Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government would always be able to send immigrants over the route, as they would keep a sufficient staff to send by this way those who desired; they could do that if the number were not materially increased over what it had been during the past two seasons. The hon. gentleman was wrong in saying that the number of immigrants had decreased; when the Government placed the road in the hands of a contractor the number increased.

Voice—For the first few months.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said during the first year they carried more than they ever had before, and what his hon. friend spent during the last year he had control of this business was no less than $399,628.10. This the hon. gentleman wished to see repeated, although, if he recollected aright, only immigrants went over the road that year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the system might have been continued during the last two years. The immigrants would have gone on increasing, and as the affairs of the road were improved the expenses would have decreased; at least that was what they expected.

Mr. STIRTON said this was a matter in which he felt an interest. He had passed over the road himself to learn the treatment which the immigrants received. His right hon. friend was astray with regard to the idea that to keep the Dawson road open would have the effect of making the Americans more civil to travellers. He could tell the House that the road through the American Territory was now so perfect that no man in his senses, after experiencing the difficulties connected with the Dawson route, would attempt to go over it, when he had the other.

A passenger could go from Thunder Bay to Manitoba in five days. It was really more the interest of the Americans to make their line cheap and encourage traffic, than to fall back to the old state of things. There were last year, and he had no doubt there would be the coming season, opposition boats on the Red River, and that would tend very much to increase the comfort of travel. He knew many people who had travelled over the Dawson route, who complained bitterly of the insolent treatment they had received from pups of officials put on by the right hon. member for Kingston. They were so disgusted they never travelled that way again; one dose was quite as much as they were willing to take of that medicine. He thought the Government were quite right in making a change. If they followed the advice of the right hon. gentleman opposite, they would throw away their money.

Mr. COOK said he would not have referred to the question, but for the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac. In conversation with Mr. Carpenter, that gentleman had repeatedly stated that he had the plant, stages, horses, provisions and everything necessary to carry passengers over the route, and it would be a great advantage to him to get all the travel he could accommodate. Parties who had gone over the route since it came under the management of the contractor said it was far more successful than under the late administration. He (Mr. Cook) did not speak from hearsay, but he had heard Mr. Carpenter say it would be in the interests of the Company if they could get as many as possible to travel over the route.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that in regard to the relative merits of the Dawson route, when managed by the Government and when under contract by Messrs. Carpenter & Co., he could only say that it was quite certain that the Dawson route had had at least the merit of cheapening the rate charged by the American lines. As soon as the Government was in a position to offer to transport immigrants from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry for ten dollars, then the rates on the American lines were reduced, and the vexatious United States Custom House regulations removed. Again, the Dawson route must be credited with the salvation of the North-West. If no such communication had existed, no force could have entered in 1870 to restore order, and the Dominion of Canada would have been to-day only one-third of its present area. In the matter of the Carpenter contract, he had warned the Government last year what would be the result, and showed how they really offered to the contractors a premium for not carrying emigrants, and he was not surprised at the statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac. He (Mr. Schultz) had heard these reports, and from so many and various sources that he thought there must be some truth in them. In regard to the reference made by the hon. member for South Wellington concerning the great advantage of the American over our present mixed land water route he entirely agreed with him, but he (Mr. Schultz) thought that when the hon. gentleman drew attention to that difference he did not see that he was directly condemning the policy of the Government in the matter of railway communication as propounded by the Hon. Premier. Where it was proposed to sever the parts of the railways, there were already waggon roads, and suppose the railroads were built, there still would exist the difficulties which made the Dawson route expensive and the Carpenter contract a failure. It would require a very large expenditure of money between Shebandowan and Rat Portage to reduce the number of breaks by portages to seven; and were this all done, yet as against the American route with its one transshipment, not a passenger nor a pound of freight would go over the line. He regretted very much to hear the Premier express himself to the effect that there was a doubt about the ultimate connection of these two detached railways, and that in that case these water stretches would be made available. He begged to refer the Premier to his remarks on this subject when the matter was up last year, and he took occasion to again warn the Government of the fallacy of a mixed land and water route to connect Lake Superior with Red River—a fallacy which he feared would lead to the useless expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars. If the Government were not quite certain that they would be able to connect these two links of rail, then far better stop the work at once, for the expenditure would be only so much money thrown away.

Hon. Mr. POPE said the original fare on the Dawson route was $30 per head. He had induced his colleagues to reduce it to $10 per head. Previous to that they could not get a reasonable rate over the American lines, but after that the rate was reduced. The advantage of the route was therefore shown by the effect it had in reducing the price by the other route, and removing obstacles to emigrants going that way. Although the expense was large, it was money well laid out, and it would be a mistake to give up the idea we could send passengers over our own route.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said the Dawson route, while almost wholly useless as an emigrant road had been of very great advantage in reducing the cost of transporting supplies to the North-West. The very fact of its having been given to a company two years ago had the effect of making the people in Minnesota reduce their rates still more. They are shrewd men, and having very little confidence in their own government they thought the Dawson route would be more efficiently managed by the contractor than by the Government. He thought the Administration should still be prepared to carry emigrants and freight by the Dawson route if any attempt were made by the Americans to enforce higher rates. It should not be given up altogether. He understood the Americans would still further reduce their rates this year. It was hardly fair to say it was money thrown away to spend on the railroads connecting with the water ways, provided they were adopted for an all-rail road,—and were not taken out of the way.

Mr. SCHULTZ—What would the hon. gentlemen use it for, because it has been shown to be of very little practical use heretofore?

Mr. SMITH said the hon. gentleman would surely allow it was a very different thing to have a railroad and to have of a waggon road. Many things could be brought into the country by means of a rail and water route which could not be carried by an ordinary waggon or cart, and they could be usefully employed while progress was being made with the railroad. He would be very sorry to see it stop short with this rail and water route. On the contrary, he hoped and trusted there would be a through railroad carried out with all possible speed.

Mr. TROW dissented from the expression of several members with regard to the Dawson route. He had the pleasure (not the torture) of passing over that route in 1874, and he thought the correct policy for the Government would be to continue it. The plant is joint property. It was there, and, of course, valuable, and could be used for the water stretchers. By the construction of a railway from Thunder Bay to Shebandowan, a distance of some 45 or 50 miles, the stage would be done away with for that distance. Then there were very few portages in the water way from Shebandowan to the North-West Angle, and when the balance of the railroad was completed from there to Red River, emigrants could be taken from Fort William to Winnipeg in the course of three or four days. It was a very pleasant route. He had travelled it, and so far from discourtesy having been shown the emigrants, the contractor had stages ready for them when they landed from the steamer, and they were generally speaking treated kindly. It was true there was some discontent, but it was caused by a colony from Marquette to the number of three or four hundred, under Mr. Rolston. Some of them were not very moral, and they caused trouble and disturbance on the route. The construction of the two stretches of railway would make it a very agreeable road for a pleasure trip in summer, and almost as convenient as the Red River route would be for years to come. Of course our Government would make the road to Pembina, but there was a connecting link that might not be made for some years. The Red River was not the most navigable on the continent. It was broken with rapids, and boats had often been delayed two or three days on the way. He had known passengers who went by the Dawson route to be two days ahead of those who went by the American route.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said any one who had heard the hon. member for South Wellington must come to the conclusion it was impossible for us to hope to compete with the American lines. The main advantage of the Dawson Route was to save us from being at the mercy of the Americans. He wished to know whether there was not precisely the same objection to expending money on railways and water stretches between Thunder Bay and Red River that existed (in a greater degree he admitted) against the Dawson route? He would show the House what the route was the Premier proposed to construct, and was now constructing, and ask whether every dollar that was to be expended on that line would not be completely thrown away. Last Session the Premier said: "One of the most important things to be looked to in opening up our North West country is to obtain speedy means of ingress from Lake Superior. It is felt that it is extremely difficult for us to pour a large population into that country when the expense of transport from Fort William westward is so great; and it is deemed advisable that we should not be driven for any length of time to "pour a tide of emigration through any portion of the United States in order to reach our own territory." We know too well the kind of civility extended to our immigrants passing over American lines not to provide means of ingress at the earliest possible moment into the Red River if we wish to take them safely to Manitoba, instead of leaving them settled in Minnesota.

This was the description of the line of communication that the First Minister is now engaged to make: "The entire distance from Red River to Lake Superior is in round numbers 430 miles by the Dawson route. Of this we have surveyed and located a line, and asked for tenders for 155 or 160 miles. This leaves a distance between the two points of 270 miles. Of that distance we will be able, by constructing two cheap wooden locks at Fort Francis, to obtain from Rat Portage uninterrupted steam navigation for a distance of nearly 200 miles to Sturgeon Falls, at the east end of Rainy Lake. From this point eastwards towards Lake Shebandowan, although there is a continuous water navigation with a number of small portages, still the country is, on the whole, tolerably favourable."

There are 200 miles of water stretches and half a dozen portages, which amount to a dozen transhipments. What would hon. gentlemen say of this road after all the enormous expenditures that have been made, involving the construction of locks, portages and railways from Shebandowan to Rat Portage and Red River? He would give the Premier's own description of the work when finished:

"We hope within two years, or two and half at the outside, that we will have a railway finished at the eastern and western ends, and with these and the locks at Fort Francis we expect that the distance altogether may be traversed in four or five days at the outside, that now takes on the average from nine to twelve days."

He asked the hon. gentleman whether he could for a single instant question the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar, who said that when all expenditure had been incurred and the line provided, every dollar would be thrown away, because the immigrants will go from Duluth to Winnipeg by rail instead of spending four or five days to get from Thunder Bay to Red River. The remarks which had fallen from the First Minister had disappointed him, because he was in hopes that the years of delay which had taken place would have led him to propound a different policy in relation to this measure.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have propounded no policy.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER supposed the Premier had propounded a policy to the House. He had taken the hon. gentleman's own words, and had hoped that he would have adopted the course pressed upon him some two years ago, and again last Session. He was extremely anxious that the line should commence at Nepigon, and take the course which would save sixty or eighty miles to travellers from this section of the country to Red River. But the hon. gentleman had adopted a different course, and had selected Thunder Bay. He had hoped that further consideration, examination and reflection on this question would have brought the hon. gentleman to the conclusion—in which he would have been sustained by every gentleman in the House—that instead of building 150 miles of railway through a difficult country, and connecting with water stretches that would render every dollar of the money utterly useless, he would announce his intention to push as rapidly as possible the connection from Shebandowan to Rat Portage by rail. If that were done, the expenditure, it is true, would be larger, but we would have a line to compete with that from Duluth. The policy of continuing these water stretches he regarded as fatal. The expenditure on the work would be thrown away, and the Americans would still monopolise the transportation of immigrants in this section. He hoped the Hon. First Minister would ask the assent of Parliament to push that line of rail from Thunder Bay to the waters of the Red River.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I cannot imagine that the hon. gentleman was in when I spoke, or he would not have made his speech. I stated distinctly that we had had a line surveyed on a much more favorable route than ever before obtained from Lake Superior to Rat Portage.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I entirely misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I understood him to refer to the contracts between the line from Nepigon and that from Thunder Bay.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said from the summit level they had obtained a much more favourable route than the Nepigon one, and reached that point by at least as short a distance as if they had gone by the northern and most expensive route. The hon. gentleman seemed to object to their using the water in the meantime. What could any person do but use the best means of communication between the two points until the railway could be constructed? It might or might not suit the financial affairs of the country to have this road built—that was for the future to determine; but it was the policy of the Government to have the road constructed as soon as possible, and they would strain every nerve to that end. Their policy in the meantime was to build to the water and use it as means of communication between the two points during the interval. As he had stated, it would take, under the most favourable circumstances, four or five years to connect; but were they to stand idle and refuse to put a canoe or a steamboat on those lakes until that work was completed. Until the road was fit for running they proposed to do the best they could with the water communication, and no one could reasonably object to such an arrangement. The hon. gentleman, however, had set himself most determinedly to go to Lake Nepigon and nowhere else.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Oh, no; that was owing to the misunderstanding.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then there is no difference between us, except the disposition to criticise.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was extremely glad to hear the statement of the Hon. First Minister, with the exception of one qualification—that was, that he intended to push the road as rapidly as possible, providing the financial condition of the country would permit. He (Mr. Tupper) would decide that at the outset. If the finances would not allow the rapid prosecution of the work, he would say don't waste any money in large expenditures, which in his opinion would be useless, until the road was pushed through. No one could object to using water communication for the purpose of constructing the railway, but if they were not in a position to carry the project through, the expenditure was thrown away.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked if the hon. gentleman could not see this? Suppose they were not able, after the coming year, to proceed with the intervening portions; to have 120 miles at the west end and 60 at the east would necessarily facilitate the completion of the other part when they were able. He could not say they would not be able to make arrangements, but he hoped they would. He took credit to himself and colleagues for cheapening the rate of transportation. Last season they carried immigrants from Quebec to Manitoba $10 to $12 cheaper than ever before. He did not blame anyone in this connection. No doubt the hon. gentlemen opposite made the best arrangement they could, only the present Government had made better, and more economical arrangements.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Did they go over the Duluth road?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They did.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The fares were cheapened in that way then?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not at all. We simply made better arrangements.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he was glad to hear these explanations, as few questions interested the people more than this. If he understood the Hon. Premier the proposition was to have two roads—one by the water stretches and a better road somewhere to the north of Lake Nepigon.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had misunderstood him. It would perhaps be better not to discuss the Pacific Railway further, and he would give more information when the proper time arrived. The hon. gentleman again explained the proposed route.

Mr. MITCHELL said if he had understood his hon. friend, after getting the water stretches they might still have to build a line of railway from Lake Superior to Lac de Mille Lacs or Manitoba. Did not his hon. friend propose, when the Pacific Railway was built ultimately, that these water stretches should form part of that line of communication?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! No!

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Well, then, I accept the statement made by the hon. gentleman, and I will defer any remarks I might have to make until the broader question comes up; but I must confess that I rather misunderstood his explanations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Regarding this subject of the Pacific Railway, I would remind my hon. friend that papers promised in the speech from the Throne have not yet been brought down.

Mr. MASSON said it had been stated by different hon. gentlemen that it was the intention of the late Government—as was the proper course—to keep open the Dawson road, which would have the effect of lessening the rates upon United States railways; and he would draw the attention of the Administration to the fact that the Hon. Premier last year stated that his policy would be to connect Fort William and Fort Garry. He then announced that the road could not be built within two and one half, or three years; and were they to understand, that while this Dawson route was closed, save for mails, immigrants were to be forced to go through the United States? If this was the case, the American companies would raise their rates and defeat the object kept in view by the previous Government in this connection.

The motion being carried.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, in reply to the right hon. member for Kingston, stated that he would shortly lay on the Table the papers promised in the speech from the Throne, including the Orders in Council referring to the Esquimault Railway difficulty, the despatch of the British Columbia Government, and the subsequent petition to the Queen adopted by the Legislature of that Province. After the Speech from the Throne was delivered here, however, these papers, he remarked, had all been published in British Columbia, although they should first have been laid on the Table of this House. In the meantime, the 19th sec. of the Act of 1874 required the Minister of Public Works to place upon the Table of the House statements of the progress made on the works of the Pacific Railway, with the expenditures up to date for the year, and copies of all the contracts concerned. He now laid on the Table a copy of all contracts entered into on the Pacific Railway, with a simple memorandum from the Chief Engineer; also a general report such as could be published, conveying some detailed statements of the various surveys and explorations, which had taken place in different parts of the country. The engineers returns for the year would necessarily fill a volume of considerable size, but this was not what was desired. Some of the engineers had just arrived from very remote distances, but he hoped to have all the possible information submitted before the rising of the House. At present the report would be somewhat incomplete, giving however a bird's eye view of their transactions during the year. He hoped hon. gentlemen opposite would be satisfied with these explanations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—These explanations, which the hon. gentleman proposes to give, will I suppose, be accompanied by a somewhat general report from the engineer, furnishing this bird's eye view, of which my hon. friend speaks?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Of course.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The verbal statement of my hon. friend, although he speaks with great precision, cannot be equal in value to a report committed on paper.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the House adjourned at Ten minutes after Eleven p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto)—To incorporate the British Canadian Investment Company.

Mr. BOURASSA—To amend the Bankruptcy Act of 1875.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria)—To incorporate the National Loan and Life Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. McDUGALL (Elgin)—To amend the Act incorporating the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew)—To amend the Act passed at the last Session relating to the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company.

THE NORTH WEST TERRITORIES.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the House went into Committee, Mr. Mills in the chair, on the Act respecting the North-West Territories.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that in order to meet the views of his hon. friend opposite, he proposed to introduce a preamble as follows:—Whereas it is expedient, pending the settlement of the North-West Territories, to create a separate territory of the eastern portion of the North-West Territories, therefore Her Majesty, &c.

With regard to the proposition made by his hon. friend from British Columbia, that the territory north of British Columbia and the 60th parallel should be provided for in this Bill, he would reply that having examined the map carefully he found that this would not be as remote from the seat of Government of British Columbia, as from the seat of Government of the North-West Territories. They proposed in order to prevent any possible temporary inconvenience, to give British Columbia magistrates current jurisdiction in that part of the territory lying north of the Columbia and west of the Mackenzie River, and the 120th parallel. This country would be placed under the authority of existing laws. He proposed to fill the blank in the 1st section by inserting after the word "district," the title Keewatin, which would be the name of the new territory, signifying the North Land; also to fill up blanks in the 4th section, by inserting the words "not exceeding ten, and not less than five."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK took objection to the 6th clause on the ground that too much power would be given to the Lieutenant Governor in Council—the power of amending or repealing any of the laws passed by the Parliament of Canada. In the 11th section it was declared that certain laws should be applicable to the District—criminal laws for instance, so peculiarly under Federal jurisdiction. The power in question was greater than that conferred upon Local Legislatures. He suggested in consequence that the last part of the 6th clause should be struck out, as a year's delay respecting such legislation could do no harm.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said there was no no doubt a good deal to be said in favour of what the hon. gentleman remarked, but there had been some experience of this kind of legislation before, and there was no reason to suppose from it that there was anything improper in this clause. No ordinance of the North-West Council would have force unless marked "urgent," and even then it would be subject to disallowance. The proposition was simply to keep the status quo in this territory until it was either annexed to Manitoba or otherwise dealt with so as to be in possession of provincial rights and privileges.

The clause, and the two following, were adopted.

On clause nine,

Mr. MOUSSEAU said this clause seemed to empower the Government of the New Province to repeal clause 11 of the Act of last Session securing separate schools to the North-West Territories. He wished to know if this was the case.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the 11th clause of the North-West Territories Act was not yet in force, and would not apply to any of these territories until the Act was proclaimed. It was a clause which could only come into force practically in connection with a system of taxation, no provision for which was made in this portion of the territories so long as it remained under this form of Government. The future of these territories would be either one of two things-- they would be annexed to Manitoba, or they would be detached from Keewatin and re-annexed to the North-West. In either case the rights of the minority would be protected. There was no intention on the part of the Government to depart from the general principle of the 11th clause. If the territories were attached to Manitoba they would be subject to the laws of that Province; if to the North-West, they would come under the 11th clause of the Act of last Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—If I understand it, by simply proclaiming the Act of 1875 this 11th clause will come into force.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Certainly. The clause and the following one were adopted.

On clause 11,

Mr. BUNSTER moved to strike out the provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the territory.

The motion was lost and the clause was adopted.

The remaining clauses of the Bill were adopted without discussion.

On the motion to adopt the preamble.

Mr. SCHULTZ said a more honourable name than Keewatin might have been selected, and he would take occasion to suggest one before the third reading of the Bill.

The preamble was adopted and the Committee rose and reported the Bill as amended.

The amendments having been concurred in the Bill was read the third time and passed.

LAW RELATING TO VIOLENCE, THREATS AND MOLESTATIONS.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill entitled an "Act to amend the Criminal Law relating to violence, threats and molestations." He desired to direct the attention of the House to a slight alteration in the proposed clause from that which was recently passed in England. The English clause in this particular referred to "any person using violence towards or intimidating his wife, child or other person, or injuring his property." There was an objection to the word "intimidates," as to whether it constituted a sufficient definition of crime. He therefore asked leave to insert a sub-section in which the words were changed to imperilling or injuring a person's property; but, of course, all the sub-sections were subject to the governing clause, which provides that the action must be wrongful and for the purpose of preventing a person from doing what he had no legal right to do, or compelling him to do what he had a legal right to do. There was a provision giving the right to the accused to object before the tribunal authorized to try him summarily, and thereupon the offence was made indictable.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said it was suggested that something further ought to be in the Bill, which was not in the English Law--that was with reference to threats of accusing of crime. There were two or three classes of crime which would naturally suggest themselves to his hon. friend, where the accusation would be as great and serious an intimidation as any threat of personal violence or injury to property. He suggested the Bill should be changed to bring such offences within its scope.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called attention to a threat of this kind:—"You must continue to work in this place, or I will do you mischief." The injury was not described, but it was intimidation; it probably did not mean violence to persons or property.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It must be one or the other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said a threat might be made to injure the reputation, which was not property. There might be charges which did not amount to personal violence or injury to property, but still would affect a man's character. He suggested that his hon. friend take this into consideration.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said of course he would give the suggestions of his friends due consideration, but he thought that as practical legislators it was better for them to provide punishment for the offences named by law than attempt to conjure up different kinds of possible threats which were unknown in this country. Probably many of the cases to which reference had been made by his hon. friends would be met by the existing law. By legislating for that class of crimes the objection might be raised by a large number in the community to its being class legislation, and they ought to be careful in dealing with such matters. He would remind his hon. friends, while not interposing objections to their views, that agreeing thereto would be making a new law, the utility of which had not been demonstrated by experience or required by public necessity.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON remarked that a case of the kind to which he had referred had come before one of the Courts of Assize last month. He trusted the Hon. Minister of Justice would look into the matter before the final disposition of the Bill.

SUITS AGAINST THE CROWN.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill to make further provision for the institution of suits against the Crown by Petition of Right.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked how far this measure would affect the interest of parties who had fyled Petitions of Right under the Act of last Session on this subject. Certain parties in Nova Scotia who had fyled petitions under that law had been treated by the Government in a manner which caused them great disappointment, and of which they had just reason to complain. He understood that when a law existed under which people are permitted to proceed against the Crown by Petition of Right, the consent of the Crown was assumed to be given in all cases except some, possibly, of a very exceptional character, and that the clause in the Act providing for the Governor in Council granting or refusing permission to proceed, was only intended to protect the right of the Crown—not for the purpose of enabling the Government capriciously or at will to say that one party should be allowed to make a Petition of Right and the other not, but for the purpose of preserving the Royal prerogative. He thought he was safe in saying that this was the principle on which Petitions of Right were dealt with in England, on whose law with respect to this subject this Bill was modelled. He thought also that there was scarcely any class of cases in which persons complying with the law were prevented from fyling Petitions of Right and from bringing their claims to judicial decision. The parties in Nova Scotia to whom he alluded complained, however, that they had sent in a Petition of Right in June last with regard to certain claims which they professed to have—a petition which they were entitled to send in under the Act of last Session—and the Government had treated it with contempt, or that the Government had not been able to arrive at such a decision with respect to it as those parties considered they had a right to claim. The petition in question was fyled in June last by parties who had been contractors on the Intercolonial Railway. On the 15th of September the Minister of Militia telegraphed:

“OTTAWA, 15th September, 1875.
“John Starr. Papers waiting opinion “Minister of Justice. Decision will be “communicated to you shortly.”

He (Mr. Tupper) thought that if a Petition of Right was to have any effect at all an answer should be given to it before such a length of time had elapsed as between June and September. He thought that the Government were bound immediately upon the fyling of a petition of right to give the parties presenting it an opportunity of proceeding to have their claims dealt with; but in this case the petition of right was sent in in time; the parties were informed by one of the members of the Government on the 15th September, that the papers were in the hands of the Minister of Justice, and that the decision upon them would be communicated shortly. The First Minister was in Halifax; and a month after the telegram from the Minister of Militia, that on the 18th November, 1875, Mr. Starr addressed a respectful letter to the Minister of Justice, as follows:—

“When Mr. Mackenzie was here he said our Petition of Right, presented last June, was referred to you, and would have immediate attention. Delay is extremely disastrous and only increases our claim for damages. Please advise if Governor General’s fiat has been granted; if not, how soon it will be. “JOHN STARR.”

The Hon. Minister of Justice was kind enough to reply, and he (Mr. Tupper) trusted that his letter would not be taken as a model in style in future for communication between even so august a functionary as the Minister of Justice, and the most humble of Her Majesty’s subjects.

He said: “In reply to a telegram dated the 18th inst., I beg to state that I am not in a position to give the information you require.” He was told by the Minister of Militia a month before that the papers were in the hands of the Minister of Justice, and that a decision would be shortly given. He had also been told by the First Minister—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I beg to contradict that at once; on the contrary, I told him that I was not in a position to say whether there were any grounds for presenting a petition or not.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER presumed that none of the applicants were silly enough to suppose that the First Minister was the person to decide this matter. He did not think that the gentleman in question said anything of the kind. The conversation had taken place in presence of a large number of gentlemen, including representatives of the press, and was published. The First Minister had said that the papers were in the hands of the Minister of Justice, and would obtain immediate attention; and if the hon. gentleman did not make such a statement it was his bounden duty to have done so, with respect to the request of the humblest of Her Majesty’s subjects. Mr. Starr wrote again at some length urging the Minister of Justice to give his decision, and pointing out the great difficulty in which he was placed by the delay. He did not say that the claim was just, but he believed that at all events it should have been submitted for judicial decision. The Minister of Justice received a very large income for the discharge of such duties; but what did the hon. gentleman say in reply? and this was certainly a model for correspondents—“I have your favour of the 25th inst. It not being in my province to communicate the decisions of the Government, I have transmitted your letter to the Secretary of State, the proper officer, who will now give it immediate attention.” This was the answer to a promise made as long ago as the 15th September. The petitioner, in suppliant tones, merely asked what he should or should not do—nothing more; and the Minister replied that it was not his business to communicate decisions of the Government. The petitioner then addressed the Secretary of State, the papers having already been in the possession of the Minister of Justice and Administration for five or six months. He obtained no information from this source, however, and he again addressed him. On the 7th of December Mr. Starr received the first intimation from the Government respecting the Petition of Right filed in June, and what was it? “An official letter was sent to your counsel on the 1st inst. A copy of that letter will be sent to-day.” Under the law passed by this Parliament, previously, to give relief in such cases, these claims should have been referred for judicial decision. After all these delays, the following amusing letter was despatched:—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

“OTTAWA, Dec. 1st, 1875.

“Adverting to the petition of Messrs. Starr & Wolfe, transmitted with your letter, on the 5th of June last, I am directed to acquaint you for the information of the petitioners, that the action of the Government, upon the matter to which their petition relates, is for the present deferred.”

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—That is my advice.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The hon. gentleman said that this was his advice. Did he think that subjects of Her Majesty in this Dominion had no right to an answer regarding a question of this kind after six months’ delay? And did he not think that by the law passed by this Parliament, a person presenting such a claim had a right to the information whether he would be permitted to proceed or not? The reply might well be epitomised as hope deferred. He wished to learn whether such action was taken with the purpose of bringing in a Bill to change the law.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Precisely.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER continued, that if this was the case, the Government occupied an entirely indefensible position. In Great Britain, he believed, under such circumstances, trial by Jury was granted, with reference to questions of fact as well as law. In Halifax, he knew, respecting matters in which the Imperial Government was concerned, prompt attention was given to them, and parties had the opportunity of establishing the facts as far as they were able. He could hardly conceive of a greater injustice, or of anything reflecting more seriously on this Parliament, than deliberately to change the law. In this relation he thought that the Government were very strongly censurable for having treated an applicant with such discourtesy, and he trusted that in the measure submitted care would be taken providing that no parties would be deprived of any of the rights they at present possessed.

Mr. IRVING remarked that he had understood the hon. member for Cumberland to say that persons had the right to have their cases tried under Petitions of Right at present; and that under the Bill of the Minister of Justice, these rights were changed. The Bill he himself had introduced at the last Session, did not propose in any case of this kind that the question should be determined by a jury, but by a Judge only; therefore the hon. member for Cumberland could not have read carefully the bill of last Session.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I am entirely misunderstood. I stated that under the Imperial Act persons had a right to trial by jury.

Mr. IRVING continued, that the hon. member for Cumberland had said the Bill deprived litigants of some rights assured them in the spirit of the bill of last Session. This was the point he intended to answer.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I enquired if it did.

Mr. IRVING added that the Minister of Justice said this Bill did not deprive litigants of any rights. He wished to draw the attention of the hon. member of Cumberland to the point, that it ill became him to assume the position he had taken; because he (Mr. Tupper) and a large number of his followers had voted to deprive the public of the right of trial by jury in connection with the bill concerning the Supreme Court and Court of Exchequer.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that the hon. member for Cumberland had mixed up the case of a suitor under the existing law with the general discussion. It was quite true, as he had explained on making the motion for the first reading, that the bill proposed to substitute for various local tribunals the Supreme Court as the only tribunal for hearing these cases. Many reasons which he considered sufficiently obvious existed justifying this course. It was thought that the moment a Supreme and Exchequer Court was by Parliament established, that claims against the Crown in Chancery, in a word, against the Federal Government, should be tryable only in that Court. Several of the considerations in question would suggest themselves to every one; the place of trial frequently might be partly in one and partly in another place, and in fact would very often, as he had mentioned at the first reading, be in this city, for many of these cases involved the consideration of public documents, plans, contracts and the evidence of public officers connected with the Departments. He was charged with disregard for the interests of the subject; but he had made express provision that the trial might be had partly in one place and partly in another, as far as was necessary in order to promote expedition, economy, efficiency and convenience, both with regard to the Crown and subject.

Now, he was glad to know that the hon. gentleman's chief and leader, taking a more dispassionate view of this case, taking a more statesman-like view of the functions of a member of Parliament, did not hesitate when the Bill was read the first time, to commend that provision and give his hearty assent to the trial of these cases in the Supreme Court alone. Another provision of this Bill, indicating to the hon. gentleman's distorted view a disregard of the rights of the people, was one by which the area of cases to which the Petition of Right was extended was considerably enlarged. The hon. gentleman was not expected to be conversant with the subject, and therefore, if he had been forced to speak, inaccuracies of statement would have been excusable; but otherwise they were not. The Act of last Session was intended by Parliament to exclude entirely a very large class of cases from Petition of Right. He was not prepared to say it had effectually excluded the whole of that class, but it had a large number of them which were included in this Bill. From his experience, the Bill of last Session would exclude nine out of every ten cases of contracts entered into with the Department of Public Works. Under this measure there would be no longer statutory power, as there was in the Act of last Session, preventing the subject from trying out a case with the Crown. If it should be one in which, between subject and subject, there would be ground for action, the court would decide whether such ground existed or not. He believed this to be an important extension, applicable to several Petitions of Right which were before him (Mr. Blake) as law officer of the Crown. He had felt it a great difficulty, more responsibility and a larger duty than he thought should be imposed on the law officer of the Crown. When he came to deal with these petitions which were presented under local laws, after a full consideration he had decided they should be tryable only in one Court; and he had suggested to his colleagues that action upon these petitions should be deferred until Parliament had an opportunity of deciding upon amending the law. That advice had been accepted, and Parliament should decide whether the proper course had been pursued. This was what the hon. member for Cumberland thought the Government were highly censurable for doing. If the hon. gentleman thought he could procure from the House and country a verdict of condemnation, he knew the proper course to pursue.

The hon. gentleman had asserted the assent of the Crown was technical. On the contrary, it was an important element, the law officer of the Crown being responsible in each case to Parliament. He believed the general and wholesome rule was to grant a fiat. It was only where a case was plainly frivolous and vexatious, and where an improper use was attempted to be made of this right to present petitions, that the law officer of the Crown ought to take the responsibility of refusing the fiat. Still, he felt from his own experience, and what he had learned on the subject, there might be cases in which it should be refused. In that particular the Act was placed precisely on the same ground as it stood in England.

The hon. gentleman had referred to a particular case in which delay and discourtesy had been shown. Immediately after the petitions were placed in his hands, the questions raised came before him for decision. They were so serious and it was so difficult to decide whether action should be taken or not, that careful consideration and advice were required. He felt that it was no very light responsibility that he was taking when he ultimately advised that this action should be taken. The decision was in its nature one which would not be satisfactory to the petitioners. They wanted a decision, and he did not want to decide any petition adversely. He preferred taking the judgment of Parliament in the sense in which this Bill was to be proposed, and it would be unfair to give an advantage to one more than to others. No one had a right to approach the Crown for legal proceedings; the Petition of Right was only granted last Session.

With reference to the question of discourtesy, Mr. Starr took the very unusual course of telegraphing from Halifax to the Minister of Militia at the expense of the Department. He deluged the office with telegrams, one of which cost $4. That reached a climax, and Mr. Starr was informed he must pay for his own despatches. Having received a telegram from that gentleman, he (Mr. Blake) replied by letter, stating that he was unable to give an opinion, and this was the discourtesy complained of.

The hon. gentleman complained that he had written another discourteous letter. After communicating with the Minister of Militia, Mr. Starr wrote to him (Mr. Blake). The proceedings were conducted in his office until such time as he had advised the Government and they had come to a conclusion. The question of dealing with various petitioners was then considered, and it was perceived to be impossible for them to indicate the course they intended to pursue. It was, therefore, decided to refer each petitioner, as he applied, to the official organ, who would simply and plainly intimate that the action was deferred. They took this responsibility of deferring action with the view of submitting to Parliament the proposed amendment of the law, and they conceived it would be improper to disclose to suitors their propositions in advance of disclosing them to Parliament. Having made this arrangement, he wrote to Mr. Starr to the effect that not being the official medium of communication of the Government, it was not within his province to reply, and intimated that the Secretary of State was the proper person. At the same time he sent Mr. Starr's letter to the Secretary of State with the request that he would give it his immediate attention. What was there discourteous and improper in this? He had before him a telegram from Mr. Starr stating that he had done what was satisfactory to him. The charge that the Secretary of State was the cause of the delay was also unfounded. Any delay that might have occurred was owing to the neglect of Mr. Starr's legal advisers in forwarding him the letter of the Secretary of State. He denied that either that official or himself had been guilty of discourtesy to the petitioner.

No man's rights were taken away by this Bill; on the contrary, they were enlarged. In England there was a wholesome sound principle of legislation which objected to retroactive measures. It was a cardinal rule, however, that that practice should not apply to procedure. But the machinery by which the law was enforced was frequently changed whenever the public interest required. In this instance the form was changed, but the petitioner still had his rights. His petition would be tried in a tribunal which he hoped was not an unfit one, and with which Mr. Starr had expressed his satisfaction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said when the Bill was introduced he expressed his satisfaction with the clause placing the jurisdiction in the Supreme Court; this arrangement was advantageous to the suitor against the Crown. He objected to that portion of the hon. gentleman's reply to the member for Cumberland, in which he said if the Government had acted wrongly in this matter, there was the remedy of appealing to Parliament. That was not a satisfactory reply to any charge of neglect of duty, which ought to be answered, and the hon. gentleman might have thrown himself upon the House, Hon. Mr. BLAKE.—I should willingly throw myself on the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—That would be rather taking me at a disadvantage. He doubted whether the hon. gentleman had the right to assume the grave responsibility of deferring the claim until legislation had been effected. His hon. friend ought to bear in mind when he was passing the Petition of Rights Act, that it would be well at once to give jurisdiction to the General Courts. An Act was in existence at the time of this correspondence conferring the right on any person having a claim against the Crown to proceed in the Courts where a petition could be properly tried.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he pointed out certain exceptions, which in his opinion applied to many petitions. For obvious reasons he declined to say whether they would apply to the case referred to by the member for Cumberland.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD quite understood that, but if Mr. Starr had no right, under the Act of last Session, his hon. friend ought to have told him so and refused the fiat. That would not have prevented the gentleman from re-petitioning under the new measure. The hon. member for Cumberland did not attribute any neglect to the Minister of Justice. The industry and ability of that hon. gentleman in private and professional life were well known, and he had no doubt those qualities would be carried into his public duties. But this treatment of an unlettered man was not just the thing.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Is it owing to Mr. Starr's use of the telegraph that my friend calls him an "unlettered" man?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Apart from that, Mr. Starr was a layman and unaccustomed to official procedure. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) could quite understand from what had dropped from the Minister of Justice the reason that that hon. gentleman had kept this matter in suspense. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought that as the hon. gentleman had restricted the right of petitioners with regard to tribunals before which their cases should be tried, he might as well go still further and abolish the official arbitrators altogether. He thought that was a very clumsy mode of disposing of matters arising under the operation of the Public Works Act. He admitted now, as he had admitted before, that he thought that the Crown was always at a disadvantage in the trying before a jury claims against the Board of Works or any other public department; and he thought that such cases should be tried entirely without the intervention of a jury. In such cases the jury generally looked on the Government in the light of a large corporation, of which they were not members, and in which they had no interest, and thought that it was well always to give the verdict against the Crown. He therefore thoroughly approved of the limitation proposed by this Bill, under which the Court should judge of fact as well as of law, and if this were provided, what was the use of a reference to a Court of Arbitrators? He thought that, in this respect, they might take an example from the United States. There they had a Court of Claims, the judges of which, like those of the Supreme Court, held office during good behaviour. The Court of Claims was a High Court of Justice. The gentlemen who were selected to preside in it were professional men, and their decisions were looked upon as being as solemn adjudications as those of the Supreme Court itself, or very nearly so. He believed that in the United States no preliminary enquiry was necessary, but that any party could file a petition of this character against the Government of that country. As a matter of course, he brought the action at his own risk and it was adjudicated on. He (Sir John) thought also that the court of claims judged of fact as well as law. Under all the circumstances he would press upon the Government the advisability of doing away with the official arbitrators, and leaving all these matters to be tried by the Supreme Court and the Court of Exchequer.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said he agreed very much with what his hon. friend had said with regard to Courts of Arbitrators. Every person who had ever been engaged in arbitrations must be very well aware of the great amount of time they occupied and the large expense they involved; and must be ready to admit that the results of them were sometimes anything but satisfactory. He thought that the Minister of Justice should have the right of saying whether the fiat should be issued or not, because that hon. gentleman would not be likely to refuse it when it ought to be granted; and that these cases should stand on the same footing as others. He must confess, that with regard to this particular case which had been the subject of discussion this afternoon, he had been unable to see anything wrong or unfair in the conduct of the Minister of Justice. He could not help thinking that there were circumstances connected with the administration of new laws, under which the gentleman occupying that position should be very careful with respect to the course he took. In England, when the Attorney General had the right to refuse Petitions of Right, there had during the last three-quarters of a century been only three cases made the subject of discussion in Parliament which had not been allowed to go before the Judges. In two of those instances the Legislature maintained the view the Attorney General had taken; and in the third, the celebrated case of Baron Vokes, it was decided, but without at all reflecting upon the Attorney General that the petition should be granted. He (Mr. Cameron) hoped with his right hon. friend from Kingston that if it were possible the Government would revise this whole measure as far as it related to submitting cases connected with public works to arbitrators, and placing the decision of such matters entirely in the hands of one tribunal, he ventured to assert that this change would be satisfactory to the whole Dominion.

The Bill was then read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Scatcherdin the chair.

The first eighteen clauses passed without discussion.

On the 19th clause,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that he would now make some remarks which he had been prevented by the Rules of the House from making in reply to the observations of hon. gentleman a short time ago. The Committee would see that this Bill did not propose to extend the power of reference to official arbitrators. All that it did was to provide that all cases under the existing law which the Minister of Justice might refer to arbitration, he would be permitted to refer under this, with the consent of the Governor in Council, within a certain time after the petition was presented; and that would prevent the Minister of Justice making a fiat. The observations that his hon. friends had made were, no doubt, deserving of great consideration. When the Act had been tried, as it perhaps would be before next Session, they would be better able to judge how far it would be practicable and prudent to repeal entirely or to restrict the provisions with reference to official arbitrators; but it would be acting rather hastily with the measure to blot out the existing remedy of arbitration before a single petition under the Petition of Right Act had been tried. He was not prepared to say that it might not be found expedient to propose, within a year, the change which his hon. friends on the other side of the House had suggested. He ventured to ask his hon. friends if he was not acting on true Conservative principles in taking this course.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that he supposed he must accept the statement of the Minister of Justice, that he had intended no discourtesy, and the statement of the member for Cardwell, that there had been nothing to complain of in regard to this matter. That did not, however, alter his (Mr. Tupper's) judgment on that point in the slightest degree. He held that it was the duty of the Minister of Justice, when these suitors asked if they were to be allowed a certain privilege which they claimed to have under an Act of this Legislature, to have answered them at once, yea or nay. He (Mr. Tupper) went further, and said that the hon. gentleman had exercised the power of the Crown in regard to this matter in a way in which it would have been impossible for this Parliament to have exercised it between subjects. It would be ex post facto legislation, and to remove rights acquired under the law and attached to a pending suit would be a course no Government should venture to propose to Parliament, and no Parliament should ratify. It was quite sufficient to prevent any Bill becoming law if it proposed that existing rights conferred by the law were to be taken away. He thought that the hon. gentleman would admit this; but what had he done? He had claimed that he had widened the privileges of the subject; but this he (Mr. Tupper) denied. The hon. gentleman, in his own statement, had not ventured to say that these parties did not enjoy such rights under a law on the Statute Book, and it did not matter whether it had been enacted one year or twenty years ago. The Minister of Justice had not imperilled his reputation as a lawyer by asserting that the party had no claim; and if this was the case he should have frankly so stated to the applicant. The hon. gentleman had deferred action until Parliament met, keeping the party in suspense for six months; and finally the petitioner had been informed that the Government refused to come to any decision, which nevertheless they were bound to have rendered. Was no injury inflicted by delay of justice? It was often a denial of justice, as it was in this instance. The parties who had been suing at the feet of the Minister of Justice for an answer as to whether their claims could be tried judicially under a Bill of Rights, had gone into bankruptcy, and this no subsequent legislation could retrieve. He asked if this was the condition of things for which the hon. gentleman took credit, and he declared that he could show that the hon. gentleman had narrowed the rights of the subject. The hon. gentleman had taken away their privileges by an introductory clause. At present claims were to be submitted to a judicial tribunal; but the amendment said in effect to these very persons—"Although you have the right under the law to proceed; although the Attorney General would be compelled to grant a fiat, the Minister of Public Works can step in at the eleventh hour between you and your legal rights and take them away; and instead of giving you the Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to decide upon the justness of your claims, he can commit them to the discretion of those men, who depend for their living from hour to hour on the word of the Minister of Public Works." Was this right? He thought not. The Government as was urged by his right hon. friend, should not have the power of placing one suitor upon one footing, and another upon another footing; this was not desirable for the Government themselves, as it would lay them upon the charge of unfairness and partiality, even when such condemnation was unmerited.

When this Administration came into power, what was one of their first acts? They deprived of his position Mr. Compton, an able officer at Halifax, who was replaced by Mr. Elliot, one of their supporters, who held another position entirely incompatible with the duties of an official arbitrator of the Public Works Department, being also Inspector of Public Works under this Government. The anomaly to have been expected consequently occurred the other day—the report of Mr. Elliot, as Inspector, was rejected by the Minister of Public Works. Let it be supposed it had been in the other direction—that he had refused to certify a claim, and the Government adopted his recommendation, and that it finally came again before this gentleman as arbitrator! Every man in this country should stand on the same footing. The power it was proposed to confer upon the Government was a dangerous one; and the Administration should not be so placed as to be open to temptation in this connection.

These claims, in nine out of ten cases, as the Minister of Justice said, were between private individuals and the Minister of Public Works; the former charged the latter in such cases with denial of justice; and yet in the Minister of Justice would be placed the power of deciding as to the manner in which their claims were to be adjudicated upon. This was contrary to the interests of the whole country, as well as to those of the Administration.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that with reference to the charge of discourtesy which the hon. gentleman had reiterated, he had not previously thanked his hon. friend from Cardwell for answering it, but as it had been repeated he must say that the hon. member for Cumberland was a bold man indeed. The hon. gentleman reminded him of the famous Six Hundred at Balaklava; although cannon to the right of him, and cannon to the left of him, volleyed and thundered, he went on, but like the famous Six Hundred again, the hon. gentleman also came back very small.

With regard to a more serious, and another personal question, the hon. gentleman naturally misapprehended his position altogether; the hon. gentleman said that he (Mr. Blake) had not ventured to imperil his reputation as a lawyer by pronouncing an opinion on the right of this particular individual in regard to the petition. He appealed to the hon. members for Kingston and Cardwell whether in the present state of this Bill, pending as it was before Parliament, he would not be inflicting a fatal stab on his professional reputation if he had not kept his mind perfectly free and unprejudiced on a subject on which he might yet have to give a decision.

With reference to the hon. gentleman's argument as to the arbitrators, he (Mr. Blake) was sorry to hear him pass such a bad compliment to the legislation of the late Government. The House had now learned from the hon. gentleman that the arbitrators who were the servants of the late Ministry, appointed by and dependent on them, were not impartial in their decisions. Reckless as the hon. gentleman was in his assaults on the character of his opponents, he should never have been so base as to attack men who were not present to defend themselves, or to insinuate that they had done injustice to the subject whose judge they were, unless he had some ground for it. This law was not confined to the Public Works Department. Other Ministers adjudicated on claims. It was only when the decision of the Minister was unsatisfactory that there was reference to the arbitrators. In all these years during which this law was on the Statute Book these same difficulties occurred, or they did not. If they did, the hon. gentleman should have amended or abolished the law; if they did not, there would be no harm in allowing the law to remain as it stood until next Session.

In the first place, the power to refer under the Statute was guarded, the whole Government being collectively responsible. In the second place, wherever the principle was one of law it would be good policy to refer it to the judicial tribunal. Lastly, if the point were one of accounts, and not involving any question of law, the arbitrators' tribunal might be simpler, cheaper and more effectual than the Court.

He had no knowledge of the manner in which the arbitrators had discharged their duties, but he had no doubt they had done their work well.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER observed that he was glad to find, that although he did not have the advantage of being a lawyer, the Minister of Justice had felt the necessity of sheltering himself under the guns of the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Cardwell. He (Mr. Tupper) had read from the Act itself the definition in this relation; it stated that in any case in which either before, or within two months after the presentation of the petition the claim is under the Statutes in that behalf referred to arbitration by the head of the proper department, who is thereby authorized, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to make such reference upon any Petition of Right. So the hon. gentleman would see that under the clause to which he was adhering with such tenacity, that power of referring to official arbitrators the claims sought to be brought before the Supreme Court was not only conferred, but also the rights which the petitioners held under the law; they were prevented from ever going before the Court mentioned. He left the House to decide whether he had said a single word reflecting upon the impartiality of the arbitrators; it was not from himself that the hon. gentleman learned that these arbitrators held positions under the Government, being liable to discharge at anytime, for this was stated in the Statute Book. A difference existed between the appointment of the arbitrators and Judges, the latter being perfectly independent of the Administration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Hon. Minister of Justice had hardly been fair in stating the hon. member for Cumberland had made a charge against the Dominion Arbitrators. What the hon. gentleman did say was that there must be greater confidence in a tribunal where the Judges were independent than in one which was not. That involved no charge against the arbitrators, who he believed had discharged their duties well. The Minister of Justice had also stated that he (Sir John) was responsible for forming that tribunal. He had introduced the Bill in 1867, taking it from the old Act which was in existence before he was Attorney General at all.

After some further discussion the clause was adopted.

The Bill was reported without amendment, read the third time and passed.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

SUPPLY.

On the motion to go into Committee of Supply,

Mr. WORKMAN said—When I had the honour, Mr. Speaker, of addressing you this day week on the question now before the House, I moved an amendment to the resolution then in your hands. That amendment I discovered afterwards was ruled out of order, and very properly so, I believe, according to the practice of the House; but I was not aware when I proposed it that such was the case. I told you then I would take the very earliest opportunity of submitting that resolution again to this House, and getting a clear and distinct vote upon it. With that view I have now risen, and I wish to state that since I offered my amendment on the first occasion I have had the satisfaction of visiting some of my constituents in Montreal, and they have requested that I should bring this measure squarely and fairly before the House and get a distinct and plain vote upon it. In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the nature of the resolution, I will now read it—That all the words after “that” in the original motion be struck out and the following inserted instead thereof: “This House deeply regrets that the Government has not proposed to Parliament a policy of increased protection to our various and important manufactures, the large amount of capital now invested therein, and the present depressed condition of the country rendering such a policy necessary to restore them to a condition of prosperity.” I do not intend to detain the House on this question, because it has already been very fully discussed; but, as I have stated, I wish to get a vote on this resolution. To my mind it is very plain and straightforward, and admits of no trimming and no dissimulation. When I had the honour of addressing my constituents previous to the election, I stated distinctly the line I intended to adopt. The amendment is in accordance with the policy I then foreshadowed, and it is with that view I now bring it forward.

The gentlemen who have addressed you on this subject, and especially those entertaining what they are pleased to term free-trade proclivities, have spoken very fully as to their adherence to that policy. I maintain that free-trade is a perfect absurdity, and that we have no such thing in this Dominion. A very large portion of the revenue has to be raised by the imposition of duties upon imports; therefore, to say that this is a free-trade country, or that we can pursue a free-trade policy, is, to my mind at least, a perfect absurdity. Those gentlemen have dwelt very much on that theme, and have talked with a great deal of force as to the injustice of placing taxes upon the farming and lumber interests to their injury, merely for the benefit of a few manufacturers. I stated last Tuesday, and I repeat it now, that the result of discriminating duties on our manufacturing industries, instead of increasing the prices of articles required by the farmers and lumbermen, have in almost every instance decreased the price to the consumer. I am prepared to prove that, and in support of the statement I then made, I may say that three gentlemen were brought before the Committee on Commercial Depression—

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman is not at liberty to speak of what took place before the Committee.

Mr. WORKMAN—I stand corrected, then. I may state that I had a conversation with three gentlemen who are thoroughly competent to give an opinion on the subject; and if you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I shall mention their names. One was Mr. Perley, of this city, a very large lumber merchant, carrying on an extensive business; another was Mr. Baldwin, and the other Mr. Booth. I put this question to these gentlemen:—Has the increase of the duties on the articles you consume in your shanties, mills, &c., increased the price of these materials to you within the last few years? Their answer was plain and distinct, that it had not, but on the contrary, their plant (such as saws, augurs, spades, shovels and everything almost that is used in their establishments) are manufactured in Canada, and are really cheaper to-day than they were a few years ago. That is a sufficient answer to those gentlemen who claim that any increase of duty would increase the tax upon lumbermen and farmers.

I am prepared to prove the same thing with reference to the farming interest; the implements used by the farmer are cheaper, of a better quality, and better suited to the wants of the country than they were when $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty was imposed. The incidental protection we have enjoyed for the last ten or fifteen years has stimulated manufacturing industries to a certain extent, and the result is that these articles are now produced cheaper and of a much better quality. There are a great many other industries that I might mention to sustain this position, but I do not wish to detain the House too long. But there is one in particular to which I shall, and I wish I understood it enough to enter into all its details---I mean the sugar question. That very important branch is almost ruined by the policy of our Government, and by the policy adopted by the United States in allowing such very large drawbacks as they are doing on the exports of refined sugar to Canada. These drawbacks consist principally of three classes, viz.: \$3.60 per 100 lbs., \$3, and \$2.50. Such drawbacks are allowed to the refineries of Boston, New York, &c., on all sugars of certain grades exported from the country, so that sugar coming from the United States here gets this bonus, and the effect has been to close our refineries and throw the refiners out of employment. Hundreds of men are idle and families in almost a state of destitution in consequence of the want of a proper policy by the Government in meeting this unjust proceeding on the part of the United States. I hope this Government, before the House rises, will take this question into serious consideration. A gentleman whom I had a long conversation with lately declared that a refinery in Canada has worked at a clear loss of $12\frac{1}{2}$ to $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents on every 100 lbs. brought into competition with the United States. I state that on the authority of a gentleman well qualified to judge, and I think my hon. friend from Halifax will probably confirm my statement, or will correct me if wrong. The quality of sugar now sent into Canada is very inferior; the saccharine quality of that sugar, in some instances, is not more than 60 per cent. of what it used to be, and I believe the average is from 80 to 82, while the genuine article we got some years ago would average 89 to 99 per cent., and the consumer pays quite as high for the article. This arises from the fact that persons in the United States are manufacturing the cheapest and commonest article to send into Canada, in order to secure the enormous drawback.

I hope, therefore, that the Government will see their way to bring before this House some remedy for this great evil. I also stated on an occasion to which I have already referred, that Canada was made a sacrifice market for various manufactures in the United States and certain kinds of goods. When I was in Montreal, yesterday, I called on one or two people who are engaged in the hardware business---in my own branch of business. One young man who is buyer for a very large house, I asked distinctly and plainly if it was the case that goods were offered to Canadian buyers at lower prices than they were to American buyers for home consumption. He replied equally plainly and distinctly that it was quite notorious, and in proof of this assertion he gave me a memorandum of some articles. First, take locks: These are used extensively in our houses. There is what is called the price list. They are all fixed. There is no alteration or change in the prices, but there is an alteration in the discount. The nominal prices are the same for both Canada and the United States, but in the United States the manufacturers allow a discount of 50 and 2 per cent. to purchasers for home consumption; but for Canadian purchasers they allow a discount of 50 and 2 and 10, making a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. against Canadian manufacturers and in favour of themselves really. The next article he gave me was that of enamelled hardware. We have one manufactory up at Hamilton. The discount in the United States is 20 per cent. off their lists, but for Canada, in order to compete with or to drive out our struggling industries of the same, as at Hamilton, and one or two at Montreal, a discount of 50 per cent. is allowed. That is they charge 80 cents in the United States, but only 50 cents for them when the articles come into Canada. The price in the United States for cistern pumps, or the discount allowed rather, is 35 per cent. for American merchants, but if the goods are coming into Canada a discount of 45 per cent. is allowed. In scales a discount of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ is allowed for home consumption, but if they come into Canada a discount of 50 per cent. is allowed. I think that my hon. friend from Hamilton, who is in the hardware line, will confirm me in this statement.

Mr. WOOD—Hear, hear.

Mr. WORKMAN—I was contradicted when I made these statements before, but I am prepared to prove that this state of things does exist, and I quote the figures now. I defy any hon. gentleman to contradict them. There may be certain branches of dry goods and certain lines of goods sold exactly at the same price in the United States as in Canada, but there are a great many descriptions that are sold cheaper in Canada than in the United States for the purpose of crushing out our own manufacturing and industries in this country. American manufacturers are determined to do it if they can; and in proof of this I have to quote you the prices I have just read. There is another article, manufactured both in Quebec and Montreal to a considerable extent, viz.: India-rubber goods. The price of these goods is nearly one-third less if they are exported to Canada than if they are for home consumption in Boston, New York, or any other large city in the United States. The difference is so great that I am almost afraid to read it, but I have it from undoubted authority. There is another article—galvanized wire. If for home consumption in the United States, the price is 9 cents per pound in United States currency, but if the order is from a Canadian hardware merchant, the price is 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents in gold. The one is equal to 8 cents gold and the other to 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents gold. Therefore, we have to compete with what I call an unjust and sacrificing system in the United States. They send their surplus stocks into our markets and dispose of them almost for whatever prices they will bring. They know very well that Canadian merchants, as a rule, pay promptly and in cash—and they take care that all of these sales are for cash—for in 10, 15 or 20 days they have their money, while our merchants are obliged to sell at large credit, and very often they make bad debts. These are some of the difficulties we have to contend with in this country and under the system at present advocated by the Government of the day. These are the great and the trying circumstances under which our manufacturers labour. Is it therefore to be wondered at that there is a great outcry for some change? I certainly had the best reason for believing that some change would have been introduced to meet this crying evil that is to be heard of all over the country, in every town, in every village almost throughout this Dominion. You will find that the statements I make here are confirmed by facts that are patent to the people. The hon. gentlemen who to-day control the destinies of this country, and are responsible to it for the policy they introduced last week, will find that they are mistaken if they calculate upon our people submitting quietly to have a continuance of this system. If I am out-voted in this resolution to-night, it will be my duty to try and impress upon my constituents, and also upon different constituencies throughout this country, that we must educate public opinion up to this point. We must try to impress upon them the importance of a protective policy to our manufacturing industries here in Canada. And if we cannot succeed in doing that, if we are out-voted by a decided majority, then it will be time enough for us to submit to the dictates and decision of the House. In the meantime, I am determined by every possible means to bring this question squarely and fairly before the House. With that view I drew out my resolution without consulting any one, and with very short consideration indeed. I placed it in your hands this day week, and I then stated, Mr Speaker, that I should insist or endeavour to force a vote upon it. I do so now. I make that motion, seconded by Mr. Devlin, the hon. member for Montreal Centre.

Mr. COLBY— I, perhaps, may be

pardoned for making a few observations upon the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Montreal West. I did not care to take part in the debate to which we have recently listened at considerable length, upon the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton, for the reason that the debate was somewhat discursive, and was taking a broader field than I thought was necessary for the consideration of the House in connection with the important question of the tariff. I believe that the question which is interesting this House and the country is not a question between free-trade and protection. I believe there is no hon. gentleman on the floor of this House, however enthusiastic he may be in his free-trade sentiments, who would urge that free-trade, pure and simple, was suitable for this country; and I believe there is no gentleman, although there are some very ardent protectionists here, who would advance the proposition that it would be to the interests of the country to surround it with a Chinese Wall, and to make an insurmountable barrier around it.

Our present policy is the policy of the late Government, that which we have had for many years, viz.: protection to the industries of this country. The question is whether the protection we now have is an adequate protection. It is a question as between the protection that is at present afforded, and one of a greater degree. There are many who are not out and out Protectionists, who believe, that in view of the present distress, especially amongst manufacturers, we should increase the protection.

In view of the unfair and fierce assaults upon our manufacturers from parts without this country, and of the present situation, I think that if manufacturing industries were desired, we could well afford, even at a little sacrifice, to come to their relief at the present moment. The solution of this question will, however, depend very largely upon the light in which these interests are regarded. I have heard, I must confess, hon. members of this House denounce those who were engaged in these enterprises as corporants—as persons who had interests distinct from the mass of the people—who were preying upon this country, and whose only idea and wish was by rings, monopolies and other unfair methods, to promote their own cause. Now, this is not the opinion to which I have been educated, nor do I think it is an enlightened opinion. I have always been led to believe, and hold that the great industries of this or any civilized country are inter-dependent; that the agricultural, commercial and manufacturing interests work concurrently for our well-being and prosperity. Those of the manufacturer are not necessarily adverse to those of the farmer, nor vice versa; they are coadjutors, working for the common benefit, and an appeal to the farmers as a class, as against the manufacturers as a class, is the purest demagoguism.

If I thought, as some hon. gentlemen seem to think, I should say that we should sweep these industries out of existence; but my observation has taught me to consider, and I have been educated to believe that the state of the arts and manufactures in any country is almost a measure, and certainly an index of its prosperity and greatness.

If their encouragement then is desirable, how shall it be effected? I would appeal to any gentleman in this House, and ask if he thinks, that our manufactures can exist and flourish with a system of free-trade, pure and simple? Everybody knows that they cannot; our circumstances are such that this is impossible.

An Hon. Gentleman—Why?

Mr. COLBY—An hon. gentleman enquires why? The reason is obvious to my mind, though it may not be to this hon. gentleman; they could not, in such a case, compete with the rivalry of Great Britain and the United States, two great nations with which we have commercial intercourse; their manufacturing establishments have been founded for many years, and with their unlimited capital and acquired skill, and business reputation, possessing, moreover, the trade market of the world, while we are excluded from our nearest mart, it would be quite impossible for us, with our limited means and peculiar conditions to prosper in this relation under a system of absolute free-trade, and build up these industries.

I am quite aware that perhaps the hon. gentleman who made the enquiry, as well as other hon. members, may be extreme in their views regarding free-trade; but I had hardly supposed that this was at present a point in controversy. I imagined certainly that the initial difficulties incident to the establishment of manufactures in a young country situated as ours is, would appal anyone if we had a system of free-trade, pure and simple.

If then, I am correct in the belief that some measure of protection must be granted in order to make these enterprises successful, the amount to be granted comes into question; and I venture to assert that it is impossible for any man, I do not care how conversant he may be with theories, or how enlightened he may be, to elaborate in his closet and propound a tariff which, evolved by any system of (a priori) reasoning shall be adapted to the changing exigencies of a country like this. Any tariff devised must be experimental, it must be tentative, it cannot rest upon pure, abstract principles, it cannot be procrustean; it ought not to be such as will compel the varying industries and conditions of the country to conform to certain fixed rules, but rather a tariff which will yield to our changing necessities, and conditions. Whether protection should equal ten or fifteen, or twenty, or twenty-five per cent. is I assume, a matter to be tested; and in this manner alone can it be determined. Our tariff when prepared, gave a fair degree of protection to manufactures; but it now appears, if the evidence by which we are surrounded is to be credited, as well as the testimony of those most interested, that in consequence of the fierce competition to which they are exposed from our neighbours over the line, and of other causes, it is insufficient to accomplish the end in view. That very great distress exists is not controverted; it is admitted; the Finance Minister acknowledges it—also that it has been largely aggravated by the system of bringing in American goods, which are sold at reduced slaughter prices. He further admits that there are cases of extreme hardship, but he does not feel it to be the duty of the Administration to intermeddle. He lays down the proposition that a Government cannot be free and at the same time paternal—that a Government cannot properly exercise a paternal influence over the industries of a country unless it has the power of limiting production as well. I must dissent from that idea; in the strict sense no Government can be free; the very conception of Government is contrary to the idea of freedom, and in that sense no Government can be free. I believe that it can be free and paternal to a certain extent, having a fair solicitude for our industries, and adapting its policy from time to time to the varying exigencies of the country, it may yield to the stress of the times, and yet be a free Government.

I don't think that a Government, in order to be free, should be rigid and unelastic, and incapable of adapting itself to the exigencies of the country. The Finance Minister seeing, as he freely acknowledges, the distress of the country, might very fairly, without doing violence to his views on that subject, have met this condition of affairs.

There is no doubt, that being a new country and our relations being such with the two great nations with which our business has most to do, our circumstances are somewhat peculiar, and I believe if there ever was a country in which the Government might strain a point in order to encourage industries, that country is Canada. We have valuable resources, and all the elements essential to success in manufacturing enterprise. We have iron, coal, water-power, and as tractable a population as can be found in the factories of any country.

I am not an extreme Protectionist. I would not surround this country with an impassable barrier by way of a tariff, but I am one of those who believe that the circumstances in which we find the manufacturing industries of the country are such that the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Montreal West may fairly be supported by the members of this House.

MR. DOMVILLE—I have listened with great attention to the speeches on this subject, and I must confess I am unable to arrive at any decision from the statements and arguments I have heard. We have been told that the Government were induced, by the threats of Lower Province members, to adhere to their policy, or rather to change it, because I am led to believe their original intention was to bring in a just and reasonable tariff. Now, I should like to know what men from the Lower Provinces did that. I never was invited by members from New Brunswick to attend any meeting to discuss the question.

We have heard the Premier talk about rings resulting from protection, but are there no rings in Canada? Have we not heard of them here where we have no protection?

I think the present depression is nothing new, following, as it does, a period of prosperity; but that is no reason why we should not adopt a policy to meet the occasion. I do not believe any man who is sound on the question of political economy believes in a high protective tariff, but I believe in incidental protection which will help our manufacturers for the moment and prevent their being slaughtered by the introduction of cheap goods from the neighbouring country. We are told that a protective tariff would make goods dear. I do not believe it, and in proof of it I point to the United States where iron is cheaper than it can be procured in Great Britain. Coal can be sold at the pits-mouth as cheap or cheaper than in England, and even cotton and other manufactured goods are exported to the Mother Country. If a protective tariff ranging from 40 to 60 per cent. ad valorem does not enhance the cost of goods there, why should a moderate tariff increase the price of wares here?

To my mind the cure for high prices is this: A high protective tariff stimulates industries and causes over-production. But do you find over-production here? On the contrary the country is crying out for protection to enable our manufacturers to produce more. We find in Nova Scotia the coal, iron and limestone almost together, and labour not much dearer than in Great Britain. Iron could be produced there to compete with the world. Instead of depending upon England for our iron we should be able to export it to Australia, the East Indies and South America.

The United States manufacturers have a home market, and send their surplus productions to other countries, even though they cannot realize a profit. That is the way they regulate the supply and prevent the home market from being over-stocked.

I should like to see such a tariff adopted as would enable Nova Scotia to produce 200,000 tons of iron and steel a year. That would necessitate the consumption of 400,000 tons of coal, and the employment of a large number of men. Allowing $25 per ton as the cost of production, that would give an annual expenditure of $5,000,000 in the Province, that now goes abroad to pay for foreign labour. Ontario would supply the flour, but although the people of the Lower Provinces complain, it would be levying a tax of $300,000 a year on them to protect it they would send back to Ontario pig iron to pay for it. The people of Nova Scotia are mistaken if they think protection would do them any harm. If any Province would have a right to complain it would be Ontario.

What we want in this country is such a tariff as will enable us all to get along. The Government, no doubt, think they are doing the best in the interests of the whole country; but there are many industries that require protection, and it is the duty of this Parliament to legislate for the benefit of all classes of the community.

I believe in free-trade if we can get it, but our shipping is deprived of the coasting trade of the United States, while their vessels trade in our waters. Now, I say that is not free-trade. Let them open their markets to us and we will be happy to trade with them on equal terms. I heard the hon. member from Carlton say that he believed in free-trade—that he did not believe in taxing special industries—and at the same time he enunciated the doctrine that the stamp duties should be done away with.

Mr. SPEAKER—That was in another debate. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. DOMVILLE—I will say, then, that I would be surprised if I heard an hon. member from New Brunswick say that he was in favour of free-trade, and at the same time argue that stamp duties should be done away with and direct taxation resorted to. Is not the stamp duty a direct tax. How can you have free-trade and not have direct taxation? The Hon. Minister of Finance said that this crisis came upon us unanticipated. I think he was mistaken in that. I think he might have foreseen for a long time that there was going to be distress. We had seen it in the United States for a long time, and as we trade with that country a great deal the hon. gentlemen might have known that we would have it here too.

The hon. gentleman in referring to the banks spoke of one of them, the Bank of Montreal, as a great institution. I admit that that bank is a great institution, and one that the country ought to be proud of; but at the same time I hold that no one bank should be built up at the expense of others; and to place a slur on the smaller banks at this critical juncture is unfair, inasmuch as it is calculated to injure the value of the stock and their position before the country; and to give one great bank an advantage not enjoyed by the smaller ones, must injure the latter and prevent them making the money for their stockholders which they ought.

The question has been raised as to the desirability of protecting the farmers, and it has been said that if manufacturing industries are protected the farmers must be protected also, because everything the latter require and do not produce will then cost them more than it does now. Well, I believe it can be shown that such an incidental tariff as would protect the manufacturers would not enhance the price of such goods to the farmers; but even if it did, would not the farmers at the same time be stimulated to raise all the various cereals which can be grown in the county, by the increased demand which would come from them from the people engaged in manufacturing? An if the public generally suffered from an advance in the prices of cereals, would they not at the same time enjoy the advantage which would result from a large amount of money being spent in this country which now goes abroad? Here is the Intercolonial Railway spending a large amount at the present time for rolling stock which ought to be built in this country. I would advocate a policy under which all such things as these would be produced as far as possible in this country. The West should supply the flour, wheat, grain, &c.; and the east, coal and iron, &c. Our shipping should not have a burden placed upon it because it brings money from abroad. It should rather be stimulated, and if this were done our marine, instead of being the seventh in rank might be the third, second, or even the first in the world.

It is said that England is a free-trade country. I admit that; but why is she so? It is because of the cheapness of money there. Any Political Economist will tell you that money represents so much labour, and that if we have to pay dearly for money we have to pay dearly for labour; and I would like to see the Finance Minister provide some scheme under which we could get money cheaply here as is done in England, where, taking the average of sixteen years, it will be found the Bank of England's rate has only averaged a little over (4) four per cent. per annum. England is the centre of the wealth of the world, which accumulated there because the country is highly civilized, and everything that wealth can purchase can be obtained there. She is also a country in which there is freedom for everybody; and people who have made money abroad—Englishmen—go back to the old Mother Land once more before they die, educate their children there, and send them out to the colonies to endeavour to do what their fathers have done before them. There are not the same chances for the investment of money there that there are here, in a broad country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific; but here the interest is higher than it is in England because the security is lower. I do not think it came with very good grace from the Minister of Finance to say that factories in Montreal had shut on the eve of the opening of Parliament in order to coerce Parliament.

Mr. DOMVILLE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT — The hon. gentleman must excuse me. I made no such statement.

Mr. DOMVILLE—I apologize to the hon. member. It was a Ministerial supporter; and as hon gentlemen on the other side of the House form so compact a body under all circumstances, that whatever emanates from one must of necessity, emanate from all. If not the Hon. Minister of Finance might say that he did agree with that assertion and I would be satisfied. I must apologize to the House for speaking so long, but I wished to have my views on this subject understood. I did not wish to be put down as a Free-Trader or Protectionist; for I want to see such a policy brought down as will, if possible, meet the emergency of the moment and contribute to the happiness and welfare of all classes.

Mr. PALMER — The constituency I represent is rather a peculiar one in regard to the question now before the House. It contains nearly sixty thousand of a population. In the city there were a great number of mechanics and manufacturers, and at the same time a large number of merchants engaged in the shipping business, so that with the exception of the farming interest, I may be considered a representative of all the interests in the Dominion. My views are of what I call a free-trade character, that is, I think that it is to the benefit of a country to have the freest trade with the world that the condition of the country will admit of; and such a view I hold to be not at all incompatible with that fostering care of all industries without which there would not be any trade whatever. But before I proceed further I would like to have a point of order called, viz: whether I can refer to anything which has been said on this subject in a previous debate.

It would be impossible representing the interests I do, to vote upon such a resolution without expressing distinctly the views I entertain upon the question of the tariff and the principles of trade involved therein. It cannot be denied that the principal industries of this country, which have hitherto prospered, are at the present time in a depressed state, and that those engaged in those industries have asked for that protection which they think the Government should extend to them under existing circumstances. They feel that may be done in a great measure by a revision of the tariff, and therefore whether they are mistaken or not, it does not become any member of this House to taunt them, as some hon. gentlemen behind me have done, by saying they are suing in forma pauperis—that they are asking assistance from the charity of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order. He must refrain from referring to what hon. members had said in a previous debate.

Mr. PALMER was under the impression this was one debate.

Mr. SPEAKER said the whole question of free-trade and protection was before the House, but this was an entirely new debate, and it was improper to refer to what had previously been said in the House. If that were allowed the hon. members referred to could not be prevented from demanding an explanation, and the whole subject would be gone into just as if there had been no debate at all.

Mr. PALMER was of opinion that this was a continuation of the late debate, and that it was in order to refer to statements previously made.

Mr. SPEAKER said if the hon. gentleman would reflect a moment he would see that it was not one debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the ruling would materially affect his hon. friend; it would only prevent him from alluding to the speeches of hon. gentlemen on a previous motion, but he could reply to their arguments without referring to the individual members. There was, however, a question in his mind as to whether this was not substantially one debate, just in the same way as if an amendment was proposed where a measure had previously gone into Committee, which allowed discussion on the third reading of a subject introduced on the second.

Mr. SPEAKER said the question that he should leave the chair might be put fifty times during the Session; would it be proper for any member to refer to subjects which had been brought forward on similar motions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD thought so, if the motion to retain the Speaker in the chair was on the same subject.

Mr. SPEAKER--I have left the chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD was of opinion that every time Mr. Speaker was prevented from leaving the chair by a motion like the present, in intercepting the main motion, it was practically a continuation of the same subject. A similar motion was made the other day by the hon. member for Halifax, and it was but fair that on the pending resolution allusions to the previous debate should be permitted.

Mr. PALMER said he did not view the question in the same light as Mr. Speaker. This was not merely a question to leave the Chair, but the question before the House was the policy initiated or maintained by the Budget Speech. However, he bowed to the ruling, the only effect of which as regards himself would be to shorten his remarks. Mr. Palmer continued: It is a pity that those gentlemen who have asked protection from the Government have not been treated with courtesy.

As I said before the question of protection or free-trade is one as to which I have always accorded my views in favour of free trade. My hon. friend from Stanstead says it is no use talking about free-trade because we cannot get it, and because it is actually beyond the scope of legislation. Not having free-trade, it is the duty of the House to foster, by all the means in its power, the industries of this country, he cared not whether they were the manufacturing or agricultural interests. It is simply a question as to the best mode of legislating for the purpose, without doing wrong to any. I have the idea that manufactures cannot flourish nor can anything else, without the country is made cheap to live in. If there is a large expenditure the money will have to be taken from the pockets of the people. I will hold up both my hands in favour of any measure that will prevent an increase of the expenditure.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Of course the country is justified in creating a debt for the purpose of fostering industries and for building up the country. In the matter of immigration a considerable sum is spent; but it is for the purpose of developing the country, although it is no less a bounty than a sum would be to benefit manufactures. I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that no one industry can flourish without others. The farming population would be very poor if it were not for manufactures. I was surprised to hear the Finance Minister say that protection would build up towns but would deplete the country. I always believed that if a large town is built up that a large country adjoining it must necessarily be benefited, as the farmers would have to supply the manufacturers.

Some of my hon. friends, and particularly my hon. friend from Cumberland, enumerated the doctrine that a duty should be placed on coal and flour. I must record my dissent from my hon. friend. I would like to foster them, but I don't believe this would be brought about by paying duties upon them. I don't apply these remarks to the coarse grains, but more particularly to flour and also to coal, both of which are absolutely essential to manufacturers. I must confess that my views upon this question are very nearly in accord with those of the hon. member for South Waterloo; but I want to say that the hon. gentleman in his speech, and in the statistics that he gave to the House contradicted his argument. If I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman started with the idea that protection to manufacturers meant nothing but an increase cost to the farmer. A little further on, that gentleman quoted from, I think, an American authority to prove what he wanted to prove, viz.:—That protection was destructive to workmen themselves. He showed that the cost of living under protection in the United States had increased in a greater ratio than the cost of wages, and then he showed that the cost of everything had increased five-sixths, and that farmers' produce cost double what it would have done under another system. And then he replied to the assertion that our markets were being slaughter-el by foreign productions, that if protection was put on it would so stimulate manufactures that it would absolutely reduce the articles absolutely below the value of these slaughtered articles. So that arguing from the same standpoint we have the farmer ruined by higher prices, and then the declaration that by this system the slaughtered articles would be half the price they are now. I think the true theory is that the home market is of the greatest importance to the agriculturist. If a farm is taken in the vicinity of a town it is worth double the price of what it would be if further off; because the transportation of the produce would not cost so much. It is very important, therefore, to farmers that manufactures should be built up; but how this is to be done is another question, and a more difficult one. It is important not only that living should be cheap, but that the Government should impose the duties to the best possible advantage. Take for instance the main industry of my own province—shipbuilding. You find the very materials that go to make ships—which necessarily are free-trade, they going to compete with outsiders—are taxed. The yellow metal put upon the bottom of ships is taxed, although this was done in no other country, and the metal could not be produced in this country. This tariff required revision. Many articles were entered at prices which they were never produced for. A specific instead of an ad valorem duty ought to be imposed. A great many of my constituents engaged in manufactures complain bitterly that articles that enter manufactures were charged an absolutely higher duty than upon the manufactured articles. This was protection with a vengeance. I was pleased to see the Finance Minister enter into the question of economy. I looked at the estimates with a great deal of curiosity. I find in the first year that the Government have spent upon the administration of Government and for services that do not enter into the construction of works fairly chargeable to capital, $115,000 more than their predecessors. This year I looked carefully to see whether they reduced the salaries, but they did not.

Of course public works cannot be stopped now, if they can be done without being destructive to the credit of the country.

The hon. gentleman at that time resorted to, what we on this side of the House, considered an extraordinary step; he raised the tariff in order to benefit the country; and I was rather surprised to see that in the course of one year he has taken a directly opposite course. If I understood him aright, he said, "There is going to be a deficit this year of something like two millions, and yet he is going to trust to chance and the future to make it good." He has, however, proved the truth of what he affirmed twelve months ago—that it was destructive to our credit to have a deficit, and such loss of credit was to lose an enormous sum of money; and Canada is not only going to suffer from the loss of her manufactures and the distress of her people, but also in the money market; and if my hon. friend's policy is carried out, the credit of the country will be destroyed. I am delighted to find the Government disposed to be economical; but I fail to see how they have done it, save in stopping important projected public works. We had in the estimates from year to year, a sum for the construction of the Bay Verte Canal.

An Hon. Member--Don't name it.

Mr. PALMER--I will name it. This sum is not now in the estimates, and I think that this is a great mistake, for it is folly to say that this Canal must not sometime or other be built by the Dominion. A contract was given out, I believe, for the St. Peter's Canal; and in my own city there is the work of extending the railway around Ballast Wharf, in which connection the Government must have spent at least $100,000; these works are stopped; and not only so, but the portions partly completed are going to destruction. I doubt very much whether this is real economy. as the works could be finished much cheaper during these hard times than under other circumstances; and if incidentally some employment to citizens of St. Johns, it would certainly do no harm.

On the Intercolonial Railway, I have understood, that the wages of trackmen have been reduced ten cents; but this, I believe, has not been the case with officials having large salaries; which, on the contrary, are said to have been increased. This road is entirely under the control of one man—an unfortunate fact for the Maritime Provinces, because he has managed to ruin all the industries along the line by altering its tariff of rates.

An Hon. Member—Who is he?

Mr. PALMER—Mr. Brydges.

Our mechanics also complain that the work done along the road is not let by tender as formerly, Mr. Brydges, it appears, discovered what mechanics in New Brunswick would perform it for; and in about a fortnight afterwards it was undertaken by persons hailing from the United States, or Ontario, or some other Province, at their own prices. Then, of course, they referred to the old files of the Globe, and observing that Mr. Brydges was there abused as guilty of all sorts of crimes, and of all kinds of jobbery, stories were circulated that he was interested in the execution of these works. This system, which was very bad, should be changed, and tenders should be invited. I would support any Government measure that would make the necessities of life as low in price as possible, and foster our manufactures, but not to the detriment of any other class of our population. The present tariff in many respects is destructive not only to our industries, but to the production of raw material, and it should be revised. The exhibition at St. Johns last year showed that our manufactures were in a very high state of cultivation. The manufacturers and mechanics of St. Johns have passed the following resolution:—

“Whereas, during the present depressed state of trade, the manufacturers and mechanics of St. Johns feel more than ever the necessity of an increased protective tariff to enable them to compete successfully with foreign markets, “Resolved, That we, the manufacturers and mechanics of St. John's, do memorialize the Dominion Government to increase the duties on all imported articles which come into “direct competition with domestic manufactures.”

I may not go to this extent, but they are familiar with their own business and form a numerous body; and of course they share the sentiments of my hon. friend from Montreal West.

I would be very much pleased if the resolution of my hon. friend was drawn up in different shape, but I can certainly go with him as far as the revision of the tariff, in any direction that would afford relief to the manufacturers of this Dominion, is concerned. I would look for such advantages first in every other way possible; I would allow every article that enters into their productions to be admitted free of duty; I would favour the cheapening of the cost of labour and of all their materials; but I do not say I would stop there, though I certainly should do so unless I was thoroughly convinced that such manufactures could ultimately succeed in this country, and such articles be made here as cheaply as elsewhere; therefore, if I cannot vote for this resolution, I shall seize the first opportunity afforded to offer a motion which I can support. I am not at all disposed to treat these manufacturers and mechanics with derision; for their case demands and ought to receive the serious consideration of the Government and of this House, which, as far as possible, should alleviate the depressed condition of every one of our suffering industries; and the Government which refuses to extend such aid, refuses to discharge the duty of a Government to the country over whose destinies it presides.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness)—Having spoken at some length at a previous stage of this discussion, I would not have taken part in the debate now but for the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead. The hon. gentleman referred to a few words I used on a former occasion.

Mr. COLBY—I made no reference whatever to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACDONNELL—The hon. gentleman, in a discourteous manner, said the manufacturers had been stigmatized as paupers, because they came here and asked for protection. On that occasion the words I made use of were, in formá pauperis. I did not refer to the manufacturers or any particular class of this Dominion, but took a broad ground, and asserted that any set of men, be they farmers or anything else, who, having invested a certain amount of money in any industry, and finding they were becoming bankrupt, came to this House and asked us to tax one portion of the people of this Dominion to contribute the means by which they could continue their business, came asking for charity, and in the strict sense of the term in formá pauperis. If the hon. gentlemen had allowed me the opportunity which any one conversant with the decorum—

Mr. COLBY—-I fear the hon. member is wasting his ammunition. I made no use of such an expression as "pauper" in my remarks, consequently he is astray. I made use of the word "cormorant," mentioned by another gentleman altogether.

Mr. MACDONNELL—The hon. gentleman, extending his remarks, said an attempt had been made to set one class against another—the farmers against the manufacturers. The false rumour became contagious, and the hon. member for St. John followed the same line of argument. I made no distinction whatever between any class of people of this Dominion, but I did say what I have repeated here to-night, and I am sustained in my position by the ablest writers. I am not the inventor of the term.

The hon. member for Stanstead said the fiscal policy of this Dominion has been for years one of protection. I say it has not, but has been a revenue policy.

There are two principles which guide legislators in raising revenue. The first and the statesman-like principle is that the revenue shall be raised in such a manner as to interfere as little as possible with the commerce of the country. That principle has been observed heretofore in raising our revenue. The second is that the revenue shall be distributed over the whole population so as to fall as equitably as possible on all classes. The term incidental protection, quite an absurd expression in itself, has arisen from this policy, but it is not protection.

The hon. member for Montreal West, not deigning to offer this House any arguments why the policy he advocates should be adopted, gives the valuable evidence of two gentlemen he met, their ipse dixit delivered on the street, that protection is necessary for this country. I am not satisfied with such evidence, nor can I understand by what reasoning or logic the hon. gentleman arrives at the conclusion that by raising the tariff and making things dear they will at the same time become cheap.

As to this wonderful and very sweeping amendment which the hon. member for Montreal West has submitted, it asks this House to increase the tariff upon the various industries of the country, and that irrespective, whether it is necessary for the necessities and Government of the country. The resolution asks this House to protect every industry in this country; in other words, to give protection to none, because the labourer, having to pay more for his food, clothing, and everything he uses, would claim and be entitled to more wages. The consequence would be the enhancing of the cost of every article consumed in the country. Therefore, the principle that I lay down is, that protection to all industries means protection to none.

Mr. BOWELL called attention to the fact that the resolution proposed to protect manufacturing industries only.

Mr. MACDONNELL having read the resolution, said it is all the same. What does the word manufacturing mean? It covers almost every industry. Therefore, I say it contemplates protection to every industry, ergo, protection to none.

Mr. OLIVER—I am very much pleased that the amendment is couched in such plain and unmistakable language. I was rather amused at the logic of my hon. friend from Montreal West. He said that notwithstanding the increase of 2½ per cent. on the duty two years ago, he had a conversation with two gentlemen, who stated that the duty of articles entering in to the manufacture and support of the lumber interests and the articles required by the agriculturists had not been increased. If we take the statements of gentlemen we meet in the streets and hotels as evidence, any of us can furnish proof that the object of this movement is to increase the price of every manufactured article in the country. The hon. gentleman says that sugar is manufactured at a loss of 12 cents per 100 pounds. Suppose the Americans were excluded from our markets, the cost of sugar would be increased to that extent, and it is an article required by all classes of the community.

I do not understand the sugar interest, but it is evident from what I have heard debated by gentlemen intimate with the subject, that if an increase in the tariff on sugar takes place, those who consume it will have to pay two cents a pound more than they now do for it. There are two refiners in Montreal and I believe one in Halifax, and although I admit that these are important establishments, and give employment to a large number of hands, I ask, is it right to take one or two cents out of the pockets of the consumers of this country to support one or two institutions? My hon. friend from Montreal West says that if his motion is not carried he is going on a mission to convert the whole of the people of Canada to protection. Well, I think that if he does go upon such a mission, that it will be more difficult to convince the agriculturists that to put duties on the goods which they consume, which will only benefit the manufacturers of those goods, than even to secure the passage of such a resolution as that which he has proposed. I invite him to take the field in favour of protection, and I tell him that if he does, he will find that there are enough advocates of free trade in the Dominion to cover all the ground that the missionaries of his policy can cover throughout the length and breadth of the country. He says, and we see it in the press and hear it at every public meeting, that the people of the United States have slaughtered goods in Canada. Well, that may be the case, but I ask the hon. gentlemen from Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, whether those cities have not slaughtered more goods in Canada than the United States has done, whether they have not forced goods on the merchants throughout the country, and whether through the agency of the Insolvency Act of last Session those goods have not afterwards been sacrificed. Go into any hamlet town in Western Canada, and I have no doubt but it is the same in Eastern Canada, and you will see an auctioneer, or perhaps two or three, selling bankrupt stocks from Montreal, or Toronto, or Hamilton, and not American goods.

But supposing that the Americans do come in here and slaughter goods at prices ten per cent. less than they sell them for in the United States, who gets the benefit? Is it not the large consuming population? And are these people going to ask their representatives in this House to press an Act to prevent them from getting cheap goods? In my opinion it is impossible to benefit both the manufacturers and the farmers by raising the tariff, unless the cost of raw material and labour is reduced.

I have heard it stated in the course of the debate, and also outside of the chamber, that the agricultural interests, as well as the other interests of this country, should be protected; that the surplus of products of this country was very small, if there was any at all. Now, even if this were so with respect to flour and wheat, there is a good and sufficient reason for it; but I find, after going carefully over the trade and navigation returns, that we exported last year a surplus over and above our imports (if we do import largely of American wheat and flour) of 1,150,000 bushels, (in round numbers) realizing to the country $883,000. The Dairymen's Association of Canada, with all the other dairymen, exported last year $5,000,000 worth of cheese and $2,500,000 worth of butter, besides which it is estimated that $1,000,000 worth of those products were consumed in Canada, making the total value of dairy products of the country during the last season $8,500,000. This is an interest which is growing very rapidly—more rapidly perhaps than any other interest in the country. I find on looking over the returns that not more than ten years ago $250,000 worth of dairy produce was imported. The development of this interest is destined to bring about a revolution in agricultural pursuits, and it is proving not only a direct but an indirect benefit to our farmers; direct on account of the large amount of money which it brings to them, and indirect inasmuch as it is a means of causing them to improve and enrich the soil.

I heard a number of hon. gentlemen state that at all events Indian corn ought to be protected. Well, I find—and the statement I make here will be found correct—that we have produced for consumption in Canada 1,629,328 bushels of that product, costing $891,502, or a little less than one cent. per pound; while the other coarse grains which have been exported by the people of Canada have realized one cent. and four-fifths per pound. The idea has been expressed that the coarser grains should be raised in this country, and Indian corn kept out by a protective tariff. Well, if that were done it would be a losing transaction to the people of Canada. However, I am not going to follow out that argument.

The hon. member for West Montreal has not given us a single particle of proof that the manufacturers of our country require protection. He stated that there is a depression. Well, everyone in this House admits that. But, Sir, we find that there is depression all over the United States as well as in Canada. In Philadelphia, at the present time, where there is perhaps more labour employed now than in any other city in the United States or in Canada, there is a large number of persons requiring employment and who are destitute for want of it. Again we see that at a meeting of the Board of Trade in Boston, at which the subject of the existing depression was under consideration, a reduction of the duties between Canada and the United States, instead of an increase, was proposed as a remedy. I hold that there is proof that the manufacturers of Canada are in quite as good a position as the manufacturers of the United States; for we find that a manufacturing institution in the town of Dundas has just been purchased by Americans, who intend carrying on the manufacture of screws there very extensively. We find, also, that Americans are coming over to establish a musical instrument factory in the town of Guelph, and a large cotton factory is being organized near the city of Montreal, with a capacity of producing six million yards a year. Do the people who are engaging in these enterprises believe that the tariff of Canada is too low, and that the goods of the United States are being sacrificed here? In the village of Ayr there is one of the largest agricultural implement factories in the country, and I heard the proprietor of that state in a speech not long ago, that he was able to manufacture goods enough to supply his customers not only in the Canadian market, but in the United States to which he sent a large amount, notwithstanding a duty of forty per cent.

I am glad that the Government, instead of increasing the duties, have determined to reduce the estimates, and I believe that when the Minister of Finance stated that that was their policy, the statement was hailed with satisfaction by nineteen-twentieths of the people of this country.

Mr. ORTON—I regret that I cannot vote for the motion of the member for Montreal West. The hon. gentleman forgets that great depression exists, not only in the manufacturing interests, but also in the agricultural districts of the country. There are large sections in which the crops have been badly damaged by frost; and the farmers can hardly get a market for their coarse grains. I know that in the northern part of the County of Wellington there are a large number of settlers who have gone into the back woods and made themselves homes, but who this year are scarcely able to live. The manufacturers have shown a contracted spirit in this matter, and it is with considerable regret that I observe my hon. friend cannot look further than Montreal. He might have so framed his resolution as to meet with the approval of a large number in this House and country. It might have been so constructed as to do justice to the agricultural interests of the country by giving them the first choice in the markets, which was nothing but fair. For one, I do not believe that an increase in the tariff would advance the cost of manufacturing goods, and I think the resolution might have fairly included the agricultural, mining and other interests. I do not believe in class legislation, and I think the resolution, in ignoring the claims of the consumers, will fail to secure its objects, as it is necessary that the consumer should be prosperous in order that the manufacturer may have a market for his goods. I was rather amused at the remarks made by the hon. member for North Oxford, who referred to the immense increase in the production of cheese and butter. The hon. gentleman did not tell us that that increase was owing to there being 4 per cent. duty on these articles. I must again express my regret that the hon. member for Montreal has not looked a little further than the manufacturers in introducing his amendment.

Mr. BROWN—I wish to make a few observations relative to what has been said by the hon. member for Oxford with reference to Americans establishing factories in Canada. I know an instance. One of the largest factories was established by Americans, but it has suspended and thrown a large number of men out of employment. As a manufacturer, and from my position as representative of a large manufacturing town, which has contributed largely in subsidising establishments, I can say that we do not ask any exclusive tariff, or anything but fair competition with the United States. All we require is to be placed upon an equal footing with the Americans, and I think we will be able to produce goods as cheap as they. At present we are working at a disadvantage. The rolling mills in Toronto, Kingston and Montreal have had to stop on account of our inability to compete with their bar iron. We give scrap iron to the Americans and purchase it back again in bars. I may mention a number of articles which are imported here free. Mill machinery generally is admitted at a rate of 10 per cent., but the larger portion comes in free. Such an arrangement does not give us a fair chance of competing with them. Agricultural implements are also, to a great extent, admitted free. All a man has to do to import these articles free is to belong to an Agricultural Society.

Had we the same scope of markets the Americans have, we could compete with them even with the disadvantages we now labour under. It takes a long time to educate our workmen into skilled mechanics, and every country has to go through the preliminary stages before becoming great in manufactures. England was protective until she was enabled, through her superior workmen and machinery, to compete with the world. Canada should take a lesson from that, and our statesmen should remember that it is not until manufacturing industries are prosperous that we shall rise to be a great nation. A great deal has been said about the agricultural interests, but it should be borne in mind that if the manufacturing interests are crippled farmers would suffer to a great degree. The Government makes every effort to bring immigrants to our shore, and yet we have not employment for our young men who have served their time as mechanics, who go to the other side to get higher wages and steadier employment. I hope the motion will be the means—although I do not suppose it will be carried—of bringing the matter fully before the country, and that by another Session of Parliament the people will render such an opinion as to induce the Government to take measures to aid and foster our manufacturing interests.

Mr. SINCLAIR—I am glad this question has been brought before the House in a proper manner. We have had a great deal of discussion, but now we have the matter fairly before us, and I hope there will be a square vote upon it. As far as I understand, the manufacturers are the only class that are looking to this House for relief from the existing depression, but if we look abroad, we shall find other classes are suffering as much as they are. I believe the mercantile and lumber interests are as much depressed as any, but persons engaged in these branches know perfectly well that we cannot legislate in their behalf, and therefore they have not applied to us for relief. The manufacturers claim that the want of protection is the cause of the depression. When the Committee to report upon the state of manufactures sat in 1874, Mr. W. E. Sanford, member of a large wholesale clothing firm in Hamilton, stated that our prices were fully 12½ per cent. lower than those of the United States, which has a protection of 100 per cent. I think that is an admission which shows clearly that the more protection manufacturers have the higher goods are. It has been stated that protection will not increase the price of manufactured articles. I can hardly conceive that such would be found to be the fact in practice, and it will be difficult to convince any person that such will be the case.

I find here another man who was very honest in his expression. He was asked how many of them would undersell each other. He said about one-half dozen. Then there would be a union amongst them to keep up the prices of their goods. "We are obliged," he said, "to unite to keep up the prices of goods." If you give an advantage to anybody, no matter whether he be a farmer, manufacturer or lumberman, you must expect him to make the most of his position. The farmers of Canada were not included in this resolution, and therefore the hon. member for Centre Wellington cannot support it. I think if the farmers of Canada were left alone they would be better pleased. They do not want anything of the kind, and I think if the mercantile community and the lumbering classes gained anything by it, and if the tariff was raised to a protective tariff then the business of the country would be placed in the hands of a few wealthy manufacturers and importers about our sea-coast. If you raised it to 25, the percentage asked for, you will find that the wholesale business will be in the hands of one or two people. In Great Britain, where free-trade is the order of the day, you find goods at low prices through competition; but the manufacturers are combining by every possible means to keep down the wages of their employés. This was a very serious question with British statesmen—to settle labour and capital—and it is only of late years that they have been able to accomplish anything in that direction which is at all satisfactory. At present, Great Britain with free-trade is in the most prosperous condition, and manufacturers at last have been compelled to pay proper wages. They took the advantage whenever they could, and we ought to consider that it will be a difficult matter for farmers to get the trade of the country out of the hands of manufacturers and importers when once the latter have it. In the States, not many years ago, the railway contractors had got control of the railways, and the farmers had great difficulty and would not but for legislative pressure have secured their rights. If we raise the tariff to a protective point—and I am glad the question has come squarely before the House—I think it will be the hardest day for Canada she has ever seen. I hope the tariff will be kept at a revenue rate, even if it might be necessary to make a revision of the duties. If we have a protective tariff we will drive away foreign competition, and will at once give the monopoly to manufacturers and wealthy importers to make immense sums of money. I hope there is intelligence enough in the House to see that the country would prefer that the tariff was lowered instead of increased. It is rather high already for revenue purposes. Some hon. member stated not long ago, that the Government ought to make a change on account of the depression. I beg to differ. The more the tariff is kept to one standard the better for business men, as they would have a sure basis upon which to make their engagements. I fully agree with the Government in not meddling with the tariff at present, because I do not believe it had anything to do with the depression. Legislation did not bring it and legislation cannot cure it. Countries with free-trade are suffering, and the United States with a heavy protective tariff of 100 per cent. upon some articles felt the depression sooner and to a greater extent than Canada. It is impossible to believe that a protective tariff would remedy the depression. I am glad the vote is to be taken on a clear issue, as I cannot vote for a protective duty.

Mr. COOK—I will not detain the House very long. Probably I would not have spoken but for the remarks of the hon. member for Carlton. I am puzzled to know how lumbermen can be protected unless you give them a bonus. Nearly everything used in their operations is imported. Most of the provisions are imported.

Mr. PALMER rose to a point of order. The hon. gentleman was referring to a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman was out of order.

Mr. COOK continued—The mover of this amendment stated that he had a conversation with some lumbermen who told him that it was to the interest of the trade that it should be protected, and that, although most of the articles which they used were subject to an increasing rate of duty in recent years, they were not any dearer on that account. The great staple article used is pork, of which we import very largely for the use of the shanties. There is a specific duty of \$2 per barrel upon pork, and an ad valorem duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the barrels, which brings it up to a considerable sum. Some arguments may be used by hon. members who represent the lumbering trade in this House, that from the fact of the importation of lumber it is necessary to protect that trade. In 1871 there was a volume of importation into this country, subject to an ad valorem duty of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., of \$51,403.

In 1875 we find the quantity had very much increased, the amount of dutiable lumber being $396,086. There was exported from Canada in 1871, lumber amounting to $213,352,211; in 1872, $23,685,382; in 1873, $23,586,816; in 1874, $26,817,715. In 1875, when there was such depression, especially in the lumber trade, we find $24,781,780, making for the last five years, $126,224,904 of lumber exported. It was stated that there should be duties on lumber imported from Michigan, but I would like hon. gentlemen to know that most of the lumbermen in Michigan are Canadians. When they bring their lumber to Quebec we have the benefit of the carrying-trade and the money being left here. The amount of money invested in the lumber trade, less that which was passed out for manufacture, made a volume of $27,000,000, or nearly one-third of the whole floating capital of the Dominion of Canada.

A vast amount of money is invested in mills and in the operations of the lumber trade, in which, according to the census of 1871, there were interested directly about 250,000 people of this country; then perhaps there is double this number indirectly interested in it. The great depression that exists has been without doubt due to over-manufacture and the falling off in the demand of the American and home markets, where the commercial crisis has been still more severe than here. This interest should be fairly dealt with by hon. members. The Finance Minister very properly said that it was only second in importance to any industry in the Dominion, and I accordingly hope that this resolution will be supported by such a minority that all who propose a protective tariff will abandon the project.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Mr. Speaker—My hon. friend from Montreal West and myself row in the same boat for a similar purpose. My hon. friend was fortunate enough to catch your eye first, and on the whole I am rather pleased that he was successful in so attracting your attention, because it was of infinitely more importance than an hon. member occupying his position in Parliament should move such a resolution than that I or any member of the regular Opposition should have done so. It is a fair, straightforward and perfect want of confidence motion in the policy of the Government. It is a censure upon its policy, and while this might be expected from those who like myself have not the good fortune to place implicit confidence, or any great confidence, in the Administration, the position of my hon. friend adds to its significance. He recently came to Parliament—and he was recently elected as a supporter of the present Administration, as it were, by my hon. friend at the head of the Government, as his special candidate for West Montreal. If rumor speaks true, my hon. friend the First Minister used all his blandishments for the purpose of inducing my hon. friend from Montreal West to cast aside his modesty and come forward again into public life; he succeeded, and, therefore, we may fairly suppose that the hon. gentleman had a warrant from my hon. friend the First Minister to speak on behalf of the Government to the people of Montreal, and these whose suffrages he was seeking had a right to believe, when he was speaking and avowing his sentiments on this subject of free-trade and protection, that he spoke with the sanction, with the knowledge, and not only without the disapprobation, but with the positive approbation of the hon. member, the leader of the Government, and so of all the members of the Cabinet. I am not surprised, therefore, at the deep feeling which my hon. friend from West Montreal has shown; he, I have no doubt, felt, and still feels, that he was, beyond question, made the means of deceiving the people of Montreal when he asked their suffrages as a supporter of this Administration, and at the same time a supporter of the Protectionists and manufacturers. There must have been some misapprehension in this; my hon. friend at the head of the Government, I take it, did not design to deceive my hon. friend or convey false impressions; but it is a most unfortunate circumstance—a circumstance which has worked badly for my hon. friend from Montreal West, and, obviously, greatly to the injury of the manufacturers and importers, and every commercial interest of this country—that this misapprehension should have existed. My hon. friend was misled, not intentionally, of course, by the head of the Government, and not only so, but he was also misled when he supposed that he was speaking with the authority and sanction of the Administration, under the shadow and wing of the Premier, and was making the positive statements he did during his candidature, at his election and after his election, inducing not solely the people of Montreal but of the whole Dominion of Canada to understand that the Government had adopted a policy of affording some relief to the manufacturers of Canada, and effecting some alterations in the tariff. •

Sir, my hon. friend therefore felt it due to his own honour, as well as the principle he upholds, to place on record at the earliest possible moment his vote of censure as expressed in this resolution, regarding the policy of the Government. While, however, the first portion of it commends itself to me, I think that the concluding portion falls far short of the extent to which he ought to have gone; and I think so, for the reason given by my hon. friend from Centre Wellington a little while since. While I consider that the hon. member for Montreal West, when pleading as it were on behalf of the manufacturers of this country, ought to have gone further, and that our agricultural interests should be included in the motion, I will not pursue the course of my hon. friend, who says that he will vote against this resolution owing to that exclusion. I think that he is mistaken, and I hope that he will reconsider his position in that respect.

Sir, I believe, that the manufacturing interests of this country, in their present state of depression, require the adoption of a policy similar to that announced authoritatively as it were by the hon. gentleman in Montreal. I also think that the agricultural interest of Canada requires and calls for the protection, which is spoken of; but, Sir, because this resolution only goes half way, that is no reason why I should vote against it. I shall be in favour of the resolution of my hon. friend from Montreal West, and I shall endeavour hereafter, when I have the opportunity, to extend the resolution in the direction I have indicated. This resolution I shall read at once as a notice to my hon. friends opposite and the country of what I intend to propose. When the opportunity offers, during the course of the present Session, I shall move
 “That it be resolved, that this House “regrets that His Excellency the Governor-General has not been advised to “recommend to Parliament a measure
 “for the re-adjustment of the tariff, “which will not only tend to alleviate “the stagnation of business, deplored in

“the speech from the Throne, but also afford encouragement and protection to the struggling manufacturers, and to the struggling agricultural productions of the country.”

This is the resolution, Mr. Speaker, which if I had the good fortune to have preceded my hon. friend from Montreal West, I would have moved, and which I intend to propose hereafter.

Now, Sir, at this late hour, and after the long speeches already made, I do not intend to enter into any long series of remarks on the great theories of free trade and protection; but one thing is very remarkable—that in all this discussion, and in all the various discussions which have taken place since the beginning of the Session, hon. members, or some of them, think that free-trade is political economy. Political economy in a great science; and a tentative science, as yet experimental—a science which embraces in connection with the political system, in the widest terms, all that concerns the material progress and prosperity of a nation and of all nations. Free-trade is a very subordinate branch of it, but it is a branch; it has been elevated, and it was raised in the time of Cobden, owing to the great success of free trade in bread, almost to be a religion, and since his death it almost seems that it has been degraded into a superstition; but, Sir, free trade, as has been said again and again ad nauseam, must be reciprocal. Free trade, free intercourse between nations, means what the word expresses; it does not signify that one nation must bind the other to that phrase, without regard to disturbing causes, or the situation of the nation itself, or of foreign nations, or the difference of tariff. Free-trade does not mean that a country, under all circumstances, must open its doors to all nations, no matter what their customs may be, no matter what their financial system may be, and without exercising any judgment, or using any guard, or employing any protection with regard to the country itself; this is not the opinion of any really great Political Economist. This view is perhaps held by the minor lights of the Manchester School; but the great Political Economists have always admitted the existence of disturbing causes, and have always held that there are other things as important, and more important to a nation, than the mere aggregation of wealth, and the supremacy of free trade or protection. The collective interests of a nation must be considered. They are various, and a nation must stand on its own ground. Theorists, with regard to free trade, have laboured under a misapprehension, and have advocated a false science, opposed to the protection of the industries of a country under any circumstances. Now, that is not the opinion, as we all know, of John Stuart Mill. His celebrated passage, in his book, which has been so often quoted, I will quote again. It has been repeated by him in the last edition of his book in the same words that it was in the first. His position has been attacked; I myself have heard it assailed by political economists in the Political Economy Club, in England; but this man, superior, as we have been informed by the hon. member for Welland, to Adam Smith, lays down in this work, which he leaves as his legacy, the principle that there are circumstances connected with the manufacturing interests of a nation which not only excuse, but justify protection.

Mr. YOUNG—Two years ago when the question was up with regard to beet-root sugar, I quoted that very statement of Mills. My right hon. friend declared that on second thoughts, and on the advice of his friends, Mr. Mills had withdrawn that passage from his book.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman must be mistaken. If he turns up the last edition of this book he will find it there. The hon. gentleman is altogether wrong. This is the passage:—

“The only case in which, on mere principles of political economy, protecting duties can be defensible, is when they are imposed temporarily (especially in a young and rising nation) in hope of naturalizing a foreign industry in itself, perfectly suitable to the circumstances of the country. The superiority of one country over another in a branch of production often arises only from having begun it sooner. There may be no inherent advantage on one part, or disadvantage on the other, but only a present superiority of acquired skill and experience.

A country which has this skill and experience yet to acquire, may in other respects be better adapted to the production than those which were earlier in the field, and besides, it is a just remark of Mr. Rae, that nothing has a greater tendency to promote improvements in any branch of production than its trial under a new set of conditions. But it cannot be expected that individuals should at their own risk, or rather to their certain loss, introduce a new manufacture and bear the burthen of carrying it on until the producers have been educated up to the level of those with whom the processes are traditional. A protecting duty, continued for a reasonable time, will sometimes be the least inconvenient mode in which the nation can tax itself for the support of such an experiment. But the protection should be confined to cases in which there is good ground of assurance that the industry which it fosters will after a time be able to dispense with it; nor should the domestic producers ever be allowed to expect that it will be continued to them beyond the time necessary for a fair trial of what they are capable of accomplishing."

This is the principle laid down by Mill, the leader of the modern school of political economy in England, a Free-Trader in the best sense of the word. I say this extract I have now read applies to the circumstances of Canada. We are a young country, just emerging from the first struggles with the forest. We have but little realized capital as yet; the manufactures of the country, with a few small exceptions, having scarcely taken root. They are lying alongside of a country which has had the advantage pointed out by Mr. Mill, of having commenced first. The manufactures of the United States have been going on for a long period of time, and large amounts of capital have been realized: all these things we have to fight, in addition to the fact of our industries being in their infancy, and the other disturbing influences not alluded to by Mr. Mill, which add to the reasons why our manufactures have the same right to be encouraged that the child has to look to the parent for guidance until able to walk alone. Mr. Mills, the Free-Trader, goes much further than many gentlemen in this House who will vote against the resolution. He does not speak of a revenue tariff which would afford incidental protection to our manufacturers as being justifiable, but he lays down the broad principle to encourage native industries; if they are fitted for the circumstances of the climate, soil and people of a country, protection ought to be given, and is justified on the true principles of political economy.

But we hear hon. gentlemen say it is not for the interest of the manufacturers themselves to have protection. It would create monopolies, and monopolies bring on apathy and lethargy. If Mr. Mills thought it was not in the interest of the manufacturers to protect them, he would not have said so in the passage I have read. He holds it out for the purpose of encouraging infant manufacturers in their struggling state, and lays it down that it is not only excusable and defensible, but justifiable. He thought reasonable protection would be for the benefit of the manufacturers themselves; but in this country we are not called upon to break our heads upon theories. We know perfectly well in the circumstances of this Dominion, a young country extending from sea to sea, almost without bounds, that the development and improvement of our resources, the great works that will be undertaken by the country, will be for long after we who are here will be no more, call for a large revenue. If this be true, as a matter of course in the adjustment of the tariff taxation should be so imposed as to do the least harm and the most good. We cannot have in a young and comparatively poor country like this, direct taxation. We have handed that source of revenue over to the Local Legislatures and municipalities. When you take our local rates and the certainty that in the not distant future the Local Legislatures must resort to direct taxation, you will see that source of revenue will not afford hopes of our being able to resort to it. We must trust to our customs, therefore, as the principal source of our future revenue. Now, what can be more reasonable than to so adjust the tariff for revenue purposes that it will enable us to meet our engagements, and to develop our resources, the duties falling upon the articles we ourselves are capable of producing. The Government of which I was a member since 1854 pursued the same course. They laid down this principle, that the taxation should be adjusted in such a way as to be as little burdensome as possible upon the people, and be placed on those articles which we can profitably produce ourselves. That policy was laid down strongly by my colleague at that time, the present Hon. Sir Alex. Galt. He laid down for us the principle of a national policy, that we should consider our own interests only, and that in an adjustment of the tariff we should endeavor to foster all these various industries of which I have spoken. We steadily adhered in practice to that principle. Sometimes when the principle of free trade or a cry for a reduction of the pressure of taxation arose we had to yield. We were overcome occasionally, and had to make some steps backward, but on the whole, we held steadily to the principle and carried it out as strongly and uniformly as we could. We were forced at one time to reduce the tariff to a considerable extent; at another time, not very long ago, we took up the national policy, which has been made a matter of ridicule, and carried it, certainly not by a large vote. With a very short sighted policy on the part of the manufacturers of Canada that national policy was opposed by them. If they had known their interest they would not have joined in the attack made upon it, and if they have, to a certain degree, had it recoil on their heads, it is because they opposed it so blindly. I believed then, and I believe now, that the two must go hand in hand—that you cannot sever them. I believe it is the interest of the agriculturist to have a certain market at his own door. I believe it is not in the interest of the great agricultural community to be forced to look to a foreign market altogether for the sources of their prosperity and for their purchasers. I believe no nation has ever heretofore, or will ever hereafter, rise to any eminence in civilization, the arts and sciences, or prosperity of any kind, unless it honours agriculture and encourages manufacture. To be sure, we heard from the Finance Minister—a gentleman whose parliamentary courtesy is only exceeded by his financial ability—that it would have the effect of driving people from the country into the town. It is not every man can be or likes to be a farmer, and the man who is unwillingly made one will always be a failure. There is no life in* the world in my estimation more happy and enviable than a farmer's, under the circumstances in which he is placed in Canada. It is a pleasant independent life, bringing domestic happiness and all that the expression implies, but still, all men are not to be farmers. There is the man of constructive genius, who feels that his function in life is to become an artisan or mechanic, to enter into a trade, or some of the other various pursuits. These aspirations of the young men of the country are not to be checked or discouraged. On the contrary, that country is the best and will be most prosperous where every man has the utmost freedom to choose that mode of life, and exercise the abilities God has given him freely and without limit. It would be almost pedantic to refer to the those of antiquity, but looking at all those which have been civilized in the earliest history, sacred or profane, you will find that wherever a nation has merged from barbarism they have built up great cities. So it is in modern times; look at the Hanseatic towns, the commercial cities of Italy and the Low Countries. But it is said, as a reason why we should not encourage manufactures, that it has a tendency to induce young men to leave the country and go into the towns. Why, the policy of the Government will not keep the young men chained as serfs of the soil in our land. Their policy will not send them into our towns, but into the towns of the United States, where they encourage all kinds of mechanical pursuits. We have heard a great deal about this "Chinese wall." As I said a little while ago, the principle of protection to a moderate extent is justifiable, and the true principle of political economy. If you build this wall it will be like a dam which backs up the water of a stream until it overflows the country and does a great deal of mischief, but if the dam is raised so as to allow a moderate part of the water to go over, that water can be used for fertilizing, manufacturing, and for other good purposes. Therefore, the proposition I would hold up is simply that the dam should be raised high enough not to retain the water altogether, for that would ravage the country instead of doing it a service, but that we allow a certain amount of the stream to percolate over.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Do you want to dam protection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Mr. Speaker, if you were a magistrate I would take up the hon. gentleman for swearing. But I tell the Hon. Finance Minister that he admitted there was such a thing as a slaughter market, and he had too much reason to believe our market was occasionally used for that purpose. Now, our manufacturers may be interfered with by this slaughter process from other sources, as has been argued. When there is a depression of trade in the neighbouring country, goods must be sold; that happens also in our own country. We see frequently in time of great depression, similar to the present, when merchants are becoming insolvent, every kind of goods thrown upon the market, and slaughtered, so to speak, to the great injury of solvent traders. That cannot be avoided, and it is right that it has the compensatory advantage of giving cheap goods to the purchasers. But it gives no real compensating advantage for the permanent real injury that is done to the trade of the country by the ruin of those merchants, and by the want of confidence thus induced by the spread of ruin, for the actual insolvent whose goods are slaughtered will make other insolvents. But while we cannot avoid that, and it is greatly to be regretted that we cannot do so, we can, to a great extent, regulate our trade so as to protect our dealers against the depression which exists in the neighbouring country. When it happens that there is a forced sale of stocks in that country, in consequence of which the honest trader is compelled either to shut up his shop, or enter into competition with insolvent estates, it is possible so to regulate the tariff as to protect our own people. But besides the evil of making this country a slaughter market, there is another very serious one of sending goods into this country for the purpose of bringing down prices here, injuring our manufacturers, and driving them out of the market and afterwards getting control of the market. It is said that such a thing never happened. Why, do we not see it happening in our own country? Have we not seen, for instance, one steamboat line trying to drive off another steamboat line for the sake of getting a monopoly? Did we not see the Syracuse salt manufacturers sending in their salt some years ago for the avowed purpose of destroying our infant salt works? Do we not see at this moment the ruinous competition of two cables from Europe to Canada? Do we not see the Anglo-American Company trying to sweep out the Direct? Do we not know that in England railways are run against each other at ruinous rates for the purpose of getting control of trade? And then there are combinations of workmen all over the world together with associations of employees of labor. We have also the Iron Masters Association of England, and the Iron Masters Association at Pittsburgh in the United States, both of which act as one man: and therefore it is not strange that persons in the United States think it to their interest to crowd our market with their goods for the purposes of destroying our infant manufactures. If this is permitted to go on, the confidence of our manufacturers is destroyed, and their capital lost, it may be years and years before that confidence can be restored and that capital replaced. In the mean time, we shall have come to take the goods of the foreign manufacturers at their prices.

We are informed in the Speech from the Throne that there is stagnation in trade. We are informed, also, that this has arisen, not from any fault of our own, but in consequence of the depression in trade that has taken place in the neighboring country. That is the statement which His Excellency the Governor-General was advised by the hon. gentlemen opposite to make to this House, and if it be true, I say that if there ever is a time when it is lawful, or allowable, or wise, or expedient for a Government to interfere, now is that time. Besides, the general principle which I have been advocating, that our manufactures, being in infancy, require encouragement till they grow to majority, there is this particular exigency to be considered. There is an avowed and admitted stag-nation; there is an avowed and admitted depression in trade; and when this is put along with the principle I have just mentioned, I say that if there ever are circumstances in which the Government is justified in coming to the assistance of those engaged in trade, they exist now. In the first place, our manufactures are in their infancy; in the second place, there is a great depression; and in the third place, there is an admitted deficiency in the revenue. All these reasons combine to show that the Government—a paternal Government, which it is the boast of the hon. gentlemen opposite that they are—should intervene to alleviate the misery (because it amounts to misery) which now exists in this country, and to protect our credit. As to what the deficiency may be we cannot tell. Strange to say, the Finance Minister, in the long and able speech which he made, did not state that, although it was the purpose of that speech to state what he estimated the revenue to be, what he estimated the expenditure to be, and what the deficiency was to be if there was to be any deficiency. I ask any hon. gentleman who heard that speech, if he can tell me now what the deficiency is to be on the 1st of July next. We are told that a system of economy is to be followed, but how can this House tell whether those economies will be sufficient unless the hon. gentleman tells us what the deficiency will be? For the hon. gentleman not to tell us was like performing the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out. I can only account for his omitting to give us that information on the supposition that his speech was prepared for delivery before the Government changed their intention of bringing down an alteration in the tariff. I have heard it stated—I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice stated it the other day—that the Government had had no intention of altering the tariff. Well, of course, my hon. friend would not have stated that if it were not true. It may be perfectly true that the Government did not reduce the change to an Order in Council, and that they did not submit it to the Governor General. I assume that something of that kind would have would have justified the hon. gentleman in making that statement; but on the whole the circumstances show that the intention of the Government—or at all events that the intention of the leading members and the head of the Government—was to bring down some alteration in the tariff, and an alteration in the direction of protection to our manufacturers. Why, the member for Montreal West stated in his place that certainly the deputations which waited on the members of the Government on their invitation left them with the impression on their minds that there was going to be an alteration. Every one of those parties who communicated on the subject with hon. gentlemen opposite, left them with the firm belief that an increase in the tariff would be announced; and I have no doubt that when the member for Montreal West made a statement to that effect in Montreal, and afterwards told us here he was too busy in considering the question of the tariff to sit on the Committee of my hon. friend from Bothwell, he must have thought he had received sufficient information to warrant him, as a public man and as a trader, in making that announcement. Some of those gentlemen too whom I saw up here the other day from Montreal, one of them I was told was a leading Grit, said it was an insult to them. We have been asked, he said, in Montreal to make some suggestions about the alterations in the tariff, and we interested ourselves in that subject, and if the Government had had no intention of making an alteration in the tariff, why did they give us the trouble of addressing ourselves to such a task? Why ask us to go into the question of the tariff at all? Why ask the hon. member for Montreal West to go and study the matter, if the Government had not come to the conclusion to make any alteration? Why should hon. gentlemen have allowed it to go abroad that they intended to make a change, to the great injury of the trade of the country, for it is a fact that the slightest hint of that kind disturbs the public confidence, and works instantaneous and direct mischief? As I intend to make it my duty to ask this House, if I am spared, to accept the resolution I have already read, I shall not occupy the House at this late hour any longer, but just to say this, that in this matter the Government lost a great opportunity. The country at one time believed, and always will believe, that the Government had made up their minds, until a few days ago, to avail themselves of it. Men who can put this and that together, and who can draw inferences from facts, thought it was the intention of the Government, in some way or other, to come forward with a measure of relief. These gentlemen from Montreal said they were received with great courtesy by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, and he led them to believe that he was only prevented by the pressure of his friends in Parliament, and the fear of not being supported by them, from bringing in such a measure. Now, I can scarcely believe that a pressure of that kind would have induced them to change their fixed policy. There are only two solutions to the question why they have acted as they have. One is this,—that my hon. friend the Premier desires to please the gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces by a return to the free-trade principles which he enunciated in Scotland. He was hampered on the one side by free trade pledges which he made at Dundee and elsewhere, and he was hampered, on the other hand, by promises made to his friends in this country and by the supposed necessity of electing my hon. friend from Montreal West. He was also hampered by his Sarnia speech. He had a choice of difficulties. He was a Free Trader in Scotland, and a Protectionist in Montreal. Therefore, my hon. friend was exceedingly glad to have this pressure brought to bear upon him, and he returned to his first love—his Dundee love. He threw over my hon. friend from Montreal West, and made him the scapegoat, and sacrificed him and his friends. Perhaps there might be another object—that when the Hon. Premier came to look at the difficulties of the tariff he got frightened. He remembered the horrible mess the Finance Minister made of it the Session before last, and his unsuccessful attempt to deal with the various articles; and my hon. friend—joining perhaps in his secret heart in that want of confidence which everybody expressed in the Finance Minister's ability to make a sufferable, decent policy—was able to say to his colleagues, "Well, you see, these Maritime people won't vote for us, and this will be a good way of getting out of the scrape." And so, notwithstanding all the previous labours of the different Boards of Trade, and of the people from Montreal and elsewhere who were invited to express themselves as to the alteration of the tariff, and notwithstanding the expectations held out by my hon. friend from Montreal West, everything is thrown over, and here we are back where we were last summer. The hon. gentleman opposite has lost a great opportunity. The country would have been grateful if he had come forward with a measure for its relief, and I believe he might have expected the hearty support of hon. gentlemen on this side.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — Hear! hear!

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD — My hon. friend smiles ironically. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, judging from the manner in which he acted when in Opposition, cannot conceive it possible that any party, rising superior to any party triumph, could sacrifice party questions for the good of the country. This is, however, the principle which actuates us upon this side. I am as strong a party man as my hon. friend, and will go as far for party as he; and parties can fight and have their struggles, triumphs and defeats so long as the country is not made the victim and does not suffer. But I say that that party is unworthy to retain the confidence of the people who, in their desire for victory, will forget the country. That is not the principle which actuates us on this side, and I hope it will never actuate us. Surely there is a wide enough field to fight political battles and urge political principles without injuring the country. My hon. friend must have felt in his own heart that he might have expected the strong support of this side to any reasonable proposition that could have been made for an incidental tariff to protect our manufactures and give them some aid, some alleviation, com-for: and assistance in this time of distress.

The manufacturers of this country have been hoping against hope. Some have been working half-time, some three-quarters time, and some have scarcely been keeping their doors open, hoping and believing they would get assistance; and now at this last moment, just as they thought the time of relief was coming, just when their tether was strained to the utmost, when they were keeping on their work-people—not by spending their own money—but by their credit and by pledging their resources, in the hope and belief that they were going to get assistance from the Government, no aid was given. The disappointment was dreadful, and there was deep indignation—curses not loud but deep—at this heartless policy which led them up to the very last moment to expect relief, and at the last moment, owing to some apprehended difficulty which if faced manfully would have disappeared, they were disappointed, and the manufacturers and those who depended upon them, the working people and their families, were left in a state of suspense, and now almost in a state of despair. But not only are the manufacturers—who had a right to expect that they would be assisted—not only are they driven to despair by the callous timidity of the Government, but the merchants in every city and town in the Dominion, who thought and believed from the assurances of the Government, from the inferences they drew, that there would be an alteration in the tariff, pledged their credit in order to get their goods out of bond, and that is a great addition to the commercial suffering, depression and stagnation which exists in the country.

This Government had an opportunity which may never offer itself again. Notwithstanding their very many faults, which have ripened to maturity in a very short time, if they had come forward with a measure of the kind I indicate, and which was indicated by my hon. friend, and by the motion I had the honour to read just now, the country would have condoned all their offences and given them plenary absolution for all their sins of omission. They would have spoken with renewed confidence, and held their position, and we would have been left in the cold shades of Opposition year after year. They would retain the confidence of the country by having come forward, in the time of need, commercial stagnation, ruin and misery, to the rescue. It is no compensation to us that this mistake, this gravest error of the hon. gentleman opposite, will redound to the credit of the Opposition. I know and feel that it is no compensation to us that the party to which I belong are very many steps nearer a return to power than they were a week ago, in consequence of the Government having adopted this policy. It is no consolation to us. It were infinitely better that the Government should have been sustained for years and years if they had come forward at this time of trouble to the relief of the country, the relief of the manufacturers, the operatives and their starving families.

I have spoken principally about manufacturers, as the resolution of my hon. friend is confined to the protection of that interest. I am sure it can be shown that the agricultural interests have the same rights as the manufacturing and the same claim on this House. Although not a farmer myself, nor the representative of a rural constituency, from the position I hold I am overlaid with correspondence from rural constituents and from the farmers of the country—men whom I know to be farmers and not amateurs—real, hardy, intelligent sons of the soil. They all point in one direction—that the farmers, are now awaking to their claim, partly sentiment I admit, but partly from a spirit of justice, and that they will no longer suffer Canada to be flooded with American agricultural products, whilst our productions are literally excluded from crossing their borders. But I shall not enter upon that subject now, but bring it up on a future occasion. It is not because this resolution does not go as far as I wish, and does not embrace all classes, that I do not vote against it; and I call upon all those who are in favour of agricultural protection to come forward and assist the manufacturers first and they will have a claim upon them afterwards. Let both these interests go together, and not even the strength of my hon. friends opposite, nor the strength of the majority behind them, can withstand them.

I believe confidently, as I said before, that that majority, if the Premier had used a little more of his ordinary courage, would have followed him in this direction just as blindly as they are now following him to the injury of the country, and the injury of himself and friends when they return to their constituents. Believing thoroughly and sincerely in what I say, I venture to affirm that if to-morrow there was an appeal made to the people on this question, the answer would be returned from one end of the country to the other in favor of the policy I advocate, against the culpable and I was going to say almost senseless policy proposed by the Government on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I congratulate my right hon. friend on having at last found some resting place which he may call a policy. It is true he has only brought his goods to a slaughter market, but he says he will be able to drive British competition from Canada in a very short time, although he has not told us what that interesting process means. The hon. gentleman has not indulged in any of the extreme statements which he made at public meetings where there were none to answer him—where he attributed the commercial and manufacturing distress wholly to the Government. Why, he attributed every kind of misfortune, including the Colorado bug, to the presence of a Grit Government. The hon. gentleman has very carefully abstained to-day, and will continue to abstain, I have no doubt, in this House from imputing any disaster like that to anything that the Government has done or is about to do. But, Sir, before proceeding to discuss some of the matters the right hon. gentleman referred to, let me call the attention of everyone for a moment to his remarks regarding John Stuart Mill. The hon. gentleman may not have made the statement that my hon. friend from Waterloo attributed to him, but he may find, if he recalled a certain circumstance, that he might have done so. He must surely remember that even John Stuart Mill wrote a letter to Mr. Greeley, of New York, withdrawing that passage from his book. He may remember the disappointment felt by the Protectionists of the United States with reference to Mr. Mill's passage—how they distorted it, when Mr. Mill really withdrew it, and expressed his regret that it had ever been put in. But in order to make doubly sure, I had the pleasure last summer of meeting with a well known English writer—whom the hon. gentleman no doubt knows—Mr. Newmarsh, an intimate friend of Mr. Mill; and I called his attention to this circumstance, sitting at the dinner table one day in London. He said: "Oh, yes; that is well known. "We all expressed our exceeding "regret to Mr. Mill that the passage "should have been written, as it was "liable to be misunderstood. He with- "drew it, however, unmistakably and "completely." So Mr. Mill cannot be quoted. I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to Mr. Newmarsh. I have no doubt he (Mr. Newmarsh) will recall the conversation which took place at Mr. Potter's dinner-table.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I don't understand the "hear, hears" of hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Was the hon. gentleman going to "Potter's Field?"

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Both the right hon. gentleman and I were going to Potter's Field one day, but he has gone there now, and is likely to remain there. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman has taken the ground to-night that he has always advocated—a national policy. Well, Sir, who doesn't advocate a national policy? Who is there that never did? The right hon. gentleman considers that he advocates a national policy which was right and that nobody else was capable of doing so. Every Government has advocated a national policy. We have expected in this country that a revenue tariff was a desirable financial policy. Under many circumstances I would not agree with that. But in consequence of our geographical position I have been driven to agree to it. I have never wavered in my adherence to free-trade doctrines. I am amazed to hear the hon. gentleman say that free-trade is not even an important fact in political economy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I did not say that. My expression was not synonymous. I said it was a branch and a subordinate branch of political economy.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I can only say that I am surprised that any political student should say that the entire freedom of commerce and trade is a subordinate part of political economy. Why, Sir, I believe it is the very height of political economy. I believe there is nothing that conduces so much to the welfare of a great people as to have entire freedom of commerce. Who does not recollect when British shipping was hampered with all kinds of harassing legislation? Who does not remember when British shipping was not able to move about in the harbour without great annoyance, simply because the tonnage dues were imposed according to the size of the deck? Who does not know that whilst this tonnage was in existence, whilst this embarrassing protection lasted, whilst every British port was shut to every foreign vessel, and when British owners demanded British shipping for themselves, whilst no American ship could go to a British port or to a port of one of its colonies—who does not remember that the United States showed their power as an able nation, and that they were rapidly outstripping British shipping. But the moment the ports were thrown open to all parts of the world, and foreign vessels traded with Glasgow, London, Leith, Hull, Liverpool, or Quebec with the same ease as the British shipping—when the tonnage laws were repealed, when there was perfect and complete open competition for all kinds of shipping—who does not know, what student of political economy and history does not know, that from that moment British shipping took a start forward that has never been checked to this hour. My hon. friend behind me the other day said the check to American shipping was caused by the war in the United States. No doubt the war did a great deal of injury to the shipping, but it is a fact that the American shipping declined more rapidly after the war than during the war. It is a fact, as shown by a statement recently published, that the foreign traffic of the United States carried by American ships is at this moment less than it was at the closing year of the war, shewing that at the time of the excessive protection, where protection is admitted as a principle, that the shipping is being rapidly destroyed, while on the other hand the shipping of Great Britain and her colonies promise to soon absorb the entire foreign commerce of the world. And yet the right hon. gentleman says that freedom of commerce is but a subordinate part of political economy. But the right hon. gentleman guards himself; he goes for moderate protection. At one part of his speech he would seem to indicate definitely that he had decided to adopt protection as his political creed, but he took care to qualify this. He says he favours a moderate protection, and he illustrated it by suggesting that it would be a very good thing to let a little water out of our lake in order to drive machinery, but it would be very disastrous if we let the whole lake out, as it would sweep the whole machinery away. I am afraid his illustration is unfortunate; for if a little protection will drive trade a little, a great deal of protection will sweep away the trade altogether. The right hon. gentleman admits this by his illustration, if it means anything; and the hon. gentleman is right. It would be the worst thing that could happen to adopt protection as a principle, because that means that everybody must be protected alike, or else some person is to suffer injustice. Who is to suffer injustice? The right hon. gentleman says Canada is young, and that it must be led gently until it grows up to manhood, and able to take care of itself. But who is to be its nurse? Who is to take care of the child?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—It's dry nurse!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A very dry nurse! The hon. gentleman reminds one of the man standing in a tub and trying to lift himself by the two handles. If protection is to be adopted as a policy, and all parties are to be protected, then we are the worse for the protection by the cost of protection itself. If, on the other hand, only certain classes are to be protected, I want to know what the classes are. To whom is the protection to apply? The hon. gentleman took a great deal of care to tell of his interest in the farmers. And, unfortunate man! he has his post office box crammed every day with letters from distressed farmers calling for protection. I only wish he would send me a dozen of them to read. It is very unfair that all the distressed farmers should go to the hon gentleman and never to myself. I represent one of the largest and richest farming constituencies in Canada, I believe. It is one of the largest in population and area, and one of the best farming districts, and yet I have not received one letter from any of my farming constituents complaining that we were not protecting them. The fact is, farmers in my county are an intelligent class. They know as much as my hon. friend from Kingston with reference to protection. The farmer knows that it is the merest sham thrown in to delude the people. He knows it is merely trying to coat over the pill with sugar. But surely my hon. friend will give the farmers of this country more credit than to imagine that a few honied phrases and pleasing expressions are sufficient to seduce them from a sound policy, and to induce them to adopt a protection policy. But the right hon. gentleman says it is a shame that the Government of the country should permit the United States to crowd their cereals into this market to the injury of our farmers. Does the right hon. gentleman pretend to say that it is possible to affect the price of wheat of these markets by wheat being sent from the United States. Does not my right hon. friend know very well that wheat comes here as merchandise, and makes us the richer by the carriage? What was our canal system constructed for? Was it merely to carry wheat from the borders of Lake Huron? Did he mean that every person who established a mill should grind Canadian wheat and Canadian wheat only? If we adopt a protective system it would shut out all trade from other countries and compel us to trade with one another in any way we thought best.

The hon. gentleman did not venture to deal with another particular question; he did not tell the House, as he was bound to do, in what way we should provide a revenue if this policy were adopted. I was compelled, as a member of the Administration, to listen to every representation made to the Government during the last few months; and it gave me a great deal of pleasure to receive the deputations on this subject with courtesy and kindness. I hope that I gave no one any reason to complain in this regard. But it seems that the very fact that I did so receive these deputations is now turned against me, and I am told that, on this account, these deputations had good reason to believe that I intended to accede to their wishes; this is indeed a new doctrine. "But suppose that we do adopt this protective policy," I asked one of these deputations. "You represented a certain manufacture." I will not mention, for I do not desire to state names. He answered, "Yes." "Very well," I said, "if the duty is increased, what will be the result. Let us talk business regarding this matter. You want 7½ per cent more protection?" "Yes." "Well how will that benefit you?" "Oh!" he replied, "it will raise the price." "But how will it raise the price," I continued, "if they are now able to compete with you from the United States, unless you exclude their articles." "Ah!" he rejoined, "it will exclude their goods." "Oh! then you will destroy our revenue with respect to this article to the extent of $175,000; how will you replace it?"

Sir, there was no answer; and this question the right hon. gentleman is bound to answer, if he is bound to give his policy to the House, as he seems obliged to do. So it will be with almost every article; to the extent a revenue tariff is abandoned, and a protection policy adopted, the revenue of the country is destroyed, and must be supplied in some other way. The hon. gentleman says that in the Act of Confederation he gave away the power of direct taxation to the local governments, but I do not agree with that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—Oh, no! I did not say that. What I stated was, that power was given to the local legislatures and municipalities, and that if we exercised it as well, it would amount to confiscation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—That is very true. I would like to see my hon. friend adopt his protective policy. I do not wish him any ill, but if I did I could desire nothing worse than to see him on this side announcing a protective policy, and the imposition of a poll tax on the people, in order to make up for the taxation required to carry on the Government. I would like to see him carry it out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—I dare say you would.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—And I tell the hon. gentleman that it would have delighted him two or three days ago, if he had us bringing down such a policy as would have made this course a necessary consequence. That was what the hon. gentleman desired and hoped.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—The hon. gentleman raised the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. That was a protective policy; and yet it increased the revenue.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—No, Sir; that was purely a revenue policy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—It was both; try another rise and to get more revenue.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—I would much rather take a rise of my hon. friend.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—You have already.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—My hon. friend says that I have already; I will not do it again.

The increase from 15 to 17½ per cent. was made in order to secure a revenue policy.

It is quite true that I have always said, as I reiterate now that so far as such a policy encourages manufactures, I will not on that account complain. If the country was so situated geographically that our system of taxation could be so readjusted, I believe that nothing would enrich it so much as to relieve trade and commerce from every species of restriction imposed upon them. I look upon every restriction as regards trade and commerce between man and man as simply a relic of a barbarous age; and if we are compelled in our fiscal system, as is and will be the case as long as our neighbours are so diametrically opposed to the views I personally hold, we must take this means to raise the revenue. We require from Customs and Excise duties, as I told my hon. friend from Montreal—and so I tell him now—and as I have always said in my speeches at Hamilton, &c., the necessities of the country are such that it is impossible that we can succeed in raising sufficient revenue with less than 15 per cent. And when I spoke at Hamilton I remarked that my impression was that we would soon require an advance. This proved to be the case, and we imposed an increased tariff without hesitation; but the Government were bound in this particular juncture in our affairs to consider whether it was possible to obtain any more revenue by means of an additional percentage on certain classes of goods. It may be reasonably doubted whether it would be possible, or if so at all, it would have only been possible to the extent of excluding certain articles from which we now derive revenue, every cent of which we require for our expenditures. This was a policy which the Government was bound to consider in the interests of the country as well as in the interests of manufacturers and farmers.

It was a very easy thing for my right hon. friend, in his position, to criticise and to offer a policy which he knew he would have no opportunity of putting in force for many years to come, if ever. This was a safe course to pursue; and if the right hon. gentleman derived much pleasure from contemplating the effects of that policy among the farmers of the country, then I am sure that as far as I am concerned he is quite welcome to it.

My right hon. friend also took serious objection to the policy of the Government, because he said it had produced serious derangement in trade in consequence of merchants having taken their goods out of bond, in anticipation of a change in the tariff. I have only to say that the Government never directly or indirectly stated to anyone that the tariff would either be advanced or lowered, and we would have been as much to blame if we had indicated to any person that we would not alter it, as if we had announced that a change would take place. The Administration had no right whatever to intimate anything that would give any justification for derangement in trade; but, Sir, it was very natural for my hon. friend from Montreal, and for all men in his business who examined the returns published in the Gazette.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—And who knew that a deficit this year would be inevitable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It was quite natural for them to suppose that there would be a change in the tariff in order to meet these circumstances, also that this agitation would increase, as the time drew near for the meeting of Parliament and the delivery of the Budget Speech; and that every man who could command the means should withdraw his goods from bond, to save himself from the disadvantage of a possible increase. But for this no Government could be held accountable—no Government could be charged with dereliction of duty merely because people drew inferences from facts that were published, not for that particular time only, but in accordance with a custom that had prevailed for years. Only to this extent, Sir, is there any excuse or justification for the right hon. gentleman's assertion that we were in any way responsible for such a state of things.

I have no doubt that when my hon. friend from Cumberland was Minister of Customs, if there was any change in the tariff—I do not recollect, that there was—he found, repeatedly, questions addressed to him by letter; and the hon. gentleman will remember, that during the last two Sessions members behind him put questions on the paper enquiring what increase would be placed on certain articles. People did not consider that the Government had no right—it would indeed be a violation of their duty—to make any statement then either as to any intention to create new duties, or let the duties alone.

I was a little surprised, Sir, to hear the right hon. member for Kingston speak of my hon. friend's tariff measure, two years ago, as to the mess made of it; but if the hon. gentleman should hold his tongue about anything, it should be with regard to making a mess of a tariff, for who does not remember the time when we had one tariff in the afternoon and another in the evening; and who does not know of the right-about-face movement of the right hon. gentleman? I am not aware whether my hon. friend was ever in the army or not; but if so, he was familiar with the manœuvre of right-about-face; and if there was ever a right-about-face, it was shown in that change of the entire tariff. I do not think that the hon. member for Cumberland was in the Cabinet at the time when he was credited with applying the whip very liberally from behind, bringing the pressure to bear upon the Government, which, it seems, the people from the Maritime Provinces are always credited with using. I believe that my hon. friend from Cumberland did not then deny the soft impeachment; but my hon. friends from the Provinces do deny the charge now made, and I also do in their name. I saw many of these gentlemen, who discussed the matter calmly and quietly with me. I heard all their views, as well as the opinions of many other members; but no member, nor any deputation from this House, held out any threats of any kind in this relation; and we have no reason to doubt that any course the Administration might pursue in the interests of the country would be supported by their opponents in the House as a general thing.

I have merely to say, in conclusion, that the Administration will feel bound, while they occupy these seats, to endeavour to administer the affairs of the country in the interest of the great mass of the people; but, in so doing, they cannot avoid, apparently, trampling upon some interests which they have no desire to treat in this manner. And if commercial men at present imagine that we have wantonly neglected their interests, and wantonly avoided giving them any relief in our power, I have only to state that it was impossible for any Government to give a more earnest, serious, dispassionate and prolonged consideration to their interests than they have done.

The hon. gentlemen opposite say that the course we have taken has placed them many years nearer to power than they were three weeks ago; and this expression seemed to give the hon. gentleman infinite pleasure, judging from the gusto with which he delivered it. Well, Sir, it was not necessary to affirm anything of that sort to keep up appearances; and I do not grudge the hon. gentleman any little satisfaction he may obtain by expressing such an opinion. Sir, I do not care if in the exercise of our duty to the country—for I believe that the Government ought to act in the interests of the great mass—this course brings the hon. gentleman nearer to power or not I do not want to retain power at the expense of principle. And if it be the only object of an Opposition or a political party to get several steps nearer to power, why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that some of us might have occupied such a position many years ago. I believe that we are firmer now than on the day when the Finance Minister announced the policy of the Government. The course we have pursued dissatisfies some of our own political friends in the House, whom I grieve to say are opposed to our policy; but nevertheless, although it may have alienated them in this or in anything else, we have pursued the only course open to us as a Government under the peculiar circumstances in which we were placed. I believe that it will commend itself to the House and country; and instead of bringing my hon. friends opposite several steps nearer to power—to that power for which they long so much, and which is ever on their lips—I am conscious that it removes them a great many steps further from it than they were before; and if they attempt in this country to act in the interests of a class instead of in the interests of the whole people, the whole people will not, Sir, sustain those who support a partial principle.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto)—I think I must, in justice to myself, detain the House for two or three minutes before a vote is taken. The resolution of the hon. gentleman from West Montreal is so worded that it must succeed in securing the votes of those who have the most opposite opinions. It propounds a principle without defining a rate, and therefore those hon. gentlemen who have the most opposite views may equally vote for it. I may state, however, that this juncture is not the time to amend the tariff. I listened with very great regret, (as many hon. gentlemen did in this House,) to the announcement made by the Finance Minister of his policy. I conceived that during the recess he should have patiently, prudently and carefully examined into those industries that were languishing, that he should have made provision for them, and be prepared to announce a policy that would meet with general approval. I was disappointed, and I am quite sure that others were disappointed, and yet I feel as others, must, that that policy having been announced that the changes in the tariff have, to a large extent, been discounted, that the spring trade being in the country now being commercial, a change now made might be most disastrous. I have listened to a great many speeches in this House attacking positions that were never raised, and assailing a policy that has never been suggested. I have heard attacks on the policy of a "Chinese Wall," nobody having proposed such a policy. I believe no one who advocated protection wished for anything unreasonable, or anything that would have been detrimental to the agricultural interests, or to any other interest in this country; but if carried out in the mild spirit as proposed would have been productive of the best results. While gentlemen on this side of the House have expressed their desire to foster languishing industries, so have gentlemen on the Treasury Benches. I have taken down for example the words of the Finance Minister on the subject, and before recording my vote I wish to ask him what he means by the following:—"I do not wish to lose sight of the fair play due to our manufactures." I wish to ask the Minister of Finance if by these words he understands that if new dangers should arise to our industries, no remedies are to be provided for those dangers? I wish to ask if, in the ever-changing phases of trade, manufactures languish, there are no remedies to be found. I wish to know if there is such an undue desire to provide for the nineteen-twentieths there is no determination shown to make provision for the other twentieth. The Minister of Finance said that he was not prepared to legislate for one-twentieth part of the population to the exclusion of nineteen-twentieths; but I ask whether if the latter have rights, the former do not also possess them? If the hon. gentleman would pause for a moment, he would have thought that the class which has invested eighty millions in plant and in the development of the industries of this country, annually expending forty millions of dollars and employing two hundred thousand persons were entitled to consideration. If three pensions are allowed to each of the 200,000, which would be a fair allowance for each family, it would give a total of 600,000, equal to more than one-eighth of our population; and if you add those who are dependant for support upon other industries, you have as many more, or fully one-fourth of our entire population interested in manufactures. He will agree with me that this is something more than one-twentieth. I will simply ask in conclusion, whether the Finance Minister will announce to this House--because I hold that a hasty adjustment of the tariff would be a dangerous experiment--whether after he has patiently investigated and looked into the claims of these languishing industries, he will provide such measures as will save them from destruction. It is due to me that this question should be answered before I record my vote.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I do not propose at this hour to enter on my reply to the right hon. member for Kingston, or to make any reference to matters that have arisen in this debate, I merely rise to answer the question of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. Undoubtedly circumstances may arise—we have never denied that they might arise—which will require further action at our hands. Our position is simply that we see no occasion at present for taking further action.

The members were then called in, and a division was taken with the following result :

The amendment was then declared resolved in the negative ; majority, 55. The following gentlemen paired upon the question :—Mr. Rochester for the amendment, with Mr. Blackburn against ; Mr. Currier for, with Mr. Power against ; Mr. Ouimet for, with Mr. ——— against.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

The item $9,550 for Administration of Justice was passed, and the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House adjourned at Twenty minutes past One a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at ten minutes past Three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BABY—To amend the Criminal Law relating to offences against the person.

Mr. WORKMAN—To incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Mutual Fire and Marine Insurance Company.

ELECTION ACT OF 1874.

Mr. TASCHEREAU—To amend the Dominion Elections Act of 1874, declaring ineligible for election to the House of Commons all persons disqualified for election to the Local Legislatures.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I invite an explanation of the object of the Bill.

Mr. TASCHEREAU—It is intended to amend section 102 of the Dominion Elections Act of 1874.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—How does the hon. gentleman propose to deal with cases in which the judges have declared parties disqualified under the law, who after such disqualification have been whitewashed through a Bill introduced into a Local Legislature for the purpose of destroying the decision of the judge. This House has not adopted such a policy, and I trust that it never will. I hope that having adopted the system of trial of controverted elections by judges, their decisions when rendered will be respected by this Parliament. As the hon. gentleman has introduced a Bill, which is to cause action to be taken in this House upon disqualifications in connection with the Local Legislatures, I trust that he will provide that this Parliament will only regard the judicial decision, and not any act of any Local Legislature by which contempt is thrown upon these judgments.

Mr. TASCHEREAU—I will take the suggestion of the hon. member into consideration.

Mr. OLIVER—To empower the Canada Southern Railway Company to issue preferential stock.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I beg leave to introduce a Bill entitled an Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway.—

This is simply intended to remove all doubts as to the power of the Government to act under a former statute regarding the Halifax extension.

TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—I ask for information concerning the translation of the debates. We have received only a small portion as yet in French, and I would like to know what progress is being made.

Mr. BOWELL—The Chairman is not here, and I am unable to give any information. The Committee has not been called together, and I have no knowledge whatever of what has been done. The whole matter is in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee, who has apparently assumed all responsibility.

QUESTIONS BY MEMBERS—HALIFAX STATION.

Mr. DOMVILLE—Was the iron station now at Halifax awaiting erection purchased privately or by public tender, and from whom?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have already stated that the iron roof was not obtained by tender, but purchased from Clarke, Reeves & Co., of Philadelphia, at a cost of $12,800.

THE DECK-LOADS' LAW.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Whether any report has been made by the Port Warden of Quebec to the Collector of that Port, or to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in relation to a violation during the season of 1875 of an Act intituled "An Act respecting Deck-Loads," 36 Victoria, Cap. 56 by the barque N. Churchill; or whether such violation of said law has been brought to the notice of said department in any other way; also whether such vessel before clearance by the Customs Department, had the certificates required by sections 5, 6 and 7 of said Act, and whether any prosecution has been taken against the master of said vessel for violations of the Provisions of said Act for the penalties provided under sections 8, 9 and 10 of said Act or the punishment of imprisonment to which the master of said vessel is liable?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Some correspondence in this connection is now before the House, and I presume that my hon. friend has seen it. Steps have been instituted to prosecute, but the vessel in question has never returned.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The captain and vessel have been in the country all winter. I am glad to learn that my hon. friend has taken steps in the matter, and this is quite satisfactory to me. My hon. friend has not, however, stated whether before clearance by the Customs Department, the vessels had the certificates required by sec. 5, 6, and 7.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—My hon. friend will see by the correspondence, that there has not been so great a violation of the law, as he anticipated the correspondence would show. The Government will prosecute if the law has been violated.

PORTAGE ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Whether the arrangements and negociations carried on in 1872 and 1873, between the Canadian Government and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, for the transfer of Portage Island in the Bay of Miramichi to the Canadian Government, have resulted in the title of such Island being vested in the Government of Canada?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I believe that the title is not complete. I am not aware of the existence of any return in this regard.

JUDGE AT SOREL.

Mr. GILL—Is it the intention of the Government to take the necessary measures to have a resident Judge at Sorel during the leave of absence granted to the Honorable Mr. Justice Loranger?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The Government have taken steps to supply his place during his term of absence. Some correspondence which has passed on the subject is at the disposal of the House, if the hon. member will move for it.

CHENAL ECARTÉ.

Mr. STEPHENSON—Will any sum be put into the Supplementary Estimates, or be otherwise provided this year for the purpose of prosecuting the work already begun for the improvement of the navigation of the Chenal Ecarté at its confluence with Lake St. Clair?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not the intention of the Government to touch that channel this year.

INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. BECHARD—Is it the intention of the Government to have published in French the book intituled "Laws and Orders in Council affecting the Inland Revenue of Canada, 1875," which the Department of Inland Revenue has just published?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET moved for a return of the number of suits instituted before the Supreme Court, and of the number of judgments recorded.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the Supreme Court was one of appeal, and suits were not instituted there, but brought from other Courts. The Government had no power to ascertain what decisions had been rendered, but he would take steps to communicate with the officers of the Court, and obtain a return, which he had reason to believe would not be voluminous.

The motion was carried.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. OLIVER moved for a statement of loss to the Post Office Department by the sending of certain papers and documents free of postage during the last Session of the Ontario and Quebec Legislatures.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said the Post Office Department was not in a position to give the information desired. It was provided by the Post Office Act that certain documents and other matters mentioned therein might be sent free of postage. There had been no record kept, and therefore no return could be furnished. The motion of the hon. gentleman, however, would place the Government in such a position as to be able to furnish the information next year.

Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. OLIVER said he was confident this information would be acceptable to the House and country if it could be furnished in the future.

The motion was dropped.

GLACE BAY HARBOUR MASTER.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for a return of moneys paid to Mr. Henry Mitchell, Harbour Master of the Port of Glace Bay, in Cape Breton. Mr. McDonald said it was claimed that this harbour was private property. The appointment was very unpopular and altogether unnecessary in the public interest. The appointment was not asked for by any one interested in the matter, and he understood a few months after it was made the official was asked to resign. The impression at the place was that the appointment was made for the political services of the official. He (Mr. McDonald) wished to see the correspondence to ascertain whether such was the case or not, and that the public might know the facts.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he was not aware that this gentleman was a friend of the Government. He (Mr. Smith) could furnish the information off hand if it would satisfy his hon. friend, but was quite willing to bring down the papers if he desired it.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) thought the hon. gentleman was a little astray in supposing that the harbour is private property. If the hon. gentleman took the trouble to look into the subject he would find that under the rules and regulations of the Government of Nova Scotia, the Governor in Council before Confederation had power to make the appointment. The same power that then was given to the Governor in Council was now vested in the Marine and Fisheries Department. There was another reason why the appointment of harbour master at the Port of Glace Bay was necessary, and that was that the Dominion Act gave certain powers to the harbour master whereby he could compel obedience to any orders he gave in connection with the safety of the harbour. This harbour being located almost immediately on the Atlantic ocean, required a good deal of supervision to prevent masters of vessels from throwing ballast or other materials into the water, and thereby interfering with the navigation. Unless the harbour master received an official appointment there would be no one to compel obedience to the orders which it would be necessary to give for the purpose of keeping the harbour free from obstruction. He did not believe the appointment would be regarded as unpopular, and if it was unpopular with any one, the dissatisfaction could be only with the proprietors. He thought the appointment was one the Government could justify.

Mr. MACDONALD reiterated the statement that he regarded the appointment as one not in the interest of the public, and he thought it should be known whether or not the office had been discontinued. Fees had only been collected by the officer the first few months after his appointment, and it was doubtful to him whether the gentleman still held the appointment.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said the appointment was made in July, 1874, and in the year 1875, the harbour master received $142. Therefore, the hon. gentleman was clearly under a misapprehension when he said there were no fees collected in 1875.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SALT TRADE.

Mr. FARROW moved for a Select Committee to enquire into the salt interests of this country, with power to send for persons, papers and records. He said he was glad he had now an opportunity of bringing this matter before the House, having brought the subject up too late last Session for it to procure the necessary consideration. The salt interests of the country were in a very languishing condition, and it might not be generally known, but in the western part of the Province there are the best salt mines to be found in the world: There was something like $500,000 invested in these wells, and it was an interest which, on account of various circumstances, was unprofitable. They had heard a great deal about the protection of numerous products, but not a word about the protection of salt. Those products which had a duty of 17½ per cent. were represented to require more protection, while salt had none. The United States prevented Canadians from sending their salt into that market, whilst the Americans could flood the Canadian market free, and slaughter their goods. If the other manufacturers were placed in such a position, there would be a hue and cry sent down to the House which could not be withstood. He trusted this matter would secure the attention of the House. What were the circumstances of the case? In the first place the interior of Canada was flooded with Syracuse salt from Oswego, and at the mouth of the St. Lawrence they were met with an abundance of Liverpool salt which came over in Quebec ballast ships at very little cost. That salt was thrown on the Canadian market at a less price than it was sold for in Liverpool. At the time the Washington Treaty was consummated they were promised that the Americans would repeal their duty, but this promise passed as a matter of history merely; consequently they had to look to this House for redress, and they asked for nothing more than they had a right to expect. They asked for a small duty on foreign salt, and he thought, considering the condition of the exchequer that such a tax would contribute considerably to the revenue. There was another point. The bags in which the salt was shipped to Canada were allowed to come in duty free, while the Canadians had to pay a duty on bags they imported. The House could not fail to see the unfairness of this condition of things. Even a small duty placed on those bags would help the struggling industry of salt a good deal. The Americans sent their surplus lumber to Canada for the purpose of slaughtering the market; and he contended that the interference of the Government was urgently required to remove this disability from which they suffered.

We produced 20,000 tons of salt a year, and what were we to do with it? The Americans sent their salt here to be sold even at half price, making the best of the matter they could, and this was done repeatedly, to the great detriment of our interests, which had attained great importance. They were not to be trifled with; one-half million of capital was interested in the works; and in 1874, there were manufactured in Canada, no less than 350,000 barrels of salt, equal to 98 millions of pounds. If they could only run on full time, the product would amount to one million barrels a year, sufficient to supply this country and the Western States also, if the latter market was open. These industries employed a large number of men, and had caused the establishment of large and fine foundries and cooperages in their neighborhood. Timber was required in great quantities for the barrels, and in this manner, the farmers benefitted to a great extent, owing to the existence of these interests, when prosperous. It had been said that manufacturers did not add to the well-being of the agricultural community; but this was not the case. Previous to the negotiation of the Washington Treaty a small duty was levied on imported salt, but it was removed in this relation with the understanding that the Americans would abolish their protective duty, but this had not been done. Our neighbours played a game of grab; they obtained every possible concession from this country but gave none in return. The Canadian industries would thrive with one-half the duty which impeded the exportation of our salt to the United States. The present price was very low; and the manufactories were not closed simply because if they were stopped the machinery would be destroyed by rust. The importation of Liverpool salt was the chief obstacle. It was to be remembered that England during the reign of King William imposed an enormous tax on foreign salt, about 22s. a bushel; in 1823, it amounted to not less than 15s., two years later it was reduced to 2s., and shortly afterwards taken off altogether. England protected her interests until they were firmly established; she now manufactured about two millions of tons per year, exporting of this nearly one million. One-half of the American duty was 35 cents per barrel—not too much protection to ask under the circumstances, our population being only four compared with the forty millions across the border. A small revenue duty should be levied on both Liverpool and American salt. Free trade said that if they could not stand competition they could go to the wall; they only desired a fair field, and no undue favour. Our salt, made in Huron and Bruce—to this fact he called the attention of the Minister of Justice particularly—was the finest in the world, and for this he had the testimony of the most noted chemists, who proved that it was superior to Ashton salt, factory filled salt, Syracuse and Cheshire salt. As to any objections members from the Maritime Provinces might have to extending the protection required, he thought that Confederation was intended to bind us together commercially, hence Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward's Island ought not to trade with the United States in this relation. The Lower Provinces had rich coal fields. If that interest required protection, it should obtain it, but he knew that no industry was suffering so severely as the salt manufacture. Vessels taking salt to New Brunswick, could bring back coal, which was placed on board, he understood, at $2.37½ a ton. He could promise for it under such circumstances, and they would be well paid if they received $1.50 per ton for the salt, which could be laid down in Quebec and Halifax, at from $5.00 to $5.50 per ton. Coal could be taken in return at $2.50 per ton, and sold at $4.50 or $5.00 in Toronto and Ontario generally. That would be as cheap coal as we could get in the west from the United States. Would it not be better for us to leave our money in our own country? That was the true national policy; the other policy was one which would ruin the Dominion.

There had been a good deal said about increasing the cost to the consumer, but it had been admitted that the late advance of 2½ per cent. in the tariff had not produced that effect. The only result of it was to diminish the profits of the middlemen. A small duty put on salt would not increase the cost of that article to the consumer. The high duty in the United States had not been attended by any such result, the competition between the Syracuse and the Saginaw companies keeping down prices. To such an extent had the competition gone that a meeting of the Michigan salt producers was recently held to consider what they should do. They decided on sending 10,000 barrels of salt into the Eastern markets and selling it at even lower prices. That was the way Protection worked in regard to that interest.

He merely asked for a small committee, the expense of which would be very trifling, as they intended to call only one witness. He trusted the finances of the country had not fallen so low that the expense would be objected to. There were no less than twenty-five salt wells in Huron and Bruce, in which $500,000 capital was invested. He was glad the hon. member for South Bruce, who had the ear of the Premier, was present to give his assistance.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I understand that the hon. gentleman does not propose sending for many witnesses.

Mr. FARROW—There is only one, or at the furthest two, I intend to send for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I shall not object to the motion.

The motion was carried.

THE TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET asked what progress had been made with the translation of the debates. He had received only 16 pages yet, and on the last one he saw the word "millenium." was it to end there?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It is a good stopping place.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—I will see to it immediately.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE suggested as there was a certain amount of arrear, perhaps it would be well to get some extra assistance. If the regular staff was kept working up arrears he was afraid they would never catch up.

After some further discussion the matter was dropped.

THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.

Mr. BROUSE moved for an Address to his Excellency the Governor-General for a Return of the names of occupiers or holders of land on the islands of the St. Lawrence between Brockville and Gananoque, called "The Thousand Isles;" the number of acres in each holding; the value and appraisal of each holding. He said during the administration of the late Government these islands were ordered to be surveyed and valued. Much dissatisfaction existed among the settlers on those islands at the prices that had been placed on these lands. A owns land next to B. A's land is valued at $1.50 per acre, while B's is placed at $10 or $12, both being similar. As a large number of persons had settled on these islands, there was a good deal of dissatisfaction among them on this account. Another cause of complaint was that where an individual bought out the claim of some former settler he found he did not get the improvements. They were placed in the possession of his neighbour, while he got nothing but rocks. The difficulties which these settlers experienced, separated as they were at certain seasons of the year from each other and from the mainland, ought to be taken into consideration. They should not be dealt with more harshly than those on the main shore. He asked that this matter should be considered seriously, because it affected those people deeply. He was exceedingly anxious that the Thousand Islands should be kept in the natural condition which makes them valuable to the Dominion. This was not a local but a national matter, in which all were deeply interested.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection to the motion, but he apprehended the principal object of the mover was to give him an opportunity of expressing his opinions. With reference to the islands which were available for sale, it was the duty of the Government to act with regard to them as they would with land elsewhere—get their value irrespective of the prices which lands had sold for at previous periods.

The Government had felt from the first that it was exceedingly desirable to prevent the destruction of the natural beauty of the smaller islands, and steps had been taken in that direction by the payment of an officer who had other duties to perform, to have supervision over them. Some had been resorts for smugglers; others had been frequented by camping parties who destroyed the timber. The officer had prevented this. It was not the intention of the Government to sell those islands which were ornamental, although several parties had sought to purchase them for summer residences. The Government thought it much better to keep those islands in their natural state and leave them open to all who observed the regulations for the preservation of lumber and natural appearance of the islands. The returns would be brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I believe these islands are the property of the Indians.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Nearly all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said in that case the hon. gentleman was right in saying the best price should be obtained for them. The object was, while it was exceedingly desirable that the beauty of these islands should be maintained as one of the most striking pieces of scenery in the world, that the interests of the Indians must be guarded. It seemed to him a judicious system to grant leases to persons of means who desired to occupy them as summer residences, making it strictly necessary they should preserve the lumber and erect such buildings as would increase the beauty of the scenery.

He was very glad to hear from his hon. friend that it was intended to take this action. The money would be well spent, and he presumed that the expense was chargeable to the Indian fund. These islands undoubtedly should be protected. On the American side there were beautiful residences. He did not know what means were taken on the other side of the dividing line to protect the islands, but it was lamentable to see some points which were formerly beautiful, utterly ruined by the wreckless barbarism of excursionists who lighted fires that had destroyed and ruined them.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) agreed that means should be taken to protect the smaller islands, and if possible derive a revenue from them. What they complained of was the mode of appraising. Some of these parties living in these islands had surveyed their own property at the request of the late Government. After they had gone to the expense of having their farms mapped out, a new survey had been made, showing a difference of from 40 to 60 acres. With regard to the appraisalment, he stated that adjoining some valuable farms which had been appraised at $1 and $2 an acre, there were farms not so good as those rated at this low figure which had been appraised at $5, $6 and even $7. There was great discontent in consequence. In some cases the settlers had been located on their farms for 80 years, the property having been handed down from father to son. The men who lived on these islands were under great disadvantages compared with those on the mainland. They had no schools and no roads, but they had to pay their municipal taxes, and their claims should be well considered. He thought the Government might realize a high price by the renting of the islands. He trusted the Government would bring down the papers asked for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said with regard to the papers he could not promise to bring down private correspondence regarding the appraisalment of land. Some of these papers were confidential and would not be brought down in the usual course, but any papers that were not so regarded the Government would have no objection to produce. With regard to the Indian lands it had been the custom of the Government for many years never to sell them without the consent of the Indians themselves. It was only when the Indians agreed that the Government either leased or sold Indian lands. It was a great mistake to imagine that Indians were not capable of looking after their own affairs, for they showed a great deal of astuteness in a way. The Government always consulted them in respect to the sale or leasing of their property, and were very particular not to act against their will. He would bring down those papers which were not of a confidential character, and he hoped his hon. friend would be satisfied with that.

The motion was carried.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a Return shewing the tenders received in 1875 for the conveyance of the mails between Victoria and San Francisco, with a copy of any correspondence respecting the said tenders and mail service generally; also a copy of the contract for the performance of the said service.

He drew the attention of the Government in making the motion to the fact that the coast between San Francisco and Victoria was almost harbourless, and that in the event of an accident overtaking a steamship on this route, it would be very difficult indeed for the vessel to make a harbour unless it was able to reach the Straits, or as was the case last year, when a vessel was tugged to the Columbia River. Sufficient means had not been taken to rescue passengers in case of danger; and the coast was most inhospitable. The steamships which performed the service should be well furnished; at present they were miserable and unsafe. A great deal of interest was taken in this matter by the people of British Columbia, and the travelling public in that region. Representations had been made to the Government in the hope of having the contract placed in British hands, and of having Victoria as the headquarters of the line instead of San Francisco; nevertheless, it had been entrusted to a foreign company—the Pacific Mail Steamship Company—to whom is paid $24,000 per annum. Victoria is also made a mere way station between Washington Territory and San Francisco. In addition, under the present system, the coal industry of the Washington Territory instead of Vancouver was being built up. Lifeboats were only provided on the steamers for 75 persons, when there should be sufficient to accommodate both passengers and crew. The tables, moreover, were badly supplied; and there was not enough room provided for the steerage passengers, the convenience of women also being shamefully neglected. The tables was placed on deck, and the passengers were obliged to eat standing. More attention should be paid to steerage than to cabin passengers, as the former were essential in order to ensure the advancement of British Columbia.

Mr. BUNSTER stated that these American steamships resembled floating coffins,—they were wretched affairs and dangerous. These circumstances formed a serious obstacle to the passage between the countries in question. He wished to impress on the Government the importance of subsidizing a British line. They had already paid a heavy penalty in the loss of some of their most enterprising and esteemed citizens with the ill-fated steamer Pacific, on which 325 souls perished. They had no Government Inspector, and people were frequently afraid to trust themselves on the steamships in question. The contract was not properly performed; and he hoped that the Postmaster-General would see that a better class of vessels was secured on the next occasion, for this service especially, in view of the fact that two first-class steamers had been ordered on the Clyde, in the hope that the contract would be awarded to the owners, who were not foreigners. The Americans sought to make of Victoria a mere way-port, and they boasted that the Dominion should not be allowed to have a flourishing capital on the Pacific coast. Still, he had sufficient confidence in British enterprise to believe that we would there succeed in building up a city. He trusted that the contract would be cancelled, as he knew that its terms had not been observed.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo), thought that these terms had been violated. He agreed that the present steamship service was most inadequate, and stated, as an objectionable feature, that the crew, with the exception of the captain, mates, quarter-masters and engineers, was composed of Chinese, with whom no one would care to trust his life in case of accident.

Mr. CASEY explained that though he was not a representative of British Columbia, he took a peculiar interest in this question, owing to the fact that a personal friend of his had for a long time been supposed to be the only survivor in connection with the steamship Pacific disaster. He had had full information regarding these matters, and all accounts fully corroborated the representations made by his hon. friends from British Columbia. It was generally admitted that the Government should secure efficiency of service under such circumstances, and he trusted that the value of the money spent would be procured.

The fact of this subsidy being granted tended to create a monopoly and to drive competitors off the route. Passengers who had travelled by that line since the loss of the Pacific said the management was intolerable. The Pacific was not in a position to go to sea. Her boats were not in order, and her crew was composed of Chinamen. Everything was in disorder the moment the accident occurred. The state of the other vessel was described as being bad also, though not perhaps to the same extent. It was quite proper this appeal should be made to the Government by the British Columbia members, and backed by the representatives of other provinces. The means of communication with our most distant provinces should be made as efficient as it was intended to be when the contract was given.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN quite agreed with the hon. gentleman who had spoken of the necessity of a direct line from San Francisco to Victoria. The steamers of the line which at present received the subsidy called at Puget Sound, merely running into Victoria to land passengers, mails and freight, while the advantage of coaling them at Nanaimo was lost altogether. They got their coal from the American side altogether, and the Province lost in this way as well as from not remaining in the harbour of Victoria.

When he (Mr. Langevin) went to British Columbia some years ago, the steamer that plied between San Francisco and Victoria, though not first-class, was nevertheless manned by white men, and great care was taken for the safety of the passengers. He did not put much faith in Chinamen in case of accident. Experience had shown that in the hour of danger they took more care of themselves than of the passengers. It was important that the conditions of the contract should be adhered to, and if the line was found to be useless, it would be a great deal better to cancel it and subsidize a proper line.

Mr. BUNSTER said the vessels did not even go into the harbour, but landed passengers and freight in a dirty old coal tug.

Mr. DEWDNEY said the contractors intended, when they took the contract, to utilize some English boats that were then lying at Japan, but immediately after getting it, they learned this English Company had failed. They then made the best arrangement they could with one of the most powerful steamship companies in the world. He thought the Pacific Mail Company had been treated rather unfairly by hon. gentlemen who had spoken on that subject. The Company made contracts with the Vancouver Island coal mine owners for a supply of coal, but they were not able to furnish it as fast as they could take it away. They agreed to take 4,000 tons a month from a company and pay for it whether they took it away or not. It was only when they found it could not be supplied fast enough that they went to Seattle, where they were obliged to take coal of an inferior quality.

It was true the Pacific was rotten, but the steamers that were doing the service now were new vessels, the City of Panama not being more than four years old. The harbour of Victoria was not large enough to accommodate large vessels.

Mr. DE COSMOS—No! no!

Mr. DEWDNEY said the steamship Panama in entering it had run aground.

Mr. BUNSTER said that was the result of bad pilotage.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said there could be no objection to the papers being brought down. When they came it would be found the Government had made the best arrangements possible under the circumstances for the transmission of the mails. There had been the ordinary advertising and acceptance of the lowest tender. It was to be regretted the first-class steamers referred to by the hon. gentleman were not in British Columbia waters, and ready to tender for the service. The amount of subsidy was very large—some $54,000—about half as much as the Atlantic service cost. The Government would be glad to receive any suggestions from the representatives of British Columbia or other hon. gentlemen who had information on the subject.

Mr. DECOSMOS said vessels of a proper size to do the business between Victoria and San Francisco could get all the coal they could take in at Vancouver Island. As to the capacity of the harbour of Victoria, it had been floating the largest vessels for eighteen years to his own knowledge. The accident to the Panama was due to the fact that the pilot took a wrong course.

The motion was carried.

THE LOSS OF THE PACIFIC.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a copy of all correspondence or reports in the possession of the Government respecting the loss of the steamship Pacific. He said his object was simply to learn what had been done on the part of the Marine and Fisheries Department with respect to enquiries into that great disaster. He noticed an allusion to it in the report of the Department, and also mention made of rewards given for saving life. He believed some steps should be taken to make arrangements with the United States Government by which vessels of that country in our ports could be subject to the supervision of our officers.

It had been suggested that if an officer, well qualified to form an opinion as to the sea-worthiness of vessels, were appointed by the Government, that the existing danger would be to a great extent removed.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said they had no objection to bring down the papers on the subject. He might say that the Government was in no way responsible for this matter. The vessel was an American one and wrecked in American waters. With regard to the question as to how far they had power to supervise vessels coming to Canadian ports from foreign countries, he was not prepared then to state.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL regarded the suggestion of the hon. member for Van-cover as a most important one, and said it had occupied the attention of the Government for many years past. He considered that in the future there ought to be a clause inserted in the contracts entered into by the Government with owners of these vessels, providing that they should be subject to examination by an officer appointed by the Canadian Government. He spoke next of the necessity of the Government investigating the cause of all marine disasters, although he admitted there were a great many difficulties in connection with the prosecuting of such investigations.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) dwelt upon the necessity of the supervision of vessels carrying passengers and freight to Canadian ports. They all knew that the vessel in question had a certificate, but it had been granted by a negligent officer without examination. The Pacific was a mail steamer six months previously to the accident, at which time she was considered to be a good, although an old boat. This illusion, however, was dispelled when the collision occurred. He hoped the Government would be able to take some steps in the future to prevent the recurrence of such accidents.

The motion was carried.

THE TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a return shewing the respective sums paid in 1875-76 for transporting freight and passengers, in British Columbia, belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey—the said return shewing the rate per pound for freight, whether packed or waggoned, the distance carried and where carried; also the fare for each passenger, the distance carried and where carried; and also showing the persons other than Indians to whom the same may have been paid; also copies of any tenders and calls for tenders for transporting the said freight and passengers; also copies of any Departmental instructions issued to the Paymaster or Chief Engineer in charge of the Western Division of the C. P. R. R., or any correspondence respecting the giving of the said freight and passengers to any one or more persons.

He said that it was rumoured that the contract for the conveyance of freight and passengers had been given to one person only, without tenders being advertised for. If the statement were untrue it was the duty of the Government to bring the facts to light. It had also been stated that from two to three cents more per hundredweight had been paid for railway freight than would have been if competition had been solicited.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) thought in justice to the contractor and the employees that the information should be supplied. Rumours were abroad that excessive prices had been paid to the different parties concerned. He had no reason to believe the rumours, but as they had been scattered broadcast he thought it was the duty of the Government to accede to the motion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE had no objection to the motion; he had no personal knowledge of the abuses of which complaint was made; but if they were found to exist they would be rectified. The great distance of British Columbia from the centre of operations here, where the Chief Engineer was stationed, rendered it necessary that the Chief Engineer of that Province should be entrusted with a very great deal of authority—much more than any officer in any other part of the Dominion. He did not doubt that this executive officer had used this power wisely; but, nevertheless, mistakes might have been committed. The utmost expedition would be used in bringing the information desired before the House; and he would only suggest, that in addition, the hon. member might also ask for a return respecting those who had paid no fare on Government steamers.

Mr. DEWDNEY observed that he had been on the point of making the same suggestion.

Mr. DECOSMOS replied that he was aware of the position held by the Chief engineer mentioned, who had, however, nothing whatever to do with the contract; consequently, the allusion of the Premier to this officer did not strike him as quite proper. The First Minister had suggested an amendment which he was quite willing to accept; he was aware that the distinguished gentleman who led the Government referred to himself (Mr. DeCosmos), and he would state the case. Last autumn he proposed, as one of the representatives of the City of Victoria, to visit Bute Inlet, as he considered was his duty in view of the fact that it was proposed to build the Pacific Railway to this point. He accordingly asked the chief officer in charge of the Marine and Fisheries Department there for permission to go on a Government steamer; this was given, and he went on board. Subsequently he received a note stating that he could not proceed, but as he had made his arrangements he replied that he would not go ashore unless forced. He thought that the reference of the Prime Minister in this regard did him no credit. He believed that the paymaster had acted in this connection through personal spite, being also, no doubt, inspired by fear lest he, as a journalist, might discover something out of the way in that gentleman's department. He was willing to accept the amendment, unless the Premier was prepared to apologise for mentioning the matter.

The motion was carried.

DUTIES ON LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) moved for a statement of duties levied on locomotives or parts thereof since 1st July, 1867, &c., &c.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER seized this opportunity to ask the Minister of Customs whether he had supplied the missing portions of the correspondence in order that it might all be printed in detail, having been referred to the Printing Committee.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE replied that all this correspondence would be shortly laid on the table.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton), moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all correspondence in relation to the dismissal of Mr. McDougall, Postmaster, Christmas Island, Cape Breton; and also, all correspondence in relation to the appointment of a successor.

He explained that Mr. McDougall was one of the most respectable and wealthy men in the County of Cape Breton. He put this notice on the paper in 1874; but at the request of the Postmaster-General, who assured him that this gentleman would not be dismissed, he dropped it. Afterwards the dismissal took place; and in 1875, he gave a similar notice of motion, but was unable to carry out this intention. He had no opportunity for doing so, save on one evening, and the Postmaster-General being then absent, he had deferred the matter. He believed that the removal was due solely to political reasons. In 1874, at the general election, the Ministerial candidate in the County had threatened Mr. McDougall with dismissal, unless he voted for him. This might be denied, but it was susceptible of proof. The Postmaster-General had informed him (Mr. McDonald), that the discharge was due to such causes that he did not wish to have it brought before the House. The late Postmaster-General having made the same statement, he had communicated this to Mr. McDougall, who requested him to bring the question before the House. He was informed that Mr. McDougall knew of no charges having been preferred against him, and was not aware for what reason he was removed. Mr. McDougall did not care for the position, save to suit his own convenience, as he did fully one-half the correspondence in that quarter.

The hour being six, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

LETTERS PATENT.

Mr. IRVING moved the second reading of the Bill to enable William Smith Amies to obtain Letters Patent for a new and useful Artificial Manure.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—Will the hon. gentleman explain the nature of this Bill?

Mr. IRVING said it was to obtain, in favour of the present assignees of the patent, an extension of time, which by law they were entitled to had they filed their petition in time, and which, by an oversight, they permitted to pass over the five years. The Premier, when the Bill was introduced, had cautioned him it was so at variance with the principle of the general law that the Government could hardly permit it to pass; but on explaining that it was a patent which had already been granted, he (Mr. Irving) was allowed to have the Bill printed, read the second time, and referred to the Private Bills Committee to be dealt with by them as they thought proper.

Mr. BOWELL asked if the Premier gave his consent to the principle of extending patents by special legislation after the patentee had failed to comply with the law in case he required an extension of time. In the past, when the law was not as liberal as it is now, the Government and the Private Bills Committee, of which he was then a member, on every occasion refused to extend these patents on the principle that the patentee, having allowed whatever right he might have had for extension to lapse, it was in the interest of the public that no special privilege should be given him, particularly if he had received the profits arising from the article patented.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had warned the hon. gentleman at the time the Bill was introduced that the House would not likely consent, and the Government certainly could not consent to give patent rights by legislation where the law was not complied with. The claim in this case was that the parties meant to apply for an extension of a second five years, but were late by a few days. One consideration that arose was how the House might be disposed if it turned out to be the result of neglect on the part of a clerk to recommend that the Bill should be allowed to become law. It was a serious question whether even that should be done, and he had only consented to the introduction of the Bill on the strict understanding the Government did not commit themselves to allow it to become law unless it was clearly established the delay was the result of accident. He remembered a Bill similar to this, which Mr. Wood of Durham had in charge, was allowed to pass, it being proved that the delay was due to the neglect of an attorney.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he would not oppose the second reading, but he called attention to the wording of the second clause. There might be acquired rights between the time the patent lapsed and its restoration by this Bill. This second clause should be so worded as to ensure that the rights and privileges of third parties should not be interfered with.

The Bill was read the second time and referred to the Committee on Private Bills.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

To grant to the Canada Landed Credit Company enlarged powers of borrowing and lending, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

To amend the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 93, intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Gas Lighting Company."

To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Shipping Company.

To amend the Act intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Clifton Suspension Bridge Company."

THE AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

The debate being resumed on Mr. Orton's motion for the appointment of a Select Committee regarding the agricultural interests of the Dominion.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) stated, that it had been said that the farmers did not require protection. He had the honour to represent a farming constituency, and he knew that in it there was a very strong feeling against the existing state of things. The farmers held that it was most unjust that they should pay taxes on almost everything they consume, while respecting all they produce they were compelled to enter into competition with the whole world; also that it was highly unfair that American produce should be permitted to enter Canada free of duty, while our Canadian produce must pay duties ranging from 15 to 20 per cent. and even above the latter figure. These anomalies should be remedied. The Premier and some of his supporters declared that the agriculturists were perfectly content, but he knew from his experience in his neighbourhood, that anything except content existed amongst them. It was represented that there was no distress among the farming population. It was true that there was much individual wealth; but an examination of the registry offices would disclose a very large number of mortgages on farm properties, which were daily fyled. Their property was not as remunerative as it ought to be and this was one of the evils with which they contended. They had raised to too great an extent wheat and other crops, for which they could readily obtain gold, reducing inordinately the producing power of their lands. A proper rotation of crops was not followed, else they would be more prosperous than they were to-day. The mass of the farmers were Free-Traders, but they were beginning to understand that free imports did not mean free-trade. He knew that in his own and the adjoining Riding a very strong feeling existed among the farmers in favor of protection to manufactures, as these furnished a home market for products either of so little value as not to bear transportation to distant markets, or so perishable in their nature that they could not be shipped, when time was one of the essentials to this end. He believed the farmers were being convinced that one of the great reasons for their increased prosperity since 1867, was due to the establishment of manufactures in the country; and they were perfectly willing to bear their share of taxation in order to build up a home market; but they were not willing to do so while the Americans enjoyed the same position as themselves in their own market, and they were in a great measure excluded from the American markets owing to the heavy duties levied. Many members had, at the last election, carried agricultural constituencies almost by false pretences, as they did not dare to appear before the electors as upholders of the present state of things; and he was confident that when these hon. gentlemen again went to the polls, unless they changed their tone they would be left at home. The farmers remembered that they were prosperous when no Reciprocity Treaty was in existence, and while they were not undesirous of re-obtaining reciprocity—which after all did not prevent their suffering greater adversity than at present—they were dissatisfied with the present system, and would be equally willing to do without such a measure on condition that justice should be done to the Canadian people, and that the Americans should not possess greater advantages in Canada than Canadians enjoyed in the United States.

On these grounds he supported the motion for this Committee, and in order that the causes of the depression from which the farmers were suffering might be ascertained. Hon. gentlemen who said the farmers were in a prosperous condition, had only to examine the books of the Registry Offices and see the amount of mortgages which had been registered against farmers, and which could not be regarded as evidences of prosperity.

Mr. ORTON said he only wished at this point to review some of the arguments that had been advanced against the appointment of this Committee. It had been contended that the agricultural societies and farmers of the Dominion did not desire the Committee, whilst, however, a different state of things existed. He had read resolutions contradicting that statement from several agricultural associations, and at that moment he held in his hand a letter from the Master of the Dominion Grange, thanking him for the action which he had taken in moving for this Committee. That in itself was a sufficient evidence of the interest taken by agriculturists in the action of the House in this particular. It was next argued that it would be an excuse for manufacturers of this country to have additional protection placed on their manufactures, that it would act injuriously to the farmer, the chief consumer. He believed the farmers of the country were perfectly aware that the prosperity of manufacturers would also contribute to their prosperity by affording a market for their products. No system of protection which would injure the mass of the people—the farmers—would ever be carried by this House; and the farmers consequently had very little fear on that behalf. With regard to a duty on Indian corn it might, perhaps, reduce the profits of the distiller. He did not think the farmers would suffer by it, because he was not aware that it was used to a large extent by them. He knew that in Canada we could produce coarse grades sufficiently good for cattle feed. In Essex, Kent, Oxford—

An Hon. Member—No, no.

Mr. ORTON continuing, said that in Welland also a considerable quantity of Indian corn was raised. The argument that a duty on United States cereals would increase the price of bread-stuffs was a weak one; for Liverpool ruled the bread-stuff market of the world, and no duty placed on American cereals would affect the price of bread-stuffs in Canada. He considered that gentlemen on the other side of the House had entirely failed to show that American produce coming into Canada is not injurious to Canadian farmers. The $9,000,000 worth of American products which were consumed in Canada must be injurious to Canadian farmers. Canada lost 15 cents a bushel, the sum paid to the American miller for converting the wheat into flour, on the enormous quantity of flour imported into Canada yearly. This alone was a large loss to us. He then alluded to the sneering manner in which the hon. member for South Wellington had referred to the motion maintaining that such conduct would not meet with the approval of his constituents. The member for West Elgin had treated it in a contemptuous manner, and had stated he would not have condescended to have noticed the motion if it had not been for the speech of the hon. member for South Brant. For this he did not think the hon. member for West Elgin would receive the approval of his constituents. In conclusion he asked that the names of Messrs. Ferguson, Monteith and McQuaig be struck from the Committee and the names of Mr. Charles Burpee, Mr. Ray and Mr. Sinclair be inserted instead.

Mr. HIGGINBOTHAM was glad his hon. friend had taken a step in the proper direction in order that this matter might be investigated. He, however, was not satisfied with the composition of the Committee, which was composed of one British Columbian, three members from Quebec and eleven from Ontario. This he did not consider was a fair representation of the agricultural interests of the Dominion. He also thought there should be a larger number of farmers on the Committee to do the subject justice, and proceeded to state that Canadian farmers used a large quantity of Indian corn for feeding stock. He held in his hand a letter from one person who handled 2,000 bushels a month, and who gave the names of the persons who bought the corn from him, together with one man who found it to his advantage to sell the coarser and buy the better grades. He had no objection to the Committee. It would be unfair to refuse it simply because on previous occasions the hon. member had been unfortunate.

Mr. TROW said his business led him to travel pretty extensively in Western Canada, and he knew the farmers as a rule held mortgages instead of giving them. They were, with little exception, a prosperous class of people, and though he had the honour of representing an agricultural constituency, he had not received a single letter with reference to any change they required. If they had grievances they ought soon to be removed, because it had been stated the other night that an army of Grangers was to be organized to see that the rights of the farming community were protected. He did not see any necessity for such a movement, since the hon. member for Norfolk, who was a representative of the press, could through his widely-circulated journal say all that was requisite. The hon. gentleman argued for rotation of crops, and contended the land became impoverished by not adopting that system. When land becomes impoverished it is more adapted for the raising of vermin, that destroys the crops. The farmers required medical men to prescribe for the destruction of their enemy, and if the mover of the resolution was not a practical agriculturist, he might aid the farmers by prescribing some remedy against the Hessian fly, the weevil, or even the Colorado bug. If he could, the farmers would be glad to find a champion in him.

Mr. HIGGINBOTHAM.

Mr. GORDON denied that the farmers were in a depressed condition. Some of them had their farms mortgaged, it was true, but it arose from the fact that they wanted to buy still more land. To say that any general distress prevailed among the farmers was to libel them. If they wanted anything from this Parliament they were not too bashful to ask for it, yet, after the attempt of the hon. member for Centre Wellington to direct public attention to this matter, they had not presented a single petition to this House. If any distress prevailed were editors, bankers, doctors or lawyers the men to investigate the causes of it? What did they know about the farming community? One would think there were no practical farmers in the House to see the way in which they were passed over. Only four of them had been named in the first place, and now two of the four were taken from the Committee. How could the farmers look upon this as anything but humbug?

The statement was true that land was not bearing as much as before, but what good would protection do for it? It was an evil which could be remedied by care in agriculture and nothing else. He believed a true grievance did exist in the mode of leasing land. The leases were too short, and sufficient care was not taken to bind down tenants to a proper course of cultivation. This was an evil to which he hoped the attention of the farmers would be directed.

Of the fifteen members of the proposed Committee only six were Free-Traders, and their report was a foregone conclusion. They would recommend protection; and suppose it were granted, what good would it do to Canada as a whole? Any increase in the price of food would come out of the pockets, not of the people of the United States, but of the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the mechanics of our towns. He was sure the farmers of Centre Wellington would scorn to increase their gains in such a manner. He hoped the Committee would be granted, because if it were refused there would be a cry raised that there was an attempt to grind down the farmers. An investigation would only prove that no depression existed among the agricultural community.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said he represented a farming constituency, yet he had heard no expression of opinion from the farmers in favour of protection. He believed if they had been in great distress they would have communicated with him. He represented not only one of the wealthiest agricultural constituencies in Canada, but there were many wealthy manufacturers in the county, and not one of his constituents had addressed him a single expostulation against the existing condition of things.

He thought that what had occurred on the previous night must be a pretty fair indication, at least, that there was some disposition on the part of those who represented the people of this country to protest against the doctrine which had prevailed of late to such an extent, to the effect that there must be a wide movement in favor of protection. He had no doubt that a further opportunity would be presented for the discussion of the general question; but as his hon. friends from Compton and Stanstead, who like himself represented agricultural constituencies in the Eastern Townships, seemed moved with the desire to express the views of the farmers so far as they understood them, he felt that it would be unfair if he did not speak on behalf of his constituents. During his last two elections the cry of protection had been raised in his county by the people from Montreal, but not successfully, as the agriculturists could not see the advantage of having heavy burdens imposed on them for the benefit of Montreal manufacturers. He did not have a word to say against those who sympathized with the distress existing in the cities of this and other countries; and he was bound to admit that the hon. member for Wellington was pursuing a logical course. If one interest was protected, all must be equally favoured; and, of course, this amounted to no protection at all. Partial protection, they knew, amounted in fact to a bounty. The system could not be better illustrated than by the story of a blind man living near Detroit, who whittled axe handles, selling them at 50 cents apiece. A Canadian at Windsor beginning to make them with a lathe, and underselling him at 10 cents per helve, the Yankee hurried to Washington and laid his case before President Grant, and the Committee of Ways and Means, claiming that a great American industry was being prostrated, the Americans, under the influence of the policy which forced them to create a slaughter-market here for their goods at half-cost, granted protection. The Canadian importation was arrested, and the blind man with his jack knife and axe-handles continued his former course. He was not disposed to cast reflections upon those who felt aggrieved owing to the existing depression; he could not but sympathize with the unemployed in the great centres of population, but, at the same time, they must not lose sight of the fact that if one class was to be bolstered up by protection, this must be extended to all desiring relief, making of this a purely paternal Government. His constituents desired no such aid, unless, indeed, unfair discrimination was shown by the House towards other elements of the population; in such event he did not doubt that the hon. member for Wellington would find himself (Hon. Mr. Huntington), alongside of those who represented other agricultural constituencies in Lower Canada, asking that they too should have a bounty in order that they might lift themselves over the fence by their boot straps, as hon. gentlemen seemed to think was possible.

Mr. BOWELL.—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to avow that he is a Free-Trader?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—I do not make any particular avowal. If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the paper, and if it is in order, I will answer it.

Hon. Mr. POPE said that his hon. friend had fallen into the error in which other hon. gentlemen became involved, speaking of those who were in favour of a higher tariff as Protectionists. The question before the House was not Free-Trade vs. Protection; nor was the question which the farmers had deeply at heart, whether they themselves should be protected or not. As far as his own county, and that of the hon. gentleman also, was concerned, he could say that the farmers of the Eastern Townships felt the very great importance of having manufactures in their midst; being quite willing that sufficient protection should be given them to enable them to prosper. This was the real issue before the House and country. We could not have free-trade, situated as we were alongside of the United States; and if this was not possible it was a common-sense view to take to declare that if our neighbours were determined to build up a wall against us, and to prevent us occupying their markets while they threw their productions into our country at reduced rates in order to crush our industries—we should protect our own manufacturing interests. He admitted that cities, perhaps, felt more strongly touching this matter than rural constituencies, but the latter felt a deep interest in it, as witness the bonuses given in many parts of the country in order to encourage the establishment of manufactures. It was important that we should look at this thing from a Canadian point of view and, as far as possible, place Canadians in a better position than they at present held. The Dominion had prospered under the revenue tariff prepared by the late Administration; also during the American civil war, which had the effect of increasing this protection; but since its conclusion, our neighbours had begun to compete with us more actively, the price of labour had fallen in their own market, and our system of protection had proved to be insufficient. It was not that he would not be willing to enter into free competition with the Americans and run the ordinary chances in connection with manufactures and everything else, for he thought that we might well do it; but when we could not get this, should we do as the Government and the hon. gentleman did—shut our eyes and say: Here are two theories; take one or the other, but do not look to the interests of Canadians. His opinion was, that as practical common sense men, the proper thing for them and the Government to do, and the only thing that would suit the country with respect to this or any other Administration, was to take the different articles used in this country, go through the list carefully, and wherever we could, or by a little fostering might be able, to manufacture any article as cheaply as any other country, such an industry should receive the protecting care of the Government. Such he believed to be the feeling of the Canadian people generally, and notwithstanding his hon. friend's statement, this, he considered, represented the sentiments of his hon. friend's constituents. He denied the correctness of his hon. friend's assertion, that the system of protection would raise prices, and this he would prove. He would cite an instance, of the date of 1858, when a heavy pair of boots were worth in Canada $4, while in Portland or Boston they could be purchased for $3. Protection was subsequently given to our manufactures in this respect, and the price of these boots fell to $2.50, owing to the competition created by the prudent, patriotic and fostering policy of the then Government. Why should this not be the case? Have we not the raw material, the bark for tanning, and the hides, and the people to manufacture it? All then that was required was protection while the industry was in its infancy. This argument applied with equal force to other similar cases. It was nonsense to talk about taxing the farmer; there was no such intention on either side of the House. This might be so if pure protection was demanded, as the hon. gentleman attempted to show; but this he denied. His proposition was that we should protect moderately those articles which we could, under such circumstances, manufacture as cheaply as it could be done anywhere else; and such articles were many in number. It was not for the sake of protection merely that he took this position, but for the sake of Canadians and Canadian interests. They ought to look to the interests of Canadians in this matter, and whether they, as mechanics and farmers, would be benefited by a change. He concluded by appealing to the House to take a wider and more comprehensive view of the subject, and at the same time to appeal to the sentiment of the people.

Mr. BOWELL said he should not have spoken on this occasion, if the Hon. Post Master General had condescended to answer the question he had put to him. He was not aware that it was necessary to put a notice on the paper to ascertain what were his particular views on a question before the House. If he wanted any information in respect to his department, then it would be his duty to give that notice, but not otherwise. It would appear that the hon. gentleman had had a bridle placed on his tongue by his leader, in order to prevent in future the necessity of having to withdraw sentiments which were in accord with a vast majority of the people. The question he wished to ask was whether the hon. gentleman always expressed the same views upon the subject before the House as he had on that occasion, or whether he was prepared to change his views for the particular locality in which he might then be in. He was induced to ask this question by the recollection of a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in Montreal to a large body of manufacturers. The hon. gentleman was reported to have then said: "In the first place let me speak of protection, a question which has been so prominently before the country for some time back. To a certain extent, I am a Protectionist."

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL proceeded to read the continuation of Mr. Huntington's speech, as follows:—"I do not believe that any one will maintain that the country should support itself by direct taxation. I have had frequent interviews with the members of that body, (Industrial Association) and have been assured by them that a high rate of duties was not what they desired. The dispute is not as to excessive imposts, but a just distribution so that the nascent manufactures indigenous to our soil, so to speak, should receive the benefits." These were the hon. gentleman's declarations of opinion to the merchants of Montreal. He (Mr. Bowell) would not hesitate to take issue with the hon. gentleman as to his broad declaration that the farmers of the country do not ask any protection as against the imposts placed on the products of their farms by the United States. He did not pretend to say that if a reciprocity of trade could be established so far as related to the natural products of the soil, the Canadian farmers could compete with Americans in their market. What the farmers complained of, was, that whilst they grow certain classes of grain for exportation, they cannot get into the American market without paying a very high duty, and that the products of the farmers of the United States were admitted into Canada free. He was aware that since the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty Canadian farmers were driven into some other mode of utilizing the land on which they had formerly dwelt, and the result was that from the Dairy they obtained more money for less labour than they did under the old system. He observed that the change in the composition of the Committee was suggested by the Premier, so that if the result of the change had been to make the whole thing a humbug, he was to blame and not the member for Wellington.

If the hon. gentleman would tell honestly his opinion, he would say the whole thing was a humbug, and done for political purposes. It was not clap-trap and buncombe, as the hon. member for North Ontario termed it. It seemed from the expression of opinion given by certain members of this House that no one had a right to speak upon a question affecting his constituency, even if it was an agricultural county, unless he happened to be a farmer. If the farmers of Centre Wellington had sufficient confidence, as they had shown by electing him they had, he (Mr. Bowell) could not conceive why members should ridicule the hon. gentleman for expressing the opinions entertained by those who had sent him to Parliament. No matter whether he was a doctor or a miller, he might be able to come to a correct a conclusion on a question of political economy as those who ridicule him.

He (Mr. Bowell) believed the sooner a policy was adopted by which our tariff would be so adjusted as to protect the interests of every class of the community without being oppressive to any particular class, the better would it be for this country.

Mr. MILLS said he was an agriculturist, representing an agricultural constituency, and had as good an opportunity of knowing the view of the farmers on this question, in his own section at all events, as those who had spoken in this debate. Their opinion, he believed, was that they should be let alone. It was not in the power of this House to do much for them by increasing the burdens of any portion of the people; but something could be done by economy and reduction of taxation.

Some hon. members had argued that it was of great consequence to the farmer to have a market at his door, that it would save him the cost of transportation for his products and for the goods he consumed. Those who used that argument forgot that each farmer raised four times as much as he required for his own use. We would, therefore, require a manufacturing population of 12,000,000 in this country so that the agriculturists would not represent more than 25 per cent. of the whole.

Some hon. gentlemen had advocated a reciprocal or retaliatory tariff as against the United States. They argued that such a policy would greatly benefit the farmers. A friend had furnished him a pertinent illustration of the working of such a system. West Ontario is much better suited for the production of barley than corn. A Canadian farmer sells 500 bushels of barley to a United States purchaser at 90 cents per bushel, and is met by a tariff of 15 per cent., which leaves him only $375 from the sale. He buys with that amount 833 bushels of corn and returns with it to Canada. Suppose this retaliatory policy were adopted, he would have to pay on that corn $125 duty, by way of punishing the Yankees for their narrow and unwise policy. That farmer would conclude the views of the hon. member for Centre Wellington were not calculated to promote the prosperity of the agricultural community.

By the trade and navigation returns of the United States for the year ending June 30th, 1873, he observed that the importations of corn into Canada were 7,418,711, and the quantity exported from the Dominion during the same period was 6,242,976 bushels. What did the hon. gentleman propose to accomplish by the taxation of what was imported? Simply to deprive Canadians of the carrying trade.

Mr. ORTON—Couldn't that pass through in bond?

Mr. MILLS—Would that be of any advantage to Canada?

Mr. ORTON—Yes, we would have the carrying trade.

Mr. MILLS said we had that already, and we had in addition the business of converting that corn into meal before exporting it, an advantage which we would lose by the adoption of a retaliatory policy.

Mr. WALLACE said by referring to the trade and navigation returns of Canada for last year, he found the exports of corn from Canada last year amounted to only 27,000 bushels.

Mr. YOUNG—You are only taking a portion of it.

Mr. WALLACE—No, I am taking the whole.

Mr. MILLS—What would be the result if the hon. gentleman succeeded? If he examined the industries of Western Canada he would find that if the Americans excluded barley, beans, wool, cattle and sheep from their market they would almost completely cripple for the time being the Canadian farmer. When the hon. gentleman proposed a war of tariffs and a policy of retaliation—because every observation he had made in asking for a Committee pointed to that—he proposed a contest from which we could reap no possible advantage, but probably serious injury. The hon. gentleman from Compton had informed the House that the imposition of duties would not affect prices; this was a novel doctrine. But what was the object of protection?—To increase prices. What had been the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite? To admit raw materials employed in our manufacturing industries free of duty, and furnish them to manufacturers at the least possible cost. But if taxation did not increase prices, what was the objection to taxing raw materials. It required no analysis to show that the argument was fallacious. The only result that could follow such a system would be a general system of taxation, burdensome to all classes of the community. In the census he found included as engaged in manufacturing industries, 10,213 blacksmiths, in no way dependent upon any system of protection; 5,400 shoemakers, 2,700 bakers, and 908 persons engaged in the manufacture of cheese. All those persons—and they formed no inconsiderable proportion of those classed as manufacturers—were in every way identified with the agricultural population and their interests, and were therefore improperly classified. In fact the whole classification was absurd. Ten thousand people were mentioned as concerned in the manufacture of clothing, but they would be so employed whether the cloth which they made up were manufactured here or imported. So it was with regard to hundreds of others. It was not possible for any Government to prevent failures in business. No Government could compensate for want of judgment, skill, prudence or foresight on the part of those engaged in trade. The hon. member for South Norfolk represented that the farming population of the country were in a deplorable condition, but he (Mr. Mills) did not regard this opinion as either correct or justified. The large amount of money deposited in the banks of the country by agriculturists was entirely inconsistent with the hon. gentleman's statement. There would be, of course, among the farmers, men who would become involved in difficulty and lose their property, just as there would be among men following mercantile and manufacturing pursuits; but these failures were beyond the reach of any Government, and if the right hon. member for Kingston were in power now, he could not give to idleness and folly the rewards which alone fall to the lot of the prudent and industrious.

Mr. RYMAL was rather anxious that the Committee should be granted, for he was certain that if practical and intelligent farmers were examined they would show that they merely wanted to be severely let alone. He had been a farmer for nearly forty years, and he did not think that the exclusion of American coarse grains from our markets would increase the price of these grains here. He had in Hamilton sold barley to an American some few years ago, and purchased immediately afterwards American corn to replace it, making in a few hours 80 or 90 per cent. clear profit, and he had frequently repeated the transaction. He thought the agriculturists of Norfolk County were on the whole as prosperous as those of other sections of the Dominion. Some farmers would always be poor, and protection could not change their condition. A number were also inflated with high ideas; they dressed like princes and were clothed in scarlet and fine linen, exhausting their resources. This was also the case with many manufacturers. This was one reason why so many of them failed. If they went to work with their own capital and understood their business properly, so many of them as do would not go to the wall. He at least recollected a gentleman who rode into Parliament some few years ago on this agricultural hobby; he saw his successor over there, for he rode in and rode out again; and his hon. friend, that gentleman's successor, had never ventured to mount the hobby which had thrown his predecessor.

He did not know if his hon. friend from Wellington was a skilful rider or not, but the hon. gentleman would find this animal was somewhat tricky. He would venture to assert the hon. gentleman would find himself thrown into the horse-pond some time or other. He thought the hon. gentleman was rather severe on his old friend and chum from the South Riding of Wellington. He had intimated that on account of that gentleman's reluctance to assist him in this great work, his constituents would not again return him as their representative. That gentleman had represented the South Riding of Wellington for a good many years, and had been elected by acclamation on several occasions. Another of his friends had also been attacked on the same grounds, but he (Mr. Rymal) was satisfied that if he continued in the same straightforward course of conduct which had characterized his political career so far, he would long be the member for the North Riding of Norfolk in spite of the hon. gentleman opposite. He advised the Government to grant the Committee, and let the the hon. gentleman choose to serve on it whoever he pleased, for the greater absurdities he made in the selection the greater would be the absurdities in the report, in all probability.

Mr. MILLS—I can now give the hon. gentleman the statistics I referred to in the course of my observations. I find here that the exportation of Indian corn, not the produce of Canada, was last year 2,051,691 bushels, whilst the amount exported, produced in Canada, was 28,499 bushels.

Mr. WALLACE regarded the trade and navigation returns from which the statistics were taken, as erroneous.

Mr. ORTON said he had made the changes he had moved at the suggestion of the Premier. Eight of the Committee were engaged in farming, and he was perfectly satisfied with a majority connected with the agricultural interest. He moved the amendment of his Committee as suggested.

The SPEAKER called attention to the fact that the motion had already been adopted, and the hon gentleman could not move an amendment to his own motion.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie the amendment was carried.

The motion as amended was then adopted.

ENGINEERS.

Mr. COOK moved the second reading of the Bill to provide for the examination of persons employed as engineers elsewhere than on steamboats. He said that when he formerly introduced a similar Bill he had been requested to withdraw it.

He withdrew the motion, but he found that the objections taken by the Premier a few nights ago were not the same as he had made in the former Session. He (Mr. Cook) intended to change the Bill in some respects and to make it apply to locomotives. He supposed under such circumstances the Government would not oppose it. It was argued that steamboats carrying a large number of passengers should have competent engineers. The same argument applied to locomotives. To meet the objection that it applied to small establishments as well as large ones, he proposed to exclude all those places where steam was used from the operation of the act where less than twenty persons were employed.

Another objection was that this Bill affected trade and navigation and should, therefore, be introduced by resolution. By reference to the Statutes of 1867 it would be seen that the Act relating to the examination of engineers on steamboats was introduced and passed through the House without having been founded on a resolution. If this could be done in one case it could also be done in the other. The same remark applied to the objection to the clause imposing a penalty. Last Session the hon. gentleman who then represented West Toronto introduced a Bill to suppress gambling houses, which imposed a penalty of $50. That Bill passed and was now on the Statute Book. If this measure was wrong so was the other. However, to meet that ground, instead of imposing a fine he would make a violation of the provisions of this Bill a misdemeanor.

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman cannot impose a penalty or fee of any kind without the assent of the Crown, and even if he had this sanction it must originate in Committee of the Whole, inasmuch as it imposes restrictions on trade.

Mr. COOK said he would withdraw the bill, but he gave notice that he would move to have it referred to the Supreme Court in order to have their decision as to whether the matters proposed in it were within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the Bill had no existence on the Records of the House and he did not see how it could be referred to the Supreme Court.

The Bill was dropped.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON moved the second reading of Bill to amend the law relating to Criminal procedure. He proposed that this Bill and Bill No. 12 should be read the second time without discussion and referred to a select Committee who should consider them carefully, and if they should report them back to the House the principles they contained could be discussed and decided upon. A resolution for which the hon. member for North York had given notice, and of which he (Mr. Cameron) did not approve, might also be referred to the same Committee to be considered and reported upon in the same way.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. member had very kindly anticipated a suggestion he (Mr. Dymond) was about to make, that the gentlemen who constituted this Committee should also consider this resolution which he had put on the notice paper some days ago. Of course this was a subject on which he did not presume to express any positive opinion of his own. For years past a number of circumstances came under his notice which led him to believe that the concession to persons charged with felony, of the right, if they choose, to submit themselves for examination under oath, would be attended with advantageous results in the interest of justice. All legal reforms are slow in their growth. Recently in England, and more recently still in Canada, we have admitted the plaintiff and defendants in civil cases to give evidence. It is supposed that this would be productive of perjury, but the prejudice has been dispelled by experience.

It seemed absurd that witnesses should be called from distant places to give evidence of a secondary character, while the man who could, if he would tell the whole truth, stood silent before the Court, or at all events was only able to make a statement through his counsel, which was liable to be discredited because it was not verified by examination or cross-examination. The objections to this proposal mainly were, that if this right were given to the accused it could hardly be refused to the accuser; but there are limitations to taking evidence in civil cases. There are cases where persons are so situated that they are not allowed to give evidence. That being the case, precisely the same limitations could be imposed in criminal trials.

There is a dread that we should adopt the continental system of placing the accused under the examination of the Judges, who in fact become the accusers. He believed it was possible for us, proceeding step by step, to grant the privilege to the accused without going farther. This reform would tend to the morality of the bar. Instead of basing his argument on the excuse or falshood of the prisoner, the counsel would find it on his evidence. Where there was a good case the accused would be induced to enter the witness-box and submit himself to examination and cross-examination, and a higher tone would be infused into our judicial proceedings.

Mr. BROOKS did not wish to anticipate the discussion on this Bill (No. 10) when it would be reported to the House—if it ever came back—but he regarded the first provision as a dangerous innovation in criminal procedure. It was a proposal to examine witnesses under commission, not only in foreign countries but in other portions of the Dominion. It is one of the elementary principles of our procedure in criminal matters, that trial shall be open and in the face of the world; that the examination and cross-examination shall be such as will tend most fully and fairly to illustrate the truth of the evidence which is given. He feared the effect of this change would not be one which would advance the interests of justice. He was afraid we should attain to a less perfect degree the truth which was to be sought for, but would find in addition to the ordinary crimes there would be a greater amount of perjury. Upon this subject he might say there was a great danger in this alteration, from the fact that those who would be likely to commit perjury would not be liable to a penalty. If a commission were sent abroad the witness could never be punished for giving false evidence.

He was not aware that under the administration of our law as it had been administered for so many years, there had been any case—or at any rate, any number of cases—where in justice had suffered for want of the power that would be conferred by this Bill; and he might say that so far as criminals were concerned, in the large majority of cases where parties were brought to trial for crimes alleged to have been committed by them, they might fairly be presumed to be guilty. Our laws throw around the criminal so many guards and protections to be observed by the Crown before conviction could be obtained, that it was almost impossible for the conviction of innocent persons to take place. Let them look at what would be the effect of this change in procedure. It would perhaps be greater in this than in most countries, owing to the position of the adjoining country. Under the provisions of this Bill, a criminal committed for trial might immediately apply to any Judge of the Court having jurisdiction for a Commission to examine witnesses in a foreign country; and all those who were at all conversant with criminal practice knew that one of the great means of defence on the part of criminals was to look about in order to obtain evidence. They cared very little whether it was true or false, if it might exculpate them from the charge, and they were aware from the number of cases constantly brought before our Courts, that there was the very strongest incentive, on the part of the accused to manufacture evidence. The result of the powers sought to be conferred would be this:—Any criminal desirous of obtaining false evidence would at once avail himself of those provisions, and in this way: We did not live far from the boundary line, and instead of bringing witnesses to exculpate an accused person before the Court in order that the Judge and jury might determine the weight to be given to their statements from their demeanour, they would find that in almost every case of importance applications for commissions to examine them in a foreign country would be made. Although in regard to this matter he did not at all have the experience of the hon. gentleman who had proposed the measure, what little experience he had had, though not in the same direction, in the prosecution of criminals, he still thought that this point ought to be considered before a Bill of this kind was passed. At present all the protections and guards which were practically necessary, had been thrown around the criminal; while the Crown had no interest in, and no desire for the conviction of an innocent party.

Since this Bill was introduced a practical illustration had been presented of what would undoubtedly have been the result had these powers been given. This occurred during the trial of a man for felony, within a few miles of the boundary line. Upon his defence he adduced the evidence of the relative, whose testimony, had it been true, would have entirely exculpated him; and it was only from this fact that we were enabled—by means of the appearance of the witness, his hesitating manner, and a rigorous cross-examination, and not by the direct facts—for the statements were so made that disproof was impossible—to obtain a conviction against a party undoubtedly guilty, who had induced a witness to perjure himself in the box. With regard to this question it might be said that the innovation was only a change as to the manner of procedure. He took it that a change of procedure in our Courts, in criminal matters, was a vital change which was of the highest importance, and which should not be made unless for very grave reasons. In some single isolated cases there might be undoubtedly grounds for the course the hon. gentleman proposed; but the exception proved the rule. And he had yet to learn that in this country there has been a conviction, or any number of convictions, of innocent persons, or any injustice suffered by reason of the non-attendance of witnesses whose testimony could be obtained by commission. Again, there was another serious objection to the examination of witnesses under commission on these points—it was very difficult indeed to arrive at the truth. There was a provision inviting the Crown to attend to these matters. The practical result would be that it would have to be represented in every instance, and this might involve not only the very greatest inconvenience but the greatest possible expense. There was no limit whatever to the issue of these commissions. Again during the trial of these cases very much depended upon the whole of the evidence being in at one and the same time, and very often the means of disproving or discrediting a witness were only given at the time of the trial, although the facts might be known prior to the trial. Of course under this provision such evidence must be taken prior to the trial; commissions were conducted almost in private, and the witness did not there, as before the Court, have before his eyes the fear of punishment if he committed perjury, or of a rigorous cross-examination under the eyes of a Judge and jury who had listened to the evidence placed before them. He would, therefore, make statements he would never dare to offer under the other circumstances mentioned. There was also, to his mind, a very strong objection concerning the matter of detail. Provision was made to enable the prisoner to make application for such a commission before any Judge of a Court having jurisdiction, whether in the district where he was held for trial or in any other district. He could understand why the privilege of examining witnesses under commission was limited, and he feared that the consequences of an act of this kind in connection with our criminal proceedings would be very serious, unless there have been or should be shown to exist practical cases of hardship, where actual injustice had been committed. The danger of doing injustice was very great. The innovation his hon. friend attempted to make in our criminal proceedings was very dangerous, and one which he thought ought to be opposed.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) said he was disposed to agree with almost all that had fallen from the member from Sherbrooke. Of course, on this subject he had some little experience, but nothing like that of his hon. friend from Cardwell. Although framed on behalf of the Crown, he would say this, that the Bill if it became law would open the door to very great abuses, and he agreed with the observations of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, that no case had come under his observation in which serious injustice had resulted to any persons in consequence of the absence of any such provision. All who were engaged in the practice of the law knew the valueless character of evidence taken under commissions; that in civil cases also it was regarded as the slightest possible weight; and it was never used when it could possibly be avoided, for the reason suggested by his hon. friend—that evidence taken in writing, when a tribunal has to decide upon it without the opportunity of seeing the witness, and observing his demeanour, and thereby forming an opinion of his credibility, receives very little consideration. With reference to cases tried before juries, as criminal cases would necessarily be, he had observed that juries almost invariably disregarded or paid very little attention to evidence read to them from commissions. For these reasons it would be found that the practice would be of little value to the prisoner, and no doubt it would be very much abused. Another reason why it was not necessary that they should not have this kind of legislation—of course in civil cases it was essential, because they had to enquire about transactions occurring in foreign countries, remote distances and in places where the witnesses were not resident under the jurisdiction of the Court—was that in criminal cases the transaction has always happened at our own doors, and therefore there was not the same necessity for sending commissions all over the world as is necessary in civil cases. There was one part of the Bill, however, the last clause, about the evidence of accomplices, he thought a very necessary and proper provision. It was one that had recently attracted a good deal of attention. Recently a judge had held that the evidence of an accomplice was competent, and had advised the jury to convict on it, and they did. A new trial was moved for, which was refused, and the Court of Appeal sustained the refusal, holding that the direction of the Judge was a correct one. Those who had been engaged in the law were aware of the unreliable character of the evidence of accomplices, and he thought it was desirable that there should be some such line taken as his hon. friend had suggested by the last clause. He expressed his entire concurrence with the views of the hon. member for Cardwell as to the inexpediency of such an amendment as that suggested by the hon. member for North York.

Mr. MOUSSEAU could not at all understand why the Courts, and the highest Courts in the country, should be in some measure placed in such a position as was proposed, in order that thieves might be advantaged. At the Criminal Court in Montreal, where Mr. Ritchie, Q.C., and himself represented the Crown, at least seven or eight pick-pockets from New York had been at a comparatively recent date tried and convicted; but if such a provision as is here presented had then existed, evidence would have been taken on their behalf before Commissioners in New York of witnesses who were their accomplices, and who had also spent several years in United States penitentiaries. The witnesses examined for their defence were proved to be accomplices, and under the circumstances mentioned they would have proved a very strong alibi, which under our present system would be impossible.

Besides, if these provisions were adopted, a fundamental and essential rule of both criminal and civil law would be violated. He spoke particularly on behalf of Quebec, where enquêtes in civil cases were conducted without a Judge being present, and sometimes even in the absence of the parties concerned. This system had proved to be far from satisfactory; and they had returned to the old method—witnesses being heard in presence of a Judge, and also of a jury in certain instances. This gave much greater security. In Quebec a law had been passed giving, in civil cases, the right to all parties to have witnesses heard before a Judge; and in Ontario it had been provided that witnesses should be heard before a Judge and jury. The provisions of this measure were generous towards the accused persons, even to absurdity; the attempted innovations were perfectly useless and inadvisable. Having alluded, at some length, to the curious and important case of Beaugard, who, some years ago, was tried at St. Hyacinthe for the murder of a man named Charron, in whose company he had last been seen, he stated that he objected to one of the clauses as not only useless but even dangerous, because it confirmed a principle which did not now exist, that the uncorroborated proof of an accomplice could be accepted. He would vote against the second reading.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said he was happy to see the Bill introduced. He had listened with a great deal of attention and considerable profit to the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke. It was true, as that gentleman said, that in our system the burden of proof rests with the Crown as against the prisoner. Those who had large experience in criminal matters must know that while the duty of the officers of the Crown was simply to bring the matter before the Judge and jury, yet that rule was sometimes exceeded, and Crown Counsel, in his zeal, pressed for conviction almost as strongly as in civil cases. The provision in question was attacked because the witness could not be brought before the Court. There may be cases in which injustice has been done to prisoners because there was no such provision. He knew of instances where witnesses outside the jurisdiction of the Court were confined in jail, who could only be brought from remote parts under an Order, which had to be obtained wherever evidence was of importance to the prisoner, and his circumstances were such as would not enable him to bring the witness. In his Province, owing to recent legislation, that difficulty had been overcome, and he saw there was a provision in the second section to prevent the Court being imposed upon to a great extent. Interrogatories were to be prepared, which would be sent to a foreign country and submitted to the person appointed examiner, and by him to the witness, so that, as far as those interrogatories are concerned, the Crown as well as the prisoner will be represented. This provision might rarely be put in operation, but that was no objection to the Bill. He considered prisoners should be given every opportunity of making out their case, and particularly so in view of the fact that the Crown was, generally speaking, well represented. He did not regard it as an argument against the Bill that every man charged with crime was probably guilty, and that therefore his testimony was likely to be questionable. As a matter of fact, the evidence was just as likely to be of a good character as of a questionable character. Then it was urged that this provision might be used for the purpose of delay. It was, however, for the Judge to decide whether the motion was made with a view to delay or on behalf of justice. He did not think it would be safe, as far as the interests of the Crown and the prisoner were concerned, to adopt the amendment of the hon. member for North York, and he hoped the hon. member for Cardwell would not withdraw his Bill, but that he would endeavour to have it passed.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON said he had not anticipated a discussion on the second reading of the Bill. In civil suits, even in the case of a claim of $100, it was competent to obtain a commission to a foreign country. But in a criminal case which involved the life, honour or reputation of the criminal, a commission could not be obtained. It was apparent that the law required amendment in this particular, and no one could for a moment imagine that this was a matter which really ought not to be remedied. It was a subject which had been maturely considered, and when there were Acts of Parliament allowing these commissions to be issued in certain cases, there could be no reason why they should not be extended to a greater degree. It had been stated that this Act might be taken advantage of to create delay, but the Court in all cases must be asked to intervene and decide upon this point. Affidavits must be forwarded to show that the witness was a material one. He then alluded to the fact that the Criminal Court of Appeal in England had decided that the evidence of an accomplice was competent evidence; a case had also been brought before the Superior Court in Upper Canada with the same result, and the judgement of the Superior Court was confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

He did not think the fact of a man being under sentence should exclude him from giving evidence, because as he regarded it the fact of his being under sentence was a circumstance in favour of his giving truthful evidence with the hope of pardon. He looked upon the change of procedure as one of an important character, and as an honest one in the right direction.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said although he had listened with a great deal of pleasure to the arguments of the hon. member for Cardwell he could not agree with him. He did not think the House should pass the first clause. It would be establishing a dangerous precedent in our criminal procedure to allow witnesses to be examined by commission, not only for the reasons given by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, but also because with our long line of frontier and the great facilities afforded for accomplices to escape across the line, it would be very easy for the person accused of a crime to send for the evidence of a person who would be afraid to come to this country, and who would be likely to make statements with a view to exculpating his friend. The argument, it would be better that ninety-nine guilty persons should escape than one innocent person should be punished does not apply to this case. Few cases are likely to arise where the commission would be required; but if a man should be so unfortunate as to be convicted because his friend will not come forward to give evidence, he can appeal to the Crown; and if a reasonable case can be made out, the Crown would take it into consideration; therefore, no injustice would arise. If this Act should pass, in ninety cases out of every hundred, the commission would be asked for, because in criminal cases every artifice is tried to obtain delay. Witnesses would crop up on the other side who would be ready to swear to anything, because the likelihood to be prosecuted for perjury would be very light indeed. That commissions are granted in civil cases is no reason why they should be allowed in criminal trials. There must be much stronger proof in the latter case, and the possibility of obtaining a verdict against an innocent man is very slight.

As to the second clause, with regard to the evidence of accomplices, the Bill contained the correct principle, because we should have the anomaly which exists swept away. He would have great pleasure in voting for the second part of the Bill.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the Bill commended itself to his judgment. It was about time some act of this kind was passed for the purpose of enabling defendants in criminal proceedings to protect, not only in some cases their honour and reputation, but also their lives. He could not see why the same method should not be pursued in criminal as in civil cases. The argument that applications would be made to procure delay had not much weight, inasmuch as there was a very considerable guard placed upon that by the section of the Bill which states the application must be made to the Judge, and he must grant an order for the commission to issue. There is no doubt great injustice may be done to a defendant by not allowing him to examine witnesses de bene esse on his behalf. If the witness happens to be away from the country it should commend itself to the common sense of the House, there should be an opportunity of procuring his testimony. The same argument should apply where a witness for the defendant, is unable to travel or is about to leave the Province. For these reasons the measure should meet with the approval of the House.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE was not sorry this discussion had taken place, inasmuch as he believed all important measures like this should receive more discussions than one. This Bill ought to be received with the greatest consideration. The long and very wide experience of the hon. member for Cardwell, in that, as in all other departments of law, with which this Bill was concerned, entitled his suggestions to the greatest respect. He (Mr. Blake) would have supposed clause four unnecessary but for the fact that no less than three Judges of the Court of Criminal Jurisdiction had expressed their opinion that it is doubtful if criminals under sentence can be examined as witnesses.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—Two Judges in England have also expressed the same opinion.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought, therefore, the point should be made perfectly clear. The reasoning which admits the evidence of these persons after their sentence has been worked out, is entirely in favour of their evidence being admitted while they are undergoing their sentence.

With reference to the earlier sections three applied to the case of a commission being issued, and the proposal, somewhat cognate of his hon. friend from North York, some general observations might, perhaps, be made to which no allusion had been made in the debate. He would say with regard to the proposition of his friend from North York, that it was one of a very serious character, which he did not think could be entertained or be engrafted upon the legislation of the country otherwise than through a Bill introduced for that purpose, giving all parties opportunity for discussion and consideration; and he considered that its introduction at this stage would be an unfortunate precedent. Concerning the proposal of his hon. friend regarding the first three clauses, one or two general observations could here be offered. Many things were logical, clear and impregnable in this relation, which they did not practically see their way to attaining. Rules prevailing with regard to civil cases, could not be wholly adapted to criminal cases, and all the arguments which had been employed with respect to the right of a prisoner to have a commission, applied with fully equal force to the proposal that a prisoner who had been unjustly condemned, as he said, owing to the lack of a witness, or who had suddenly discovered a new witness, should have a new trial. He admitted that it was a practical question, but contended that they could not reach abstract justice and perfection of procedure. For this they could not hope; and how near could they come? They must balance the probable mischiefs. As to these there was, in his judgment, much practical force in the suggestions which had been made in connection with what might be the result in a great many criminal trials if the evidence were to be taken on commission. The examination of witnesses in Court was very important, and the cross-examination was the supreme test which decided what weight was to be given to the testimony. He was afraid that the practical result of giving power to have commissions issue would be, in a great many cases, that persons who perhaps were living in the country or within a few miles of the boundary line, would remain away and give their evidence by commission. He did not think an honest witness would act in this way, or see how any witness who was not concerned in the crime or in some improper act could do so. It was the witness who dreaded the test of cross-examination under such circumstances who absented himself. It was just such witnesses that should be examined before the Courts. The Bill seemed defective in detail, because it did not propose to give the Crown the same power. The intention was to give it, but the language of the Bill was somewhat obscure. His hon. friend, with his usual candour, would admit that they could not proceed in this relation on principles of abstract justice, of what was logically correct, or of what was done in civil cases. The question was a practical one, of how far they could with safety go, and where between conflicting dangers was to be found the safest course to be pursued. He thought a Select Committee would pause before reporting to the House in favour of the issue of such commissions, and if it should so report it was probable that his hon. friend's clauses would be guarded with some further provisions.

So much said with reference to the first three clauses, and now an observation on the 5th. His hon. friend from Cardwell had quite correctly stated what the objection to the law—so to speak—was. It was the law that a prisoner or accused could be convicted upon the evidence of an accomplice; that was the law both of England and of Canada. The accused might be convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. What had been laid down for so many years, or as his hon. friend said, what was invariably laid down as the rule by the Judges, was not so laid down by the law. In charging, they tell the jury that it is the right to convict upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, without advising them to do so, but it was unsafe so to convict; and as a rule the jury take the advice. In offering that advice the Judges were called upon to charge the jury as to whether there was sufficient corroboration or not; they were called upon to point out what was corroborative, in order to permit the jury to weigh the evidence of the accomplice and convict upon it. How far it was fit to attempt to mould into a short clause the rules of Court; how far his friend on the Committee might be successful in placing—precisely upon its present footing as appropriate—the charge of the Judge as the law upon the Statute Book was a question. There was, however, a point to which he desired to direct the attention of his hon. friend and the Committee without expressing a positive opinion on it himself. It had been ruled that this view, with reference to the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice being unsafe ground for conviction, applied to the testimony of any number of accomplices. It seemed to him open to question how far that would be a sound rule to lay down in the Statute Book. He did not pretend to say there was not some danger in convicting upon the testimony, even of a number of accomplices, but he could well conceive a case in which the Judge, the jury and the public at large might be absolutely convinced, in such a sense as would render them satisfied that justice had been obtained, by the evidence of several accomplices, although not in the view of the law as expounded by the Judges as corroborative evidence. Then he would throw out for his hon. friend the suggestion how far it would be well to attempt to deal with the question. He was a little apprehensive that the result of the clause, if passed in its present shape, would be to leave the law precisely as the Statute is now, and in attempting to obviate an anomaly they might unsettle the unwritten law or practice of the Judges. Having been quite ready to assent to the 4th clause, deeming the 5th clause well worthy of consideration, and entertaining a favourable opinion of the others, he thought the best course to pursue was that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee before the final decision of the House was passed upon it.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee.

The House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes past Twelve, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 9.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Five minutes past Three, p.m.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. COLBY—To enable Ozro Morrell to obtain a patent for certain inventions and improvements in sewing machine shuttles.

FELONIES AND MISDEMEANOURS.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill to make other provisions as to the more speedy trial in certain cases of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanours in Ontario and Quebec.

He observed that mischiefs appeared to have grown up under the operation of the present Statute, which required a remedy. The measure he submitted proposed to give the Crown the right of objecting to any speedy trial until the sitting of the next Court of competent jurisdiction. If a prisoner elected to be tried summarily, the proper attorney might consent on the part of the Crown; but if the Attorney was of contrary opinion, a warrant of remand for a time not exceeding eight days should be made out, and the attorney should communicate with the Attorney General of the Province, communicating the particulars of the case and his reasons for declining his consent. If the Attorney General approved of definite remand it was permitted; but if not the record was drawn up as under the present Act. Mischiefs had become apparent with regard to further procedure in such cases. The law required that such trials should be held at the earliest practicable moment; and as to expense, it was to be observed that what was saved in maintenance was often largely increased in the conduct of prisoners. Publicity and solemnity were two essential elements in the administration of justice; and these were lost under the present system of procedure, which was hardly creditable. The prisoners feared publicity, and he was informed that under this influence they often chose such a mode of trial; and frequently so little decorum was observed that it was difficult to distinguish which was the Judge, which the counsel, or which the prisoner. He proposed to remedy this, by providing for frequent and regular sittings of the Courts in question. Notice was to be given at least five days previously, in order to ensure the attendance of the public; and it was certainly desirable that there should be a decent regard for the proper forms and ceremonies under such circumstances, for which he had made provision. In case it was thought necessary and proper, the application of this measure would be extended to the other Provinces.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

He proposed to repeal the legislation giving to police and stipendiary magistrates the same powers as County Court Judges, and to leave the latter alone the power to speedily try criminals.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite approved of that part of the Bill providing for some check being held over the summary trial of a criminal at his own request, by the Judge. In all that was said about the importance of publicity and solemnity, and a Court preserving proper dignity and holding itself as a Court in the public view, he thoroughly agreed with the hon. gentleman. The other parts of the Bill also seemed to be well considered and well advised. He also admitted the desirability that there should be similarity in our criminal procedure all over the Dominion; yet the efficient administration of justice was more important and should not be interfered with merely for the sake of securing uniformity in procedure.

The Bill was read the first time.

POSTAL IRREGULARITIES.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) called attention to the fact that quite a number of volumes of last year's Hansard sent by mail from the distribution office had never reached their destination. He wished to know if the Postmaster General could furnish any information on the subject.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said he learned now for the first time, with a great deal of regret, that such an irregularity had occurred. He would take means if possible to prevent its occurrence.

CRANBOURNE POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROULEAU asked whether it is the intention of the Government to select another place for the Post Office of the Township of Cranbourne, County of Dorchester, inasmuch as the present Post Office is not in the centre of population?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—It is not the intention to remove the office. The difficulty which the hon. gentleman's question seems to indicate, will be removed by establishing an office about three miles distant from Cranbourne in the same township, between the third and fourth ranges.

LAND PURCHASE ACT OF 1875.

Mr. PERRY asked whether any correspondence has taken place between the Dominion Government and the Government of Prince Edward Island in reference to the award of the Commissioners appointed to value the lands of certain proprietors in Prince Edward Island, in accordance with the Land Purchase Act, 1875?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I think the only correspondence was the transmission of the judgments of the arbitrators and certain notices of appeal. I am not aware of any other correspondence at the moment.

ESQUIMAULT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY.

Mr. DEWDNEY asked whether any proposition has been received by the Dominion Government from a private company to construct the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway; if so, what is the amount of money asked for per mile, and do the Government propose to entertain the proposition?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A proposition was received within the last few days, but it would require too long an answer to give the hon. gentleman the information that he asks. It would be better to move for it in the usual way.

NAVIGATION OF THE SAGUENAY.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it is the intention of the Government to give to one of their engineers the instructions which they gave last spring to Mr. Symmes, respecting the works required to be executed in order to improve the navigation in that part of the River Saguenay, called "Bras de Chicoutimi," inasmuch as Mr. Symmes died before being able to carry out these instructions?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No instructions have been given yet, regarding any works there, to the engineers of the department.

CARRYING THE MAILS IN DORCHESTER.

Mr. ROULEAU asked whether it is the intention of the Government to alter the conditions of the contract for carrying the mails between St. Anselme and St. Malachie, County of Dorchester, so as to provide that the St. Claire and St. Malachie mails may be received on the same day that they reach St. Anselme?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—The attention of the Government has been in no way called to this subject.

DISTRICT MAGISTRATES IN QUEBEC.

Mr. TASCHEREAU asked whether the Government is aware of certain appointments made by the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, since the year 1869, of District and County Court Judges, having jurisdiction, without appeal, in civil and criminal cases, in the said Province, under the name of "District Magistrates;" and whether such appointments have not been made in violation of the provisions of "The British North America Act of 1867," and in usurpation of the powers exclusively reserved to the Governor General of Canada, by the said Act?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The Government have no official information of any such appointments, though, in the course of the various proceedings it must come to their cognizance that such appointments have been made. It is not thought proper, under the circumstances, to express an opinion here as to the constitutionality of that action. Of course the suitors or criminals of the Court will have the right to appeal on this subject.

GOVERNMENT DREDGES.

Mr. FLYNN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to send a dredge boat during the coming summer to deepen the entrance of Fourché Harbour?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—As soon as the engineer in charge of the works in the Lower Provinces reaches here, arrangements will be made for the work of dredging during the coming season, at the places where it is most required. The large dredge must, of course, work in deep harbours, and the smaller ones in shallower places. Some of these dredges are engaged for a month or two to come at works uncompleted last year. I can only answer the question more fully after I get information from the engineer in charge.

ANNUAL DRILL.

Mr. PELLETIER asked whether it is the intention of the Government to change the system of Military Exercises; and whether the formation of Camps in each Military District is to be continued?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—It is not the intention of the Government to change the system of drill. The camp training will be discontinued for the present year.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN NEW WESTMINSTER.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a County Court Judge for the district of New Westminster, British Columbia; and if so, when is the appointment to be made?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—There is some correspondence on this subject which the hon. gentleman can have if he moves for it.

FRAMES FOR THE CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. TUPPER asked whether the contract for the cases and frames for the Canadian Department of the Centennial Exhibition was given out by tender or by private arrangement; if the former, who was the successful competitor, and if the latter, with whom was the arrangement made?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There were seventy cases 12x13x3, glass frames all around, to be made by Mr. Craig, of Montreal, by a private arrangement, for $70 each. He puts them up in Philadelphia; they will be brought back and re-erected here in the Patent Office for use after the Exhibition is over.

THE CIVIL SERVICE EXPENDITURE.

Mr. ROULEAU moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General praying him to cause to be laid before this Honorable House:

1st. A list of all the employes, whether permanent or temporary, of the following public departments at Ottawa: Public Works, Receiver General, Finance, Post Office, Militia, Customs, Inland Revenue, Secretary of State, Marine and Fisheries, Justice, Interior, Agriculture and Statistics; showing the salary of each of such employes;

2nd. A statement showing the bonus granted to each of the employes above named, for the year 1875, and what portion of the sum voted for that purpose, during the last Session of this Parliament, has been thus distributed among such employes;

3rd. Copies of all Orders in Council, Reports or Documents granting such bonus to each of the said employes, and showing upon what basis such bonus was distributed among them.

The motion was carried.

GROSSE ISLE BUILDINGS.

Mr. CIMON moved for an Address to his Excellency the Governor General for copies of the following documents relating to the undertaking and construction by Messrs. Piton & Co., contractors, of certain buildings for the Dominion Government at Grosse Isle, namely:

1. Correspondence between Piton & Co., and the Department of Public Works;

2. Reports of Messrs. Lepage, Scott, Peachy, and Gauvreau, Architects and Civil Engineers, and correspondence of these gentlemen with one another and with the Department of Public Works;

3. Reports of Mr. Scott after his visit to the locality, and reports of the same on the several reports referred to him;

4. Reports of J. B. St. Michel to M. Lepage;

5. Accounts of Piton & Co. transmitted to the Department of Public Works;

6. A detailed statement of sums paid by the Department of Public Works to Piton & Co.

The motion was carried.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPHY.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE moved for a Select Committee to enquire into the possibility of establishing a Submarine Telegraphic System, and into the advantages and necessity of such a system of telegraphy in the waters of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time; also to enquire into the best mode of improving the present lighting of the said River and Gulf. He explained that the latter portion of the motion he had not given notice of, and he trusted the Government would allow him at this juncture to make the addition.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be an inconvenient mode of procedure to go on with business of this nature without notice of motion having been given. The matter was materially different from that on which the original motion was based, and while he could not object to the proposed inquiry, he was sorry he could not allow the addition to be made, in view of the fact that it was so entirely different to the ordinary practice of the House.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE said he would withdraw the addition to his motion if it was the desire of the House. However, he had no doubt that by the time he had given his explanations it would be conceded that it would be better to leave the motion as it was. The Dominion had incurred large expenditures in the construction of railroads and the improvement of our water communication in order to secure the trade of Japan and China. They had been improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence for many years past, and if they were to succeed in establishing the St. Lawrence route as a rival to New York, improvements would also have to be made in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Until Confederation very little encouragement had been given to navigation by the improvement of the St. Lawrence. They had a few straggling light houses here and there, but it was only since Confederation that the great system of light houses had been inaugurated. The improvement of the St. Lawrence was of the highest importance to the country, and in proof of this he would read to the House a list of the wrecks and casualties reported to the Marine and Fisheries Department as having occurred in the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Straits of Northumberland from 1869 to December 31, 1875. They would find, for instance, that between Quebec and Gaspé, including Anticosti, that 177 vessels and 57 lives had been lost, and that the loss to cargoes and vessels as far as could be ascertained was $1,692,594. Twenty-five vessels had been lost in the same period between Gaspé and Miramichi. These wrecks involved the loss of eleven lives, and property to the value of $70,672. From Miramichi to Gut of Canso and Cape North, including Prince Edward Island and Magdalen Islands, 137 vessels had been lost. Loss of life 48, and the cost to vessels and cargoes $568,700. The total number of casualties was 339; lives lost 116; total loss to property $2,331,966.

In order to improve this condition of things, he proposed the establishment of a telegraphic system around the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, connecting with the mainland the different islands in these waters. A line of telegraph at present only extended on the north side only as far as Murray Bay, and on the south side as far as Matane, and then along the borders of the Baie de Chaleurs to Metapediac, and around by Gaspé Head and Fox River, completed through the spirit and enterprise of the inhabitants of the District of Gaspé alone. Lines should be run between Fox River and Matane, a distance of about 180 miles, to the Island of Anticosti, on the western and eastern extremities, in order to connect it with both shores of the St. Lawrence to the Bird Rocks and to the Magdalen Islands; outside the Gulf there was also Sable Island, which should be similarly connected with the mainland. When a vessel went ashore it was perfectly immaterial to know it, unless relief could be given; and to make such provision would form part of the intended enquiry. There should be some mode established of going to the assistance of wrecked vessels; a steamer stationed at some central point might be best suit for this purpose. This subject had occupied the attention of the Dominion Board of Trade, and had been deeply studied by Dr. Fortin, a former member of the House, who had for many years navigated the St. Lawrence.

Mr. GILLMOR did not desire to defeat the motion, but he presumed that the Government was already in possession of the information the hon. member desired. The motion bore a strong resemblance to a proposition made last year with the view of discovering the most direct route to Europe. It was also well to look at the expense incurred by such enquiries. A scientific gentleman from Montreal, Mr. Faragina, had been examined before the Committee appointed in the latter relation, and hon. members might be surprised to learn that he charged for giving his testimony, and preparing a statement which could be read in five minutes, $254, a sum for which a labourer might toil a year. He believed the gentleman was styled a Colonel—and he thought that this must be the case, owing to the amount of the gentleman's bill. The services rendered by Mr. Faragina were unimportant, and his statements that the only ports in the inner Bay of Passamaquoddy were in American territory was grossly incorrect. He was satisfied that the gentleman had never visited the places in that part, with which he pretended to be personally acquainted. In the inner Bay of Passamaquoddy there were five ports, and it was not necessary to approach it. He supposed that Mr. Faragina was a friend and chum of the hon. member for Bonaventure, and while he was not opposed to the motion, he did protest against the system of appointing Committees for the sake of employing scientific gentlemen to give such information respecting which the Government should possess all the knowledge desired; but if for this information they waited until it was furnished by the hon. member, he was assured that the Administration would remain for a long time in ignorance of the subject. He was satisfied that an attempt was being made to take a certain amount out of the public Treasury.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE replied that these remarks were worthy of a person who was incapable of appreciating scientific attainments. It should, in justice to the gentleman mentioned, be also stated that he was detained in this city for twenty or twenty-five days. If the hon. member for Charlotte wished to treat labourers in the same manner as scientific men, he was welcomed to such an opinion; and he (Mr. Robitaille) believed that a man who would affirm that this was an attempt to extract public money from the Treasury, was a man whom he himself would rather suspect in such a relation of entertaining such motives.

Mr. GILLMOR—I wish to say in answer to the attack made upon me—

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. member for Charlotte has no right to reply in this instance; when he was speaking I must say I was under the impression that he went too far in his allusions with reference to the hon. member for Bonaventure.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER agreed with the Speaker that the hon. member for Charlotte had gone a great deal too far in attacking the motives of the hon. member for Bonaventure, and he was quite certain that every member of the House would acquit the latter of any intention to do anything else than the resolution submitted proposed. He was quite sure that the House would not be disposed to consider even the sum of money named as a very extravagant grant to be paid to a gentleman of great scientific attainments detained, for any length of time on important business. He was bound to concur with the hon. member for Charlotte with regard to the inaccuracy of Mr. Faragina in the particular mentioned. He was quite certain that the latter had fallen into an entire misapprehension in this regard, though he did not doubt that this gentleman could give a great deal of valuable information. He wished to support the hon. member for Bonaventure in his opinion as to the great importance of the service he proposed, and it would be remembered that last Session he had called the attention of the Government to the urgent advisability of connecting Sable Island, St.

Paul's Island, the Magdalen Islands and Scattarce by submarine cables, for the protection and assistance of the shipwrecked mariners. The attention of the Government could not be drawn to a more important matter, and he did not believe that the expenditure in this relation would be very large. He thought, moreover, that the amount of property, which in consequence of such steps would be saved, would, in value, repay the entire cost incurred. The Island of St. Pauls might be said to be the key of the St. Lawrence, and was only a very short distance from the county of Victoria. Almost every vessel entering the St. Lawrence sighted this island; and it would be of the greatest possible importance, pecuniarily, that between it and the Magdalen Islands and Bird Rocks, and the counties of Cape Breton or Victoria—which ever might be the more convenient—sub-marine cables should be laid.

Mr. KIRK corroborated the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte with regard to the testimony of Faragina, whose evidence he had heard, and he had at once concluded that this gentleman had never seen the harbours he essayed to describe. He believed that these statements had induced the Committee to make an incorrect report; and this the following extract proved—"There are three harbours possessing the qualities necessary to commend them to the attention of the hon. House—namely:—the harbours of Halifax, Louisburg and Whitehaven."

There could not be a greater mistake. He would read the statement of the famous Admiral Owen, who was sent out in 1846 to survey the harbours of Halifax and Whitehaven, with a view to selecting the terminus for the then intended Intercolonial Railway. It was as follows:—

"The nearest accessible harbour to Cape Canso, at the eastern land's end of Nova Scotia, is Whitehaven, in lat. 45 deg. 10 min. N., long. 61 deg. 10 min. W., and is a most splendid and commodious port, at the nearest available point of North America to Ireland, its natural facilities greatly exceeding those of Halifax or any other point upon the coast."

Yet in the face of this report the Committee had come to the conclusion that the harbour of Whitehaven was not worthy the consideration of the House.

Hon. Mr. SMITH was glad the hon. member had asked for this Committee, and had no doubt it would have the effect of calling not only the attention of the Government but of the public to the subject. With regard to Sable Island, he did not consider there was such necessity for telegraphic communication with it as to some of the islands of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. There was a humane establishment on Sable Island, with 25 or 30 persons and appliances for saving life and property. Still, it was a matter worthy for consideration and he would give every assistance in his power to further the enquiry.

Mr. DAVIES said nearly all the wrecks in the Gulf occurred in November and December, and the telegraphic communication would be useless unless ice-boats were kept to run to the relief of wrecked persons. The proposition of the hon. member who brought in this motion must commend itself to the House, but ice steamers would involve a considerable expense. He (Mr. Davies) had no objection to the appointment of the Committee, but in these days of retrenchment he would not like to see money thrown away in bringing gentlemen here who would expect large remuneration.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought it was unfortunate that side issues should be introduced in this question. He was satisfied the Committee, if appointed, would not be guilty of extravagance of any kind in summoning persons to give information. He did not agree with the hon. member for Kings (P. E. I.) that nearly all the wrecks in the Gulf occurred in November and December. Most of them certainly did occur late in the fall, and probably November offered the largest record of any month in the year, but many vessels were wrecked on our shores in early spring. During the past ten years several wrecks had occurred on the Magdalen Islands in midsummer. As a matter of economy it would be expedient to establish telegraphic communication with those points.

Half the vessels wrecked on the Magdalen Islands had been sold before the owners in Montreal knew anything about it. The Government could not be expected to provide for everything in a day, and the country would be satisfied if the Marine and Fisheries Department would give this matter reasonable consideration. It was true there was less necessity to lay a cable to Sable Island than to other points, because there was a humane establishment there, and it was visited regularly by a Government steamer, but it would be more economical to have the telegraphic communication. Fewer men would be needed on the Island, the steamer need not call except when necessity required it, and wrecked passengers need not be delayed more than ten hours. There was another point where telegraphic communication was needed—St. Paul's Island, at the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Ninety-five-hundredths of the whole trade between Europe and Canada, North of Canso, passed within sight of that Island, yet it was visited only two or three times a year by the Government vessel. It would be a great satisfaction to have early intelligence of the passing of vessels and of wrecks and accidents to ships in the vicinity of this Island and Bird Rocks. Last year great excitement was caused by the Prussian being delayed some ten days at this place. All this uneasiness could have been avoided if there had been telegraphic communication with St. Paul's Island.

This question was of deep interest to the public, as might be seen from the eagerness with which the papers were scanned every morning to learn whether such a boat had passed the point. If we had communication extended from Cape North to Magdalen Islands, and from Briar Island to the Bird Rocks, it would greatly alleviate the anxiety of persons interested in the movements of vessels. He was a member of the Committee at which Colonel Faragina was examined, but only attended one meeting. That attendance, however, convinced him of the great knowledge this gentleman had of the subject. It appeared from his evidence that Col. Faragina made a winter voyage through the Gulf, under the auspices of the United States Government, to ascertain how far it was susceptible to winter navigation. The House and country had been troubled for years as to the solution of this question, and he thought that if Col. Faragina's experience was obtained for $250 it was money well spent. He felt it due to gentleman attacked to state exactly what his opinion was on the subject. He thought the testimony of Col. Faragina was most satisfactory and conclusive that the winter navigation of the Gulf was not only difficult but dangerous. He hoped side issues would not be permitted to interfere with the appointment of this Committee, and he was sure the Hon. Minister of Marine would give to the question, and the report when submitted, that attention and consideration its importance demanded.

Mr. DEVLIN was exceedingly glad that the hon. member for Bonaventure had brought up this motion. A few days ago he had the honour of presenting a petition signed by the Board of Trade, the Corn Exchange, and a large number of citizens of Montreal, including 75 sea captains, recommending the measure of protection now sought, in the strongest terms. Everyone ought to agree that the safe navigation of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence should be secured by the Government. All classes were interested in its success, and he had no doubt if the Committee was granted and the investigation vigorously pushed forward beneficial results would accrue. The hon. member for Cumberland had stated the case so well and so clearly as to render it entirely unnecessary for him to go into details. He felt that the matter was now well understood, and that the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries recognized the importance of acceding to the motion and afterwards giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said hon. gentleman had referred to the various points with which telegraphic communication was desirable, but there was one which had evidently escaped attention—the Atlantic Coast of Nova Scotia. There was no part of the mainland or of the Gulf which was the scene of so many accidents as that between Halifax and the Strait of Canso; and he therefore hoped that the Government, when contemplating future improvements, would consider the necessity of affording telegraphic communication with that portion of the Atlantic seaboard. Ships approaching that coast in the winter season were often kept a long time by adverse winds or by ice, and often arrived at the ports in want of provisions and often seriously damaged. Many of the headlands of that part of the coast were uninhabited and the other portion was also sparsely populated—hence shipwrecked crews were subject to more inconvenience than at Sable Island, where there was a humane establishment. He quite agreed with the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that cable communication with that Island was at present unnecessary, because at this humane station there was an ample supply of provisions and men to assist crews of wrecked vessels, and there could not be the suffering which may result from disasters on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia. He would also draw attention to the necessity of having a powerful steamer at Halifax or some other point to assist vessels approaching the coast at critical times. In the United States, revenue-cutters performed such service during the winter with excellent results. He trusted that point would not be overlooked in any future arrangements.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) did not want the opportunity to pass without making a few observations on this important subject. Telegraphic communication between some of the islands of the Gulf, where there are humane establishments, and the mainland was not absolutely necessary, inasmuch as they were capable of supplying the wants of shipwrecked mariners. He was surprised at the hon. member for Halifax referring to the extension of the telegraph system from that city to the Strait of Canso. It was well known the key of the St. Lawrence was Cape Breton, which was the terminus of the Atlantic cable and one of the most important points of the Gulf; and if any extra communication was to be afforded that Island should certainly be included in the arrangement. Almost every vessel from Europe seeking telegraph orders on this side of the ocean makes for the port of North Sydney. This was another reason for looking to the requirements of Cape Breton, and he trusted the Government would give it due consideration. While agreeing that Col. Faragina's testimony was important, he thought that gentleman was well remunerated for the evidence given. There was no doubt, whatever, that the gentleman was a person of very considerable experience, and his testimony was very much appreciated by a number of the Committee, but how it was he should remain 25 days in attendance on that Committee, he (Mr. McKay) did not thoroughly understand. The gentleman's evidence was of a very limited character, and might be scanned over in a few minutes. It seemed to him the evidence taken before the Committee might have been completed in a very few days. This investigation should hardly be placed in the hands of a private member. It was of such importance to the trade and commerce of the Dominion that he thought the matter should be taken up by some members of the Government, by whom the interest of the public would be much better secured. This, he considered, would be better than leaving the matter in the hands of a private member.

Mr. GOUDGE said that one of the chief objections to taking evidence before the Committee was the expense, which argument, he thought, should not be allowed to militate against so important an investigation connected with the shipping interest, and the lives and property of subjects of this Dominion. The first question which would engage the attention of the Committee would be the cost of the undertaking, and the next would be the advantage which would accrue to the Dominion upon the establishment of such telegraphic communication. He thought there were members in the House who had practical experience as to the necessity of establishing such communication. There was no doubt now about the practicability of the undertaking, the only questions at issue were the necessity and the cost. It gave him great pleasure to acquiesce in the motion, and he had no doubt if the Committee were appointed that the necessity of the work would be shown to the House. With reference to the opinion expressed relative to the connection of Sable Island to the mainland, he thought it very desirable that this connection should be made. It was time the humane establishment had at its disposal large forces, and was able to provide for a considerable number of persons should they be shipwrecked on the coast. But sometimes the Island was not visited for weeks, and if a large number of shipwrecked persons were obliged to be kept there for any length of time it would be a source of considerable expense to the public, and doubtless of personal inconvenience to the sufferers. Therefore he thought a system of submarine telegraph should connect this Island with the main shore.

Mr. TREMAIN said he was happy to find this motion on the notice paper. He considered the subject one of great importance to the trade and commerce of the country, and should engage the serious attention of the House. He hoped the appointment of the Committee would be the cause of the establishment of a telegraph system, not only in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, but also extending to the Island of Cape Breton. He was well acquainted with the Island of St. Paul and was fully impressed with the belief that the telegraphic connection between it and the mainland would prove greatly beneficial to the maritime interests; as among other things vessels could be reported to the centres of commerce when first entering the Gulf. He would further state that they had been deprived of communication between Victoria and Cape North, distant some 90 miles, which latter place was some 14 miles from St. Pauls. He trusted the Committee would be appointed.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I would suggest that the hon. members for North Norfolk and Stormont be added to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE consented to make the addition.

Mr. GOUDGE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he desired to state with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte, that he and the hon. gentleman for Bonaventure had had an understanding that there should be no expense incurred upon this Committee. The hon. gentleman expected to call a witness, but beyond that it was not anticipated there would be any expense. It was quite true the expenditure of the Committee last year seemed very great. Whether the gentleman in question was well or ill paid was a matter they were not able to decide. At any rate he himself considered he was badly paid. He thought it was desirable the Chairmen of Committees should endeavour to avoid keeping witnesses, particularly those belonging to a scientific class, whose services must be paid for at a higher rate than others. He had no doubt the conversation that had taken place on the subject on this occasion would prevent a similar question arising in the future.

The motion was carried.

WINTER NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. FRECHETTE said the object of his motion was the appointment of a Select Committee to take into consideration the possibility and practicability of navigating the River and Gulf St. Lawrence during the winter season. It had been said—and this with unquestionable truth—that the great drawback of this country was its winter season; not only as it paralyses to a great extent the development of our agricultural resources, but more particularly, inasmuch as during nearly six months of the year it closes to navigation our great national and commercial artery—the River St. Lawrence. This was undeniable, but was there no remedy to a state of things so detrimental to the prosperity of this country? Was there no possibility of keeping open to commerce and navigation this great outlet of ours, during all seasons of the year, and thus removing the most serious impediment to our national progress? Such is the important problem which is now forcing itself upon the public mind, and the solution of which is the object of the motion now before this hon. House. And, in proposing this motion, he fully realized the responsibility assumed, for he considered that upon its adoption and successful issue depended our securing to this Dominion an incalculable improvement on its present condition, that is an independent and uninterrupted communication with the outer world.

The scheme now submitted to the consideration of the House was not entirely new. The hon. gentlemen at the head of the Government had already given his attention to it, endeavouring to secure all information possible as to its practicability and probable results. During the first Session of this Parliament the attention of several of the hon. members of this House had been drawn to this great and important question, and he was happy to say it had met with the most favourable consideration, especially on the part of the representatives of the Lower Provinces, who, with their practical and experienced views in those matters, had seized at once the importance of the project as one destined to create a most beneficial revolution in our present system of commerce and navigation.

Since then, at the request of Mr. E. W. Sewell, the projector of the scheme, a Parliamentary Commission had been appointed by the Legislature of Quebec to investigate the matter, and the evidence adduced had been such as to so materially strengthen the position of that gentleman that, in his (Mr. Fréchet's) opinion, it could be no longer permitted to any true friend of this country to shut his eyes upon a question involving at such a degree the most vital interest of the nation.

He now held in his hand the full report of the enquiry made by the Special Committee, so appointed by the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, to take that subject into consideration.

At page 35 he found the following, signed by 43 branch pilots of the Lower St. Lawrence:—

"We, the undersigned, Branch Pilots for the River St. Lawrence, do hereby certify that the floe ice on the River and Gulf St. Lawrence would not offer any serious resistance to

"powerful screw-steamers. The absence of fog and heavy sea during winter is a great advantage in favour of winter navigation. Everything considered, we are of opinion that the navigation of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, during the winter months, is possible and practicable."

At page 24, he found the following statements: It was from Col. Farajina, the Russian hydro-graphic engineer alluded to in the last debate. In spite of what had just been said against the professional abilities of that gentleman, he maintained that he has had perhaps more practical experience of the winter navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence than any other man in this country, having been employed for a long time by the American Government expressly to test its practicability. He states:—"I must say, as a conclusion, that the winter navigation of the River St. Lawrence is possible with vessels constructed for that purpose, and that the difficulties alluded to are not serious. I feel satisfied that any trial to that effect would be successful, and would remove all the doubts that may be entertained as to the practicability of the scheme."

At page 14, I find Mr. Charles Brown, an intelligent and experienced pilot, telling us that he ran, on the 16th of April 1863, from Cape Ray to 60 miles west of the Bird Rocks through floating ice, in a wooden sailing ship, by a heavy gale, without incurring the slightest accident. And further on he says:—

"The navigation of the St. Lawrence is quite practicable during the winter season. I would pilot a good steamer from Quebec to Halifax, at any time during winter. It is easier," says he, "to navigate in a snow storm, than in a fog."

At page 11, the hon. Mr. Savage, a gentleman residing on the shores of Gaspé, states that he never saw the ice so packed as to prevent a vessel from moving either towards or from the Gaspé shore; that there is little or no fog during the winter months; and that many winters are entirely free from it. Further on, he states, which is quite natural, that there is no rolling sea in winter, the floating icebergs keeping down the waves.

In short, the evidence furnished by all the witnesses examined was so conclusive and so convincing that the Committee did not hesitate a moment to adopt a favourable report, of which I beg to quote the few following lines:—

“Reviewing the question from a national point of view, your Committee are of opinion that if modern science can be enlisted in the successful accomplishment of the object sought, Canada would then possess the inestimable advantages of an independent and uninterrupted communication by water with foreign countries, and a great portion of her own people living on both shores of the St. Lawrence.

“Quebec would become an important winter seaport, and the railway project of constructing lines to connect the Dominion with the Atlantic ports, undergo a complete revolution, and the export trade would of necessity converge towards Quebec as the only available Canadian seaport.”

On the 4th of August, 1874, Mr. Sewell published a paper, entitled: “The Winter Navigation of the St. Lawrence from Quebec to the Sea Practicable, and the Reasons Why.” In this paper, the writer advanced the following facts:—

“1st. The floe-ice of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence is composed chiefly of ice, the weight or resistance of which does not justify our looking upon it as a serious obstacle to winter navigation.

“3rd. The floe-ice lays for the greater part of the season on the south shore, from the fact of the prevailing winds coming more or less from the north.

“4th. From this position of the floes, steamers navigating up and down the St. Lawrence would seldom or never come in contact with the ice to such an extent as would seriously impede their progress.

“7th. Snow storms are not so numerous as to justify our attaching any importance to them; and a vessel in such a storm is not by any means in so critical a position as a vessel enveloped in a fog, the former having the floe-ice under her lee, acting as a shield between her and the shore, while the latter has no such protection.”

All these facts, which most peremptorily answer all the principal objections set forth by those who had no faith in the practicability of the scheme, were endorsed in the strongest manner by the whole evidence given before the aforesaid Committee, and consequently virtually solved the problem of winter navigation in the affirmative. But, as Mr. Sewell very properly states, he may write, he may speak, he may give lectures, he may advocate this great enterprise for years and years, and yet be just as far as ever from bringing it to a successful issue, if men of progress—and he (Mr. Fréchet) believed the gentlemen who occupied the Treasury Benches were men of progress—do not tender him a helping hand. Ship owners will not risk their property, nor will it be possible to effect insurance upon goods and vessels passing by this route unless the feasibility of this mode of navigation be demonstrated by practical experience. And who will ever pay the cost of such demonstration, if not the most interested party, the country herself?

The proposition of Mr. Sewell was this:—

Mr. Sewell proposes to run a steamer from the first of December to the first of May in each year for a term of five years. The vessel to make two trips per month between the following ports:—Quebec, Murray Bay, Bic, Saguenay, Rimouski, Percy and Paspébiac. The Dominion Government to pay a subsidy of $16,000 per season, and to place an Agent on board of the vessel, whose duty would be to make a report at the end of each month of the vessel's performances. At the end of five years, should the accumulated reports prove an endorsement of all the advantages claimed in favour of winter navigation, the Government to offer $100,000 per annum as subsidy to the Company that will undertake the carrying of the mails via the St. Lawrence, winter and summer. At the end of the first three years, should the performances of the vessel not be such as to prove beyond all doubt the practicability of the enterprise, the subsidy to be withdrawn. As the subsidy will but cover running expenses, the Government, to remunerate Mr. Sewell, of course by a reasonable bonus, so soon as the ocean line of steamers is established.

He (Mr. Fréchet) did not believe that there was a man in this whole Dominion thoroughly impressed with the importance of the subject who would think this proposition unreasonable.

The author of it is was gentleman personally, nay, intimately known to him and to many hon. members of this House. There was hardly a middle-aged citizen of Quebec who did not recollect the derision and contempt heaped upon his head when, as early as 1852, Mr. Sewell wrote to the Legislature of his country suggesting the establishment of a steam winter ferry across the St. Lawrence, between Quebec and Levis. Why, the majority of the inhabitants of these localities looked upon him as a kind of visionary, fit for nothing else but a lunatic asylum. And yet, the bold suggestion of the young man has since been successfully carried out. Experience has proved that he was anything but a visionary. Mr. Sewell had lived to see his project an accomplished fact, and—a triumph not often awarded to inventors—he was a daily witness of the incalculable advantages his fellow citizens derived from his genius and foresight. And now, the same man, vested with an additional experience of nearly a quarter of a century, makes an appeal to this Parliament to place it in his power to carry out a scheme of a similar nature, but of national instead of local importance, and which if successful, would make this country ever his debtor. Would this appeal be in vain? The question was before the House.

He was not asking the Government to pledge themselves to the assistance of this project without knowing beforehand the sentiments of the public mind about it. It had been advocated by both the Liberal and the Conservative press, and the general opinion was that it ought to be tried at once and the question settled without further delay. There was no public measure that would give more general satisfaction, not only to the Province of Quebec but to the country at large, for the whole Dominion was highly interested in the removal of this great impediment to our commerce, the closing of the River St. Lawrence to navigation for at least five months in the year. Nay, the commercial world looked with interest upon the matter. New York journalists had already written to know what likelihood there was of the project being carried out. Quite well they anticipated the result. Portland, New York, Baltimore and the other maritime cities of the American Atlantic coast would awake to the fact that we Canadians were at last true to our own interest, and that we had boldly entered the list in the struggle for the carrying of the western produce to the sea. And a result still more desirable, and which has been as yet but imperfectly achieved by the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the heart of this Dominion would be relieved from its present critical and humiliating position of dependence upon a foreign power for a communication with the outer world during nearly six months out of every twelve.

And what are we asked to risk for an attempt to secure this great national boon? A few thousand dollars! Why, the information that would be elicited was worth the money. Nations of Europe had spent millions over millions to send expeditions to the farthestmost polar regions merely to ascertain a point of science; why should we hesitate to risk a few thousands to solve a problem so important to our future destinies?

In conclusion, feeling that the sentiment of country first, and party after, was held by every member of the House, he had no doubt that the present motion would be unanimously supported.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he did not intend to oppose the motion, although he was not impressed with the practicability of the scheme.

Mr. DAVIES said it was very well known that there was always a very large quantity of open water in the Gulf in the most severe winters. When north winds prevail the ice was swept from Prince Edward Island to the south side, leaving a space of open water on the Prince Edward Island side of the Gulf, so that an ice steamer could pass without difficulty, as the ice was composed of floes which were constantly moving. Although he thought the navigation of the Gulf was practicable, he did not think it would be attended with practical results, as vessels for such work would have to be small and strongly built. Such a vessel was being built by Mr. Sewell, of Quebec, but he was unable to prosecute the scheme for want of means. This winter navigation might be of some advantage, if the vessels were owned and managed by the Government, to the shipping of the St. Lawrence. Vessels were frequently wrecked in the Gulf on Bird Rocks and the Magdalen Islands, and the crews were compelled to remain there all winter; but if this winter navigation were established a great deal of life and property might be saved by an ice steamer. He did not think the navigation would be very dangerous, as the water was comparatively calm where there were ice floes; but insurance would be so high that he doubted whether such a line of transportation could compete with land carriage. It was very desirable, however, that the scheme should be tried, as it was of great importance to the Dominion to establish the fact of the possibility of the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Fiset stated that the question raised by the hon. member for Lévis was so important that he considered it his duty to say a few words on the subject. Advocates of new ideas and new schemes were sometimes considered as Utopians, but happily for his hon. friend, if this scheme received for the first time in the House considerable developments, it was not less a project which, outside of Parliament, had been for a long time studied, and which, properly speaking, could not be looked upon as entirely novel. The practicability of the navigation of the St. Lawrence during winter below Quebec had for some years attracted public attention, and specialists in particular, observing the facility with which the river was traversed at this season between Quebec and Lévis, where its bed was narrow, the current rapid, and the ice very strong—formed in fresh water,—asked whether it would not be possible to navigate it where it was wider, the ice less thick and the current less strong.

Experienced men passing their opinion upon numerous facts, believed they could answer in the affirmative, and though he did not possess such an experience, he shared in this view, and he was assured of the practicability of the navigation of the St. Lawrence below Quebec and Bic. Not only did he consider it possible below Bic in particular, but also easy in the first part. In this region navigation during the summer season was more prolonged than at Quebec by several weeks; in fact, when the river was closed beneath this city and Montreal, it was open near Bic, being as free of ice as during summer, and as had been published, the boats of the S. S. Sardinian, on the 29th of November, found little difficulty in reaching the wharf. Not only was this the case, but the S. S. Sardinian, which had feared to come on to Quebec, owing to the lateness of the season, waiting at Rimouski for the mails, could have sailed from this point with as much facility on the 10th or the 15th of the following December. Navigation also commenced in this quarter from fifteen days to three weeks earlier in the spring than at Quebec. Frequently, in fact, the river was completely free of ice on the 15th of March. The matters at issue in this immediate relation deserved the serious attention of the mercantile community, and of the Government particularly, because Rimouski was connected with the Intercolonial Railway by a branch recently built. Further, the ice, which was not strong below Rimouski, was there always in motion, and a channel free from such obstruction always existed to the south or north, according to the direction of the wind. On these grounds an experienced navigator in this country once offered to convey the mails in winter from Rimouski to Moisié, a distance of 156 miles, in monthly trips in a small vessel, for a very moderate price, and his application was still to be found in the Post Office Department. If, then, it was possible under such circumstances, surely the river would be navigable for a steamer built for this particular purpose. He believed in its practicability as far as Quebec, and above all, up to Rimouski, and he trusted that the Government would take steps to make the trial desired.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had no objection to voting for an enquiry into this matter, but he certainly did object to the hon. gentleman from Lévis promulgating to the world the idea that the Dominion had not an open seaport during the winter months. He thought it was hardly fair to the Maritime Provinces to say that St. John and Halifax were not open ports, and there would be communication with them all the year round through our own Dominion when the Intercolonial Railway was opened through. It was not long since they had the largest wooden ship in the world floating in the harbour of St. John; he alluded to the ship St. Lawrence. Halifax harbour, with few exceptions, was always open in winter. St. Andrews was also a winter harbour, and a good deal might be made of it eventually. The question would be whether it will not be the most convenient port for vessels to call at yet. It is very convenient to deliver mails and passengers at Halifax, but when it comes to freight, St. Andrews may be found to be as good a port as any. He was sure if the hon. gentleman had thought for a moment he would not have promulgated such a statement to the world, that this Dominion had no winter port on the Atlantic.

THE POSTMASTER OF CHRISTMAS ISLAND.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) resumed the consideration of his motion for an order of the House for copies of all correspondence relating to the dismissal of Mr. McDougall, postmaster, at Christmas Island, Cape Breton. He did not intend to say much in addition to what he had already stated in connection with this subject. The dismissal of Mr. McDougall was made for political reasons, and this was an attempt to injure him in other respects. The Postmaster General, in 1874, had kindly allowed him (Mr. McDonald) to read the papers in connection with this matter, but refused to furnish copies of them, and he was therefore obliged to make this motion. The Postmaster General had advised him not to bring this matter up in the House, as it would necessitate an exposure of Mr. McDougall's character, but the latter gentleman was willing to have the subject discussed. The Government would, no doubt, deny he was dismissed for political reasons, but they would find it hard to substantiate that denial. The elections took place in January, 1874, and the charge was investigated nine or ten days before it by a Commissioner sent from Sydney to Christmas Island for the purpose. The dismissal did not take place for several months after, when it was announced in a local paper. The investigation was made in January; the dismissal was not made until the following fall. This did not look very much as if he desired to be dismissed on the charge made against him. If it were true, the dismissal should have taken place at once. He (Mr. McDonald) had other papers in his possession which at present he would not say anything about. He would wait until he could see how the Government intended to justify themselves. He might add, he would also like to have the papers brought down in relation to the dismissal of the postmaster at Little Glace Bay, the postmaster at Reserve Mines and the postmaster at Little Lorraine.

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman will have to put a motion on the paper.

Mr. McDONALD said he believed these men were also dismissed for political purposes. If the Government would bring down the correspondence it would save him the necessity of putting a notice on the paper.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the charges against Mr. McDougall were rudeness to the people who went to his office, and excesses in many ways. Upon representations made to the Department—some of them by his own relatives—an enquiry was made by an official who was sent to Christmas Island from Sydney for the purpose. Several witnesses were examined, some of them he thought on oath. On his report, no doubt, the dismissal was based. The hon. gentleman who had introduced this motion stated he believed the dismissal was due to political reasons. It seemed to him (Mr. MacKay) that the object of the motion was to afford an opportunity for attacking him. The references to him, he could say, were without effect. It was alleged that shortly before the election he had gone to Mr. McDougall or that person's son and threatened that unless they supported him he would cause the postmaster to be dismissed. That statement was without foundation in fact, and he (Mr. MacKay) was amazed that it should be made in this House when neither Mr. McDougall nor his son, while in the witness box during the trial of his (Mr. MacKay's) election, made any reference to this matter. If there had been any foundation for the charge they, being politically and personally hostile to him, would have sworn to it when they were endeavouring to unseat him.

It appeared to him that the hon. gentleman had only put the motion on the notice paper for the express purpose of making a charge for which there was not the slightest foundation in fact, and which the very men whom it was alleged had made the statement would not dare to swear to in the witness box. With regard to the other matters, the Postmaster General was the proper person to speak for the Government. He had no doubt whatever that when the papers were brought down the hon. gentleman would rather regret bringing the matter before the House, and that the late Postmaster would be forced to exclaim "Save me from my friends."

Mr. McDONALD—(Cape Breton) said he could not very well bring this matter up, and attempt to prove that this Postmaster was dismissed for political reasons, unless he referred to his hon. colleague, and it was his intention when he introduced the motion to state everything in connection with the affair. He repeated the charge that the officer was dismissed by his hon. colleague, who was at that time running an election in the interests of the Government. The Hon. Minister of Justice would appreciate the defence which had been made. His hon. friend, did not refer to the statement he (Mr. McDonald) made last night, that two barristers of the Province made affidavits in Court that they believed they would be able to prove the allegation. His hon. colleague said these witnesses would not make their statements on the witness stand, but gentlemen knowing the circumstances of the election would not be surprised to hear that the judge trying the case would not allow them to make such statement, and that in consequence the affidavits were made appealing for an opportunity to prove the charge. It was disingenuous for his hon. colleague to evade this in the way he did. Professional gentlemen would appreciate it. If the judge had allowed their testimony to be taken, the charge would have been substantiated. When Mr. McDougall heard of his dismissal, he wrote as follows to the Postmaster General:—

"POST OFFICE, CHRISTMAS ISLAND,
"30th July, 1874.

"SIR,—I understand through a local newspaper, that the Government have dismissed me from the office of Postmaster here. I would thank you to inform me on what grounds the Government saw proper to dismiss me. If charges have been brought against me in the capacity of Postmaster, I now claim the right of a copy of such charges, with the names of the parties making the same.

"By giving me the required information you will much oblige.

"Your obedient servant,

"MALCOLM McDOUGALL.

"To the Postmaster-General, Ottawa."

The answer to this, the speaker continued, was as follows:—

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"OTTAWA, 12th August, 1874.

"SIR,—I am desired by the Postmaster-General, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, and in reply to inform you the cause of your removal from the charge of the Christmas Island Post Office, was, that your habits of intemperance incapacitated you from a proper performance of your duties as Postmaster, and rendered it necessary in the interest of the public service, that the office should be placed in other hands.

"I am, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"WM. WHITE,

"Secretary."

Mr. McDougall wrote another letter, which it was unnecessary to read. He claimed the right, as his removal was said to be in the public interests, that the names of his assilants should be given him. He received the following reply:—

"OTTAWA, 12th Sept. 1874.

"SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 31st ult., and to say in reply, that I have no further remarks to offer than those contained in my letter of 12th ultimo, except that the investigation into your conduct was conducted by an officer acting for the Inspector.

"I am, Sir, your obd't servant,

"WM. WHITE,

"Secretary."

"MR. MALCOLM McDUGALL,

"Christmas Island, Co. Cape Breton, N. S."

It was unnecessary for him to say anything further on this point, but he might state something which his hon. colleague concealed from the House, and no doubt from the late Postmaster-General and the Government. He had seen the evidence, and the House would be surprised to learn that the principal testimony against Mr. McDougall was that of a man who was dismissed by the Local Government shortly before that on a complaint of forgery. He had a letter from another Postmaster stating that he had been threatened with dismissal by his hon. colleague, and was dismissed as well as the copy of a petition unanimously signed by the inhabitants of the district asking the Postmaster-General to continue him in office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was rather surprised that some remarks had not been made on the part of the Government, and he was especially surprised the Postmaster General was not in his place when he knew this was the first order on the paper. He was absent probably in the hope and expectation that the hon. member would not have the opportunity of bringing this matter up again during the remainder of the session. It was the duty of the hon. gentleman who knew all the facts and had heard the calm temperate statement of his hon. friend on the previous day, to be present and defend his department, because motions of this kind were the legitimate mode of bringing up such charges, and when they were made was the legitimate period for the Government to reply. But here was this most serious and grave charge made and unanswered. It had been sworn to by two professional men that the Postmaster had been dismissed for political reasons, and it was alleged that the late Postmaster General after looking into the matter, promised his hon. friend that the official should be reinstated as there were no grounds for his dismissal. It also appeared that the man, not knowing why he was dismissed, wrote to the Department inquiring the cause, and was informed that behind his back the charge of intemperance was brought up against him, and the first thing he knew he was dismissed upon the grave charge of being utterly incompetent to hold office owing to intemperate habits. The hon. gentleman also proved that the last Postmaster General as well as the present, tried to frighten him from moving this motion by saying it would be better for the man's character if the matter was dropped. But with the consciousness of innocence, feeling that he had been maligned, aspersed and wrongly charged and convicted, Mr. McDougall came here and appealed to the only court and tribunal which could protect his character and restore his reputation, and defend not only his own honour but the honour of his wife and children. The Hon. Premier, however, in the absence of the Postmaster-General, who should have been present to reply, said he would let the matter go, and in the meantime the man's character must remain in suspense. It was not fair—it was not British justice, and there was no excuse for the conduct of the Department. He knew very well had the Premier or the Minister of Justice been head of that Department it would never have been done. Here was this man dismissed on a serious charge, and the first thing he knew of it was the receipt of a letter informing him of his dismissal; that he was tried and sentenced by a secret tribunal without his knowledge; not by the regular Inspector but by a person sent temporarily for the purpose. This was not British justice, and he hoped the Premier would see that the papers were brought down speedily. The postmaster had a right to claim a trial in which he could examine the witnesses and bring evidence in rebuttal; that it should be a fair trial in open court, and if found guilty he would have no right to complain of dismissal.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had very little to say about the matter, as it occurred before he took charge of the Department; but after examining the papers in the case, he felt it is duty to go to the hon. member who moved in this matter, and ask him in a friendly way not to call for the papers, as he felt that the proof was of such a character that it would do no good to the postmaster and would not interest the public. He was not disposed to ask that the papers should not be brought down, but when they were before the House they would prove that this exhibition of warmth on the part of the hon. Leader of the Opposition was entirely unnecessary. The doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman that every departmental enquiry should be a judicial one, he thought was a mistake. He had no doubt when the papers were brought down, the mover would find out he was not the real friend of the late postmaster. As to the political feature of the case, he had known in his time postmasters to be dismissed for political reasons, and this exhibition of warmth might have been reserved for those cases. As far as the evidence in this case submitted to him was concerned, there was nothing to show a political motive, but there was abundant evidence that it would have been a disgrace to the country to continue the man in office.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the papers would be here on Monday, and they would have been brought down earlier but for the hon. mover putting it off himself. He put it off last Session in the same way.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton)
—I deny that.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman did put it off, although he now alleges he was unable to get his motion made. He did not make the motion because he deemed it wise in his client's interest not to make it. He (the Premier) had recollection of a man of the highest moral character having been dismissed from office by the late Administration for political reasons, but no person had ever been dismissed by the present Government except for causes that rendered their continuance in office detrimental to the public interest. He would sooner resign office to-morrow than dismiss a man from the public service because of his political opinions, but the hon. gentleman opposite did not so act. The right hon. gentleman knew that one of his colleagues sent printed circulars during an election campaign warning Government officers that they voted against Government candidates at their peril, and if they dared to vote against the Government and their representative candidates they would be dismissed. The present Government had never done that nor would they ever do it. He was amazed at the strictures of his hon. friend when there was no occasion for them, as the papers would show the postmaster was dismissed for good and sufficient reasons, and the hon. gentleman when he showed such warmth only exposed himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said on behalf of himself and the late Government, he would say that the statement of the First Minister was utterly unfounded; that during the whole time he (Sir John) had been in the Government, he was not aware of a single case in which a public servant had been removed from office for political reasons. He denied it altogether, and challenged the hon. gentleman to the proof. In answer to the Postmaster-General, he would admit that if it were an office during the pleasure of the royal prerogative, the pleasure of the Crown could be exercised without a judicial trial, or without investigation, and the official be dismissed; and all that could be done in such a case would be to move a vote of censure on the Government for doing so; but if the Government dismissed an officer on charges of disgraceful conduct, that reason being once given, they must, as a matter of fair play, be well founded, and proved after a full and fair inquiry, and not by secret investigation behind a man's back.

Mr. SCATCHERD said the country postmaster held an onerous position, for which he received small pay. And he would be sorry to find any case where such an official should be dismissed merely because he had seen fit to exercise his elective franchise in the way he thought proper. Since he had been in Parliament he had known several cases where postmasters had been dismissed from office for voting against the Government candidate. He had heard the right hon. member for Kingston say he had never, and his Government had never, dismissed a postmaster for political reasons; but he knew a case in which the Government did dismiss postmasters for political reasons and afterwards justified it on the floor of Parliament. Referring to the Parliamentary debates of 1862 he found that on April 30th, of that year, "Col. Haultain, in the absence of Mr. Cockburn, enquired of the Ministry for what reasons Mr. Clemishaw, late Postmaster at Bloomfield, in South Monaghan; Mr. Harstane, late Postmaster at Baltimore, in the township of Hamilton; and Mr. Kennedy, late Postmaster in the Township of Alnwick, all in the West Riding of Northumberland, were summarily dismissed from their respective offices shortly after the last general election, and whether the said gentlemen, or either of them, were dismissed for having voted at the said election against the Government candidate."

"Hon. J. A. Macdonald said he was not prepared to say whether or not these gentlemen were Postmasters, or whether, being Postmasters, they voted at the last election and were dismissed therefor. However, he would make enquiry of the Postmaster-General. But in the meantime, he would remark that if these persons worked and voted against the head of their Department they deserved to be dismissed."

This he considered was a proof that they were dismissed for political reasons, and their dismissal was justified upon the floor of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was very glad that the hon. gentleman had alluded to the matter. How did that result? Hon. Sidney Smith was Postmaster General, and he was a candidate for the County of Northumberland. At Cobourg one or two of these postmasters came up on the hustings and insulted him before a crowd.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked what were their names.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not remember the names, but he heard one of these postmasters insult the Postmaster General and call him a swindler and a scoundrel, and they spoke and worked in favour of his opponent, a Mr. Cockburn.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said as additional proof he recollected that he had brought up a case three years ago when a Post Office Inspector wrote letters to the postmasters in the county of Welland when an election was being held, threatening them with dismissal if they voted against the Government candidate, and the hon. gentleman, then Leader of the Government, defended that letter upon the floor of this House. The hon. gentleman himself, when on an election campaign, took a high officer of the Government with him to speak at political meetings, and yet he had the face to charge this Government with having dismissed public servants for political reasons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was a rule generally admitted both in England and in this country, that an officer of a department ought not properly to work against the Government; he could vote as he pleased, but he should not be an active partizan against the Government, and no rule had ever been given whatever that an official cannot vote for the Government. The hon. gentleman said he brought up in Parliament some time ago the fact of the Post Office Inspector, Mr. Griffin, having threatened employes. If the hon. gentleman would look back at that correspondence he would find there was no such threat. It was a private letter to the postmaster stating that as a friend he would advise him not to vote one way or the other. The resolution that was moved on this was a severe censure against Mr. Griffin, and he (Sir John) did not defend him. But the letter being a private one, though the principle being one they could not defend, they did not vote down the resolution, but the previous motion was moved. The charge that the late Administration dismissed public officers for political reasons he denied, the only instance being that where Hon. Mr. Smith was actually insulted on the hustings. That he knew and heard, and he thought the hon. First Minister would admit that when a subordinate officer of a Department came before the country, and publicly insulted his superior, it was time to dismiss him. It was for this the postmasters referred to were dismissed, otherwise they might have voted and worked against the Government as they pleased, as country postmasters had always been looked upon and considered as semi-official, not regular officers of the Government.

Mr. SCATCHERD said the right hon. member for Kingston stated that it was for insulting the Postmaster-General on the hustings these men were dismissed; if they had only worked or voted against the Government he would have said nothing against it. But the reasons he gave in Parliament for their dismissal were that they had voted and worked against the Government, and there was nothing said at that time about their insulting the Postmaster-General. At that time "he did not know whether they were postmasters or not, but if they were, and these persons worked and voted against the head of their Department they deserved to be dismissed."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if the hon. gentleman would follow it up he would find that it was discussed not only in the Legislative Assembly but in the Parliament, and the reasons there given.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it would be seen that at that stage of the proceedings the hon. gentleman was not aware even that the dismissed officials were postmasters, and now when the then Postmaster-General was not in the House the right hon. gentleman was able to be acquainted with that of which he was ignorant at an earlier period of the transaction. He proposed to lay down a principle with regard to this case, and he says that these dismissed officials were postmasters, but it was for insulting the head of the Department, and not for voting and working against the head of the Department, that they were dismissed.

Mr. BIGGAR said he had it from Mr. Smith himself, who said the postmasters were dismissed for having taken a part against him in favor of Mr. Cockburn.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he was sorry the Postmaster-General was not in his place when he made the statement. What he then stated was that the principal witness against the late postmaster had been dismissed by the Local Government on a complaint for forgery.

The SPEAKER—That is not an explanation, and I must request the hon. gentleman to take his seat.

Mr. TUPPER thought it ought not to be forgotten that his hon. friend was taken at a great disadvantage by the absence of the Postmaster-General from his place at the time the statement was made. It was competent for the mover of a motion to reply to the response of the Government. His hon. friend had not an opportunity to reply to the Government in consequence of the absence of the Postmaster-General. In his second speech he had replied to the hon. member for Cape Breton; therefore his hon. friend was entitled to the reply he desired. But this case had assumed a very extraordinary phase. In response to the challenge given to the hon. gentlemen opposite to point out an instance in which the late Government dismissed an office-holder for political reasons, the hon. member for Middlesex had been compelled to refer to transactions that had occurred twelve or fourteen years ago. He found on the journals of the House a resolution offered by the Leader of the Opposition, when the late Government occupied the Treasury benches, declaring that it was a high crime and misdemeanor for any Minister of the Crown to use the influence of his office in reference to elections. When that motion was made he challenged the hon. gentleman to point to a single instance in which they had dismissed an officer for political reasons. By their citing a case which had been buried in the rusty archives of the country for so many years, the Government confessed their inability to produce a single instance. Since these hon. gentlemen had been in power one case had occurred establishing that they used their power for the purpose of controlling elections. The hon. gentleman when he moved his resolution condemning the use of governmental influence in elections, stated that he did so because the inspector had threatened the postmaster with the loss of his office if he exercised his franchise against the existing Government. Times had changed since then; they went out of office and the hon. gentlemen went in. In his own country, before they retired from office, there was a person clamorous to have a contract taken from the parties who held it, and given to himself. He (Mr. Tupper) refused to do as requested, saying the Government had no power to do an act of injustice. During his election the power of the Postmaster-General was exercised against him, and the contract which he had been asked to transfer was given to the man who desired it. That man was formerly one of his (Mr. Tupper's) strongest supporters, and at the present time he was one of his most active opponents. It had been proved that the present Government had used the influence of their offices in other directions. In the Renfrew election it was proved that the Postmaster-General had used his influence on behalf of the Government candidate. This had not been done in one case only, but in many.

The case before the House was sufficiently clear for every one to come to a conclusion upon it. In the election that took place in Cape Breton, the postmaster and his son were threatened with and received dismissal. He found that both father and son would have sworn to the interference of the Government in the election had the revising barrister who tried the case permitted them to give the testimony. These gentlemen when they were asked by the postmaster for the reason of his dismissal, told him he was a drunkard; and when he asked for the evidence, the Government said, "If you attempt to expose the Government we will strip you of your character." This was the tyranny exercised by the Government. The postmaster then asked on what authority his character was to be taken away. The man who it was said possessed the necessary evidence for that purpose was proved to be guilty of forgery, and it was upon such evidence that the character of the postmaster was to be taken away. Instead of giving the man a trial, as the Government was bound to do in view of the circumstances, they put him out of his office on the testimony of a man who was branded as a forger. The Government had no right to deal in such an unjustifiable manner with the dearest rights a man possessed, dearer than life itself—he did not speak of the office, which was insignificant—and injure not themselves only, but thereby affect the character and reputation of this Parliament. They should have at once restored Mr. McDougall to his office, and have prevented such an exposure. He was deeply gratified to observe that the hon. gentlemen were obliged to fall back upon the hon. member for West Middlesex; and he challenged the Government to show a single instance in which, for political reasons, a man had been deprived of his office by the late Administration.

Mr. ARCHIBALD directed the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland to an instance in this regard, which occurred within a much shorter period than the hon. gentleman had named. A postmaster in his county had been dismissed shortly subsequent to the elections of 1872; and during the Session of 1873 he moved for the papers. Previous to bringing them down, a discussion took place regarding the letter of Mr. Griffin. On that occasion, the hon. member for Cumberland, who acted for the Postmaster General in this House, stated that the dismissal had been due to the fact that this Postmaster had performed his duties by deputy; further, that a petition had been presented praying for such action. This was very unfair on the part of the hon. member, as the latter at the time alone had any information in this regard in his possession, rendering an immediate reply impossible. The papers were brought down, and what proved to be the case? The postmaster, it was true, had performed his duties to a considerable extent by deputy, but this was done by three out of four of these officials throughout the country. As to the petition, to it were appended only fifteen or twenty signatures, comprising those of three persons, members of a single firm; one other of the signers received his mail at the office, and another did so, perhaps, only twice or thrice a year. The balance were obtained all over the township of Osnabruck, and with the exception of those mentioned, not one of these individuals obtained his mail matter at this office. They were, also, all adherents of the opposite political party. It was not claimed that the duties had been inefficiently performed; no complaints against the postmaster existed; and under these circumstances, it appeared to him, when was taken into consideration the remarkable coincidence that although this person had employed a deputy for several years, this was not objected to until after the elections of 1872, that this dismissal could only be ascribed to political causes.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) rose to make a personal explanation. The Premier had said that he had not moved in this matter previously, because he (Mr. McDonald) did not wish to, and because he was so prompted by his friends, and in the interest of his client. The facts were these: In 1874, when the notice was called, he explained that he had received information from the Postmaster-General which induced him to drop it, and did so. Last year, when it was called, he rose to make the motion, but was called to order by the Premier, an understanding, of which he was ignorant, having been reached between the First Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, that no argument was to take place that day on a notice of motion; and he wished above all things to make an explanation. When the matter came up a second time it was towards the end of the Session, at six o'clock, and thereupon the Postmaster-General at once left his seat. As he (Mr. McDonald) did not wish to take action in the Postmaster-General's absence, he deferred it. On the third occasion the notice was reached at 8.30 o'clock; it was first on the list, and the Premier moved an adjournment of the House. Consequently he was unable to discuss the matter last year, and during the present Session he had seized the first opportunity to bring the question before Parliament. The Premier said that he (Mr. McDonald) had been prompted to abstain making the motion; this he denied, save to the extent that he was requested not to do so by the late Postmaster-General.

Mr. GALBRAITH stated that a postmaster in his county, who was not a drunkard, but an earnest member of a temperance society, and who had been for several years a warden of the county, had been dismissed from his office for political reasons by the late Administration, owing to the efforts of political opponents in the neighborhood. Strong feeling having existed amongst the Conservatives against this official, repeated attempts were consequently made to injure the man's character; and one person was, for connection with them, sentenced to serve a term in prison for the crime of perjury. Charges were made against the postmaster, and an investigation was held; none of them were, however, fully proven, shewing that the memories of the witnesses were either defective, or their evidence fabricated. The Government dismissed the postmaster on the report of the Inspector, though a petition in his favour, signed by nearly every man in the village had been presented; he moved for the papers, and the return included a very short report from the Inspector. He might say, that the postmaster had, in 1872, at a public meeting, controverted a statement made by a prominent Conservative, and was at the time threatened with dismissal.

When the change of Government took place, the gentleman in question brought the matter before the Administration; and on re-investigation, it was found that no ground existed for the action taken by the former Cabinet, and consequently he was reinstated and his interim successor, who was a very worthy person, dismissed. Last year a motion was made for the papers in this relation; and at the suggestion of the Postmaster General, all documents in this connection were brought down. It was then established that a very large portion—nearly the whole—of the report of the Inspector, to which he had referred, had been suppressed by the late Administration; and the party who made the motion, discovering that his position was untenable, at once let the matter drop.

Mr. COCKBURN said on the very evening three years ago when the hon. member for Stormont stated the case repeated again to-night, he (Mr. Cockburn) had mentioned a parallel case, the postmaster, at Gravenhurst having been dismissed without notice by the late Government. It was true he was absent, but he had a deputy in his place, and he would have attended if he had received notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said with respect to the case mentioned by the hon. member for North Lanark, he regretted exceedingly the hon. gentleman from South Lanark, who knew all the circumstances, was not present. However, the facts were easily understood from the statement now made. The charge brought against the postmaster, if true, would have been sufficient to deprive him of the confidence of the head of his Department. That charge was investigated by the Inspector, in the presence of the accused, and a report submitted to the Department on which the dismissal was based. Afterward the postmaster was restored by Mr. Macdonald, the first Postmaster-General in the present Government. The hon. member said the whole report was not brought down in 1873. Of course, he (Sir John) could not now say how that might be, but he was quite sure the Postmaster-General in his Government was not a man to garble a report of any kind. There was in this case a full investigation, and a report on which the Government acted.

Mr. MACKAY—The hon. member of Cumberland stated in his place that two barristers swore to the fact that in my election campaign I had threatened the Postmaster of Christmas Island with dismissal.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I stated we had it in evidence from the hon. gentleman's colleague that two respectable barristers had made affidavits they were prepared to prove the fact, and that when they brought forward their witnesses they were not allowed to speak.

Mr. MACKAY rose to speak but was called to order, having already spoken.

Mr. KERR rose for the simple purpose of doing an act of justice to an absent friend and highly respectable citizen of Canada. The right hon. member for Kingston was in error in saying it was either the postmaster of Bloomfield or Baltimore who had interrupted him and Mr. Smith on the hustings.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I do not remember what postmaster it was, but it was a postmaster.

Mr. KERR said these were the only two postmasters present; and if the right hon. gentlemen knew them as he (Mr. Kerr) did, he would be convinced they were incapable of the conduct charged against them.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said his case had been investigated by one of the ad hoc judges, and subsequently taken before a full bench, and there argued for a considerable time; but none of the charges against him had been substantiated. He was amazed when he heard his hon. colleague made charges which he knew perfectly well had been thoroughly disposed of in the investigation which extended over some four months, and in which he (Mr. MacKay) had been accused of every crime in the political calendar. In that trial seventy or eighty witnesses were examined, and when the petitioner found he could not unseat him, he (the petitioner) and his counsellor made affidavit they believed they could prove something else against him in connection with the dismissal of the postmaster at Christmas Island—a person that two witnesses on the stand swore they would not believe on oath, and one of whom swore he was not responsible for his acts or words. The statement of the hon. members for Cumberland and Kingston that the person who was appointed to the position of postmaster in Mr. McDougall's place, had been convicted of forgery, was without foundation whatever.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had merely called attention to a statement which he had heard for the first time in this discussion.

Mr. MACKAY said the next time the hon. gentlemen made statements on the authority of another, they should be prepared to substantiate them. He was not there to defend this person in any way, but he did not wish to hear him, being absent, maligned in such a manner. This matter was brought before the Election Court, where a number of witnesses were examined, and no inclination was shown by his hon. colleague and the petitions to refrain from pressing anything they could against him. This was no place in which a charge of such a kind should be made, but if the hon. member saw fit to do so, he would not have the slightest objection to its being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to be thoroughly investigated a second time. He was in a position not only to defend him there, but elsewhere, and he did not desire to screen himself from any investigation that might be made, so far as his election or the dismissal of the postmaster of Christmas Island were concerned. The earnestness with which the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Cumberland had taken up this matter, regarding which neither appeared to be very well informed, proved in his opinion, very conclusively, the truth of the adage that "Old smugglers make very good Customs' House officers."

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) replied that the conduct of the hon. member for Halifax did not surprise him any whatever. On another occasion he would refer to this matter. He did not imagine when he made the motion that the discussion would have assumed such proportions, but he had not expected that his hon. colleague would have made a speech in this relation. Having done so he was bound to respond; the argument of his hon. colleague was very disingenuous, and in fact the hon. member had sought to mislead the Speaker and the House.

Mr. SPEAKER—Order!

Mr. McDONALD withdrew this remark. His hon. colleague had alleged that if Mr. McDougall and his son had been able to prove what was affirmed, they would have been only too willing to do so. The inference was that they were not in a position to make such proof, and the House no doubt would be led to believe that they had been allowed to give their evidence. The fact was otherwise; the petition filed against the hon. gentleman charged him with intimidating certain Dominion officials, threatening them with dismissal unless they voted for him. The names of Mr. McDougall and his son were, however, not specially mentioned in the petition; and when they entered the witness box to prove that they had been menaced with dismissal—on the second day of the trial—objection was taken to the reception of the evidence, and the lawyers at once made an affidavit declaring that they were able to establish the accusation. They asked the judge for permission to state the charges specially in the petition, and this was refused on the same day—the second of the trial. The person who was recommended by his hon. colleague, and who was appointed to succeed Mr. McDougall, had been removed by the Local Government from the Commission of the Peace because he was guilty of perjury. The late Postmaster-General, to whom he had mentioned this matter, made enquiries of his hon. colleague, who corroborated his statement; and this was the cause of the cancellation of that appointment. This was the person to whom the hon. gentleman referred as having made a second affidavit.

The motion for adjournment being withdrawn, the motion of Mr. McDonald was carried.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

The adjourned debate on the improvement of the St. Peter's Canal being called,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had requested Mr. Flynn to allow it to remain over until the Chief Engineer came home, and the hon. gentleman had consented.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER could not understand what the Chief Engineer had to do with this discussion. The contract had been let and was being prosecuted, and the question was with reference to the dimensions of the canal. He could scarcely imagine that the Hon. Public Minister having taken the responsibility of reducing the proposed dimensions was not prepared to make the statement. If this was a mere question of postponement he wished to address the House on the subject; but if the hon. First Minister expected the engineer, who was in Nova Scotia or somewhere else, he had no objection to give way.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might take his own course. He would have nothing to say in the matter.

Mr. FLYNN said he was very desirous that the adjourned debate should be continued, but the Hon. Premier had expressed a wish that it should stand over until the engineer was here to give him some more information. He agreed to the arrangement, and as the engineer had not arrived and he could not get the information specified, he thought the matter should stand over.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he would call the order unless the hon. First Minister would state when he expected the engineer.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I will not state anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Then I ask that the order be called.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then I shall move in amendment that the next order be taken up.

Mr. MASSON—I call the Speaker's attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman cannot make a motion when an hon. member is on his feet.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was not at all surprised that the hon. First Minister was unwilling to discuss this question. The hon. gentleman and some of his colleagues seemed to have arrived at the conclusion that no one was interested in it except the hon. member for Richmond. As a member of this House and of a former Government which provided for the construction of St. Peter's Canal, and as one of the representatives of Nova Scotia and the Dominion, he felt a deep interest in the subject, and he thought before he sat down the House would come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman had good reason for adopting the very extraordinary course he has pursued with a reference to this debate. On a previous occasion, the hon. gentleman wished it continued, because he wanted to make a statement, when the hon. member for Richmond was in his place, and subsequently he gave the House another reason—that some engineer was expected here, from whom he wished to procure some facts. The Province of Nova Scotia, provided for the construction of the canal under the impression that it was of great importance to the trade and business of the country. The canal was in an advanced condition at the time of the Union, and every measure was taken to press it forward. It was ultimately finished, and the predictions of many parties who were unable to value the work, were not realized. It was found that during 1871, no less than from 600 to 700 vessels and from 200 to 300 boats made use of the canal. The increase in the trade and business of the country demonstrated the dimensions of the canal were insufficient, and the hon. member for Charlevoix, then Minister of Public Works, directed a report to be made on its enlargement. An engineer of great ability recommended the enlargement of the canal to 50 feet in width and 15½ in depth; and the late Government were so convinced of the necessity of this improvement that they decided to ask for an appropriation for the work. The present Government came into power, and upon their shoulders devolved the public works undertaken by their predecessors; but they were apparently satisfied with the possession of office, and came to the conclusion that all that the people required had already been achieved, and that it was of no consequence whether public works of the greatest importance were proceeded with or not. The hon. gentlemen opposite allowed the Session to pass without making any provision whatever for this improvement, except that in 1874 $75,000 were voted for an estimated expenditure of $250,000. The people naturally expected they were going to carry out this work; the Government had asked for this money, and it had been placed ungrudgingly at their service. But how did they perform the work? Not a blow was struck, and the entire season was allowed to pass with the money voted in their hands, and with the country pledged to the immediate prosecution of the work. In 1875, another Session having passed over and renewed pledges having been given to the people, tenders were invited on the 9th May; and he asked the Minister of Public Works, who had had this money in his hands between one and two years, why the call for tenders was delayed until then, everybody knowing that the summer season is the only time when such work should be undertaken? After the contractors had expended a large amount of time and money in examining the plans and specifications, nothing was done, and on the 5th of July amended plans were made and tenders were again invited. He wanted for a moment to draw the attention of the House to the power attempted to be exercised by the Minister of Public Works and by the Government in relation to this matter. What would hon. members say if, after the Government had received an appropriation for the widening and deepening of the Welland Canal in accordance with a certain plan, and had declared their intention of performing a certain amount of work, they had come back to the House and confessed they had made a contract on different plans from those agreed upon?

The House would observe that these tenders were invited before the Minister of Justice became a member of this Government, and that after he entered the Ministry these amended plans and tenders cutting down and reducing this work to a depth of 14½ feet instead of 15½ feet and to 36 feet in width instead of 50 feet, were adopted. If there was a gentleman in this House, in this Ministry or in this country who was bound to protect the interests of Cape Breton against this alteration, and the cutting down of this work for which the money had been voted that man was the Minister of Justice. When that hon. gentleman was employed in the laudable work of destroying the Baie Verte Canal project he gave a solemn pledge to the members from the Maritime Provinces, when he was inducing the House to take away the appropriation of a million of dollars out of the estimates for the construction of this work, which it was claimed would cost five or six millions, he represented to the House and to his constituents that if the Maritime Provinces would consent to the abandonment of that project he would pledge himself that that money would be expended in other legitimate public works in the Maritime Provinces. He would read the hon. gentleman's statement from the Reports and see if he would say "hear! hear."

"Hon. Mr. Blake said that this item for the construction of an important public work—important especially in point of expense—had for a long time appeared in the estimates, and he regarded it as the settled policy of the country, which at any rate he was not prepared to dispute, that an equal amount, supposing the Baie Verte Canal should not be constructed, should be expended for some public purpose of national importance in the Maritime Provinces. He thought that the people of Ontario—he spoke only for his own constituency—would sustain him in the statement that it having been the settled policy of Parliament, for a considerable number of years, that a large expenditure should take place upon this work they would be agreeable if it were proved to be unreasonable or impracticable to carry such a work out, to an equal amount being expended in some other public works, in which the Dominion had an interest. Therefore, so far as he was concerned, speaking for his constituency, the only question he had to consider was whether that particular work was a fit one on which to expend the funds of the Dominion. Upon that question he did not express any opinion. He thought it would not be becoming in him to solve the question, which from the statement of the Leader of the Government, it appeared was not ripe for settlement, the necessary information to that end not being yet forthcoming. But it did seem to him, while he agreed to the expenditure of this sum of money on that or some other public work of national importance in that quarter, that he ought not to be called upon to agree to the expenditure of that amount of money on this public work, until there was a case before the House, on which Parliament could safely pronounce."

That was the statement upon which the hon. gentleman induced the Government to take a million dollars out of the estimates and vote $20,000 for the Hon. John Young and other gentlemen to enjoy a pleasant summer excursion, while they were destroying by unjust means the construction of the Baie Verte Canal. How did the Hon. Minister of Justice carry out his pledge? The other day the member for Cape Breton brought up the question of the extension of the road from Canso to Louisburg, which would have the effect of bringing Montreal and New York very much nearer to Europe than was possible under any existing line. Did the Minister of Justice say he was prepared to sustain the Government in bringing forward a policy for the construction of this extension of the great railroad system of the country? No; not only did he say nothing in favour of aiding that important national work, but he turned his back on all his pledges, and when he had an opportunity to do justice to that section of the country, instead of availing himself of it, he sustained the Minister of Public Works in cutting down the work on the St. Peter's Canal without asking the consent of this House. In the history of the Parliament of Canada, from the hour it was formed until now, he challenged the Minister of Justice to show an instance in which such an outrage was attempted in the interference with an appropriation passed upon by the House. The principle was the same as if it had been applied to the Welland Canal after Parliament had decided that it should be enlarged to a certain size and the Minister of Public Works should take it upon himself to give out tenders for an enlargement on a smaller scale.

No Government had ever to face such a dereliction of duty and such contempt of Parliament, and it was no wonder that the hon. gentleman asked for the postponement of this question until the engineer was present. But why did he want the engineer? That gentleman had staked his professional reputation on his report that the trade of the country required that the canal should be enlarged to a certain size. After taking nearly two years to consider the matter, the Government had adopted the report on the estimate submitted. These facts spoke for themselves. He did not think that there was an independent member on either side of the House who would sustain such a proceeding as this, and surrender the power entrusted to them by the people for the protection of the public interests. The history of the Parliament, and of the Governments of Canada, might be searched without finding a precedent for such a course as the Administration had adopted in this relation. He thought, as the Government had succeeded in having the plans and estimates for the enlargement of this canal amended, another year having passed without a blow being struck, it was due to the House and country that every effort should be made to obtain without delay the construction of this work according to the plans and specifications agreed upon by the House a year ago, but instead of that a contract had been made for this work on a reduced plan that will defeat the object and waste the money expenditure.

On the suggestion of the Hon. Mr. Blake, the debate on this subject, was adjourned.

TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. WORKMAN moved the second reading of the Bill, entitled "An Act to incorporate the Trust Company of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD begged to point out to his hon. friend, that, owing to the similarity of this title with the designation of the "Trust and Loan Company," which had existed since 1844, great confusion and inconvenience would result if no change was made. He hope that his hon. friend would communicate this matter to the parties for whom he was acting.

Mr. WORKMAN replied, that he would take the earliest opportunity to do so.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE ROYAL ALBERT BRIDGE.

Mr. BABY moved the second reading of the Bill, entitled: An Act to incorporate the Royal Albert Bridge Company.

Mr. WORKMAN desired to have the second reading postponed, as very strong feeling existed against the Bill in the City of Montreal. Influential deputations intended to come up and oppose it.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON hoped that the battles which were to be fought in this connection, would be reserved for the Committee to witness, as it was very inconvenient to raise a discussion on the subject in the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE hoped his hon. friend from Joliette would observe that it was absolutely necessary, previous to the consideration of the Bill in Committee, that the plans and specifications should be produced showing how the work would affect navigation. The most minute particulars were to be explained, as this was a matter which required the most careful attention. He had noticed that the Harbour Commissioners and other authorities, with regard to the shipping interests of Montreal, were strongly opposed to the Bill. He did not mean to imply that he would oppose it, but he wished it understood that it would be imperatively requisite for its promoters to establish that such a bridge would not interfere with navigation.

Mr. BABY replied, that he would inform the promoters of the bill of these requirements.

The Bill was read a second time.

NATIONAL LOAN AND LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria), moved that the Bill, entitled: An Act to incorporate the National Loan and Life Assurance Company of Canada, be read the second time.

The motion was carried.

DOMINION NOTES.

The House, on motion of the Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT, went into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient to provide that the Acts respecting Dominion Notes shall extend to the Provinces of Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Manitoba respectively, and that said notes be a legal tender in the said Provinces as in the other provinces of the Dominion.—Mr. Young in the Chair.

Mr. WORKMAN.

The resolution being adopted the Committee rose and reported.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved for leave to introduce a Bill founded thereon.

Mr. PLUMB complained that the circulation of notes of small denominations was unduly restricted; he understood that they were retained by the banks; and he asked the Finance Minister whether the circulation could not by some means be renewed.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT stated in reply that for several months old and mutilated notes were being called in and cancelled; this was proceeding actively, and they were doing their best to get new notes into circulation. As his hon. friend well knew, the banks were not disposed to permit them to leave their hands; practical difficulties were met in endeavouring to get them out of these institutions, but they were making every effort to succeed in this connection.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) called attention to the fact that there were very few one and two dollar bills in circulation in British Columbia, especially in the interior.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the measure was introduced for relieving that stringency in the several provinces.

Mr. BOWELL said the great difficulty was in reference to the small-note circulation. It was desirable that the Hon. Finance Minister should devise some means to enforce their circulation, as the banks were determined to hold the small notes.

Mr. THOMPSON (Welland) said he was glad the necessities of the country were bringing the members of the House to think upon the subject. What the country required was a currency independent of the mercantile system, and one that would prevent the continual recurrence of panics.

A bill founded on the resolution was then introduced.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of a Bill to provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in the Province of Nova Scotia, and for other purposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked for an explanation of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was the same Bill as that introduced by him last Session.

Mr. SINCLAIR hoped the Bill would pass, and trusted that the Hon. Minister of Justice would bring down a Bill this Session putting the County Court Judges of Prince Edward Island on an equality with other County Court Judges in the Dominion. These judges had been in office nearly three years, and they would be disappointed if their salaries were not readjusted this Session.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the House was, no doubt, aware of the circumstances under which the County Court Judgeships were established in Prince Edward Island. Prior to Confederation the salaries of the County Court Judges were raised to $2,000 a year, at a time when the Superior Court Judges were receiving only $1,900 a year. After Confederation, the salary of the Chief Justice was raised from $1,900 to $3,000 a year, and the salaries of the Puisne Judges were raised to $2,500. In the same Act it was proposed to arrange the salaries of the County Court Judges so that they should not be less than $1,000 nor more than $2,000 a year. He was informed that the functions of County Court Judges were comparatively limited. In Prince Edward Island there was one County Court Judge to every 33,000 of the population, whereas in Nova Scotia there was only one to every 60,000 of the population. He merely made these observations to show that there were reasons why the rule of equality suggested by his hon. friend could not be applied in considering the salaries of the judges of any particular place.

He thought his hon. friend would agree that it would hardly do to give County Court Judges enjoying a limited jurisdiction, with a comparatively small amount of work, a salary within one hundred dollars of that given to a Puisne Judge of the Superior Court. He would say that he did not himself think that the judicial salaries in several parts of the Dominion were on a satisfactory footing. He would say at this juncture as he had said in reply to applications the Government had received from all parts of the Dominion on the subject, that it was his purpose to give a full and careful consideration to the position of all judicial salaries during the recess. As to what the result of that consideration might be, or as to what he might suggest to his colleagues, or what their determination might be was entirely a matter for the future. He would say generally that this was not a time when it was very easy or proper for the Government to propose to increase salaries. He felt that the financial condition of the country was not such as to enable them to do that which they otherwise might not be unwilling to do in this direction.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE said he was glad to hear that the salaries of the judges were to be considered, and called particular attention to the judgeships of Saguenay, Gaspé and Bonaventure, the salaries of which required revision.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Can the hon. gentleman state whether they have an equal amount of work?

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—The hon. gentleman is in a better position to know than I am.

The Bill then passed through Committee of the Whole (Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair), and was read the third time and passed.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill to make further provision in regard to the Supreme Court and Exchequer Court of Canada. He said he did not intend to ask to have it referred to Committee of the Whole on this occasion. He proposed to introduce some additional amendments, and with a view to giving the House 'an opportunity to consider them, he would put them on the notice paper.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient to provide that the provisions of the Canada Civil Service Act, 1868, and any Acts amending the same, and of the "Act for better ensuring the efficiency of the Civil Service of Canada, by providing for the superannuation of persons employed therein in certain cases," and any Acts amending the same, shall extend and apply to the officers, clerks and servants of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the Exchequer Court of Canada, at the seat of Government.—Carried.

The House went into Committee,—Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER wished to know whether the public officers from whose salaries the Government deducted a certain per centage on account of the superannuation fund, were entitled on having their offices abolished or their services dispensed with in any other way than by dismissal, to an allowance.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the law on that subject was on the statute book. There was a special provision in case of the abolition of their offices. It was permissive, not imperative.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he wished to take this opportunity to draw attention to cases of great hardship.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT suggested that it would be better to do so in the discussion on the estimates.

The resolution was reported without amendment and referred to the Committee on Bill No. 22.

EXTENSION OF ACTS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

The House went into Committee to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient to extend the Act 33 Victoria, chapter 47, respecting weights and measures, and the Act 38 Victoria, chapter 36 respecting the marking of casks containing merchantable liquids with their respective capacity, and the Act 36 Victoria, chapter 48, to provide for the inspection of gas and gas meters, to the Province of Prince Edward Island, including in such extension the powers given to the Governor in Council to make tariffs of fees for services performed in carrying the said Acts into effect; and to repeal such Acts of the Legislature of the said Province as may be inconsistent with the said Acts.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

The resolution was reported without amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD wished to know why all the Dominion laws were not extended to Prince Edward Island as to the other provinces. It was desirable that there should be uniformity in this respect.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied it was not well to make too sudden changes. These laws should be extended gradually to the Province. He introduced a bill founded on the resolution.

The bill was read the first time.

THE GRANT TO MANITOBA.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following resolution:—That under the circumstances appearing in the Minute of Council of 26th October, 1875, upon the finances of the Province of Manitoba, laid before the House, it is expedient that Canada should pay as a temporary annual grant to that Province the sum of $26,746.96 yearly by semi-annual instalments, being the amount necessary in order to raise its revenue derivable from Canada to $90,000. Such grant to commence from the 1st day of July, 1875, and to continue until the close of the year 1881.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested as this was an important measure, it should be allowed to stand over.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the resolution could be adopted, and the discussion could take place on the second reading of the Bill.

The House then went into Committee on the Bill, which was reported and the report concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill founded on the resolution, which was read the first time.

The House adjourned at Eleven o'clock, p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—To incorporate the London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company.

Mr. OLIVER—Respecting the Canada Southern Bridge Company.

Mr. BLAIN—To Incorporate the National Trust and Investment Company of Canada. (Limited.)

Mr. DOMVILLE—To incorporate the Chartered Bank of London and North America.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill to make more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members.

The motion was carried.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

The first section was agreed to.

Upon the second section

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that the practical operation of this Act had been that so soon as the sitting member was willing to give up his seat the proceedings necessarily terminated, because there was no one to carry them on against. It appeared to him that there ought, in the first instance, to be some means provided for an investigation in cases where the Judge believed corruption had prevailed extensively, even if the sitting member abandoned his seat, with a view of preventing an enquiry into the circumstances of the election.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said there were inconveniences and difficulties on both hands. It was not until within the last two or three years that any writ could issue except by order of the House. Complaints were made from the benches opposite as to the practical operation of the present law. It was pointed out the public were interested in having a searching investigation into electoral corruption. He had never denied the justice of this observation, at the same time that he had expressed the opinion it was impossible to compel petitioners to proceed if they did not wish to, and even if they could be compelled it would be unlikely to do good, while it would involve large expense on private individuals for a public end. If this was regarded as impracticable or impolitic, some other means must be adopted, and the only way was by some such proceeding as he proposed in this Bill. There was another alternative—instead of adopting the English rule it could be made the duty of the Governor in Council, upon such reports, to at once issue a commission of enquiry. It might be more expeditiously done in that way; but looking at the comparatively short time between the general election as a rule, and the meeting of the House, there was no necessity for it. Very soon after the first meeting of Parliament the question would be considered. It might, if expedient, stay the issue of the writ or not until an investigation was had. He thought it was of high importance there should be some means of pointing out to a whole constituency, where extensive corruption was practiced, that it must suffer. This was not new—it was an old and wholesome law. He submitted these clauses to the House, and would accept any suggestions to improve them, in the spirit they were made.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said this clause would leave them in a worse position than before they had the Controverted Elections Act. Prior to that a sworn tribunal, drawn by ballot to avoid party predominance on the Committee, tried the case. That was found unsatisfactory because it was impossible to divest members, sitting in antagonism to each other, from being influenced by party feeling. This proposition would lead to something a thousand times worse. It threw back into this House the question, to be decided by an unsworn tribunal, whether a writ should issue.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE would be very sorry indeed to be the introducer of the system of trying controverted elections by this House. The suggestion of the hon. member was not without weight, but he could not see how a constituency could be punished after wide-spread corruption except by refusing to issue a writ.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called attention to the last part of this clause. It empowered the Judge, in case he had reason to believe the petitioner and respondent had collusively agreed to hush up the corrupt practices of the former, to report that an enquiry should be made into the case. It seemed to be scarcely fair to punish the whole constituency and cast a stain upon it, because the Judge reported that there was collusion between the sitting member and the unsuccessful candidate to hide corrupt practices.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE, to avoid all possibility of doubt, suggested the following addition: Further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is desirable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—That will do.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) thought that a constituency should not be disfranchised for a single corrupt act the part of an indiscreet supporter, which would be the effect of the Bill in its present form. A member who supposed his election was purely conducted might discover that such an act had been committed, the hiring of a team, for instance; and, unwilling to incur the expense of a contestation, might abandon the seat. The Judge might be under the impression that further enquiry was desirable, though under such circumstances the constituency should not be disfranchised.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—My hon. friend will remember that the Judge would have before him, the witnesses who would be examined.

Mr. CAMERON—But there would be only a single act.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—He would judge from the evidence before him, and the surrounding circumstances.

Mr. CAMERON—But the Judge will not have the materials upon which to form an opinion.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—If he has he reports positively.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked whether his hon. friend did not feel that placing the Judge in the position of making a report to Parliament under such circumstances would not be a reflection on him, Parliament being authorized to consider the Judge's conduct? After a general election, there might be 20, 30, or 40 controverted elections, and if no writ was issued until the House met, so many constituencies would then be unrepresented. Our Parliament only first sat for a short period, and if cases were to be tried over again within its Session one-half or two-thirds of the Session might be lost before there could be a return.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the reconsideration of the first clause; also, that "whether" be inserted after "to" in the 11th line, and the words "have extensively prevailed," after "practices," in the 12th line; further, that a similar alteration be made in the second clause, 20th line. He observed that he would consider before the Bill reached its next stage whether the suggestion of his hon. friend from Cumberland should be adopted.

Mr. BABY—I think it would be preferable, instead of "or" in the second clause, 15th line, to insert "and that."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—There may be two findings, that such practices have prevailed, or that he has reason to believe that this is the case. This provides for both.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD observed that there was a good deal in what had been said by his hon. friend from Cumberland.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE did not think that any reflection would in this relation, be cast upon the Judge; the House must determine whether a commission—the main object of the report—should issue or not.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK held that this was sufficient punishment for the constituency. It did not say that there should be a delay for the whole Session or a long period, and he did not think that any reflection would be cast upon the Judge.

The first and second clauses being adopted,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE proposed, that the third clause be amended by inserting "whether" after "to," and "have extensively prevailed" after "practices" in the 32nd line.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness) stated that it was the intention to give to the petitioner a certain number of days after the presentation of the petition, previous to the publication in the Canada Gazette of the return. The word "then" in the 1st line on the 2nd page, referred, he presumed to the date of publication in the Gazette.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE--No; it refers to the 60 days.

Mr. MACDONNELL--"During that time" would be better.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE---No! no!

Mr. MACDONNELL--If, for instance, the House was in Session only for one or two days after the publication of the Gazette, and if the petition was not presented within this time, there would be no opportunity afterwards.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE--I will make a change to meet my hon. friend's views.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER remarked that the 2nd and 3rd clauses were open to very great objection. When a Judge in a county tried the case, a great advance had been made in arriving at the facts, and he could not see why the investigation could not be continued at the time. If a party abandoned his seat, it was true that he could not be compelled to proceed, but he (Mr. Tupper) would suggest whether the Judge could not be authorized to report, and a person be appointed immediately for the purpose of taking up the investigation. A Commission would have to do the same thing; and if the course he proposed were adopted, a great deal of time and expense would be saved, avoiding all the difficulties to which attention had been drawn, as to the disfranchisement of a constituency for a considerable portion of the term of Parliament.

Then he objected to the appointment of revising barristers. If they were to have a Commission from which they were to expect an entirely impartial consideration of the subject, they must select persons acting under some responsibility as the Judges of our Courts. The manner in which revising barristers had conducted inquiries under the Controverted Elections Act, in Nova Scotia, had been eminently unsatisfactory. And he thought a great and important advance had been made in getting the trial of controverted elections into the hands of the judiciary. He would view with great regret the adoption of a measure that would take a retrograde step and place these enquiries in the hands of revising barristers.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE had no doubt that the general observations of the hon. gentleman were well grounded in reference to the expediency of having these investigations as far as possible by judges. But in introducing the Bill he pointed out that it might occur that these investigations would require attention when the judicial staff of the county were so far engaged with the regular judicial business of the county that they could not devote any attention to them. This matter, however, was left with the House in granting the address to refer the investigation to the Judge of the Supreme Court, the Provincial Judges, or to one or more persons, to be named in the address to be Commissioners. But it might be that upon the occasion of a general election the ordinary judicial functions of the county judges would be such that it would be impossible for them to discharge that duty without disorganizing the ordinary administration of justice. It was with a view of meeting this difficulty that he proposed to increase the facility of constituting the necessary tribunals. When the application for the address was made to the House it could then be determined whether the case should be referred to Judges or a Commission.

Mr. DEVLIN said he was in a position to state that the Judges of the District of Montreal found it almost impossible to discharge their ordinary duties, together with the additional duties imposed upon them under the election law. He thought the same might be said with regard to the District of Quebec. If the Judges of Montreal were required to do this work in addition to their present duties, their numbers would have to be increased, or else the public justice in other matters must be neglected. The matter was one of great importance, and it was only right that the Minister of Justice should see that the Judges were not placed in a position in which they could not discharge the duties imposed on them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD regarded this as a very important measure, and at the same time hoped the enquiries under this Act would not be very numerous. He did not think the measure would throw a great burden on the judiciary, and was of opinion that the investigations should be conducted by Judges only. In this way the confidence of the country would be retained in the final decisions arrived at. If it were subsequently proved that the evils existed to such an extent that the Judges could not conduct the enquiries, then the Bill might be amended. Then if the law remained as it was it might be imputed to the Government that they were desirous of promoting the enquiry by Commissioners. He was quite sure an imputation of that kind would be unfounded, but such imputations were made, and he thought it would be advisable to refer the cases to Judges only. Another point in the Bill was that an enquiry might be made on the petition of a certain number of electors. There ought to be some check on this. There was very little difficulty in getting up a petition for the purpose of having an imputation on a party election, and gratifying political feeling. The names of the electors should be verified in some way, and it should be proved that they were bona fide electors.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that no difficulty had been experienced in England. With regard to verification, if the House had any doubt as to the genuineness of the signatures the matter could be remedied by any person bringing the matter up to the House. He was inclined to make the number of signatures required to the petition 35.

With regard to the other, it would be remembered if fortune smiled on the occupants of the Treasury Benches in Toronto and in Ottawa, the elections for Ontario and the Dominion would take place about the same time. It would not be at all unlikely that the House might be obliged to resort to Commissioners, the Judges having more cases to try than they could attend to.

After some further discussion

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved to amend the 1st line on the second page by inserting the words "at the expiration of 60 days."

The motion was carried.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said if the members of this House were not allowed to be barristers, neither should the members of the Local Legislature. If anything the latter were more extreme partizans than the former.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was copied from the English Act. He moved that the words "being members of Parliament or" be struck out.

The motion was passed and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

The clauses from 3 to 7 inclusive were agreed to.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved to strike out the work "then," and add after the word "sitting" the following:—"at the expiration of said period of fourteen days."

The motion was carried, and the clause was agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 13 inclusive were agreed to without discussion.

The 12th and 13th clauses were adopted without any amendment.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he would not move the 14th clause, as the resolution had not passed through Committee.

The 15th clause was carried without amendment, and the Committee rose and reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the House in Committee to consider the following resolution, Mr. Scatcherd in the chair:—

That it is expedient to provide that it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to order the payment of the necessary expenses of any enquiry under the Bill (No. 14) intituled: "An Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons," and that every Commissioner not being a Judge shall be paid at the conclusion of the enquiry, besides his travelling and other expenses, such sum as shall be fixed by the Governor in Council; and that every Commissioner shall, after the making of the report by the said Bill directed, lay before the Governor in Council a statement of the number of days he has been actually employed in the enquiry, together with an account of his travelling and other expenses; and that in any payment by this resolution authorized shall be made out of any money which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of Commissions issued under the said Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN said before this resolution was adopted, he desired to ask the Minister of Justice if any additional compensation was to be afforded to the Judges of Quebec, who might be called upon to give effect to this law. He asked this question, because under the Act of 1873 some provision was made for the remuneration of Judges, but under the Act of 1874, that provision was not allowed. He held it would only be common justice that these gentlemen should receive some remuneration for the additional labour it would impose upon them. It ought to be a liberal remuneration for the Judges of Quebec, who now received a wretched salary—so small that it would be lowering the dignity of the judiciary to make it public. The Minister of Justice was a leading barrister in this country, and it was to be hoped he would see his way before long to adopt some measure to relieve our Judges from the unfair position they now occupy in this respect. They were not paid as much as bank clerks, or as magistrates in the neighbouring Province, considering the importance of the duties they were called upon to discharge under the law as it is now.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he did not think it a sound principle that any such claim for extra pay should be set up by Judges in consequence of the Statutes giving them some additional duties. The general rule ought to be understood, that the country should pay the Judges adequately for reasonable time occupied in the discharge of the duties of the judicial office. It was known that every new Statute, or almost every new Statute that was passed, involved some fresh labour for the Judges. It was only the other day an Act was passed imposing additional duties on County Court Judges, and the House was constantly passing Acts which directly or indirectly added to the labours of the judiciary. There was one point in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre to which he was responsive. He believed there were some instances in which the judicial salaries were inadequate; he spoke of no Judge in particular, and under these circumstances it might be a question for the House to consider at a future day whether they should make any change; but he did not think that change ought to be by specific remuneration for some specific duties of the work of the Judge. The House had placed upon the Statute Book a provision that the Judges of the Supreme Court shall not hold any other office or commission of profit under the Crown. A somewhat similar provision existed at one time respecting the Superior Court Judges of Lower Canada. It was under this that the case of Judge Johnson was brought before the notice of Parliament when he was appointed to another office in Manitoba. He believed that this was a sound general rule, and he did not propose to add to the remuneration of Judges for any service they might be called upon to render under this Statute.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he concurred entirely in the views of the hon. member for Montreal Centre that the Judges should be better paid, and that they should have precisely the same remuneration as a Commissioner. He feared that if the Act provided for Commissioners, when the work could not be done by Judges, and that the Judges were not paid for this extra work, the whole of this service would have to be performed by the Commissioners; to obtain this service from the Judges it should be provided that they be paid the same as Commissioners.

Mr. PALMER said it would be a wrong principle to give extra pay, for the result would be that a Judge would distribute his extra work among other Judges in order to get this extra work with extra pay. He would like to see the Judges better paid, but not in this way, and he hoped the Minister of Justice would not introduce the principle into this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD agreed with the Minister of Justice. It was highly desirable that the Judges should be better paid for their services, and the Local Legislatures should see that they were not overworked. There was an additional reason why the Minister of Justice should confine this work to Judges if he could see his way to do so. When the Judges found that this extra work would take them away from home and they would only have their travelling expenses paid, there would be strong representations from them that really the business of their several Courts would keep them at home, and it would throw all this work upon special Commissioners which was in the highest degree undesirable.

Mr. DEVLIN wished it to be understood in bringing this matter under the notice of the Committee as he had done, he did not accuse the Judges of Quebec of a desire to shirk any additional duty that might be imposed upon them by the law of the land because it would not give them additional pay. He entertained a higher opinion of the Judiciary of Quebec than to think so, and he would not have referred to it all if he thought the judicial salaries were consistent with the dignity of the office. They were not paid as well as the Judges of Ontario because, he was informed, the Judges of this Province received an annual sum from the Local Legislature in addition to salaries paid them by the Dominion Government. No such additional salary was received from the Local Legislature of Quebec by the Judges of that Province, and his opinion was that no such pay should be received from Local Legislatures under the circumstances.

Mr. PALMER complained that the Judges in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island were insufficiently paid. He thought that Judges who performed the same character of work should, throughout the Dominion, be paid the same salary.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that salaries depended upon the circumstances of Provinces and their judicial systems. The system and organization in Quebec were different to those in Ontario, and it was impossible to compare the position of these Judges, without regard to many circumstances which could not well be taken into account in debate. He was informed, on good authority, that the work in Quebec was not properly distributed, as in the country districts the Judges had little or nothing to do. One had only one case before him during a year; a second, only two cases during the same period.

Mr. SCHULTZ urged that the position of the Judges in Manitoba should be considered; the cost of living, fully one-half greater than in Ontario, should also be remembered in this relation, while their duties were as important as were the duties performed by their confreres in the other Provinces.

The Committee rose and reported, and the amendments were concurred in.

INSOLVENT BANKS.

The Bill intituled "An Act to make provision for the winding up of Insolvent Incorporated Banks," was read a second time.

LAW RESPECTING INDIANS.

The House, on motion of the Hon. Mr. LAIRD, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Mills in the chair, to consider the Bill intituled "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws respecting Indians."

Mr. SCHULTZ remarked that the width of the roads mentioned was fixed at one chain; it was well known that in a prairie country the roads were made one chain and one-half wide, in order to prevent their being blocked by snow drifts in winter. He suggested, that as elsewhere in that region, the width be so ordered in this instance.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that the clause in question, applied to the settled belt on the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, where many holdings had narrow frontages. These roads ran back through these holdings, and were the width made $1\frac{1}{2}$ chains little would be left comparatively speaking. Under these circumstances the change suggested would be impolitic. He was speaking in the interest of the occupants of these lands.

Mr. SCHULTZ said as regards the first clause in the Bill he was surprised to find the width of the proposed road allowance fixed at one chain, when all the other Dominion road allowances were one chain and a half. He believed that roads less than one chain and a half would be found practically useless, and he trusted that the hon. Minister of the Interior would alter the resolution to that effect. When the question of the system of surveys for the North West was under discussion in the House three or four years ago, he had himself represented that it was found in a prairie country that when roads were only one chain in width and the country became settled and fenced, that the snow drifted the road full and rendered it useless for purposes of travel. The original Hudson Bay Company survey had made the main road allowance two chains, for the reasons he had stated, and therefore it was not well to make a road which was parallel with this, and might be very much used, less than one chain and a half in width. He would strongly urge that this should be done or else the road would be useless.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his hon. friend for Lisgar had stated that one-chain roads were too narrow and ought to be at least a chain and a half. He thought the suggestion of the hon. member should be adopted. Land could not be so valuable as to necessitate the spoiling of the road, and a chain and a half was not very wide.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) thought it would be a great hardship on some people if the outer roads were not more than a chain.

Mr. BANNATYNE said a road less than a chain and a half would be useless in their country.

Mr. LAIRD saw no objection to making the rear roads a chain and a half, but he would object to the enlargement of the other roads. The land was valuable, and it did not seem advisable to take up any more of it than was necessary in the construction of these roads.

On the suggestion of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD the resolutions were amended so as to make the width of the outer roads one chain and a half, the width of the longitudinal roads remaining unchanged.

Mr. SCHULTZ, in speaking on the first clause of the Bill, said before he had only looked at it from a public point of view, and the latter part of the first clause made him look at it from the standpoint of the present owners of the land from which this road allowance was to be taken. He felt that the power proposed to be given to the Government to take this land at a fixed price of one dollar and a half an acre was most unfair. In scarcely any part of Manitoba, on the River Belt, was land so low in value as one dollar and a half per acre, while near Winnipeg and elsewhere it was worth twenty or thirty times as much. He would like to see the latter part of the first clause left out entirely, and a fair value to be fixed in a manner fair to the Government and to the individual. He thought that any other way would be a great hardship, and he (Mr. Schultz) begged the hon. promoter of the Bill to reconsider this point of the first resolution before the matter came before the House again.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the roads would be a great convenience to the farmers, and especially those whose farms the roads ran between, and the Government did not regard it as advisable to change the amount of compensation fixed upon.

The resolutions as amended were adopted.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions as amended.

The report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD, after a brief discussion, introduced a Bill founded on the resolutions.

AFTER RECESS.

Bill to amend the Act incorporating "Le Credit Foncier du Bas Canada" was read the second time.

SUPPLY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I rise to move the amendment of which I gave notice the other night. In making this motion, as a sense of duty compels me, I do it without any hope of being able to secure the expression of a majority of this House in support of it. The declared policy of the Government and the support which it has received from the House utterly precludes me from having any expectation of success with my motion. The course of the Government and the declaration of its policy compel me to believe that no resolution in favour of the protection of any of the great industries—be they manufacturing, mining, or agricultural—will meet with the sanction of this House. In the first place, the country and this House had a right to expect that a different course would have been pursued. It was announced by the newspapers supposed to be in the confidence of the Government, that there would be a change in the tariff. In the Globe, which if not the avowed organ is the confidential supporter of the present Government, it was announced a new tariff would be introduced and to what extent the change was to take place. Then we had the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West, who was of the opinion that the Government had authorized him to make the declaration to his constituents that there was to be an alteration of the tariff in the direction his constituents desired and required, in the way of increased protection to manufacturing industries. We had the statement of several delegations that waited on the members of the Administration, and especially the financial member of it, that they left him with the belief and on the understanding and expectation they were promised an alteration of the tariff to the protection of their manufactures. I do not mean to say—it would be unparliamentary for me to do so after the statements made by the Finance Minister and the Premier—that such promises were made, but it is quite clear from the opinions formed and inferences drawn by intelligent men who understood what they heard, they left the hon. gentleman with that belief, and the country generally had a right to expect this subject was to be fully dealt with this Session. All those expectations have been, however, set aside for ever. All hope has been lost. The manufacturers of this country now know their fate. They know they have no hope of aid in their distress or encouragement for the future. The Head of the Government also contributed—unwillingly, no doubt—to confirm the belief that the tariff would be increased. His bringing out the hon. member for Montreal West to be the candidate for that constituency; his speeches at Sarnia, Halifax and Montreal itself; his allowing, without immediate contradiction, my hon. friend from Montreal West in his candidature (he being the avowed and favoured candidate of the Premier) to make such statements as he did—the country had a right to expect there would be a change. I say all hope is gone after the declaration made to the House by the Premier and the Finance Minister. The hon. leader of the Government diminished the importance, and denied the alleged direction and scope of his assurances, and he returns in this House to his original and long-declared opinion, pronounced in the most formal manner in his speeches in England and Scotland. He returned to his first love, and not only announced there was to be no alteration in the tariff and no assistance given to our manufacturers, but he assailed the very ground upon which they fairly applied for relief and almost ridiculed their pretensions; and while he treated their application for assistance with opposition he treated those of the agriculturists, I might almost say with contempt; added to this, we heard the rapturous plaudits with which the pronuncia-mento of the hon. member for North York was greeted. The whole Ministerial party cheered him to the echo, when he announced that the Reform party, the Liberal party, of which the Government are the exponents and administrators, had nailed their colours to the mast, to the principle of free-trade, absolute, unconditional free-trade, under all circumstances, connecting it with the other great principles of which this party are the avowed champions in this country, in England and elsewhere. Then our manufacturers and agriculturists knew perfectly well that under no circumstances could they, or had they any right to expect any assistance, any countenance, any encouragement, any support from the present Administration, or from those acting with them, giving them their support and adherence. However, I felt it to be my duty to bring this subject once more before this House and the country. I have no hope that there will be a vote of the majority in favour of the proposition I shall submit; I have no hesitation in saying that the resolution will be lost and defeated by a considerable majority; but it will be on the records of this Parliament, and it will be for the country hereafter to judge between the two parties as to whether the principle of coming forward and aiding, under the particular circumstances of this crisis, our manufacturing and commercial interests be the correct one, or whether it be the principle the Ministerial party has proclaimed—that of treating their claims for assistance with neglect and with indifference, so that they can have no hope for aid from this Government or this Parliament, but must trust to their own efforts to meet all their difficulties as best they may, unencouraged, uncountenanced and alone.

The motion I make will have at least another great advantage; it will enable, for instance, my hon. friend from Lincoln another opportunity of showing his great interest in the development of the manufactures of the Dominion. My hon. friend from Brant will also have another occasion for establishing how profoundly he is interested in the welfare and encouragement of these industries and the interests of our farmers and agriculturists.

My hon. friend from Lincoln made an admirable speech. I cannot refer to its details, but I may allude to the fact that he did make a speech, and an admirable speech it was; it convinced me. An old Scotch baronet, a friend and life-long supporter of William Pitt, who was asked if he had ever heard a speech in his life that had changed his opinion said—"I have heard many a speech which changed my opinion, but I never heard a speech that changed my vote." My hon. friend has improved on the old Scotch baronet, because although he himself spoke for the purpose of convincing others that the Government were wrong in failing to protect the various interests he mentioned, his affection for the Administration, his desire to keep them in power, and his warmth of devotion towards the hon. gentleman at its head, made him—though he convinced others by unanswerable and unanswered arguments, that a reasonable protection to our manufacturers ought to be given—vote against the proposition that the Government ought to have done so. I can well understand the difficulty of the hon. gentleman between Polly and Lucy—between comedy and tragedy—and like Hogarth's picture, between Protestant and Catholic Doxy. The hon. gentleman yielded, however, to the seductions of my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and having spoken one way, voted another. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was expressing his own candid opinion; perhaps not. That hon. member made a speech at a particular time, just before the local elections for the County of Lincoln, and perchance it was not so much for the purpose of announcing his own views as of endeavouring to avert from himself the fate of the late lamented Mr. Neelon. However that may be, Sir, we have yet to deal with these questions, and I shall propound this resolution. I did not intend to occupy the attention of this House very long, because this subject had been discussed at some length, and a great many hon. members on both sides of the House have expressed their various opinions upon it. I remark sir, with respect to my resolution, which has been printed, that the Globe states it is not specific enough, that it is vague, and that it is too general. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that an able and experienced journal should be so ignorant of constitutional principle, constitutional practice, and constitutional propriety, as to expect the Opposition to assume the functions of the Government of the day, and prepare a counter-tariff. If, Mr. Speaker, the Administration had come down with a revision of the tariff, and made certain propositions, then it might be proper, possibly, and expedient, perhaps, to present counter proposals; but when the announcement is made that the tariff is not to be interfered with, and that we are to go on as we were before, then no opposition could take such a position, unless they had access to sources of information which can only be found in the Departments—in the pigeon holes in the office of the Minister of Finance—and with full knowledge of these circumstances and connaissance de cause, could they present to the House and the country a well prepared scheme to meet the existing condition of the country. So Sir, I—as my hon. friend from Montreal West did the other day—have been obliged, in obedience to constitutional and Parliamentary propriety, to assert the principle which is involved in my resolution, in the general terms in which it was expressed.

I stated that while the Government seemed to treat the claims of the manufacturers with indifference, they treat the claims of those who urge the claims of the agriculturists with actual contempt and ridicule. My hon. friend at the head of the Government stated that he heard no requests on the part of the farmers of Ontario, and especially those of the County of Lambton, for any reciprocity of tariffs with the United States, and he said that was because they were an intelligent constituency. I have no doubt of their intelligence, Sir; they have shown that by selecting and supporting my hon. friend, and to their credit it is that they elected him as their representative, and enabled him to obtain the position he so worthily holds, but which he would infinitely more worthily hold had he other opinions as to the necessity of coming forward at this moment to the relief of the country in its exigency and need.

I should like to say a few words about the agriculturists, because the previous discussions were principally on the manufacturing interests. I shall not assert on their part that they come here in forma pauperis, or that they are suffering from distress or pecuniary difficulty. I am not going to say anything of the kind; no man could truthfully say that the farmers cannot live in comfort or happiness under the present tariff. But the question is this, whether they have not a right under the circumstances to such an alteration of the tariff as will place them on the same footing with their neighbours on the other side of the line.

Let us look back at the circumstances of this country before the Reciprocity Treaty was granted. There was a cry in the old Province of Canada, in Upper and Lower Canada, for a treaty with the United States which would enable the free interchange of the natural products of the two countries. For years and years it was pressed upon the Government of the day, which in turn pressed it upon Her Majesty's Government, and the latter upon the United States. That agitation was commenced under Mr. Baldwin's Reform Administration, continued under Mr. Hincks' Administration, and finally under the Administration of Sir Allen Macnab, of which I was a member. But during that Administration we never claimed any credit for the negotiation. Our part in its consummation was a mere formal one. The treaty had been made, concluded and perfected before we had anything to say about it. So beneficial to the country was this measure in promoting the interests of the farmers that the Government paid £20,000 and more for the expenses of its negotiation. There was such an increase in the prosperity of the country in consequence of that treaty that the greatest apprehension of ruin fell upon us on its cancellation. We were anxiously looking forward for relief, and every effort was made by the Canadian and Imperial Governments to effect a renewal, and every possible concession was made, consistent with self-respect, and perhaps that border was overleaped in our anxiety to effect that object. When the American Government refused to renew the Treaty it was a great blow to the various agricultural interests, but the gloomy apprehensions of ruin were happily not realized. Blessed with a fertile soil and a good climate, they survived and overcame the great losses which fell upon the country in consequence of the cutting off of that great source of trade—that constant and valuable market. There were three reasons why the renewal was refused. One was a feeling of hostility, perhaps a natural one to some extent, in consequence of heart-burnings arising between the mother country and the United States, on account of the unhappy events of the civil war. This feeling of hostility towards England and her dependencies was one moving cause why the treaty was not renewed. The second cause was an unfounded idea that shutting out our farmers and the mass of the people from the profitable trade they had enjoyed for the previous ten years would force them to favour annexation, to cast in our lot with the United States, and thereby obtain a free market. The last cause was that American farmers along the frontier, the producers of the various natural products of the United States, declared it was for their interest and good that we should be excluded from their markets. I will not yield to my hon. friend the Premier in my respect for the intelligence and common sense of the farming population. I believe as reading and thoughtful men, and as men who understand their own interests, they are equal to any other class of the community. If the agriculturists of the United States say that Canadian products should be excluded from the American markets, surely it is not unjust or unwise for our farmers to say: “If you show hostility towards the Government to which we adhere, or any desire to keep your markets to yourselves to influence you, we will be quite justified in adopting the same course in regard to you.” It is a natural and a true feeling, and one belonging to humanity, that fair play is bonnie play.

To be sure, if it can be shown that the adoption of that policy would be injurious to our farmers we ought not to pursue it; but I cannot understand the statement of those gentlemen who say that it would be injurious in one breath and tell us in the next that we have a surplus of agricultural products to sell. If we have a surplus, what harm could excluding the Americans from our markets do? But it was said by some hon. gentlemen: “But we import very largely from the United States, and it is good for our carrying trade to have American vessels passing through our waters and canals.” It is perfectly true that this is a great advantage, but it is a different question altogether. The putting of a duty upon the agricultural products of the United States will not injure this trade, unless we chose to shut down our canals. But, it is said: “We buy Indian corn; they grow it cheaper in the United States.” I believe they do grow cheaper, as in the case of Indian corn; if you put a very small duty on it, it can still be brought in to be used by the people of this country. It is only required for our distillers; and thus not only would a very considerable revenue be created, especially in a time like the present, when we have a deficiency in our income, but at the same time it would also encourage the growth of coarse grains by our farmers; and as long as we have distillers, I think even my hon. friend from South Ontario will admit that our farmers ought to obtain a good price for their rye, peas, and other coarse grains used in distilling liquor, as well as the Americans. (Voice—What about barley?)

The hon. gentleman says what about barley. We do sell our barley to the United States, and we do pay a duty on it.

Hon. Gentlemen—No! No!

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—We sell our barley to the United States, and it is subject to a duty of 15cts. on the bushel, but our farmers export barley, notwithstanding, and if we put on 15cts on every bushel coming into this country, it would not diminish by a single bushel the barley we sell to the United States—not if we put on, 5cts. or 25cts. or 100cts.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It would not increase what they send to us either.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—It is of importance, and of growing importance to this country, that we should encourage and protect the growth of coarse grains in the Dominion. It is as evident as can be that the market for our wheat and flour in Europe is diminishing and will continue to diminish. We have new rivals in the production of breadstuffs, and Canada cannot hold her own against them. We have not only to fight against the United States, but all Europe. Before the Crimean war but little wheat and flour came to the English market from Russia, except via the Baltic and the countries bordering on the Black Sea. Although Russia, especially the south part of Russia, was one of the finest wheat growing countries in the world, there were no means of bringing out the crops of the country and sending them to a foreign market, and it was the same in Hungary, in consequence of the want of railroads. Since the Crimean war, that part of Europe has been covered with a net work of railways, and being nearer home, the agriculturists of Europe will compete more and more in the Liverpool market, and will force our farmers into other channels to find markets, and to raise other crops to suit them. That is additional reason why we should encourage the growth of coarse grains, and foster manufactures that will create a consumption for all our farmers can raise. It is not denied, as far as wheat and flour are concerned, that the prices of these two articles are governed very much, though not always, by the price in Liverpool; but it is otherwise with all other agricultural produce which Canada raises. The price of wheat and flour will be governed here more and more by the European markets.

Mr. MILLS—We ship peas and oats to Europe.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I have known peas and oats to be shipped from Europe to Canada. It has been urged that our farmers do not look upon this subject with favour; that they are indifferent to it. We heard the other night, the hon. member for Brant on that matter, and he said next year we would have one hundred thousand farmers petitioning for reciprocity of tariff with the United States. From the information I have received from agricultural constituencies, the farmers of the country are in favor of treating the Americans as they treat us; and as they resolve to keep us out of their market, that we should adopt the same policy, and encourage in every way possible the increase of the manufacturing population, where we would have a safe and certain market, a market at our own doors, a market not depending upon the various exigencies that foreign trade is liable to. The farming population are fully alive to that, and Mr. Speaker, our proof of it was given the other night, by an hon. gentleman in this House, that for the purpose of encouraging manufacturers in this country, the farmers voluntarily put a tax upon themselves to grant bonuses of large sums of money to encourage manufacturing industries in their midst. It is conclusive proof that the people of the country are in favour of, and are willing to tax themselves to encourage manufacturers; and if we can foster manufacturers by putting a tax on foreign produce they will be equally if not more in favour of that mode of encouragement than by taxing themselves to give bonuses.

Now, with respect to putting a duty upon American agricultural products, or raising of the tariff for the encouragement of manufacturers, it is said it is a retaliatory policy, an unworthy policy, and it will excite the hostility of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we have played that conciliatory game long enough; we have had it ad nauseam; we have almost exceeded our moral self respect in our anxiety to obtain reciprocity with the United States. They cannot complain, they have no right to complain, if we treat them as they treat us; they have better sense; they know they have no right to complain if we conceive it is to our own interest to treat them as they treat us and mete out to them just what they mete out to us. But it is said that is the old Tory style of doing business; that was the course of infant political economy or before political economy existed. That argument was brought up in this House. It was said such a policy was only advocated by the old effete school of political economy before the modern school prevailed; that a retaliatory policy ought not to be maintained. I then pointed to the course taken by Canning, the founder of the modern school of political economy, the master at whose feet Huskinson was educated and whose principles Huskinson carried out. And what did Canning do? His financial principles were well known; the course he took against the Government of the Netherlands when they put on the duty on English shipping was defined in a poetical despatch to Sir Chas. Bagot which was as follows:

"In matters of Commerce the fault of the Dutch
Is giving too little and asking too much,
With equal advantage the French are content,
So we'll tax all Dutch commerce at twenty per cent."

And they put it on.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There was another celebrated agriculturist who was advised in the same direction—Job.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I know nothing about Jobs. We should not, of course, to use the old proverb, cut off our noses to spite our faces; and if we believe a protective policy is going to be an injury to us we ought not to adopt it. But it will be found that the farmers of Canada will argue, when the question comes to be discussed around their own firesides, and with their neighbours, and at the hustings; they will agree to the proposition I now make, that the United States should be dealt with as they deal with us, and we would be craven if from fear of offending our neighbours we took any other alternative. If they do not grant us reciprocity in trade, we should give them reciprocity in tariff. It is not our interest that we should adopt blindly and servilely the same rate of tariff they have adopted towards us. I believe that with respect to agricultural products a reasonable tariff might be imposed. Notwithstanding the duty on Indian corn some years ago, a considerable amount of it was imported to use with the coarse grain of our farmers for distillery purposes, and that grain paying a duty gave a substantial addition to the revenue of the country.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The Hon. Finance Minister resided for a time in the vicinity of a large distillery near Kingston, and I know that very large sums were paid for duty on Indian corn that was brought in there for the purpose of mixing with and giving a stronger flux to the coarse grains of our own farmers.

Respecting my resolution, I say it is of importance. If ever the Government had any intention of dealing with the tariff at all that now is the proper time. The Hon. Finance Minister tells us there is to be a deficiency. He has not told us how much, but he will, no doubt, tell us to-night what the amount will be. It ought to be a considerable one, or should not be dealt with so seriously as it has been by that hon. gentleman. The retrenchment promised us must either be in the ordinary affairs of the Government, or in the prosecution of the public works for which appropriations are made. I cannot presume that the Government would retrench in the ordinary administration of public affairs, so as to injure the efficiency of that administration. I presume they have not in the retrenchments they allege to have made in that branch of the public service impaired its efficiency; and if they have not, that retrenchment should have taken place whether there was a deficiency or not. So I take it that that retrenchment can be of very little consequence, and there has been no retrenchment at all.

On comparing the estimates of last year with those of this year, I find those for the administration of public affairs are largely increased. The hon. gentleman has not retrenched in the administration of public affairs. Then if the retrenchment on which the Government relied was not mere cheese-paring, it could only be in ceasing to prosecute the public works for which appropriations have been made by Parliament. I think that is a most lamentable state of affairs. This country can, in my opinion, well afford to prosecute these works.

At the present time, owing to the depressed state of the country, the people are working only half time in the different manufactories. There is a great deal of suffering among the working classes, and substantial relief would be given to them by these great works being proceeded with. Now, Sir, why are these works not proceeded with?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — What works?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I am arguing that the retrenchment by which the Government hope to meet the deficiency must be either in the expenses of administration of affairs, or in ceasing to prosecute the public works. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, has not shown in what way that retrenchment is to be effected. With regard to my first supposition, if the retrenchment could be made without diminishing the efficiency of the Department, it ought to be made in any case. The only other source of retrenchment is by not prosecuting the public works. My hon. friends laughed a good deal at the expression, "Incidental protection." They say it is a contradiction of terms. It is not so. It will be admitted, I think, by my hon. friend from Bothwell, that the increase of tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. was a revenue increase imposed for the purpose of raising $3,000,000. It was a revenue tariff but was it not incidental protection to our manufacturers to the extent of 2½ per cent. It raised a revenue of $3,000,000, and incidentally protected our manufacturers to that extent, and I would venture to say that if the Government had come down with what was understood to be their original policy—an increase of the tariff to 20 per cent.—it would have caused a substantial increase in the revenue and have been an additional protection on our manufactures to that extent. It is true you may go beyond the proper limit in taxation. You may tax so high as to diminish consumption and thereby not effect the purpose you desire. The more expensive you make an article the greater the tendency to diminished consumption. But if you go to a certain point you increase the revenue and protect the interest of the manufacturer of the articles on which the increased duty is put. You may not get a revenue in proportion to the increase of duty, still there will be a positive increase, though not to the same extent, and by having that increased duty you give confidence to the manufacturer. You increase the wealth of the manufacturer and the prosperity of the working classes, and you enable them thereby to consume other dutiable articles that will more than make up any loss that may be experienced by the increase of duty, provided that increase will not be of such an extent as to be prohibitory and destroy the collection of the duty for revenue purposes. I think we have a right to protect our manufacturers, from this country being made a sacrifice market. It is no matter whether it is made a sacrifice market from the effect of depression in the neighbouring country, which will bring about a shrinkage of values and a sacrifice of property, or whether it is made a slaughter market by trades union combinations in the United States. Whichever may be the case they are sending goods into the Canadian market with the avowed purpose of crushing our native manufactures.

Mr. HOLTON—What a misfortune.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The hon. member for Chateauguay says what a misfortune. Yes, Sir, it is a misfortune. Every shrinkage of values is an injury to the community. If in this town 20 or 30 merchants fail, and if their stocks are thrown on the market as bankrupt stocks, the consumer will derive a temporary advantage. But it is only a temporary gain, for there is a real loss to the community. An injury is caused to the solvent merchant, in consequence of the general depression such an occurrence occasioned. It gives rise to a scarcity of labour or want of public confidence, and a wider spread of insolvency. The other day we heard a gentleman in the House read extracts from the Chicago Tribune, pointing out the awful consequences that would result to Canada if we adopted the American system. It is not my intention to defend the wisdom of American financiers. The Americans are a great and prosperous nation. They know what they are about, and one can scarcely believe that a self-governing and educated people are carrying out such an utterly ruinous system as that which has been spoken of. It is not my business to defend their financial policy, but I certainly want to quote a United States paper as an authority to show that it would not ruin us if we kept American manufacturers out of our markets. But let me read the American authority on that point. The article is taken from the North American, and published in the American Manufacturer. It is as follows:—

“In a letter now before us to a friend in this city, from a man of the highest standing in the scientific world of Sweden, the writer, speaking of certain reciprocity propositions recently received from Germany, says that they are wholly unlikely to be accepted, as they would do more harm than ‘the French treaty has already done.’ ‘Of that sort of trade,’ he continues, ‘we have already had enough.’ So, too, says Austria, English journalists advising us that she stands ready, at the earliest permitted moment, to denounce the whole reciprocity system; and the wool growers of Hungary being even now engaged in an earnest effort at bringing about some arrangement with Australian woolen manufacturers similar to that which has here existed for some years past. Belgium adheres to protection, and the most distinguished of her teachers, M. Laveleye, has just now astonished his free trade friends by a renunciation of the doctrines of their economic school. Italy follows suit, the Manchester Guardian assuring its readers that ‘the Italian government is endeavoring to impose a tariff so highly protective in its terms that one is almost led to wonder whether the Italian people are not forgetting their own history, and the London Economist describing the Italian prospect ‘as a complete return to the protectionist system.’ Germany moves in the same direction, a letter now on our table advising an American correspondent that ‘the current in the direction of increased protection is now setting more strongly than at any time in the past.’ Turkish statesmen, as we learn from the Levant Herald, are awaking to the fact that to the absence of protection has been due the present ruinous condition of the country, and that without a total change of policy no change for the better can be looked for. Russia, after having for a time modified her protective system, has since returned to it with renewed energy, and now stands among the foremost of protective nations, determined that not only shall the needs of her own people be supplied from domestic factories and furnaces, but that by means of the numerous railroads now in progress they shall be enabled to contend successfully with Britain for all the markets of Central Asia, and even, as we now are told, for that of Western China.

out the whole of the present century, rejoices in a foreign commerce that grows more steadily and rapidly than that of any other country in the world; and in a prosperity so undisturbed by the present almost universal commercial crisis that she has been but now described by a British journalist as bearing to all appearance ‘a charmed life.’ India, with her almost nominal wages and but slight protection, is now entering into vigorous competition with the textile manufactures of Britain, and promises soon to supply the home demand for that railroad iron for which she has been thus far so entirely dependent on British ironmasters. Australia becomes from year to year more earnest in her adherence to a protective policy, and the day approaches when Canada must inevitably follow in the same direction. Among ourselves the advantages of a great home market become from day to day more clearly obvious to our farmers and planters, and the day seems not far distant when the headquarters of protection will be found among the mills and furnaces of Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee. That such is the universal tendency of the present moment is admitted by the London Telegraph, which now reluctantly acknowledges that ‘in spite of prophecies and smooth words, and the lifted voices of miscalculating friends, the world, since the repeal of the corn laws, has gone on in its old bad way;’ that is to say in a way adverse to that policy which looked to the establishment in Britain of the one and only ‘workshop of the world.’

“Where may now outside of the Cobden Club be found the home of British free trade policy and doctrine? Scarcely even in Britain, whose markets are being supplied with the products of low priced foreign labour, and to such extent as to have deprived thousands, tens of thousands of British working men of the means of obtaining bread for their wives and children.

“Thirty years since they were told that with free trade in corn, and free admission of the manufactured products of the world at large, there would come the ‘cheap loaf,’ and perfect harmony between employers and employed; the result of such measures now exhibiting itself in the facts, that discord seems almost universal; that the Contemporary Review, speaking of and for Great Britain, assures its readers that ‘there is no reasonable doubt that in no other civilized part of the world are there so many deaths traceable to starvation as in this country,’ and that those of the London Hour are simultaneously assured that ‘we can not look in any one single direction without being made aware of the positive and absolute failure of free trade as carried out by England. Our manufacturers suffer, our exports suffer, our shipping suffers, the social and physical condition of our people suffers, our character and honour suffer, and yet there is a political party in England that still maintains that this ruinous policy must be adhered to. * * * Political leaders of this stamp little dream in what direction the thoughts of the whole trading community are being forced by the results of modern Liberal legislation ; they little dream of the difficulties almost every man in business has to contend against under free trade and unlimited competition ; they little dream that, although there is no popular action as yet, there is a universal conviction that the whole commercial policy of the Liberal statesmen of England must be revised, or the suffering and losses of the people will get beyond recovery.

"Having studied carefully the facts we have thus presented, our readers, as we think, can scarcely fail to arrive with us at the conclusion that that British free trade system which looked to giving to the manufactures of Britain a complete control of the commerce of the world, now totters to its fall, and that its acceptance by other nations must at no distant day take its place among the most remarkable delusions of the past."

That is an article from an American newspaper, quoting from several English authorities, but I will call the attention of the House to a short note in the Westminster Review. It is written on the necessity of paying off the national debt while they are rich, and before they become poor. Remember the Westminster Review is the organ of free-trade, the organ of Cobdenism, and of Mr. Bright, a consistent supporter of everything liberal in religion, in politics, and in finance. Says the Westminster Review :

"We shall not be considered premature, we hope, in pointing out danger in this direction when we read in the public prints that tires are being delivered in the neighbourhood of Sheffield at prices far lower than those at which they can be produced there—that American calico is sent for sale to Manchester at thirteen pence a pound, while the same quality cannot be produced there under thirteen pence half-penny—that a Halifax carpet firm have removed a large portion of their machinery to the United States, where they hoped to turn out their goods more quickly and more profitably—that English black silks have given place to those of France, Prussia, and the Lower Rhine—that Basle has seriously crippled the ribband trade of Coventry—that the English silk velvet trade is quite snuffed out, our velvets now coming from Crefeld in Rhenish Russia—that in the trimming department of our warehouses everything—buttons, braids, trimming and headed trimming, and a thousand other articles—is almost exclusively German manufacture, and displays a style and finish superior to anything we can produce—that in low wool shawls of a certain kind, the Germans give better value than the English ; while in their tissue shawls the French excel the Scotch—that of useful goods, even when originated here, samples are sent abroad and are imitated and improved upon in such a manner as to displace the patterns—that in fancy dress the best woolen goods are of French manufacture, coming from Roubaix ; their beauty of colour and softness of texture excelling the English ones—that beautiful and artistic fabrics, resembling sealskin and dogskin and other fanciful articles which come from Berlin, are used here for ladies' cloaks—that while common and inferior cloths are bought at Leeds, the finer kinds come from Germany and Belgium—that in brocaded silks, from which neckties are made, Germany has displaced Macclesfield, while German brace webs take the place of those supplied by Leicester—that in fancy handkerchiefs for ladies' neckties the French article is preferred to that made at Paisley or Glasgow—that the silk coverings for umbrellas and parasols are invariably of foreign production—in fine, that in many departments of trade our supremacy has been not merely threatened but done away with."

These are the results of years and years of free-trade in England and opening up her markets with the world—she having previously built up enormous establishments and concentrated capital, having a large mass of population engaged in manufacturing, with coal and iron side by side, with all the advantages free-trade was bringing them ; and still these foreign countries which have adopted a different policy, and which have not been seduced by the precepts of England, but still keep up protective duties or tariffs which afford incidental protection, are not only competing with her in the markets of the world, but at her own door. This is a striking fact, and it is already prophesied that in ten years, some say much less than that, those who clamored for free-trade and free bread and got them, when they find they are losing their own markets, will agitate for a return, not to anything like prohibition, but to such a revenue tariff as will give them fair play in their competition with other nations.

There is no hope that this country will receive aid from the present Government after the solemn declarations the hon. gentlemen opposite have made and allowed to be made. We have no expectation they will reverse their policy, that our manufacturers will be protected, that our mining interests will be developed or our farmers placed on the same footing as those of the United States, by any action of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no hope in this House, and therefore we must appeal by this resolution, which I am going to place in your hand, from the Government and their followers, to the sober second thought of the country.

I move "that the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved that this House regrets His Excellency the Governor General has not been advised to recommend to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid in alleviating the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious speech from the throne, but would also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries, as well as to the agricultural products of the country.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman was good enough to say he could well understand the difficulty my hon. friend from Lincoln had in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal West. I would assure him I equally well understand the difficulty he has in submitting the proposition just now placed in your hands. I dare say that other members of this House besides the Government fully appreciate the disappointment which was evident enough on the part of the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues when they found the Government were not disposed to interfere with the tariff, or disturb the existing rates of taxation. I have not the slightest doubt the hon. gentleman would have been extremely delighted to have seen us floundering in the depths of the protectionist bog from which he has emerged. I have no doubt he would have liked extremely to see the Government endeavour to essay the task of solving and reconciling that utterly impossible problem of a revenue with a protective tariff. We had no intention whatever of committing ourselves to this policy, and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite once for all that although the Government gave very serious consideration to this question, and took great pains to decide what was their duty in this crisis, they did not at any time entertain the idea of levying what is called a protective tariff. Doubtless we admit, as every Government in this country have admitted, that it is extremely desirable when a Government have to levy duties they should be so imposed as, in the words of the right hon. gentleman, to promote the good of the greatest possible number. On that point we agree. We also admit that it is our duty to advocate a policy in the interests of Canada alone, and the right hon. gentleman may depend there will be no difference in that respect between the occupants of these benches and the hon. members opposite.

Now I may repeat once more in the most positive and explicit manner, no man was justified under whatever circumstances in stating any member of this Government had an intention to meddle with the tariff. I refer to the Speech from the Throne to show that we had no such intention. If hon. gentlemen refer to my own utterances, delivered before I proceeded to England at a public meeting in my own County, and through the medium of the press addressing the people of Canada, I defy anyone to say that at that time I held out the slightest or faintest indication that the policy of this Government was to increase the duties.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—It was a readjustment of the tariff.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I spoke of no such thing. As to the statement that such inferences were drawn by those who waited on me or my hon. friend, surely the right hon. member must have been almost laughing at the House if he supposed that because we listened to the gentlemen who spoke to us and endeavoured to obtain information from them on the subjects they brought under our notice, they had reason to draw inferences from what we said, that we wished to readjust the tariff.

The right hon. gentleman was good enough to make some allusion to the competition to which our agriculturists were to be exposed, and particularly that from the south of Europe. As well as I can recollect the geographical position of Odessa, it is as far away from Liverpool as Chicago or Detroit, perhaps a little further. As my hon. friend says, I think that if we have wheat to sell, we will be able in the various markets of the world to obtain a fair price for it.

The hon. gentleman was good enough to give another extraordinary illustration of the growth of protectionist principles in this country, alluding to rural townships, if I understood aright, as having contributed by bonuses and otherwise to the establishment of manufactures in their midst. Well Sir, I have paid some attention to the progress of the same bonus movement and I fail to recollect at this moment—perhaps some hon. gentleman can correct me—a single rural township in which villages did not largely predominate, which have so acted.

Villages and towns have doubtless done so, and that I can understand, but I would like to know of such an instance as I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. POPE—I can inform you on this point.

Hon Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Will my hon. friend give me the name.

Hon. Mr. POPE—The townships of Compton and Eaton.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—To what manufactures do they contribute?

Hon. Mr. POPE—Manufactures of meat and cheese.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Meat and cheese; I do not deny, that they are industries, but I think that it is almost a play upon words to say, that a joint stock meat curing establishment belongs to the class of manufacturers the right hon. gentleman from Kingston had in mind; and coupled with whose policy is a proposition to tax the farmers from 35 to 45 per cent. for the benefit of our manufacturing industries, I consider that the general impression which will be made by this measure upon the bulk of our intelligent agriculturists will be that this policy is a sprat thrown to catch a salmon.

Now, Sir, it is rather remarkable—although I am bound to say that the hon. gentleman advocated his cause, such as it is, in a very sober and temperate manner—that the hon. gentleman was extremely careful not to say what particular industries he would protect, and to what extent he would propose to do so; in fact, he took very good care to hide what kind of benefits might be derived from this same Protectionist movement, whether incidental or otherwise, and what is a much more important question, its probable cost to the country. I purpose filling up some of these gaps which the hon. gentleman left in his argument; and in the first place I would like exceedingly to direct the attention of the House to the real number of people likely to be affected by this policy, whether for good or evil. On this point there has been a great deal of exaggeration; many hon. gentlemen look carelessly, I must say, at the official returns placed in our hands, and are under the impression that the class which would be more particularly affected by this movement, includes several hundred thousand persons. I have heard them stated on more than one occasion, I think, as polling from 200,000 to 213,000, necessarily yielding support and contributing to the maintenance of a much larger number. Now, this is a matter of some interest to the House, and I beg to call their attention to the various classes, of whom I see 213,000 put down as being concerned in our manufacturing industries. Among the industrial classes which are vulgarly suppose to be likely to be benefited by this same protection movement are:—2,600 bakers, 15,700 blacksmiths; 2,000 bricklayers and brickmakers; about 1,000 builders; 3,600 butchers; 32,500 carpenters; 4,300 carriage makers; 1,000 chemists; 4,400 coopers; 8,000 dressmakers; 18,000 fishermen; from 9,000 to 10,000 lumbermen; 4,000 painters and glaziers; 2,000 plasterers and plumbers; 8,700 printers; 3,000 saddlers; 7,000 seamstresses; 4,000 ship-builders; 5,000 stone-masons; 2,700 joiners, and 1,200 wheelwrights—forming 150,000, out of the 213,000, who really and truly are in no ways concerned in such a policy, depending almost exclusively upon the progress and the prosperity of the agriculturists. Well, of the remainder, no less than 32,000 are divided into the trades of the shoemakers, tailors, mechanics and cabinet-makers, of whom a proportion are undoubtedly employed in the cities, and are necessarily more or less interested in the supposed benefits which would accrue from such a system, but of whom the larger number are as dependant as any other class on the agriculturists, and on them alone. I have said—and I repeat it again—that we do not desire to refuse justice to any section of the community because it is small; but it is proper that this House should clearly and distinctly understand how very small a portion of the population is in reality interested in this relation. I described it on a previous occasion as consisting of about one-twentieth part; but I might say with greater truth, one-fortieth, because at least one-half of them have very little indeed to fear from foreign competition. Any one, for example, who looks at the returns for imports of boots and shoes, which affect by far the largest single industrial class, can see for himself that the importation of less than one per cent.—I believe this is the proportion brought from the United States—cannot in any shape or way disadvantageously affect its profits. This section may be injured—and, doubtless, it is to a great extent—by over internal competition among themselves; but most assuredly not by any foreign industries with which it may have to contend.

Now, as the hon. gentleman remarked, this argument is nearly worn threadbare. There are, however, a few points to which it may be necessary to call attention; and one benefit will probably result from this discussion. At any rate, many extravagant pretensions are being abandoned; and the case is practically narrowed down to one single, solitary issue—whether it is advisable for us to adopt special means in order to protect a certain very limited segment of our population from the competition to which they are exposed from the people of the United States.

I may remark that no hon. gentleman, as far as I have noticed, has dealt with the formidable question of how we could defend ourselves against the smuggling, which would inevitably arise in our case, as well as in that of the United States, if we are to have a a tariff bearing any proportion to theirs; neither has any hon. gentleman, in my recollection, ventured to deny, that with respect to a very great part of the articles which would thereby be affected, we are perfectly safe from any injurious consequences which would result from their overpowering our manufactures, and afterwards raising the price against us, from the single circumstance that the Americans are really to a very great extent competing not with our own but with the British manufacturers.

I do not at all desire, Sir, to enter into a minute calculation of what quantity of goods it would be possible for us to produce, if we chose to manufacture them at any hazard, but I would call attention to two other important facts which ought to weigh considerably with hon. members, as measuring the cost, which any largely increased production would entail. I believe it is generally admitted, that any single person employed in manufactures of any kind, can produce on the average to the value of $1,000 or $1,200 per head. These figures correspond with the details given in the American and Canadian censuses, and it is also sustained by the information furnished by all manufacturers of whom I have had the opportunity of inquiring touching this subject. Let us suppose that it were possible to impose a 25 per cent. or even a 20 per cent. tariff in favor of a large number of articles which could not otherwise be produced here, and let the House for one moment consider what would be the cost of this protection, and then draw a conclusion as to how far it would be to the advantage of this country to have recourse to any such artificial stimulus. Taking some such calculation as that, as the basis, any hon. gentleman will see if it be necessary to impose a 25 per cent. tariff for the benefit of manufacturers, the result would be that on every $1,200 worth of goods produced $300 would be paid by the community for each individual so employed; and it must be remembered that this average of production is not the average for heads of families, but of men, women and children; and that therefore far less benefit would accrue to the country from the payment of such a sum than might ordinarily be expected, supposing each of these units represented a full-grown man supporting a family consisting of four or five persons.

I say candidly that I regard the 17½ per cent. tax which we levy on most of these classes of manufactures which it would be possible to develop in this country as very formidable indeed, amounting to about $200 or, strictly speaking, about $210 per year per individual concerned. Although there may be some advantages which I do not deny in such a system, and although it is not likely that in the case of any industry which would really take root here such a tax would be necessary to foster it permanently, still it must be remembered that the tariff is already very high, and that to raise it any more would render it almost absolutely prohibitive on many articles, while for the enormous taxes that would in consequence of such a policy be imposed on the country, very small returns in the shape of artisans added to the population would be obtained. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to read us some documents from English reviews and American papers. I will not allude to what has passed in debate the other night further than to say this.—I may be permitted to say, that I am as well acquainted as other hon. gentlemen with the very celebrated passage in Mills' works, to which allusion has been made on various occasions; and I am perfectly convinced that if that eminent political economist was conscious of the use made of his words in this relation, I believe he would be tempted to rise from his grave and refute them, had he not taken the precaution to leave ample refutation on record. I would like to read what Mr. Mills said on the 20th of January, 1871, regarding the points which are now agitating this country:—

“I hold every form of what is called Protection to be the employment of the powers of government to tax the many, with the view of promoting the pecuniary gains of a few. I say the intention, because even the desired object is very often not obtained, and never to the extent that is expected; but whatever gain there is, is made by the few, and them alone, for the labouring people employed in the protracted branches of industry are not benefitted. Wages do not range higher in the protected than in other employments; they depend on the general rate of the remuneration of labour in the country, and if the demand for particular kinds of labour is artificially increased, the consequence is merely that labour is attracted from other occupations, so that employment is given in the protected trades to a greater number, but not at a higher remuneration. The gain by protection, when there is gain, is for the employers alone. Such legislation was worthy of Great Britain, under her unreformed constitution, when the powers of legislation were in the hands of a limited class of great land owners and wealthy manufacturers; but in a democratic nation like the United States, it is a signal instance of dupery, and I have a higher opinion of the intelligence of the American many, than to believe that a handful of manufacturers will be able to retain by fallacy and sophistry that power of levying a toll on every other person's earnings, which the powerful aristocracy of England, with all their political ascendancy and social prestige have not been able to keep possession of.”

I simply beg to say that if I erred in supposing that the system of protection was calculated to enrich the few at the expense of the many, at least, Sir, I had tolerably good authority for venturing to draw the deduction. It is to be borne in mind that such were the results arrived at by Mr. Mills in 1871, when the great experiment of protection by the Americans was under discussion, having had full opportunity to develop itself to the uttermost.

It was asked, the other night, and the question deserves an answer, how we pretended to explain the great emigration which has taken place from Lower Canada. No doubt it is quite true a very considerable number have emigrated from that region, and many of them have found employment on the fertile prairies of the Far West, or in some of the manufacturing districts of America; but if any hon. gentleman chooses to work out for himself the problem of which I have given the necessary premises, he will see that if we were to manufacture in Canada every article of import possible to make, it would afford employment for a very small proportion of those who have left us. If we take the American census returns we will also get some interesting information relative to this phase of the question. During the last ten years the State of Maine has decreased from 14,000 to 15,000, and a similar state of affairs exists in New Hampshire; whereas in Lower Canada we have had an increase of 80,000. The important States of New York and Ohio have actually increased in a less degree during the last decade than either Ontario, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. The fact is this: where the climate is severe and the soil in many respects unfavourable on either side of the line, population will not increase very rapidly. Like causes produce like results, and a certain number of people here and in the United States naturally gravitate to the most fertile country, where it is easier to gain a comfortable living without much capital; and that fact justifies us in making exertions to to open the great and fertile country of the Northwest. Without it, we must under the necessities of the case become comparatively stationary in population. We may bolster up our manufactures and force our industries to any extent, but unless we can obtain new and fertile lands no considerable increase can take place. It has been said that the difference between protection and free-trade is the cause of so many of our fellow countrymen emigrating from Lower Canada. I will ask the attention of hon. gentlemen again to the census of the United States. On comparing the numbers of industrial classes in the two countries, they will find that so far from our being at a disadvantage under our comparatively low tariff, relative to our population, we have as large a number of people engaged in industrial occupations as the United States in 1870. According to their returns in that year they had 2,700,000 in manufacturing, mining, and other industrial pursuits. We at the same time had 213,000 in the classes enumerated, and besides some 30,000 employed in connection with the lumber trade, which branch is included in their figures. As our population is just the eleventh part of that of the United States it will be seen that we have relatively as large a percentage in this particular as they, despite their enormous tariff.

I think my protectionist friends have been rather unadvised in discussing this question. They have at this present moment a rather good thing, if they only know it, and I must tell them if this 17½ per cent. tariff were to be strictly and closely scrutinised, it would be found that it is rapidly approaching prohibition on certain classes of manufactured goods. As the country grows in population a tariff of this kind comes to be prohibitory, and if they were wise they would not draw the attention of the country too closely to the fact. I have no objection whatever to the imposition of a tariff, if it be imposed as Mr. Mills stated in the paragraph quoted—if it was correctly quoted—that is with a view of giving a temporary protection to those industries which can naturally be prosecuted here. We know that we must have a customs tariff, and and that it is impossible to have it without more or less granting protection to manufacturers; and although I do not believe in incidental protection, still I am willing that the tariff should be so distributed as to give an advantage—not in endeavoring to settle manufactures here that do not belong to us—to the particular classes of industries which will naturally grow up in the country.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Do I understand my hon. friend to say he is in favour of incidental protection?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I did not say that. These hon. gentlemen were quick enough to declaim at some length on the effects of our policy, as they are pleased to call it. There is great difference of opinion as to what would be the effect of the retaliatory policy which I heard for the first time in this House advocated from the Opposition benches. I am inclined to think that the spectacle of the Canadian people, quietly pursuing their own course without reference to the policy of the United States, is far more likely to convert sensible men in that community than to attempt to impose retaliatory duties. If we were some 24,000,000 or even 14,000,000 people, I could understand there might be some advantage in the course recommended, but when I recollect we are but 4,000,000 in the immediate neighbourhood of 40,000,000, I say that hon. gentlemen have greatly overrated the possible disturbing influence of any action of ours in this direction—that our imposing a retaliatory tariff would have any other end than to furnish to American protectionists a much needed weapon to induce that country to proceed a little longer in the course it has adopted.

I have been looking over my notes of the right hon. gentleman's speech to see if there were any other points to which he called attention to which I should offer a reply to-night. With respect to the retrenchment policy which the Government announced, and which appears to have given umbrage to the right hon. gentleman, because it differs from any policy that he or any of his friends attempted in a similar emergency, I venture to say that the retrenchment which we advocated and are now carrying out, is simply the policy which we announced from the first day we took our seats on these benches. We pointed out at that time that public expenditure had been unusually and abnormally swollen, from the fact that the hon. gentleman engaged in a great host of minor public works which it was necessary to complete. I took occasion in 1874 to point out that these expenditures must necessarily continue for two or three years, but that at the end of that time we hoped to make a large reduction, and on looking at the estimates the House will see that reduction has been made, not only without disturbing the public interest, but entirely in the public interest. As to those great public works to which the country was pledged, I should like to know which of them have been closed which was calculated to give employment to any large number or relieve the existing distress. I am aware of an opinion existing that injury has been done by discontinuing some of those works, but I do not think any hon. gentleman can point out any great work really to be beneficial to the whole Dominion which has been interrupted or even suspended. On the contrary, it was with the express purpose of being able to prosecute those works with due energy that the loan to which exception has been taken was contracted. I may add that we are in full possession of funds to carry out those works with all the energy occasion will permit.

There is but one other question of real importance to which I desire to direct attention. It is perfectly true we have had our crisis, just as the Americans have had theirs; but I do not believe it was caused necessarily by a protective tariff in the one case or free trade in the other. As I have stated before, and state again, over-production always brings distress, no matter however small or large a country may be; but I say our position is naturally better than the United States in this respect—that we have not wasted our strength by a mischievous system of protection, that we have not artificially stimulated our manufactures and so contributed to produce this distress; and we have greater strength and recuperative power to-day than if we had exhausted our manufacturing and agricultural populations by having recourse to the policy pursued in the United States. I believe that one of the worst results of American protection is this: that it has caused an enormous waste of national resources, and that is the true reason why they find it so difficult to recover from the stagnation into which they have been plunged. I look for a revival of trade in a reasonable time in Canada with all the more confidence because we have abstained from such a policy; and although I feel that many are at this moment in a state which calls for our sympathy, yet it is not fair for any single section of the community to appeal to the Government for assistance, while we find other sections having large interests, employing more inhabitants, and conducting more directly to the welfare of the people, are equally distressed and are not asking assistance. Why is it the agriculturists do not appeal to the Government in the case of a bad harvest? And why in a case of a crisis, which bears the same relation to the manufacturing interests as a bad harvest to the farming interests, should an appeal be made to this House? If we saw any way of granting the aid required without inflicting a great and lasting injury on the country, nothing would give greater pleasure to myself or to the members of the Government than to grant it.

But surely we have the right to say that the onus lies on these gentlemen to prove their case. I have listened patiently to their speeches, and have taken all possible means to inform myself on these subjects, and I cannot see that it is in any way our duty to imperil the welfare of the whole people of Canada for the sake of a few interests.

Mr. MASSON—I have seen by the remarks of the Hon. Finance Minister and of the Premier that there have been difficulties in the Government in bringing their tariff policy before the House. I have seen it by the answers of the Finance Minister himself. He has taken the position which we on this side of the House heartily concur in when he says: "In framing a tariff we must so frame it that the industrial interests of the country shall be considered." Well, Sir, this is the principle which we all admit on this side of the House, and I tell the hon. gentleman he is at direct issue with the Premier on this question, for the idea of the First Minister is that in framing the tariff we should consider the interests of the trade with foreign countries, and not the manufacturing interests of this country. I can prove it by the speeches of the hon. gentlemen in England last summer, where he told his hearers that his policy was the great free-trade policy; that his tariff would be so framed that the commercial interest between England and Canada would be increased instead of fostering our manufactures, as the Finance Minister says. Here are the words of the First Minister on that occasion:

"I need not assure you, or any one here, of the anxious desire of the people of Canada to cultivate the most extensive trade relations with every part of the world, but especially with the great centres of trade in this country. (Applause.) And while we are compelled by the necessity of revenue to impose a very considerable duty upon goods entering into the country, we shall always feel bound so to distribute that taxation as to promote as far as possible the interests of the trade relations that are existing between civilized countries."

That is not the only contradiction we find on that side. When the Prime Minister came back to Canada he thought it would not do in a country like ours to make free-trade speeches such as he delivered in England and Scotland. He modified his remarks, and at Sarnia his speech was an advocacy of what you may call an incidental protection policy.

But the Finance Minister will not accept an incidental protection policy, or what Mr. Galt calls a modified free-trade policy. I think this system of trade should be considered entirely above all sectional spirit or feeling, and I intend to discuss it in that way; I may be allowed, as I have heard members coming from different parts of the Dominion expressing the views of their constituents on that subject, state what are the views of the rural constituency which I represent in Quebec. It has been said that the farmers are opposed to protection; but I represent a rural constituency, and the House will remember I have presented petitions here signed by the farmers of both shades of political opinion in my county, asking for a protective tariff not only for manufacturers, but also for the agricultural interests. These petitions stated that as long as we had a country on our borders that would exclude our manufactures and agricultural products, it was the bounden duty of the Government to provide such a policy as would give us protection against the United States. As I have before stated that petition was signed by persons of different political opinions, and I will tell the House that those Liberals who signed that petition, have not, as some of the members of this House have done, changed their policy when party purposes required it, but they are ready to stand by these principles and ask protection from this Government, or from any other Government that may be in power. They feel that the interests of the manufacturers and agriculturalists are identical; they feel that agriculture will succeed better if they have manufacturing towns and villages scattered over the country creating a home consumption and a market where they can sell all the small products of the farm that they can raise to advantage.

Ask any farmer if he prefers to have his farm near a great city like Montreal rather than thirty miles from it, and he will at once answer that he prefers to have it near the market. They believe that by protection every water power in the country will be utilised for manufacturing purposes, that it will create a demand for labour and supply a home market, saving the cost of transport on their produce to a foreign country.

It has been said by the hon. gentleman, the Finance Minister, that the bonus system to manufacturers by municipalities has been a complete failure. I know that in the small town where I live the inhabitants are a unit in favour of giving a bonus to manufacturers who would come and settle there if protected from foreign competition. They will willingly exempt manufactures from municipal taxation for ten or fifteen years if a tariff of twenty per cent. is adopted. They believe that if the trade is profitable they will have sufficient competition among themselves to prevent high prices. They may be wrong, but it is their opinion, and I will tell this House how these ideas were formed. The farmers know very well what their interests are in Quebec as well as in any other province, but on questions of this kind they sometimes require to be educated to what is their real interest; and do you know who are some of the great educators of our population in Lower Canada on the question of free-trade and protection? They were the Liberals of Quebec who, in the elections of 1872, denounced the late administration on not giving sufficient protection to the trade of the country, and in the election of 1874 held out as a great inducement for the support of the present Government that they would give protection to our industries. The great national party in Lower Canada which was to enter into an alliance with the dead party of Canada first in Ontario was favoured for several reasons, and first of all because they distrusted their old leaders and they considered a new policy was absolutely necessary, as their countrymen were expatriating themselves and going to the United States to find employment in the manufacturing districts. The platform and policy of that party was protection to our native industries. But something occurred. There was a gentleman in that party who was very much respected; in fact, he was the Nestor of the party. I allude to the hon. member for Chateaugay. That gentleman held free-trade principles, and it was absolutely necessary that the party should agree among themselves. The way they managed it was this: they agreed that they should not in speaking mention the word "protection" at all, nor should they put the word on their platform.

The hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska with others, when they delivered speeches did not mention the word "protection," but they said: "We must encourage our home industries." I will read a speech from the great Liberal Leader in Quebec, Mr. Joly, in 1872, delivered when he was laying the foundation of the National party. He was speaking of the expatriation of the French population of Lower Canada, and he said:

"I will tell you the reason why we have chosen that name. You must have seen in the House, and in the papers, that to attract a considerable immigration, an immigration advantageous to the country, it is necessary to encourage industry by all means possible. Everybody understands that our young men would not leave the country if they found here sufficient, not to indulge in luxuries, but to provide for their food and clothing."

These were the ideas of the party, but there was a little difficulty in the way; they said there is an objection to that, for if we carry out the protection policy with our American friends on the other side of the line, we shall get into trouble with England, so they invented another policy what they called a branch of the National policy, not political independence, but commercial independence of England, a Zollverein with the United States, and thereby create a most stringent protection against Great Britain. Mr. Speaker, I have the speech of another hon. gentleman, one of the leading members of the Liberal party, a gentleman who has made a most able speech in this House—I mean the hon. member for Megantic. Last year that hon. gentlemen delivered a most eloquent speech, in which he said that protection was absolutely necessary for our country; yet we all know how the hon. gentleman voted this year. I wish to read you a quotation from his speech.

He said, “He regretted he could not endorse the tariff of the Minister of Finance. . . . Instead of taxing tea and coffee, the articles we cannot produce, the Finance Minister should have placed his duties on articles which could have been manufactured among us, in which case not only would a revenue be secured, but our manufactures would have that protection which they needed.

“He especially dwelt on protection to our agricultural products, which were essential to the opening up of our country, and was the prelude to our embarking, as we should do, in manufactures. He combatted the arguments of the member for Bothwell; and with regard to the position of the United States, held that without protection it would never have been the country it to-day is.”

These are the educators of the people of the Province of Quebec! But that is not all, let us see what the Liberal press of Lower Canada—that great engine which spreads ideas throughout the world, and which sometimes educates people against their will. The L'Evenement, reproducing an article of another paper, says upon this subject:—

“What we require is a commercial policy thoroughly established and permanent, moderately protective with a guarantee that it will not be changed for a dozen years. Then we can invest with confidence our capital in the different sorts of industry suitable for this country. We would no longer import any of the articles you manufacture here. It would be absurd to cultivate pine apple as an article of commerce, and we should not permit our iron ore to be sent to the United States to be returned in the shape of manufactured articles.” The National, the organ of the new National party, has had so many articles on the subject, and has instructed the people so often in regard to this subject, that it is not necessary for me to cite them to you. I shall now quote to you an article of great influence which was published in the Bien Public, a few months ago, which is as follows:

“The resolutions adopted at a large meeting of manufacturers that has taken place lately in Toronto, ask for the tariff to be raised to 20 per cent. on all goods coming from England and Ireland that can be manufactured in Canada, and that on all articles coming from the United States and other countries Canada should impose equal duties to those imposed on Canadian products going into the United States and other foreign countries. We accept these resolutions, and do not hesitate to say that that should be the programme of every Government having at heart the prosperity of the country. It is this that everybody requires except certain political men who sacrifice practice to theory. The hon. Mr. Mackenzie has happily said the tariff should be modified in the Canadian interest, and we are sure he will keep his word.

Now, Sir, it will probably be said that these gentlemen are in favour of protection, but that they believed 17½ per cent. was enough. I have shown the member for Megantic did not believe 17½ was enough, and I can tell these gentlemen that if they wish to protect the manufacturing industry of the country they must impose such duties as would protect the manufacturer in a proper way, and enable him to compete with the foreign manufacturer. If this is not done the tariff will be a mere burden on the people of the country. The manufacturers have been heard and a Committee has reported unanimously that a 20½ per cent. tariff was required.

The Conservative party is not responsible for the disappointment that exists to day. The Liberal party is, and my hon. friend the Prime Minister is primarily responsible for the whole thing. He is responsible on account of his changed tone since he came back from England, for raising the hopes of merchants which have been thwarted. The member for Montreal West took great responsibility on himself when he asserted to the people of Montreal that we would have protection, and he is bound to tell the people of Montreal the grounds on which he based his assertion by means of which he secured the confidence of his constituents.

In the face of the present situation what had the Government done? The Hon. Finance Minister admitted that there was great depression in the country, but stated that it was not so great as the depression of 1857. He also admitted that the manufacturers were suffering, and gave as his reason for this the fact that the Canadian market had become the slaughter market for United States goods. He admitted more than that—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! no!

Mr. MASSON—He admitted there was a deficit. Instead of indicating the proper way to remedy this deficit to stop our market from being flooded with American goods, the hon. gentleman stands still and says the situation must cure itself. He says he will not interfere with the tariff, because the depression is monetary, and will disappear in a few years. The only way to relieve the present depression is that which should suggest itself to every public man, and which is hinted at by Sir A. T. Galt in his letter to Mr. Ferrier; namely, the pushing forward of the public works we are bound to construct. I admit if you go into public works which are not required, of course it would be wrong; but if the Government believed this crisis was momentary, it was their duty to have increased the estimates for the public works so that the labouring classes might have been provided with work. The result of their policy will be to drive our labourers as well as our mechanics away from the country.

It has been said that the existing depression is not of so serious a nature as that which existed in 1857. Then we had a Conservative Government in power, and a statesman at the head of the finances of the nation second to none in the Dominion. What was the action of the Government under those circumstances? The revenue of the country had fallen off from $4,675,000 in 1854 to $3,365,000 in 1853, and was not sufficient for the wants of the country. The Government remodelled the tariff, raising it to twenty per cent. And the result was a considerable increase in the revenue. By the year 1859-60, the revenue was raised $4,556,000, and the following year, 1860-61, it was $4,760,000. Results are better than theory, and if the Government adopted the same means to-day they would get the same result. A strong opposition was offered to the action of the Government by English capitalists in England, who pretended that the colonies should be nothing else but a market for their manufactures. Sir Alexander Galt in response to the opposition of the English capitalists, said that we were not making a tariff detrimental to English manufacturers, but that we were making one irrespective of England, and to meet our requirements similar Opposition was offered on the part of the United States, and a similar answer was returned to the opposition from that quarter. What does Sir A. T. Galt say of the tariff of 1859? By that tariff, the interests of the country had been enhanced, our manufactures created, and the great grievances of the Americans against it was that it fostered the interests of the country and ruined the manufacturing interests of the frontier towns in the United States. In reference to this subject, it was said in 1862:—

“The injury this inflicted upon our people is avowed by the Hon. A. T. Galt, the Financial Minister of Canada, to be ‘no subject’ of regret to the Canadian Government. The tariff of which Mr. Galt speaks with so much complacency extinguished the trade of our frontier cities with Canada in their own manufactures. Many manufacturing establishments on our side dismissed their workmen, and were closed; and many were removed to Canada in order to avoid the payment of duty on their productions. It can create no surprise that much indignation was excited, without exception, in all those cities on the Canadian frontier, which are daily and hourly witnesses of the one-sided nature of our dealings with Canada in the products of American labour.”

Then referring to Buffalo, it goes on to say:—

“Many of her citizens and those of Rochester also have been compelled by the Canadian tariffs to leave their homes and remove their families to Canada.”

Now, I ask if all this is not better than piling up figures and discussing things from a purely theoretical point of view, as my hon. friend from Bothwell will probably do in a few moments.

The Conservatives have been reproached because they did not give protection themselves. I have shown the only protective tariff we have had in Canada was framed by them. Since that time Confederation has taken place. The people of the Lower Provinces were accustomed to a lower tariff, and we were told under the new system our affairs would be so managed that we would have plenty of money in our treasury. The people of the Maritime Provinces were not willing, to consent to any increase of duty.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—Hear! hear!

Mr. MASSON—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but I want him to understand that if we have a deficit to-day it is not due as he stated to the Pacific Railway, because there is not an inch of it built. Two years ago we had to raise $3,000,000 and we have a deficit again. We have had to build the Intercolonial Railway, and if we wish to extend a railway to Louisburg, build St. Peter's Canal, to deepen the harbours, build lighthouses, and to construct the Baie Verte Canal—if they want money expended among themselves they must help us to raise it. I mistake the spirit of the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick if they will not do so. A protective tariff has not been needed very badly until now. We have had the civil war and high priced labour in the United States as a protection in the past; we have had a full treasury, and there was no deficit until the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. There is no better proof of this than the fact that the Committee appointed in 1872 to investigate the question of protection, reported that the manufacturers of the country were not on the whole in an unsatisfactory condition. Nevertheless, they thought a tariff of twenty per cent. would better enable them to build up their industries. If a tariff of twenty per cent. was necessary then, where there was no such depression as we have now, I ask if we do not require it far more to-day? The greatest enemies of incidental protection or modified free-trade for this country are not the American or English manufacturers, but the abstract-theory gentlemen who have formed their opinions in England, and fancy we should, under different circumstances adopt a free-trade policy here. As far as our manufactures are concerned, we are in our infancy and require protection. As long as countries are situated in different conditions, so long will we have different systems of political economy. If I were in England I would be a Free-Trader, and I would advise the Colonies to confine themselves to the production of the raw material; to send them to the mother country to be worked up there and returned to the colonists with the bill of cost for transportation both ways, and the cost of manufacture. But the reason for which the Free-Traders of England, in their own interest, advise us to adopt a free-trade policy should induce us to be Protectionists. The very fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are driven to defend their policy by quoting from American authorities, is a proof we need protection. The policy of the Conservative Party, as laid down by the right hon. member for Kingston, is to so remodel our tariff as to give to our rising manufactures that protection to which they are entitled, and we are ready to go before the country and put that in contradistinction to the policy of the Premier who said in England we should so adjust our tariff as to foster the trade relations with England and foreign countries.

Mr. BROUSE—I do not desire to give a silent vote on this motion. I heartily approved of the motion of the hon. member for Montreal West, and cordially gave it my support. The manufacturing industries of this country are depressed, and I felt it was the duty of the Government to foster them in their infancy, but the agricultural and manufacturing interests are not necessarily twin brothers, though they go side by side a certain distance. One can profit by protection, the other be benefitted by free-trade with the whole world.

The hon. member for Terrebonne said results are far better than theories. Let us see what the results have been in Central Canada. I represent a constituency in part manufacturing and in a greater part agricultural. I believe the great wealth of our Dominion lies in agriculture, and that it should be protected, but not in the way proposed by the hon. member for Kingston. How can you protect the farmers by placing a duty on the products of the soil? Take the sixty miles along the St. Lawrence from Brockville to Cornwall, in which are situated besides those towns, Prescott and Morrisburg. I have the United States Consul's certificate of all the produce sent from this part of Canada to the United States and ascertained how much returns. This section of Ontario in the fall, winter and spring is flooded with Americans who come here to purchase products of the soil. I find, from the districts to which I have referred, we export butter to the United States as follows:—

1874.....	1,668,400	"

We exported cattle as follows:—

1872.....	1,289
1873.....	4,300
1874.....	9,500

We sent of calf skins to the United States in 1872.....	69,000

1874.....	40,000

Along the St. Lawrence, and particularly in Stormont, probably more eggs are collected for foreign markets than in any part of Canada. We sent to the United States in 1872.....	1,324,000	dozen

1873.....	1,125,000	"
1874.....	1,116,000	"

We raise hops largely in Grenville County. We sent to the United States in

1872.....	114,000	pounds
1873.....	60,000	"
1874.....	36,000	"

We sent of pelts to the United States in 1872.....	26,000

1874.....	132,000

Poultry is one article we export largely to the United States We sent in

1872.....	126,000	pounds
1873.....	130,000	"
1874.....	233,000	"

Mr. BROUSE.

Of sheep we exported, in 1872.....	61,000

1874.....	47,000

We sent in 1874, of hay, 4,500 tons, of oats, 30,000 bushels, and of rye, 24,000 bushels. In 1872, from those four little towns I have mentioned, we sent $3,332,000 worth of farming products to the United States markets; in 1873, we sent $4,625,000 worth; in 1874, we sent $3,517,000 worth; and in 1875, notwithstanding the hard times, we sent nearly $3,000,000 worth. Let us turn to the other side, and see how we could protect our farmers. Let us put large duties on these articles. A drover comes here, pays $2 for a lamb and takes it to the United States. He pays $3 for a permit, and half a dollar gold in duty. Now, instead of protecting our farmers by increased duties we should attempt to get that market thrown open for their products. The farmer would get $2.50 for the lamb which he now sells for $2. This motion of the right hon. member is mere clap-trap, intended to catch a few supporters of the Government, and I do not think he believes in the policy he proposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman had better keep that speech for the Senate.

Mr. BROUSE—If I were in the Senate I would make the same speech even if the hon. gentleman were there too. In 1875 the whole Province of Ontario received from the United States only $680 worth of butter; in the same year we sent from the town of Prescott alone to United States markets $175,000 worth of the same article. Then, in the matter of sheep, this Province imported just three. The right hon. gentleman should demand protection or our sheep.

Now there are only three articles that come into Canada which can compete with Canadian agricultural produce—wheat, corn and pork. I understood the mover of the resolution before the House to say a duty should be placed on wheat. We have magnificent water power in this country along the Welland Canal, the Longue Sault and the Lachine Canal; these are leased to manufacturers who bring wheat from the West into the country without paying duty on it, manufacture it and send it out to be sold. Would you shut up these manufactories by taxing wheat and preventing it from coming into Canada? We enjoy the advantages of it passing through the country; advantages we would not enjoy if that policy was carried out. I understand something about corn; the mover would tax it, and what would be the effect? We cannot raise corn enough to feed our manufacturing interests here, and for distillery purposes. There was another manufacturing industry which the hon. member forgot when he was endeavouring to build up these interests; I refer to the starch manufacture, which we should protect. We have three establishments to-day in Canada, one of which is in the County of Grenville, and it uses 600 bushels of grain per day. Although the corn used in this manufacture comes into the country, yet the Americans come in with their starch and successfully compete against it until they compel the Canada starch works to close.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Hear! hear!

Mr. BROUSE—This is an industry I would protect. The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," and I say "hear, hear." Let us protect that interest, but if you place a duty on grain that comes in here, where in the name of heaven will you protect it?

An Hon. Member—Put it on starch.

Mr. BROUSE—There is already a duty of two cents per pound on starch.

An Hon. Member—Let us put on four cents.

Mr. BROUSE—Notwithstanding this specific duty of two cents on every pound they sell it in Kingston delivered cheaper than Canada starch.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Supposing corn was delivered in the starch manufactory in bond?

Mr. BROUSE—I follow out the hon. gentleman's argument when he says facts are better than theories, and I am not going to talk theory. The fact is that starch costs $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents of our money, and it costs 6 cents to manufacture it in Canada without a duty on corn. I cannot understand how you are to tax a material brought into the country to be manufactured and yet protect the manufactured article. This to me is absurd, and I bring forward this argument to show that it is wrong to say that this House or the Government should tax corn brought in for that legitimate purpose. In another direction that corn is heavily taxed, as it is used largely in the manufacture of whiskey, and there is a duty on whiskey of 25 cents per gallon. Will you tax it any farther? Can you? You can make a beam so large that by its own weight it will break; that is the law of nature; and are you going to tax raw material and then tax the manufactured article to such an extent as to prevent its being manufactured? It seems to me to be absurd to talk about protecting the manufacturing interests of the country unless you throw open the American markets and allow our farmers to take their produce from there and sell it where they can get the largest price. I think I heard the hon. gentleman say there was no possibility of getting this privilege. Let me tell him that there was a time when he had the lever that would have opened the markets of the United States—our fisheries that he gave away. This I regret, and had he brought a resolution stating that he regretted exceedingly that the only lever we had to open the American markets was no longer within our power because of himself, he would have acted more properly. When I heard the hon. gentleman struggling to make his remarks it reminded me of a man trying to ride two horses without any reins. As long as the horses go together it is all right, but they come at length to where there is a cross road, and one wants to go one way, and the other wants to go the other way, and he is in great perplexity because he cannot ride them both. These industries go side by side for a certain distance, and then they diverge, one wanting protection, and the other free trade.

Mr. LAURIER—The hon. member for Terrebonne having made allusion to me in his remarks, I thought it advisable to give my own views on the subject. Still, I feel diffident about expressing myself, being hardly competent to deal with the question. However, since my hon. friend has chosen to do so, I presume that I can express my own feelings better than he can. What my hon. friend has said as to my protective proclivities are perfectly true, and I do not deny that I have been a Protectionist, which I am still. I differ with my hon. friend in this, and to-night I will give my vote against the motion. I am a Protectionist as well as the hon. member. I am a moderate Protectionist; he is an extreme Protectionist.

Mr. MASSON—No! no!

Mr. LAURIER—The difference between us is, that he wants the tariff increased, and further burdens put on the people, whereas I believe that we have already enough burdens. Perhaps my hon. friend will say that I am not consistent, but I claim that I am more consistent than he is. I am not at all surprised to see that he is an extreme political economist. He belongs to a party extreme in every way—extreme politically, socially and religiously.

An Hon. Gentleman—Hear! hear!

Mr. LAURIER—Many hon. members say "hear, hear," and perhaps my remarks touched ground. I want to set myself right on the question involved in this matter. The hon. member for Terrebonne tells me that the question is one of free trade versus protection. He says that the question of free trade versus protection is a matter political as well as economical. It is asserted by many, and assumed by others, that free trade is a Liberal principle, and protection a Conservative principle. I beg to dissent from this doctrine. I see nothing political about it; it is purely a matter of social economy. If we turn to the history of both parties in any country where the English language, or British institutions are in existence, or even attempted to be established, we find that this matter has even been treated from a purely economical and not a political point of view. It is true that the Liberal party of England is the father of freedom in trade as well as of liberty, not only in England but in the world at large. It is also true that free-trade was carried in England through political action, and that its introduction was opposed by the Conservatives on political and economical grounds; but it is equally true that since free-trade has been in operation in England, and its beneficent results have been fully experienced by that country, the Conservative party has abandoned its former prejudices, so that at present both parties are a unit in this connection. From Great Britain we cross the Channel, and we find the Liberal party in France divided on the question. When I speak of this party I do not mean the body of hot-headed men who, lacking sound principles, convictions and political opinions, assume, but do not deserve, the name, and who have thrown France into revolution after revolution; but I mean that great body of patriotic men who, at the time of the disastrous war of 1871, attempted by every constitutional means (and by such means alone) to endow France with free institutions, acknowledging as their leaders Thiers, Gambetta and Say, who are divided in opinion on the question of free-trade and protection.

While Thiers is an intense Protectionist, Gambetta and Say are both Free-Traders. As to the Conservatives of France I cannot say what their opinion is on the matter, nor am I aware they have any. The Conservatives of France, and the great body of the Conservatives of Lower Canada, do not trouble themselves with these matter-of-fact questions. They chiefly concern themselves about saving their own souls and cursing the souls of other people. From the old world we come to this continent. In the United States the Liberal party is intensely protectionist and the Conservative or Democratic party intensely free-trade. If at last we come to our own country, we must be compelled to say, from the many discussions we have had, the Liberal party is far from being a unit on this subject. We have consistent and lifetime Liberals on both sides. As to the Conservatives, I am not aware until very recently that the party had a policy on the question, at least their leaders never avowed any. It is true from what we have seen in the House, that the great mass of the party seems to be protectionist, but is equally true they have only within two or three days come to adopt that policy openly, probably in justification of the well-known and now famous saying that a political party, like a fish, is moved by its tail. All this I will prove. The question of free-trade and protection is not to be applied in any country to political motives, but is to be treated simply as a matter of pure economy, and its solution depends entirely on the condition of the country. It cannot be denied that free-trade or protection is to be applied according to the necessities of a nation. If the view of the subject that free-trade must be the ultimate policy of any nation be taken, it yet cannot be denied that protection is a matter of necessity for a young nation, in order that it may attain the full development of its own resources. I conceive the most obstinate Conservative must admit that freedom is the natural condition of trade, as of everything human; and the most obstinate Liberal must also allow, that though it would never do to build a Chinese wall around our country in order to cut us off from the outside world, yet sometimes it is both wise and prudent to establish on our frontiers a few detached forts to protect our territory against foreign invasion. Therefore I can agree with my hon. friend from Terrebonne, that the question as to the adoption of free-trade and protection altogether depends on the condition of the country which may be in question. If I were in Great Britain I would avow free-trade, but I am a Canadian born and resident here, and I think that we require protection. But to what extent do we need it? In this relation it is that I am not in agreement with my hon. friend. He holds that the tariff should be increased in order to preserve our manufactures from the injurious effects of foreign competition; but my hon. friend should remember that protection means taxation, which is a burden on the people, and the price a young a vigorous nation must consent to pay in order to rid itself of the yoke of a more wealthy nation. I consider, however, that the present tariff affords sufficient protection. It may be said that this was not the real object in view, but I care little for the motive—I only regard the results.

We have at the present time a 17½ per cent tariff, which is protection for Canadian manufacturers against foreign competition. But that is not all. Against the English competitor he has the difference of freight in his favor, and against the American competitor he has the difference in the price of labour. But notwithstanding all that amount of protection, we are told it is necessary to increase it. Has any evidence been adduced to support that proposition? I have listened attentively to what has been said in its favour, and the summing up of the argument has been that the country is in a depressed condition. But is the depression under which we are now suffering the consequence of our present tariff, or has it been proved that by a change in the tariff it would have been relieved or alleviated? There is not a tittle of evidence to that effect. The answer given is this: That the depression is not particular to this country, but is universal and affects highly protected as well as free-trade countries. Then will it be pretended that an increase in the tariff will restore prosperity? Hon. gentlemen opposite have gone sentimental over the question. They have said factories are closed or working on half-time, and that thousands of men are out of employment in the cities. All this may be true, but suppose we had a high tariff? The result would be the same, and we would be even in a worse position than we are now—in the same position as the manufacturers of the United States are. With the thousands of men out of employment, 25 per cent would be added to the necessaries of life, and there would be more suffering.

Let us go still further. Suppose we should have the legislation sought, we would be no better situated than we are under a moderate tariff. The United States have a high tariff, and are suffering even worse than we, and the remedy proposed there is a decrease in duties. It would be extremely unfair, unjust and even dangerous if we were to take the present condition of things as a basis to frame legislation.

It would be legislating for exceptions and from exceptions. Let us take the normal condition of our fiscal policy; let us look at the year preceding the crisis. It is admitted on all hands the country was then prosperous, and does not that prove that our policy is sound? But let us take a still better criterion. We are said to be suffering from a great wrong. It is the advantage of the constitutional system under which we live that either party may rid the country of any wrong. Is it to be supposed that if we had a grievance in this regard, the parties would have remained silent? The fact that we have had a moderate tariff so long without complaints is the best evidence of its benefits.

There is another argument which has not been answered. We have had many changes in the tariff since the adoption of our fiscal policy 20 years ago, but the manufacturers never made any complaints until the crisis came some eighteen months ago. Since then this agitation commenced, and the cry of a retaliatory policy was raised. Manufacturers say: "If the Americans close their markets against us, we should close ours against them." But this is not a protection but a free-trade argument. It means simply: "Give us fair play; give us fair competition." If this argument proves anything, it is that we are ready and strong enough at this moment to cast off protection and to meet the Americans on an equal footing.

I presume that the argument that Americans slaughter goods in this country is very much exaggerated. I noticed last summer that those who were loudest in the denunciations of American productions were the manufacturers of boots and shoes at Montreal, although the imports to the Dominion did not amount to a quarter of a million per annum. But even suppose the case to be such as presented, what should we do to remedy it? Should we follow the course suggested by our hon. friends opposite, and establish the American tariff in this country? That policy would not be to the benefit of the consumer, because the member for Terrebonne admitted himself that the cost of living under it would be increased 20 per cent. Then, what would be the position of the manufacturer? He would have the privilege of offering goods in the United States markets just as they slaughter their productions in ours.

I said at the commencement of my remarks that I was in favor of protection, but I do not understand protection as my hon. friend understands it. I take it that we should have a tariff that will commence by taxing the raw material. If the policy of my hon. friend were carried out, wheat would be taxed; he knows perfectly well that the Province of Quebec is not a wheat-producing country, and he would have to levy a tax on every farmer in the Province. I am sure that is not what he is aiming at, but he cannot deny this may be the result of the policy which he proposes. We have within ourselves the ability to create an industry. If it be shown that we cannot maintain it, unless by legislation either in the way of premium or prohibitory tariff, then I should be ready to take that into consideration, but I shall never vote for a proposition of the kind now before the House, that every article of consumption in the Dominion should be taxed.

Mr. MOUSSEAU—Explanations are necessary after the speech of my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska to-night, and his vote on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Montreal West. Everybody knows what has passed, and notably in connection with the local elections of 1875, and the federal elections of 1872 and 1874. Each one of the hon. gentlemen is familiar with what passed in his own Province, and also what occurred in Quebec. In that Province the cry for protection commenced in 1871 at the time of the local elections, although it was a question which came more under the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. The Liberals of Quebec began to agitate this matter, not only at the time of the local election, but even in the Local House during the session of December, 1871. They said at that time, and repeated later in 1872 that the Province of Quebec was much behind the other Provinces in progress, and that this was due to the bad policy of the Conservative leaders, who should have granted protection twenty-five years previously. These gentlemen delivered magnificent speeches, full of fine and patriotic sentiments, and mourned the fate of the exiled French Canadians, whom they stated were exiled owing to the inefficient policy of Sir George Cartier and the right hon. member for Kingston, and that the omissions of these gentlemen in this respect had brought the Province into a state almost of misery.

Mr. Speaker, the elections of 1871 were conducted on this cry, and at that time they were in a position to do so in the province. They had at least the air of sincerity in what they said, and after the elections they continued to advocate this matter even in the House. Quebec was not the proper place to discuss the subject. They knew that the question should have been brought up in Ottawa, if it was their intention to produce any efficacious results on behalf of the interests they pretended to be desirous to serve. They named a Committee in 1871 at the autumn session of the Quebec Parliament, when several young Liberals of talent took their seats. The electors carried them on their shoulders into the Legislative halls, and in the midst of these remarkable young men was the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska. He was then as now an extreme Protectionist, but he did not advocate the cause of protection at that time with free-trade arguments. Then he pleaded protection with arguments which were perhaps sincere, but at all events they had the colour of common sense. I think that the House will not object if I quote from the speeches delivered by this hon. member at that important time. In 1871 the Province of Quebec as well as other provinces was not suffering from depression in trade; nevertheless the Liberals who arrived at Quebec in greater numbers than they ever were before came full of the idea that they were about to regenerate the country, as they have since done at Ottawa. The Liberals of Quebec, who thought they were called upon to regenerate that province in its Parliament, made very fine speeches in the debate on the Address. The most significant, the best and the most eloquent speech of all—one which I recommend to the attention of the House, one of which I cordially approve, one which all Quebec admired, and which it would now approve much more than the speech the hon. member delivered this evening—came from the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska. The speech was delivered on the 9th of November, 1871. The addresses proposing and seconding the reply to the Speech from the Throne, as was customary, painted matters in very bright colours, but this did not suit the hon. member. He had reflected in his closet over the ills of this country, and here was the result as he announced it to the House:—

“Whoever has studied the situation of the country elsewhere than upon paper, and from the depths of his heart; whoever has been able to closely witness the condition of our agricultural and commercial interests, vacillating and timid, and our industries in a backward condition, must say the brilliant description of the mover and seconder of the Address is only a mere mirage and not a reality.” I do not doubt in the least that the speech was delivered with perfect sincerity, and it provoked the appointment of a Committee in the Quebec Parliament to inquire into the means for promoting the different industries of the Province. I am convinced that he had not reflected on this matter in his study; he had gone through the country as the good father of a family should, and studied the evils which existed, and that he arrived at Quebec with all the remedies necessary to rescue that Province from its unfortunate condition. He found our agriculture behind the requirements of the age, our commerce unventuresome and hesitating, and our industry not so advanced as it should be. This was in 1871, when he considered the Province to be in a great state of suffering, and he was of opinion that the remedy was protection. Those unfortunate leaders, the right hon. member for Kingston and the late lamented Sir George Cartier, had dragged the country almost to ruin, at the sacrifice of our most sacred interests; by their unpatented policy in failing to grant protection they had forced French

Canadians to leave the country. He also said: "They tell us we are rich and prosperous. Is this really the case? With regard to all classes of society, the trader, the banker, the merchant, the member of the Liberal professions, the agriculturist, the simple artisan, and everywhere, without exception you will discover an indubitably unhealthy condition, a state of languishment and suffering which proves there is an evil somewhere." I have never heard since that, nor since I have paid attention to public affairs, of a speech that was so much admired. These were his views: "The principle cause of the evils from which we suffer is that up to the present the production of the country has not been equal to the consumption." This was essentially a Protectionist argument, an argument in every way worthy of the hon. member's patriotism, which induced him to seek for such a length of time for the real cause of these evils. "The Ministry could, with so much more propriety, admit that it has not alone to bear the consequent responsibility, but this responsibility rests upon the entire nation." Upon this I must pay a very high compliment to my hon. friend. He was more just at Quebec than in his speech on the hustings. For outside the walls of the Legislature they did not fear or hesitate to hold responsible for this state of things the two honorable leaders who had so long, so brilliantly, and so successfully guided the destinies of the Conservative party and of the country. In fact, those who have followed somewhat closely the affairs of Quebec, if they look at the past, will understand that if there is fault to be found it falls upon the whole nation. An explanation for this pretended want of progress on the part of Quebec can be given. When that Province entered the Confederation, her people occupied a position in which no others of the Confederation were placed except perhaps the Acadians of the Lower Provinces. Hon. members from the other provinces and their journals were not sufficiently familiar with the condition of Quebec to make such accusations as they have levelled against it. After the conquest, which was not only glorious for England but raised her grandeur, when the full liberty enjoyed before was restored, the French people of the Province were deserted. They were not only poor, but had been decimated by war and the consequences which naturally follow. Those who had taken the lead in its affairs at the time returned to France to escape from the yoke of England, and they left the French Canadians alone with their priests to aid, educate and assist them. For a long time they fought for their own subsistence, and to preserve the shreds of the heritage that had been left them; and it is not surprising that fighting in the midst of poverty they did not make as much progress as the other provinces, which were peopled by a strong current of immigration. This explains why French Canadians are found in certain branches of material progress not so far advanced as those of the other Provinces, but in many things they at least occupy an equal position.

I will continue, Mr. Speaker, to quote from my hon. friend's speech. "It is humiliating to admit that after three centuries of existence this country cannot provide for its own necessities, and that, although nature has been so prodigal in its gifts to make it a manufacturing country, it is obliged to obtain its supplies from foreign markets." I am quite sure that at the time the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska was quite sincere, and I would not venture to doubt that to-day he is not so; but I suppose that since that date he has made progress. I heard his speech, and I wonder what new discoveries he has made to force him to change so thoroughly his opinions. Here we have the bouquet of the speech: "It is our duty, especially the duty of those of us who are of French Canadian origin, to create a national industry." Has the hon. gentleman so soon changed his views in this relation? It appears now that our industries are sufficiently protected, but then this was not at all the case. I cannot conceive by what mode of thought he has arrived at this conclusion. At that time he considered above everything it was the interest of the French Canadians to found and promote national industries, and in this way prevent the humiliation that wounded his patriotism in the fact that after 300 years of existence we had no Canadian industries. Well, Mr. Speaker, it appears that since 1871 he has made marvellous progress; he must have seen the Province covered with new industries and the advancement of the French Canadians, not only by a national industry but by industries sufficiently protected.

On the 6th of December of the same year this same patriotic gentleman, who was most prominent among the Liberals of Quebec in advocating protection to national industries, had something to do with this resolution:—"Moved by Mr. Gendron seconded by Mr. (now Senator) Trudel, that a special Committee be named to enquire as to the best means to be adopted in order to develop and advance industries in this Province, and this Committee be composed of Messrs. Chauveau, Robertson, Langevin, Cassidy, David, Eddy, Eisenhart, Fortier, La Rochelle, Laurier, Marchand, Mollieur, Roy, and the mover and seconder." This Committee which was to do such marvellous things under the aegis of the Liberals, sat for a long time in 1873 and 1874, in order to devise some specific remedy; but when it was on the point of giving birth to a project in this relation, the hon. member found the field of Quebec too restricted for his aspirations, and he came to Ottawa. This is not all. In 1872 the intensity of the excitement of, and the ardent heat shown at, the electoral contests will be remembered. Not only the material interests of the country were considered, but mixed up with this were the religious or national questions. The Liberals of Quebec, at the time called Grits, Reformers or Nationalists, conducted the campaign, mounted on three fierce war horses. The first was the question of Riel, who was the unfortunate object of the prosecution of my hon. friend for Hastings. The second was the New Brunswick School Question, in connection with which they charged the right hon. member for Kingston and the late Sir George Cartier with having trampled under foot and in a cowardly manner sacrificed the interests of the Catholics of that Province. The third is much more easily understood because much more apropos. They said that these unfortunate Conservative leaders had betrayed and destroyed the interests of Quebec in failing to grant protection at least twenty-five years ago. Permit me, young as I am in political life, to make a few reflections, which will, perhaps, be somewhat disagreeable to my hon. friend, in the interest of political morality and consistency. This hon. gentleman conducted the struggle against the Conservatives of Quebec on these three great questions, and God be thanked, in the interest of the country and political morality, that since they have been raised to power at Ottawa we are able to judge of their real value. You, Sir, have, been a witness of the debates in this House, and of their pusillanimous conduct with relation to these great questions. After having reproached and stigmatised the Conservatives in the strongest manner because Riel did not receive a complete, absolute and unconditional pardon, and after having reproached them bitterly for having sacrificed above all the interests of the Catholics in New Brunswick in connection with the school question—you are able to judge of the shameful way in which they have retreated from the positions they took. As I stated in commencing, they might have been sincere; I hope they were. It is possible that they recognized that Riel was not the holy man, the brave compatriot, they had represented him in 1871 and 1872. It is also possible they were very sincere upon another point, and they saw that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick did not so greatly merit their sympathies as they had previously supposed. One after another they bowed the knee to the Premier, and accepted the slap in the face which he has given them with due meekness. What has been the consequence? I have reason to draw the attention of the House to it in the interest of political morality and political honour.

They have been unable to reply to our criticisms with regard to their disgraceful proceedings, and the consequence has been that in all recent elections they have been swept out of public life in the most humiliating manner. I take this opportunity, without assuming to possess the gift of prophesy, to predict that owing to their vote on the motion of the hon. member for Montreal West, and if they pursue the same course with regard to the motion now before the House, at the next election they will be completely swept out of existence. I have no doubt that only ten or twelve will be permitted to return to mourn over the false position in which they are placed by the treachery of their predecessors. I am chagrined to notice the stand taken by the Government, which, if I merely considered the interests of my own party, I would observe with pleasure. But no, I am influenced by higher motives than mere party considerations. Since I have entered political life, I have not been inspired with the desire of gaining a party triumph merely on account of the dishonourable conduct of my opponents. I regret, therefore, the vote which they gave on the motion of my hon. friend for Montreal West, and which I fear they will record touching the motion of my right hon. friend for Kingston, which I am quite confident will achieve their political ruin. Those three war horses will be killed under them. Up to the present, I have cited the eloquent and patriotic speech of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska, but I will now quote the speech of another member of this House, my hon. friend for Megantic. These two gentlemen are political neighbours, and the latter is a young man of a great deal of talent. He contributes to the paper of which I have the honor of being part proprietor; hence I am well acquainted with his opinions. The hon. member for Megantic in 1873, and for a long time previous, was an advanced Protectionist.

My hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska, on the abolition of the double mandat, came to Ottawa, and since he has been obliged to follow the Premier as a leader, he has not been so violent on the question of protection. The hon. member for Megantic, who voted against the motion of my hon. friend from Montreal West, in January, 1873, wrote admirable letters on the question of protection, on which subject he was perfectly well informed, and wrote with extreme ability; and as it is very important to show what were then the views of the National party on this question of protection, I crave the indulgence of the House for making a few quotations. The hon. member ascribed the prosperity of the United States to protection, and their ability to diminish the debt contracted on account of the civil war at the rate of $100,000,000 a year. The hon. gentleman should give the necessary explanations on this point, and I hope he will do so, at least, to his constituents. In January, 1873, he wrote: "Parliament will soon open, and, without doubt, efforts will be made in order to obtain a modification of the tariff in the sense of protection." The hon member continues to refute in advance the argument of Mr. Mackenzie, and proceeds:—

"I conceive the difficulties which it is necessary for him to conquer; but, on the other hand, in taxing certain products exempted from imposts, the increase of consumption by the augmentation of population or the improved condition of our industries would produce as it seems to me sufficient compensation.

"This was beyond question proved to be the case in the United States, which have prospered while protecting their industries, and at the same time diminishing their debt incurred during the civil war at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, without taking the interest account into consideration. We have lost, owing to our unwise policy in this relation, 75,000 consumers, which benefit by their presence the American Republic, without regarding the foreign immigration, which our system obliges to pass through Canada, to settle over the border."

The hon. gentleman having ridiculed free-trade, states:—

"Our policy, in my opinion, should be protection for every manufacturer for which the raw material, with exemption from duties, or the levy of purely fiscal imports upon all foreign raw material, which we could advantageously manufacture; and low duties for every imported article which is to be consumed without being manufactured."

In February, 1873, the hon. gentleman wrote:—

"Protection by lessening our fifty millions of importations, would leave in the country a balance in our favour, from which everybody would benefit. But the class which would be benefited in the clearest and most general way, would be the agriculturists, aside from industries necessarily local, and ordinariness of minor importance. Certain manufacturing interests belong to us, or could be located amongst us with advantage; viz:—manufacturers of wood, iron, wool, cotton, cheese, beet-root sugar, &c., &c.

"If there is one of these in connection with which cheapness might be a principal consideration, it is the iron industry; nevertheless, the United States have sacrificed cheapness in this relation, in order to promote this important enterprise. As our position is somewhat identical with that of the United States, we have the same grounds for adopting such protection.

"If it is wished to form an idea of what has been the protection in the United States, let us hear what Henry Clay states as one of their great illustrations:—Protection has been for the United States the sheet-anchor of its prosperity, and the mainspring of its progress. The seven years which preceded the adoption of the protective tariff of 1824 have been most disastrous, while the seven years which have succeeded have been the most prosperous the United States have ever witnessed—protection for my country signifies prosperity."

I am convinced that the right hon. member for Kingston had read these articles previous to making his motion, which does not demand an extravagant protective tariff, but merely a readjustment of taxation; and I do not know how the hon. member can vote against such a resolution. I am confident indeed that the right hon. gentleman has secured a victory in this respect this evening.

I have cited these extracts, because they apply to two hon. members of this House, and if we peruse the columns of their organs of that day and read reports of speeches they delivered at the elections, we will see that these hon. gentlemen preached the same doctrine, not only with intelligence and force, but with a bitterness of sentiment against our unfortunate Conservative chiefs for having failed to grant them the protection desired. I ought to avow that brief as my political experience has been, I was astonished at the greater part of the speeches pronounced here in favour of free-trade. I was surprised that prominent men on the other side should be divided on this question. I had occasion to say, and I repeat it now, that political economy is only half a science. Apart from certain great social principles regarding the distribution of riches, it is not a science but only a matter of political expediency.

It is impossible to apply to the United States the doctrines or theories which are suitable to England, and vice versa; nor can we apply to France the doctrines which are adapted to Great Britain. It is also impossible that the doctrines of these three great countries can be applied to Prussia, Russia or Austria, and much less to a new country like ours. The reproaches the members of the opposite party have uttered against the Conservative leaders—I speak more particularly with reference to my hon. friends from Quebec—on this question of protection have not the slightest foundation, and for two reasons: in the first place it was impossible for a long time to speak of protection, because our country had been left without power, without strength, without resources, and without the capital necessary for its proper development; and it was natural that England in her turn sought to keep the colonies from developing their industries to her disadvantage. With that object a great number of Governors received private instructions urging them strongly to retard the too rapid growth of colonial industries. But when we became somewhat powerful and prosperous, England said to us, "now that you are strong enough you can take care of yourselves." And when she did so the corollary was that we received the full right to arrange our own taxation. In 1859 the movement commenced for the readjustment of the tariff on a protection basis. This wise step in the right direction was abandoned, as the hon. member for Terrebonne so clearly explained, in 1867, at the period of Confederation, to please the Maritime Provinces.

Permit me, at this point, to say to these friends from the Maritime Provinces that no Province in the Confederation was so liberal and so generous to them as Quebec on the occasion of the agitation for better terms. Everybody will remember what passed, and what violent opposition—the word is Parliamentary as well as correct—was raised to that proposition by the Reform party, led by the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, and this opposition was so strong and so factious that better terms could not have been voted if it had not been for the majority given by the Province of Quebec.

This action kept our good friends in the Lower Provinces from preventing the consolidation of Confederation, originated by our great statesman. We do not ask for thanks in politics, for our own interests rather than friendly sentiments govern our political actions. The gentlemen of Upper Canada stated at the time, with regard to the efforts of the then Opposition:—

“ You believe you have done a great thing with reference to better terms, but you have placed Confederation on the verge of revolution. The French Canadian peasants have exhibited enough intelligence to save the country even at the expense of an augmentation of their taxation.”

This is what a distinguished gentleman, whom I could name, says. I will not, however, refer to him by name, as he has retired from political life. Some speakers who have preceded me, cite the examples of France and England, but the prosperity of one has been ascribed to protection, and of the other to free-trade. This is exactly what I said a few minutes ago—in this Dominion, which is altogether under peculiar circumstances, which have nothing in common with these other great countries, these theories do not apply; gentlemen come into this House filled with the doctrines and principles in vogue in older countries, and which are not at all suited to our own. I say more, the science of free trade is altogether erroneous, and this system cannot by any means be universally applied with benefit. I heard the other day the hon. member for Montreal West tell us that protection in this country commenced in 1847-48, but the hon. member was quite astray there. This country has almost always had the advantage of enormous protection in favour of our agriculturists, due to the policy of England. Lower Canada at that time exported and sold grain at very high prices, and the French Canadians attained a greater degree of prosperity in proportion to the population than they now possess. What occurred later? The repeal of the Corn Laws. With the construction of great public works we received grain at Montreal from the Great West, and since we constructed our canals, notably the first, Chambly, grain was exported to the United States at great profit. Still later we had the benefits of the protection system, so that I can say that it was almost constant. We have had illustrations drawn from the state of things in England and France, and it is alleged that the nations have enriched themselves and reached the high degree of prosperity which they at present enjoy by means of free-trade. On the contrary, before they adopted free-trade principles, they had a system of protection to the extent, in certain particulars, not only of 20, 30 or 50 but even 100 per cent. France has made enormous sacrifices in order to protect her industries. They talk of the treaty of 1860 as having been a great step on the part of France towards free-trade, but the hon. gentlemen who make these statements are completely in error, for there is a list of products on which duties averaging 25 per cent are levied and another list averaging 30 per cent. Under the operation of this system the progress made has been so favourable that a large number of articles of steel which they had hitherto imported from England are now manufactured in France and exported to England. So it is with regard to the same kind of industry in the United States at this day. They said, “ we have coal and iron ore, as we have in this country—and consequently why should we not establish among ourselves steel and iron industries to as great an extent as in England?” What has been the result. Within a few months the system perfectly succeeded, and they not only make their own iron and steel in enormous quantities, by imposing heavy duties against foreign manufactures, but they compete with England successfully in her own market. The hon. members have cited the opinions of many political economists, but there is a gentleman who now occupies a distinguished position in this connection. The gentleman I refer to is Mons. Thiers, who drew France from the frightful disasters into which Napoleon plunged her. Under M. Thiers France paid off six millions of her indemnity in two years. What does the great statesman say in this regard? Here is his statement:

"I understand that hesitation is shown respecting the development of certain industries in the country; but what I do not comprehend is that when they are developed, they let them perish.

"We are told that we wish an industry en serre chaude. Which are the nations that have endeavored to develop their labouring interests? They are free and intelligent peoples.

"When a foreigner brings them a product they seek to imitate it; and nations which lack this desire are the indolent peoples of the East. Intelligent and free nations strive to appropriate to themselves the products which foreigners bring into their territories."

The example of England is constantly cited. This is the example which this great and intelligent nation has given us: During the 14th, 15th and 16th centuries the Brabaneons possessed fine woollen industries. England, which received these products said, as soon as she woke up to her position: "With my wool these goods are made. I have the labour, the intelligence and the raw material, and this is foreign labour which is supplying my wants." She accordingly kept her wools, established her own manufactures, and then began the great prosperity of England. Is that barbarism? Did England soon abandon this system? Only a few years ago, merely for the purpose of securing flourishing linen industries, did she not adopt protective tariffs, forbid the exportation of the machinery, and give premiums to the Irish peasants, in order to encourage the cultivation of flax? History shows that not America alone has adopted tariffs in order to develop native industries; but English colonies, Canada and Australia, have had recourse to the most vigorous protective policy against even their mother country, in order to establish their industries on a firm basis. India herself, with a colony of 500,000 Englishmen settled on her territory, has framed tariffs to encourage manufactures; and Mr. Wentworth Dilke repeats, in connection with this fact, the words which Western America pronounces with pride: "An agricultural should become a manufacturing people. Something else is necessary beside the flourishing seaports of New York and Boston, the prosperous interior cities of Cincinnati and Chicago; and to obtain these, it is necessary through a protective system to exclude foreign products." And, nevertheless, Mr. Wentworth Dilke is a Free-Trader in England, for he understands that what is suitable for one country is not suitable for all; and that free trade is not the law of the world.

These same opinions the Liberals advocated in the strongest manner at the elections of 1871, 1872 and 1874, and upon which they will be judged by the country. I now come to the consideration of the speech of my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska, and I confess that I have rarely seen an advocate pleading a bad case reveal, at the same time, more audacity than the hon. member. What astonished me the most was to hear the hon. member declare that he had always been and was still a Protectionist, and immediately afterwards make a free-trade speech to prove what?—that protection is hurtful to the country. But he has not given a single reason to explain the change apparent in his views within so brief a period as the last few years. He complains that if the tariff was raised, too onerous burdens would be imposed upon the people of Quebec. This argument seems to me to be neither of much weight nor courageous. Having advocated the principle for several years which he now condemns, and having thus raised the expectations of the people in this connection, through their speeches and other articles in the press, these hon. gentlemen now aver that what they have so powerfully contended for would be detrimental for the country. But the right hon. gentleman from Kingston does not ask for an augmentation of the peoples' burthens, and for what reason then do the hon. members on the Ministerial side of the House—Liberals who hold that Conservatives should have granted protection 25 years ago—for what reason do they say that this proposition frightens them so greatly? The right hon. gentleman is simply desirous of obtaining a readjustment of the tariff, and this would be perfectly possible under the circumstances—and especially with the assistance of such an able Finance Minister as the gentleman who delivered the extremely eloquent speech to which we listened the other day. Certain hon. members have gone so far as to insult the great manufacturing interests of the country by treating them as beggars asking for charity instead of demanding justice. The hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska made an extremely grave accusation against the member for Terrebonne, stating that he was not only an extreme Protectionist but an extreme Catholic. This is a very serious charge, and the second accusation is worthy of the first.

Only a few months ago the journals of this Liberal-Grit-National-Reform Party proclaimed with a flourish of trumpets that the hon. member for Terrebonne was extremely liberal in his sentiments, and was even working against the interests of the Catholic Church, alluding to a position he was said to have taken in connection with clerical influence at elections. They then universally asserted that he was the most liberal and moderate of all Conservatives, but to-day there is a wonderful change. He was also said, at St. Croix, where were present a great many members of the opposite party, to have almost spoken against the Church, and the Liberals then intimated that it was possible to coalesce with him. They made an advance in this connection. If he had desired it, he could probably have obtained the position of the Hon. President of the Council. An hon. member has remarked that the tail moves the head of a political party. We had an illustration of this last week on the occasion of an important motion. The Liberals allied themselves against the President of the Council because a wretched Conservative, who was the editor of a miserable Conservative journal, had obtained a contract which might give a profit of $100 a year. The hon. members of this House who claim this patronage implied that if the Hon. President of the Council did not cancel the contract he would be compelled to leave the Cabinet, thereby bringing about a humiliation extremely painful and disagreeable and most dishonourable for the Government and the Parliament. I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen, coming from the Province of Quebec, could have changed their opinions to so remarkable an extent within the past few years. They now come and intimate that they were not properly acquainted with the subject with which they were treating when they demanded a re-adjustment of the tariff for the protection of our tariff.

I exceedingly regret that public men, who are perhaps intended to conduct the destinies of Canada, and perhaps to replace the President of the Council and other members of the Cabinet, should have treated so important a subject with such levity as to come before the hon. members of this House, and say that really they did not understand the matters concerning which they formerly spoke. I hope that hon. members will forget their party prejudices, and remember that there are subjects which are of more importance than mere party interests—the great interests of the country. I am convinced that my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska, having reflected more deeply over the question, will adopt a different course; also that the hon. member for Megantic will retrace his steps, and that apologising to their constituents and their country for their late expressions of opinion, both hon. gentlemen will cast their votes in favour of my right hon. friend's motion.

Mr. FLEMING moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would prefer if this motion could be decided at once. If there was to be an adjournment of the debate it must proceed on Monday. The right hon. gentleman had moved a resolution of want of confidence, and the Government must know whether they had the confidence of the House or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if the debate were adjourned it could only be resumed, according to the Rules of the House, on Tuesday, unless the House unanimously consented to proceed with it on Monday. This might not be a motion of want of confidence unless the Premier considered it one.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was afraid he would have to consider it a want of confidence motion, though he might weather it, and the debate must proceed on Monday. This had been the practice of the right hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it had been the invariable practice of the right hon. member when he was Leader of the Government to insist on such motions being discussed to the exclusion of all other business until a vote was reached. It was the uniform practice in England.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was not the practice in England, and never had been. The hon. gentleman ought to know better, and there was no excuse for his statement. The practice in England was this—the Government might, and sometimes did, refuse to go on with any Government business until such motions were decided, but they never deferred private business.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he understood some motions which were attacks on the Government policy went over to Government days, but not a serious one like this, which, if carried, would have the effect of displacing them. The hon. gentleman knew it was quite immaterial to him personally whether the debate would be continued on Monday or Tuesday, because he would not be present either day, but he thought his view was the sound one. He was under the impression if he were to move that the debate be continued on Monday, it would be quite in order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said no rule of this House could be altered without due notice, or there might as well be no rules at all. If there were a universal consent of course the agreement of all parties would set aside the rule. In the interest of free discussion and a free Parliament, the minority had a right to insist upon the rules of the House being carried out.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. member had better add to his motion that it be the first order of the day on Monday.

Mr. FLEMING—Moved that the debate be adjourned until Monday.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I object to an addition to a motion which I have seconded. I hope the Government will not press this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER—When the Government declare they regard any motion as want of confidence, it has been usual to continue the debate without interruption, but whether any member has an object is another matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that if the debate should be continued on Monday, Tuesday should be given to the private members.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not consent to this.

After some further discussion Mr. Speaker said it was the custom to give precedence to want of confidence motions, but he could see no rule for it. This seemed to be an exceptional case. Usually the Opposition wanted to press a motion of want of confidence, and facilities were given by the Government for the discussion.

The motion to adjourn the debate was carried, and the House adjourned at Fifteen minutes past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 13, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—To amend the charter of the St. Lawrence Bank, and change the name of said Bank.

MOTIONS OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. SPEAKER—I have looked more carefully into the question raised on Friday last, and as it is a matter of some importance, I think it is my duty to explain the reasons which strengthen my decision. I found in the first place that Mr. Todd had already a note on the subject attached to his very valuable work, in which, indeed, he does not treat this point directly at all. His note is this:—"It is usual to give priority over other business to a formal motion of want of confidence, but not to a resolution embodying a less direct expression of opinion adverse to the policy of Ministers, however seriously such a motion may be regarded in its ultimate consequences." This is a note prepared some time ago by Mr. Todd, which I found in his work. I think, however, there is some reason to doubt whether that note does distinctly and fully express even the practice of the House of Commons. I find in May, 1841, when Sir Robert Peel moved what is known as the first direct motion of want of confidence in the Ministry of the day, after a very lengthy debate on the subject, when the time came for an adjournment (the debate took place on a Thursday) Sir Robert Peel instead of claiming as a matter of right that it should proceed on the following Wednesday (the House adjourned over to that day), put it to the leader of the House, Lord John Russell, asking him whether it could not be arranged that the debate should proceed on the next day. Lord John Russell's reply was in substance that he thought the matter could be arranged, and the debate accordingly did proceed on the next day. It will be seen, however, that it was not because of any right claimed by the leader of the Opposition to persist in carrying on the discussion, but as a matter of arrangement between the two parties of the House. The Ministers then, as on other occasions, furnished facilities to those who assailed them to pursue the attack to its ultimate issue. I find again a motion arising on the 6th June, 1872, which involved, according to the view of the Ministry themselves, a question of confidence in their administration. The question was then raised whether the debate should proceed continuously, and Mr. Gladstone expressed himself in these words:—

"I do not wish to be held bound even by silence to the doctrines that every motion to be made in this House, which the Government may regard as involving a vote of censure, is therefore to receive precedence of all other business and is to be made the subject of immediate discussion. There are various qualifications to be attached to that doctrine—qualifications according to the circumstances of the case; qualifications according, also, to the intention of the member by whom the motion is made; qualifications according to the support which that motion receives from large portions of the House; and, finally, let me add, qualifications according to the bearing of the motion upon the public interests at the time. Because it is perfectly conceivable that a vote might be moved, not like that of my noble friend, to which he disclaims attaching the character of a vote of censure, and which might receive considerable support, but for the immediate discussion of which, nevertheless, it might be contrary to the duty of the Government to give extraordinary means, if in their conviction and knowledge it was likely to be injurious to great public interests."

Here again Mr. Gladstone speaks from the standpoint—in fact on the ground—that it rested with the Government to determine whether they would afford facilities to the Opposition. I cannot succeed in finding any case in which the parties who moved a motion of want of confidence were not willing to proceed with it. There is another occasion almost directly in point. It was in November, 1852, when the Liberal party in the House, through Mr. Villiers, while the Budget was under consideration, made an attack on the Government of the day, proposing a series of his famous resolutions in favour of the question of free-trade in broad terms, very much as the resolution we have on the other side in this House. That was accepted as an attack on the policy of the Government, an attack involving their existence. It came up after formal notice of motion, and an amendment was moved to it by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fate of the Government depended on that; the debate commenced on Tuesday, and I find it recorded here:—"The House adjourned "until Thursday, Wednesday being a "public day. The question was not "pressed by either party. The Govern- "ment did not invite the Opposition to "proceed with the debate, and as a mat- "ter of course the rights of the members "to their private day were regarded, the "debate being adjourned till Thursday." That I consider a case so much in point as to leave no doubt as to my ruling on Friday. I am glad to see by these precedents that I ruled correctly on Friday night last.

THE ST. LAWRENCE AND OTTAWA RAILWAY ACT.

The House went into Committee of the Whole—(Mr. Burpee, Sunbury, in in the chair) to consider an Act further to amend "The St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Act as amended by Standing Committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines."

Mr. BLAIN said touching the 18th Section, providing that if parties holding first and second claims did not accept payment, interest should cease, it seemed to him, that this would alter their position, and he desired to learn whether their consent had been obtained.

Hon. Mr. SMITH replied that this matter had been taken into special consideration, but on the whole it did not seem to be of sufficient importance, to prevent the object of the Bill being attained. Some persons had seven, and others, eight per cent., and some claims were drawn for seven—others for eight and twenty years. On receipt of thirty days' notice they would be obliged to accept the money, and the bondholders were quite willing to take it at any time.

The Committee rose and reported, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) moved the second reading of the Bill intituled an Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

The motion was carried.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. OLIVER moved the second reading of the Bill intituled an Act to empower the Canada Southern Railway Company to issue preference stock.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) stated that he would have no objection to the second reading if he were permitted to make suggestions or move amendments, if advisable, when the Bill came before the House after being considered by the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought it would be more convenient if any objections entertained were submitted immediately, and invited the hon. member from Oxford to explain the purpose of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER stated that he had informed the hon. member for Elgin that when the Bill came before the Railway Committee, if he (Mr. Macdougall) had any objection to offer to it he would endeavour to obtain for him—as well as for any other person under the same circumstances—a hearing. The provisions of the Bill were similar to those of Bills passed during the last Session, being simply intended to empower the Company to issue preference stock for five millions, to be used in the payment of overdue interest and in the redemption of a certain amount of first preference bonds of a previous issue, the consent of the holders having been obtained; also for the issue of second preference stock to the extent of $2,500,000 in order to redeem $2,500,000 of similar bonds. His only object at present was to have the Bill referred to the Committee, when all objections could be considered.

Mr. PALMER was of opinion that it would be very much better if there was a clause permitting the consent of parties whose interests were affected in this connection.

The Bill was read the second time.

MAIN-À-DIEU.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton)—Is it the intention of the Government to provide funds for building a break-water at the Port of Main-à-Dieu, N. S., this year?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not their intention.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

Mr. PELLETIER—Is it the intention of the Government to extend the system of free delivery of letters to St. Sauveur, one of the suburbs of the City of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGDON—The subject is under consideration.

INDIANS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. COSTIGAN—Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a Resident Indian Commissioner at Tobique, New Brunswick, in accordance with the wish of those interested in the Indian Reserve at that place; and in order to reduce the cost of managing the affairs of said Reserve?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that the present number was quite sufficient.

MAIL FACILITIES.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Is it the intention of the Government to give three mails per week to St. Cajetan d' Armagh and to St. Magloire, in the County of Bellechasse?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGDON—I may say that the Government have no such intention.

SUPPLY OF RAILS.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Have the Government entered into any engagement with any person or persons, company or companies, in the Province of New Brunswick, to supply them with rails to promote the construction of railways; and if so, what railways, and who are the parties and companies, and what are the conditions of such arrangements?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not think that any such answer as was desired should be given. However, he might state that the Government had allowed the temporary use of rails by several branches, such as the Chatham branch, connecting with important points on the Intercolonial; three or four of these roads had applied for this privilege, and he proposed at an early date to bring the matter formally before Parliament.

GRAND NARROWS, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. TREMAINE—Is it the intention of the Government to build a pier or brakewater on the north side of the Grand Narrows, Victoria County, Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—This subject has not been under the consideration of the Government.

BRAS D'OR LAKE.

Mr. TREMAINE—Is it the intention of the Government to place buoys on the Bras D'Or Lake to mark the several shoals between Grand Narrows and Baddeck, and between Baddeck and Little Narrows, Saint Patrick's Channel?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I am not in the possession of sufficient information to enable me to give an answer; but I will make enquiries, and if the work is necessary it will be done.

SHIPPING CERTIFICATES.

Mr. FORBES moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General for all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET.

Imperial Government; also between the Local Governments of the Maritime Provinces and the Dominion Government, relating to certificates of service granted by the Dominion to captains in the Merchant Service before 1871.

In explaining the motion, he said it was well known that the merchant marine had rendered good service to the State, and the motion before the House was certainly one that called for the consideration of Government. Canadian captains in English ports were met with the fact that they were unable to clear their ships with the Canadian certificate of service. In 1872 a law was passed in Canada providing that captains in the marine service of the Dominion, upon producing certificates of merit, should receive certificates of service which should carry their ships anywhere in the world. These captains had always done their duty, and were universally regarded as competent men. The English law, on which our Statute is based, allowed English captains to take their vessels wherever they went, whereas Canadian ships were prevented from sailing from England to other ports on Canadian certificates of service. Under these circumstances Canadian seamen were labouring under a disadvantage. He could not see in what way Canadians were inferior to the masters of British ships who sailed in British vessels registered in England. Canadian vessels sailed from Dominion ports registered in the Dominion. The question arose, had the Imperial Government any control over Canadian shipping, and it was a question which was disturbing the mind of the Canadian shipping masters generally. The disability under which Canadian captains suffered was a reflection upon their seamanship. He thought that it was a subject to which the Government should give their earnest consideration, and which called for active measures on their part.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said there certainly was no objection to bringing down the papers there were on the subject, and while he thought there was some force in the remarks of his hon. friend, he did not altogether coincide with his views.

In 1854 a Bill was passed in the English Parliament authorizing the private examination of masters and mates; and providing that any person having been a master on January 1, 1854, should be entitled, as a matter of right, to a certificate of service. An Act was passed in Canada in 1870 providing that masters of ships were entitled to certificates of service, as a matter of course, without any examination, on a certificate of good conduct being produced. He did not think there existed any difficulty in regard to the matter. There were very few of these certificates granted, and they were getting fewer and fewer every year. Many of the persons who held these certificates were undergoing examination for certificates of competency. He would bring down the papers at as early a day as possible.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said this was a matter of some considerable importance when legislation was going on in England affecting the merchant shipping of our country. One of the great objects we should have in view in Canada was to endeavour to get as much relief as possible from interference on the part of the Imperial Parliament. In dealing with the matter we should be able to say, "we ask nothing unreasonable, and we ask nothing that you would not be prepared to deal out to your own people." His hon. friend from Queen's made a statement which was not quite accurate. He had said an English captain could go to any port in the world. This was not so. There were two classes of certificates issued by the Board of Trade, the first of which would enable a master to take his vessel into any port in any part of the world, while the other class applied to home vessels. Some time ago the Dominion Government applied to the British Board of Trade for permission to legislate upon this subject, and introduced a Bill into the Dominion Parliament similar to the one passed in England in 1854.

The English officials who had superintendence of the shipping interests of Great Britain did not like to give the same classification to certificates granted by Canadian authorities as to those granted by English examiners. It took about three years to convince them that we were just as capable of conducting an examination, just as sensitive about the standing and character of our shipmasters, and just as careful in regulating our shipping interests as they were in England. While they were slow to give way, the English authorities were always prepared to concede what was fair when just reasons were put forward. He thought it would be very impolitic to ask them now to give a higher standard to our shipmasters than to others. In order to have our certificates of competency recognized in England, it was found that our examinations would need to be pretty strict, and this would be likely to exclude a considerable number of officers who had charge of ships for many years, and were good practical men though they did not possess the scientific knowledge necessary. It was found advisable to relieve them just as was done in England, not because it was thought desirable, but because it was considered unwise to throw a large number of men out of occupation. It must be remembered that the English Act was passed in 1854, and consequently but a small percentage of English shipmasters of that time were alive to avail themselves of certificates of service.

Mr. MILLS—That does not affect the principle.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he was aware of that, but he conceived we were weakening our position when we asked another Government to give our certificates a higher standing than they gave their own.

Mr. FORBES—I do not ask for that.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. gentleman asked for the papers for the purpose of getting these certificates recognized in England, where very few such certificates were now in force. We had made very respectable progress in obtaining independence in legislating on this subject. We had only now to ask exemption from British legislation when we had legislated for ourselves. The number of British ship masters who held certificates of service under the Act of 1854 was very small indeed, and when the hon. member for Queen's asked to have such certificates granted under the Canadian Act of 1870, he requested too much. Our Act had worked admirably, and there had been hardly any complaints against it. Instead of adopting this course, the hon. member for Queen's should advise masters who had certificates of service to educate themselves in the scientific part of their profession, and fit themselves for obtaining certificates of competency. That was what was contemplated when the Act was passed in 1870. He did not rise to oppose this motion, but for the purpose of setting the matter right, and calling the attention of the House to the very important question now raised. While he highly approved of the hon. gentleman's object to raise the standard of the people of his own country, he should not give any just ground to the Government or Parliament of England, to refuse what we might more legitimately ask, and that was that the British legislation now under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament shall not affect our shipping.

Mr. PALMER said the hon member or Queen's was not the only one who had heard complaints on this subject, because he (Mr. Palmer) had heard them in his own constituency. Now, either we had the power to pass the Act of 1870, or we had not. It was utter absurdity to allow a ship to clear from a Canadian port when she would not be allowed to clear from an English port under the same master. It would be better to give no certificate at all than have this state of things continue. He held this Parliament had a perfect right to legislate on the subject, and he denied the right of the Imperial Government constitutionally to make a different rule for Canadian from what they did for foreign ships. The moment they granted this Parliament the right to legislate for their own shipping and govern their own affairs, they had no right to interfere with them in such a manner. Just as well might they undertake to regulate a factory in New Brunswick as the shipping of this country, except for quarantine or other matters which would be applicable to foreign ships.

It was totally inconsistent for them to regulate the duties of masters to sailors, and of sailors to masters. The system was most vicious in its nature, and surely it required as much skill to sail a vessel from Liverpool to Halifax, as from Halifax to Liverpool.

Mr. MILLS did not fully understand the position of the hon. member from Northumberland, who demanded that the classification of ships should be under the control of the Parliament of Canada, and yet he assured them that he asked the Imperial Government to concede as a favour, what certainly belongs to Canada as a right. This was a very extraordinary position; and to his mind had somewhat complicated this question of jurisdiction. It was perfectly clear that the Dominion possessed power to legislate exclusively on this subject. Our Constitution was a compact between the various Provinces, a part of whose former powers of legislation we held.

Hon. Mr. SMITH asked his hon. friend, if he thought that this Parliament had power to compel the authorities in England, while our ships were in British waters, to recognize the authority of its acts.

Mr. MILLS admitted that the Imperial Parliament could take away the legislative authority conferred under the British North American Act, though this would be an act of bad faith and of violence; also that it could legislate for Canadian ships in the waters of Great Britain as well as for American or French shipping; all we asked was to be let alone. We had the authority he had mentioned and must exercise it exclusively.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL explained that what he had asked as a favour was not a right to have Canadian certificates recognized in British ports, and consequently he had not complicated the question.

Mr. MILLS held that the Imperial Parliament had nothing to do with Canadian, any more than with American certificates; and this, in his opinion, involved the whole question.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—What about Canadian certificates for the masters of British ships?

Mr. MILLS—That is an entirely different matter. The British North American Act had conferred on the Dominion the powers belonging to the old Provinces. The Merchants' Shipping Act of England, passed in 1854, also applied to Canada as a Canadian law, but distinctly and separately from its being an English Act, and when it was amended in England the amendments did not extend to this country.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—That is not involved in this question.

Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—The effect of the legislation is simply this:—The Canadian master with a Canadian certificate in his pocket, can go to England and take charge of a British ship in a British port, to sail to any part of the world; consequently the certificate of a Canadian master has the same force and validity in England as the British certificate.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—That is the point.

Mr. MILLS—The point was not what the master's rights on a British ship were, under the provisions of a law entirely distinct from the Merchants' Shipping Act—under an Imperial Act conferring power in reference to English shipping. He supposed that this would be admitted by his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—No.

Mr. MILLS—In interfering with our masters they are acting in direct contravention of the powers conferred on us.

Mr. FORBES considered that the difficulty originated with the course taken by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He ventured to affirm that from this time forward until next year many complaints would be made in this connection. They were told that the masters of Canadian ships could again go to school; but some of them had commanded vessels for twenty-five years. A hardship was felt in this relation by ship-owners as well, and he held that the matter merited consideration from the Government. It was evident that the hon. member for Northumberland did not consider that Canadian were equal in ability to British ship masters, or he would never have insulted the former, as he (Mr. Forbes) thought the hon. member had done. He hoped that as the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was himself deeply interested in the shipping interest, this question would receive the attention it deserved.

Mr. KILLAM thanked the Board of Trade for the action it had taken in this connection in the public interest, preventing owners of vessels from engaging incompetent masters. If these captains had sailed since 1870 until now, and were unable to obtain certificates on examination in this country or England, it was time they should go to school.

The motion was carried.

THE GATINEAU BOOM CONTRACT.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER moved for a message to Senate praying for copy of report made by Select Committee of that Hon. House during last Session on the subject of the construction of booms, piers and other works on the Gatineau.

Delay had taken place in connection with a communication between the Post Office and Public Works' Department, and the question arose as to the time when the tender which was in question had been actually sent to the Government; in consequence the Minister of Public Works felt it his duty to decide that the tender of another party, not the lowest, should be accepted.

A good deal of attention had been given to this subject, and a Committee appointed in the other branch of the Legislature having examined into it, held that under the circumstances the Government would be warranted in making payment to Mr. Palen, whose tender had been the lowest, for the work he had performed. This was perhaps done somewhat irregularly. Mr. Palen had been requested by the person whose duty this was, his tender being the lowest, to go to work in order that time might be saved, as this officer was under the impression that it was very important to do so. He asked the Hon. Minister of Public Works whether under these circumstances Mr. Palen should not be remunerated for the expenditure he had made on the work mentioned.

He was quite satisfied that the Government, in reviewing the case, would discover that there had been some irregularities connected with it. He was also satisfied that his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works would not be disposed to see an injustice done to a private individual who was given instructions by an Officer of the Department.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that Mr. Palen had no right to make complaint in this particular. The proceedings were strictly regular and in accordance with the usage of the Department. It was alleged that it was because Mr. Palen was politically opposed to the Government, and the other parties were partially in favour of the Government, that he did not receive the contract. With reference to that he could only say Mr. Palen on the contrary said he had been and was then a supporter of the Government. Mr. Palen was the only one of the parties he saw and he knew none. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was satisfied in the first place that the tender of Mr. Palen was not in time, and he was at this moment satisfied that the tender was not in time. As there was some doubt in regard to this, it was agreed by his deputy and himself that they would open the tenders and have them extended. An improper notification took place, and he thought the Government would be disposed to consider how far that improper notification led to any expenditure on Mr. Palen's part before he was notified not to proceed. To that extent he (Mr. Mackenzie) was willing the matter should be considered, and would state that Mr. Palen should receive whatever he was entitled to under these circumstances.

Mr. BOWELL thought the First Minister went a little too far when he said Mr. Palen had no cause to complain. Whether improperly or not, Mr. Palen received instructions to go on with the work on the booms on the 9th, and did not receive orders to stop work until the 16th. Mr. Bowell then read the Senate report on the subject in support of this statement.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The report was not adopted.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. BOWELL said it would have been adopted, and amounted to the same thing.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said, knowing a little of this matter he was glad to have heard the First Minister state that he was disposed to take the matter into favourable consideration. Mr. Palen had reason to complain of the manner in which he had been treated, and he thought he had a right to expect from the Department some little remuneration for his expenditure.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE referred to the evidence given by Mr. Merrill before the Senate Committee, showing that Mr. Palen was notified between the Thursday and Saturday that the contract had been awarded to another party, and that on the following Monday he put from 50 to 100 men at work.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought the matter might safely be left with the First Minister after the statement he had made, and he had no doubt the hon. gentleman would do substantial justice to the case.

The motion was carried.

WHARFAGE CHARGES.

Mr. ROBILLARD moved for a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

Resolved—That it is expedient to provide that each and every person who may have constructed or may be in possession of a wharf on any navigable water in Canada, such wharf not being within the limits assigned by competent authority to any Corporation of Harbour Commissioners, so long as the said wharf shall be maintained in good repair and fit for public use, may levy on vessels moored to such wharf and upon all goods landed or shipped or deposited thereon (except arms, ammunition, and military accoutrements and other amunitions of war, for the use of Government or for the defence of the Dominion, and except also vessels wholly laden therewith), the several rates and dues mentioned in the Schedule appended to the Act of the Parliament of Canada, passed in the 36th year of Her Majesty's Reign and chaptered 61, subject to the right of the Governor in Council to suspend at any time such power to collect the said rates and dues, or to order the demolition and removal of such wharf should he consider it advisable in the public interest so to do."

Mr. TUPPER—I would like to know if my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has read the resolution.

Hon Mr. BLAKE—I have heard it read before, and I understand my hon. friend the First Minister has consented to allow the early stage to be taken with the view to the discussion taking place on the second reading of the Bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole—Mr. Pelletier, in the Chair.

The resolutions passed through Committee without amendment and were reported. The report to be received to-morrow.

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. GILLMOR moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement of all licenses issued for fishing weirs or traps in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia for the years 1874 and 1875; also a statement of the tax collected each year from the same source. He said in the county which he had the honour to represent the fishing interests was very considerable, as would be shown by the following statistics taken from the last census. In his county there were in 1871 no less than 70 vessels engaged in the business; they were manned by 322 men. There were also 687 boats, manned by 1,040 men, besides 130 men engaged in the same business on the shore. They used 47,828 fathoms of nets. In 1871 they produced 475 barrels of mackerel, 10,104 quintals of codfish, 15,722 quintals of pollock, hake and haddock; 124,140 barrels of herrings, and 59,943 gallons of oil. In the returns, smoked herrings and frozen herrings, large branches of industry in the county, were not named at all. In these fishing industries a number of weirs were erected which, prior to Confederation, paid a tax of one dollar each. Very recently that tax had been increased to $10. His constituents felt this tax was oppressive, and he would read one of several letters which he had received on the subject. It was as follows:—

“The owners of fish weirs in the Bay of Passamaquoddy are dissatisfied, and feel that the Government weir tax of ten dollars per weir a year is oppressive and unjust, inasmuch as it is unequal and bears hard on the poor man, arising from the fact that most of the weirs do not catch enough to pay this tax and afford him a living besides. That is not in proportion to value from the fact that a few weirs built on first rate privileges have a large catch, while others, and they are the greatest number, are built on poor privileges and get a small catch.

“We hope this unequal and unjust tax of ten dollars a year may be removed by reducing it to one dollar as heretofore, or by making it equal and in proportion according to the privilege on which the weir is built; they may be first, second or third class and taxed accordingly. That in our humble opinion the old tax of one dollar, as heretofore imposed, is more equal and just and better suited to our uncertain business, and more in accord with the wishes of toiling fishermen, working hard and receiving little as a recompense. They feel the ten dollar tax almost unsupportable.”

That communication was signed by 71 of his constituents. He was not engaged in this industry himself, but he had visited that part of the county, and knew something of the hardships the fishermen had to endure. If this tax were necessary it should not be imposed on all alike. The weirs were built at a venture. Sometimes they succeeded, but more frequently they did not pay for the outlay, and it was thought unjust that the unsuccessful should have to pay as high a tax as the successful. He hoped if the tax could not be reduced it would at least be distributed more fairly. In the summer season the fishermen laboured under a great inconvenience from fogs. Often it came on them when they were four or five miles out from land, and he had seen men and women on the shore blowing fog horns by the hour to guide them home. The fishermen did not get through their labour during the summer as the agriculturists did, and they deserved more attention than they had received. There was another grievance of which the fishermen of Passamaquoddy Bay complained. Under the Washington Treaty American fishing vessels, well equipped, stretched their nets for miles along the shore, and our fishermen had to go beyond this line of nets in order to obtain any catch at all. Those nets were so stretched as to prevent the fish from coming near the shore where they could be caught from small boats. This was a grievance which they knew could not be redressed. They had suffered more than any people in the Dominion from the Washington Treaty, and the least that could be done for them was to give every consideration to their important industry. They did not come to this Parliament asking for protection; they only asked to be fairly considered in the matter of benefits accruing from the distribution of the revenue. He trusted the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would look into this matter, and not only decrease the tax on the poor toiling fishermen, but also give them a few fog bells and harbours of refuge.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I am glad to find somebody else objects to the regulations besides myself.

The motion was carried and the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

THE GUYON ISLAND LIGHT HOUSE.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for an Address to his Excellency the Governor General for copies of tenders, plans and specifications for building a light house at Guyon Island, and all correspondence relating to the same; also for a copy of the contract.

A few days since, in answer to a question, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had stated that tenders had been invited for this work last summer. The lowest was submitted by a man named Cameron, the sum being $2,130; the contract had, however, been transferred to a Mr. Sinclair, and the building was to be finished by August next. He had received a letter from another gentleman who had tendered, and who complained very strongly in this connection, representing that tenders were asked for this work last summer, the time for their reception extending up to the 30th of June. The building was further to be completed by the 15th of last October, and $10 were to be deducted daily for any delay that might occur on the part of the contractor after the date mentioned. This gentleman also affirmed that had he known that the work was not to be finished until August last, he would have reduced his tender by 15 per cent., as the Guyon Island was situated in the ocean, and had scarcely a landing place, while he understood that the work had to be done within quite a short period. He (Mr. McDonald) thought that an unfair advantage had been given to the present contractor; the award might as well have been made privately, as in this case the formal notices, &c., proved to be nothing more or less than a farce. He would allude to another contract if he were permitted—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Order! order!

Mr. McDONALD—If not, he would put another notice on the paper. The circumstances were these: tenders were invited for a marine hospital—

Mr. SPEAKER—This is an entirely new subject; you had better pursue the course you intimate.

Hon. Mr. SMITH had no objection to bringing down the papers. The contract had been in the first instance awarded to a man named Cameron who lived, he believed, at Halifax. He was notified, and his partner replied that he would accept. Subsequently, however, Cameron could not be found; and the work was given to Mr. Sinclair, who had sent in the next lowest tender, being some $60, he thought, above that of the former. A considerable period had intervened, and accordingly the time was of necessity extended. He considered that they had in this acted in the public interest, as advertisements for tenders, &c., required quite a large expenditure. He would be glad if the hon. member for Cape Breton would name the person from whom he had received a letter.

Mr. McDONALD—It was Mr. Poole, who also tendered,

Hon. Mr. SMITH—What was the amount?

Mr. McDONALD—He does not state.

Hon. Mr. SMITH remarked that if he recollected aright this tender was largely in excess of those he accepted—to the extent of some hundreds, or thousands, he believed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said that this was an extraordinary statement. His hon. friend ought to be more precise in the information he gave the House than to speak of a difference of hundreds or thousands of dollars.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—It is very extraordinary, but nevertheless true. The motion was carried.

THE SHIPPING INTERESTS.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL had the honour to place on the records of the House the following resolution for an Address to Her Majesty, as the opinion of the House—that any legislation affecting British merchant shipping which may be adopted by the Imperial Parliament should not include in its operation Canadian tonnage, or if such legislation should be applied to Canadian tonnage, it should also include foreign tonnage, in order that no advantage should be had by the latter over the former by the effect of such proposed Imperial legislation. He directed to this matter the attention of the hon. member for Bothwell, who was inclined to be abstract rather than practical in this relation. With his advanced views touching the powers conferred under the British North American Act, more especially with respect to the subject of shipping, he (Mr. Mitchell), however, fully sympathised. There had been great reason for the course which Mr. Plimsoll had pursued; but like all sentimental legislation, the action which had therefrom resulted had gone far beyond the bounds of prudence. He felt a deep sympathy with Mr. Plimsoll in many of his representations; but within the past five years but few cases on the Canadian records could be found to which Mr. Plimsoll's assertions would apply; therefore he held that to Canadian tonnage and ship-owners, the legislation contemplated by the Imperial Parliament should not extend. On the 7th of March, 1872, this matter had been in point of fact taken up by the late Administration, and action determined upon.

On the 7th of March, 1872, he found in a report which he (Mr. Mitchell) had himself made to Council, he called the attention of the Government to a memorial received from the merchants and ship-owners of Halifax, and recommended that a Bill be submitted to meet the requirements of that memorial. He found on the 2nd of May following, a petition received from the merchants and ship-owners of St. John, signed by nineteen-twentieths of them, praying for the passage of an Act to facilitate the organization of a Canadian Lloyd's Registry and Classification of Shipping. That memorial was sent in from the merchants and ship-owners of St. John in consequence of the Plimsoll movement in England.

Mr. McLEOD—Did not the same parties petition against the establishment of a Canadian Lloyds?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he held in his hand a petition in favour of it; which he then read as follows:—

"CITY OF ST. JOHN, PROVINCE OF NEW "BRUNSWICK, DOMINION OF CANADA.
"2nd May, 1873.

"The undersigned, merchants, ship-owners, underwriters and others, beg respectfully to say:—

"That in their opinion the best interests of Canadian Shipping would be greatly advanced and protected by His Excellency the Governor General and their Honours the Members of the Privy Council of Canada introducing a measure to facilitate the organization of a Canadian Lloyds Registry and Classification of shipping: and

"That provision be made to give the respective Local Boards of Trade a representation in such Association through their President and Vice-President, whom it would be desirable to appoint ex officio, or in their room two other members to be chosen by each of the said respective Boards as members of the Committee of Classification, and further;

"That it would be expedient to grant that all the Canadian tonnage, at the time of the opening of the said Dominion Lloyds, which is classed in Lloyds Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or in Bureau Veritas, or which is in course of classification in these Registers, and when so classed shall be transferred to the Canada Lloyds Registry Book, and receive therein a similar rating for the unexpired term of their class free from any charge.

"Minister of Marine and Fisheries. &c.,
"Ottawa."

Whether they had changed their minds or not since that he could not tell; what he could say was, that the hon. member for Kent was one of a delegation who came to Ottawa and induced him (Mr. Mitchell) to prepare a measure and insert the necessary clause empowering the Government to enforce it at any time. On the 5th of May he received the following telegram:—

("By Telegraph from St. John, N. B., to Hon. Peter Mitchell.")

"OTTAWA, 5th May, 1873.

"Add to petition in favour of Canada Lloyds mailed in triplicate, Hon. William Muirhead, Hon. John Robertson, William Munro, Hon. James DeVeber, Steeves, Hillyard and Ruderick, J. D. "(Signed,) ROBERT MARSHALL"

It only required these names to complete the petition. Except two or three shipowners, it included all the leading merchants of the great commercial city of St. John. On the 10th May he (Mr. Mitchell) wrote as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 10th May, 1873.

"The undersigned has the honour to report to Council that he has had brought under his notice the Bill introduced into the Imperial Parliament by Mr. Plimsoll, M. P., and others, the provisions of which will affect detrimentally, and in his opinion unfairly, the seagoing shipping of Canada. The Boards of Trade, both in St. John and Halifax, and the commercial men as well as the Parliamentary representatives of the Maritime Provinces have remonstrated against the proposed legislation above alluded to; and he, therefore, recommends that Her Majesty's Government be communicated with by cable telegraph forth with, and that they be respectfully requested to urge upon Parliament the exemption of Canadian Shipping from the operation of said Bill, or at least to suspend the progress of it until the Canadian Government can be heard and their interests duly represented

A copy of the memorial from the St. John Board of Trade is annexed.

"Respectfully submitted.

"(Signed), P. MITCHELL,
"Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

This matter was brought under the notice of the Government by himself for the purpose of making representations to the Imperial Parliament. The object of that legislation he would give as stated in the minute dated May 14th, 1873:—

"It had been charged against him that the legislation which he, as Minister of Marine, during his administration of that office, was detrimental to the interests of Canada. He would refer to his record and challenge an expression of public opinion as to the truthfulness of such an assertion. In every action of his life, while head of that Department, he had but one object in view—to promote the prosperity while maintaining the rights in the shipping interest of this country. In this despatch of May 14th, 1873, after dealing with the whole question of Plimsoll's grievances, and the fact while these charges might have been perfectly true as relating to the shipping of Great Britain, they could not with truth apply to Canadian vessels."

He went on to say:—

"The Government of Canada has, accordingly, submitted to the the Canadian Parliament several measures relating to and regulating pilotage, merchant shipping and seamen, several of which have become law, and which are largely assimilated to past Imperial legislation. Amongst these is one, a copy of which is annexed, entitled 'An Act relating to shipping, and for the registration, inspection and classification thereof,' in which provision is made for the inspection and classification of ships within the Dominion of Canadian. Under this law it is proposed to establish a system of inspection and classification which, it is hoped, will take the place, so far as Canadian tonnage is concerned, of both Lloyd's and Bureau Veritas, and it is of the utmost importance to the shipping interests of Canada that the certificates which may be granted under the law referred to should be recognized by the Board of Trade in the same manner as it is proposed by the fifth section of the Plimsoll Bill, that the certificates of Lloyd's officers or of the officers of the Liverpool Underwriters' Registry of Iron Vessels should be recognized."

He went on to state:—

"It will also be remembered that the Government has been questioned in the Canadian Parliament as to whether they have taken steps to obtain the exemption of Canadian tonnage from the operations of said Bill.

"The undersigned would observe that a strong feeling exists in Canada that in questions so vitally affecting our interest as those relating to shipping, and to which our Canadian Parliament give so much attention, and in relation to which our Canadian people are well qualified to judge of what suits their interests, Her Majesty's Government may safely adopt the policy, that wherever the Canadian Parliament have dealt with questions relating to shipping, the Imperial Parliament should exempt Canadian ships from the operation of Imperial Legislation upon that subject."

That he held to be one of the fundamental principles on which he should start in discussing this question with the Imperial Government. We had the power conceded to us—we were quite capable of exercising it, and had exercised it in such a manner as to elicit an expression of approval from prominent English statesmen, and even from Mr. Plimsoll himself:—

"This principle the Imperial Parliament, to a great extent, have already recognized in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, in exempting colonial ships while within the bounds of a colony having a Parliament or Legislature which has legislated upon the subject, from the operations of said Act. It is desirable that the principle of exemption, in so far as Canadian shipping is concerned, should be extended to all British ports, and that the Imperial Government should throw the responsibility of the legislation necessary to control and regulate Canadian shipping, upon the Canadian Parliament, subject always to the control which Her Majesty possesses, in the approval or rejection of such measures as the Canadian Parliament may enact.

"This course would give great satisfaction in Canada, and would do much to perpetuate those ties which bind us to the Mother Country.

"The undersigned believes that such a policy is in accordance with the general views entertained by Her Majesty's Government, and the experience of past years shows that the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada have not unworthily exercised the great powers which they possess, and he would, therefore, respectfully submit that Her Majesty's Government should be asked to recognize the principle which he has above stated.

"He would therefore recommend that, pending the decision upon the above recommendation, and in order to relieve Canadian shipping from the evils anticipated from the Plimsoll Bill:

"1st. That the Imperial Government be asked that in any legislation that may be had affecting shipping, they should give to the Canadian inspection and classification of vessels, hereinbefore referred to, when it may be organized, the same standing and recognition as they may give to Lloyd's Registry or the Liverpool Underwriters' Registry for iron vessels.

"2nd. That if the Plimsoll Bill, or one of a similar character, becomes law, that for the first twelve months thereafter it shall not apply to Canadian vessels, in order to afford to Canadian shipping an opportunity to obtain the necessary inspection and classification under the Canadian system of inspection and classification as contemplated by the annexed Bill.

"3rd. That inasmuch as the Canadian Parliament has legislated upon the deck load question, Canadian vessels should be exempted from the operation of sections 15, 16 and 17 of the Plimsoll Bill.

"4th. That Canadian vessels be exempt from the operations of sections 19 and 20 of the said Bill; or if Her Majesty's Government consider that course objectionable, then that due consideration be given to the representations contained in the annexed petition from the St. John Board of Trade in relation to the Load Line of Canadian ships as compared with iron ships."

That was the position taken by the late Government, and he was proud to say the hon. gentleman who succeeded him in the Department, in two despatches he had sent, asked for the same concessions, claimed the same privileges, and demanded the same rights as he (Mr. Mitchell) had contended for. Canada had nothing to complain of in the treatment she had received from the British Government, and Parliament, wherever an injustice had been done us that we represented properly to them, had always been willing to concede everything we had a right to claim. While he concurred to a great extent with the broad and enlightened views entertained by the hon. member for Bothwell, that wherever the British Government had given to the people of Canada the right to deal with questions specially named, we have a right to ask that our legislation on such subjects be not contravened by Imperial Acts, he believed they should rather deal with the subject in a way that would bring about practical results, than in a manner not likely to be satisfactory. He had so dealt with the Masters and Mates Certificate Bill, and it will be recollected that at the time he moved in this matter, Canadian masters and mates were labouring under a serious disadvantage. They could not always allow their ships to remain in dock after a month or more to enable the masters to undergo the necessary examination. Though he had been charged with having overlooked and undervalued the old masters who were only qualified to get certificates of service, any gentleman who had condemned his policy in this regard did not do him justice. He asked for what they had a right to demand, he knew it was useless to ask for more. They had not the right to ask that the certificates of service given by the Canadian Examiners should have the same importance as those issued by the Imperial Board of Trade. Why? Because England reserved to herself the right to legislate, and had established two classes of certificates of service as distinguished from certificates of competency in her own ports on her own tonnage, and our certificate of service did not cover the same ground—They therefore had no ground for asking that these men who were entitled only to the coasting certificate should have the same privileges, standing and rights as persons who had received certificates of service for foreign lands as distinguished from the coasting certificate—nor had we a right to have them classed with persons who passed their examination for competency before the British Board of Trade. If any gentleman charged him with neglecting to secure the rights and privileges due to Canada, he mistook the powers Canada possessed under the British North America Act. If any gentleman said that the management of the Marine and Fisheries Department during the seven years of the existence of the late Government was detrimental to the shipping interest, he stated what was directly opposed to the belief of the whole country. The next communication in connection with the history of this very important subject is a Report to Council, dated 14th February, 1874:—

“OTTAWA, 14th February, 1874.

“The undersigned has the honour to report to Council that he has had under consideration a circular dispatch from the Earl of Kimberley of the 3rd December last, transmitting copy of a letter from the Board of Trade, enclosing a copy of the “Merchants Shipping Act, 1873,” and of the instructions issued by that Department to Registrars and other officers in the British possessions abroad, and requesting with reference to the 12th and 13th Sections, relating to the survey of unseaworthy ships, that steps might be taken for the passage of a law giving similar power to the proper authority in Canada to that which is by the sections referred to, given to the Board of Trade.

“The undersigned has the honour to report that previous to the passing of the Imperial ‘Merchant Shipping Act, 1873,’ the Parliament of Canada had made provision for the cases referred to in Section 26 to 29 inclusive, of the Act passed at last Session of Parliament, relating to shipping and for the registration, inspection and classification thereof.

“Respectfully submitted.

“(Signed,) A. J. SMITH,
“Minister of Marine and Fisheries.”

Then comes the following:—

“OTTAWA, March, 18th 1874.

“The undersigned has the honour to report to Council that he has had under consideration the petition of the Dominion Board of Trade, addressed to His Excellency the Governor General on the 12th instant, praying that in view of the fact that legislation will be proposed in the Parliament of Great Britain in reference to the inspection of shipping, such measures may be adopted as are necessary to prevent such legislation from prejudicially affecting the tonnage of the Dominion of Canada; and he recommends that a copy of the petition be forwarded through the usual channel to Her Majesty’s Government with the request that the prayer of the Petitioners may be complied with, and legislation in any degree detrimental to the shipping of the Dominion of Canada may not be enacted by the Parliament of Great Britain until reference has been made to the Government of Canada for its opinion thereon.

“Respectfully submitted.

“Minister of Marine and Fisheries.”

He considered that his hon friend in this second report had weakened considerably. On the 20th of April he found a letter from the Under Secretary of State to the following effect:—

“BOARD OF TRADE,

“WH. TRILL GARDENS, 20th April, 1874.

“Merchant Shipping Code—Colonial unseaworthiness.

“SIR,—I am directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge receipt of your letters of the 4th and 11th inst., enclosing copy of a letter and enclosures from Robert Marshall, together with a copy of a despatch and enclosure from the Governor General of Canada relative to Canadian shipping.

“In reply I am to state for the information of Earl Carnarvon that the papers in question have been forwarded to the Royal Commission on unseaworthy ships.

“The Board are also desirous of learning whether the Canadian Bill with regard to the Government classification of ships in the Dominion is going on or not, and, if it is, in what stage it is now in.

"I have, etc.,

"(Signed), THOMAS GRAY."

"The Under-Secretary of State,
"Colonial Office."

That reply was a practical concession to the Canadian demand in connection with Canadian Shipping, and it only required the Government of Canada to assume a firm position, and every thing they asked would have been conceded. On the 21st of May, 1874, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries wrote as follows:—

"The undersigned has the honour to report to Council that he has had under consideration despatch from the Earl of Carnarvon (No. 54), of the 23rd April last, transmitting copy of a letter from the Board of Trade, and requesting that a reply might be made to the enquiry contained therein respecting the Bill for the classification of ships in Canada, as to whether such Bill was in operation or not, and what stage it was in if in operation.

"The undersigned recommends that the Board of Trade be informed through the usual channel that the Government of Canada have not as yet decided to put the provisions of the Act which relate to the inspection and classification of ships practically into operation, and to publish rules and regulations for such inspection and classification of shipping, and that no official action has been taken in the matter since the proclamation of the Act in the Canada Gazette.

"Respectfully submitted,

"(Signed,) A. J. SMITH."

While he was willing to do justice to his honorable friend in every way, he thought he was weak on one point in his Administration, namely, in not putting in operation the Act for the inspection and classification of ships. This was the one thing required to make our system complete.

He was not inclined to censure the British Government for including Canadian shipping in their legislation, when one of the most important links in this connection had been omitted by the Canadian Government. On the 10th of April, 1875, the following report was made to the Privy Council:—

"On a report dated 5th April, 1875, from the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, stating that he has received information that a Bill has been introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the provisions of which, if adopted, he believes will seriously affect the sea-going shipping of Canada, trading to and from the United Kingdom; and he therefore recommends that Her Majesty's Government be communicated with by cable telegram, immediately, requesting them to urge upon Parliament the exemption of Canadian shipping from the operation of such Bill.

The Committee concur in the above recommendation and submit the same for Your Excellency's approval.

"Certified.

"(Signed,) W. A. HIMSWORTH."
"Clerk Privy Council."

"To the Honorable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

His policy had been endorsed by his hon. successor, who on the 5th of April made the following report:

"OTTAWA, 5th April, 1875.

"The undersigned has the honour to report to Council that he has received information that a Bill had been introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the provisions of which, if adopted, he believes will seriously affect the sea-going shipping of Canada trading to and from the United Kingdom; and he, therefore, recommends that Her Majesty's Government be communicated with by cable telegram immediately, requesting them to urge upon Parliament the exemption of Canadian shipping from the operation of such Bill.

"Respectfully submitted,

"(Signed,) A. J. SMITH,
"Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

This was the telegram proposed to be sent by the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:—

"My Government regard Plimsoll's proposed amendments to Shipping Bill as very objectionable, and request your Government to delay measure until mine have time to remonstrate."

The following was an extract of a report of a Committee of the Hon. the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the 22nd April, 1875:—

"The Committee of Council have had under consideration the report, dated 20th April, 1875, from the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, having reference to the report to Council of his predecessor of the 10th and 14th May, 1873, recommending that Her Majesty's Government be requested to urge upon Parliament the exemption of Canadian Shipping from the operation of the Plimsoll Bill, &c., &c.

The Committee concur in the foregoing Report and recommend that a copy of this minute and documents appended, be transmitted to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies.

"Certified.

"(Signed,) W. A. HIMSWORTH,
"Clerk Privy Council."

"To the Honorable
The Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

His hon. successor had endorsed his own position; and he was glad to say that he (Mr. Smith) had very fairly maintained it by his arguments.

The following are extracts from another official document:—

“OTTAWA, 20th April, 1875.

“The undersigned, with reference to the Reports to Council of his predecessor of the 10th and 14th May, 1873, recommending that Her Majesty’s Government be requested to urge upon Parliament the exemption of Canadian Shipping from the operation of the Plimsoll Bill, as the passage of such Bill might injuriously affect Canadian Shipping, and hold out inducements to transfer a large portion of the tonnage of Canada to foreign flags, and with reference to his report to Council, dated the 5th instant, stating that he had received information that a Bill was again before Parliament relating to the same subject, and recommending that the British Government be requested by telegraph to urge on the Imperial Parliament the exemption of Canadian Shipping from the operation of such Bill, as he understood it might seriously affect the interests of such shipping, has now the honour to report that, although he has not been able to see a copy of the amendments proposed by Mr. Plimsoll to the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, he has seen notices of such proposed amendments in the newspapers, from which it appears that such amendments, if carried, would seriously affect the interests of Canadian ships while in the United Kingdom, by subjecting them to compulsory inspections and restrictions with reference to dec.-loading.

“With reference to the general question of seaworthiness of Canadian ships, the undersigned remarks that nearly all the sea-going vessels of Canada are classed either in British Lloyds, French Bureau Veritas or American Lloyds, which is a good guarantee of their strength and sea-going qualities, and he is now considering the propriety of recommending the adoption of rules and regulations for the voluntary inspection and classification of Canadian ships by the Canadian Government, provided for in the 54th section of the Canadian Act, 36 Victoria, Chapter 128, in order that Canada might have the advantage of possessing a national institution of its own for the classification of its shipping, the rapid growth of its Mercantile Marine, and the large amount of Canadian capital now invested in this interest appearing to require such additional facilities for the classification of its shipping.

“The undersigned, therefore, recommends that Her Majesty’s Government be requested to urge on Parliament the exemption of Canadian shipping from the operation of any of the provisions contained in the amendments proposed by Mr. Plimsoll, until the Canadian Government and Canadian ship-owners had an opportunity of considering such provisions.”

The Government was a little weak-kneed here, and he regretted their retrogression. They had received the following circular:—

“DOWNING STREET,
“22nd October, 1875.

“SIR,—With reference to my predecessor’s circular despatch of the 3rd December, 1873, I

transmit herewith for your information and for general publication in the Colony under your Government, a copy of a letter from the Board of Trade enclosing a copy of “The Merchant Shipping Act, 1875.”

“2. I request that you will call the attention of your Ministers to the desire expressed by the Board of Trade, to be furnished with an immediate Report of any case in which grain, etc., is shipped in British vessels in contravention of the Act, and in such a manner as to endanger human life.

“3. I shall be obliged if you will favor me with any observations which may occur to your Advisers with reference to the application of the several provisions of this Act to the Colony under your Government.

“I have the honour, &c.,

“(Signed).

There was another report made by his hon. friend of date the 8th of February, 1876, two or three days before Parliament met. It was very long, and as far as it went was well enough, but it stopped short of the real remedy. He, however, would only read a couple of extracts:—

“The undersigned is of opinion that no Imperial leg station should take place affecting the question of seaworthiness, or loading of Canadian vessels in Canadian waters—the Canadian Legislature is the proper authority to deal with such questions, and when it becomes necessary to legislate for the safety of Canadian vessels in Canadian waters, he has no doubt the Canadian Parliament will be quite ready to do so, as it has already done in the past.”

“With reference to the general policy of recent Imperial legislation relative to British Merchant Ships, the undersigned remarks that a number of communications, in the shape of petitions, memorials and verbal statements, from owners of Canadian sea-going ships and Boards of Trade, have reached his Department, urging the Canadian Government to take some steps to protect Canadian shipping from the effect of Imperial legislation, so as to place Canadian ships, while competing in the carrying trade, on as favourable a footing in British and foreign ports as for-ign ships.”

He did not desire that the great shipping interests of Canada, in which were interested fifty millions of dollars, should be injured by Imperial legislation for which no reason in this connection existed; we should be severely left alone in this relation.

One link in order to complete our case had not been placed in operation, but if this had been done, the people of Canada would be secure and safe against the existence of the abuses of which complaint had been made, and he left to his hon. friend and successor to explain why this link was wanting. We should have the sole power to deal with great interests such as the shipping interests, and he wished to avoid the sensational legislation in this regard that had disgraced England. He looked with contempt on the attitude in which the Imperial Government were placed during last Session by Mr. Plimsoll's terrific attack on them, when he outraged deliberately the laws of the House of Commons and creating a sensation unparalleled in that august body. So extraordinary was the effect, that the Government, as it were, fell on their knees before Mr. Plimsoll, and accepted such propositions as he chose to make. Would such things be tolerated in this free Canada of ours? He thought not, and he hoped to avoid the immediate difficulties and pressing evils which he saw overspreading the shipping interests of the Dominion unless we both demand exemption from such sensational legislation. The one link in question should be supplied. His hon. successor entertained, as he had stated, the same views as himself; but simply because some people had changed their minds no action was taken in the direction desired, and the legislation of the country was paralyzed. He trusted that delay would be apparent no longer; and that the abuse referred to which had been allowed to remain for two years' inoperative would be put into force.

Then there are those who might be disposed to laugh at the interest he manifested in this matter, but he felt it his duty to warn the Government of the evil which was impending over the shipping of Canada if they longer dallied with this important interest, and he placed on the Minister of Marine and this Government the responsibility of any bad results that might follow his failure to put this Act into force.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Why did you not do it yourself!

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the Act was passed in May, 1873, and in the November following the Government were bowled out by hon. gentlemen opposite. If he had remained in power two months' longer the Act would have been in full force, as many other important measures affecting our marine interests now were. The Hon. Minister of Marine went to St. John and told the shipowners he would adhere to the legislation of his predecessors, and believed such legislation was right, but the hon. gentleman was too easy and good-natured. He knew what was right, but was a little weak in the knees in not insisting upon carrying it out.

He (Mr. Mitchell) was willing to venture his experience as a public man on the future of this question. If the hon. gentleman relied upon getting the British Government and Parliament to include foreign shipping in the legislation they were now adopting, he was mistaken and Canadian shipowners would be left in the lurch. The complications arising from such an attempt would be so serious that every prominent officer in the Foreign Department and Board of Trade would set himself against it, and when this occurred in England with respect to any measure, it was almost impossible to carry it out. The hon. gentleman knew how he was himself controlled in that way, as every Minister but the Premier was by the officers of his Department.

The only true course for the Government to pursue was to put their foot down and say we have rights in this matter conceded to us by the British North America Act, and had acted on them, and did not desire their legislation to interfere with us. If that policy were adhered to, he felt satisfied the people and Parliament of England would adopt the principle, but a weak-kneed course would lead them to suppose we did not wish to insist upon our rights. The crisis at this moment was such if the Government consulted the true interest of Canada they would at once send the Minister of Marine to England, while this legislation was going on, with a strong remonstrance from the Parliament of Canada against the shipping of this country being affected by it. If he would do this, and put the Inspection of Shipping Act in force, he would confer a great benefit on Canada.

Mr. McLEOD said he had too much consideration for the time of this House to consume as much of it as had the hon. member for Northumberland in the discussion of this question, nor would he attempt to follow the hon. gentleman throughout his long and rambling speech. He would briefly and to the point refer to some of the subjects raised by the hon. member. He was aware that a petition numerously signed by the shipowners of St. John had been forwarded to Ottawa, asking for the establishment of a Canadian Lloyds, but it was got up under momentary excitement in the belief that the Plimsoll Bill would act injuriously to Canadian tonnage. The moment that excitement died out our shipowners began to realize the risk to which they exposed themselves by having their tonnage placed under Government control. From that moment petitions were sent in against it, not only from St. John, but from every port in the Maritime Provinces. In looking over the memorial of the Board of Trade of Saint John, presented to the Government in May, 1873, he was surprised to find only two clauses of it embraced in the despatch of May 14th, 1873; and so far from having asked for Canadian Lloyds, no such thing was required. They simply asked the Canadian Government to prevent hasty legislation such as the Plimsoll Bill then before Parliament, and that vessels classed in Bureau Veritas should be recognized. The hon. gentleman, instead of doing that, simply referred at some length to the necessity of a Canadian classification, in which opinion he was almost alone. What the people of the Maritime Provinces feared was that in any legislation by the Government of Great Britain, Bureau Veritas would not be recognized by the Imperial Parliament. On looking over this correspondence he was surprised to find that the hon. member for Northumberland asked that Bureau Veritas be not recognized in England.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I approve of that.

Mr. McLEOD said he was glad to hear this from one who assumed to be the champion of the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces, and it was desirable that the shipbuilders and owners of the Maritime Provinces should know that the hon. member for Northumberland was the man who, in his official capacity, advised the British Government not to recognize Bureau Veritas.

It was well that the shipowners of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should know to what extent they were under obligation to the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. gentleman complained that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries had not put the Act passed by the late Government establishing Canadian Lloyds into operation, stating that it was the one link required to make the shipping laws of our country perfect. He (Mr. McLeod) believed that the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries had acted with good sense, knowing that a strong feeling existed against it in the Maritime Provinces. He was surprised his hon. friend should undertake to cure the evil by the establishing of Canadian Lloyds. He ought to know that the Imperial legislation recognized no classification whatever. They properly took the position that the shipowner should be allowed to conduct his own business with the same freedom as any other trade; but at the same time they held that a shipowner should be responsible for that freedom. Mr. Plimsoll desired to put the responsibility on the Government, and the Government desired to put the responsibility on the shipowners. The hon. gentleman ought to know that of the 750,000 tons of steamers at the port of Liverpool, some 450,000 were not classified at all. That, therefore, destroyed the argument that the necessary link to perfect our system, and free Canadian ships from interference of Imperial legislation was the establishment of a Canadian Lloyds. It was time the British Act did not deal with the question of foreign tonnage. This was a most important point to Canadian interests, and the laws which applied to Canadian vessels in the ports of Great Britain should also apply to foreign vessels. The Board of Trade of St. John, at a meeting held February 19, 1876, approved of the despatch sent by the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There was one point urged at that meeting very properly, and he trusted that it would be listened to by this Government. They sent a petition asking the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to visit Great Britain with a view of looking after our interest in any legislation that might take place.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—We agree on that point.

Mr. McLEOD said there was another motion on the notice paper relating to the subject, and he thought it was not advisable now, seeing the thing was in the hands of the Government, to take the responsibility away from them by any resolution of the House. He desired then to move the following amendment:—

Resolved, That all words after “that” be struck out and the following substituted:—“The despatch forwarded by the Government of the Dominion to Lord Carnarvon dated 8th February, 1876, is approved, and that the House express a hope that the views therein contained will be adopted by the Imperial Parliament in any legislation affecting the British Merchant Shipping.”

Mr. PALMER was sorry that his hon. friend from Northumberland thought proper to bring forward this resolution. He was sorry there should be any dispute on this question, and did not think the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries should be charged with neglecting the shipping interests of the Dominion. Both the present and the last Minister of Marine and Fisheries had done every thing in their power. He regarded the second part of his hon. friend's resolution nullified the first, because he asked the English Government to legislate on a subject on which he denied their right to legislate. The importance of the shipping interests of the Dominion could not be over estimated, and the rights of ship-owners should be carefully preserved if the property of the country was not to be destroyed.

For the last twenty-five years these interests had been injured by British legislation, though he did not mean to say that this was done intentionally. He agreed with his hon. friend from Bothwell with regard to our rights of legislation, and so much so, that he had been accused in his own city of entertaining a desire for the separation of this country from England; but as to this he declared—let the interests of every ship-owner in the Dominion be ruined, rather than have such a culmination brought about. He believed that the position he took was entirely compatible with that we proudly occupied in connection with this great Empire. Recent legislation had crippled not only the shipping interests of the Dominion, but also those of England.

The Mercantile Shipping Gazette, the highest authority in that country in this respect, stated on the 4th of last February in an editorial:—

“That it is the province of those who advise the Crown, and of independent members in their places in Parliament. But the facts adduced and the arguments employed at a recent meeting, all tend to show that the ship-owners understand their case, and that they have not abandoned the position they have taken up. The Government have seen as the direct result—discontent prevailing throughout the entire ship-owning community, and a whole fleet of ships transported to a foreign flag.”

The ship-owners were not running unseaworthy vessels, but they were building a class of ships which were safer year by year. Sir Charles Adderly in introducing the subject in Parliament stated:—“It was said that there was a general “deterioration of our shipping; that “the disasters were traced to the deterioration of our seamen, and that the “amount of loss of life had increased.” The reverse was the case. He had carefully sifted the figures of a writer who was authority on this subject, and the conclusions the writer had come to were chiefly these:—That the British tonnage had trebled since 1835; that British ships clearing in foreign trade were sextupled in the same period; and, again, the sea trade had doubled within the last twenty years; that British ships had increased not only in the trade of the United Kingdom, but had actually been absorbing the trade of other countries which had actually fallen off, and their trade was rapidly falling into the hands of British shipowners. The wrecks which had taken place since 1836 had steadily decreased in proportion to the number of voyages; and the loss of life between 1833 and 1835 was one in every 4,600 tons of foreign trade, whereas between 1870-72 it was one in every 13,000, or three times the amount. In fact the falling off in the loss of life was the most remarkable circumstance in these figures. The correctness of the statements he had made were very creditable to the country at large, and that was the first of four propositions resulting from his enquiries.

Further on Sir Charles declared that it was not unseaworthiness which caused the loss of life and property in the greater number of cases, but in reality the inefficiency of the seamen themselves, who were put on board unfitted by drink to navigate the vessel; and why did not legislation reach this, the greatest wrong felt in this regard? The legislation proposed was in the interest of crimps, who by their system were eating out the vitals of both seamen and ship-owners.

Mr. Plimsoll threatened to introduce another Bill, and no man at present dare invest his capital in ship-building. He agreed with his hon. friend from Northumberland and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that a Canadian Lloyds should be established, and if thoroughly and practically and honestly administered it would be a benefit to the country. At the same time he shared the opinion of his hon. friend from Kent, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should not put such a law in operation in face of the ship-owners who were opposed strongly to the introduction of such a measure, unless, perhaps, there was some little tax upon it. The only thing was to make a classification or inspection and give a certificate as to the exact nature of the ship; but the opinion at present in St. Johns is almost unanimously against the formation of that Canadian Lloyds. What was the proper remedy? It was embodied in the following resolution which he had placed on the journals:—

“That in the opinion of this House the right of Legislation to affect Canadian ships and the rights and liberties of the owners thereof belong exclusively to the Parliament of Canada, and that any Legislation on those subjects by the Imperial Parliament (except as far as may equally affect Canadian ships with the ships of all other countries in ports of Great Britain, and such as may affect Imperial interests) would be inconsistent with such exclusive right of the Canadian Parliament and a violation of Responsible Government as conceded to Canada.”

Mr. PALMER.

He traced that right of legislation as far back as the concession of Responsible Government to the country. The moment the right was conceded to Canada to legislate with reference to her own private affairs where Imperial interests were not affected, it was impossible for the Imperial authorities to legislate on the same subject. It might be argued with regard to the British North America Act, that it was a mere distribution of the powers of legislation between the General and Local Parliaments, and no attempt to create new powers. But the 91st Section of that Act provided that the exclusive legislation of the Dominion extended “to all matters within the “subjects enumerated,” and among those subjects were ships and shipping, and trade and navigation. Although this was a mere distribution of powers, and he submitted to his hon. friend the Minister of Justice whether that was not the recognition of powers which already existed. The first section confined legislation to the “good government “of Canada,” which meant government on the well-known principles of constitutional law. But the legal power and the constitutional right to legislate were two different things, and his argument was that while England had the legal authority to legislate in this case, she had not the constitutional right to do so. In the Merchants Shipping Act there was a distinct clause to the effect that any British possession through its Legislative Assembly can repeal any provision of that Act; it would be absurd if they could repeal it unless they could substitute another provision. In giving the right to Canada to legislate for herself, we acquired the power to legislate just the same as an independent country as regards our own affairs. On this point the following passage from Halleck's Book on International Law was quoted:

“We have already remarked that the exclusive power of civil and criminal legislation is one of the essential rights of every independent and sovereign State. An infringement upon this right is a limitation of the natural sovereignty of the State, and if extended to a general denial of this power, it is justly considered as depriving the State of one of its most essential attributes and as reducing it to the position of dependence upon the will of another.”

The point he made was that the denial of our right to legislate upon one subject was just as much an infringement of our right, as the denial upon others; and if denied, that was a breach of the constitution and its whole safeguards were utterly gone.

Was this confined to the territorial limits of Canada? All knew, with reference to independent States generally, that authority is confined to the territory of such States; but there were limits. The ocean was common to the ships of all countries, and there must be laws to govern those ships, and somebody must have the right to enforce such law. The rule as laid down in this book, page 170, section 24, is that "public and private vessels on the high seas and out of the territorial limits of any other State, are subject to the jurisdiction of the State to which they belong. The ocean is common to all mankind, and may be successively used by all as they may have occasion." The simple point was that public and private vessels on the high seas were subject to the jurisdiction of the State to which they belong. He contended that, constitutionally, Canada could legislate for her own shipping within her own ports, and they were liable to the same laws on the high seas; therefore, what constituted a crime in port was also a crime within the jurisdiction of our Courts when committed on the high seas in a Canadian vessel.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said if we had a Canadian flag it would.

Mr. PALMER said the sovereignty of ships while upon the high seas was exactly the same as the sovereignty of the country to which she belonged. Halleck says on page 171, section 26, "Private vessels of one State entering the ports of another are not in general exempt from local jurisdiction unless by express compact. But there are certain exceptions to this rule, which result from the right of asylum, based on the laws of humanity." It had been said here we were arguing against the right of England legislating in her own port with reference to Canadian ships. He agreed that England would have the right to legislate on the subject in her own ports. He distinguished the constitutional right of England to legislate, which was identical in such regard to Canadian ships, with the right in regard to ships of all other countries; and he trusted that that country was too proud not to grant to us every iota of the constitutional right which we were entitled to. He held that the people of Canada under a Responsible Government had a right to govern themselves or misgovern themselves without the interference of the British authorities, if they chose. If he could think otherwise, he should ask Great Britain to withdraw these powers of legislation from this country, and let them rule us by the Imperial Parliament. Why were the sanitary regulations of our shipping to be subject to Imperial Legislation, and the sanitary condition of our coal mines, our houses and our factories excluded from it?

Now, with reference to our Flag, as though it were involved in the same question, could not a ship be a Canadian ship and British ship at the same time? A man could be a British subject and a Canadian at the same time—and why should they differ? Outside of the Dominions of the British Empire, although a Canadian, you are simply a British subject; and when you apply to the British Consul or Ambassador, he does not enquire whether you come from England or from Canada, and the question in no way bore on the question he was discussing. Then, if you can claim protection in a foreign port from a British Consul as a British subject, why not claim it for British-Canadian shipping. The present Bill introduced in the British House of Commons by Sir Charles Adderly makes it a misdemeanour to send a ship to sea if it is unseaworthy, and more than that, it throws the onus on the owner to prove it is not unseaworthy. This Bill if it became law he considered an outrage. See how it would operate against the shipping of New Brunswick! The ships there were owned by companies, and one of these vessels might be detained in a port—Liverpool for instance—for weeks through malice, before the proprietors could prove their innocence. It was time that this subject should be thoroughly understood and that Canadians should speak out. The principle he contended for was that Canadian ships should not be included in the general mass of British ships in British legislation, that Canadians should legislate for theirs, and that the British legislation for Canadian shipping in British ports should be identical with that for foreign shipping. If the Parliament of this country were left to regulate our own shipping affairs in our own interest, to see that the lives and property of Canadian subjects were safe, and that our ships went to sea in a proper condition, the result would be that an impetus would be given to this trade, as we had the people and the material out of which to build up a splendid navy.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said it was necessary for him to make a few observations in consequence of the remarks of the speakers who preceded him. He understood the hon. member for St. John to say that the Bill which is now before the British House of Commons making it a misdemeanour for any persons who are guilty of sending an unseaworthy ship to sea was an outrage.

Mr. PALMER said that was not his objection; what he considered the outrage was throwing the onus of proof of his innocence on the proprietor of the vessel.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said a law identical with it had been on the Statute Book of this Dominion for two years.

The hon. member for St. John was in error in supposing we had the power of coasting trade prior to 1869. Since 1853, and up to 1869, it was regulated by Imperial legislation. In the latter year an Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament authorizing this Dominion to exercise that power, and unless they did so, the coasting trade of this country would be thrown open to the world. His predecessor was in office at the time, and exercised the power given by the Imperial Government. The hon. gentleman seemed to think, under responsible Government, the Imperial authorities had no power to legislate for our vessels in ports of the United Kingdom.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I never said that.

Mr. PALMER.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said in the Act relating to Masters and Mates, the hon. gentleman, instead of exercising the right which he contended we possess, to legislate for ourselves, stated expressly under Her Majesty's will that Act should remain in suspension; and now he claimed that England had no right to legislate for our shipping in her ports.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—What I said was that England, having given us the right to deal with shipping, she ought not and would not interfere with it if proper representations were made.

Hon. Mr. SMITH asked if the hon. gentleman claimed by the British North America Act that right was given to us, why did he suspend the operation of laws passed by this Parliament?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I will give the reasons for it.

Hon. Mr. SMITH called his hon. friend's attention to the Act relating to the shipping of seamen, which also contained a suspending clause. If we had the right claimed by him, why did he abandon it in both of these Acts? In the measures relating to deck-loads and the loading of grain, the hon. member claimed the right to legislate for English vessels in our ports, yet he denied the right of England to legislate for our vessels in her ports.

He (Mr. Smith) had always been in favour of the establishment of a Canadian Lloyds, but he could not deny there was a widespread feeling among ship-owners against it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said if the hon. gentleman could see the files in the Marine Department he would find the great majority of the ship-owners were very much opposed to it, and he did hesitate not to say it was on that account he had refused to put the Act in force. Not six weeks ago a large meeting of ship-owners was held in St. John, at which there was an almost unanimous expression of opinion against the establishment of a Canadian Lloyds. He asked this House whether the Government had not shown prudence in yielding to that sentiment.

The hon. gentleman who now wanted exemption altogether for our own shipping, simply asked in his dispatch to the Imperial Government that Canadian vessels be exempted for twelve months. Notwithstanding that the present Government forwarded a dispatch asking that the Imperial legislation should not affect Canadian shipping, but it had no effect, because last Session a Bill was passed ignoring altogether our request. On reflection he (Mr. Smith) did not think it reasonable to ask England to exempt Canadian shipping.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Why did you do it, then?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I have explained the circumstances. We found the remonstrances of the Government of this country had no effect.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Because you did not follow them up.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he had followed them up, but notwithstanding that, the British Government passed their Bill without regarding them. Mr. Plimsoll seemed to have control of the public mind, and even of Parliament, notwithstanding the powerful influence of the British ship-owners.

He believed Mr. Plimsoll was the cause of the adoption of the present Bill and some of its provisions were forced on the Government. He (Mr. Smith) did not think it would be in the interest of Canadian ship-owners to exempt them from Imperial legislation, and was satisfied it would be unwise to separate the Flag, because they knew the prestige it gave them in foreign countries, and whenever English ships got into trouble in foreign waters they only had to appeal to the British Consul for assistance. He could not see that the Bill contained any provisions that were inimical to the shipping of Canada. He did not hesitate to say that if they would only make the law applicable to foreign ships it would be a great benefit. The marked feeling which existed in England was not engendered by Canadian ships. When a Canadian ship got unseaworthy she was sent to England, sold and transferred to the English register. The matter of load-lines was one of some inconvenience, but it was not a great hardship. It was simply a contract between the owner of the ship and the sailor. Then as to the deck-line there was no hardship and it gave very little trouble. Another objection was that the vessels were subject to survey and inspection by officers appointed by the Board of Trade. One quarter of the sailors could detain a vessel on complaint, but in Canada we also had a law by which a quarter of the sailors could detain a ship. Then a foreign vessel coming into the port of Montreal could be supervised by the Port Warden. Therefore no objection could be offered to the two last regulations which were to be found on the Canadian Statute Book. Ships coming from England to Canada were subject to the laws of the Dominion, and why should Canadians ask that their ships should be free from English legislation in English ports? The despatch dated the 18th of February, and forwarded to England, had met with general approval throughout the whole Dominion, and by the ship-owners in almost every part of it. It seemed to him that the true interest of the ship-owners should be to ask the British Government to make no special discrimination between foreign and Canadian shipping, and to approve of the amendment which had been offered to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he thought the hon. member for Kent, when he asked them to endorse every word in the despatch of the 8th February, was asking too much. He was sure three-fourths of the House had never read the despatch.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—They ought to have done so.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—No doubt; but the hon. gentleman knew that there were many other despatches and documents which are not read. Members have not and cannot get time for the task. The despatch would not appear in the journals, and out of 206 members they would not find twenty who would be able to lay their hands on it and give their reasons for voting. He moved the following amendment to the amendment:—That all words after "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted:—
"In the opinion of this House it is "desirable that the Government should continue the efforts made by the late and present Governments to insure the exemption of Canadian shipping from the effects of Imperial legislation calculated to place Canadian shipping at a disadvantage with foreign ships in British and foreign waters."

Mr. PALMER stated that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had made a rather fierce and entirely uncalled for attack on him. He was surprised at the position the hon. gentleman had taken with regard to the legal question. He, of course, admired the extraordinary knowledge of the lawyer, but they all knew that the privileges granted foreign vessels with regard to the coasting trade, and the rights of foreign ships in British waters, were entirely a matter of Imperial legislation. Another of the hon. gentleman's arguments had been equally abstruse to the effect that legislation on this subject was to be reserved for the special assent of the Queen in Council. He had never heard before the argument that a subject concerning which the Canadian Parliament had power to act without any delay, should be so reserved. He had imagined that the greatest tyro in the world would have known more of constitutional law. He had been misrepresented touching another matter. The hon. gentleman had said that he held that the Imperial Government had no power to legislate with reference to ships in their own waters. So far from this being the case, he had declared the very opposite over and over again. Canadians should have the exclusive right of legislation with reference to Canadian shipping; this ought not to be left in the charge of persons who had no interest in, and who might have interests which are entirely hostile to it. The English ship-owners invested in iron, and the Candians in wooden ships. The Imperial Parliament had control over British ships everywhere, and the result might be that if Canada legislated in this relation, we might have laws entirely dissimilar and antagonistic to those of Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said notwithstanding the very lucid and clear exposition of our constitutional rights of the hon. member for St. John, who spoke ex cathedra on this very important question, he did not explain the point he took. Since the establishment of Responsible Government the various British possessions in America had the right to deal with the subject and exercise the right of exclusively legislating with relation to British shipping. England did not legislate in Canada with reference to foreign ships in our waters; we had this matter in our own hands.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—By the passage of an Imperial Act?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Certainly. When the hon. gentleman said the Queen has power to disallow any Act, that was, of course, very important information. The hon. gentleman did not seem to know the distinction between the right of disallowing an Act and one with which there is connected a suspending clause. As to the amendment, it really did not cover the ground. While in the abstract it was very well, the hon. member would recognise that it was confined to a particular point. The hon. member had read various suggestions from the despatch in question, but he might say that these had received the approval of the ship-owners of the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Of a few ship-owners of St. John.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Of St. John and of the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought it very desirable that the House should come to a conclusion in this connection, consistent with the provisions of the British North America Act, and satisfactory to the general sense of the House and of the country. However, as the debate had occupied a great deal of time, as those who were not experts in the matter of ship-building had very little opportunity for saying anything at all on the subject, as it was late and another motion would on the morrow probably occupy a little more of their time than they could spare for this purpose every night, actuated by a wish to arrive at a satisfactory result, he moved the adjournment of the debate. The debate was accordingly adjourned.

The House adjourned at Twenty minutes past Eleven p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three p. m.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved that the petition of Frank Smith and others of the City of Toronto, praying for an Act of Incorporation under the name of the British Canadian Loan and Trust Company be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, in conformity with the recommendation of the said Committee in the report presented to-day.

The motion was carried.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. YOUNG (Waterloo)—An Act to Incorporate the British Canadian Loan and Investment Company, (Limited.)

Mr. CURRIER—An Act to Amend the Act incorporating the Ottawa Gas Company, to confirm the resolution of their shareholders placing the preferential and ordinary stock on the same footing; and to confirm, amend and extend their corporate powers.

Mr. VAIL—To Amend Acts therein mentioned respecting Militia and Defense in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CURRIER—Explain.

Mr. VAIL said the Bill explained itself. It was intended to amend the clause that made it incumbent on the Government to make an enrollment of militia during the present year. It was proposed in this Bill to defer the enrollment until 1880, and that enrollments should take place every five years.

Mr. DEVEBER—To incorporate the Maritime Savings and Loan Company.

Mr. NORRIS—To change the name of the Security Permanent Building and Savings Society of St. Catharines to that of the Security Loan and Savings Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) moved the suspension of the rules in order to enable him to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Synod of the Church of England in the Diocese of Rupert's Land.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—An Act to amend the Railway Act of 1868.

Mr. BOWELL—What is the nature of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the object of the Bill was to provide for the appointment of a third arbitrator under certain contingencies not provided against in the existing law.

VIOLENCE, THREATS AND MOLESTATIONS.

The House went into Committee on Bill to amend the Criminal Law relating to violence, threats and molestations; Mr. Mills in the Chair.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had decided not to adopt the suggestions of his hon. friends from Kingston and Cardwell with respect to this clause. He entirely agreed with them as to the importance of preserving to the minority of any trade or occupation its liberties against an improper assertion of the so-called rights of the union or majority, and he would always be ready while he sat in this House to sustain any legislation that time might determine to be necessary for that purpose; but this House might be averse to enact special legislation unless for a real and admitted evil. As far as he knew there was no reason to apprehend that this clause would be inadequate.

The Bill was reported, read the third time and passed.

CROSSING NAVIGABLE RIVERS.

The Bill to make provision for the crossing of navigable waters by railway or other road companies incorporated under Provisional Acts, was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE suggested that the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraphs.

Mr. PALMER said this was a very important Bill and might, if passed, have the effect of injuring the navigation of certain rivers.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he was aware of the importance of the Bill, and his reason for referring to the Standing Committee was to have these clauses thoroughly considered. Of course it could be fully discussed afterwards in the House.

Mr. PALMER said it might be dangerous to put this power in the hands of the Government, and it should apply simply to small navigable streams.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE, in reply to hon. J. H. Cameron, said this Bill took away no right of a company. It was only in case it had no power to build a bridge over a navigable stream that it could apply to the Governor in Council to obtain it.

After some further discussion the Bill was referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraphs.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of the Bill respecting the Intercolonial Railway. He said the only object of this Bill was to remove doubts as to whether the Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway enabled the Government to carry the line into the city of Halifax, as far as the present station that was being built.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had received a telegram from the Halifax City Railway Co., asking that the Bill be postponed until their explanations should arrive.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it merely gave the same power to the Government with respect to expropriation of property, &c., on this extension as they had on the rest of the Intercolonial Railway.

The Bill was read the second time, passed through Committee of the Whole, read the third time and passed.

SUMMARY TRIAL ACT.

The Bill entitled an Act to make other provision as to the more speedy trial in certain cases of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanors in the Provinces of Ontario, was read the second time.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. Laurier in the chair) on the Bill, intituled an Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons. (Resolution, reported from Committee of Whole on the 10th March, referred.)

Hon. Mr. BLAKE, in amendment of the third clause, moved the insertion—after the word "election," in the 9th line on the second page—of the words, "And have annexed thereto a solemn declaration, signed by the petitioners, stating that they are such electors, and that the allegations of the petition are true to the best of their knowledge and belief;" also, the insertion, after the word "being" in the 17th line, of the words, "County Court Judges, or being."

The third clause, as amended, was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE explained that he could not alter the 14th clause with the view of not having the judges specially remunerated for these services, in order to obviate a difficulty suggested by an hon. member. He thought that the mischief arising out of special payments, which were plain and palpable, overbalanced the suggested mischief with regard to the referment of the matter to Commissioners, which was within the control of the House.

The Committee rose and reported, and the Bill, as amended, was read the first time.

SUPPLY.

The Debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Cartwright, that the Speaker leave the chair, and the House go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment, being resumed,

Mr. FLEMING stated that the tariff which had been submitted two years ago had met with severe criticism. In England the tariff introduced by Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone had to pass through the same ordeal, this, however, was not at all unusual. A singular circumstance was noticeable in connection with the deficit. It had been made the subject of rejoicing on the part of a certain portion of the community, who imagined that additional taxation would be rendered necessary, and they would profit thereby. The Leader of the Opposition had framed an amendment in such a manner as to try and catch the largest number of votes. A variety of interpretations might be placed upon it, but for its real meaning, they were obliged to examine the speeches made by its supporters. One member approved of a 20 per cent. tariff, which would be an increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

It had been represented that American goods were placed on the Canadian market at discounts of 20, 30 and 50 per cent.; and if this was the fact, how could it be prevented by such a small increase duty? A national policy had also been mentioned; he did not know that any member on either side of the House would advocate anything else; all our policies were national. It had again been termed a paternal policy—but when the child grew up he was left to his own resources. An imitative policy, it was further termed; but who were we to imitate? Not Great Britain, but the United States! Imitation was said to be the highest flattery; but were we to destroy our shipping interests, of which we boasted so much? In 1873-4 the Americans paid $415,924,580 on imports; and goods admitted free of duty were valued at $179,936,668—$595,861,248 in all, of which 68 per cent. had been carried by foreign vessels. The exports of the United States for the same period amounted to $704,463,120 in value, of which 74 per cent., or $521,394,909 in value were shipped in foreign ships. This would be the condition in which Canada would be placed under a similar system.

Hon. Members spoke of a retaliatory policy. There was a time when, if we had wished, we could have retaliated against the United States. That was upon the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, we could then have excluded the Americans from our canals, and by those means have struck a blow which would have been felt from the shores of Lake Huron to the foot of the Rocky Mountains.

But we did not, and he believed it was well we did not, for if we had, Canada, while injuring them, would have suffered herself. The result of such action would have been to have sent the trade of the West down the Erie Canal to New York. Buffalo would have been built up at the expense of Montreal.

This amendment partook somewhat of the character of a sugar-coated pill. It was to be made palatable by the introduction of the agricultural element. Members had spoken of having received letters from farmers, calling out for protection. He had not been honoured with any such. He had, however, received a letter from one of his constituents in which he said:—"I hope that the Government will be able to carry out their plan of retrenchment and show to the country that it is not an increase in the tariff we need, but economy both on the part of the people and the Government." This gentleman had full opportunity of knowing the sentiments of his neighbours, and he believed that they were those also of the large majority of the farmers in his riding.

A great deal had been said about the benefits of reciprocity, and former speakers had dwelt upon the advantages which would follow free intercourse with the United States. He had no doubt it would be so, but it was simply preposterous to suppose that by putting a duty on American wheat they would be forced to negotiate a Treaty. If the Americans in repealing the old Treaty thought they would force Canada to cry out for annexation they soon found they had made a very grievous error. They put on the screw, but it was a dock-yard screw and only answered the purpose of launching the good ship Confederation. It was asserted this new and undeveloped policy, foreshadowed by the right hon. member for Kingston, would benefit farmers by placing them in the same condition as their neighbours over the line. Now, what was that condition? In the House of Representatives a year or two ago, Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, made the following statement:—

"The farmer starting to his work has a shoe put on his horse with nails taxed at 67 per cent., driven by a hammer taxed 54 per cent.; cuts a stick with a knife taxed 50 per cent.; hitches his horse to a plow taxed 50 per cent., with chains taxed 67 per cent. He returns to his home at night, and lays his wearied limbs on a sheet taxed 58 per cent., and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 250 per cent. He rises in the morning, puts on his humble flannel shirt taxed 80 per cent., his coat taxed 50 per cent., shoes taxed 35 per cent., and hat taxed 70 per cent.; opens family worship by a chapter from his Bible taxed 25 per cent., and kneels to his God on an humble carpet taxed 150 per cent. He sits down to his humble meal from a plate taxed 40 per cent., with knife and fork 35 per cent.; drinks his cup of coffee taxed 47 per cent., or tea 78 per cent., with sugar 70 per cent.; seasons his food with salt taxed 100 per cent., pepper 297 per cent., or spice 379 per cent. He looks around, upon his wife and children all taxed in the same way; takes a chew of tobacco taxed at 100 per cent., or lights a cigar taxed 120 per cent., and then thanks his stars that he lives in the freest and best Government under Heaven."

The right hon. member for Kingston has said that there was, in his estimation, no life in the world more happy and enviable than a farmer's, under the circumstances in which he is placed in Canada; and yet he would change his condition and place him under a burthen of taxation like his American brother.

He (Mr. Fleming) had always supposed that the right hon. member for Kingston had, during his long term of office, followed the policy of Great Britain as far as the circumstances of the country would admit. In proof of this, he would call attention to the policy of the late Government as indicated by the Budget Speeches of its Finance Ministers. In 1859 Sir A. T. Galt announced a deficit of over $2,400,000 and increased the tariff for revenue purposes; however, he said at the same time, he did not believe a protective policy was best in this country, situated as we were in close proximity to the United States. Again in 1866, Sir A. T. Galt, in his Budget Speech, stated:—"We have the choice of the American system or the European. If we take the United States system of protective duties, of protecting everything, every branch of industry, we shall to a certain extent assimilate our system with theirs, a course which I do not think this country will approve. On the other hand, if we adopt what I call the European system—because the policy of England is now being generally adopted by other European countries—if we adopt that system as opposed to the American system then, I think, we shall stand in

MR. FLEMING.

"the position of offering to the people and the capital, which for various causes are now seeking new homes and employment, a country possessing more advantages than any other on the continent." At that time a duty of fifty cents per barrel was put upon flour, and ten cents on corn and other coarse grains. The avowed object of this duty was to bring the Americans to terms. It had, however, no effect. In 1868 the duty was taken off. The right hon. member for Kingston said in the House on the occasion of its repeal, that the flour tax had been imposed as an assertion of the independence of the country against American exclusive legislation. It had been maintained with this view until it had been found to work oppressively in certain sections of the community, and was now repealed as a step in the right direction.

In 1868 this was taken off; it had been stated that it was imposed to show the Americans that we intended to act as we pleased; but when it was found to oppress a certain portion of our people it was removed. This was said by the right hon. member for Kingston, who declared further that it was a step in the right direction.

Advocates of protection had announced that though now defeated they would educate the country up to the proper point, and carry the next elections on this policy, but what sort of education would it be to teach people not to depend upon themselves, but upon others? The best training for a young man was in the way of cultivating self-respect and self-reliance; and the same principle held good with regard to manufactures and citizens generally. He was not aware that after all the manufactures were suffering so very severely, and he advised them to follow the example of the Canadian farmers of 1857, when placed under similar circumstances. A poor crop was succeeded by a falling market. The price of wheat had fallen one-half in Toronto within the space of four months; and what did they do? They did not fold their hands; but finding that the growth of wheat was not profitable, they turned their attention to darying and stock-raising; and in consequence soon restored themselves to prosperity.

One cause of the present trouble, he believed, lay in the belief of manufacturers that they ought to secure a larger percentage of profit than others obtained from their investments. He did not think that the Government had any right to interfere with the profits of capital. To show the condition of several manufactures, he begged to submit the following statistics, taken from the last Census:—

“The manufacturer of agricultural implements occupied 252 establishments, 2,546 hands, employed $1,104,308 capital, paid in wages $556,084; value of raw material, $889,847, and of manufactured do. $2,685,392; percentage of profit on capital, 85. Manufacture of boots and shoes 4,191 establishments, 18,719 hands, and $3,266,633 of capital and $4,159,896 wages; had raw material valued at $7,927,155, and manufacture valued at $16,133,638; percentage of profit on capital 123. Cabinet and furniture making employed 854 establishments, 4,366 hands, $2,050,175 of capital, paid $1,189,435 in wages. Value of raw material, $1,414,774, and of manufactured $3,580,978; percentage of profit 46. Chemical establishments gave employment to 202 hands, $465,900 capital, and paid $64,076 in wages. Value of raw material, $475,538, and of manufactured $816,250. Percentage of profit 59. There were 8 cotton factories, employing 745 hands and $632,000 capital, and paying $129,400 in wages. Value of raw material $462,000, of manufactured $781,000; percentage of profit 30. There are 2,295 flour and grist mills, employing 4,992 hands, and $9,929,898 capital, paying $1,282,879 in wages. Value of raw material $32,474,548, and of manufactured $39,135,919; percentage of profit 54. Foundries and machine shops had 430 establishments, employing 7,653 hands, $3,760,505 capital, and paying $2,429,815 in wages. Value of raw material $2,427,423, of manufactured $7,325,531; percentage of profit 65. There are 4 sugar refiners employing 359 hands, $425,000, and paying $118,200 in wages. Value of raw material $3,706,000, of manufactured $4,132,750; percentage of profit 70. Tanneries had 1,142 establishments employing 4,207 hands, and $2,656,163 capital, and paying $1,056,204 in wages. Value of raw material $5,712,642, and of manufactured $9,184,932; percentage of profit 90. Wool cloth making employed 270 establishments, 44,153 hands, and $2,776,814 capital; paid $917,837 wages. Value of raw material $3,217,068, and of manufactured $5,507,549; percentage of profit 50. Of nail and tack factories there are 15, employing $191,870. Value of raw material $707,080, and of manufactured $1,147,380; percentage of profit 64.”

If these statistics were correct, manufacturers could afford to bear with a year or two of depression. A great deal had been said about the control of the home market, but in the United States the boot and shoe manufacturers, who had complete control of their own market, in 1871 petitioned Congress, stating that the duties placed on articles used in connection with their business, which yielded three and a half millions, while the taxes imposed upon it amounted to eight millions; and this the Administration was reminded, must eventually be borne by the wearers of these articles. On leather was 35 per cent.; on cotton and silk rubber 35 and 50 per cent. respectively; and on lastings and serges, 8 per cent., while these were manufactured by only two establishments in the country.

“We believe,” these manufacturers continued, “that the entire removal of all protective duties would greatly advance our industry, as we should then have the markets of the world to sell our products, thus largely increasing the labour employed and the profits of manufacturing.”

This was signed by the proprietors of 122 factories in Lynn; 15 in Beverly; 22 in Worcester; 96 in Haverdale; 35 in Marblehead, and 84 in the city of Boston—all of Massachusetts; and by 3 in the town of Portsmouth, and by 7 in Dover—both of New Hampshire, numbering 384 of the largest factories in these States.

The present tariff should receive a longer trial. Frequent changes were injurious. Manufacturers should depend more upon their own energies and business capacity than they were disposed to do.

He would quote from a speech made by Mr. Dobell, of Quebec, at the recent annual meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade:—

“The sugar refineries of England have been suffering lately from the competition of beet root sugar imported from France. They did not clamor for protection, but met together and resolved to improve their machinery, manage their establishments more economically, and notwithstanding the bounty offered to the sugar interest in France, still compete with them. For a time,

“one of the locomotive manufactures of England was closed because labour was so high. Locomotives were imported from Belgium cheaper than they could produce them. Did you find the English manufactures rush to the Government for protection? Not at all. They took the sound practical course of business men—cut down expenses, and by their wise policy regained prosperity.”

Our country possessed immense advantages, and almost inexhaustible resources, and he hoped, and was confident, that by economy, both public and private, it would in due time be raised to the position occupied by the most flourishing nations of the earth.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) stated that his hon. friend from Brant had read statistics showing the state of things as they existed in 1871, but he had not told the House that the country was then universally prosperous.

Adversity, however, was now the rule, and every one complained in consequence. He would not affirm that the change was due to the change which had taken place in the Administration; but it was, nevertheless, strange that when we had what was called a corrupt Government prosperity reigned, while since 1873 we possessed what was called a pure Government combined with adversity. He only gave the facts and allowed hon. members to draw their own inferences.

The discussion had been principally confined to the questions of free-trade and protection; but these were not at all at issue. If it was so, he would unhesitatingly avow himself a Free-Trader; and if any hon. gentleman was prepared to advocate free-trade—with its necessary consequence, direct taxation—he would support him. He, however, believed they could get free-trade by a better method, and without direct taxation. The issue now before the people was a question of tariffs. What he contended for was a readjustment of the burdens and not an increase of taxation. It was said that a taxable bread meant an increase in the cost of bread to the consumer. If, however, the price of bread were reduced that interfered with the ability of the producer to purchase other articles he might require to live upon. The advocates of free-trade in Manchester did so, not because the artisans might get more bread, but because they might get bread cheaper, so that they might be able to work cheaper, and in that way make Manchester the great emporium of the world for certain manufactures. Free-trade in England had operated to the detriment of English artisans, and a dispute had arisen between Free-traders and Protectionists as to whether it would not be advisable for England to adopt a policy that would put her artisans on a better footing than that which they had at present. It had been said that the position of Canada was far less dangerous now than it was two or three years ago. With this proposition in one respect he agreed. It was in a less dangerous position, because that which was feared had come. The crisis had come, and the danger was past, but the crisis was followed with a fearful result. Two or three years ago we had prosperity; now ruin had overtaken many, and there was no such thing as prosperity. Those who put forward the Provincial view of the case did not act like statesmen. The duty of a statesman was to view the Dominion as a whole and legislate accordingly. Anything affecting injuriously a portion of the Dominion, affected the whole of it. It was said the country would recover from the commercial squall by which it had been struck. He had no doubt that after the ruin had passed away the country itself would remain, but how would it be with those who had lost their all through the violence of the tornado? It was said that it was an evidence of the prosperity of this country that Canada could negotiate a loan on the London market at a favourable rate of interest. He regretted that the country had borrowed money, for borrowing must prove injurious to any country. But the reason that this money had been obtained at rates so very favourable in England was because the Government which had preceded the hon. gentlemen had succeeded in carrying on the business of the country, in increasing the revenue, and at the same time decreasing axation. It had been said that borrowing money in England added to the permanent capital of this country. This proposition he regarded as an absurdity. Again, it was argued that the policy of the Government was one of justice. Now, he would ask was it a policy of justice to allow other nations to have an advantage over us in our commercial relations with them? The United States were allowed to have an advantage over us in every respect. Everything we sent over to them they taxed, and many things they sent to Canada were admitted free. Was that justice to the people of Canada? He regarded it as a remarkable argument that in six years, time the country might be in as prosperous a condition as it was in 1871. So that in two years of radical rule, under what was called a Reform Government, the country had retrograded so much that it would take it ten years to recover. If this was reform the people might well say—from all such reform Good Lord deliver us. This was a peculiar kind of progress. The Finance Minister, to a certain extent, was responsible for the condition of affairs in the Dominion. In our commercial condition which was largely based on credit, confidence was essentially necessary to prosperity, but the Hon Minister of Finance struck a blow at confidence in his first Budget Speech. In answer to the question, what could be done to assist the country in its present crisis, he would respond, send for Sir Francis Hinks. Put him in the position of the Minister of Finance and he would institute order at once and restore the finances and credit of the country. He had restored the financial condition of the country twice and could do it again. The present depressed condition was the offspring of human legislation, and by human legislation prosperity can be restored. But before the disease could be cured the cause of the disease must be ascertained. Over-production was given as one reason for our depressed condition, but this he did not believe. Production created happiness, and excessive production must create greater happiness, and on the principle that like produced like, it was impossible for happiness to create misery.

It could not be said that inflation was the cause, for they might look back to the periods between 1851-55, and 1869-73, when inflation was said to exist, and ask if we had suffering then? No; we had prosperity, and all that would seem to be wanting to secure perpetual prosperity would be continuous inflation. Over-importation was only a secondary cause; it did not matter how much we imported if we could only pay for it. He believed that the banks had largely contributed to bringing about depression; the circulating medium in Canada in all amounted to 28,000,000, and all the rest of their capital was used by importers. The banks had injured the country in another way; the depression began in September, 1873, when we should have been prosperous, because the lumbermen were getting their returns and the produce of the farm was coming to market, and money should have been plentiful; but the banks had taken capital to New York where they speculated in gold. The Government should control these institutions, and prevent them carrying capital out of the country. They could do so by refusing to grant them more privileges than private money lenders could secure if such a policy were pursued. Another reason given for the depression was shrinkages in value; these might be either legitimate or illegitimate; loss through wear and tear and decreased cost of production were legitimate, but a pure decline in the price of an article made for sale was illegitimate shrinkage, meaning ruin, perhaps, to the manufacturer. This was the case at present in connection with our industrial interests; and illegitimate shrinkage signified disaster to the manufacturers, and possibly starvation to the operatives. The Government should take this question into their serious consideration, and institute a new order of things preventing such shrinkage.

Two years ago the hon. gentlemen opposite were taken on credit by this country on their professions of honesty and ability to govern, but they had shrunk immediately in value in public estimation. Only a short time ago they were able to carry the Montreal constituencies, but there was a shrinkage of value there. It was the same in Hamilton.

Mr. WOOD—No! no!

Mr. WALLACE said they were shrinking in value throughout the country very fast, and they would feel it when they were swept out of the Treasury Benches, as he believed they would be next election, and the sooner that happened the better for the country. He might illustrate this shrinkage in another matter. When the hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition they said the Pacific Railway should be built by a private company or not at all, but when they crossed the floor of the House they made it a Government work. He believed that was the proper way to build it, but they shrunk in value because of their inconsistency. Again, when in Opposition they declared no contracts should be let without the sanction of Parliament, but in power they let contracts without consulting the people's representatives, and they did many things they previously professed to abhor. They were therefore shrinking in value. It was a legitimate shrinkage caused by their own acts.

It was said the slaughtering of foreign goods in our markets was one cause of the depression. It was impossible to prevent this, however, by legislation. In his opinion another cause, and a very important one, of the prevailing distress was the false system of credit in the country. Our banks lend their credit when their capital stock is gone. In prosperous times they induce men to go into speculation upon bank credit, and this system led to much evil. The only way to prevent this was by devising a monetary system that would be expansive and keep pace with the industry of the country. Money moves industry. Take away the motor and the industry ceases to move. When we have no money industry collapses and depression is universal. He believed we could introduce a system of money which would render credit unnecessary. But before such a system could be introduced it was necessary to know what money is. Now what was money? He would say negatively it was nothing. It could be made out of almost anything and, therefore, it was nothing in itself. It was neither the product of nature nor of industry, but the creation of Governments by which to measure value, and to facilitate the exchange of values. But a measure to be of use must be a fixed quantity, and gold being subject to the laws of supply and demand, did not answer that requirement. Gold could measure nothing, because a starving man would give all the gold in the world for a loaf of bread. Now, the true value of any article is the labour it costs to produce it, and the true measure of its value is its usefulness to man—just what a man would give for it. It is unjust to take one value and make it the measure of all other values, because it gives it a supremacy over all other values, and as gold is made the measure and it bears no proportion to all the other values, the system tends to the depreciation of these values—the restriction of production—the prevention of happiness and the creation of misery. He held the suffering of this country and the depression of trade throughout the world is due to the false monetary system by which commerce is regulated. Our money is unequal to the task of measuring the industry of the world, and we have to supplement it by credit. He would introduce money of the least value possible because the less value it was the truer measure it would be. Paper money, therefore, was the best, because it was the of least value, and was less subject to the law of supply and demand than any other. Paper money bought everything in the United States, and was, therefore, not the "vicious and irredeemable currency" which an hon. gentleman in the debate had tried to represent it. It was plain that money of this kind which would buy all a man wanted and pay all his debts was good enough.

At Six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WALLACE continued, stating that the system of paper money was the best because its value was small, and it was easy of transportation. It might be said that it would be good only among ourselves; but no money was good out of the country where it was created—it mattered not whether it was of gold, silver, or paper, we did not hesitate to take greenbacks, although we knew that we could not go to the States and get gold for them; they possessed a purchasing power, and could buy gold as well as anything else. The purchasing power of gold was regulated by the law of supply and demand; if scarce, this was increased; if abundant, it was lessened. They would be told of depreciated money; but this was not so bad as depreciated values. If we over imported, money was scarce, property was sacrificed, trade collapsed, and ruin, as at present, prostrated the country; if such a currency existed no one felt it except those who wished to have gold—the importers; and was it not right that the men who caused the ruin should so suffer for their recklessness? If the price of gold was increased the price of imported goods was also increased, and this gave protection and a stimulus to home industries; this was the true system of protection, making industry protect itself, instead of by taxation, which benefitted neither producer nor consumer, but was only a burden. It was far better to collect revenue by direct taxation than by Customs duties, as the cost of collection was thereby saved. The Government should be carried on in a manner more conducive to the interests of the country than at present; money should be issued representing the labour of persons employed by the Administration. The Customs system created a host of revenue officers, non-producers, who, like locusts, preyed upon the country's vitals. Was it more dangerous to empower the Government to issue money than to borrow? He thought not, and that it would be better to issue legal tender notes for twenty millions than to borrow this amount. Circulation would thereby be increased, production be stimulated, and industry benefitted; while borrowing sent money out of the country to pay the interest merely, year after year, to our disadvantage. There could be no comparison between the systems. It had become more profitable to speculate in money than to invest manufactures; and the consequence was that a horde of money-lenders had been created, who were non-producers, preying upon the industry of the people.

Borrowing money was only discounting the future, and for the construction of our public works, we might discount future by borrowing from ourselves, for although we had no money we had what was better—we had an immensity of wealth in our wild lands, our forests and our mines. At the taking of the last census we had real and personal property worth $1,028,000,000; and if we wanted to spend $150,000,000 on public works, we could not realize the great wealth, besides which we had all the wild lands, forests, mines, &c, of the great North-West Territory; yet when we required only eight or ten millions for such purposes, we ran over to England and negotiated a loan. A man would be considered to possess poor business capacity if he had $1,000, and a house and lot worth a couple of hundreds, and still was unable to obtain funds to the extent of $150 for any undertaking—this was the position of Canada. If our credit was sufficient to secure gold with which to buy Canadian labour, why was it not good enough to purchase it without the intervention of gold? Was it because the English people had more faith in our future than we ourselves? He believed that Canadians had full confidence in it. Our legal tender notes were, of course, based upon gold; but this did not amount to more than 25 cents on the dollar. The people did not seek to exchange them for gold, but only wanted to get more of them than they had. Our commercial system, which made us go 3,000 miles to secure coal, which was to be found in the Dominion; import iron when we had it under our feet, and wool when we could grow it, &c., could not be right; but still the Government said it was impossible to change it.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said it was extraordinary that the right hon. member for Kingston should, in the year 1876, place before this intelligent House and country, a proposition to levy protective duties on the agricultural as well as the manufacturing industries of other countries. The effect of putting a tax on both was to protect neither, and the thing was absurd on the face of it. The right hon. member for Kingston was the last defender of the system of imprisonment for debt, and now, in 1876, he wanted to put a tax on corn and wheat. Whatever law was good for 40,000,000 of people would suit 4,000,000. The laws of nature were immutable, and applied to all countries alike. What suited England would suit us, and it was nonsense to say we should shut out the people of other countries from ours. The one thing necessary to ensure manufacturing for Canada, was to open our doors to all countries without reference to their duties against us. By allowing the products of other countries to come freely into Canada, each family would save from one to two hundred dollars a year—say $50,000,000, and as capital reproduced itself three times in the year, that would give $150,000,000 which was lost forever to our people every year by our tariff. The panic in Canada was the result of protection. The interest on money in this country grows every year higher and higher, and there is a something rotten in our system which makes people poorer instead of richer. In the Niagara district, the garden of Canada, all the land in the township where he (Mr. Thompson) lived, could be bought for $50 an acre; forty years ago it was sold for $60 an acre. Under true principles of Government, land would be dear, labour dear, and products cheap; but in Canada to-day land is cheap, labour cheap, and products are dear. The true measure of progress is not the production but the consumption of a people. Every country consumes all it produces, receiving something in return for all it exports. If there was a Chinese Wall built round Canada, so that we could not communicate with another country, our people would continue to accumulate wealth as they do now. Foreign trade is nothing but a swap of products, the merchants being nothing but middlemen who amount to nothing in a nation. The cause of our troubles has been that our laws have been made to suit the merchants instead of the producing classes. This should be altered, and the moment it is done the industrial classes will rise from their present condition, and the country will be free from panics. Canada did not want protection. There never was a country in such a position to throw off the time-honoured principles of protection as Canada. She had the courage, wealth and capacity to do it, and if she refused to take advantage of the situation she was a coward, and would sink in the estimation of the world into a two-and-six-penny colony. He desired to say in regard to the question of money and interest, that it made the rich richer and the poor poorer. Men who partook too much of the character of shysters sat in their miserable offices and actually sapped the independence, liberty and intelligence of the whole country by their 7, 8, and 10 per cent. principles. There the difficulty lay. He was quite satisfied that it was possible for a Government like this to make such a system of currency as would credit the exception and not the rule. No legislation that protected the rich man only would be satisfactory to the country. The rich man could take care of himself, and legislation was required to elevate to his true dignity the working man.

Mr. BERTRAM said that if instead of adopting the advice of the hon. member for South Norfolk, to send for Sir Francis Hincks to take the place of the Minister of Finance, the Government were to send an invitation across the House, the hon. gentleman himself might consent to fill the honourable office. The hon. gentleman had also spoken of the extraordinary shrinkage which had taken place in values, and had spoken of shrinkage as consisting of two kinds, legitimate and illegitimate. He (Mr. Bertram) thought it would be a good thing for the House to know the opinion of the hon. gentleman as to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the shrinkage which took place in the famous Governmental fall of 1873. The question to which the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston gave rise was one of great importance, and one which should be approached with very grave consideration indeed. That motion, if it meant anything, meant they should overturn the present system and adopt a protective tariff. It was well that they had the experience of the United States and England to guide them in the consideration of this subject. It would, however, be unwise for them in considering the present condition of the country to forget the differences of the condition existing in the three countries. It was well known that land in England was very dear in comparison with Canada, and that money was more plentiful and much cheaper than here. This gave a great advantage to farmers and manufacturers in Canada, and if they examined into the condition of Great Britain they would see she was passing through a crisis almost of the self-same kind as that which Canada has been subjected to.

There was nothing extraordinary in England being in its present condition; which was due, as had been the case frequently, to over-production. In the United States, the circumstances were somewhat different—over-production being combined with an inflated currency and shrinkage in the value of real estate. The crisis commenced there about two and a half years ago, and though they boasted of immense recuperative power and resources, their position was still but slightly changed, while with us the effects were far less grave. We had prospered under our present system, and he did not care whether it was termed incidental protection or modified free-trade, as there was nothing in the mere name. It had given us an elastic revenue, and encouragement to our manufacturers. By this amendment, the right hon. gentleman sought to overturn what he and his friends had built up, acting the part of an iconoclast. If it passed the parties should change names, as the Government would represent the Conservative party of Canada.

The right hon. gentlemen stated that we should all take an interest in Canadian manufacturers; this was quite right, but it was only one half of the truth, for we should also take a deep interest in every individual in the Dominion. The right hon. gentleman further said, that we should encourage, assist, and support our farmers in their needs; these were fine sentiments, which he was sure every hon. member would endorse; but fine words alone would not do. We were asked directly to exclude American produce from our market; and one reason given in this relation, was rather extraordinary, viz:—that at least it would do no harm. This was inconsequential; and what good would it do? this it was the duty of the advocates of such a policy to show the exclusion of Indian corn was urged on the ground that our farmers would then raise rye, to be used by our distillers; but was it expedient that our wealth and labour should be employed in producing rye, when whiskey could be made of corn with one-half the labour? He thought not. It had been asserted that the farmers paid the present duty of 15 cents per bushel on barley sent into the United States, but he believed that he could prove that it was paid by the Americans. He took wheat as a standard of value for farm products, its price was regulated by that which obtained in Europe. We competed in this article with the United States in Liverpool; and it stood to reason that our farmers would not grow barley if they could get more money for it than wheat. The actual facts were that Canada was yearly exporting a larger quantity of the former; and he considered this was the clearest possible proof that the farmers found it to their advantage to do so; therefore the Americans paid that duty themselves.

An article had been read to show that foreign were replacing English goods in Great Britain, and that these free-traders would soon be demanding protection. This might be so; but one thing would surely happen when England changed her policy in this respect; when she only manufactured for her own consumption, she would rank with Spain in the world's estimation, and in a few years hence the proverbial New Zealander might be seen standing on London Bridge. There was no doubt that a small quantity of Belgian iron had been imported into England, but this was due to the strikes and demands for increased wages in the latter country. If the English manufacturers desired to keep the foreign trade in connection with certain articles, they should pay more attention to their designs, &c., for instance: At present electro-plated ware was largely brought into the Dominion from the United States, whereas, not many years ago, it had been imported from England. And why? Because the British manufacturer kept in the old grooves, while the Americans had secured new designs and new metal.

One reason was as good as fifty, and he had given one why English manufactures were being superseded in particular classes by those of the United States.

The neighbouring country was par excellence one of protection, and what was the result of the system there? In the iron trade there were at this day millions of dollars worse than idle. When the Morrell tariff was first brought into operation it gave such an impetus to industries, and the profits of manufacturing were so enormous that numbers rushed into such employment. The result was where there was only one or two manufacturing establishments of a particular kind, they combined for the purpose of simply robbing the people, and where there were a good many, the competition was so keen that the strongest only survived, the rest being ruined. When prosperity again returns this will be repeated, more people will go into those industries, and the extreme competition will end the same way. The position of this country was different, being neither one of free-trade as in England, nor protection as in the United States. Our duties being very small prevent our manufactures from realizing more than fair living profits. As an illustration of the results which sometimes arise from a high protective tariff, he referred to the combination of the coalminers of Pennsylvania a few years ago to obtain $2 per ton more than a reasonable profit for coal. If the Nova Scotia coal had not been excluded from the markets of the United States, the poor classes of the New England States and New York would have felt the benefits of competition in the cheapness of fuel.

He could not take his seat without expressing the pleasure with which he had heard the announcement of the Finance Minister that the deficiency of the revenue was to be met by economy and not by increased taxation. That policy would be sustained not only by the House but by a majority of the people throughout the Dominion.

Mr. McNAB stated that the question under consideration was most important to the farmers, of whom he was one; he had also the honour of representing an agricultural constituency. The amendment had been very carefully worded, indicating no particular line of policy beyond an expression of censure with regard to the Government, and only advised a re-adjustment of the tariff. Still they had a right to assume owing to surrounding circumstances, that if carried, its effect would be to increase the duties on certain classes of goods. The Boards of Trade and manufacturers, with singular unanimity, had concluded that the tariff should be raised, but it was to be remembered that the manufacturing and mercantile classes only formed about one-twentieth part of the population; and yet their proposition was to place higher duties on the articles consumed by the other nineteen-twentieths. He was not surprised that this one-twentieth should ask for protection. It would be a good thing for them, though bad for the farmer. But they argued that the agricultural interest would also receive the benefit of protection, and it was alleged they desired it. He had been a farmer for twenty years, was a member of several agricultural societies, and this year held the position of President of the Agricultural and Arts Association of Ontario, yet he had never heard a desire for protection expressed by the farmers of any section of Ontario. They knew that it was not to their interests that this House should adopt any such measure. They reasoned the matter in this way:—"We farmers are the producers, and there is but one-twentieth of our population which consumes our products. It is impossible in the nature of things that these people can control our market, consequently it is to our interest to have such legislation as will enable us to purchase as cheaply as we can, and sell our products at the highest

Mr. BERTRAM.

"attainable prices." If this motion should pass, everything the farmer consumed, everything he purchased in the cities, whether for use in his house, or in his fields, would cost him more. But it was alleged that the tariff would so increase the price of farm products that it would compensate him for the additional cost of his implements and clothing. In Ontario and Quebec we are not importers to any large extent of coarse grains or cattle, and therefore the duties on such articles would neither protect the farmers nor add to the revenue. It had already been shown that the Canadian farmers derived benefit from the free importation of American corn, which was a grain also used in the manufacture of starch. If this House imposed a duty on Indian corn the effect would be to enhance the cost of the raw material to the manufacturer of starch. But assuming, for the sake of argument that the farmer would be benefited by raising the tariff, he would lose ten dollars for every one he gained by the increased taxation.

Now, the farmers of Canada did not that to be protection. If the Government of the country, after carefully considering the matter, found it was necessary in order to meet the public requirements to impose an additional duty on certain articles, the farmers of Canada would not oppose the addition; but the farmers were not willing that there should be any special legislation for the few at the expense of the many. They sympathized with the manufacturers, but they did not believe the true remedy for the existing depression was protection, but patient perseverance, prudence and strict economy. It would be unwise for the Government to change the fiscal policy of the country in order to meet the depressed circumstances in which the country then was. The motto in which farmers believed was "equal rights and equal privileges to all men and all classes, and special rights to none." That motto they were willing to uphold on this question. The farmers frequently suffered from hard times induced by the failure of crops and other causes, but who ever saw the farmers coming to this House and asking for special legislation in their own behalf. If the gentlemen opposite convinced him that the carrying of the amendment before the House would advance the great agricultural interest, he would be with them. But he was heartily convinced that it would be most prejudicial to the agricultural interests, and indeed to the interests of those classes who asked for it, and who might in the meantime reap a temporary advantage. Therefore he should with great pleasure vote against the amendment.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was greatly to be regretted that the Government allowed a false impression to get abroad in regard to their proposed dealing with the tariff. The hon. member for Chateaugay and Montreal West were looked upon as the accredited agents of the Government in their statements to the people of Montreal. If there was not an actual suggestio falsi, there was at all events a suppressio veri, and their statements should have been contradicted. In dealings between private persons such conduct would have been scouted and it was the bounden duty of the Government to have stated that there was to be no alteration of the tariff if such was their intention. The Government at the time were making enquiries throughout the country, and were engaged in considering a revision of the tariff.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Does my hon. friend presume to state that I was engaged on a revision of the tariff; because, if so, I beg to contradict him?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—I say the hon. member was considering changes.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I beg to say that the hon. gentleman is making a statement he has no right to make, and which is entirely incorrect.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK reiterated that the Hon. Minister of Finance received information from all parts of the country obtained at his request, and after having received these recommendations it was an act of great discourtesy to the parties supplying the information, if he did not even consider them. The Hon. Minister of Finance was not "A daring pilot in extremity, pleased with the danger

"When the waves ran high."

He saw the impending storm between the contending elements, led on the one side by the hon. member for Halifax, and on the other by the hon. member for Montreal West. He saw there was great danger in changing the fiscal policy, and he prudently shrank from the encounter. But by raising the false expectations of the merchants, he tended in a great measure to disarrange the trade of the country. The Hon. Minister of Finance had, in all his speeches since he announced his policy, alluded to manufactures in terms of disparagement. He announced his intention of preventing them, so far as he could, amassing "colossal fortunes," which threaten serious mischief to the country. He alluded to them as "lobbyists," forming "rings," that manufactures produced an "artificial transference" of the rural population to the towns which should be checked. He spoke of the "squalid hovels" of the rich manufacturers in the suburbs of Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton. He spoke of them as forming only one-twentieth of the population. Nay, in his last speech he says they do not compose one-fortieth of the population. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) said the whole tendency of the Finance Minister's speeches was to arouse a hostile feeling between the agriculturist and the manufacturer. That he, in effect said, "we are an agricultural country, and do not want manufactures, unless they grow up like mushrooms—that we should not plough the ground nor manure it, so as to encourage their growth." Putting aside for the moment the question of protection and free-trade, let us suppose that we are to remain solely an agricultural country, he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) asserted that as an agricultural country the older Provinces were almost full; only, perhaps, in Ontario were there any good first-class lands still ungranted by the Crown, and even there the quantity was very small. We were pushing immigration into the North-West where we offered acres of rich, fertile, virgin soil, "without money and without price."

If this was the case, could we expect immigrants to settle on our second-class lands? Certainly not, until the profits of farming were raised to such a degree as to enhance the value of land now occupied, encouraging improved tillage and the cultivation of such lands. The older Provinces should guard their manufacturing interests, otherwise they will remain stationery, or perhaps retrograde. For example: across the Border during the last decade, the greatest increase in population had occurred in manufacturing States; and if an opposite policy was pursued, our population might even decrease; our farmers and their sons would go the North-West, and they would not be replaced. The entire increase in this relation in the United States during the last ten years, amounted to 22 per cent. In Maine, which with its lumbering greatly resembled an old Canadian Province, the population had actually decreased; in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, it increased 23 $\frac{13}{100}$ per cent; in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, the aggregate increase, however, was only 14 per cent. In New Hampshire the figures also showed a decrease.

The Finance Minister was in error when he affirmed that the manufacturing classes did not include one-twentieth of our population. The census informed us that 479,512 persons were engaged in agricultural pursuits; 75,201 in commerce; 60,104 in domestic pursuits; 212,808 in industrial pursuits, and 39,144 in professions; 143,070 not classed; total, 1,009,847; thus showing that our agriculturists did not comprise one-half of the population, and the industrial classes comprised about one-fifth, or taking out the lumbermen, fishermen, &c., they would be more properly speaking, about one-eighth. The Finance Minister should not have treated these interests with contempt and scorn; but he should have dispassionately argued the benefits between protection and free-trade. The Finance Minister said in his Budget Speech, "Theory apart, there are very few of us who would object to a moderately low rate of duty, or would care much to be found opposing a tariff, though in defiance of free-“ trade theories, which would bring a large addition to the population of the country at a very moderate cost to the remainder of the population.” was precisely the position he took, and he was prepared to argue with the hon. gentleman on his own text. We should have a readjustment of the tariff in order to encourage our native industries, and our agricultural interests. The abstract principle of free-trade was incontrovertible, but it was inapplicable to Canada in its present peculiar position; give us free-trade on both sides and he would support it; and until we could really obtain it we should fight the Americans with their own weapons. He believed that the Canadian farmers would support this attitude, and he saw no reason why a duty should not be placed upon corn. If a duty would not change the price of wheat, as hon. gentlemen opposite averred, neither would it alter the price of flour. There were many anomalies in the tariff which ought to be removed. The locomotive manufacturer in Canada did not enjoy at present equal rights; other industries were protected to the extent of 17½ per cent. while he had only 12; this was improper, and should no longer be allowed to exist. The piano industry should also be aided by a proper method of collecting the duty on foreign pianos. The supporters of the amendment did not favour extreme protection; they desired sufficient protection to foster industries which would yet supply the millions that would settle in the vast North-West, instead of allowing this country to be so furnished from the Eastern States, which would otherwise be the case. He spoke as the representative of a farming constituency, and did not think the policy advocated would result in increased taxation to the farmer; even though it might render necessary a slight increase of taxation, he thought that the agriculturists would support it in the general interests of the country.

Mr. BUNSTER rose to explain why he would give a different vote regarding this amendment than he had cast the other night, touching the motion of the member for Montreal West. When British Columbia entered Confederation, its tariff was 12½ per cent. on manufactures. By this act the duties were raised 2½ per cent.; and two years ago a similar increase had been made, and uncomplainingly borne. He thought that the farmers had as much right to protection as the manufacturers had; our industries were at present either closed or running on short time, and as the country was being flooded with American goods these interests should receive proper consideration.

When British Columbia entered the Confederation, her farmers had a slight protection, and the articles they consumed were not so expensive as they are now; neither was the Government so expensive as it is to-day. They laboured under the delusion that Confederation would increase their prosperity, but they found every promise broken, and they realized the fact they had been duped. When the hon. member for South Bruce on taking office, appealed to his constituents, he repudiated the agreement made with Lord Carnarvon, and yet the Leader of the Government took him in as his colleague, just as a man who had a bad case secured the services of an able lawyer to make black appear white. The Hon. Premier did not want to give British Columbia her rights, and that was why he took the Hon. Minister of Justice into his Cabinet. Last year he (Mr. Bunster) had shown the latter gentleman a specimen of British Columbia wheat; he would now pass him a specimen of British Columbia barley, and ask whether a country that could raise such grain as that was not worth protection.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I believe it can protect itself.

Mr. BUNSTER said it could not protect itself, because while the Americans had free access to our markets we were practically excluded from those of the United States. In 1875 the Americans sent into British Columbia 728 horses and 1,181 head of cattle, which were entered at less than half their value on bogus invoices. They also sent in 1,454 swine, 8,400 sheep, and other things in proportion, and yet the Government when appealed to for protection, replied: “ We can-

"not change the tariff." He knew to the contrary. They had changed it since he had been in Parliament. But if they could not change it for the whole Dominion they might give British Columbia a discriminatory tariff, or allow her to have one such as she possessed before Confederation, when she was more happy and prosperous than she has been since. Instead of injuring the revenue it would increase it, while it would permit the farmers of the Province to have their own market. If they had free-trade with the United States it would be fair enough, but they were met by a heavy tariff on everything they exported to that country. The coal of British Columbia would be excluded altogether from San Francisco only for its superior quality. As soon as the Pacific Railroad should be built, British Columbia would not object to any tariff that might be considered best suited for the interests of the whole Dominion.

He considered if Indian corn were not imported into Canada, that other cereals to supply its place would be cultivated to a greater extent than now. Therefore he was of opinion that an advantage would result to Canada from the taxation of Indian corn. He thought he had shown that protection in this country was desirable. If they did not want protection in Ontario, he begged to inform them that it was desired in British Columbia, and he hoped the Government would allow them to fix their own tariff, as they would not perform the other promises they had agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he rose for the purpose of stating clearly to the House, and through the house to the country, the reasons on which he based the vote he gave on this question some days ago, and the vote he would give on this amendment. He was a Free Trader and had been one all his life; but he believed in free-trade being reciprocal. He was in favor of free-trade, then, if they could get it; but since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty the policy of Canada always seemed to be more or less contrary to the policy of the United States. From 1865 to the present time, Canada had been throwing open her markets to the production of American manufactures and agriculturists, and had failed to obtain any reciprocal treatment in relation to the manufactures and productions of this country. He thought the crisis had arrived, and that it was desirable for Canadian statesmen to take hold of this matter. He would here lay down the principle that they could not get reciprocity in trade without reciprocity in tariff. He did not mean to say that where the Americans imposed a tariff of 50 or 70 per cent. we should impose the same, but he would so re-adjust the tariff that while it would raise the amount needed by the Finance Minister, it would act at the same time so as to protect such of the struggling industries of the country and the agricultural products as it might be desirable to collect the duties on. He did not pretend that he would vote for that resolution on the abstract principle of protection, but as a retaliatory measure for the purpose of forcing the neighbouring country, on which our prosperity so much depended, to adopt more of a liberal policy towards Canada. It might be said that he did not represent the views of his constituents on this subject, but it would be remembered that he had been returned twice to Parliament since he had voted on a similar motion some six or seven years ago, with the view of influencing Americans to be more liberal in their treatment of Canada. He would vote on this occasion with Sir John A. Macdonald, although he might feel it his duty at a future stage to introduce another amendment on the same subject in order to enable him to express more clearly his views in regard to this important matter.

Mr. COLBY said he desired to express what he believed to be the sentiments of the farmers on this subject. It was very properly stated by the hon. member for Glengarry that agriculture was the paramount and predominating interest in the country, all others being largely subsidiary to that all absorbing interest, and that any fiscal policy not in the interests of agriculture ought not to commend itself to the favour of the public men of this country. His hon. friend from Grenville a few days since had called the attention of the House to the large quantity of Canadian agricultural produce that was exported to the United States. That gentleman's opportunity for observation was very good, living, as he did, at a most important shipping port. He regretted the hon. gentleman did not prosecute his inquiry further, so that he could have explained to the House the cause, in his judgment, of that circumstance.

Why was it that New England and New York absorbed so largely the agricultural products of the States which composed New England, as well as the surplus products of this country before and during the period of reciprocity and now? The answer was quite obvious—they possessed a large consuming industrial population? How did this happen—could it be supposed that it was a mere matter of accident? He affirmed—and after a moment's reflection this would be clear to every hon. member, and every thinking man in Canada—that it was the result of a long and deliberate policy on the part of the very able and sagacious public men who had controlled their interests for many years. Long ago, Daniel Webster, in the Senate of the United States, announced the policy of protection for manufacturers and agricultural products, for woollen fabrics and wool, &c., and from that day until the time of Justin Morrell, the Senator, who initiated the iron-clad Morrell tariff, New England did not want able, far-seeing and sagacious men who had a proper appreciation of their interests to advocate the same policy. We saw the results; they prospered under this condition of affairs. In New England they were quite incapable of producing like the Western States, large quantities of wheat for foreign consumption, cotton or sugar, &c.; but the farmers raised a class of products which must be consumed within the country itself; there was no market abroad for their coarse grains, beef, and the produce of their pastures and meadows; these statesmen accordingly saw that a home market must be created, and they deliberately set themselves to work to make it. The results were as brilliant as they had wisely anticipated; they succeeded; a home market was created; the agriculturists prospered; great industries were built up, and enormous capital being accumulated was sent into the South and West to construct railways, and stimulate their industries; and all this was the effect of a system arranged for the benefit of their own special localities. Was it not well then that our public men should consider these circumstances? How did this affect the New England agriculturalists? It was notably true that in their manufacturing towns and cities their produce sold at higher rates than were obtained in any other part of the continent; and did they pay higher for what they purchased than others have done?

Hon. Gentlemen—Yes.

Mr. COLBY—Hon. gentlemen said yes, if so, notwithstanding all their duties and our 17½ per cents applying to certain articles, how could they ship so large a quantity of things into Canada? This was a matter susceptible of the most exact verification. The New England farmer sold at higher and bought at lower rates than the agriculturalists of any other portion of America. If this held good for that section, why could it not also apply to the agricultural districts of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Eastern Ontario, which were merely the northward extension of New England and New York. There were to be found the same conditions of soil and climate, and the same products, the same facilities for success in manufacturing enterprises, and the same magnificent water-powers. He did not speak for the producers of the South or West, or even for the wheat-growers of Ontario, but for the districts mentioned, whose staples were fitted for domestic consumption and not export. This was the special idea with which Quebec entered into Confederation, having fine water-powers, mines lumbering and a people tractable and easily taught industrial pursuits. She saw for herself a future similar to the position now occupied by New England in the United States when the Great North-West was settled with a producing population. We could not force any industry, whether agricultural or manufacturing, which was not congenial for us; they in Quebec, in the Lower Provinces, or in Eastern Ontario, could not become a wheat-growing people; and why not then work concurrently with nature? We should adapt our policy to the country; and if we departed from such a course, we would do violence to nature, and in lieu of aiding and further developing our prosperity, we would retard our progress, and do our people very great injury. He attached very great significance to this point, and he invited particular attention to its consideration: Suppose that all the industries of New England and New York were to-day blotted out of existence, to be at no future period revived, and that the manufacturing centre instead of being located on the sea-board, was removed to the valley of the Mississippi, he asked, what could be the hope and the prospect of the eastern part of this continent as an agricultural country?

What could we raise of produce that we could send to any market of the world to feed a population remote from us? The very supposition of the case shows to any person who will give it a moment's reflection that if agriculture can be made profitable on the east side of this continent, pursued against the disadvantages of climate, it can only be made possible and profitable by having a large consuming population to use the products of the country. He did not speak in favour of extreme protection, but he believed a policy of moderate protection would do for us what has been accomplished in New England where it has been tested for many years, it would be the best day for the farmers they ever saw. But it might be said we cannot become a New England; there is no market. Well, there was very little market in New England before that policy was instituted. Give us our own market and that is a starting point; but are there no markets abroad? Why should not we compete with the world in the West Indies and other non-manufacturing countries? The world is open to us; there are millions of people to be clothed and supplied with manufactures. Their markets are as open to us as to any other nation. Is there any reason why we should not reap that harvest? That is an ambition which should be encouraged.

MR. COLBY.

He had been very much surprised to hear from certain high and influential quarters in this House a sneer thrown at who ever seemed to suggest anything in the direction of giving protection to the farmers of this country. That had been the case from the time that a certain hon. member proposed a committee to consider the condition of the agricultural interests down to this part of the debate. He (Mr. Colby), very well recollected that the first time he addressed the Parliament of this country in 1868, it was on a subject concerning the farmers of this country. On that occasion he had asked for a certain degree of protection to the farmers. He had urged the matter with great zeal, and made use of the expression so often quoted in this debate, "reciprocity in tariffs if we cannot have free trade." After considerable effort the Government of the day conceded the point; and he knew the course he had pursued met with the hearty approval not only of his own constituents but also of the farmers in the adjoining counties of that section. They were very grateful indeed for the protection which had been given them.

The hon. member for Grenville the other night asserted that only three sheep had been imported into Ontario last year. On referring to the blue book and looking over the tables of imports and exports of farming products not the produce of Canada, he found the following figures:—

Mr. YOUNG— Oh, no!

Mr. COLBY said if the figures in the Blue Book were incorrect it was not his fault. If they were correct, they showed that we imported for consumption in this country something like $5,000,000 of farm products. If it were true that our neighbours who, as a deliberate policy, excluded us from their markets, sent in here untaxed this large amount, or anything like it, a wrong was done to the farmers of Canada, and this question should not be sneered out of the House or trifled with.

But he would go further and say, even if there were at present no large amount of imports from the United States for consumption in this country, the time has now arrived when a policy should be laid down in the interest of our farmers. Competition with our agriculturists in our own markets is imminent from the great producing regions of the West. If it is not on us to-day, it is coming, and very shortly. Let any one travel through the great States of the West and North-West, as he had done during the last two or three years, and see their boundless capacity for production, and he would be convinced of it. Our Ontario and Quebec farmers are wool-growers to-day, but how long will they be wool sellers without protection? The time is not far distant when wool from Texas, Colorado and those immense agricultural regions will be coming into our markets and under-selling the wool produced in Canada.

It was a simple question whether our farmers were to be driven from the agricultural industry of wool raising, or whether we should adopt the policy of excluding American wools, except upon the payment of a high rate of duty. The multitudes of sheep which were now being raised upon the immense plains of Texas and Colorado, were proving invaluable to the United States. It was calculated that wool could be produced there at the rate of from 10 cents to 12½ cents per pound. With the advantage of these immense feeding grounds, where there was ample pasturage, and a climate of such a character that sheep required no shelter, how long could we compete with western wool. If it was not to-day, it would be only a year or two years, when, if our farmers wanted the benefit of selling their own wool in their own markets, we must make our American friends pay tribute on all that they send to those markets. Some hon. gentlemen, on speaking of the wool trade of the past, said that low prices would not effect us at all, as our long combing wools were a specialty; but he begged to assure his hon. friend from Ontario that the Ontario long wool business was a matter of short duration, for to his own knowledge that was a thing that was as well understood on the other side of the line as it was here to-day, and there were sections on the American side where they were going very largely into this long wool raising. This business would increase so that in two or three years further the Americans would not take wool from Canada on the terms of paying a high duty on it. The Americans were a shrewd observant people, and when they saw that a certain class of wool was required by the manufacturers in that country they were quick enough to perceive that there was no natural obstacle in the way of the raising of that product in the Northern States, and that it was better to raise wool that would fetch 50 cents per pound than wool that would only bring 25 cents per pound. They were now paying attention to the breeding of Cotswolds, Leicesters and long-woolled sheep in the United States for the purpose of preventing the Ontario wool grower from coming into their markets with their combing wools. It was so with other products. Gentlemen from Ontario were congratulating themselves on the high prices they were receiving for their dairy products; but he would say to these gentlemen who were interested in these dairy products that the great North-West has also found out the fact that butter and cheese can be profitably exported to Liverpool as well as grain, and in his last visit to the West he was surprised to find cheese factories springing up in localities where a few years ago they would never have thought of establishing that industry. Look at the facilities that had of late years been effected in railroad transportation for agricultural produce, and the reduced rates which had been obtained by organized farmers or grangers in the United States, and how long would it be before Texas and Kansas heaves were brought down by rail to the Toronto and Montreal markets to undersell our native cattle unless we were prepared to meet them with some obstruction on the frontier? Our true policy was not so much to encourage foreign trade as to foster our agricultural industries and our markets, and build up a home market where we can sell these articles which could not bear transportation to a foreign market; a local market where we could sell our vegetables, fruits, coarse grains, poultry and eggs at higher prices than anywhere else. He would say, in conclusion, that it would be well for us to take a leaf from the New England book—that if it was sound policy in them to build up home markets, the same policy might be good for us. He would remind the House that great industries could not be built up in a moment. We could not build up great industries or successful manufactures any more than the farmers of the country could change the staple productions of their farms in a moment. It was the duty then of every member of this House to exercise prudent forethought to understand what was best for the country, and endeavour to inaugurate that policy, before the evil day was upon us, which would protect us from impending danger and build us up as an agricultural and manufacturing people. He was surprised on listening to some of the remarks from the members from the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. COLBY.

One would suppose that these gentlemen were all shipowners or interested in the shipping trade. He had been under the impression that there were some mining resources and some farmers in the Lower Provinces, but one would suppose from speeches made that they were the last in the world who would be benefited by a large industrial and mining population. There was an incalculable treasure locked up in our mines, and he thought it was the duty of the Government who had charge of the destinies of Canada to be paternal in its care. We wanted a vigorous policy, we wanted a positive policy, an objective policy, a national policy, the tendency of which would be to unlock the wealth of our mines, stimulate our industries, and develop our resources and defend us from unfair and injurious foreign competition. We wanted a policy that would be positive, not a mere negative policy that permitted the people to drift along the stream without any direction or guidance by the public men as to the investment of their capital or the employment of the industries of the country.

Mr. ARCHIBALD said the resolution was like the one they had seen before, only it had been sugar-coated in order to catch the votes of the agriculturists, but the coating of the pill was too thin to be really taken by them. The agricultural portion of the community would too readily see where their interest lies to be taken in by any such shallow pretence. On a former occasion when this question was before the House, he expressed a strong opinion against any attempt to protect agricultural interests. At that time he had produced figures to show that there were only two articles on which it was possible to levy a tariff that would protect the farmer's wool and corn. At that time he had pointed out that while we were actually importers of considerable quantities of these products, we exported a greater amount, and it was to the benefit of the farmers that these exchanges took place. We exported some three millions of pounds of wool for two-thirds as much money as we imported eight millions of pounds for. The hon-gentleman from Stanstead said we might look forward to the time when our products would be overwhelmed by the products of the West, and our wool would be swept out of existence. He feared no such danger, and as for the ten cents Texan wool, he for one believed the lower we could buy that wool the better. He did not pretend to say we could ever raise wool profitably for ten cents per pound, but if we could buy it cheaper than we could raise it, it would be better to drop wool-growing and devote our energies to something else.

Honorable gentlemen urging this national policy apparently thought the consumer had no rights at all, and that the seller alone was interested. He claimed that any articles that came into the country enriched it, and it certainly was not good policy to prevent that from being imported which was a source of wealth. The old theory that both parties to an exchange could not make a profit had become exploded, and it was now admitted that a trade between two parties in such cases might result in mutual benefit. The people of this country might have been deceived a few years ago by the arguments advanced in favor of this proposition, but to-day the schoolmaster had been abroad, and they could no longer be hoodwinked by such contentions. The tariff was not the whole tax the consumer paid. The charges of the wholesale and retail dealers would advance a twenty per cent. tariff to thirty per cent. to the consumer. Protection, like some other poisons, was cumulative in its effects, and this arose from the fact that what was one man's finished production was another man's raw material. The manufacturer of pig iron for instance called for protection, and when it was transformed into refined iron more protection was called for. Then it went into the hands of the anchor maker, and he must have his protection. Here the iron was subject to three different protections. The iron trade had flourished in the United States not because it was protected, but because of the natural advantages it possessed for the prosecution of the trade. Protection, however, might have stimulated the trade for a time, but it rendered the cost of the construction of railroads so great, that the farmer had to pay for the enormous protection in the way of excessive freights. He then went on to show that from the year 1824 to 1832 in England, under a Protectionist policy, while the population was steadily increasing, the exports remained stationary. This was the state of affairs up to 1833 when Lord Sydenham made the first improvement in the British tariff by reducing the taxes on something like 700 articles. Then the exports increased from £39,000,000 in 1833 to £53,000,000 in 1849. On the repeal of the corn law the state of affairs which then prevailed was to a certain extent relieved.

It was true that there was a great season of scarcity in 1846, the year of the Irish famine, preventing to some extent at least the immediate results being witnessed within the first year or two; but shortly afterwards, in 1850, the fruits of this policy were plainly to be seen. He proposed to show how far it had been successful to date—to point out the total amount of exports beginning with the year 1860, after periods of five years each. In 1843, the exports attained \$42,000,000; in 1860 they had risen to \$135,000,000 under free trade; in 1865 to \$165,000,000; in 1870 to \$199,000,000, and in 1874 to \$239,000,000; these were the results of the system which the right hon. gentleman had told them, a few evenings ago, would perhaps in the interest of Great Britain be abolished before long. They had been informed that our manufacturers had thriven until two years ago; but at that time the duties were increased $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; and did the hon. gentleman pretend to say that this advance had operated prejudicially to the manufacturers. If not, they could not be suffering more than other portions of the population, and it seemed unreasonable for them to come and ask the legislature to create an artificial state of thing to enable them to reap steady certain profits at the expense of the great bulk of the consumers. He was inclined to agree with the hon. member for Frontenac, in his comments regarding the locomotive industry; and his hon. friend would doubtless admit that the Government, which had remedied the evil to which his hon. friend had alluded, deserved his thanks. The late Administration had admitted free of duty parts of locomotives, as he alleges, interfering very materially with that industry in this country; and this Government had imposed on them a duty of ten per cent. He represented an agricultural constituency; and he wished accordingly to enter his protest against the giving to the agricultural community, and the great consuming public, the mere shadow of protection, while the manufacturers obtained the substance.

Mr. PATERSON (South Brant) would not have spoken had not the right hon. mover of the amendment seen fit to allude to him as well as to his hon. friend from Lincoln, insinuating that he (Mr. Paterson) would have some little difficulty in reconciling his vote on the former want of confidence motion, with sentiments he had uttered; but this was certainly not the case. Eight days before the tariff was introduced he had spoken regarding the appointment of the Depression of Trade Committee, and he took the ground that it was the duty of the Finance Minister, in the introduction of a tariff, to see what industries could be cultivated; what were already established; whether any were being crushed out; and whether any could be successfully fostered. He spoke in the anticipation—it was no matter how he arrived at it—that the Finance Minister was about to introduce a new tariff. This had not been submitted; and, nevertheless, he held that the remarks he had made would still hold good, for they were not to suppose that because it was not done this year such a tariff would never be brought down. When it was it would be the duty of the Finance Minister to do as he had suggested, and he felt bold to say that thus the hon. gentleman would act. Such a policy had existed from 1858 to the present time; it still actuated the Government; and this was what was desired. If he thought that the Administration was about to retrograde in regard to incidental protection and sweep away the duties, he would withdraw his confidence from it; but they had no intimation that such a step was contemplated, and in point of fact the contrary was announced. The Finance Minister had told them that he had considered these questions, and that he did not think the manufacturing interests were suffering to the extent believed in outside circles. He supposed that the hon. gentleman had information which was not in the possession of other members, and he was in consequence not prepared to vote for a motion of want of confidence. Boots and shoes had been manufactured in Canada to the extent of sixteen millions of dollars, and as the importations proved to be only worth $250,000, the depression which existed in this connection must be traced to over-production. So it was with many other classes of goods. He had hesitated, as he would again hesitate, to support any resolution of non-confidence, because the Government had not seen fit to introduce a new tariff during the present year. He believed that their course of retrenchment would recommend itself to the people. But while the first motion failed, another was introduced by the right hon. member for Kingston, who took the ground that the former one was not satisfactory, and yet he and those who support him voted for it. They had entirely changed their policy within a few days. On the first amendment they voted for protection to manufacturers alone; to-night they would vote for protection to all the industries of the country. Now, was that an honest change of base? It was an abandonment of principle for the purpose of securing a few additional votes. He did not wish to impute motives, but he thought if the first part of the resolution censuring the Government were carried, the hon. gentleman would not care so much for the last part. He arrived at this conclusion because he had not heard of this protection to the farmers until the past few days. They had introduced it summarily, and believed the farmers would be caught, but in that they would be mistaken. When he voted for a resolution it would be for one that was bona fide in its nature. He aided in securing a Committee to inquire into the condition of the agricultural interest, but before that Committee had reported we found a resolution prejudging the result of its labour and proposing duties on grain in the interests of farmers. On a former occasion he said a tax on wheat, if it would not benefit the agriculturist would benefit the miller, and on that ground he would favour it. The hon. member for Kingston had stated that he had letters from all parts asking for the imposition of a duty on agricultural products. Well, he would reiterate the statement he had previously made that 100,000 grangers would present a petition to the House for the same purpose.

It was desirable to wait for information on this matter. It was possible the farmers might discuss this matter over again and take the view expressed by some hon. gentlemen here that this was but an attempt to draw the wool over their eyes. What did the amendment affirm? Simply that it was in the interest of the farmers that a duty should be put on grain. It asserted nothing as to how the tariff should be amended, and the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston was no better. There was a difference of opinion among the Opposition on the subject. Some favoured a high protection tariff, or as they called it, reciprocal duties against the United States. Others approved of incidental protection and a tariff for revenue purposes. The House had a right to demand something more definite on the subject. The same ambiguity prevailed outside of the House. The Mail lauded the policy of the right hon. gentleman to the skies, and said he intended to protect manufactures and the products of the mine, the forest, and the field. The London Free Press, an equally ardent defender of the right hon. gentleman, gave a description of what it conceived to be his policy, showing that it is merely a re-adjustment of the tariff for revenue purposes. He failed to see that the right hon. gentleman had nailed himself down to anything in this resolution. When he was removing the duty from flour in 1868 he said it had only been imposed for the purpose of shewing the Americans our independence, and although it had been maintained for a certain time, when it was found that it was unduly pressing upon a certain portion of the community it had been repealed. That was said by the same gentleman who now tried to make them believe that the right course was to put a tax on agricultural products. He could quite understand that all of the right hon. gentleman's followers would vote for this resolution, as it pledged them to nothing, and all that was in it, or all that could be made out of it, all that stood forth distinct and clear, was this: a vote of censure upon the Government—nothing more and nothing less. Talk of it being an association of great principles. It was nothing of the kind. It simply asked the House to withdraw their confidence from the Ministry because they did not think fit to change the tariff. The right hon. gentleman in introducing his resolution said, in reply to remarks in the Globe that he had not been sufficiently definite, that it would be impossible for him to suggest what changes would be made without having access to the papers in the pigeon holes of the office of the Finance Minister. While he made that candid admission, he asked him (Mr. Paterson) and all the members of this House to vote non-confidence in the Government, because they did not introduce tariff changes; they who had access to the papers in the pigeon-holes, and after careful study of them declared it was not wise to make any changes. He would challenge any of the right hon. gentleman's supporters to point out any passage in his speech in which he laid down a policy of protection beyond an assertion of his own that the imposition of a small duty upon grain would benefit the farmers of this country.

Such a duty as would not bear in any way upon the consumers could not be of very great advantage to the interests concerned; therefore, while he maintained the position he had formerly taken with regard to the duty and policy of the Government touching our manufacturing industries, and while he held that the Administration should protect our agricultural interests, still he was not prepared to support a motion, declaring that the present Ministers were unfit to conduct the affairs of this country, simply because they announced that they did not see their way to the introduction of alterations in the tariff during the present year. For his part he was prepared to vote against the amendment.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he intended to vote for the resolution. He had listened with great attention to the discussion that had taken place, and had heard a great deal about policies. He believed the only policy that would develop the resources of the country was that of a revenue and national policy combined. He contended that protection was absolutely necessary for the coal interests of Nova Scotia, and it was only by adopting such a system that we could obtain reciprocity in trade from the United States. He had heard a great deal about the agriculturists of the Dominion, but very little about the coal mining interests of the country, except from one or two gentlemen. He did not refer to this when the matter was before the House a few days ago, as he thought the proper time was when the tariff came under consideration, and when he could back his opinion by his vote, as he intended to do on this occasion. He thought a national policy protecting our coal and other industries would be endorsed by the constituency which he had the honour to represent, and he believed the sentiment of his constituency was a fair indication of the sentiment of other constituencies in that Province.

The Speech from the Throne admitted that there was great distress apparent throughout the country, but the Government did not attempt to take any steps to mitigate the distress they acknowledged existed. He considered it was necessary to do something to relieve the distress this year because next year the result of the depression might be so serious that the sufferers would be beyond assistance. He went on to say that the coal mines of Nova Scotia constituted one of the most important industries in the country, and there were invested in them about $12,000,000. Altogether there were some 23,000 hands employed directly and indirectly by these mines when they were in full work, exclusive of about 20,000 seamen engaged in the coal trade. This industry was now in a very depressed state and unless it obtained relief he feared it would be altogether closed up before long. The present policy of admitting American coal free was calculated to destroy the trade, and it was the unfair position in which it stood in relation to the United States that the present stagnation of the trade was mainly due. It had been stated that they were all Free-Traders from the Maritime Provinces. He was satisfied that the people of Nova Scotia were not all Free-Traders, and he believed the great majority were in favour of a policy that would encourage the industries of the country. They wanted their coal protected in order that they could supply the Ontario market, and he was satisfied that if the American Government were forced on this point that the reciprocity would eventually be obtained.

He had no hope from the present Government to obtain a duty on American coal. The Hon. Premier a few days ago had unmistakeably declared himself on this point. He stated that nothing less than from two to three dollars duty on American coal per ton would force the people of Ontario to take Nova Scotia coal. This was an extravagant statement for the Hon. Premier to make. It was uncalled for. It was calculated to make the people of that Province believe that the coal mining industries wanted this large tax. This was not the case. That industry simply wanted seventy-five cents per ton on American coal—the same as they imposed on ours. They were now enabled to compete with our own coal industries on very unequal terms, and unless the tariff would be re-adjusted now, he feared it would be too late to do so next year. The Hon. Premier in his free-trade speeches in Scotland, last summer, stated that vessels of 600 tons burthen could now go to Lake Superior, and stated that when the enlargement, now taking place in the canals in Ontario, they would admit vessels of 1,500 tons. With such facilities he could not see why we could not compete successfully with the Americans in the article of coal in the Province of Ontario. The people of the Maritime Provinces were now and in the past contributing to build their canals in Ontario, while they had no canals of their own—the only one they had was neglected. He thought the people of Ontario should submit to a small duty on coal when we were building their canals.

An hon. member made a most extravagant and unjust statement in regard to the quality of Nova Scotia coal. He meant the hon. member for North York. It was a statement that no member of Parliament should make. He said that a cargo of coal sent to Toronto from Nova Scotia, a few years ago, was so bad that "it was too dear at any price." He was glad, however, that this was contradicted in Toronto itself by gentlemen in Toronto, and it was shown that Nova Scotia coal was superior to the best American soft coal coming to that market; not only that, but it was shown that it was worth from 50 cents to $1.50 per ton more than American soft coal.

The hon. gentleman declared himself a Free-Trader, and that he was opposed to sectionalism. He was opposed to a tax on breadstuffs in the Lower Provinces—because it would be sectional. He (Mr. McDonald) would show that hon. gentleman the present tariff was sectional, and bore heavily on the Maritime Provinces.

He trusted the member for North York would urge upon the Government to re-adjust the tariff in this respect. He feared, however, the member for North York when the matter came to a vote, would be found protecting the Government by his vote, although that would be inconsistent with his views.

The hon. member for Halifax said that the hon. member for Cumberland was the only representative from Nova Scotia elected to advocate a national tariff policy. He (Mr. McDonald) for himself would say that the hon. member for Halifax had no authority from him to make that statement, whatever authority he had from the other representatives from that Province he had none from him. He would support the hon. member for Cumberland in advocating a national policy that would include a tax on American coal, and he had no hesitation in saying, as far as he knew the sentiments of the people of Nova Scotia, but the hon. member for Cumberland could be elected for any constituency in that Province in opposition to any one supporting the tariff policy of the present Government.

Another, the sugar industry, was very much interested in the re-adjustment of the tariff, which was required. He had received a circular from a gentleman who had paid a great deal of attention to this question, and who was as well qualified to form an opinion regarding it as any other man in Canada, and he stated that the manner in which the duty was imposed on the raw and manufactured articles was the very reverse of every other article on the Canadian tariff; also, that so far from the industry in Canada being protected, it was positively weighed down by a duty equal to fifty per cent. of the value of the raw sugar, while on the refined there was only a duty of forty per cent., forcing the greater part of the refining for Canada to be done in New York and Greenock.

The duty on this article should be re-adjusted in the interest of the whole Dominion, as it would be the means of establishing a large trade with the West Indies, to which the Maritime Provinces could send their coal at cheaper rates; and if the amount of refined sugar imported last year required the use of about 50,000 tons of coal, this, if consumed in this country, would conduce largely to the support of this industry. The duty on coal oil ought also to be re-adjusted; and he directed the attention of the hon. member for North York to this item, as the present only weighed heavily on the Maritime Provinces. Kerosene oil was produced in Ontario, and a high protection was imposed in its interest. The Maritime Provinces imported very considerable quantities from the United States, and they were refused a duty in favour of their coals. Nova Scotia paid in duty on coal oil $23,963, with a population of 387,000, while Ontario with her 1,621,857 people only paid in this respect $28,108. Hence this was a sectional tax, and a re-adjustment of the tariff he considered necessary.

The tariff, as a whole was unjust to the Lower Provinces; and, as adopted two years ago by the present Government, it was sectional, so far as the Provinces were concerned. Ontario and Quebec last year contributed to the revenue at the rate of $4.11 per head, while Nova Scotia and New Brunswick paid at the rate of $4.25, or 14c. more per head, amounting to an additional $94,262 for the year in proportion, for their population of a little over 600,000 persons. He hoped that hon. members from the Lower Provinces, who were credited with having great influence with the Government, would secure a readjustment in the direction he had instanced, or else the better terms they had secured some years ago would soon be absorbed in extra taxation and sectional at that.

Mr. CARMICHAEL remarked that the hon. member for Stanstead had not pointed how the mining interests were to be benefitted by duties in their favour, and he would bring to the notice of this hon. gentleman and of the hon. member for Cape Breton, the fact that the word "mining" was not mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. COLBY—I ask if that is not a struggling industry?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I would enquire of the hon. gentleman whether it is a suffering industry? If it is, it is included in the resolution; if it is not it is not so included.

Mr. CARMICHAEL thought that the hon. mover was the proper exponent of his own resolution. The shipping was also a struggling industry, and if it was intended to pass legislation for the benefit of the lumber and fishing interests, it was not indicated in what direction relief would be afforded. Consequently he was of opinion that the resolution was intended to deceive.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Is the hon. gentleman in order?

Mr. SPEAKER—That is rather a strong word to use.

Mr. CARMICHAEL observed that duties on the shipping interest would be disastrous to it, and a grave impediment to trade.

The Finance Minister two years ago had proposed a special tax of $1 per ton on the shipping of the Maritime Provinces, but it was not carried out—owing, they were told, to influence of hon. gentlemen opposite—or at least only to a limited extent.

Mr. McDONALD.

A rope factory existed in Halifax, and they only had a protection of five per cent. If it was intended to give other articles which had 17½ per cent. a protection to the extent of 20 or 25 per cent., why should this interest be content with five per cent. This would be sectional legislation. An anchor manufactory was also established in Halifax, and on the raw material in this relation five per cent. was levied, while anchors were admitted free. If this interest was protected, they could extend their operations very largely, and he had been asked before he came up to Ottawa whether there was any likelihood of this being granted. The imposition of 25 per cent. duty in that connection would mean $5 instead of $1 per ton on shipping, and his hon. friend from Cumberland should explain how this could properly be levied. The result of such a policy was visible in the United States, whose shipping interests had been destroyed. The hon. member for Stanstead had stated that the prosperity of the United States had been due to protection; but it was not true that protection was the cause of this prosperity. One might as well say that small-pox was necessary for the prosperity of the country as to declare protection was.

England prospered under the feudal system, but of course her progress was slow. When she bounded forward it was exactly in proportion as she adopted the principles of freedom of trade. Were we not now to give her assistance in making further progress in freedom of trade and religion? The favourite example of the Protectionists was the United States, but that country was a conglomeration of nations, and if she prospered, it was on account of free-trade. It was her unbounded resources, with internal free-trade, that enabled her to prosper and progress in spite of protection and slavery. There was a cry about England's decadence, but he would take the testimony of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone and the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli in preference to what was to be heard on this side, and they had recently stated the country was prosperous. When England was governed under the protective system there was distress and fear among her people, and there was danger of anarchy and revolution; but now she was prospering above all other nations. The United States, on the other hand, with all the blessings of protection, was greatly distressed, and numbers of her people were suffering. He thought the thanks of this country were due to the Government for having given us a truly national and not a sectional policy.

Mr. NORRIS said it was his duty to answer the charges made against him by the right hon. member for Kingston, who stated that he spoke in favour of protection and then voted against it, and that influence had been brought to bear on him to that end. This was an error. The Government never spoke to him about sustaining them. He voted of his own free will, and he had no hesitation in telling the House why he did not vote for the motion of his hon. friend for Montreal West. That resolution did not include all he advocated; it was well known that he had always favoured protection for the agriculturists as well as the manufacturers, and he would not have been fulfilling his duty to his constituents if he had supported a motion which did not include both those interests. The right hon. gentleman said that his speeches in favour of protection had been made to influence the Lincoln election. That was a charge which could not be borne out; he never made speeches with the object that they should have effect in Lincoln or anywhere else. He presumed the right hon. gentleman was master of that art, and believed that every person else was practicing it. The people of that county had intelligence enough to decide according to their own judgment, and any speech that either he or his hon. friend could make could not work any change in an election there. Then the right hon. gentleman said his speech had converted him to a Protectionist. If that was the case he (Mr. Norris) was very fortunate in making that speech; he had been successful in missionarising before, but never to the extent that was now claimed, and he certainly deserved credit for the convert he had made. We must presume the right hon. gentleman's statement was true, because previous to that speech he had never stated in the House or outside of it what his policy was. If the right hon. gentleman had been a true friend of the manufacturers, they would not to-day, perhaps, be knocking at the doors of Parliament asking for protection. Previous to 1866 we had a tariff of 25 per cent. which was reduced to 15 per cent., when the manufacturers of this country needed protection as much as they do now. If anyone was to blame for this it was the right hon. gentleman himself. The reason given for lowering the tariff then was the opposition of the people of the Maritime Provinces to high duties. The same reason applied now as then. He (Mr. Norris) had always been a Protectionist, but never an advocate of a Chinese Wall for this country. He had always opposed discriminating and excessive duties, but he believed in a fair measure of protection to our home industries, manufacturing and agricultural. He would have to vote for the amendment because it covered all he had advocated. Deeply as he regretted having to vote for this motion, he could not go back on his principle. He confessed he had more confidence in the Government than in the Opposition, and believed they were more friendly to the manufacturing and all other interests of the country, but at the same time this motion involved a principle for which he would have to vote.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER suggested that as it was now after One o'clock and several members were yet to speak, the debate should be adjourned until to-morrow, when it could go on till a vote was reached.

After some discussion this suggestion was adopted, and on motion of Mr. Borden the debate was adjourned until to-morrow.

The House adjourned at Twenty minutes past One a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

 WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—To supply an omission in the Act extending certain criminal laws to British Columbia.

Also—Respecting the attendance of witnesses at criminal trials.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TASCHEREAU rose to a question of privilege affecting the character of this House. He found an entry in the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada of the following facts:—"On March 30th, 1865, a certain person named Jean Baptiste Daoust was tried before the Court of Queen's Bench, Montreal, and found guilty of the crime of forgery; that afterwards, on the 9th of June, the following year, the said Court of Queen's Bench refused to order a new trial." A person also named Jean Baptiste Daoust had been introduced to this House as the member for Two Mountains. Under the circumstances of this case, he (Mr. Taschereau) thought it was only due to this House that the entry in the Journals should be read and the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He therefore moved that the entry in the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada for the Session of the year 1866, relating to production of certain papers in the case of the Queen vs. Daoust be now read.

Mr. MASSON said the House was taken by surprise at this extraordinary motion, which was brought up without notice having been given, even to the member for Two Mountains himself. This matter occurred before Confederation, and Mr. Daoust had been since then elected to this House and held his seat for six years without an objection being raised. He appealed to the spirit of justice of this House to say whether it was fair to pursue such a course as this. Mr. Daoust had not only been a member of this House since 1866, but had been an employé of the present Government since 1873, yet no action had been taken against him. The House and the country would view with regret, but not with surprise—he had grown accustomed to such things since the change of Government—the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, who showed themselves greatest in the smallest things. Whatever action the majority might take, it was plain that an injustice was being done in raking up old difficulties. However, nothing better could be expected from them after their action in the De Celles matter a few days ago. He protested with all his energy against this act of injustice.

Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. LAURIER did not think this was the time for the hon. member for Terrebonne to display any passion in the matter. This House was interested in the decision of this case as well as the hon. member for Two Mountains. He and his colleagues only desired an investigation into the case, and that justice be done to whomever it was due. He would be very sorry to see the honour of the House trifled with. It was said by the hon. gentleman that they were dealing unfairly with the hon. member for Two Mountains. That hon. gentleman had accepted a seat in the House and he must therefore take the consequences and face them manfully. The hon. gentleman had said satirically that they were the greatest men in small things. He consented to the first assumption of the hon. gentleman, but he did not agree that the honour of the House was a small thing.

Mr. SPEAKER—If the Hon. member for Two Mountains is in his seat this is the time for him to make his statement, after which he ought to withdraw.

Mr. MASSON—It would be difficult for him to know what is going on, seeing that he has received no information on the subject.

Mr. PALMER was surprised by the motion before the House. He thought it was not for the House to deal with questions of forgery, and he could not see what an Election Committee had to do with it. It was extremely odd that no punishment had followed the conviction for forgery, and he took it that there must be something very extraordinary in the case. While the honour of the House should be protected, he maintained that it was a very serious matter to bring a charge of this description against any member of the House.

Mr. HOLTON—There is no charge made. The motion is simply that the Journals of the House be read.

Mr. PALMER—Then it is very wrong to take action in the matter.

Mr. LANGEVIN said it would only have been fair that the hon. member for Two Mountains should have had notice of this intended action in order that he might have prepared his defence, and he was satisfied the hon. gentleman who made the motion would, on reflection, see the justice of this. He suggested that the consideration of the matter should be postponed for 24 or 48 hours, for the purpose of giving the hon. member for Two Mountains time to prepare any statement he might have to make.

Mr. LAURIER said what the hon. gentleman who had preceded him had stated was perfectly reasonable, and that they were quite ready to accede to the suggestion, although when the motion was made the hon. member for Two Mountains was in his place.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) thought it would be a great pity to have the matter laid over for a day without some further explanations being made in reference to the whole case. The circumstances as they really appeared from the papers, which he held in his hand, were very different from anything they had had reason to understand from any statement made up to the present time. It appeared this gentleman was indicted on two informations for forgery. At the first trial two of the witnesses whom the accused expected to have on hand did not appear, and he was convicted. The second indictment was for the forgery of the name of the same person, and at the second trial the witnesses whom he had expected at the first trial were examined, and the prisoner was acquitted. He accordingly made application to the Court to have the verdict of his first trial set aside on the ground that the evidence given at the second trial ought to have been given at the first. The Court granted him a new trial on the ground that he was taken by surprise. Accordingly the case came up for trial a second time, when the Counsel for the Crown objected to the second trial on the ground that the Court had acted illegally in granting a new trial on the ground of surprise; that the Court of Criminal Appeal for Lower Canada, under the Criminal Law as it then stood, had no right to grant a new trial, or take any action in this regard except upon a point of law; and that following the judgments the Courts of Appeal of Upper Canada had given, no right whatever existed for the granting of a new trial on the mere fact that a witness who had been expected had not been present, or upon any other ground apart altogether from questions of law. The learned Judge, before whom the case came, took the same view, and reserved the matter for the Court of Appeals, which determined that there could be no new trial; and therefore the conviction stood. When he had heard that this point would likely arise he had asked a gentleman, a member of the Bar, conversant with these matters in Lower Canada, whether he could show him the judgment of the Court of Appeals on this occasion; and he believed that there was none on record.

An Hon. Member—The case is reported.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON supposed that if this was so, it related to the legal point. The accused from that day to this, under two Administrations, had never been called to appear for judgment by any Crown officer.

These circumstances, which it was but fair to state, were apparent from the official document which he held in his hand; when they referred to the Journals of the House of 1876, as was suggested, they simply saw that on Mr. Cartier's motion certain papers were placed before the House, and that shortly afterwards the resignation of the member for Two Mountains took place; both in the Journals and Sessional Papers reference was made to Sessional Paper No. 31, and turning to where it should be, a blank was found with the explanation that under the direction of the Printing Committee it had not been deemed advisable to print these documents; but these documents were here now, and they established the facts he had mentioned.

Mr. TASCHEREAU replied that he had been charged by the hon. member for Terrebonne with having been unwilling to act honestly and impartially in this connection; he had not, however, alluded to the case in an invidious way. His object had been to lay the papers before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and he had not thought that there would have been a discussion on the merits of the case on the present occasion. This he considered unfair to the hon. member for Two Mountains himself. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was to be found in Lower Canada Jurist, vol. 10, was this—that a new trial could not legally be had.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Let it stand until to-morrow.

Mr. TASCHEREAU—I have no objection to give twenty-four hours; and then I will bring it up as a question of privilege.

The motion was withdrawn by leave of the House, with the understanding that it would be brought up on the following day.

SUPPLY.

Mr. BORDEN resumed the debate on the amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

He thanked the hon. member for Cumberland for his kindness in interfering in his behalf on the previous evening with the desire of obtaining for him a favourable hearing; and also the Premier for affording him the opportunity of moving the adjournment of the debate. He desired to read a portion of an article which appeared in the paper which was the organ of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia. The extract showed that this journal followed a policy entirely opposite to that laid down by the hon. gentleman from Cumberland on the evening previous. It was headed "Dr. Borden on the Pacific Railway," and read as follows:—"The member for the County of Kings in the Dominion Parliament has delivered—we beg pardon—read

" a speech in the House of Commons on " the Pacific Railway. We say read, because we have the authority of one " who was present"—he trusted this was not a member of the House—

" That the hon. gentleman read every " word of his so called speech like a " child reading a spelling book. Every- " body in Kings knows that the worthy " doctor is incapable of speaking thirty " consecutive words anywhere. He may " have written it, although of that we " have grave doubts, and if any friends " fancy that he can succeed, let him " settle the matter by arranging for the " re-delivery of his Pacific speech with- " out the paper. The speech, taken upon " its own merits, whoever wrote it, is a " piece of blatant and senseless balder- " dash."

He did not suspect the hon. member for Cumberland of having anything to do with the publication of these comments, and he believed that they met with the hon. gentleman's entire disapprobation.

The hon. member for Cape Breton undertook on the previous evening to announce the political feeling of Nova Scotia; this was a new departure for this hon. member, who had hitherto contented himself with the investigation of postal, and similar matters. The hon. gentleman declared that he supported the national policy of the hon. member for Cumberland, and perhaps he thought that this gave him the right to lecture the House and members from Nova Scotia regarding the politics of that Province.

The hon. gentleman said there were no Free Traders in Nova Scotia, but after the vote on the motion of the hon. member for Montreal West, he might feel happy if there were not. If that motion had been carried the cost of living to every one of the colliers of Cape Breton would have been increased, and the existing depression would only have been increased. The hon. gentleman also remarked that the amendment before the House just suited him, but was there anything in the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston which could be construed into a guarantee that the coal interest of Nova Scotia would be protected? There was nothing definite either in that speech or in the resolution before the House. If the intention of the right hon. member for Kingston was to protect everything, it was clear that nothing would be protected. But he seemed to indicate a desire to protect only the agricultural and manufacturing interests. It was denied by some that he intended to increase the taxation of the people, but if the protection was to be at all adequate, would it not have the effect of destroying the revenue derived from the articles protected? This would necessitate a readjustment of the tariff, and a general increase on articles imported into this country, and not manufactured here. It was plain that there would be increased taxation on everything. The great reason alleged for asking that manufactures be protected was that they suffered from a peculiar depression, but that argument had been exploded. It had been shown that they suffered from the same depression which prevailed in other countries and in all branches of industry at this time.

There were many reasons why a protective policy should not be adopted. We must depend upon the development of our vast resources for future greatness. Our North-West must be filled with population, and we can only attract immigration by making the cost of living cheap in this country. While a protective tariff would be an injustice to the majority for the benefit of the few, it would also enhance the cost of living and drive immigration from our shores.

The only protection for our agriculturists was low duties, which would enable them to purchase the necessaries of life as cheaply as possible. Several Ontario farmers in this House had spoken in opposition to the principle of protection as applied to agriculture, and he believed they expressed the opinions of a large majority of the people of Ontario. He had the honour to represent the largest agricultural constituency in Nova Scotia, and he had no hesitation in saying that the views of the vast majority of his constituents were opposed to protection either to manufactures or agriculture. He had not the slightest doubt they would continue to do so, notwithstanding the captivating picture drawn by the hon. member for Stanstead of large manufacturing towns and home markets. The same picture had been presented to them when they entered the Confederation; but although the tariff had been increased seven or eight per cent., they saw no such result. No interest of Nova Scotia asked for protection, and the Board of Trade of Halifax had unanimously adopted a resolution against the system. The chief production in his county formerly was potatoes, for the raising of which the soil was peculiarly adapted. Since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty they had been shut out of the United States' markets, and the farmers of King's had been obliged to turn their attention to raising other products. In the year ending Sept. 20th, 1865, the value of potatoes shipped from his county alone to the United States was $130,992. In the six months immediately preceding the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, the value of potatoes exported from the same county to the United States was $135,229. In the year ending June 30th, 1875, the total amount of vegetables exported from the entire province to the United States was only $35,257.

It was very clear that the only remedy for Canada was reciprocity. The proposition of the right hon. gentleman would not help them, and he denied that a retaliatory policy would assist Canada. It had been stated that the United States had endeavoured to force us into annexation by the imposition of a high tariff. They had not succeeded, and it was absurd to think that a country ten times weaker than our neighbours could succeed in forcing a policy on the United States. He was further satisfied that a retaliatory policy would result injuriously to Canada. The right hon. gentleman's proposition to protect agricultural products would involve the imposition of a duty on flour. That would be a strange kind of protection for the farmers of the Lower Provinces who had no outlet for their products. Some might accuse him of sectionalism in his remarks, but he was satisfied that he was not open to this charge. Notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton he felt assured that among the leading men of the Maritime Provinces, the determination of the Government to keep down taxation had met with entire approbation. With regard to his own county he believed it was so, and he believed it applied to the whole of the western part of Nova Scotia at least. In conclusion he desired to congratulate the Government on the policy they had adopted in resisting the encroachments of Protectionists on the rank and file of the people, and on the system of economy they had inaugurated.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (South Ontario), held that a retaliatory policy would ruin Canada, and especially the lumber trade. What would the gentlemen conducting their business on the Ottawa say if they had to pay two or three more dollars on lumber? A retaliatory policy meant that we should do the same as the United States without reference to interest or to common sense. One thing which had been lost sight of by hon. gentlemen was, that if a tariff were raised above a certain point it afforded neither protection nor revenue. Last year the hon. member for Cumberland advocated retrenchment and opposed taxation on the ground that the finances of the country did not require it, whilst this year he took an altogether different course. The Finance Minister in the course of his duty notified the banks to prepare for the payment of money falling due to the Government; but the moment they were notified a yell came up from the Conservative party that the whole country was to be ruined by the absurdity of the Finance Minister. But the money was not called in.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings)—Did he not notify the banks that he wanted the money?

Hon. Mr. CAMERON replied in the affirmative, but repeated the fact that the money was not called in. He then showed that the Government had reduced the expenditure on militia and camps $403,000, and on emigration to the extent of $195,000. He thought the Government might very well reduce the militia expenditure another $400,000. If by this system of retrenchment the Government succeeded in maintaining the public credit, they would receive the approbation of the whole country.

A Government was in difficulty when it raised a tariff suddenly, either without due consideration, or owing to necessity and loss of revenue. Prior to Confederation a Finance Minister came to demand, on the plea that increased revenue must be obtained, double the duty on tea—it was then a penny. The consequence was—as he had warned the House—that $80,000 of revenue was lost. The farmers did not desire the imposition of a duty on grain; but on the contrary, they wished to see the importation of more grain than at present from the United States. The market was in England, and the only question at issue was whether the grain went by Quebec or New York.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) believed that a large majority of the people residing in the county of Hastings were anxious for increased protection in favour of our manufactures and of a duty on American grain. They also desired the construction of the Pacific Railway to open the great West for emigration. These matters had been brought before the electors of East Hastings in 1872 by a gentleman prominently engaged in lumbering and in shipbuilding; and this gentleman believed that Canadians should levy a duty on American grain, and showed that we were prepared by granting protection, not only to aid our farmers, but also our manufacturers. All would admit that this the latter required; and our agriculturists knew that when these interests prospered, they could readily sell their produce at increased prices, and for cash—which was impossible under contrary circumstances. Protection would consequently be to the farmers' advantage. The importation of Indian corn depreciated the price of our coarse grains; and the policy of the American manufacturers in sending their goods into this country and selling them for their actual cost was easily understood. The Americans had been given the privilege of fishing in Canadian waters in order that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces might have the advantage of sending their fish and fish oil free of duty into the United States. The farmers of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec had not only consented to this, but had also assisted in the payment of twenty-seven millions in order to build the Intercolonial Railway, and place light-houses at proper points. They also furnished money for putting in operation the bankrupt railway of Prince Edward's Island, and they were willing to do all in their power to make the people of the Lower Provinces happy, prosperous and contented. These agriculturists besides wished to secure the construction of a road in order to open up Manitoba and the North-West to settlement. The hon. member for Brant had taken exception to the amendment of the right hon. gentleman, stating that he could not understand the object of the member for Kingston, and holding that the motion meant and went for nothing; and shortly afterwards the hon. member for Lincoln declared that this motion contained what he had advocated throughout his life, showing that he, at any rate, entertained a contrary opinion.

The amendment before the House was one which every member of the Opposition would support, and on which they were ready to appeal to the people. But the Finance Minister had informed the House that our young men should be advised to remain on their farms. Now he (Mr. White) knew many young men who had gone to the cities and towns and succeeded, not only as merchants, but as professional men, occupying the most prominent positions. He believed the motion before the House would have the support of a large majority of the people of his county, and of the country in general.

Mr. PLUMB was surprised to hear an hon. gentleman opposite say there was no use in discussing this question any longer—that there was such a large majority against the amendment that no arguments would have any effect in changing their votes. Now, if the only fact brought out in this debate had been the discovery that we import so largely of farm products from the United States, it was worth while to continue it and to discuss the advisability of taxing such imports. He had voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal West, but he saw it did not go far enough and he was glad that another had been brought in which recognized other interests. One argument against this resolution was that those who supported it sought to persuade members of this House to impose a high tariff. He had never heard anyone argue in favour of such a policy. Some hon. gentlemen had spoken in favour of a retaliatory tariff; but he did not think they were ready for that. What had been contended for was a recast of the present tariff that it might be so regulated as to give the greatest benefit to home industries, and that the anomalies, in regard to taxing raw material, might be corrected. Nobody denied the fact that our manufacturing and mining interests are depressed, and if it was possible to assist them it should be done. He denied that there was any insincerity on the part of those who supported this amendment. They would prove their good faith by their votes. It had also been said that so small a portion of the community was engaged in manufacturing, and so large a part of the population would suffer from a protective policy, that it should not be adopted; but it must be remembered that what affects any considerable class must affect the whole people. Hon. gentlemen opposite had asserted that those who suffered for want of protection should read certain authorities on free-trade. It was a strange way to pacify starving people to tell them to read free-trade literature. It was not the manufacturer himself who suffered, but his employes and their families who could not find work. This House had heard something of such distress, but he predicted they would hear more before next summer. The agricultural interest needed a protection which would give it a steady market not affected by the fluctuations of other markets.

An eloquent gentleman on the other side of the House, who had made an excellent Protectionist speech, drew the conclusion that he must vote against any measure for protection, because, he said, agriculture was the main-spring of our prosperity. He (Mr. Plumb) admitted that, and if anything could be done to aid the farming interest, everyone in this House ought to be ready to support such a measure. On the frontier, where he resided, they had for a long time access to the American markets. During the war in the United States all our products brought high prices there; now our neighbours are our competitors. They taxed our products in the following style:—Beef and pork 1c. per lb.; hams and bacon, 2c. per lb.; cheese, 4c. per lb.; wheat, 20c. per bushel; butter, 4c. per lb.; lard, 2c. per lb.; rye and barley, 15c. per bushel; Indian corn, 10c. per bushel; oats, 11c. per bushel; rye flour, 10c. per bbl.; potatoes, 5c. per bushel; vegetables, 10 per cent. ad valorem; flour, 20 per cent. On our side we had no corresponding duties. It had been said by the hon. member for South Ontario that protection would injure our millers. That need not be the case if grain to be manufactured into flour by them be admitted in bond, and that they did not think so would be seen by the following petition:—

“The Petition of the Dominion Millers Association.”

“Humbly Sheweth

“That your petitioners, in the interest of the millers of Canada, numbering upwards of twelve hundred persons, having in the aggregate thirteen millions of dollars invested in the manufacture of flour in the Dominion of Canada, submit:

“That the interest of your petitioners, and the prosperity of the agriculturists, and of those engaged in the manufacture and export of the agricultural produce of Canada, are greatly prejudiced and injured by the marked inequality between the terms upon which cereal products are permitted to be imported into the United States from Canada, and those on which similar products are admitted into Canada from the United States; and your petitioners humbly submit that the free admission into the Dominion of grain and flour from the United States, while heavy discriminating duties are levied by the latter country upon similar products coming from Canada, is an injustice to the farmers and millers of this country.

“And your petitioners further submit, that while the charges, trouble and delays involved in bonding grain and flour of Canadian growth or manufacture, form a grave impediment to trade therein between the inland and seaboard Provinces of the Dominion, in the absence of any corresponding restriction on the importation into the latter Provinces of grain and Flour grown or manufactured in the United States, a decided preference is created in favour of foreign over native produce, to the discouragement and diminution of inter-provincial trade, and consequently to the detriment of the political as well as of the commercial interests of the Dominion.

“And your Petitioners therefore humbly pray that duties corresponding to those levied by the United States upon agricultural produce grown or manufactured in Canada, may be imposed upon similar imports from the United States, and that a drawback may be allowed upon the export of foreign grain when manufactured in Canada.”

He thought that this was a sufficient answer to what had been stated by the hon. member for South Ontario with regard to the millers.

The Government had told us that they found no necessity for recasting the tariff. A very large balance was undoubtedly held to the credit of the Administration by Canadian banks, but this represented a debt—not a surplus. It had been borrowed for certain purposes, on certain pledges, and for those alone could it be expended. It was not intended to tide over difficulties and provide against deficits. He had been very sorry to observe in the economies of which they had heard so much—but which were only economies when compared with the profuse expenditure of the Government during last year and the year before—a reduction of \$400,000 in the estimates for the Militia Department. He was aware that the hon. member for South Ontario had extreme views on this subject, but he doubted greatly whether the majority of the people of Canada agreed with that hon. gentleman on this point. He could hardly believe that this hon. gentleman's arguments had induced the Government to make this reduction. The whole apparent retrenchment of which the Government boasted was simply reduction of expenditures for the current year as compared with the extravagance of the last and would prove to be no ultimate saving at all. They were told that so small a portion of the people were engaged in manufactures that it was unfair to tax the great portion of the community which constituted the remainder. He desired, however, to show that the manufacturing industries of the Dominion of Canada in 1871 were: Capital invested (cents omitted), \$77,964,020; value of manufactures, \$221,617,773; wages paid, \$40,851,000; hands employed, 187,942. This shows that about $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the population were engaged in manufactures, and allowing that the wages of each operator sustained three individuals on an average, it would appear that about fifteen per cent. of the whole population are depending upon manufacturers for the necessaries of life. Each operator produced on an average \$1,179, and received in wages for so doing \$212, or 18 per cent. of the production.

The manufacturing class amounts to 44 per cent. of the agricultural class, or nearly one-half, and their wages for labour, $40,851,000, would have purchased the total cereal products of the Dominion in 1871. The products of their labor may be estimated at 75 per cent. more. The value of raw material used was $125,907,841, leaving $65,709,927 for wages and profit.

Now, if the manufacturing interest was in the prosperous condition it might be, there would be no necessity for four hundred thousand young Canadians seeking work and wages in the neighbouring Republic. Canada would have been in a very different position to-day if the native industries had been properly fostered. He believed that a small tax on bituminous coal would be a source of great advantage to Nova Scotia, inasmuch as it would enable that Province to supply Ontario, as far West as Toronto, with coal. What they wanted really was a national policy. He deprecated the Pacific Railway policy of the Government, asserting that if they had undertaken to build the road as was first intended, it would have given confidence to our population and have proved a great boon to the country by giving work to a large number of people, adding that a system of protection might have been adopted in connection with that policy, which would enable the iron for the road to be furnished from Canadian mines.

A good deal had been said about the prosperity a free-trade policy had conferred upon England, but he could not discover any analogy between the conditions of the two countries. England was in a very different situation when free-trade was adopted from that of Canada at the present time, and much of her sudden prosperity arose from the increase of railways. He was satisfied that free-trade would be ruinous to the trade of this country. In conclusion, he trusted that the hon. gentlemen who had avowed protection sentiments on the other side of the House would not follow the example of the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for Grenville, but would adhere consistently to the positions they had taken.

Mr. OLIVER contended that the imposition of a tax on corn would seriously affect the lumber interest. The hon. gentleman from Niagara had said that the importation into this country of the products of the soil was nearly as large as the exportation. This statement was not correct, and was refuted by the trade and navigation returns. In answer to the hon. member for Stanstead, he stated that the farmers of this country, in Ontario at any rate, were opposed to giving bonuses to manufacturers, believing it to be an unsound policy. The same hon. gentleman had advocated the taxation of the products of the soil, claiming that it would build up a large manufacturing population that would consume the annual products of the soil. This was a very plausible argument; but where were they to find an outlet for the manufactured articles? It was admitted that Canada could not compete with Americans in their own country, or with the English in their own market. Therefore, they would have no outlet for their manufactured goods.

The great difficulty about the theory of building up, through protection, the manufacturing interests of the country and a large consuming population for natural products, was that an outlet could not be found for the goods manufactured under this system. What would be the effect of the imposition of a duty on certain articles the hon. member for Stanstead mentioned? The latter strongly urged that a duty should be imposed on wool, but this would be a direct tax on the people of this country. We bought and sold this article largely; according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we purchased last year 7,947,879 lbs., costing $1,375,484, and we exported 2,647,498 lbs., realizing $919,680, leaving a balance of

3,300,351 lbs. in favour of our importations. The quality we required for manufacture was very different from that which we raised; the latter was long and fine, used in the New England States, and the former was short. Our selling price averages 31 cents. per lb., and our buying price 18 cents. per lb., paid to the Americans, obtaining on the transaction a handsome profit. Any one who had paid the slightest attention to the rulings of the Boston market would know that at all times Canadian commanded from 5 to 10 cents per lb. more than American wool; and this was the reason—as he had been repeatedly told by manufacturers—in consequence of our more vigorous climate our wool had a finer finish than the American. The same observation held good with regard to furs throughout the past, and he apprehended for all time to come our product would obtain a higher price than the American. His hon. friend from Stanstead feared that our wool should be excluded from the market across the border; but as we did not raise a sufficient quantity for our manufactures, a tax of 12 cents. per lb.—equal to the American duty—on wool imported would compel our manufacturers to pay in this relation 30 cents per pound, instead of 18 cents, to their great detriment; and the consumer would pay an increased price per yard for cloth. His hon. friend also advocated the imposition of duties on pease, oats and barley; but as we did not import a single bushel of these grains this would be folly. They next came to wheat and flour. The right hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, said that he had his pockets full of letters he had received from farmers urging such protection, but in the first place it would not require a great number of letters to fill the hon. gentleman's pockets, and in the next place, he did not doubt that the member for Kingston had a sufficient number of admirers among our agriculturists to fill with letters many more pockets than this hon. gentleman possessed; but where were the petitions from our farmers laid, in this regard? On the table? He admitted that such a document was in circulation, though not presented perhaps, among the millers of this country. He had read the proceedings of the millers who had met in Toronto, and he found that they complained of two things:—First, that their interests were not protected, and, secondly, that the railways discriminated in favour of grain, which was carried for 25 cents per 220 lbs., while flour, barreled, was charged 40 cents per 220 lbs., a grievance which could be remedied. The Miller's Association resolved to lay these matters before Parliament, but it appears that this has not been done, and they fall back on the device of increasing the price of flour by means of protection.

It was laid down by every political economist, and everyone who has studied the trade of this country, that as long as our exports of flour and wheat exceed the quantity we raised, it was impossible for any protection to regulate the price of these articles, as this was done in the market where they were sold. It was said that our imports in this relation equalled our exports; but this was a mistake. We exported of wheat and flour last year 8,594,460 bushels, realizing $10,004,069; and imported 7,444,086 bushels, which cost $9,120,270, the former showing a balance of 1,150,372 bushels in favour of our people, worth $883,749. The quantity appeared very small, but, as he had stated on a previous occasion, this was a good and sufficient reason for the decrease as compared with our imports; hundreds and thousands of acres were now used for the growth of certain other agricultural products, which were planted with cereals a few years ago. The people of the western section, and also, he was glad to say, those of the eastern section and the sea-board Provinces, had gone largely into the manufacture of dairy produce.

It being six o'clock, the House took recess, Mr. Oliver still having the floor.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. OLIVER resuming, stated that about eight or nine years ago we imported about one quarter of a million's worth of dairy produce; but at present we exported it from Ontario to the value of $7,500,000. He was happy to say that the county, a part of which he had the honour to represent, exported of such produce a million dollars worth during the past season. This information was not to be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns; but he had it directly from the Secretary of the Dairymen's Association, and he could vouch for its accuracy.

It was proposed to benefit our manufacturing industries and agricultural interests by means of protection; but the farmers ought to see what they would pay for--what they would receive under such a policy. Between 1870-1, when a duty was imposed on foreign produce imported, it realized only $78,000; and if it was re-imposed, only a corresponding amount would probably be obtained, while for its sake the agriculturists would be obliged to pay a very much larger sum.

Last year we imported dutiable goods to the value of $78,000,000; and even if an extra 2½ per cent. were levied on manufactures imported it would increase their price, at all events, to that extent, and the taxation by two millions. The consuming public would be obliged to pay this advance! They again found that not one but every industry must be protected, including mineral products, the lumber and mercantile interests; and if the mineral products were taken into consideration, it appeared that the very small sum of fifty cents per ton must be placed on coal, of which we imported 660,000 tons, raising such a duty, consequently, to $330,000 per annum. We purchased yearly tea to the value of four millions of dollars; and a movement was afoot in favour of the re-imposition of the duty taken off from this article. Since the duty was removed the Americans had full liberty to compete in our market, and beyond question this had lowered the price of the article. If the duty was re-imposed it would cost the consuming public $400,000 per annum. The sugar refiners desired further protection, and the member for Montreal West affirmed that they now manufactured sugar at a loss of 12 cents per hundred pounds, owing to the drawback allowed on the American article when exported here. If the demand of the refiners was granted it would increase, at the lowest estimate, the price of our sugar one cent per pound.

We used 11,000,000 pounds, and consequently we would have to pay therefor $1,111,000. He was told by a gentleman who thoroughly understood this trade, that the advance under such circumstances would exceed one cent per pound; and, as he had mentioned, the people would at least be taxed an extra $1,111,000 for the benefit of three or four institutions. Taking their condition into consideration they knew that some refiners who, like many other persons in Canada, had commenced operations with very small capital, had realized very large competencies, showing conclusively that the undertaking was profitable.

The hon. member for North Huron, by his Committee, would ask for a re-imposition of the duty on salt. We import 2,560,000 bushels of salt, for which we would have to pay the additional price, at 5 cents per bushels, of $118,000. It would be impossible to estimate the taxation which this protective system would impose on the country, but on the articles he had mentioned it would be something like $3,969,000 which the consuming population was asked to pay to put into their pockets the small amount of $78,000. But it was asserted the imposition of protective duties would not increase the cost of the articles protected. He thought he could prove the contrary from the history of the petroleum interest, which was protected by a tariff of 15 per cent., and paid an excise duty of five per cent. The American duty was 20 per cent., so that the duties were nearly reciprocal. The result of this protection was that rings were formed among the oil producers and refiners of West Ontario to increase the cost of petroleum to the consumers. Refineries were standing idle and their proprietors were receiving three to five thousand a year for keeping their machinery idle. Instead of oil selling at 15 cents to 20 cents it costs 28 cents wholesale. Another result of this protection was that smuggling was carried on so extensively it would require double the number of preventive officers to watch the frontier. Such were the results of over-protection. The hon. member for Stanstead advocated a policy which would make a close corporation of this country, where everything we could produce would be consumed by a manufacturing population. What effect would that have upon our shipping interest? If everything is to be protected, as a matter of course all the articles that enter into the building of ships would cost more, and the result would be the same in this country as in the United States where the shipping interest had been destroyed by over-protection. Admitting for the sake of argument that the price of flour could be increased by protection, it would add to the cost of breadstuffs consumed by the Lower Provinces. Would the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick be content with that? He apprehended they would feel discontented, and it would be injurious to the future of this country if any of the smaller Provinces had reason to believe that Ontario and Quebec had used their great influence to tax them unfairly.

The policy of the Government, with reference to the cash at their command, had been attacked. The late Government deposited it in the bank of Montreal. That bank went down to Wall Street and speculated on the money which belonged to the people of Canada. The present Government put a certain part of this money into the various banks of the country. It was alleged that this produced inflation, and was a principal cause of the prevailing depression. Now there was nothing more important than to have sufficient money at the command of the commission merchants to move the grain every fall. The people merely had the use of their own money when it was required.

It had been said that the policy proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston would benefit the farmers. This was a mere assertion, which nobody had backed up with facts or figures. The hon. member for South Norfolk had stated that there was prosperity in this country until the present Government came into power; but he forgot that the depression of 1857-8 occurred while the right hon. member for Kingston was in power. It would hardly be asserted that the influence of the present Government extended to England, Germany, or the United States; yet there was depression there as well as in this country.

Representing as he did one of the best agricultural districts in the Dominion, he had deemed it necessary to make these remarks before voting on the amendment before the House.

Mr. WOOD said that two years ago, when he had the honour to move for a Committee to investigate into the manufacturing industries of this country, he had no idea that the question of free-trade and protection would so soon engage the attention of Canada. The report of that Committee showed the injustice done to the manufacturing interest, and their right to redress. He maintained that the farmers would not object to taxation if it could be pointed out that it was to their interest, which he thought could be done. They were willing to be taxed for railroads that would open up to them markets which they had not formerly been able to reach. The fact was that protection merely asked for the creation of a home market for their rural productions. The hon. member for South Brant had stated that a number of things in the United States had a protection which amounted to some 80 and 100 per cent., but the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House that scarcely any of these articles were imported. These articles were manufactured in the Union and were sold to the people at as low a price as they could purchase them in a foreign country. The welfare of the country demanded the protection of home industries. (At this point, Mr. Wood, in consequence of sudden indisposition, was unable to proceed with his remarks).

Mr. MILLS said the resolution proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston was said to be a very comprehensive one, and he thought the observations which had been made by supporters of that hon. gentleman, not only in the House but in the press, showed this statement of the character of the resolution was literally correct. In fact, it was so comprehensive that the Free-Traders who supported the gentlemen opposite found no difficulty in endorsing the sentiments which it expressed, and the Protectionists on the Government side of the House were equally ready to support it in the interests of protection. Some hon. gentlemen had complained that this had been a discussion on the questions of free-trade and protection, and that these questions were not necessarily raised by the motion before the House. He dissented from that proposition, holding that these questions were strictly pertinent. The hon. gentlemen who supported the resolution did not say they desired more taxation for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the public service, but a redistribution of the tariff in order to encourage home industries. He remembered that when the terms of the admission of British Columbia were under consideration, the right hon. member for Kingston and his colleagues in the Government found it necessary to propose a resolution in which they stated that in carrying out these terms no increased taxation would be required. It seemed that gentlemen, belonging to the party of retrogression as well as the party of progress, believed that progress was a public blessing, but the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House since the Session had commenced had abandoned the ground they had formerly taken. In the discussion of these resolutions the ground had been taken that taxation was really a public blessing, and under the circumstances it seemed to him that the question of free-trade and protection became very important, and the real issue before the House. He never had been able to understand the logic of those who declared in favour of free-trade as a matter of principle, and at the same time were practically in favour of incidental protection. He held that free-trade was an undoubted advantage, and did not subscribe to the doctrine laid down by the right hon. member for Kingston that it was a mere subordinate branch of political economy, but rather the outcome of certain facts. It was a logical deduction from a great number of facts that had been considered, not incidental in its character, not influenced by circumstances of time and place, and which was equally applicable to all people, whatever might be their peculiar condition. He did not think it was in the public interest to impose more taxation than was absolutely required. Now, what did they find in that principle of incidental protections? They found that the country collected a very large amount of taxes, a very small proportion of which, it might be, went into the public Treasury. The tax imposed on imported goods, or a considerable portion of it, at all events, went into the public Treasury, but the incident to this customs tax imposed on goods being produced in the country went into the pockets of the manufacturers and the distributors. By incidental protection they took the money from one portion of the people and gave it to another portion engaged in different pursuits. He would be very sorry, seeing that Canada had, to some extent, entered upon what he considered to be a wrong path in adopting this principle of incidental protection, if they should seek to press it further. He believed it was in the public interest that they should depart from that system and get back to a more rational and wholesome basis of taxation.

As a matter of principle, there was no difference between incidental and direct protection, and in his judgment no advantage could be gained by either system. So long as indirect taxation existed a considerable amount of money must be collected, which did not go into the public Treasury; and one of our aims ought to be to limit this to the greatest possible extent. We paid on goods paying specific duty, a tax of $2,366,944; and on these the importer and retailer realized a profit of $929,718. Goods paying specific and ad valorem duties paid a tax of $2,328,663; and the ordinary profit to the importer and retailer was $815,033. On goods paying 25 per cent. duty, $2,826,076 were collected, and on these a profit of $98,936 was obtained. Goods paying 17½ per cent. gave a revenue of $9,519,688.61, the profit being $3,331,260; 10 per cent. goods paid $2,083,242, and the profit amounted to $99,134. On goods worth five millions, five per cent. was paid, the tax raised being $292,834, and the profit was $102,291. In order that $15,344,000 might be received into the Treasury, taxes in the form of profits to the importer and distributor of the good—but not upon the original price or cost—were paid to the extent of $5,273,000; making in all $20,618,000 in taxation, of which only $15,000,000 had come into the Treasury. Besides there was the cost of collection. He did not say that we should adopt the system of direct taxation, for there were certain advantages arising out of the present system, as under it people paid taxes when they could do so, and according to their proportions. The disadvantages were, however, immense, and deserved the very gravest consideration. He thought it would be seen that it was possible for the public to pay, besides the five millions to the retailer and importer which he had mentioned, a very large sum to the manufacturer. He did not say that when 17½ per cent. of taxation was imposed the price of the articles in question was increased to this extent; but this might be the case. If this was assumed to be so, on the $76,000,000 worth of goods we annually produced, corresponding to those that paid 17½ per cent., the people would be obliged to pay the additional sum of $18,000,000. He did not pretend that this was paid, but he said that the price of articles was considerably increased in consequence of protection; else how could it confer any benefit? Our whole theory of admitting raw material free of duty was based on such an assumption, and this increase must be added to the $15,000,000 of which he had spoken; so that in connection with the collection of the $15,000,000 of Custom's duties, the people paid a very large amount which formed no inconsiderable portion of the total amount of taxation levied. They had been told that protection would be in the interest of the farmer; it seemed to be a most extraordinary statement that taxation was a benefit. The manufacturer did not add a dollar to the public wealth, which consisted of what he compelled others to contribute to his capital; his profits were wrung from the industry of others, and this was the necessary consequence of the system. The mover of the amendment averred that protection would increase the prosperity of the Canadian farmer; but he would like to see this proven, for he could not see how it was to be done. How could it produce this effect? We were told it would be produced partly by the increased cost of rye. We produced in Canada 3,800,000 bushels of corn and 1,000,000 of rye, and the imports of such grains were for the use of farmers and lumbermen. How then could they be benefited by this taxation on articles which they used themselves.

The hon. member for Stanstead had pointed to New England to show how protection could build up industries. He (Mr. Mills) had in his hand some interesting statistics of the consequences of protection in that country. Industries protected by duties of 60 and 70 per cent. had benefited by that policy; but the farmers had found the markets at their own doors too expensive to be profitable. The price of land depends on the profits derivable from the soil, and yet we find, since the adoption of this policy, there are not to-day so many houses in proportion to the population in New England as there were in 1860; there are not so many engaged in agricultural pursuits now as then, and the value of land has decreased in all the New England States and Pennsylvania.

The right hon. member for Kingston had advocated a hostile commercial policy for the purpose of bringing our neighbours to terms, but a Government which adopted such a policy injured its own people more than the people of neighbouring countries.

Spain furnished a striking illustration of the effects of a high protective policy; yet the commercial un wisdom which had crippled the energies of Spain, was what the right hon. member for Kingston recommended to the favourable consideration of this House. The neighbouring country had tried it, and the result was shown in the woollen interest. In 1867 an agreement for mutual protection was entered into by the wool producers and the manufacturers of woollen goods, and received the sanction of Congress. In three years from the time of its adoption, one thousand sets of woollen machinery in the United States, involving directly the labour of 16,000 workmen, and indirectly the support of three times that number, were stopped. Woollen factories costing $1,000,000 were sold for less than $200,000, and converted into establishments for the manufacture of cotton. The reason given for the increased duties on woollen goods was that labour in the United States was so much higher than in England, but we find from the New York Commercial Bulletin that the price of labour forms but 17½ per cent of the cost of production. That would not make a difference of more than two or three per cent. between the cost of production in England and the United States, notwithstanding the protective tariff of nearly 60 per cent. One hon. gentleman had asserted the other night that States in which manufactures were established were more prosperous than those which depended altogether on agriculture. In the decade between 1860 and 1870, Pennsylvania increased in population 20 per cent., in Maine and New Hampshire the population decreased, in Vermont the gain was only 5 per cent., and in Rhode Island, 25 per cent.; while Iowa, a purely agricultural State, increased in the same decade 83 per cent., Michigan 60 per cent., Illinois 50 per cent., Kansas 200 per cent.

The hon. gentleman who sat near to him pointed out that the wool produced in Canada was a much more valuable article than that which was used in the manufacture of woollen goods in this country. Now, a tax on imported wool would not benefit our farmers in the smallest degree, as it would produce no effect on the price of wool, which was governed by the foreign market to which it was sent. The hon. member for Stanstead threatened Canadians with being run out of their own market by the wool from Texas. But the effect of the protective policy of the United States had caused a reduction in the number of sheep raised year by year in Texas and Ohio. They had been told of the advantage protection would be to our manufacturers; but in the United States, manufacturers were not now in a prosperous condition. Of the 75,730 persons engaged in manufactures, 25,240 were without employment, and had no choice between being supported as paupers or by means less lawful. This was the system which hon. gentlemen recommended to this House for its consideration in the face of the experience of the United States. The fact that the English market had fallen in 1873, 1874 and 1875 was due to the fact that the continental customers of England had been impoverished by the late war, but as soon as these customers recovered from the effect of this war the prosperity of these trades would return. The hon. gentleman did not deem the experience of England as anything, saying that every country began with protection. This was true, but there was a time when the theory of medicine was not so advanced as it was now, and he apprehended his hon. friend from Cumberland would not have them go back to the days of Galen because the country was new. There had been discoveries in economic science, as in other sciences, and instead of commencing where our ancestors began, we should profit by their experience and learn something from their wisdom. Certain industries were undoubtedly depressed, but he would not state the precise cause, whether owing to over-discount or its consequence, over-importation, or to sympathy with the condition of our neighbours. If the restrictive system was beneficial, why should the canals be widened and railway facilities increased, for their object was to cheapen transportation and equalize prices. An hon. member had already pointed out that all round Protectionists would find a great deal of difficulty in carrying their theory into effect, as increased duties would be placed on all articles coming into competition with our interests. There were three elements in the price of every article—wages, taxation, and profits; and they were told that an increase of taxation could be made without affecting either wages or profits. This was absurd. He had never been able to understand how this could be done. Coal was a raw material, and yet a duty upon it in favour of the Lower Province interests would be prejudicial with regard to Ontario manufacturers. He did not understand the hon. member for Cumberland to say that it would be specially advantageous to the latter, but rather that standing alone it would be injurious to them; yet if a tax was put on flour for the benefit of Ontario simultaneously, mutual benefit and blessing would follow. This was the argument. The hon. member for South Norfolk told them that our difficulties would be removed if we had money which had no value—if the Government would employ an engraver and establish a paper mill. This he could not comprehend. Of one thing, however, he was certain, that if we ventured to frame an extreme Protectionist policy, the greatest difficulty would be experienced before a rational system could be obtained.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER regretted that the hon. member for Bothwell had not favoured them with the long and philosophic address he had delivered at an earlier period in the debate. He feared that at this stage no line of argument which any hon. gentleman could take would prevent a certain amount of weariness being felt by those who were compelled to listen. He had spoken on two former similar occasions, and he would not have risen in this connection had not reference been frequently made to the opinions he had advocated. One objection taken to the motion, which he supported with very great pleasure, was that it was too comprehensive; one hon. gentleman said that any Free-Trader could vote for it with perfect consistency, and another hon. gentleman had affirmed that it was in favour of protection. Both these statements were true; and why? For the reason he had previously given. In the condition of Canada it was idle to discuss questions of free-trade and protection as abstract principles; it was impossible, situated as we were alongside of a great nation, to adopt a fiscal policy, framed utterly regardless and irrespective of any policy pursued by our neighbours. Hence a defensive policy to which a Free-Trader might object on the principles of free trade, should be supported by him in order that he might secure his purposes; the extreme Free-Traders, if they liked, occupied a common platform with protectionists in this relation. Free-trade could only be obtained by one mode. Individual members might be opposed to reciprocity, but both political parties were favourable to such a treaty, which meant free-trade to a certain extent with the United States; and it could only be attained by one means—by adopting a defensive policy. Why did we get it twenty years ago? Simply in order to remove the customs duties, which restricted the free-interchange of certain products between the two countries. Why did they adopt that treaty? It was because there was a hostile tariff on both sides of the line, and the time has come when, if we would secure a renewal of reciprocal relations, we must have something to offer. Therefore, everyone who believed in reciprocal free trade with the United States was bound to support the resolution before the House. This Government, rightly believing that reciprocity would promote the prosperity of the Dominion, sent a commissioner to Washington to negotiate a treaty, but he had given everything in advance; he had nothing to offer, and he could accomplish nothing.

An hon. gentleman had complained this resolution was too comprehensive, but that was just the policy Canada required—a broad, comprehensive, national policy, that without looking to any particular part of the country would promote the prosperity of the whole Dominion. He did not believe any man in this House had the moral courage to stand up and deny the soundness of the principle contained in this resolution. Was there an intelligent man in this country that would not, if he could, so reconstruct the tariff as to alleviate a stagnation of business which was deplored in the Speech from the Throne. It must have been a severe depression which would cause the Government to make such an allusion to it, and the only ground on which it could be justified was that they were prepared to ask Parliament to adopt measures for its removal. Was there a man who would deny it was the duty of the Government, if they could, to afford fitting encouragement to our struggling industries? If there was he would like to see him. He (Mr. Tupper) saw no reason why the free-traders in this House should not join with the Protectionists in supporting this resolution, and finding some means of dealing with this difficulty in a statesmanlike and practical manner. The speech of the hon. member for Bothwell proved how absurd it was to discuss this question from an abstract point of view. He denounced incidental protection, which the Premier whom he supported, had advocated in this House and elsewhere. Even in the Government itself there was a difference of policy. He (Mr. Tupper) held that however much they might differ in opinion, they were bound when they presented themselves to Parliament to agree upon the great fundamental principles of public policy. When, therefore, the Premier declared himself in favor of incidental protection, it was not open to the Finance Minister to say he was opposed to it. He was not surprised the hon. gentlemen disagreed. Two years ago the Finance Minister declared to a deputation he was personally in favour of protection.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman is making a most inaccurate statement. I never declared such a thing.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was so reported in all the Ministerial journals and not denied. The hon. gentleman was strangely misunderstood by another deputation also. They left him recently under the impression that he was in favor of increased duties, but the only protection hon. gentlemen opposite believed in was the protection of their seats.

He then proceeded to read from a speech of the First Minister to show that he had made a solemn pledge that there would be a readjustment of the tariff and increased protection whenever the revenue failed to meet the expenditure, and had thereby increased the financial depression which existed in the country by the discouragement of trade. The gentlemen on the Treasury Benches believed in nothing except that which, regardless of the welfare of the country, would continue their tenure of power. The Hon. Minister of Finance had given a pledge that the tariff should be this year increased, and he would give the hon. gentleman the grounds on which he made the statement. The hon. gentleman had made a Budget Speech, in which he had left the House in ignorance as to what would be the financial position of the country three months hence. But the hon. gentleman had given figures which would enable those who placed confidence in him, to arrive at the probable condition of the country on July 1st, 1876. The hon. gentleman stated that if he had not imposed the new tax in 1873-4, there would have been a deficit on July 1st 1874, of $1,300,000. At the end of three months, however, there was a surplus of $126,522, and yet he told them that there would have been a deficit if it had not been for the new taxation. Now, in order that the deficit might have existed there would require to have been an increase of expenditure over the revenue of $1,426,522 during the remaining portion of the year. The statement of the hon. gentleman laid on the table a few nights ago, as to the financial condition of Canada up to the 10th February, showed that the expenditure exceeded the revenue by $1,145,713. The railway suspense account amounted to $1,167,950, making a total of $2,213,663. To this amount must be added the amount of the surplus at the end of nine months of 1873. $126,522, which, together with the $1,300,000 deficit the Finance Minister said would exist if the new taxes were not imposed, gave a total of $3,640,186 as the deficit which, by his own figures, the Finance Minister showed would exist on July 1st. He maintained that in view of the pledges which had been made by the First Minister in favour of incidental protection and a revenue tariff, the country had a right to expect a different policy. The Hon. Finance Minister, when he asked the House to impose $3,000,000 additional taxation in 1873-4, stated that in order to get money cheap, it was necessary to prevent the possibility of a deficit being charged against the Government if it was desired to get the highest price for Canadian securities.

He asked the hon. gentleman to tell him how this was consistent with that declaration. Were we done borrowing money? The hon. gentleman knew that this was not the case. The hon. gentleman had told them that we must borrow money in order to take up our debentures as they fell due, in addition to carrying on our public works. The hon. gentleman who told the House yesterday that the honour, prosperity and future of Canada depended upon giving him supplies that would avert a deficit, now sat stolidly by and allowed the Government to succumb to the influences which had been brought to bear upon them at the eleventh hour — permitted this enormous deficit to strike down and ruin the credit of the country. What did the hon. gentleman say in a speech that he (Mr. Tupper) held in his hands. That we would have had a deficit; that our credit would have been practically broken; that we would have had a repetition of the disgraceful condition in which this country found itself during the year 1866, when Canadian five per cents were quoted on the London market at 75 or 76 cents on the dollar; and the Canadian Minister of Finance, standing in his place, was obliged to rise and tell the House that he was unable to borrow money in London on the credit of Canada at eight per cent.

Did the hon. gentleman wish to restore this state of things, and put Canada in the position he had indicated. The hon. gentleman had told the House that if he was not given three millions, when he did not need a dollar, such would have been the result; and yet the hon. gentleman, when by his own showing a four millions deficit would exist on the 1st of next July, was prepared to hold on to office and abandon the settled policy of the country, going back on the pledge given by the First Minister of the Crown, throwing away his own public character and disregarding the declarations made to the people of Canada at the bidding of gentlemen who said that they would not consent to any addition to the tariff. He was informed that the hon. gentleman's tariff resolutions were printed; so far was he from not having—as the hon. gentleman had intimated on the previous night—even considered the representations made by the different sections of the country.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I beg to tell the hon. gentleman that whoever told him so, stated a wilful and deliberate falsehood.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER replied that under these circumstances he was obliged to accept this averment; but he would add that he had reason to believe that his statement was correct. Nevertheless, if it were not they ought to have been printed—if good faith had been kept between the First Minister and the Canadian people, and between them and the Finance Minister, who had pledged his reputation as a man that no deficit should exist, because it was so utterly disastrous and ruinous to a country in the condition of Canada. One of the hon. members from Prince Edward Island—Kings County, he believed,—took credit for the pressure he and his friends had brought to bear on the Finance Minister at the last hour. What did he find in a paper of Charlottetown, which was the organ of the Minister of the Interior? A telegram; and if the hon. gentleman wished to see the authority for the belief the people entertained in this regard he should look at the journal, the property of one of his own colleagues. And this telegram sent from Ottawa declared that the Finance Minister desired to meet the deficit by the imposition of new duties, but that the Government had been pressed by a deputation from the Maritime Provinces which expressed its hostility to any such measure. The hon. gentleman had inserted in the gracious Speech from the Throne the statement that the depression of trade was such as to require the attention of the House, and they had prepared a policy which was consistent with their pledges, but at the eleventh hour this has been abandoned, and all they offered to the country was a protective policy with regard to the Treasury Benches alone. He had said that any person in favour of a Reciprocity Treaty must expect to obtain it by one means alone, and that would be by adopting the policy he years ago had advocated, when he was met by the same declarations that he had heard during this debate. As a Canadian he could not listen to them without a blush, and he had no hesitation in saying that no man in Canada should hear without shame the assertion that our position was so utterly humiliating and at the mercy of the United States that we dare not follow a policy which we considered to be in our interests. A Canadian who did not blush for such an admission, was unworthy of the free institutions which we enjoyed. He was proud to be a Canadian; but this pride would become abject humility, if we were obliged to accept the policy of self-abasement the Ministerialists proclaimed to the world had to be followed, and if we could not adopt the fiscal system we believed the interests of Canada required at our hands; if we were forced to abase ourselves at the feet of our neighbours, and if they could dictate on what terms trade could be carried on between the two countries. He would not go into the question of slaughter markets; but the facts were known. While the products of Canada were met by a hostile and prohibitive tariff, we occupied a position which enabled the Americans to come in, destroy, and cripple, and break down all our industries. The hon. gentleman told us to be careful about what we did, and to speak with bated breath lest these great neighbours of ours might hear us, and sacrifice and destroy our interests.

Canada possessed the rights and privileges of a free country, and her Parliament could legislate in her own behalf, irrespective of the dictation of her neighbours. We were bound to deal with these questions in the true and national spirit of national policy. He had advocated these views previously; and one of the ablest members of the House at the time controverted them, enunciating the same doctrines to which he had just previously listened with such pain and dissatisfaction. But what were the opinions which that gentleman to-day held? He referred to Sir Alexander T. Galt, who as everybody knew, had been foremost in propounding the principle that the true policy of Canada was not to excite by retaliatory measures, and the adoption of a hostile tariff, any ill-feeling on the other side—that all difficulties should be smoothed away, and all made serene, in order to bring about reciprocal trade in this way; and what was his position to-day? After six years of patient waiting for the success of his own plan, he had adopted the views he (Mr. Tupper) had advocated in their entirety. That gentleman was now satisfied that the only true policy for Canada was to legislate, as far as regarded the United States, in the same selfish spirit in which they legislated with reference to us; and that in this manner, and in this manner alone, could we hope to attain any great future for this Canada of ours.

What had the hon. gentleman who had just sat down told the House?—that 600,000 tons of coal had come into Canada during the past year without the imposition upon it of a farthing of duty; and why should not this article pay duty as well as the clothing we wore, or any other article of consumption? Canada possessed the most magnificent coal mines on this continent; and why was it that our mining interest should not be included in this resolution as one of the most struggling industries to be found at present in Canada? The hon. member for Bothwell had revealed the secret; while this interest, in which twelve millions of capital were invested, was stagnant and paralyzed, and while the deepest suffering in consequence prevailed, what were we doing? Receiving with open arms from the United States, which excluded our products by a duty of 75 cents per ton, coal to the extent of 600,000 tons, on which not a farthing of duty was paid. Would a contra-impost be a sectional tax? The Finance Minister knew that in his own tariff he had proposed a tax of $1 per ton on ships, but because he was unable to carry it he reduced it to twenty cents. He (Mr. Tupper) could point to a product in Ontario on which 150 per cent. was paid by the people of the Maritime Provinces—the article was petroleum.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT I did not put a tax on it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER enquired whether a tariff carried through the House by the hon. gentleman was his own or not. The hon. gentleman had undertaken to change and remodel it, and therefore he was responsible for it. 150 per cent. was levied on petroleum, an article which was the exclusive product of Ontario—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! No!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER stated that the duty on petroleum was 15 cents per gallon, and the hon. gentleman was aware that it was produced in the United States for something like ten cents per gallon. The people of Ontario did not pay the duty because it was obtained in their midst, but it was more convenient for the Lower Provinces to import it from the United States. He did not say that this course was politic or impolitic, but it did not answer for gentlemen who maintained such a tariff to say that, when coal was produced in Nova Scotia, the people of this Dominion must buy it from a foreign country to the extent of 600,000 tons without paying a farthing of duty.

Could the hon. gentleman give him any reason why this was not a legitimate article of taxation the same as anything else in this country? At any rate he was ready to accept a duty on flour for this reason. If we were ever to follow the example of the United States, who had built up by their commercial policy a great internal trade, we must adopt a similar policy. It would be wise even to subsidize a line of steamers to carry coal and other products from Nova Scotia to Ontario, and transport flour and other products in return. While it would yield some revenue it would stimulate interprovincial trade. Such a policy would be worthy of this country and its people.

Hon. gentlemen who claimed credit for having formed this policy, admitted that protective duties build up great cities, but they complain that it takes the population from the country. They say "sweep away the large cities of Canada and the country will be as good as ever." The man who believed the great commercial centres of the Dominion could be swept away without spreading devastation throughout the country had yet to learn the alphabet of the progress of nations. He pitied the man who could look at Montreal and Toronto without feeling they were places of which Canadians might justly be proud. The Finance Minister seemed to deplore the fact that any man could be induced to do anything except remain at the tail of the plough. The hon. gentleman seemed to think these great centres of wealth, refinement, talent and education, were not worthy of a moment's consideration. Canada was in this position—her industries were inseparably interwoven with each other, and he defied anyone to injure one without injuring the whole.

The policy of the late Government when they found they had more money than they required, was to make tea and coffee free, but left the protective duties unchanged, which was the true policy. He was prepared to go to the fishing hamlets of the Maritime Provinces and submit to them if they were not prepared, for the sake of getting tea and coffee free of duty, and their own industry fostered to pay something on flour. It was a disgrace to this country that we did not furnish flour to all the people of the Lower Provinces from the granaries of Ontario.

He had the pleasure of finding that the doctrines he had propounded six years ago, and which met with such hostility from the most experienced public men in this country, were now endorsed in all their entirety. The hon. member for Halifax said such a policy would alienate England, but it would be perfectly right and just for Canada to discriminate in favour of the mother country. Our products instead of being met by a hostile tariff were received freely, and it would be wise and fair and would be attended with the best results to promote intercourse between the two countries.

He contended that the true policy of this country was to offer inducements to capitalists to invest their money in the Dominion, that industries might be built up in our midst. For want of such a policy one great interest had been driven out of this country, carrying all its capital with it to New York. We were losing capital, and we were losing what was more valuable—men. We were spending our money freely in bring immigrants to settle here, but the want of manufacturing industries had driven a quarter of a million people from Lower Canada across the border, and no doubt they had increased to half a million by this time.

He asked whether the statement of Mr. Howland, that 400,000 men from the western section of this country were now to be found scattered over the western and middle States of the neighbouring republic, was not worthy of consideration. A policy that would repatriate our country with these loyal and enterprising men, was a policy that Canada must adopt if she wished to do anything but hold a stationery position or to retrograde from her former prosperity.

The late Government had adopted a tariff that was as high as was necessary in the condition of the country at that time, to raise the revenue that was required. When reductions were made it was by taking the duty off tea and coffee, and placing on the free list articles which were required by our manufacturers as raw material. The $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. increase for which hon. gentleman opposite claimed credit was not commensurate with the change in the labour market of this continent. While they apparently gave protection with one hand, they swept it away with the other, by taking out of the free list articles required in our manufactures, and that accounted to a great extent for the changed condition of our manufacturing industries.

The Finance Minister claimed credit for pursuing a policy of retrenchment, and asserted that it caused umbrage. Any gentleman who could take umbrage at the retrenchment policy of the Government was very sensitive. What was this retrenchment policy the Hon. Minister of Finance had brought forth? At all events he had pleaded in extenuation that it is a very little one! The hon. member for South Ontario almost shed tears of gratitude over him for having reduced the Militia expenditure nearly $400,000 but instead of reduction, the fact was the House was asked to vote in reality more than the late Government had expended in 1873-4. Was that the kind of economy that should meet with an overflow of gratitude! He would ask him if he had not a little gratitude for the Government that really expended less on that service in 1873-74 than he had asked the House to vote on the same service. It was an insult to the House for the Government to claim credit for retrenchment or economy. They asked the House to vote $5,483,684 more for the expenditure of 1874-75 than had been expended in 1873-74. They made a pretence of economy by asking the House to vote $3,000,000 they did not require, and finding they could not spend the money they ask for less now, and call it economy. The late Government spent during the last fiscal year they were in power $19,174,641, while the expenditure of the present Government last year was $23,713,071, which was $4,538,430 more than the expenditure of the late Government during 1872-73. The estimates for the coming year are $3,708,172 more than the expenditure for 1873-4. Hon. gentlemen opposite would have to find some other grounds than those of pretended economy and retrenchment to sustain them. If the industries of this country were to be given fair play, an entirely different policy would have to be adopted with regard to Manitoba and British Columbia. They were most deeply interested in the policy propounded in the resolution. The large deficit which would exist by July would strike a fatal blow at the credit of Canada, and put the country in a condition which, according to the Finance Minister, would prevent it from obtaining money for less than 8 per cent. No one would suppose that a railway from Lake Superior to Red River would be constructed by Canada with money borrowed at 8 per cent. interest. The hon. gentleman by allowing a great deficit to stare the country in the face would effectually strike down the credit of the country. The hon. member for South Ontario says we are wasting time—that we can not expect to change the majority of sixty-four sustaining the Government. In agitating this question then they were appealing to the country and not to the members of the House, who regarded the interests of the people as subservient to party. It was true the hon. gentlemen might have a majority of sixty-four with which to vote them down, but they could not forget that that majority, two years ago, was more than one hundred. Let his hon. friend, the First Minister, look across the House at the seat occupied by the member for North Victoria and he would find where he had an able and intelligent friend and supporter sitting one short year ago, sat to-day an able and intelligent opponent of the Government. Let him cast his eye upon the county of Berthier, and he would observe that where one short year ago he could elect a representative in the Ministerial interest by acclamation, an able and intelligent representative of the people of the county, in opposition to the Administration, had been returned by a majority of 270. Let him glance at the County of South Norfolk. He (Mr. Tupper) did not wish to hurt the hon. gentleman's feelings, by reminding him of the strenuous efforts he had made to defeat the present representative of this constituency, and he would simply say this—that in this, one of the finest agricultural counties in the whole of this great Province of Ontario, which had by a majority of 90 two years ago sent a member to sustain the Government, had recently reversed its policy, and by a majority of 158 elected one of the most pronounced opponents the Administration had on that side of the House. Let the First Minister turn his attention to Two Mountains, and he would find that where he had a member elected by acclamation two years ago, one short year ago his candidate was defeated by a majority of 127. The hon. gentleman who now filled this seat had been bitterly assailed in the House, and taken at a disadvantage; but was he returned by a paltry majority? No,—but through the united support of every man of every stripe of politics in the country. He (Mr. Tupper) knew nothing of the matter to which allusion had been made in the House; but if the hon. gentleman required a character, this election by acclamation, under such circumstances, was sufficient for the purpose. Again, in the city of London a majority of 61 in favour of the Government had at the first opportunity, after a fair and generous trial had been given the Administration, been turned into a majority of 128 against them. Then if the First Minister went to Bellechasse, where he had a majority of 581 two years ago, he would see that a majority of 255 had been recently registered against him. In South Huron a majority of 84 of two years ago had dwindled into insignificance, and a gentleman who had for many years borne the banner of Conservatism in the county and fought in the Conservative interest, had not only rescued it out of the hands of his political opponents, but come to the House elected by acclamation. In Chambly county, a majority of 104 in favour of the Government two years ago, had been turned in favour of his hon. friend behind him, this county's able representative, to 150 against it; in East Toronto 130 of a majority for a supporter of the Government, on the earliest occasion which presented itself, had been changed to a majority of 414 against it. In Dorchester, where after an extremely violent contest two years ago, his hon. friend behind him had been returned by a poor 21, this hon. gentleman had recently been borne back triumphantly into the halls of the Legislature by a majority which was swelled to 466. In West Toronto a majority of 240 two years ago in favor of the Administration had been turned to a majority of 352 against it; in Charlevoix, a stronghold of the Government, which was supposed to be a Ministerial close-pocket borough, the candidate who had 276 of a majority only two years ago, had been defeated by his former able colleague, now at his side, the Opposition candidate, with the handsome majority of 211. He (Mr. Tupper) would say as little of North Renfrew as possible. Although it was carried by the Opposition candidate, his hon. friend had had his revenge. He (Mr. Tupper) had been there pitted against a gentleman whose physique was so incomparably greater than his own, weak as the hon. gentleman's cause was, that he had never recovered from the result of that three days' duel; and in this county a majority of 48 for the Government of the day a year ago had been turned into a majority of 242 for the present member.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

What of Centre Toronto? Did the hon. gentleman think it a triumph to have this constituency represented as it was to-day, and whose place had the hon. member taken? If there had been a man in the House ready to accept any statement which the Government might make, or back any policy which it might propound, that man was Mr. Wilkes, who whether in or out of the House was prepared to do the work, which was not always of the most creditable nature, the Administration had for him to perform.

An hon. gentleman—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER would also repeat, "Hear, hear," for he was rejoiced to know that what made it impossible for Mr. Wilkes to show his face on the hustings of his constituency, when he was condemned to meet the electors again, was the manner in which he had acted as Chairman of the Committee, tyrannizing over the present representative for South Norfolk, one of the most respected members of the House. If on this floor a majority could not be found to condemn that proceeding, he was proud to be assured of the fact that in such a great constituency as Toronto Centre this conduct had been visited with condign punishment.

Who came in Mr. Wilkes' stead? One of the most outspoken opponents that the Government had encountered in connection with the most important question of the Brown-Washington Treaty. If there was any one who deserved well of his country it was he who, when the interests of Canada were about to be sacrificed by the Government, had the independence to come forward, and apart from all political ties, declare that he was an open and unflinching foe of such a policy. That gentleman had said that the Administration endeavoured to inflict on the country a treaty which would have been utterly ruinous and disastrous to it; and he (Mr. Tupper) was rejoiced to find such a change made in the representation of this constituency.

What should they say of Hamilton? Elections had taken place in that city, and he asked the sitting members if they would have obtained their seats and a re-endorsement at the hands of the electors, if they had proclaimed the doctrines which the Finance Minister had recently announced. They would reply: "No!" There was not a person in this country who did not know that these hon. gentlemen were elected, not in support of the policy propounded by the Globe in Toronto, or the Herald in Montreal, but the contrary, whatever might have been their personal predilections or prejudices.

Then there was Lincoln, and was its representative elected through his endorsement of such a policy as the Government had announced. He (Mr. Tupper) felt almost sorry to accept the support of this hon. gentleman who, owing to his patriotism, was obliged to tender reluctantly his vote in opposition to the Ministry, because when listening to the hon. gentleman he perceived that his political attachments were so strong that that it was almost breaking his heart to give the Opposition the slightest support. What occasioned this action on the hon. gentleman's part? Why, he knew that as an honest representative of Lincoln he must vote against the Government on this important question—the most important indeed that could ever be submitted to the House: and the hon. gentleman knew that in vindication of what he believed to be the true interests of Canada, he was obliged to turn his back on those who sat on the Treasury Benches.

Then he came to West Montreal. The Premier, to beat Mr. White, had brought out an old supporter of Sir John A. Macdonald, who, while in Parliament, had for years voted against the hon. gentlemen opposite, and on the hustings declared himself opposed to the fiscal policy of the present Government. Though a Ministerial candidate, he advocated a reciprocal tariff and was opposed to the Government on the tea duties and the Pacific Railway policy. The battle was close, and even with this candidate, who pledged himself to vote against the Government on every important part of their policy, he was able to secure a majority of only 50 in a constituency which they had carried but two years before by 594 majority. These were evidences that hopeless as it might be to endeavour to grapple with the stolid indifference of men who thought their whole duty was to sustain the Government in doing one thing to day and another to-morrow, the Opposition could look beyond them to the intelligent and less confiding people of Canada, who by such verdicts had shown they only required an opportunity to complete the victory, which would be decisive when the people were permitted to speak. The man was blind who with those facts before him could not see standing out on the living page of our country's history, like the handwriting on the wall, the fact that these gentlemen had been tried in the balance and found wanting. The man must be deaf who could not hear the funeral knell of this Government which was peeling throughout the land, and the voice which was calling to the Ministry, "get you gone and let better men take your places!"

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had listened with some amusement to the torrent of vituperation which the hon. gentleman had launched against the Ministry. Not that it was unusual — but nothing could more effectually prove the utter weakness of the hon. gentleman's cause than the necessity which he found for levelling such charges, and assuming knowledge which he did not and could not possess. He had chosen to charge the Government again, and the Finance Minister particularly, with having not only contemplated and prepared a new tariff to be brought before the House, but even having it printed at the time. The declaration which had been made the other night that no such tariff had been prepared or announced should have been sufficient to prevent the hon. gentleman from indulging in such senseless tales, but nothing was too extravagant to say, and nothing too inaccurate for him to re-assert. He had stated that in 1874-5 the Government asked for $5,000,000 more for public service of the country than was asked for in 1873-4. It was possible more money was voted, but it was on capital account. The expenditure of 1873-4 was altogether $23,316,316. For that expenditure the late Government were responsible, because their successors were bound by the estimates of the current year, and had to make their estimates accordingly.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

The expenditure in 1874-5 was $23,771,864, and of this sum there were four entirely new items amounting to $538,702, besides many minor items, in consequence of a new Province coming in. Deducting this amount, the entire expenditure was $23,232,000, or $93,000 less in the first year of the new Government than in the year preceding it. The estimates for this year were $24,833,000, which embraced new items which had not at all to be provided for by the late Government, to the amount of $800,000, leaving the expenditure for the current year $24,000,000. This would show the extreme inaccuracy of the hon. gentleman's figures, but he was also astray in the militia estimates. The entire militia expenditure for the ensuing year was $649,000, while the smallest estimate of the hon. gentlemen opposite was $880,000, showing a reduction of $240,000 this year.

The hon. member for Cumberland had brought his power to bear, not in favour of protection so much as to discredit the Government. They did not object to his attack upon their action or criticisms of their policy, but they did object to his claiming they had no regard for the public interest. He had such regard for the public interest that he might have been on the Treasury Benches long before he reached them, but he would never stoop to the means adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite to gain power, or retain his hold upon the Government.

The hon. member for Cumberland, speaking of the member for Montreal West, endeavoured to show he was opposed to the general policy of the Government; but this was only a proof that no man of respectability would support hon. gentlemen opposite. He (Mr. Tupper) had read over a list of elections that had taken place since last Session, to show that the Opposition had carried nine elections, and the Government only three. That was very easily accounted for. The wave of popular indignation which swept the late Government out of power undoubtedly gave the Liberal Party more than their normal strength in the country. It was not a matter of surprise, therefore, that there should be some changes during the recess.

The hon. gentleman said a few nights ago that the Government had blindly adopted their predecessors' tariff, and had not the originality to construct a tariff of their own. They took the tariff of the hon. gentlemen, but now the hon. member for Cumberland said it was ruining the country. He would ask them to imagine the intellectual capacity of the men who could conceive that the true way to alleviate commercial distress was the imposition of new taxes. That was the most extraordinary remedy for commercial distress that could be imagined. He was surprised the hon. gentleman declared that his resolution meant nothing, but it was only following out the logical sequence of all his speeches. He did not remember that when in 1874 they imposed an additional percentage on some classes of goods they were charged with introducing the thin edge of protection. The hon. gentleman was then a Free Trader, and riding a free trade hobby, but now that the Government was not disposed to impose any new taxation he took an entirely different ground. The hon. gentleman charged him with having in his (Mr. Mackenzie's) speeches advocated incidental protection. He denied that he had ever been an advocate of protection, but he had stated frankly and openly that he was a Free Trader in principle. He had stated that the geographical position of the country and other conditions made it impossible to obtain the revenue required in any other way than by customs and excise duties. This would be the principal item from which the revenue would be drawn so long as the neighbouring republic continued the policy they at present adopted, and the burden should be distributed so as to confer the greatest amount of benefit on all classes. The hon. gentleman himself predicted that the financial cloud in the United States would overshadow a portion of this country. They knew that commercial crises came every ten or twelve years with the utmost certainty, and they had had an extravagant Government in power for many years, who had in the most wanton way increased the expenditure of the country. They saddled the Dominion with $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 debt for the purpose of securing financial support. They imposed on the country the enormous burden of the construction of the trans-continental railway, and in view of these facts it became the duty of the Finance Minister to make preparations to meet the expenditure the former Government had pledged the country to, and to meet the coming cloud which was certain, sooner or later, to cover our country as it had covered other countries before. The hon. gentleman stated, with the greatest possible coolness, that the effect of the imposition by the late Government of 50 per cent. duty on coal was to reduce the duty on coal going into the United States. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had a great opinion of this country; he believed we were a great people, and he believed we would be a greater people. But if the hon. gentleman succeeded in making the United States reduce their duty on coal, he would admit the hon. gentleman was a greater man than he thought he was, and that we were a greater people than he thought we were.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to state the facts?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I thought the hon. gentleman had stated the facts; as he has not I will state them myself.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was supposed that the Committee of Ways and Means in Washington reduced the duty on coal, but as soon as the Canadian Budget Speech was made they put it on again.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the duty in Canada was imposed in 1871, and the reduction of the United States' tariff was not made until 1872. The hon. gentleman said a retaliatory policy would meet the case.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was glad then to hear the hon. gentleman repudiated the sentiments of so many of the hon. gentlemen about him.

The hon. gentleman declared in favour of reciprocity of tariffs, which meant that we should impose on American goods precisely the same duties that our neighbours levied on our own. This was in the worst sense, a retaliatory policy, a most stupid course to recommend. Independent of all rules of trade, and of all knowledge of commerce and business, the hon. gentleman urged the adoption of the United States tariff, whether it would be suitable to us or not.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I do not.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then the hon. gentleman does not want reciprocity of tariffs.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I do.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is certainly then what it means.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE - The hon. gentleman had made a speech, which he had delivered on several occasions, and launched very strong and vigorous language at the Administration, depicting in glowing terms the chances of his own return to power, and the blessings this would bring to himself and the country. His hon. friend had also attempted to paint the distress which at present prevailed, and induce the House and country to believe that this state of things was to be attributed to the Government, on account of the tariff which they had adopted in 1874, and of the tariff which they had not imposed in 1876.

He thought the hon. gentleman could not for a moment doubt that the effect produced upon the country by the commercial disasters which had overtaken it, was simply what might always be expected when a time like the present came round in its usual way. The hon. gentleman must know, if he had looked back over our history, that the worst commercial crisis that ever took place in Canada occurred during the years 1856-7 and 8; also that his present leader was then the leader of the Conservative party, which came into power in 1854, when prosperity was enjoyed by the farmer and mechanic to such an extent as had not existed for years past; for he remembered then the Ontario agriculturist obtained $2 per bushel for his wheat; when wages were higher than they now were; and when a great tide of prosperity rolled over the country. Yet two years afterwards the shadow of commercial distress overspread farmers, mechanics, and merchants, distress, such as had not since been experienced, and as he hoped would never again be witnessed in this country. The hon. gentleman still spoke of the distress which at present prevailed as something extremely lamentable, causing his heart to bleed; and of the heartlessness of the Ministry, which would not raise an arm in order to avert any portion of the calamity from our suffering people. He (Mr. Mackenzie) believed that the suffering was confined to a very small section indeed. He could point to men who, six or eight years ago, were worth only from $10,000 to $20,000, and who by manufacturing to-day possessed fortunes of nearly half a million. Large sums had been made by the manufacturers. He did not grudge them what their enterprise had brought them, but everyone knew that their fortunes came out of the pockets of the people, and when a crisis like the present came, these men must in common with all classes make up their minds that the high tide of prosperity which they had enjoyed for a time was not likely to last forever, but that there must be periods of distress for manufacturers and their employes, as well as periods of comparative famine for the farmers and the classes dependent upon them.

The hon. gentleman and the member for Kingston—who was not present—had ventured the remark that instead of helping the country in its needs, and instead of sympathizing with the distressed classes, such as the manufacturers and their workmen, the Government almost ridiculed them, treating their representations with contempt. He could only say that nothing of the kind was fair or just; the comments were quite the opposite to true; he never ridiculed, and no hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches had ever ridiculed any section of the population. They were bound to receive, as they did, all the representations of manufacturers and merchants with the utmost possible patience; and he need not say that if the Government had been convinced that the interest of the country required such a revision of the tariff as had been recommended, and as many of the deputations asked, they would not have hesitated for one moment to incur the displeasure of hon. gentlemen opposite by making the change in the tariff which they required. They represented not only the manufacturing and commercial classes, but the whole country, upon which they were bound to consider what the effect of such a policy would be; and it was necessary for them to act in the interests of the great bulk of the people. This course they had pursued. The hon. gentleman might say that they were not honest in their motives; that they were actuated simply by the desire of retaining office; and that it would have pleased the great majority of the House and the great mass of the people had they adopted a different policy. But they surely were as able to comprehend the feeling of the House and country as was the hon. gentleman; and they would, moreover, be devoid of principle if they took a different course, merely in order to give their Administration greater strength. The very fact—if it was such—that they had displeased the majority of the House and country by their action, showed that they must hold their offices but lightly, risking them for the sake of carrying out what they deemed was for the best interests of the country. He feared, however, that the hon. gentleman was assailing the views of the great majority of the members of the House and the people of the country. The concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman all led up to one point—the restoration of the hon. gentlemen opposite to power; but if they had no other or better means of obtaining this object, than the policy at present pursued, he thought it would be long indeed before hon. gentlemen opposite would be entrusted with the destinies of the country. The hon. gentleman said that he, for one, would be prepared to discriminate in favour of England in our tariff arrangements. He would like to see the hon. gentleman carrying out such a policy; what would the result be? The hon. gentleman desired the Government to impose a duty on coal, but would he discriminate in favour of English coal? Would the hon. gentleman answer that question?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman said no. Then the hon. gentleman would only discriminate where it suited him; the hon. gentleman wished to conciliate public feeling in England, and this was a very cheap way of doing it. Although in favour of proceeding against the well understood policy of the Empire, his hon. friend was nevertheless to discriminate in favour of English merchants and manufacturers, and now he wanted the Government to impose a duty on English coal. He was afraid that when he came to particularize they would find there were very few articles in connection with which they would be able to carry out the policy the hon. gentleman pretended to favour.

He had to deal with another point, and he would then leave the matter in the hands of the House. The right hon. member for Kingston had accused him with neglecting and stopping public works; he had asked what this meant, and he had obtained no reply. He repeated his enquiry, for at no period in the history of Canada had there been so many public works carried forward as were at present under contract, and yet got no answer.

The expenditure of public money upon these works was greater and would be greater during this year than next, or than it was likely to be for years to come, so there was no ground for that charge. The Finance Minister had raised the last loan for the specific purpose of taking care that our public works should be proceeded with, and every effort was being made to push forward the works which were contemplated in the general scheme of canal improvements. The hon. gentleman charged the Government with imposing a very high duty on petroleum oil. The Government made no change in the tariff; they never touched the duty upon petroleum in any way whatever, and if the extraordinary reduction of price in the United States had made it possible to introduce the oil of that country at a lower figure to compete with Canadian oil, the hon. gentleman should have foreseen it. The hon. gentleman on the one hand had clamoured for protection on certain articles, and on the other hand for the removal of protection where it existed. He proposed to deal with the one point the resolution was intended to effect. The hon. gentleman hoped to make the farmers believe that he was specially their friend, and this resolution was intended to convey to the farmers the impression that although the Opposition were in favour of giving some special protection to manufacturers, they were also willing to give the same protection to the farmers. But he maintained, and his hon. friends who had spoken on that side had proven that it was out of the power of this House to give any protection to the farmers; that it was an utter delusion to pretend that such could be given, because of most coarse grains we import none, and the one we did import the hon member for North Wentworth had shown it was of great consequence to the farmers not to protect, but to obtain as low a price as possible. The Americans could grow corn cheaper than we could hope to do, and our farmers could sell their barley at higher rates than they could purchase corn. The idea that people could make money by being prevented from engaging in this sort of traffic was an utter delusion. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that it was part of the duty of this Legislature to prevent people from buying and selling where they could make money. If they should adopt the policy which the right hon. member for Kingston proposed, they would simply exclude foreign goods from the country and compel the people to trade with each other, and we would lose our foreign commerce. The hon. gentleman spoke about lowering his tariff as being a step backward, but to reimpose these duties would really be a step backwards in civilization. When the attempt was made to impress the belief upon our farmers that they would benefit by such legislation, he mistook their spirit, intelligence and political knowledge if he imagined that they were to be caught with such chaff. The views of the majority had been tolerably well explained, and all that had been said on the opposite side went to show their willingness to take advantage of any occasion to give a little temporary embarrassment to the Administration. The concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite, and of the leader of the Opposition, who moved this resolution, showed conclusively what was the real motive that guided them in proposing it, and he could only hope the verdict of the House would be so unmistakable on this as it was on the other motion that they would soon perceive that taking up so much time in the House in discussing a question of this kind was only losing time. He believed the intelligence of the House and of the country was abundantly sufficient to detect the sophistries and poor arguments that had been advanced by the gentlemen who opposed the Administration.

Mr. CASEY said it was apparent to everyone this amendment was nothing but a bid to catch the agricultural vote. The right hon. member for Kingston, in his speech had remarked that we should place our farmers on a level with those of the United States. This was something which he (Mr. Casey) did not desire to see, because our farmers were ahead of their rivals. If the policy of the Opposition were carried into effect it would make Canada a dear country to live in, and that would not be acceptable to the farmers. It had been held that a protective duty would facilitate the interchange of our flour for the coal of the Maritime Provinces. It was true if a sufficiently high tariff were imposed this could be done, but it would increase the cost of both articles to the consumer. The average value of coal exported from Nova Scotia to the United States in 1875 was $2.33. The cost of bringing it to Toronto would be about $4.50 per ton, which would make the price delivered say $7 per ton, while the average cost of United States coal imported into Ontario was $5. The duty required to force Ontario to use Nova Scotia coal would have to be $2 per ton. Ontario consumes say 400,000 tons, and the increased cost to the people would be $800,000. The right hon. member for Kingston advocated reciprocity in trade or in tariffs, which meant that because the Americans shut themselves out from buying in the cheapest market we should do likewise.

The adoption of a retaliatory policy virtually meant the closing of our markets for the Americans; and notwithstanding what had been said in support of the amendment, he did not know a single farmer who was in favour of the so called national policy. He hoped that the policy of the Government would be supported.

Mr. DECOSMOS believed that he was the only member of the House, and possibly the only parliamentary representative in the Dominion, who had resigned his seat in order to test the sense of his constituency on the question of protection; and he had been successful. The entire country was interested in the matter at issue. The leader of the Opposition had pronounced in favor of protection; and the leader of the Government had declared in favor of free-trade. He was opposed to a policy discriminating against the United States and in favour of England, unless Great Britain was prepared to use our timber and corn instead of obtaining its supplies of these articles from other countries. This was not a question to be considered as affecting the interests of the Ministry, but those of the Dominion. When British Columbia entered the Confederation its tariff was well calculated to foster its industries; but the Dominion tariff had proved to be unsuitable with regard to their agricultural interests, on behalf of which he favoured protection. If the Government were wise, taking a statesmanlike view of the great country they controlled, they would give to each section what was best adapted for creating wealth within it. All they asked was protection against the large farming interests of California and Oregon, and for such a proportionate reduction in articles of importation from foreign countries as would benefit the country. The First Minister should promote home in preference to foreign industries. The hon. gentleman had spoken of a five million deficit, but this would not be of great consequence if 5,000 people were induced to settle in British Columbia, who would earn $5,000 each at the gold mines. Any respectable government in this country could obtain enough money to construct a railway from Montreal, if necessary, or from Matawan to Victoria within the next ten years without oppressing any of the inhabitants of old or new Canada. The Government could ask Great Britain to guarantee a loan of fifty millions at two and a-half per cent. They had hoarded up some fifteen millions of dollars, of which twelve and a-half millions were, he believed, guaranteed for the Pacific Railway, and one and a-half millions for fortifications. The Administration substantially refused to carry out the terms to which they agreed with regard to the building of this railway, for which, if fifty millions were loaned for the purpose, the balance of twenty-five millions could be realized by the sale of lands, by which means the interest, sinking fund, &c., could be met. He sincerely hoped that we would never attempt to threaten the United States; but he still trusted that the Government would not allow the industries of this country to be crippled for fear of levying such duties on American imports as would protect our manufacturing interests. He did not think it was wise to talk of retaliation. The hon. First Minister remarked that the expenditure this year would be greater than for many years to come. He was very sorry to hear such a remark from the Premier. He had supposed the true policy of a country in time of depression was to augment public works and carry them on, and by these means employ the population until times became prosperous. Therefore, he held it to be the duty of this Government, instead of curtailing expenditure, to increase it and make provision for those who were suffering for want of employment. He believed that the farmers should be afforded such protection east of the Rocky Mountains as would enable them to provide the flour out of which to make bread for the people of the Maritime Provinces, and that in return we should impose a duty upon coal upon this side of the Rocky Mountains as would cause the people of Ontario and Quebec to be supplied from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. He believed in building up a home trade; and as an instance of its beneficial effects pointed to the wonderful recuperative powers of France, after the war with Germany, in consequence of being self-supporting. San Francisco exported last year $31,000,000 worth of American products to the markets on the shores of the Pacific, and imported $35,000,000 from abroad—nearly one-half the imports of the Dominion of Canada that had a population of 4,000,000, while the state of California had only 600,000. If our great Canadian Pacific Railway were constructed the products of our manufactories in the east would be carried into the markets on the Pacific, and compete with the exports of California. His constituency was principally in favour of protection to agricultural industries and the fostering of home manufactures. They did not ask for any prohibitory tariff; they did not ask for a tariff to encourage the growth of silk worms, or to bring into existence industries that our people had not thought of. All they asked was that as new industries arose in this country, we should impose a tariff to protect and foster these industries, and he believed the same principle would apply to the east as well as the west side of the Rocky Mountains. British Columbia stock raisers suffered severely from the low ad valorem duty at present imposed upon stock. They would prefer to see $5, $6 or $7 a head on cattle; $10 on horses; and $1 or $2 on sheep. The late Administration refused to give a separate and modified tariff to British Columbia; that was due to some extent to the Local Legislature not having formally asked them to do so. He had asked the present Finance Minister if such a thing would be done for British Columbia, but up to the present moment he had received no satisfactory reply. He intended to vote for the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston; he did not care whether it was a censure of the Government or not, he voted for it on the principle that he believed in protection for every native industry of the Dominion.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) said it would seem from the motion of the right hon. gentleman from Kingston and his speeches that he had in his hands the care of the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the country, but he had overlooked entirely the coal mining interest. When he heard the hon. member for Cumberland speak it seemed to him that the resolution was more mixed. The hon. member did not go in for a retaliatory policy; he did not go in for a reciprocal tariff, and he would like to know what he did go in for. He did not feel inclined to support such an amendment as the hon. gentleman had brought in, unless it was going to be of some benefit to the coal interests of his Province. Supposing the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were to assume the reins of power, what guarantee had the members from the Maritime Provinces that they would impose a duty on coal imported from the United States. By voting for this resolution he would be voting to impose an additional tax on the head of the people of Nova Scotia. He very much preferred to have the tariff remain as it was, at 17½ per cent., than there should be such a change in it as would only protect manufacturing industries and agriculture. If they could not protect all, the most advisable course to pursue was to leave the tariff as it was. It was very much better to

Than fly to others that we know not of.”

Mr. McCALLUM considered they were not legislating in this House for the present day, but for the future, and for that reason they should endeavour to foster and build up the industries of the Dominion. He believed in protection that would encourage manufactures, furnish the people with employment and build up a home market for Canadian produce. An hon. gentleman argued that it would require a tax on American coal equal to the freight on Nova Scotia coal to force it up to Ontario. Any man who was engaged in the commerce of the country knew very well that the principal freight was from the West to the East, and that freights from the East to the West were very cheap. If a trade were established between Ontario and the Lower Provinces they could bring up Nova Scotia coal as far as Toronto and it would not cost more than 50 cents per ton more than American coal.

Mr. KIRK said he did not intend at this late hour of the night, to detain the House but for a few minutes. This question has been before the House two or three days, and has been ably discussed from every stand-point, and there was now nothing new to say.

There was a principle laid down by an hon. member on the other side of the House, which is: "To legislate injuriously to any portion of this Dominion injuriously affects the whole Dominion." With this principle he entirely agreed, and it is because he agreed with it that he could not vote for the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston, now under discussion. There is an epoch in the history of our country anterior to which hon. members are sometimes wont to look; and when we look beyond the time when Confederation took place, in the history of Nova Scotia, we find that up to as late as 1854 we had in that Province a tariff of but 6½ per cent., a purely free trade and revenue tariff. After our railroad system commenced the tariff was increased to 10 per cent., and never in the history of the country was it higher than 12½ per cent. Revenue under the 12½ per cent. tariff, flowed into the treasury so rapidly that the Government of the day reduced it to 10 per cent. in one year, at which it remained till Confederation. It would be remembered, that Canada at that time had a 20 per cent. tariff. Now hon. members will not have forgotten the deep strong feeling which existed in Nova Scotia against Confederating with Canada. There were two principal causes for this bitter feeling of hostility. The first was the hon. member for Cumberland and those associated with him in promoting the scheme, refused to submit the question to the people at the polls, forced Confederation on us, and treated us as serfs, and not as free men enjoying a free constitution. The second was, the fear that the 20 per cent. protection tariff which then existed in Canada would be forced upon us in Nova Scotia. There need be no better arguments to prove that our people in Nova Scotia were then a free-trade people, and he was bold in stating that their minds have not since changed in that respect. He well remembered how eloquently the hon. member for Cumberland and his associates expatiated on the bright, the glorious future that was in store for Nova Scotia, and which was to commence immediately on the consummation of Confederation. We were to have mills and manufactures on every stream; we were to have the capitalists and manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec coming down and establishing their manufactures in every town and village in the Province. The sound of the pinnaul and hammer, and the whiz of machinery were to disturb the slumbers of the sleepy villagers; there was to be nothing but prosperity and no hard times. Where are the promised manufactories that removed to Nova Scotia? Instead of this being the case, what are the facts? We have the hon. member for Cumberland coming before this House and asking hon. members to enact a law to force the people of Nova Scotia to pay taxes to support those struggling manufacturers in Ontario and Quebec. It was said that the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston may mean free-trade, or it may mean protection. When we take it in connection with the speech of the right hon. gentleman in putting the resolution to the House, with the speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, who seconded the resolution, and in connection with speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite supporting it; and taken also in connection with the vote given by these hon. gentlemen on the resolution submitted to the House by the hon. member for Montreal West, it can mean nothing else but protection, which means taxation—additional taxation. It is said in support of the right honourable member's resolution that the agriculturists want protection. On looking at the Tariff we find the agriculturist is already pretty well protected. There is a duty of 10 per cent on hay, straw and beans, on animals of all kinds except for the improvement of stock, a duty of 10 per cent on vegetables, including potatoes and other roots. There is also a duty on the products of the dairy, on butter 4 cents per pound; or a duty equal to 25 per cent, and on cheese 3 cents per pound, or a duty equal to 30 per cent., and a duty equal to 10 per cent. on lard, tallow and so on—Now, we find on looking at the trade returns that these duties have been pretty effectual in keeping out foreign products. We find that of horses there were imported in 1875, but 1,225 whilst there were exported 4,382 and 4,130 of which went to the United States. There were imported of horned cattle 4,580, whilst we exported 38,968—34,651 of which went to the United States. Of sheep Canada imported 8,690, and exported 242,458, of which 236,808 went to the United States. Of butter Canada imported but 221,966 pounds. She imported 9,268,044—6,579,405 pounds of which went to the United States; and of eggs Canada imported 35,637 dozen, and exported 3,521,068, of which 3,424,850 dozen went to the United States.

These figures show that the balance of trade in these products of the farm was largely against the Eastern States and in favour of Canada. The Maritime Provinces have been appealed to in this debate to come up and support a protection policy as one in their interest. Now the interest of the Maritime Provinces are varied and important. He spoke more particularly for Nova Scotia as he had the honour to represent, however unworthily, a constituency in that Province. We have agriculture, fishing, mining, ship-building, and lumbering, not one of which can in any way be benefited by a protection policy. High tariffs as has been so often and so ably explained during this debate, mean high labour, dear food, a higher price for everything that enters into the consumption and production of all their industries. The agriculturists of Nova Scotia want no protection. They have no competition from the United States for any of their productions. Wheat in Nova Scotia is not grown to any extent, and consequently the farmer must of necessity procure his flour from abroad, and if a duty is placed on flour as contemplated by the resolution, it will be a tax on the Nova Scotia farmers. Nova Scotia imports annually about 400,000 barrels of flour. A duty of 25 cents per barrel on this article would make a tax of $100,000 on the people of Nova Scotia. During this discussion, we have heard but little about the fishermen of the Dominion, a most important branch of industry—except that some hon. gentleman from the other side of the house has said, “that much had been done for that class, and it ought now to bear a tax on flour and meal for the benefit of the farmer.” What has been done for the fishermen? It is said the market of the United States had been opened up for the sale of their fish.

There was exported from Canada in 1875 $5,580,527 worth of fish, of which $3,738,165 were exported from Nova Scotia, of which only $892,010 went to the United States. Now, this is what has been done for the fishermen—merely the right or privilege to sell $892,010 worth of fish annually. But what has the fishermen given for this privilege, Sir? We have been told that the “only lever we had to enforce “this much desired Reciprocity Treaty “with the United States had been “given away.” Well, what was that lever? Was it not the right to fish in our waters, which has been given away, a consideration for which it is expected this Dominion will receive a large amount of money. This money will be paid to the treasury of Canada, and the fishermen will see none of it. Then, the fishermen have paid dearly for the paltry privilege of selling a few fish to the Americans, and he protested against this House imposing a duty on their flour and meal.

Now, a great deal has been said about placing a duty on coal. He did not believe that any duty this House will submit to will be of any benefit to the coal interests of Nova Scotia, and for the same reason that he would vote against a duty on flour and meal he would vote against a duty on coal, because it would be sectional. Whilst in the case of flour and meal the tax would fall on the Maritime Provinces; in the case of coal it would fall on the western Provinces. If the Government desired to do anything to relieve the coal interests he would inform them wherein he thought this can be done, and done fairly to the whole Dominion. The coal owners of Nova Scotia pay now—and have paid since mining commenced in that Province—a duty to the Local Government for revenue purposes of 10 cents per ton; this amounts to a duty of 5 per cent. on all the capital engaged in mining. He thought it was a matter worthy of the consideration of this Government, in view of the fact that the Local Government cannot afford to relinquish this tax, to arrange with that Government in the way of commuting the amount which gives to the Local Government a sum annually of about from $80,000 to $100,000, according to the amount of coal raised. He remembered when the Finance Minister introduced his tariff two years ago, the hon. member for Cumberland violently attacked the policy of the Government, and said that it remained for an Ontario Finance Minister to impose increased taxes on the Maritime Provinces—that he was entering the thin wedge of the Protectionist. He could only say it now remained for a Nova Scotia representative to labour industriously to drive that wedge home.

Mr. HAGAR said he was well aware it was time this debate should cease. The question had been most ably and exhaustively discussed, and a most formidable array of figures and statistics given to the House, to add to which, he felt, would be an infliction. He would therefore confine himself to a few general remarks.

When he read the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, he was forcibly reminded of the angling proclivities of the right hon. member. He was, it was well known, an adept in the piscatory art, for he had himself confessed that he had often thrown his net and caught therein many a fish—big as well as little; and now, not with his accustomed skill, he had made another cast; once more thrown his net, baited it with protection, and hoped thereby to draw within or entangle in its meshes, no less a prize than the farmers of this country. But he (Mr. Hagar) imagined they were too shrewd, too intelligent, and too wary to be allured by such a bait; and unless it was changed for something more palatable, he would find his catch, not only small in size, but few in numbers. He (Mr. Hagar) denied that the farmers of this Dominion required increased protection, and had yet to learn, that in any number they had asked for it. He was himself a farmer, and represented a farming constituency, yet he knew of but one farmer in his county who advocated protection, and as it was understood he had given the hon. member for Centre Wellington the benefit of his views upon the subject, they would doubtless be embalmed in that report which all were so anxiously expecting. No one would question the magnitude and importance of the farming and lumbering interests of this country, and yet neither of these great industries had sent one single petition to this House, or one deputation to the Government, asking for increased protection, not but that they felt the prevailing hard times, not that they suffered from the general depression (and he could speak feelingly as well as truly when he said no interest suffered more keenly or severely than the lumbering interests), yet they did not seek relief at the expense of their neighbours. They had not, like some smaller industries, besieged the Government, which in their way they would fain make paternal by replenishing their pockets, which perchance extravagance, mismanagement or misfortune might have depleted. Neither of these great industries asked for increased protection, but they would hail a Reciprocity Treaty with our neighbours across the lines, if such a thing could be brought about on a fair and equitable basis, as the greatest boon that could be conferred upon them.

He did not desire to seem uncharitable, and he must confess it appeared to him as if this whole agitation for a protective tariff was conceived in greed, begotten of selfishness, and (with the exception of a small number of honest visionaries who believed what they practised, and that opposite class who desired to make political capital out of it) it was sustained and nourished by the few who desire to enrich themselves at the expense of the many. In these times of general depression, which extend to other countries, not perhaps more favourably situated, but certainly wealthier than our own, when trade languishes, when every interest suffers,—when capital is withdrawn, because confidence is weakened, he considered that unless it were absolutely necessary for purposes of revenue to meet our engagements, it would be worse than folly to increase the burden of our taxation. The opinion of the hon. member for Cumberland, to the contrary, notwithstanding he believed the course the Government had taken upon this question—the policy of retrenchment they had initiated—seeking by a wise, prudent, and judicious economy to curtail expenses, and to make our income square with our expenditure would commend itself to, and meet with the hearty approval of, the great majority of the people of this country. This policy was in accordance with that sound, true and correct legislation, the great object and aim of which was to confer “the greatest good upon the greatest number.”

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) was understood to say that he would not have spoken at such a late hour after so many eloquent speeches that had been delivered, but for the fact that he represented here an important industry whose interests had not been much discussed during the debate. He did not believe in protection as a principle of political economy, but he felt that the large duties which the United States imposed upon lumber and timber going into that country, while large quantities of lumber and timber came from Michigan to the Quebec market free, was an unfair competition with the Canadian lumbermen. He held in his hands a letter which stated that contracts had been made for the delivery of deals in the Quebec market, and he felt that some measure of relief should be afforded to the lumbermen of this country from such competition. He had heard it stated that the passage of the Michigan lumber through the country was a benefit to our carrying trade, but he had not heard anything advanced to justify the belief, that this lumber was not carried in American bottoms. He believed that such an adjustment of the tariff as was indicated in the resolution before the House would have the effect of bringing about reciprocal trade relations with the United States rather than the continuance of the slaughter policy which had been so long adopted, and had produced so unsatisfactory a result. With reference to the farming interests they were identical with the interests of the lumber trade. When one flourished the other flourished and when one languished so did the other. Believing as he did that a proper adjustment of the tariff would benefit the country he would support the resolution.

Mr. DEVLIN said it would require two or three hours to go over the points raised on this important question. He gave the House notice in order that members might retire if they chose; but if the House wished to vote now he would reserve his speech for another occasion.

The members were then called in, and the House divided, when the resolution was negatived on the following division:—

YEAS :	NAYS :
Messieurs	Messieurs
Cameron (Victoria)	Ross (Prince Edward)
McQuade,	Cockburn,
Brooks,	Wallace (Albert)
Brown,	Lafamme,
Macdonald (Sir John)	Holton.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he was paired on Monday and Tuesday with Sir John A. Macdonald, and understood that the pair terminated with the sitting last night. They both expected that the vote would be taken last night, but some hon. gentlemen seemed to understand that the pair continued until the vote was taken. Had it not been for that he would have voted against the amendment with the utmost alacrity.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member for King's County (Domville) told him he paired with the hon. member for South Waterloo, but he observed the latter had voted on this occasion.

Mr. ARCHIBALD said the pair expired at half-past seven this evening.

A pair was made for Mr. Charlton, and that gentleman not having returned, he and Mr. Domville would stand against each other.

Mr. BROWN said he paired with Mr. Lafamme for Friday night.

The House then went into Committee of Supply—Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

On the item for the Militia Department, $35,151,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL suggested there should be a reduction of expenditure at headquarters.

Mr. BOWELL pointed to an increase in this item of about $4,000, which he could not understand under this policy of economy. Every salary, with the exception of about three, had been increased, and there had been additional messengers employed.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said those increases of salary were statutory.

The item was passed and the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House adjourned at thirty-five minutes past Two a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROBINSON—To incorporate the England and Canada Mortgage Security Company.

THE JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ROSS moved the adoption of the fourth report of the Committee on Printing. The last paragraph was a recommendation to dispense with the printing of the journals of the House, by which a saving of $2,350 will be effected. This was the system adopted by the Senate.

The SPEAKER said this was such an important matter that time must be given for due consideration of it.

After a brief discussion the report, with the exception of the last paragraph, was adopted.

THE MEMBER FOR TWO MOUNTAINS.

Mr. TASCHEREAU moved that the Journals of the House of Assembly for the Province of Canada for the Session of 1866, relating to the production of certain papers, in the case of the Queen vs. J. B. Daoust, be now read. He proposed, if the motion should be carried, to refer the case with the papers to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. DAOUST then read the following statement:—

Before withdrawing from the House, according to the practice, when any motion in which a member has a personal interest is under consideration, I beg leave to make the following statement:—In the month of March, 1865, two indictments were found against me for forging the name of my brother-in-law to two notes, one for $500 and the other for $300. I knew that my brother-in-law had authorized me to place his name on those notes, and that a witness was present when the authority was given to me; but when the first indictment was tried I could not remember who the witness was. I could not swear to the fact myself, and I was convicted because I could produce no witness to substantiate my statement. The trial of my case was published in the newspapers, and my witness heard of it and came forward to testify to my innocence. The first indictment was tried in March, and the second indictment in April, when the witness came forward and was examined. On his evidence I was at once acquitted by the jury without leaving the box. I then directed my Counsel to move to set aside the verdict and to obtain a new trial on the first indictment. Judge Mondelet, before whom the motion was made, set aside that verdict and granted me a new trial on the affidavits that I put in; the Counsel for the Crown consenting that a new trial should be granted. When my case came before Judge Aylwin for the new trial, he held that the new trial was illegally granted, because no new trial could be granted on facts alone, and directed that it should be referred to the Court of Appeal for adjudication, and that Court so decided on the appeal at the Crim-iminal Term following. Mr. Ramsay, as Counsel for the Crown, moved for judgment against me, and Judge Mondelet, before whom the motion was made, declined to entertain the motion, declaring that his order to quash the verdict against me had never been set aside, and there was therefore no conviction against me on which any sentence could be passed.

Mr. Speaker, I might close my statement here, but I consider that I should not make it complete unless I called the attention of yourself and this honourable House to the fact, that after these charges had been made against me, I was elected to this House by acclamation, and sat as the Member for the county of Two Mountains for for a whole Parliament; that the the members of the present Government, who were then in this House, sat in the House with me; that the Hon. Chief Justice Dorion, the leader of the members from Lower Canada who were opposed to me, also sat in that House, but no one of them, during all that time, ever made any motion against me, nor since the present Government took office have they ever instructed any Crown officers to ask that sentence should be passed upon me on that conviction now ten years old.

On this statement of facts, Mr. Speaker, I think that I may fairly leave the consideration of my case to the members of this honourable House, believing that as I now withdraw from their presence for a time, they will speedily restore me to the position to which my constituents so lately unanimously elected me.

Mr. Daoust then retired.

Mr. MASSON thought the House was entitled, after the statements made by the hon. member for Two Mountains, answering conclusively any accusations in advance that could be made against him, to know if any of these assertions were questioned by the mover of the resolution or any hon. member present. If not, he hoped the Premier would take this question in hand, and move that the House do proceed to the next order of the day.

Mr. LAURIER thought the matter should be discussed dispassionately, and he proposed to deal with it in this spirit. He had not seconded the motion in order to gratify spite against any one, but with the view of doing his duty towards his Province. The statement which the hon. gentleman had submitted disclosed facts which should go before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, in order to ascertain the legal and responsible position of the member elect. The hon. member had certain rights and privileges, but these might conflict with those of the House. He had been indicted for the committal of two forgeries, and found guilty on one accusation; on the second, he was acquitted. A new trial was granted; but afterwards this ruling had been set aside. A technical question arose; it was said that a part of the decision of Judge Mondelet had not been overruled by the Court of Appeals, but simply the portion which granted the new trial. This was technically and substantially true, but when the order granting a new trial was set aside, did not this also do away with the ruling concerning the verdict? He could not conceive that a judge could set aside a conviction and not grant a new trial; if he could do one he could do the other thing, or if the latter was beyond his authority so was the former.

These facts had been laid before the House by the Attorney General of Lower Canada, the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, and the papers being submitted, the hon. member only three days afterwards resigned his seat. The hon. gentleman had been since elected, it was true, and no steps had been taken in the matter. But what was the legal aspect of the case at present? Any Crown prosecutor acting in the District of Montreal could at any time move for judgment against the hon. member. The Court of Appeals declared that the conviction remained in full force, and the question was, whether a man so liable was fit to sit in the House. In this a technicality was involved, but it was quite clear that the circumstances should be referred to the Committee mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) thought that the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska had shown very strong reasons why they should proceed in this connection with a great deal of care. He quite agreed with what the hon. member had said; this question was not to be approached in a party spirit. The statement read by the hon. member for Two Mountains revealed facts, not one of which was disputed, that required the House to pause before it took action.

If the witness who had come forward on the occasion of the second trial had been heard on the first, without doubt a verdict of acquittal would also have been given in the former instance. Mr. Johnson, the Counsel for the Crown, who conducted the two trials, as appeared from the papers on the Clerk's table, had at once consented to a new trial being had; this being the case, it struck him that in Upper Canada, under such circumstances, the Crown would have intervened. The whole proceedings in Lower Canada in connection with the verdict had been entirely contrary to law. Judge Mondelet had clearly no power to grant a new trial, as the law did not provide for cases of surprise, error, or mistake. It was also clear that the Judge made two orders, or one order combining two propositions; one quashing the verdict, and another, according to a new trial. He could not say, owing to unfamiliarity with precedence before the courts in Quebec, but if there was power for the issue of the two orders, no appeal could certainly be taken against one of them. The steps taken with regard to the appeal had been absolutely contrary to law, and without precedent. The judge who reserved a case under the Criminal Appeal Act, was the judge who tried it; and Judge Aylwin before whom this case came for a new trial afterwards, had as much power to send it before the Court of Appeals as his hon. friend or himself, and no more. It was however so transmitted; and the judgment there pronounced was really in controvention of all provisions of the law. Beyond question, the verdict of guilty still stood against the hon. member for Two Mountains. What did the Crown say? It could at any time, before a verdict was given, according to the practice in our Courts, enter a nolle prosequi; and this could be done even after a jury was sworn to try a case.

The jury gave a verdict, and a nolle prosequi being entered, the Crown could not interfere except by granting a pardon or bringing forward a new indictment. In the case of the member for Two Mountains a verdict had been given, but no judgment entered, and none of the consequences which were involved in a judgment could by any possibility come against him. They could not sentence him because the time gone by would require that a record of conviction should be first had, and after the statement of the facts which had been presented to the House the Crown would never allow a judgment of record to be given. The Crown had the right both before and after conviction to pardon the accused if it thought proper, but in the event of the latter the stigma remained. Now, in this case the stigma of conviction should not be allowed to remain. The hon. gentleman had sat in the House several years since the conviction, and after an interum of a few years he returned, and was arraigned on a conviction which had never matured into a judgment, and of which, if the facts stated that day in the House were true, he ought to have been acquitted. He (Mr. Cameron) considered that it would be more to the hon. gentleman's advantage to have this case go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, from which it would return exonerating him from the whole procedure if there was nothing to contradict what he himself had stated. He was perfectly certain that the gentleman who was implicated in the matter would receive at the hands of the Hon. Minister of Justice as much consideration and tenderness in the administration of the duties of his office as though he were the hon. gentleman's warmest political friend.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the House would readily understand that when the hon. member for Two Mountains rose to make his statement it would not have been generous in him (Mr. Blake), to make the suggestion he was about to offer. It would not have been right to have prevented an hon.

member standing in his position from making a statement, although he might have thought it a little premature. His hon. friend the member for Montmagny, who made the motion, pointed out that he intended to follow it with another, and that he would reserve his remarks until the papers were read. The hon. member for Two Mountains followed that motion with his simple statement. He agreed with the hon. member for Cardwell as to the spirit in which they should approach the consideration of this matter, but it seemed to him that in entering upon a grave judicial investigation of this character the first thing to be done was to have the papers before the House. He begged to submit to the consideration of the House whether it was not proper in the interest of the hon. member for Two Mountains that the papers should be read without further discussion.

Mr. MASSON thought the Hon. Minister of Justice had misapprehended the position in which his hon. friend was placed. The motion made on the previous day was accompanied with expressions bearing heavily on his hon. friend from Two Mountains, and he (Mr. Masson) considered he should take the first opportunity to make the statement he had made. He thought the hon. Minister would see that the hon. member for Two Mountains had acted as he should have acted, by laying his case before the House.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he would be sorry to think that the House understood him to call in question the course the hon. gentleman had thought proper to pursue. He merely wished to point out that it would be more formal and regular if they first permitted the formal motion to pass, and then go on.

The motion was adopted.

The papers were then read in French, The reading in English being dispensed with.

Mr. SPEAKER—The Clerk informs me that in connection with a case of this kind, it is the custom of this House to enter the statement of the member on our Votes and Proceedings. I do not know that this is done in the English Parliament; but I think that if it is to be so entered, it would be more in order if it came after the entry of the reading of the papers, than if it was inserted previous to them. Yesterday I called on the hon. member for Two Mountains to make a statement and withdraw, because the hon. mover in this matter chose while asking for the reading of the papers, to go somewhat into the merits of the case. To-day I thought that it was an entirely new proceeding; and proceeding more regularly, a motion was merely made that the papers should be read. As this did not of itself convey any charge, I did not feel that it was the time to call on the hon. member to make a statement and withdraw. He however volunteered to read a statement before the papers were produced; and, I think that with the consent of the House, I would instruct the Clerk to record the statement as having followed the reading of the papers, as it may form a precedent hereafter. Without this precaution some confusion might result.

May tells us:—The practice on learning the charge against him, after being read in his place, is for him to withdraw from the House. The precise time at which he ought to withdraw is determined by the nature of the charges; when founded on recorded petitions or other documents, or on words spoken, and taken down with sufficient explanation of the charge, it is easy to have them read, and for the member to withdraw before any question is proposed.

The papers have now been read, and if the hon. member were in his place, it would be quite in order for him now to make a statement and withdraw. If the House will consent, I will direct the record to be prepared in that way.

Mr. MASSON—Two years ago, Mr. Delorme, the member for Provencher, was assailed in the House, and it is recorded simply on the Journals that he made a statement.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Perhaps the matter may be left over for a short time, and then definitely settled.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell)—If the papers are entered on the Journals, I think that the statement should also be entered.

Mr. MASSON—I contend that the statement then should not be placed on the Journals verbatim; but only the part the hon. member may require.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It is to be observed that almost the whole of the statement, with the exception of one point—the denial of the truth of the accusation—may be said to be argumentative; probably the suggestion of my hon. friend the First Minister should be followed.

Mr. SPEAKER—I see it recorded that “the said Pierre Delorme having stated in his place, that the said charges were utterly unfounded and untrue.”

Mr. MASSON—These words were inserted, but not the statement he made.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Probably that was his whole statement.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—This was the substance of the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER—It occurred to me as a matter of justice to the hon. member whose character is impugned, this statement should appear.

Mr. TASCHEREAU wished to correct his hon. friend from Cardwell regarding certain points. On the back of the indictment were these entries—after the words true bill—arraigned 8th of March, 1865; trial fixed for the 30th March; trial had same day; verdict guilty, and recommended to mercy. The Court had simply granted the motion for a new trial, but the first conviction had not been actually quashed. Judge Mondelet had differed from all his colleagues in the Court of Appeals regarding the question. Judgment was given on the 8th June, 1865, and when the matter came up again in September 1866, the only thing that Justice Mondelet said was, that he had not changed his mind, and that, according to his opinion, he could not pass sentence on the first trial. Desforges denied that he had given the hon. member any authorization to sign his (Desforges) name.

It was strange also that the line of defence in the first case was this—that the signature was genuine and no forgery. It was said the Crown prosecution was favorable to the prisoner, but his statement in Vol. 9, L. C. Jurist, page 86, was as follows:—

"The Court will probably consider that under the peculiar circumstances of the present case I am precluded from offering opposition to the motion of my learned friend. The first indictment was supported by direct and positive evidence, as, indeed, was the second, but there is this difference between the two cases, viz.: That in the first the evidence for the prosecution was not encountered by any testimony on the prisoner's behalf tending to explain or exculpate his conduct, and the conviction upon that indictment was, therefore, a matter of course; while upon the second trial, it was proved by evidence that was only discovered after the verdict in the first case, that authority to sign the name of the prosecutor existed to an extent to satisfy the jury of the prisoner's innocence. I feel, therefore, that he should have the opportunity accorded to him of adducing the same justification in the case now before the Court. It has been suggested to me that upon this motion being granted, I should file a nolle prosequi. I am not prepared to go that length however. I am bound to protect the rights of the prosecutor as well as those of the prisoner, and the prosecutor must have in the present case an opportunity of rebutting the prisoner's evidence if he can. I will take the prisoner's recognizance to appear on the first day of next term."

It had also been said that the ruling of the Court of Appeal was based on Lower Canadian law only, and not on English law. He found, however, on page 203 of the 10th volume of Lower Canada Jurist, page 223, the following opinion of Judge Meredith:—

"The first question submitted to us by the learned judge is, whether a second trial can be legally had in the present case, it being a case felony, and I think that this highly important question may at this day be answered in nearly the same words used by Chitty half a century ago, namely: 'In case of felony or treason it seems to me completely settled that no new trial can be granted.' There is, it is true, one case, Queen vs. Scaife, in which a new trial was granted in a case of felony. This much is plain, that whatever may be the rule with respect to cases moved by certiorari into the Queen's Bench, the rule with respect to cases tried in the ordinary course of law was, when the criminal law of England was extended to this country, and still is, that there cannot be a new trial in cases of treason and felony. Repeated attempts have been made in Parliament to change the law in this respect, and those attempts have invariably been resisted, not on the ground that the law was not as stated by those who sought to change—but on the contrary, on the ground the change proposed would not be an improvement. It is true that in Upper Canada the distinction between misdemeanors and crimes of greater magnitude has been done away with, in so far as respects the right to obtain a new trial; but this has been done by statute, and if legislation for that purpose was necessary for Upper Canada, it is still more necessary here, for it is plain that if an application for a new trial were allowed, it ought to be made to the Court of Queen's Bench sitting in appeal, held by at least four judges, and not to the Court of Queen's Bench on the Crown side, usually held by one judge. And it is equally plain that under the existing law such an application could not be made to the Court of Appeals."

The notes which formed the basis of the two indictments were signed at two different dates and were for two different amounts. The evidence in the second trial was quite different from the testimony in the first. It did not appear in the second trial Desforges was a witness as to the question of authority, but he was in the first trial and gave evidence that he never authorized the prisoner to sign his name on a note of any kind. Having stated these facts he (Mr. Taschereau) moved that the case be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MOUSSEAU congratulated the Hon. Minister of Justice on the liberal spirit in which he approached this question. He desired to make a statement of the facts which had not yet been placed before the House. It was a fact very well known that the hon. member for Two Mountains and his brother-in-law had been in the habit for four or five years of endorsing one another's notes. About eighteen months previous to the conviction the hon. gentleman's brother-in-law authorized him to sign his name to notes for an amount not exceeding $1,000. The former in civil suit denied a signature to a bill for $500, and the hon. member for Two Mountains was of course arrested on the charge of forgery. He was tried and found guilty, and the news of the trial immediately spread over the whole country. One of the witnesses, who was present when the hon. gentleman's brother-in-law authorized him to use his name, then came forward. A new trial took place, and the hon. gentleman was triumphantly acquitted; the judge had not the slightest hesitation in declaring that he was entirely innocent of the charge brought against him. An application was at once made for a new trial. The application was granted, but the next term the same judge was not on the Bench. This gentleman raised objections to the new trial, and at the same time took it upon himself to make up a case and submit it to the Court of Queen's Bench. The Court of Appeals had confirmed the opinion of Mr. Justice Aylwin. The weight of authorities in favor of new trials was very great indeed. In most parts of the United States, in connection with felonies, these were granted. There was considerable analogy between this and the French system, which gave recourse against judgments in certain cases. They possessed in this regard the requete civile, under which decisions delivered in the Civil Courts could be set aside, either on the ground that they had been based on false evidence or given in the absence of authoritative documents which had been concealed, or missing, or discovered after judgment; this practice was founded on the great principles of justice and equity. In this relation new trials should always be treated from a very liberal point of view. The prosecutor, at the time of the trial in question, although a Conservative, and though the accused had rendered great service to his party, had treated him most severely; no hesitation was shown, and the non-member had been speedily found guilty. This proved that the parties concerned in the case were high-minded men, who were not inclined to prevent justice being done. On the occasion of the second trial the same judge presided, the same Crown Counsel appeared, and the same advocates conducted the defence. He must make especial allusion to Judge Mondelet, who stood very high in the esteem of his fellow citizens; though some did not always approve of that gentleman's doctrines, his high sense of duty and his great impartiality were well and generally appreciated at the first trial. The Judge had charged very severely against the prisoner; but when the missing witness, a brother-in-law of Desforges, who was interested in obtaining a conviction in order to save himself the necessity of paying $800, appeared and gave his testimony, His Honour instructed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, being very strongly impressed with the innocence of the hon. member. The remarks of Judge Mondelet touching the case, when brought before the Court of Appeals, were to be found in the Lower Canada Jurist, Vol. 10, and page 221; the judgment was delivered on the 9th of June, 1866. This was an extract:—

“MONDELET J.—At the March Term, 1866, of the Court of Queen's Bench, at which I presided, Daoust was tried on an indictment for forgery of an endorsement of a promissory note. From the evidence adduced at the trial, there seemed no doubt, and I charged the jury—as I never shrink from doing where my conviction is strong—to return a verdict of guilty, and the jury did so. The most important evidence was that of Desforges, who stated that he had never authorized the prisoner to sign his name. The prisoner was subsequently put upon his trial for forging the same name on another note, and this time the jury found a verdict in his favour, on evidence tending to show that the prisoner had been authorized by Desforges to sign his name. The prisoner stood between two fires—between a verdict of guilty and a verdict of not guilty. Towards the end of the term, Mr. Ouimet, the prisoner's counsel, moved for a new trial on the first indictment, in order that the witness Legault, who testified that Desforges had authorized the prisoner to sign his name, might be heard. Mr. Johnson, who then represented the Attorney General, said that under the circumstances he did not think proper to oppose the granting of a new trial. I, having presided at both trials, and being au fait with the circumstances of both, having no possible doubt that Daoust either believed himself authorized, or was really authorized to sign the name, considered it not only justice, but an imperative duty to grant a new trial. I wish to be clearly understood on this point. First—because an imperative sense of duty urged me to it; and secondly—because I believed the Court had the power to do it. In the following September Term, Mr. Justice Aylwin, who was then presiding, reserved the case for the consideration of the full Bench. It will be understood that my conviction must be very strong, when I still adhere to it; though I find four Judges, for whose abilities I entertain such profound respect, differing from me in opinion.”

He (Mr. Mousseau) had received a letter from a gentleman in Montreal who was present when the judgment was rendered, mentioning the following circumstance which did not appear on the record. When the judge decided that no new trial should be granted, Mr. Ouimet rose and said “What is my poor prisoner to do? You give no new trial and his innocence is perfectly proved.” Judge Drummond said “You need not trouble yourself, no Government in the world will do anything against your client.” The following Term the Crown prosecutor moved that sentence be rendered on the verdict.

Some astonishment had been expressed by hon. members opposite that the hon. member had resigned in 1866. The reason was he found himself in a very awkward position, and on the advice of Sir George Cartier he resigned in order to test public opinion and ascertain whether he had the confidence of his constituents. He resigned and was opposed by a wealthy manufacturer who had an establishment at St. Scholastique, employing hundreds of men. He was rich, backed by strong friends, and spent money freely. Mr. Daoust was poor and his election expenses were only $20, yet, after a very hot contest he was returned to Parliament. No popular verdict could set aside a legal decision, but taken in connection with the opinions of the Bench, it was a proof that in his own county, and among those who had known him from his childhood, there was perfect confidence in his innocence. He telegraphed to Montreal the previous day for a copy of the Judge's order, and he would beg leave to read the following report of the case which was published in the Montreal Herald, Gazette and Minerve:—

“Court of Queen's Bench—September Term— “Presiding—MR. JUSTICE MONDELET.

“WEDNESDAY, 17th October, 1866.

“In the matter of J. B. Daoust, Esq., M.P. P., Mr. Ramsay, on part of the Crown moved for sentence.

“The motion was opposed by Mr. Ouimet. His Honour said that Mr. Justice Ailwyn had reserved the motion on the part of the Crown to proceed to a new trial in September of 1865, and that the Court of Appeals had decided that there could be no new trial in a felony, but this left intact so much of his judgment as set aside the verdict. Until that portion of his judgment was set aside there could be no sentence on the verdict; in other words there was no verdict. The Crown could therefore make nothing by the motion.

“Mr. Ramsay said that the whole of this matter had been begun and the new trial accorded before he had the honour to represent the Attorney General. He was desirous of asking His Honour whether he had been rightly informed that the Counsel representing the Crown had consented to the new trial. His object in asking was that it would manifestly be a breach of good faith on the part of the Crown to consent to a new trial, and afterwards to adopt the extreme proceeding of moving by writ of error to set aside a portion of the judgement to which the Crown Counsel had formerly consented.

“The Court said that Mr. Johnson for the Crown had consented at once.

“Mr. Ramsay then asked if the Court would consider him authorized in entering a nolle prosequi on the bill?

MR. MOUSSEAU.

“The Court declined to give any opinion.

“The Crown must take its own course.

“Mr. Ramsay only asked because he had nothing to do with the application for granting a new trial or the granting of it, and therefore he did not feel called upon to assume the responsibility of taking any step without the assent—not the consent, but the assent—of the Court.”

That state of things had been undisturbed since that time, and no proceeding had been attempted either in the Courts or in the House. The hon. gentleman had sat in the house several sessions since, and although there were many gentlemen in the House well qualified to judge, not only on questions of law, but on principles of parliamentary practice and upon constitutional points. No attempt was made by the old Parliamentarians to bring this matter up, and it seemed strange that these young members should now undertake to bring the question before the consideration of the House. The motion asked that these papers and the questions they involved should be submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and he was sorry he could not see the ultimate result of such reference. They were not dealing with a disgraced man or a fugitive from justice, but one who had been acquitted by one of the highest tribunals in the country. If the Committee were to report adversely to the hon. member for Two Mountains, the effect would be to upset the decision of the Court which had acquitted the hon. gentleman.

AFTER RECESS.

MR. MOUSSEAU resumed his speech. He said there was nothing before this House against the character and standing of Mr. Daoust. If there were any proceeding to be taken against him it must be taken before a legal tribunal. Suppose the matter should be referred to a Committee of this House, it would be casting a reflection on the character of the hon. gentleman. But it was said that unless this House took steps to remove the difficulty, the hon. member was liable to have proceedings taken against him at any time in the Courts of law. If there were any ground for such action being taken, however, no decision of this House could interfere with the proceedings before the legal tribunals of Quebec. He (Mr. Mousseau) hoped that this matter would not be referred to the Committee, but that the Minister of Justice would move that the orders of the day be taken up. The hon. member for Two Mountains had been pronounced perfectly innocent by the Courts of Law and by his constituents: to refer his case to a Committee of this House would be to cast a doubt on those judgments.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said the character of a member of this House was in question, and it was their duty to ascertain whether with the facts before them Mr. Daoust should continue to hold his seat. There were English precedents for the course to be pursued, in the cases of Smith O'Brien in 1849 and O'Donovan Rossa in 1870. From the papers before the House, it was apparent that the hon. member for Two Mountains had been indicted for forgery and found guilty, but there was no evidence to show that anything further had been done.

The hon. member for Bagot had stated that this was not a subject for the consideration of the Committee. He would agree with the hon. gentleman, if the House were satisfied, that the hon. member for Two Mountains had not been adjudged guilty of felony; but when there was doubt on this point he thought it advisable that the matter should be referred to a Committee. In 1870, in the case of O'Donovan Rossa, Mr. Gladstone, who led the House of Commons at the time, moved that this member elect was incapable of sitting in the House, inasmuch as he had been adjudged guilty of felony. It was proposed by a member of the Opposition that it should be referred to a Committee, and Mr. Gladstone stated that if he entertained any doubt in this connection he would have no objection to this step.

Mr. BABY—Had O'Donovan Rossa not been convicted and sentenced? Was he not under sentence?

Mr. MACDOUGALL replied that if the hon. gentleman would have patience he would make himself clear. He thought that circumstances existed in connection with this case which made an enquiry into the facts by a Committee desirable, in order to ascertain the proper course to be pursued, and to report forthwith to the House. He only desired that justice should be done in the premises. He had heard it stated that the hon. member for Two Mountains had sat for a number of years in Parliament after his conviction, but he submitted that this would be no condonation of any offence which might have been committed. This would be no bar from a legal point of view to such proceedings as had been taken in the cases of O'Donovan Rossa and Smith O'Brien.

Reference had been made to Sir John Jarvis, who afterwards was an eminent Judge on the English Bench, in the discussion which took place on the motion with respect to the election of O'Donovan Rossa, as having expressed an opinion in this election; and in the case of Smith O'Brien, Earl Russell, who led the House of Commons at the time, used the word "convicted," and at the instance of the Attorney General of the day, he amended his motion by inserting the words—"adjudged guilty of felony." Sir John Jarvis in the course of his arguments, to which reference was made by Mr. Gladstone as well as by the Solicitor General of the Day, suggested that "adjudged guilty of felony" should be substituted for "convicted," and these words were incorporated in the motion by the Leader of the House of Commons.

The question was whether the case was one which would justify the very strong proceedings adopted in these cases. He had some doubt on the subject, and he thought the case should be referred to the Committee in order that the case might be enquired into. He desired that the gentleman against whom this charge was preferred should have fair play, and he was quite sure the Committee to whom the case was referred would do the hon. gentleman justice and inform the House as to the proper course to pursue.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) thought it was unfortunate that the friends of the hon. member for Two Mountains should evince so much solicitude on his behalf as to prompt them to put him before the House and the country in so unenviable a light. The hon. gentleman had been acquitted of the charge by the highest Court of Criminal Jurisdiction in the Province of Quebec, but this was not sufficient for hon. gentlemen opposite. He was perfectly satisfied the hon. member for Two Mountains could not be expelled unless he had been guilty of conduct which rendered him unfit to be a member of this House. No one had an idea that he was guilty of such conduct, and the Committee could do nothing to settle the difficulty. The matter should end in the House.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he would be sorry that the decision arrived at by the House should be anything but unanimous. The suggestions made were alternatives, either to refer the matter to the Committee or to pass on to the Orders of the Day. He thought it would be most unfortunate to pursue the latter course. The case came before Parliament the second time. In 1866 Sir George E. Cartier, then Attorney General for Lower Canada, laid upon the table these papers. It indicated that, in the opinion of the Government and Parliament of that day, in the then existing state of things, the House should consider the matter in some way or other. It so happened that any action which might have been taken by the House was averted by the resignation of the hon. member for Two Mountains. Subsequently the proceedings referred to by the hon. member for Bagot, and which were not on record, were taken. Whether they were correct or not, it was only by virtue of them the House was called upon to determine if they had taken place before Mr. Daoust's resignation, whether he would have pursued that course. It was desirable the case should be investigated, not only in the interest of the hon. member for Two Mountains, but of Parliament. It would be better to postpone any decision for a few days, until this Committee had time to thoroughly investigate the matter.

If the House should, as he hoped it would, adopt unanimously this view, it would demonstrate that no step taken in the case was, in the slightest degree indicative of an adverse opinion regarding the situation of the hon.

member for Two Mountains. He thought that they should take no action which would have the effect of prejudging the case any way whatever. With such intentions he had communicated with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in order that they might agree on this mode of disposing of the matter. The motion was changed, requesting the Committee to examine into the legal aspects of the case—and very singular they were—so that they might know exactly how they stood in this connection. It did not propose to delegate to it either the duty of hearing witnesses, or expressing an opinion on the facts disclosed in these papers; and due regard would be paid to the position of the hon. member, inasmuch as he believed that the various statements with reference to the new trial were amongst the papers; also, that the Committee should be instructed, as was frequently the case with Committees of the Imperial House of Commons, to search for parliamentary precedents applicable to the case, being requested to report whether any existed, and if so, what further proceedings were required. He trusted that the report would be speedily made, and that they would then be able to dispose of the matter in a more satisfactory manner than at that moment, after the discussion of the afternoon, whether by dropping it or passing to the Orders of the Day, or taking other action without a vote on the motion.

Mr. PALMER—Do you propose to allow the Committee to obtain the subsequent proceedings?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—They are asked to report on the legal questions, and of course they will get the subsequent proceedings. It would be grossly unjust if they did not, preventing the completion of the entire record.

Mr. MASSON assented to the position taken by the Minister of Justice; at the same time he confessed he would have certainly preferred the adoption of another and more decided course, there being nothing before the House to justify adjudication regarding the position occupied by one of its members. After reflection, however, he thought it better that they should look into precedents with an eye to the future.

Mr. SPEAKER observed with reference to the mole of report, that he found at least two cases in point—and there were probably some others—where statements made in explanation by hon. members whose conduct was impugned, were fully entered on the Journals of the House. One dated as far back as 1837, when the Hon. Mr. Bolton, member for the County of Norfolk, laid a formal charge against Mr. Watts, then a member of the House; and the statement of the latter in his defence was set forth at full length. The second took place in 1865, when the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald brought under the notice of the House the fact that one hon. member had, in an angry moment, struck a blow with his fist on the nose of another hon. member. The former made a long statement, explaining that the provocation consisted in his being, in fact, told that he lied; and such as it was, it was recorded at full length on the Journals. He found that this was not the practice in England, where neither the statement itself nor even its substance was given in any instance. He left it to the House to decide whether it would adhere to our own or follow the English practice.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN was of opinion that the statement should be entered on the Minutes, as the other papers were to be published.

Mr. SPEAKER—The resolution commences—"it appearing from the statement of Mr. Daoust"—and I think that under the circumstances it ought to be recorded.

Mr. LAURIER—It was understood that the hon. member should have the privilege of bringing down a statement.

Mr. MASSON—The statement of the facts will be inserted. /

The motion was carried.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Blake, the Bill entitled an Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons, was read the third time and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Mills in the Chair, to consider the Bill intituled, An Act to make more effectual provision for the administration of the law relating to corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons.

The first three clauses of the Bill were adopted without amendment.

On the fourth clause,

Mr. SCATCHERD asked, in the trial of contested elections, if it was intended to pursue the enquiry on both sides, or on one side only? Hitherto the Courts had only investigated into the charge of corrupt practices against the sitting member, and no notice was taken of corrupt practices on the part of the petitioner. He thought there ought to be a full enquiry into the corrupt practices on both sides of the House.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he thought this difficulty had been provided for by the law of 1874.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was of opinion that the case had been provided for in the Bill which had just been read the third time.

Mr. DYMOND considered that as the evidence in these cases would have to be obtained from persons more or less implicated in the corrupt practices being enquired into, that it would be necessary to extend the indemnity in order to indemnify any person from the penalties imposed by the Act who had fairly and honestly answered the questions that might be put to him.

Mr. BOWELL thought the first clause covered, the points referred to by the hon. member for Middlesex, and the hon. member for North York.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that the point made by the hon. member for North York was one of great importance, and one to which he had given consideration. In England provisions for indemnifying witnesses at the trials of controverted elections were made.

Those provisions were gradually expanded as experience appeared to demonstrate the necessity of making them wider for the discovery of the whole truth about the matter. At length they were settled in the form in which they now appeared on the Statute Book. The Government had embodied the substance of that indemnifying clause in the Bill which had just been read the third time. Under that clause a witness who was willing to tell the whole truth was indemnified against any proceedings that might be based on his evidence, the terrors of the law being reserved for those who did not disclose the truth, and about whom there might be any reasonable ground to suspect they should be put on trial.

Mr. SCATCERD said this was an important point. For instance a member's seat was contested and the Judge is called upon to decide whether the seat was gained by bribery. The defeated candidate is no party to the suit, and the sitting member is unseated for corrupt practices, having to pay all the costs. Now he (Mr. Scatcherd) contended the defeated candidate should always be a party to such petitions, and if bribery on his part should be proved, the costs should be divided.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said a provision to that effect was contained in the second sub-section of the eighth section of the Controverted Election Act of 1874, by which the sitting member was enabled to file a cross petition against the defeated candidate who petitions.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said in one county (Dorchester) the defeated candidate was disqualified under this very provision.

The clause and the remaining sections of the Bill were passed. The Committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

The House went into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to provide that the travelling expenses of the Judge and all expenses incurred by the Sheriff or other officer in consequence of any sitting for the trial, and for providing a Court room and any accessories under the Bill (No. 13) intituled: ‘An Act to make more effectual provision for the administration of the Law relating to corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons,’ shall be defrayed out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purpose.”

The Committee rose and reported the resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Bill No. 13.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

Regarding item 6, providing for a sum not to exceed $30,140 to defray salaries in the Department of the Secretary of State,

Mr. BOWELL remarked, that this showed an increase similar to what he had noticed on the previous evening.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that this was caused by the promotion of certain second-class to first-class clerks. A gentleman who had been hitherto charged with the superintendence of the stationery, and who had effected a saving in the Department, had been promoted, as he understood, in accordance with an arrangement of long standing. This was the only increase with the exception of the ordinary advances of $50 a year.

The item was passed.

Item 7, providing $39,681 to defray salaries in the Department of the Minister of the Interior, and item No. 8, providing for the payment of $20,720 in the Department of the Receiver General, were passed without discussion.

On item No. 9, providing for $18,250 for the payment of salaries in the Department of Finance.

Mr. BOWELL remarked that the amount showed an increase.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that he believed this was due merely to the statutory increases.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER hoped that the appropriation would be sufficient to secure the correct publication in the Official Gazette of the receipts and expenditure. He had felt that it was disgraceful to the Financial Department of the Government that statements should be published which, at the expiration of several months, should be found to be totally fallacious. We had a great deal of discussion as to the derangement of our trade within the past few months, and the hon. gentleman knew that every merchant formed his opinion from the statement of revenue and expenditure, which was one of the objects of the publication of the Gazette. The hon. gentleman had never condescended to explain to the House why the returns for March last had never been published; and he thought that the Committee should be informed why they were suppressed—why they never could be obtained, and to what was due the great inaccuracies found in them. He trusted that the recurrence of these would be prevented. If this had happened only for the first time it would not be so open for censure, but this was far from being the case.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT stated that the most important error in the returns occurred last September, a few days before he sailed for England. On coming back in December his attention had been called to it, and he had immediately caused a statement for the six months to be published in the Official Gazette. On enquiry in the Department he found that a clerical error had been made by one of the inferior clerks after they had left the Auditor's hands. This clerk was reprimanded, and no doubt the hon. gentleman did not wish a further punishment to be inflicted, though the mistake was unquestionably not creditable.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—He has, however, inflicted a great deal of punishment on other people.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT continued, that with regard to the future he would take care that more accurate returns would be prepared. He had issued the most stringent orders, requiring that the returns now published should correspond much more nearly than they had hitherto done, with what were known as the days' statements, which came more closely than the others under the supervision of the Ministers; he thought that these precautions would be sufficient to effect the purpose. With respect to the March statement, the Auditor General had explained to him, when his attention was called to the matter, that there were some extraordinary errors in the various reports made to him, and this had been the cause of the delay.

The item was passed.

With regard to item No. 10, providing for $27,500 in connection with the Department of Customs,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER invited the Minister of Customs to explain why the Civil Service Act had been violated—, as he had understood was the case in the Customs' Department—by the appointment of officers over the heads of competent officials—who had served for considerable terms—with increases of salary. Not only so, but very large bonuses had been added to these salaries out of all proportion with those given to officers of long periods of service.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE replied that the officer to whom he supposed allusion had been made, had been a very efficient accountant for many years, and was quite as efficient as any of those who were employed in the Department. His qualifications in fact entitled him to a position higher than the one he occupied. Some nineteen-twentieths of the employés had received the usual $50 advance per annum; and $100 each had been given to three junior French clerks, who only got $450 a year each; and this was very small for men, who had been in the service for four or five years.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER answered that he had not referred to the gentleman to whom the hon. gentleman made allusion.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—The officer referred to has been in the service for four or five years; he has been a very efficient accountant for many years, and he is really entitled to the position.

On item No. 11, providing for $24,982 for the Department of Inland Revenue.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if the Inland Revenue Department was utilized in the carrying out of the provisions of the Weights and Measures Bill?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that circumstances might arise which would offer serious obstacles to the employment of Inland Revenue Officers, but still wherever they could use these officers they did so.

The item was then passed.

On item No. 12, for $218,934, for the Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he saw there was an increase in the number of officers in the Department.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE in response said there was now a vacancy in the Department which they did not propose to fill up, as they thought they could do without that officer.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN stated that there was also an increase in the number of first-class clerks, and he wished to know if that measure was in accordance with the theoretical organization of the Department?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not know what the hon. gentleman meant by theoretical organization.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said that some years ago a Committee had prepared a paper for the regulation of the appointments in the Department. This was what he referred to as the theoretical organization.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had not seen the paper, and he presumed he had acted independently of it. He had endeavoured to make the Department as efficient as possible with as few men as possible, and in the conduct of that department he would endeavour to promote men who were entitled to it on account of their real value, and not give preference to certain men simply because they had been a certain number of years in office.

The item was carried.

On item No. 13, $84,990 for the Post Office Department,

Mr. BOWELL said that though this was a decrease from last year that it was an increase over 1873-4 of $18,000. He desired to know what was the reason of that.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the reason of that was that a considerable number of extra hands who had been paid out of the contingencies of that Department were made permanent officers. It was more properly a transfer from the contingencies to the regular expenditure of the Department.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—How many extra clerks are there in the Department?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I think there are not more than seven or eight extra clerks, but there may be more. The number, however, varies according to the amount of work that has to be done in the dead-letter office.

Mr. BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman inform us whether the system of advertising the letters, formerly practiced, was more expensive than the present system?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I will obtain that information for the hon. gentleman. I am very sorry that the Postmaster General is too unwell to be present and answer these enquiries.

The item was passed.

Item, $23,240 for Department of Agriculture passed.

On item, $23,815, Mr. Cartwright explained that the increase of $1,605 was in consequence of the engagement of an additional clerk and some minor expenses.

The item passed.

On the item, Departmental Contingencies, $175,000,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this item should be reduced to what it was in 1873. It was an item that would bear to be pruned down.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said if the Public Accounts of 1872-3 were examined it would be found that that item in the estimates had always to be supplemented by another vote.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said telegraphing alone was $59,000 last year, while the last year of the late Administration the account for telegraphing was only $26,000.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the increase was in consequence of the number of public works being carried on at a great distance from the capital, and also the addition of Prince Edward Island to the Confederation. Some of the telegraphic expenses might, no doubt, be curtailed. There had also been a great deal of telegraphing across the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said that last financial year, 1874-5, there was a large increase in telegraphic expenses in consequence of the change in the tariff.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this was the account where "mucilage" and such like things came in; subscriptions for papers, books, &c.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would give the hon. gentleman something if he could devise any possible means to keep the newspapers out of the offices. As for the books, he had stopped them by the simple expediency of excluding the book pedlars out of the buildings. As for the telegraphic expenses, a large number of cypher messages had been sent between Ottawa and Washington and British Columbia last year.

The item passed.

The item, $20,000, for the stationery office, passed.

On item, $35,000, for re-adjustment of salaries (including promotions),

Mr. MASSON asked if the Premier was understood to say that he would regulate the promotions of his office himself? The hon. gentleman would have to remember, powerful as he was, there was a Civil Service Act by which promotions were regulated.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman always kept within the law; but if he wished for a comparison of the way promotions were arranged by his predecessors, and by himself, he was willing to do it.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman was not justified in using the tu quoque style of argument.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had kept within the Act.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said when this vote was first introduced it was his impression it was only going to be a temporary arrangement. He thought it was time this bonus system should be done away with.

The item passed.

Items under the heading of "Charges of Management," $63,100, passed.

Item, $10,000, ("Miscellaneous"), under the heading of "Administration of Justice," was passed.

On item, $10,000, "Miscellaneous North-West Territories," a new vote,

In reply to the Hon. Mr. Tupper,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said, owing to the increase of settlement in the Territories, there had been violence, and offenders had to be brought to justice. There were also expenses connected with the McIvor murder, and the Government thought it better to provide this amount to meet such contingencies.

On the items under the head of "Administration of Justice," $54,400,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK suggested that care should be exercised not to appoint too many officers to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had proposed as few appointments as possible, and only on the application of the Judges. He would appoint no officers until he was satisfied they were required. The amount of $10,000 for contingences was merely conjectural.

The items were passed.

The item, $15,000, for police was passed without discussion.

On the item under the head "Penitentiaries," $306,175.69,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the increase of $5,151.87 for Kingston Penitentiary was due to the fact that a large number of convicts had been sent there from St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE in reply to a question, said plans were being prepared for the providing of additional accommodation for convicts in Nova Scotia. No site had yet been purchased nor had the Government exactly fixed upon any place. They were in communication with parties as to the value of land, &c., and he hoped to be able to give further information on the subject before the close of the Session.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if it was true the Government had superannuated the Warden of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary and appointed to the position a gentleman who had recently been of service to the party to which the hon. gentlemen opposite belonged?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was quite true the late Warden had been superannuated upon his (Mr. Blake's) recommendation, after a careful investigation of the affairs of the Penitentiary, and on the application of the gentleman himself. It was also true that another person had been appointed to the office, but he was not aware whether it was in consequence of the claim to which the hon. gentleman referred.

Dr. Duchesneau had the highest testimonials as to his capacity, and the energy and fidelity with which he had discharged his duties justified the choice.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) hoped the labour of the convicts would be utilized in such a manner as not to interfere with out side industries. He knew two or three establishments that were interfered with considerably by the prison labour of the United States, and particularly of Michigan.

Mr. MASSON asked if any investigation had been made into the charges against the late Warden of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that there was no charge against him. He had applied for superannuation, and after an investigation into the management of the Penitentiary it was thought best to grant it.

Mr. MASSON said he was glad to hear this because it had been asserted that the late Warden had been discharged after an investigation into the management of the Penitentiary. He was glad to hear that there was no foundation for such assertions.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had no desire to say an unkind word of the late Warden. He had merely remarked there was no accusation against him, but the result of the inspection was not satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said if the Government found that anyone occupying such a position neglected his duties he should be dismissed without superannuation. None but deserving officers should be superannuated.

The Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary had been superannuated, and the statement of the Minister of Justice led him to suppose that it was the intention of the Government to get rid of this official in order that another might be put in his place. It so happened that a defeated candidate had been given a very valuable post at the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, and also very conveniently for the Local Government of Nova Scotia that it had to provide for one of the local members, succeeding a gentleman who the Inspectors reported was one of the most efficient and able officers in the public service. Not only so, but the salary had been largely increased simultaneously in favour of the new officer, a friend of the Administration. This was an abuse of the power of the Government and of the Superannuation Fund System, and one of the things which shook the confidence of the people in the belief that this fund was provided for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the public service, the only ground upon which a change could ever take place.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that he was not very familiar with the circumstances connected with the case of the Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary, because the arrangement in question had been effected, he believed, before he entered the Administration. If he was rightly informed, however, this officer had not been for a long time in the public service, entering it somewhere about the age of sixty-eight, on the appointment of the hon. gentleman opposite, while his age was now about seventy-two.

As to the Wardenship of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary and the Deputy-Wardenship, he might say that one of these officers had been superannuated, and the services of the other gentleman dispensed with. The ex-Warden's state of health had rendered his continuance in that position impossible; he had applied for superannuation nine months ago, and to his ill health he (Mr. Blake) in part attributed the disorganization of that institution. This gentleman was no friend of his; and according to the strict rule his hon. friend had advocated, it would have probably been advisable, under the circumstances of the case, to dispense with any remuneration at all in this particular.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Does the hon. gentleman speak of Dr. Tassé?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—No! I alluded to Jean Baptiste Daoust, at present the member for Two Mountains, who received a gratuity of one month's pay for each year of services. This was likely a sort of justice I would not administer to a political friend, but I did it for a political opponent.

Mr. MASSON—I am glad to hear the real explanation at last. The state of things in question proves to have been due to the ill health of Dr. Tassé.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I said principally, Sir. The state of disorganization which had existed before was aggravated by that gentleman's illness; but I desired to look as leniently as possible on his conduct. I did not wish to speak of these matters, but they have been dragged out of me by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—My statement with regard to the change in the Halifax Penitentiary is that when the Government asked the inspectors, the responsible officers, on whom they were bound to depend for a report, with the view of getting a place for one of their friends; they had to report that he was one of the most able and efficient officers of the Public Service.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I know of no such thing.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I undertake from my place in this House to state—and I do it advisedly—that this was the answer which the Minister of Justice got from the Inspector of Penitentiaries; and I say that we have received no answer in this relation.

Mr. MILLS—Was that officer sixty-eight years old when appointed?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I only know that he was as rigorous, able and efficient an officer as could be found in the service of this country. I do not know or care for his age; this report of the Inspectors was very damaging with regard to the intentions of the Government.

Mr. MILLS—It was very damaging to them.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No doubt of that; I have no doubt that it led to their dismissal, for the Government required a report in accordance with their wishes. This, moreover, relates to an abuse of the Superannuation Act.

That is one particular charge; but I declare further that the Government which created an undue drain on the revenue by dispensing with the services of a valuable and efficient officer, deliberately came to Parliament and had the salary increased, and why? To bestow it upon a new man, one of their friends; and there is no answer given to this accusation.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the circumstances of this case were somewhat peculiar. The Superannuation Act provided that persons 65 years of age should ipso facto be superannuated. This gentleman, who was then above that age, was some five or six months after the passage of the Order in Council appointed to this office.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—He was in the public service when he was appointed.

Mr. BLAKE—In what Department?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—He filled an office on the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they all knew that there were exceptional cases in which officers had rendered service to their country after the age of 65, but they were of comparatively little use after that. He did not know anything about this gentleman, but he must then be over 70 years of age, and could not in the course of nature be expected to be fit for the dangerous duties imposed upon the Warden of a Penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he desired that the Government would bring down a statement of the officers appointed under the Weights and Measures Act, together with the ages of the officers.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Said he was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that he had no doubt that the two inspectors were dismissed on account of the report they made. The hon. gentleman knew very well that these men were removed from office because the offices were abolished and a saving to the public secured. The gentleman who was retained had distinguished himself as an active opponent of the Government, but was in every respect a capable and worthy man.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE pointed out that the hon. gentleman's Government introduced the principle of arranging these salaries, and that a salary of $1,400, the amount paid to other Wardens of Penitentiaries, was not too large for that responsible and somewhat dangerous office. One of the necessary qualifications of the occupant of such a position, in addition to the wisdom which age gave, was the vigour which age too frequently took away.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that perhaps hon. gentlemen would remember that in the Session of 1874 he announced the intention of the Government to dispense with two of these inspectors, at the same time declining to do it at that particular time because they wished to make sure that they were doing right. They took time to consider the matter, and had only done that which they had contemplated from their accession to office, and by means of which a considerable saving would be effected.

The motion was adopted.

On item No. 37, for $17,640 for the Manitoba Penitentiary,

Mr. SCHULTZ desired to enquire when it was likely that the Manitoba Penitentiary would be in a condition for occupation.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—In July or August next.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he was glad to learn that this was the case, because the present arrangement was a very expensive one to the Government. A building had been rented at a large rental. Most of the prison labour had been devoted to its improvement, and while its value had been doubled in consequence, still the owner continued to exact the large rental, and the sooner this expense was cut off the better.

This item, together with items No. 38 and No. 39, was passed.

On item No. 40, $60,850 for salaries and contingent expenses.

Mr. SPEAKER stated that the whole expenditure of the House of Commons was rather calculated to create an erroneous impression. There had been a slight increase of expenditure in this Department of public service, but it was one for which the officers of the House were in no way responsible. It would be within the recollection of the House that the Commissioners of Internal Economy were instructed to make a revision of the salaries with a view to their re-adjustment. This had been done, and many of the salaries had been increased in a manner proportionate to the services rendered, and the length of the services of the employé. The death of the chief clerk of the Private Bills office had created a vacancy which had not been filled up, and an annual saving of $850 had been made. The expenses of Committees, extra sessional clerks, &c., had been reduced from $14,400 to $13,000, and he had recommended the Leader of the House to endeavor to keep down the expenditure of the Committees as far as possible, and he thought it would be kept down within the estimates. The publishing of the Debates in French swelled the amount of that appropriation. It had been put down at $15,000 this year. The House, however, had nothing to do with this expenditure, which was managed by the Committee on the Debates. There would have been a considerable reduction in the expenditure on behalf of this part of the public service had it not been for the increased expenditure necessary in the publishing of the Debates.

The following items were passed without debate:—

Expenses of Committees, extra Sessional Clerks, $13,000.

Contingencies, $20,140.

Publishing Debates, $15,000.

Salaries and Contingencies—per Sergeant-at-Arms estimate—$35,450.

On item of $12,000, grant to Parliamentary Library, including provision for law books,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the grant last year was insufficient to procure what was considered necessary for the purchase of law books. He had directed the Librarian to consult with parties at Osgoode Hall and Montreal, with regard to the text books that were to be obtained, and after getting their opinion they found that the sum required was more than was anticipated.

Mr. BERTRAM called attention to the disgraceful manner in which many of the books in the library had been mutilated, and suggested that some measure should be adopted to prevent it in future.

Mr. SPEAKER said this had been a serious complaint for some year past, but it had been impossible so far to prevent it. The Librarian was an exceedingly careful officer, but there were 300 gentlemen who were privileged to go to the library and take whatever books they pleased out of it. Besides this, the Speakers of both Houses were allowed to grant privileges to a large number of persons of this city on recommendation of members of Parliament, to have access to the library. It was impossible when so many persons were allowed to have the books, to prevent vandalism. Some of the valuable and rare books were not allowed out at all, and many were kept under lock and key. If any hon. gentleman could suggest any means of preventing the books from being defaced he would be very glad to adopt it.

Mr. YOUNG said the matter had been before the Library Committee. One reason of the abuse was that the number of assistants was too small to take care of the library, and in consequence of the Statute, they could not increase them. The new library was expected to be completed next year, and there would be a railing in front of the shelves, so that the public could not have access to any of them without asking an assistant.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the library was practically a free circulating library to the people of this city, and the Committee had devoted themselves to seeing how far this system could be curtailed. He looked into the library himself the other day, and he found on the register the name of one private person down for twenty volumes. It could hardly be expected that the whole Dominion should have to contribute to keep up a free library for the people of this city.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought it was only reasonable that the library should be at the disposal of the members of Parliament and the public, but it was intended that that privilege should not be abused or that it should be turned into a free-circulating library.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he would be very sorry to see the people refused the use of the library within proper limits.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said valuable books were taken out of the library and scattered about the city, and it was not the intention of the country in subscribing $10,000 a year for this library to provide a circulating library for Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought it would be unwise to deprive the members of the Civil Service of the use of the library, as every means should be afforded them to improve their minds by reading instead of spending their leisure hours in a less profitable manner. One means to prevent the books from being abused would be to make it the duty of one person to note the condition in which each book left the library and returned; and when people found there was such a check it would make them more careful not to mutilate the volumes.

Mr. MASSON said the Premier had made the statement that one private person had 20 volumes out of the library at one time. This showed there was some lack of administration in the Department, as members of Parliament could have only three volumes out at one time. The people of Ottawa should not be allowed greater privileges than the members of this House.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON stated that as long as the general public, including school boys, were allowed to have access to the books, they could not prevent their defacement. He believed that there were too many novels in the library; the perusal of these works demoralized the young people, rendering them unfitted for the study of scientific and historical works.

Mr. YOUNG announced that there would be another meeting of the Joint Committee, when he would bring the subject before it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that they could not well have a more efficient Librarian, but it was very difficult to arrange and keep proper supervision over such a place, with an ordinary staff.

On the item, $70,000, for printing, printing paper and binding.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that the increase of $20,000 over the vote of last year was in consequence of the representations made by the officials that they found it impossible to get through their work properly without incurring additional expense.

Mr. YOUNG was sorry to see this item increasing so fast. Many years ago the printing service of old Canada got to be a great abuse, $150,000 being expended in one year. The Printing Committee reduced it to $27,000, and until lately the estimates were not unreasonably so. A great deal of useless matter was printed which might be dispensed with.

After some further discussion the item was passed.

The remaining items under the head "Legislation" were also passed, and the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House adjourned at Thirty minutes past Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE INSOLVENCY ACT.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill to amend the Insolvency Act of 1875. He said he had adopted several suggestions which had been made to him, but in all cases where an amendment was not obviously necessary, it was thought best to give the existing provisions of the Act further trial. In the Bill before the House provision was made for the publication of notices, not only in the Official Gazette, but also in local papers. This was done to give the smaller creditors who did not take the Official Gazette proper notice. It would not increase the cost of advertising, because instead of publishing it twice in the Official Gazette, one notice would be given in it and the other in the local paper where the insolvent estate was. Another amendment provided for the examination of certain witnesses under oath. Then, with reference to securities, it was proposed that all given under the 28th and 29th sections of the Act of last Session shall be deposited with the Judge in the case, to be kept as a record of the Court. It was also proposed that creditors might have inspection of security and apply, on notice to the Judge, for an order that new or additional security be furnished. The provision with respect to costs would be a sufficient safeguard against unnecessary applications. His attention had been called to the insufficiency of remuneration in the winding up of small estates. He proposed to give 7½ instead of 5 per cent. on estates of $1,000. With regard to judgments, he could not accede to the request to make an exception in the case of Nova Scotia, but had decided to put all the Provinces on the same footing. His amendment was as follows:—"By the recovery of any judgment or recording of it, or by any other proceeding on the judgment," so that neither in Nova Scotia or anywhere else could any efficiency be given to a judgment unless these proceedings, which give it efficiency under the Statute have been taken.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness)—Will that have a retroactive effect?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it would affect judgments only as to future insolvencies. Another provision was for the collection of insolvency statistics, which made it the duty of the official assignees to furnish certain statistics to the Government for publication annually.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) requested attention to three or four matters which, in the practical operation of the Bill, had not been found to work in the manner in which he thought they had been intended to apply. Clauses in the present Act with reference to the sale of insolvent estates, absolutely conflict with each other. One provision stated that an advertisement being given in the Gazette, the sale of the estate might take place en bloc, with the assent of the majority of the creditors, but at the same time two other clauses existed, one having reference to real estate and the other to other estate, which—while apparently the first clause gave absolute power in this respect—ordered that advertisements should be made for two months before it could be sold. Different opinions had been held by different local Judges and lawyers as to the powers thus conferred, and there was really ground for the greatest possible doubt being entertained in this relation. The matter was of sufficient importance, in his opinion, to merit consideration in this Bill. There was another point of great importance—with regard to the position held by banks concerning insolvency claims. This occasioned great difficulty and should be put on a clear and more definite footing. Attention should also be given to minor details in this connection; but the other matters he had mentioned were really of great magnitude.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Does the hon. gentleman wish banks to have exceptional rights?

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—Not in the least; but the way in which their claims should be treated should be clearly defined in the Act.

Mr. PALMER remarked that a great contest had taken place in the Courts of Nova Scotia, which had been only a short time settled, as to whether the right of lien could be enforced in any other way than by execution. The Courts decided that this existed without any reference to the execution at all, and that it could be otherwise enforced; the result was that recorded judgments had been used as securities. He was rather surprised to learn that the Minister of Justice proposed to sweep this right away without reference to future insolvencies. In the Act of 1867, whatever lien and claims were previously granted by law, were preserved. He could not see why this Act should not permit the same liberty.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—That is not the form of the Act now on the Statute Book.

Mr. PALMER—It is so provided in the Act of 1869.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that he had endeavoured to deal in this measure with suggestions submitted to him. The hon. member for Cardwell had not, however, explained how he would solve the difficulties he had mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON proposed to add intersections; he thought these defects could be cured without much difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I will endeavour to adopt the hon. gentleman's suggestions, if the remedy is quite apparent.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—I will send them to you.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE considered that we should have a uniform system in this connection throughout the country. However, a provision could be inserted preserving the rights of parties who held liens, who could realize if they so chose. He was quite willing, so far as it was possible, to protect vested interests.

Mr. MACDONNELL questioned the power of the Dominion to deal with the control of property in the Provinces. It was true the Act of Confederation gave power to the Dominion Parliament to legislate in matters of insolvency and bankruptcy, but he did not think that would enable the Legislature to interfere with the rights and titles of property in the several Provinces.

The Bill was read the first time.

DISTRESSED SETTLERS IN MANITOBA.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT submitted the following message from His Excellency:—

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons the accompanying estimate of the sum required to be appropriated to the relief of distressed settlers in the Province of Manitoba, and recommends the same to the House of Commons.

Estimate of the sum to be appropriated for the relief of distressed settlers in Manitoba, $25,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the House had already been informed that the Government felt themselves compelled to assume the responsibility of having a special warrant made out for $60,000 for the relief of the settlers in Manitoba, and the providing of seed corn for the coming spring. It was the impression of the Local Government at the time and of the Hon. Lieutenant-Governor that this sum would suffice. Recent investigations, however, had proved that this was not the case, and he proposed to read a letter from the Lieut.-Governor on this subject. They deemed it proper, Parliament being in Session, that instead of acting on their own responsibility they should bring down a message in the usual way and ask the House to sanction the additional vote proposed. When they went into Committee of Supply they would ask the House to assent to this vote.

The Lieut.-Governor's letter was as follows :

" OTTAWA, 16th March, 1876.

" The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, First " Minister of Canada.

" SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that before leaving Manitoba I ascertained that the distress existing among the people of the Province, owing to the destruction of the crops by the grasshoppers was very severe

" At my request the Central Relief Committee deputed two of their members, the Hon. James McKay, and J. W. Nixon, Esq., to visit the western section of the Province and make a personal investigation into the circumstances of the settlers there, who are largely composed of recent immigrants from the Province of Ontario. I understand that the report of these gentlemen fully confirms the representations I had received from the people themselves as to their distressing circumstances. When the original application for the loan of $60,000 to the sufferers was made to you by my Council, it was so made after enquiries instituted by them by letter and by personal investigation; and had not the early closing of the Red River intercepted the arrival of the supplies of provisions and seed-grain, which it would have procured, and thereby necessitated a large outlay for winter transport, that amount would probably have proved sufficient to alleviate the distress. Under present circumstances, however, with the knowledge I possess of the extent of the desolation, from which so many of our people in all sections of the Province are suffering so painfully, I am under the necessity of appealing to the Privy Council and requesting that an additional sum of $25,000 may be granted, to be applied to the purchase of seed-grain and provisions, as has already been asked for through me by the Central Relief Committee. I regard the prompt granting of the request as a matter of the gravest urgency, and would respectfully press it upon you.

" I have the honour to be,

" Your obedient servant,

" ALEXANDER MORRIS,
" Lieut.-Gov. of Manitoba."

Since the Lieutenant-Governor had left there he (Mr. Mackenzie) had received a telegram on the subject from the permanent relief committee, and an urgent telegram from Archbishop Taché, confirming still more strongly, if possible, the absolute necessity of something further being done to prevent very great suffering. It would appear that a very considerable number of the population declined in the first place to make known their real position, hoping they might be able to sustain themselves through the winter. That hope, however, proved delusive. The circumstances connected with many of that class had just become known, and it became the duty of the Government, in their estimation, to ask for an additional sum, and they took this method of doing it. He asked that the House would give unanimous consent to the course the Government proposed to take.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER assured the Government that their action in this regard would receive the cordial support of the whole House. They were all deeply interested in the question, and most anxious to throw a large population into that Province. Nothing would be more fatal to that effort than the allowing of that unexpected calamity to go by unrelieved.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that His Excellency's message, together with the accompanying estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply. The motion was carried.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. BLAKE, the House then went into Committee on the Bill to make more effectual provision for the administration of the law relating to corrupt practices at Elections of Members of the House of Commons—Mr. Forbes in the chair.

On clause No. 6,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that, with regard to the fixing of the minimum time of service, he did not think any injustice would result from the clause as it stood.

The clause was passed with verbal amendments.

In regard to clause No. 10,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that it had been suggested as a matter of convenience to give a name to the Court in view of the affidavits and other papers being filed in it. He proposed in compliance with the suggestion to insert the words after "Court of Record," "In the name of the Court for the summary trial of corrupt practices at elections."

The remaining clauses of the Bill were adopted without discussion.

The Committee rose and reported the amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

THE MANITOBA SUBSIDY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of the Bill to provide for the payment of a grant to the Province of Manitoba. He said that in moving this motion he did not require to say much concerning the Bill, as the papers brought down by message gave a full explanation of the position of the Province, financially, at the present time. The proposal that was made was, in brief, to add to the amount of money which they received annually the sum of $26,746.96, in order that it might reach the sum of $90,000. The Province had abolished the Upper House, and thereby effected very considerable saving. At the present time they were actually without funds for the purpose of printing the Sessional work just collected. He hoped the House would not object to the proposal of the Government.

Mr. RYAN said the amount proposed to be added to the Manitoba subsidy, although an inconsiderable item in the finances of the Dominion, would be a considerable one in those of the Province. He was quite sure when the news reached Manitoba it would create general and profound satisfaction. He wanted at the same time to say that while they thought the Government had made a move in the right direction they were of opinion the Government had not gone quite as far as the circumstances would justify. It was thought that in place of an increase to $90,000, it should have been increased to $100,000. Manitoba was the child of this Dominion, and this relationship imposed duties on both parties.

While the Province was bound to exercise a reasonable degree of economy in the administration of its finances, it was clear that the Dominion was bound, since Manitoba had no other resources, to allow subsidy adequate to pay for the working of the machinery of the Provincial Government. They had no other resources worth mentioning than the Dominion subsidy. In other Provinces the public lands were held by the Local Government, but in Manitoba they were the property of the Dominion. Direct taxation was at present impracticable, because the class of settlers in new countries was generally poor, and for the first few years after their settlement had heavy expenses to meet. They were also subjected to heavy expense by the extravagant rates which the Kitson line charged for freight. An attempt had been made to break up this monopoly, but it failed. During the past two years the Province had been devastated by locusts, and although there was good reason to believe it would be many years before they would again be visited by this plague, the settlers would not be in a position to bear direct taxation.

When Manitoba applied for an increase of subsidy, they at the same time submitted a statement showing the expenditure of the Province to be about $106,700. Since that time the Legislative Council had been abolished, but it would still be necessary to increase the Dominion subsidy to $100,000 to enable Manitoba to pay its way. He would move that it be increased to that amount if he thought the Government would give it their support. Since the Federal Parliament had assumed the responsibility of calling the Province into existence, they should give them the means to meet its necessary expenditures. If the Minister of Justice or any member of the Government could suggest a source of revenue from which to collect money or any way by which the expenses of Government could be reduced, such advice would receive the serious consideration of the people of Manitoba; and if it could not convince them, it would at least strengthen the hands of those in the Province who were fighting for economy and good government.

When Manitoba became a part of this Confederation, 1,400,000 acres of land were reserved for the children of half-breeds, in order to extinguish the Indian title; but although six years had passed since, no part of the reservation had been broken up, and many half-breeds had sold their rights to these lands for the merest trifles. This delay in breaking up the reserves was also a grievance to the settlers, who had been obliged to settle at great distances from the capital. It was also a source of expense to the Province, because of the increased cost of constructing roads and bridges to reach such distant points. There was also delay in issuing patents for lands. Although three years had passed since the Commission on this question was appointed, not more than 5 per cent. of the patents had been issued.

The hon. gentleman knew the evil effect of land disputes in creating bitterness and heart burnings; and these were rankling in the bosoms of the people in every part of the Province, embittering social intercourse, paralysing local industry, and to a certain extent preventing the investment of foreign capital. These matters had been subjected to such delay that if he felt he did not direct attention to them he would be wanting in his duty.

Mr. MASSON did not oppose the second reading, but rose to show that the action of the late Government in granting a subsidy of $65,000, which was denounced at the time as reckless, was fully indicated and justified by the recommendations of the Administration which could better appreciate the responsibilities of office. In Quebec, especially those who there had taken a great interest in the addition to the Confederation of the Western Provinces had been severely condemned as having been too liberal in their conditions.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that he had no recollection of ever having objected to the financial arrangements of the late Government with the Province of Manitoba; and he was all but certain that he never did so object. The affirmation made was something like the statement that the hon. gentleman had been offered a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. MASSON replied that he had alluded to the hon. gentleman's friends in Lower Canada as having voted against the terms then in question. As to the other matter, he thought that it would have been in far better taste if the hon. gentleman had said what he now did when the hon. member who first brought it up was present in the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I did not say it, because I did not know that he said anything of the kind.

Mr. MASSON—At least six days have passed since it was said and the hon. member should not have waited until this moment when the hon. member for Bagot was not in his seat, to make the statement he has done.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. member will understand that I know my own business. There is not a word of truth in the allegation; no such offer was ever made directly or indirectly.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER stated that he did not have a perfect recollection of the First Minister having objected to the late Government's proposals concerning Manitoba; but he was quite sure that the hon. member did object, simply because he always objected to everything the late Administration did. A very grave difficulty, however, existed; the proposal of the Administration had his most cordial sanction, as the allowance of $65,000 was clearly too small for a Province so situated, and a grant of $100,000, he believed, would be approved; but he begged to call attention to a motion which had been moved on the previous similar occasion, and to which the late Government had been so weak as to assent. Mr. Oliver had moved in amendment to the resolution, seconded by Mr. McGill, that the words "But the House is of opinion that no further grant or permission beyond those made by the Union Act, and the Act respecting Nova Scotia, should be made to any of the Provinces out of the revenues of Canada for the support of the Government or Legislature of any of the Provinces" be added to the end thereof. This would teach them all that it was not always well for an Opposition to push advantages to the greatest possible extent, and he supposed that they would in this instance be obliged to go back on the principles recorded in this amendment in the Journals for the 31st of March, 1870, page 126.

Mr. SCHULTZ said after the full discussion of the subject by his hon. colleague from Marquette, it was scarcely necessary for him to say more than express his pleasure at the additional grant proposed to be made by this Act to Manitoba. He joined the hon. member for Marquette in thanking the Ministry, and would even go a little further, and thank them for the reception which they had accorded the delegates from the Province. These gentlemen had reported that not only was their reception courteous but every evidence given of a disposition to deal fairly with any claim the Province could show for better terms. While he (Mr. Schultz) felt that for these things thanks were due, yet he felt that the amount granted would still be found insufficient for the purposes of the Province, and without going into any of the ground already travelled over by speakers who had preceded him, he would endeavour to show this briefly. In the Minute of Council which embodies the arguments used by the Manitoba delegates, and the report of the Sub-Committee in the whole matter, he found the following paragraph:—

“The Sub-Committee are of opinion that having regard to the whole circumstances of the case, it would be proper, provided the Local Government and Legislature should make such changes in their system as would (without diminishing the total aggregate amount to be devoted to the great objects of education, agriculture, public works, charity, and administration of Justice,) bring down the total expenditure to a sum not exceeding (independent of the amount of local revenues) $90,000; it would be proper to charge as an advance on the debt account the balance due the Dominion, and to invite Parliament to make an additional annual grant to the Province of $26,745.96, being the amount necessary in order to raise its revenue derivable from the Dominion to $90,000; such grant to commence from the 1st day of July, 1875, and to continue until 1881, when the Province will become entitled to the increased population allowance, based upon the census to be taken in that year.”

The Legislature of Manitoba, doubtless having in view these facts, granted for the expenditure of the Government for the current year, the following sums:—

Civil Government.....	$19,200 00
Total Legislation	12,200 00
Administration of Justice.....	10,000 00
Immigration and Agriculture....	2,000 00
Charities and Hospitals.....	2,000 00
Public Buildings.....	5,000 00
Provincial Gaol	3,500 00
Road Service.....	8,000 00
Education.....	7,000 00
Miscellaneous.....	15,300 00
Special.....	800 00

Making a total of $95,000, which was proposed to be covered by the $90,000, which the subsidy would be under the new arrangement, and an amount of $5,000 expected to accrue from licenses and the tax on wild lands. Now, it would be seen that for those expenditures, which the Minute of Council has considered of such importance as to be specially mentioned, the amounts were almost ridiculously small. Immigration, for instance, was only $2,000; Charities and Hospitals the same, while the whole granted the Public Works Department was the absurd amount of $5,000. These amounts were quite insufficient, and he regretted that the Government had not seen fit to grant the amount the delegates asked for. He (Mr. Schultz) also agreed with the hon. Member for Marquette about the matter of half-breed Lands, and he felt that the thriving Canadian settlements of Springfield, Summerside, Rockwood, Greenwood, and Elanwood, were all being badly treated in the matter of roads communicating with other parts of the Province. With only five thousand dollars to expend on Public Works, it was useless to expect the Province to do much, but he would endeavour to show on another occasion that it was the duty of the Dominion Government to build these roads.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said that had the Government consisted of a Lieutenant Governor and Council, the amount voted to the Province would have been amply sufficient; but it must be very clear to all, and especially to those who knew the great expense of living in Manitoba, that $90,000 would be very inadequate for the expenses of a Government such as they had, with so many officials. The increase given would create general satisfaction in Manitoba; but he thought they might have made it $100,000. He was glad to be able to state that they had succeeded in making very satisfactory arrangements with two transportation companies, by which means the rates would be greatly reduced beyond those of former years. With regard to the half-breed lands there had been a good deal of dissatisfaction, but he had no doubt that the matter was now being attended to by the Government.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he understood his hon. friend from Terrebonne to state that objection was made in the House by the hon. gentleman sitting on those benches to the financial part of the terms granted originally to the Province of Manitoba. He had to say in reply that he never heard any such objection made, and he never made such an objection himself. He had in the country, but not in the House, discussed the Constitution granted to Manitoba, but not the financial terms. They objected to the cumbrous system of government given to a Province with so sparse a population, and to the conferring upon them of a government so unsuited to them in every way. What the Government was called upon to do now was to ask Parliament to provide, at the expense of Canada, the defects in the system which the late Government originated. The present Administration had procured a simplification of the Manitoba Constitution and a reduction in the expenditure. They could not ask the people to go back to the point at which they started originally, and therefore it had been necessary to supplement their income at the expense of Canada. The reference which had been made to the objections raised to the increased terms to Nova Scotia was not applicable to this case. There was nothing inconsistent between their positions then and that which they took now. The terms given to Manitoba were given by the people of Canada represented in Parliament, and consequently they had the right to change that arrangement if they chose. Then, as to the resolution which the hon. gentleman said ought to teach them moderation, he (Mr. Blake) hoped it would teach moderation in a quarter where it was more required. That resolution was passed at a time when this particular contract and the Province of Manitoba was not in existence. And yet in face of that fact the hon. member contended that the circumstances were the same in both cases.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER explained he meant to say that when the whole of the Provinces, as represented in this Parliament, made a compact with Manitoba for its admission on certain financial terms, and they were ratified by the Imperial Parliament, they stood on the same footing. Prince Edward Island came into this Confederation on the understanding that certain arrangements were made with Manitoba, and the same principle applied to the latter Province as to the original four.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the Provinces did not make this agreement; the Dominion of Canada made it. It was a compact of the whole of Canada. It might have been carried by a majority of members of Parliament from two Provinces against three or four adverse to it, but still it would have been the act of this Parliament. Although he would go as far for State rights now as he did in the Nova Scotia controversy, he could not destroy the efficiency of the Confederation principle by admitting that anything Parliament might lawfully do it could not lawfully undo without the Provinces themselves are a party to the bargain. In the case of Nova Scotia the objections were to the altering of the fundamental part of the compact of Union, without the assent of the Provinces, and to the mode in which the alteration had been negotiated. Instead of negotiating with the Local Government the late Administration preferred to deal with the gentlemen who happened to sit in this Parliament as the representatives of the Province. In the case of Manitoba, the present Government dealt exclusively with the Government and Legislature of that Province. He denied there was anything inconsistent in the course now pursued with the action taken in the case of Nova Scotia.

Mr. PALMER said if he understood the hon. gentleman right, he contended that the Provinces which came in under the 146th Section of the British North America Act stood in a different position constitutionally to the older Provinces. To that he (Mr. Palmer) must express his entire dissent. The British North America Act was not only an agreement between the four original Provinces, but an agreement as to the terms on which the others might come into the Confederation. He held that it was utterly impossible to bring in other Provinces unless under this Act.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The North-West Territories were admitted into the Dominion; we carved Manitoba out of them.

Mr. PALMER said the only ground on which the grant to Manitoba could be justified was that the money belonged to the people and could be expended as they thought fit. Therefore he did not object to it, but he did object to the right claimed by the Minister of Justice to deal differently with the new Provinces brought into the Dominion from the old ones.

Hon. Mr. POPE contended that this Parliament had a perfect right to give an increased subsidy to Nova Scotia or any other Province of the Dominion if it should be deemed expedient to do so, and he thought it unwise to attempt to bind this Parliament in such a way that they could not pursue a certain course if the exigencies should arise which would render it desirable. There was no doubt when the resolution in the case of Nova Scotia was entered on the Journals it applied not only to the Provinces that were then in the Confederation, but to all that might subsequently be admitted.

There might be difficulties encountered in new sections of the country; but the same difficulties were experienced in connection with municipal matters. The best remedy for this state of things was to throw the responsibility on the people. He for his part had every confidence in the people of Manitoba, endowed by the free Government condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite. He would give them no mixed Government for it was best for the people to legislate for themselves. He would vote for this Bill with pleasure, as he had done in connection with the grant of better terms to Nova Scotia. He believed that it was in the interest of the Dominion that every Province should have sufficient means to carry on the Government without being oppressed. With regard to the record on the Journal, he felt more sorry for the Minister of Justice than for any other member, because that hon. gentleman was so nervous and so greatly interested in being consistent.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I would ask at this stage, if in accordance with the usual practice on this day, the House will adjourn at six o'clock?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—We desired to take up the Estimates this evening, but we are quite willing to have it understood that only those items on which no prolonged discussion will likely occur shall be considered.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—In this case I must say that I should feel it to be my duty to be in my place.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON entirely agreed with the Minister of Justice with regard to the measure before the House, as there was the greatest possible difference between it and the instance to which reference had been made.

Mr. BOWELL called the attention of the Premier and of the House, with regard to the broad declaration made that no objection had been taken by him to the terms granted Manitoba, to the record in the Debates, in which Mr. Mackenzie, now the Premier, was reported to have said:—

“With regard, however, to the excessive expenditure which was to be imposed on the Dominion by the arrangement of the Bill (the Manitoba Bill) it involved the amount of the debt, $416,500.”

“Sir GEORGE E. CARTIER—$21,000 a year.”

“Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes; there would then be $12,000 to make up at 50 cents per head; and in addition the Government proposed to pay nearly $30,000 for the Local Government. He could scarcely conceive that the amount was necessary.”

He thought that this was sufficient evidence on that point.

He also found in the famous Aurora speech, not a direct objection to the Manitoba Bill, but sentiments entertained by the Minister of Justice, which were hardly consistent with his present position.

The Hon. Mr. Blake then said—"We are engaged in a very difficult task—the task of welding together several Provinces, which have been accustomed to regard themselves as isolated from each other, and which are full of petty jealousies, their Provincial questions, and their local questions. How are we to accomplish our work? How are we to effect a real Union between these Provinces? Can we do it by giving a sop now to one, now to another, after the manner of the late Government, by giving British Columbia extravagant terms, which have been referred to, and by giving Nova Scotia $150 a head for the export duty, which cannot be made out as worth more than $65,000 a year? Do you hope to create and preserve harmony and good feeling, with such a false, and sordid, and mercenary basis, as this? Not so! That day I hope is gone for ever."

Apropos of another matter, he found it on record that the hon. member for Terrebonne might possibly if he desired have had the position of the President of the Council. The Premier's name had not been mentioned nor had the House been informed how the offer had been made.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—No offer was made.

The Bill was read the second time, and the House rose for recess.

W. O'DONOHUE.

Mr. COSTIGAN—In order that no hon. member would be taken by surprise, gave notice that on the next occasion when the motion was made for the House to go into Committee of Supply, he would move in amendment:—That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that whereas this House did on the 13th of February last vote an Address to Her Majesty, praying that a full amnesty be granted to all persons connected with the North-West troubles, for all acts committed by them during the said troubles, saving only Louis Riel, Am-Brose Lepine and W. D. O'Donohue; and that a like amnesty was granted to Louis Biel and Ambrose Lepine conditional on five years' banishment from Her Majesty's Dominions, thereby excluding W. D. O'Donohue from the benefits of such amnesty; and whereas the said W. O'Donohue has since written the following letter—(here he read the letter submitted to Parliament last Session)—in the opinion of this House the Government should at once institute a thorough enquiry into the statements contained in said letter, in order that justice may be done in the premises.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE suggested that the motion should be placed on the notice paper.

After a brief discussion the suggestion was adopted.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

On the item, $25,000 for the relief of the distressed settlers in Manitoba,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that the reason why this sum was asked for without being placed in the estimates in the usual way, was in consequence of representation made to the Government that the case was urgent and would not admit of even a week's delay. The roads would soon break up, and it was important that the grain should be forwarded at once for the use of the settlers this spring.

Mr. SCHULTZ—Is this a gratuity or a loan?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It is a loan.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the money was advanced to the settlers and mortgages were taken on their lands for its repayment.

Mr. SCHULTZ objected to mortgages being taken for such small amounts as four or five bushels of wheat given to each settler. It would be much better to take payment by note.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the people of Manitoba had shown such an independent spirit that they declined to accept a gift from the Government. They wanted relief, but they were willing to repay anything that might be advanced to them, and they could not, therefore, object to giving a mortgage.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he was aware of the independent spirit of the people, and he did not ask that repayment should not be exacted. What he did contend was that a note would be more convenient than a mortgage for such a small advance as four or five bushels of wheat.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said no one was more ready than he was to give hearty support to the proposition of the Government for the relief of the settlers in Manitoba. He entirely agreed with the hon. member for Lisgar in the objection to this Government becoming the mortgagee of the people individually. There had been some experience of the mode in which that was worked out in the township of Proton, Ontario. A person named Nixon was dispatched to Proton on the eve of an election to bring the power of the Crown Lands Department to bear on the settlers to influence their votes. It was not desirable that such a scandal should be repeated on a large scale; and in a wider field. This same Nixon was now the agent of the Dominion Government in the North-West. The first step was taken, and the next would be the mortgaging of the settlers' lands. He objected to that. It was bad enough to have to pay the cost of transportation, and $6 a day to an official out of this advance, without putting the additional expenses of a mortgage on each settler. It would be better a thousand times to let the people suffer than to deprive them of their freedom, as he had reason to believe they would be if this course were taken. He hoped the Government would reconsider the matter and abandon the idea of taking a mortgage from the settler to whom an advance was made.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that the question was not whether there were hungry men; the proposition was not to relieve all who were suffering from want of bread. Settlers in that Province—persons who were invited to settle on Dominion lands—had been met by a sudden calamity which had deprived them of the fruit of their labours. The grasshopper had consumed their harvest, and they were without means; so much for the limitation of the grant.

Then the hon. gentleman said that the farms ought not to be mortgaged; but he did not understand the hon. member to say that these sums ought to be made free gifts. Was that his view?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The hon. gentleman acknowledged that this ought not to be done. Then these settlers were to remain debtors of the Government, with the power to exact, or remit, or postpone the payment, or order the immediate payment of the debts incurred. The Administration was to be able to oppress or exercise leniency, and the only difference between them was that the land ought not to be mortgaged; and was not the argument as to influence being brought to bear on voters, as potent with regard to the one as to the other position? It was perfectly clear that the moment the hon. gentleman conceded the admission he did, this was fatal to his case, and his inferences became totally illusory. If they were debtors to the Government, this should be put in the clearest possible way.

The hon. gentleman had referred to transactions which had occasioned considerable comment, but with his usual unfortunate inaccuracy, was mistaken about names; but as the Finance Minister had remarked on one occasion, there was twenty per cent. of accuracy in the statement. A person called—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Mr. Lewis.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It now appeared that the hon. gentleman knew that it was Mr. Lewis who was concerned in the matter, but he had preferred an aptness of illustration to accuracy of statement, in order to make a point. The hon. gentleman had no right to say that Mr. Nixon was an emissary of the Government. He gave to this statement the flattest possible contradiction. He was First Minister of the Government at the time, and it had then been clearly shown that Mr. Nixon was not an emissary of theirs. Although the conduct of Mr. Lewis was reprehensible, he observed that he (Lewis) had issued a pamphlet in which he disproved the charges against himself; but as it appeared to him (Mr. Blake) the evidence proved that his conduct had been reprehensible in the extreme; yet he always stated that he did not have the slightest authority for what he had said to the parties in question regarding the intentions of the Government.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Hon. gentleman could "hear! hear," but it was entirely too late even for the persistence of the calumniators of the faction, to which the hon. gentlemen belonged, to go this length.

Mr. BOWELL—What about the interview with Mr. MacKellar in his shirt-tail?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The whole of this story has been spread before the country. The evidence I believe was taken on oath; and on the whole, no honest, no fair-minded, and no candid man careful of his reputation, could come to conclusions based on it, adverse to the Government of which I was head at the time.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER could only say that he had not felt it necessary to explain the circumstances connected with this matter, and he suggested to the Minister of Justice that the difficulty mentioned could be obviated by leaving the payment by the settlers open, as the object was merely to afford relief through the Government; it would not be accepted as a gratuity, and the understanding should be that these persons should pay it back when they felt able to do so; but no mortgages were to be taken. The hon. gentleman said that this aid was to be extended exclusively to men, who where the owners of the lands—

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Settlers.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The owners of the lands; if they be not owners they cannot give mortgages.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Settlers.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The hon. gentleman need not draw fine-spun legal subtleties here. They were the owners or had a right to the lands, or mortgages would be useless. If they could not pay the Government would be the loser, and it would be a thousand times better for the Government to make a free gift of it out and out than to have any such relations with individual settlers as was proposed. He had never said that there was a duty of $1 a ton levied on ships. He had never said that the hon. gentleman had proposed to levy a duty of $1 a ton, and that it had been prevented by the fact that the tariff was not found acceptable by the House. His (Hon. Mr. Tupper's) statement was not 20 per cent. astray, while the hon. gentleman's statement was 80 per cent. astray. It had been asked why he was not accurate in the statement of the facts he had made. It was because he wanted to spare the Hon. Minister of Justice. He did not want to tell the House a truth to which the hon. gentleman could not listen without a blush. He did not care to state then that Mr. Lewis went on that dishonourable and corrupt mission with money furnished by the partner of the Hon. Minister of Justice. This transaction and others of a like kind had undermined the confidence of the people of Ontario in the hon. gentleman, and it was transactions of this character that had swept away his supporters from seven of the finest Reform constituencies and returned his opponents instead. It was such transactions as these that had swept away the overmastering majority of the Government in Ontario and left them in the position they now occupied. He hoped the hon. gentleman was now satisfied.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was due to a public servant who was unable to speak for himself there, that what the honourable gentleman said should not remain uncontradicted. He was convinced that there was no evidence—he spoke subject to correction—that there was no evidence in the investigation in question on which Mr. Nixon was proved to have said or done anything which ought not to have been said or done. He did not recollect any evidence which in the slightest degree affected Mr. Nixon in reference to the allegations which Lewis made. That statement was due to Mr. Nixon, who was in a distant part of the country discharging able and efficient duties which he was called upon to discharge. The matter had been thoroughly investigated, and he had only to state that the allegations constituted an infamous scandal.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) held that many of the individuals to whom money was lent by the municipalities would never pay back the money they owed unless they were compelled to do so by the Government. It was necessary some way should be devised to collect the amounts, and he considered that they were in duty bound to assist in getting back this money. If the Government undertook to do what had been suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland, the people would soon know it. They would be held responsible for the collection of this money, and if they used it for the purchase of support the country had intelligence enough to find it out.

Mr. DYMOND said Mr. Nixon's connection with the Proton affair was not only never proved, but it was absolutely disproved. That Mr. Nixon had ever committed any offence against electoral purity had never been substantiated. The charge was first brought against him in a disreputable newspaper which terminated a dishonourable career some years ago.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that notwithstanding the disreputable character of that journal, the support of one of the gentlemen connected with it was acceptable to the Government.

Mr. DYMOND said that Mr. Robertson had been engaged by a newspaper as advertisement agent in London, but he failed to see how that circumstance made him a supporter of the Government. The charges were first made in the newspaper referred to, and it was a cruel, dastardly and infamous slander.

The story with regard to Mr. McKellar was no more just than that relating to Mr. Nixon, so far as anything corrupt or discreditable to him as a Minister was concerned. No man in Ontario held a higher reputation for veracity, and it was in consequence of the high estimation in which he was held throughout the country that the Opposition and their press hurled such slanders against him.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said if Mr. John Ross Robertson was the disreputable character which the hon. member for North York had represented him to be, it was anything but creditable for the Globe to employ him on its staff, and it was rather singular that the men who claimed to be leaders of the Party of Purity should reward the writer of the articles they complained of by an appointment to an emigration agency in Ireland. The proposition of the Government was fraught with corruption and danger to the last degree to the liberties of the people. Let the principle once be established that the Government can take the money of the people out of the Treasury and use it for the purpose of lending it to individuals, taking mortgages on their property as security, and the rights of the people are seriously tampered with.

Mr. YOUNG said the principal object was to know that this money would be repaid at some time or another, not so much for the amount of money involved, as to prevent the establishment of the principle that any distressed portion of the community might look for aid from the public exchequer. If the objection urged against this proposition could be held valid, it would apply with equal force to the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BOWELL said so far as he was concerned he gave the Minister of Justice the greatest possible credit for the Bills he had introduced this Session in order to stamp out the corrupt practices which had been exposed in some of the Ontario election trials. His course was in marked contrast to that of the gentleman he had taken from the bench to act as leader of his party in the Ontario Legislature, and who had introduced Bills to whitewash every man who had been found guilty of corruption and disqualified under the law.

The only question really was as to the best possible way in which the relief could be given without placing those who were the recipients—if he might use the term—of this favour in a position in which any Government could exercise any control over them in the future. He believed that the suggestion of the hon. member for Cumberland was the most proper; the money should be loaned to the Provincial Parliament, which should be held responsible, and this would be a much better plan than the taking of mortgages. When Quebec was in great part burned down, a considerable sum of money had been voted in aid of the sufferers, and it was known that this had been used as a lever by the supporters of candidates during subsequent elections.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD did not think that they would in any way mend the matter by empowering the Local Government to collect the money, as the arguments concerning political influence would have the same bearing and greater force in this connection. The latter, moreover, did not desire to assume this responsibility. Very few of these settlers had received their patents for these lands, and the Dominion Administration was in the best position to arrange the matter. He did not think that there was any ground for apprehending danger as to the use of the power held over the settlers in order to secure political ends.

Mr. PLUMB stated that the Minister of the Interior's statement had strengthened the argument that this matter should be placed under the control of the Local Government, which could deal with it better than any agent of the Dominion Cabinet so far distant from the scene of operations. He thought that they were all endeavouring to find the best means of acting, and he trusted that the plan he mentioned would commend itself to the good sense of the House. He doubted whether it was desirable to hamper the settlers' lands with liens; but if it was necessary, there would be no difficulty in doing so, as the Government, in most cases, held the titles to the lands. The money should be distributed fairly, and put into such hands as would best serve their purposes.

The item was passed.

Item 52, $3,000, to meet expenses connected with the care of archives being taken up, Hon. Mr. POPE alluded to the collections of interesting documents in this country and Europe upon which the history of Canada would, in a measure, be based. Mr. Brymner, a gentleman who, previous to his appointment, had been employed in the office of the Herald (Montreal), had been sent to London, and Mr. Verrard to Paris; they had searched the archives preserved in those two cities, and had made important discoveries.

At this point, as the Hon. Mr. Pope had not brought with him papers to which he desired to refer, the item was left over for consideration at another time.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER then called attention to the fact that the item which had been previously entered in order to provide for salaries and contingent expenses of the established office, Halifax—amount, $4,100—had been omitted. The Union Act provided that the collection of statistics should appertain to the general Government. At the time of its passage there existed in Nova Scotia a law to which the people of that Province attached very great importance, requiring the preparation of statistics. They had been willing to charge themselves with the expenditure necessary for this purpose and continue the system which was the best of the kind in the Dominion; and they had not supposed that the time would arrive when this Government would remove the appropriation for this purpose. Vital statistics were very important, and to procure them in proper form was one of the first duties of an Administration. He did not know of any country to which such a system would be of greater advantage than to Canada. It was one of the means by which the outside would become acquainted with matters of extreme importance in connection with the system of immigration—such as health and climate, &c. He regretted the proposal of the Government on several grounds, and he would observe that Nova Scotia would have great reason to complain on account of it. It was due to their own reputations that the Government should bring forward reforms, and he suggested that this system would be one of the most valuable improvements which could be inaugurated. Besides it would save their reputations by leaving one reform behind them on the Statute Books.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT was very glad to hear that the hon. gentleman had some good intentions. The Government had considered this matter and found great difficulties in the way of carrying out any system of statistics worthy of the name, and it was not desirable to have any partial system. With respect to the question immediately before them, the item had been omitted by a clerical error; the system was intended to be continued this year, but they would announce their intention to abolish it next. He could give little hope of the adoption of a general system of statistics; the question of expense was too serious. He would feel it his duty as to the matter in hand to bring down a supplemental estimate.

Hon. Mr. POPE referred to the great importance of a proper system of statistics, remarking that among its many advantages would be that of enabling his hon. friend to ascertain the exact basis on which to raise his revenue. The system was really of necessity to the country, and would probably not cost more than $150,000. It would show the world we had a most healthy country and would in that way attract emigrants.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said his hon. friend's estimate of the cost was well within the mark; $150,000 would not at all meet the expenses of the system. From a legal point of view, however, it would be practically impossible to carry it out, and if the hon. gentleman came to consider the matter he would recognize that fact.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was glad that the system immediately under review was not to be abolished this year, as it would leave another year for its consideration, and he hoped the question after this discussion would be reconsidered. It was not exactly fair, in view of the fact that the Province of Nova Scotia provided for the service before Confederation, that it should now be abolished.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Committee must remember that the service is not really performed for the money voted in Nova Scotia. To make the statistics practically useful required more than three times the amount asked, and it was of little real value unless a larger sum was spent. In Ontario the municipal law enabled the compilation of an exact system of statistics regarding real and personal property, and vital statistics will be added this year. The system, however, had been acknowledged practically useless up to this moment, but by the adoption of an energetic administrative measure it would soon be made more effective. In Lower Canada it was admitted that the record of births and deaths was much more accurate than anywhere else, and it was a system which cost very little to the Dominion. Statistics of real and personal property were necessary to let the people in Europe know what the average wealth of our people is. In addition, statistics of trade were valuable. Our Navigation Returns were prepared in such a way as not to be so available as carefully condensed tables of districts. The railway system of Canada was now very extensive, and when any new project came up, some of the Directors go to England and endeavour to obtain money on the issue of bonds, but they had absolutely no means of laying before the public the real position of every part of the road and its relation to other roads. Every company of any size got up a map, sometimes showing its own line in a favourable light, and the other roads in a crooked manner. An authoritative volume giving full particulars regarding the railways of the Dominion was of extreme necessity, and they had taken pains to prepare such a book, which would be placed in the hands of members in a few days; and the engineers were preparing a map, showing with perfect accuracy every railway in the Dominion. Personal statistics were rather beyond their power, a fact which was recognized by the hon. member for Cumberland and his colleagues in not pushing their Bill to its legitimate conclusion—a place on the Statute Book.

Mr. PLUMB stated that a complete system of statistics would be of great service to the Government, the public and the country.

Mr. BROUSE called attention to the necessity of the establishment of a Bureau of Sanitary Statistics. It was one of the most important questions that could engage the attention of the House; and any money expenditure in that direction he was certain would be acquiesced in by the country. He showed that in Maine the death rate had been greatly reduced by improved sanitary measures, and a corresponding reduction would take place in Canada if similar measures were adopted.

Hon. Mr. POPE thought a more efficient system than that before the House was required.

Item No. 53, for $6,500, to meet expenses in connection with the organization of the Patent Record, and item No. 54, for $5,000, to meet expenses in connection with the preparation of Criminal Statistics was adopted without discussion.

On the item of $100,000 to meet the probable expenditure required in connection with the Philadelphia Exhibition,

Mr. BOWELL asked if there was any probability that the $100,000 passed last session would be sufficient, or whether it was intended to bring down any new sum in the supplementary estimates.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was surmised that it would be sufficient, together with the sums the Provinces would vote in addition.

Mr. YOUNG said that although it was desirable to keep the expenditure in this matter as low as possible, yet it was also desirable Canada should make a good display there. The fruit growers desired $2,000 in addition to the sum already awarded them in order to enable them to make the exhibition creditable to Canada. He would prefer to see the amount increased rather than the Canadians should not make a first-class display.

Mr. DOMVILLE was opposed to further expenditure in this direction, believing that the depressed condition of the country would not warrant a larger appropriation than $100,000.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) thought $100,000 would cover the whole cost.

Mr. PLUMB hoped that if the fruit growers wanted assistance that they would receive it out of the $100,000, and that if that sum was not sufficient that a further sum would be granted.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER considered the credit of the country was committed, and he hoped nothing would be spared that was absolutely necessary to make that exhibition thoroughly creditable to the country.

The Fruit Growers' Association here as well as in Nova Scotia having exhausted their means, and their application for aid in this regard having been refused for want of funds, he thought that, as probably these associations had no funds on which to draw, the Finance Minister should be asked to put into the supplementary estimates an additional sum—say $20,000—which if necessary could be used for their purposes.

The item was passed.

Item 58, providing for the expenditure of $5,628.50 for new militia pensions, passed without discussion.

Item 59, appropriating $50,000 to meet the probable amount required for pensions paid to veterans of the War of 1812, being taken up, Hon. Mr. VAIL explained that though this sum had been expended last year, thirty or forty veterans still remained to be paid. It was believed that this appropriation would be sufficient during the present year, as a number of pensioners had died; the diminution on this account would probably amount to twenty.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) enquired whether there was any provision for the payment of the pension to the widows or orphans of those who died before the money reached them.

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that it was quite impossible to meet these claims.

Mr. BROUSE would have liked to see the vote doubled and $50 in lieu of $20 paid to each of these veterans, many of whom were extremely poor.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER could not see why the claims of the widows and orphans of applicants should not be honoured; it was a mere question of distribution, and these cases would be very few—not twenty cases at the outside.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cornwall) regretted that the vote was not increased. The sum appeared to be very small.

Mr. MASSON took the opportunity to ask whether it was intended to give a gratuity to the widow of a Judge who had recently died?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE had no objection to answer the question at once. A memorial in this relation had been presented; a two month's allowance, as was done under the circumstances in the cases of all public servants deceased, had been granted, but the Government did not intend to give a pension.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) suggested that as an inducement to citizens to serve in the Militia, grants of wild lands, which did not appear at present to be of great demand, should be held out to them, to be given after a certain period of service had expired. Unless some such thing was done, under our present system he believed that the volunteers would very largely disappear.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—We cannot hold out any encouragement in that direction.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought that the object of Parliament had not been attained with regard to the pensions given to the veterans of 1812. No hon. member had supposed that $20 would only be received by each of them, but rather $50. He hoped that the Government would reconsider the matter.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman must remember that a very large number who received $20 are very well off, some moving in the first circles of society, they having pressed their claims. There must be a limit to these public allowances, and if possible, we should discriminate, but that is extremely difficult and cannot be entertained.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was of opinion that the establishment of the longevity of Canadians proven by the number of these veterans who had made good their claims was worth all the money expended in that connection; it was very important for the country, which has—

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—So few doctors.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Reasons for inducing immigration.

Mr. WOOD agreed with the hon. First Minister that the large majority of those men are wealthy.

Mr. BROUSE suggested that a certain number of medals should be struck off and the pensioners allowed to take them instead of money if they so desired. Some of the wealthy men would prefer the medals so that they could hand them down to their children.

Mr. GIBSON thought $40 instead of $20 might be given, as the men were passing away rapidly.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said there was just one way of making a discrimination. Those of the veterans who are well off could refuse their pensions, and the money could be distributed among those who are poor.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) had no doubt many of them would accept a medal as a reconnaissance, but in his section of the county, where the men were not so rich, most of them would take the money.

The item was passed.

Item 60, consideration to pensioners in lieu of land, $8,000 was carried.

On item, $7,000, for care and maintenance of properties transferred from the Ordnance and the Imperial Government, including rents, under the heading of Militia,

Mr. DOMVILLE enquired what steps had been taken with regard to the Government lands at Fredericton.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said nothing had been done except to put a portion of the lands not required for military purposes into the hand of the Minister of Interior to be disposed of.

Mr. DOMVILLE said there were some squatters on the land.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said there were none except those who were under lease.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac), asked whether it was proposed to dispose of the Ordnance lands in the vicinity of Ottawa. He was informed that Cartier Square was being surveyed and laid out into lots for sale, and that the rest of the Ordnance lands in the vicinity of the city were being surveyed also for sale.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The land in question has not been surveyed; the Government will act in that as in other matters in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he considered the hon. gentleman's reply was an insult to the House. Parliament represented the people, and the Government were not despotic controllers of the Dominion. It was nothing new for the Premier to give such answers, but it was an abuse of power. He would like, for instance, to ask if he were not afraid to subject himself to similar insult, by what authority the Government had undertaken to deal with Major's Hill in this city, in the way they had done, without consulting Parliament. He was not discussing the policy or impolicy of the course of the Government, but the position was that the Government had no right to deal with the public property irrespective of authority obtained from Parliament. He did not think a greater wrong could be inflicted on the people of Ottawa than to divide Cartier Square into lots and dispose of them. It was on the faith of that being reserved as a public square that parties invested their money in adjoining lots, and expended large sums of money in constructing buildings, so that it would be a great wrong to make any disposal of the property that would prevent it from remaining a public square. Such a place was necessary for the health of the community, a breathing space for those who were compelled by circumstances to live in the city.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he supposed he should feel sorry for having incurred the hon. gentleman's displeasure, but the hon. gentleman was getting so into the habit of using this extravagant language, that nobody cared how often he used it. The hon. gentleman had no right to assume such a tone. He held that with respect to that property, and all other property, the Government had acted in the public interest. He had given the only answer that should be given, and it was his answer now. The law gave them power to say how public property should be disposed of. The Government did not hold Cartier Square for the benefit of the city. If the city had a right in that square, then the Government had no right to dispose of it; if the city had no rights in the property, the Government had a right to dispose of it. If the hon. gentleman knew the city had rights in it, and was correct, then the Government could not violate the law of the land; but if the hon. gentleman was wrong, and the people had no rights, it was the duty of the Government to dispose of the property as they thought proper in the public interests. The people of Ottawa had no more right to the property of the Government in this city than in any other part of the Dominion, and he did not think it was the duty of the Government to give a public park to the city, simply because a few parties had to reside there. With regard to Major's Hill, the Government had a right to dispose of it as they had done. They had given it on a conditional lease to the city of Ottawa—on condition of making certain improvements which necessitated the expenditure of $15,000, and the Government retained the right to resume the property any time they liked. He did not think it was in the public interest that Major's Hill should be sold or divided into town lots. It was close to the Public Buildings, and he considered that it was necessary for their safety that it should not be built up.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said a large number of people were interested in this property, and he thought he was entitled to an answer.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was utterly impossible for him to give any other answer than that he had already given. They had no plan with regard to the sale of the property to make public.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER held that the Government had no right to dispose of public property without the consent of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think the hon. member for Cumberland was serious in his statement that the Government had not the power they claimed in this relation. These acts were Executive acts, with which the Administration was entrusted by Parliament, to which they were responsible. The charge was very grave; and he proposed that the hon. gentleman would at some proper time formulate it, and give the House occasion to ascertain whether he could sustain it by argument and not by mere assertion.

The late Administration had, in an instance which related to the city of London, acted in a manner similar to the present Government, showing that their views in this regard were the same; he had no doubt that other such instances existed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER replied that with reference to Major's Hill, the Government had abused its power, having absolutely disposed of an extensive area of public property which would have brought a great sum of money, if sold in the ordinary way, for the whole people of this country to whom it belonged. Five miles of railway had been given away; and had the hon. gentleman who sat along side the Minister of Justice power to do this?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I do not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Then the hon. gentleman had shut his eyes at it, for the Minister of Public Works by his own hand, without the consent of Parliament, had made a contract giving away five miles of railway, and had passed an Order in Council, without any reference to Parliament and without having a single line stating that his action was subject to the approval of Parliament. What was more, the Administration had no power to touch one dollar of the people's money without authority to give it away. The Government had also bound itself to relay five miles of railway.

An Hon. Gentleman—With steel rails.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Not until they were laid were they so—having been stolen. I suppose that then they were "steal" rails.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The hon. gentleman's illustrations are like all his illustrations, and his points are like all his points.

The item was passed.

Item 73, providing for the expenditure of $10,000 for ordnance and equipment of field batteries of artillery, being taken up,

Mr. MASSON enquired whether arms would be given to a battery formed in Gaspé, which had been lacking in this respect for a couple of years. The artillery force of this country should be properly and generously supplied in this and all relations.

Hon. Mr. VAIL admitted that this was an important branch of the service, but it was impossible to spend any money in this regard, outside of the two central points of Quebec and Kingston.

Mr. MASSON—Will the battery at Gaspé then be disbanded?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Attention will be given to the matter another year.

The item was passed.

Item No. 74, providing $110,000 for the maintenance and equipment of "A" and "B" Batteries, Garrison Artillery and School of Gunnery, Kingston and Quebec, was passed.

On item No. 75, providing $10,000 for Military Schools in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick,

Mr. MASSON asked why there were not Military Schools in the other Provinces?

Hon. Mr. VAIL said that Ontario and Quebec had Schools of Gunnery, and it was thought the Lower Provinces were entitled to Infantry Schools.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked whether the Government was aware that persons had come from the United States, passed through these schools, received their training and money, and returned to that country.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—I have never previously heard of such a thing.

The item was passed.

On item No. 77, providing for $30,000 for the pay and maintenance of Dominion force in Manitoba,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that in view of the condition of affairs in Manitoba it was intended to reduce the force to 50 men.

Mr. MASSON approved of the policy of the Government, not because he thought such a force was necessary, but in consequence of the wretched system which was followed. He had paid a visit to Manitoba, and he affirmed there were men who though they had been two years in this force did not know how to load their rifles. He had drawn the attention of the Premier to the matter last Session and he asserted that the disgraceful facts were within his own knowledge. These men had been employed in cutting wood and drawing water—in fact in doing everything which a soldier should not do.

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that when this was brought under his notice, he had immediately taken action to remedy the state of affairs that existed, and he thought the hon. gentleman would at least give him this much credit.

Mr. SCHULTZ could not but feel that this reduction of the force under the circumstances, was ill advised.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the principle object in giving these men a grant of land was with a view to induce them to settle in the country. If persons who in enlisted the second time were permitted a second grant the object of the Government would be frustrated entirely. The Government had only followed the policy of their predecessors in this matter in refusing the second grant to parties who had enlisted before. The parties by remaining in the country were able to secure this land without performing any service whatever, and it was not very likely that such an offer could be made an inducement for service. He was not aware of any precedent, such as mentioned, having been established; the system in vogue was improper in the public interest, and was not calculated to aid in the settlement of the country.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT denied that any men had enlisted under false pretences.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said this was the usual answer of the Government when they had no excuse for their conduct

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

—they gave a bold and unqualified denial, or else they turned to their predecessors for a precedent.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It is not true as to the men who were re-enlisted.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No ! The hon. gentleman knows that unless it was stated in the advertisement asking for these men, and stipulated that only those who had no qualifications, and only those who had everything to learn.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—I would ask the hon. gentlemen when these men re-enlisted—what Government was in power?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I care not what Government was in power. I am now speaking of the terms under which they were enlisted and of the decision taken by the Administration which denied them.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—That was only a decision on the claims made after their time was up.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I care not what Government made the pledge; if these men were enlisted on the stipulation that those who served two years should receive 160 acres of land and no distinction was drawn between those who had previously served and those asked, but who had never so served, I say that the faith of the Government was pledged to treat all alike.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said these men who claimed an additional grant were men who enlisted under the old Government. He was not in a position to state that this Government re-enlisted any men; but if they did, and these men served out their two years, they would be entitled to the grant of 160 acres of land.

The hon. gentleman could not condemn the Government for acting on an Order in Council passed by the late Government, in refusing to make a second grant to those men who had re-enlisted.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said he had applied to both Governments to obtain grants for persons who had enlisted the second time, and had been refused.

Mr. BOWELL said if a man enlisted for a specified time for certain pay and a certain grant of land when that time expired, he should receive that grant without the Government stopping to enquire whether he had enlisted before, served his time and received a previous grant.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the expectation in sending men up to Manitoba from the different Provinces was that they should remain there and settle on their land and not re-enlist, and in this way send up men from the different Provinces.

Mr. BOWELL said that was not the object of the late Government in specifying that a quota should be enlisted from each Province. At the time the force was established there was great excitement, and if a call for volunteers was made there would have been ten times the number required volunteered from Ontario. Sir George Cartier, in order to give each Province a chance, decided that the force should be made up by a quota from the different Provinces.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the object of the late Government was to send in men to defend the country, and when they were in there and trained in the service, that they should be kept there; but the policy of the present Government was not to re-enlist them when their term expired and have trained soldiers, but to send up unexperienced men from the Provinces.

Hon. Mr. POPE asked if it was correct that a number of men were sent there last year and whether they were entitled to 160 acres?

Hon. Mr. VAIL thought the matter had been discussed enough and that every member understood it.

Hon. Mr. POPE said it appeared that the men who re-enlisted there were punished. It would be better to pay their expenses back again and not to pay the bounty. He could not understand why the men were to be reduced this year. A considerable force was required in that country. The Hon. Minister of the Interior might have to go there to make treaties with the Indians, and what would Prince Edward Island do if that hon. gentleman was massacred there because there was not a sufficient force to protect him. It was injudicious and unwise at this time to take away from that section of the country what was really required not only for the safety of the people, but also of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said the reasons of the Minister of Militia give on this question were a little incongruous—that the best men were not selected to discharge the important duties, but that selections were made from the Provinces. The lines drawn between the Provinces were a mistake; if we intended to become a homogenous people these differences should disappear.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the statement of the Hon. Minister of Militia now was that if a person who had served his time was willing to re-enlist on the spot, they would accept him, but give him nothing but his monthly pay. But if that same individual came down to Halifax, and the Minister of Militia was ready to take him, he would be returned at the public cost and receive another grant of 160 acres of land.

Mr. BUNSTER said he viewed with suspicion all the items connected with the expenditure of this Government, and asked for an explanation of the bonds which the Hon. Finance Minister recently created. He proceeded at some length to criticise the various items in the estimates.

The item was then passed.

At 2:45, Hon. Mr. TUPPER moved that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

This was negatived.—Yeas, 19; nays, 27.

The item passed.

On item $293,657 for Mounted Police, Manitoba,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER objected to the Committee continuing to pass items at such an early hour in the morning. He therefore moved that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

This was negatived.—Yeas, 21; nays, 34.

A debate arose on this item.

Mr. BOWELL asked [what was the cause of the increase of $107,651.50 in this vote?

Hon. Mr. POPE.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE submitted a detailed statement which showed that in consequence of establishing so many posts, additional officers had to be appointed. The cost of transporting forage for the horses was enormous, oats costing 12½ cents delivered at some of the posts.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked why the item should be charged to Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was a clerical error, that it should have been "North-West Territories."

Hon. Mr. TUPPER moved that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again, as this was a very important item that should be thoroughly debated.

After a long debate the item passed. The Committee rose, and the House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes past Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 20, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOWELL (For Mr. Kirkpatrick)—To incorporate the British Canadian Loan and Investment Co.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell)—To amend the Act to incorporate the London and Canada Bank, and the Acts amending the same.

Mr. BROOKS—Respecting loans by the British American Land Company.

THE LIBRARY.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) moved the adoption of the report of the Library Committee. He said the Library was intended as a Library of reference, and the works that were in it should be found there at all times. It was entirely open to the public, and instead of the officials in charge being the persons through whom books were given, visitors who had cards of admission, went to the shelves themselves and took away books without stating what they were, keeping them as long as they wished. The number taken out in one day was 800 volumes, and many of them were brought back in a mutilated, damaged and wretched condition. Some of them were scribbled over and pencil-marked; others had the indication that they belonged to the library cut out of them; illustrated books had their illustrations absolutely removed, and some had disappeared altogether. A more active and efficient supervision was required in the new hall. Instead of the public having access to the books as before, they should be under the control of regular officials. There were other alterations necessary. The library should be divided into three departments, each being under the superintendence of a competent person. Greater care should also be exercised in selecting books, and a Sub-Committee had been appointed, consisting of three members of each House, to assist the Librarian in making selections from time to time. He moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the points at present submitted seemed to be these:—It was recommended that a larger sum should be voted than was placed in the regular estimates, in order to fill certain blanks in the particular branches of History and French literature, as well as to purchase some further legal books, which he presumed were really provided for in the estimates already.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—I suppose they are. We were not quite clear on that point.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE had understood that this was case. He had observed an item of $1,000 inserted for the purpose of procuring a particular class of text books, to be kept in a place separate altogether from the library, for the exclusive use of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—That is to be called the Library of the Judges.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There were three other points—one related to the letting out of books, and to this, he thought, the Library Committee would attend. Then there was the kind of books to be purchased in the future; he had had something to do with the organization of the legislative library at Toronto, and they had decided to exclude all classes of books not directly or indirectly necessary for the purposes of legislation. Works on history were of course necessary in this relation, as well as every sort of book bearing on constitutional law. They included, however, many which did not directly, perhaps, deal with this department of law; but still they were selected in that way, and the rules adopted excluded all light literature. Hon. members during previous years had advocated making the Parliamentary Library similar to the Library of the British Museum, but he thought that this idea might fairly be set aside, as in the first place inadvisable, and secondly, almost impracticable. The number of volumes was at present something like 73,000 or 74,000.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—Eighty thousand or rather more.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE was not quite sure of the capacity of the new Library, but he presumed that the shelving would not accommodate more than three times that number, so that if a general collection were persisted in, a period to it would arrive before many years. The works obtained must consequently be select, and they should be as complete as possible. The report would not, as he read it, force any particular arrangement on the Government, but was intended to simply indicate the views of the House.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON—That is all.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE had discussed the matter to some extent with the Librarian a few months ago, when the latter brought to his attention the existing necessity for having some special assistants to aid him. Of this he was aware, but he had deemed it inexpedient to propose any change until they began to make arrangements for the removal of the books, which would be done probably in July next at the latest. At no distant day he hoped that they would secure assistance of a very high character, as the Librarian and his assistants should be men of great literary attainments. They all knew how very efficient the present Librarian was, and this standard they should in future maintain. The Government was desirous of learning in connection with these matters the views of the House, as by these their action must necessarily be governed.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) thought that at very slight cost great assistance in this respect might be got from persons engaged in special departments of work throughout the Dominion. No doubt the present Librarian gave a great deal of attention to the selection of books, but he could not possibly know of all the new works which come out from time to time. It was perfectly manifest that aid of the kind he had mentioned would be of very great advantage.

The report was adopted.

LIFE INSURANCE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend and consolidate certain Acts respecting Life Insurance.

He explained that this was based on the Act passed last Session, concerning fire and marine insurance companies, when provision was made for their inspection by an officer lately appointed for the purpose, and for a certain deposit being made, which in the case of some of them amounted to \$50,000. The main objects which the Government desired to obtain were of course to provide for the safety of policy holders, as far as was possible, making the companies subject to the inspection of their present official and requiring a certain deposit to be lodged with the Administration. The Act was in the main designed to extend to life insurance companies the provisions on the Statute Book with regard to fire insurance companies. The matters to which most attention would probably be directed were:—the rate of interest on which the valuation of the liabilities should be based—this was proposed to be $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. which was the maximum laid down in the majority of American cities, being moreover considerable in excess of English policies. Schedules would be adopted in the same way as in the case of the fire insurance companies, and these would be varied as the Government might require, from time to time, on the authority of the Minister of Finance; this clause being exactly identical to a similar clause with reference to fire insurance companies. The expenses would be paid in much the same manner by a proportionate levy on the companies. He would not weary the House at present with any considerable number of details having regard to the possible contingency of the insolvency of companies, and mode in which the assets should be distributed; these being chiefly of a legal nature, which would be better discussed in Committee of the Whole, or in the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Their policy was intended to protect policy-holders, and consideration was given as far as possible to existing interests.

The Bill he hoped would be distributed in the course of a day or two, and he would not move the second reading until hon. gentlemen had had a full opportunity of examining it minutely.

Mr. YOUNG (Waterloo) considered the Bill a move in the right direction on the part of the Government. In letters which he had received from companies affected by the Bill, especially Canadian companies, the principle was very favourably spoken of. He was glad to find that the Government would be ready to receive suggestions in regard to the measure. The clause which made the rate at which the assets of the companies should be counted as against their future liabilities, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., was a very important one, and he was pleased to see the Government take this position. He did not think it safe to the persons insuring in the different companies to place the rate higher than $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. It was true the rate of interest was pretty high in the country at the present time; but undoubtedly the accumulation of capital which would take place in the future would considerably reduce the rate of interest. He trusted, with regard to this point, the Government would maintain the position they had taken.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said he did not agree with the hon. gentleman on that point, believing that a great deal more consideration ought to be given to the subject than he thought his hon. friend had given it. There were two parties to be considered in an insurance contract. In England, in the recent Act it was found necessary to introduce on this subject, the rate was placed at 4 per cent., only one per cent. below the legal rate of interest. The legal rate of interest in Canada was 6 per cent., 7 and 8 per cent. being to a greater extent the rule. And he thought it would be perfectly fair if this rate were established at 5 per cent. He was not speaking of the regulations that might be made for the future, he was only speaking of what might be done in reference to companies already existing. It was all very well to place a rule of this kind on the Statute book in reference to companies that did not exist, but when they had to deal with companies already in existence they should take into consideration the contracts that had been entered into by both parties. Insurance companies in making their calculations on the rate of premiums took the rate of interest into consideration equally with the rate of mortality. Now, if the Government suddenly altered the rate of interest from 5 per cent., as it was at present, to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., without enabling the company to increase the price of their premium they would make a one-sided agreement. They would give to the parties who entered into the contract a benefit they did not contract for, and the other parties a liability they never agreed to enter into. There ought to be a certain time given to enable existing companies to gradually bring themselves within the scope of this Act, so that there would be no such pressure on them as they would experience if the loan were changed suddenly. He considered that ten years would be a fair time. To suddenly change this system as was proposed would not be perfectly fair, and the accuracy of the proposition must commend itself to the fairness, the common sense and common reason of every member of the House.

Mr. WORKMAN entirely agreed with the remarks that had fallen from the hon. member for Cardwell. He conceived that the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

was too small, as seven and eight per cent. was the rate of interest that could be obtained on safe investments. That morning he had been offered a good mortgage at eight per cent. with a large margin. He thought $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in a market like that of Canada was too low, and he hoped the five per cent. rate would be embodied in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said his experience with regard to the highest class of investments did not agree with that of his hon. friend. He would say to his hon. friend from Cardwell that this was a point of importance. He understood his hon. friend as not objecting to the general principle laid down, but as asking for an exception for the existing companies for a certain period of time. And if he would draw up an amendment in the sense he proposed and submit it to him (Mr. Cartwright) it would be given due consideration.

Mr. PALMER considered this question was of great importance to the public, and was glad that a measure had been introduced on the subject. He desired to see the suggestion of the present Finance Minister carried into effect, namely, putting the inspection and regulation of insurance into the hands of the Government, being satisfied that it was in the interest of the public that this should be done.

Mr. YOUNG said the rate for valuation in the United States was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and in Massachusetts it was 4 per cent. The hon. member for Montreal West remarked that mortgages paid eight per cent., but such a rate would not do for a life insurance company with policies running for so many years. The best basis was the rate obtained for our own securities. He (Mr. Young) thought $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was as high a rate as we ought properly to adopt. At the same time he quite agreed with what the hon. member for Cardwell said—it might be inconvenient for some companies to adopt that rate at once.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked at what time and in what way the Government intended to bring matters connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway before the House?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had laid papers before the House giving very full information, indeed, on the subject, and the debate could take place on the vote for the Pacific Railway.

After some further discussion the matter was dropped.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

Bill incorporating the Canadian Fire and Marine Insurance Company was agreed to in Committee of the Whole (Mr. Blain in the chair), read the third time and passed.

Bill to confirm the amalgamation of the City Bank and the Royal Canadian Bank, and to incorporate the Consolidated Bank of Canada, was read the second time.

QUESTIONS BY MEMBERS—A. BRANCHARD.

Mr. ROBILLARD—Whether Athanase Branchard, Esquire, advocate, of Montreal, has ever paid into the hands of the Receiver General a sum of $619.68, which the said A. Branchard received from the Sheriff of Beauharnois, on the 4th January, 1868, being the amount for which Her Majesty was collocated in a case numbered 269, in the Superior Court, Beauharnois, in which the Right Honorable Edward Ellice was Prosecutor, and W. A. Noel, Duguay et al. defendants, under a power of attorney to him, dated 1st July, 1867; what steps have been taken to compel the said Branchard to reimburse the said sum; and if the said sum has not yet been reimbursed, what is the reason of the delay?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—There is no record in the office of the Receiver General of any such sum having been paid, or in my department of proceedings having been taken with reference to it. The hon. member has not stated out of what claim this matter arose, and therefore it is not possible to make further enquiry; but if time and other information is given, further searches will be made.

THE SEIGNORIAL CLAIMS.

Mr. CARON—Whether the Government have wholly paid off the indem-

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

nity to the Seigniors of the Province of Quebec; and in case the whole has not been paid, whether the balance is to be paid so soon as the claims of the Seigniors have been approved; finally, whether the Government intend paying tutors unconditionally?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that claims in the aggregate amounting to $2,618,755 had been paid, or settled to date; the balance of the original capital remaining in the hands of the Government was something under half a million. Of this a very considerable part, owing to entails, could not be paid for years to come; a good number of claimants had not as yet made application, and the rule in all cases was that as soon as the title was proven, payment was made as rapidly as possible. Hitherto no additional payments had been made to tutors, but it was under the consideration of the Department whether this was possible.

COUNTRY POSTMASTERS' SALARIES.

Mr. HORTON enquired whether the Government have based the commission to country postmasters on the basis of their receipts for 1874-5, and if not, why not?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON stated in reply that the salaries for 1875 had been so fixed in all cases but one, where full accounts had been rendered; where these had been partial, the returns for 1874 had been used.

BANK STATEMENTS.

Mr. YOUNG asked whether the Government have considered and intend to propose any more stringent measures for the inspection of the monthly statements of our Chartered Banks published in the Official Gazette?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I may say that we have not yet considered any such measures; but the making of a false statement is a misdemeanor, or at any rate a crime in itself.

THE VETERANS OF 1812-15.

Mr. BROUSE—Among the applicants for pensions for services in the war of 1812 and 1815, how many already were in possession of a pension either by the British or Canadian Governments; also on what basis has a pension been denied our veterans who were in receipt of one for injuries received during the Canadian rebellion of 1837 and 1838?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—Eighteen persons already in the receipt of pensions asked to be allowed to participate in the $50,000 grant; four received them from the British and fourteen from the Canadian Government. We have followed the practice of the Imperial Government, which I understand is not to grant a second pension to any person.

THE ORDERS OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—If the right hon. member for Kingston is here on Wednesday, we should consider the adoption of the report sent in by the Select Committee regarding the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—He is on the way now.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then I give notice that it will be taken up on Wednesday when the motions are called.

THE NORTH-WEST COUNCIL.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved, seconded by Mr. Wright, that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying for copies of all acts passed by the North-West Council, and copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Lieut-Governor of the North-West Territories relative to any matters engaging the attention of the said Council. Mr. Schultz, said that he would have moved this Address without any reference to the Council whose functions were about to be supplanted by the new order of things, were it not that his attention was directed to the matter by an editorial in the Toronto Globe of the 25th February, a portion of which he would take the liberty of reading:—

"Heretofore the North-West Territory east and west of Manitoba has been governed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and a species of half advisory, half legislative, Council of gentlemen chosen from among the residents in Winnipeg and its vicinity. They are themselves not slow to admit that their constitution is a farce, and it requires no effort of imagination in those even who have never been in the North-West to understand the impossibility of merchants and others in Winnipeg acting as a Legislature for the settlements on the Saskatchewan, and nearly a thousand miles away in the neighbourhood of the Rocky Mountains

"At one of the last sittings of this Winnipeg Council, of which the former editor of the Nouveau Monde is a prominent member, it was proposed to incorporate the clergy of the missionary dioceses of the North-West with land-holding powers. The object of this was so apparent to those in Winnipeg, who have seen the effect of the system there, that it was strenuously opposed by some of the English members, but in spite of their efforts it was carried, and would have come to Ottawa with such force as this nondescript Council have been able to give to their legislation had not Lieutenant-Governor Morris refused to assent to the Bill."

Here was the utterance of a leading organ as to the value of this Council now about to cease to exist. There was a reference to certain Bills which were brought before the Council to incorporate religious bodies in the North-West, and where it was assumed that the Council had passed these; and they were only prevented from becoming law by the action of the Lieutenant-Governor who exercised his power to stop them. This statement he (Mr. Schultz) must characterize as utterly without foundation. It was true that such Bills were before the Council, but when the promoter of them found that the sense of the Council was against them, he withdrew, and it did not need the power of the Lieutenant-Governor to prevent any ill-considered and rash action of the Council itself. Of course it must always be a matter of opinion as to whether the services of this Council were valuable or not, but we have a more authoritative utterance than the last, which hon. gentlemen will find in the last report of the Minister of the Interior, who says:—
"It is due to that Council to record the fact that their legislation and valuable practical suggestions submitted to Your Excellency from time to time through their official head, Lieut.-Governor Morris, aided the Government not a little in the good work of laying the foundations of law and order in the North-West, in securing the good will of the Indian tribes, and in establishing the prestige of the Dominion Government throughout the vast territory."

Here is the estimate which the Hon. Minister specially charged with the care of North-West matters place upon the services of this Council. He (Mr. Schultz) being a member of this Council did not care to say much of its merits or otherwise, and would leave it for time to determine whether a body of men, many of whom if they did not now live in the North-West yet had the practical experience of years in connection with it, were not as to be of service as any Council to be appointed under the new system, and he trusted that the new Council would give that consideration to the suggestions and recommendations of the old which he felt their importance demanded. Among the papers which he hoped to have brought down by this motion, would be found valuable suggestions as to the preservation of the buffalo. He (Mr. Schultz) would urge the importance of this matter on the Government. So long as the buffalo were numerous there was little danger of difficulty with the Plain tribes of Indians with whom we were now being brought into contact. When these were extinct we must expect to deal with a race of paupers rendered dangerous by want of food. The Rev. Father Lascombe, a high authority of all such matters, believes in common with many others that if the present rate of destruction goes on the race of buffalo will be extinct in ten years. It is true that since the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad and the establishment of military and other settlements in the Missouri, Father Lascombe estimates the number killed yearly during the winter at 80,000, and about the same number in summer. Their present feeding ground comprises a length of, say six hundred miles by about one hundred and fifty, and is bounded on the west by the Rocky Mountains, on the east by the Qu'Appelle Lakes, on the south by the Missouri and the north by the north branch of the Saskatchewan, and this limit is ever decreasing by the destruction caused by the hunters of the Saskatchewan on the north, those from the Missouri on the south and the Red River hunters on the east to an extent and rapidity so alarming that it is estimated by the Rev. Father and others that in ten years they will be extinct. Such a result is not at all improbable, since it is only a few years since the buffalo ranged east of the Red River, and since the last of the wood buffalo, an animal of the same species, but larger size, which ranged between the Saskatchewan and the Slave Lakes, was killed and the whole of the race is extinct. The use of the revolving pistol and the repeating rifle instead of the ordinary loading gun has helped to bring this about, aided by the destruction caused by wolves, sickness, accidents of various sorts and the wasteful destruction of the buffalo pound. Unfortunately, too, it is the robe of the female buffalo which is the most valuable, and when killed for it she is always with calf. It is her flesh which makes the best meat, and being more easily hunted down than the bulls, it has caused a destruction which has resulted in many of the bands met with last summer being composed of a proportion of six or seven males to one female. The district where buffalo are found has narrowed with startling rapidity during the last ten years, buffalo having about that time been seen by him (Mr. Schultz) east of Red River. These facts point strongly to the necessity of preventive measures, and the facts spoken of are so well known to the Indians and half-breeds that they are anxious the Government should take action in the matter if it were not for the fact that it would be impossible to prevent the killing of cows. At the same time there would be no objection to the killing of buffalo bulls at any season of the year, but since this is impossible a stringent law is demanded which will practically leave these animals undisturbed from the 1st November to 1st May, and an enactment to prevent the killing of calves at any season. If such a law were passed it is believed that in five years the buffalo would have so increased that these restrictions might be removed. He (Mr. Schultz) hoped that this matter would receive the consideration at the hands of the Government which its importance demanded, and that the papers bearing on this matter would be printed for the general information they would afford.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter to which the hon member had particularly alluded—the preservation of the buffalo in the Western prairies—had occupied a large share of the attention of the Government for a considerable time.

SANITARY STATISTICS.

Mr. BROUSE moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the expediency of asking legislation, with a view to constitute a bureau of sanitary statistics in connection with one of the public departments. He said he had brought this matter up two years ago, when some doubt was expressed as to whether it was within the jurisdiction of this Parliament or of the Local Legislatures. The interest manifested in sanitary science was increased day by day, and he desired to ask that a bureau of sanitary science should be connected with one of the departments of Ottawa, where information on such matters could be received, tabulated and sent throughout the Dominion educating people to protect their lives. In Massachusetts, every year at the opening of the Legislature a Committee is appointed on the question of sanitary science. The death rate, in consequence of the action of the Legislature, had been reduced fifteen per cent. during the last few years. In Michigan, ten years ago, similar legislation was had with equally good results, the reduction in the death rate during the decade being about sixteen per cent. In Minnesota, Colorado and other States, steps were being taken in the same direction. During the last Session of the Georgia Legislature a Board of Health was established for the State. The population of Georgia is about the same as that of Michigan—a little over a million inhabitants. The gentleman appointed to take charge of health matters in Georgia wrote for information to Dr. Baker, who occupied a similar position in Michigan. The latter in his report just published in the newspapers says:—"If the death rate in Georgia in the last census of the year 1870 had been that of Michigan at the same time, the number of deaths would have been 11,130 instead of 13,606 as reported,

"an addition of 2,476 deaths." It was estimated and ascertained that for every single individual case of death there are about twenty cases of severe sickness, and, therefore, the 2,476 deaths represent 49,520 cases of severe sickness. It is estimated the expense of each case of sickness is about $40 for the physician, medicine, time and nursing. That would give some $1,980,800, which added to the cost of burial gives $2,030,320 in a single year as the loss to the State of Georgia for want of proper sanitary legislation. The report goes on to say that "the State should inaugurate a measure that would result in the saving of millions of dollars in money, and preventing deaths and sickness involving an incalculable amount of human suffering." The desire to legislate on this subject in the United States is increasing. At an important meeting recently held in Philadelphia, attended by statesmen and men of education, it was unanimously resolved to ask Congress to establish, not a bureau, but a department of health at Washington. In France the result of sanitary legislation was as follows:—In 1842 the death rate was one in 36; after the board of health had taken action, and the people had been educated in hygiene, in 1862 the death rate had fallen to one in 39, and in the decade from 1862 to 1872, to one in 47, a decrease in thirty years of nearly 33 per cent. Supposing France had a population of 36,000,000 the deaths in 1842 would have been 1,000,000, but in 1872 only 766,000, showing a saving of 234,000 lives in a single year.

Austria and Russia have taken action in this direction, and while Prussia has no truly Provincial Boards of Health, she is establishing a central bureau for the Empire. The object of the motion now before the House was not to discourage local boards but to encourage them. England has legislated in this direction by passing no less than forty health measures in the last thirty or forty years. Dr. Latham, in his admirable treatise, mentions the results of sanitary arrangements in twelve towns, to five of which he would refer:—In Cardiff, the death rate before legislation was 32 $\frac{2}{10}$ per 1,000; after legislation, 22 per 1,000; saving of life, 32 per cent.; decrease in typhoid fever, 40 per cent.; decrease in consumption, 17 per cent. In Croydon, death rate before legislation, 23 per 1,000; after legislation, 18 per 1,000; saving of life, 22 per cent.; decrease of typhoid fever, 63 per cent.; decrease of consumption, 17 per cent. In Merthyr, before legislation, death rate per thousand, 33; after legislation, 26; saving of life, 18 per cent.; decrease of typhoid fever, 60 per cent.; decrease of consumption, 11 per cent. In Newport the death rate before legislation was 31 per 1000 and was reduced to 21 after legislation, showing a saving of life of 32 per cent.; the saving on typhoid fever was 36 per cent. and on consumption 32 per cent. In Salisbury the death rate previous to sanitary legislation was 27 per 1000; after legislation it was reduced to 21, a saving of human life of 20 per cent., of 75 per cent. on typhoid fever, and 49 per cent. in the death rate from consumption. Doctor Buchanan reported that the result of sanitary legislation in England, in 25 cities and towns under his care, was the reduction of the death rate in some to 20 per cent. and others to 33 per cent., being a reduction of one-half. He begged to instance some other cities:—Liverpool, before sanitary legislation, was 38 $\frac{1}{2}$ per thousand per year, and after sanitary legislation it was reduced to 26 per thousand per year, or a saving of life of nearly 33 per cent. In the city of London the death rate was 40 per cent. before legislation and 20 per cent. since. Since the sanitary legislation had been put into effect in England there had been a reduction of the mortality from consumption of 49 to 10 per cent. Professor Grey, who was appointed one of a commission to investigate this question, when said he returned after making the enquiry wrote:—“I am fully impressed that throughout England and Wales, that of the 36,000 deaths from consumption which take place yearly, 5,000 could be prevented.” This disease prevailed to a considerable extent in the Dominion of Canada and it was of importance that nothing that would tend to decrease the number of deaths from that cause should be forgotten.

Mr. BROUSE.

England had also taken a lively interest in the sanitary condition of her colonies. In Calcutta the deaths had been reduced 50 per cent. by sanitary legislation. England throughout her Eastern Dominions required the most stringent observance of sanitary rules by her army of 70,000 regulars and 130 000 native-soldiers.

He would next turn to the Dominion, and take first the City of Montreal. The statistics were not perfect, but it was shown that the death rate in Montreal was 38, and he was prepared to think that it exceeded 40 per cent. Montreal was most favourably situated, but notwithstanding this fact its death rate was 20 per cent greater than that of the crowded City of London. The city of Toronto was located in a healthy and beautiful position, yet its death rate was over 38 per 1,000. It was in the power of the House to change that enormous death rate, and it was, perhaps, most important legislation which it was now possible that hon. body could pass. There were three considerations involved in the question before the House. They had life, health and money. With regard to the first, Dr. Liman said in his valuable life report, “that one-third of the deaths in England could be prevented.” There was a population of 4,000,000 in Canada, and taking the death rate as 30 in 1,000 there would be 120,000 deaths, one-third of which, 40,000, would be preventable deaths. He was willing to take 15,000 as the number of preventable deaths, and he was satisfied that that estimate could not be questioned. They were very anxious to attract emigration to our Canadian shores and spent a good deal for that purpose; but they had a preventable death rate greater than the entire emigration remaining in Canada. When so much money was spent in attracting strangers to Canada, should they not be as anxious to protect the lives of those near and dear to them, and be equally ready to enter upon a similar expenditure for that purpose? With regard to the second point, health, it had been shown that for every death there were 20 cases of severe sickness. That gave, with 15,000 deaths, 300,000 severe cases of sickness which might have been avoided if sanitary measures had been properly understood and carried into effect in the Dominion. Each death, according to English statistics, implied an average of 20 days of sickness, which, taking the number of preventable deaths in the Dominion as 15,000, gave 11,000,000 days of preventable sickness. The returns published in Europe showed about 8 days' sickness yearly to each individual, one-third of which were preventable. That would be 6 days to each person, but taking as the lowest estimate, 3 days, that would give 12,000,000 days of sickness that could be prevented. The two methods came within a fraction of each other. Now, there was also a money consideration in this matter. It had been shown that the average cost of each case of sickness was $40, and they had 15,000 preventable deaths in this country. Twenty seven cases of sickness to each death gave 300,000 severe cases of sickness, which at $10 each would give the sum of $12,000,000 expended yearly, which might be prevented if proper sanitary precautions were taken. Again, it was allowed that funerals cost generally $20 each. That would give another preventable expenditure of $6,000,000. It had been estimated that each individual life was worth $50 per year, making the value of each adult life to be $1,000. The total loss to the Dominion by these preventable death was $750,000. There was also a large amount of suffering which could have been prevented; and crime being the result of poverty, which was bread bysickness, it was necessary to take these circumstances into consideration in order to come at a proper estimate of the value of health. He knew that it was a difficult matter to approach the Government on these questions. The loss of an individual was simply regarded as such, and he appealed to the House and Government to take this matter into serious consideration, and to legislate for the general good of the country. He knew that some would say that it should be left to the physician; but this he denied. It was not his duty to prevent, but to heal diseases, sacrificing at times his health and life for the benefit of his fellow-creatures; but it was the duty of the statesman and philanthropist to initiate sanitary measures in this relation. It could not be said that our climate was not favourable to longevity, for the Blue Book just placed in his hands had convinced him, as he thought it would every hon. member, that no country in the world occupied a better position in this respect. The returns showed that 3,000 veterans over 78 years of age were now living, though at the time of the war of 1812, the population of Ontario only numbered 82,000; and this circumstance could not be paralleled.

He did not wish to prevent Local Governments from taking action as well; but with this he did not think that a bureau of sanitary science would interfere. They simply asked for some central point, where they might receive all information relating to diseases peculiar to our climate and soil, and everything in this regard concerning the children on the streets, the artisans in their workshops, the thieves in their prisons, the insane in their asylums, &c. The Government should legislate if possible to protect the health of the people, and preserve human life.

He did not propose that the Committee should have power to send for persons, or to incur any great expense. He believed that a bureau could be established with scarcely any additional expense in connection with the Department of Agriculture, or some other Department. He moved that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the expediency of asking legislation with a view to constitute a bureau of sanitary statistics in connection with one of the public departments; the Committee to be composed of the Hon. Messrs. Holton and Robitaille, and Messrs. Scatcherd, Blain, Dymond, Flynn, Young, Burpee (Sunbury) Kerr, Landerkin, Forbes, Christie, Fiset and the mover.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE had listened, as he was sure every hon. member had done, with the greatest interest to the speech of his hon. friend. At the same time he was bound to say at once that the object the hon. gentleman desired to accomplish, and which would be so greatly in the interests of the country, affected local far more than federal legislation. The hon. gentleman had himself, in his elaborate argument, pointed this out when he referred to American legislation on the part of the States of the American Union in this relation. Our powers were similarly limited.

It would not be denied that the chief cause of bad health in our towns and cities was the want of proper drainage and of pure water. His hon. friend had cited Montreal as one of the very worst examples of an unhealthy city, in the Dominion at least, and if his statement was correct—and this he had no reason to doubt—its mortality was more than, or at least double that of the City of London. It was also known that the drainage of Montreal was exceedingly defective, and that the water used there was not as good as it ought to be. The water of the Ottawa River was probably as pure as that supplied to most cities; but a very large portion of Montreal was besides supplied from wells. They knew that in Ottawa, until the water was brought into it from the river, typhoid fever was exceedingly prevalent, and he had been informed by physicians that since this event this form of disease had almost disappeared. He had no doubt that if Montreal was properly drained the health of its people would be immensely improved. He was under the impression that the mortality of London (England) had decreased from 28 to 29 per 1,000 to about from 19 to 20 per 1,000 since the perfection of its drainage and sewerage system. This House had no power to make regulations for the drainage of cities and towns, as this rested exclusively within the province of the Local Legislatures.

On the clearing away of the heavy timber—which had covered it for ages—from a large portion of the flat lands in Ontario, a great deal of ague, and what were termed lake diseases, had been produced, and the Local Legislatures had appropriated a large sum of money to be loaned to the occupants of such properties, the drainage of which had caused the disappearance of these diseases, while making the lands more productive. Many towns in Canada had been built in places unsuitable for obtaining a supply of good water, and buildings were frequently erected without reference to the great necessities of ensuring health and cleanliness; the result was that certain diseases prevailed to a great extent in such localities.

It was tolerably well admitted—though a small class might deny it—that vaccination would prevent the spread of small-pox; but this Parliament could not deal with this matter or anything of the kind; and so with other sanitary measures. It was in their power and their duty to establish a quarantine at our sea ports, to prevent the introduction of infectious diseases from vessels coming from foreign ports, but so far as he was aware, to this their power was limited. Mr. Speaker had previously called attention to the prevalence of a most painful disease, leprosy—not common fortunately in this country—in the Province of New Brunswick, but still they could take no action in this regard, though they might in such cases vote a sum of money in aid of the local authorities.

Fruitful causes of disease were—the want of proper ventilation and light in our dwellings; and in many of our towns, the hastily and ill-constructed houses might be called breathing places for consumption and lung affections and the excessive use of stimulating liquors—the vilest of all being perhaps common whiskey made from the very worst corn, adulterated often afterwards with more unwholesome ingredients by the retailer. An officer should be appointed to declare buildings unfit for habitation when necessary; and as to liquors, it was held by some that we had power to prohibit their sale and manufacture altogether. There was no question, that the importation should be forbidden, but as to manufacture and sale, it was different. all these.

His hon. friend could scarcely hope to accomplish anything by this motion farther than to elicit discussion and lay his own views before the public, and in this he had succeeded. The form of the motion was also objectionable, proposing the establishment of a department—a proposition which should originate with the Government; but he would not take advantage of a technicality in this regard. These matters had not, however, escaped the attention of the Government, as they had some relation to the question of vital statistics; the extreme value to the country of such a system was undoubtedly making us acquainted with the localities where certain diseases prevailed above all others. This question was one of the most important that could engage the very anxious attention of any Government, and they intended, he might add, to promote the object which the hon. gentleman had in view, by every means within their power. He hoped that his hon. friend would not press his notion.

The hour being six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WORKMAN resumed the debate. He said the mortality in Montreal was not so great as it appeared to be, in proportion to the population. The limits of that city are the same now as they were 90 years ago, when the population was only some 9,000. The present population is 150,000, and there are between 35,000 and 40,000 outside the limits in the suburbs, where there are very few hospitals or charitable institutions. The consequence is the sick and destitute are brought into the city where they are cared for. There is in Montreal among its many excellent charitable institutions, an asylum under the management of the Grey Nuns, for unfortunate children born out of wedlock, and also some born really in wedlock. He would not venture to state the number of such children brought there, but it was very large, and they not only came from the suburbs, but from neighbouring towns and even from Ottawa City. They arrived, many of them, in a dying state, diseased and suffering from the effects of exposure. Though every care was taken of them by the good Sisters, the rate of mortality was 19 to 20 per week, and this helped to swell the mortality of Montreal, and to give the public the idea that the city was unhealthy.

He maintained that the water supply of Montreal was as pure as any in the world, and he had visited many portions of Europe and America. It was obtained from the St. Lawrence, about seven miles above the city, where the current ran at about the rate of six miles per hour. During ten months, it consisted of Ottawa, and during two months—February and March, when the Ottawa River was extremely low—of St. Lawrence water; and he had never heard that the health of the city at all varied during the year in this respect. The supply was most abundant and general; and the diseases prevailing there could not be laid to its deficiency or its unhealthiness. Wells were entirely unknown in the city or the suburbs, as far as he knew; small-pox was, it was true, epidemic in certain parts, particularly in St. Louis and St. James' Wards, owing to a most unreasonable and unjust prejudice against vaccination. But he hoped that this would be soon overcome by aid of the common sense of the people. The mortality was most largely confined to children under three or certainly under four years of age; and during July and August, this was really appalling, chiefly through diarrhoea, and dysentery; but the adult population was as healthy as in any town on this continent. He might mention for instance that his own mother lived to the age of 102 and 22 days. The death rate was not so great as appeared. The matter in question was one of most vital importance; and he trusted that regarding it the Government would take action. In Great Britain, France, Belgium, Austria, and Hungary such a bureau existed, and the vital statistics collected were studied with the greatest interest and care. The health of the German people was also promoted by their Government by every means within its power. In Munich, Bavaria, an apparatus was provided for enabling persons, who after interment might regain consciousness, to give an alarm; and, therefore, he thought that they should do something at least for the living. He trusted that at a future Session this subject would receive from the Government the consideration it deserved.

Mr. CHRISTIE approved heartily of his hon. friend's motion, as the question was one of very great importance; for the good which can by this means be effected could be scarcely estimated. In a short time, he hoped that the sanitary condition of our country would be completely revolutionized. Many diseases were preventable; and small-pox, it was well known, could be virtually extinguished with proper sanitary regulations. In parts of Great Britain and the United States, the death-rate was only from 12 to 13 per thousand; in other places it was 30, and in Montreal 40.

Mr. WORKMAN—It is 39 in Montreal.

Mr. CHRISTIE had seen in the Canada Medical Gazette that it was from 40 to 50 per thousand. This question was important from a monetary point of view, as sickness caused loss of time, unusual expenditure, &c., and he believed that important as the system of immigration was, a greater number of lives were sacrificed in Canada through preventable diseases annually than there were immigrants brought into the Dominion during that period.

Mr. BLAIN said in case of an epidemic it would be well that this Parliament should have power to meet the exigency. He therefore felt it his duty to support the hon. gentleman's motion.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he felt it was a matter of regret that the subject of the public health had not been under the purview of the federal power. The hon. member for Grenville had shown by a very moderate calculation something like $15,000,000 a year might be saved to the wealth of the country. Suppose the saving were placed at half that, a small portion of it would pay for the attention to be devoted to this question, and the advantage would be great in rendering it more attractive as a country to reside in. From the lowest point of view—the financial—the question assumed a gigantic character. It was not exaggerated in any degree by the hon. member for Grenville. There was but one opinion on that point, and the only question was how far this Parliament had power to deal with the matter. He hoped the Committee would be granted, and that steps would be taken—and the Dominion Government had power to do so—to collect a mass of sanitary statistics which would be of incalculable benefit to the public. Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Government would consent to having the motion so amended as to bring it within the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the motion could be so amended and would be approved of.

Mr. LANDERKIN said this was a question which had occupied the attention of most civilized nations with the most satisfactory results. At present the sanitary arrangements of this country were very defective. He recollected that an epidemic of small-pox broke out in the place where he resided, and the municipal council were unable to appoint a board of health until a proclamation was issued. The epidemic made headway and many lives were lost before the board of health was organized. Municipal Councils should have more power to deal with such matters. The Local Governments had boards of agriculture and there was a Dominion Department of Agriculture. He did not see, therefore, why this parliament could not establish a bureau of sanitary science. He trusted the Government would consent to the formation of this Committee.

Mr. DYMOND said it seemed to him the difficulty had been created in the mind of the Premier rather by the speech travelling beyond the record than by the motion itself. Although sanitary reform was undoubtedly a matter of local concern, to collect statistics for the whole Dominion was a work which the federal power alone was competent to deal with. The duty of this Committee would be to indicate the class of information required and the form, perhaps, in which the statistics might be most usefully computed.

Mr. KERR rose to express his thanks on behalf of his constituents for the admirable speech of the hon. member for Grenville. He hoped this Committee would be granted. There must be something radically wrong in this country when the sanitary condition compared so unfavourably with that of the crowded countries of the Old World.

The motion was amended so as to conform with the rules of the House, and adopted.

STEAM FIRE-ENGINES.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for an order of the House for a return of all the steam fire-engines imported into the Dominion of Canada from foreign countries; the class of such engines; the country or countries from which they were imported; the price at which each such engine was entered for duty; by whom so entered; and the amount of duties so paid upon each engine respectively.

He explained that manufacturers of steam engines in Canada considered that they were exposed to unfair competition from foreigners, through the importation of engines for trial, which were sold, though the duty was never paid. The Hon. Premier had assured him that no duty had been refunded in any case, but he was sure that what he said was correct. Our manufacturers in consequence felt justly aggrieved, they themselves being obliged to pay on articles they used $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties. He trusted that no objection would be raised to the bringing down of the returns.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that there was no objection. They could, however, not be prepared probably for some time, as he did not think that steam were separated from other fire-engines in the ordinary returns. In the absence of the Minister of Customs he could not speak with certainty, but was strongly under the impression that no engines had been allowed to enter free; as to being entered in bond he could not say but this might be the case in exceptional instances.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought that a mistaken impression prevailed throughout the country, as constant application had been made to the late Government for the importation of these engines free of duty.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They were free at one time.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—It probably arose from that. He thought, however, that the law was in every instance observed. Engines might have been allowed to enter in bond for experiments, but he was satisfied that they had not been permitted to be retained without the payment of duty.

The motion was carried.

THE CHARLEVOIX ELECTION.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN moved :—

“ That the Honourable Hecter Louis Langevin, the member representing the electoral district of Charlevoix in this House, having stated from his place in this House that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish by satisfactory evidence that the Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon, the member representing in this House the electoral district of Quebec Centre, and the President of the Privy Council of Canada, was instrumental in hiring, or causing to be hired, a number of men who are employed in summer as members of the River Police at Quebec, and in sending them or causing them to be sent to the electoral district of Charlevoix during the recent election of a member to represent that district in the House of Commons; and that the said men were headed or accompanied by one Edmond Trudelle, an officer or employé of the Customs Department at Quebec, and that the whole or a large portion of said body of men were conveyed to said district in vehicles, the cost of such hire being charged to the said Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon, who has promised to pay, or directed or caused the same to be paid, the said men so headed or accompanied being sent to said electoral district to interfere illegally in said election to disturb said election, and thus to deprive the electors or a portion of the electors of said district of their freedom as such electors; and the said Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon having denied these charges; it is ordered that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections do enquire into all the circumstances connected with the above charges, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and with instructions to report in full the evidence taken before them, and the proceedings of said Committee on this subject.”

He explained that on the 20th or 21st of last February, he had made a motion to the effect that copies of instructions given to an officer of the Customs Department at Quebec should be laid before Parliament; and a statement with regard to the conduct of that person, and the men sent under his charge to the county he had the honour to represent. While doing so, the President of the Council thought proper to deny its correctness; he thereupon repeated it, and the denial was repeated; and also a third time. Accordingly, he asked for a Committee in order that he might prove his charge to the satisfaction of the House. He had not put the notice on the paper for a few days, in the hope that the President of the Council might, after reflection, withdraw what he had said in the heat of the debate; the notice had been on the paper for over three weeks, and though he was told that he might take the matter up out of its order, as a question of privilege, he had not done so for this reason: he had no feeling against the President of the Council, and when he brought the subject before the House, he had not intended to move for a Committee. He wished to afford the President of the Council an opportunity for withdrawing his denial; but in his absence, he felt obliged to make his motion. It would give him great pleasure had the President of the Council acted as he had desired—or if he would do so now—as he did not wish to persecute the hon. gentlemen. He hoped that the motion would be granted, as he would then be ready with the evidence required to establish his accusation.

Mr. FRECHETTE said that having been present at the electoral contest in question he was familiar with the facts referred to in the motion. He was ready to admit that there was a number of men belonging to the Water Police Corps of Quebec present at this election. The question was, had they not a right to be there as private individuals, as well as a great many other persons belonging to different parts of the Province of Quebec?

The question sought to be discussed by this motion was, had these men done anything to restrain the freedom of the electors? The hon. gentleman from Charlevoix said that men were sent down there with the connivance of a Minister of the Crown. This had been denied; but every one knew that if he had done so, he would not have been acting as a Minister of the Crown, but as a private member of a political party taking advantage of legitimate means to protect their interest. Was the hon. member for Charlevoix ready to deny that two years ago the late hon. member for Charlevoix was badly wounded, and left for dead in a pool of blood by a gang of Conservative ruffians? Was the hon. gentleman ready to deny that scenes of violence of a most serious character took place in his own presence at the last election? Was he ready to deny that Mr. Tremblay had a very narrow escape on the 1st of January from the partizans of the hon. member? He considered that the Liberal Committee perfectly justified in taking means to keep peace and protect the life of their candidate. He contended it was not only their right but their duty. Mr. Fréchette then spoke of the scenes of violence which took place at the last local election in his own county, and to the depredations of what he called the Langevin gang in Quebec city. He was proceeding to read extracts from the evidence given before a Committee appointed to enquire into the mode of electioneering adopted by the hon. member for Charlevoix in running for Quebec Centre, when

Mr. MASSON rose to a point of order, holding that the hon. gentleman was out of order in reference to matters connected with other elections.

Mr. SPEAKER sustained the point of order.

Mr. FRECHETTE said he did not think the hon. member for Charlevoix, with his antecedent, had better introduce such charges into the House. He begged to move in amendment to the motion that all the words between "charge and enquire" be struck out, and that the following words be substituted:—"A select Committee be appointed to."

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said there was a marked change in the tone of the hon. member for Charlevoix, who was now willing to drop the matter on certain conditions. He (Mr. Cauchon) held the same position now as he did the other day. He stood by his denial. The hon. member for Charlevoix was the last in this country who should level such charges against members of this House. He had travelled from county to county with this corruption fund, and was at last rejected by public opinion, even in his own county, and had to conceal himself for a long time, not daring to meet the people taking his constitutional walk only by night, because he was afraid to face the public gaze. Yet the hon. member had the audacity to challenge public opinion and attempt to place him (Mr.

Cauchon) in a position in which he (Mr. Langevin) had been so many times himself, though he had been, from considerations of mercy, allowed to escape. The men that went to Charlevoix were not there as policemen. They were perfectly independent. They might have been postmen; but what did they do? They did not interfere with the election. The old member for the county asked for protection when he knew his life was endangered, and when he (Mr. Cauchon) knew his own life was in danger from rowdies who went from meeting to meeting to prevent people from speaking. He had done nothing of which he was ashamed, nothing but befriend his supporter. He had warned his friends not to violate the law or interfere with the freedom of election. It might have been possible that a Custom House Officer was in Charlevoix at the time of the election, but some of the officers of the same department took part in the triumph of the hon. member for Charlevoix, which was actually organized by a Custom House Officer. No attempt was made to punish those officials nor to interfere with the postmasters in Charlevoix, who had not only voted for the Opposition candidate but also worked for him. If the men who went to Charlevoix did nothing to interfere with the freedom of election, there was neither harm, guilt nor crime, and the hon. member would discover by and by he was mistaken in his assertion.

Mr. CARON regretted that personalities had been brought into this discussion. The hon. member for Charlevoix, in moving for the Committee, had done so in such a way that not even the President of the Council himself could have taken offence. The accusation against the latter gentleman was, that he had organized a force of men who, during the season of navigation, were police, but during the winter season had no legal right to act as such. The President of the Council had selected the hon. member for Lévis to defend his case. He would not say that the hon. member for Lévis was a bad lawyer, because he knew him professionally, and as such knew how much he was deserving of respect; but he had a very bad case, and had spoken upon this occasion of everything but that case. The President of the Council complained that his life was endangered; but the only risk he ran in Charlevoix was when he fell into a cellar. The hon. gentleman had referred to his twenty-five years of political glories and brilliant victories, but never mentioned how often he had been brought to the bar of public opinion. No doubt the accusations would be considered untrue, but still the hon. member was accused of having made use of his position as one of the members of a former Government to receive from the hands of contractors and others moneys which he should never have touched. No doubt it was a slander when he was accused, while he was Minister of Public Works, of having received from the hands of his own contractors these amounts, which as a public man he should not have received.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said although such charges were false and therefore did not hurt him, he wished it to be understood that he had not attacked the private character of the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Did not the hon. gentleman say the hon. member for Charlevoix had committed such public crimes as to prevent him taking his constitutional walks by day?

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—I say public opinion was so strong against him that he had to do so, but I defy anyone to say I attacked his private character. This assault on me is unprovoked altogether.

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. member for Lévis was very properly called to order for referring to matters concerning the Local Legislature; the hon. member for Quebec is equally out of order.

Mr. CARON said he was merely speaking of public and political matters; he could remember the cry of indignation which rang from one end of the Province to the other, when the Hon. Leader of the Local House, Mr. Joly, from his seat in Parliament accused the Hon. President of the Council, the member for Montmorency, of receiving illegally and unconstitutionally money from Government as one of the proprietors of the Beauport Asylum.

Mr. SPEAKER Called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. CARON—Said the hon. member for Charlevoix had been accused of organizing a band of bullies to carry the election, but the hon. member for Levis, in making the charge should have mentioned something about the kidnapping of L. E. François.

The hon. gentleman knew that he could be probably elected; but this person suddenly found himself carried away by a number of friends and admirers of the Hon. President of the Council, who no doubt was absolutely ignorant of it. This was possibly one of the slanders to which public men were sometimes exposed; still it simplified motives considerably, and the hon. member was elected unanimously; but after all this was a very simple matter. It could be easily dealt with, and he hoped that it would be treated in such a manner that such a question would never again be brought before the House. The reputation and character of our public men belonged to the country, and it mattered very little, when history was written, whether they belonged to that, or the other, side of the House, for in taking away, or assailing their reputation, deep and lasting injury was inflicted on the country. He trusted that a Committee would be granted, for in this event if the charge was false, the President of the Council could adduce the requisite proof. The hon. gentleman had made charges of the most serious character against some of the most honourable and respected of our public men from time to time, in the columns of his paper, and it seemed to him that he should also be able to receive counter-attacks without showing so much excitement and temper as he had exhibited on the occasion when this accusation was preferred.

No one could doubt that the Water Police, against all the rules of the force, had been organized and sent to Charlevoix in January, and he had heard it then rumoured in Quebec that the President of the Council was a party to the transaction; other charges, which might possibly be termed slanders, were made in the Province of Quebec against the hon. gentleman, and no doubt in this instance he would be able to show that the charge was unfounded.

Mr. PELLETIER was surprised to hear the hon. member for Quebec complain of the use of personalities in the discussion, as the hon. member had himself indulged freely in that direction. He would not, however, follow him in this respect. Having taken an active part in the Charlevoix election, he was acquainted with the facts, and he hoped they would be laid before the House through a Committee, for the hon. member for Charlevoix would then learn more than he desired. If he were allowed to allude to past elections, he could prove many circumstances which would be very disagreeable to the hon. member. Policemen had been sent to Charlevoix County, but the charge that they were dispatched there in order to interfere illegally in the election was totally unfounded and false. It was impossible otherwise to obtain proper protection in the county. In 1874, Mr. Tremblay had been nearly murdered there, and what justice had been obtained? Two men had been arrested, but their trials had always been deferred, and this proved to be a mere farce. He was at St. Paul's Bay with the hon. member who threatened him, and he was obliged to cross the river in order to address the people. The hon. member had come to the meeting with a company he did not care to mention particularly, and refused to enter the house unless they were also admitted; cartridges had afterwards been found concealed on the premises; all this would be proven before the Committee. Not only so, but in every parish of the county, the friends of the hon. member had been warned to be very careful to vote before 11 a. m., indicating that no one would be permitted to approach the polls after that hour. This was the reason why protection was demanded; he would tell the names of the persons who asked for it, before the Committee.

member for Lévis had been properly called to order for referring to a particular election for Quebec Centre. An hon. member had spoken of that election having been carried by acclamation, but he (Mr. Pelletier) could give such an explanation of that matter as would make the hon. gentleman who had been returned blush for shame. He (Mr. Pelletier) could have been elected upon that occasion, as he had been before in Quebec East, but for his desire to see the public peace preserved and the lives of the citizens protected from danger. At that election gangs of bullies and ruffians were organized—by whom was very well known.

Mr. CARON desired to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the hon. gentleman was out of order.

Mr. PELLETIER admitted that he was a little out of order. He thought that the hon. gentleman would regret having brought this matter before the House. The hon. gentleman was the last man who should speak of the organization of gangs of bullies. The Pacific scandal—

Hon. Gentlemen—Order! order!

Mr. PETTETIER—The hon. gentleman had admitted that he had been corrupted in this connection; and also that he had corrupted electors.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I must call your attention, Sir, to the fact that the hon. gentleman has charged an hon. member with the use of money for corrupt purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER—I hope that the hon. gentleman will confine himself to the subject before the House.

Mr. PELLETIER—During the election at Charlevoix the hon. gentleman admitted that he had received $32,000, and spent it during the elections.

Mr. SPEAKER—At Charlevoix?

Mr. PELLETIER—During the Charlevoix election.

Mr. DOMVILLE—He made a "Big Push."

Mr. BLANCHET said that as the matter was going before a Committee, he did not think it would be judicious, wise or fair for any member to give a decision on the question before the Committee had reported upon it. He wished, however, to refer to one or two statements made by the hon. member for Lévis; believing that the hon. member should be the last man to speak of violence and difficulties at elections. The hon. gentleman, referring to the local election at Lévis, had made a statement with regard to the Provincial Police.

Mr. FRECHETTE called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled the point of order to be well taken.

Mr. LAFLAMME considered it more appropriate to have this matter referred to a Special Committee of nine than the regular Committee on Privileges and Elections, because the accusation was not so much in regard to a breach of the privileges of election as a direct charge of corruption against an hon. Minister. He was a total stranger to the facts which had been brought before the House, although he had read most of the charges which had been alleged. They were, in his opinion, a fit subject for enquiry, affecting as they did the official conduct of a Minister of the Crown. This Committee, he was of opinion, ought to go further and enquire into the general interference of past Governments with public officials. He thought if such an investigation were made, it would give rise to such legislation as would prevent the recurrence of such things in the future, and regretted that the Committee to be appointed could not enter into the investigation of past events.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER had no hesitation in saying that every member of the House had a common interest in seeing the Hon. President of the Council exonerated from the charge that had been brought against him, and it was not his intention to say a single word that would in the slightest degree appear to prejudice that question. He was of opinion that the hon. gentleman had been badly advised as to the line he should take on this occasion. It would be very difficult to imagine a graver offence being committed by any gentleman holding the high position of President of the Council. He was greatly astonished to find the hon. gentleman meet the proposal of his hon. friend, the member for Charlevoix, in the way he did, when the offer was made to withdraw the motion if the Hon. President of the Council would. The statement of the hon. mover of the resolution was correct. He thought the hon. gentleman was badly advised in regard to the course he took. With regard to the remarks made in regard to the defeat of the hon. member for Charlevoix on a former occasion, he could not allow them to pass by unbuked. Mr. Gladstone was rejected by the University of Oxford, and subsequently in South Lancashire, after which he had to take refuge in the constituency of Greenwich, which might be termed a Government pocket-borough. Because his hon. friend was compelled to retire for a time was, he to be told by the hon. President of the Council that he occupied a position of which he might not be justly proud? Then there was one gentleman having a most powerful influence on the Reform side that was rejected by the electors, who was now in Parliament in the Upper House by virtue of the power of the Crown. Such a reference as had been made to his hon. friend was ungenerous. He was a little surprised at the amendment which had been moved. It would have been better in the interests of the President of the Council if he had met this motion differently. Instead of resorting to the tu quoque style of argument and attempting to turn attention from the charge against him, he should have courted investigation, and he (Mr. Tupper) hoped the hon. member would succeed in clearing his character. The Committee on Privileges and Elections was constituted by the Government, and consisted of 24 of the ablest members on both sides of the House, 15 of whom were staunch supporters of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had discovered that the proposition of the hon. member for Lévis was to appoint the Committee by ballot by the House.

After some discussion,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was an extraordinary proposition to take this matter away from the Committee on

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Privileges and Elections, and to use the overwhelming majority of the Government to select a special Committee of nine when five would have been enough.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier seemed to forget that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in his place in Parliament had challenged an investigation into the manner in which the elections had been conducted by both parties, and as that was declined the only other course was to appeal to the Courts. The record of the election trials remained a monument to the comparative purity of the Liberal-Conservative party and the corruption resorted to by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SCATCHERD could not see why this matter should be referred to a Committee at all, the hon. member for Charlevoix having failed to make out a case.

He contended that it had been the practice of the House in cases of this kind not to refer the charge to a Committee at all; on the contrary, it had been the usage under such circumstances to vote it down by a large majority. He would cite an instance of this, and he held that this ought now to be done. By referring to the Journals for 1871, page 216, this matter appeared to have come before the House.

"Hon. Mr. Mackenzie moved in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Dorion, that all the words after 'That,' to the end of the question be left out, and the words 'it appears from the statement made to this House by the Hon. Charles Tupper, C.B., President of the Council, that on the 31st day of March last, a Bill was depending in the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia for the disfranchisement of Dominion Officials at Nova Scotia elections, and that the vote of the Hon. James McNabb, a member of the said Council, was material to the decision on the Bill, and that the said Hon. Charles Tupper was desirous that the Bill should be defeated; and that on the same day he received a telegram from Halifax, as follows—'Hon. Mr. McNabb votes to-day for Disfranchising Bill. Can you guarantee Peter an office if his father is put right—A. Wickwire.' To which he replies as follows:—'Your telegram received. Anything Hill engages to do, I will carry out—Charles Tupper.' And that in pursuance of said telegrams, in order to secure the vote of the said Hon. James McNabb, an office in the Dominion service was offered to the said Peter McNabb, a son of the said James McNabb,"

Was this sent before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any Committee? No; it was voted to send it before no Committee at all, and still he had no recollection that the hon. member for Cumberland had then said that such reference was due to the President of the Council, in order that he might clear his character of all stain, though the hon. gentleman now so averred. They were warranted consequently in voting this proposition down, by the precedent of the Cabinet which had ruled the country for so many years to its disadvantage, and which was composed of great men of all political parties. He was not very certain whether the hon. member for Charlevoix had voted on this occasion. Yes he had, if the name on the division list was his; so this appeared to be the proper course to be followed.

Mr. MASSON—The hon. member forgot to mention a fact which was very important. The motion read had been a direct motion of want of confidence in the then Government.

Hon. Gentlemen—No! no! no!

Mr. MASSON—If he was wrong, hon. gentlemen could contradict him in a far different tone; citation proved nothing, for the motion was really a motion of want of confidence. In the present case it was different. The President of the Council was not attacked as a Minister, but as a member of the House, and as having most seriously violated its privileges.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked the indulgence of the House, in order to make an explanation, as an hon. member had revived a matter personal to himself.

Hon. Gentlemen—No! no!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—If hon. gentlemen objected, he would of course submit, but he did think that he should be allowed an explanation under the circumstances.

Mr. SCATCHERD contended that if this were permitted, they should be allowed to go into the Pacific scandal and the $32,000.

Mr. SPEAKER—I do not think that it would be right for you to make an explanation unless it is the pleasure of the House.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I ask it as a favour, assailed as I have been by the hon. gentleman reviving a question of that kind. I claim the privilege, being one of a minority in the House—of a great minority. I throw myself on the generosity of the House.

Mr. BABY—I move the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not think that the hon. member should look upon the mere reference to a precedent as an attack.

Mr. SPEAKER—I was about to say that the hon. member used a very legitimate argument, though it might not have been very pleasant.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE continued, stating that an allusion had been made to the election of Mr. Gladstone for Greenwich, but the hon. gentleman must surely recollect that this took place prior to the election in Lancashire. Greenwich had 20,000 electors. Mr. Gladstone had been nearly defeated there at the previous election, and it could in no sense be called a safe borough for either party. The appointment of a Select Committee was the most convenient mode of dealing with the charge; if there was no objection it might be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; personally he had no choice. If it were to be treated as a political matter, the Government had a sufficient majority on the latter Committee, and consequently no improper motive could reasonably be imputed in this relation. The hon. gentleman said he rose to pour oil on troubled waters, but if this was his oil he would ask what could the hon. gentleman's acid be like.

Mr. SPEAKER remarked that as an adjournment had been moved, hon. members could introduce into the discussion all kinds of irrelevant matter. He would not interfere unless something was said which was personally offensive.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER regretted that he owed to his hon. friend behind him the right which the hon. gentleman opposite seem disposed to deny—an explanation concerning the resolution the hon. member for Middlesex had read. The First Minister said the hon. gentleman had made no charge; the First Minister had drafted that resolution with such ingenuity that it merely required to be read in order to embody the gravest possible accusation.

As the hon. member for Middlesex had chosen to revive this matter for the purpose of embodying it in the Hansard, he considered that he ought to be entitled to give the sequel. The charge contained in that resolution was that he had sent a telegram of a certain purport to an hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia. The statement he had given at the time to the House, accompanied by the most abundant written proof, was that an old and respected friend, a member of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia—who had been one of his fastest and strongest political supporters—a member of the Government with him—who had assisted him by his vote in the Legislature in carrying the Union of the Provinces, and to whom he had been deeply indebted politically—had again and again urged him (Mr. Tupper) to appoint his son to some office. He (McNabb) had stated that in his declining years and broken fortunes, the assistance of his son would be very material to himself and to his family. The conduct of this young man had not been very exemplary; and he had told the old gentleman that if his son proved to have reformed, as was said to be the case, and become strictly temperate, and worthy of an official position, he would be glad to use any influence in his power to do that to which the public services of the father were entitled at his hands. He accordingly informed the Minister of Customs that if a suitable vacancy occurred for this young man, he (Mr. Tupper) would be very glad if he could receive such an appointment; at all events, a trial might be given.

This was the position in which matters stood when he received information from Nova Scotia, that an attempt was being made by the Local Government to obtain the vote of the father for a measure which he considered would be very improper and injurious, being arrived at and conceived in a spirit of hostility to Canada, an effort being made to make the old gentleman vote contrary to his inclinations by means of his necessities. This was the mode in which the matter was presented to him, and what was his answer? He was asked if he would fulfil a promise made long previously, and did he reply that he would certainly do so? Nothing of the kind. It was well known that the local members for the County of Halifax were opposed to the Government in this House, and a gentleman belonging to the Liberal-Conservative party had been elected sometime previously. He was not quite certain but that this gentleman had been deprived of his seat; but at all events he had not long previously been elected. His colleague, Mr. Howe, and himself agreed, that when patronage was at their disposal in the county, this gentleman having obtained the confidence of the constituency on their behalf, should be entitled to name some one to the position. An hon. gentleman, a supporter of the Government in the Senate, Mr Northup, had some time previously applied to him to appoint some friend of his to an office, and that he (Mr. Tupper) said that they had come to an agreement that the patronage of the Government was to be dispensed by Mr. Hill. He also received a telegram from Dr. Wickwire asking for an appointment for young McNabb, and gave the same reply as he had to their supporter in the Senate. The whole question turned upon the point, was Mr. Hill a man of the character and standing which would entitle him to the control of the patronage in Halifax; and he had to state that Mr. Hill was a man of the highest character and standing, socially and politically, in the City of Halifax. There was an interesting sequel connected with this matter, and he was not sorry this question had been brought up. Where was the young man on whose authority this statement was made? He had died in a lunatic asylum! The Government of the day appointed him to a position, and some months afterwards he returned to his old habits, and had an attack of delirium tremens. He was sent to the lunatic asylum from jail, where he recovered his faculties. Previously to this he had received $200 as hush money from the Treasury Department, The Hon. Minister of Militia, then Provincial Secretary, visited McNabb in the insane asylum, and told him that he had better remain where he was, because if he went out he would be convicted and sent to prison, while if he remained where he was he would escape on the ground of insanity. They refused to let him out, and he died there. And where was Mr. Hill? Mr. Hill this day was the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia, invited to that position by the late Government, and they had no reason to regret the confidence they placed in him when they said they would convey the patronage of Halifax to him.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said they had no reason to attempt to bribe Mr. McNabb through his son, Peter, because from the year 1867 to the time he retired from Parliament he continued to be a supporter of the Government. With regard to Peter McNabb, he stated that after the death of Mr. McNabb, whenever he met the widow she always pressed him to find a position for her son. At last they found a vacancy for the young man in the Crown Lands Department, and he behaved himself very well for a few months, after which he returned to his bad habits. With regard to the $200 paid to young McNabb, that was money which he obtained by overdrawing his salary.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Did he not receive that money before he went into the Crown Lands Department as a clerk?

Hon. Mr. VAIL stated with emphasis that that was not so. It was not an uncommon thing for clerks to overdraw their salaries. Mr. McNabb was in the habit of drinking to excess, had delirium tremens and become so dangerous that he stabbed his landlord where he was boarding. He was put in jail for a time pending the trial. The doctors examined him, pronounced him insane and him sent to a lunatic asylum. He was reported from time to time as improving, but unfit to go out. Shortly before he died the Superintendent of the Asylum reported to the Government that Mr. McNabb was insane and should not be let out. A Board of Directors was sent to examine him and corroborated that report. The conversation between him (Mr. Vail) and McNabb occurred once while he was at the Asylum. McNabb ran to him and said: "Why don't you let me out?" He (Mr. Vail) did not want to be seen talking to a crazy man, and to get rid of him, replied, "You must take your chance of a trial if you get out." Crazy as he was, McNabb knew enough to realize his position.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said they were accustomed in the Local elections of Nova Scotia to have Dominion officials interfere in them, acting under instructions from the hon. members for Charlevoix and Cumberland, who were then at the head of two departments at Ottawa. The officials of the Custom House Department openly canvassed and voted against the candidates of the then Opposition. It was to prevent this that the Local Legislature passed the Act to disfranchise officials of the Dominion Government from voting in local elections. It was to defeat this Bill that the bribe was offered to McNabb by the hon. member for Cumberland. But the old gentleman did not vote, and Peter did not get the office.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Oh, yes; he got an office.

Mr. JONES—Yes, but under circumstances entirely different. He would not detain the House any longer; he did not want the hon. gentleman to mislead the House, and wished to point out the great discrepancy between the position Mr. McNabb actually occupied and the position the hon. member wanted to assume that he occupied.

Mr. PALMER wanted to show the hon. member for Middlesex that the precedent he cited had no bearing on the question. The resolution moved by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was whether Dr. Tupper should be censured; and it was voted down as a slander on the hon. member for Cumberland, which was proved by the fact that he (Mr. Tupper) was returned by an overwhelming majority.

Hon. Mr. BKAKE said they must remember there were good and bad precedents. The precedent which the hon. member for Middlesex cited was certainly one which he did not wish them to follow, and one of which the country had no reason to be proud. He could not call the occasion of that vote otherwise than discreditable and disgraceful to the Parliament and Government.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Discreditable to those who proposed it.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—To those who opposed it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon. members for Halifax and Pictou were defeated, and he was sustained by the people of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said this was rather a serious view to take, for the hon. gentleman upon a subsequent and greater question which engaged the attention of the people at the last election—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Will the hon. gentlemen allow me to say—

Hon. gentlemen—Order, Order.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—He is afraid to let me ask him.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Very much; the hon. gentleman is a formidable character. It was, the speaker continued, a dangerous argument for the member for Cumberland to use, that he was returned from Nova Scotia while others of this side were defeated; it would bring up the question of abuse of patronage in order to control the vote on a particular point. The fact was that the hon. member, when a Minister of the Crown, was informed, with reference to a measure pending in the Legislature, that one of the members was about to vote contrary to his views. In order to assure that man's vote he guaranteed his son an office, instead of repudiating the offer made in this direction as an insult to the Government of which he was a member, and his only excuse for this disgraceful and shameful act—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I call the hon. gentleman to order for denouncing an Act of Parliament as shameful.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was a dead Parliament. On that shameful night on which a disgraceful vote was perpetrated by a bad Parliament the hon. gentleman excused himself on the ground that the man was a supporter of his, that the Minister of Militia was trying to buy him, and that he (Mr. Tupper) stepped into the bribe on his own account and rescued his follower. The hon. member justified himself in this way to the House and the House, to its disgrace, accepted the justification.

There had been nothing to enquire about; it was simply a resolution with regard to facts, admitted by the hon. gentleman; the motion was drawn from the hon. gentleman's own speech, and the House was asked to vote, that it was, as he always believed it was—and in which relation he had voted with pleasure—a flagrant violation of the laws of public morality, calculated to inflict deep disgrace upon the country and its institutions; but the House, unfortunately, refused to adopt this position. This was an evil precedent, but they had also a good one to which he would turn. The hon. member, in one portion of his speech, had performed the pleasing duty of casting oil on troubled waters, but he must be allowed to observe that the hon. gentleman did not prove himself to be entirely equal to the task, being rather calculated to disturb, than to promote tranquility.

The Government had a decisive majority on the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, therefore, the insinuation that they were afraid to trust it for fear of not obtaining fair treatment, was unfounded.

When an investigation of this description was to be made it should be done according to some settled form and rule. In the next place, experience proved that a small Committee was preferable to a large Committee for such a purpose, as it might involve the examination of numerous witnesses, and twenty-four or twenty-five gentlemen could not well be spared, from day to day, from their other duties. The other precedent was one which was not to be forgotten. He referred to the motion made on the side of the house—on which the hon. gentleman then sat—on the 2nd of April, 1873. It was intended to refer a matter not to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but to a Select Committee of seven; this motion affected Ministers of the Crown and had relation to elections in connection with the Pacific Scandal—so that it met the other points to which the hon. gentleman referred. This motion, made by the hon. member for Shefford was voted down, and shortly afterwards it was followed by the motion of the Leader of the Government, which was carried. The right hon. gentleman had the matter referred to a Select Committee; and this was a precedent which should be followed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER explained that the hon. member for South Bruce had put words in his mouth which he had never uttered. He stated distinctly that McNabb had been one of his strong political supporters, a member of a Government with him, and as having assisted them in carrying the Union.

Hon. Mr. POPE charged the Government with being desirous of securing a Committee of nine in order to obtain six members against three representatives of the Opposition. He had no objection either to the appointment of five, with three Ministerialists to two members of the Opposition, or to a Committee of three similarly composed.

The motion to adjourn the debate was then withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said in responding to the argument that had been used against him, he would first allude to the remarks of the hon. member for Levis. He was not personally known to that hon. gentleman who had read to the House, from the report, the evidence of two gentlemen called before an Election Committee in Quebec. The hon. gentleman should have stated that he (Mr. Langevin) being elected unanimously to Quebec Centre, that was not a contested election. That Committee was appointed to enquire into the conduct of the returning officer at that election, and it reported sustaining the returning officer. If the hon. President of the Council had not persisted in his denial he would not have forced the resolution on the House. He had asserted certain facts, the hon. gentleman had denied them, and therefore he (Mr. Langevin) considered he was bound to have this matter referred to a Committee. The hon. gentleman had stated that he had been compelled by public opinion to withdraw from one county to another, and to secrete himself for three years. He wished to state that he could have been elected in Dorchester County if he chose, and the hon. gentleman who at the present time represented that county was cognizant of the fact. He denied that he had organized any band of roughs in Charlevoix, contending that as a stranger that would have been an impossibility. He maintained that under the 86th clause of the Election Law it was impossible for those men to have visited Charlevoix as perfectly independent individuals. He referred the matter to the Standing Committee, because he thought it was preferable to asking for a Special Committee of five, seven, or nine. If he had selected the members he had no doubt it would not have been satisfactory to the House. He knew politically there was a majority in favour of the Government on the Committee of Privileges and Election, but he had such confidence in the gentlemen composing it that he would be perfectly satisfied to entrust the case to their decision.

Mr. LAFLAMME rose to a personal explanation. He said he had never used any language or had any intention of insulting the clergy. He considered it a great honour to be connected with high dignitaries, and he had never said a word to their disparagement.

The amendment was then adopted, and the motion as amended was carried. The members being called in, the Committee was struck, each member having the right to nominate one. The vote stood as follows: For Mr. Langlois, 20; Mr. Laurier, 21; Mr. Laflamme, 19; Mr. Aylmer, 19; Mr. Palmer, 19; Mr. Blanchet, 17; Mr. Baby, 19; Mr. Taschereau, 18; Mr. McDougall, (Elgin), 17.

The House adjourned at Four minutes to One o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed :—

To make provision for the winding up of insolvent incorporated Banks.

To provide for the payment of a grant to the Province of Manitoba.

THE DOMINION LANDS ACT.

The House went into Committee to consider certain resolutions providing for the amendment of the Dominion Lands Act.—Mr. Forbes in the Chair.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked if this was copied after the American Act.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it was more liberal. The American Act required that 40 acres of the 160 should be planted with trees, while this measure required only 32 acres of the 160 should be set aside for that purpose.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked why it was that six years should be the limit for procuring patents. This, he believed, was more stringent than the American Act, although there was more land under forest in Manitoba than in any of the Prairie States of the neighbouring country.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the American Act required eight years of tree planting before a patent could be obtained; this measure required only six years, at the expiration of which, everything being satisfactory, a patent could issue.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he quite approved of the measure.

The resolutions were reported and concurred in.

A Bill based on them was introduced and read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, &c. ACT.

The Bill entitled An Act to extend the Acts therein mentioned respecting Weights and Measures, and the Inspection of Gas and Gas Meters to Prince Edward Island, having been read the second time, the House went into Committee of the Whole, and having passed it, rose and reported.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

THE RESERVE MILITIA.

The Bill entitled an Act to amend the Acts therein mentioned respecting the Militia and Defence of the Dominion of Canada, having been read the second time,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER enquired as to its purport.

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied, that in order to save expense, it was proposed to postpone the enrolment of the reserve militia until 1880, to take place thereafter at periods of five years each. Of course, there was the proviso that this could be ordered at any time in case of war, or any such emergency.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill, Mr. Bowell in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked whether it could not be so worded as not to deprive the Governor in Council of the power of securing such enrolment under any circumstances, when, in his judgment, it might seem necessary.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The law is imperative now.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I understand that, but could not the Bill be so changed so as not to leave enrolment subject to the mere contingency of war.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The proviso reads—in case of war or any other emergency.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have no appropriation for it at present, and if the Government should think it advisable next year, we would ask the House to vote the requisite sum.

The Committee rose, and reported the Bill passed with an amendment.

The amendment being read the second time and concurred in, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

The Bill entitled: an Act to amend the Railway Act of 1868 being read the second time,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that it simply provided for an omission in the Railway Act, which had never been apparent until very recently. It was impossible at present, where two arbitrators were appointed by a company, and any individual whose land was to be expropriated, in case the latter died, to replace him. This Bill removed the existing difficulty.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, Mr. Dymond in the Chair, and rising, reported that it was adopted.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

THE CRIMINAL LAWS.

The Bill entitled an Act to supply an omission in the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 42, extending certain Criminal Laws of Canada to British Columbia, being read a second time,

The House went into Committee of the whole, Mr. Archibald in the Chair, and passed it. The Committee having risen and reported, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE LAWS RESPECTING INDIANS.

The Bill entitled An Act to amend and consolidate the Laws respecting Indians, being read the second time, Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that it provided for the consolidation of the several Acts of the Dominion with respect to Indians.

In the first clause the word "band" meant any tribe or body of Indians who had an interest in a reserve, of which the legal title was vested in the Crown; an "irregular band" signified any tribe which held no such interest. The term "Indian" meant any person holding land, the title of which the Government possessed, and with whom treaties existed. The term "Non-Treaty Indian" denoted any person of Indian blood who was reported to belong to an irregular band, or who follows the Indian mode of life, even though only a temporary resident of Canada. The word "reserve" was defined to mean any tract of land set apart for the benefit of a particular band of Indians. A special reserve meant any tract of land set apart for the use of Indians, the title of which was vested in a corporation or community legally established. It was also provided that any Indian who had resided five years in a foreign country, and not associated with his band, might sever that connection. It also provided that that connection might be resumed with the consent of the Government. Another provision of the Bill was that an woman who married a white man should continue to receive the annuity and retain all her privileges. There was another provision in the clause enabling the band to give her a ten years purchase for her privilege, after which she would be for ever separated from them. Another clause put into force the theory they were carrying out last Session with regard to the half breed and full blooded Indians, as it was considered better it should be sanctioned by law. There was a provision which had been suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster. He desired that the penalty for selling liquors to Indians should be made more vigorous by the addition of hard labor to imprisonment, and this matter had been left to the discretion of the judge. It had been found that the decisions of magistrates in cases of selling liquor to Indians had been successfully appealed from, and this success it was thought was owing to the sympathy juries had with liquor sellers. The Government thought these appeal cases might safely be left to the judges, and therefore a clause making this provision had been inserted in the Bill. With regard to the enfranchisement of Indians, it had been deemed advisable to obtain the consent of the band, and unless this was done it was considered that there would be a great deal of trouble, and discontent would result.

When an Indian who had borne a good character for intelligence and sobriety would receive a location ticket for the portion of land designated, he would enter upon a probationary period for three years. If at the end of that time he was found to have continued sober and industrious he received a patent for his land and became enfranchised, still retaining his right to share the annuity moneys. If they wished to separate from the Indian band altogether, they could enter upon another term of probation of three years. If they still continued in the paths of sobriety, they could take their share of annuity money, and be struck off the Indian list.

The consent of the band must be obtained for the distribution of the capital funds. This Bill would give the Indians some motive to be industrious and sober, and educate their children.

Mr. SCHULTZ said it might be very well to consolidate the laws, but the new principles of this bill would be better left out altogether. It would be found impracticable to make this Bill operative in the North West. Any one having an intimate knowledge of the tribal relations of the Indians of the West would see this. The Act did not define with sufficient clearness what an Indian was. It declared that any one who accepted treaty money should be considered an Indian. Now, he considered this unfair. Many of the half-breeds who had accepted lands and moneys under former arrangements would never have done so if they had supposed for a moment it would have classed them among the Indians. There were other objectionable features of the Bill, to which he would refer in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PATERSON considered this measure a step in the right direction. There were 90,000 or more Indians in Canada, 30,000 of whom were in Ontario, having $9,000,000 vested in the hands of the Government. The matter was therefore one of importance. While this Act might not be applicable to the Indians of the North West or the tribes of other parts of Canada, there were bands in Ontario that should be given facilities to raise themselves in the social scale. In Brant there is a reservation comprising a whole township, in which there are fourteen schools, eleven of which are taught by Indians. There is also an institution for teaching the young men farming, and the young women housekeeping. For some 48 years missionaries have been preaching to those Indians, and if, after all these advantages they are not fit for enfranchisement, it is the strongest possible argument against the system that has hitherto prevailed, and in favour of enfranchising the tribe. The hon. member for Charlevoix, in 1860, passed a Bill providing that the Indians desiring to be enfranchised might have a certain portion of the reservation set aside for them on their applying for it and on producing proofs they were fit to be granted the rights of freemen, but they could not hold such land in fee simple. Only one Indian was enfranchised under that Act, and when the Government had granted him his share of the principal money, and desired to allot him his portion of land they found they could not lay it off. He was in the position of being neither Indian nor a white man. He applied as a last resource to the Department to make him an Indian again, but they found although they had the power to make an Indian a white man, they had no power to make him an Indian again. Among the objections to the Bill before the House was one that the Indians were unable to manage their own lands. There was no proof of that; it was mere assertion. There were Indians in this Province who occupied professional positions and were as intelligent as any member in this House. What could be done with some could be done with all. In the reservation in Brant there are some 3,000 children, of whom 1,600 attend school regularly, and in ten years more it will be an exception to find an Indian child unable to read or write.

Did any one say that a person capable of receiving an education and being trained in the arts and practices of British civilization should be prevented from assuming this position? If so, it was a mistaken idea, and the time had come to test the matter. He did not believe that it was entirely possible to wipe out in this country all national distinctions; but every resident of Canada should make it his proudest boast that he was a Canadian. The endeavour to perpetuate the Indian in the Canadian nation was an anomaly. Where the Indian had not forgotten his national habits, and still lived by the chase and fishing, it would not be desirable to ask him at once to take upon himself the duties of a free man; but regarding the reserves of Ontario, consisting of 52,000 acres, it was different, and immediate steps should be taken to place these Indians in a better position. Hunting and fishing has long since ceased, and they supported themselves by agriculture and various handicrafts, in which they should be encouraged to the greatest possible extent. This question must soon be dealt with; they were not dying out on these reserves, but increasing at the rate of one per cent. per annum. Nothing would redound more to the credit of the Minister of the Interior than to show the possibility of raising the Indian to the place of manhood; he believed that this could be done. He trusted that the Government would act wisely and liberally in this relation. National distinctions should not be perpetuated in this country, and no legislative obstacles should be placed in the way of the union of whites and Indians. Under the Act of 1868, if a squaw married a white man she ceased to be an Indian within the meaning of the Act, and consequently lost her previous rights and privileges; this was, in other words, a penalty for doing so, and it was a restriction which should no longer exist. The children of the issue of such marriages should also be entitled to these rights and privileges. Under this Bill she did not forfeit under these circumstances her right to a share of the principal of the money, but this did not go far enough. She should be entitled to it as her dower, and the children of the first generation should also share in the principal funds of the tribe.

Under the present law an Indian absent five years from his reservation lost his interest in it. This was a mistake, being a restriction on his liberty. Indians should be encouraged to mingle with their white brethren and learn their occupations without pains and penalties being imposed for so doing. They should also be allowed to rent their farms to whites, who would improve them in the art of agriculture.

He called the particular attention of the Minister of the Interior to clauses 66 and 69. The former was too sweeping, enacting that no mortgage or lien of any kind could be taken on any personal property belonging to Indians, who, lacking a superabundance of cash, would in consequence be debarred from the purchase of agricultural implements, seed, grain, &c. Again, Indians could not be sued for debt.

These restrictions should be removed, and power should be permitted them to give chattel mortgages. Clause 66 would have a most injurious effect in their regard. Then as to the amount of land to be set apart for an enfranchised Indian, this was left for decision to the Indians in Council; and it might happen that while many on a reservation were sufficiently intelligent to desire enfranchisement, the majority would impede them in accomplishing their object, and allot them too meagre a share of their lands.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—There is a limitation in the clause.

Mr. PATERSON understood this merely to signify that a child under fourteen should not be allotted less than half what was given to an adult; but the latter's portion was not specified.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—The first part of the clause fixes the proportion to be assigned to an adult.

Mr. PATERSON was glad to hear that this was the case. He trusted that no retrograde step would now be taken. This Bill was applicable to the most advanced Indians, and it had not gone one step too far in the direction of the enfranchisement and elevation of the Red men of the Dominion. He now desired to say a word in regard to the duty that belonged to the Indian. In the Act of 1869 a clause was inserted providing that in the case of the convictions of Indians for offences against the law, the expenses of the Court might be borne by the Indian Department. That was very good as far as it went and it was a section he considered desirable. In his county there was a township of 3,000 Indians, and without saying anything to the disparagement of that class, he would state that there were more Indian cases before the Court in proportion to the population than any other. These Indians contributed nothing to the Administration of justice or to the municipal fund. Was it right then that one county should have to bear the expense of the administration of justice to that body of Indians? He thought the House would agree that it was not. He was bound to say on behalf of the Indians that they asked no favours of white men. The land they lived on was their own, the money in the hands of the Government was their own, and he believed they were willing to pay their share of the taxes. He hoped the Hon. Minister of the Interior would give this matter consideration, and see his way clear to amend the Bill in the direction indicated.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said it must be considered that Indians were not in the same position as white men. As a rule they had no education, and they were like children to a very great extent. They, therefore, required a great deal more protection than white men. He could not see the force of the remarks of the hon. member for South Brant, in which he asked for certain restrictions to be removed. He desired the Hon. Minister of the Interior to say how far the third clause changed the position of Indians.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—It merely gives a clear definition of the classes of Indians existing.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN thought the provision with regard to the severance of the connection between an Indian and his band should be amended. He did not think they should give a premium for the dismissing of an Indian from the band, as would be the case practically by the adoption of this provision. Was a man who was travelling for the purpose of improving himself to have his connection with his band severed, and if he ceased to be a member of his band was he to be deprived altogether of his land and money?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the clause was substantially the practice of the Department. The hon. gentleman would observe that while the band was allowed the option of giving their consent, still the Superintendent General or the Department had the right to investigate into the case.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said that while he was in the Department that was done repeatedly, but in nearly every instance there were great difficulties either with the band or with the Indians themselves. He thought that in one or two instances the order had to be cancelled.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—This Bill admits of their coming back.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN thought one of the clauses of the Bill would interfere with the acquired rights of some of the people.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—All their present rights are respected. Does the hon. gentleman mean those parties who are in receipt of annuities or the whites who had taken leases of Indian land? Those half-breeds who have been living on the reserves are now regarded as Indians, the law fully protects them, and their full rights cannot be disturbed.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked if the clause with reference to the surrender of lands provided that the majority of all the male members of the band, or only a majority of the males present at the meeting, was necessary to a decision.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—Of course the majority at the meeting.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said there should be a certain proportion of the band present before a surrender of lands should be determined upon.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the Department took good care in their practice not to allow these surrenders unless the Indians were at home at the time.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said, nevertheless, this precaution should be taken for the protection of the Indians, and as little should be left to chance as possible. The same provision should be made for the proper election of chiefs. It should be made clear that a certain proportion of the tribe should be present at the election. The clause respecting intoxicants should also be amended to prevent the Indians from manufacturing liquor for themselves.

The intention of the Minister of the Interior was no doubt good in proposing to enfranchise the Indians, but the hon. gentleman would fail as he (Mr. Langevin) had done in 1869. The Act of 1869 was framed to prevent jealousies by keeping the land in the hands of the tribe, merely giving the enfranchised men a life interest in it. That did not succeed, and the same cause would make the Bill before the House inoperative.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the Bill was framed to meet the views of the Indians expressed at their grand council in Sarnia, the summer before last. If they did not carry it out the fault would rest with themselves and not with the Government.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said it might apply to the Indians of Ontario, but it would not suit the tribes of Quebec. Some general plan would have to be adopted to educate the Indians and fit them for enfranchisement, just as a white boy would be prepared for manhood.

Mr. MCGREGOR thought that the Bill was a step in the right direction, as Indians should have it within their power to obtain the full privileges of white men. The Leader of the Opposition had had the honour of attending at a banquet given to an Indian residing in the County of Peel. The latter's brother, if in the House, would hardly be supposed to be an Indian, and indeed, many hon. members would sooner be so considered than this person.

The Minister of the Interior had visited his county last year, and settled a dispute, which had long existed there between the whites and Indians, the males being allotted 100 and the females 50 acres of the land, the balance being sold. They occupied about 8,000 acres. He regretted that the term of probation was not shorter, as three-quarters of the Indians in his county might very properly be enfranchised at once.

Mr. SNIDER had had a great deal to do with Indian Reserves and with Indians, who he knew were very grateful to the Minister of the Interior for the interest the hon. gentleman had taken in their welfare. He had with great pleasure shown educated Indians around the Parliament Buildings, and these he could say would do the House no discredit if they occupied seats on this floor, being more intelligent than the great majority of white men. This was a great improvement on former similar Bills, and the Indians were perfectly satisfied with its provisions. He did not think that Indians could be so easily tempted with bribes as whites; and he hoped that the Bill would be made as perfect as possible.

Mr. FLEMING contended that the policy to be pursued with regard to the Indians, must be either one of preservation or one of absorption and amalgamation. Legislation during the past twenty years had a tendency in the former direction. In 1857 he believed the first Bill having relation to the enfranchisement of Indians had been introduced by the right hon. member for Kingston, who explained that the object was to raise them to the position of white men. If it had failed this was to be ascribed to the fact that the machinery provided had not been sufficient for the purpose. Indians should be placed precisely on the same footing with whites; and they should be made more self-reliant and self-dependent. He was greatly gratified on account of the introduction of the Bill; and he would have been better pleased had it gone still further, offering them greater inducements for self-advancement. As to squaws losing their rights to their property when they married whites, it was to be observed that it appeared from the 9th clause that an Indian widow could marry a white man, and yet retain all her estate, real and personal, though according to the 3rd sec., and sub. sec. C, an Indian woman marrying any person other than one of her nationality was deprived of such right; this was surely inconsistent.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—An Indian widow cannot marry a white man and convey dower to her husband.

Mr. FLEMING—I read it otherwise. The 9th clause is as follows:

“Upon the death of any Indian holding under location or other duly recognized title any lot or parcel of land, the right and interest therein of such deceased Indian shall, together with his goods and chattels, devolve one-third upon his widow, and the remainder upon his children equally; and all such children shall have a like estate in such land as their father; but should such Indian die without issue but leaving a widow, such lot or parcel of land and his goods and chattels shall be vested in her, and if he leaves no widow, then in the Indian nearest akin to the deceased, but if he have no heir nearer than a cousin, then the same shall be vested in the Crown for the benefit of the Band. But whatever may be the final disposition of the land, the claimant or claimants shall not be held to be legally in possession until they obtain a location ticket from the Superintendent General in the manner prescribed in the case of new locations."

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—By sub-section D. she loses all such rights.

Mr. FLEMING—This should be made clear and distinct.

Mr. DECOSMOS stated that there was no such thing as statute labor in British Columbia.

With regard to sec. 79, touching intoxicants, he would mention that an Indian Reserve existed in Victoria, on which there was a licensed house held by a man named Everett, and the operation of this provision would interfere with the vested right that this person undoubtedly possessed for a certain number of years. Unless the Government was prepared to grant compensation, this right should be continued him. He would be gratified if amendments were made in this regard, as the Bill on the whole was excellent in its nature.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD thanked hon. members on both sides of the House for their favourable opinion with reference to the measure, and remarked that certain points had been noted, which could be more properly explained in Committee. His object was simply to make the Bill as perfect as possible, with the cordial co-operation of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. He proposed the second reading of the Bill, and announced that it would again be taken upon Friday next.

The Bill was then read the second time.

The hour being six, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The Bill respecting roads and road allowances in Manitoba was read the second time.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply. Mr. Scatcherd in the chair.

Mr. FLEMING.

On item $35,000 for the improvement of navigable rivers,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if anything had been done towards improving the Harbour of Partridge Island River?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE promised to furnish information on the subject at a future day.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if anything had been done towards dredging Wallace River? It was a very important work and a small expenditure in dredging would produce important results. Last Session the Premier had stated he expected to be able to provide for that in the dredging service, but nothing was done.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had found it impossible to reach that point. There were two large dredges which could not be used anywhere but in deep water, and the smaller dredges were employed elsewhere. Nothing would please him better than to dredge the harbours to which the hon. member for Cumberland had referred. The $10,000 in this item for the improvement of navigation in Neebish rapids was to remove some dangerous rocks from the channel on the way to Lake Superior. The United States Government had dredged a great deal up to the boundary, and there was only a small passage in our territory that required improvement. The $15,000 for raising anchors was to improve the harbour of Quebec. It was expected this expenditure would be fully repaid by the proceeds of the sale of the anchors and chains removed. A fair beginning was made last year, but five or six anchors were grappled at once, and the chain broke with the great weight. By the time repairs were made the severe weather set in, but if a good beginning were once made the bed of the river would soon be cleared.

Mr. WOOD suggested that something more should be done to improve the navigation of the Neebish Rapids than remove the rocks. Wharves should be built along the rocky shore to prevent vessels from being broken against it by the force of the current.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had to trust to the engineers, and they objected altogether to the building of a wharf alongside.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked if the Harbour Commissioners would have supervision over the removal of the anchors at Quebec?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes; they have it under their charge entirely.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, in answer Mr. Cimon, said the hon. gentleman to must have misunderstood him, or he must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Mr. Symes had general instructions with regard to the rivers, and to examine into the reports made regarding them. His illness and death prevented him from carrying out the general instructions he had received. The Government had not yet appointed an officer in Mr. Symes' place, but such a man could be appointed in good time for the spring operations.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) called attention to the fact that private parties were building their piers so far out in the river, at the head of the Basin of Minas, in the County of Colchester, that it was beginning to interfere with the navigation of the stream.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That involves a point of law.

In answer to Mr. Bertram, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not the intention of the Government to take charge of the small rivers which had no connection with the great lakes or the ocean. The smaller streams come more properly within the jurisdiction of the Local Governments. With regard to the Trent Canal it was originally intended by the old Province of Canada for a highway to Lake Huron. The old Province expended something like $200,000 on these works. The canal had been unproductive, the traffic being nothing or next to it.

Mr. BERTRAM said the Trent Canal was now in a very unsatisfactory condition. He had no objection to its being taken charge of by the Local Government, but he was of opinion that the Government should not abandon works that had cost so much money until they had made arrangement whereby the Local Government would assume the control of them.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Local Government had undertaken to construct some locks and improve the navigation of the lakes, thereby taking the ground, apparently, that they were willing to occupy that position in regard to these streams and lakes. Before Parliament rose he intended to submit a resolution asking authority to dispose of those and other works in Quebec and Ontario, and place them in the hands of the Local Government, which could manage them efficiently in connection with other parts of their business.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER questioned the power of the House by simple resolution to transfer these works to the Local Government.

The item was passed.

Item 98, providing $25,000 for the Lake Superior and Red River route, being taken up, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that this sum would be used for the establishment of a weekly mail over the Dawson Route, and to provide other service, if necessary.

Mr. MASSON remarked that his previous statements in this regard were borne out by the fact that out of four or five thousand people who had gone to Manitoba last year, only eighty had passed over the Dawson Route.

The item was passed.

No. 99, providing for the Toronto Examining Warehouse, $39,000, Guelph Custom House, Excise and Post Office, $25,000, and Kingston Military School and repairing fortifications, $40,000: total, $104,000—being taken up,

Mr. BOWELL asked the First Minister if this related to the beginning of a policy with regard to the erection of post offices in the larger towns of the Dominion. It was no doubt proper that Guelph should be so favoured; but he trusted that the principle would be extended a little farther—to places equal to and more populous than Guelph. He referred particularly to Belleville, which had a population of between 9,000 and 10,000. The net post office receipts here exceeded those of the former town, though as to excise, receipts were probably less.

Mr. PATERSON called the attention of the Premier to the fact that last year he had promised to initiate a scheme during recess, whereby improved public buildings should be secured for the larger towns of the Dominion. He did not take the least exception to the item for Guelph, but Brantford had a larger population, and probably did more business. He hoped that it would be at least considered in this relation next year.

Mr. BROWN trusted that before next Session Belleville would be granted such accommodation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that his impression last Session was that it would be desirable in large towns of 10,000 people and thereabouts that public buildings should be erected as a mere matter of economy; this was still his impression, and it was the intention of the Government to carry out the plan. The extent of population did not always indicate the amount of business done; the collections for all purposes in Belleville were less than $150,000, while in Guelph they exceeded half a million.

Mr. BOWELL—Owing to the presence of the distilleries.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Its inland revenue receipts were very large. The collections of all kinds amounted to $1,100,000 last year. Had it been possible to make other arrangements in Guelph, no such vote would have been asked. St. Catharines, Brantford, Guelph and Belleville occupied about the same position with regard to post office receipts; though widely different in other respects. The Customs collections at Brantford were larger than at Guelph; while the inland revenue receipts of the former place were next to nothing.

Mr. WOOD had hoped that the First Minister would have given a reason why last year's appropriation for an immigration shed at Hamilton was not used, their present accommodation for this purpose being inadequate. He also thought that Hamilton was entitled to a new post office and a fair share of the public money. He trusted that at the earliest possible moment the Premier would make provision for the erection of a post office in Hamilton which would be suitable for the city.

Mr. PATERSON.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE considered that the Hamilton post office was a very handsome structure; it was also spacious for the requirements, as the Postmaster now lived in the building. Where the free delivery system was established, these buildings were generally found to be too large. As to the immigration shed, it had not been erected owing to the fact that the tenants were too few, the majority going by the Bridge.

Mr. PATERSON thought that the answer might have been more specific. Brantford was under the impression that the scheme mentioned would be very generally applied. Guelph after all had the advantage in point of receipts, owing to the production of more whiskey; and the claims of Brantford with regard to the erection of public buildings, were in his opinion so strong that they could not be properly overlooked.

Mr. TROW hoped that Stratford would not be forgotten in this connection, its population numbering 7,000, and its position being central.

Mr. STIRTON observed that the hon. member for Brant had been mistaken with regard to his figures. St. Catharines, which had a population of 12,000, was the only town in the Dominion that exceeded Guelph in this respect. It was high time, under such circumstances, for the Government to do something in the way of accommodating the public. But the Government were quite justified in this expenditure on another ground. If they rented a suitable building they could not get one for less than the interest of the cost of the building would amount to. It was only tardy justice to Guelph.

Mr. PATTERSON had no objection to Guelph getting this building, but he wanted the First Minister to give the other larger towns public buildings also.

Mr. NORRIS said St. Catharines had a good Custom House, but required a Post Office. He hoped when the revenue was in a better condition that town would not be forgotten.

Mr. MACDOUGAL (Elgin) asked the Government to consider the claims of St. Thomas, which was a thriving town with a population of 6,000.

Mr. BOWELL reminded the hon. member for South Wellington that although the receipts from the post office at Guelph were larger than the receipts from the post office at Belleville, the difference was not great. The former amounted to $11,100; the latter to $11,800, while the cost of collection at Guelph was $3,736, and only $2,800 at Belleville, leaving a balance of $586 in favour of the latter in the actual net receipts to the Dominion.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said there seemed to be a raid on the Treasury Benches to supply buildings for all the country towns. It would be a dangerous precedent to establish that the Government were bound to put public buildings in all the towns. There were some places where it would be to the public advantage, but he was satisfied in the most of them the people could be equally well served by hiring accommodation and at less expense than by constructing buildings. He hoped the Government would hesitate before committing themselves to such a dangerous principle.

Mr. MASSON asked the Premier to explain why there had been such a large expenditure on repairs of fortifications last year.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said explanations of this vote were needed. He wished to know why the commandant's house had been so badly planned that there was not a room in it large enough to accommodate ten persons. He wished to know who was the architect of this wonderful edifice? The commandant would not go into it. The House would also like to know something about the College building, and when it would be opened.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he received with the utmost meekness this rebuke for his neglect, since it came from one who knew so much more about plans than he (Mr. Mackenzie) did. What he had to say was that while he had not done all his hon. friend would have done, he had done his best in the matter. His impression was that the matter had been well attended to. The building was planned by an able architect according to his (Mackenzie's) direction, and he was prepared to defend the construction of the building. In addition to other works, the interior of the stone fort, a large building 170 feet long and 4 chains high, had been entirely refitted, and a considerable amount had been expended in levelling the ground. A very large proportion of the vote was expended in repairing the fortifications. He was extremely well satisfied with the work that had been done. No doubt a part of this money would be required in the erection of a new wing, and they expected to be able to open the school early in the spring, in the front, with a small staff of professors.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—How many persons have applied to enter the Military School?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said 8 or 10 had passed the first examination, which was considered to be somewhat severe. Another examination would be held in a few weeks, less severe. They desired to have about 22 students to commence with, and not more than 25 at the outside, in order to leave room for the younger officers in the active force who desire to enter the school.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that he did not speak on behalf of the commandant but from a personal inspection of the buildings.

Mr. MASSON—Asked what would be the cost of the new wing?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Said about $20,000 or $30,000, but the cost, of course, would depend upon the size of the buildings.

Mr. MASSON—What will be the approximate cost of the whole building?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—About $100,000.

Mr. MASSON asked if the House was not pledging itself far beyond the wants of the country. He did not think they could utilize so large a building, and the expenditure in his opinion was unwarranted, unless they intended to establish a standing army in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said if the hon. gentleman was of a different opinion to that of the Government, and it was the opinion of the House that it was not wise to make the expenditure, the Government were willing to learn wisdom from the House upon this, as upon other questions.

Mr. MASSON did not think that accommodation for one hundred pupils was required, unless the Government intended to establish a standing army. An expenditure of $100,000—which would probably, in point of fact, be increased to $150,000—was not warranted by the means of the country; he had supposed that a building of reasonable dimensions would have been erected; and he was astonished that such an expenditure had been made. The disbursements intended were too large.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Very well—vote against it.

Item 100, providing $5,000 for repairing fortifications at Quebec, and $60,000 for the examining warehouse at Montreal, having been taken up, Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN stated that the sum of $5,000 was too small for the purpose in view; and enquired whether the 60,000 would complete the warehouse.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE believed that it would; the estimate for the building itself had been under $180,000.

The fortifications at Quebec, as at Kingston, did not meet the requirements of the latest systems; consequently repairs would only be made on the permanent buildings, as were absolutely necessary to prevent them going to decay. A considerable sum had been expended last year on the Point Levis fortifications, which had not been built in conformity with the exigencies of our climate. A portion of the walls of the citadel would have to be taken down.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN regretted the smallness of the sum, and he hoped that this point would be considered at least in connection with the supplementary estimates. The walls of the citadel, for the safety of residents of the Lower Town, would have to be kept up.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that these works had been neglected under the administration of the hon. gentleman; had this not been the case a very slight expenditure would now have been requisite to keep them in proper order. The chief architect had reported to him what was absolutely necessary to be done, and such repairs would be effected.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN stated that had the engineer reported, when he was at the head of the Department, that the fortifications were out of repair, prompt attention would have been given to the matter; but such a report had only been made in 1873. The walls were greatly dilapidated.

Mr. MASSON asked what assistance the Government would give towards the embellishment of the city of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they had not considered the question definitely. An engineering officer had examined the ramparts last year with a view to ascertain to what extent the wishes of the City Council and the people could be complied with. The understanding was arrived at that certain streets might be allowed to pass through the ramparts for the convenience of the public if the city would pay the expense of making something like ornamental gateways to preserve the beauty of the place from a historic point of view. The City Council had agreed to make an appropriation for the purpose, and the Government were bound, so far as the public interest would permit them, to allow the streets of the city to pass through certain portions of the rampart.

The item was passed.

On item $3,000 for the Sydney Marine Hospital,

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) asked what the cost of the building would be?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—$12,348.

Mr. MACKAY—Have any tenders been invited for the construction of the Sydney Quarantine Hospital?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I think not.

Mr. MACKAY—Is the amount to be voted this year?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No.

Mr. MACKAY—Is the building to be constructed?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not this year.

Mr. MACKAY said when the amount was put in the estimates, the work should proceed. At Sydney and North Sydney some 600 vessels come in from sea, and a season or two ago small pox was introduced into the place, putting the Government to some two or three thousand dollars expense. It was not fair or right that this important port should be neglected. A quarantine station was absolutely necessary. The Government must take the responsibility on themselves if small pox should be introduced into the place this year again.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said his hon. colleague in January, 1874, had read a letter from the Premier stating this work would be proceeded with immediately, but there had been some difficulty about the location of the two buildings. In his (Mr. McDonald's) opinion, both buildings should be located at the one place, where they could be attended by one doctor, at less expense to the country.

Mr. MACKAY said the opinion of the officers sent by the Government was diametrically opposed to this view. The people of Sydney would never consent to the construction of a quarantine hospital within the limits of the town.

Mr. FLYNN asked why the item $1,000 for a marine hospital at Arichat, placed in the estimates last year, was not revoted this year?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was for the simple reason it was impossible to build a hospital for $1,000. There was no foreign shipping coming in there likely to render necessary an institution of the kind at that point.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was true there was not much foreign trade at Arichat, but vessels called there from New York and Boston, where small-pox was prevalent.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said if a hospital should be found necessary at any point, it would be constructed, but it would not be well to give the impression that every small place on our coast should have such institutions.

Mr. FLYNN said that previous to 1873 several cases of small-pox were brought to Arichat from the United States. The matter was brought under the notice of the Government and a sum of $1,000 was placed in the estimates for the erection of a Quarantine Hospital, it being thought that sum would be sufficient for the erection of a small building. The amount was granted in 1875, but this year it had been omitted.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the late Government had made appropriations for the erection of these buildings at ports where they were required, and these appropriations having been revoted, he considered the Government was bound, unless they could show some good reason for not doing so, to go on with the work. He was satisfied that there would be great dissatisfaction in the places where the people found the Government were not prepared to fulfil the pledges which had been given them.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) also dwelt upon the necessity of the erection of a Quarantine Hospital at the port, stating that there was no place to send small-pox cases except to the Marine Hospital.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE believed that the Imperial authorities owned some property which the Government desired to obtain, but the Imperial authorities had declined to put it at their disposal. The Government did not think with the new Marine Hospital erected there that there would be any difficulty with the diseases that might occur in the port. All he could say at present was that the sum of $1,000 was utterly useless for the purpose—at least four times that sum being required. That amount was only put into the estimates in order to make temporary provision if it was required, and the Government had thought it advisable to remove from the estimate a vote totally inadequate for the purpose.

The item was adopted.

Items 103 and 104, appropriating $500 for the Louis Marine Hospital, was passed without discussion.

On item 105, Public Buildings, B. C., $5,000.

Mr. ROSCOE asked if it was the intention of the Government to erect a Custom House on the river, where the Custom House officer had to live in a tent, and had no place in which to keep his money and papers securely.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said of course it was not the intention of the Government to build Custom Houses wherever there were Custom House Officers. The Officer who was placed to collect revenue anywhere was generally supposed to find a dwelling for himself. The Government were not aware of the circumstances connected with this case until the hon. gentleman brought it to his (Mr. Mackenzie's) notice a few days ago. He said to the hon. gentleman then that the Government would erect a log building on the river which would do temporarily, both for the purpose of a residence and an office. Owing to the inability of the Government to get the boundary line defined, they had some difficulty in regard to the collection of duties there, but at the present time they had simply located the officer where they believed he should be located, and they would endeavour to obtain temporary accommodation for him.

Mr. BUNSTER enquired whether it was the intention to build a Custom House in Nanaimo; the collections last month amounted to $3,000 and for the months previous they were $8,000? They would be a great deal more, he was informed, if a Custom House were erected, as merchants at present did not bring their goods there directly. The prospects of Nanaimo were excellent, but like other parts of British Columbia it was very much neglected by the Administration. They also badly required a new post office.

The item was passed.

Item 106, providing $30,000 for a general Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces; $20,000 for the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary; $52,400 for the Manitoba Penitentiary; $66,000 for the British Columbia Penitentiary, and $5,000 for Penitentiaries generally (additions and repairs)—total, $173,400, being taken up, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that convicts would be employed in connection with the erection of the Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Where is the building to be placed?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE hoped to be able to give this information before the estimates were all passed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Another wing was to be built at the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, from which, owing to want of room, 150 convicts had been sent to Kingston last year. The British Columbia Penitentiary was under contract. The last item was intended to provide for general contingencies, such as the destruction of one of the main buildings, which had taken place last year at Kingston.

Mr. MASSON—Will this vote complete all the buildings, save the Penitentiary for the Lower Provinces?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Scarcely. The British Columbia and Manitoba Penitentiaries will, however, be completed.

Mr. MASSON—Will the Custom House and post office at Manitoba be also finished with the amount voted?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am so informed. At this point the Premier rose to explain with regard to item No. 104, that the vote made for the post office last year would complete the building. The entry was entirely wrong; the $25,000 was to be used for the erection of new buildings, a residence for the Lieutenant-Governor, &c., in the North West Territory.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Where will they be located?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is not precisely settled.

Mr. SCHULTZ hoped that in this regard the Government would not pursue the course which had proved so disastrous last year, under somewhat similar circumstances, at Fort Pelly, where buildings had been erected without tenders being invited for the work. They turned out to be most miserable in construction, and were now entirely useless. This was due partly to the ill-judged haste with which the Administration had chosen Fort Pelly as the seat of Government, and partly to the employment of improper materials. The Mounted Police had found it utterly impossible to use them during last winter, and although it was not directly so stated in the report, an inspecting officer on visiting them considered them completely unsuited for the purposes in view, advising the Government to have nothing whatever to do with them. He hoped that this would not again occur, and that tenders on this occasion would be obtained.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The buildings will be proceeded with exactly in the same manner.

Mr. SCHULTZ—Then I trust that it will be with different results.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I think it will be with the same results.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN enquired where the British Columbia Penitentiary would be placed?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It will be built west of New Westminster on Government ground.

Mr. MASSON thought that the Premier's replies to Mr. Schultz had scarcely been satisfactory, and asked what could have justified them being given in such a manner?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Nothing whatever.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Perhaps the Premier will tell us whether the information of the hon. member for Lisgar is correct or incorrect?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not correct.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—You state that the buildings have been satisfactorily constructed—do I understand that?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I do.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Were they built with or without tender?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Without tender. It is quite impossible to get tenders for such contracts. We erect them by means of Government officers in accordance with the instructions of the architect at Ottawa.

Mr. SCHULTZ—I must hope, at least, that the results will be well worth the experience obtained, at any rate.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I know what our experience and the experience of the late Government has been with respect to the payment of extravagant sums for such contracts; and we do not intend to repeat it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What expenditure has been made in the construction of buildings at Fort Pelly?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I cannot tell exactly; I will bring down the information shortly.

The item was passed.

Item No. 107, providing $182,000 for rents, repairs, furniture and heating, &c.; $40,000 for heating Public Buildings, $2,500 for the removal of snow at the Public Buildings, Ottawa, $12,000 for gas used in the Public Buildings, Ottawa, $5,000 for fuel and light at Rideau Hall, and $10,000 for repairs and miscellaneous expenses at Rideau Hall—total $251,500—being taken up,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK stated the expenditure for rents, repairs, furniture and heating, &c., had increased remarkably during the last few years; in 1872-3 this item amounted to $81,000; and in 1873-4 to $95,000; and now it was no less than $182,000. He hoped that the Premier would explain; and as he asked the question politely, he hoped that the First Minister would not snap his head off.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the expense of maintaining public buildings had increased enormously of late. The new public buildings in Montreal, Toronto and other places increased the expense of maintenance. It was found necessary to rent a number of buildings. In this city, for instance, it was found necessary to rent rooms for the Supreme Court and also for the Pacific Railway Surveyors, there being absolutely no room in the offices for them, and a great deal of work had to be done in the interior of some of those buildings to fit them for occupancy. The details of such expenditures would be found in the Public Accounts. He was not aware of anything abnormal at all; it was simply because of the greater number of buildings to be maintained. The selection of Rideau Hall was in the first place unfortunate. The cost of the grounds with buildings attached was not far from $400,000. Last year, the old building having been found in a delapidated condition, they had to put on a new roof entirely of wood and iron, and it was now in a tolerable state of repair.

The motion was passed.

On the item, $62,200, for harbours and breakwaters in Ontario,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that the $6,000 to be expended at Thunder Bay was to dredge the bed on the Kaministiquia River, some 2½ feet deeper. The Local Government of Ontario had expended several thousands in improving the place, and as it was to be the terminus of the Pacific Railway it would be necessary to have it deepened to at least 12 feet.

Mr. PLATT asked for some information about the vote for Toronto harbour. It appeared to him very improper to neglect the port of Toronto, which was a harbour of refuge.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said a vote had been taken for this purpose last year with a view to enable the Government, in the first place, to make a thoroughly scientific investigation of the harbour, and in the second place to erect some temporary piers, if that should be found desirable, in order to ascertain the effect of currents depositing sand in different places. Several engineers had spent a great deal of time in this examination, and their report was nearly complete. The examination developed the fact, not previously known, that the breaking of the bar at the east end had really not in any way injured the interior part of the harbour. The water about the wharves was found to be not more than ten feet deep. The only part requiring early attention was some dredging at Queen's wharf, and extensive dredging would be necessary to facilitate the entrance of larger vessels. The bay was altogether too shallow. The original plan laid before the Department of Public Works would have involved an outlay of between three and four hundred thousand dollars, and the result of the investigation was to show this would be money thrown away. Dredging was the only way to get deeper water in the harbour. There was no fear of the destruction of the harbour by the breaking away of the bar.

The item was passed.

Mr. CIMON said he would be glad if the Hon. First Minister would tell him why he refused this year to put in his estimates any sum of money for harbours, piers and breakwaters in the Province of Quebec, in which the navigation is so extensive. There was not a cent in the estimates for this purpose in the Province of Quebec. He would ask if the Hon. First Minister had received no demand for such an appropriation, and if he was not aware that improvements were required in that Province? He (Mr. Cimon) knew that petitions had been sent from his county asking for the construction of breakwaters, and yet were unanswered. Last year the First Minister had placed in the estimates $28,000 for that purpose in the Province of Quebec; but all this money was for the County of Charlevoix, of which Mr. Tremblay was then the member. He supposed that Mr. Tremblay had gone to the First Minister and said to him:—"My election is contested, and the judgment declaring it void will be given next summer; if you don't come to my aid I will be beaten." And then the hon. gentleman gave this $28,000 to Mr. Tremblay, which he applied only for the purpose of securing this election, the money having gone into the pocket of a very few friends of his. The work was badly done, and the money recklessly expended. First, M. Gagnon, son of M. A. Gagnon, who had represented Charlevoix in the Local House, got about $16,000, and it was in this manner:—Mr. Gagnon had been a supporter of the Local Government till the Tanneries affair. His son had the contract for the Bay St. Paul's pier, and he was claiming from this Government an indemnity of $16,000; the arbitrators of this Government had refused to give him that sum, allowing him only $1,000. Then Mr. Gagnon, who had heretofore supported the Local Government, voted against him, supporting the Rouges; and some months afterwards the Federal Government made, out of this $28,000 which were voted for the people of Charlevoix, a gift to Mr. Gagnon's son of $16,000. He (Mr. Cimon) said a gift, because they bought from him timber which was worth $4,000, and paid him $16,000 for it. Then it was for the members of this House to draw the proper conclusions. He was sure that the First Minister knew nothing about this. He hoped the hon. gentleman did not; and thought that all these improper transactions, and all had been done only though Mr. Tremblay, who had mistaken the Hon. First Minister. He wished to know why the Province of Quebec was so ignored?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said Mr. Gagnon entered into a contract, sometime before he (Mr. Mackenzie) assumed office, to build a crib for a certain sum of money, but by some oversight by the Department the contract was really executed for six cribs. Mr. Gagnon would not at first sign the contract, but afterwards finding that he could get the timber, he undertook the work. The contract was a larger one than was required. The timber was bought on Mr. Symes' recommendation, and the work was done under his supervision. He was not aware that this matter required any further explanation at his hands. Returns on the subject had been asked for and the papers would be brought down in a few days.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked how much money had been expended on the piers of Baie St. Paul, and Eboulements.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not be expected to give information on that, as there was no vote for it in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Public Accounts of 1875 showed that only $7,085 had been spent on the Baie St. Paul pier.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said that statement was up to 1st July, and he thought the large proportion of the work was performed after that. He understood that the work done would exceed the appropriation and if that were so the money must either have been paid or there were large claims for the balance. The Eboulement extension of break-water was not connected with the land, and therefore it was of no use for the purpose for which it was intended.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The building of landing-piers is not the business of the Government.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—The Malbaie extension is a landing-pier.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am sorry I did not know that. Had I been aware of the fact it would not have been built.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said it was intended as a landing-pier by those who obtained the vote. A large amount of money had been expended on the work in question, and he was satisfied that what had been done could have been done for half the money.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was an inconvenient time to discuss the matter, no discussion on the subject being anticipated. He was not prepared to make the statement with regard to the character of the work the hon. gentleman had himself made; Mr. Symes was not an officer of his own choosing. He had found that gentleman in the Department, he had trusted him implicitly. With regard to the location of the Baie St. Paul pier, there had been a good deal of correspondence passed, and all he could say in regard to it, was that if the location was not the proper one he must throw the burden of that upon the officers of the Department, who he was satisfied did the best they could.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—The men the hon. gentleman sent down were not the proper parties to do the work. They were recommended to the hon. gentleman by parties interested in the matter.

Mr. CIMON—I am informed that Mr. Symes had instructions to act according to the views of Mr. Tremblay.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Mr. Symes did not receive instructions from me to act according to the views of anybody. The item was passed.

Hon. Mr. POPE enquired why proper accommodation was not provided for the Customs Officer at Sherbrooke, where from $10,000 to $15,000 were collected annually; a building might surely be rented—although this was in the Province of Quebec. He found that for the other Provinces, and especially for Ontario, $124,000 were set apart for public works and buildings chargeable to income; Nova Scotia to receive $42,500, and Prince Edward Island $29,250. Something, however, should be done in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the collections in Sherbrooke amounted to $10,487.19; in hundreds of other places they were in excess of this amount; and in fifty places ten times as great; and yet they did not pretend to erect buildings where the business might be done in a room 10x12.

Hon. Mr. POPE—You rent sometimes, though.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I do not know anything about that. If anything is wrong, no doubt the Minister of Customs will attend to it.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—I think this officer receives $150 for rent; he has not complained.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought that public money should merely be expended where it was most required without reference to localities. He deprecated the raising of sectional issues in this relation.

Hon. Mr. POPE said that he had not requested any unnecessary expenditure. Favours had been granted the Great Western and Northern Railways, and large sums were to be spent on the Georgian Bay Branch. He could not understand why everything should fall to the lot of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The payment of the Northern Railway's debt had been made to the Dominion, not to the Ontario Government; and how this increased the allowance to Ontario passed his comprehension.

Mr. MASSON urged that the Prime Minister forgot that when a Province was relieved of a debt due to the whole Dominion, the other Provinces bore their share of the burden without partaking of the benefit. The Northern Railway had owed a considerable amount to the Dominion; and it was then well understood—it was admitted by the Toronto Globe and the greater portion of the Liberals in that city—that this road was in a fairly flourishing condition, being able to pay five per cent on its debt due to the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! No!

Mr. MASSON—The Treasury of Ontario had represented most distinctly in a state document, that this was the case; and more, the Globe had written editorially, that “the Northern Road is one of the very last undertakings that should come a begging for relief at the present moment from any Canadian tax-payer.”

He could cite other extracts of a similar character from this paper, which further declared that the “Northern Railway is not so bankrupt as its Managing Director represents it to be. On the contrary, it is comparatively speaking, a healthy and prosperous enterprise, worth a vast deal of money as it stands, and giving every promise of being worth a vast deal more. To surrender shares in it to the amount of $190,000, without a direct and valuable advantage to the city from the surrender, would be the very height of imbecility;” and this was the organ of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No!

Mr. MASSON—Then it was the organ of the hon. gentleman's party; and yet though Toronto benefitted especially from the working of the railway, the journal would not consent to the abandonment of the debt towards the city. The Dominion did not benefit in so great a degree from such a local enterprise; and consequently the argument against abandonment of such obligations obtained greater force.

He agreed with the Minister of Public Works that these matters should not be treated from a sectional point of view; and if the hon. gentleman considered that Quebec had reached the millenium, not being in want of anything, he was quite justified in giving nothing to the Province. Still, the question put by his hon. friend from Chicoutimi had not been answered; it was, had not there been applications made for improvements in the St. Lawrence? He hoped that a reply would be made.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE could not answer a question so indefinite; if it was put definitely in writing, he would bring down the information desired.

Mr. MASSON hoped that, as was the case last year, when in the first instance very little at all events had been granted Quebec, the hon. gentleman would yet remedy matters in the supplementary estimates. This had previously been done to the extent of $27,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE exceedingly regretted that hon. gentlemen from Quebec should attempt to make a sectional fight in this relation. He had the returns showing the relative expenditures in Ontario and Quebec during the last forty years; and these proved that Ontario had never acted grudgingly towards her sister Province. The same spirit still animated her people, and he could only say that he was as destitute of sectional feeling as it was possible, in his opinion, for any human being to be. He did not know of any great public work in Quebec that had not received due attention at the hands of the Government. The hon. member for Terrebonne said that everything went to Ontario.

Mr. MASSON—I did not say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. member said, that whether it concerned railroads or anything else, all went to Ontario; and was applauded when he represented that a debt had been forgiven to the Northern Railway for the benefit of that Province. The hon. gentleman was cheered when he set out in the new role of bringing Quebec into collision with the other Provinces. This was, however, no boon to Ontario; the old Province of Canada loaned $2,310,000 to the Great Western Railway Company, receiving in return three and a quarter millions, the capital and 4 per cent interest, which was paid, not to Ontario, but to the Dominion.

The late Government had proposed to absolve the Northern Railway Company from their indebtedness, for the sum of £100,000; the present Administration valued the assets of the Company at a higher figure, and brought in a Bill, passed unanimously he believed, to obtain one million of dollars instead; and if they were able to carry out this agreement they would do so. This was charged to Ontario; but what railway in any other Province could be sold for any money at all? As a rule, they did not pay working expenses; and it was no boon to own 700 or 800 miles of railway. This was anything but a money-making speculation; and the million in question would be added to the wealth of the Dominion.

Mr. MASSON replied that the hon. gentleman did not answer the question put, but pleased himself by erecting men of straw in order to amuse himself by knocking them down. He had not said a single word with regard to Quebec in opposition to any other Province; but he had affirmed quite the contrary. He had deemed it to be his duty to call the attention of the Government to the Northern Railway question; and he could read in this connection the memorandum submitted in 1873 by the Treasurer of Ontario to the Lieutenant Governor, declaring that this road could pay five per cent. on the lien. It ran as follows:—

“MEMORANDUM submitted to the Lieutenant Governor in Council, on the 3rd of May, 1873:—

“Upon an examination of the returns of revenue as earned by this railway, and after a liberal allowance for expenditure on capital account, it appears to the undersigned that the company could with facility pay interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum on this amount of the Provincial lien, and at the same time exist in full efficiency and make from time to time such alterations and additions as the traffic and public interest might require.”

That decided conclusively, from an Ontario point of view, what was the feeling of the country on the subject of the Northern Railway. It was true the old Government brought in a measure to grant relief to that railway, but it was opposed then, as now, by the representatives of Quebec, and the opposition was not from them alone but from the Ontario members also.

Mr. OLIVER thought it was very unfair for the hon. member for Compton to represent Ontario as receiving the whole benefit of the building of these Railways. Such was not the case. Montreal reaps as much benefit as part of Ontario from the Northern Railway which, by the Grand Trunk, draws the trade of a large section of country to Montreal. At this very time Ontario is granting bonuses to railroads which were increasing the trade of Montreal. It was unwise, therefore, for Quebec members to raise an issue between the Provinces. Look at the enormous amount of money expended on the Intercolonial Railway, five-ninths of which was contributed by the people of Ontario. Since confederation Ontario had paid into the treasury $15,000,000 more than she received from it. If there was one Province in the Dominion which had acted generously by the others, it was Ontario.

Hon. Mr. POPE said he did not complain that more money was expended in any one Province than another, but he did object to being told that because Quebec received some benefit from this road, which had cost the Dominion $5,000,000 that debt should be forgiven to the railway company. He did not want to raise an issue between Ontario and Quebec, but he wanted to see justice done.

Mr. YOUNG said Ontario was really the only Province in the whole Dominion that paid more into the Treasury than it had taken out of it.

Mr. DOMVILLE—No; New Brunswick has also paid more than she has received.

Mr. YOUNG said he had the official figures and they were as follows:—Ontario, from July 1st, 1867, to July 1st, 1873, had paid into the Consolidated Fund, as nearly as could be calculated, $55,251,758, and received $40,095,756, being a surplus of over $15,000,000 paid into the Exchequer, whilst Quebec had received some $1,871,777 more out of the Treasury than it had paid in during the same period.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER called attention to the fact that there had been applications for repairs to the piers at Port Grenville and Partridge Island, and that considerable loss would likely be sustained if the repairs were not done.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) stated that at Cow Bay 10 cents per ton had been charged upon every vessel entering the port. That high duty precluded many vessels from going into the port, and it was desirable that this rate should be reduced.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that was the amount fixed by Statute, but he would call the attention of the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) remarked that captains of vessels overtaken by storms complained greatly of the tax.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the Statute of 1874 imposed ten cents a ton on vessels under 100 tons once a year, and twice a year on vessels above 100 tons.

The item was passed

Item 112, Prince Edward Island, $24,750,000, was also passed.

On item 113, providing, $10,000, for slides and booms,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) asked why the amount asked for the construction of booms at Des Joachim's slides at the last Session was left out of the estimates for the present year? He found that the receipts from these works were $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the cost of the construction of the works, and he considered that this was the largest rate of interest received from any public work in the Dominion

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the expenditure for booms and slides up to the end of the last financial year was $1,832,007.36, and the receipts from the same work was $1,580,215.28, showing a deficiency of about $260,000. From a number of the small works no revenue was received, and the works in the vicinity of the Ottawa were generally productive enough. From the slides and booms on the Ottawa and its tributaries, there had been a revenue of $175,000 in excess of the expenditure.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said three-fourths of the square timber of the Ottawa passed this particular place, and as it would be a saving to the trade they would gladly pay a sufficient toll to return a reasonable interest for the construction of the work. This toll could be collected at a much cheaper rate by the Government than by a private company.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the works on the Ottawa and its tributaries paid a considerable revenue in excess of expenditures for maintenance, and since 1867 had paid as much as $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the amount expended for capital account. When they were told by the Finance Minister that he could borrow in England at five per cent., and considering that this work would be of great benefit to the trade, the lumbermen were not asking too much of the Minister of Public Works in requesting to have this improvement made.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said it was not a question of mere money. The rapid was a dangerous one, and every year there was loss of life there. He hoped the Minister of Public Works, who was interested in the free and safe navigation of the river, would see his way to allowing the grant which had previously been placed in the estimates to be re-voted.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) corroborated the statement with regard to loss of life at that rapid. He had lost a number of men there himself. He thought that argument ought to induce the Government to allow this estimate to stand.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter had been submitted to the engineers, and they had reported on it sometime ago. It seemed to him, from their report, it was not of such a character that the improvement was absolutely necessary. He would only remark that there was no more reason why the public should execute these works on the Ottawa than they should construct any other works that were in the hands of private companies. There was no reason why private companies should not own these booms and slides. They could manage them to their own advantage much better than the Government could do it.

Mr. WRIGHT asked if the Government would be prepared to make over these works to the trade.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government would be prepared to consider the question. Before the estimates were finally passed he would inform the House what the engineer had reported on this matter.

Mr. WHITE said as a practical lumberman he could not agree with the statement made by the First Minister that these works would be better managed by the trade than by the Government. It was true that mistakes were sometimes made in location of works, but generally speaking they were located to the great advantage of the trade, and they were better in the hands of the Government than controlled by private companies who would desire to make money out of them. It seemed to him that these works were as much Government works as breakwaters and harbours of refuge.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) concurred in the remarks of Mr. White. The lumber trade did not ask the Government to make improvements for them for nothing at the expense of the rest of the Dominion; they were willing to pay tolls that would return a reasonable interest on the investment.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the works were not as remunerative as one would suppose from the figures, as there were some $201,000 of arrears for some years past that it would seem almost impossible to collect.

The item was passed.

Item 114, providing $11,000 for dredge vessels, was passed without discussion.

Item 115, providing $102,000 for dredging, being taken up,

Mr. DECOSMOS enquired why dredging had been stopped in the harbour of Victoria? This appeared to him to be something extraordinary, as at Victoria there were paid in duties over $500,000, one-third as much as Nova Scotia, and one-thirtieth of the Customs revenue of the Dominion. Was it part of the hon. gentleman's plan to shut down upon this as well as upon everything necessary and unnecessary for British Columbia? Did the hon. gentleman not intend to keep faith with this Province with regard to a small matter like this, as well as in connection with a great matter like the Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not choose to discuss the question of keeping faith at that time, for he did not think that anyone on looking at the estimates would say that they were not keeping faith with British Columbia with reference to the expenditure of public money.

The harbour of Victoria could undoubtedly be improved; but it was in an excellent condition, and dredging was not at present absolutely necessary. The removal of rocks in the harbour was of much more consequence, and nothing further would be done during the current year. He had no desire to refuse to expend any money there; and his information in this respect was obtained from the engineers. A contract had been entered into for the removal of the rocks.

Mr. DECOSMOS remarked that if two rocks, which he mentioned by name, were removed, vessels of 1,500 tons could move about near the wharves with great ease.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE promised to make a note of that matter.

Item 116, providing for $10,000 to be expended on miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, was passed without discussion.

Item 117, providing for the expenditure of $45,000 for surveys and inspections, being taken up,

Mr. KIRK remarked that he had presented to the Premier a petition very numerously signed, a few days ago, asking for the use of a dredge to clean out Lange River, near Tor Bay; and he enquired whether it could be obtained during the present season?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not know what dredge would be suitable for the purpose; he would make enquiry with reference to this matter.

The item was passed.

Item 118, providing for the expenditure of $15,000 for arbitrations and awards, was passed without discussion.

The House adjourned at One o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

AFTER ROUTINE.

BEACON LIGHT ON RED RIVER.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a beacon or light house at the mouth of the Red River, known as Sloop Channel?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not the intention of the Government to erect this light house. I am informed by the Department that no representation or application has been made on the subject, and it has not therefore been under consideration.

THE PENSIONERS OF 1812-15.

Mr. BLAIN asked whether, as some of the pensioners of 1812-15 died after the vote of last Session but before the amount was paid over, it is the intention of the Government to pay the amount appropriated under the vote to such of the friends or relations of deceased as attended them in illness and saw them interred?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—It is not the intention of the Government to pay these claims.

VICTORIA POST OFFICE.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked, do the Government intend to pay debts contracted and due about eighteen months ago respecting the post office, Victoria, by the Post Office Inspector with certain mechanics of that place? If so, when? If not, why?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government will pay all debts contracted by officers authorized to contract them.

Mr. DECOSMOS—What about this particular case?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said although they were unauthorized, and it was irregular and improper for Mr. Wallace to order anything, still what appeared to be essential would be paid for.

PUBLIC RESERVES AND BUILDINGS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked when do the Government intend to transfer to the Province of British Columbia for Provincial purposes certain public reserves and public buildings for which application has been made at various times between 1871 and 1876?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I indicated to Mr. Walkem, when he was here last and mentioned the subject, the lots which I believed the Government would be willing to give to the Local Government, but I never heard from him after he returned to British Columbia, and in consequence the matter dropped.

LAND RESERVES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked did the Government send any telegram, despatches or Minutes of Council in 1874 or 1875 to the Government of British Columbia requesting the latter to make provision by Statute or Order in Council for the conveyance to the Dominion of a belt of land 20 miles wide along the line of the proposed railway between Esquimaux and Nanaimo? If so, will the Government bring down all the papers connected with such request?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have no objection to bringing down all the papers. There is nothing except an Order in Council and the letter communicating it to the Local Government.

LINGAN HARBOUR.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) asked whether it is the intention of the Government to send one of the Government steam dredges to deepen the bar at the entrance of the Harbour at Lingan this year, according to promise made last Session?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have no recollection of making any such promise. I can only have said the Government would do the best they could with the dredges. I can say nothing more now; but my impression is there are several harbours considerably more important as to trade which have to be attended to by the five dredges which are in operation.

THE NAVIGATION OF AMERICAN CANALS.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all papers and correspondence with the Colonial Office, or with the Government of the United States, in regard to the apparent violation of the Washington Treaty in denying Canada the free navigation of the United States Canals, in accordance with that Treaty.

He said he regarded this matter as a real violation of the Washington Treaty, although he merely termed it an apparent violation in his motion. In the Treaty of 1854 this very question was included in almost the same shape as in the Washington Treaty. Two years had now passed since the ratification of the Washington Treaty, and nothing had been done to bring about the reciprocal navigation of the canals and inland waters of the United States. In the Washington Treaty the United States undertook to secure to Her Majesty's subjects the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal and the State canals on terms of equality with inhabitants of the United States. That portion of the Treaty had not been carried out. Canadian boats were stopped by the Custom House authorities of the United States, under an old Act which had not been repealed, and if the American Government desired to carry out the provisions of the Treaty they certainly would repeal that Act. The result of the action of the United States was that the trade of this country was conveyed to Albany and New York, in American instead of Canadian bottoms. A good deal of correspondence had taken place between the United States and the Imperial authorities on the subject during the last four or five years, but no satisfactory result, apparently, was being brought about. It might be said that it would be impolitic to lay these matters before the House. He did not think this would be the case, and he was of opinion that in Canada we were better able to judge of the question than those living at a great distance from the country. He hoped the Government would see fit to give the information required.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE doubted whether it would be advisable to bring down the correspondence on the question at the present time, and he would request the hon. gentleman, if he pressed his motion, that there should be a distinct understanding that the Government might bring down very little of the information, and perhaps it might be advisable to bring nothing down. The motion could only pass on that understanding. He thought the words "apparent violation of the Washington Treaty" should not be on the Journals of the House. If the motion were altered so as to read—"In regard to the action of the United States in denying the free navigation of the canals of the United States," then he would not object to the motion.

Mr. JONES—I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the returns could not be complete, because the Government were now in communication with the United States on the subject; therefore it would not be advisable to publish some of the correspondence the Government was in possession of. The same reasons made it undesirable to discuss the matter then.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was satisfied that his hon. friend would agree to the suggestions made. The discussion of a matter which was the subject of diplomatic correspondence might not only embarrass, but actually obstruct the negotiations of the Government.

Mr. JONES agreed to the suggestion and the motion was carried.

THE DEEP-WATER TERMINUS OF THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. PALMER moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement showing the amount which the Government of Canada have incurred in the construction of the branch of the Intercolonial Railway around Courtney Bay towards the ballast wharf at the city of St. John, New Brunswick; also copies of all correspondence between any of the authorities of the said city and any person on behalf of the Government with reference to the terms on which the Government was allowed to build that work on property belonging to the city; and copies of all correspondence for the purchase of the Rankin wharf property for a deep-water terminus for the said railway, and of the estimate of the cost of securing and construction of such terminus. He said that the work as far as it had proceeded had cut off the city from the sea, and he understood that the Government had been allowed to build these works over the city property in consideration of their making the terminus of the railway at the Ballast wharf. It was said that the Government had abandoned this work entirely after expending certainty not less than $100,000 or $150,000 upon it. When he (Mr. Palmer) had asked them a question on this subject the Hon. the First Minister reported that he was not aware that any parties had claimed their property had been injured by the prosecution of this work so far. He, however, had since discovered that the Mayor of St. John had, some time previous to the answer being given, written to the Department stating that such was the case. It was perfectly clear, moreover, there would be a very large injury to the property of the city unless the work was completed. If completed, instead of being an injury, it would be a benefit, because then it would be utilized in making the approach by the railway to this property. Having some very considerable local knowledge in reference to this matter, he wished to say to the Minister of Public Works he thought Rankin's wharf was entirely unsuited for a deep-water terminus, being extremely difficult of approach and the water not being deep enough. However, that was a matter for the engineers to determine. The people were a good deal excited about the subject, and the city was now claiming damages for loss to property which they had allowed the Government to use on the understanding this work would be completed. Before the House was asked to vote any sum for the purpose of making a deep-water terminus, they should be in possession of the information he asked for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said some of the papers could not be brought down, but most of them would be submitted. The expenditure for the purchase of land up to the present time was $115,111. He could not agree in the opinion that if the railroad were carried no further it would be any more an obstruction to that part of the city than if it were carried the whole way. A considerable portion of the road would be useful under any circumstances.

Mr. DOMVILLE—Not at all. It is perfectly useless. I speak from personal knowledge.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the question the Government had to consider was what was best in the public interest, and if it were possible to harmonize it with the interest of the City of St. John, it should be done. The Government had the impression that the city sought to impose onerous conditions on them. It was originally agreed by the City Council that the Government should have possession of the frontage to Reid's wharf. This was afterwards recoded from. At all events the Government were convinced it would not suit their purpose except at an enormous expenditure to go to the Ballast Wharf and construct works that would be absolutely necessary there in order to secure accommodation for the large traffic anticipated. It was yet undetermined to what point they might go, but it was likely it would be determined very soon. They had to keep in view in considering that determination not merely what would be requisite for the traffic, but what would suit the harbour, and also what would be most likely to answer for connecting with the roads owned on the other side of the harbour.

He had no strong impression about the bridge himself, but if there was to be one it must be constructed either on the upper side of the suspension bridge at the falls, or across Navy Island. We might fairly look forward to the time when complete railway communication could be had from New York and Boston to the most eastern point of Nova Scotia, and with the straightening on various places, we might expect to see a large portion of a certain kind of traffic carried over it. Any arrangements made in connection with the St. John terminus of the Government lines ought to be made with a view to having them as convenient as possible for the anticipated trade. Of the present vote there was a sum of $20,000 which had been awarded to the heirs of some estate—he believed the Chipman estate—that might be demanded at any time. There had been some legal difficulty about the matter.

Mr. DOMVILLE hoped that the Government would pause before determining to do anything in connection with this matter. He only wished to benefit the City of St. John in the selection of the place; and the Minister of Customs knew that Rankin's wharf was not fit for a deep water terminus. This was not to be gainsaid. As far as railway requirements were concerned, the proper location was above the suspension bridge. The city had voted a sum of money to a company on condition that a bridge was built above the falls; but this had not been done, and the Company had applied two years ago for a charter to bridge the river or harbour where it would interfere with the rights of the people and cause a toll to be levied on the inhabitants of both sides. No doubt the Government railway must connect with the western extension in time; but why this should be done at the sacrifice of the public interests he could not understand. The railway in question was hopelessly bankrupt, and the bondholders in England had contemplated foreclosure. He had been asked, when in London, who could be put in charge of it. He hoped that the Premier would endeavour to meet the views of the citizens of St. John, though of course without sacrificing the interests of the Dominion in this connection.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE assured the hon. gentleman that he considered nothing regarding this matter save the general good. He had no idea where the terminus was to be selected, whether near Ballast wharf, or up towards Rankin's wharf. He was quite willing to leave it to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. DOMVILLE disclaimed intimating that the Minister of Customs had any personal interest in view, and thought that the hon. gentleman, as a representative of St. John, should urge the Premier to place the terminus where it would most benefit the city.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE had no doubt that the Premier would be governed by the representations made on the part of the city on this subject. He had always, and was still, of the opinion that the bridge should be built where the suspension bridge now was.

Mr. DOMVILLE enquired if the hon. gentleman would use his influence to have the matters at issue submitted to arbitration?

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—This is to be dealt with by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PALMER hoped that the road would be made continuous. A drawbridge at Navy Island, would be utterly destructive to the city's interests, as the current and tide run at this point at the rate of seven miles an hour. He put it to the Premier whether the question of a continuous line had anything to do with that of a deep-water terminus? He could see no connection between them. It would be much better to choose the latter at Ballast Wharf, where land was cheap, than in a thickly settled part of the city. He did not wish to obtain any confidential communications; but the House should be informed of the estimate of the probable cost of the work. The people of St. John could not comprehend why this should not be given, as they were confident that the Government had been misled with regard to this matter. If the location of the terminus at Rankin's wharf, including the price of the property, would cost less than at Ballast wharf, as was represented, then he would admit that he knew nothing of the subject. He hoped that the matter was not finally settled, as the change of terminus in the future would involve enormous expenditure.

Mr. KILLAM stated that many who did not live in St. John thought that if the city did the proper thing it should give the right of way to Ballast Wharf, and not leave it to arbitration.

Mr. PALMER—It did do it; and besides offered to give a large piece of land at Ballast wharf.

Mr. KILLAM—No! no!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — They asked $100,000 for the land at Ballast Wharf.

Mr. KILLAM held that the city demanded an exorbitant price for this property. This was in part the reason why work had been stopped. He hoped that the Government would not proceed in this regard until the city took a proper view of the subject. He admitted that a bridge at Navy Island would do injury to the city, as the harbour was small and the current rapid. The city was seeking to make money at the expense of the Dominion.

Mr. McLEOD said there was considerable diversity of opinion as to where the deep-water terminus should be. It occurred to him, looking at the question from its various stand points, that if the river were dredged above the falls and the terminus were placed where they were crossing the river, that such an arrangement would suit the city of St. John best.

Mr. PALMER.

Mr. PALMER wished to state that when the Government found they required more property for this work, the city authorities said they would give all the land they offered at first and allow Government arbitrators to value the additional property they required. He wondered if the town of Yarmouth made so liberal an offer?

Mr. KILLAM—The town gave all the land required for the right of way.

The motion was carried.

HUDSON AND JAMES BAYS EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement showing imports during the fiscal year 1874-5 into the North-West Territories through ports on the Hudson and James Bays together with exports from the same; names of, and remuneration paid to persons employed by the Government at the said ports, together with the instructions furnished them by the Government, and reports made by them to the Customs Department.

He said that he wished to direct attention to this matter because he could learn nothing from the public accounts of last year, except that a Mr. Fortesque is a sub-Collector of the Government with a remuneration of $200 per year. Now, there is a person of this name who is an officer of the Hudson Bay Company, at York Factory, in Hudson Bay, but he (Mr. Schultz) scarcely thought it possible that the Government should place itself at the mercy of any large importer of dutiable goods by employing one of the employes of the importer to collect the duties and make the returns. In this particular case the imports and the exports are large, and yet the trade and navigation returns do not give that exact information which the motion seeks. It seems quite clear that the Government interests in these regions are great enough to warrant the employment of a special Revenue Officer. There is in these Bays themselves and on their shores the possibility of a great trade for Canada. From very credible sources he (Mr. Schultz) learned that at Paint-

Hills and on Paint Islands, in James Bay, there is a vein of magnetic iron ore, which when examined by a practical English miner in 1865 was pronounced to be one of the largest and most valuable veins of that mineral in existence. Graphite or plumbago in a very pure state is also found at the same place. Galena is very abundant along the east coast, and a quantity sent to England was found when assayed to contain 80 per cent. of lead and 8 per cent. of silver. Coal is also said to exist near the Little Whale River, and the Esquimaux report iron mines on the mainland near Hudson Straits. All this mineral wealth is especially valuable because found on the shores and near the excellent harbours to be found in these bays. There is also a very large fishing interest in these regions. Immense numbers of white porpoise or arctic whales annually visit the Hudson and James Bays, where they enter the rivers, and could in these rivers as well as on the shores of the Bay be properly fished. The Hudson Bay Company, who carried on business in two of these rivers captured 7,749 of these fish, which yielded 768 tons of oil worth upwards of £27,000 stg. in the London market. Porpoise skins are also a valuable article of trade, a very superior sort of leather being made from them. On the islands of the bay, seals are to be found in great numbers, as well as the walrus and the polar bear. Salmon are abundant in the rivers, which drain the range known as the South Belshaves, and cod-fish are also abundant about Hudson Strait. In view of the importance of the trade possible in these regions, he (Mr. Schultz) hoped that the Government would give all information in their power, and that they would take into consideration the anomaly of appointing the employee of the principal importers to take charge of the very important direct and indirect interests of Government in this region.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said they would bring down all the information they had on the subject in the Department, and in the office at Sault St. Marie, where all the returns were made. The Collector at the Sault visited the district once a year and made an examination of all the entries, manifests and books of the district. He had also to state that every safeguard possible had been placed on the collection of the revenue by the Department.

Mr. SCHULTZ thanked the Hon. Minister of Customs for the promise that all the information would be brought down. But he also desired to know why the Government employed an employé of the importer to collect their duties?

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said this was a very exceptional case. It was impossible to get people there to act as Custom House Officers unless they took some responsible man on the spot. The Government found that this service had been done for many years by one of the agents of the Hudson Bay Company there, and they had not seen their way clear to get any one else to take the position for the small salary they paid. They could not pay a large salary, as the revenue collected was very small.

The motion was carried.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for the Reports of 1874 and 1875 of the engineer in charge of the British Columbia section of the Western Division of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

He said that it was agreed at the inception of this work that the survey should be completed in two years. Since then over five years had elapsed, and very little was known by the people of the country as to what had been done upon that survey, which ought to have been completed long ago. He showed how expeditiously the Central Pacific Railroad Company had conducted their surveys in that part of the country, and condemned the Government for not proceeding more rapidly with the survey.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he must ask the hon. gentleman not to press his motion. The report of Mr. Sandford Fleming, of 1874, was all that could be made public in regard to these surveys. The reports of Mr. Smith made to Mr. Fleming he could not promise to bring down, as they consisted to a great extent of confidential letters, and would not be proper documents to publish in the shape sent down. If the hon. gentleman desired any specific information on the subject he had no objection to give it, but he did object to the motion in the way it was put.

Mr. DECOSMOS thought the report of the engineer of the Western Division should be placed before the House prior to the discussion of this subject.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) considered it important that these reports should be laid before the House. The Government had promised that the utmost diligence should be used in the forwarding of these surveys, and it was necessary they should have the reports before them in order to ascertain if the promise of the House had been carried out. The Session of 1876 had arrived and they had no more definite information as to the surveys than they had in 1874, and if they were to judge of the future from the past years and years untold would roll by before they would arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the route to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he hoped the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion. All the information up to 30th June was in the Public Works Report. If subsequent information would be produced in the chief engineers report which he has in preparation.

Mr. BUNSTER said he reluctantly consented to withdraw the motion, hoping, however, that the Hon. Premier would give all the information he could as fast as possible,

The motion was withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS IN BANKS.

Mr. BOWELL moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement of all moneys lying at the credit of the Dominion in any bank, or in the hands of any financial agent, or other person with whom such moneys are deposited in Canada or elsewhere, said statement to show:—
1st. The amount to the credit of the Dominion in each Bank on the last day of each month from December, 1873, to December, 1875, inclusive. 2nd. The amounts drawing interest at the close of each month in the different Banks and the rate and the amounts on demand not drawing interest. 3rd. The amounts on deposit in the hands of Canadian banks, financial agents or other persons in England or elsewhere other than in the Dominion, and the rate of interest, if any, received upon said deposits. He said the information sought for by this motion had, to a very great extent, been furnished by the returns which had been laid on the table since his motion had been put upon the notice paper. Still, in looking over the Finance Minister's statements and comparing them with the official returns in the Gazette, he found such large discrepancies between the two that he thought it was well to call the attention of the House and the country to the facts, more particularly when he remembered that in a discussion which had recently taken place, the Finance Minister stated that the large amounts which were lying on demand in the Banks were not necessarily drawing no interest. On looking over the returns furnished by the Auditor General, however, he (Mr. Bowell) found that none of this money lying on demand in the banks drew interest. He thought some arrangement should be made with the Banks so as to secure some interest upon demand deposits, as was done with private individuals when they had running accounts and large deposits to their credit. When the Finance Minister made the statement to the House that deposits on demand were not necessarily without interest, no doubt he did so with the object of conveying to the country the impression that portions of these sums did draw interest. That was the inference drawn from it by himself and others, which the facts did not warrant. The amounts lying in the different banks, on demand, and bearing no interest, in 1874-5, were:—

1874.

July	$4,909,595 00
August	3,170,344 29
September	3,995,391 81
October	5,233,667 70
November	4,873,623 23
December	4,875,496 39

1875.

January	4,999,612	47
February	3,194,740	48
March.....	3,843,957	73
April.....	3,916,996	47
May.....	3,985,324	70
June.....	3,548,781	85
July.....	4,227,130	89

Now, it seemed to him, some system might be adopted by which interest on these large amounts might be saved to the country, instead of, as was now done, lending it in the Banks thereby enabling them to encourage speculation by increasing their discounts largely, and sharing the profits among the stockholders at the expense of the people. The effect of this system was exemplified when the Finance Minister issued his circular informing the Banks that it would be necessary for them to pay the sums which they had lying at the credit of the Dominion. Expecting to have to pay these large amounts they were obliged to restrict their banking accommodation to the people of the country, and the result was almost a panic. The House had been informed by the hon. member for Montreal West that the effect of the issuing of this circular had on the country, was of a very serious character—that had the money demanded been paid at the time, it would not only have injured some of the weak Banks, but in all probability might have driven them to the wall. It had also been stated that the Government, and more particularly the Finance Minister, deserved very great credit for not putting his order in force and enforcing payment of that money, thus enabling the Banks to go on and continue their discounting without interfering with the business of the country. He was also given great credit for having gone to England and borrowed money instead of demanding from the Banks that which really belonged to the public—in other words, that he deserved praise for using the credit of Canada to borrow money while they had sufficient for all their requirements but allowed it to remain in the hands of private bankers for the benefit of their stockholders. He (Mr. Bowell) believed he could show that this money had been distributed largely among those Banks which were able to bring and did bring the largest amount of political influence to bear in favour of the Government; and that at one time one of the Banks had on deposit a sum nearly equal to 50 per cent. of its paid up capital.

He would refer to only a few months of each year to show how unequal this money had been distributed. The Bank of Montreal, with a paid up capital of $11,961,400 had the following Dominion deposits in 1873:—

	On Demand.	At Interest.
Dec. 1873,...	$1,807,369	$1,500,000
April 1874....	3,807,600	2,000,000
July " ...	2,389,885	2,000,000
Oct. " ...	3,613,579	2,973,333
Dec. " ...	3,055,568	2,973,333
April 1875 ...	1,769,414	2,473,333
July " ..	1,385,614	1,500,000
Oct. " ..	1,394,485	1,000,000
Dec. " ...	1,298,701	1,000,000

The Bank of Commerce with a capital paid up of $6,000,000, but which did not appear to be in great favour with the Government, had the following deposits:—

	On Demand.	At Interest.
April 1874....	$ 54,953	$ 50,000
July " ...	497,027	50,000
Dec. " ...	494,725	539,888
April 1875....	236,983	539,888
July "	129,513	434,888
Oct. "	24,891	288,888
Dec. " ...	255,206

The Merchants Bank, with a paid up capital of $7,146,000 had only the following deposits:—

	On Demand.	At Interest.
Dec. 1873 ...	$375,362
April 1874...	358,197
July "	382,749
Dec. "	300,675
April 1875....	$325,186
July "	189,289
Oct. "	163,822
Dec. "	185,196

Such were the returns for the larger Banks; he now desired to call attention to the Dominion accounts during the same period in the Ontario Bank, which had a paid up capital of only $2,932,752. In December, 1873, he found by the Gazette returns that the Ontario Bank had on deposit but $180,491 on demand. In January, 1874, it had $214,463, in February $273,780.

March, $291,361; and April $300,468. During these months, January, February, March and April, there were no interest-bearing deposits in this Bank to the credit of the Government. In May, however, $238,906 was on deposit on demand, and $192,765 drawing interest; the deposits for June he was unable to find owing to the fact that the statement was not contained in the Gazette. The table continued as follows:—

	On Demand.	At Interest.
July 1874...	$280,642	$196,416
August.....	303,658	246,416
September..	336,088	440,861
October.....	336,088	440,861
November..	361,455	440,861
December..	370,991	440,861
Jan. 1865....	314,624	440,861
February...	347,129	462,527
March.....	377,128	547,527
April.....	353,609	669,194

He found in addition, from the returns moved for in the Senate during the last Session of Parliament, that there were at the credit of this Bank in England during the month of April the sum of $243,333.33, but he did not know whether it bore interest or not, as the returns did not show it, and of course he had no other means of obtaining the information.

Taking the amounts deposited in England, and at interest and demand in Canada, the total deposit to the credit of the Dominion in the Ontario Bank at that time reached the figure of $1,267,137.04, proving the truth of what he had said a short time previously — that the deposits for that month in the Ontario Bank were almost equal to 50 per cent. of the whole paid-up capital upon which to speculate at the expense of the people of the Dominion. Whether the country held any security for so large a sum he did not know, nor did the country, for such information had not been vouchsafed. In May, the Bank held on the part of the Government, $359,331 on demand, and $669,194 at interest; and in June, $389,666 on demand, and $669,194 at interest. In July, however, these deposits were changed, for we find that the non-interest bearing deposits were increased from $389,666 to $611,302, while the interest bearing account was reduced from $669,194 to $206,666, showing that the Government had either placed on deposit from funds then at their disposal, a very large sum to the credit of the non-bearing interest account, and had used a considerable amount which was bearing interest; or had drawn from the interest bearing deposits over $300,000 and added it to the non-bearing interest account. He trusted the Finance Minister would explain why this large sum was carried from the interest to the non-interest bearing account. To the non-initiated, who formed their conclusions from the returns published in the Gazette, these figures presented a most extraordinary spectacle.

In August of the same year, the non-bearing interest deposits amounted to $500,456, and the interest account to $208,391. In September, $598,084 on demand, and $209,591 at interest. In October the former was $597,752, while the interest-bearing deposits had been altogether withdrawn. In November, the non-interest bearing deposits were $583,427 and the interest bearing account was a blank. In December $428,686 were deposited bearing no interest, while $100,000 bore interest; proving that whether the President of this Institution was so or not, the Bank was certainly a favourite with the Government for some reason or other. Either it afforded better facilities for doing business than any other Bank and was considered more solvent; or what is more likely these large deposits were given to the Bank in recognition of political services rendered by its President, the Hon. John Simpson.

This was not all. When he compared these figures with the official returns sent down by Mr. Langton, the Auditor General, and laid before the House, he discovered that the figures of one or the other were totally unreliable, for in fact no one taking both statements into consideration could come to any correct conclusion whatever. The discrepancy between the two was of the most extraordinary character, extending to hundreds of thousands. He would, however, only refer to the interest-bearing accounts and exhibit the difference existing between the returns made by the Ontario Bank and published monthly in the Official Gazette, and the sums given as being in the Bank in the statement submitted by the Finance Minister. The table was as follows:—

Official Gazette Return.	Finance Minister's Statement.
1874.
July . . . $196,416	$196,416
August . . . 246,416	196,416
September 440,861	196,416
October . . 440,861	196,416
November 440,861	196,416
December 440,861	440,861
1875.
January . . 440,861	440,861
February . 462,527	440,861
March . . . 547,527	340,861
April . . . 669,194	340,861
May 669,194	340,861
June 669,194	340,861
July 206,666	340,861

Beyond this the returns submitted to Parliament did not go, and he had no means at his disposal for making future comparisons; but the wide discrepancies above displayed would certainly strike the House as being somewhat strange and unaccountable.

One thing, at all events, was certain, both returns could not be right. It might, and no doubt would be said by the Finance Minister, that those published by the Bank dated to the end of the month, while those brought down by the Finance Minister were to the first of the month; still he thought the House could scarcely be convinced that such a remarkable discrepancy as that between $669,000, and $340,000 should not only exist in one month, but should be continued for three or four months without any change.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I will save the hon. gentleman the trouble of wasting the time of the House over that point,—it is quite evident that the Ontario Bank included the amount it held in England during these four months.

Mr. BOWELL—If this be granted, then it only shows the necessity of adopting some other system in order that these figures, when published, may be comprehended by the general public. If the balances in England were added to the Ontario Bank, then why did not the Finance Minister show that in his return so as to avoid misapprehension?

He found, however, that even with the aid of this interpretation they could not arrive at a correct solution of the problem. Taking the average totals as submitted by the Finance Minister and comparing them with those given in the Gazette for the same months, it would be seen that they did not tally; the difference on the whole for the thirteen months, it is true, was only $4,545, but when he took the same totals and compared them with the figures relating exclusively to the Ontario Bank, he discovered a discrepancy of no less than $210,556. The average totals as per the Official Gazette for the thirteen months, ending July last, was $820,017, while Mr. Langton's average for the same period was only $609,461, making a difference of $210,556; so that if the statement of the Finance Minister were correct, that the deposits which the Ontario Bank had bearing interest in England and elsewhere accounted for the discrepancy between the returns, it certainly did not explain this discrepancy, at least, nor did they explain what had become of the $210,556. This might all appear strange to some, but it would not so seem to those who had watched the course of events during the last two or three years, particularly as they referred to the favoured Ontario Bank. In this country the people would naturally ask why a bank having but between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 of paid up capital, should have had so large an amount of Dominion money deposited with it without interest, while those Banks and moneyed institutions having a paid up capital three or four times as large, should not have had as much. He thought it could be better understood in the light of past events, and by looking at the political aspect of the whole question. A few years ago this Bank had not so much money at its disposal as it had had of late. The political parties of the country had changed places, and a change in the administration of the affairs of the country took place. An election followed, and his hon. friend, the Finance Minister, made a political tour through the central portion of the country. The hon. gentleman visited South Ontario, as well as his (Mr. Bowell's) county, of which he had no reason to complain; for the result of his visit to North Hastings in one township alone was to increase his (Mr. Bowell's) majority from 38 to between 80 or 90. However, shortly after the hon. gentleman's visit to South Ontario, the present occupant of the seat for that riding became a candidate, and they found the President of the Ontario Bank issuing a circular to his friends and bank customers in that riding, in which he not only asked for the support of his friends, but he notified his bank managers in the different parts of the riding to do the same. For the information of those who had not seen the circular he would read it, and he was sure those who had read it before would be delighted to have their memories refreshed, and to those who had not read it, it would be a source of information, showing how elections were carried in Ontario. He was satisfied that this letter, together with the figures he had given to the House, would enable hon. members to understand why the Ontario Bank had received so much greater favour than other banks throughout the Dominion. The letter was principally as follows:—

"BOWMANVILLE, Jan. 17th, 1874.

"———, Esq.,

"DEAR SIR,—Although I am not disposed to oppose Mr. Gibbs on personal grounds in the approaching elections, still, as one who has laboured long and hard to promote the interests of Canada, I now ask my friends to support men who will support the present Government, for the following reasons:—

"Because many of the men forming the present Government are my personal and esteemed friends.

"Because, if the present Government is sustained, I will be able through them to get justice for our party in needful appointments and otherwise.

"Because, if they are sustained, our bank and other Ontario banks—and through them the country—will have the use of the Government surplus until required.

"May I ask you to give my old friend, Mr. Cameron, your candid and honest support?

"I am, yours truly,

"J. SIMPSON."

The President of the Bank in this instance had certainly shown a marked degree of penetration. He saw that if his friends were sustained the result would be beneficial to himself, his bank, and his shareholders. The result was as anticipated, and as he (Mr. Bowell) had shown. The country believed, and there could be no doubt that these favours had been conferred in consideration of services then rendered in defeating the Hon. Mr. Gibbs, and assisting in the election of Mr. Malcolm Cameron. But this undue influence did not stop here. So impressed was the Hon. Mr. Simpson with the fact that he was to receive great benefits from the Government in power that his bank managers were instructed and did send out letters, of which the following is an extract:—

Mr. BOWELL.

"We," that is, the Bank, "are largely interested in the success of the present Government as their continuance in power will add largely to the success and prosperity of the Bank. Our President, the Hon John Simpson, is calling upon all our friends to give us a hand for Mr. Cameron, and he would esteem it a great favour if you could give us a helping hand along with our many other friends."

Putting the President's and the Bank Manager's letters together, and looking at the official returns, he thought they might safely say that that President not only made a "big push" but a successful "push" in the direction of receiving large bank deposit which enabled him to do business upon the money of the Dominion, and declare large dividends to his stockholders at the expense of the country,—by having the money on deposit without interest—at rates ranging from 8 to 10 per cent. Are these facts not sufficient to cause people to ask whether some other system could not be adopted by which the country should receive benefits for the immense amounts now deposited with the banks, without any benefits being received to the country therefrom? It might be argued that these banks were liable to be required to pay over the money at any moment, and that they should, in consequence, receive some benefits for this; but as arrangements were made by private individuals by which they received a certain amount of interest on deposits, with the right to draw at any moment, he could not see why the country should not be placed in the same position particularly when they had seen that the effect of the Government demanding its own money had been to materially affect the trade interests of the country. The interests of the country demanded that the system should be changed. Looking over these bank statements and returns of the Finance Minister, and the effect a sudden call had upon weak banks for this deposit and the trade of the country, he deemed it his duty to enter his protest against the continuance of a system of this kind, which enabled the Government to remunerate their political friends with the money which belonged to the whole people.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had no objection to the motion passing, but he desired the return to be made up in such a way as to include the years 1871 and 1872, because it was desirable that the House should see exactly how these matters were managed during the two previous years. He could not help thinking it would have been wiser if the hon. gentleman had waited until the returns had been brought down before he made the speech he had just delivered. Had he done so, he would have had reason to modify several of his statements. He would call the hon. gentleman's attention to some two or three patent errors into which he had fallen, without entering upon a detailed criticism of his observations. In the first place, the discrepancy between the statement of bank balances as brought down by Mr. Langton in obedience to the demand of the Public Accounts Committee, and those published in the Banking Gazette was entirely attributable to the fact that they were made up to different dates, and dates at which there would be always a considerable variation in the balances. He might remark for the hon. gentleman's special information (and he seemed to require a good deal of information apart from that he had moved for) that considerable differences would always be found between a bank statement on the last day of the month, and a bank statement on the first day of the month. As a general thing, it would be found desirable, when the Government were in the habit of paying in or drawing large sums from banks that the money should be paid in or withdrawn on the first day of each month. With regard to other matters to which the hon. gentleman had referred, if he desired to have the Auditor General examined before the Public Accounts Committee, he had no doubt satisfactory explanations would be given of the apparent discrepancies. It might possibly be that the returns in his office to some extent differed from those of the banks, because sometimes entry warrants were passed which might not be presented to the various companies on which they were drawn for several days, or, in some instances, for weeks after they were returned to the department. With respect to the statement as to the Ontario Bank, he begged to reiterate his statement made in answer to the statement of the hon member for Cumberland. He stated then what was the fact, that up to June 30th, 1875, instead of their being $600,000 deposited with that bank, without interest, that there was only about half that amount. The sums given in the Gazette were divided into sums at demand and sums not at demand. Nothing was said as to whether they bore interest or not. With regard to the hon. gentleman's question as to whether it was desirable for the Government to charge interest on sums which they were likely to use and which they would require to have absolutely at their command, he thought the hon. member for Cumberland had laid down a very correct rule in his remarks on that subject some days ago.

It was stated then by that hon. gentleman that in his judgment money was of no use to a bank unless it had the control of it for a considerable time, and he was quite right in so stating. The position both of this Government and of the late Administration with respect to those bank balances was this: enormous expenditures were going on, amounting to something like forty or forty-two millions of dollars in a single year, and ranging sometimes from three to eight, or even twelve millions in a single month. Moreover, under the legal tender system to which the Government was pledged, it was necessary to keep large sums on hand. That was one ground on which he (Mr. Cartwright) had opposed the introduction of the legal tender system at all. He had not in the slightest degree altered his opinion of that measure by which promises to pay had been substituted for one-half of the gold reserve of the country. No doubt there were conveniences attendant upon it, but the disadvantage inherent in the system was this: the Government were always obliged to keep, in addition to the gold reserve, a very considerable amount absolutely at call, and he doubted very much whether it would be expedient for a Government, however it might for an individual, to demand interest on sums so deposited. He had invariably found where interest was demanded, the banker was sure to endeavour to obtain some return for it. If it was desired that the public at large should not be embarrassed by having their accommodation curtailed, it would be necessary not to demand interest of money held at call. The reason was so clear that it was not necessary for him to lay down more than the general principal that in this country, while we have such enormous expenditures going on, a large amount of money must be held at demand, and it would not be wise in the public interest to exact much return for it. With reference to the distribution of these sums, any hon. gentleman could easily understand it was advisable the Finance Minister of any Government should not render an account of the precise reasons which induced them to withdraw deposits from certain banks. Special reasons might exist for it, and it was better in the public interest that the Government should be supposed even to act capriciously than that they should be understood to withdraw because a bank was not considered safe. Some of our largest banks had declined on more than one occasion to take considerable sums of money which he would have liked to deposit with them, for the simple reason they had no means of employing it profitably in their business at the moment. That was one reason why some banks had received a smaller amount than others. Another consideration, which had more or less influenced the Government was this: sometimes they were put to considerable shifts to get out small notes. That was a difficulty which would always exist unless the Government had a monopoly of the whole circulation, or engaged in the actual practical business of banking. There always would be some difficulty in supplying ones and twos which were the denominations to the use of which they were confined. On more than one occasion he had found it necessary, for the convenience of the public, to give sums of twenty or thirty thousand dollars in small notes to the various minor banks for the purpose of getting them into circulation. He might also observe that if he were to remove deposits from some of these banks the only result would be that they (the banks) would be obliged to apply for gold for the Dominion notes, and that the reduction of their deposits might lead the public to suppose they were dangerously weakened. He did not say it was advisable that banks in such a position should have large deposits, but it was one of the reasons why sums deposited should not be hastily withdrawn. Under the operation of the Legal Tender Act, the position of these banks had been mixed up with that of the Government as regarded the amount of legal tenders which they desired to keep out; and that would continue to be a source of some considerable inconvenience, and in some cases of possible danger, to the stability of these institutions. Last Session, with a view to reducing this danger to a minimum, he had introduced a provision in the Banking Act, which required the Government to hold gold only for everything over $12,000,000, and fifty per cent. of gold for all issues over $9,000,000; and he thought as the population and trade of the country increased, it would, by the natural expansion of its reserves and of its banking capital, grow out of that system which contained within it certain elements of danger. As to the question to what extent the Government were the cause by removals of deposits, of the commercial panic which occurred in June, 1875, he thought a very cursory review of the bank balance on the first day of each month in 1874-5—particularly those of Ontario and Quebec, which were the only Provinces in which it had been asserted the balances had been violently disturbed—would show conclusively there was extremely little ground for that assertion. So far from there being any violent disturbance or oscillation in the bank balances, they were remarkably constant during the thirteen months from July, 1874, to July, 1875. On the 1st of July, 1874, after paying the subsidies, there was nearly $8,000,000 in the Ontario and Quebec Banks, at interest, or in ordinary cash. On the 1st of July, 1875, after payment of subsidies, there was $8,114,000 in the self-same banks, showing that the disturbance between these two periods had amounted merely to $114,000. The only other disturbance was due to paying a large amount of seigniorial indemnity, for which a considerable sum had been brought from England. So far from this measure producing a panic, it was very considerably instrumental in sustaining the credit of country, and in bringing in capital, which was certainly more or less needed at that time, as a permanent investment. As to the sum total it would be advisable to keep in hand, it must be remembered that as our Dominion extends, as we take in new Provinces, and commence various great public works, it will be necessary to maintain a very considerable amount of money at certain points, more than would ordinarily be required. In the Ontario and Quebec Banks, where the chief reserves were, the Government very rarely had more than some $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 lying available, and of that, the largest proportion had been in the Bank of Montreal, their chief fiscal agent. The disturbance which had occurred almost invariably happened in the cash on deposit in that bank. He had been assured that not only had the Montreal Bank taken pains in their management to avoid in any way curtailing the accommodation to their customers when the Government made demands on them, but in order to strengthen credit here, they had drawn large sums from their reserves in foreign countries to enable them to accommodate the Canadian public, and render assistance to other institutions which might be in want of it. He desired that to be thoroughly understood, because he had always made it a point of policy in dealing with our banks, to impress upon them the desirability of not allowing the balance placed in their hands to go to their customers so as to avert the disturbances which he had been charged with having caused. Every possible precaution had been taken to prevent these sums being used in that way. This system of making large deposits in the various banks of Canada had not been inaugurated by him, but was one he had found in full operation when he entered on the duties of this office, and the relative increase was vastly less from 1873 to 1875 than in the two years preceding. He proposed to bring down a statement showing the amount on deposit on the first of every month, from December 1st, 1871, to December 1st, 1875.

At six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The Bill intituled an Act to incorporate the Canada Fire and Marine Insurance Company, was taken up.

Mr. WOOD, in reply to the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, explained that the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Thompson, Haldimand) — then absent — declined to change the name of the Company on the ground that under this title it had been doing business for some time.

Mr. DOMVILLE considered that a breach of faith had been committed in the neglect to alter the title; he gave notice that he would move that it should be changed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE enquired what Company at present existing bore a similar title.

Mr. DOMVILLE—The Canada Mutual Marine Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There is also a Canada Life Assurance Company; as long as the name is reasonably distinct, there is no ground for complaint.

The Bill was read the third time, on motion of Mr. Wood, and passed.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. Desjardins in the Chair, to consider the Bill intituled an Act to amend the Acts respecting the Citizens' Insurance and Investment Company, and reported the Bill.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee, Mr. Irving in the Chair, to consider the Bill intituled an Act to extend the time for the commencement and completion of the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway, and rising, reported it.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee, Mr. Oliver in the Chair, to consider the Bill intituled an Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Clifton Suspension Bridge Company, and rising, reported it.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee, Mr. Mills in the Chair, to consider the Bill entitled an Act to amend the Act to incorporate "The Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada," and rising, reported it.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF CATTLE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Mills in the Chair, to consider the Bill entitled an Act to amend the Act 38 Vict. Chap. 42, respecting the transportation of cattle by railway, or other mode of conveyance, within the Dominion of Canada, as amended by the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines—and rising, reported it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

INCORPORATION OF BOARDS OF TRADE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Macdonald (Toronto) in the Chair, to consider the Bill entitled an Act to amend the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 51, intituled an Act to authorize the incorporation of Boards of Trade in the Dominion—as amended by the Standing Committee of Banking and Commerce;—and rising, reported it.

It was read the third time, and passed.

THE INSPECTION ACT.

The House went into Committee, Mr. Killam in the Chair, to consider the Bill intituled an Act to amend the Act to make better provision for extending to the whole Dominion of Canada, the Act respecting the inspection of certain staple articles of Canadian produce—as amended by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. KIRK desired to learn why the clause relieving exporters of fish from the necessity of having them inspected had been struck out by the Committee? He was informed by the fishermen of his county that inspection was of no value to them whatever, and he could not see why—since flour exported need not be inspected—fish should not be an exception to this rule.

Mr. DAVIES thought that the hon. member was in error, as inspection was certainly of value.

Mr. YOUNG explained that the Committee, after long and careful discussion, decided almost unanimously—only two votes being contra—that fish exported should be inspected.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL agreed that this should be done, as inspection was of very great importance.

Mr. BUNSTER hoped that the words "excepting British Columbia" should be erased.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought that this erasure was desirable.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON explained that the original Act did not extend to British Columbia, in accordance with the desire of its representatives; also that the entry of the words "excepting British Columbia," was in harmony with all the previous legislation in this connection.

Mr. BUNSTER hoped that the law would be extended to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL urged that the omission of the words "British Columbia" would have this effect.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that no provision had been made for the inspection of fish in that Province.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON considered that they were not in possession of sufficient evidence to show that the extension requested was desired in the Province. He, however, would be very glad to see such legislation secured.

Mr. BUNSTER stated that fish being a principle article of export in British Columbia, they wished to have it inspected, in order to ensure the establishment of a world-wide reputation in this relation.

Mr. DECOSMOS did not agree with his hon. friend from Vancouver; he was of opinion that the inspection of fish oils would be an injury instead of a benefit to their trade. He hoped that the extension of the operation of this law to British Columbia would be deferred until the desire of the persons interested could be definitely ascertained.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON remarked that as the representatives of that Province were divided on the subject, the delay requested should be accorded.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought that the Committee should rise and report progress, in order to obtain the opinion of the Minister of Justice on the legal point in question.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that if at a future time they became satisfied that British Columbia really desired to secure the inspection of its fish, this would be granted.

Mr. BUNSTER accepted this explanation, and withdrew his proposition.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE, in view of the gradual destruction of the oyster beds at Caraquez, etc., urged the inspection of oysters.

Mr. FORBES did not think that this matter came within the purview of this Act, but simply appertained to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL held that it was for the House to take action in this connection if it was considered advisable.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE announced that the Government would take this question into consideration; in the meantime he advised, that this Bill should be allowed to pass in its present shape,

Mr. SPEAKER was of opinion that the inspection should take place at the oyster bed, and not at the place of sale. Reckless fishing, unfortunately, was not rare; but as regards size, care should be taken under such circumstances, as the Caraquez oyster was much smaller than the oyster obtained from the Prince Edward Island beds.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—It is one-fourth the size.

Mr. GILLMOR moved in amendment to clause B, that half-boxes should be twenty-two inches long, and four inches wide, and should contain not less than ten pounds of fish.—Carried.

The Committee rising, reported the Bill as amended.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ST. PETER'S CANAL.

The debate being resumed on the motion of Mr. Flynn, for an order of the House for a copy of the reports and plans made by Mr. Perley in the summer of 1873 for the enlargement of St. Peter's Canal, &c.,

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) stated that this canal was very important with relation to the shipping and other interests of the Lower Provinces. Somewhere about 1863-4 the Legislature of Nova Scotia had come to the conclusion that it was very desirable that the waters of Bras d'Or Lake and the Atlantic should be connected by canal; well aware of the benefits which would be derived from this undertaking, as dangerous navigation would thereby be avoided, and a plain, easy, and direct way provided for reaching the coal ports in that quarter.

Since then a much larger class of vessels had come into use, and it was found that the canal was at present neither deep nor wide enough for the purposes of trade. During the past year nearly 700 vessels and over 200 boats had passed through it. Vessels of 1,000 tons capacity were, however, compelled to take a circuitous route by Scattaree and Big Bras d'Or, and a great saving of time and expense would be effected if this canal were properly enlarged. The steamboats plying between Pictou and Prince Edward's Island, touching at Port Hawkesbury, could not use it owing to its narrowness and shallowness, and steamers bound to the lakes were obliged to go round through Big Bras d'Or. A steamer which came from Halifax to Sydney would pass through by this route if it were possible, and the delay in enlarging it was seriously detrimental to the interests of the settlement on Bras d'Or Lake, and the coal trade, and the trade with the adjacent Provinces.

Some two years ago a sum of money was put on the estimates for, and the House consented to, the construction of this work, and the Government directed Mr. Perley, the engineer, either by himself or by his assistants, to make enquiry to ascertain what was required. The report was, that its breadth should be extended to 50 feet, and its depth to 15½ feet. The House had certainly expected that the money voted would have been expended, but nothing had been done, though the Government had not only asked for tenders, but had entered into contract with Mr. Tuck. This caused a very great deal of dissatisfaction among the people living in the counties of Cape Breton and Richmond. His county was principally interested in the matter—more so than Richmond or any other county. In the plans for the canal, its proposed width and depth had been reduced, though the alteration had not been made in the general interests of trade. He would be glad to hear a satisfactory explanation for the change from the Premier, if such could be given. Those who were acquainted with the question conceded that Mr. Perley's report was correct; and were of opinion that the reduction of the proposed breadth to 36 feet, and of the depth to 14½ feet, was not in the interest of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and of the growing trade between the former Province and Newfoundland. When he remarked that the locks on the Ontario canals were to have the proportions of 270 feet in length and forty in breadth, he could not but think that the interests of Nova Scotia were comparatively neglected. The contractor had had a number of his employés and a portion of his staff on the ground, and he could have proceeded with the work in December last, to the great advantage of the labouring classes in the neighborhood during the winter; but still no action had been taken. It might be objected that a difficulty had arisen as to securing a portion of the lands required; but he understood that there was a special Act on the Statute Book authorizing the Government to take possession of any land needed for public works, arbitrators being appointed to consider its value, and a sum of money, as might be thought proper, being deposited in one of the courts. They could at any rate put themselves in possession of any land that was required for public purposes, but it was only within the last month or so any steps had been taken. The delay might be susceptible of explanation, but the reduced size was not in the interest of Nova Scotia. The Government had sent Mr. Perley to inspect the works and accepted his report, and he could not see why they now reduced the size. If a year ago the canal should have been fifty feet wide and fifteen and a half feet deep, surely that size was as necessary now as then.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman who had moved the resolution seemed to have two or three subjects of complaint. He was wrong in his assumption that Mr. Perley's report was submitted in the summer of 1873; it was made in the spring of 1874. He was also wrong in supposing that a greater draught of water than 14 feet could be got or used. Judging from what had been stated by Admiral Bayfield in his St. Lawrence Pilot, vessels of 12 feet draught were the only ones that could safely pass the shoals of St. Peter's Bay. Mr. Perley had come to Ottawa within the last few days and informed him fourteen feet was the maximum depth that could be used without enormous labor in removing those outside shoals, a work not to be thought of. The locks on the St. Lawrence canals were 270 by 45 feet. To apply the same proportions to St. Peter's canal, the locks 200 feet in length should be 33 feet wide, instead of 36 feet, which was the reduced breadth. The locks of the Welland canal, built in 1844, were 150 by 26 feet; the locks of St. Peter's canal built in 1859, were 122 by 26 feet beam. The traffic of the latter canal was very trifling indeed. At the present time no vessel with a greater tonnage than 150 tons could go through. When Mr. Perley's plan showing locks 200 by 50 feet was submitted to the permanent officers of the Department, they considered 36 feet would be a much better width. The mere work of making the canal a few feet wider was little compared with the cost of working heavy gates of 50 feet. The widest in Canada are only 45 feet, and the vessels have been adapted to the system of locks. The great trade of the country was done by propellers, and the width of 36 feet is enough for a considerable number, if not all the Allan steamers. It was very much wider than the largest propellers on the lakes. On the sea coast, however, it seemed there were side-wheel steamers engaged in the Bras d'Or trade, which were wider than 36 feet. The engineer had been instructed to find the greatest width of beam of this class of vessels, and if the Government found that the adoption of the locks to such steamers anything like a necessity, there could be no very great difficulty, at this time, in making them wider. He declined to recognize the doctrine that the Government were bound by the reports of their officers. He never hesitated to change their plans very materially when the public interest demanded it.

Mr. FLYNN said he was not prepared to say what was the exact depth of water on the shoals in St. Peter's Bay, but Mr. Perley must have had all the information necessary when he made his report. In August, 1873, he had been sent by the late Government to St. Peter's to inspect the canal, and while on his way there, consulted him (Mr. Flynn) on the subject of his mission. He met Mr. Perley returning, and was informed he had instructions to submit his report in time for the November Session. When he (Mr. Flynn) came up to attend the Session of 1874, he understood Mr. Perley's report was in. Of course the Government had a right to alter plans, but this was something more. In this case the money was voted by Parliament in 1874 and 1875 for the enlargement of the canal based on the plans and specifications made by Mr. Perley in 1873. And in addition to this the Minister of Public Works invited tenders to carry out the same, which, in his judgement, differed materially from the position taken by the First Minister, and did not change the opinion he entertained on the previous occasion, that the Government had not the right to alter the plans after Parliament had voted the money.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not at all.

Mr. FLYNN said he had inspected the plans in the Department, and found the depth of 15½ feet and width of 50 feet had been recommended by Mr. Perley. With that he was satisfied. The Government was at that time determined to carry out that report. There was not a word said there that the commerce of Cape Breton did not require it. There was not a dissenting voice when the estimates were brought down, and $75,000 voted. Nothing was done that year, but it was because no tenders were asked. The sum was re-voted the following year and tenders were asked for under those plans and specifications prepared by Mr. Perley. The people of Canada were asked to tender for the enlargement of St. Peter's Canal to 50 feet in width and 15½ in depth.

He held that after Parliament had passed a vote based on certain plans and measurements, they had no right to interfere with the size of the canal, and maintained that the Government could not obtain any further information than that they were already in possession of. However, the statement made by the Minister of Public Works that the Government would alter the width of the Canal if, after obtaining further information they found it necessary, in order to accommodate the paddle-wheel steamers now connecting between Pictou and the Bras d'Or Lake was satisfactory. These steamers, owing to the accommodation they gave, and not drawing much water, were likely to continue in use for many years. These are the description of boats used in all inland navigation in Upper Canada and the United States, and unless the Canal was made wide enough to allow the Prince Edward Island steamers to enter Bras d'Or the people of Cape Breton will have just grounds for being dissatisfied. We have now been asking since 1869 for the enlargement of this canal. About that time its insufficiency for the trade of the Bras d'Or was brought to the notice of this Government, and three years elapsed before even a survey was made, and now three years more have elapsed and not one dollar has been expended in improving this important work. There was a feeling in that portion of the Dominion that they had not been fairly treated by the Government, and in that feeling he (Mr. Flynn) fully participated. In consequence of the steamers running between Pictou and the Strait of Canso not being able to use the canal, the people of the Bras d'Or and a large portion of Richmond County are prevented from dealing in Montreal, as they otherwise might do if the canal was large enough to permit the Island boats to use it. They could connect with the Gulf boats at Pictou and carry freight to different points in Richmond and the Bras d'Or. The sum required to improve the Canal is not a large one. Last Session we voted $4,600,000 to improve three canals in Upper Canada—the Welland, St. Lawrence and Lachine—while only $260,000 was required to complete the work on the canal in question. He regretted that the Hon. the First Minister did not now give a positive assurance that the work would be enlarged to the size recommenced by Mr. Perley. But he had no doubt that when he instituted the enquiry promised, it would result in the enlargement of the Canal to the extent desired by the people of the Island of Cape Breton. He believed there was only $38,000 difference between the price of the present contract and one of the tenders sent into the Department of Public Works when the first tenders were invited, and he thought it unfair and ungenerous that Cape Breton should have been denied what they required for so trifling a sum. However, he hoped the further information the Prime Minister said he would endeavour to obtain would be the means of enlarging the canal to the extent required and allay the dissatisfaction at present existing in Cape Breton in connection with this work.

Mr. DAVIES said the enlargement of this canal was a matter of the greatest importance to Prince Edward Island, but he thought the Government should proceed carefully in the matter.

If a report to the Government had shown that there was only 12 feet of water in the basin, it would be folly to make the canal 15½ feet. With regard to the class of steamers there, they were very broad, but he thought these steamers would die out as it had been found that propellers consumed one-third less coal, and paddle-wheel steamers could not compete with them on that account. It might be some time before this change would be effected, but he was confident that it would be effected. Therefore it would not, perhaps, be necessary to enlarge the canal to 50 feet. He was of opinion that the First Minister had acted wisely in not increasing the depth of the canal.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE then read from the report of Admiral Bayfield, in which he stated that vessels drawing 10 or 12 feet of water might run into the canal during rough weather with the aid of a chart, on which they would have to rely.

Mr. FLYNN—He does not say there are not more than 12 feet of water.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No. The chart says there are three fathoms, but Mr. Perley states that a vessel drawing 14 feet might get in when the water is still, and not otherwise.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) also claimed that after the Government had placed a vote in the estimates based on Mr. Perley's report, they were not warranted in changing the character of the work. He understood that the original contract would only have cost about $36,000 more to execute than the one which had lately been given out.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No.

Mr. McDONALD—I am sorry we had not the plans and specifications connected with the work so that we could ascertain.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I will give the hon. gentleman the figures. The lowest tender based on the first plan was $250,000, while the lowest tender on the last plan was $203,000, being a difference of $47,000.

Mr. McDONALD thought the difference being so small the Government might have proceeded with the work in accordance with the first plan.

They were to have a canal 14½ feet in depth and 36 feet in width of a cost of $220,000, a difference of $47,000 compared with the estimates for the increased dimensions that had been proposed. He regretted the Government's action, and expressed his belief that the canal would cost at least $250,000. He understood that the contractor, Mr. Tuck, had been for several months on the ground, and very likely he would demand extra compensation. The St. Lawrence canals were to be 45 feet in width at the locks; and under these circumstances surely in connection with this canal—only half a mile in length, the same consideration should be extended by the Administration to the interests of the Lower Provinces. The member for Richmond had done his duty, and thrown the responsibility on the Government; and if the latter did not do its duty in this regard for a great many years to come, it would not obtain supporters from Cape Breton.

Mr. MACKAY thought the Premier must be mistaken in one point; outside there were 4½ fathoms, from 25 to 28 feet of water.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is an error.

Mr. MACKAY knew that on Bayfield's chart the depth was marked in some places as 3½ fathoms, 20 feet; vessels drawing over 15½ feet could enter St. Peters' Bay, and the canal should be at least the same depth. Reefs and rocks were in the way, it was true, but these could be buoyed and made generally known. He failed to discover that in any channel used the depth at low tide was less than 4½ fathoms; inside Bras D'Or Lake, close to the shore it was eight, and it immediately deepened to about 18 fathoms, Capt Bayfield's soundings were always under the mark.

Mr. MASSON, with reference to a remark which had fallen from the Premier, contended that the Government could not arrogate to itself the right of changing the plans of their engineers and architects when they thought fit and proper to do so. The First Minister in this regard was entirely wrong. This might be done by the Administration before they were submitted to Parliament and a vote taken for the expenditure of money; but afterwards this was not the case. The Government could not of its free will increase the expenditure; and at most could only reduce it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I never said anything else.

Mr. MASSON urged that even as to the reduction of expenditure in such relation, circumstances might occur when Parliament would not have approved of it. For instance, a vote might be taken in favour of the deepening of a canal to 14 feet, the Government might afterwards change the plans to 12—when if such had been the proposition presented to Parliament it would have been promptly rejected.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness) could see no force in the argument of the hon. member for Terrebonne, as the plans and specifications of this canal were not on the table.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They never were.

Mr. MACDONNELL observed that the House had voted without knowledge of the plans. He regretted that the dimensions of the canal had been lessened, as in the near future this might serve to the great detriment of trade. He was glad to have from the First Minister an assurance that if, upon re-examination, it would be found in the public interest to alter the specifications, this would be done. He felt confident that this would be the case. He had not had a high opinion of the report of the Canal Commission presented some years ago to the House, but it was known that this contained a recommendation in favour of the extension of the dimensions of this canal. The Lower Provinces had magnanimously resigned all claim to the making of the Baie Verte Canal, which involved the expenditure of eight or ten millions of dollars, and he thought that this being the case, their other public works should receive very generous consideration and treatment.

The motion was then agreed to.

THE INSOLVENCY ACT.

Mr. BOURASSA moved the second reading of Bill to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875.

Mr. BECHARD explained that the object of this measure was to protect farmers, professional men and labourers, all who were classed as "non-traders" in the Act of 1875, from the effects of that law which was passed to suit the convenience of traders and to meet the exigencies of trade. If traders required an Insolvency Law it should be limited to those for whose benefit it was enacted. Under the operation of this Act the trader after he has given up for the benefit of his creditors all that he possesses is discharged of the balance of his debts provided he can pay thirty-three cents on the dollar, while the non-trader cannot by the same proceeding be discharged from his liabilities after he has been ruined, too often by the acts of traders.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said the Act of 1875 had only come into operation in September, and had been tried but a few months. The amendment now proposed had been submitted to Parliament last Session and rejected.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Nothing had yet occurred to justify the House in changing that decision, and he hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE hoped the mover of the Bill would not press it to a division. If adopted it would entirely destroy the efficacy of the insolvency law of last year, because if only a certain class of the trader's liabilities were to be affected by it, he would be no better off than before. Under the existing Act, the non-trader who risked his money in trade knew the consequences of a failure.

A more practical solution of the grievance complained of under the existing law was for the non-trader to be careful to whom he gave credit, and to remember there was a risk of the person trusted going into insolvency. He hoped they would not attempt to alter the law in any principle so important as that.

The members were then called in, the House divided, and the motion was lost on the following vote:—

CRIMINAL LAW.

Mr. BABY moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Criminal Law relating to offences against the person. He stated that the object of the Bill was to assimilate to a certain extent the Criminal Law of Canada to the English law, 23 and 24 Vict. Chap. 100, in which the death penalty had been established. As it was, it was impossible to get a verdict against any persons accused of some crimes against the person because the only penalty was the death penalty. He hoped the Bill would commend itself to the members generally, as he was sure it would to the gentlemen who had any experience in our criminal courts.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he would consent to the second reading of the Bill, upon the understanding that it should then be referred to the Select Committee, having similar Bills under consideration. He might afterwards ask that the Bill might not be proceeded with, in view of the probability of a general reconsideration of the Criminal Law in reference to capital sentences, before the next Session of Parliament.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. TASCHEREAU moved the second reading of a Bill entitled an Act to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1874, and to declare ineligible for election to the House of Commons all persons disqualified for election to the Local Legislatures during the period of such disqualification.

He explained that it only contained one clause to the above effect; providing, moreover, that during that period such persons could not hold any office under the nomination of the Crown or Government of Canada. The Election Law would not be complete without such a clause.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER renewed his suggestion that when the disqualification was removed by Local Legislatures, the decisions of the Courts should still hold good with regard to this Parliament.

Mr. TASCHEREAU considered that this suggestion was against the very principle of the Bill, which related purely to the action of the Local Legislatures.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought that as Parliament had wisely entrusted the trial of election cases to the Courts, their decisions should be respected in their entirety. He agreed otherwise with the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that the hon. member for Cumberland would experience a great deal of difficulty in drawing up the intricate clauses which would be necessary in order to secure the object the hon. gentleman had in view. The law as it existed might, moreover, be changed. His hon. friend from Montmagny proposed to redress a grievance in a practical and able manner, and as it seemed to him to the only practicable extent. The hon. member for Cumberland might embody his suggestion into an amendment, which he had no doubt would receive fair consideration.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) asked whether it was proper to leave to Local Legislatures the establishment of what should be considered disqualification for this Parliament. In one Statute it had been enacted that if a candidate took a drink, though with no corrupt intention, in a tavern on polling day, it should be cause of disqualification. This was absurd, and gave rise to cases of the greatest possible hardship.

Now, if this Bill should become law, the result would be to depute to the Local Legislatures the power of defining what class of offences shall be disqualifying for this House. If the Local Legislatures thought fit to pass absurd laws he did not know that it was right for this House to bind itself to them.

Mr. BABY suggested that there ought to be a provision that this Bill should not apply to cases now pending before the tribunals of the country.

The Bill was read the second time.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply—Mr. Mills in the Chair.

On the item $276,281.67 for Ocean and River service,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked why the appropriation for steam communication from St. John, New Brunswick, to ports in the Basin of Minas had been dropped?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the mails were now carried by rail. The subsidy for steam communication on Lake Superior had also been dropped, and in every case tenders were asked instead of granting subsidies.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE asked why the subsidy to the Gulf Ports steamers had been dropped?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it was in accordance with an arrangement by which the mails were to be carried by the Intercolonial Railway as soon as it was in operation.

Mr. BUNSTER suggested that a similar arrangement should be made for carrying the mails to British Columbia, and he hoped the Pacific Railway would soon do the work that was now being done by steamers plying between San Francisco and Victoria. The service was not efficiently performed. The reason why the steamers did not get coal at Nanaimo was not because the contractor could not supply it, but because it was impossible to put it on board on the time specified in the contract for want of hatchways. He trusted that when the next contract of a similar character was made, the interest of British Columbians would be consulted, and that the Postmaster General would give these matters his consideration; and see that justice was done according to the spirit of the contract. In conclusion, he maintained that a better boat should be employed in the service.

Mr. DEWDNEY said that was the steamer they had come down by previously to the Session, and he contended that she was a good steamer. He did not know of a steamer run by the present company that was not a first-class boat.

Mr. DECOSMOS pronounced the steamer to be unseaworthy. Her boats were not sufficiently numerous for the passengers she carried, nor had she sufficient accommodation. Another disadvantage she possessed was, that she was not suited to the carrying of coal.

The item was carried.

Item No. 124, appropriating $4,200 for steam communication with the Magdalen Islands, was adopted without discussion.

On item 125, appropriating $15,000 for winter service by steamer between Prince Edward Island and the mainland,

Mr. TUPPER asked what was proposed to be done in regard to that service?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they were endeavouring to make some arrangements for a steamer. They had not absolutely decided whether to purchase or construct a vessel, but the indications at present were that they would purchase a steamer.

On item 133 appropriating $21,700 for the Quebec River Police,

Mr. LANGEVIN asked for the details of the reduction of $6,500 on this service. He wanted to know what change was to be made in the personnel of the force?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Minister of Marine considered a smaller force would be sufficient, but as the hon. gentleman was absent he could not give any particulars as to the reduction.

The item was carried.

Item 134, providing $500 for the removal of obstructions in navigable rivers being taken up,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained, that it was intended to remove wrecks, &c., one or two such cases having already occurred.

The item was carried.

Item 135, providing $142,917.50 for salaries and allowances of lighthouse keepers was passed without discussion.

Item 136, providing $213,000 for maintenance and repairs being taken up,

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) remarked that he noticed in the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the sum of $117 had been paid for a sand bank, near Cape Bar, which was not in reality worth more than $10.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT made a note of the matter, and promised to look into it.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Being in Cape Breton, it ought to be worth $117.

Mr. McDONALD—Yes; I have no doubt that it was worth $117 to the Government, at the last election.

The item was passed.

Item 137, providing $30,000 for the completion of light-houses in course of construction being taken up,

Mr. SCHULTZ called the attention of the Government to the pressing necessity existing for the erection of a light-house at the mouth of Red River. The consequent expense would not be serious, and the shipping on the lake, which was becoming very considerable, would be greatly advantaged. The lake was larger than Ontario, and navigation at the mouth of Red River was difficult even in daytime. In order that the Cabinet might not plead want of knowledge in this respect, he drew their attention to it, and he hoped that action would be taken.

The item passed; and the Committee rose, reported, and asked leave to sit again.

The House adjourned at Thirty-five minutes past Twelve a. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 23, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DESJARDINS drew attention to an incident which occurred in the debate of Friday last, during which the veracity of a member had been called in question while absent from the House. The Premier, alluding to a remark made by the hon. member for Bagot that the Liberals wished to coalesce with the hon. member for Terrebonne, denied the statement. The hon. member for Bagot was now present, and perhaps the Premier would repeat the denial in order that the hon. gentleman might put himself right.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have no personal knowledge of what the hon. gentleman said, further than what was told me. I have only to say again, as I said the other night, I never made any offer to the hon. member for Terrebonne directly or indirectly of a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said he was glad of this opportunity to set himself right, because it was a serious matter to a young member to have his veracity questioned by one in so high a position as the Premier. On the occasion when the statement was made, he (Mr. Mousseau) was speaking in French. He had been referring exclusively to the Liberals of Quebec at the time, and showing their inconsistency on many public questions. He had pointed out that after condemning the hon. member for Terrebonne they wished to coalesce with him. That speech had been accurately reported and translated, and the statement could be found in the Hansard and the Montreal Gazette. If it was contradicted he would give to the House the reason which had prompted him to make the assertion.

The matter was dropped.

Mr. GREENWAY called attention to the following paragraph which appeared in the Ottawa correspondence of the Toronto Mail, the day after the vote on Sir John Macdonald's amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply:—

"I would take the earliest opportunity of pointing out to the Conservative electors of South Huron, that Mr. Greenway has proved a traitor to all the professions made to them by him when he was elected by acclamation, and that he sits in the House a mere chattel of the Administration, deserving the contempt of all honourable men."

That might have been allowed to pass; but on the 20th instant, the Mail published the following:—

“THE TRAITOR GREENWAY.

“The Brantford Expositor, a Grit journal, thinks we have been unduly severe on the traitor Greenway. Our contemporary makes two wrong assumptions in this matter which require to be corrected. It is assumed, for one thing, that our denunciation of Mr. Greenway was chiefly because of his having voted on the Free Trade side, and against Sir John Macdonald's motion. Now, it is true enough that this vote was the public occasion which first drew general attention to Mr. Greenway's apostasy: but nevertheless the fact that he was going to “rat” was well known to numbers of people, both in and around the Commons Chamber, and in his own constituency. The London Free Press truly says that as far back as a month ago news reached the Liberal-Conservative party (in South Huron) that their member could not be depended upon. Our Brantford contemporary, in its excess of charity, wishes it to be believed that where Mr. Greenway turned was on the trade question, the debate having had the effect of convincing him that Sir John's Protectionist policy was all wrong, and that the Free-Trade policy of Mr. Mackenzie was the thing for Canada. All stuff, we say; what Mr. Greenway turned on was the promise of a Government appointment for himself, expected to be in Manitoba. It sounds very fine to talk about a conscientious change of conviction, and so on, but it takes all the romance out of the affair when you know that the “conscientious conviction,” so called, was a mere vulgar matter of bargain and sale. While sincerely regretting the part we took in recommending Mr. Greenway to our friends in South Huron, we are glad to hear that they have already selected a gentleman upon whom they can depend to carry their banner when Mr. Greenway's time to ‘step down and out’ shall have arrived.”

He regretted that the first occasion on which he rose to address the House should be on a personal matter. He desired to say that whenever the policy enunciated by the Government met his approval he would have no hesitation in supporting it. He denied most emphatically that anything had influenced his vote but this principle. There never had been such a consideration as the Mail intimated. There was not now such a consideration offered; he had not been approached by any member of the Government or any of their supporters in such a manner, and the charge was a pure fabrication, utterly without foundation. He was sure the Premier would do him the justice of contradicting a statement which was without a shadow of foundation. At the proper time he (Mr. Greenway) would explain his vote to the electors, but he would now inform the Conservative candidate who was out in his constituency that he would have about three years to wait before a chance would come to oppose him.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—In response to the call of my hon. friend, I feel bound to say that on no occasion has he, by myself or through any friends or other person, solicited anything whatever at the hands of the Government, either for himself or for any public purpose even. Many gentlemen on both sides of the House have occasion to call upon me about public works in their vicinity, but it so happens that even in this connection I have had no visit and no representation of any kind from the hon. gentleman, nor have I any knowledge of any kind whatever of a desire on the part of the hon. gentleman to seek or obtain any office under the Government, or any favour of any kind from the Administration. I am quite sure that no offer whatever was made to him by myself or any member of the Ministry; nor had we in any way anything to do with influencing the hon. gentleman on the vote to which he refers. I am glad to say that although the paper in question accused the hon. gentleman of deserting his party, no Ministerial journal has accused the seven or eight ministerial members of doing anything of that kind, because they chose, regarding that particular measure, to vote according to their consciences with the Opposition. The Ministerial party could afford to divide in this relation, as it can afford to divide upon many other matters where conscientious differences exist. I observe that there was no conscientious difference of opinion existing in this regard among the Opposition.

CROSSING NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole—Mr. Mills in the Chair—to consider a Bill entitled an Act to make provision for the crossing of navigable waters by railway or other road companies incorporated under Provincial Acts, as amended by the Standing Committee on railway, canal, and telegraph lines. The Committee rose and reported the Bill with several amendments. The report of the Committee being adopted the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT.

On motion of Mr. Blake the House went into Committee on the Bill to make further provision in regard to the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court of Canada, Mr. Mills in the Chair. Several verbal amendments having been made to the Bill,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE proposed a series of new clauses, of which he had given substantial notice on the notice papers. The 26th section would read—"An appeal to the Supreme Court in any habeas corpus matter shall be heard "at an early day, whether in or out of "the prescribed Session of the Court."

The law gave considerable jurisdiction to the Court in connection with these matters. It was at any rate doubtful whether these cases should be heard out of the prescribed Sessions, which were held in January and June; and it was obviously improper that any of them should be postponed until these Sessions.

The 29th clause was as follows:—

"In any habeas corpus matter before a Judge of the Supreme Court, and any appeal to the Supreme Court in any habeas corpus matter, the Judge or Court shall have the same power to bail, discharge or commit the prisoner or person, or to direct him to be detained in custody or otherwise to deal with him, as any Court, Judge, or Justice of the Peace having jurisdiction in any such matters in any Province of Canada."

The 28th Section read:—

"On any appeal from the Supreme Court in any habeas corpus matter under the said Act, it shall not be necessary, unless the Court shall otherwise order, that any prisoner or person on whose behalf such an appeal is made shall be present in Court on the argument of the judgment on such appeal, but the prisoner or person shall remain in custody to which he was committed or remanded at the time of giving the notice of appeal, unless on liberty on bail by order of Judge of the Court which refused the application, or of a Judge of the Supreme Court, provided that the Supreme Court may, by writ or order, direct that such prisoner or person shall be brought before it."

The presence of the party accused he thought should not be made a necessity; and it seemed to him essential that greater elasticity should be permitted in this relation. If an appeal came from Cape Breton or Vancouver Island, the enforced presence of the accused would involve consequences which were not to be thought of.

The next clause was an amendment which he could not consider as otherwise than important. His attention had been directed notably to the subject of the working of the Act for the extradition of criminals, and he had come to the conclusion that while no substantial injustice was at all likely to arise from leaving the law as it stood, yet it was possible that by the passage of this Act, delays and difficulties productive of considerable inconvenience might be created. The person held for extradition required a judicial trial before a judicial functionary, and after the magistrate had finally committed him for removal from the country, he had recourse to the highest tribunal of the Province on an application for a habeas corpus in order that it might be determined whether the decision was legal or not.

Immediately after that the papers came before the representative of Her Majesty who, on advice, of course, was bound to consider whether on the whole extradition should take place or not. These seemed to him to be sufficient safeguards against improper extradition; but delays might result from the existence of appellate jurisdiction. He also proposed the following clauses:

" COSTS.

"30. The Judges of the Supreme Court, or any five of them may, under the 79th section of the said Act from time to time make general rules and orders for awarding and regulating costs in each of the said Courts in favour of and against the Crown as well as the subject.

"31. Any costs adjudged to Her Majesty in either of the said Courts shall be paid to the Receiver General, and the Receiver General shall pay out any moneys in his hands for the time being legally applicable thereto, and which may be voted by Parliament for the purpose, any costs awarded to any person against Her Majesty.

" CERTIORARI.

"32. A writ of certiorari made by order of the Supreme Court or a Judge thereof issue out of the said Court to bring up any papers or other proceedings had or taken before any Court, Judge or Justice of the Peace, and which may be considered necessary with a view to any enquiry, appeal or other proceeding had or to be had before the Supreme Court.

"And also that section 58 be amended by adding after the words 'Crown alone' in the 8th line, the words following: 'And in all cases in which demand shall be made or relief sought in respect of any matter which might in England be the subject of a suit or action in the Courts of Exchequer on its Plea side against any officer of the Crown; and also by striking out the words 'or any officer of the Crown' at the end of the said section."

Mr. TASCHEREAU suggested the addition of the following clause:—

"Whenever there is not a quorum of the Judges of the Supreme Court to hear and determine any cause or causes pending before the said Court in consequence of one or more of the said Judges being disqualified or incompetent to sit in any such cause or causes, absent from Canada or on leave, the Registrar shall, on a requisition to him to that effect, make an entry thereof in the Register, and on the order of one of the Judges of the said Court give notice thereof to the Minister of Justice.

"Her Majesty may therefore appoint one or more persons being Judges of one of the Superior Courts in any of the Provinces forming the Dominion of Canada to replace such Judge or Judges during the period of their inability to sit."

Mr. PALMER said the quorum might be reduced under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE was glad his attention had been called to this matter. He had felt from the beginning that the necessity of having a quorum of five in a bench of six was an element of weakness. There were obvious inconveniences in filling vacancies by ad hoc Judges. The usefulness of the Court largely depended on its judgments being given by at least five of the regularly appointed Judges.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) thought it would be better that there should be possibility of such a difficulty arising as had been suggested by the hon. member for Montmagny than to fill up vacancies in the manner proposed.

Mr. PALMER concluded it would be better to empower the Judges to reduce their quorum, relying upon their acting upon their clear and unquestioned duty of sitting when they were able to do it and not disqualified by law.

After some further discussion the Committee rose and reported and the Bill as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

ROADS AND ROAD ALLOWANCES IN MANITOBA.

The House went into Committee on Bill respecting roads and road allowances in Manitoba, Mr. Young in the chair.

Mr. SCHULTZ said as this Bill naturally brought in a variety of Manitoba Land matters, he desired to avail himself of the opportunity of discussing them. He regretted to be under the necessity of bringing up these matters year after year, but the grievance was so great that by no other course could he do justice to his constituents. He was glad to learn in another debate that the half-breed land patents were now actually being prepared for distribution, and he felt that had this been done years ago, when it should have been done, much of the dissatisfaction and ill-will which now exists would have been averted. These lands were a free grant to the English half-breeds. They did not press for them—the Manitoba Act granted them before they had a voice in this House to represent them, and the weary years of waiting for that which became theirs by Act of Parliament now nearly six years ago is what they complain of. Again, there are the very natural complaints of new settlers, who coming to make a home in Manitoba found these large reserves of lands in the river belts locked up from settlement by them and equally so from use by the owners, while had the Government three years ago distributed these lands, the holders would in many cases have sold to those who, coming into the country for homes, naturally wished them as near as possible to the river. Again the distribution of scrip to the half-breed heads of families has been so delayed that now when it is on the eve of distribution it will be found that owing to the Government reserving twenty miles on either side of the Canada Pacific Railroad from sale or settlement, most of the recipients in the County of L'Esperance will not be able with this scrip to locate land where it would be of any use to them. While speaking of this Railroad Reserve he (Mr. Shultz) desired to say that its continued exclusion from Homestead Entry was a gross act of injustice to those who had gone to the country to make homes. Pushed back from the river by the intervening reserves, the Canadian immigrants had farmed the thriving settlements known as Springfield, Cook's Creek, Rockwood, Victoria and Woodlands. They had found even there in many cases that what with the Hudson Bay sections and the desirable Quarter sections pounced upon as soon as surveyed by land officials, it was difficult enough to establish themselves. Yet their energy and pluck is exhibited in their well-tilled farms, their schools and churches. These settlements are, however, full, and the pioneers who farmed them want more room for their relatives and friends who wish to join them—and what do they find? Forty miles in width of some of the best land in the Province locked up from settlement. Locked up for what? The Government said because a railway was to go through. Weary eyes have watched, however, for the indications of this coming work, but the signs of the times are too gloomy to afford much hope. What should be done and what he (Mr. Schultz) earnestly urged should be done would be to throw this Reserve open for homestead entry by all parties and let the country be filled up. There were other lands for the railway when the railway was actually to be built, and in the meantime the locking up of these lands would be productive of great harm to the settlement of the Province. Again, there were the wants of these new settlements in the matter of roads. He (Mr. Schultz) had brought the matter up last Session and he wished again to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that Manitoba alone of all the Provinces did not own her lands, and that the title being vested in the Dominion, the Dominion incurred all the responsibilities connected with that ownership. If the lands belonged to the Province the people of these new settlements could look with propriety for local aid in making and maintaining at least trunk lines of road, and this duty he (Mr. Schultz) now held devolved in the Dominion. The Dominion, for Dominion purposes, held greater Reserves which lay between these settlements and their objective points for marketing and other purposes, and it was hard to expect that these young and struggling communities could bear the expense of roads, not only through their own sections but intervening districts. It was the duty of the Government, he held, to foster and encourage these young settlements, and it could not be better done than by liberal grants to their townships or local organizations to aid in making, at least, trunk lines of road. He was glad to be assured that the granting of patents for lands in the river belt and elsewhere would not be further delayed, for there had been far too much delay in this matter already, and the sooner all these vexed questions of title and the numberless grievances springing out of them were settled the better.

As regards the road allowances now under consideration, he (Mr. Schultz) still thought, as he had expressed himself on the first reading of the Bill, that it was unfair to fix an arbitrary rate of remuneration for the payments of owners of the land so taken. The land should be paid for at its actual value, whatever that was. The roads, he believed, would be useful; but the Bill did not go far enough, and he hoped that the matter to which he had called the attention of the Government would receive their consideration.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the roadway was taken from the Dominion lands. The only roads for which compensation was given were the lanes connecting them, and the amount which the Government proposed to pay for them was sufficient. A proportion of the land would be taken from each lot between which such lanes would run. He proposed to amend the 3rd section of the Bill to the following effect:—It was stated in the clause that the Local Government should have the surveys and plans made for these trails and highways which were to be transferred to the Province. As all the surveys had been under the control and supervision of the Dominion Government, he wished to provide by his amendment that the Dominion in lieu of the Local Administration should secure the surveys of these trails and highways.

The Bill was reported with amendments (which were concurred in), read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION NOTES.

The House went into Committee on Bill to extend the Act respecting Dominion notes to the Provinces of Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Manitoba; Mr. Young in the Chair.

The Bill was reported without amendments, read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time :—

Respecting the attendance of witnesses on criminal trials.

To amend and consolidate Acts respecting insurance.

THE NORTH-WEST AMNESTY QUESTION.

Mr. COSTIGAN, previous to moving the motion of which he had given notice, with respect to W. D. O'Donoghue, desired to make a few remarks.

Hon. members very well knew that the question of amnesty was dealt with and a good deal of feeling excited throughout the country with regard to it. A large number of people outside of the House thought that it was the duty of the Government to grant a full pardon to all persons connected with the North-West troubles; nevertheless only a partial amnesty was accorded, in favour of Louis Riel and Ambroise Lepine—W. D. O'Donoghue, a member of the same creed and of the same Provisional Government being excluded from its benefits. He wished it to be fully understood on this point that he had no desire to injure, annoy or embarrass the Ministry in the slightest possible degree, being wholly actuated by a wish to relieve W. D. O'Donoghue from the position in which he was placed; and he moved this amendment simply because he could attain his object in no other way. He might have demanded more, and have seriously embarrassed the Cabinet and a few of its supporters, had he intended to make political capital out of the matter; but this was not his intention. During the last Session many hon. members, and many people throughout the Dominion, had been surprised to find that W. D. O'Donoghue had been excluded in the manner he had mentioned; they could not understand why this was done; they could not comprehend how O'Donoghue could be more guilty than Reil and Lepine, or less deserving of leniency than they. The hon. member for Hastings had then stated that if W. D. O'Donoghue had not been an Irishman, but a member of the same nationality as the other two persons to whom he had referred, he, like them, would have been pardoned. Perhaps this argument did not possess much force, and he, for his part, had not then considered and did not now think that this was the reason that influenced the Government to do as they had done; but he did say this—the Government would have acted wisely had they seen fit to contradict this assertion and explain the real facts connected with the case. It was unfortunate that such an explanation or contradiction had not then, or afterwards, been offered.

His amendment contained no word of censure with regard to the Government and no attack upon it, and he did not even ask that a Committee should be appointed to enquire into the circumstances. He merely wished the Government to take such action as would do justice in the premises. He felt that this was perfectly fair, and he trusted that the Government would accept his proposition. O'Donoghue had been a member of the Provisional Government and had taken part in the troubles; but his guilt was no greater than that of his colleagues, and according to his own statement it was less. It might be said, of course, that he was also connected with the so-called Fenian raid into Manitoba; but he did not think that this was a reason sufficient to warrant his exclusion for all time to come from the benefits of amnesty. O'Donoghue denied that he had any thing to do with such a raid; but even if this were admitted, he (Mr. Costigan) did not see why he (O'Donoghue) should be treated with more harshness than any other Fenian held as a prisoner. This so-called raid, moreover, did not amount to anything serious, nor did it produce any consequences worthy of notice. Not one drop of blood was shed at the time, hence he considered that O'Donoghue should not be compelled to remain for all time under the stigma of a charge of murder and be debarred from the privileges enjoyed by other British subjects.

It appeared to him that the Government had acted with great inconsistency; on the one hand, here was a man who had denied taking any part in a Fenian Raid—

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—No! No!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—He admits it.

Mr. COSTIGAN—O'Donoghue denied that it was a Fenian raid. Of course he (O'Donoghue) might admit that he joined in a movement which formed part of the policy of the Provisional Government of Manitoba; but even putting the matter in the strongest possible light, and granting that this was such a raid, he (Mr. Costigan) held that the Administration would be dealing more harshly with O'Donoghue, and would be making his case an exceptional one, if partial amnesty were refused him—after all other similar cases, in connection with which the results were more serious, were taken into consideration. Touching the latter, everything had been blotted out, and the persons concerned had been freed for all time from the evil consequences arising out of their acts; yet this one man was singled out from all the others.

It had been said that O'Donoghue was of a violent temperament and always disposed to interfere with the peace and quietness of the community; but he (Mr. Costigan), having taken the trouble to enquire, had been informed, on good authority, that this was not the case. It was true that O'Donoghue had taken part in the troubles in question; but so had the majority of the residents of that section of the country. O'Donoghue, otherwise, stood well in the community; he was besides not an American citizen; he was no American adventurer; but a young man who was educated in Manitoba and who held there a position as a professor. It seemed to him that the Government had refused O'Donoghue an amnesty on account of his participation in the so-called Fenian raid; but twelve months had passed since the matter was previously discussed, and of course the Administration being one year older, was one year wiser. He trusted, therefore, that the Ministry would see their way clear to an acceptance of his proposition. Every hon. member must feel that the position in which O'Donoghue was placed was not consistent with the attitude taken with regard to Riel and Lepine. He had not taken any step to force the Government into any particular line of conduct; and whatever might be the reason why the case of O'Donoghue had not been so favourably considered as that of his colleagues, he hoped, that this amendment would be accepted by the Ministry in the spirit with which it was offered.

He begged leave to move, seconded by Mr. Devlin,

“That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that whereas this House did on the 13th day of February, 1875, vote an Address to Her Majesty praying that a full amnesty should be granted to all persons connected with the North-West trouble, for all acts committed by them during the said troubles, saving only Louis Reil, A. D. Lepine, and W. D. O'Donoghue, and that a like amnesty should be granted to L. Reil and A. D. Lepine, conditional on five years' banishment from Her Majesty's Dominion, thereby excluding W. D. O'Donoghue from the benefits of such amnesty—and whereas the said W. D. O'Donoghue has since written the following letter, viz:—

“To the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, Ottawa City:—

“SIR,—I beg to state to you and the hon. body over which you preside, that a great injustice has been done me by the late action of Parliament in excluding me from the amnesty granted to all others who participated in the insurrection of 1869 and 1870 in Manitoba. As this action of Parliament would seem to throw the whole responsibility of the ‘Insurrection,’ the ‘execution of Scott’ and so-called ‘Fenian Raid’ on me, I do not propose shouldering all of them, and those who were responsible may go forth spotless at my expense, purified by a resolution of Parliament.

“I accordingly make the following statement of facts, which I can prove most conclusively:—

“1st. The insurrection was advised by Gov. Wm. McTavish who, with other officers of the Hudson Bay Company, also aided and abetted it from its inception up to the very hour it ceased to exist. That Reil was in constant communication with Governor McTavish, and on many occasions under his instructions. That he, Governor McTavish, fully recognized the Provincial Government. That Donald A. Smith, on arriving at Fort Garry, recognized the Government, also in my own hearing, and with Gov. McTavish was Riel's adviser during his stay in the Fort, and after the departure of both of these from the country, Riel continued to hold council with John McTavish, who then represented the Hudson Bay Company.

"2nd. That others, whose names I now forbear mentioning, and who are very 'loyal' subjects, advised recourse to arms.

"3rd. That I was not a party to the Insurrection till the 15th of November, 1869, about four weeks after its inauguration, and two weeks after possession was taken of Fort Garry.

"4th. That the case of Thomas Scott was never brought before the Provincial Government, either before or after the execution or 'murder,' as it is properly termed, of Thomas Scott, and I am entirely clear of this charge, and should no other alternative be left to remove the stigma of murder from my character, I am determined to do so at some future day at any hazard. From this I state without fear of contradiction, that the Provisional Government did not order the trial or execution of Scott, and that neither as a member of that Government, nor as a private individual, had I any part, directly, or indirectly, in the execution of Thomas Scott.

"5th. That the so-called 'Fenian Raid' is a misnomer, as Fenianism had nothing whatever to do with it. That it was simply a continuation of the insurrection inaugurated in '69, and with the same avowed intention, and by the same parties, a fact which the then existing Government of Manitoba was cognizant of for months previous to the so-called 'raid.' That my part in it was simply that of an agent of the people, holding a commission authorized by a resolution of the Council held at La Riviere Salle in September '70, over which Council L. Reil presided. This commission I hold, as a proof which I have in my possession the Minute Book of the Council. Neither was it brought at any time before the Privy Council composed of the French members of the Legislature. Further, that as a member of the Government, and having my residence in Fort Garry, I was entirely ignorant of the fact that a military council was to be held or being held, to try any of the prisoners there confined, until I was summoned to give testimony by Riel and the Council then sitting on Scott's case, which summons I treated with contempt by informing the Council that it was acting without authority, and as such I failed to recognize it, and that I refused to testify in the case. That neither Riel nor any other officer of the Government consulted with me, nor I with either of them, on the trial or execution, and that I am entirely innocent of the blood of Scott, which were I given an opportunity I could prove conclusively. And further, that but for my part in the so-called 'Fenian Raid,'—of which I will speak hereafter—I would have gone to Manitoba long since and demanded a trial on evidence in my possession signed by the officers, both civil and military, of the late Provisional Government of the French party, also a copy of the resolution authorizing the commission.

"That I am aware persistent efforts have been made by certain parties since I left the country to throw the responsibility of all the unlawful acts committed during the 'troubles' upon me. A certain pamphlet was published last winter 'to show why an amnesty should be issued by the Canadian Government,' in which this effort was repeated, and the 'manifesto letter' of Riel aimed also at this point. Had the causes of the 'troubles' and the acts committed during them been thoroughly investigated, these immaculate gentlemen would doubtless stand in a different position, in the eyes of the public from what they do at present—purified by a resolution of Parliament and amnesty. That I ask no favours now of the Canadian Government or Parliament; they have meted out to me the full measure of their injustice, but the world shall know in my own good time the whole unvarnished truth.

"W. D. O'DONOGHUE,
"Secretary of Treasury, &c., &c., of the late Provisional Government of Rupert's Land, N.W.

"St Paul, Minnesota, Feb. 26th, 1875."

"In the opinion of this House the Government should at once institute a thorough enquiry into the statements contained in said letter, in order that justice may be done in the premises."

The hour being Six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Victoria had proposed a resolution indicating it was the duty of the Government to institute an enquiry into the statements made in the letter of O'Donoghue in order that justice might be done in the premises. While the Government felt it was their duty to listen to all representations of the kind, they did not feel that any such duty was imposed upon them as the hon. member asked the House to affirm. The complaint the hon. gentleman made was that injustice had been done O'Donoghue by reason of a different measure being meted out to him, not of justice but of mercy, from what had been extended to others. The allegation was repeated that a different course was pursued towards O'Donoghue because of his nationality, and the complaint was made that the Government did not repudiate that statement. The hon. gentleman had mentioned that he would not re-assert that proposition. No more would he

(Mr. Blake) say the hon. member brought forward this motion because he was an Irishman, and no more would he say that he (Mr. Blake) opposed it because he was an Irishman. He did not see what nationality had to do with this question, and he regretted that the hon. gentleman had introduced, even to repudiate it, the absurd allegation that the distinction was made on the ground that Riel and his associates were Frenchmen, and O'Donoghue was an Irishman. The reasons why partial amnesty was granted to Riel were mentioned in the resolutions of last Session, and the Address based on them. They showed that after the termination of the North-West troubles and the establishment of a Constitutional Government in Manitoba, an incursion into that Province was set on foot, the principal actor, if not the leader of which was W. D. O'Donoghue. It was necessary to the preservation of that order which had been restored that there should be a union of all the inhabitants of that country. Such results were obtained upon pledges made to some of the actors in the old North-West troubles, and the attitude there assumed by them was one of the principal causes for the lenity extended to those individuals. It was unnecessary to do more than state these facts to show why, when it was proposed to deal mercifully and leniently with the actors in the North West troubles, the same lenity was not extended to O'Donoghue. A statement of the facts showed that a different line must be taken with him. What was the attitude of these three chief actors at that time? On the one hand they found O'Donoghue leading an insurrection against Her Majesty's subjects, while the others were found on the other side. The acts of O'Donoghue on that occasion were such as precluded the House from taking a favourable view of his case. The letter of O'Donoghue which the hon. gentleman had read showed that O'Donoghue did not dread anything that might be alleged against him in reference to these North-West troubles. The hon. gentleman had complained that in respect of this particular person an amnesty in reference to the North-

West troubles of 1869-70 had not been granted, and that O'Donoghue was not permitted to re-enter the Province of Manitoba free of danger in respect to these transactions. Now, O'Donoghue's letter, which had been read, expressly stated that he was entirely innocent of the blood of Scott, that he was under no apprehension of standing his trial on that subject, and that but for his part in the so-called Fenian raid, he would have gone to Manitoba long since and demanded his trial. He did not want mercy in regard to the North-West troubles, and was prepared to face justice on that charge. What now was the difficulty? It was not that he had not been pardoned for his connection with these troubles, because he did not want an amnesty for that. His difficulty was that his action in 1871, whatever it was, had not been pardoned. He wished the House to mark that in this letter O'Donoghue did not ask for lenity or generous consideration of his acts in regard to the 1869-70 troubles. He said that he had been unjustly treated, and that justice was all he demanded, and that he would receive it from the Courts of Manitoba if he were not disabled from going into that Province on account of the transactions of 1871. The hon. gentleman had asked why those transactions should be taken into consideration. He replied for the reasons they had given they were bound to take them into consideration in dealing with the transactions of 1869-70. The circumstances connected with that raid were of very material importance in judging of the transactions of 1869-70. The House was bound to consider the whole position and attitude of any person to whom it was prepared to extend the prerogative of mercy. He (Mr. Blake) maintained that the conduct of O'Donoghue was such as to disentitle him to any favourable consideration at the hands of this House or of the Crown. The hon. gentleman had said he did not admit that O'Donoghue was engaged in the Fenian raid of 1871. He was engaged, he admitted, in a raid which was a trifling affair, but not in a Fenian raid. All the evidence they had on the subject, with the exception of the statement in the letter, in which

O'Donoghue said he was not in the Fenian raid, was very clear and emphatic in the other direction. He did not intend to weary the House by reading passages from the evidence taken before the Select Committee on which the Address was founded. The House could not have forgotten that there was a unanimous concurrence of testimony in the view that the affair of 1871 was a Fenian raid. They must also remember the company in which O'Donoghue was at that time. They must remember that his aider and leader in that transaction was the so-called General O'Neil, who had been seen on the frontier in another quarter leading a Fenian raid. The hon. gentleman said it was a small matter and ought to be considered favourably. The House would recollect that a man who was not an Irishman was tried for participation in that raid, that he was convicted and received the capital sentence. The House would remember that that sentence was commuted to twenty years imprisonment, and that that sentence was still being undergone. He rejoiced that they had not heard either from Irishmen or Frenchmen anything about the commutation of that sentence or granting of an amnesty to that man. That Fenian raid was wholly unjustifiable, and whatever palliation there might have been for the original discontent there was none for the gang of miscreants who on that occasion hoarded the boundaries of Manitoba. He did not think the House would be disposed to say that it was the duty of the Government to institute an enquiry into the facts alleged by O'Donoghue in his letter in order that justice might be done. He (Mr. O'Donoghue) alleged that the transaction was a part of the old insurrection; that the Hudson's Bay Company had to do with it, and that other persons whom he threatened ominously, but did not name, were implicated in the affair. The House had justly resolved to pass the sponge over all those transactions with the exception which was referred to, and he considered that the renewal of an acrimonious discussion on the subject would prove utterly fruitless. He did not see any means, and if he had seen means he saw no use, in the Government entering upon an investigation of the allegations of O'Donoghue because there remained the fact that he was the promoter of that wanton insurrection which produced results of a most serious nature. Although no bloodshed ensued, it necessitated the expenditure of a large sum of money and brought about a most unfortunate state of affairs.

Now, the hon. gentleman urged that they ought to enquire into the matter; but as he said at the beginning so he concluded — it was the duty of the Executive Government to make enquiry into the truth by any means in its power, and consider with respect any representations that might be made to it with reference to any proposal to exercise the prerogative of the Crown; and if O'Donoghue should bring forward any such statements as he thought were material, and if he applied to the Crown for the exercise of its prerogative of mercy, of course it would be the duty of the Administration to consider that application, these representations, and these statements. But what did this person do? He said that he asked "no favours now of the Canadian Government or Parliament; they have meted out to me the full measure of their injustice, but the world shall know in my own good time the whole unvarnished truth."

That "good time" it seemed had not yet arrived; he had not heard, and he had not seen the statement of the "whole unvarnished truth" as it was in that "good time" to be told by this O'Donoghue. He presumed that when the time had come, he (O'Donoghue) would make his statement, supporting it by his allegations, and present it in the proper quarter, where he (Mr. Blake) had no doubt that it would receive the attention and consideration which it would, probably, so eminently deserve; but in the meantime he asked the House whether upon a letter such as this, containing allegations and admissions such as this, not requesting anything, not giving the whole facts, and not seeking for any enquiry nor for mercy, they were to be called upon themselves to institute an investigation in order that they might find out before that "good time" of O'Donoghue's the facts upon which they were to advise the Crown. That this could be their duty, and that they were called upon to do so was perfectly out of question. The hon. gentleman, moreover, did not point out any means or machinery by which, if this were the case, they could accomplish that duty at this time. How were they to find out these particulars to which this gentleman referred, or at which he rather darkly hinted? No such means existed.

The resolution of the hon. gentleman, although he (Mr. Costigan) said that he did not intend it as a censure on the Government, and although he affirmed that he uttered no complaint with regard to it, declared that to be the duty of the Administration which, if it was its duty, was so at the earliest convenient moment after this letter became public, and so had been ever since. If the hon. gentleman's allegations were correct the Government had neglected and were now neglecting their duty; but whether this was so or not, they did not recognise that they were called upon to make any enquiry or take any step in this affair under the present circumstances; and while he repeated that it would be their duty to receive any representations made by any man who asked for the favour or clemency of the Crown, this was not their duty considering the attitude which O'Donoghue assumed—he having preferred no representation and having given no materials or facts. Nor had they the means of instituting any useful enquiry; and in consequence of all these things they were obliged to ask the House so to decide, vote down this amendment, and proceed with the business to transact which this House had been really called together.

Mr. DEVLIN, as the seconder of the motion, deemed it to be his duty to offer a few remarks in explanation of the reasons which had prompted him to take this position. Before proceeding to do so, however, he felt bound also to say that he had heard for the first time in the House a statement with reference to the connection of O'Donoghue with the difficulties which had arisen in Manitoba. He desired to be understood that in seconding the motion he was not actuated by a wish to obtain the influence of the Government, the House or the country on behalf of O'Donoghue if it were true that after the insurrection in the Province of Manitoba had ceased he had organized a body of men for the purpose of disturbing its peace and its order. If the facts bore out the statement made by the Minister of Justice, and he took it for granted that the hon. gentleman made it on evidence laid before him, these had certainly not come within his own personal knowledge. It was well that the Minister of Justice had made that explanation, because it had been widely circulated that this man (O'Donoghue) was excepted from the amnesty granted to other persons implicated in these unfortunate disturbances because he (O'Donoghue) could not bring to bear the same amount of influence, owing to his humble position, as those who were associated with him in that insurrection, if it could be so called. It had also been published—as the Minister of Justice must be aware—that O'Donoghue was passed over because of his nationality. He well knew that this insinuation was false; he was perfectly conscious and confident that the present Government had never refused to grant an amnesty to O'Donoghue and extend to him the clemency of the Crown because either of his creed or his nationality. He also knew that the House had dealt in a generous manner with all the persons who were concerned in these unhappy disturbances, which for a time had attracted the attention of the country; and certainly it did seem strange to those who were not aware of all the facts which had just been mentioned by the Minister of Justice, that the leading spirits in that insurrection should have had extended to them the clemency of the Crown, and been pardoned as they had been, while one man, and one man only, who had been associated with them—but not so prominently concerned—in that so called insurrection was excluded from such benefits and assigned to banishment. Therefore the action of his hon. friend in making this motion was deserving of commendation because, first of all, it offered the Government of the country, through the Minister of Justice, the opportunity of tendering an explanation, as they were bound to do; and in the next place it was a matter of high importance that the people of this country should know and feel that all men were treated alike, and that equal justice was administered to them no matter under what sky they happened to be born, no matter what might be their creed, and no matter what their nationality.

He spoke under a feeling of embarrassment, because he had not had a knowledge of the facts which it seemed had come under the observation of the Minister of Justice; and therefore he considered it to be his duty to plead, as it were, the cause of this man who, after all, as had been stated by the Minister of Justice, was not actually a suppliant at their door seeking pardon, but who was simply an applicant relying upon his rights as a British subject in order to obtain justice from the Parliament of this country. In this character O'Donoghue demanded an enquiry, alleging that he was not guilty of the crimes charged against him; also that he was prepared to establish, if the opportunity were offered him, that he was certainly as much entitled to amnesty as the other persons who had received that measure of leniency from the Crown. True, the Minister of Justice put O'Donoghue's case in an entirely different light, and if the evidence bore this statement out—if after peace was proclaimed, and the residents of Manitoba had returned to their respective homes determined to maintain the law of the country, O'Donoghue had plotted an insurrection and scheme to overthrow the Government of the country, then he had no right to appeal to the clemency of the Crown, or expect favourable consideration from this hon. House, because he held that situated as O'Donoghue was, there was no justification for his having recourse to violence. If he did so in order to subvert the lawful Government of the country and failed, and the result had brought down punishment on himself, he (Mr. Devlin) would be disposed to regard him as a coward in afterwards appealing for pardon. The man had not been heard, and he contended a fair trial should be accorded him. Much of the evidence collected and placed before Parliament with regard to the others was unreliable, and it might be equally untrue with regard to O'Donoghue who claimed the consideration of the House, and the leniency extended to others implicated with him. The opportunity ought to be afforded him to make good his allegations. In this letter O'Donoghue said the Fenian raid was a misnomer, and that it was simply a continuation of the insurrection inaugurated in 1869. He (Mr. Devlin) could not speak as to the accuracy of this statement, but it placed the matter in a different light from that in which it had been viewed by the hon. Minister of Justice. If that hon. gentleman saw fit to institute the enquiry prayed for he would probably not find it difficult to arrive at a different conclusion.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE — O'Donoghue has never prayed for an enquiry. He says in his own good time he will come down with the facts.

Mr. DEVLIN—Of course if he has not asked for an investigation it would be unfair to press it upon him. In the statement, O'Donoghue says:—

“I beg to tell you and the hon. body over which you preside, that a great injustice has been done me by the late action of Parliament in excluding me from the amnesty granted to all others who participated in the insurrection of 1869-70. This action of Parliament would seem to throw the whole responsibility of the insurrection, the execution of Scott, and the so-called Fenian Raid on me. I do not propose shouldering all of them that those who were responsible may go forth spotless.”

According to the resolution, continued the speaker, O'Donoghue was specially excluded from the amnesty granted to the other parties, and he claimed by that exclusion a great injury had been done him. The natural inference which followed from this letter was that if the matter was investigated the man would be enabled to establish his allegations. This was an embarrassing subject now and had been before. It was one which he (Mr. Devlin) would prefer to avoid referring to if possible, but he knew that he ought on an occasion of this kind to make the case known, leaving it with the House to deal with the application as their wisdom might suggest.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) said O'Donoghue had certainly an advocate in the hon. member for Montreal Centre of whom he had no cause to be proud. He (Mr. White) honestly and candidly believed that the hon. gentleman cared less for his countrymen than for the Government. If O'Donoghue had nothing to do with the death of Scott, he was more entitled to the amnesty than those who got it. Like many other poor Irishmen, O'Donoghue was caught in a trap, while those who inveigled him into the position were allowed to go free. When he listened to the vacillations of the hon. member from Montreal Centre on this subject, who might have done good service for a fellow-countryman, he (O'Donoghue) might well exclaim "Save me from my friends." But there was another phase to the affair. The man who lost his life in the North-West Territory (Thos. Scott) was an unfortunate Irishman; his brother, who is now an incurable lunatic owing to that tragedy, was also an unfortunate Irishman, and O'Donoghue was another. In view of this it would be well for Irishmen to take the advice given by Mr. Waller on St. Patrick's day—to discharge their duty and be good citizens of a free country. He (Mr. White) voted that no amnesty should be granted to Lepine or Reil, but he was now prepared to vote that O'Donoghue should be heard and justice meted out to him. Irishmen had been greatly misled, but he believed they would never be brought into the same position again.

Mr. BANNATYNE denied the assertion in the resolution. The late Governor did all in his power to warn these men and begged them to go to their homes. He knew that the late Mr. Mactavish never did advise Louis Reil, but to warn him and his party to give up their actions and return to their homes, and the first trouble commenced long before McDougall's arrival at Pembina—indeed, he might say, was caused by the hon. member for Lisgar and other agents of his, whom he styled "friends of Canada," men who never lost an opportunity of both of writing against and abusing the people of the country, saying that they would soon be ruled differently when they got in power, as they soon would be. Not long after this a meeting was called, through the organ of the member for Lisgar, by one Wm. Dease, which over one hundred French Métis attended. Mr. Dease addressed the people, and informed them that the Hudson Bay Company had sold their lands and themselves to Canada, and were to receive some £300,000 sterling. Dease was well furnished with information on the subject, and he (Mr. Bannatyne) would like to ask the hon. member for Lisgar if he did not know who furnished him with it, and also advised him to take this step, was it not the hon. member himself? Dease advised the people to organize, demand the public money from the Hudson Bay Company, and form a Government of their own. Governor Mactavish was sent for, came and explained all he knew, and said that there were negotiations going on in England, but that the money was only for their chartered rights and not for the people's lands. On the few occasions in which the interference of the authorities were practicable, their efforts to calm the existing excitement were met by the assertion that they were regarded as mere nominees of the Hudson Bay Company, which had sold the country and its inhabitants, and were, therefore, entitled to no consideration. Another source of all troubles from which they had suffered lay with the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The manner of Confederation was a blunder. From the year 1857 to 1869 the Imperial Government had been trifling with that country and refused to give any useful assistance towards its progress and development.

When the papers from Ontario and Quebec came up, and when they learned McDougall was going in armed to take possession of the country, they organized and kept everyone out of the country. Mr. McDougall was turned away, and a Government formed. Reil was elected at their head, and he sent to Governor Mactavish asking him to delegate his authority to them. He said no, not while there was life in his body. After this the unfortunate death of Scott occurred, and it was a wonder only one life was lost. During the time the delegates were at Ottawa, O'Donoghue was not loyal to the Métis. When the British Flag was raised, a few minutes after, O'Donoghue ordered it to be taken down. News of this was brought to Reil who went out and told O'Donoghue there should be but one master, that the Métis expected to have their rights secured and would live under the British Flag. In proof of it he nailed it to the mast and there it remained until the troops were brought in. O'Donoghue on many occasions did all he could to work for annexation, so much so that at one time a gentleman of high standing came from the American side and offered Reil $50,000 in cash and $100,000 more and a position if he would only work for annexation. Reil told him "Take your money, keep your assistance, I want none of them; I will never work for annexation, and I trust the day will never come when Canada will be annexed to the United States. I left my farm where I was working when I was told we were to be transferred to another power without our being consulted. I will fight to the last until we get a representative Government. I want not your money, and when our point is gained I will go back to my farm again." In June of that year he (Mr. Bannatyne) found O'Donoghue was doing all in his power to secure Reil and his party. He had sent down to the United States and parties were noticed travelling through Minnesota and down the Red River armed. The name of the party who led them could be mentioned if necessary. Reil saw it and wrote to Archbishop Taché urging him to hasten to Red River as O'Donoghue was determined still to resist the Canadian Government, and also instructed the speaker to write his Grace to the same effect. The immediate cause of all the troubles was Mr. McDougall himself, vigorously aided by the member for Lisgar, with whom he took counsel, who grossly deceived him. McDougall afterwards stated that, send where he liked, to the Portage la Prairie or Stone Fort, all his information was certain to come back from Dr. Schultz—information unfortunately for the peace of the country, wholly unreliable, giving an entirely erroneous impression of the actual circumstances of the country and settlers.

The late Governor Mactavish did all he could, and had he or the hon. member for Selkirk done otherwise than they did when the latter acted as Commissioner from Canada, there would have been much bloodshed to deplore, that country would then have been in ashes, and to-day would not have been ours, the almost certainly being there would have been civil war all over the North-West.

Here Mr. Bannatyne read extracts from a letter of the late Governor Mactavish to the late Hon. Joseph Howe, the Secretary of State for the Provinces, dated 14th May, 1874, which were as follows:—

"The ground on which Mr. McDougall pretends to base a belief in the connivance of the Company's officers at the seizure of their Fort, is contained in a report of Major Wallace, who appears to have been commissioned as a spy. I have made diligent enquiry into some matter relating to the visit of the person in question, to the settlement and the probability of his having arrived at the sentiments of those with whom he came in contact. I am informed that the plan taken by the Major to win the confidence of his interlocutors was free indulgence in coarse and unseemly abuse of the gentl man in whose interest he had come. By some people these representations were quickly swallowed as the sentiments of a person who had enjoyed the privilege of long intimacy with the object of his abuse and was therefore a reliable authority; but by the more intelligent of his hearers the Major's deportment caused him to be regarded as a schemer, or a man lacking discretion to a dangerous degree. On the whole I am inclined to think the mission of Major Wallace an error of judgment on the part of its originator. Relying on the accuracy of his assurance' Mr. McDougall remarks that the Company's officers in charge of Fort Garry were told of the intention of the Rebels to take the Fort the day before it occurred, and that the Chief Constable, Mulligan, who is an old soldier, offered to raise a force, partly composed of pensioners, with which he declared he could hold the country against all the rebels who would be likely to attack it, but he was told by Dr. Cowan, the officer in charge, that 'his services were not wanted.' To this I reply there was no such man as 'Chief Constable Mulligan.'

"A force of policemen has for some years past been employed to keep the peace in the village of Winnipeg. Of those men, Pensioner Mulligan is one, but he is vested with no authority or pre-eminence whatever over the others, as the description of his office above quoted would lead one unacquainted with the facts to believe. The other two policemen are French half-breeds, and were among the Insurgents.

"Mulligan did not advise Dr. Cowan of the intended seizure of Fort Garry the day before it occurred, but some time after it had taken place, he and another old pensioner named Michael Power called upon the Doctor and offered to expel the French. On being asked what force he would require to effect his object, Mulligan was silent, but Power replied:—'One man to raise the flag and another to stand below and defend it.' The ridiculous offer was forthwith declined.

"I deny that any of the Company's officers as a body are capable of the gross breach of trust assumed by Mr. McDougall, and I protest against your acceptance of the report of Major Wallace as authoritative, or even fairly reliable in the matter on which it treats.

"At no time was Mr. McDougall or the misery of his position absent from my thoughts. I felt and still feel most deeply on his account and that of the members of his party. Advise or suggestions I had absolutely none to offer, except those which at the rare intervals complained of. I sent in the letter, the length of which seems to be unpalatable. These letters were, as Mr. McDougall correctly supposes, written by my legal adviser, Mr. Black, at a time when, from excessive weakness, I could only with difficulty sign my name. He is incorrect, however, in imputing to Mr. Black personal views, the attainment of which might have influenced the policy of the local authorities and found expression in their official correspondence. As a man of strict honour and integrity, Mr. Black commands the fullest confidence of myself and Council, and I have no hesitation in assuming responsibility for any statement he has placed over my signature. I object to having been laid under the necessity of formally denying charges which should never have been made or entertained against me by your representatives, unless supported by incontrovertible proof. Complicity with those who degrade the Magisterial office by countenancing and supporting armed rebellion against the Sovereign, combined with betrayal of trust, the aim of which would be to sacrifice to a ruinous amount the property of those whose commercial interests have been placed in my hands, imply a moral obliquity of character to the imputation of which I must not be indifferent.

"I object that civil disorder should have been excited in the Colony through official mismanagement.

"Apart altogether from the military episodes of the last few months, it has long been patent to all men of intelligence connected with this place that the mode in which Canada was preparing the way for political incorporation with this country was injurious and likely to create trouble. The mission of Mr. Snow, though represented as an act of delicate charity to a famishing people, made a good deal of mischief. Mr. Snow's apparently close connection with the faction already alluded to, appeared to lend the countenance of your Government to the promoters of tumult and disorder. Canadian newspapers containing absurd caricatures of the country and people, from the pen of the paymaster on the works, were diligently read by the objects of attack. Complaints arose of unjust dealing, of liquor selling to Indians, of interference with pre-emption rights of settlers, of extortion and other disorders, the results of which were a law suit and several uprisings among the French half-breeds, which were with some difficulty suppressed. The bad feeling, however, remained."

Very unfortunate for Mr. McDougall was the impression which even then prevailed in the colony, that he was determined to support his subordinates in everything, and was, although at the time employed with Sir George Cartier, as Canadian Commissioner in England, encouraging political disturbance in this place, with the object of precipitating the downfall of the Company's rule, and the consequently more certain and easy success of his mission.

I think the Imperial Government ought to satisfy English interests in this country on a basis of justice, the more so as this territory has hitherto cost it nothing.

He could only say that while O'Donoghue charged the Hudson Bay Company and others with having instigated and kept up this rebellion, these charges were untrue, and when he stated he was not present at the death of Thomas Scott he also stated what was not true. He was there, and there giving directions on the morning Scott met his death, and O'Donoghue alone, he believed, was the instigator of that crime. O'Donoghue never cared for the interests of the people. His whole wish and determination was to make the people believe that they could not expect mercy from the Canadian Government, and that they would be glad to hand themselves over to the American Government. When O'Donoghue stated that the so-called Fenian raid was only a continuance of the troubles that had already existed, he knew he stated what was untrue, for the moment the Governor General's proclamation was issued Riel and Lepine were found twenty miles from home inciting the people to rise and saying that this was a different matter from the other, and if they were willing to protect their homes before, there was much more reason to do so now. It was said they were rather slow in coming forward to offer their services—that was because the proclamation was not issued in French. Had the motion of the hon. member for Victoria only been for amnesty for O'Donoghue—as a member of the Provisional Government, and had he in that capacity acted only as Reil and the other members of it—he would have been most happy to vote for it. A few years ago Fenians had entered the Eastern Provinces of Canada, some of our best young men were shot down, and some of the Fenians were taken prisoners. A few months afterwards they were liberated, but O'Donoghue's attempt at invasion was even more wanton and unprovoked than the attempt which had been made in Canada, and did not in his opinion merit amnesty.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said it had been made to appear that the case of O'Donoghue was the case of Riel and others who were connected with the insurrection at Red River in 1869-70. It was true that these men were together up to the time the country was occupied by Canada in the summer of 1870, or rather until within two months of that period, for it was known that before the troops reached Red River there was a great divergence of opinion between them. It was well known that Riel and his friends were anxious at that time to come peaceably into Canada, but O'Donoghue took quite a different course. There was evidence to shew that O'Donoghue endeavoured to keep the people from uniting with Canada, that he used every effort to have the country annexed to the United States, and it was also well established that Riel at that time had offers from the other side of the line which he would not accede to. In August, 1870, Canada took possession of that country; this Fenian raid occurred in October of 1871 after there was a Government in the country, and it had become a province of the Dominion.

Everything was going on with apparent satisfaction to the inhabitants when we heard of this Fenian raid. To call it a continuation of the outbreak of 1869-70 would be absurd, as it did not take place until fifteen months afterwards. There could be no doubt at that time O'Donoghue was associated with the body known as Fenians. It was also known that Riel and these other parties who had been connected with the insurrection of 1869, on this latter occasion offered to aid the Government against the Fenians. The hon. gentleman from Victoria had taken credit for O'Donoghue, that there was no blood shed during his attempted invasion of Manitoba, but even this could not be credited to O'Donoghue. It was entirely owing to the admirable conduct of the people of Manitoba, who rose to defend their country and their rights as Canadian citizens, and to the timely assistance given by the officers of the United States at that time on the frontier. He did not think that O'Donoghue should be pardoned because he was an Irishman, any more than if he were English, Scotch or French, as all were equally entitled to the protection of the law in this country, no matter what their nationality.

Now, with reference to the accusation of complicity with the insurgents, brought against Governor MacTavish and other officers of the Hudson Bay Company—Men actuated by proper feelings would pause and well consider before venturing an opinion in such a case. But, perhaps, it was becoming and congenial to men like O'Donoghue and the hon. member for Lisgar after all the prime mover in this affair, maliciously and unblushingly to prefer those charges against the lamented gentleman, Mr. MacTavish, now that his lips are sealed in death. Mr. MacTavish, was well known to be a gentleman of the strictest integrity, a man ever actuated by the highest principles of honour, a man whose memory was enshrined in the hearts of the whole people of the Red River of his day. He would be long remembered for the good he had conferred on the country. Mr. MacTavish saw that he was unable to withstand the strong force in opposition to him, and in order to prevent bloodshed he adopted the course which he thought most advisable under the circumstances, and in this he (Mr. Smith) cordially co-operated with him. How could Mr.

MacTavish have found means of doing anything against such an insurrection as that to which he was opposed? The people, rightly or wrongly—he did not then think rightly—believed their rights were in jeopardy. They believed they ought to have been consulted before they were dragged into Confederation, and he frankly admitted he held the same opinion. Seeing they were not consulted they determined to protect their rights as they understood them, and with such a force against him Mr. MacTavish was powerless. The honorable member for Lisgar had spoken of cowardice and incapacity in connection with this matter; but such an imputation would come home with more truth and justice against the hon. gentleman himself. When intrenched within his stronghold at the outset of the insurrection, why did he not keep his post with the body of men with whom he was then associated? Were the odds too great against him? and if so, why so unmanly as to turn round and upbraid those who were in a weaker and far more difficult position than he himself, when he surrendered his arms and was marched off to prison? How different another party of some forty men, when having in their keeping important documents and information from the Canadian Government to be communicated to the people of Red River, they found themselves opposed by more than ten times their own number of armed men! They, at the imminent hazard of their lives, fulfilled their commission, and so prepared the way by maintaining comparative peace and quiet in the settlement for its union with Canada.

He was sure, had Governor MacTavish lived, he would have been foremost in desiring an investigation into his conduct; and it was well known to the hon. gentleman from North Hastings and all the other members of the North-West Committee, that he (Mr. Smith) was most anxious and pressing to have a full and searching enquiry into everything concerning the insurrection, and into the alleged connection of the Hudson's Bay Company's officers with it.

With regard to himself (Mr. Smith) he desired to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar last Session, to the effect that he (Mr. Smith) had attended a public meeting in the Parish of St. Andrews in the winter of 1870, at which he (the hon. member for Lisgar) was also present. This allegation is contained on page 1,077 of the Debates for 1875. This charge being brought against him, he believed it to be his duty as a man of honour to disprove it, and he was in possession of the means of doing so most effectually. Briefly, then, on the 27th December, 1869, he arrived at Fort Garry—on the 19th and 20th of January the meetings of the people of Red River, known as the "mass meetings," took place. At these the friendly intentions of the Canadian Government were made known to the settlers, and they then determined to meet in convention to arrange terms of union with the Dominion. The convention held its first sitting on the 25th of January, and before rising on the 10th February, desired to have delegates elected in the several parishes to insure the peace and quiet of the settlement until the union with Canada could be consummated. On the 17th of February Riel and his friends captured several men—some of the persons he believed with whom the hon. member for Lisgar had been associated in opposition to the former—and who, after the liberation by Riel of a number of prisoners, had disbanded and were on their way to their homes. One of these men, Major Bolton, was taken prisoner on the 17th, tried by those then in power, and condemned to be shot at midnight on Saturday the 19th of the same month. He (Mr. Smith) conceived it to be his duty—his bounden duty—to see Louis Riel on the matter, and endeavour to save the life of this officer. After much earnest discussion Riel consented to spare Bolton's life, and at the same time said: "Now, Mr. Commissioner, I have a favour to ask of you." Riel then asked him to go throughout the settlement and advise the people that with a view of coming into Canada, and maintaining the peace in the meantime, they should assemble peaceably and quietly in convention. The result of this he was assured would be the release of every prisoner. Who would not have responded to such a call, seeing that there were no other means within command of accomplishing an object desired by every man in Canada? Besides, was it not his duty to do all in his power to prevent bloodshed so long as there was no sacrifice of honour? They knew that nothing but evil could come of strife. [Up to the 20th of February he had never once left Fort Garry from the time he had entered it, on the 27th of the previous December, with the sole exception of going to the Court House under guard, and two or three times just outside of the wall. It was asserted that he appeared at meetings at which the hon. member for Lisgar was also present in the Parish of St. Andrews—that was before the 20th of February, 1870.

He would now read affidavits of gentlemen of the highest respectability, residing in the Parish of St. Andrews, the Hon. Mr. Hay, Captain Kennedy and Mr. Andrew Mowat, as follows, showing that the hon. gentleman was not present at the meeting in question:—

“I, ANDREW MOWAT, of the parish of St. Andrews, in said county and Province, farmer, do solemnly declare as follows:

“1. I was a resident of the said parish of St. Andrews during all the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy.

“2. I know Donald A. Smith, Esquire, and John Schultz, Esquire, the present members of the Dominion House of Commons for Selkirk and Lisgar respectively.

“3. During the said year, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, the said Mr. Smith never attended a public meeting of any kind, either in the school-house or in any other place in the said parish of St. Andrews, nor did he and the said John Schultz ever meet each other upon any occasion in the said parish. My grounds of belief for this last statement are that during Mr. Smith's visit to Red River in that year, Dr. Schultz was either a prisoner in Fort Garry, or in hiding in the neighborhood of St. Andrews, until the departure of the latter for Canada, via Lake Winnipeg. During the period of his concealment he was five days in my house, and only appeared in public upon the occasion of the expedition to Kildonan in February, and the meeting held upon the return of that expedition. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act passed in the thirty-seventh year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled:

Mr. SMITH.

‘An Act for the suppression of voluntary and extra judicial oaths.’

LISGAR, to wit :

“I, EDWARD H. G. G. HAY, of the Parish of St. Andrews South, in the County of Lisgar and Province of Manitoba, Esquire, do solemnly declare as follows:

“1. I have lived in the said Parish of St. Andrews since the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and recollect distinctly the circumstances which occurred in the said parish in connection with the Red River troubles, ‘so called.’

“2. I was present at every public meeting held in the said parish in connection with the said troubles from the first day of January of the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, until I went up to Winnipeg or Fort Garry to attend the Convention of Delegates held at Winnipeg in the month of March of that year, which Convention is now known as the Provisional Government.

“3. In the month of February, in the year last named, a body of armed men marched from St. Andrews, aforesaid, to the parish of Kildonan, in the County of Selkirk, and about four miles distant from Winnipeg, with the ostensible object of obtaining the release of the prisoners then confined by Mr. Riel in Fort Garry. Messengers were sent to Mr. Riel and the prisoners were released. The force then, after deliberation, retreated to St. Andrews.

“4. On the day after the return of the said party from Kildonan a public meeting was held in the school-house at the Rapids church in said parish of St. Andrews South. The object of that meeting was to discuss the propriety of taking possession of Lower Fort Garry and setting up a Government in opposition to Riel. Dr. Schultz, member of the House of Common of the Dominion of Canada for the County of Lisgar, was present at the meeting. I was also present. Donald A. Smith, Esquire, the present representative of the County of Selkirk, in the Dominion House of Commons, was not present, either on the same day or the Monday following. Another public meeting was held in the school-house at which I was present, and of which I was chairman. The said Donald A. Smith was not present at that meeting. At that meeting Thomas Sinclair of St. Andrews, the present Registrar of Deeds, and myself, were elected Delegates to the Convention at Fort Garry, which, as I have said, has since been known as the Provisional Government. A day or two after that meeting Mr. Smith came down from Fort Garry, accompanied by Archdeacon McLan and Henry McDermot. This was the first occasion of his visit to St. Andrews since his arrival in Manitoba, then Red River. He met the said Thomas Sinclair and myself at the Reverend Mr. Gardiner's house, and after a short consultation he continued on to Lower Fort Garry, and thence to St. Peters.

"5. He attended no public meeting in St. Andrews North or South during that visit. At this time Dr. Shultz had left St. Andrews on his way to Canada via Lake Winnipeg.

"6. The said Donald A. Smith never attended any public meeting of any kind in either of the parishes of St. Andrews North or South during all the period of time he was in Red River as Commissioner or Agent of the Dominion Government, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and to the best of my knowledge and belief Dr. Shultz and Mr. Smith never met during that visit, and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously, believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act passed in the thirtieth year of Her Majesty's reign intitled 'An Act for the Suppression of Voluntary and ext a judicial Oaths.

" EDWARD H. G. G. HAY.

"Taken and subscribed by the said Edward H. G. G. Hay before me this twelfth day of February A. D., 1876.

"(Signed),

" SEDLEY BLANCHARD,

"Notary Public for the Province of Manitoba."

Another affidavit from Capt. William Kennedy, St. Andrews, County of Lisgar, and sworn to before Sedley Blanchard, Notary Public, was also submitted, giving evidence to the same effect as the foregoing.

Mr. SCHULTZ enquired whether Mr. G. Hay, one of the deponents, had not been the Hudson Bay Company's candidate against him in Lisgar County.

Mr. SMITH replied that he was not called upon to answer this question. However he would state that Mr. Hay, the Hon. Mr. Hay, at one time a member of the Provincial Government, had never been a candidate of the Hudson Bay Company in any respect. But the hon. gentleman had certainly opposed the hon. member for Lisgar in that county.

These affidavits were signed by some of the most respectable men, not only of the Parish of St. Andrews, but of the Province of Manitoba, who were acquainted with the exact circumstances, and who could not but have known had he visited that parish as was asserted by the hon. member for Lisgar. With these vouchers for the accuracy of what he had said last year, he could pronounce the misstatement then made by the hon. member for Lisgar in this relation utterly false, and such as would brand him as one not to be tolerated, as a member of such an honourable body as this House. The hon. member wished to seem to set lightly by this, but here was the proof, and it was impossible for the hon. member to gainsay it. Up to the 20th of February, he (Mr. Smith) had never left Fort Garry to go even for half a mile away, for the best of all reasons—that this was utterly beyond his power. These assertions of the hon. member last year had been false from beginning to end. This he must say, in presence of the vouchers he held, and if an investigation was made into the matter, he could adduce the most abundant proof to show that the hon. member had come to the House with the deliberate intention—and with malice aforethought—to make a statement that he knew to be absolutely false, and that he did make such statement. Before the real circumstances were known regarding the hon. member's conduct at Red River, the hon. member had been lionized in Canada, and presented with watches, services of plate, guns with which to shoot the members of the Provisional Government, and all sorts of nice things. This was very pleasant no doubt at the moment, but he fancied that the hon. gentleman seeing it is now known how little he deserved them, looked back upon these occurrences—these trophies with very little satisfaction.

The Imperial Government had had every opportunity of investigating into and knowing the truth, and they had exonerated the late Mr. MacTavish of all blame in connection with the troubles. With regard to himself (Mr. Smith) perhaps he might say a word more. He regretted that the right hon. member for Kingston was not in his place; but other members of the late Government were present, and they would not object to his reading the letter he had received from them, not in 1870, when any doubt might have existed as to the course he had pursued, not even in 1871, but as late as 1872. But, aside for a moment, touching the affairs of 1871, he might ask when the Fenian raid took place, and almost every man turned out, and when he himself had the honour of standing at the head of a hundred as good men as ever bore arms to repel these Fenians—not the Provisional Government—where was the hon. member for Lisgar then? Was he in these ranks? No, he was not. On another occasion, in 1870, the hon. gentleman had made as quick steps as possible out of the country, and so did he also act in this case.

To resume, however, in 1872, certainly without any solicitation on his part, he (Mr. Smith) had received from the then Government, a letter dated the 22nd of February, entirely approving of and thanking him for all he had done while acting as Commissioner in 1869-70; and so anxious was the Ministry that he should obtain it, that having sent one copy to Fort Garry, he was informed by telegraph—for he was then on the point of leaving for England—that another duplicate had been sent to his address by the same steamer by which he took passage.

Having read an extract from this letter conveying the thanks of the Governor General for the manner in which he had executed the commission entrusted to him, Mr. Smith being asked by an hon. member what about the $60,000 paid to Dr. Schultz as indemnity for losses during the insurrection, replied: Not $60,000—only $32,000, or with the money for Brick's $35,000, adding the hon. member for Lisgar told the House on a former occasion that he had been whitewashed in respect of this payment by a Committee of Public Accounts, but every hon. member of this House then on that Committee knew that through that layer of whitewash there appeared many very dark streaks.

Mr. Smith then expressed his regret that he had been forced into these explanations, adding that he trusted this was the last occasion on which this affair of the North-West troubles would be brought before the House.

Mr. LITTLE believed mistakes were made by the Hudson Bay officials. They did not preserve that firm attitude for the country they did in their own interests. If they had done so those disturbances would have been nipped in the bud. He believed also a great mistake had been made in giving this amnesty to Riel. The Crown can do no harm, but its advisers can and did. He did not believe in this process of whitewashing by Parliamentary law. It had been done in Ontario, but he trusted in this instance such an evil would not be repeated. He could not vote for a committee that would have the effect of whitewashing such an offender. Like any other British subject he ought to come forward like a man if he believed himself innocent, and be tried by a jury of his countrymen.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that it must be conceded that this discussion had wandered away far from the motion before the House. So much latitude had been allowed to many, in fact, all the speakers, that it would seem as though the Speaker himself rather enjoyed these North-West discussions, and if in the discussions he should wander a little himself, he would expect the same consideration which had been shown to his hon. friend from Selkirk. As to the remarks of his hon. friend from Provencher, he had nothing to say. He differed with him entirely in the opinions which he had formed and the conclusions he had arrived at, but at the same time, knowing that he was the brother-in-law of Governor MacTavish, it was the least he could do to take, as he had done, the first opportunity which offered to present the conduct of his relative in as favourable a light as possible; and while the hon. gentleman might have been led in the heat of discussion into making statements against himself, yet he had refrained. But while this was the case with his hon. friend from Provencher, what must he say of the manner in which his hon. friend from Selkirk pursued him? What had he (Mr. Schultz) done that year after year he must be the victim of his hon. friend's peculiar views on North-West matters. Hon. gentlemen would remember Coleridge's beautiful tale of the ancient mariner. This ancient mariner was described as a man of weird and unearthly aspect, over whose soul the shadow of some great crime rested, and who, at stated intervals, was compelled by some hidden remorse within to pour out his doleful tale and relieve his misery, and it almost seemed a parrallel case with his hon. friend from Selkirk, who all through the recess and up to the time when he could pour out his tale of mis-statements of the hon. member for Lisgar seemed to be boiling and simmering with this oft-told tale of the North-West troubles. He (Mr. Schultz) felt much as the wedding guest, whom the ancient mariner stopped, who exclaimed:—

Mr. SMITH.

“ I fear thee, Ancient Mariner ;
I fear thy skinny hand,
By thy long gray beard and glistening eye,
Now wherefore stop'st thou me.”

Now, if his hon friend the ancient mariner had only told his story to the marines instead of to the House of Commons not much harm would be done, but we had every year the same trash brought up and talked about by the hon. member. On the present occasion he had seen fit to dispute what he alleged the member for Lisgar had said last Session about his (the member for Selkirk) being at a school house to dissuade the people from resisting Riel, and had brought an affidavit from a Mr. Hay, the Hudson Bay Company's candidate against him in his county to disprove what he had said. Now it really mattered very little whether the hon. member for Selkirk was in the parsonage using his influence or in the school house. The facts remained the same; what he asserted last Session he still asserted, that the hon. gentlemen had advised the people who were then resisting to yield to Riel's Government, and that by his cowardice and incapacity as Commissioner for the Canadian Government he continued a rebellion which a man of firmness and courage in the same position could have stopped. As his honourable friend had read a number of papers, he must beg permission to read a couple, too, which would be found to bear on the question raised by the hon. gentleman. The first of these was from John Bruce, the first President of the Provisional Government, who might be supposed to know even more about the events discussed than the hon. gentleman from Selkirk or himself.

“ TERRITORY OF DAKOTA, } “ COUNTY OF PEMBINA, } ss.

“ John Bruce of Pembina County, Territory of Dakota, farmer, who being duly sworn deposes and says: That he is the person who was the first President of the Provisional Government of the North-West, in the years 1869 and 1870; that the matter connected with it formation was first brought directly before his notice by being invited to attend a meeting in the Court House, at Fort Garry, in the beginning of October, called for the purpose of discussing the change about to take place in the affairs of the country. At this meeting the question of admitting Governor McDougall was brought up, and while a number, such as Dease and Hamlin wished him to come in, Louis Riel and others opposed his being admitted, saying that once in he could not be put out, as those in favour of admitting him were in the majority. He, the said John Bruce, did not take part in the discussion, as he had been elected Chairman of the meeting; but he was in favour of keeping out Governor McDougall by force, for the following reason: Being well acquainted with Governor MacTavish, and being a Justice of the Peace under the Hudson's Bay Company's rule; he, the said John Bruce was accustomed to go frequently to Governor MacTavish for advice and instructions, and that when the movement was first talked of in the month of September he had gone to Governor MacTavish and asked his advice about it. Governor MacTavish said in answer to him that it would be well to resist the Canadian Governor and keep McDougall out; that it was an injustice to the people the Canadians taking possession of the country, and an injustice to the officers of the Hudson Bay Company, because the Government had given to them no part of the three hundred thousand pounds paid for their country. On the 16th day of October, A.D. 1869, another meeting was held at St. Vital, when Riel addressed the people in an excited manner, saying that McDougall was coming in to rule the country; that he would ill-treat the Metis and urged them to immediate action to keep him out. Next morning early a crowd went and constructed the barricade at Stinking River. About one week after this event he went again to see Governor MacTavish and learn his opinion of what had been done. After telling Governor MacTavish all that had been done and was intended, Governor MacTavish told him that it was all right and to keep out McDougall, but to be careful, for he feared the movement might go too far and cause bloodshed. After the party went to the Hudson Bay Company's Post, at Pembina, and drove Governor McDougall over the line, he, the said John Bruce, sent to Governor MacTavish to inform him of the event and to learn his opinion. Governor MacTavish sent word that it was all right. On the 2nd of November Fort Garry was occupied by Riel and the party during the absence of the said John Bruce. That he, the said John Bruce, again visited Governor MacTavish at his home on the 5th of November, and that MacTavish said: ‘ Well, Mr. Bruce, what news? That his answer was: ‘ Well, you have the news! Your Fort is occupied and it will be a great expense to the Company. Then said MacTavish replied that he would rather have the Metis there than the Canadians, and that as for the expense, that the Company in England had got £300,000, and he did not care if it did cost them a thousand or two. He, the said John Bruce, then asked him how long he was willing to feed them, and he said, 'As long as you like, because while you are here I feel safe.' A short time after this the said Governor MacTavish requested a guard to be put before his house, as he feared injury from the Canadians, which was done. When Col. Dennis came into the country with the proclamation from Governor McDougall, he, the said John Bruce, again saw Governor MacTavish and told him of the proclamation of Governor McDougall. Said MacTavish said: 'The proclamation amounts to nothing; it is not worth anything; it is not true and you need not believe a word of it. I have received a letter from McDougall and I am as mad as I can be about it.' After the taking of Dr. Schultz, done on the 7th of December, A.D. 1869, he again saw and informed Governor MacTavish of the capture and imprisonment of the Canadians, when the said MacTavish again assured him 'that it was well done and that now there would be no further trouble,' but they had better release the natives of the country; 'as for Dr. Schultz, they had better chain and make sure of him, as he was the most dangerous of the lot.' That about this time he, the said John Bruce, thought that the movement was going too far, and shortly afterwards, and long before the shooting of Scott, he had left the movement and Riel had taken full control. That said John Bruce does not believe that Governor MacTavish in any way encouraged the action which led to the death of Scott, and felt that it would hurt their cause; but that up to that everything was done of importance with the full knowledge and consent of the said MacTavish. That he believed the reason for the action of the said Governor was caused by the general feeling of the Company's officers against the Canadian occupation of the country; and verily declares that if at any of the interviews described Governor MacTavish had expressed disapprobation or counselled a different course that the insurrection would not have commenced, or after its commencement would at any time have been stopped.

"Before the undersigned, a Notary Public, in and for said County and Territory, appeared John Lennon, of the town of Pembina, in the said County of Pembina, Hotel-keeper, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says:—That his name, occupation and residence is correctly stated as above, and that during what are known as the troubles of 1869-1870, he was then a resident of what is now the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, where he kept a saloon. That when the movement against Governor McDougall was first commenced by Riel, Bruce and others, he took no part in it, believing at first that it was an offence against the Hudson Bay Company who were then ruling the country, but that this impression was soon removed from his mind by finding the officer of the Hudson Bay Company, then at Fort Garry, encouraging those who were to resist the entrance of Governor McDougall, and in every secret way encouraging and assisting those who were engaged in the movement. The first case which occurred by which he knew that officers of the Hudson Bay Company were in complicity with the movement, was a short time before Riel took possession of Fort Garry. A number of persons were assembled at a hotel kept by Dutch George, where John MacTavish of the Hudson Bay Company, the person at present in charge of the Hudson Bay Company's Post at Fort Garry, urged every one present, including myself, to go up and join the party under Riel at Stinking River, and that a short time afterwards I went in to Robert O'Lone to see Governor MacTavish, then Governor of the Hudson Bay Company, and that when the said Robert O'Lone asked him his opinion of the movement, he then said Governor MacTavish told us that Riel and the insurgents were perfectly right in resisting. That the Canadian Government had no right to force the purchase of the country and thus injure the half-breeds, and that the Hudson Bay Company were forced to take the three hundred thousand pounds rather than nothing from the Dominion Government, and that it was an act of injustice to them as well. Seeing from this and from many sources of information that the movement was then really one of the Hudson Bay Company's authorities, I became engaged by the Provisional Government as Chief Constable for the Province, and while thus engaged I had an opportunity of knowing all about their secret matters. In reference to the loan said to have been drawn from the Hudson Bay Company by the Provisional Government, I knew that there was no forcing in the matter, and in regard to the so-called capture of Fort Garry by Riel. I knew of my own knowledge that it was practically understood between the authorities at the Fort and Riel that Fort Garry should be taken possession of. In reference to the shooting of Scott, I believe that Wm. B. O'Donoghue was in no way connected with it, and frequently in conversation with me told me that he was away at White Horse plains and that it was a bad step and deeply deplored. It was that action also that caused me to leave the moment which I did, immediately afterwards. I fully believe but for Governor MacTavish and the other officers of the Hudson Bay, no movement of any kind would have occurred and that Governor McDougall would have come in without opposition.

"Notary Public,

These papers were only interesting from the fact that they were on the question of the Hudson Bay Company's complicity or otherwise. The House must be aware that this company had made a large claim against the Government for compensation for losses during the rebellion. If the Hudson Bay Company were not guilty of complicity in the rebellion, they were entitled to compensation for their losses the same as anyone else, but it seemed that their guilt was confessed in the fact that they did not dare now to push their claim; and that even his hon. friend from Selkirk, brazen as he was in other respects, did not dare say a word about it.

As regards the ungracious and unkindly allusion made by the hon. member for Selkirk as to his reception by the people of Canada in 1870, after escaping from Riel, he could only say that he would regret if it was undeserved, and that if his hon. friend had done his duty as Canadian Commissioner, he (Mr. Schultz) would not have had a price set on his head, and been compelled to make the trip mentioned. It seemed to him that the hon. gentleman from Selkirk, in view of what had been said in the House, when last Session he had (he had almost said swindled) succeeded in getting $3,000 out of the Government. He would have shown better taste in keeping silent on a subject which had, to say the least, so lit le for his honour and glorification in it.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said neither at any public meeting at St. Andrews, nor in any other way or on any other occasion did he make such representations as those attributed to him by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down. Even if he had done it would not have affected in any way the action of the people of St. Andrews, because they had appointed their delegates to the meeting while he (Mr. Smith) was still a prisoner within the walls of Fort Garry, as his hon. friend the member for Provencher would bear testimony.

He desired to ask the hon. gentleman if he was aware where Mr. John Bruce was at that time, and if he was not in Manitoba did he leave the Province on account of a charge of theft or perjury being brought against him?

Mr. SCHULTZ said he was not Mr. Bruce's keeper. He wished to make one explanation directly bearing on what his hon. friend had stated. The hon. gentleman was under a misapprehension as to what he had stated in regard to his (Mr. Schultz's) conduct at the school house. What he wished the House to understand by his speech last Session was that it was through the hon. gentleman's instrumentality that the people of Red River, at a time when they might have resisted the authority of Riel, conceded to him their allegiance, and that by the hon. gentleman's cowardice and incapacity in the discharge of his duty as Canadian Commissioner he prolonged that rebellion at a time when it ought to have been stopped.

Mr. BOWELL could not give a silent vote on this question, and while he intended to vote against the motion he desired to take exception to some of the reasons given by the Hon. Minister of Justice for the action of the Government in the matter. The hon. gentleman had stated that those who had been pardoned by the Government were not parties to the Fenian raid. Now, it was proved by the evidence taken before the North-West Committee that on the 5th of the month the raiders marched towards Pembina to take possession of the fort, and it was not until March 7th, after they had been driven from Canadian soil and had taken refuge on American territory, that Riel and those with whom he was connected, offered their services to the Government. Had it been supposed by Riel that O'Donoghue and those with him would have been successful in their raid, he would have joined them. He (Mr. Bowell) believed that had O'Donoghue been of the same nationality as Riel and Lepine he would not have been excluded from the amnesty. He stated this before, and he believed it now. He might be wrong but nevertheless he was sincere in what he said. He was not prepared to vote for any motion which would extend that pardon to any of those whom he believed were guilty, not only of rebellion, but of one of the blackest crimes that perhaps had blackened the criminal annals of this country. He could not help expressing his amusement at the ignorance of the subject displayed by the member for Montreal Centre, and more particularly of its application to the class he claimed to represent.

He must have regretted exceedingly that he consented to second the resolution, because after the speech of the Hon. Minister of Justice he evidently had found new light. Having done that it would have been much more honourable for him to have asked the member for Victoria to have allowed him to withdraw his name as seconder to the motion, but he did not do so, and he supposed the hon. gentleman was prepared to vote with the mover of the resolution. He trusted they had heard, for some time at least, the last of this question in this House, but if it did come up again it would not be to extend pardon to those who should never have received it.

Hon. Mr. POPE said he was one of those who had voted for the amnesty last year. He did so because he thought no possible good could come from punishing these men. To-day he stood in the same position, and with the hope that the hon. gentleman from Victoria would withdraw his motion, since he saw it was impossible to carry it. This man O'Donoghue, whoever he was, or whatever crimes he might have been guilty of, was said to be nothing less than a Fenian from the United States. He understood the man was a Canadian, and he took arms against this country; but did they not find other men taking up arms against the country? Were not many Fenians placed in the penitentiary from the other side of the line? Was not an amnesty given to them, and why should he not be pardoned too? If any good purpose were to be obtained by banishing this man from the country he would support it; but as nothing could be done now he would urge upon the hon. gentleman to withdraw the motion and await a time when this country would think it was beneath them to pursue anyone to the extent they had pursued this man. He admitted that the crime was a serious one, but no possible good could come from pursuing this man any further.

Mr. COSTIGAN said he had become satisfied from the tone of the remarks of the Hon. Minister of Justice that his mind was made up to oppose this resolution. He could easily understand how the hon. gentleman, by the forcible way of putting the subject before the House, could make out such a case against O'Donoghue that his resolution would be voted down. But he remained of the same opinion as formerly, that an injustice had been done; that there was an inconsistency in the manner in which this man had been treated as compared with the justice dealt out to others. He had said at first that he was not going to charge the Government with the insinuation that had been cast across the floor of the House, that it was because of his nationality that O'Donoghue was excluded from the amnesty, but he felt that as far as concerned the allowance of justice or fair consideration in this House, a man might as well be a farmer as an Irishman. The Hon. Minister of Justice said it was quite competent for this man O'Donoghue to obtain justice in the Courts. The same proposition was made that Riel could stand his trial in Ontario, Quebec or Manitoba, and then this House would deal with it afterwards. But he never did so; and notwithstanding he did not submit to be dealt with by the tribunals of the country, the Government took the motion up, and an amnesty was granted to him and to Lepine. The Minister of Justice made a strong point against O'Donoghue when he said the so-called Fenian raid was not a continuation of the North-West troubles; but he thought there was evidence already adduced which gave strong reason to believe that the Provisional Government had entered into an agreement with O'Donoghue that this raid was to be made for the purpose of forcing the amnesty from the Government, and that the former were cognizant of the steps about to be taken. It appeared that the affidavit furnished by Francis Charette showed that these parties were in league with O'Donoghue and those who were with him. (He here read the affidavit in question.)

Mr. BOWELL.

It had been clearly stated to-night this man O'Donoghue had certain strong claims on the sympathy of those who favoured an amnesty for Riel and Lepine, because the Minister of Justice had admitted if it had not been for this raid and the assistance they rendered to repel it there would have been no amnesty at all. He remembered when Riel and Lepine had been treated by hon. members opposite as anything but gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN—I am glad to hear the Minister of Justice say “hear, hear,” because he has called them gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—If I did so it was inadvertently. I withdraw it at once. It would be a disgrace to the name.

Mr. COSTIGAN—It is extraordinary that while he considers Riel and Lepine gentlemen, to which I do not object, he treats O’Donoghue, their colleague, as a ruffian.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—We must draw the line somewhere.

Mr. COSTIGAN said the principal reason why the Government granted a partial amnesty was the fact that they were pressed by their supporters on one side to grant a complete pardon and on the other to grant none. They were obliged to yield. In the instructions to the Governor General it was clearly laid down that there should be no amnesty for the crime of murder. Notwithstanding this the Government were forced to pardon Riel and Lepine. There had been many Fenian raids into Canada, but in every instance excepting this a full and unconditional pardon was granted. He would not withdraw his motion, though he knew it would be defeated, because he intended to continue his effort until justice was done O’Donoghue.

The House then divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

SUPPLY.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Young in the chair.

Item 138, providing for salaries and disbursements of Fishery Overseers and Wardens: Ontario, $3,860; Quebec, $10,000; Nova Scotia, $14,375; New Brunswick, $10,085; Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, $1,500 and British Columbia, $1,000; being taken up,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK stated that these salaries in Quebec had been increased $2,000; in Nova Scotia, $1,300 and in New Brunswick, $2,500—signifying either that a greater number of overseers had been appointed, or that their salaries had been advanced, neither of which was necessary. The Government proposed retrenchment, and this was a department in which it could well be done. He had heard more grumbling concerning the system in force during the last year than during the ten previous years, and this related particularly to Inland Districts, on account of hoop and trap-net fishing, which, if allowed to continue, would utterly destroy the fish in these quarters. The evil effects of this practice had already been seriously felt on the Rideau Canal, and the River St. Lawrence. The farmers in his constituency complained loudly in this relation, stating that it was now impossible to catch fish where they had formerly been plentiful. He urged the Government to look into the matter, and thoroughly investigate the license system.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that the attention of the Minister and Marine had already been called to the use of hoop and trap nets, which would be restricted as much as possible. The licenses would be quietly and gradually diminished to the greatest possible extent. As to the other point, if a system of fish protection prevailed in this Dominion, a considerable number of officers must be appointed to inspect the various lakes and streams; and this was done in order to remedy the very evil against which the hon. gentleman had directed his eloquence. The only addition made to salaries had taken place in Nova Scotia. One inspector had formerly attempted to discharge the duty of looking after all the officers employed in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and as one person could not properly perform this task, they had separated the Provinces in this relation, and appointed a special officer for the latter. In the other items there was no increase, but on the contrary, a positive decrease. The usual details would be found in the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) thought that the hon. member for Frontenac had not been very logical in his statements with reference to the increase of expenditure, as he had complained of this, while he found fault because the fishing districts in his part of the country were not sufficiently protected. This protective system, he would remark, was only now being introduced into the Lower Provinces under the energetic management of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He anticipated that under the circumstances the expenditure would be yearly increased, for it would be useless to establish breeding establishments in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick if a sufficient number of overseers and wardens were not nominated.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said that to him it seemed an outrage upon the rights of the people of Northumberland to say that the riparian privileges which they had enjoyed for three-quarters of a century should be taken away by an Order in Council without the fishermen being allowed an opportunity of presenting their case to Parliament. Before the Government should have issued such regulations, which were first dated in the month of March, but which date was subsequently struck out and May substituted, they should have submitted this policy to Parliament, which was at that time sitting, and ask for an expression of this House as to whether the rights of three-quarters of a century should be taken from the people without warning. Instead of doing so, they issued this Order in Council, and the first intimation the people had of the policy of the Government was that these Orders were fulminated from one end of his constituency to the other.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that the debate should be adjourned in consequence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries being absent from the House; the debate could take place on concurrence. The suggestion was adopted and the item passed.

On item "Nova Scotia, including Inspector and Clerk," $14,375,

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) asked why there was an increase of $1,175 over the vote of last year?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was formerly an inspector appointed for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick jointly, hitherto; now there were two.

The item passed.

On item, $17,000 for the maintenance and repairs of steamer for protection of fisheries,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the increase of $7,000 was only apparent as it was taken from the item for Dominion steamers. The object was to send the steamer Lady Head to the Gulf for a longer time than usual.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the logical results of the present system, as far as could be judged, was that the more money that was spent the less efficiency was secured.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he would be glad if some arrangement could be made with the neighbouring country to protect our waters.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT admitted the great importance of this point, and they had communicated through the British Ambassador with the United States on the subject. He was not, however, prepared to say what chance there was of satisfactory arrangements being consummated.

Mr. BERTRAM called attention to the fact that a number of Americans came over here to fish for pleasure, and suggested that a small fee should be exacted from them.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the Government applied the regulations in regard to the fisheries in a manner which was unjust to the Province from which he came. He contended that the Government was bound to administer the affairs of the country as not to press unduly on one section. For instance, it was an outrage to pass laws that were limited in the operation to New Brunswick. He thought the Government had acted in a high-handed manner in regard to the fisheries. The return for which he moved time ago had just come down, and after a hasty glance he could not find any justification for the attempt to deprive the people of the Maritime Provinces of rights which they had enjoyed for nearly a century.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE said the Glendon, which had been purchased at St. John for $20,000, was not fit for the service she was bought to perform. The very men that went on board this vessel had condemned her and were afraid to go to sea on her when there was any sea or wind. She had not power enough to face a breeze. When she left St. John for Pictou, a schooner left a day later and yet got to Pictou ahead of her. The Government could have purchased a Scotch built vessel for $25,000 at the time they got the Glendon, and saved money in maintenance and running.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Glendon had cost $30,000 in the first place. Mr. Smith, who examined the vessel, valued her at $25,000, and she was purchased by the Government for $20,000. All possible pains had been taken to see if she was fit for the service. It appeared, however, that she was not, and had to be employed in the lighthouse service.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said it was an insane purchase. One of the persons who had sold the vessel to the Government informed him that he would have been glad to part with her at half the price.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the vessel was not really worth $5,000, and she could have been bought any day for $10,000 cash. It was well known in St. John that she was unfit for the service, and people would not believe at first that the Government had bought her.

Mr. McLEOD said the purchase of the Glendon might have been an error of judgment, but she cost only $70 per ton, while the late Government had paid over $100 per ton for two schooners which were now doing duty as light-ships.

The item was carried.

On item No. 148, appropriating $16,000 for fish-breeding, fish-ways and oyster beds,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked how much of this money was spent in Ontario and in the other Provinces of the Dominion?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the money was expended on the fish-breeding establishments in the various Provinces. About $4000 would be spent in Ontario and the remainder on the other establishments, which were about six in number.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the money spent in the encouragement of fish breeding in Canada was most judiciously expended, and he would have been in favour of a larger expenditure in this work.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE thought that the money in question was well expended, and asked what was to be done with reference to oyster beds?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that they would be as far as possible protected.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE read from a report a statement to the effect that our oyster beds were being completely exhausted, accompanied by the warning that unless they were closed against dredging for three years it would be too late to preserve seed. He lamented the circumstance that we continued to import vast quantities of oysters from the United States at prices which made this favourite shell-fish an expensive luxury, while our native sources of production, from which an abundant and cheap supply could be obtained, were being abandoned to destruction. Hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island might not think it worth while to talk about protection in this connection, but before five years had passed they would change their opinions. Our oysters were at present greatly reduced in size, compared with their size five years ago, and if the system were not changed before five years more had elapsed they would be in a far worse condition. The beds should be treated in the same way as the salmon fisheries had been protected and encouraged under the fostering care of the late Government. The beds should be closed for one year, or for two or three years.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated that the Local Government of Prince Edward Island had legislated to secure the protection of its oyster beds.

The item was passed.

Items 141, 142, 143, and 144, providing respectively for the vote of $2,400 to the Quebec Observatory; $4,800 to the Toronto Observatory; $500 to the Kingston Observatory; $500 to the Montreal Observatory, and $850 to the New Brunswick Observatory were passed with little discussion.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) stated that the service performed at Sydney was not worth the salary paid.

Mr. PLUMB thought arrangements might be made to have the telegraphing done cheaper by companies on contract.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL was of opinion that the expenditure could be largely increased with propriety, and what was being done was very judicious.

On item No. 148, appropriating $23,000 for the Marine and Emigrant Hospital, Quebec, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether any change had taken place in the administration of the affairs of this institution?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had taken steps to have the hospital placed on a proper footing as a Dominion institution.

The item was carried.

On item No. 158, appropriating $6,000 to meet expenses in connection with the inspection of Insurance Companies, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what was the policy of the Government in relation to Marine Insurance Companies? He asked this question because he understood that the policy of the Administration would be such as to drive foreign companies out of the market.

They had not even now nearly sufficient Marine Insurance Companies to do the business.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they did not desire to discriminate against any companies. The sole object was to provide against the establishment of irresponsible companies, and they chiefly devoted their attention to fire and life companies. It was only to a moderate degree that they interfered with marine companies at all.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL called attention to the fact that the Clinton Insurance Company had taken people's money, and in one instance where a fire occurred had only paid one-third of the claim and asked time for the balance. Finding they were acting illegally they refused to pay the rest of the claim. He wished to know if there was any recourse against them?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the company had been acting illegally and were subject to a heavy penalty under the law.

The item passed, and the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House adjourned at Fifteen minutes past One, a. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 24, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES OF JUDGES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. Mills in the Chair) to consider the following Resolution:— That it is expedient to extend the provisions of the third section of the Act 34 Victoria, Chapter 33, to the Chief Justice and Justices of the Court of Error and Appeal for the Province of Ontario, so that they shall under like circumstances be entitled to the same proportion of their salaries as retiring allowances, as the Judges mentioned in the said section, payable in like manner out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

The resolution was reported and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill founded on the resolution.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Young in the Chair.

On the item $289,096 for Indians,

Mr. COSTIGAN complained that the Indian Commissioner in New Brunswick resided a hundred miles from the reserve, and a considerable portion of the appropriation every year was eaten up in travelling expenses. Now, if a local man were appointed, it would save a considerable amount of the Indians' money. The Indians and white people had no confidence in the present Commissioner, and were desirous of having a change. He hoped the Minister of the Interior would comply with their wishes.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that this state of things existed prior to his entrance on his present office. Two agents had been appointed some years ago in New Brunswick, at salaries of $400 each, and it was true that this was more than was given to the agents in Nova Scotia, but it was to be remembered that the latter were seven or eight in number, and consequently the former had larger areas under their supervision. No doubt it was competent for the Government to dismiss officials or reduce their salaries, but it was a very unpleasant duty to perform, and he could not see his way to meeting the wishes of the hon. member. He had intended to visit the locality last year, but could not go; he hoped to be able to do so this year, however, and he would investigate the matter and see what could be done to improve the existing condition of affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) thought that the Minister lost sight of the fact that the payment of these salaries came out of the Indians' funds, and consequently he considered that it would be better to incommode one man than a large number of persons whose interests were well worthy of consideration.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked how many Indians there were in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—About 303.

Mr. McLEOD asked how many there were in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—About 1,500.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked why the item for agriculture implements for Indians in Manitoba and the North-West had been reduced?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said a number of the Indians had already been supplied in accordance with the terms of the treaties. Once they were supplied there was an end of the necessity for making such an appropriation.

Mr. SCHULTZ thought that this required some explanation; they were asked to vote $10,000 to supply provisions for Indians assembled to receive annuities under the above-mentioned treaties, referring to treaties Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 5.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that it did not appear on the face of the estimates for this reason: A vote had been made yearly for this purpose. The treaties were made away from the posts and a conference sometimes lasted a week. It was absolutely necessary to provide supplies for them during the time the meeting lasted.

Mr. SCHULTZ said it was a great grievance with the Indians that the time of receiving payments was so uncertain. He suggested there should be definite times and places for payments. Sometimes the Indians assembled and had to wait for weeks before the Commissioners paid them.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated that they were endeavouring to do so; hon. members would understand that in a new country and under the circumstances in which they were placed, it was impossible to be exact to the day. They hoped in the future to be able to keep their appointments with the Indians with greater exactness.

Mr. PLUMB asked why there was such a large appropriation for salaries and office expenses in the Manitoba superintendency? He noticed it was $18,660 this year, an increase of $1,910 over the appropriations of last year.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that the increase was due to the proposed appointment of a Superintendent for the North-West Territory, and of local agents both there and in Manitoba, which step in the end would effect an economy as to the provisions distributed yearly.

Mr. PLUMB hoped that the details would be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he noticed in the report of the Minister of the Interior that school books, medical attendance, garden seeds, &c., were included under the head "salaries and office expenses." He thought these items should be voted separately.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it was impossible to put down these small items separately in the Estimates. They varied from year to year, and it was found necessary to ask for a bulk sum to be expended as advantageously as possible for the Indians. When everything was organized in the North-West as it was in Ontario, the Government could state in the Estimates what sums were required for special purposes now included under this one heading. In their report to the Finance Department they gave the number of schools, but these particulars were not furnished in the Estimates. They hoped hereafter to give the items in greater detail.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said the salaries and office expenses were known definitely and could be voted separately. So could the larger items now included under that heading, and the House would then know what they were voting.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it was only a few months since this organization was commenced, and until it was completed nothing definite could be known or stated in the estimates. This was the first year that these items appeared.

Mr. PLUMB remarked that the estimate in this relation last year almost reached the same figure; therefore he thought that some organization had been effected.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD, regarding the appropriation of $1,500 to supply ammunition and twine to Indians under treaty No. 4, explained that they happened to be twice as many in number as they had anticipated; therefore the amount had been increased from $750 to the figures mentioned.

Mr. SCHULTZ, concerning the appropriation of $80,000 to defray probable expenses in connection with new treaties, regretted that the expense incurred in connection with the negotiation of past treaties had been much greater than they should have been. Had supplies been obtained through tender, a great deal of money could have been easily saved; and he hoped that a change would be made in the policy which had been pursued, ensuring an important saving for the country.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD thought that they had taken the greatest precautions in this relation during the past year. Tenders had been invited, and on one occasion they had secured flour at the rate of $2.50 per hundred lbs. Extreme care had been exercised, and the accounts had been audited at Ottawa before they were paid.

Mr. SCHULTZ claimed the right to call attention to such matters in the public interest. Tenders might have been asked; but he considered it strange that he, living where they were said to have been published, had not observed it, and it was there the general impression that it had not been done. The charges for the transportation of the flour had been excessive, and the person who had done this had then turned round and sold oxen to the Government at a price much higher than they could be purchased in Winnipeg. A radical defect existed in regard to the negotiation of those treaties. It was easy enough to collect a body of Indians, and if there were plenty of provisions, and if the interpreters and half-breeds were on the side of the Government, it was easy to induce them to make almost any treaty. They were unacquainted with the value of money, and it rested with the Government simply to say whether it would deal fairly with them or not. The point he wished to make was this: in scarcely any of these treaties had it been definitely settled where the reserves were to be. This was due to the hurry shown in making them, and the desire of those engaged in the matter to get through a troublesome business as soon as possible. What had been the result relative to the first treaty? Trouble had existed all along owing to this fact. He trusted that in the future, before the Commissioners left the ground, the question of the reserves would be definitely arranged. This course would avoid much of the trouble which from his place in the House he predicted would occur if the system was not changed.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that in Manitoba, where there were a good many settlers, they had been more particular touching the selection of reserves. Regarding Treaty No. 4, the Indians were consulted with and the location of the reserves was chosen, but it proved that only one-half of the bands were prepared to select their reserves at all. Most of them were plain hunters who did not wish to retire on the lands; they had found it better to treat with each man separately in this relation, as they had a perfect right to do. If the first treaties had not mentioned where the reserves were to be, they would have found it much easier to deal with this matter—as there would have been more freedom on the part of the Department and also on the part of the Indians.

Mr. RYAN asked if the Government were making any arrangements to remove the band of Sioux at the Portage to their reserve? They were continually committing depredations, and their presence was a nuisance and likely to prove dangerous. Six of them had shot one of their comrades and escaped punishment.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said there were ample reserves at the forks of the Little Saskatchewan, and the Government had endeavoured to persuade and induce them to move there. Some did move but the greater number of them would not go. The Government did not think it wise to use compulsory measures, but the matter was under consideration.

Mr. SCHULTZ said there was no re-vote of the appropriation made last year for the removal of those Indians. He believed the present unsatisfactory condition of affairs was due to the failure of the Government to furnish a reserve for the band. They were offered a reserve on the coast of Lake Manitoba, with which they were satisfied, but the delay of removing them there had excited dissatisfaction. There would be a repetition of the difficulty if they were not removed at once.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said they had absolutely refused to go to the Lake Manitoba reserve because they were afraid of the Salteaux and the Chipewas. The delay was due to their own action, and that was the reason why the land at the forks of the Little Saskatchewan had been reserved for them. There were no Indians near that place and it suited their wishes. There was wood, water, and a good supply of fish. A few depredations had occurred, but on the whole their conduct was good. Very few communities under similar circumstances would have been better, and Manitoba was benefitted more than it had lost by their presence. They worked for the farmers and had been found honest and faithful. When they were removed to their reserves the Province would miss them.

Mr. RYAN quite agreed with the Minister of the Interior as to the superiority of the second reserve, and admitted that some of the farmers found them useful, but the great body of the settlers wanted to have them removed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if any steps had been taken to punish the Indians who murdered their comrade?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it was a matter which came under the jurisdiction of the Provincial authorities. The Dominion Government had no right to interfere in the matter.

Mr. SCHULTZ said the duty of the Government was to use every exertion to deal with this case, and to remove these 300 Indians who were strangers in the country and had no right there.

Mr. GOUDGE asked if it was intended to establish a school for the Indians of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD admitted that education was backward among the Indians of that Province. He thought the people of Nova Scotia should urge them to apply for a school. No such application had been made yet.

Mr. GOUDGE begged to say that Indians of the Province greatly desired the establishment of a school, their admitted backwardness being the very reason which made this step advisable. If these Indians were to be preserved from extinction, and if they were to be prepared to take advantage of the means provided for their enfranchisement, they must be educated. He did not charge the Government with dereliction of duty, but trusted that attention would be paid to this matter. He hoped during the coming season the Government would send an official of the Department to investigate the management of the the Indians in Nova Scotia. There were several agents, none of whom visited the agencies to see that they were properly administered. The Minister knew that one agent, at least, did not give satisfaction.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated that one of the great difficulties experienced in dealing with the Indians of Nova Scotia was due to the fact that they were so scattered; nevertheless, attention would be given to the question which was brought by the hon. gentleman under his notice.

All the items under the head "Indians" were passed. •

On the item, $86,000, for miscellaneous expenditure.—In connection with the item of $8,000 for miscellaneous printing,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER called attention to the publication of the Bank Returns; he believed that the Government were endeavouring to secure their greater accuracy and had hoped that they would be so precise as to show the amounts on interest, and the sums which were held without bearing interest. It was also important that these returns should form a portion of the Gazette, instead of being inserted as at present on a fly sheet.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—as to the second matter, had no objection to comply with his hon. friend's suggestion; he would look into the matter and see if this were possible.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK hoped some assurance would be given that the monthly statements were more correct. Last year they were so inaccurate as to represent an expenditure of $2,000,000 more than the actual amount. It would be better even to delay the publication of the statement for a week or so and have it correct than to mislead the public who watched for those returns with great interest.

On the item $50,000 for unforeseen expenses,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK remarked that this item only amounted to $30,000 during the Administration of the late Government though it had been since increased to $50,000. An extraordinary expenditure had been incurred last year with reference to the Governor General's tour, but as this was not likely to take place again during the present year, he could not see why it should not be reduced.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said in 1872 the late Government asked for $75,000; in 1873, $75,000, and in 1874 $30,000, which had all been expended when the present Government came into office.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the amount, $12,000, for commutation in lieu of remission of duties on articles imported for the use of the army and navy, was too large since the troops had been removed.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the amount of duties remitted last year for wines and tobaccos imported for the use of the Imperial forces at Halifax was over $11,000.

Mr. BOWELL asked why were not A Battery in Ontario and B Battery in Quebec granted similar privileges.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that these were native, not Imperial troops.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) observed that this was not a new item; it had appeared in the Estimates prior to Confederation. The arrangement in question had always prevailed in Halifax since it was a garrison town.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said on referring to the returns, he found that the amount voted in 1873 for unforeseen expenses was $75,000, the amount spent was $18,000. In 1874 the appropriation was $45,000,000, and the expenditures were $38,360.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had merely read from the estimates and had not looked at the return of expenditures.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the expenditure under this head sometimes varied thirty or forty thousand dollars.

With regard to the appropriation of $120,000 for the organization of a Government in the North-West Territories, Hon. Mr. TUPPER enquired when it was proposed to organize this Government?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that this would take place, probably, very early in the summer. Further details would be found on the same page.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked whether any of the $33,800 voted last year had been expended?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought that a portion of this sum had been spent.

All the items under the head "Miscellaneous" were passed.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS.

On the item $697,591 for the collection of Customs revenues,

Hon. Mr. BURPEE, in reply to Mr. McCallum, said there was no objection to making the canal officer at Port Maitland an official in the Customs Department. The contingent account had been reduced, and any vacancies that might occur would be filled up from officials in the service.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK was glad to hear that the Government had determined to put an end to the system of making Custom House appointments among local political supporters; this had, however, not been peculiar to the present Administration. The amount paid for salaries had of late largely increased,—in the Province of Ontario to the extent of $95,000 since 1873-4; and in Quebec, $23,000; and in the other Provinces in proportion.

Mr. BROUSE surmised that this was due to the batch of appointments made by the late Government, when on the point of resigning their offices.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK thought not, as he believed that at least many of these appointments had been cancelled.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said there was an increase of about $23,000 in Prince Edward Island. The increased expense by the appointments referred to was some $32,000, and the increase by larger salaries was $56,000. The present Government had cut off some $30,000 and gone back as nearly as possible to the condition of affairs in 1873-4.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the case of Mr. Robert Miller, of the port of Miramichi, had received favourable consideration, his salary having been reduced owing to his strong partizanship for himself (Mr. Mitchell) ?

Hon. Mr. BURPEE explained that Mr. Miller had been doing duty as appraiser at Newcastle and Chatham ; the Inspector had reported recommending that another officer should be appointed to act at one of these places, Newcastle, which had been done, without any reference to his political opinions, with which indeed he (Mr. Burpee) was unacquainted.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the object was to starve Mr. Miller out to gratify the vindictiveness of a person who was not now in the House. The Minister of Customs had no doubt been innocently led into this, and he was satisfied the hon. gentleman, now that his attention was directed to the matter, would do justice to Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER claimed the indulgence of the Committee for a few minutes, while he drew attention to one or two matters with which he thought they could better deal in connection with the item before the Chair. The charge had been made, that the expenditure in the Customs Department had been unduly increased under the late Administration by large additions made to the salaries of its officers. Now, the Committee was perfectly well aware that the House had placed at the disposal of the Government a sum of money for the purpose of readjusting the salaries in that Department, which only was performed in obedience to the decision of Parliament, involving a large increase in expenditure. It appeared to him perfectly obvious, under the circumstances, that the hon. gentlemen who had succeeded them in office did not require to make any corresponding increase, though he found that for the collection of Customs last year an addition of no less than $24,374 had been made to the expenditure, notwithstanding the fact that, during the last year the late Administration was in power, its expenditure in the Customs Department had exceeded considerably the largest expenditure ever made in this relation, in this country. Then coming to the present year, he found that, in lieu of a policy of retrenchment and economy, and instead of reducing the disbursements in those departments of the public service especially under the control of the Government, they were asked to vote $39,292 more than they had voted for the year 1873-4. Any hon. gentleman who turned to the Estimates of prospective revenue submitted by the Finance Minister would observe that instead of anticipating a larger, the hon. gentleman expected to have a smaller revenue. When we had much lower importations than during the past year—to the amount of eight millions, the expenditure was $24,000 less, and without any expectation of receiving larger revenue it would during the current year exceed by $39,000 that of last year. To what was this due? And this brought him to another branch of the question which was pertinent to the item under consideration. When he had last the pleasure of visiting the Riding of North Renfrew in company with his friend the First Minister, that hon. gentleman stated to the electors that the late Government when in the throes of dissolution, and in the last hour of its existence, had created some two hundred offices throughout the country and made some two hundred appointments.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I said one hundred.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Very well ; he would give the hon. gentleman the benefit of his correction, but he was afraid that the people of North Renfrew understood the hon. gentleman, as he had done, to declare that the late Government had created two hundred offices.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! no! I recollect perfectly saying—within a trifle of one hundred ; also that about one hundred were cancelled.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER would come to this other matter in a moment. What he understood the hon. gentleman to say, and what he hoped the hon. gentleman did not say, and the electors comprehended him to affirm, was that the late Administration had created two hundred offices, and made two hundred appointments; that of these one hundred were brought into existence for the purpose of finding places for their friends, like the unjust steward; and that one of the first duties the hon. gentleman had to discharge in the interests of the people of this country, was to cancel and sweep away for ever one hundred of those appointments, for which there was no necessity whatever. He hoped that the hon. gentleman had said one in lieu of two hundred; at all events this was a statement which it was necessary now to make, because he had, under his hand, a return laid on the table of this House by the hon. gentleman, showing the appointments they had made, and the appointments which had been cancelled. The former numbered in reality about seventy-five—but were they of the character which the the hon. gentleman had pretended they were? Were they offices created to find places for their friends, and had the country been saved the cost of the salaries in question from that time to this? He thought that if the hon. gentleman would turn to the records of the Privy Council, he would find that he could not place his hand on five offices which though cancelled had not been filled subsequently by the hon. gentleman himself.

He denied the truth of the assertion that an office had been provided in order to secure a position for a friend. He invited attention to this matter because it was a very grave charge which had been preferred.

He would be filled with deep regret if the Administration of which he had the honour of being a member had been open to such censure. What was the character of these appointments? If the hon. gentleman took the trouble to read over the list of these offices filled in fulfilment of the pledges of the late Government to their friends, who had asked, as they were entitled to do—that this should be done, and in relation to which the Government had only discharged their duty in making provision for the public service, he would see that out of the 750 offices cancelled, no less than thirty-five of them existed in the Island of Prince Edward, and that instead of being created unnecessarily, the Administration in taking this step had been simply fulfilling the provisions of the Union Act, which made the officers in the new Province officers of the Dominion, touching services that came under the purview of the Dominion Parliament, until they were regularly appointed by an Order in Council;—therefore, instead of creating officers, they had merely given official recognition to persons who had held office many of them for ten and some for twenty years.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—And some of them never.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER would admit that this was quite true; they might have discharged their duty by giving appointments to persons who had not held offices previously; but they had not created the offices. Twenty-five of them were Customs officers; and the hon. gentleman would hardly say that in appointing Collectors of Revenue, as they were entitled to be named by this Government, the late Administration had done wrong. He was, however, bound to do the hon. gentleman the justice of stating that although he had cancelled thirty-five appointments in Prince Edward Island, he had re-appointed a large number of these officers.

It appeared that he had taken this course, simply in order that these parties might have the distinguished honour of holding office under the appointment of the new, instead of the old Administration; he would not find fault with this, but he would remark that of that number, twenty-five were Customs officers. Was this the creation of offices in order to find places for their friends? He thought that the hon. gentleman would hardly so inform the House, when he told the hon. members that if they would turn to the Public Accounts of last year, instead of these twenty-five officers appointed by the late Government in Prince Edward Island, the present Administration had there given appointments to no less than sixty-six persons.

The Public Accounts now showed 66 Customs officers for Prince Edward Island instead of the 25 appointed by the late Administration, and yet the hon. gentleman (the Premier) told the people of North Renfrew that he had, by a stroke of the pen, swept away 100 offices that his predecessors had created, and which were not called for by the interests of the public service. The hon. gentleman not only reappointed these officers whose appointments were cancelled, but increased the number to 66. The House could readily understand from this why there was such a large increase in this item in connection with the public service. These were the facts as shown by the public records as they exist.

The Minister of Finance had stated that the only means he had to present to the country to provide for the very large deficit in the revenue was by increased economy, but they certainly did not find this economy being exercised in any of the departments specially under the control of the Government themselves. With reference to the Civil Service, nothing would tend to the efficiency of the public service more than following closely, and as far as possible, the Civil Service Act, which provides when vacancies occur the next lowest in the service shall be promoted, provided he had the necessary industry, sobriety and ability to discharge the duties of the office.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Did the hon. gentleman do that?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Yes; we did.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Did he do that in the port of Montreal, for instance?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he would invite the hon. gentleman to inspect the records of the Department which he had administered, or go to Montreal and point out an instance in which the administration of patronage under his control as Minister of Customs had not been to fill vacancies by promotion as they occurred. As to the case mentioned in Montreal, he had only given legitimate promotion to an officer who had not only a claim to it by a long term of service, but his appointment was endorsed by the leading merchants of the city.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. JONES—What about the Collector of Halifax?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said his friend was anxious to exhibit his Sampson strength by lugging in the Halifax Collectorship, but the late Administration never had found it necessary to take a Minister of the Crown from their Cabinet in order to find a Collector for the port of Halifax. He did not think the hon. gentleman consulted the wishes or feelings of his friends in making any allusion to that appointment. It was a great injustice when vacancies occurred in the service to bring in outside parties in order to provide places for political supporters and put them over the heads of officers who had spent years of their lifetime at low salaries in the public service, with the expectation of promotion as opportunities occurred.

Mr. DAVIES said the appointments in Prince Edward Island were made the day before the late Government resigned. Thirty-five officials were appointed, and the reason why there were not more was they had not time to do the work. More were required, because the shores of the Island were not sufficiently protected against smuggling. If a revenue cutter were provided for the service it would save money to the public treasury. In the ordinary course of events the late Government should have made the appointments in the Island after it came into the Union, but they waited until the representatives of the Province were elected and could come to Ottawa to nominate persons to fill the offices in the Island. The Government were then under a cloud, and when they found the representatives of the Island would not sustain them, the appointments were made just before they resigned.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A good many of them were made after the late Government resigned.

Mr. DAVIES hoped the number of officials would be increased in order that smuggling might be prevented.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the salary which was paid to these officials, who numbered about 45, was $40 a year. The position of the Island rendered it necessary that a large number of officers should be employed at a small salary. He desired to state that of the amount voted in 1873-4 only $40,000 was expended, so the total sum added to the estimate of that year would come out as nearly as possible like the estimates he had in his hand, and the expenditure asked for this year would be within $41,000 or $51,000 of the amount the hon. gentlemen considered as the necessary expenditure up to October 31, 1873.

It being six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House went into Committee on the Act to grant to the Canada Landed Credit Company enlarged powers of borrowing and lending, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

The Committee reported the Bill without amendment, after which it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BROOKS moved the second reading of the Bill respecting loans by the British American Land Company.

The motion was carried, and the Bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS.

The debate on the estimate for Collection of Customs was resumed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked why the new Custom House at Chatham which was now completed, was not occupied by the Government? He stated that the Government were renting a building from a gentleman who opposed him in his last election, and he desired to know the intention of the Government in this particular.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said that they had obtained a favourable report as to the condition of the new Custom House from the collector at Chatham, and it was the intention of the new Government to occupy the new building as soon as possible.

Mr. BUNSTER regretted that there was a decrease in the appropriation for British Columbia, and called attention to the fact that an additional officer was required at the port of Nanaimo, where it was a difficult matter for one officer to do the work properly. There was a great necessity for an increase in the number of officers instead of a decrease.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said a great saving would be effected this year in this department by the occupation of the new Custom House. With regard to the port of Nanaimo, he said that the revenue last year was $2,800, and that it was collected by one officer. It seemed to him that one officer ought to collect the revenue of that port during the ensuing year.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked what had been done in regard to the defalcation of a Collector of Customs which occurred a few years ago? He desired to know what steps had been taken to get that money refunded?

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said the defalcation had occurred during the administration of the late Government, but the present Government had received promises of the payment of the money which they had not yet investigated.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said in relation to the complaint of the hon. member for Cumberland of his (Mr. Mackenzie's) remarks at Pembroke, he had only to say he thought he was exceedingly moderate in those remarks. Now, between the 13th of August and November, the late Government made 100 appointments which they had no right to make, in view of the fact that a motion of want of confidence in the Government was pending. At that time he had no hesitation in moving the cancellation of a large number of those appointments, some of which were entirely new. He thought the Government had acted with singular moderation in the cancelling of those appointments, when they allowed one-half of them to remain, though the men were known to be politically opposed to the Government. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman should provoke any reference to those famous days in December. When it was supposed that the whole talent of the Government was devoted to the debate then going on, they were writing out Orders in Council and making appointments. A very considerable number of these appointments were made even after their resignation. These facts were not creditable to the hon. gentlemen, when they knew they had lost the confidence of the people. There were circumstances under which an outgoing Administration might make appointments, but to proceed to a wholesale creation of offices in that way was not only highly improper, but in his opinion highly unconstitutional. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had pointed out they had done nothing of the kind. The offices filled under the Insolvent Act could not be called Government appointments. It was in fact a matter forced on the Government by the public opinion of the House and country, and a task they would gladly have given over to some other persons or bodies. The character of the appointments made by the late Government in the last days they held office was entirely different. The Hon. Ministers of Customs and Finance had shown that instead of an increase having been made in proportion to the growth of the business and population of the country during the two years and a half, there was a positive decrease relatively to what they found when they assumed office, and they should continue, he hoped, to show that relative proportion in a more favourable degree when they could get rid of some of the officials appointed by the late Administration in the last days they held office.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said he had ventured in his election address to make the statement that the Government had by their legislation of last Session secured to themselves some 300 additional appointments. He had made that statement advisedly, and he thought the Hon. Leader of the Government at a public meeting acknowledged the accuracy of that statement.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I did not.

Mr. WHITE said the Government had at all events taken the appointments out of the hands of the Boards of Trade, and to that extent had increased their patronage. In criticising that portion of his address, the Premier had charged the late Government with making some 200 appointments, of which the present Administration on taking office cancelled some 80 to 100. The impression left on the minds of the electors was that those appointments had been made, not in the interest of the country, but for political purposes. Now, if they were necessary, and only cancelled by the present Government for the purpose of re-appointing them or appointing others in their stead, the argument of the Premier to the electors of North Renfrew ought to have no effect. There was no denial of the statement that instead of having reduced the number of officials, the present Government had added to them, and it was plain the Premier was not quite ingenuous in the assertion he made to the electors.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the late Government had no apprehension they would be defeated; and while the Treasury Benches were assailed, they gave their whole time and energy generously and magnanimously devoting themselves to the public service. The Premier would give them credit for the patriotism they had displayed on that occasion. In making these appointments they had only exercised the right which retiring administrations in England had always enjoyed. They had merely bestowed the patronage which legitimately belonged to them.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought the hon. member for Renfrew was wrong in saying the Dominion Board of Trade recommended leaving the appointments as they were before, but if they did, it was the strongest evidence that the public opinion of the country was against the old system, because that body did not represent public opinion.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) thought it might fairly be assumed they represented that portion affected by the insolvent law.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not by any means.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said the Dominion Board of Trade and other public bodies throughout the Dominion had petitioned Parliament to keep the law as it was before, but the Government wanted to have the patronage in their own hands. In the face of such manifestations of public opinion, the law was changed to accomplish this end.

The items were passed.

INLAND REVENUE.

On the items under the head "Excise," $235,800,

Mr. BUNSTER called attention to the fact that it cost $5,000 to collect $4,223 derived from this source in British Columbia. He recommended the adoption of the United States system of licensing the brewers, requiring them to pay, say $1,000 each per annum, and let the trade take care of itself, doing away with the excise officers altogether.

He suggested the advisability of taxing each of the brewers $1,000; there were five in the City of Victoria, and this would give a revenue of $5,000 per annum. He held that the present system was not suitable to the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. ORTON thought that the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver was worthy of serious consideration, because the levy of duties was undoubtedly vexatious for the brewers of this country.

Mr. HAGGART asked if the salaries mentioned were paid? The Collector of Customs at Perth had not received the $1,000 set down to his credit.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that he would look into the matter.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER called the attention of the House to the fact that the expenditure in the Excise Department was the most extravagant that they ever had in the department up to that time, yet the Committee were now asked to vote $29,865 of an increase for this service, although it did not include the cost of bringing into operation the law respecting weights and measures.

A gentlemen, who had been in the employ of the Government, complained that he had been very badly treated. He averred that he had an office in the Inland Revenue Department at Moncton, in the Province of New Brunswick, for several years; that he had undergone a very rigorous and passed a first-class examination, and that he was so reported to the Government; also, that parties living outside of this country altogether, and animated by hostile feelings towards him personally, were determining to have him displaced from his office; that they had applied for this, and in this relation he referred to the representative of the adjoining county; that the Minister of Inland Revenue, finding no ground for doing so, he having performed his duties efficiently, called upon him to go to the city of St. John to fill a position in connection with the Inland Revenue Department there; that there was no necessity for his transfer, the officials at St. John being fully equal to the performance of all the work, having moreover made no requisition for any further assistance; that one of them had a great deal of leisure on his hands, being not fully occupied, in fact; that he was given no increase of salary, and that, though a first-class officer, having passed a first-class examination, he was placed under second and third-class officers who had been unable to pass a first-class examination.

He (Mr. Tupper) did not wish to press the matter, because the Minister of Inland Revenue was prevented by an unfortunate illness from being in his place; but he desired to draw the attention of the Finance Minister, who dealt with those questions in that hon. gentleman's absence, to the matter, in the hope that he would enquire into the correctness of these statements; because if they were correct they disclosed a case of great injustice. It was just as well to dismiss a man from his office—indeed this course was much the more preferable—than to compel an officer in receipt of a small salary to remove him to a place where it was altogether inadequate for his support. What would be sufficient at Moncton, would be utterly inadequate at St. John; and if he were so transferred without any addition to his salary it was simply another mode of depriving him of it.

Of course this officer had been unable to comply with his instructions, and he was notified in consequence that his name would be omitted from the pay list. These circumstances might or might not be within the knowledge of the Minister of Customs; if they were not he hoped that the hon. gentleman would enquire into them.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Does the hon. gentleman make the statement on his own authority?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I make it on the authority of a letter addressed to me by the officer himself. I will place this letter in the hands of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman is aware of the English practice, I presume. No attention is paid to complaints except they are made to the Head of the Department by the party himself.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought that his hon friend would admit that if the officer was unable to secure redress from the Government and found himself deprived of his office, then he had no other recourse.

He (Mr. Tupper) did not doubt that this gentleman had exhausted every means of obtaining justice before he had taken his present course.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT doubted very much the accuracy of these representations; though he would make enquiry into the matter.

Respecting the complaints as to the increase or decrease of revenue and expenditure, he might state that in 1873-4, a vote of $218,000 appeared to have been asked for in the Estimates, and by Orders in Council the hon. gentleman would see that a total sum of $26,885 had been added to the expenditures on the previous estimates, and these being added together, the hon. gentleman would perceive that whereas by Order in Council they had proposed to expend the sum of about $245,000, the Government only asked for a rate of $235,000.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—That does not touch my statement.

Hon Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It does touch your statement.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—These were the Estimates brought down by the hon. gentleman in 1873, increased by expenditures made through Orders in Council; the whole being $10,000 more than the Government now demanded; and this was a very important statement showing, very clearly on which side economy was exhibited.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—It does not touch my statement, that you are asking the Committee to vote $39,000 more than the expenditure of 1873-4, the largest that ever was made.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The estimates respectively asked for, and not the ordinary expenditure, were in question. With respect to the matter generally, every hon. gentleman must know that if 15 or 16 per cent. were added to the taxes on the main articles of excise, it would become undoubtedly necessary to exercise special diligence in collecting this revenue. It was quite clear that the temptation to smuggle spirits at 75 cents per gallon was considerably larger than if the duty was only 63 cents per gallon, and anxious as they were to save money in every possible way, it would be a most disastrous saving to the public if they in anywise impaired the efficiency of the excise, from which they collected a revenue of nearly six millions of dollars per annum.

The large amount received during the year 1873-4 was, as the hon. gentleman knew, and as had been conclusively shown at the time, to a very large extent anticipated by the action of the various distillers in stripping their storehouses, or bonded warehouses, of every gallon then manufactured; and if the hon. gentleman turned to the report of Mr. Brunel for that year he would perceive that no less than $600,000 or $700,000 at all events, a very considerable sum had been anticipated.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—We admit that.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—This being the case, he now stated, as he had already represented, that the revenue for the present year far exceeded any revenue yet received. They could not as yet, having three months still to run, speak with absolute certainty on this point, but judging from so much as had been received, he expected that the revenue would decidedly exceed, very largely exceed, the revenue of last year, and certainly that of the year 1873-4.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Then I am afraid that I gave my hon. friend too much credit in discounting to such an extent as we did, the receipts of 1873 and 1874.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT — No ; you did not.

Mr. BOWELL—The Finance Minister has stated that the estimates of 1873-4 amounted to $218,000.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT — Precisely.

Mr. BOWELL—The estimates I hold in my hand, for that year amount to $298,300, making a difference of only $10,000.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—What estimates has the hon. gentleman got ?

Mr. BOWELL—I had the estimates of 1874-5, which contain the amount asked and voted for 1873-4.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said with reference to the salary of this official at Moncton—$600 a year—there were a great many officers in the service at that salary, and some at a great deal less. At St. John there were only two officers in the Excise Office, and they had sufficient work to keep them employed.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if it was true, as rumored, that the Collector of Excise at Kingston was superannuated, and if so had the appointment of his successor yet been made ?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he believed that officer had not yet been superannuated.

The item passed.

CULLING OF TIMBER.

On item $81,500, salaries, culler's fees and contingent expenses,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said the expenses of culling timber were defrayed by the timber trade. The fees collected were divided between the cullers and the office expenses. The trade had no objection to the amount of fees paid to the cullers, as they did not think these were too highly remunerated, but he thought a large reduction might be made in the number employed in the Quebec office, as the office expenses were very much larger than were required. The revenue derived from the cullers' office at Quebec for 1872-3 and 1874 was $82,341, while the expenditure was only $31,190, leaving $41,150 of a revenue in excess of expenditure. It was an anomaly that one industry—under a free-trade Government—should pay a special tax of $10,000 a year, or about 15 per cent. over the amount required to defray the expenses of the office. He would ask the Government to exercise the power conferred on them by the Act of last Session, and lower the fees so that the amount would not be in excess of the requirements of the office.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the actual receipts last year were very little in excess of the expenditures of the office. However, the Minister of Inland Revenue had under his consideration several important reforms in that direction, which would have to remain in abeyance until the hon. gentleman recovered sufficiently from his illness to attend to the duties of his office. When he returned he would endeavour to comply as far as he could with the wishes expressed on both sides of this House, and reduce the expenses of this service to the lowest possible point.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) suggested that the cullers' office should be thrown open, the rotation system abolished, and the cullers allowed free-trade in their business.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said he understood before he became a member of the Government that there was a rule passed by which the fees were to be decreased. He did not know whether it had been done. As the number of cullers decreased by death or superannuation, the vacancies were not to be filled.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said cullers were not well paid, especially measurers of square timber. The highest made about $978, and the average was about $400 to $500 a year, which was insufficient for a man to live on. It would be wise to put the cullers in a better position and the lumber interest would not suffer by it.

Mr. WHITE said the time occupied by the cullers in the performance of their services was very small—from 10 to 12 days in the season—and many of them were employed in other ways than culling. What he wanted to point out was that the expenditure for the maintenance of the office and the payment of the supervision was larger than was required, and that during the last two years $23,000 had been taken from the lumber trade in this way to go into the consolidated revenue of the country.

Mr. COOK said he hoped the Government would carry out the recommendation of the Committee of this House made two years ago, and it would be a great advantage to the lumber trade of the Dominion.

Mr. ROCHESTER objected to the cullers' office being thrown open to competition. He believed that as long as the present deputy head of the Excise Department occupied his present position no office under that Department would be satisfactorily managed. He thought the Ministry in framing any measure respecting the cullers' office should take a certain number of practical lumbermen into their confidence, it would be better for all parties concerned.

POST OFFICE.

On item, $1,732,500 for Post Office,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked for explanation of the increase of $345,230 over the estimates for 1874.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he could only repeat the explanation given last year, that it was due to the addition of Prince Edward Island to the Dominion, increased postal facilities and an increase of railway mileage by some 1,600 miles. Moreover, a great many of the contracts made in former years at cheap rates for mail service had expired, and the Post Office Department had found it impossible to renew them without an increase. A large amount of the increase was from the better facilities given for postal delivery in the cities, &c.

In Quebec and Ontario, stage and ordinary land conveyance cost $340,000; in New Brunswick, $48,000; in Nova Scotia, $98,000, and in British Columbia, $46,000. The cost in outlying Provinces had been necessarily increasing in a great ratio, and he was afraid if they had to be served at all, it was scarcely possible to hope for any reduction in the expenditure. Several alterations were made in the mode of keeping accounts. Formerly large sums were allowed to be received by postmasters without going into the books of the department at all; but that system had been modified, and might possibly be totally abolished in a short time. The demands for accommodation would increase as the country grows, and the Postmaster General was obliged constantly to refuse applications from all parts of the Dominion for extension and improvement of mail services.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said in 1872-3 the entire cost was $858,000, whereas in 1873-4 it was $1,331,000, or an increase of $500,000 in these two years. It was quite impossible to prevent post office expenditure. The service was paid by commission, except in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The charges are all for carrying mails, and as these were competed for, there was no possibility of avoiding the increase.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the contracts were not always given out by competition. One in the county of Renfrew had not been competed for.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was true that while the country grows the expenses will increase; but at the same time the revenue ought to increase.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not if you reduce the postage.

Mr. WHITE said in the year 1873 the loss on the Post Office was $234,000, and in 1875 it was $365,000. This was what wanted explanation.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the falling off in the revenue and the increased facilities granted the public explained this.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought the Hon. Minister of Public Works had drawn a very erroneous deduction from the figures he quoted. The fact that the expenditure had largely increased between the dates mentioned appeared to establish that such thorough provision was made for the service as to render it unnecessary for the expenditure to be still further increased. He always understood that one of the strongest arguments in favour of compulsory prepayment of postage was that it was going to diminish the work done at the post offices very materially, and that consequently the expenditure would be reduced. But that measure was followed by an increase of no less than $345,000 in 1873-4, a fact which deserved very careful consideration. The Hon. Finance Minister stated the increase of railway mileage had contributed in this same direction. In his opinion mails ought to be carried much cheaper by railways than by horses and carriages. If it was dearer it was an argument against utilising the railways at all for this purpose.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the railways in many instances complained that they actually lost money through being compelled to put on a clerk. On the road from St. John to Bangor the Government supplied a carriage to the boundary and paid from 7 to 8 cents a mile for the service. On the other side, however, the United States were paying 12 cents, and the company were complaining that they were carrying the Canadian mails at a loss. The hon. gentleman mentioned similar facts to show that cheapness was not effected by using railways, but the public derived an immense benefit from the rapidity of communication.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER thought a disposition should be evinced to cut down where over-charges were made. All the elements which entered into this service had been reduced, and the price for carrying mails ought to be correspondingly reduced. But the real difficulty, it appeared, was the great pressure brought to bear on the Postmaster-General for accommodation. In his own county a striking illustration of this had taken place. When the railway was established from Truro to New Brunswick, it involved a change in the service, and provision was made by allowing the contractor to have the side service, from Grenville station to Wallace, at the same rate as under his own contract. This party, a strong supporter of his own, pressed the Government to have this service changed from the Wentworth station, near his own residence, to Wallace. The request was refused on the ground of inconvenience, but a general election came, and he immediately made application to the new Government. He was then informed that the service could not be taken away and given to him without competition, and he brought sufficient pressure to bear to have the contract put up for competition.

He tendered below the other party, and secured the contract for himself. Having secured the contract, he asked for a change of location, which was refused by the present Postmaster General's predecessor. The gentleman who at the present time occupied the office, however, was more susceptible of pressure, and finding that the possessor of the office was able to render valuable political aid, he made the required change in the service. This contract was given without any tender being made, and the people were making an outcry against being deprived of the mail communication they required. Whilst the people were suffering from the change, the Treasury was being depleted by money being paid out to remunerate an enthusiastic politician for changing his politics. He would give another instance in which the Government had been susceptible of pressure when they could secure political support. In his own Province he found that the cost of the printing done in Halifax under the administration of the late Government was $5,550.99 in 1872; for money order office, $1,199.28. The total expenditure, in 1873 including the money order office, was $7,486.90, and in 1874 it was $8,428. Under the present economical Administration the sum expended in 1875 was $11,326.63. This money was paid to a paper in which a prominent member of the Administration was supposed to be interested. The increased expenditure in this respect during the first year of the present Administration was $3,839. He was prepared to support any appropriation for the postal service that would be in the interest of the country, but when they found the expenditure on this service was enormously increased by transactions such as these, he felt it his duty to draw the attention of the House to the manner in which the money of the people was being expended.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he was very glad the hon. member for Cumberland had brought this subject before the House, because it had formed the subject of comment elsewhere. A great many of the hon. gentleman's statements were of an exaggerated character. When the late Postmaster General went into office he deemed it his duty in carrying out the policy of the Department to convert what they called in Nova Scotia way-offices, into post offices. But there were a great many places where the people keeping these way-houses were not willing to keep post offices and correspond directly with the Department at Ottawa. When the first notification of the change was made the Postmaster-General was remonstrated with, and an understanding was come to that the existing way-offices should not be interfered with and that he might act as he thought best in regard to the establishment of new offices. Owing to the inspector in Nova Scotia misinterpreting his orders he had $5,000 or $6,000 worth of printing done which was not required. Now the printing last year cost $10,194, and taking away $5,000 for extraordinary expenditure, the amount expended by the present Government was with an additional number of way and post offices, only a few hundred dollars in excess of that expended by the late government in 1872-3.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was no doubt that in consequence of the increased postal convenience to the public there had been a larger expenditure. The Prince Edward Island item made up $50,000, and the addition to postal conveniences, authorized last year, some fifty or sixty thousand dollars more. There was no doubt these improvements had been well received by the public.

The present was an experimental year, however, and more experience would be necessary before the Government could decide as to whether the tendency to increased expenses should be encouraged or checked. With reference to the mail service in Cumberland, he had not been in that county, but he had acted on the recommendation of gentlemen who knew what was most needed in the public interest, and thus saved some $400 a year. With regard to the other difficulty referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland it was undoubtedly embarrassing, but it was a legacy left the present Government by their predecessors. It cost fifty per cent. more to do the work in Halifax than in Ottawa, but by new arrangements, hereafter the printing will be done here under contract. As to the cost of carrying the mails, the railway companies were complaining the present rates, which were established in 1864, were not high enough. It was very easy to say, explain this increase of $100,000, but everybody knew the expenses under the improved system would be greater. The public had the matter in their own hands. They paid their money and took their choice. The increase in the cost of the land service was due to the fact that the railways had diverted the current of travel from the old stage routes, and consequently the owners of the stages had to charge more for carrying the mails. In conclusion, he would say that no pressure was brought to bear on him by his friends. They came to him saying they would be glad to have post offices in certain localities, but did not press him in these hard times. How different must have been the experience of the late Government!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the announcement that all the printing would be done in future by contract would hardly please the hon. member for Cumberland. When the Government of Nova Scotia decided to adopt that system, the only opposition to it came from the newspaper representing the views of that hon. gentleman, and in which he had an interest.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had never in his life been interested to the extent of one dollar in any newspaper in Nova Scotia.

Mr. JONES—Not in the Colonist?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Neither in the Colonist nor any other newspaper. He was not surprised that the Postmaster General had decided to have all the printing done by contract when it had increased in one year from $7,486 to $11,326. The House would be surprised at the failure of the hon. gentleman to explain why he gave out contracts to his political friends and supporters without tender. By that illegal act a whole section of Cumberland County had been placed in a most disagreeable position, and the change was exceedingly inconvenient to the public.

Hon. Mr. VAIL stated that on the opening of the railway in 1872 or 1873, a mail route was opened between Grenville and Wallace, on the lake shore, a distance of about eighteen miles. Before proceeding further he would refer to the clause of the Act, which would prove that what the hon. member for Cumberland said regarding the giving of mail contracts was quite correct. It stated that before acceding such a contract, involving a cost of over $200, at least eight weeks previous notice should be given by advertisement, but what had the hon. member done? When he represented that county, and was a member of the Government, he gave the contract to a man without putting it up to tender for the sum of $800. Was the hon. gentleman prepared to deny this? Subsequently a petition was signed, requesting a change to be made in the route to Wentworth, which was about nine miles beyond Grenville; it was refused, and he believed that application was then made to the Post Office Department to have the service put out to tender. The party who made this request, moreover, offered to carry the mail over this route for some two or three hundred dollars. This was also refused. After this Government came into power, the same person called the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that some $800 were being paid for the conveyance of the mail over these eighteen miles, when it could be done for one-half of this amount. The Postmaster General referred it for enquiry to the Inspector at Halifax, who recommended that the service be put up for contract. This was done, and the result was that it was taken for $250. Was the hon. gentleman prepared to deny this? The hon. gentleman had only one ground for complaint in this connection. Last year a change had been made from Grenville to the other station on this route, (Wentworth), which was made the point of departure instead of Grenville. This necessitated an increased expenditure of some $70; and if he was correctly informed the service now cost $287 instead of $800. He considered that if the hon. member had waited until these papers were placed on the table, he would have been the last man in the House to make complaint.

He would show to the House that the printing account had increased rapidly from year to year under the hon. gentleman's Administration. To one paper had been paid in 1868, $2,522; in 1869, $3,114; in 1870, $3,207; in 1871, $3,324; in 1872, $4,325, and in 1873, $6,569.87. The next was a broken year, and he was unable to give the figures.

He would allude to another matter:—The railway station at Halifax was about 200 yards from the post office, and for performing the mail service between these points his hon. friend had given $200 a year. This contractor sublet it for $80; but he made so much that he had broken off this arrangement and now carried it himself for the $20.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER replied that the hon. gentleman had made no statement with reference to the former mail contract, as to its being accorded without tender, which he had not given to the Committee. The Department having done away with the service performed by the contractor, it was changed to a service at the same rate per mile, under a rule which had invariably been followed in Nova Scotia, when a contract was interfered with, through the opening of a line of railway; and this was the arrangement which had been effected. What he complained of was this—not that this service was put up to competition and taken at $250, but because it had been obtained by a person who, relying on his influence with the Government, had never performed the service at all.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—It is done, and done satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—This person, immediately on receiving it, appealed to the late Postmaster General to get an entirely different route and different service, but he appealed to him in vain. An entire change had, however, been made in this relation, the public incommoded, and the service given to this party without tender and without contract.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON understood the hon. gentleman to be in some difficulty on account of a corrupt and illegal act. The hon. gentleman had said that the contract was given to a person without advertisement, and he (Mr. Tupper) now admitted that the contract had been advertised.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER explained that what he complained of was this:—that during an election a corrupt arrangement had been effected, by which a person had been allowed to forward his own interests to the detriment of an entire community. The Government had not only carried out this arrangement, but they had also subsequently transferred to this person a contract for an entirely different route, without any tender whatever. This had the effect of alienating a strong political partisan of his own, and making of him a strong political opponent, hence he had reason to charge that this was a corrupt transaction. As far as the post-office printing at Halifax was concerned, the hon. gentleman had not mentioned that the first year the present Administration had the opportunity of handing it over to the Citizen Publishing Company the account went up to $10,000; but he was glad to find that the Postmaster General had discontinued this contract on discovering that these parties could not be trusted with the performance of the work.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON stated that it now appeared, after all, that the Postmaster General had advertised the matter, and that this corrupt act which had occasioned the hon. gentleman such distress had resolved itself to this, that the late Postmaster General for good and sufficient reason had taken the contract from a partisan of the hon.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

gentleman's, who was enjoying $800 a year for doing this simple service which another partisan of the hon. gentleman's—who the hon. gentleman said had deserted his party—did for $250; and for saving the difference the hon. gentleman now rose and made of it a grievance against the Government.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER stated that he had not made a charge of corruption against, but on the contrary had defended the late Postmaster General. When this person who had abandoned his political principles applied to the late Postmaster General for his pound of flesh it was refused; but when he made application to the hon. gentleman who now filled that office it was done. And this person was therefore performing postal service as a contractor to-day for the Government without tender.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—It was the late Postmaster General who rescinded the contract.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—Yes, it was; and it was the late Postmaster General who advertised it.

Mr. BOWELL said he had asked when the vote was taken on the Civil Service in this Department if any information could be given as to the expense which was incurred at present by having all unclaimed letters returned from the Dead Letter Office, as compared with having them advertised as under the old system, and the Finance Minister promised to give the information.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said while the actual payment of extra clerks would appear to be larger, yet the saving in other ways, which would appear in the Public Accounts, would be equal to it, and the one was about equal to the other.

Mr. BOWELL called attention to payments of $10,000 last year to the Citizen Publishing Company of Halifax, for departmental printing, of which company the Hon. Minister of Militia and the member for Halifax were charged with being partners, and they had not denied it. At any rate they appeared to be so familiar with the business that the House would accept their silence as an admission that the Minister had used his influence to put printing in the way of this company and pocketed his share of the profits. He found also the St. John Freeman had received $9,000 for similar work, but as the name of the party who owned the paper was not put down, they could not say whether he was a member of this House or not. He wondered if the receipts for the money were signed "Freeman?"

In 1874 the same paper received $8,126, and the Halifax Citizen $10,247, so that it was quite evident the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches had adopted the policy—"to the victors belong the spoils," and they had not forgotten themselves. Had they given it to their friends outside it would only be what might be expected, but they had adopted another plan and only gave the spoils to the papers in which they were interested themselves. He called attention also to the fact that a post office in his constituency had become vacant and no appointment had been made. He supposed it was because there did not happen to be in that locality a single supporter of the Government. He supposed it required political influence to get an appointment made, as no attention had been paid to the recommendations which he had sent in.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said as proof that appointments were not made through political influence, he would state that he had made applications for three new offices in his county and had not been able to get one.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said, he had made application some time ago for a post office in a certain part of his constituency, which was refused, as the Government could not see the necessity for it; but after he had lost his seat and a Ministerial supporter was returned, the post office was established, and it was used as an argument against him (Mr. White) in his last election by his opponent why the electors should not give him their support.

Mr. KIRK said the question with respect to the printing done in Halifax and St. John was not who was it done by, but was the sum paid too large for the work performed. He found that in Nova Scotia last year they had 144 post-offices and 733 way offices, and the Post Office Department concluded to convert these way offices into post offices. This change necessitated a large amount of printing for account books and necessary forms. He remembered a few years ago—in 1872, he believed—advertisements were published, calling for tenders for a mail contract; tenders were received, but before the day for opening them arrived, it was known that a certain firm who had tendered for $400 more than others, had got the contract, and were entering into arrangements to perform the work.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said the hon. gentleman ought to bring down papers to substantiate this statement.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER hoped he would put a notice on the paper to move for the production of the papers; he would be surprised if the charge could be sustained.

Mr. SCATCHERD said the hon. member for North Hastings, who seemed a little exercised about the illegality of those newspapers having received money for Government printing, should look a little further, and he would find the Mail had received such work. It was possible, too, that the paper with which the hon. gentleman was connected might have inserted Government advertisements. A little broader view of the thing should be taken, and all classes included, and then some satisfactory conclusion might be reached.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman ought to be capable of drawing a distinction between the ordinary advertisement sent to a newspaper without, in all probability, the proprietor's knowledge until it was published, and Ministers of the Crown and prominent members owning establishments and doing job work for the Government to the tune of $11,000 and $12,000.

Mr. SCATCHERD did not see the difference, and knew very well there was no difference. But perhaps the hon. gentleman, when he published such advertisements, took the ground that it was a small amount which would not be noticed, and therefore he was safe in taking it.

Mr. BOWELL said it was not a question of amount at all, and that there was an important difference in the two cases.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE was bound to admit that there was a difference between advertisements and job printing, because one advertisement paid a great deal better than the same amount of printing. He knew which his hon. friend would take if he had his choice.

Mr. BOWELL—But suppose a man got a large quantity of job work and had no job office, and had to farm it out?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Suppose the moon was green, cheese?

Mr. DESJARDINS urged that the postal service for the town forming the western suburb of Montreal, and containing from sixteen to eighteen thousand people, should be improved. Further, the municipality of Notre Dame de Grace, about three miles from Montreal, lacked a post office; its residents could obtain their letters at present only at Montreal, or at St. Henri, or at Cote des Neiges. Hoche-laga, a very important village, which was progressing very rapidly, was also exposed to serious inconveniences in this relation; the line which carried postal matter to it ran in such a manner that papers and letters leaving Montreal in the evening, reached their destination about three o'clock on the day following, about the same time that these were delivered in parishes at five, six, or seven leagues from the city. Coteau St. Denis, St. Jean Baptiste village, and other municipalities about Montreal had sent petitions praying for the improvement of their postal service, and he hoped that the Postmaster General would see that they were placed on a more satisfactory footing than at present. The village of Outremont and the Tanneries de Belair also required consideration in this regard.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—I have only to say in regard to what has fallen from the hon. member, that there is, no doubt, much force in what he has stated with reference to the necessity for increased postal communication; but how far the censures which the hon. gentleman's friends are disposed to pass on the Department over which I have the honour to preside, will interfere with my opportunities to fulfil their wishes, I am not at this moment able to say.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated that he had listened with patience to the duel which had taken place with reference to post offices; he had, however, as much cause for complaining as any other hon. member who had been compelled to give to it his attention. He could bear testimony to the general efficiency of the Department; he had made only one application to it so far as he recollected, during the past twelve months, and this had been for the establishment of a way office in a settlement in his county of some twenty-five years standing, which contained some five and twenty settlers. It was situated twelve miles from any post office. Judging from the tone of the remarks of the Postmaster General, he did not think that there was much likelihood of securing any assurance that the matter would receive any ready attention, nevertheless he would submit with patience, and trust to the tender mercies of the Department. If despite all the present depression in trade, the hardness of the times, and the falling off which was likely to occur in the receipts during the year, he could obtain the appropriation of $80 or a $100—he was very moderate in his demands—to secure the object he had in view, he would return to the Department his most grateful thanks.

Mr. KIRK, with reference to a statement he had made, informed the House that in 1873 a tender had been accepted to carry the mail between Shubenacadie and Melrose, a distance of 88 miles; the party who received it was prepared to perform the service on the day when the tenders were to be opened, without waiting for this to be done. The price was $1,625; and another tender, which he knew had been sent in, was drawn for $1,400.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER again recommended his hon. friend to move for the papers, as a very grave charge was made against the Post Office Department. He had no hesitation in saying that this statement ought to be substantiated, if it were possible; but it was entirely contrary to the whole course of procedure with relation to these matters, and he was quite certain that the hon. gentlemen laboured under some very serious misapprehension. If the hon. gentleman would move for the papers, the correspondence with the Post Office Department would show that the late Postmaster General had not been so recreant to his duty as the hon. gentleman seemed to think.

Mr. KIRK—I know it to be the fact.

Mr. PLUMB drew attention to the receipts and expenditures of the Department for 1873, 1874 and 1875, showing that the ratio of revenue had not kept pace with that of expenditure, based upon the following figures taken from the public accounts for those years. In 1873 the entire receipts were $1,308,154, and the entire expenditure $1,553,000, the deficiency being $245,450; in 1874 the receipts amounted to $1,407,068, and the expenditure to $1,695,480, the deficiency being $288,312, and in 1875 the receipts were $1,473,436, and the expenditure reached $1,873,24, showing a deficiency of $397,877, only an increase of $72,000 in the receipts and of $200,000 in the cost of collection.

The item was carried.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

On the item No. 190, appropriating $72,000 for salaries and expenses of 72 Inspectors of Weights and Measures.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he was of opinion that these inspectors should be paid by fees. If this were done he was satisfied that a better inspection would be made.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that the Statute passed three years ago provided the inspectors shall be paid by salary.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) asked whether the Government intended to make any change in the present law.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT thought it was better to give the law a fair trial, and he did not consider it would be right to propose alterations before they had had experience of the working of the Bill. He also said that as far as possible they would employ inland revenue officers.

The item was carried.

The item $3,000 for inspection of staples passed without discussion.

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

On the item $10,000 to meet expenses under the Adulteration of Food Act, Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked what steps had been taken to carry out that Act?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government were now appointing analysts in some of the leading cities.

The item was passed.

On the item $18,475 for collection of slide and boom dues,

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) called attention to the inadequacy of salaries paid to the slide masters of the Ottawa, who were most faithful and efficient officers. The slide master at the Rocher Capitaine, who had no duties to discharge, actually received the largest salary of all.

After some further discussion the item was passed.

On the item $200,000 for Prince Edward Island Railway, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained this sum was required for working expenses. The revenue, it was thought, would amount to about three-fourths of that.

The item was passed.

On the item $32,200 for telegraph lines in British Columbia,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked for explanations.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said $26,700 was required to pay the staff in the telegraph offices of British Columbia; the sum of $1,500 was required for repairs, and $4,000 for subsidy to the Western Union Company.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—What revenue is expected for this large expenditure?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The net receipts last year were $9,849.18.

The item was passed.

On the item $1,946.66 for telegraph line between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. In reply to Hon. Mr. Tupper,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said an arrangement had been made with the Telegraph Company who held a monopoly on the Island. He had no doubt himself but the Government might run a line along their railway, but they preferred making an arrangement with them by which for a certain amount they had the use of their lines without erecting a telegraph line. The Company had the use of some of the Government offices to do the ordinary work of the neighbourhood. All the Government messages connected with the working of the railway had to be transmitted by this line to Moncton to the head office and thence to Ottawa.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was necessary that all such contracts should be laid on the table of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had a different opinion; he did not pretend to lay every contract upon the table.

The item was carried.

Items $4,000, agents and contingencies, British Columbia; $60,000, surveys of land, North-West (including commissions and staff), and $10,000 for minor revenues, passed without debate.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

In reply to a question as to whether the House would sit on Saturday, it being a Roman Catholic Fête d'Obligation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said in a matter of this kind the Government were entirely in the hand of the House, but where there was even one member whose conscience would feel offended at sitting on that day they should not compel him to attend. At all events it was tolerably evident that there was quite a number who, although not opposed to sitting in an emergency, would prefer not to sit to-morrow, and he thought the Government would be consulting the interests of the whole in not asking them to sit to-morrow.

INFORMAL QUESTIONS.

Hon. Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if the Government intended to bring down any reports of the engineers of the Pacific Railway this year.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied these were in the Public Works Report, which was laid on the table a month ago.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER enquired if there was any information with reference to the Vancouver Island road?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter had not come before him yet, and indeed had no connection with the subject at all. It was not a part of the Pacific Railway, and would be a separate question entirely from the discussion which would arise on the estimates. The matters which would come up on the estimates in connection with the construction of the road, building of telegraph lines, and purchasing of rails and everything of that sort it is usual to discuss; but the mere question of policy involved in the correspondence with the British Columbia Government was an entirely separate thing and could be better discussed by itself.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) asked whether any information would be given with respect to the result of the surveys that had been lately completed on the line of the Georgian Bay branch before that item was discussed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Oh, certainly?

Mr. BLANCHET—And about the cancellation of the contract?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—These papers have been brought down, and were printed in the newspapers.

In answer to a further question by Mr. Wright of Pontiac, Mr. Mackenzie said the Government would give all the information they possibly could. But they had no report from the Chief Engineer relative to the Georgian Bay branch, because he had not undertaken the survey at all.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said the Hon. Minister of Public Works promised some time ago to announce what steps would be taken with reference to the construction of the Georgian Bay branch, and he asked if that information would be given when the item came up?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Are we to vote the item blindly?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—If the hon. gentleman chooses to vote blindly I should be very happy.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Is that what the Hon. First Minister asks us to do?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am not asking hon. gentlemen to do anything. We are going to discuss the matter fully and give every information in our power.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said if the Hon. First Minister did not choose to give the information the country demanded, it would be proper for the House not to vote the item.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—If my hon. friend does not vote, he will be wanting in his usual astuteness.

The subject then dropped, and the House adjourned at Thirty-five minutes past Twelve o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 27, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROBINSON (Toronto) introduced a Bill to amend the Criminal Law of Canada, so as to admit of the utilization of the labour of convicts beyond the walls or limits of jails in the Dominion.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

Bill to incorporate the "National Exchange Company," passed through Committee of the Whole.

The following Bills were agreed to in Committee, read the third time and passed:—

To incorporate "The Scottish Canadian Loan Co."

To incorporate "The Trust Company of Canada."

To amend the Act incorporating the Mail Printing and Publishing Co.

To amend the Act incorporating the Canadian Gas Lighting Co.

To enable the Welland Vale Manufacturing Co. to obtain an extension of a patent known as the "Rodden's Improved Capped Ferule and Sockets."

Bill to further amend the Act to incorporate the "London and Canada Bank," and to amend to amend the Act amending the same.

DORCHESTER ELECTION.

Mr. ROULEAU asked what are the reasons why the writ of Election for Dorchester was not issued until several months after the judgment annulling the election which took place in 1874?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am not able to state what the reasons were. The then Attorney General being absent from the city at present, I have not had an opportunity of making an enquiry.

The question was allowed to stand.

HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. CHURCH asked whether it is the intention of the Government to send an engineer to Petite Rivière, Lunenburg County, N.S., to make a survey and report if the erection of a breakwater is necessary?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—An engineer of the Department, I presume, will be in that neighbourhood during the course of the summer, and will make some investigation as to the necessities of the case.

Mr. CHURCH asked whether it is the intention of the Government to make arrangements so that the Dredge Canada shall return to the Harbour of Lunenburg, N.S., during the present year to complete the work commenced there last autumn?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I expect to be able to send the dredge there in the course of the summer. I am not able to say at what precise time.

Mr. CHURCH asked whether the Dredge Cape Breton will be sent to Mahone Bay, N.S., to deepen the channel of that harbour after her present engagements are completed; and if so, when?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is impossible to say when her present engagements will be completed. I am afraid her time is promised for the whole season. I am not able, therefore, to give a definite answer to the question. We will do the best we can and put the dredge in the most necessitous places.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked how many steam tug boats did the Government contract for in St. John, N.B., last year? Who were the contracting parties? Are they yet built, and will they be ready for use this coming summer?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — There were no steam tugs contracted for; there were no contracting parties; they are not yet built, and they won't be ready this summer.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

Mr. GORDON, with reference to his motion concerning the observance of the Lord's Day, stated that it was a subject in which he believed a widespread interest was taken, apart from anything of a political nature, in every section of the Christian community, and by all well-wishers of our great country. He would endeavour to do all that lay within his power to place this matter fairly before the House, and in order to deal with it intelligently, he proposed to divide the subject into several branches. Previously, however, he proposed to lay before the House his reason for taking up this question. In the year 1874, a most glaring act of Sabbath desecration had occurred within the bounds of the Dominion, to which his attention had been drawn, causing him great pain—he alluded to the Boundary Survey. He discovered that some 259 men had been employed for the space of five months on this work, settling the boundary line between the United States and Canada, the Sabbaths, however, not being observed. He thought that this gave cause for deep feelings of shame to every one who wished well to his country; this was the case with himself, and accordingly he was exceedingly glad to learn that this work was not under the surveillance or control of the Administration, the survey being made jointly by the British and American Governments, which alone were responsible for it.

He desired to deal with this question with respect to the post offices, canals, and railways of the Dominion. The House would bear in mind that no serious attempt had been made at legislation in this relation since Confederation; previously a variety of Acts were passed, and some of them were partially successful in preventing the employment of persons on the Sabbath on public works.

Such legislation began as early as 1844; and with successful results in 1853, when the Hon. George Brown obtained a Committee, with power to send for persons and papers. A vast amount of useful information was collected on this occasion, and an exceedingly valuable report, which did equal credit to the hon. gentleman's head and heart, was presented. Later in the year, 1857, the same gentleman brought the matter before the House, in the shape of a Bill so drawn as to forbid any labour being done on the Sabbath, in the post offices and on the canals of the two Provinces of Quebec and Upper Canada; but after a very keen debate it was lost by the casting vote of the Speaker, who supported the amendment.

No legislation restricting labour in the post offices was enacted until 1860, when a departmental order was passed permitting postmasters in Ontario, then the Province of Upper Canada, to close their offices on the Government days; no mention was made at the time of Quebec, and matters continued in this state in this connection until 1868, the year after Confederation took place, when the Postmaster-General, the Hon. Sydney Smith, promulgated a departmental order, which, besides confirming the right of Ontario postmasters to keep their offices closed, enjoined postmasters in Quebec to keep their offices open for one hour on this day. The order issued in 1860 ran as follows:—"Referring to Article 9 of "the regulations of this Department, "postmasters in Canada West are informed that they are relieved from "the obligation of their office for the "delivery of letters, &c., on Sundays;" and the order sent out in 1868 read after this manner:—"Postmasters in "Canada, except in the Province of "Quebec, are at liberty to close their "offices to the public on Sundays; and "in the Province of Quebec postmasters should keep their offices open

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

“for at least one hour either before or after divine service, as may be most convenient to the public generally.”

With regard to the other Provinces, he would very briefly glance at the state of the law in order to place the question fully before the House. In New Brunswick no work whatever was done in post offices on the Sabbath, and in Nova Scotia they were closed by law on this day; in Prince Edward's Island, the office in Charlottetown alone, was allowed to be open for one hour; and in Manitoba this was the rule solely with regard to the office in Winnipeg. In British Columbia, all these offices were closed on the Sabbath. In the Province of Quebec, there were 980 post offices; and in the course of his evidence given before the Committee in 1853, the Postmaster General, the Hon. Mr. Morris, estimated that two persons on the average were employed in each office, giving a total for Quebec of 1,960 who were engaged in work on that day.

He had mentioned that these offices could be closed in Ontario on the Sabbath; but this statement required some qualification, as those situated on the line of the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways were required to be open while mail trains were passing, mails being made up and delivered. He had no means of making a correct calculation as to the number of persons thus employed; but his estimate was that there were some two hundred offices on these lines, requiring the services of some four hundred employees, besides at least an equal number in the conveyance of the mails, and the men engaged in driving omnibuses to and from the trains, occasioning a very considerable amount of Sabbath desecration, which in his opinion was very much to be lamented. So far as he could secure credible information, the number so employed in Quebec and Ontario could not be placed at a less figure than three thousand, a matter which merited very serious consideration. This anomaly was also to be observed—while some offices were permitted to be closed others were enjoined to be kept open; while some had no work to do, others were enjoined to do work on this day, on pain of losing their positions if they refused to comply. This disclosed a lamentable state of affairs, and he saw no just reason why, when post offices were closed in the Maritime Provinces, in Manitoba, British Columbia and in the greatest portion of Ontario, the iron arm of the law should require the offices in Quebec and along the great lines of railway to be kept open, and he deemed it extremely desirable that a uniform Act should be passed applying to the entire Dominion in this relation, making the strict observance of the Sabbath obligatory.

He wished to notice another point in this connection. Even where the offices were closed, with the exception of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island, the law was permissive, and any postmaster could open his office if he chose in defiance of public sentiment; and he desired it to be so amended as to make closing on the Sabbath obligatory.

He now came to the question of the canals; and as in the case of the post offices, he found that in this relation there existed a wide divergence of practice throughout the Dominion.

He found that the Lachine and Welland Canals, upon which there was a larger traffic than on any other canals in the Dominion, were entirely closed on the Sabbath. The Beauharnois Canal, St. Anne's Lock, St. Ours Lock and Williamsburg Canals are open without restriction. When the largest canals are closed on the Sabbath, there was no just reason why work should be permitted on the others. The experience of the men living in the vicinity went to show that this service led to great desecration of the Lord's Day. Among the witnesses examined at Mr. Brown's Committee in 1852 was the Rev. Mr. Cannon, a Roman Catholic priest, who resided in the vicinity of the Cornwall Canal. When he was examined by the Committee, 5th October, 1852, to the following questions put by the Committee he gave the following answers:—

“Do you consider the effect of the traffic injurious? Yes; the men on the canal feel it to be a great hardship to be obliged to work on Sunday. What is its effect on the population? It causes a great deal of dissi-pation; young peop'e and others are led away to the canal to see the boats passing, and it is incongruous to hear the church bell and that of the steamboat ringing together on Sundays." * * * "What is the feeling in your neighbourhood with regard to this Sunday traffic? The people all ask why those employed by Government are required to work on the Sunday, while there is a law fining all persons who are found doing so. It is looked upon as a great nuisance, being productive of fighting, drinking, card-playing and various other sources of annoyance. The closing of the canals would be a most popular measure."

The Rev. Hugh Campbell, residing in the same neighbourhood, expressed himself in similar terms on the subject, and pointed out the great satisfaction with which the men engaged on the canals would receive a law prohibiting Sunday traffic. With regard to the change expected on the morals of the traders passing through the Welland Canal before and after closing on Sabbath, the testimony of the Rev. Mr. Bone is as follows:—

"I have taken particular pains to make enquiries from men engaged in various departments of our lake trade, as to their views on the Sabbath question—from the workmen who feel it to be a privilege to be on the Welland Canal on the Lord's Day, as it affords them rest of body, time to read or go to a place of worship; from captains who have tried both working and not working on the Lord's Day and their uniform testimony is, that the Sabbath labour does not forward them ultimately—i. e., were they to continue passing through the canal on the Lord's Day as on other days, they would not make any more trips through the season, besides losing the temporal, moral and spiritual benefit flowing from Sabbath observance; from lock-tenders, who state that when the canal was open on Sabbath there was a great deal more intemperance, profanity and disturbance of the public peace; then, a female would scarcely be safe to walk alone on the foot-path on Sabbath; now, they may be seen walking along quietly to Church or Sabbath School, none making them afraid. Also, the moral character of the lock-tenders has very much improved since the canal was closed; yea, some are exemplary Christian men. One, for example, takes an active part in our Bethel services, and I believe would rather leave his situation than work on Sabbath. So that if our canals were opened on the Lord's Day it would at once open the floodgates of vice, demoralize all engaged in the business, besides annoying those who sacredly keep the Lord's Day, and open a new source of temptation to the young to desecrate the Sabbath."

The opinions of those gentlemen, continued the speaker, could not be too calmly considered, especially in view of the fact that six or seven petitions had been presented to the House praying for the re-opening of the canal, from American Boards of Trade and owners of Steamboat Companies. It had now been closed for a quarter of a century with the utmost good to the employes, and no harm to those engaged in the trade. Seeing that the system had worked so well in this instance, there was great encouragement for the Government passing a law applying to every canal in the country.

He now came to the last part of the subject, and one which was perhaps the most difficult to deal with; he referred to the railways. In the year 1873 this question was taken up by the church to which he had the honour to belong, and the following circular was sent out to the companies in Ontario, by authority of the General Assembly:—

"It is a very grievous hardship on Christian men to be deprived of the public means of grace, and compelled either to do violence to their consciences by labouring on the Sabbath, or resigning their situations, and a very large number of the employes on railways are anxious for and would hail as a precious boon the Sabbath rest; nor is it for the interest of either the company or the public that conscientious men should be driven from your service, and their places filled by men morally reckless.

"But, passing from considerations such as these, however important, we ask the serious attention of the Board to the large number of congregations in which the public worship of God is painfully disturbed by the noise and commotion of passing trains Sabbath after Sabbath, and that, too, in violation both of the law of God and the public law of the Dominion. And we very earnestly and respectfully submit to the members of the Board that they are personally responsible to God for what in their official capacity they command or permit. Moreover, the systematic carrying on of any form of labour on the Sabbath exerts a very deadening influence on the moral and religious sensibilities of the people at large under whose observation such labour is performed; and were the bad example of railway companies in this particular followed by the representatives of other industries, the effect would be the practical subversion and abandonment of Christianity throughout our land; for, without the preservation of the Sabbath, history proves religion cannot survive.

"Remember the Sabbath Day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work. But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord, thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work."

This was endorsed by nine churches as follows:—

"We do hereby, on behalf of the respective religious bodies which we represent, cordially endorse the sentiments of the said memorial, and earnestly desire to see its objects accomplished, regarding as we do the present system of Sabbath traffic as injurious to the best interests of our country and the cause of religion.

He found that this memorial represented the opinion of nine Protestant Christian bodies in the Province of Ontario. He might add that although this memorial was not endorsed by the Bishops connected with the Roman Catholic and Episcopal Churches, he found that letters sympathizing with the movement were distributed by Bishop Bethune of Toronto and the Bishop of Huron. The Manager of the Great Western Railway, Mr. Price, in reply to the circular addressed to that company said:—

"I am instructed to inform you in reply, that the Directors have given this subject their serious attention, and desire to curtail the running of trains on the Sabbath Day to the very smallest limit, but there are reasons which render it utterly impossible to stop entirely the train service on Sundays. Since the establishment of the Union Pacific Railroad, there have been two passenger trains running between the Pacific Ocean at the West, New York, Boston, and the Atlantic Ocean at the East; these trains, called the Pacific and Atlantic expresses, are the only passenger trains run by this Company on Sunday, and it would be as unreasonable for us to stop the through passengers on these trains in Canada, as it would be to stop an Atlantic steamer in the middle of the Atlantic. During a part of the journey other lines have also to perform Sunday service. Lines on the American side by the Pennsylvania Central, and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern also perform this continuous service the same as the Great Western Railway and its connecting lines. With regard to the freight business there is this difficulty (which is, of course, very much magnified in the winter), that the connecting lines, East and West on all through lines, give contracts for what is called 'time freight,' to be delivered under a penalty as to time, between Chicago and New York, in so many days. Unless the Great Western Railway Company and its connections adopted the same rules and time as the competing lines in the States for through freight, we might as well close the railway altogether, as traders and merchants would not ship by this route.

"I would point out to you that, so far as the subject is within the power of the Directors of this Company, every exertion is used to curtail the operations of the line on Sabbath Day to the narrowest possible limits, and no trains are run for local service.

"JOSEPH PRICE,

Our intention and object, however, is to reduce it within the smallest possible compass, and this object we shall steadily keep in view.

I shall be glad to present your letter and circular to our next Board meeting.

"H. ABBOTT,
"Managing Director."

The Managing Director of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway replied as follows:—

"MANAGING DIRECTOR'S OFFICE, }
"OTTAWA, Feb. 11, 1873. }

"MY [DEAR SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of the 28th ult., covering copies of a memorial on the subject of Sabbath observance. It is my desire to limit work, in this company's service, on the Sabbath as much as possible."

The House would observe that the only serious objection which was made to do away with Sabbath work upon railways came from the Great Western Railway Company. The Managing Director of that railway was the only one who condescended to assign reasons why they had to run trains on Sunday, and a perfect examination of these reasons might be desirable. The House would observe that that gentleman said it would be as unreasonable to stop through passenger trains on Sunday as it would be to stop a vessel at sea. He thought this argument was absurd. A vessel at sea had no port to run into and it was bound to prosecute its voyage, while on board all passenger vessels Divine service was as much recognized by passengers on Sabbath Days as on shore. This could not be the case with regard to railways, and when a train left for a destination that it could not reach without trespassing on the Sabbath, he could not see why it could not be compelled to halt at some station where the passengers would be allowed to rest on the Lord's Day. Reasons were given that through trains on the Pacific Railway—the Atlantic and Pacific Expresses—should not be stopped on Sunday, but he thought that passengers from the Pacific Coast if they were overtaken on the Lord's Day should rest. He was sure the workmen would desire rest as well as the passengers. Another reason was with regard to time freight, that unless they carried it through continuously, traffic would be seriously impeded. This brings the question down to one of expediency in carrying on traffic on the Lord's Day, human expediency placed above divine law. He was sure that no one who held to the divine obligation of the Sabbath would feel that the reasons here put forward were powerful enough to justify any railway company in carrying out the course they had pursued. He had quoted the opinion of these Railway Companies. He found on the Northern Railway, where a very large amount of through traffic was done between Toronto and Collingwood, they were uniform in their rest. If the steamboat arrived at Collingwood on Saturday night or Sunday, the passengers were compelled to remain over until Monday. This was not the case with the Great Western R.R. The Divine law was entirely obligatory and above human expediency, or it was not. No individual was allowed by law to violate the sanctity of the Sabbath; then why should companies claim special privileges which individuals had not? He did not see why individuals should be permitted to combine together and set a cause at defiance which they could not individually do with impunity.

Mr. GORDON.

It being six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. GORDON in resuming said that one of the most important points in regard to the Sunday railroad traffic was the keeping of the employes at work during the Sabbath day. A friend of his had written to him to the effect that he had approached some of the employes engaged on the Grand Trunk Railway on the subject, and although they earnestly desired a change which would allow them to rest on the Seventh Day, they declined to sign a petition to the House of Commons, stating that they would be immediately dismissed if they did so. To whom were these helpless ones to look for aid? They could not look to the railroad company or endeavour to obtain redress without losing their situations. It was the duty of the State in regard to the post office employes, and those engaged on the canals and by grasping monopolies, to step in and see that they shall not be permitted to do such a thing; moreover he maintained and believed that statesmen and the Government were entirely responsible for exercising that oversight on behalf of those who were helpless and who could not otherwise receive protection under the law. He maintained likewise that the position taken by the Great Western Railway Company was not borne out by the statements of other railway companies. In the year 1872 a very powerful association banded itself together to look after the observance of the Sabbath, and were particularly charged with influencing the railway companies of the United States. They issued circulars asking the railroad companies of the United States to co-operate with them in endeavouring to stop as far as possible the traffic on railways within the bounds of the Union. The following was a part of the circular on the subject:

"The New York Sabbath Committee, in 1858, collected much valuable information in regard to Sunday trains and Sunday work on the railroads diverging from the city of New York.

"The officers addressed upon the subject, appreciating the design of the Committee, furnished with promptness and courtesy important statistics and statements in regard to their respective roads. The information then obtained was published in a pamphlet, and was received by the managers of railroads and the public generally with much interest.

"The Committee now desire to extend their investigations to the leading railroads throughout the country, and they take the liberty of respectfully soliciting information upon the points named on another page, which please return with your answer in regard to the road with which you are connected.

"The Committee feel less hesitation in asking for this information from those officially connected with the management of the roads; for they have almost invariably found on their part an earnest desire to reduce Sunday trains and abridge Sunday work.

"The general order of President Lincoln to the army and navy, during the late war, commanding that 'Sunday labour in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity,' fairly presents the general sentiment of the nation in regard to unnecessary labour on the Lord's Day.

"It is in the spirit of kindness, and with the desire to aid the managers of railroads in efforts to prevent unnecessary work on the Sabbath, and thereby to promote the welfare of the community, that the Committee ask for this information."

The following questions were appended to the circular:—

"1. What is the number of passenger-trains which pass over your road on Sundays?"

"2. What is the number of Sunday freight and cattle trains?"

"3. What number of men have to work a part or the whole of that day in consequence of Sunday trains?"

"4. What number of men work on Sunday, either in the machine-shops or repairing the road?"

"5. Are Sunday trains a source of profit to your company?"

"6. Any additional information and suggestions on this general subject which you may be kind enough to communicate will be gratefully received."

The circular was promptly answered by a hundred and twenty-four companies and it appeared that the condition of Sunday traffic was as follows:—

THE EXTENT OF SUNDAY TRAVEL AND SUNDAY WORK ON 124 RAILROADS IN THE UNITED STATES.

"Number of companies which run no Sunday passenger freight or cattle-trains...	65
"Number of companies which run Sunday passenger or freight and cattle-trains...	59
"Number of Sunday passenger-trains run by these 59 Companies.....	177
"Number of Sunday freight and cattle-trains run by the above Companies.....	42
"Number of men employed on Sundays..	1,106

This estimate of the number of men employed on Sundays is far below the actual fact, since many companies left this question unanswered, or stated that they could not answer it with any degree of accuracy.

To the question whether Sunday trains are a source of profit the following answers were returned:—

"The General Superintendent of the Morris and Essex Railroad (N. J.) writes: 'I can only suggest that Sunday work, as a rule, does not pay.'

"The Boston and Providence Railroad: 'Secular work on Sunday is profitable to nobody—corporations or individuals.'

"The Indianapolis, Peru, and Chicago Railroad: 'They would not be a source of profit on the road of this company.'

"The Northern Railroad, Boston: 'Do not think it profitable for the company nor good for the community or the employes to work or run trains on Sundays'

"The Nashville and Decatur Railroad: 'Regard them as unprofitable to the company and demoralizing to the employes.'

"The Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg Railroad: 'Never can be to any road, for both men and machinery need a day of rest.'

"Col. Geo. A. Merrill, Supt. of Rutland, Burlington and Vermont Valley Railroad, writes: 'Many years' experience and observation more and more convince me, as a railroad man, that even in an economic view there is no more profitable rule for us to follow than 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.'

"J. P. Farley, Superintendent of Dubuque and Sioux City and Dubuque South-Western Railroad: 'From experience I know that labourers, mechanics, managers, &c., will do more work, and do it better, in six days than in seven. Further, if we habitually ask our men to break God's law by a desecration of the Sabbath, it will not be long before they will break his law in other respects by defrauding, &c.'

"S. Ruth, Superintendent of Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad: 'I have long been of the opinion that it is to the interest of the railroad and steamboat companies to suspend operations on the Sabbath, as it demoralizes the men and makes them reckless, and is the cause of many accidents. I believe railroad companies would be much more prosperous if Sunday running was entirely suspended, as I believe there is a Providence for good in the observance of the Sabbath. I suppose there are employed on the railroads in the United States, in whole or in part, on the Sabbath 30,000 men.'

"R. B. Dunn, President of Maine Central Railroad: 'I am pleased to learn that you are doing so much good, as I know you must be, while engaged in this noble work of abridging the labour of employes on the railroads on the Sabbath. Heaven bless you in this great work.'

"E. G. Barney, Superintendent of Selma, Rome and Dalton Railroad: 'In nearly thirty years' experience on Western and Southern railroads, I have never found it necessary to run Sunday trains except where connecting or competing lines rendered it so. I think men perform more work in six days, resting every seventh, than when they are worked every day. I also think men are more reliable and trustworthy on roads where the Sabbath is observed than where the day of rest is ignored.'

"F. McLeod, President of Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Railroad: 'I feel that an individual cannot violate the Sabbath with impunity, neither can a corporation; and nations alike are responsible for a wanton desecration of the Sabbath.'

"Hon. Abraham Murdock, President of Mobile and Ohio Railroad: 'There is no question relating to the management of railroads in which a greater interest is taken by me, and I am free to confess that I do not believe the running of Sunday trains is profitable to the company, and that it is a positive violation of divine law none can doubt.'

"L. J. Fleming, the Superintendent and Chief Engineer of the same road, adds: 'My experience, extending through a third of a century, in the management of railroads, is that cessation of labour on Sunday produces a good moral effect upon the employes and laborers.'

"W. W. Card, Superintendent of Pittsburg, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railroad: 'In my opinion, Sunday trains and Sunday work of all kinds should be discouraged. It is demoralizing, and men engaged six days of the week need Sunday for rest.'

"E. B. Phillips, President of Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana Railroad: 'We are satisfied that (leaving all moral considerations out of the question) it is for the interest of the company to allow our employes the rest of the Sabbath.'

"J. Durand, General Superintendent of Little Miami, Columbus and Xenia Railroads: 'It is, in my judgment, gravely to be feared that the want of cessation from labour on the canals, railroads and steamboat lines of the country on the Sabbath has a tendency to degrade the tone of morals in the community; yet less censure can attach to those men who are compelled to labour for their daily bread than to owners and employers who require the service to be performed.'

"E. F. Drake, President of Minnesota Valley Railroad: 'As a general rule, men of good morals, and particularly men of any religious character, who would take employment which would require the habitual violation of the Sabbath, would prove unfaithful and unreliable servants. Those who may disregard the Sabbath as a divine institution will admit that in all business matters and employments the rest of the seventh day is needful for the mental, moral and physical necessities of man.'

"Frederick Watts, President of Cumberland Valley Railroad: 'Several years ago, under a contract with the Government to carry the mails, our company ran passenger-trains on Sunday. For the last ten years all work on our road and in our shops has been prohibited; and my experience is, that nothing more highly conduces to the health and working powers of the employes than their rest from labour on Sunday. And, in my judgment, there is a corresponding advantage to the Company itself.'

"W. Byth, Superintendent of Alexandria, Loudoun and Hampshire Railroad, Va.: 'We take pleasure in answering that this company has never run a Sunday train. Our people have no desire for them, nor can we see any advantage in or any necessity for running them. There is not one in ten thousand of those who would travel on the Lord's Day who could not as well arrange to go on Saturday or Monday.'

"Robert Harris, General Superintendent of Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad: 'Apart from the religious view of avoiding work on Sunday, we are convinced that a rerief from the necessity of working and watching lengthens our lives and makes them more useful and valuable, and that it is no hardship upon any one to force them to tarry on their journey that day.' "

Such was the opinion of a large number of men who had great experience in railroad work. He hoped it was of such a nature as would go far to counterbalance the view expressed by those who were directly interested, simply because they made money by it, in violating the Sabbath and disturbing the peace of the community. Apart from the moral aspect of the question he maintained the right of the people to demand that the Sabbath should be observed on the leading railways of the country. In the first place, the men employed on such lines were entitled to a day of rest. It was a God-given right which no company should have the power to take away from them. It was to the interest of those corporations that they should have a faithful class of servants. How could they expect, when they asked their employés to violate the fourth commandment, they would long observe the eighth? He also maintained that the security of property throughout which railroads pass, demanded that trains should not run on the Sabbath Day. If any company was permitted to set at naught the law, he asked on what grounds can they justly complain if they themselves suffered from violations of the law? Railroad property would be worthless if we had not a law abiding population. Again he asked how many accidents take place because of the weariness of those employés who have not had a seventh day of rest? There had been many accidents from this cause. Then, with regard to the large number of classes who were disturbed by Sunday traffic, it must be remembered not only railroad employés themselves, but large numbers along the line were prevented from enjoying the rest of the Sabbath. For instance, drivers of omnibuses and carriages, hotel keepers and post office employés had to take part in the violation of the Lord's Day. This was a question which interested all classes, and was not advocated merely by straight-laced individuals. In all the leading countries of the word, the Sabbath has been held in high esteem, and its observance has been advocated not only by clergymen and professedly religious people, but by men holding high positions in every calling.

He found that Lord Macaulay, a man against whom a charge of being a fanatic or enthusiast could not at all lie, said:—"If the Sunday had not been observed as a day of rest, during the last three centuries, I have not the smallest doubt that we should have been at this moment a poorer and less civilized people than we are." He would also read the following opinions, which were worthy of consideration:—

"Count Montalembert: 'There is no religion without worship, and no worship without the Sabbath.'

"Sir Matthew Hale: 'The more faithfully he applied himself to the duties of the Lord's Day the more happy and successful was his business during the week.'

"Blackstone: 'A corruption of morals usually follows the profanation of the Sabbath.'

"Adam Smith: 'The Sabbath, as a political institution, is of inestimable value, independently of its claim to Divine authority.'

"Lord Kames: 'Sunday is a day of account, and a candid account every seventh day is the best preparation for the great day of account.'

"William Wilberforce: 'I can truly declare, that to me the Sabbath has been invaluable.'

"Sir Walter Scott: 'Give to the world one half of Sunday, and you will find that religion has no stronghold on the other. Pass the morning at church, and the evening, according to your taste or rank, in the cricket-field or the opera, and you will soon find thoughts of the evening hazards and bets intrude themselves on the sermon, and the recollections of the popular melody interfere with the Psalms.'

"S. T. Coleridge: 'I feel as if God had, by giving the Sabbath, given fifty-two springs in the year.'

"Isaac Taylor: 'A Sunday given to the soul, is the best of all means of refreshment to the mere intellect.'

"Justice McLean: 'Where there is no Christian Sabbath there is no morality: and without this free institutions cannot long be sustained.'

"Attorney-General Bates: 'The religious character of an institution so ancient, so sacred, so lawful and so necessary to the peace, the comfort and the respectability of society, ought alone be sufficient for its protection: but, that failing, surely the laws of the land, made for its account, ought to be as strictly enforced as the laws for the protection of persons and property. If the Sunday laws be neglected and despised, the laws of person and property will soon share their fate, and be equally disregarded.'

"Willard Parker, M.D., New York City: 'The Sabbath must be observed as a day of rest.'

This I do not state as an opinion, but knowing it has its foundation upon a law in man's nature as fixed as that he must take food or die.'

"John Richard Farre, M. D., of London: 'As a day of rest I view the Sabbath as a day of compensation for the inadequate restorative power of the body under continued labour and excitement. One day in seven, by the bounty of Providence, is thrown in as a day of compensation, to perfect by its repose the animal system.'

"John C. Warren, M.D., Professor in the Medical College of Harvard University: 'So far as my observation extends, those who are in the habit of avoiding worldly cares on the Sabbath are those most remarkable for the perfect performance of their duties during the week. I have a firm belief that such persons are able to do more work and to do it in a better manner, in six days, than if they worked the whole seven.'

Looking back on what he had advanced, he would briefly draw attention to these points:—In the first place he had established throughout the Provinces constituting the Dominion, as regarded post-office work, that a great divergence of practice obtained, some post offices being entirely closed by permission, while others were kept open by command, the strong arm of the law being brought to bear upon employès compelling them to violate a certain portion of the Lord's Day. Also as far as canals were concerned, that many of them were kept open, occasioning a vast amount of desecration, to the detriment of the men so engaged, and of all good morals in the vicinity; and with reference to railways, he hoped that he had made out a case, giving not only his own opinions, which were of very small weight, but putting against the doctrine advanced by the Great Western Railway the views of many prominent men of long experience, who had been engaged in the same traffic, and who certified in the most positive manner that the running of railways on Sunday was not necessary, while the abstention from it was of great benefit to the companies and employès, and the more profitable in the long run.

One word in conclusion. He desired that the Government which directed the affairs of this vast Dominion would seriously lay this matter to heart, and ensure, as far as lay in their power, the strict observance of the Lord's Day throughout the length and breadth of the land; for this all the right-thinking people, and of the various religious communities of this country, would demand of them and insist upon it until they had attained their object.

He was quite aware that a considerable diversity of opinion existed with regard to our Roman Catholic friends, as to their mode of observing the Sabbath, and hon. members would observe that his remarks had entirely related to public works, having no relation to private observance. He believed that this latter was a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of individuals as between them and their God, in which no legislature could properly interfere; but this he did maintain, that so far as the protecting power of the State could extend to the helpless, the down-trodden and the oppressed, who were under the heel of grasping, greedy and money-making monopolies, it was its duty to step in and afford that protection which such persons had a right to demand. So far as our Roman Catholic citizens were concerned, he held that while Protestants were ready to admit their claim to tenderness of conscience regarding certain days which Protestants did not observe, they should exercise the same mutual forbearance towards Protestants in this relation, bearing in mind that throughout the Dominion the latter had a most tender regard to the observance of the Sabbath Day, believing that it was a divine institution which no man had a right to wrest from the meanest subject in the Queen's Domains. This being the case, Protestants asked that no opposition should be made by these gentlemen or any others to their earnest desire in this regard. He knew that he had a difficult subject to advocate before the House; but he felt that this it was his duty to do, in view of the comparative youth of this great Dominion; for while we were seeking to lay the foundations of a great future, we should also endeavour to plant and imbed in our Constitution that which would bear good fruit. Such had been the result in the past, for people who had observed the Sabbath, being guided by reverence for God's Commandments, occupied a high position in the scale of nations.

In consequence he moved, seconded by Mr. Goudge, that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:

"1. That the interest of public morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community alike render it desirable and necessary that there should be a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's Day on all public works which are under the control of the Dominion Government.

"2. That in the conduct of Government surveys and explorations, Government employes should be enjoined to abstain from the prosecution of labour on the Lord's Day.

"3. That in the opinion of this House there should be an entire closing and cessation of labour on all canals, railways and other public works which are under the control of the Dominion Government, during the twenty-four hours comprehended in the Lord's Day—save and except only such services as may be of absolute and unavoidable necessity."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that with the views expressed by his hon. friend from North Ontario, regarding the advisability of observing the Lord's Day as a day of rest and of worship, he was entirely agreed; but as to the power of this House, or of any Parliament, to enforce that observance in the manner that his hon. friend had mentioned, in accordance with the conscientious scruples of the hon. gentleman, and of many who thought with him, there might be room for serious divergence of opinion. Before, however, making any general remarks on the motion which the hon. gentleman had so ably submitted to the House, he must express his astonishment with reference to one of his statements that there had been a systematic and continued violation of the Sabbath Day by the force employed by Her Majesty's Government, in determining the boundary between the United States and North-West Territories. He had only to say that if this was correct he had heard nothing of it, no representations whatever had been made to the Administration on the subject, and it seemed to him incomprehensible why an officer of rank in Her Majesty's Army should have devoted himself to such labours upon the Sabbath, as it had not been required of him by this Government, nor he was sure, by any commands of the Imperial Cabinet. He felt, moreover, certain that his hon. friend had not been correctly informed on the subject.

So far as he knew no labour had been performed on Sunday by any of the parties engaged either in the Pacific Railroad surveys or in other public works under Government control, and he was not at all sure that many of the public servants were particularly anxious to work for seven days in the week, when they were allowed to get off with six. In his own experience, indeed, he had not found any particular anxiety on their part to labour, even during these six. No Minister, no Government and no public official having charge of others, would, he was certain, desire to be employed during the seven days. With regard to the great public highways, as his hon. friend had stated, the Lachine, Cornwall and Welland Canals were altogether closed on Sundays. On the Beauharnois, St. Ann's, St. Ours and Williamsburg Canals the locks were seldom used, however, on the Sabbath Day. Now, the closing of many of the canals was not a subject of legislation with us at all; the Government might require all their servants, of course, to abstain from opening the locks under any circumstances, but occasions have arisen when it became almost a necessity for vessels to pass through, as when they had perishable goods on board and the weather was very hot, making a detention of twenty-four hours a very serious matter. Then the question frequently arose—and it was before the Government at the present moment—whether vessels should be stopped in the course of a long journey. There were fully twenty-one steamers, for instance, plying regularly between the city of Montreal and the city of Chicago. Two days and a half's journey takes them to the Welland Canal. They reach there at eleven or half-past eleven Saturday and are detained until Monday perhaps at the mouth of the canal. Some of those vessels take a large number of passengers aboard, and at the places where they are required to stop there are probably no facilities for their attendance at church. Representations had been made to the Government that the detention of these passenger steamers had been a fruitful source of local disturbance from disorderly crews and passengers not so piously inclined as his friend from North Ontario. Owners claim that their vessels are stopped at the middle of their voyage. The canal is the only means of navigation between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, and when once they are fairly on their journey they reach the Detroit River at the end of the third day, and they pass up that river to River St. Clair. The passage of those steamers on the waters of the rivers was quite as offensive as the passage of railway trains on the banks, and perhaps if anything more annoying to worshippers in churches. In the church in which he worshipped at home the congregation were greatly annoyed by the whistles of passing steamers. They had no control over vessels navigating the rivers, while they, or some other parties, had control over the trains passing over land. It was held they should be required to anchor in the river or canal as the case may be. These representations were incessantly made to the Government, but it was a matter of great difficulty to regulate the observance of the Sabbath Day on the part of the commercial and travelling public. On one or two occasions, recently, vessels had been permitted to pass up the canal on the Lord's Day, but each time the captain and crew were arrested under the Local Law for breaking the Sabbath. This was a matter entirely in the hands of the Provincial Legislature, and therefore the hon. gentleman had wisely confined his resolutions to what the Government might fairly be held to control, namely, that there should be universal observance of the Lord's Day on the public works of the Dominion. The Government did enforce that now, and such had been the policy, he presumed, of all Administrations—to give the rest of the Sabbath to all their employes. The next resolution was :

"That in the conduct of Government surveys and explorations, Government employes should be enjoined to abstain from the prosecution of their labour on the Lord's Day."

If it was thought necessary to enjoin this upon them, there was not the slightest objection, but it appeared unnecessary. The third resolution was :

"That in the opinion of this House there should be an entire closing and cessation of labour on all Canals, Railways and other Public Works which are under the control of the Dominion Government, during the twenty-four hours comprehended in the Lord's Day—save and except only such service as may be of absolute and unavoidable necessity."

So far as the Dominion railways are concerned, there was, for instance, a train that leaves St. John at six o'clock in the evening and arrives at Halifax about eight or nine next morning. It leaves Halifax on Saturday evening in the same way and reaches St. John early Sunday morning. The question arose whether this was, within a reasonable sense of the word, a violation of the observance of the Sabbath. His hon. friend thought the observance should commence and end at midnight; others regarded it not in that strictly literal sense, as only being required during daylight, so far as public manifestations were concerned, and that trains ought not to be stopped at points where it is impossible for passengers to get accommodation. Again, some looked upon the observance of the Lord's Day as one altogether of a personal nature—that everyone should satisfy himself—and the well-known words of our Saviour, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," a considerable number interpreted to mean that its observance in the sense of absolute cessation of labour for the twenty-four hours does not conform to the letter or spirit of the Divine author. The Dominion Government, however, had only to see that no unnecessary work was performed in the works under their own control. It would be remembered that the Municipal Act of Upper Canada or Ontario provided that the Council of every city and town might pass by-laws for enforcing the due observance of the Sabbath according to law, which was still the law under the new regime. The 22 Vic., passed in 1859, "An Act to prevent the profanation of the Lord's Day in Upper Canada," after providing that no business should be prosecuted, exempted steamers carrying Her Majesty's mails, from the penalty that might be imposed by any Legislatures. A large number of petitions had been presented to the Government from owners of vessels in the United States ports complaining of the closing of the Welland Canal on Sunday and praying that it should be opened, or if closed it should only be during the hours of divine worship. These matters occasioned a very great deal of difficulty. It was desirable that vessels passing from one port 200 or 300 miles east of the canal to ports several hundred miles west, should not be stopped on their way, and it was equally important to us that while there should be no unnecessary stoppage, that all employés engaged on these works should have the opportunity of gaining that rest which is requisite, and of worshipping on the Sabbath Day as they ought. On the other hand it was known, that while the canal was opened it imposed no additional labour on the part of the employés, as that was provided in addition. It was the public policy of the Government and Parliament that those works should be shut except in cases of necessity, such as indicated when vessels might be required to pass through to avoid serious loss not contemplated at the beginning of the journey. He did not see what the hon. member had to gain by going into Committee and passing those resolutions, which no one seriously objected to, but which after all merely affirmed a truism and a policy already in existence. All he had to say with regard to special abuses was that the Government would endeavour when their attention was called to any to have them rectified. He expressed his hope and belief that his hon. friend would give some authority for the statement with reference to the Boundry Survey, or else it might be presumed that he must have been misinformed on the subject, as it was scarcely creditable to any large bodies of employés that they should be accused of having deliberately and systematically violated the sanctity of the Lord's Day when they were not required to do so by the Government employing them. He hoped also, having obtained this discussion and having elicited as far as the Government was concerned an expression of opinion in favour of his own views, his hon. friend would not find it necessary to prosecute the matter further by asking the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider this resolution.

Mr. CHRISTIE said he wished to express his hearty approval of the resolution before the House. The county which he represented had long complained of the desecration of the Lord's Day by the opening of the canals, and they had petitioned frequently against it. The hon. gentleman who then represented the county succeeded in getting the canals closed during a portion of the Sabbath, which was a step in the right direction and a partial remedy of the evil complained of. But it was desirable that the sanctity of the Lord's Day should be observed as closely as possible. He did not think it would at all interfere with trade; on the contrary it would be a benefit to it, and would contribute to the prosperity of the Dominion. He considered that the due observance of the Sabbath was essential to the physical well-being of the people, and those who observed the Lord's Day and abstained from work would live longer and accomplish more labour than those who worked every day of the week. He quoted from a medical authority to prove that a strict observance of the Sabbath added seven years to a man's life. He would express an earnest hope that the Ministers and members of this House would give the matter their serious consideration that the necessary steps might be taken to secure a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's Day throughout the public works of the Dominion.

Mr. BROUSE said it appeared to him that if vessels going up lake Ontario and through the Welland Canal were tied up in that canal during the Sabbath, where the men were allowed to leave the boat and frequent grogeries and hotels and get drunk, it would be far better to allow vessels to pass along and have their crews under the control of their captains. He argued that the Sabbath should be properly observed; but let any person pass through the canals on the Lord's Day on one of the Northern Transportation Company's vessels and they would find that if the vessel were tied up at Port Dalhousie or Port Colborne, it would be almost impossible to get her in operation again so that she could pass on her voyage on Monday forenoon. Instead of 24 hours' delay they would find that 30 hours were lost, and the men would not be in a fit condition, from the many temptations along the shore, to perform their work. He thought this was a strong argument in favour of permitting vessels to continue their voyage. Another point was the fact that the Welland Canal was only a small link in the navigation of the lakes, and when vessels were detained for 24 hours it was not only a great drawback to the trade, but it increased the cost of transporting grain. The canals in the United States that compete with the Welland Canal were open every Sabbath, and men who had invested large sums of money in carrying grain between Chicago and Montreal would lose a great deal of money if vessels were not permitted to pass along on the Sabbath day, under the control of their respective commanders. The loss from a sailing vessel being tied up was from $35 to $40 per day, while that of a steamer was from $120 to $200 per day; and when they would be detained 48 hours, owing to the carousing of their crews over Sunday, he thought they should not be prevented from continuing their voyage by the closing of the canals on the Sabbath day.

Mr. DEVLIN said the question under discussion was no doubt of considerable importance; and as he concurred in many of the remarks of the mover of the resolution, it had occurred to him it would be well to point out to this hon. House that while they were attempting to deal with the observance of the Sabbath on public works at a distance, they might perhaps look nearer home. He believed some two or three years ago Parliament prohibited, as far as it could prohibit, the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Commons portion of these buildings, although they did not pass a prohibitory liquor law, in order to meet the views of their temperance friends. If the canals should be closed on Sunday and the public works suspended, why not close this Chamber on the Sabbath? Why not pass a law to close the club on Sunday? He sometimes came to this House on Sunday, not to do work, but just to see who were at work on Sabbath, and see how many saints were here writing business letters and correspondence. During the very hours that service was going on they could be seen writing business letters in this House. If they went in for strict observance of the Sabbath, why not close this Chamber on Sunday, so that there would be no temptation to prevent the members from attending divine service, and close the club also. He contended that any strict observer of the Sabbath would be shocked to see the number of members who came here to work on Sunday; therefore, concurring in the motion of the hon. gentleman, he contended that if they were sincere in this matter let the order go forth that these doors be closed on Sunday so that the messengers and clerks could go to church. Close the Library and every other room in the building, except those allowed to the Speaker.

An Hon. Gentleman—Where would we spend Sunday?

Mr. DEVLIN said in church of course. He thought it as well, too, it should go abroad to the country that while they had three or four pious gentlemen in this Chamber, the constituencies should also know that there are representatives among them who were really hard working men on the Sabbath day.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness) said he felt astonished at the revelations of the hon. member who had just sat down. He asked if any hon. gentleman belonging to this House actually came here to perform work, the work of the country, or any other work on the Sabbath Day. He hoped the hon. gentleman was only joking.

Mr. OLIVER said he desired to correct a statement of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution. It was stated by the hon. gentleman that the post offices along the line of the Great Western Railway were compelled to deliver and receive mails on Sunday. He thought that this was a mistake as there were no mails carried on that road on Sunday. The last mail of the week was delivered on Saturday going to the West, and a last mail to the East passed through to its destination and out of the Province before Sunday morning. He would state, however, that the amount of traffic upon that road was almost as great on Sunday as on any other day of the week. There were two passenger trains every day, one from the East and one from the West, and he had seen in the course of an hour four or five different freight trains pass from the East to the West conveying empty cars to be ready for Monday. He knew that the people living along the line were very much annoyed by the traffic that was conducted on it on Sunday, and if it were possible to put a stop to it it would be a satisfaction to them. But he did not know that it was in the power of this Government or of the Local Government to put a stop to such traffic. He would remark that the statement of his hon. friend from Montreal Centre should not be allowed to go abroad unexplained. He knew that there were a great many gentlemen here who had families in distant parts of the country, and they came here, in all probability, after service in the afternoon, to write letters to home, and when the hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre saw them engaged at their desks they were engaged in corresponding with their families. The recommendation that the Library of the House should be closed he objected to. Where would the members spend their Sabbath afternoons? Would the hon. gentleman have them loafing about hotels and in their bed rooms when they could obtain books with which to improve their minds? It would be intolerable to live in a city of this kind during Session if they were shut out from the Library on Sabbath.

Mr. SMITH (Peel) said the injurious effect of the stoppage of vessels from going through the Welland Canal had been referred to, and he supposed in carrying out the same argument that the stoppage of the the rail-ways would have the same effect. He had no doubt that if the Government consented to allow the Welland Canal to be open on Sunday that double the number of vessels would go through it. He considered that the thanks of the House were due to the hon. gentleman for bringing this motion before them. They wanted to know really where the authority in this matter lay, whether it was with the Local or the Federal Parliament. They were told by the Premier that the Local Governments had control of this matter. He wished to state that in Ontario the Local Government had endeavoured to enforce the local statute and had been unable to do it. Again and again Grand Trunk employes had been fined, but the company had paid the fines, and the men were put to work again immediately. The company had in other ways violated that statute, and there was no doubt a very large portion of the public desired to know with whom the jurisdiction lay.

Mr. GORDON said the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had expressed surprise that he should have made the statement he had made as regarded the carrying out of the Boundary Survey, and had wished him to state his authority, or else withdraw it. He was sure he would not have made the charge had he not believed it to be true. His authority was a nephew of his own who accompanied the survey, who said that from the first no Sabbath or religious observances were regarded, that the work was carried on continuously throughout the seven days. That was his authority for that statement. As to the statement of his hon. friend, the member for Grenville, in regard to the undesirability of detaining vessels at the mouth of the Welland Canal, and the evils that flowed out of that practice, he denied that such would be the case. He thought he had adduced sufficient testimony to prove that the contrary was the result, and he desired to know whether mere opinions were to be put against the experience of practical men. It was the first time he had even heard that harm could result from giving the men on these boats an opportunity to hear the gospel preached. It was well known that the Young Mens' Christian Association in Ontario had made ample provision for the spiritual requirements of those men, and he trusted they would continue to have an opportunity of enjoying those advantages on the Sabbath. With reference to the statement of the hon. member for Oxford, he was glad to find he was not in error. He stated that the Great Western Railroad did not deliver mails on the Sabbath, and that was an additional reason why the law should apply to the Grand Trunk. With regard to the request of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government that he should withdraw the resolution, he would say that he believed that the religious people throughout the Dominion would not be content with the answer the hon. gentleman had given. He had received no promises from the hon. gentleman to set matters right, either in regard to the post offices or the canals. He could not see how any serious loss would follow the observance of the divine laws. The hon. gentleman's explanation—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It was not an explanation; it was a correction.

Mr. GORDON said he thought the remark made by the hon. gentleman in this particular was uncalled for. He had endeavoured to avoid personalities and personal affairs, and to deal with the subject on broad principles. He would reiterate that the large religious community of the Dominion had this matter at heart, and he was not satisfied, as mover of the resolutions, to withdraw unless the Government was prepared to accept the entire responsibility of this course.

Mr. CURRIER hoped the Government would not be induced to give the terms demanded of them. He regarded it as more advisable to let the boats go through the canals than to detain them, and give the boatmen an opportunity of visiting the groggeries along the shore. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Argenteuil respecting the Carillon and Grenville Canal, great inconvenience resulted from the adoption of the resolution of his predecessor preventing the vessels from going through the canal on Sunday; and if that were done now boats would accumulate at each end, and it would take all Monday and Tuesday before the canal would be clear at both ends. He was sure there was no one more desirous to see the Sabbath day kept holy than himself, but he could recognize the inconvenience and loss it would be to the public to adopt such a resolution as this.

lamity for this House to divide on a question of this kind and decide in the negative. He had listened carefully to the explanations of the Premier, and they were satisfactory to his mind. The hon. mover of this resolution having put his views so clearly before the House and brought out so many points that were excellent in themselves, should, after the assurance given by the Premier, withdraw his motion for the present. It was quite too late in our day to discuss the benefits arising from the Sabbath Day. Nations become great only in proportion as they observe it. Scotland is what she is to-day, chiefly because of the manner in which the Sabbath day is observed, and her sons wherever found are what they are chiefly from the way in which they have been taught to regard that day. There were many objections raised to this resolution, however, which he would hesitate to say were wrong. With regard to perishable goods passing through canals, he thought it would not be a sound thing to detain a cargo with the consciousness that detention might eventuate in loss. The mover of the resolution had spoken about the 3,000 employes of the post office that were kept away from places of worship on the Sabbath day. That should be rectified. He understood the Premier to say that any representations that might be made to the Government would be entertained. As one doing a large business—and he could speak for other business men—he had never taken a letter out of the post office on the Sabbath day, and he was sure he had lost nothing by it. He declared, and could prove it, that the man who devoted himself to secular matters on the Lord's Day was a fool and would live to find it out.

Mr. YOUNG joined in the hope that this motion would not be pressed to a division. From what the Premier had said, he took it the amount of work done on our public works was comparatively little, but he was aware that on many lines of railway a strong disposition had been manifested of late to pay no respect to the Sabbath Day. The Great Western of late had run a large number of freight trains on Sundays, and on the Wellington, Grey and Bruce, on which formerly it was a rare thing to see a train run the Seventh Day, there was now an average of four every Sabbath. However, he was satisfied with the Premier's explanations and assurances, and hoped the motion would be withdrawn.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) sympathized very much indeed with the position of the hon. member for North Ontario, who was actuated by the best motives. After the assurances of the Premier, however, that the influence of the Government would be used to secure a better observance of the Sabbath, he ought to be satisfied and withdraw the resolution.

Mr. GORDON said that in view of the general promise given by the Premier that the Government would do whatever was in their power to better this question, he would withdraw his motion for this time. In the event of this promise not being fulfilled, he would renew the agitation at a future Session.

The motion was withdrawn.

ST. CHARLES AND ST. JOSEPH DE LEVIS RAILROAD.

Mr. BLANCHET moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of any communication, report of engineers or other parties, relating to the construction of a Brunel Line of Railway from St. Charles, County of Bellechasse, to St. Joseph de Lévis. He said this was not the first time this question had been brought before the House. It had been discussed some years ago at the beginning of Confederation, when the Act was passed for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. The terminus of the latter road had been fixed at Riviere du Loup, but it was because the Grand Trunk had a branch to that place. Some years ago the engineers of the Grand Trunk Company surveyed and reported favourably upon the branch line from St. Charles to St. Joseph de Lévis. The cost was estimated at $200,000. The Grand Trunk would be ready to come to some arrangement with the Government for that part of their road from Riviere du Loup to Quebec, without which the Intercolonial Railway would be incomplete. In reply to the hon. member for Rimouski some time ago, the Premier had stated the Government had no fixed policy on the subject at the moment. He was sure when the Intercolonial was completed, the Government would see the necessity of doing something to secure for it the large traffic which would follow the construction of that branch, and which would save a distance of 25 miles. It was very important that the Government should take this matter into consideration. When the North Shore Railroad would be completed this branch would be a necessity.

Mr. FRECHETTE said he had also given a notice on this subject, but this of the hon. member from Bellechasse had precedence. The motion now before the House brought up a matter entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament.

His (Mr. Fréchette's) motives were to ascertain whether any step had been taken, or suggestion made by the hon. member for Bellechasse to induce the late Government to make this projected line of railway a continuation of the Intercolonial, and thus secure to Point Lévis the advantage of the terminus of this important road. In consequence of what he had heard on the hustings, the hon. gentleman would admit that his curiosity was quite natural. Viewed in that light, this line became national in lieu of a local enterprise, and fell within the purview of the House. He hoped that sooner or later, and the sooner the better, the Government would adopt this course, and that the Intercolonial would never be considered complete until it connected Quebec with the Maritime Provinces. He trusted that this would be done as soon as the financial position of the country would admit.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that there was little use in adopting the motion, inasmuch as there were no such reports, he believed, to be presented. He was not aware of any survey of that kind having been effected by the late Government. They were quite conscious of the importance of securing a short cut to the river from the Riviere du Loup Branch of the Grand Trunk, but at the same time other means at present existed of reaching the river, although by a route some nine or ten miles longer than that which the hon. gentleman proposed. This would probably have to be done, but they were not now desirous of expending more money than they could help on public works. They wished to avoid any expense not absolutely necessary, and therefore they did not propose to take any steps in building the branch line to which reference was made. While he freely admitted its desirability in the trade interests of the Lower Provinces, he would remark in the meantime a provisional arrangement with the Grand Trunk prevailed in this relation, advantageous and occasioning them no loss. He supposed that the hon. gentleman would drop the motion, as there were really no papers which could be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said that four or five years ago the hon. member for Bellechasse had spoken to him about this matter, and he had caused enquiry to be made. He entered into communication with the then Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, Mr. Brydges, and it was understood that a survey should be secured, and an exploration take place on this branch. Mr. Brydges thought that this would be important, as was also admitted by the Minister of Public Works. It took place, and plans were prepared. He did not know whether the latter and the report of the engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were now in the office of the Public Works Department, but they had existed, and some six or eight months ago the late Manager of the Grand Trunk had written to him to learn whether the plans or reports were in his possession, as they could not be found. He had answered that they were not, and that they must be in the Public Works Department. They might have been, however, destroyed when a portion of the Grand Trunk workshad been burned at Montreal. He assured the hon. gentleman that the motion was brought before and taken into consideration by the late Government. Of course the report and plans were not acted upon—they were made in 1873 if he was not mistaken—but the late Administration had been deeply impressed with the desirability of having the work in question performed.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Perhaps the Premier will allow my motion to be carried. In the meantime the papers may be discovered.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Oh! certainly.

The motion was carried.

THE SLATE INDUSTRY.

Mr. AYLMER moved for an Order of House for a return of roofing slate and other manufactured slate imported into Canada during the present year from the United States.

He thought that an explanation was due to the House; and at the same he trusted that he would succeed in enlisting their sympathy in favour of one of our struggling industries. As hon. members were probably aware we had large deposits of slate in almost every Province of the Dominion, though he was not aware that any of them, save in the Eastern Townships, and more particularly in his own constituency, had been developed to any extent. The band of slate in his constituency stretched from one portion of it to the boundary line; and for both quality and quantity, he presumed that it was unsurpassed by any in any part of the world. A large amount of capital, over $500,000 or $600,000, had been invested in this industry within the last few years, and a large number of men skilled in such work had been employed, the districts in the vicinity of the quarries being in consequence greatly benefitted. At present he was sorry to say this industry was almost strangled. At one time they hoped to make of this part of the Township a second Wales, but last year, probably owing to the great depression of trade, especially in the United States, American manufacturers of slate had turned their attention to Canada in order to rid themselves of their surplus stocks. As hon. members probably knew, we had a duty of 35 per cent. against our exportations of slate to the United States, while theirs entered our market free of duty. Until within the last few years our neighbours had probably a sufficient demand for their productions in this respect in their own country, for they had not interfered with our market; and our quarries obtained a ready sale for all they produced. The increase in the supply was gradual in proportion to the demand, and we had every prospect of doing well in this regard; but owing to the circumstance he had named, this was no longer the case, and our slate quarries were almost closed. The cost of slates would not be increased if the protection required was granted; and it was worthy of remark that the American slate was not as good as our own. This industry deserved encouragement at the hands of the Government, and he hoped the present condition of affairs would be completely rectified. The loss sustained was not represented wholly by the amount of capital lying idle, for the portion of the slate exposed to the action of the weather, while the works were closed, would become so deteriorated, that when they were reopened, it would have to be removed as waste material, at great loss and expense. Moreover, the question of labour was to be considered. Those engaged in the manufacture of slates were skilled workmen, and if kept long out of employment, would emigrate to secure work in the Vermont quarries, so that again we should, as in other instances, turn ourselves into immigration agents for the United States.

This industry was not like many of the interests for which protection was demanded. Coal was used as raw material by manufacturers of Ontario; the Maritime Provinces were opposed to the duty it was urged should be levied on salt, and a large portion of the population was desirous of seeing the protection of coal oil reduced; but a duty on slates would not conflict in any way whatever with the interests of the whole country. One other article on the free list he would place in the same category with slate—this was marble.

In the past year the importation of unmanufactured marble was $95,000, of unwrought stone and slate $101,000, of manufactured marble $82,000. The duty paid on this was some $14,000; and if the same amount of duty had been collected upon our slate and marble as was collected upon the manufactured marble, we would have had an addition to the revenue of $35,000. The Minister of the Interior in his late report had the following in regard to the exhibition of our natural productions at the Centennial Exhibition:—

“Amongst the specimens, which include samples of every useful mineral or mining product hitherto discovered or manufactured in Canada, the polished marbles, the building stones, the gold, silver, copper and iron with their ores may be mentioned as especially deserving notice. The marbles are represented by 60 polished slabs of 12 x 18 inches; the building stones by 70 six-inch cubes having one face polished, one rough and the others dressed to show four different styles of working; roofing slates and slabs, lithographic stone, refractory materials, grinding and polishing materials, mineral paints and manure, limes, cements, plasters, clays, bricks, pottery, petroleum, coal, lignite and peat are all well represented; also ornamental stones, mineral waters and salts.”

With natural productions such as these at our doors, some encouragement ought to be given for the working of the quarries. With regard to his principles he might say he was neither a Free-Trader nor a Protectionist, but the following passage from the speech of the Finance Minister defined his (Mr. Aylmer's) views on the tariff question:—

“We know that we must have a Customs tariff, and that it is impossible to have it without more or less granting protection to manufacturers; and although I do not believe in incidental protection, still I am willing that the tariff should be so distributed as to give an advantage to the particular classes of industry which will naturally grow up in the country.”

He thought slate was one of those natural industries which would grow up if the same protection was extended to it as to all other manufacturing interests of the country.

It might appear to hon. gentlemen as though he had been inconsistent by, at the present moment, making what would appear a protection speech, and having on previous occasions voted against the amendments of the hon. member for Montreal West and the right hon. member for Kingston; but he had been consistent as he could not vote want of confidence in a Ministry of whose general policy he approved, and from whose Customs tariff he considered the protection required for the country was derivable, as well as feeling that the agricultural community, especially in this part of the county, do not require any protection. In his own constituency they imported a large quantity of coarse grains for feeding purposes and did not advocate any tax being placed upon this their raw material, which, when turned into beef and dairy produce, and under which system their farms are improving and their farmers prospering. For such reasons he voted against both amendments, and the only protection he asked for was that the same measure shall be extended to our State industry as is already given to all the other manufacturing industries of the country. This was really fair, this was only just.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said there was no objection to the resolution passing, but the hon. gentleman would see from the return that there was no line indicating slate particularly, it was included with stone and marble. He would send for the returns from the principal ports, and try and give him the information as soon as possible.

Mr. AYLMER did not wish any great expense to be incurred. He would be satisfied if for the future the two items were kept separate.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said that had been done this year, and would appear in the next report.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might be interested to know that until within the last few months a particular class of slates could not be obtained in Canada, and had to be imported for the better class of buildings. That was the quality used making various figures on the roof. He doubted if it was known now throughout the Dominion that slates of all qualities can be obtained at our own quarries. With regard to marble, he found on examination nearly $50,000 was brought from Italy—a kind which could not be obtained on this continent—and the balance, between $60,000 and $70,000, was procured from the United States, a great portion being superior in its working qualities to what has been found in Canada. Although we have a great variety in this country it had not been worked to such an extent as to fairly develop the best qualities to be obtained, but he thought in a few years we would be able to produce marble quite as good and cheaper than any now obtained in Connecticut.

The motion was carried.

THE JESUIT BARRACKS.

Mr. MASSON moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a copy of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec, relating to the Jesuit Barracks in the City of Quebec, together with all memorandums and Orders in Council relating to the same. He said those who had visited Quebec would have observed an immense block in the upper part of the town, which looked like an old prison, was delapidated, gloomy and an eye-sore to all observers. The building had been condemned, but owing to a want of agreement between the Local and Federal Governments, nothing had been done in relation thereto. It had formerly been the Jesuits' College, formed part of the estate of the Society of Jesus, and had been for many years devoted to the higher branches of education. Ever since the dissolution of the Order in 1774 the building had been occupied by the Imperial troops under Royal instructions, and the whole of the Jesuits' Estate devoted to any purpose the Crown might think fit. It was known to every member in the House that the greater part of the property had been appropriated for educational purposes in the Province of Quebec. Up to 1831 numerous complaints were made that some part of the estate had been diverted from the purpose for which it was designed. In 1832 the circumstances culminated. The Legislature of Lower Canada sent a petition to England setting forth these facts. The answer was a dispatch from the Imperial Government appropriating all the estates belonging to the Jesuites at the time of the conquest, to the purposes of education.

The barracks alone were reserved, but they were reserved only temporarily. The Minister of Justice would bear him out that according to the dispatch the whole of the Jesuits' estates should go to educational purposes in Lower Canada, and that the barracks were reserved only temporarily, because they were occupied by Her Majesty's troops, as they would not put them to any inconvenience by taking them from them. This implied that as soon as the troops were withdrawn from Quebec this property would revert to Quebec for educational purposes. The rights of the Province of Quebec to these buildings had never been contested; they had been admitted under the old regime before 1841. It would be very easy to prove that since then under the Union by different resolutions of the House and by Acts of the Legislature these buildings were recognised as belonging to the educational fund, exclusively for the Province of Quebec. Since Confederation had been established it was easy to prove by Orders in Council and otherwise that it had been admitted that the change in our constitution did not take away from the Province of Quebec the rights which they had in these buildings. The despatch of Lord Goderich in 1832, stating that they were occupied only temporarily for the convenience of the troops, stood good at the present moment. In 1870 the troops were withdrawn from this country. In consequence of the withdrawal of these troops it was found necessary to transfer to the Dominion authorities, not the proprietary rights of the Imperial Government which did not exist, but the possession of those barracks. The transfer was made at the time at the request of the Imperial Parliament on the condition that the Dominion Government should provide barrack accommodation for the troops should they ever have to return to this country, thus implying that they were dispossessed of this barrack property. The buildings had been examined by engineers lately, and they were found to be little better than a ruin. Since the transfer of these properties to the Dominion Government there was a feeling in the Province of Quebec that as the buildings were no longer required for barrack purposes, they should be transferred to the Local Government. They made application for them several times, asking to be put in possession of the property. In answer to this application there was an Order in Council, passed in 1873, giving to the Local Government the possession and occupation of the barracks, the only condition being that they should be kept in repair until the formal question of title should be decided. Moreover, if he was rightly informed, that Order in Council requested that the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General should prepare a memorandum on the question, and interview each other on the point. The Local Government did do what they were required to do by the Order in Council; and finding that it was absolutely necessary for them to construct departmental buildings in Quebec, they renewed their application to this Government. It was not surprising that they were anxious on the subject, as they had had no place for the safe keeping of the valuable documents in their possession, and they did all in their power to obtain speedy possession of the building. Under the conviction that the barracks property would be transferred, plans were made for the new buildings, and tenders were called for. Notification was given to the Federal Government; but the answer was that nothing could be done, and no further action could be taken by the Local Government. The people felt that there was a denial of their rights, and the Local Government were accused of being negligent of their duty—that they were not doing all in their power to secure the construction of the buildings. They were embarrassed, and that embarrassment came from the Federal Government. Some political capital had been made out of it; they had tried to ruin the Local Government in Quebec by making it appear that they had been recreant to their duty, and some went so far as to say if a better Government existed in the Province the claims of Québec would have a better chance of redress. He did not believe this, but if it ever entered into the minds of the friends of this Government that there would be a change in the Administration in Quebec they might abandon that hope as they were finally established. He would be answered that the difficulty was the title. He could not understand how a question of title to the Jesuit's Barracks could have caused delay from the fall of 1873 up to the present moment. If it was a property acquired from a private individual and the title deeds were lost he could understand the delay, but this title came from the proclamation of the Imperial Government and it did not take two years to confirm such a title. This was a question of vital importance to the people of the Province of Quebec, who were expecting the transfer of these buildings, which were useless to the Imperial Government and did not belong to the Federal Government. He thought if there were any guilty parties in this matter it was time the country should know it. That was the reason why he had moved this motion, and he hoped the papers would show the reasons why these buildings were not transferred to the Local Government, and why it was that the Local Government were not able to take possession of the Government property and erect new buildings in the Province.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection to the motion passing. His hon. friend from Terrebonne had chosen to assume, with his usual charity, that the only object the Government of the Dominion had in not at once making over this property to the Local Government, was with the hope that they might make some political capital out of it, and he appealed to them to-night, now that the Local Government were so firmly established that there was no hope of overthrowing them by anything that this Government could do, that they should now do them justice. He was sorry that the hon. member should be so uncharitable in his remarks towards them. He assured the hon. gentleman that this Government would from no consideration whatever abstain from doing an act of justice merely because the Local Government happened to be at variance with them. They had nothing to do with the Local Government; they had never interfered with the Local Government, and they had no reason to interfere with them; but there was a question in connection with the title to the property, and the question must necessarily have to be investigated before a decision could be arrived at. On the occasion of the calamity by fire at Quebec all the public buildings in the city had been placed at their disposal, and they had been occupied by the Local Government to this day. So instead of making any complaint the Government of Quebec ought to feel that the Government had endeavoured to act in the most friendly manner to them, and had done their best to expedite the public business in that Province in that and all other matters. With regard to the papers, he was not sure that they all could be brought down, but such as it was in the public interest to bring down would be, and the hon. gentleman would find that he was entirely mistaken in attributing evil motives to the Government in relation to that property.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN hoped that when these papers were brought down they would see the matter had been so advanced that the Federal Government would be in a position to transfer that property to the Quebec Government. It was very important that that property should be transferred, and surely the title between the Imperial Government and the Federal Government could not be in the way of the transfer. It would be a great boon to the Province of Quebec if that transfer took place without any long delay. The Quebec Government were ready to erect the new Parliamentary and Departmental Buildings. They were only awaiting for the transfer of the property to give contracts and then proceed with an important work, the construction of which would be a great boon to the labouring classes in Quebec. We might add that the Minister of Public Works was in error in stating that the hon. member for Terrebonne had said that this matter had been used by the Federal Government to make political capital out of it. His hon. friend had only stated that the Liberal candidates had used that question as a weapon against their opponents, which was the fact.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said if any capital was made out of this subject it had been made by the local candidates. He thought that if the Local Government desired to give any work to the artisans of Quebec, they might do so by the erection of the Court House which was burned down a few years ago. They had transferred the Court House to the Hospital, and those who had occasion to attend the Courts were exposed to the risk of diseases from the Hospital. The money had been voted for a Court House, and if the local authorities were desirous of giving the people work they could do so. With regard to the question of title to this property they had nothing to do—it was a question of law. The question as to whether these Parliament Buildings should be built there or further west of the St. Louis Gate was one for the Quebec authorities to settle. He was of opinion that this site was a more valuable one than that which was now occupied by the old barracks, and he was satisfied that it would give better satisfaction to the public.

Mr. BABY did not consider that the site of the new Parliament Buildings was a matter for the consideration of this Parliament. The question for them to consider was, should they give that property to the Local Government which belonged to the Local Government? That was the question, and he hoped the hon. gentleman would look into it, as he believed it would be better for the Local Government to build their Parliamentary Buildings on that lot.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said that it was now three years ago since the Court of Justice was transferred to the building where it then was; and there were a good many members of the House who practiced in that Court, but he could not see in what way they are now the worse for the change. As far as the site for the construction of the Provincial Buildings was concerned, it had nothing to do with the question before the House. The question was were the Federal Government ready to render justice to the Local Government? It was now one year since the former Government had made application for this building and as yet no decision had been arrived at. He could not see why it should take long to come to a decision in regard to this matter. The fault did not lie with the Local Government, but with the Federal Government, which was not always disposed to render justice to Quebec.

Mr. MASSON said he had received no kind of answer or encouragement from the Hon. Premier. The hon. gentleman had not told them why this property had not yet been transferred, and he did not say whether he would be able to bring down the whole correspondence. He thought the House was entitled to hear something from the Government with regard to this important question.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was sorry that the hon. gentleman was so difficult to satisfy, and also that his hon. friend the member for Bellechasse had spoken as he had. He seemed unable to say anything without attributing to the Government a desire not to do justice to Quebec. Anyone who knew anything of the facts in this matter, knew there had been nothing like a desire to do injustice to Quebec or any other Province.

On the contrary, they had avoided the very appearance of doing anything that could by implication be understood as interfering in any way whatever in the affairs of any Local Government. With regard to the particular matter in hand, he would not give an opinion, and if the hon. gentleman's idea was to elicit a legal opinion from him (Mr. Mackenzie) on a matter of this sort, he made a great mistake. Even if the Government of the Dominion held absolutely this or any other property, they would be bound to consider any representation made to them by the Quebec Government in regard to the location of public buildings and that Government would be equally bound in the same honourable way to consider any representations made by the Dominion Ministry if they desired to obtain some property held by the Province in order to accomplish some federal purpose. In that spirit this Government had sought to conduct the affairs of the country; in that spirit they would deal with every other matter with the Province of Quebec as with other Provinces, and he hoped they would do it in such a way as to convince the public, if not the hon. gentleman, that they were not actuated by the motives attributed to them.

Mr. MASSON said he did not ask for a legal decision, but the Hon. Premier had not even said there was a legal question.

Mr. CASGRAIN said the title to that property might not be quite so clear as the hon. member for Terrebonne seemed to think it was. If he would look over the long and elaborate memorandum of Baron Mazerés he would see how far the Local, or even the Imperial Government, had a just title to these properties. There were some parts of these properties which had been given by private donors for purposes of education. He did not think when these properties became vested in the Crown, such parts of them as had been given to the Jesuits by private donors could be held in the same way as the rest. When the last of these Jesuits died, he made a will in favour of the then Bishop of Quebec, and as far as the title of the property could be thus transferred, a question of law might arise as to how far it affected the right of the Crown to the property. It was true when the Commissioners were appointed to regulate and settle the Jesuits estates, they notified the heirs of original donors of the property, but how far this had been done he could not say. It was also a question how far under our Municipal Law the Crown inherited the estates of the Jesuits. All these points he supposed would have to be submitted to the Minister of Justice when the property was to be transferred to the Government of Quebec, if ever a transfer was made.

The motion was carried.

THE PLIMSOLL MOVEMENT.

Mr. PALMER moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:— That in the opinion of this House the right of Legislation to affect Canadian ships and the rights and liabilities of the owners thereof belong exclusively to the Parliament of Canada, and that any Legislation on those subjects by the Imperial Parliament (except so far as may equally affect Canadian ships with the ships of all other countries in ports of Great Britain, and such as may affect Imperial interests) would be inconsistent with such exclusive right of the Canadian Parliament, and a violation of responsible Government as conceded to Canada. He said it could not be denied that recent Imperial Legislation in England had materially injured the interests of Canadian ship-owners. It could not be denied that it was immensely in the interest of Canada that the largest amount of capital should be invested in the shipping trade, which was so important to a nation. It would ill become persons who were descendants of the British race to deny that the mother country rose to its present eminence almost entirely because it was mistress of the seas. He believed Canada stood in a much more favourable position to become the great ship-owning country of the world than ever Great Britain did. In fact Canada to-day exceeds every other country in comparison with the number of its inhabitants in the extent of her shipping interest. Representing, as he did, the largest ship-owning community in the Dominion, he felt bound to assist as far as he could the forwarding of that great industry. The proposition before the House denied the right of the Imperial Parliament to deal with subjects they have legislated upon. It was entirely inconsistent that two bodies should have power to legislate on the same subject. It would be very much better to have the jurisdiction vested in one, because with two, inconsistent provisions necessarily follow. What might be declared the law under one system might be declared not to be the law under the other. If he could prove that the Imperial Parliament had given Canada the right to legislate on certain subjects, it would show that they had deprived themselves by that Act of the power of legislating on the same subject. He did not deny, so long as we were a portion of the empire, that in mere point of law the Imperial Parliament had the power to pass a law affecting our shipping. He did not deny the right of the Imperial Parliament to legislate with reference to our ships in their own ports. He had never argued that they had not that right. On the contrary, he claimed the right of Canada to legislate as did England in her own ports, affecting not only her own shipping, but that of her own colonies and of every foreign country. His resolutions on this point stated clearly that the prerogative of the Imperial Government was, and ought to be, confined to the general legislation. He would not go over the argument he adduced the other evening, but simply state his proposition that this Parliament had the exclusive right of legislation with reference to Canadian shipping; and this right had been distinctly recognized by England. A Canadian ship on the high seas was exclusively under Canadian jurisdiction; this he contended was a simple rule of international law, which must apply to the different limits of legislation between England and her colonies, and entirely consistent with the dependence of the latter on the former. It was of course regulated by the terms of the British North America Act and of despatches that might have passed. It had been objected, that if we did not allow the Imperial Government to legislate respecting Canadian ships outside the ports of Great Britain, we would be obliged to send Consuls and vice-Consuls and agents to the ports of all countries to protect Canadian industries; but in this difficulty he did not see the slightest weight. The Canadian, under such circumstances, would not less be a British subject; and he would enjoy the same rights as if the Dominion was a Crown colony. The regulation in question would only exist as between England and her colonies, with which foreign nations would have nothing to do; we would still have the privilege of flying the Old Flag, and rather than lose this dearly prized right, he was sure that many a man would rather revert to the condition of a Crown colony. He thought that England would be glad to get rid of the trouble of governing us in this relation; the people of Great Britain had no other desire than to see us prosper in every way; they could not tell what was for our own good, and would prefer to let us work out our own destiny. No distinction could properly be drawn between a ship, any other piece of property, or a person with regard to the right of nationality. He hoped that this would always be so, and that we would ever possess the glorious rights of Britons and British subjects. The Consuls appointed by the Imperial Government represented British interests wherever they were stationed, and consequently he could not perceive the slightest foundation for the difficulty in question, which was by some suggested. It did not matter to foreign countries whether regulations which concerned us were made by England or ourselves, and consequently the presumed obstacle to freedom of action on our part was merely a bugbear. If we were allowed to govern ourselves—or, as a celebrated statesman had remarked, to misgovern ourselves—he held that we should be able to do so regarding our shipping interests; and the moment that this right was fully recognized, that moment an impetus would be given to ship-building in Canada, which would surprise, he believed, many foreign countries. He was satisfied that this was not retarded so much by any legislation on the part of England, or by anything it threatened to do in this respect as by the fear of what might be done. No man was willing to put money in property when he did not know what would become of it; and this uncertainty prevented such investment. Then this protection was afforded by the Act of 1854:—The owner not himself in default, was not liable for any damage done to any further extent than £15 per ton; and this sum, by amendment introduced in 1862, was reduced to £8. What was now proposed? To make this liability under certain circumstances unlimited. And what would be the result? No person would dare to invest his money in a ship unless he himself took charge of it, since those having control of it might wilfully commit some injury that might utterly ruin such owner, himself innocent of any complicity whatever in the matter. Would this not affect the right of Canadian ship-owners? It would certainly do so, for if such legislation did not concern Canadian interests he could not imagine what could. It might be good policy, but it was a matter in connection with which the ship-owners of this country ought to have a voice.

Mr. MASSON.

He had carefully excepted in his resolution the rights of the Imperial Parliament in legislating with regard to the ports of Great Britain and legislation that might affect Imperial interests, but he did not know that this was necessary, because it was probably amply secured through the right of veto.

The privileges in question once secured, we would enter into the struggle for supremacy and to obtain the carrying trade of the world, with just such restrictions as we chose to place on our tonnage. Under such conditions he did not hesitate to affirm that we would be able to outstrip all other nations in this particular industry, if not in connection with anything else. He did not cast the slightest reflections on the Government. He thought that they had done all they could in this relation, being actuated by a sincere desire to benefit the country as far as was in their power, his sole object being to assist them in attaining this desirable end; and he felt that until such privileges as he had mentioned were obtained, their efforts in this direction would be impeded. If it could be pointed out to him that what he proposed would in any way at all injure, instead of helping them in this relation, they would find him most willing to take any course to aid them in any possible direction which had in view the accomplishment of what was desirable in the interests of all parts of the country, and what the people of the section from which he came felt was absolutely necessary to ensure the prosperity of the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had listened to the hon. gentleman's remarks on this subject with great pleasure. He did not suppose there was a very serious difference between the hon. gentleman's views and his own as to the desire to assert and maintain the right this Parliament had to legislate on certain subjects. He did not think it desirable that the question now before the House should at the present time be discussed at any length, or that it was wise for this House to pass strong resolutions asserting a principle upon which there might be some difference of opinion with the Imperial Government. The British Parliament had the Shipping Bill under consideration at present, and the Canadian Government were in correspondence with the Imperial authorities on the subject. He put it to the hon. gentleman if he did not think it was wiser to avoid pressing the matter upon the attention of the House. He might depend upon it the views he had enunciated now and on previous occasions would be thoroughly represented, and every effort made to have the Shipping Bill placed on such a footing as would be satisfactory to this country and other parts of the empire. We must remember that the British Agents look after our shipping in foreign ports, and we must take care in asserting our independence of Imperial legislation we do not throw ourselves outside the pale of that protection it must have in foreign countries. We are not in a position to defend our own shipping. That is done by the Mother Country, and we must not seek to put our own shipping in a more favourable position than that of the Mother Country. As far as we could accomplish the placing of our own shipping on the best possible footing, and maintain that intimate relationship with the Imperial Government that was absolutely natural from a moral as well as a business point of view, this Government would do it, and he asked the hon. gentleman to withdraw his resolution and leave the matter in the hands of the Administration.

Mr. PALMER thanked the First Minister for the manner in which he had treated the question; he was quite willing to be guided by what the hon. gentleman had said, as he would be advocating his own cause very badly if he did not do exactly as the hon. gentleman suggested. He would like the hon. gentleman to state, however, if he did not think that it was the duty of the British Government to protect all Canadians.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Certainly.

Mr. PALMER stated that the Imperial Government protected our shipping, and that we were quite willing, if necessary, to sacrifice ourselves on behalf of the Mother Country at any moment.

Mr. MILLS wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that a vessel upon the lakes, where the Canadian Government exercised the sole right of legislation, when she sailed from a Canadian to an American port, was as much in a foreign country as if she had sailed from St. John or Halifax to Lisbon, or some other foreign port. There was no greater impropriety in asserting the right of legislating for ships sailing on the sea, than for those sailing on the lakes.

Mr. GOUDGE, as a representative of a constituency largely engaged in shipbuilding, desired to thank the Premier for the statement which the hon. gentleman had made that night, as it would go very far towards reassuring the ship-owning and ship-building community of the Maritime Provinces, perceiving that the Government had this matter so thoroughly and so completely under their consideration. He assured the House that the subject of taking the matter of legislation with regard to shipping into their own hands, had engaged the attention of some of their largest ship-owners; and while this might involve some difficulties, and although certain benefits were to be derived from connection with the Empire, particularly when our ships went abroad, nevertheless, the difficulties connected with the legislation of the Imperial Government under the Plimsoll Bill, so-called, became a matter of such serious importance to our ship-owners that they were even willing rather to sacrifice these benefits rather than suffer to the extent which might yet become inevitable under existing circumstances. He was happy to observe that the Government were in communication with the British Government touching this subject, and to learn that the rights of Colonial ship-owners would be so thoroughly considered that they would not suffer in any respect in this relation.

The motion was withdrawn.

The House adjourned at Thirty five minutes past Eleven o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

THE CASE OF JUDGE LORANGER.

On the motion to receive the petition against Judge Loranger,

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said there could be no doubt unless the petitioners withdrew it or the House decided unanimously not to hear it, the petition must be read, unless it contained something of a character which rendered that course improper. In the case of Chief Justice Duval the petition contained expressions which should not be read, and it was withdrawn. A similar course was pursued in the cases of Justices Drummond and Badgley. He merely mentioned these as analogous to the case before the House. There were, however, schedules to this petition against Judge Loranger which would prevent its reception independent of any other cause.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said his attention had not been directed to the technical point with reference to the schedules. On the general question as to whether the petition could be read and received, of course the hon. member had practically conceded there could be no objection. The hon. gentleman had referred to other petitions which, having been withdrawn, the House was not possessed of. There was, however, one petition which had been received and acted upon at two Sessions, having been referred to a Committee of which the hon. member for Cardwell was Chairman. The prayer of that petition was practically the same as this. There had been a recent discussion in the Imperial House of Commons on a petition against the Lord Chief Justice and two other Judges, which contained the strongest possible charges against them and prayed for their removal. It also contained, however, references to language used in the House of Commons, and on that ground, and that alone, was rejected. It seemed to him it was impossible for this House to do otherwise than receive this petition, apart from the technical objection with regard to the schedules.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not know whether it was his official duty to examine the schedules attached to the petition or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD remarked that the practice in England was exceptional, as examiners there looked over petitions, which duty was supposed to be done here by the Speaker, who was responsible as far as knowing what was in the petition was concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER observed that there was a difference between reading and receiving petitions; this was the point at issue. The ordinary reading merely comprised the recital of the prayer of the petition and the name of the petitioner by the Clerk; and when he declared that a petition could not be received, he or somebody was supposed to have read it. Whether at this stage it was within his competence to do so, he was really not prepared to say.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—The reading is the necessary preliminary to the reception. We must know what is in it before we determine whether we will receive it.

Mr. SPEAKER—The question being altogether technical, I am bound to consider technicalities.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) stated that the authorities clearly ruled that a petition with affidavits, appendices or any other documents, attached, could not be received.

Mr. SPEAKER—The only question that arises, is whether I should not have knowledge or cognizance of the fact that there is anything attached to it.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell)—I leave that altogether to yourself.

Mr. SPEAKER—None of the ordinary rules make the Speaker examine the petition, that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Let it be taken as read.

Mr. SPEAKER—This should not be the case unless its reading is moved.

The petition, which charged Mr. Justice Loranger with gross partiality and injustice, being read

Mr. SPEAKER stated that it was now for the House to determine whether, in a matter of such gravity, the petitioner should not be allowed to detach from the petition what seemed to be appendices within the meaning of the law; he thought that cases existed where such permission had been given.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) doubted whether this could be done;

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

he considered that the schedule was one of the most material parts of the petition.

Mr. SPEAKER observed that this was a matter resting entirely with the House.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell)—The petition is either regular or irregular.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The petitioner, it appears, states in the body of the petition that he desires to establish his charges against Mr. Justice Loranger by certain schedules attached.

Mr. SPEAKER—The schedules contain the details of the case, the charge is substantially in the body of the petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Then the petition must fall to the ground?

Mr. SPEAKER—The details are specified in the statement, A. B., annexed.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I think it important that the ground for your ruling should appear.

Mr. SPEAKER—The reception of the petition is refused on the ground that appendices are attached to it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton), previous to the Order of the Day being called, rose to make a personal explanation connected with a statement which had appeared in a newspaper over the signature of a member of the House. It was to this effect, touching the transfer of the Pictou and Truro Branch of the Intercolonial Railway to the Local Government, with a view to the extension of the line eastward:—

"I have done all that could be done, and have stood alone for the extension. Had it not been for me even its name would not have been mentioned.

(Signed), "N. L. MACKAY."

His explanation was this:—When this question was before the House he stated distinctly from his place that he was opposed to the transfer of this road by the Administration to the Local Government, unless with the condition that the road should be extended all the way to Louisburg; that it would be unjust, particularly to the county of Cape Breton, which he represented, if the transfer were made with the view of having the road merely extended to the Strait of Canso; that the impression prevailed in his county that the Hon. Premier had during the past year resisted a good deal of pressure intended to induce him to consent to such limited extension, and that the hon. gentleman had obtained more credit for this in Cape Breton than for any other of his acts since his accession to office; that the transfer would be unjust to his constituency, particularly because it at present owned a large portion of the road the Dominion Government proposed so to be transferred, and that if it was only extended to the Strait of Canso this would be of slight importance to the county he represented. He might also state that if his hon. colleague had not placed a notice on the paper asking for the correspondence touching this matter, he would have done so himself.

Mr. MACKAY—I was about to speak when the Speaker said I was out of order.

THE SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT OF CANADA.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the third reading of the Bill to make further provision in regard to the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court of Canada. He said he had considered the suggestion of the hon. member for Montmagny, but had not thought it advisable to make any alteration in the Bill in regard to the quorum or the appointment of ad hoc Judges.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE INLAND REVENUE.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the House went into Committee on the Bill from the Senate to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue.

The Committee reported the Bill without amendment, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN LEGISLATION.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved the House in to Committee of the Whole on the Bill to amend and consolidate the laws respecting Indians.

The first and second clauses were adopted without amendment.

On clause 3,

Mr. PATERSON suggested that the word "male" be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it made no difference, because when an Indian man married a white woman she became a member of the band, but when an Indian woman married a white man, her children did not share in the lands.

Mr. PATERSON doubted if it was wise to impose a penalty on an Indian woman for marrying a white man. He contended it would be a benefit to the country to encourage such intermarriages.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said there was a great deal of force in the remarks of the hon. member, and an endeavour was made in another sub-section to meet the objection. It was proposed to allow an Indian woman who married a white man to retain her annuity moneys during her life time, and if she wished to receive the capital sum, she could do so by drawing ten years' purchase of annuity money. Of course she and her husband would then cease to have any connection with the band, and their children would not be considered.

The sub-section was passed.

On sub-section B, which was as follows:—Provided that any Indian having for five years resided principally in a foreign country, or having for a like period very rarely resided with or visited the band to which he or she belonged, shall cease to be a member thereof, and shall not be permitted to become again a member thereof, or of any other band, unless the consent of the band with the approval of the Superintendent General or his agent, be first had and obtained; but this provision shall not apply to any missionary, teacher or interpreter, while discharging his or her duty as such.

Mr. SCRIVER objected to any member of a band being thus deprived of his annuity.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained in some cases Indians went to the United States and shared the annuities there, only returning to Canada long enough to draw their annuities here.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD objected to this proposition, which would have the effect of dealing with the Indians as serfs of the soil.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said they should belong to one country or the other.

Mr. BORRON contended that it would be an arbitrary exercise of power to deprive Indians of their birth-right because they spent a portion of their time in another country, where, perhaps, they found it most convenient and profitable to reside and work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD quite understood that it would be convenient for the department to have such an arrangement as this; and that the Indians would approve of it, because the fewer there were in a band the more its members would receive; still, it was their birth-right, and they should not be deprived of it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE reminded the House that many of our Indians were adopted into United States tribes, while Indians from that country were adopted into bands in this country. There was a sort of reciprocity among the tribes in this respect.

Mr. PATERSON said our Indians had a perfect right to adopt any number of outsiders they pleased. Their money was their own, and they could do what they pleased with it. Every inducement should be offered to the Indians to leave their reserves and mix with the whites. He suggested, therefore, this sub-section should be dropped out altogether.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said in the North-West, the Blackfeet Indians roam on both sides of the boundary line, and it was very possible some of them would have to be received into our treaties, and some into the treaties of the United States. He did not think any Indian entitled to receive annuities on the other side of the line should have the same right here. The clause was therefore necessary.

Mr. PATERSON remarked that it was not a question of dealing with our money. If it did, there might be some reason for directing that if an Indian went into a foreign country he should not share in it; but on the contrary, this legislation would deprive such Indians of the enjoyment of their own money. This money, at all events, belonged to the Indians in his (Mr. P's.) own country, who had never received a cent from us. Their affairs were administered by the Government, and he could not really see the justice, under the circumstances, of taking from them their own money.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—We do not let them use their money as they wish.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—But you have not the right to take it away from them.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—We do not take it away.

Mr. FLEMING thought it strange that Indians should be prohibited from obtaining land in the North-West, when the most ignorant and illiterate immigrant could enjoy that pre-emption right.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It will be more convenient to discuss that matter when we come to the clause in question.

Mr. FLEMING—I allude to this clause.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) stated that the wording of the clause was perfectly clear. Indians were precluded from the enjoyment of such a right after an absence of five years, but yet not entirely, as it could be restored with the consent of the Superintendent and of the band as well.

Sir. JOHN A. MACDONALD—They will not consent to give up their own money.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—After an absence of five years an Indian is not reputed to belong to a band, but in our experience, when an Indian returns and really wishes to live with the band again, he is generally received with open arms.

Mr. BOWELL—I understand that this clause is to stand.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—Yes.

Mr. BOWELL—I also understand that the words "professional man" are to be added after the word "interpreter."

Hon. Mr. LAIRD.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—Yes; that will be one amendment.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Clause D,—Provided that any Indian woman marrying any other than an Indian or a non-treaty Indian shall cease to be an Indian in any respect within the meaning of this Act, except that she shall be entitled to share equally with the members of the Band to which she formerly belonged in the annual or semi-annual distribution of their annuities, interest moneys and rents; but this income may be commuted to her at any time at ten years' purchase, with the consent of the Band, being taken up, Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN enquired if this was at present the law?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that it was not at present. Any Indian woman marrying a white man was entirely cut off from her former rights. This amendment was added at the request of the Indians, who were greatly pleased with it.

The clause was then adopted.

Clause E provided also that no half-breed in Manitoba who has shared in the distribution of half-breed lands shall be accounted an Indian; and that no half-breed head of a family (except the widow of an Indian, or a half-breed who has already been admitted into a treaty), shall, unless under very special circumstances, to be determined by the Superintendent General or his agent, be accounted an Indian, or entitled to be admitted into any Indian treaty, being taken up,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained, in reply to the Hon. Mr. Langevin, that the reason for introducing this provision was this:—Persons of mixed blood had desired to join in the benefits of treaties made, and had attained their object, receiving their annuities annually. Lands had been given to the half-breeds in order to extinguish their titles.

Sub-sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and section 4 were adopted without discussion.

Section 5—“The Superintendent General may authorize surveys, plans and reports to be made of any reserve for Indians, showing and distinguishing the improved lands, the forests and lands fit for settlement, and such other information as may be required; and may authorize that the whole or any portion of a reserve be sub-divided into lots,” being taken up,

In reply to Mr. Paterson, the Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated they would be only too ready to authorize surveys, when these were desired by the Indians.

Mr. PATERSON remarked that a large minority might be opposed to this proceeding, and the Superintendent General might feel a delicacy about doing so, under such circumstances, whereas if the latter had simply to carry out provisions of law, he would relieve himself of any possible odium.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—We might, however, require surveys for central locations, and disputes might arise between Indians on the reserves, necessitating the ordering of surveys being made on our part.

Mr. FLEMING said he was of opinion that before any steps were taken towards the enfranchisement of the Indians, that the clause should be amended as follows:—“That whenever the majority of the male members of a band, of the full age of twenty-one years, assembled at a meeting or council thereof, summoned for that purpose according to their rules, and held in the presence of the Superintendent General or his agent, shall decide upon having the whole or any portion of their reserves subdivided into lots and held by them in severalty, the Superintendent General may authorize surveys, plans and reports to be made, showing and distinguishing the improved lands, the forests and lands fit for settlement, and such other information as may be required.”

Mr. PATERSON was unable to agree with his worthy friend in this matter. He had no objection to the clause being added, but to take the power from the Superintendent General and rest it in the band alone he did not think was desirable.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD objected to the amendment on the ground that what the hon. gentleman asked for was in the enfranchisement clauses.

Mr. BANNATYNE said that some Indians in Manitoba had sold land to settlers in good faith, and there seemed to be a difficulty as to the titles of the land on which no improvements had been made. He thought something ought to be done in regard to the matter before the clause was passed.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) thought it was only fair that something should be done to legalize these sales.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said this would be opening up a wide field. If they admitted the right of giving titles to the Indians, they would probably find the whole North-West in the hands of other persons. He found in an old proclamation of the British Government that purchases of lands from Indians were strictly forbidden. It was understood that Indians could not dispose of land except by treaty to the Crown. If an Indian occupied a piece of land outside a reserve, although he was allowed to enjoy the results of his improvements he had no right to sell the property.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said this land had been given to these Indians by Lord Selkirk for services rendered. The lands were situated below Sugar Point, and permission was granted the chief at the time the lands were given to the band.

Mr. BANNATYNE reiterated the statement.

Mr. FLEMING was willing to withdraw the amendment, but he regarded it as an essential one.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD again called the attention to the fact, that what the hon. gentleman desired was provided for in the Enfranchisement Clauses.

The clause was adopted.

On Clause 6,

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he thought it would be a great hardship to deprive some Indians of their acquired rights as would be the case by this clause. Some Indians had bought lands from others.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said that such a purchase was illegal.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN thought that they should do something more than merely pay those Indians for the improvement of those lands in which they had acquired right.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD.

The clause was adopted.

On the 10th clause,

Mr. SCHULTZ said there were some men in the North-West who were almost pure whites, who had taken treaty money under the belief that they would not thereby be placed in the position of Indians. He believed they should not be so classed.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD thought they were in a better position to have their lands as they were, protected by the Government.

Mr. SCHULTZ said these men were not Indians and it would be a hardship to give them no opportunity to withdraw from this treaty.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD reminded the hon. gentleman that they could have withdrawn under the Act of 1874. Those who did not choose to withdraw had to be treated as Indians. He did not see why half-breeds in Manitoba should be treated differently from half-breeds in other Provinces.

Mr. RYAN said there were some Indians of the North-West who cultivated lands and who were not allowed to participate in the treaty moneys. They were not very numerous and they should be encouraged. They should either be allowed to share in the treaty money or in the half-breed lands.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said Indians who were not half-breeds were always allowed to come into the treaties, and some who had lately come in were even given back pay. There was therefore no ground of complaint on that score.

Mr. RYAN expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the explanation.

The Committee rose and reported progress.

At Six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that the House go into Committee of supply.

Mr. DE COSMOS, in amendment, moved that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be

"Resolved: That in 1871 the public faith and honour of Canada was pledged in the most solemn manner to British Columbia 'to secure the commencement, simultaneously, within two years from the date of Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as might be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of Union.'

"That owing to divers causes the construction of the said railway was not commenced in British Columbia or elsewhere at the time agreed upon.

"That in 1874 the Government of Canada applied for to British Columbia and afterward secured and accepted, through the intervention and upon the recommendation of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, an agreement for the relaxation of the railway clauses of the terms of Union; and the public faith and honour of Canada now stand pledged to carry the said agreement respecting the said relaxation of the Railway clause of the terms of Union, forthwith into operation.

"That notwithstanding the public faith and honour of Canada stand twice solemnly pledged to construct the said railway and commence the actual construction thereof in British Columbia and elsewhere, and notwithstanding nearly five years have passed since the date of Union, and nearly three years have elapsed from the date at which Canada agreed first that the actual construction should be commenced, and nearly eighteen months since she agreed the second time to commence the construction, yet the Government have not, up to the present moment, commenced the actual construction of the said railway in the said Province.

"That, therefore, this House is of the opinion that the Government should forthwith promptly commence and vigorously and continuously prosecute the work of the actual construction of the said railway within British Columbia in accordance with its solemn pledges to that Province."

He said he had no wish to discuss the question if the Government would let the resolution pass. He saw, however, they were unwilling to do so, and he would, therefore, proceed to address the House. On the 1st of April, 1871, an Address to Her Majesty passed this House providing for the Union of the Dominion of Canada with British Columbia, and on the 5th of the same month it passed the Senate, British Columbia having passed its Address sometime in January, 1871. The two Addresses were then beyond the control of this Parliament or the legislation of that Province. In accordance with the 146th section of the Union Act, an Order of the Governor in Council was passed uniting British Columbia to the Dominion. It had been alleged by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House that a certain resolution which passed the House of Commons on the 11th of April, 1871, must be considered part and parcel of the terms of Union with British Columbia. Now, if the House of Commons could by any possible action of its own import a new condition into the terms of Union without the assent of British Columbia or Her Majesty's Government, or even without notifying either of them, they could do the same to-day, and if Canada, as one of the contracting parties to the treaty, could so make new terms and conditions, the Legislature of British Columbia could upon its own motion and without the assent of any of the parties to the contract, do likewise and expect the Dominion to carry out the new terms. He wished to remove from the minds of the hon. gentlemen in this Parliament and throughout this country the idea that the resolution passed in the House on the 11th of April, 1871, could be construed to be of more vital force or effect than this—that it was a scheme prepared by the then existing Government to construct and operate a railroad from the Pacific Ocean to the railway system of Canada.

He defied the Minister of Justice, his (Mr. Blake's) leader, or any of his party, by any principle of logic or any sound rule of interpretation of Statutes, or by any rule of ordinary common sense, to import that resolution into the terms of Union. He threw down the challenge to the hon. gentlemen or to any one in this respect. Having said this he left the subject where it was, but if any one did affirm that the delegate from British Columbia, Gov. Trutch, assented to this resolution, he could inform him that he had the authority of that gentleman to state that in the first place he was not authorized to interfere with the terms of Union, and that in the next place his mission had no relation to any such interference. He would read from the despatches, to remove from the brain of the Minister of Justice a part of the vapour clouds floating through it. Hon. members were to bear in mind that sometime in January, 1871, British Columbia passed the Address for the Union; on the 1st of April it was passed in this House; on the 5th of April it passed the Upper House; and on the 11th of April that resolution was adopted by this House. It was alleged that Gov. Trutch, then on a visit here, assented to the resolution as to be considered henceforth a part of the terms. He quoted from Volume 4, Sessional Paper No. 4, Paper 18, 1875.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
BRITISH COLUMBIA, Jan. 23rd, 1871.

“MY LORD.—I have the honour to forward for the information of your Lordship's advisers, printed copies of the Address to the Queen, which has been passed by the unanimous vote of the Legislative Council, praying that Her Majesty will be pleased under the provisions of the 146 section of the British North America Act, to admit British Columbia into the Dominion of Canada on the basis of the terms and conditions offered to this colony by the Government of the Dominion of Canada therein set forth.”

This was not then on the basis of a resolution passed on the 11th of April, after the Address had been adopted by the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia.

“Gov. Trutch, who is already known to your Lordship as one of the delegates who conferred with them on this subject last year, will proceed to Ottawa next month for the purpose of affording any details or information which may be required during the passage of the corresponding Address through the Canada Parliament.”

It was not an Address then different from that of British Columbia, but a corresponding Address. Gov. Trutch was empowered merely to confer as to details, and not as to changing any condition of the terms of Union; and also to adjust such matters of arrangement between the two Governments as might have been necessary before the declaration of Union. He would state one of the details:—An Act was passed, he believed, in 1870, imposing fifty cents per gallon on spirits for one year, with the view of providing for the support of the telegraphic system of British Columbia. In conformity with the instructions given by the Legislative Assembly, those who belonged to the executive and official staff and the heads of Departments had expected pensions, and the County Court Judges, who also expected pensions, were anxious to have the matter settled and the arrangements concluded here, as well as in England; and so Gov. Trutch was sent as a delegate to secure the final conclusion of the preliminaries to Union.

He thought that he had shown that the resolution referred to, and frequently mentioned in this House—and on some occasions he had already denied that it formed part of the terms—could not by any rule of construction, moral or otherwise, be included as part of the terms of Union. What was next found? That the Government of Canada on the 20th of July, 1871, when the Province was united with Canada, in accordance with the provision in the resolution, which he had copied verbatim from the Union Act, sent to British Columbia surveyors and surveying companies; for two years they continued to make exploratory surveys of the Province with the view of running the railway through it, and on the 20th of July, 1873, they expected that this line would be commenced. In the meantime Sir Hugh Allan and his associates had received the charter to build the road; subsequently, owing to divers causes this charter was surrendered, and then followed the resignation of the late Government.

The present Administration had not been long in power when they sent an agent to British Columbia to request its Government to consent to a relaxation of the terms of Union.

He would not occupy the attention of the House with an explanation as to the real causes for the breaking off of these negotiations; but one fact was very certain: they were broken off, and there ended the matter for the time. British Columbia then petitioned Her Majesty the Queen to urge the Dominion Government to carry out the terms of Union, and possibly six months were occupied in the negotiations between this Government, the agent of British Columbia at London and Lord Carnarvon, Secretary of State for the Colonies.

In November, 1874, he thought Lord Carnarvon made his recommendation; and in December of the same year—these facts might be easily verified—this Government agreed to carry out this recommendation, with which British Columbia was content.

Mr. DECOSMOS.

An Hon. Gentleman—No!

Mr. DECOSMOS—Some hon. gentleman said, "No." Well, it was a very small gun that blew off "No."

He was willing to believe that the Premier intended to do so faithfully; but a split occurred at the time in the Ministerial party, and although the Bill necessary to make these conditions operative was carried yet, when it went to the Upper House, the friends of the Hon. Minister of Justice joined the Opposition, and by this means threw it out.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I have no friends.

Mr. DECOSMOS—The hon. gentleman said that he has no friends. If the hon. gentleman pursued his vacillating policy any longer he would not have many friends. If the hon. gentleman was prepared with his new departure and wished to get rid of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; if he was also prepared for minority representation, if he was ready for compulsory voting, besides supporting his hon. friend from Bothwell in his motion regarding the Senate, and to induce the Leader of the Government to concur in it so far as to say he would vote for it and then promise to take it into consideration and bring it down to the House, the hon. gentleman would have few friends.

The hon. gentleman's bonâ fide leader had not mentioned one iota of the vagaries of the hon. gentleman in the Speech from the Throne; and under these circumstances the hon. gentleman might well say that he had no friends.

Let them look at the friends of the hon. gentleman; the Hon. Mr. MacMaster and the Hon. Mr. Penny, both he believed life-long supporters of the Ministerial party, voted against the Bill introduced by the Leader of the Government. The next day Senator MacMaster, however, withdrew his vote, although it had then appeared printed on the Journals, but taking this view of the case, it still stood 22 to 21. If the friends of the Minister of Justice had then voted for the Bill it would have been carried, and the difficulties which now existed would not have occurred.

What more did they do? The Ministry induced the Government of British Columbia to pass an Act to enable them to take a certain belt of land for the construction of the Railway. But what did the Dominion Cabinet do? Why, nothing save that on the 20th of September they assented to a Minute in Council passed on the 14th, proposing to the Government of British Columbia to surrender their right to the building of a road between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, compensation to the amount of $750,000 to be given, not for delays that had taken place, but for delays that might occur. Naturally enough the Government of that Province refused to accept this as an equivalent for the possible expenditure of two millions of dollars.

That Minute of Council was published in the Provincial Press, and then the Globe, the great organ and oracle of the Ministerial Party stated, evidently according to the information contained in the letter of Sir Alexander T. Galt, that it was on the one part a surrender by British Columbia, and by the Dominion Government on the other part, for some indefinite period for the construction of the Pacific Railway.

Now, having found the interpretation put upon the despatch in British Columbia corroborated by a review of that Minute in Council in the Globe, how could they by any possible means understand anything else than that the review of the Globe was a matter of inspiration sent to them by the Government at Ottawa? The Opposition papers having taken the matter up, they knew there was no escape from it; and so they said it meant so and so, but any one reading that Minute in Council could not put any other construction upon it than that to which he had referred. The Legislature of British Columbia met, and having considered the Minute in Council forwarded to Her Majesty's Government an Address asking her to urge the Dominion Government to carry out their pledge to British Columbia. There the matter rested. He had stated that the Government had done nothing except pass this Minute in Council. He would, however, tell them some things the Government did do. At the time when this document was in the breeches pocket of the hon. gentleman at Ottawa they had ordered two survey parties out, one starting in Nanaimo and the other Esquimalt, to make a location survey on that road. In addition to that the Government ordered previously £5,000 worth of steel rails, which were landed in British Columbia at the very moment this Minute in Council was in the hands of the hon. members of the Executive. The Privy Council at that very moment showed a degree of duplicity that was quite astonishing. The people of British Columbia thought the railway was going to be built. There were the rails, there were the surveys and there was the despatch which was withheld for some six or seven days after it was agreed to in Council. Now, the Government of British Columbia having promptly refused the offer of $70,000, that was supplemented by the Minute in Council, going at length, into the merits of the case, and that was forwarded here. That left British Columbia on Februry 2nd and would arrive in Ottawa on the 16th of the month. A month later a Minute in Council was passed here in reply, thus prohibiting the Parliament from having an opportunity of hearing the report of Her Majesty's principle Secretary of State for the Colonies on the two Minutes of Council of February 2nd, of British Columbia and that of the Dominion Government. Where the matter stood at the present moment was this. The people of British Columbia were dissatisfied and the Government of Canada was recalcitrant. The people of British Columbia were so much dissatisfied that in his latest letters from that Province he was told that if there was no bonâ fide work commenced within that Province immediately, an agitation would commence that would end in the secession of the Province from this Dominion.

Mr. RYMAL—They do not mean anything,

Mr. DECOSMOS said he sincerely hoped they did not mean anything, and that they would not carry their threats into execution; and if the Government were prepared to do the Province justice they would not.

Mr. DECOSMOS.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—They had better settle up first.

Mr. DECOSMOS desired to state in reply to the senior member for Halifax, that in looking into the public accounts he found that much abused Province called Nova Scotia, which that hon. gentleman had laboured hard to take over to annexation or anywhere else, had received up to July 30th, 1873, $2,500,000 more out of the Treasury than they paid into it, and he would like to know whether the hon. gentleman, when he was moving at that time to go out of the Union, would have been prepared to pay over that $2,500,000.

Mr. JONES—Of course.

Mr. DECOSMOS was very sorry that this duty had been imposed on him. It was a painful duty to him to have to call the attention of the Government and the House to a violation of the terms of Union. He was one of the first to move for Confederation with the Dominion, and had had in consequence to bear more abuse and experience more difficulties than any other man in his Province. He contended, right or wrong, in season or out of season, that the people of Canada were an honourable people and would carry out whatever they agreed to, and that they would not on any occasion be unfaithful to their pledge. But it was his lot again after the Union had been consummated, after they had been united for five years, to rise up in the House and say faith had not been kept with British Columbia. He would like to know whose fault it was that faith had not been kept with British Columbia? Was it the fault of the people of that Province? The hon. member for Bothwell said yes, but he could assure him that there were utterances even of members of Parliament that could not be believed, and he had not the slightest doubt that there were oaths of some members of Parliament that would not be believed, but he hoped they did not belong to this Parliament. Before he went any further he desired to call the attention of the House to its own acts. The resolution he had offered asked that the Government should forthwith cause this railway to be proceeded with. Now, what did the House and the Government do last year? The Government recommended, and the House voted $6,250,000 for works of construction. The funds having been placed at the disposal of the Government he could not for one moment conceive why the Government did not go ahead and commence the work of construction in British Columbia. The Government not having done so, he and the people of British Columbia regarded it as a legitimate grievance. The Minute of Council of September 12th said this:—"The proposed railway from Nanaimo to Esquamalt does not form a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway as defined by the Act." Now, it was within the knowledge of the House, and it was within the knowledge of the hon. member for Charlevoix, that in the Session of 1872, on the floor of this House, after the point had been settled respecting the eastern terminus of that road, that he put a question to the Government asking where they intended to make the western terminus of the road? The hon. member for Charlevoix, then Minister of Public Works, stated that the Government intended to make Esquamalt the terminus, and he afterwards learned the hon. gentleman had made that statement after consultation with his colleagues.

On the 7th of June, 1873, an Order in Council, on the recommendation of the chief engineer, was passed making Esquamalt the terminus. In addition to that a belt of land was reserved, and was still held, on the east coast of Vancouver Island at the request of the Dominion Government and to some extent in conformity with the Statute of Union. When Mr. Edgar was sent to British Columbia, authorized to make a proposition to that Province, he stated the Government would build that portion of the railway from Esquamalt to Nanaimo, and in another place he speaks of the whole line. Now the word "portion" implies being a part of the whole, and therefore the interpretation put upon this by the agent of the Dominion Government was simply carrying out the idea of the Hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. It would be unreasonable to end that railway on a bluff on the sea coast or on the top of a mountain, or where there is not a harbour approachable at all hours of the day and all seasons of the year. The road on Vancouver terminates at the only port which can successfully compete with the rival railways in the United States, five of which are now in course of construction and one in actual operation. The Order in Council offering $750,000 to British Columbia repudiated this branch of the trans-continental railway, and after the Government of that Province had refused it, the Dominion Government, instead of commencing the work of construction and prosecuting it vigorously, had done nothing, and in the estimates had put down nil instead of a million. It merely showed this Government had no intention whatever to commence the construction of the railway this year in British Columbia. The Minute in Council said this road on the Island was offered as compensation for the delay in constructing the railway. He denied this, and challenged the Minister of Justice or any of his colleagues to produce a solitary letter, telegram or communication showing that this Government had offered to build this portion of the road as a matter of compensation. In order to convince Her Majesty's Government they had done all they could and more than should be expected of them, a financial statement was attached to the Minute in Council. The Minister of Justice stated that British Columbia, with a population of 10,000, paid into the Dominion Treasury for the last six months of 1876 the sum of $275,333, which would give for the financial year, if an equal amount should be paid in the next six months, $550,000—equal to $55 per head, according to the hon. gentleman's own figures. In 1871-2, British Columbia paid $36.29 per head (according to the hon. gentleman's basis), in 1872-3, $38.53; in 1873-4, $39.11; in 1874-5, $46.40; and in 1875, $55.06.

Mr. MILLS—What is the population?

Mr. DECOSMOS said he took the Hon. Minister of Justice's own figures as they appeared in the Minute of Council sent to Her Majesty. In the heat of an election in West Toronto, the same hon. gentleman said the population was one-third of that constituency, which would give 6,700 as the population of the Province. At Walkerton or Aurora, the hon. gentleman said there were not two thousand men in British Columbia. His last estimate was 10,000, and if the hon. gentleman kept on he would be able to form more statesmanlike opinions than he had apparently yet entertained.

In 1874 Ontario paid into the Treasury $2.69 per head; Quebec, $5.55; Nova Scotia, $3.63; New Brunswick, $4.89; Manitoba, $5.69; British Columbia (according to the figures of the Minister of Justice), $39.11. It appeared somewhat extraordinary that one tax payer in British Columbia was equal to 13 tax payers of the great Province of Ontario. British Columbia had paid into the Dominion Treasury since the Union $1,879,226, and received from the Dominion $1,204,338 more than that amount. This was advanced as a reason why that Province should not complain. That would be very good for a special plea to put before people who knew nothing about settling new countries and building up a nationality, but it would not deceive the people of this country who took large views of such matters. When British Columbia came into the Union her people had full faith in her future, but she was a young and struggling colony. They were prepared to barter her future for assistance in the present to construct public works and settle the country. For that assistance she would afterwards pay a hundred or even a thousand fold. To illustrate this, he showed that a gentleman purchases an estate and has money enough to pay for it, but not to improve it. He borrows money paying interest on it, and by-and-by receives not merely in rents his interest on the capital invested, but his estate is so increased in value that it gives him a profit on his outlay. Now this Government in looking at British Columbia, Manitoba and the North-West should take the same view and say: "We are real estate buyers. We intend to be real estate owners. We can buy this estate from the western boundary of Ontario to the Pacific by the payment of a small sum annually, and we will invest money in

"it from time to time by borrowing."

Now, coming back to British Columbia, instead of these moneys being charged against the Province as a sum of money paid out of the consolidated revenue or out of the income, it should be charged to the account of capital, and then it would show that the Dominion had paid \$1,200,000 more than was received from British Columbia, at 4 per cent. for interest and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for sinking fund; all British Columbia would have against her to-day would be \$54,000 per annum. Any statesman would take this view of the matter, that the money necessary to keep the Government of British Columbia moving under the Federal system should be considered as money paid out of capital instead of out of income. Still further he wished to draw the attention of this House to some simple facts, and he would leave the hon. gentlemen to draw their own conclusions. In 1872-3, the revenue paid to this Dominion by British Columbia, was \$385,330. By the statement brought down by the Hon. Minister of Justice for 1875, it was \$350,666 to the end of that year. Deduct the revenue of 1872-3 from that and they had an increase of revenue in that Province of \$165,336. Within a period of three years they had the revenue of that Province increasing nearly fifty per cent. According to the same ratio—taking the hon. gentleman's 10,000 as the population of that Province, which he need not say was incorrect, add 5,000 more to it and it would bring the annual revenue paid to the Dominion up to nearly \$800,000. It might be well for some hon. gentlemen to sneer at a Province that was increasing so rapidly in revenue, but they who drew their conclusions without prejudice would see that British Columbia was one of the most promising Provinces, and one that it was the duty of the Dominion by all possible means to sympathise with and support. Another item in these expenses charged to the Province was this: That Province did not require all the expenditure that the Federal Government had gone to, and which they would not have incurred if they were alone. But the federal system of Government entailed extra expenses on each of the Provinces that they would not have if they controlled their own legislation. These additional expenses he considered should not be charged to the Province. So far as the railway expenditure was concerned, British Columbia had no control over it; it was an expenditure entirely within the bounds of the Dominion Government, and in his opinion one-half the money was wasted in useless explorations. He believed they were wasting money in useless surveys there to-day. There were only two or three places where they could get through the Cascade range with a railway, and any one of sound judgment would see at once, if he were not an engineer, where that road ought to go. But what was the case? They had been now nearly five years exploring for a route, and up to the present time the hon. Minister said they had not found one, and the Minute in Council says they had not found a line. By some strange means or other they had no report brought down to this House of the surveys for 1874, although the last surveyors from British Columbia returned to headquarters in November, and the chief of that division came here early. Up to the present time five months had elapsed and no report had been brought in. He was prepared to say that these reports had been kept back designedly. When the reports were brought down in 1874 they were also kept to the last moment and it was now just as the House was about to close and when no one would have an opportunity to move a resolution or ask for information, this railway report would have to be brought down and they would be asked to act upon it. He regretted the course which the Government had taken to-day, as nothing more or less than using this House to register their decrees. He thought Parliament, whether under the control of a majority or not, ought to be a deliberative body, and they should not be compelled to sit there night and day simply to register the decrees of the Government without having an opportunity for fairly discussing every question that came before them. If he had supposed for a moment that any opportunity would have been allowed him to bring forward this resolution during the present Session at any other time, he would not have taken advantage of the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair and that the House go into Committee of Supply to put it before the House. He hoped hon. gentlemen would give it the full and fair consideration which its importance deserved and prove to the people of this Dominion, to the people of British Columbia and to the people of Great Britain that the Parliament of Canada, or at least a large majority of Parliament, are men who are not prepared to tarnish their honour nor violate the public faith.

Mr. CHARLTON said the question was one of great importance to the Dominion of Canada; it was a question, the consideration of which ought to engage the grave attention of this House and country. As to the responsibility of the Government for the speedy construction of the road, he did not propose to enter into it; but he proposed to briefly look at the question upon its abstract merit, to look at it apart from any complication or any agreement that may surround it just as if we were upon the threshold of the negotiation and about entering into the construction of the Pacific Railway at this moment. If no elements entered into the discussion but the feasibility of the project, and the proper time to build the road, what would be the probable course this country would take in this matter? He thought it would be held to be an absurdity to agree within a stipulated time, without consideration of the resources or ability of the country or the difficulties of the route, to build that railroad through 2,700 miles of wilderness. He believed that the agreement to build a road 2,700 miles for the use of 22,000 inhabitants, or less than ten to the mile, would be looked upon as the height of absurdity. Of course it might be held that the railway would develop business and increase the population, but he apprehended that we should be guided in the celerity with which we prosecuted that project by the amount of business that might be developed on that road as it proceeded in its construction. Of course the projectors and promoters of the enterprise would claim that after the road was opened from ocean to ocean a large amount of through business would be developed, but he thought there was a great deal of fallacy in the estimate of the probable amount of through freight. He believed that the estimate of Asiatic trade likely to be secured was greatly exaggerated. The popular impression that the Union Pacific Railway was largely supplied with freight from the China and Japan trade was erroneous. There was a line of steamers from San Francisco to China and Japan, sending a ship once a month each way, and the amount of business furnished by these steamers to the Union Pacific did not amount, in his belief, to one full train per week; and that was not all through business, but partly business for the Mississippi valley. The United States commenced canvassing the project of building a railway from the western limit of their railway system to the Pacific, not when the country had a population of four millions, but of twenty millions, and then they felt themselves unable to cope with such a gigantic undertaking. It was not until the United States had over 30,000,000 inhabitants, and a population of 750,000 on the Pacific slope and the Western Territories, that they ventured on the construction of the Pacific Railway. They did not commence that railway any too late; the time had come, but not more than come, for entering into such a project, and the line to be built was only about 1,700 miles in length instead of 2,700 as in Canada. The construction of the Northern Pacific Railway was not commenced and proceeded with until the rails had been laid from the head of Lake Superior to the Missouri River, and then the project failed, carrying down its promoters to ruin, demonstrating that the time for the construction of that road had not come. The portion of that line constructed had the business of Manitoba, the Upper Missouri and of Montana. It had not paid running expenses although it was infinitely more feasible than the Canada Pacific was to-day.

In 1872 a great panic swept over the United States; it prostrated the business of that country, and it was felt by every commercial nation on the face of the globe. What was the immediate cause that led to that prostration? It was the building of railways in advance of the requirements of the country, through sparsely settled districts. It was the sinking of money and means in unproductive enterprises—capital that was practically lost and squandered, and that was what contributed more largely than any other cause to the panic in the United States. Without building the Canada Pacific Railway the Dominion was now verging upon the condition which the United States were in at that time, with regard to railway expenditures, when the panic overtook them. We had built railways now that were not required. The Government were operating railway lines that were an expense to the country, and they were about to open another railway that would be a tax upon our resources and a charge upon the revenue of the country for an indefinite period. The Dominion was perhaps on the verge of disaster from unproductive investments in public works, and the time had come to consider our position and go cautiously on in the course we had now taken. If we were on the threshold of this great enterprise, and were governed by the dictates of reason and by the extent of our ability and our resources, what would be the course we would take with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway? At first, in his opinion, we would build a line of road from Lake Superior to Lake Winnipeg, and there we would pause, as we would have afforded communication from the Winnipeg basin to the great lakes of America, and would have given to the entire valley of the Saskatchewan an outlet to the markets of the world. Then it would be natural for this country to wait until settlement had increased in the country and its resources were developed and until further communication was required for the people of the North-West. When that time arrived, if it were ten, twenty, thirty or fifty years, he would then proceed with the construction of that road to the interior of the continent, and not before.

It was a mistake, a fallacy, to suppose that the construction of railway lines made a nation great or added to its wealth or prosperity unless they were constructed for a legitimate purpose to afford the population and produce of a country egress and ingress and the means of inter-communication; otherwise what was invested in a railway was money lost, until it began to make returns for the investment.

Although we had in the North-West, as he was proud to state, an extensive and fertile region, for certain reasons he believed that its settlement must necessarily proceed slowly. He did not believe that a great exodus of the inhabitants of Europe would pass to these plains, as had been the case with the Prairie States of the American Union. Quite a large proportion of European immigrants would avoid it; the Germans would naturally go further south; the residents of the British Isles, to a great extent, would follow this example. Though the Scandinavians would likely go there, still it would fill up slowly, and until a great influx came into that region it was folly to make provisions for their wants. He had often heard the grievances of British Columbia aired on the floor of this House. A stranger unacquainted with the circumstances might suppose that it had been grievously treated and that the policy of Canada toward it had been one of parsimony and severity; but this was not the case. Six members from that Province representing in all one-half of the population he represented, had seats here, and they made more noise than the delegates from any other Province. His hon. friend from Victoria admitted that British Columbia had received, since the Union, $1,300,000 more from our revenues than it had contributed to them—or $130 per head, counting men, women and children; and the Government had offered that Province $750,000, or $75 per head. Yet this had been spurned with contempt, though it was equivalent to $300,000,000, if settled in the same proportion on the whole population of the Dominion. The Government were disposed to treat British Columbia with the utmost liberality, recognizing the fact that it was still young, with extensive but undeveloped resources; they were indeed anxious to do so, looking upon it as a portion of the Dominion which should grow powerful, populous and great, and to any reasonable demands on its part they would cheerfully accede. But they did not hold that this was to be secured at the expense of the prosperity of the entire Dominion; the interests of 10,000 people on the west side of the Rocky Mountains were not of more importance than those of four millions on the east side. The Pacific Railway policy of the Government was as liberal as the people of Canada would sanction in connection with an enterprise likely to be barren in economic results, and if such a policy was adopted as would increase their burdens, the Government that did so would be overthrown in disaster and disgrace. The accumulation of a great debt, and the imposition of increased taxation in this relation would defeat the very object they had in view.

Some twenty years ago, in Iowa, there was a railway mania similar to that which at present afflicted the Dominion; every county and town of any consequence must have railway communication. To secure this the system of bonding counties, municipalities, cities and towns was entered into, taxation grew to 2, 3, 4, and 5 per cent. per annum, and the grass grew in many of their streets. The heavy burden of taxation kept away immigrants and the railways did no business. Liabilities had been incurred to the extent of $15,000,000; and so it would be in our case if a similar policy were pursued. The proper policy of the Government was to build this road as fast as the means at its disposal would permit, without adding to the burdens of the people; and any Government that taxed too severely the resources of the country in the prosecution of this work would be recreant to their trust and would receive in due time the condemnation of the people for such an act of folly.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) was glad, for the sake of honesty and fair play, to see one of the supporters of the Government tear off the mask in this connection, and openly favour the repudiation of the solemn obligations of Canada. When he read the precious Minutes of Council of the 20th of September and 13th of March,—especially the latter—he became convinced that although couched in the most enigmatical language, they naturally meant nothing save repudiation; and the hon. member for Norfolk had boldly come forward and stated that he was not in favour of preserving Canada's honour intact, proving to the world that Canadians could not be bound by treaties. He had hoped that this would never have occurred in the House; but he was glad to see it now, as it showed what they had to expect from the party in power. The people of British Columbia now clearly knew who were their friends and who their foes. His hon. friend had spoken about 10,000 people; but this kind of nonsense should be stopped. It was no business of that or of any other hon. gentlemen, whether the population of British Columbia was 10,000 or one million. An article of agreement, which they were called upon to ratify, was simply in question. They were not to decide whether 10,000 people should have six representatives or not; or whether these six possessed as much brass as the hon. member for Norfolk; he did not think, however, that they possessed as much. The hon. gentleman proposed to treat this question on its abstract merits; but this road was not intended to benefit 22,000 people, but the whole Dominion. The hon. gentleman said that the United States had not built a road 1,700 miles in length until they had thirty millions of people; but this railway was nearer 2,000 than 1,700 miles in length; and the hon. gentleman forgot to mention the connecting lines west from Chicago to Omaha, and the bridging of the Missouri in this connection. The Western States had been developed by means of railways, and this must also be the case in the North-West. The doctrines of the hon. gentleman would never serve to settle the country.

The Hon. Minister of Justice four years ago proclaimed that he was willing that the national faith should be kept, but since that date the hon. gentleman had adopted another course, coinciding in opinion with the hon.

member from Norfolk. The hon. gentleman had accepted office, and he understood from the hon. gentleman's utterances that the other Ministers had adopted, in a great measure, his doctrines in this connection.

The Cabinet had exhibited a want of energy—he would not say duplicity, as it would be unparliamentary—with regard to carrying on the surveys for the railway, and the people of British Columbia were disgusted. Many had there opposed the acceptance of the terms of Union on the ground that the Canadians would not keep their promises. He had fought for the Union, and he regretted that the predictions of its opponents had proved true. The people of British Columbia had taken up lands and made preparations for the building of the railway; but now all their hopes in this relation were blasted. The Premier had last year made a promise as to when the road would be commenced; but the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill had been afterwards defeated, and the hon. gentleman had then stated that he would proceed in a very short time with the construction of the main line.

In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for West Westminster as to whether the Government intended to lay before the House that season the report of the Pacific Survey in British Columbia during the past year, and whether they intended locating the proposed railway on the main land during the ensuing year, the hon. Premier made the following reply:

“The report for the last year up to 30th June is a ready before the House, the report of the latter half year is not prepared and therefore cannot be presented to the House. It is only a week, I think, since the last of the parties returned who were out on the last exploring survey, but I hope to be in a position within a fortnight to give a summary to the House of what has actually been done during the past season up to the first of January, which will practically lay the present position of the survey before the House as fully as it is possible to do before Parliament rises.” Again on March 5th, the Hon. Premier went in to a very full discussion of the subject, and in the course of his remarks said:—

“A complete instrumental survey has been made from Tete Jaun Cache down the valley of the Fraser River, that is following the north bend of the Fraser by what is known as route No. 6, down to Fort George, where the Nechaco river falls into the Fraser. At that point it diverges somewhat west, but still following the valley of the Fraser, but ascending the Tete Jaun Cache. The distance from Yellowhead Pass to Fort George is 245 miles, with extremely favourable gradients and light works of construction. This result is obtained, as I remarked, by following the sinuosities of the Fraser river in a general way, and after leaving the Fraser the route is marked No. 7, although it is No. 6 down to a certain point called the Old Fort. A survey was projected from Fort George across the Chilcotin country to connect at Lake Tatla with the surveys made in 1873 to Bute Inlet. The whole distance from Fort George to Bute Inlet is about 305 miles, but a small portion of that route is still unsurveyed, being a portion of the country at the head of Nechaco River, a distance of fifty or sixty miles. Except over this small distance there is no practical difficulty whatever to be encountered in passing through the country, following the valley of the Fraser as I have stated, and this gap is being at present surveyed by a party on snow-shoes; the only reason for doing that is to enable the Government at once to determine whether this part of the route presents any formidable physical obstructions, for if it does not we shall then be able to locate at once the whole of the line through British Columbia, if we decide to adopt this route. We have no reason to believe there is any serious obstruction in those fifty or sixty miles of country; but as the engineers were formerly deceived by the loose reports of Indians about the Clear Water country, it was thought best not to assume that no difficulty existed, but to make ourselves certain as to the true facts we sent a party through the country to make surveys.”

Now, when they had such a statement made to the House a year ago by the Hon. Premier, it certainly was very strange that nothing should be known of the 50 or 60 miles being surveyed a year ago last winter. It seemed the Government were determined to indefinitely protract the surveys from season to season, and no doubt another year would be added before anything would be done. When he told the people of British Columbia that Parliament would proceed with the work as soon as they could, the people ridiculed the idea and asserted that the Government never intended to build the road. He considered that in passing this resolution the House would simply express the opinion that the Government had not done their duty in carrying on the surveys in British Columbia, and it called upon the Government to proceed vigorously with those surveys. He thought if the Government would look to the future interests of the country they would proceed with the road at once. The hon. member for Norfolk had told the House that the Northern Pacific Railroad had been abandoned, and that it was a far more feasible undertaking than the Canadian Pacific. But that statement was not borne out by the facts. On the contrary it was known that the Canadian Pacific had far superior advantages, both as regards the building of the road and the opportunities for settlement on its route than the Northern Pacific, which had to pass through the great American desert; whereas the Canadian Pacific, for the great part, ran from Red River to the Rocky Mountains through a fertile country capable of settlement and the production of cereals to a high degree. If the Government would only follow the example of the neighbouring Republic they would see a way of building the road. There they were trying to reorganize the Northern Pacific, and if the Canadian road was not built before the Northern Pacific, Canada would be the loser. The Southern Pacific would probably be pushed along with vigour, and when they found a country able to build a road from the Missouri to the Pacific in 3½ years, encountering most serious obstacles in the Rocky Mountains, and then in the Sierr Nevada; and when they saw the immense traffic and freight going over the road, it should stimulate the Government to proceed with this at once. The hon. member for Norfolk had said that the trade with China was insignificant. The hon. gentleman ought to have known that beside the one steamer monthly, there were a very large number of sailing vessels from China, Australia, the Pacific Islands and other places, and the productions of California were sent over the road to the east. But he maintained that the road would create a traffic for itself. When they looked abroad they saw the Russian Empire pushing their road from the Baltic to the Pacific in one continuous line. It would be said that this Dominion was behind the age and an obscure settlement if it failed to construct this road. He hoped the Government would see their way clear to go on energetically with this work. The hon. member for Norfolk had told them that any Ministry that launched into so wild a scheme would be false to the interests of the country, but he (Mr. Thompson) would say that if no Ministry could stand without violating the plighted faith of the country then the sooner such Ministry, or 10,000 such Ministries, were swept away the better. If the country was only to become great by repudiation and national bankruptcy, the sooner his Province retired from the Confederation the better it would be for itself.

Mr. RYMAL said he was well aware of the views he had always held on the question. He never did believe that the Canadian people were in a position to undertake the building of so gigantic a work without ruin to themselves, and the more he had studied over this matter the more confidently did he think he was correct. So far as his friends in British Columbia were concerned, he had the kindest feeling imaginable towards them. He wished them all the prosperity it was possible for them to enjoy, but he was not willing that all Canada and her interests should be sacrificed in order to please British Columbia in this respect.

Let us consider the position the people would stand in were the Government foolish or mad enough to undertake to build this great work. Our present debt is \$140,000,000. If our Canadian Pacific Railroad should cost at the same rate as the Union and Central Pacific railroad, it would involve an outlay of \$300,000,000. He was willing, however, to place it at \$200,000,000. Then we had entered into engagements in the way of canals and other public works that would add another \$60,000,000 to our debt, and if our railroad should be completed in ten or twelve years, our public debt would reach \$400,000,000. It was as easy to say \$400,000,000 as 400,000,000 cents, but not so easy to get it out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Let us see what that means. Interest on \$380,000,000 at five per cent. would be \$19,000,000 annually. Moreover, the First Minister when speaking on this subject two or three years ago, said if the road were ever completed it would take a subsidy of \$6,000,000 annually to keep it in running order. This would make an annual charge on the people of Canada of \$25,000,000. He had made a calculation of the number of teams it would take to move the interest on our public debt. Suppose twenty silver dollars weigh a pound, and a team is able to draw a ton, it would take a string of teams $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles long, one team to every two rods, 160 to the mile, in all 600 teams. To move our entire debt would require 9,600 teams, forming a string of 60 miles. Fancy what a caravan it would be extending from this city beyond Prescott, drawing the public debt of 4,000,000 of people. He did not believe he had overdrawn this picture, and when people told him the 4,000,000 inhabiting this Dominion were able to bear such a burden of debt, he had come to the conclusion they were mad or crazy. He believed it would be utter madness for the Government at a time like this—yea, he was going to say, within the lifetime of anyone in this House—to attempt to build this entire line of railway. He was willing, nay, anxious if it could be shown to be in the public interest to go step by step with these improvements, but it was utter madness or worse to undertake to do so at the present time. He called upon the Government to beware if they wished to retain their seats. Everything surrounding the inception of the Pacific Railway had caused grief, ruin and shame to one great party, and if the Government ventured to follow in their footsteps they would meet the same results. Unless they made haste slowly they would find themselves, as Paddy said, “standing prostrate.” He approved of the economical policy of the Government and advised them to continue it until more prosperous times came. If he remained in this House he would give a parting kick to one Government after another until he could find one that would learn the secret of economy—the true success of a people. Extravagance was as disastrous to nations as to individuals. This resolution would have the effect of drawing the attention of the people to what they had to expect, and British Columbia would know that while the Dominion was willing to treat them fairly, generously and justly, it was not willing that the entire interests of Canada should be sacrificed to their needs.

Mr. WORKMAN said he had opposed this scheme as strongly as he could when it was first brought up in this House, and the more he thought of the subject the more he was convinced of the wisdom of the course he then pursued. He was quite certain if this railway were carried out in the manner proposed by the late Government, our country would be sunk to a state almost of bankruptcy. This question ought to be met in a spirit of kindness and conciliation, because the people of British Columbia had some claims upon us. The hon. member for Wentworth had very clearly shown the amount of debt this undertaking would impose upon this country. Our debt was $140,000,000 already. Were we prepared in order to construct a railway for some 9,000, or at most 12,000 people to double that debt? He could conceive of nothing more disastrous than the reckless spirit that seemed to take possession of some members of this House. They seemed to think so long as they could borrow money in England at a low rate of interest and spend it here recklessly the country would be the gainer. There never was a greater mistake, because if we wish to maintain the integrity, honour and credit of Canada abroad, we must guard with the strictest economy and care our public expenditures. Suppose this railway were constructed and in running order tomorrow, was there any company that would undertake to run two trains per day over it for less than $5,000,000 a year bonus and all the earnings of the road in addition? He did not think there was. During this very month of March it would require over 1,000 men to keep that road in running order, and what would it be for? To keep up communication with some eight or ten thousand people on the other side of the continent. He approved of the opening of rail and water communication to Manitoba as quickly as our circumstances and credit would permit, and when that great work was completed it would be time enough for the Government to look the other question fairly in the face. He had seen in his own experience young houses entering into business, raising money on paper and showing large balance sheets; but this past year, and the last three months especially, had shown to the commercial community the utter folly of such a course. Such would be the result of carrying out this great undertaking. The hon. member for Cariboo remarked that we were entering upon a state of bankruptcy. If we were not so now, it arose from the fact we had men at the head of the Government who would look carefully to the revenue of the country before undertaking to carry out this enterprise. He (Mr. Workman) was as loyal a British subject as any member of this House, but he thought it would have been very proper if the Government of this Dominion had told Lord Carnarvon when he interfered in this matter we were at all times prepared to receive kindly advice from the Mother Country and to act upon it whenever we found it in the interests of the country to do so, but we would refuse to allow Great Britain to interfere in our domestic matters. That was the policy he advocated here and which he hoped would be advocated hereafter. He had heard the grievances of British Columbia aired extensively, and one would almost suppose that Province formed the whole Dominion. The House had been told over and over again that the Customs revenue of that great country was about $550,000. That much had been paid into the Customs in Montreal in a week, but there was no demand from that city for large expenditures on public works in consequence of it.

Mr. ROSCOE thought it would have been much better to have brought up this discussion in Committee of Supply. At all events, the hon. the senior member for Victoria should have waited until the Ministry had explained their policy before bringing forward any resolution. He would make a still greater mistake if he forced his resolution to a vote. He hoped the hon. gentleman could be persuaded to withdraw it after discussion, as he did not see what good it would accomplish. He (Mr. Roscoe) would vote for it, however, for this reason, the Government were bound to commence the road at Esquimalt. They ought never to have undertaken to construct the island section except as part of the Pacific Railway. Although an attempt was made to represent it as a mere local road, it would be seen in the letters of instruction from the Premier to Mr. Edgar it was distinctly stated it was part of the Pacific Railroad. Lord Carnarvon also referred to it in the same manner. Thus: "That the section of the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo should be begun at once," meaning the Canadian Pacific Railway. He (Mr. Roscoe) maintained that the Government should not have offered to build the road from Esquimalt to Nanaimo except as part of the Pacific Railroad, and they should not have brought in a Special Act for the purpose. Even when that Bill was thrown out of the Senate the Government, he considered, were still bound to commence the road at Esquimalt under the Railway Act of 1873, and for that reason he would vote for this resolution.

He thought that the history of what had taken place with regard to British Columbia since the present Government came into power would be acknowledged to have been the history of a series of mistakes. The Hon. Premier in his speech at Halifax, after his return from England, called the Terms of Union with British Columbia, which he received from the late Government, an elephant, referring no doubt to the story of the man who, in a raffle, won an elephant which he did not know what to do with. They (British Columbia) were afraid at one time that the hon. gentleman was going to adopt an easy mode of disposing of that elephant by simply giving it a kick and letting it go. The hon. gentleman, however, had provided an apt illustration of the mode in which his Government had dealt with this question, which strongly resembled the mode of treatment adopted toward the elephant by the unfortunate speculator. If they went as far back as the first negotiations through Mr. Edgar, the House would admit the whole affair was most unfortunate, but he had less reason to blame the Dominion Government, as the then Provincial Government had behaved foolishly in the matter also. Then he thought it was a mistake to agree to the building of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway unless they were certain of being able to carry it out. Then they subsequently made up their minds that they were not in a position to build that road, and they determined to offer some other compensation for the delays that were agreed upon. That proposition might have been made in a very few words, simply proposing instead of building the Esquimalt Railway to give a certain sum of money and clearly stating that the other terms of Lord Carnarvon's arrangement to expend two millions of dollars a year on the mainland should be strictly carried out. This would have prevented any misunderstanding. But instead of doing that a long rigmorole of a document was prepared, which finished up by offering a sum of $750,000 for any delays which may take place in the construction of the Pacific Railway. The universal opinion throughout British Columbia was that it meant the abandonment of the whole of the Carnarvon terms.

To show how impossible it was to understand the exact meaning of this Order in Council, they found the newspaper that was the chief supporter of the Government took the same view of the matter as the people of British Columbia, that this offer was made as a veritable abandonment of the whole Carnarvon Arbitration. Then there was another great mistake, that was waiting for some months until this Minute in Council was written, for the Government made up their minds shortly after the prorogation of Parliament and they should have sent out their decision at once. There should have been no private negotiations between themselves and the Government of British Columbia. When he left the people of British Columbia knew nothing about any private communication, and he believed the Lieut. Governor himself knew nothing about it. There were several points in the Minute in Council which he wished to refer to. Reference was made to the resolution passed in this House regarding the new increase of taxation—and which resolution they had constantly brought to their notice—and it is stated that this resolution was passed “contemporaneously” with the Terms of Union; but on reference to the Minutes of Proceedings he found that it was not passed until ten days after the Terms of Union had been adopted by the House and had in fact gone forth beyond the control of this Parliament. It was said, moreover, in the second Minute in Council:—

“The Committee would observe that the resolution in question was passed within a few days of the time at which the Terms of Union were assented to by the House of Commons; that it was well known that in order to secure the consent of a majority of the House to these ruinous terms the Government of that day were obliged to promise to their supporters the introduction of such a resolution; and that the then delegate, now the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, was present and aware of, and doubtless an assenting party to the arrangement.”

Well known to whom?

It was well known to the Government, no doubt, and to the members of this House, but he denied that it was known to the people of British Columbia when they went to the polls with the Terms of Union in their hands to vote for Union with Canada, and it was quite absurd to suppose that they should be bound by it. They were bound to a certain extent to consider the resolution, but they were not obliged to regard that resolution as legally binding. It need hardly, however, be considered, because if the terms of Lord Carnarvon are carried out there will probably be no necessity for increasing taxation in order to build the railway. The Minute of Council also argues that Mr. Trutch, the present Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, who happened to have been one of the delegates at the time the Terms of Union were arranged, was then in Ottawa, but the people of British Columbia could not be bound by that resolution because Mr. Trutch was at Ottawa and at that time he did not object to it. What could Mr. Trutch do? Was he to rise up in the gallery of this House and object to it and subject himself to being expelled by the Sergeant-at-Arms? He had Mr. Trutch's authority for stating that he was not in a position to object or assent to that resolution, as he was not in the House at the time it was passed; and it was too ridiculous to think that the people of British Columbia should be in this way bound by it. It was absurd that the representatives of British Columbia should have to get up Session after Session and be obliged to discuss the question whether the railroad should be built at all. Hon. members seemed to overlook the fact that the people of British Columbia joined the Dominion on the agreement that the railroad should be built, and they treated the building of this railroad as if it had nothing to do with the Terms of Union. It was simply absurd to have any connection between Canada and British Columbia unless that railroad was built. British Columbia might as well be federated with Australia or New Zealand as with the Dominion without a railway. He could show that the construction of the road in British Columbia to the extent of two million dollars a year would pay for itself. It had been shown by his colleague that every white person in that Province was paying to the revenue something like $30 a head. They had in British Columbia a chain of mountains extremely rich in mineral wealth, being a part of the chain extending from Central America almost to the North Pole. A railway through that country would open up mines and the country generally and would bring in population to a large extent. If they had an expenditure of two millions a year in the construction of that road it was all they expected. The interest on that amount at the low rate paid by the Finance Minister would be only $80,000 a year, while the expenditure of the two millions a year would probably add to the population of British Columbia at the average rate of 2,000 a year, the additional revenue derived from which would pay the interest on the amount expended in construction. He would probably have some further remarks to make in Committee.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. gentleman who had just sat down had stated that since the Government came into power a series of blunders had been committed by them with regard to British Columbia. He quite agreed with him. When the Government occupied seats on the other side of the House they took the position that the Terms of Union were incapable of fulfilment. The amendments which the party then moved, the objections which they urged and the mistakes which they pointed out had all received moral vindication and fulfilment. He thought therefore when the Government came into power it should have been their first duty to have repudiated that agreement. He thought the Government should have said to the people of British Columbia: "We were opposed to the policy of Union on these terms, and we are quite willing that you should go back as you were; we are determined to hold in power the opinion we held in opposition, and we are convinced that the country will maintain us in our views. But if you think you can do better without us unless we fulfil these terms you are quite at liberty to go." He thought the Government and the people of this country should be the judges of what was for the interest of the people of Canada in everything that concerned the Dominion, and that they should never have allowed Lord Carnarvon or the British Government to force them into a second arrangement, which he believed the people of this country did not approve of, and would not sustain the Government in carrying out. We should be quite willing to accept the advice of the British Government on matters where Imperial interests were concerned, but in questions of a peculiarly domestic character such as this, involving the question of burthens on our own people, we must claim to be the best judges of our own policy, and he thought the Government would have occupied a much stronger position had they taken the ground with reference to the arbitration of Lord Carnarvon which was suggested last year. On these two points he quite agreed with what the Government proposed, although they did not exactly accord with the views he would like to have seen adopted. The hon. gentleman had moved a resolution asking the House to express an opinion in favour of the immediate commencement of the railway. It was high time that

hon. members should speak out freely, frankly and fully on the subject, regarding which there should be no misunderstanding; and the Ministry should have the benefit of the opinions and advice of the representatives of the various sections of the country.

When the Terms of Union with British Columbia were being decided upon, he had moved an amendment stating that they were too onerous; but though the Government voted it down, and subsequently also an amendment proposed by Sir Alexander T. Galt, it was only after they promised their supporters that if they did so, a provision would be introduced into the Pacific Railway Bill to the effect that the road would not be proceeded with if it increased the taxation of the country. This was done; a company was formed and an attempt was made to obtain the requisite capital; and they all well knew how disastrous was the failure, finally involving the downfall of the Administration.

The present Government had made a mistake in not repudiating, when they came into power, the whole arrangements; but brought in another Bill in order to carry out in a more gradual way such a policy. A proviso similar to the one he had mentioned was also included in this measure; but they knew that nevertheless the burdens of the country had been increased.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—But not on that account.

Mr. JONES—Yes, on that account. The hon. gentleman would surely not pretend to say that if expenditures had not been made in connection with this railway, we should not have had so much the more money in the Public Treasury; an additional burden had been imposed, and the stipulation of both the late and present Ministry had been violated, 10,000 people desiring the construction of this road.

An Hon. Gentleman—No!

Mr. JONES—An hon. gentleman said no; he would make the number 30,000 if the hon. gentleman wished it, but still they knew it was 10,000 people who asked them to expend from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 in building this line, this could not be done without ensuring our financial ruin. If the 4,000,000, residing on this side of the Pacific State, burden themselves forever in this matter and mortgaged our resources for all time in order to reach these 10,000 by rail, the policy would be found to be most ruinous. He wished, on the contrary, to make of this a cheap country to live in, in order to attract immigration; and we knew that our neighbours were endeavouring to reduce their expenditure and their taxation. He would communicate to the House the opinions of a gentleman better qualified than himself to speak on this subject—a gentleman who had passed through that country and who was possessed of great ability and a large amount of information regarding its agricultural and other resources—Rev. George M. Grant, of Halifax, the author of "From Ocean to Ocean," and the Secretary of the first railway engineering expedition that had crossed the Continent, accompanied moreover by the engineer-in-chief only last week. Rev. Mr. Grant in addressing an audience at Halifax, regarding the future of the North-West, said:—

"What is the true Canadian Pacific Railway policy? Two preliminary points are clear. First, that our views should be determined by our present and not by our past knowledge, still less by what this or that Government has said or done. The past and the present Governments deserve both praise and blame for what they have done in this matter, but we need not be anxious to apportion either praise or blame. I doubt if a Fisk or a Jay Gould would have been adventurous enough to agree to build the railway in 10 years; but the provision that it must be built without imposing additional burdens on the people of Canada was the act of a statesman in."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD — Hear! hear!

Mr. JONES — The hon. gentleman said hear, hear, but the reverend gentleman stated, that provided no additional burdens were placed on the country, this would be the act of a statesman.

Rev. Mr. Grant thus continued:—

"Whether the Government or a company should build the Canada Pacific Railway is a fit subject for debate, but of this there can be no doubt. The best emigration and colonization policy is also the best railway policy of the Dominion. And therefore the proposal to build the railway in ten years seems to me unwise, if not chimerical. It should not be built at all, if population does not flow into our North-West. Population is certain to flow there if right means are taken to attract the current, but at what rate who shall venture to predict? And the railway should keep ahead of the current only sufficiently to attract and direct its surging flow."

The Rev. gentleman pointed out that the railway should be built as the settlement of the country progressed. He (Mr. Grant) further said:—

"The first great step to be taken, therefore, in a true Canadian Pacific Railway policy, is to secure easy access by mail or steamer for emigrants, if possible, through our own territory, at least during the summer months, into this Great North-West of ours, and to work in connection with this a vigorous emigration and colonization policy. The Canada Pacific Railway should not be commenced from the Pacific side until at least one million of Canadians are settled west of the Red River of the North. On the basis of the debt allowed to each Province under Confederation, one million of people would be entitled to a debt of $24,000,000; and the expense of providing access to, and of opening up the North-West would be fairly chargeable to the first colonists of the country."

It was the deliberate conviction of a gentleman who had travelled through the country that the road should not be commenced until at least 1,000,000 people were settled on the west side of the Rocky Mountains.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—What does he know about it?

Mr. JONES—He (Mr. Grant) has been there, where my hon. friend has never been; and he had a great reputation to sustain. He (Mr. Jones) hoped that the House would at once arrive at a conclusion on the subject, and instruct the Government perhaps more strongly than they desired. Hon. members should express their opinions frankly, and not allow either this or any other Government—because Governments were always disposed to spend money in order to meet the pressure brought to bear upon them by the representatives of a whole Province like British Columbia—to commit any act of folly. He did not wish to say anything disrespectful concerning the hon. members from that Province, but he could not abstain from observing that the pretensions of these hon. gentlemen were rather prominently placed before the House, considering the number of people the hon. members represented, and the distance they lived from these Provinces. These six hon. gentleman argued their case, generally with great ability, but not always with great moderation, and he thought that the retorts they occasionally drew upon themselves were perhaps justifiable, if not allowable. We must, however, look to our future and not burden ourselves forever with debt. In Nova Scotia, national works of great public utility existed; there was for instance the proposed extension of the railway from Yarmouth, an important section of the Western country for which they had a short time ago asked for assistance. The Government could not help them, because they could not aid a local railway, and for this they had not blamed the Ministry. Many hon. members again thought that the Pictou and Truro Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, running through the coaling section of Nova Scotia, should be extended by the Government from New Glasgow and the Strait of Canso, and ultimately to Louisburg, holding that this would be a wise policy. He was of the same opinion, that this was a national work, but the Government could not undertake it. Doubtless other hon. members could make similar observations with regard to public works in their own Provinces. He had sufficient confidence in the good sense of hon. members to believe that they would not vote for such a monstrous proposition as was contained in the resolution—and if the people of the country believe that, the latter would sustain hon. members in recording such a vote. For these reasons, he was glad that the hon. member had brought up the subject, and he trusted that it would receive at the hands of hon. members the most emphatic condemnation.

Mr. McDUGALL (Elgin) stated that this was a matter of very great importance. It had occupied the attention of the country for several years, and it had been discussed in the House on numerous occasions. During the short period that he had had the honour of a seat in the House he had heard the name of British Columbia repeated beyond his power of enumeration. As he understood the question, that Province was a part of the Dominion, which was, of course, entitled to as much consideration at their hands as any other portion of it. The original intention had been that the Pacific Railway should be built within ten years, but he thought that scarcely any person in this country expected at the time that this promise could be realized. When that proposition was made he was quite sure that the hon. member for Victoria did not anticipate such a culmination. We had, however, this question on our hands; and he was free to confess, as far as he was concerned, that it was a white elephant on the hands of the people of this country.

The building of the Pacific Railway was an immense undertaking in every respect, and a great national undertaking. He listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax with a great deal of attention, when he said he thought the Government were to blame for not repudiating the arrangements entered into by the previous Government with respect to this railway. However unwise the policy of the previous Government might have been, they were supposed to represent the public feeling of the country. The faith of the country was in their hands and they had pledged that faith to the people of British Columbia and to the world that they would construct this road within a certain number of years. It was true that the present Government, when it came into power, very sensibly came to the conclusion that it was impossible to build the road in that time. He believed the policy of the present Government to be perfectly correct. Reference had been made to the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railroad and the action of the Government with regard to the building of that road. He knew there was a difference of opinion on the subject even between the First Minister and some of his supporters. But that difference was easily understood. It consisted, as was very distinctly stated by the present Minister of Justice, with respect to how far they should carry out the suggestions that were made by the Secretary for the Colonies. The proposed building of this road was not, as he understood it, a part of the Pacific Railway. Had it been a part of that road, he (the First Minister) would have stipulated for the construction of the railway. Not receiving the authority of both branches of the Legislature, like practical men, the Government did what was the next best thing to do. He would appeal to the hon. member for Victoria to say as to what other course the Hon. the First Minister could possibly pursue in order to meet the claims of the people of British Columbia. The Administration had made a proposition to give them $75,000 of the moneys of the other portion of Canada, for very little of that sum would be contributed by the people of British Columbia. But the people of this portion were not content with this offer. They were determined to demand a literal fulfilment of the Terms of Union and the building of the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, which under the circumstances they knew to be entirely impracticable. The demands of British Columbia were, forsooth, exceedingly modest in that respect. In every other part of the Dominion the people were denying themselves the expenditure of moneys for the purpose of carrying on public improvements on account of the stringency of the times. But British Columbia said "You must be burdened to a still greater extent for the purpose of carrying on public works in our section of the country or we will secede." The Nanaimo branch, he contended, was not a portion of the Pacific Railway proper, for if it were the Premier would have come down to the House with a Bill to enable him to build the road. Had the road been a portion of the Pacific Railroad the Act of 1874 would have been sufficient to enable him to construct it without further legislation. Now the hon. member for Victoria told them that the pledge given by the late Government should be carried out. As far as the House was concerned they had done all they possibly could to carry out the policy that was commenced by the late Ministry, but their efforts were repudiated in the other branch of the Legislature. Why was this proposition made? It was made for the purpose of the consideration for the relaxation of the terms originally entered into between Canada and British Columbia as to the time. He did not agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax with regard to Imperial interference. He thought as long as we remained a part of the British Empire that the Imperial Government had a right to make suggestions on the administration of our affairs, and the First Minister had a right to listen to those suggestions. He was happy to hear that the hon. gentleman had listened to the suggestions of the Imperial Government, and he (Mr. McDougall) had supported him for doing so in regard to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. He thought it would have been well for the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution to have examined the Pacific Railway Act of 1874 before he came down with a resolution asking this House and the country to expend a large sum of money in British Columbia. He had introduced a resolution condemning the policy of the Government in terms expressing want of confidence in the Government. The first enquiry was how far the hon. gentleman was justified in doing so with the Statute of 1874 before him, the terms of which were that the building of the Canada Pacific Railway should be carried on as rapidly as possible and without increasing the burdens of the people? Was the hon. gentleman prepared to say the policy of the Government was not sustained by that portion of the Statute? He was quite surprised to hear the hon. member for Victoria say that unless the demands of British Columbia were met that there would be a disturbance in that Province which possibly might end in secession. He wished to tell the hon. gentleman that the whole people of Canada felt interested in British Columbia and she could not secede. She was now a part of the Dominion and would remain so as far as he was concerned. He deprecated the discussion of any subject from a purely sectional point of view. They were not there to represent sections or Provinces. Our system of Government was of such a character that they were interested in every part of the Dominion, and were sent to Parliament to legislate for the general benefit of the whole Union. One opinion which had gained ground in regard to this matter was that British Columbia was anxious that a larger amount of money should be expended in order to have the money of the rest of the Dominion expended there, in order that those who were there might reap the advantage—that they might dance while the rest of the Dominion would have to pay the fiddler.

Mr. BUNSTER—No, no.

Mr. MACDOUGALL observed that as the hon. gentleman said “no, no,” he was inclined to think the hon. gentleman would not have given that response unless the remark he had made was pretty nearly correct. Now he was as desirous as anyone that the faith of the country should be preserved. He was desirous to see the railway completed as early as compatible with the interests of the country, but he believed with the hon. member of Norfolk that to build a railroad before there was any occasion for it was a very unprofitable speculation. He was of opinion that the proposal of the Government would meet with the general approval of the country and should be accepted by the House as the most reasonable course to pursue under the circumstances. At present to carry this railroad across the Rocky Mountains was out of the question. He had no doubt that there would be a time when if it was practicable to proceed with this work it would be desirable it should be done, but that would be when the great North-West became settled up, and when the inhabitants of that territory would need an outlet at the West as well as at the East. To expect this to be done at the present time was more than the country was capable of carrying out.

He thought, therefore, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the condition in which this enterprise stood and the financial position of the country, that the proposition of the Government to the people of British Columbia should have been accepted by them. The course now being pursued was in harmony with the general opinion of the country at large, and was as much as could be expected by those who felt most deeply interested. Consequently the Government should be sustained on this occasion.

Mr. MACDOUGALL.

Mr. DAVIES said it was high time a decided opinion should be expressed on this great question. It was entirely beyond our resources, and would involve us in financial ruin to build 2,700 miles of railway through a wilderness. From the very first he had been in favour of a Federal Union of the Provinces, but it would be better to let British Columbia secede than undertake such a work. It would have been better if the Government had consulted their followers on this subject. We have already got the Intercolonial Railroad on hand, which he considered a useless work. It would cost $2,500,000 a year to run it. He utterly repudiated it as a Maritime work. If in addition to that we had to pay the working expenses of the Pacific Railroad, and interest on the debt, it would ruin the country. The people are already overtaxed and could not bear the additional burden. Better let British Columbia go back to Downing Street. No doubt the country about Peace River was very fine, but even though it were settled, the cost of getting grain to market would be so great as to render the shipment of it unprofitable. We could not expect much merchandize from China or other Asiatic countries, because we could not compete with steamships. The amount offered to British Columbia was, perhaps, too small. It would be better to increase it to two or three millions, and let them give up pressing us to construct this gigantic work which would land us in financial ruin.

Mr. METCALFE said during this debate he had been reminded of the old heathen maxim—“Whom the gods wished to destroy they first made mad.” Certainly, it was infatuation in the extreme to expect 4,000,000 of people to construct 2,700 miles of railway in such a short time without increasing the rate of taxation. We had the example of the American Pacific Railway before us. With 40,000,000 of people at one end, and more than 1,000,000 at the other, with large commercial centres like Chicago on the line, it was anything but a financial success. What might we expect from the proposed road with 4,000,000 of people at one end, and ten or twelve thousand white and a few thousand Indians at the other, constructed through a vast wilderness, with rocks and hills of stupendous magnitude, sufficient to appal the most energetic and sanguine contractor in the world. Certainly the expense would be immense. It was difficult to estimate its cost. There could be no doubt it would reach $200,000,000. Considering its inaccessibility to supplies there was no doubt it would cost more than that. Then supposing it were constructed and ready to run, it would cost at least $8,000,000 a year to operate it. Added to the interest on the cost of the road, it would equal nearly the whole revenue of Canada. And what freight would there be? There was no local traffic, and he very much doubted whether a single train of freight from Japan or the East Indies would cross the continent in a year. Consider the time it would take to run from Calcutta, Canton and Melbourne—35 days by steamer to the western terminus, then 12 days across the continent and 12 across the Atlantic, in all 59 days without including the time lost in transshipment. A vessel could transport a cargo from London to the East Indies or China in 31 days by the Suez Canal, or by the direct route in 65 days. Even the old clipper ships sailed it in 70 days. It was unreasonable, therefore, to suppose this traffic could be secured for our railroad. This Government would not be doing its duty if it entered into such an immense undertaking and agreed to complete it in such a short time. If it was to be constructed at all, it could only be in short lengths, as the resources of the country would justify.

Mr. PLUMB said that he could not vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria, that he did not assume to speak upon the question in behalf of his friends in the Opposition benches, but for himself only, and he deeply regretted that such a resolution had been brought in drawn in such a form as to preclude him from supporting it.

When the Government resolutions for the construction of the Pacific Railway were introduced two years ago, they were sustained by a very large majority of this House, and he was surprised at the line of argument now pursued by gentlemen forming that majority, who had accepted the resolutions forming the Railway Act of 1874 without objection or criticism, because it was not followed by them before. He was not disposed to believe those resolutions were brought in as a sham, but that the Government were earnest in their determination to build the railroad in a reasonable time. The Opposition did not consider themselves responsible for any legislation with regard to the Pacific Railroad since 1873, and as far as keeping faith with British Columbia was concerned it must rest with the Government that made and accepted the intervention of Lord Carnarvon. A good deal had been said about the impossibility of building the Pacific Railway, and the line across the continent now in operation south of us had, been referred to as a warning by the hon. member for North Norfolk. Now the net earnings of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad in 1874 amounted to $14,374,751. The capital stock was $92,020,000; debt $131,719,000—total cost $223,739,000. It must be remembered that these roads were constructed during the war in the United States, when labour was dear, and the inflation of American currency had enhanced the cost of all railway material. The stocks of these companies had been very extravagantly "watered," and the whole construction was of the most improvident character. Therefore, 40 or 50 per cent. might be deducted from the cost, which would give for building the 2,260 miles of the main line, and 243 of branch lines, $150,000,000. At that rate the net earnings of the road in 1875 would be nearly ten per cent. on the outlay. Therefore it did not look like the financial failure it was represented to be by the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk. The capitalists who constructed this road, notwithstanding the financial panic, were running one down from San Francisco to Southern California, and were turning it eastward, intending to cross the mountains again in the direction of Texas. He had seen a proposition from the President of that road, undertaking to construct a line to Texas if the United States Government would give him a grant of about 15,000 acres per mile of land in the vicinity of the line without any other subsidy or assistance, and stating that he had 2,000 men on the road and had spent $5,000,000 already in its construction. That was undertaken by capitalists who understood their own interests and knew by experiment what was profitable. As to the cost of constructing our Pacific Railroad, the best test of that was the practical experience of those who had built the great road over the Sierra Nevada and Rocky Mountains and the difficult country intervening, certainly as formidable a route as ours.

He was not arguing that we should undertake the Pacific Railway now or that we should throw a burden of increased taxation upon the people for the purpose of building the road. He was not aware that anyone proposed to build faster than the resources of the country permit. He did not know any statesman who had ever been mad enough to argue that the road should be forced through within the space of a few years. British Columbia, he had no doubt, would be satisfied if it was completed in a reasonable time. From the initiation of the undertaking it was expressly stipulated that no onerous burden should be thrown upon the people by its prosecution, and that principle had been reiterated in every Bill brought forward on the question. No statesman in Canada, he thought, would dare to advocate the construction of the railway in contravention to that principle, which had been adopted by both sides of the House. The grave objection of the Opposition was that it committed the Opposition to a policy which they had never in any respect sanctioned. They never proposed that the road should be undertaken by the Government, but that a proper subsidy should be granted a private company for building it. They believed that the construction of a railway by the Government was an expensive and wasteful process, but their policy had been entirely reversed and changed, and the responsibility of the change of course rested with the large majority which sustains the present Ministry. It did not rest with the minority to suggest any policy on this question now, but they were certainly prepared at any time to support a proper scheme for the construction of the great work in question. They had not ceased to believe that the road was desirable for the country—that it would enrich rather than impoverish the Dominion if it were constructed with proper economy on the bases adopted by this side of the House—that it would throw a population more rapidly into our possessions in the far West than could be settled there by any other means. This had been proved by the railways constructed in the northern part of Iowa and some parts of Minnesota, which had peopled the districts through which they passed, and had been a great commercial success. A terrific picture had been drawn by the hon. member for Wentworth of the burdens which would be imposed upon the people if the road were constructed. He had loaded an imaginary train of waggons with the silver representing the expenditure. That was a sort of calculation which might be amusing, but it did not deal with the facts nor advance or retard the argument. He was astonished to hear the sentiments uttered on the other side in regard to the driving away of British Columbia from this Dominion. He did not suppose that the House was prepared for the utterance of such sentiments as he was grieved to hear from his hon. friend for Halifax; and he was surprised that they were not received with some expression to show that the opposite side of the House was not in accord with that hon. gentleman. He trusted before the debate terminated he would hear those sentiments repudiated by the majority; at any rate he had no doubt that the large majority of the House were not in sympathy with the remarks of his hon. friend on this point. He regretted that the resolution was not so framed that he could vote for it; the hon. mover might have drawn it up in such a way as would have brought to its support those who like him (Mr. Plumb) adhered to the principle that the railway should be constructed in accordance with the original agreement with British Columbia, even though they might disagree with the mover in the policy of placing such a resolution upon the House.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said there was no doubt the question before the House was of the greatest importance, and attracted the attention of the Government as well as the country. The position to which the Government stood to British Columbia and the rest of the Dominion, as well as the stand taken by Lord Carnarvon, must render it difficult and embarrassing to deal with. If the demands of British Columbia were acceded to, a very large amount of debt would be entailed on the country. We owed already $140,000,000, and the completion of the road prematurely would increase the debt to nearly $400,000,000. This was most appalling to contemplate, as a public debt must result in increased taxation, and in time our tariff, which would be found inadequate, when increased to any great extent would become prohibitory, and revenue would ultimately be collected on the necessities of life or by direct taxation. Everyone knew that increased taxation meant increased cost of living, and embarrassed manufacturers on account of the advance in the cost of production. Such a state of affairs would deter immigration, and in fact would render the country undesirable to live in. If it was the fact that we had incurred a solemn engagement to build the road in ten, as by first arrangement, or in nineteen as by last arrangement, our position would be appalling and disastrous. He had heard our engagement on this subject termed the "mad act of a mad Government," but that was not the fact, for the former Administration put a rider to their Act, to the effect that they would not carry on the work beyond the resources of the country, or in such a way as would increase the burden on the people; and the present Government in their late Act had a similar rider. This was a safeguard. He would remind his gentlemen that while we were under an obligation to British Columbia to carry out the work as far as possible, we had made a solemn engagement with the rest of the Dominion that we should not by so doing increase the burdens of the country. That being the case, he did not think they need be under very much apprehension. The Government would not make themselves liable to censure on that score, but would construct the Pacific Railway as fast as our resources would permit. He was anxious to see the road commenced and that it should proceed to Manitoba with all possible speed and give facilities for peopling the North-West Territory and thus increase our population which would enable the Dominion to proceed with the building of the Pacific Road to the Pacific slope. To proceed recklessly would only hopelessly mortgage the Dominion beyond redemption, which, as it would in the case of a private party mortgaging his farm to the full amount of its value, result in embarrassment and disaster. Some severe strictures had been made use of that evening as to the part which Lord Carnarvon had taken in these negotiations. He did not think, for his own part, with all due respect for the British Government, that they understood the interests of this country as well as we did. He believed we understood our own resources and our own political and social requirements as well as anybody on the other side of the water, and while we were willing to give every deference to their opinions, we were in a better position to form a correct estimate of our own affairs. He had always thought that the British Government should have been a party to the building of the Pacific Railway, as it was an Imperial as well as a national work. He did not see how the late Government should have left them out of the contract, as they should have borne a fair share of the burthen of constructing a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. DYMOND said he would not have arisen at that late hour to address the House had not his opinions in certain respects differed slightly from those of some of his friends who had preceded him. He thought it was quite too late in the day to discuss the abstract question of the propriety of building an Interprovincial Railway. It was not one party nor another party alone that was responsible for this work, for certainly before the Terms of Union were made or proposed, or even contemplated with British Columbia, they might have heard or read expressions of opinion of a more or less authoritative character, pledging Canada in due time to the construction of such a road. Nor did he believe it possible to conceive a Confederation similar to that under which we lived without such means of communication stretching from one end to the other. In that debate it must have been satisfactory to everyone to observe that anything like recrimination had been to a large extent avoided. He believed they were all impressed with what he might almost call the solemnity of the responsibility resting upon them on that occasion, and although they might have as matters of history to refer to some things which many would gladly forget, there was no necessity on that occasion for reviving old sores. Nor did he think on the floor of that House they should speak slightingly of any portion of the Dominion. If the people of British Columbia were few and numerically a feeble folk, so much more was it necessary for those who represented great and powerful communities to allude to their foibles or their weaknesses with all moderation and generosity. They did not stand before the world in a favourable light as regarded their relations with British Columbia. They were in a position more or less humiliating. They pledged themselves to a certain great work, and in the attempt to carry out that engagement they very early broke down. He supposed they were all prepared to admit that there was an error of judgment in the original inception of this scheme; there was a compact made which those who made it knew it was impossible to carry out. There was a blunder also in giving out the contract for the construction of this road a year and a half later, without due consideration or knowledge, on the part of those who made it, as to the difficulties or as to the cost of the work to be undertaken. If they wanted anything to prove to a demonstration how indiscreet—to use no harsher term—was that proceeding, they should find it in the fact that it was left for the Government of the day, after that charter was issued, arbitrarily to determine where the terminus of that road was to be. Was there any member even of the Township Council, or any person accustomed to give out contracts, who would issue a contract to a contractor who was afterwards to be told what was the work to be accomplished? Months after the Allan contract had been signed an Order in Council was passed which made the terminus of the road 260 miles from the point at which, under the original conditions, this road might have terminated, and that 260 miles as they had heard recently from the Prime Minister and from the report of the Chief Engineer involved, perhaps, the most tremendous engineering difficulties in the world. That portion of the line would have cost not less than thirty millions—every dollar, in fact, of the money subsidy which was to be paid to the contracting company for the entire line. Then there was a blunder committed in a political sense, in making Esquimalt the terminus by Order in Council before all the difficulties involved in carrying the line to that place could be known. That step had led to many of the difficulties in which we were involved at the present moment. Nor did he feel any particular pleasure in contemplating some of the steps which the present Government had been constrained to take since they had come into power. But while he regretted the necessity of having recourse to the counsels of the Colonial Secretary, and while he regretted their having been obliged to consent to build the Esquimalt and Nanaimo road, the House was justified in regarding the original errors of those who made the bargain and first attempted to carry it out as being the main cause of any difficulties that had taken place afterwards. There could be no reason for pointing one single word of censure at the present Government for their honest endeavours to carry out in good faith the original bargain with British Columbia as far as human means would permit. They had now arrived at a point at which it was absolutely necessary, not only to have the candid opinion of the House, but also to come once for all to a policy by which their course should be guided in future—that, to use a common phrase, they should touch bottom in this matter. Having regard to all that had passed; having regard to the solemn pledge given to the people of British Columbia, he did not feel that for one moment they should recede from the position that this railroad was at sometime or other to be constructed; but the ground upon which he proposed they should stand was this:—That from that moment they should ignore altogether the local question; that they drop out of sight utterly the wants and wishes of British Columbia as being separate and apart from this Dominion, and that they should proceed to build the work as they should have built it if British Columbia had never existed as a separate Province but had formed a part of the original Confederation in 1867. Of course they had to recognize that British Columbia was to be compensated. When an impossible bargain was made those who made it had to bear the responsibility. They should therefore proceed to construct this road purely as a national work; compensate British Columbia for the delay; pay her in cash or in kind whatever it was right to pay, and forget from that moment every claim or consideration of a local or sectional character. In considering the time in which the work should be constructed, they should consult the interests of the whole Dominion of Canada alone. He would appeal in support of that policy to the resolution placed on the Journals in 1871 by the present Premier, then Leader of the Opposition, which, had it been carried at that time would have saved them all the trouble to which they had since been exposed. But he would appeal also to Lieut.-Governor Trutch's own words, in which he gave expression to what he described as the interpretation of the Terms of Union, uttered at a banquet given in Ottawa, on the 10th day of April, 1871, in honour of the settlement of the terms. On that occasion, Mr. Trutch said:—

“He desired in conclusion to express what was his interpretation and that of the people of British Columbia, of the engagement entered into for the building of the road. When he came to Ottawa with his co-delegate last year, they entered into a computation with the Privy Council as to the cost and time it would take to build the line; and they came to the conclusion that it could be built on the terms proposed in ten years. If they had said twelve or eighteen years, that time would have been accepted with equal readiness, as all that was understood was that the line should be built as soon as possible. British Columbia had entered into a partnership with Canada, and they had united to construct certain public works, but he for one would protest against anything by which it should be understood that Government were to borrow one hundred millions of dollars or to tax the people of Canada and British Columbia to carry out these works in a certain time. Not even Shylock would have raised his pound of flesh if it had to be cut out of his own body.”

That declaration of Lieut.-Governor Trutch that Canada was not to be taxed, that the people of Canada were not to be oppressed or ruined by taxation in order to carry out the terms, was according to him the true interpretation of the bargain just consummated, and was perfectly consistent with that resolution so often referred to, recorded on the Journals of the House, which declared that the work should be constructed without adding to the existing taxation of the country. They knew by the despatch lately laid before the House that while the Government would proceed, or desired to proceed in the spirit of Governor Trutch's remarks and in the spirit of the resolution which pledged them not to oppress the people of Canada with additional taxation to carry out the work, they declared that “it remained only to “endeavour to construct the Pacific “Railway as rapidly as the resources of “the country would permit.” He ventured to submit that in that declaration, the last they had heard from the lips of the Government, a Government which no one in that House seemed inclined to censure or condemn, was to be found an assurance that should satisfy the most eager of the British Columbians and not cause alarm to the most patriotic of Canadian citizens. He hoped that his hon. friend behind him would be prepared to adopt that policy. He did not think that the hon. gentleman expected to accomplish much by his resolution, and he trusted that the debate, when it reached British Columbia, would induce the people to be more willing than they had previously shown themselves to be, to take a sound and sagacious view of the subject and enter into the partnership heartily, earnestly and honestly, prepared to receive their fair share in the great prosperity which he believed belonged to this country, and of which we desired that they should enjoy no meagre part.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM urged the hon. member for Victoria to withdraw his motion, satisfied with the expressions of opinion he had obtained. He thought that a division on the subject at the present stage would be premature. A vote would place some hon. members in an awkward position. The hon. member for Victoria had made many statements about British Columbia in an eloquent manner, but some of them he was not prepared to endorse. Public opinion was divided in the Province on this subject. There was the party of the mainland and the party of the Island. Different opinions were entertained there with regard to the manner in which the terms should be carried out. He trusted that certain hon. members had not expressed the views of the Government in this connection. If they had, the result would be disastrous for British Columbia, but he was prepared to wait until the Government brought down their policy in this regard—then he would take the liberty of speaking on this question.

Mr. BUNSTER stated that if any question deeply agitated the Dominion he thought that it was the question of building the Pacific Railway, which would tend to make of Canada a nation. An hon. gentleman had said that the representatives of this Province possessed considerable brass; this was not very complimentary; but he assured the hon. members that it required some manhood to assert their rights. British Columbia had never asked for better terms, but only desired the Government of the day to evince a disposition towards carrying out the terms on which it entered into Confederation. The contract bound the Administration to build this road within ten years. An hon. gentleman asserted that it was an unfavourable agreement; but this he denied as far as these Provinces were concerned, though it was so for British Columbia, which had made many sacrifices in the interest of the National Flag and of the Dominion. Seven millions had been paid for Alaska; and this being the case, the value of British Columbia, which was far, far superior to Alaska, might be estimated. This Province had been termed inhospitable, and called a set of mountains, and described as unfit for human beings to live in; but hon. gentlemen who made such statements were deeply ignorant of the geography and character of their own country.

The fact that the altitude of the Canadian Rocky Mountains was 5,000 feet less than that of the American range should also be taken into consideration, as against the high latitude of British Columbia, which made it a very desirable place, in order to form a proper opinion as to the importance of this Province as part of the Dominion. The Minister of Justice had exclaimed—"Let British Columbia go;" but they were not to be cuffed and kicked about. They had made a bargain and they intended to stick to it until the time for its fulfilment was expired, and then if it was not carried out they would claim damages.

He observed that the Premier laughed when he said this; but the claim of British Columbia, under such circumstances, would be perfectly valid. When the Alabama claims were first mentioned the British nation laughed; but they all knew that damages were secured and to what extent—yes, to millions sterling.

Lieutenant-Governor Trutch had said that the Dominion should not be expected to adhere to cast-iron terms. There might be something in this; but he questioned whether Mr. Trutch had the right to state that this view was endorsed by the people of British Columbia. British Columbia was ready to sympathise with the rest of the Dominion when circumstances might demand it; but what did would-be statesmen here do when they went on the hustings? They ridiculed that Province, the best friend of the Dominion, in order to serve political and party purposes. This Province had been swindled because the Terms of Union had not been carried out.

A certain newspaper had spoken against its interests; but was it to be supposed that British Columbia could be obtained without the expenditure of money. The same journal had not mentioned what other Provinces cost, and hence he had put a notice on the paper in order to obtain this information; when it was secured he would show that it had not cost a greater expenditure than was proportionate to the revenue it contributed to the Dominion. Something like six millions had been paid, he believed, to Quebec, besides the cancellation of a debt of over a million. The surveys which had been made of the line, had extended over too great a period of time, and had necessitated too heavy payments altogether; the work in his opinion should have been completed in half the time at present consumed upon it. With a portion of the money so spent a part of the road could have been built and placed in running order. Three residents of Sacramento, including Mr. C. P. Huntington, a relative, he believed, of the Postmaster-General, and Mr. Theodore D. Judah, had with the assistance of two or three men, in two years, surveyed the route of the Central Pacific Railway, while we had a large staff traversing a far less difficult section of country and engaged on similar work during the past four or five years. The Central Pacific scheme had been held up to ridicule by the San Francisco newspapers, in the same manner as certain gentlemen cried down this project; but, nevertheless, it had succeeded to the great credit and honour of every man connected with the undertaking. Some men were constantly grumbling and running down the Canada Pacific Railway scheme, but this was because these persons did not possess sufficient brains, or intellect, or statesmanship to understand that it was necessary to make of Canada—a nation. The Government should take into consideration the large increase of population its construction would ensure. The project of building it with thirty millions of dollars and fifty millions of acres of land was quite feasible—say it cost $14,000 per mile, being 2,700 miles in length—it would require an expenditure of something like $38,000,000. His estimate was somewhat like that of the chief engineer, as announced by the Premier in the Session of 1874, the latter being about one hundred millions; but he believed that was a long way above the mark. The hon. member for East York assumed to know more about it than the chief engineer and supposed that the road would cost two hundred millions. The correctness of this supposition he denied in toto. The hon. gentleman had also made another erroneous statement, and he was satisfied that the hon. gentleman had never reduced these calculations to figures, or otherwise he would never have submitted them to the House. The hon. member said that it required thirty-five days to cross the ocean from Japan to this continent; but it was well known that this necessitated only twenty or twenty-seven days at the furthest. Then, with regard to the time required to cross the continent, he regretted to see that the hon. gentleman was not better acquainted with the geography of this country. The hon. gentleman computed this at twelve, when it was in reality only six and a half or seven days. He had travelled frequently over this route, and could speak from experience. The hon. gentleman moreover said that it took twelve days to cross the Ocean to Europe, when, in point of fact, this only required eight days, enabling the entire trip to be made in thirty-six instead of fifty-nine days as the hon. gentleman had calculated. On future similar occasions he hoped that the hon. gentleman would be more careful and furnish the House with more exact information. He had figured the matter up very scrupulously and he had found that passage to the Pacific Ocean from Liverpool over the Pacific Railway, if built, could be effected in less time by two days and nine hours, than over the American route. This was something of which we might well be proud, but unfortunately in this country we were slow in taking advantage of the great resources we possessed. Mr. Disraeli had purchased a portion of the Suez Canal in order to secure for England the carrying trade of the world, and he did not doubt this great English statesman would also give assistance towards building the Canadian Pacific Railway, if that matter was brought before him in a proper spirit, with a view to improving traffic communications over British territory and competing in this respect with the United States. The Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli would require more than one string to his bow in this connection.

One hon. gentleman had spoken intelligently and carefully on this question; and he thanked that hon. gentleman for having placed such telling facts before the House. The hon. member for Niagara was always careful and precise in his figures, and no one could dispute their accuracy. He thanked the hon. gentleman for supporting the project. The hon. member for Halifax had alluded to the population of British Columbia as being ten thousand, but the hon. gentleman was probably not as well acquainted with these people as he (Mr. B.) happened to be, and he could state that they were progressive and were possessed of wider views than some people who were engaged in the exportation of codfish. If many hon. gentlemen visited British Columbia they would be more favourably impressed with its capabilities, resources and importance than they were at present. It was pretended that the Province was inhospitable, but he challenged any one to make good this assertion. The contrary was the case; the people were more enterprising, and they did not like to be abused by hon. gentlemen who knew nothing about them. Hon. members repudiated and the Government declined to carry out the arrangement made through Lord Carnarvon. He would read a few remarks made by the hon. member for South Bruce in this relation:—

“He would now touch upon a question with respect to which he had not been entirely in accord with the gentleman who were conducting the affairs of the country. He referred to the settlement attempted to be made through the Earl of Carnarvon with British Columbia. He had been of opinion that that settlement was more onerous to this country than it was advantageous to agree to, and he was happy to be able to say that previous to his accepting office, discussions had been entered upon which had resulted in an agreement upon a policy satisfactory to himself, and which, when developed at the proper time and place in Parliament, would, he believed, be satisfactory to the country. He was unable to develop that now to them for very obvious reasons, as it was dependent in part upon the result of negotiations now going on, but he would say that whatever was done, would be done subject to the deliberations and views of the people's representatives.”

He did hope that hon. gentleman would have done British Columbia justice, but from the speeches delivered on the public hustings they had not much reason to hope for justice. He took this opportunity of alluding to these remarks in order to show hon. gentlemen that it was necessary to adopt some other mode of getting into Parliament than by running down British Columbia. The remarks made about that Province had a tendency to discourage emigration and were not in the interest of the whole Dominion. He was very sorry the hon. member for Victoria had moved this resolution, but it was the only way the opinion of the country could be had, inasmuch as the end of the Session was so close at hand. He would support the motion, but he was of opinion that it would have been more prudent if he had waited until the Government had brought down their policy on the subject, and then taken action in the matter. He regretted that the Government had not desired from the British Columbians in what way a modification of the terms could be made. But instead of this they had been insulted by the paltry offer of $750,000 as a bribe. He maintained that the geographical position of the Province was a great advantage to the Dominion, and had heard it observed that the road was not built because it was feared that Ontario and Quebec would be depopulated. He, however, was satisfied that the construction of the road would be of great value to the whole Dominion.

Mr. POULIOT stated that hon. members that evening, as on several occasions during this and other Sessions, had been reminded that the Canadian Government had made a solemn contract with British Columbia concerning the building of the Pacific Railway; but the representatives of that Province had forgotten to state under what circumstances this agreement had been concluded. If these engagements had not been fulfilled the hon. members from British Columbia should impute to themselves the cause in having, like usurers, profited from the extraordinary needs of the late Government at the time the contract was passed; and they ought to have understood that in this relation the present Administration could not perform impossibilities.

He thought that the House would remember under what circumstances the arrangement with British Columbia had been made. The hon. gentleman then at the head of the affairs had been caught in a storm at the time, and as was the case with unfortunates in imminent danger of shipwreck in a tempest, the hon. gentleman had snatched at anything by which he might ensure to himself safety; under such circumstances the contract had been concluded, and it had been too favourable for British Columbia. Later it was found impossible to fulfil its conditions. There was another reason for this proceeding. England then desired to rid herself of that colony. That Province with a population of 10,000 souls had been granted six representatives, when it should only at most have had one member; and these six hon. gentlemen took up more of the time of the House than all the members for the Province of Quebec. These hon. gentlemen had threatened that British Columbia would secede from the Union if the Government did not construct the Pacific Railway; but for his part he believed that this would be good news for the Province of Quebec. In his country, at all events, it would cause general rejoicing and be the occasion of an illumination. The execution of the terms of agreement with that Province was simply impossible.

Mr. TROW agreed with the hon. member for Westminster that this resolution had been prematurely submitted to the House. All Governments should carry out, as far as lay within their power, the contracts made by their predecessors. The engagement effected with British Columbia, at the time of the Union, seemed to him to be impracticable—more particularly as to the time specified.

He presumed the line of railroad would ultimately be constructed to the Pacific, but great works should be carried on gradually. We have magnificent stretches which can be utilized with a trifling expense compared with the cost of building a railroad, and would answer our people for the next quarter of a century. The Premier could not be charged with delaying this matter, since he had purchased the rails and material required for it. It was desirable that the Government should proceed at once to connect Manitoba with Lake Superior, but they would not be justified in undertaking work without surveys, which were not made on the Pacific slope. Water communication was at all times cheaper than rail, and the Dawson Route had magnificent water stretches which could be utilized. He thought it would be the height of folly to build 2,700 miles of railway in advance of settlement, 1,000 of which would pass through the inhospitable country north of Lake Superior. There was little or no land fit for settlement before reaching the fertile lands of the North-West, and it would be difficult to keep the line open during the winter months. There had been a railway mania in this country of late, and during the last five years Ontario had gone in debt upwards of $40,000,000 in constructing lines of railway. It was easy for a Province like Ontario to borrow money, but a re-action must take place when this money had to be re-couped. He thought the Government were doing all they possibly could for British Columbia, and the latter should wait patiently, believing in the good faith of the country to carry out their engagements as best they could. The Government had nearly completed a line from Pembina to Winnipeg; they were also constructing a line from Lake Superior to Shebandowan and from Rat Portage to Red River. Large numbers of surveyors were now locating the road across the Rocky Mountains. The Government had also at a very large expense established a line of telegraph to British Columbia. He thought the inhabitants of that Province should be the last to complain of bad treatment from the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD did not feel at all inclined at one o'clock in the morning to enter into the question of the construction of the Pacific Railway, nor indeed would he feel disposed to do so at any hour on a motion of this kind. He had no doubt the hon.

member who brought forward this motion was actuated by the most patriotic motives; but still he thought the hon. gentleman was unwise and was not acting in the interests of his own Province or of the construction of the Pacific Railway in pressing it as an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. He agreed with the remarks made in the exceedingly sensible speech of the hon. member for North York—that the construction of the road was no longer an open question. It was in fact a portion of our constitution that the Dominion as now formed is composed as much of British Columbia as of the other Provinces. The constitution as it now stands has as one of the bases the agreement made with British Columbia; this was engrafted and enterwoven with it, and could not, without disruption of that constitution, be set aside or waived. He was glad to find from the remarks of every gentleman who had spoken, with the exception of the hon. member for Halifax, that that stipulation was admitted to exist. Some hon. gentleman had expressed his views strongly that the construction of this road ought not to be unduly undertaken, that the resources of the country should not be unduly pressed, and that the taxes ought not to be unduly increased for the purpose; but all, with a single exception, had admitted that the Pacific Railway is a necessity, and even if it were not a necessity as a matter of constitutional principle it must be constructed. It remained only for the hon. member for Halifax to cast the first stain on the honour of Canada. For thirty years or more he had been a member of the Parliament of Canada, and except from the lips of that hon. gentlemen he had never heard repudiation recommended. The mover of the resolution had assumed a great responsibility in pressing and refusing to withdraw it, contrary to the wishes of one member after the other from his own Province as much interested and pledged as himself to their constituents to agitate the interests of British Columbia. Upon him (Mr. DeCosmos) perhaps might fall the blame of an adverse vote. If he would only look at the papers laid before the house he would see the Government had stated as a ground for the abandonment of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway that the Senate had thrown out the Bill. He would find hereafter that the vote which he himself had provoked would be quoted against British Columbia, and he (Sir John) thought they would have the right to do so against the views placed in the resolution. While he must attribute to the hon. gentleman the most patriotic motives in offering the resolution, he must say he had no sympathy with it.

This question ought to have been brought up on its own merits, and postponed until after the Government had an opportunity of expressing their views on the present situation of that road, the policy to be carried out, and the progress they proposed to make with respect to the route during the immediate future. Until the Government had an opportunity of expressing themselves fully, this motion ought not to be made. While, therefore, he considered that the faith of the country was pledged to the construction of this road; while it should be his duty as well as his pleasure so long as he was a member of Parliament to press at all convenient seasons for the carrying out of the obligations entered into at the time of the Union with British Columbia; while he was convinced that the people of the Dominion would recognize the obligation and the duty of the Government who led Parliament and public opinion, and exact from them the fulfillment of the promise, and say to them, they must not allow any engagement, provident or improvident, to which the honour of the country is pledged, to be repudiated, rejected or broken; he had looked at this resolution with a view of seeing whether he was forced to vote for it, because he thought the hon. gentleman had deprived himself of all sympathy. He had forced the House to consider this question prematurely, and acted on his own responsibility. He (Sir John) could not vote for it, and would not vote for it. After reciting the original agreement relating to the construction of the railway, it said "owing to diverse causes the actual construction of said “ railway was not commenced in British Columbia at the time agreed, nor has it been commenced since.” It alleged there were several causes not mentioned why the road was not commenced, and concluded with the illogical sequence that therefore “ this House is of opinion ” the Government should promptly and vigorously proceed to the construction of the road. The Government in their report of the 13th of March, 1875, said they were not even yet in a position to determine the location and were not able to proceed with the work. Those causes still existed, the hon. member knew they existed, and yet he asked the House to declare that because of their existence the work should be proceeded with at once.

But there was a substantial objection from his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) point of view—that this was not a mere arrangement by which British Columbia agreed to enter Canada. It was a mutual agreement and partnership by which the Dominion and British Columbia joined hands and became one Dominion. British Columbia was pledged to the rest of the Dominion to the construction of this railway just as much as the rest of Canada was pledged to British Columbia. It was not merely for the benefit of British Columbia, but for the common benefit. If it had been otherwise no such agreement could have been made. All parties recognized it as political expediency for both colonies. It was in a spirit of perfect equality the compact was entered into. It was not only for the sake of spending money in British Columbia but for the purpose of rendering what would be merely a union on paper—one in reality. Therefore, it was agreed that the road should be constructed in British Columbia and also other parts of Canada, and that it should be commenced at both ends at the same time. What did this proposition mean? It condemned the Government for not commencing the “ actual construction of said railway within British Columbia, etc.,” and, therefore, he, a representative of Ontario, and all the members coming from other provinces, were called up to vote a resolution ordering and enjoining the Government to commence and vigorously continue the road in British Columbia without reference to any other portion of the road in any other portion of the Dominion. The language that had been used fully justified the tone of the despatch, which was as follows:—

“ The Committee must further observe that the tenor of the representations now under consideration would seem to indicate that the object of the Legislature of British Columbia is less to secure the completion of the work as a national undertaking in such a way and on such terms as may best conduce to the welfare of the whole community, than to enforce the immediate and continued expenditure within their own Province, at whatever cost to Canada, of many millions of money, for which they cannot pretend to have given an equivalent; and that their chief grievance is that their people have not as yet derived, in addition to the other financial benefits of Union, the gains and profits to be expected from the expenditure of these millions in their midst. To these views must be mainly referred the allegations, unfounded as they appear to the Committee, of disastrous and ruinous delays, and as to all classes of the population having suffered loss and deprivations.”

How could any hon. gentleman coming from any other province justify himself in voting for the resolution. Upon that ground alone he would vote against it. The hon. gentleman might perhaps have prepared a resolution that he would have been forced to vote for, and he was glad, under the circumstances, that the amendment was so drawn as to enable him to vote against it. He voted against it precisely and exclusively on these two grounds: first, that the whole proposition was illogical; and second, that it was limited to British Columbia, and called upon the Government and the whole of the House to build the road in that Province and to leave the rest of the project to shuffle for itself.

The members were then called in, and the question was put, with the following result:—

The original motion was then put and carried.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

The House went into Committee of Supply—Mr Scatcherd in the Chair.

Item 79, Intercolonial Railway completion, $915,900, was passed.

The Committee rose and reported, and asked leave to sit again.

The House adjourned at Fifty minutes past One o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act 31 Victoria, cap. 5, with respect to public accounts. He explained that he proposed to give the Governor in Council power, on sufficient cause being shown, to extend the appropriations in the supplementary estimates, for a short period, in no case to exceed three months.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill to amend the Act relating to the indemnity of members of both Houses of Parliament. He explained that when members received $6 per day, they were paid from time to time at the rate of $4. Now, that it was $10, he wished to make the proportion the same, that was, $7.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON suggested that the 30 days' corner ought to be shifted forward to 50 or 60 days. It would contribute very much to the proper deliberation the House was bound to bestow on the public business.

The Bill was read the first time.

Mr. LANGLOIS introduced a Bill to prevent parties from breaking up the ice bridge between Quebec and Levis.

Mr. SPEAKER said on looking into the point he had raised on a former occasion with respect to this Bill, he found the modern practice did not require such a measure to originate by resolution in Committee of the Whole when the penalties it imposed were for the purpose of giving effect to the measure itself.

The Bill was read the first time.

THE HARBOUR OF ANTIGONISH.

Mr. McISAAC asked whether it is the intention of the Government to send an engineer next summer to make a survey of the Harbour of Antigonish with the view of ascertaining and making the improvements required?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Departmental Engineer has received instructions to make the examination referred to.

THE ELECTION FOR DORCHESTER.

Mr. ROULEAU asked what are the reasons why the writ of election for Dorchester was not issued until several months after the judgment annulling the election which took place in 1874?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have already told the hon. gentleman I could not tell him without consulting the late Minister of Justice, who is not in the city.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Taschereau in the Chair, to consider proposed changes in the Rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER remarked that the old and new rules had been published for the convenience of members; the first five remained as they at present existed; in No. 6 a change of very considerable importance had been made with reference to what had been regarded as the privileges of individual members. The old rule allowed members to secure the immediate clearance of the galleries of strangers; the new rescinded this rule as far as the individual was concerned. A member could call attention to the matter, and the Speaker or Chairman, as the case might be, should forthwith put the question as to whether the strangers should be ordered to withdraw, no debate, however, being permitted. The alteration would be that strangers could not be removed from the galleries on the motion of any individual member. The Speaker or Chairman would still have the power of ordering the galleries to be cleared. He moved that rule six be rescinded, and that the new rule printed on the margin be adopted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that the rules should be adopted from the beginning.

Mr. BLAIN urged the importance of so framing the rules as to enable the House to meet at an earlier hour, in order to expedite business to a very considerable extent. He did not see why they could not meet at noon for example, and adjourn at six p.m., the Committees meeting at nine a.m. He desired to obtain an expression of opinion from hon. members on this point, as he could not understand why Parliamentary business could not be transacted in a similar manner as other business.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was sure that every hon. member would agree with the hon. gentleman, if he (Mr. Blain) could propose any means of shortening the sitting, but for his part he confessed that he could not see his way towards the attainment of the object.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) held that the hours of Session should be limited, for no man, except he were endowed with an extraordinary constitution, could remain in the House until two or three o'clock every morning, and still not suffer from it, as the Committees besides sat in the morning. If it was necessary that the Sessions of Parliament should be longer, and be near three instead of two months, it ought to be done.

Hon. Gentlemen! No, No!

Mr. McDOUGALL did not say that three months Sessions were necessary, but if they were requisite in order to have the work properly done, they ought to be so extended. The Sessional allowance should not be increased, however, under such circumstances, if the hon. members did not wish it; at any rate, it was impossible to have the work well done under the present system.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD hoped that the time of the Committee would not be taken up with the discussion of this subject, which, nevertheless, was extremely important. It should be subsequently considered as a separate and distinct question.

Mr. YOUNG thought that this was a reason why they should not re-adopt rules at present in existence, as business would be greatly facilitated if they confined their attention to the mere changes proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER—That would be better.

The sixth clause, as amended.

“If any member shall take notice that strangers are present, Mr. Speaker or Chairman (as the case may be), shall forthwith put the question that strangers be ordered to withdraw, without any debate or amendment: Provided, that Mr. Speaker or the Chairman may, whenever he thinks proper, order the withdrawal of Strangers,” was then taken up.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell);—what was the meaning of “Chairman” in this rule?

Mr. SPEAKER—It means the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House. It is an exact copy of the English Rule.

The Rule, as amended was adopted. Rule 19, as amended, was then taken up; it read as follows:—

The ordinary daily routine of business in the House shall be as follows:—

Mr. SPEAKER explained, that it was proposed to make the fixed rule of the House what had been their practice for some years. He requested hon. members to read the changes over very carefully.

Mr. ROULEAU thought that hon. members when questioning the Ministers should be allowed the opportunity of making explanations. He had asked the First Minister why the writ for the last election in the County of Dorchester had been delayed; and the answer had been that the hon. gentleman could not state the reason as he had no communication with the late Minister of Justice, who issued the writ. He considered that this statement was incorrect.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I call the hon. gentleman to order, as this is no time to debate that matter.

Mr. PALMER—The hon. member has a right to allude to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Certainly; as an illustration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. member has controverted the statement made to this House, and he has no right to do that. He cannot now enter on a criticism concerning what I said. I call the hon. gentleman to order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I take it that the hon. gentleman is amenable to criticism; he is there for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—But not at this particular time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—If there is an inadvertent error, the hon. gentleman should be allowed to point out in the way of illustration. The hon. gentleman is not out of order.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman is endeavoring to evade a distinct rule of the House.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman can certainly allude to this matter in the way of illustration.

Mr. ROULEAU—I would state this case merely as an example.

Mr. TASCHEREAU—The hon gentleman can cite his own case, but he cannot discuss the merits of it.

Mr. ROULEAU—The First Minister told me that he could not answer my question, but the present Minister of Justice took office on the 9th of May, and my election took place on the 8th of last July.

Mr. SPEAKER remarked that it had been the practice for two or three years past to allow Government notices of motions and orders to be taken up on Monday, but it was open, nevertheless, to any individual member to object and prevent it under the rule as amended; it would not be so possible any longer to obstruct business.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD agreed in the expediency of altering the rule in this respect, and explained that it had been decided in Committee to insert notices of motion on the order for Thursday immediately after half-past seven o'clock.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said that difficulty was experienced in regard to these notices of motion principally by the want of diligence on the part of hon. gentlemen themselves. If they were to put their notices on the paper at an early part of the Session when there was not much business before the House, business would be greatly facilitated. In the second place the notices after they had been put on the paper were allowed to stand until the end of the Session was approached, and it was impossible for them to be brought up.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL granted that there was a good deal in this; but would state that there was a very important motion of his on the paper, which was placed in such a position that it was questionable if it would be reached this Session. He was of opinion that notices of motion should be resumed after half past seven o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought the difficulty in regard to notices of motion might be remedied by adopting a system of classification, by which they could divide the motions into opposed and unopposed motions. Such an arrangement he was satisfied would keep the paper cleared of these incumbrances.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he remembered some conversation having taken place on this subject in the Committee, and inasmuch as there might have been some misunderstanding as to his reply, he would make the concession desired. The orders for Thursday would, therefore, be as follows:—

Questions put by members.

Public bills and orders.

Notices of motion.

Government notices of motion.

Government orders.

Other notices of motion.

The words "until six o'clock," would be struck out.

The orders for Thursday were then adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adoption of the following in lieu of the 58th Rule:—

"Any person seeking to obtain any Private Bill, giving any exclusive privilege, or profit, or private or corporate advantage, or for any amendment of the former Act, shall be required to deposit with the Clerk of the House, eight days before the meeting of the House, a copy of such Bill in the English or French language, with a sum sufficient to pay for translating and printing the same—600 copies to be printed in English, and 200 copies to be printed in French—the translation to be done by the Officers of the House and the printing by the Contractor. The applicant shall also be required to pay the Accountant of the House a sum of $200, and the cost of printing the same for the Statutes, and lodge the receipt for the same with the Clerk of the Committee to which such Bill is referred—such payment to be made immediately after the second reading, and before the consideration of the Bill by such Committee."

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said those who had to deal with the Private Bills coming before the House felt the necessity of an assistant—some legal expert, competent to draft and prepare the clauses of such measures. Such an officer should be appointed to be absolutely at the disposal of the Private Bills Committee during the Session of Parliament. He had felt, during the present Session, it was utterly impossible for even the professional members of the House to give proper attention to the numerous Private Bills brought under their notice.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) concurred in this opinion. Either the promoters of Bills must have the clauses reconstructed by their legal advisers and returned to the Committee for further consideration, or some legal assistant must be employed to attend to such work. The time had arrived when the Government itself must have more assistance. He believed the Minister of Justice should have the assistance of another officer. He hoped the Government would take this matter into consideration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the subject had occupied the attention of the Government on several occasions. He had felt the pressure of this kind of work very much while sitting on the other side of the House, and a little more since he had become a Minister of the Crown. He would be very glad to have private members of this House relieved from the pressure brought to bear on them in shaping these Private Bills. There had been negligence of late years in the preparation of some of those bills, and the work of reconstructing them devolved upon a very limited number of the active members of the House. He was not prepared at the moment to suggest any decided plan of action, though he would be very glad to hear the opinion of the hon. gentleman on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said a scheme might be devised by which, without any material increase of expense, the object of the hon. member for Chateauguay might be attained. The Senate had a law officer who could not be very busy; the House of Commons also had a law clerk. Three men would be quite sufficient for the work. The assistant to the two law officers should be at the service of the Private Bills' Committee during the Session.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT entirely concurred with the hon. member for Chateauguay regarding Private Bills, in which, under the present system, clauses were at times introduced of a conflicting, or directly contradictory character. He doubted whether this class of Bills would decrease in number. Companies who desired to borrow money abroad would always come to this House, and as the country grew, these would rather increase in number in his opinion. The rule with reference to the reception of Private Bills should not be relaxed during the Session. The suggestion of the right hon. member for Kingston would probably go a very great way towards remedying the evil of which complaint was made, but how far, he was not prepared to say.

Mr. PLUMB supported the proposition of the hon. member for Chateauguay. Clauses under such circumstances were inserted in Bills, sometimes, perhaps, inadvertently, and these were cited as precedents, rendering it almost impossible to reject others of a similar nature. The matter was very important, as companies by means of these Bills sometimes obtained large sums abroad; and they required the careful consideration of the Government.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was of the utmost moment that some effort should be made to promote uniformity in the bills passed. If the most obvious excrescences were removed from them, it was about as much as they could effect under the present system. A general standard for these measures should be settled; and they should be couched in the same phraseology in order that they might obtain the same construction in courts of law. A parliamentary officer might be deputed to attend to bills, and put them in some sort of shape. The Sessions were short, and owing to very great pressure on their time, particularly on Bills which were submitted at a late hour, did not receive the same attention as they would have obtained at an earlier period, the assistance of professional draughtsmen should be secured; and public measures passed by Parliament should be made practically Government measures. The same remarks applied to Government legislation; measures were prepared long after the House opened in consequence of the representations of hon. members; and if trained draughtsmen were employed, their legislation would be more creditable than it now was. Money could not be spent better than in carrying out this reform, as obscure Acts of Parliament led to law-suits, and cost the public countless sums. He believed that this Assembly possessed admirable machinery for its purposes; but no machinery was more imperfect than the Committee of the whole House.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought hon. members would admit that when he was Minister of the Crown, he submitted to the House a fair share of Bills for their consideration. Indeed, the hon. member for Bruce had on one occasion remarked that there was quite a plethora of them. He at that time had been very largely indebted to the Law Clerk of the Senate as regarded the preparation of these Bills; and he thoroughly endorsed the view, that experienced men should be employed to do this. It would moreover require very little additional expense to carry the suggestion of the hon. member for Chateaugay into effect.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not agree with the opinion, that eight days, as mentioned in the clause, was too short a time for the purpose in question, as a charge might interfere with the intentions of persons desirous of promoting Bills.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON, in reply to Sir John A. Macdonald, stated that the hon. gentleman had educated the House into the belief that sixty days should be the normal length of Parliament; of these sixty thirty were passed before any Private Bill could be referred to the Committee, leaving a similar period for their passage through both Houses. Many of these Bills were highly important, and the Committee could not sit daily. It was perfectly impossible to consider them in detail, under the present system. The Sessions of the old Parliament lasted for three, four and six months; and more time was accordingly at their disposal at that period for these purposes. Then, besides, they had the advantage of having two subordinate law officers, solicitors, one from each Province, who supervised the legislation. The Government was moreover held responsible for the whole legislation, including Private Bills.

Mr. MILLS enquired whether this clause—"the fee payable on the second reading of any Private Bill is paid only in the House in which said Bill originates, but the cost of printing the same is paid in each House"—was omitted from the new rule.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it was, as its insertion was unnecessary.

Mr. BLAIN urged that the services of legal gentlemen to examine Private Bills should be secured, to prevent such improper provisions as he had recently noticed in connection with an Insurance Bill and an Investment Bill. In the latter instance a provision was introduced, enabling the company to borrow to the extent of the paid-up capital and of the securities they held, and besides this to take unlimited deposits. The time for disposing of these Bills by the Committee was exceedingly limited; and such assistance as he had mentioned should be secured, in order that a uniform character of some sort might be given to these Bills.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE at this point explained that the 49th Clause, as amended, should read:—

"No Petition for any Private Bill is received by the House after the first ten days (not three weeks as printed) of each Session; nor may any Private Bill be presented to the House after the first three (not four) weeks of each Session; nor may any Report of any Standing or Select Committee upon a Private Bill be received after the first five (not six) weeks of each Session," &c.

On motion of hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, Section 49 was amended to read as follows:—

"49. No Petition for any Private Bill is received by the House after the first ten days of each Session; nor may any Private Bill be presented to the House after the first two weeks of each Session; nor may any Report of any Standing or Select Committee upon a Private Bill be received after the first six weeks of each Session.

"59. Every Private Bill, when read a second time, is referred to the Standing Committee charged with the consideration of such Bill. Bills relating to Banks, Insurance, Trade and Commerce, to Committee on Banking and Commerce; Bills relating to Railways, Canals, Telegraphs, Canal and Railway Bridges, to the Committee on Railways; the Bills not coming under these classes to the Committee on Private Bills, and all petitions before the House for or against the Bills are amended as referred to such Committee."

Section 2 of Section 60 was amended as follows:—

"On the day of the posting of any Bill under this Rule, the Deputy Clerk of the House shall cause a notice of such posting to be appended to the printed Votes and Proceedings of the day."

Section No. 70 was amended as follows:—

"Except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity no motion for suspension or modification of any rule applying to Private Bills or petitions for Private Bills shall be entertained by the House until after reference is made to the several Standing Committees charged with the consideration of Private Bills and reports made thereon by one or more of such Committees."

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE, Section 70 and 71 were amended so as to read as follow:—

"70. A Book, to be called "Private Bill Register," shall be kept, in which Book shall be entered by a Clerk appointed for that business by the Clerk of The House, the name, description and place of residence of the parties applying for the Bill, or of their Agent, and all the proceedings thereon, from the Petition to the passing of the Bill—such entry to specify briefly each proceeding in the House or in any Committee to which the Bill or the Petition may be referred, and the day on which the Committee is appointed to sit—such Book to be open to public inspection daily during office hours.

"71. The Clerk of The House shall cause lists of all Private Bills and Petitions for such Bills upon which any Committee is appointed to sit, specifying the time of the meeting and the room where the Committee shall sit, to be prepared daily by the Clerk of the Committee to which such Bills are referred, and shall cause the same to be hung up in the Lobby."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the following Section be inserted in the Rules:—

"87. This House will, in future, appoint the Committees of Supply, and Ways and Means, at the commencement of every Session, so soon as an Address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's Speech."

Mr. SPEAKER explained that this clause had been a Standing Order. It was out of place there, and they had decided to convert it into a rule.

The motion was carried.

Clause No. 93 was amended as follows:—

"All Bills shall be printed before the second reading, in both languages, except Bills merely continuing Acts or other short Bills of minor importance, with the printing of which the Speaker or the House may dispense."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. SPEAKER said with regard to the Standing Orders in reference to the Library, that it had been mooted in the Library Committee that as they had a statute conferring certain powers upon the Committee, the Standing Orders might be dispensed with. The Library Committee had not reported, and he merely mentioned the matter in order that the hon. gentlemen might give it some consideration.

The remaining sections were passed with verbal amendment.

The Committee rose, and reported the resolutions as amended.

The resolutions were read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

The following Bills were referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of making certain amendments—To incorporate "The National Exchange Company;" to incorporate "The Scottish Canadian Loan Company;" to incorporate "The Trust Company of Canada."

On motion of Mr. Workman the title of the latter was changed to "The Investment Company of Canada."

Mr. OLIVER asked what the amendments were.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said in the clause relating to deposits, it was proposed to restrict them in receiving deposits to one-half of their paid-up capital. There was also a clause by which the parties accepting these charters agreed to come under the provisions of the general law which he sincerely hoped would be submitted to Parliament next Session.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the whole question would be discussed next Session, when he hoped to bring down a general Act under which all these companies should be incorporated.

Mr. YOUNG was very glad to hear this announcement. It was evident that the general principle with regard to the borrowing power of these companies ought to be definitely settled by the Government. It had become a matter of necessity that there should be a general measure, and one of such a nature as would ensure success in the management of these companies.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK stated that with the member who had first spoken he approved of the policy of the Government in limiting the power of companies in making deposits; at least, these should be limited to the extent named, fifty per cent. of the paid-up capital. He would, however, as soon see this power struck out altogether, as it would be beneficial to the companies themselves. He would, as an instance of this, mention that he had been entrusted with a Bill the promoters of which had requested him to take out the deposit clause. As to the borrowing powers, concerning which the Government had changed their policy to a considerable extent since the Bill had been before the Banking and Commerce Committee, he thought that if the Ministry intended, as they have announced, to introduce a general Bill next year, restricting them and making them more stringent, at all events they had made a mistake in now granting greater powers than they proposed to do in their Bills, as it would be much more easy to reduce them at present than in the future. If they now gave power to the extent of 10 per cent., it would be very difficult next year to oblige companies to pay up 25 per cent. or cease doing business. If such was their idea they should now insist on limiting these powers to the paid-up capital. If these powers were to be only 10 per cent. at present, they should be restricted to the unpaid and not to the subscribed capital. The Trust and Loan and another company had found more restricted powers very beneficial. If wider powers were generally allowed, it was possible that, as an hon. gentleman had remarked, one of these companies would one day make a grand smash-up, entailing untold grief and misfortune. It would have been better had the Government adhered to the 25 per cent. paid up clause, limiting the borrowing powers to the amount of the unpaid capital.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—What was the amount of capital paid-up of the company the hon. gentleman is interested in promoting?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Ten per cent.; but they are seeking to have the borrowing powers restricted to the unpaid capital.

Mr. BLAIN entirely approved of the extensive borrowing powers which had been conferred. He could understand very well that people might incur serious risks if such powers were granted in cases where companies were permitted to receive deposits; but there could be no possible risk in connection with companies of this character, the deposit clause being struck out. Such a company could go into the market with $100,000 paid-up capital, and tell capitalists that the remaining portion of the stock—in one case it amounted to a million—could be mortgaged as security, for any loan made. They might as well try to limit the farmer to the sum he might borrow on his property, as to limit the power of such companies in this relation. Gentlemen who had $100,000 to $900,000 to lend, would take very good care that they obtained for it ample security.

The principle was different, however, when the deposit clause was in question. One of the Bills which belonged to Montreal had permitted to borrow to the extent of the paid-up capital and the face of the securities held by the company, and after they had pledged everything they had, they were allowed to take deposits to an unlimited amount. Suppose advantage was taken of this liberty to the extent of $500,000; when the poor people, who really ought to be protected in connection with this class of legislation, and who had laid up $50, $100 or $200 to fall back upon in case they were out of employment, come to draw it, they might be unable to obtain a single dollar. It was their duty to protect these people, but he did not feel that there was any necessity for protecting men who had $100,000 to loan.

He trusted, that when the Government settled upon a general policy, it would not be based upon the view of the hon. gentleman from Waterloo. Companies should be allowed to pledge their credit on the principle that they had the power of calling up the unpaid capital in order to meet their liabilities; this, in his opinion, was sufficient security. Another class of investment companies ought really to be encouraged by the Government. They were organized in Great Britain, where money was obtainable at a very low rate of interest, and they came here to invest it. Our companies could thus borrow on debentures of five per cent., whereas when they paid on the stock, and not on the bonus, they paid from ten and twelve per cent. He hoped that the policy of the Government would not be one that would prevent these companies springing up all over the country, as competition might lessen the rate of interest.

The Bills were reported from the Committee, read the third time, and passed.

BURLINGTON BAY FISHERIES.

Mr. BAIN moved for an Order of the House for a return of all licenses issued by the Inspector of Fisheries for fishing in Burlington Bay and the Dundas Maish during the years 1872, '73 '74 '75; the names of the parties to whom such licenses were granted; for what periods; and in what way the proceeds from said licenses have been applied; the return to include all manner of catching, taking or spearing fish. Also for a copy of all instructions issued to John W. Kerr, Inspector of Fisheries, as to the rights, rules and regulations for taking fish in said waters during such period.—Carried.

BOARD OF TRADE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Macdonald (Toronto) in the Chair, to further consider the Bill entitled an Act to amend the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 51, entitled: "An Act to authorize the incorporation of Boards of Trade in the Dominion," and reported it with an amendment, which was read the second time.

DOMINION BANK DEPOSITS.

The motion of Mr. Bowell for an Order of the House for a statement of all moneys lying at the credit of the Dominion, in any Bank, or in the hands of any financial agents, &c, being taken up for further consideration,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER stated that he intended to take advantage of the present opportunity to make a few remarks in this relation. The hon. mover of the resolution had gone into the subject at such great length, as to make it unnecessary for him to do more than glance at some of the statements that had been made. The point he had raised on former occasions, in connection with the practice of the Government in making deposits in the banks, was in the first instance that it was unfair. The admission which they already made, as to the mode in which that power had been exercised, he thought would render it unnecessary to offer any labored arguments to show the impossibility of carrying on banking on fair and equal terms, while the Government followed their present course in this regard. Though the Finance Minister made an exception to the statement, which was assumed to be correct, that the amount of money entered in the column asked on demand, represented the same not bearing interest, he thought he was safe in saying that it was not only so regarded by the hon. members of the House, and the people of this country, but that it was substantially correct that banks would not pay interest for money on call. In the second place, although there might be some exceptions to the rule, yet the amount of money held on demand represented the amount held as not bearing interest, while the amount payable after notice on a certain day, represented the money bearing interest.

The admission of the Finance Minister, that one Bank in the country had on the average for an entire year, $360,000 without interest was sufficient in his opinion to establish the point he wished to submit to the House. He drew the attention of the hon. members to the fact that the practice of which he complained had grown up under the present Administration, and was fraught with all the inconveniences and dangers to which he had directed notice. He was quite aware that the Government must necessarily have allowed very large allowances to accumulate, owing to the fact that large payments of interest had to be made semi-annually, and also the sub-dividends for the different Provinces; and the course he contended the Administration should have taken was to use their own bank in this connection, their own fiscal agent in this country, the Bank of Montreal. This was not because he had any partiality for that institution, or because he wished to give it any advantage over any other banking institution, but because it was regarded as one of the strongest in the country, and occupied the position of being the Government Bank. Through the Bank of Montreal, to a very large extent at least, all collections were made, and if the dealings of the Ministry were with their own banking and fiscal agents in the country, it removed the objection to which he had drawn the attention of the House—the favoritism that could be practised by the Government. He had said that this was unfair, and when it was shown by the Finance Minister's admission that one of our banking institutions, the Bank of Ontario, received from the Government on the average no less than $360,000 during the entire year, without paying interest on it, he thought that he had established a fact which required nothing further to sustain the charge made concerning the favoritism that could be practised, and the unfairness shown to other banking institutions which were obliged to compete with Banks enjoying such great advantages.

Then they had complained that the policy of the Government in borrowing a large sum of money in the English market, at a time when it was not required by the circumstances of the country, and spreading it about over the Dominion in the hands of the banks lead to undue inflation. The Hon. Finance Minister himself admitted that one of the most serious causes of the commercial depression from which the country suffered was the undue inflation caused by the Banks putting out so much money. He did not see any mode of extending and increasing that inflation more surely than by Government placing in the hands of the Banks fourteen and a half millions of public money. The Banks naturally wished to make use of that money, and they placed it in hands which, but for the plethora of cash, they would not have trusted it with, and the consequence was great injury to the country by the inflation which it produced. He had before stated that this policy was an unsafe policy, for just in proportion as the Banks were getting into trouble or weakening they would bring all the pressure they could bring to bear to get further deposits, and the Government in granting these deposits exposed the country to severe losses of public money. The admission of the Finance Minister that he could not get his money when he wanted it—

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I made no such admission.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had admitted it in terms stronger than words, when he told the House that he had put a larger loan on the market than was then required, because he did not want to go back again for some years, as it was not only inconvenient but disadvantageous to go borrowing frequently in the money market. But the hon. gentleman went back in another year and borrowed again more money than the country required, because, as he told them, if he had called in the money from the Banks the result would have been disastrous to the commerce of the Dominion. He considered that this established the fact that not only inflation was produced at a most unfortunate time, but that the practice was an unsafe practice, for as the member for Montreal West had said, it was not only known to the Minister of Finance but to every business man in the country, that if the money had been demanded and the parties were obliged to pay it back, the result would have been a financial crisis in the country, and Bank after Bank would have been tumbled down, producing disaster to the country. There was nothing else to warrant the hon. gentleman in going back to England for a new loan, but to avoid pressing the banks for this money. If the Government were allowed to thus go to the markets of the world and sell our debentures to place fifteen millions of dollars in the hands of the Banks, a large portion of it without interest, it would be the most fatal blow at the principles of responsible Government that could be conceived, as it placed the Government in the position of being enabled to borrow unlimited sums of money and distributing it among the Banks on the eve of a general election, to influence the country. They had seen Mr. Thompson, President of the Bank of Ontario, issue a circular to the customers of that Bank, telling them the value it would be to that institution if the party in power were sustained; and they had seen the Manager of that Bank again issuing a circular telling the customers the value to them of sustaining the Government, thereby getting the means by which they could make discounts easier. Could any evidence of a more startling character be given of the disastrous effect of the Government having the power to mortgage the revenues of the country to obtain money to distribute among their friends? It was unfair to the banks that were not favoured in this way, and he thought he had said enough to show that it was an exceedingly corrupt arrangement. He did not wish to go outside of the strict record, but the mere fact they had a great monetary institution of this country on the eve of a general election urging upon the customers the necessity of sustaining the Government was evidence that the whole system was corrupt. When he showed that this very bank received $360,000 of the people's money for a whole year without interest, taking out of the public purse at least $30,000 per annum, it was sufficient to prove that the system was not only unfair, but it was unsafe and essentially corrupt. These institutions had power enough, and influence enough in relation to public affairs without any such extension of it, and such unfair means of putting it into operation. They had an independence of Parliament Act, but under this system it was an absurdity to keep the law on the Statute Book. Under this law any member of this House receiving a benefit from the Government to the extent of one dollar, his seat becomes vacant, and he was obliged to walk out. But this was a perfect farce, if a president of a bank could receive $30,000 a year of public money from the Government by means of their deposits. He was told that the late Government pursued this policy, but he challenged the accuracy of that statement. He found that the Globe newspaper of the 7th of March ventured upon the statement that under the late Government, just before they went out of power, they had no less than $701,000 in the Montreal District Savings Bank, "which large sum was not paying in the shape of interests a single dollar." The Government must of course necessarily accumulate large balances at certain periods, but he proposed to show that the course of the late Government was diametrically opposed to that of the present Government.

The late Government had a bank, that of Montreal, and their collections were made through it. The only exceptions while the late Government were in power, in which the collections were not made through the Bank of Montreal and its agencies throughout the Dominion, were in a few cases where the Merchant's Bank had agencies and the Montreal Bank had none. Then he came to another point which he thought he was safe in saying was about the only exception in relation to the prospects of money. Formerly when exchange was wanted the Government bought from the Bank of Montreal and sold to the Bank of Montreal at current rates. Sir Francis Hincks changed that system and issued tenders when he wanted exchange, and accepted the lowest; in the same way he issued tenders when he wanted to sell, and accepted the highest with the understanding that the money, until it was required, would remain with the successful tenderers. The Government thus obtained a higher rate than they otherwise would, and no one banking institution had the least advantage over another, because tenders were invited from all the banks, and the one that offered exchange at the lowest rate had their tender accepted, and the one that offered to purchase at the highest rate had their tender accepted. There was another manner in which the banks obtained small deposits of Government money. The Government had passed a law taking the circulation of small notes into their own hands, under the operation of which law the Government were receiving $300,000 per annum.

Under that law, of course, it was important to put the small notes of the Government in circulation, and any bank that asked for $40,000 or $50,000 of the $1 and $2 gave a deposit certificate to pay the money back at any moment that it was required. With regard to the statement made by the Globe in reference to the City and District Savings Bank, he would state that institution was far more available for the redemption of their small notes. The statement that the Government did not receive interest on the $701,000 deposited with that Bank was an entire misapprehension. Five per cent. interest was received on that money.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say the Government received interest on that $701,000?

Mr. TUPPER—Yes, Sir, and I have the authority of Sir Francis Hincks for making the statement. When the Globe published the statement he wrote to that journal showing the fallacy into which it had fallen.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I would say there are two sums; one of $400,000 which did bear interest and another of $701,000 which did not bear interest.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was only giving the statement he had received from Sir Francis Hincks, and knowing his general character for accuracy he thought it would have been sufficient. He then proceeded to deprecate the dangerous policy of the Government in distributing this money in the Banks of the country without interest.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT desired to send the hon. gentleman over a paper from the Finance Department in which the two sums were stated.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that paper showed that on October 31st the money deposited with the Montreal District Savings Bank was $701,000; not at interest, and $400,000 at interest, making $1,100,000 deposited in that institution. It showed that public deposits of the country were in thirty-seven banks in various sums, those on call amounting to $2,100,000 and those not on call to $2,300,000. He said the House should understand that when these enormous amounts were deposited in the City and District Savings Bank of Montreal, the Hon. Finance Minister, Sir Francis Hincks, was a Director or President of that institution. He only alluded to this because the hon. gentleman had denied the possibility of maintaining the independence of Parliament as long as the Director of a bank was allowed to be a member of Parliament, while Government deposits were made in that bank.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I object to Government deposits being extended to banks at all except the Government bank.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman denied a system which must have obtained under the late Government of which he was a member, namely that a member of Parliament must not be a shareholder in a bank that received Government deposits. The deposits were spread over

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

37 different institutions, and of course members of Parliament were likely to be shareholders in the larger and more stable institutions. This was a new view which never occurred to him while he was on the Government side of the House but one which he had learned in the abstractions of opposition.

Mr. BOWELL thought the hon. Minister of Justice wrong in the remarks which he had just made with reference to the Finance Minister of the late Government. If his recollection served him right, Sir Francis Hincks had no connection with that bank at the time he held office.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—But he was a member of Parliament.

Mr. BOWELL said he spoke under correction, but he would say that the hon. gentleman was in error in the impression which he evidently desired the House to form in reference to the position held in that bank by Sir Francis Hincks at the time he was in office. The charge was made on a previous occasion, and he (Sir Francis) immediately wrote to the paper which made the accusation and gave a positive and distinct denial.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that Sir Francis was not a member of Parliament then.

Mr. BOWELL—I do not say anything of the kind; I premised my remarks by stating that I was not positive as to the position he held, but I am quite satisfied, from a conversation I had with him four days ago, that he was not in the position which the Hon. Minister of Justice would lead the House to believe he was when these deposits were made.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had stated he was in error on that point; he forgot at the moment that Sir Francis Hincks had retired. The fact remained, however, that he was a member of Parliament.

Mr. BOWELL said that may be. Returning to the question before the House, he said he had no objection to the return being carried back just as far as the Hon. Minister of Finance or the Government desired; it would only show the correctness of the position he assumed when he made the motion—that the system in vogue should be changed. If the Hon. Finance Minister desired to do full justice in this matter, he would state also in the return that when the late Government found that they had large surplus deposits in the banks, for which they had no use, they came down to the House and reduced taxation to the extent of nearly $3,000,000. He wished, however, more particularly to call attention to the explanation of the hon. gentleman in reference to the difference between the returns made by the banks and published in the Official Gazette and those which were laid before the House by the Finance Minister's officer, Mr. Langton. The hon. gentleman said that these inaccuracies were entirely attributable to the fact that they were made up to a different date.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—That is precisely what I did not say.

Mr. BOWELL—That is precisely what you are reported to have said.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I said it was owing to two things—one that they were made on the different dates and another that the entry warrants were included in one account and not in the other.

Mr. BOWELL said he was reading from the Hansard. On page 779 the hon. gentleman was reported to have said: "In the first place, the discrepancy between the statement of bank balances as brought down by Mr. Langton in obedience to the demand of the Public Accounts Committee, and those published in the Official Gazette was entirely attributable to the fact that they were made up to different dates, and dates at which there would be always a considerable variation in the balance."

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT asked if the hon. gentleman could not read the following sentence also: "There were conveniences attendant upon it, but the disadvantage inherent in the system was this: the Government were always obliged to keep, in addition to the gold reserve, a very considerable amount absolutely

"at call, and he doubted very much whether it would be expedient for a Government, however it might for an individual, to demand interest on sums so deposited."

Mr. BOWELL said the additional explanation did not affect, in the least, the point to which he stated he desired to call the attention of the House. Any ordinary intellect could understand in taking up those accounts and being told that one was made up to the end and the other up to the first of the month how discrepancies might have occurred for a month. But he pointed out that these discrepancies continued for months in succession, the figures remaining almost precisely the same as when they first occurred. In Mr. Langton's return, $340,000 were given as being in the bank in March, 1875, while the bank returns should $547,000. The same discrepancy only to a larger extent existed also in the months of April, May and June. If it had occurred but once he could easily understand that the explanation given by the Finance Minister would be the correct one, but how the discrepancy could remain for four or five months in succession he could not understand, and the Finance Minister had not, and apparently could not explain. On looking over the accounts of the money not bearing interest he found precisely the same state of affairs.

He found, referring to the Gazette returns of July, 1875, the non-bearing interest deposits were $611,302, while Mr. Langton's statement showed only $277,230. How was this large difference of $337,071 to be explained? There was another point to which the hon. gentleman had referred in his explanations the other evening in reply to the hon. member for Cumberland. He stated "that up to June 30th, 1875, instead of $600,000 deposited in the Ontario Bank without interest there was only about half that amount." Now, the only inference to be drawn from that statement was that he (Mr. Bowell) had said that previous to June there was a sum amounting to $600,000 in the Ontario Bank not drawing interest. He (Mr. Bowell) had made no such statement, but had given the figures precisely as he found them in the Official Gazette, and also in the return laid before the Public Accounts Committee. What he had stated was that the sum to the credit of the Dominion in the Ontario Bank in June, 1875, bearing interest was $669,000, while the sum on demand was but $389,000, and he had pointed out this remarkable fact that in July, the month following, the interest bearing deposits were reduced from $669,000 to $206,000, while the non-bearing interest-account was run up to $611,000; and in explanation the hon. gentleman said that the Ontario Bank had probably included sums which it had on deposit in its foreign branches. If that were true, he (Mr. Bowell) could not understand why the aggregates should not agree. If that statement were correct the Finance Minister in bringing down his returns should have shown that the banks held sums in other parts of the world as well as in the Dominion, and those who had the returns in their hands would have understood how matters were. Unfortunately when these returns were asked for just as little information was given as they could possibly furnish. There was one other point referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland as to these deposits having been used by the banks for commercial purposes. The Finance Minister the other night explained that he gave instructions to the banks not to use this money on which no interest was demanded; yet when he issued his circular informing the banks he would require that money and they would have to pay it, the fact of putting that request into force would have so crippled some of them as to injure their standing in the country; and the result was that instead of the country receiving the benefit of its own money, he (the Finance Minister) had to go to England and borrow, on which the public were now paying interest. His (Mr. Bowell's) object in bringing this matter before the House was to show that certain banks which had rendered political services to this Government had received benefits from the public treasury to aid in giving large dividends to their stockholders which they should not receive. That was a dangerous power to place in the hands of any Finance Minister, and this House should insist on some other course being adopted to prevent such acts being perpetrated in the future. The Government owed it to itself and to the country to adopt some system by which these returns could be made in a way that they could be understood, and to prevent public money being used to reward political supporters.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was no objection to giving the information required, provided it extended from the 31st December, 1871. The amount on deposit at that date was nearly $8,000,000, of which $4,300,000 bore no interest, an amount quite as large as any on the average that has been kept since then. As to the reasons why it was necessary to keep a large amount of money without interest, he had sufficiently explained this already, and he did not want to go over it again. Hon. gentlemen who desired to read his explanations would find them in two places in the Hansard. What he wished to point out was that both Governments—and he did not wish to be understood as censuring the preceding Administration—having enormous works to carry on, with expenditures varying from three to twelve millions in a single month, and having to prepare for the redemption of a large amount of legal tender notes, were obliged to keep heavy deposits in the banks without interest. As to the soundness of that position, no gentleman who had watched the Government business of this country was likely to differ in opinion from himself.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the Government having adopted the policy of issuing Dominion notes, could only make that available by getting them into circulation. Any bank could get forty or fifty thousand dollars of those notes at any time on the same terms—to have them as money on call—but the Government was not losing interest on the money because it had then circulated and obtained the advantage of that circulation.

In the other case, the City and District Savings Bank, as had been already explained, had been used by the Government as a banking agency in Montreal because, at all events, they circulated Government notes; and when they had a considerable amount of money accumulated it was charged to them at 5 per cent interest.

His hon. friend, he observed, shook his head, but he had the authority at all events of Sir Francis Hincks for stating this; he held the letter of Sir Francis Hincks in his hand dealing with this matter, and he was sure that they would be glad to hear it read in that gentleman's absence.

The hon. gentleman said, that on the 31st of October $4,500,000 had been distributed among the banks; but turning to the returns what did they find? The hon. gentleman referred to a very large number of banks, but he had already explained that it was for the purpose of circulating our small notes that they got any amount of money on call; and the hon. gentleman would observe that these were sums of $100,000, with very few exceptions, precisely the amounts required for one and two dollar notes. The $701,186 had accumulated in the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, the Government's banking agency for the purpose of redeeming our small notes—for which object they had had to establish an expensive department at Toronto, making the Government's relation entirely different (a purely business relation) with any other bank in the country save the Government bank. Then they subtracted the amount deposited in the Bank of Montreal, $1,215,786, and his hon. friend would see that at St. John, where there was an assistant Receiver-General, there was in the hands of the Government itself $225,261, the same as if it was in the vaults here; because it was in the custody of a Government officer, who held it for the redemption of our small notes.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The hon. member is mistaken; he will perceive that this deposit is in the hands of the Bank of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—It was then the Bank of Montreal agency at St. John and the same at Halifax. It was still, however, held for the Government. He knew that we had an Assistant Receiver-General at St. John and Halifax.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It was just a deposit with the Bank of Montreal and nothing more.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—In Halifax there was also an Assistant Receiver-General.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—No, Sir; I will explain. Those statements simply show the amounts held at Montreal, St. John and Halifax by the Bank of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—This was not so stated there. The statement there was improperly made. Among the banks the Bank of Montreal was mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The statement which the hon. gentleman has read from is one made by his own Finance Minister.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—All he could say was this: he was aware that there was an Assistant Receiver-General's Department at Halifax, and he had known a million of the public money to be in that gentleman's hands. A change might have taken place, and the Bank of Montreal might have been exclusively used. He would now show the deductions from the amount there stated:—Bank of Montreal in Montreal, $1,218,786; Bank of Montreal at St. Johns, N.B., $225,251; Bank of Montreal, Moncton, N.B., $131,948; and the Bank of Montreal at Halifax, $525,905. They had besides in the British Columbia Bank, $300,000; and the hon. gentleman, of course, knew that this was also exceptional. The Pacific Railway surveys were progressing, and it was necessary for the public service to have a deposit in this bank for that purpose, so that out of the total $4,552,676 not bearing interest, the House would perceive that $2,897,879 was to be taken, leaving $1,654,797 as the total amount held outside the direct Government agencies to meet the amount of money distributed among the banks which had one and two-dollar notes for the purpose of putting them in circulation, to which he had already drawn the attention of the House; and the exchange sold by us, it remained with them until it was required in order to obtain a higher price for it, so that the hon. gentleman would see that the greatest service he could do them was to extend these returns and bring them down in the mode in which he had amended the resolution, because this would establish fully and completely the case—that this distribution of fifteen millions of money among the banks of this country, some five and six millions of it drawing no interest whatever, was a new policy, entered upon by the present Government, for which no authority and no precedent whatever from the former Government could be discovered. As Sir Francis Hincks was not present to defend himself against the statement which had been made, he would take the liberty of reading an extract from a letter addressed by Sir Francis himself:—

“MONTREAL, 27th Nov., 1875.

“MY DEAR DR. TUPPER,—

“In accordance with your request that I should write you on the subject of the Bank Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald's Government while I was Minister of Finance, I now beg to state that we adhered strictly to the principle of keeping the Government account with the Bank of Montreal. I made a change in the previous practice, which had been to purchase our sterling exchange from that bank, and I put it up to competition, taking it from the bank which charged the lowest. The same rule was followed when we sold exchange, and in that case, in order to obtain the highest rate, we invited tenders the money to remain with the successful competitors at 5 per cent. until required. The only other way in which banks obtained deposits was when they circulated our one and two dollar bills. A bank applying for, say $100,000 in small notes, would get them on a deposit receipt at call. I have no recollection of a case having ever occurred in which we took money from our own Bankers to place it elsewhere. The Bank of Montreal received the revenue at all points, but in a few cases, at very small towns where the Merchant's Bank had agencies and the Bank of Montreal none, Collectors were authorized to deposit with the Merchant's. I recollect a case in which Gooderham & Worts in Toronto, distillers, who paid a very large amount of revenue, asked to be allowed to deposit their duties in the Bank of Toronto where they kept their account. I explained the impossibility of meeting their wishes, as it would either expose us to the charge of obliging our friends, or involve the necessity of allowing other distillers or importers to pay their duties at their own banks. I believe my explanation was considered satisfactory and the matter dropped. I do not recollect a case of favouritism and I think it would be safe to assume that no such case occurred. * * *”

“(Signed), F. HINCKS.”

So much for the policy of the late Government, stated in distinct terms by Sir Francis Hincks, and it was as wide as the poles are asunder from the policy of the present Administration. He now came to the statement about the $701,000 which the hon. gentleman had stated was deposited in the City District Savings Bank without paying interest, and the hon. gentleman would find that this also was another misapprehension. Sir Francis wrote to the editor of the Globe as follows:—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

“SIR,—In your leading article yesterday you stated that on the 31st October, 1873, the Government had $701,000 in the hands of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, which large sum did not pay in the shape of interest a single dollar. Permit me to correct this statement. At the date in question the City and District Savings Bank were paying for $700,000, five per cent. They had a much smaller amount without interest. It may be proper to explain that the Government credits at the Savings Bank arose solely from the payment of Dominion one and two dollar notes over the counter. The practice has always been for the Government when not immediately requiring the money, to transfer round amounts to the interest-bearing account and it was the practice which was not, so far as I am aware, changed by the present Government on their assuming office.”

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The statement I have just submitted, is a statement made by Mr. Tilley, and being his official statement, I must presume that it is correct. Sir Francis Hincks must have forgotten it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER did not doubt that the hon. gentleman thought that the statement was quite correct—

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It is that of your own Finance Minister.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—It appeared from Sir Francis Hincks' letter that the state of the facts was as follows:—This was an agency of the Government, and all the money belonging to them was in one and two dollar notes, paid over the counter, and issued for the Government; and whenever any amount of money accumulated in round numbers, they placed it to the charge of the bank at five per cent. interest. This was the arrangement then made; and he presumed that it still existed. He was glad that he had had the opportunity of turning up this paper, when this subject was under consideration, in order that the facts might be laid clearly before the House.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that he believed Sir Francis Hincks stated, what he believed to be the case; he understood this, and he must conclude from the official statement which the hon. gentleman held in his hands, that Sir Francis had confounded the $400,000 with $700,000.

Mr. DOMVILLE remarked that certain banks did not send returns to Parliament; he believed that a portion of these institutions were not obliged to comply with the law on this subject. He saw that the custom existed before the present Government acceded to office, and it had continued. He did not think that the Government should place money in the hands of banks that did not make returns; if these were of any value they should certainly be made; and if they declined to conform to the laws the Ministry should not afford them any facilities.

As regarded the Lower Provinces, there could be no reason why the banks there should receive money in this way as some of them had the power of issuing one and two dollar bills. He might say there was no excuse for placing money in the hands of certain banks, on the plea of getting it into circulation, if they obtained their charter before Confederation. Secondly, these banks had no right to the money unless they made certain returns; they did not require circulation because they had it already. It was, at all events, no argument in favour of their financial position and policy if they declined to do what other similar institutions did.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was, no doubt, aware in many cases it was more a matter of convenience to the Government than to them.

The motion was carried.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Bill "An Act to amend the Weights and Measures Act of 1875" (Mr. Oliver) was read the second time.

BRITISH MERCHANT SHIPPING.

On motion to resume the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Hon. Mr. Mitchell for a resolution on which to found an Address to Her Majesty on the subject of proposed Legislation by the Imperial Parliament affecting British Merchant Shipping and its operation on Canadian tonnage; the motion of Mr. McLeod in amendment thereto, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Langevin in amendment to the said amendment, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he hoped his hon. friend would consent to the withdrawal of this motion. As he had pointed out the other evening, in the hon. gentleman's absence, it was somewhat inconvenient at present when the Government were in correspondence with the Imperial Government in this matter to have any positive or strong motion passed in this House. There was no material difference between the hon. gentleman's views and those of the Government, as he would probably find; and it would be much more convenient and conducive to the public service to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said after the hon. gentlemen's statement that there was no material difference of opinion between them, he would withdraw his motion.

The amendments of Mr. McLeod and Hon. Mr. Langevin were also withdrawn, and the order was discharged.

CONCURRENCE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the various reports of the Committee of Supply.

Items No. 1 to 48 were concurred in.

On item 49, Printing, printing paper and book-binding, $70,000.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked the cause of the increase of $20,000?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that it was the printing of the House, which was not so much under the control of the Government as the Printing Committee. This amount was a mere estimate judging from the expenses of the previous year and what had already been incurred; unless the House greatly restricted the amount of printing the sum asked for would not be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if the amount voted last year was insufficient?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that it was; there was a deficit of about $15,000.

The item was passed.

With reference to the previous item, 48, Consolidation of the Laws, $8,000.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL enquired whether that sum would cover the whole expense?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied in the negative; this was merely the commencement.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked if any idea could be given of the total cost?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was impossible at present to form an opinion; the work would extend over four or five years.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE concurred in this statement. This estimate was only a beginning.

Item 50 was then concurred in.

The House adjourned at Thirty minutes past Twelve o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next to consider the following resolution:—

"That as the duties formerly discharged by the Trinity House of Quebec, whose Warden was a salaried officer, now devolve on the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, it is expedient to provide that the said Harbour Commissioners may from time to time appropriate out of the Harbour Revenues a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars to the payment of an annual indemnity to the President of the Board of Harbour Commissioners."

The motion was carried.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

The following Bills were read the second and third time and passed:—

To amend "The Trade Mark and Design Act of 1868," (from the Senate).

To extend the provisions of the Act 31 Victoria, chapter 33, respecting the retiring allowance of Judges, to the Chief Justice and Justices of the Court of Error and Appeal for the Province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Respecting the attendances of witnesses on criminal trials.

THE INDIAN LAWS.

The House went again into Committee on the Bill entitled "An Act to amend and consolidate the Laws respecting Indians," Mr. Laurier in the Chair.

Sec. 10 was passed without discussion.

Section 11,

"No person, or Indian other than an Indian of the Band, shall settle, reside upon, occupy, or otherwise use any land or road, or allowance for roads running through any reserve belonging to or occupied by such Band; and all mortgages or hypothecs given or consented to by any Indian, and all leases, contracts and agreements made or purporting to be made by any Indian, whereby persons or Indians other than Indians of the Band are permitted to reside upon such reserve, shall be absolutely void,"

being taken up,

Mr. PATERSON stated that it contained one of the four or five principles of the Bill which required particular consideration. This section absolutely prohibited any one not being an Indian settling or residing on these reserves.

He considered it very desirable in the interest of Indians that power should be given them under certain circumstances to lease their lands for cultivation to whites; despite the present prohibitions, contracts have been made, and whites who were not reputable lived on the reserves. It must especially be in the interest of Indian widows to allow them the power he had mentioned.

Mr. FLEMING remarked that it was stated in the report of the Minister of the Interior that many of the Mohawks leased farms to whites who lived on the reserve. The children of the two races, moreover, went to school together; this band numbered 804 persons. The statement of the Local Superintendent of the Six Nation Indians showed that it was necessary to permit Indian widows to lease their lands to white people; such a proviso should be introduced, the consent of the Superintendent to this proceeding being made requisite.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — That would never do. To allow the Indians to lease their lands to white people would be practically to dispossess them of the principal part of their reserves. It has always been found extremely inexpedient to permit whites to enter the reserves, and it would be much better to let them keep their lands for themselves, until relieved by the process of enfranchisement.

Mr. FLEMING considered that it would be hardly possible to carry out this Bill in connection with the small bands who lived throughout the Dominion. Some numbered only one or two hundred persons, and a widow might be unable to find an Indian who would work her land.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that certain exceptions from this rule were allowed in the following sections.

Mr. FLEMING, nevertheless, thought that such a proviso as that to which reference had been made, should be here introduced.

Mr. BOWELL asked whether this was an amendment of the old law ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that it was the 17th section of the old law, with one or two verbal alterations.

Mr. BOWELL observed that the Mohawk Indians had leased their lands to whites for a great many years, but never he believed without the consent of the Department. He doubted very much that it would be to their benefit if they could lease their properties to whom they might think proper.

Mr. PATERSON stated that the first part of the 12th clause did not cover the ground he desired ; it permitted whites to settle on land not belonging to any particular Indian, while the 11th section absolutely prohibited any Indian man or woman under any circumstances leasing their land to other parties, when the contrary course should be permissible in certain instances, preventing disreputable whites entering the Reserves and enabling the Indians to benefit from the examples which could be thus afforded them. He wished to secure an improvement on the old law.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE could not see that such a change would be an improvement. The Reserves should be preserved exclusively for the Indians. If they possessed more land than they desired, to agree to its sale or being leased was an entirely different matter, and should be left wholly within the control of the Indian Department. The bands should not be empowered to sanction leases, as they might be exposed to highly improper influences, judging from experience, enabling worthless whites to settle in the heart of the Reserves and demoralize the Indians. Lately a high and estimable functionary in the North-West, in one of the most remote districts in the Dominion, had written to him a letter which contained a pungent comment regarding the influence of whites among Indians. This gentleman had no doubt that if whites were kept away from these Indians for a few more years they would be civilised.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said the object of this Bill was to protect the Indians and prevent their lands being tampered with by white men. If white men were allowed to settle on the Reserves, the Indians—who, as a rule, did not like to cultivate land—would lease their lots for a trifle. He did not think it would be for the benefit of the Indians at all to admit white men among them.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what effect this legislation would have upon white men who held lands by lease from the Indians on reserve in New Brunswick ? Some of them were occupants of their lots for thirty years, and many held them with the sanction of the Department. He suggested this Act should not have a retro-active effect.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That has been the law since 1868.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said it would be well to meet cases where white men had been settled on those lands for a number of years, had put up buildings and made improvements, and who held their leases from the Indians either with the approval of the department, or at least without their disapproval. By this section they could be turned out of their homes at any moment.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman surely would not propose to legislate specially for parties who had acted in defiance of the law.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said they had not acted in defiance of the law, but in New Brunswick, prior to Confederation, a very loose system had prevailed in the management of Indian lands. What he wanted was to protect those who had leased lands from the Indians prior to 1868, in their occupancy.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the Department held that any bargain with the Indians irrespective of the Department was not valid. Still, where an arrangement might have been made prior to Confederation, it was respected until its term expired. As there had been no reason to complain since 1868, there would be no ground for a grievance hereafter. The clause was a transcript of the provision in the Act of 1868.

Mr. PATERSON contended that an Indian should be empowered to enter into a covenant with a white or other person, subject to the sanction of the Superintendent General. There could be no exception taken to that. Under the clause as it stood, an Indian woman who possessed a piece of land which she could not cultivate, would not be allowed to lease it, even with the sanction of the Superintendent General.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said he was willing to go this far: where an Indian woman was unable to manage her farm for her support she might, with the sanction of the Superintendent General, lease her land. He would not go farther than that.

Mr. PATERSON said he saw no reason why the hon. gentleman should seek to limit his own power. It should be restricted to no one class, because it was a provision which would have a beneficial effect. The meaning of this Bill was that the time had come when the system of tutelage should be broken in upon in the interests of the Indians themselves and of the community generally. This legislation should be in advance of the Act of 1868.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that undoubtedly the 12th Clause gave the Superintendent General power to give and revoke a licence, but if the hon. gentleman opposite thought it of any consequence the words "without the authority of the Superintendent General" might be inserted. He entirely dissented from the views of the hon. gentleman in thinking it was advisable to have Whites settle among Indians, and the policy of the Government would be to prevent that as far as possible. With regard to the widows there would be no difficulty in their obtaining white labour in the usual way.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN regretted that the hon. gentleman had made this concession, as he preferred the Clause as it originally stood.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) was also opposed to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he also preferred the Clause without the amendment. It might do well to pass the Clause without the interpolation, and before the measure reached its next stage they would consider whether it was advisable to yield to the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant.

The Clause was then adopted without amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN, with reference to Section 26th which provides for the release or surrender of Reserves, held that the majority of the band should be required to be present when this was in consideration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that an officer of the Government would be present on such occasions, preventing any chance of a mistake.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD was of opinion that the section gave more protection than when simply the presence of the majority of the Chiefs was required.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN — At all events the majority of the band should be present.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It will never be done without the assistance of the majority.

Mr. SCHULTZ entirely agreed with his hon. friend from Charlevoix in this relation. It was perfectly well known that some of the recent difficulties with Indians in the States has arisen from the fact that such assent was not obtained.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—The provision confers quite sufficient protection; an officer of the Government will be in attendance, and if any serious complaint is made attention can be given to it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is substantially provided for in another part of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—In what part?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—In the 61st section.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—I cannot prevent the clause from passing but I say once more that the protection is not sufficient. When I was at the head of the Department, complaints were preferred against our officers. They were very jealous—and properly so—of their rights.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Is the hon. gentleman satisfied with a majority?

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—The majority of the band should be present.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is required in the 61st Section.

The section was passed.

Sections 27 and 58, inclusive, were passed without discussion.

Mr. PATERSON complained that accrued interest on lots sold for the Indians had been added to the capital account, and that they received only interest thereon, instead of having the arrears of interest distributed among them. He suggested that the 60th Section should be amended by adding a provision that where accrued interest moneys from the sale of lands are paid in by the purchasers, that said interest money shall be paid out as soon as it is received by the Department. Such a provision should have a retroactive effect.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said whatever the Government might feel disposed to do in the future it would be quite out of the question to give such a provision a retroactive effect, because, in some instances, the Indians would lose their money in a day or two. At present it was invested for their benefit, and they received the interest on it every year. In some instances this accrued interest amounted to nearly half the capital sum standing to the credit of the Indians.

Mr. PATERSON said many of the Indians had been kept in a state of existence by the credit which the merchants had extended to them. He could not understand why men in such a condition should not be allowed to use their own money when they were unanimous in asking for it. It was desirable that this clause should be so amended that the Government could have no hesitancy, in the future at any rate, in giving the Indians the full benefit of their interest money.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not agree to make such an amendment in the Bill as the hon. gentleman desired, rendering it imperative, under all circumstances, to pay out the accrued interest. It would be the desire and the duty of the Government to distribute ordinary accrued interest, but there were cases he was aware of in which very large sums were involved that the Government would not be willing to have it obligatory on them to divide it among the Indians.

Mr. PATERSON said the amount of accrued interest withheld from the Six Nations Indians in the last twenty years was $108,492. He could see no equity in a system which did not allow the Indians the use of their money as it fell due.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said this was a difficult question to decide, and one that would require the earnest consideration of the Government, and he had no doubt that if representations were made by the Indians to the Government at the proper time, the matter would be considered and that money might be given to the Indians if they wanted it.

Mr. PATERSON said the Indians were merely asking for money that belonged to them. All the money and property they enjoyed was their own, and it would be an injustice not to make this concession.

Mr. MILLS did not agree with his hon. friend from Brant. An Indian had no individual right that was not the interest of the band. The duty of the Government was to judge as to what was best in the interest of the band. It was their duty to judge as to whether it was in the interest of the band that this money should be distributed amongst them or whether it should be made a part of the fund. He was of opinion that it was unquestionably best to make this money a part of the fund. If the argument of the hon. gentleman were correct, and the Indians had a right to say that the accrued interest should be paid over to them, they also had a right to say whether the principal from which the interest accrued should be similarly paid over. The Government must exercise their own judgment in governing bodies of Indians.

Mr. PATERSON held that the hon. gentleman's reasoning in this particular was entirely fallacious. It was an unjust reflection on the Indians, whose cause he was advocating, to say that they were incapable of judging for themselves and required the Government to do so for them. He had no doubt that the Government thought they were acting in the interest of the Indians; and he would give them credit for that, but at the same time he would tell them that they were making a great mistake.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for South Brant had contended that his (Mr. Mills') observations did not apply to Indians in the neighbourhood of Brantford, so far as they related to the unfitness of these people for enfranchisement. The argument had no force at all, except so far as it went in favour of taking their property out of the hands of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON said he was in favour of this just so soon as the Indians were fitted for the application of that system.

Mr. MILLS said whenever that change took place the trusteeship of the Government was at an end; but this was altogether a different matter from that to which the contention of the hon. gentleman referred—that is to say, that the accrued interest should be divided up amongst the Indians. In reply to the charge that he had argued in favour of reserving this property for posterity, he had to say that he had made no reference to the matter at all. So long as the Indians maintained their distinction as a band, the Government must deal with them—deal with them, too, as they thought best; and in this case it was a question for the Government to decide whether it was in the interest of the band to pay over at once this accrued interest, or simply pay them the interest arising upon it as an investment. There were, say, $500 of principal invested on behalf of each member of the tribe, and $300 of accrued interest—$800 in all. There was no principle of justice, he contended, which required that the $300 should now be divided up which did not also apply to the $500 with equal force. Besides, the Indians who were now dead could not be recalled in order that they might have their legitimate share of the money. He repeated, however, that there was no obligation upon the Government to adopt any particular line of policy. The law was that they should do what was best in the interest of the Indians, and he believed they were doing what was best now.

Mr. PATERSON, in order to put the case to the hon. gentleman as strongly as possible, desired to be supposed for the moment as a minor, and the hon. gentleman his guardian. Suppose there were a sum of money invested by the guardian on the minor's behalf, and that it yielded $300 per annum. Would it be fair, would it be just that the guardian should pay the ward but $100 per year, and content himself with paying him the interest on the odd $200 next year and thenceforth. The compact must be carried out in good faith.

Mr. MILLS said there was no such compact with regard to the Indians. The Government were required to do what they considered best.

Mr. FLEMMING said it was well known that the Six Nation Indians obtained a large tract of land from the Government for services rendered during the war. Efforts were made at various times to induce them to surrender a portion of that large tract, which they refused to do until representations were made to them that it would be to their advantage to do so. It would be recollected that a number of individuals who made purchases of this land neglected to pay for it. It was merely from the accident, that the money was not forthcoming at the proper time, that this money was now brought into the question at all. If the lands purchased had been paid for promptly there would have been no accrued interest.

The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 59,

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) enquired whether the Government appointed solicitors to act on behalf of the Indians in cases where tenants failed to pay rents, or other instances involving disputes on subjects likely to affect their interests prejudicially?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the agents of the Department generally looked into these matters.

Mr. WHITE said he had put the question because one of the chiefs who was here the other day complained of his band having lost several hundred dollars of rent on account of the Government having refused to allow them to employ a lawyer, appointing an agent on their behalf, and this agent failing to collect.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said no case of this kind had ever been brought under his notice, but he would institute enquiries.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clauses 60 to 65, inclusive, were passed without discussion.

On section 66, providing that no mortgage be taken from an Indian,

Mr. PATERSON suggested that this section should be struck out. It would prevent any one from selling to Indians on credit, and there were times when they required implements, cattle, &c., for which they were not able to pay cash, but on which they would be glad to give a chattel mortgage.

Mr. SCHULTZ entirely agreed with the hon. member for Brant. Persons furnishing stock or implements to Indians on credit should be allowed to take a chattel mortgage on the articles sold.

Mr. PATERSON could not see what possible injury this would do the Indian. On the contrary, he would have the benefit of the article for the time it was in his possession, and the merchant would have security which would not extend beyond the goods sold.

It being six o'clock, the Committee rose and reported progress, and the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The House resumed consideration of the Bill to amend and consolidate the laws respecting Indians.

Mr. FLEMING said this clause was unfair to the Indians, and the system of tutelage in which they were kept deprived them of the spirit of self-reliance and independence. An Indian might go to a manufacturer of agricultural implements to purchase a plough but could not get it on credit. He would be obliged to wait until his neighbour was done ploughing, which being past the proper season, the result would be failure. The suggestion to allow chattel mortgages to be taken on articles purchased in that way was only fair and right.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the Indians could purchase all the implements they needed with their annuity money. In 1869 a clause similar to this was inadvertently repealed. The Indian Agents considered it was highly necessary, and that was why he proposed to re-enact it now. Unfortunately the Indians seemed to get too much credit already, and if the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant were adopted it would only increase the danger.

Mr. PATERSON said it was all nonsense to suppose that the annuity money was sufficient to purchase implements. This clause would inflict serious injury on the Indians. Instead of this Bill being in advance in this respect of previous legislation, it was retrogressive. He could not change it, of course, but he protested against this clause.

Mr. FLEMING said many of the early white settlers of Canada would have been in a very unfortunate position if they had not been furnished implements and stock on credit, and he thought it was unfair to leave the Indians in a worse condition.

The clause was passed.

Clauses 67 and 68 were passed without discussion.

Clause 69—

“No presents given to Indians or non-treaty Indians, nor any property purchased or acquired with or by means of any annuities granted to Indians or any part thereof or otherwise howsoever, and in the possession of any Band of such Indians or of any Indian of any Band or irregular Band, shall be liable to be taken, seized or distrained for any debt, matter or cause whatsoever. Nor shall the same be sold, bartered, exchanged or given by any Band or irregular Band of Indians or any Indian of any such Band to any person or Indian other than an Indian of such Band, and any such sale, barter, exchange or gift shall be absolutely null and void, unless such sale, barter, exchange or gift be made with the written assent of the Superintendent-General or his agent; and whosoever buys or otherwise acquires any presents or property purchased as aforesaid, without the written consent of the agent as aforesaid is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is punishable by fine not exceeding two hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, in any place of confinement other than a Penitentiary”

being taken up,

Mr. PATERSON declared that it was all wrong, for how was any one under such circumstances to know that annuity money had been used.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied that this provision had been found to be absolutely necessary in the North-West and in other districts. It was never enforced save in connection with growing abuses.

Mr. FLEMING stated that the portion which followed line 45, commencing—“Nor shall the same be sold or” was new, and at the same time objectionable. This was not contained in the Act of 1868.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—It is taken from the Act of 1874.

Mr. FLEMING thought that while it might apply to Indians in the North-West, it should not have relation to those in Ontario who were semi-civilized. The Six Nation Indians chiefly obtained their subsistence by raising cattle, sheep and hogs, and how were they to sell them with this provision on the Statute Book? How were whites to know that certain articles had been purchased with annuity money? The result would be that the Indians would be unable to dispose of what they had for sale. It was preposterous to suppose that an annuity of $14 a year could keep a family.

Mr. PLUMB stated that it was difficult to separate these cases; nevertheless, this clause left the door open for constant litigations and troubles. If it was intended to be enforced it must apply to the Indians in these Provinces as well as to those living in the Far West, though it seemed to be devised in favour of the Indians on the frontier. It would be very pernicious if carried strictly into effect.

Mr. BORRON agreed with the views of the hon. members from North and South Brant. A great injustice might be inflicted on whites owing to the existence of this clause, as some Indians were as white as any of the hon. members of the House, and the articles bought with their annuities, or received as presents, not being branded in any way, parties might unknowingly buy them and thus be exposed to penalties.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN remarked that there was a great deal of force in what the hon. member for Brant had stated. In 1868 the first portion of the clause was inserted in the Act, and the latter portion in the Act of 1874. The former agreed to a tolerable extent with a portion of the law of 1866. The latter seemed to be in the way of Indians who had property to sell. He thought that the better course would be to let the clause stand over until these objections could be considered.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD supposed a case in connection with which a difficulty might arise: a squaw might buy a hen which might lay half a dozen of eggs; she might take these to market, and if any one bought them without a certificate in writing from the Superintendent he ran the risk of being sent to goal for six months. This was rather a hard law.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) related an instance in which a difficulty had improperly arisen owing to the existence of this provision. Unless the encouraged Indians in being honest, he added, they would not be honest; and unless they encouraged them to work for their own support, they would not do so. The clause ought to be changed, as it was detrimental to the interests of the Indians.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I think that the last part of the clause ought to be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—It formed a portion of the act of 1874, which was carefully drawn. It had been in force for two years and it had not done any injury as yet.

Mr. MASSON said if they considered Indians as children they must admit that there were big and little children, and could not treat them all alike. The law which would apply to the Crees and Souixs of Manitoba ought not to be made applicable to the civilized and educated Indians.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said an intelligent Indian would not try to evade the law, and he believed that Indians were generally quite as intelligent as other people.

Mr. MASSON said it was not a question of honesty, it was a question of education.

Mr. BOWELL was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. gentleman give the reason, that because some of the Indians were educated they would not take advantage of that clause of the law. Unfortunately there were many white men who were highly educated, who would cheat their neighbours when they could. He was of opinion that some distinction should be made between the Indians in the North-West and the civilized Indians of Ontario.

Mr. PATERSON moved that the clause be amended by striking out all the words after "what-oever" in the 44th line.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said that would remove the safe-guard it was considered necessary to put on the Bill in 1874. After two years' experience they had not heard of one complaint of the working of the clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—We have just heard the complaint which has been made by the hon. member for Hastings.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that the clause should be passed pro forma, and promised that they would take the matter into consideration. They would, perhaps, make it applicable only in certain cases.

The clause was carried.

On clause 70,

Mr. SCHULTZ said this clause would prove a great hardship to some of the more intelligent Indians, who did not wish to be considered as Indians and who did not take the treaty money.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they would consider this matter before the Bill was passed.

Mr. FLEMING did not see why an Indian had not as good a right to emigrate to Manitoba and get a homestead as a white man.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the clause was evidently intended to apply to the North-West alone. It could be so amended as to express the object intended.

Mr. SCHULTZ said it seemed to be held by the Government that because they gave the Indians an annuity of $5 per head the latter were to be deprived of every right and privilege which a white man holds dear. He did not see why the Indians of the North-West, when they became as intelligent as those in Brant, should not have the right to get homesteads for themselves.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said the Indians must either be treated as minors or as white men. If they should be found intelligent enough to exercise the rights of white men they could become enfranchised.

The clause was passed.

On clause 71, which provides that Indians undergoing punishment by imprisonment shall not receive their share of annuity,

Mr. PATERSON said he could see no reason why an Indian who is subject to the same laws as white men should be punished with greater severity for infractions of the law. A white man when convicted and imprisoned for the perpetration of a crime does not forfeit his income; but the Indian for a similar offence, not only undergoes the same punishment, but loses his income while his term of imprisonment lasts. He considered this unjust. He also complained that the Indians of Brant were not only exempted from municipal burdens, but they did not pay their share of criminal prosecution. Now, he contended this should be remedied by making the Indians pay the legal costs incurred in the prosecution of any of their number or in carrying out any sentence which might result therefrom.

Mr. FLMEING heartily indorsed this suggestion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this would be punishing all the innocent members of the band for the offences of the guilty. While it was true they contributed nothing towards the expenses of administering justice, it must be remembered there was very little crime among them. There were some 400 Indians on a reservation in his own county, and they were almost a model to the whites.

The clause was passed.

Clauses 72 and 73 were passed without discussion.

Clause 74, with the heading "Evidence of Heathen Indians" being taken up,

Mr. BOWELL remarked that the Indians objected to the term "Heathen Indians."

A change to "Non-Christian Indians" was made, and the clause was passed.

Clauses 75, 76, 77 and 78 passed without discussion.

With reference to clause 79, which provided that

"Whoever sells, exchanges with, bar-ters, supplies or gives to any Indian or non-treaty Indian in Canada, any kind of intoxicant, or causes or procures the same to be done, or connives or attempts thereat, or opens or keeps, or causes to be opened or kept, on any reserve or special reserve, a tavern, house or building where any intoxicant is sold, bartered, exchanged or given, or is found in possession of any intoxicant in the house, tent, wigwam or place of abode of any Indian, or non-treaty Indian, shall, on conviction thereof before a Justice of the Peace upon the evidence of one credible witness other than the informer or prosecutor, be liable to imprisonment for a period not less than two months or exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and be fined not less than fifty or more than five hundred dollars, with costs of prosecution, one moiety
