It is not creditable to the government to use the low-paid employees of this department in this way. Twenty-five years ago the section men on the railway were similarly treated; they were not permitted to join a union, but finally the railways had to give in. The railway men have just as much right to form themselves into a railway union as hon. members of this house have to form themselves into a lawyers' union or a doctors' union. The Bell Telephone Company could not treat its employees in this way; the employees of the Department of Agriculture could not be treated in this way; the Hydro-Electric people could not treat their men like this, so why should the government do so? While all this is going on the Minister of Labour is going up and down the country saying that this government is a friend of labour. I think we should have a committee to inquire into the Post Office department and change the system from top to bottom. I believe if there were a redistribution of the rates on package mail and on goods sent from the large mail order houses, who could well afford to pay a higher rate, the additional revenue would enable the government to pay these rural mail carriers a larger wage.

I take issue with the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) when he speaks of the city of Toronto. That city pays about $7,000,000, or a quarter of the total cash revenue obtained by the Post Office department, but we cannot get a new post office there. In many places throughout Canada where the revenue is only $100, $200, $400, $1,000 or $2,000, new post offices are built costing $8,000 or $10,000; no doubt this is a good way to provide work for the boys in the rural constituencies. I think the time has come when this great public utility should be placed on a real business basis with an injection of a little of the human element. The low-paid men in the department are not receiving very much more now than they received in 1780 and 1790. Cowper's Task in that part called the Winter Evening, alludes to the low pay of rural mail delivery men in 1780 and 1790 when they received ten cents a day, and conditions have not improved much even in Canada since that time. The contract system has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. There is a lack of efficiency about it, and the maintenance of such a system in the future would not be in the interests of the country. These men should be put on the same basis as the employees of the Canadian National Railway.

The post office is one of the most important government services we have in Canada, and the postal workers deserve better treatment than they are receiving at the present time. I was surprised to hear the Postmaster General who is generally a good friend to many of the branches of the department, referring to the rural mail carriers as "that element". I believe that all services should be on an equal basis and whether a man is sweeping the street, driving a tramcar or delivering rural mail, he is performing a service which is just as important as being the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General of this country. The other night the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to the gentlemen who sit on the back rows of benches as the "back-benchers". It seems to be popular to coin catch phrases, but let me say that the branch of the public service which has been referred to as "that element" is doing as efficient a public service as is the Postmaster General and his deputy.

The large cities of Canada are contributing the most of the revenue to the Post Office department, but they receive very little of the returns. The postal workers in the city of Toronto are very poorly paid. The postmaster of that city, in which the post office has a yearly turnover of almost $7,000,000, only receives $5,000 per year. There should be a committee of the house appointed to go into these matters to see if we could not find a policy, as suggested by the amendment of the hon. member for South Wellington, which would bring about an improvement in the most important public service in Canada.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Guthrie) which was negatived on the following division:

Mail service including mail service by air	16,305,000 00
Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, Secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council	1,176,175 00
	$34,926,639 40

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the Postmaster General give the committee a general statement as to the air mail service?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Does the hon. gentleman wish the statement for the whole of Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Last year we had an air mail service between Rimouski and Montreal, Montreal and Ottawa, and Ottawa and Toronto. That was twice a week to meet the incoming and outgoing British mail steamers. That continued during the season of navigation. During the winter time, after the close of navigation, we had an air mail service between Mal Bay, Seven Islands and Anticosti island. That is a weekly service. After the close of navigation we also had an air mail service between Moncton and the Magdalen islands. That service was begun a little later last winter than the winter before, but we carried it on until the opening of navigation or until such time as landing on the ice at the Magdalens became dangerous. I think we made seven or eight weekly trips. For a time we had an air mail service between Moncton and Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. The ferry boat had been laid up on account of an accident and we could not get the mails in on the regular time, so the service was put on during that period. We also had a temporary mail service lasting about seven weeks between Ottawa and Montreal, Montreal and St. John, and St. John and Halifax. This was tried out with the object of establishing later on a regular route between Montreal and the maritime provinces. We also had an air mail service for ten days before Christmas and up to New Years between the principal points in the three western provinces, with Winnipeg as the starting point. That was done with the object of ascertaining the feasibility of establishing this year an air mail service route in the three western provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no air mail service from the east to Winnipeg?

Mr. VENIOT: No. Hon. gentlemen will see that there is in the estimates an amount of $880,000. We intend establishing an air mail route from Toronto to Buffalo, connecting up at Windsor with the American lines and following those lines until we get to a point where we can join in again with our system at Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg continue the service over the three prairie provinces. The actual routes in the three prairie provinces have not yet been definitely determined, but one thing we are prepared to say, and that is that we will accommodate the larger cities and towns in those three provinces.

So far as an air mail service to the coast is concerned, I do not contemplate establishing any route this year because the surveys which the National Defence department have in hand for us have not yet been completed. When we intimate that we desire to establish an air mail service, the Department of National Defence undertake to have the route surveyed by their experts and to report to us on its feasibility. Part of that survey has been completed, and the remainder I hope will be done this year, so that we shall then be in a position to say when and how we may reach the Pacific coast.

We had other air mail services during the winter. We had a service from the head of steel out of Edmonton about 432 miles, up the Mackenzie river for some 700 miles. The people along that route used to receive their mail once during the winter, but with the service we gave them they received their mail pretty nearly once a week. We also had a service to the Flin-Flon area, to Cold lake. To-day our mail contractors in the Yukon have permission to use aeroplanes for the purpose of carrying out their contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there an air mail service to the Yukon?

Mr. VENIOT: The contractors in the Yukon have permission to use aeroplanes if they so desire. We have other air mail services, but not directly under the control of the department. For instance, a company developing some part of the country will ask permission to carry mail, and we give them permission to use what is called the sticker system; that is, they would carry the mail, protecting it by the sticker system, and they could charge to those who wished to send their mail in that way a certain fee. We regulated the fee. In some cases it was 10 cents per ounce, and the highest charge was 20 cents per ounce. That, Mr. Chairman, is a rough outline of what we are doing and what we are hoping to do this year in the air mail service.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I notice in the press that in all probability the air mail service between Montreal and Toronto will be discontinued. Is the department considering that?

Mr. VENIOT: Not "in all probability." I made the statement myself that if the business men and commercial houses and those engaged in industry did not sufficiently appreciate what the department was doing as a convenience to them and as an extension of our mail system to patronize the service as it should be patronized, I did not intend to run it for the health of the department. I felt that cities like Toronto and Montreal having that service should appreciate it to the extent that we would at least meet expenses. The matter rests there.

Mr. HEAPS: In this vote, Mr. Chairman, there are four separate items, and I suggest that each item be taken up separately because each is a separate item in itself. The first deals with salaries and allowances, and I suggest that this be taken up so that we may consider the salaries of the postal employees.

Mr. VENIOT: I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN: The first item reads:

Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. RYERSON: With reference to the proposed air mail route between Toronto and Windsor, is it the intention to make intermediate stops between those two cities?

Mr. VENIOT: I forgot to mention this point in connection with the air mail service. We are being asked daily if we will stop at this or that point, at this town or that. The main point to be considered in flying is the starting and landing places, and we will not stop at any place that will not provide a landing. The department is not providing landings. We cannot take chances of giving communication by air mail to places that will not provide a safe landing. We do not judge that for ourselves; it is done by the experts of the national defence department, but I may say that there are places between Toronto and Windsor that have good landing places and where we certainly will stop.

Mr. RYERSON: In the event of some of the cities between Windsor and Toronto providing proper landing places, will they be stopping places for the air mail service?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. RYERSON: Would they stop at Bradford?

Mr. VENIOT: We will stop at any place between Toronto and Windsor that will give us a proper landing.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 17, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First and second reports of the select standing committee on railways and shipping.—Sir Eugene Fiset.

Fifth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

Fifth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hay.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the house was in committee of ways and means last Friday certain correspondence was tabled between the Minister of Finance and certain automobile manufacturers in Canada. My attention was directed to the omission of replies from some of the manufacturers, and particularly the reply from the president of the Automotive Association. That gentleman arrived in Ottawa this morning and he brought to me my own original letter acknowledging his reply, and a copy of his reply. I regret that the correspondence had been mislaid in my department, and I now desire to table it.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Sir EUGENE FISET moved:

That the first and second reports of the select standing committee on railways and shipping be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

5. 1 stone house, 4 barns and 3 small outbuildings.

6 and 7. 1 mooring tower, 1 temporary (wooden) hangar, 1 permanent (steel) hangar, 1 wireless and meteorological hut, 1 power house for water supply and 3 temporary offices, for post office, customs house and public works, restaurant and 3 small workshops.

The farm buildings purchased with the property have not as yet been removed. A number of building structures have been undertaken, but not entirely completed, as follows:

	Approx. cost
(a) Hangar No. 1	$ 42,000
(b) Movable wooden hangar No. 2	8,000
(c) Pump—filter house, fire station—reservoir, including pumps and filter plant	28,500
(d) Temporary radio hut	2,000
(e) Office building	2,300
(f) Two small buildings for Customs and Immigration officers and postal service	800

8. (a) Yes; (b) Approximate total cost including special machinery and other equipment now in course of installation, $287,000.

9 and 10. The whole area was purchased and is available for handling the airship. A third of it has been prepared as an aerodrome for the use of aeroplanes. Sites may be leased. A charge is made for landing, storage and service, depending on the type of aircraft and the duration of its stay at St. Hubert.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HOTEL AT CONSTANT SPRING, JAMAICA

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Has any branch of the government, including the Canadian National Railways, or Canadian National Steamships, guaranteed any bonds in connection with the company now building a hotel at Constant Spring, Jamaica, or become interested directly or indirectly in such hotel company?

2. If so, to what extent, and what is the nature of the interest?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No department of the Dominion government or the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian National Steamships has guaranteed the bonds of the Canada-West Indies Hotels Company, Limited, which company is now building an hotel at Constant Spring, Jamaica, but the Canadian National Railways have purchased $50,000 of 7 per cent convertible notes of that company.

2. Answered by No. 1.

DUTY ON BANANAS

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

When does the change of duty on bananas come into effect?

Mr. ROBB: May 2, 1929.

WEST INDIAN FRUIT COMPANIES

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Has any department of the government or the Canadian National Railways, or Canadian National Steamships, any interest in any fruit company or organization whatsoever in the West Indies or Jamaica, or elsewhere?

2. If so, to what extent, and what is the nature of the liability?

3. What is the name of the company, and where is the head office located?

4. What agencies has the company in Canada or elsewhere?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No department of the Dominion government or the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian National Steamships has any interest in any such company.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

PLACE NAMES IN HONOUR OF COLONEL LINDBERGH, SIR JOHN ALCOCK AND SIR ARTHUR BROWN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has an island or mountain been named by the geographical board or the government, and a Canadian National station been named in honour of Colonel Lindbergh, an American aviator?

2. Will said precedent be extended to include the most heroic work of the pioneers, eight years before, Captain John Alcock, D.S.C., and Lieutenant Arthur Whitton Brown?

3. In view of (1) and (2) aforesaid, will an island or mountain be named after these British aviators, and will a Canadian National station be called after them, also following precedent? If not, why not?

Mr. RINFRET:

Department of the Interior:

1. Geographic board decisions do not include any feature named Lindbergh. In July 1927, the geographic board was informed that the owner of an island 25 acres in extent on the north shore of Lasqueti island, strait of Georgia, B.C., desired to apply the name Lindbergh to it. He was referred to the provincial authorities. It is not known if any action was taken. On January 28, 1929, Mooswa, P.O., in Tp. 56-5-4, Alberta, was re-named Lindbergh by the Post Office Department. There is also a Lindbergh lake 15 miles long in Kenora district, Ontario. This name was placed on the map by the Department of the Interior.

2. In April 1920, the geographic board approved Alcock as the name of a mountain in Cassiar district, B.C. The name Brown has not been applied to any feature as there are so many existing features named Brown, that the addition of another would cause confusion.

3. Answered by No. 2.

Department of Railways and Canals:

1. A Canadian National station has been named "Lindbergh" in honour of Colonel Chas. A. Lindbergh, the first solo flier to cross the Atlantic.

2. In May, 1929, the name of "Alcock" was assigned to our station at mileage 18.8 on the Ashmont-Bonnyville branch in Alberta, in honour of Sir John Alcock, the first flier to cross the Atlantic from Newfoundland to Ireland in 1919. This was done prior to assigning the name "Lindbergh". The use of the name "Brown" in honour of Sir Arthur Whitten Brown was also considered, but unfortunately it could not be used on account of several stations and post offices already bearing that name in Canada. Consideration was also given to the use of the name "Whitten" but that was found to be out of the question on account of there already being a post office "Whittone" in Saskatchewan. It is a policy of the Canadian National Railways not to adopt station names that conflict with the names of any other stations or post offices in Canada.

3. Answered by No. 2.

PRISONERS RELEASED ON PAROLE

Mr. IRVINE:

How many prisoners were released in each of the nine provinces, on parole, during the calendar year 1928?

Mr. RINFRET:

Quebec	240
Ontario	137
Saskatchewan	75
Alberta	68
Nova Scotia	58
Manitoba	52
British Columbia	50
New Brunswick	25
Prince Edward Island	10
Total	715

[Mr. Rinfret.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALES OF PROPERTY AT HALIFAX

Mr. QUINN:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways, the Department of Railways or any department of the government, sold any lands, houses or tenements in the city of Halifax, since the 31st of March, 1927?

2. If so, which, and what are their respective locations?

3. What was the amount received for each property sold?

4. To whom were such sales, if any, made?

5. Were the sales effected by tender or by private sale?

6. If by tender, were tenders open to the public?

7. If so, who tendered in each case and what were the respective tenders?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes; by Department of Railways and Canals on recommendation of Canadian National Railways.

2. Properties on the south side of Atlantic street, Nos. 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32, 34, 36 and 38.

3. $11,000 in all.

4. F. W. Dickie and Samuel Buttler.

5. By public tender.

6. Yes.

7. Ten tenders in all were received—five for the properties en bloc, and five for individual properties or groupings of same. The list of tenderers includes: A. J. Cote, Fried Bros., B. B. Bean, F. W. Bisset, J. H. Clark, E. Rafuse, W. G. Simpson, M. A. Miller, F. L. Weatherbe, F. W. Dickie Co. Of the above tenders, only two cash offers covering all the properties were received, and the highest offer was also a cash offer. It is not the practice of the railway management to reveal the figures of unsuccessful tenderers.

FISHERIES EXPERIMENTAL STATION, HALIFAX

Mr. QUINN:

1. Does the Department of Fisheries pay the board and lodging of students attending the fisheries school at the biological or experimental station at Halifax, Nova Scotia?

2. Does the department make an allowance to the board and lodging or maintenance of such students?

3. If so, how and to what extent is such allowance or payment made?

4. Does the department exercise any control over the choice of hotel or lodging houses of such students?

5. If so, are such lodging houses selected by tender or otherwise?

6. Did the department make inquiries of various hotels in Halifax during the current calendar year as to the rates at which the respective hotels would accommodate such students?

7. If so, what hotels were asked to furnish such quotations?

8. What are the names of the hotels which furnished quotations and what were the quotations in each case?

9. Were the students referred to in question 1 allocated to or did they reside at any hotel or hotels in Halifax city?

10. If so, at which?

11. Why and how were these selected?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No, but the biological board, following consideration of the matter with the department, made a grant of $45 each to fishermen who would take a six weeks course of instruction at the fisheries experimental station at Halifax, towards the cost of their maintenance during the course. These fishermen made their own arrangements for board and lodging.

2-11. Answered by No. 1.

LEASE OF BOAT FROM S. E. SEAMAN

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

1. Did the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any other department of this government, purchase a boat from Mr. S. E. Seaman, of Wallace, Nova Scotia, during the years 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929?

2. What price did they pay for same?

3. For what service was said boat purchased?

4. Did Mr. S. E. Seaman supply men to operate said boat? If so, how many, and what were the names and rate of pay to each?

5. What amount of fuel was supplied, from whom was it purchased, stating quantity used, amount supplied and price paid, and whether same was supplied by tender or otherwise? If otherwise, state particulars.

6. Were any provisions supplied by said Seaman? If so, give particulars as to kinds, quantities by tender or otherwise. If otherwise, state particulars.

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No, but the Department of Marine and Fisheries hired the motor boat "Lulu T" from Mr. S. E. Seaman for about 2½ months in each of the years 1927 and 1928 for lobster fisheries patrol.

2. In 1927 at the rate of $600 per month the owner to provide and pay for the engineer and the department to supply the fuel and oil. In 1928 the rate was $400 per month, other conditions being the same.

3. It was hired for lobster fishery patrol.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. In 1927—415 gals. gasoline at 23½ cents, $97.53. In 1928—435 gals. gasoline at 22½ cents and 24 cents, $107.63. Purchased from the Imperial Oil Company. The above prices were the regular wholesale rate to the Dominion government.

6. Not at the cost of the department.

NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. What is the total number of certificates of naturalization issued by the Secretary of State since January 1, 1927?

2. What is the total number of such certificates issued to residents of each of the nine provinces?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Number of certificates of naturalization issued from the 1st January, 1927, to the 1st April, 1929—16,902.

2. Naturalization is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion and has no relation to the provinces, for that reason the certificates issued are not listed with respect to the provinces and the information is not available.

NATIONAL REVENUE COLLECTED AT NOVA SCOTIA PORTS

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

What was the amount of revenue at each of the ports of Oxford, Pugwash, Wallace, Advocate, Apple River, and River Hebert, in the county of Cumberland, province of Nova Scotia, in each of the fiscal years 1925-26, 1926-27, and 1927-28?

PUBLIC WORKS—CHAR SERVICE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What is the total number of women cleaners engaged in Ottawa by the Public Works department?
2. How many of these are widows?
3. What are their working hours?
4. Are they allowed wages in times of sickness? If so, on what conditions, and how much?
5. What is the per diem allowance?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. 779.
2. 636.
3. Average working time two hours and one half.
4. Yes, full time if they provide a substitute, otherwise they are paid for actual working time, as in similar classes of employment at prevailing rates.
5. $1.25.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—FISHERIES LABORATORY

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Have the buildings for the purpose of an experimental station of the Department of Fisheries been constructed at the eastern passage in the county of Halifax?
2. If so, by whom was such construction done?
3. Was it done by tender or private contract?
4. If by tender, were tenders open to the public and in what newspapers were advertisements published asking for such tenders?
5. Who submitted tenders and what were the amounts of the respective tenders?
6. If by private contract, on whose recommendation was the contract awarded?
7. What sum, or sums, have been paid to date for such construction, and to whom?
8. Are any additional sums accruing due or claimed either as part of the contract price or as extras in respect of such construction?
9. If so, how much: (a) as balance due under contract, (b) extras?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. A building for use as a fisheries laboratory was built there.
2. Foundation work—R. K. Steeves, Halifax, N.S. Building—A. S. MacMillan, Halifax, N.S.
3. By tender and lowest tenders were accepted.
4. Tenders were invited from various firms doing the class of work required.
5. Foundation work—R. K. Steeves, Halifax, N.S., $1,895; R. G. Beazley, Halifax, N.S., $2,200; Standard Construction Co., Halifax, N.S., $2,260; W. F. Bedwin, Halifax, N.S., $2,472; McDonald Construction Co., Halifax, N.S., $2,474; A. S. MacMillan, Halifax, N.S., $2,984; S. A. Marshall & Son, Halifax, N.S., $2,992.

Building—A. S. MacMillan, Halifax, N.S., $16,649; Standard Construction Co., Halifax, N.S., $18,212; R. G. Beazley, Halifax Dredging Co. Ltd., Halifax, N.S., $19,299.88; Keefe Construction Co., Halifax, N.S., $19,500; A. M. Stuart, Dartmouth, N.S., $21,056.

6. Answered by No. 3.
7. R. K. Steeves, contract for foundation, $1,895; A. S. MacMillan, contract for building, $16,649, extra for grading, $300.
8. No.
9. Answered by No. 8.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PASSES TO CLERGYMEN

Mr. EVANS:

1. What are the names and addresses of all clergymen to whom free passes are issued on the Canadian National Railways?
2. Why are these passes issued?

Mr. DUNNING:

1 and 2. Clergymen as such are not entitled to free transportation on Canadian railways. The passes in question are issued on account of employees of either the Department of Colonization, Canadian National Railways, or of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, Ottawa.

The issue of this transportation is in accord with the provisions of the Railway Act and of the Immigration Act, which are applicable to all Canadian railways, and the issue of these and all other passes is subject to scrutiny by the Board of Railway Commissioners as provided by legislation.

As competing lines are not required to publish similar information, the Canadian National railways management feel that it is not in the interest of the national railways that the names and addresses of these employees should be published.

RIDEAU HALL—EMPLOYEES

Mr. EVANS:

1. How many government employees are kept at Rideau Hall?
2. What are their respective names, duties and salaries?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Thirty-eight.
2. Name—Duties—Salaries or wages per month:

R. O. Croll, superintendent, $190 (plus house allowance).

J. E. Fagan, stenographer, $95.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GRAIN TICKETS

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. What elevator companies issued the so-called high powered grain tickets in: (a) the crop year of 1927-28; (b) the crop year of 1928-29?

2. What was the amount of grain received into store by each elevator company and for which the so-called high powered grain tickets were issued in: (a) the crop year of 1927-28; (b) the crop year of 1928-29?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ENFORCEMENT OF UNITED STATES REVENUE OR LIQUOR LAWS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all complaints received either by letter, telegram or otherwise, by the government or any member thereof, or by any official in relation to the periodic visits of American armed cruisers or other American craft in Canadian waters on the great lakes, or Canadian harbours, or boundary waterways, seeking enforcement of American revenue or American liquor laws, including any complaints received of said American ships firing on alleged offending vessels in Canadian waters, contrary to the provisions of existing treaties, and a return showing what steps are being taken to protect Canadian interests and to collect damages for any breaches, if any, of treaty aforesaid.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS—LEGAL FEES

Mr. ESLING:

For a return showing the amount paid out for legal fees by the Vancouver harbour commissioners for the years 1922 to date, and to whom the said legal fees were paid.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LUNENBURG COUNTY BRANCH LINE

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all reports, surveys and other documents made or prepared by officials or engineers of the Halifax and South-Western Railway and/or the Canadian National Railways, or any person or persons acting on their behalf, relating to the construction, cost of construction, or anticipated revenues of a branch railway line from Riverport to Lunenburg and/or Riverport to Bridgewater, in the county of Lunenburg.

INSPECTION OF STOCK CARS

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda or any other documents relating to the refusal of the Department of Agriculture (Health of Animals branch) to pay J. Pendrelt Smith, of Kamloops, British Columbia, for the inspection of 146 stock cars during the five months from August 1, 1926, to December 31, 1926.

INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River) moved:

For a return showing:

1. The names of persons to whom refunds of not less than $500, under the Income Tax Act, have been made in the past five years, and the amount of such refund in each case.

2. The names of all persons or corporations in arrears or default of income tax, during each of the past five years, and the amount involved in each case.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): There is no disposition on my part to keep any information from the hon. member, but it is contrary to the principle laid down in section 81 of the Income Tax Act to disclose information respecting the private business of any person or concern. I hope, under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to drop.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not feel inclined to let the motion drop without a statement in regard to it. I am satisfied the time has come in this country as it has come in the United States—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable. We will say: Stand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Possibly the minister could permit the amending of the motion so as to enable him to give the house the total amount of the refunds made in each of the past five years.

Mr. EULER: I will look into the matter.

Motion stands.

BIENFAIT LIGNITE PLANT

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the honourable Minister of Mines, or any officers or department of the government, and any persons or firms, in any way relating to the transfer to the Western Dominion Collieries of the rights of the Lignite Utilization Board in the Bienfait plant, undertaking or equipment; also a copy of all papers, contracts and other documents in the possession of the government in any way relating to this matter.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): The government will be perfectly willing to bring down everything they have in their possession in accordance with the request of the hon. member, but more than one government has been interested in this plant and of course I cannot undertake to bring down documents in their possession.

Mr. SPEAKER: Subject to that restriction, the motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

PEAT FUELS LIMITED

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all agreements, contracts or releases thereof, entered into between the Minister of Mines or any department or officer of the government and Peat Fuels Limited; also a copy of all correspondence between the right honourable the Prime Minister, the honourable the Minister of Mines or any department of the government and Peat Fuels Limited, or any officer or employee of that corporation.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): Perhaps it would be wise to let this motion stand until I have an opportunity of discussing the matter with the hon. gentleman because, while we are perfectly willing to bring down the correspondence, the motion, if passed in its present form, would necessitate bringing down a great deal of matter which is entirely foreign to the correspondence. If I could have a discussion with the hon. member, I think the motion could be amended to meet his wishes and so that all the relevant correspondence could be brought down.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ADVISORY BOARD ON TARIFF AND TAXATION

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou) moved:

1. For a copy of report and recommendations made to the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation during 1927 and 1928 by Dr. W. A. McIntosh.

2. A copy of reports of Dr. A. W. G. Wilson since 1926 on matters of metallurgical research.

3. A copy of reports of Prof. W. R. Maxwell, when employed in 1928.

4. A copy of reports made by J. D. Fraser since date of his employment in November, 1928.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Frequently in the course of its inquiries the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation arranges with the different industries throughout Canada to send experts to examine their books with the understanding that the information will not be made public. I am sure my hon. friend and the house will at once see that if we break faith with those industries, the result will be that the activities of the board will be curtailed and it will be difficult to secure information that it is desirable the department should have in order to reach a fair conclusion. Having pointed that out to the hon. member, I hope he will drop the motion. In the first place, it is not in the public interest that we should give out this information and in the second place, to do so would be breaking faith with the different industries throughout Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not see why I should drop the motion. I do not think I am asking for any information to which the house is not entitled.

Motion negatived.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR DREDGING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I should like to call attention to question No. 3 which I put on the order paper a month ago in reference to the cost of dredging for the new pier in Vancouver harbour west of the Ballantyne pier. The question is a very simple one and I think the answer ought to have been given before now. Will the minister please facilitate the answer to this question?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): My hon. friend understands of course, that we had to refer the question to the Vancouver harbour commission. The answer has not yet been received, but I will endeavour to expedite it.

DISTRIBUTION OF HANSARD

Mr. J. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on March 6, last, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) presented the first report of the select standing committee to supervise the official report of the debates. The following recommendation was included in this report:

> After careful consideration of the matter your committee beg leave to recommend that the present number of ten copies, four of which are delivered for the files and six for mailing purposes, be increased to twelve copies, two of which shall be for the files and ten copies and no more for distribution by the King's Printer in accordance with names and addresses supplied by members of the House of Commons to the Editor of Debates, House of Commons.

Since that date, sir, French-speaking members do not receive Hansard at their rooms, while English-speaking members do. It strikes me that this is an unfair treatment towards the French-speaking members. For the last fifteen days I have in vain requested the Clerk of the House of Commons to have a copy addressed to my room. It seems to me that we should be placed on an equal footing with the English-speaking members, and that we should not be required to fill out certain forms in order to have Hansard sent to our rooms in the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER (Translation): I am informed that formal instructions have been given to the King's Printer that Hansard be sent to French-speaking members at the same time as they are to English-speaking members.

WELFARE OF PRISONERS' WIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Every year since I have been here I have asked the government what they intend to do in regard to the care of prisoners' wives, and I have always received the answer that the matter is receiving the careful consideration of the government. Would the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) be good enough to tell the house if any progress has been made in that direction beyond further consideration?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The matter is still under consideration.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES OF PROFESSIONAL AND TECHNICAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether they will lay on the table a copy of the order in council to which reference was made yesterday respecting the appointment of three gentlemen to deal with the question of salaries of the professional and technical employees of the government?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I beg to table the order in council appointing Mr. E. W. Beatty, Sir George Garneau, and Doctor Murray to inquire into and report on the question of salaries of the professional and technical officers of the civil service.

REJECTIONS UNDER CIVIL SERVICE ACT—INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): On April 8 last the following motion was passed by this house:

> For a return showing the names of persons appointed by the Civil Service Commission who have been rejected under section 24 of the Civil Service Act, in each department, for the last three years, with reason for the rejection in each case.

I would like to ask if that return is not yet ready to be brought down. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is ready so far as some departments are concerned. As we require this information for discussion on the estimates, I would ask that the tabling of the return be expedited.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I understand that my hon. friend alludes to a return from the Civil Service Commission. I shall endeavour to find out from them whether the return is ready, and shall table it at the earliest possible moment.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Last year some questions were directed from this corner of the house to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) asking if it was the intention of the department to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Customs and Excise, in which they recommend that prosecution be entered against Harry Bronfman. May I ask if the department have considered that case?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): If my hon. friend will agree, this will serve as a notice and I will endeavour to give him the information to-morrow.

EXPLANATION—MR. POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): My attention has been called to the fact, though I have not yet been able to locate it in Hansard, that I committed a serious historical mistake in the course of my remarks yesterday in that I ascribed the building of the pyramids to one King Herod. My recollection of King Herod is that he was not mixed up with that, but with a lady by the name of Salome. The idea which I intended to convey was that the commission might very well ask questions in which the historical relations of people would be as much mixed as the words which I used in that connection yesterday.

SUPPLY—SIMCOE POSTMASTERSHIP

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the house a matter of importance in connection with the administration of the Post Office Department, and in order to do so I shall move an amendment to the motion to go into supply. This matter is one which has been the subject of considerable discussion in the press in editorial comment and open letters. I refer to the appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe, in the province of Ontario, the rejection of the appointment of George E. Whittaker, a disabled returned soldier, who was appointed to that position by the Civil Service Commission, and the subsequent appointment of C. R. Bowyer, also a returned soldier, without disability, to that office. In dealing with this appointment I shall state only what I believe to be the facts, and all the facts, that are relevant to this discussion, and then I shall submit my amendment for the consideration of the house.

A vacancy in this office occurred on the 31st day of January, 1927, through the dismissal of the former postmaster. I desire, in the first place, to read two or three sections of the Civil Service Act which are undoubtedly applicable to cases of this kind. The act is chapter 22 of the revised statutes of 1927. Section 21 reads:

> Every deputy head shall notify the commission of every vacancy in any position in his department immediately after the vacancy occurs, and whenever such vacancy is to be filled, the deputy head shall request the commission to make an appointment.
> 2. The commission shall thereupon appoint the person whose name stands highest upon the commission's list of eligible persons for the class in which the position is found and who is willing to accept the appointment; in case there is no such list for the class, the commission shall forthwith hold an examination and, if necessary to prevent any serious interference with the public business, but not otherwise, may fill the position at once by making a temporary appointment as prescribed herein.
> 3. Except as to appointments to positions in the headquarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

Section 24 reads as follows:

> The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

This vacancy, as I have said, occurred on January 31, 1927. The commission was notified on February 21, 1927, and the advertisement usual in connection with vacancies of this kind was put up. I wish to call the attention of the house to this clause in the advertisement:

> According to law preference is given among candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, first, to persons who are in receipt of a pension on account of disabilities received as a result of war service, who by reason of such service are unable to continue their pre-war occupation and who have not been successfully re-established; and secondly, to persons who have been on active service overseas or on the high seas.

Twenty-three applicants responded to this advertisement, and I think eight or nine of these were returned soldiers. The district superintendent in the Post Office Department made a report to the Postmaster General on these different applications, and I propose to read from his report just exactly what he said regarding the two applicants in question:

> Charles Rex Bowyer is a married man twenty-eight years of age. Has a good education. Resided at Simcoe until about a year ago, but is now living at Mount Albion. Has had no postal experience, but would devote his entire time to the work. Was a student previous to enlistment and since discharge has been farm manager for his father, W. A. Bowyer, and is engaged in looking after some seven or eight farms owned by his father. This applicant states that owing to his being a minor he enlisted under an assumed name, that of C. R. Musgrove, and served twenty-seven months in France with the R.C.H.A. Discharged by reason of demobilization. No physical disability. Is a fine type and impressed me favourably.

Now I think I ought to read something else as to his residence, because that is one of the qualifications referred to in the advertisement. It is contended that this man was not a bona fide resident of Simcoe. From return No. 140, at page 48, being a letter from T. H. Murray, inspector of postal service, addresed to W. J. May, district superintendent of postal service, London, Ontario, I quote the following:

With reference to the report on the ratings re Simcoe postmastership, I would say that I have made full inquiries about those mentioned and would report as follows:

Then he reports on Bowyer.

Charles Rex Bowyer. I had considerable difficulty in locating this applicant, and finally found him living in the village of Mount Albion, a short distance out of Hamilton. He again stated that he considered Simcoe as his home, but his wife and family all being at Mount Albion I cannot believe that it is other than his residence. He has resided there one month, and previous to that was on a farm some two miles distant. Bowyer states that he enlisted in 1915 at the age of sixteen in the R.C.H.A. at Kingston under the name of Musgrove, his regimental number being 7578 and overseas number 348530. He has pay book, medals and discharge papers all bearing the name of Musgrove, and is at a loss how he can give absolute proof that he is the party. He should, however, be placed in Class B.

With regard to Mr. Whittaker the report reads as follows:

George Edward Whittaker is a married man, twenty-eight years of age. Has a very good education. Has resided in Simcoe for about two years and eight months. He has no postal experience but would devote this entire time to the work. Was at school previous to enlistment and since the war has been an adjuster for the Soldier Settlement Board, and is now accountant and office manager for the St. William's Preservers at Simcoe. Enlisted in the 55th battery and served in France eight months with the 22nd battery ,and discharged as medically unfit and received 100 per cent pension. This applicant has a double amputation below the knees, and I do not think he would be able properly to attend to the duties of the office with this disability.

I am quoting this so that we will have the whole record in connection with this man. Later we shall find something more with regard to his disability. The report of the superintendent states that Mr. Murray classified these different applicants in the order of merit. Bowyer was second, and Whittaker seventh from a postal standpoint.

This report should have been forwarded by the Postmaster General to the Civil Service Commission, but for some unexplained reason it was withheld for a period of six months, during which time no less than eight letters were sent by the Civil Service Commission to the Postmaster General asking for the report. It was not until October, 1927, that he forwarded it to the commission.

The commission then took the matter under consideration, and as there was some question as to Mr. Whittaker's disability, he—Mr. Whittaker—thought it well to come down to Ottawa and interview the Civil Service Commission. He saw two members of the commission and also the Postmaster General personally. This was in the month of April, 1927. Recommendations on behalf of Mr. Whittaker were made by the following gentlemen:

N. F. Parkinson, Deputy Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and director of administration of the same department; J. E. Johnston, Simcoe; Dr. W. A. McIntosh, Simcoe; P. H. Groff; George Williamson; E. J. Ashton, of the Soldier Settlement Board; the Amputations Association; B. W. Anderson and A. W. Donly.

To one of these letters the Postmaster General on February 28, 1927, replied as follows:

Dr. W. A. McIntosh,
Simcoe, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

I am in receipt of yours of the 24th inst, with reference to the postmastership at Simcoe, and I note what you say in favour of Mr. Whittaker, who is an applicant. As Mr. Whittaker is a disabled returned soldier, and as the act gives a good deal of preference to such, no doubt he will stand an excellent chance before the Civil Service Commission who have the absolute control in a position of this kind.

Yours truly,

P. J. Veniot.

Now as I have said, Whittaker came to Ottawa, and the Amputation Association, who I understand have recommended that for disabled returned soldiers postal work is particularly suitable, became interested in his case, and a letter was sent making a suggestion as to a way of determining whether this man was really fit for the position for which he had made application. I find in this interesting file a letter from the secretary, I believe, of the Canadian Legion, dated April 3, 1928, and addressed to the Civil Service Commission. The letter reads:

Re George Edward Whittaker, applicant for the position of postmaster, Simcoe, Ontario.

Sir:

As there is doubt as to whether or not the above noted ex-service man is physically able to carry on the duties of postmaster at Simcoe, because of his war disability, the Canadian Legion suggests that he be orally examined at Ottawa by an advisory board consisting of representatives of the Post Office Department, the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Canadian Legion.

There is strong opinion that Mr. Whittaker is physically capable of performing the duties and it is felt that before he is definitely eliminated on this ground, a careful examination of this aplicant should be made.

Officials of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment have also manifested interest in this case and for this reason it is suggested that this department be represented.

We understand that Mr. Whittaker is prepared to come to Ottawa at his own expense, for the purpose of being orally examined.

Yours truly,

J. C. G. Herwig,
Canadian Legion of the B.E.S.L.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the date?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): April 3, 1928. The next relevant letter which I find in the file, in answer to that, is one from the Deputy Postmaster General dated April 18, 1928. I do not know just how the letter got to the Deputy Postmaster General because, as I have said, the file appears to be in some respects incomplete. However, on April 18 we find the Deputy Postmaster General writing to the Hon. Doctor W. J. Roche, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, as follows:

Dear Doctor Roche:

The attention of this department has been called to a letter forwarded to the Civil Service Commission on the 3rd instant by Mr. J. C. G. Herwig of the Canadian Legion, in which application is made for the special examination at Ottawa of Mr. George Edward Whittaker in connection with his application for appointment to the vacant postmastership at Simcoe.

This matter has been carefully discussed, and, in the opinion of this department, there would be no object in agreeing to the proposition outlined by Mr. Herwig. According to the inspector's report, Mr. Whittaker, an amputation case and therefore entitled to every sympathy on the part of this department, has been re-established, and therefore his claim can only be considered in common with which are usually known as class B.

According to the inspector's report, there are other returned soldier candidates belonging to this class B who have superior qualifications to Mr. Whittaker, and, as the latter is apparently not entitled to the disability preference, it does not seem that special action is called for in his behalf.

Moreover, the experience of this department shows that it is very difficult to form an exact opinion of the physical capacity of an applicant in cases of this nature, and that it is only by actual performance of the duties that the applicant's qualifications in that respect can be judged.

Even assuming that Mr. Whittaker is capable of performing the post office duties at Simcoe, as pointed out hereabove, it does not seem that the aspect of the matter would be materially changed in view of the fact that there are other competitors better qualified.

In the opinion of the department, therefore, the interest of the service or the requirements of the case do not demand the special action requested by the Canadian Legion.

This matter has been brought to the personal attention of the Postmaster General.

Yours sincerely,

L. J. Gaboury.

So that the proposition for a special examination of this man was absolutely rejected and he was not given an opportunity, although the Deputy Postmaster General points out that it is only by actual trial that the man's capacity can be proved. The man was not given any such trial. Then the Civil Service Commission, after having seen Mr. Whittaker, appointed him on May 29, 1928. He was rejected by the Post Office Department on June 27, 1928. The only reason I find in the file is that the appointment is marked "rejected," and Mr. C. R. Bowyer was appointed on July 23, 1928.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give to the house Mr. Whittaker's sworn statement in this transaction:

Dominion of Canada
Province of Ontario
County of Norfolk

To Wit:

In the matter of the appointment of a Postmaster for the town of Simcoe, Province of Ontario.

I, George E. Whittaker, of the town of Simcoe, in the county of Norfolk, do solemnly declare:

1. I am 30 years of age, I was married in 1920 and have two children aged seven and three years, respectively.

2. That I enlisted as a member of the Canadian Forces in the month of May, 1916, when I was sixteen years of age and attending St. Andrew's college in the city of Toronto.

3. About a month after my enlistment I proceeded overseas and in the month of October, 1916, was sent to France and subsequently became a member of the 22nd battery on the Somme.

4. In the spring of 1917 this battery moved up to Vimy Ridge and at the end of the month of May, 1917, I was wounded in action at Thelus Wood and as a result sustained the loss of both my legs, my left leg being amputated below the ankle and my right leg below the knee.

5. I returned to Canada in the month of December, 1917, and am in receipt of a 100 per cent disability pension.

6. In the month of March, 1927, in answer to public advertisement by the Civil Service Commission, I made formal application to such commission to be appointed postmaster at the town of Simcoe.

7. In the month of April, 1927, I went to Ottawa to personally interview the commission in order that the members thereof should be better able to judge of my ability to discharge the duties of the office for which I had made application. The two members of the commission whom I interviewed were surprised that I was able to move about so freely and promised to give my application their careful consideration.

8. While in Ottawa I was introduced to the Hon. Peter J. Veniot, Postmaster General, and, after explaining to him the purpose of my visit to Ottawa, he suggested that we walk together along a corridor of the House of Commons in order that he might be able to judge of my ability to walk about. I complied with his suggestion and he then said that he could not see anything in my condition that would prevent me from discharging the duties of the office for which I applied. He also stated that, as the Civil Service Commission gave a preference to disabled men, I should have an excellent chance of securing the appointment, and I was assured that he had no objection to such appointment.

Nearly a year later, and in the month of April, 1928, Mr. Murray, post office inspector from London, interviewed me regarding my disability, he having also interviewed me nearly a year previously.

I have since been informed that this inspector had reported that if I should be appointed it might be necessary to appoint an extra clerk. I then informed the member of parliament for the county in which Simcoe is situated that if I received the appointment, and it should appear after a fair trial that an extra clerk was required, I was prepared to pay the cost of such service.

About a month later I was informed that the appointment would likely soon be made and that one Charles R. Bowyer was likely to receive the same. After receiving this information I again went to Ottawa and had another interview with the Civil Service Commission and with the Postmaster General. On my second visit the Postmaster General regarded my disability more seriously than on the occasion of my first visit, but assured me several times that the Civil Service Commission had absolute control of the appointment.

About the 1st of June, 1928, I received from the Civil Service Commission notification of my appointment as Postmaster at Simcoe and, after receiving this notice, I disposed of the business which I had been carrying on, relying upon the appointment of which I had received notice.

About a month after I had received my notification of appointment, and after I had sold my business, I was informed by a newspaper reporter that the said Charles R. Bowyer had received notification of his appointment. I then interviewed him and he produced his notification and stated that he knew he was going to get the appointment before I sold my busines and had desired to speak to me about the matter but had been warned by some of his friends not to do so.

I have been informed and verily believe that my appointment as such postmaster was rejected by the Postmaster General, although I was not given an opportunity to prove that I could discharge the duties of the office to which I had been appointed.

I then wrote an open letter to the press setting forth my position and subsequently a gentleman prominent in the ranks of the Liberal party came to me and communicated an offer of a political appointment in Brantford, Ontario, on condition that I would agree not to discuss the matter any further and that I would sign a letter to be prepared for me absolving the Liberal party of all blame in connection with the cancellation of my appointment. I declined to accept this offer and subsequently the offer of this position was renewed without any condition, but I again declined to accept the position.

I have been informed and verily believe that, between the date of my appointment and the date of the appointment of the said Charles R. Bowyer, an inspector of the Post Office department came to Simcoe to interview me but, for some reason, did not do so after interviewing some other parties here.

At the time I received my appointment the postal staff at Simcoe consisted of a postmaster and five clerks and recently advertisement for an additional clerk has been posted.

Before making my application to the Civil Service Commission I made careful inquiries to ascertain the nature and extent of the duties of the postmaster at Simcoe and obtained full knowledge thereof. I am well satisfied that, notwithstanding my physical disability, I could discharge all the duties of the said office satisfactorily to the public and to all concerned. I am informed and verily believe that the Amputations Association has recommended to the Civil Service Commission that postal work is most suitable for men of my class.

I am informed and verily believe that under the provisions of the Civil Service Act I was entitled to be given a trial on probation to determine my suitability for the position to which I was appointed. Section 24 of the said act reads as follows:

"The deputy head may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person appointed to any position under his control or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejcted for another six months; and the cause of rejection or the reason for extending the period of probation shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission."

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effct as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at the town of Simcoe, in the county of Norfolk, in the province of Ontario, this 11th day of April, A.D. 1929.

(Sgd.) G. E. Whittaker.

(Sgd.) Harold L. Osborne,
A commissioner &c.

I have endeavoured to place before the house the bare facts of this transaction; I have not left out anything which I consider relevant, and I submit that the provisions of the Civil Service Act which I have read have been disregarded and overridden by the Postmaster General in a harsh and arbitrary manner. I submit that the plain provision of our law giving a special preference to disabled returned soldiers has been disregarded equally ruthlessly. The report was held back from the Civil Service Commission for a period of six months, and it is quite clear what was happening during that period; the gentleman who was subsequently appointed was being given an opportunity to acquire a residence in the town of Simcoe, which the inspector reported he did not have, in order that the Postmaster General might be able to insist that this man was qualified for the appointment. In the file there is a letter written from the Post Office Department to the Civil Service Commission calling attention to the fact that this gentleman, Mr. Charles Rex Bowyer, was then a resident or should be considered a resident of Simcoe. On the same file there is also a letter from Mr. Bowyer which is very ambiguous and which does not categorically and specifically answer the report of the post office inspector to the Postmaster General with regard to his residence. It is not at all clear; to the contrary, I think it is very plain that this gentleman was not a resident of Simcoe and was so disqualified, but for some reason which does not appear the Postmaster General seemed determined to have this man appointed. The question naturally arises: Why was that attitude taken? Why was the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission rejected? Why was the offer of a special examination made by this man and the Canadian Legion so summarily rejected, even though the deputy stated that the only way to find out whether or not this man could discharge the duties of the position was by a trial? Why was not this man given a chance? I feel, Mr. Speaker, that an important principle is involved in this matter. There has been a plain violation of the provisions of the statute, and we must consider whether the statutes of this parliament may be violated in this way, whether the spirit and intent of the act shall be observed, or whether, under some pretext, they may be defeated as has been done in this instance.

I draw attention to this matter because it is not an isolated case; returns have been brought down here time after time showing similar actions on the part of the Postmaster General. I think the house will agree with me that this case deserves some consideration and, as I have said, I have endeavoured to present the case fairly and to bring out all the relevant facts. I submit those facts to the consideration of the house and, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson), I beg to move the following amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "In the opinion of this house the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe."

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed indebted to the hon. member for having brought up this matter, but I am sorry that he brought it up in the manner in which he did. In replying to the remarks of the hon. member, I will first refer to the last remark he made. He said, "I have placed fairly before the house the facts; I have not left out anything that is relevant to the case." I wish to point out to the house that the hon. member has left out a good deal which is relevant to the case, and which is to be found in the file, a copy of which he has in his possession.

For instance, the hon. member did not read to the house the reasons which were given for sending an inspector a second time to Simcoe. The Toronto Globe, in dealing with that feature of the case, accused the Postmaster General of sending an inspector the second time in an endeavour to find something against Whittaker so that he could satisfy his political friends around the town of Simcoe. What are the facts? It is true that this report was held back by the department—I will deal with that feature of it a little later—but it is equally true that the report was held back by the Civil Service Commission for seven months before they took any action in the matter. While they received that report from the department in October, it was not until some time in the month of February, I believe the 18th, that the Civil Service Commission wrote a letter to the Deputy Postmaster General requesting that he again send an inspector to Simcoe to interview Mr. Whittaker. They stated that the first report was not sufficiently definite as to Mr. Whittaker's physical ability to perform the duties of that office. On receipt of that request from the Civil Service Commission, an inspector was sent there the second time. It is a source of pain to me to have to contradict a portion of Mr. Whittaker's affidavit, but the facts are against him. In his affidavit he states that an inspector had gone there the second time but had not seen him. That is quite true, but Mr. Whittaker forgot to state that when the inspector went there on February 28th, 1928, to interview him he discovered that Mr. Whittaker was in the hospital at Toronto. As soon as he ascertained that Mr. Whittaker had returned on the 3rd or 5th of March, he went again to Simcoe and presented a report to the Civil Service Commission, which report the hon. member did not read to the house. I would like to read a letter dated February 18, 1928, from the Civil Service Commission to the Deputy Postmaster General. The hon. member did not read this letter, but I will do so. It is as follows:

> With reference to the postmastership at Simcoe, Ontario, I am directed by the commission to say that we will be prepared to select Mr. George E. Whittaker for this position, provided the department feels that he possesses the necessary physical fitness to perform the duties.

Then it continues.

Mr. STEVENS: Read it all.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member need not be so anxious; I will read it all. The letter continues:

I am to point out that the commission is endeavouring, in common with the Post Office department, to provide for seriously handicapped cases to as great a degree as possible, and postmasters have been mentioned as particularly suitable employment for such applications. In this case the Amputation Association is strongly supporting Mr. Whittaker, as well as the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, if his disability will not prevent the proper discharge of his duty. I should be glad, therefore, if the department could furnish the commission with a definite report at as early a date as possible with reference to Mr. Whittaker's physical fitness for the postmastership.

That was on February 18, and there was no time lost. An inspector who was qualified to make a report as to the physical, mental and other qualifications of the applicant was sent there on February 28. He did not find Mr. Whittaker at home, but he returned again on the 3rd or 5th of March, and then presented a report, which report the hon. member did not read to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the date of that report?

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman will get it in a minute if he will just take his time. The report is dated March 5, and is as follows:

With reference to the memorandum from the chief superintendent of postal services, and the note from the Civil Service Commission regarding the physical fitness of Mr. Whittaker, an applicant for the Simcoe postmastership; I would say that on the 3rd instant I again interviewed Mr. Whittaker and would say that his right leg is amputated just below the knee,—

Then I break in with the letter.

M. GUTHRIE: Read it all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He has only forty minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: I have more than forty minutes. The report continues:

I again visited Mr. Whittaker and would say that his right leg is amputated three inches below the knee, his left at the ankle, and he walks with the use of a cane.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): "Without" the use of a cane.

Mr. BENNETT: If we were not checking the hon. minister he would get away with that.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not trying to get away with certain facts like some hon. gentlemen I know.

Mr. BENNETT: And a minister of the crown too.

Mr. STEVENS: Shame.

Mr. BENNETT: It makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. STEVENS: The difference between yes and no.

Mr. VENIOT: The report continues:

He said he was with the St. Williams jam factory three years during which time he was away for one month with a blister on a stump, also that he has to go to Toronto frequently for adjustment of his appliances. He stated it would be impossible for him to do any heavy lifting.

Mr. BENNETT: Heavy lifting?

An hon. MEMBER: Are letters so heavy?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman. The report continues:

If the Simcoe post office were a revenue post office the post master might if necessary, hire an additional clerk to perform the necessary work in connection. . . but in the case of a class 2B post office like Simcoe what is required is a working postmaster. If the department requires a working postmaster at Simcoe then my opinion is that an additional mail clerk would be necessary in the event of Mr. Whittaker's appointment, as he is not physically capable of performing any heavy duties.

Mr. BOYS: How does he know?

Mr. VENIOT: That report is signed by the inspector.

Mr. BOYS: Why did he not give him a chance?

Mr. VENIOT: Does the hon. member want to make a speech now?

Mr. CLARK: Tell us his duties.

Mr. VENIOT: Prior to the vacancy occurring in Simcoe, Simcoe was an ordinary revenue office and its classification was changed to a class 2B office. Under the classification of an ordinary revenue office, which Simcoe was prior to the vacancy, the postmaster receives a salary and commission and employs his own help.

Mr. STEVENS: And the classification was changed after the application was made.

Mr. VENIOT: No. The hon. gentleman is not stating the exact truth. I do not mean that offensively at all.

Mr. STEVENS: But the Postmaster General will admit that the change to Class 2B took place after the application was made.

Mr. VENIOT: As a matter of regulation Simcoe dropped into class 2B when the vacancy occurred and, as a consequence, it was so advertised. Hon. members will see by the notice that applications were called for a postmaster in a class 2B office. That being the case, the class 2B postmaster comes directly under the Civil Service Commission and his salary is classed at $2,040 per annum as a minimum. He no longer has power to engage his help. That is done through the Civil Service Commission on the recommendation of the department as to the number required to carry on the work of the office. The Civil Service Commission regulates the salary and the number of employees in the office. That is why the inspector, in sending in his final report, stated that if we required a working postmaster, a class 2B postmaster, then Mr. Whittaker, on account of his disability, was not fitted for the position. The work of a class 2B postmaster is continuous from the time the office opens in the morning until it closes at night with the exception of the hours that he takes off for his meals. The class 2B postmaster as well as his assistants must handle mail bags and in this case there is only one male assistant, the others being lady assistants. When the condition of affairs was pointed out by the inspector to Mr. Whittaker, the latter stated that, according to that report, he did not feel he was physically fit to do that heavy work. I happened to go to Simcoe. I had been invited to go there months before this incident took place.

Mr. GOTT: On a political mission?

Mr. VENIOT: If it was on a political mission, it would not have been different from what I know my hon. friends did on certain visits to the Civil Service Commission. One thing they can never accuse me of is going on a mission to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GOTT: I deny that I ever went on a political mission to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not say the hon. member did. Of course my hon. friend has endeavoured to throw me off the track of my argument, but I will try to get back to it.

Mr. GOTT: Why does the minister make an assertion like that?

Mr. VENIOT: Because I can back it up.

Mr. GOTT: Let him give the evidence.

Mr. VENIOT: I went to Simcoe, being invited there before anything in connection with the Simcoe office took place. The people of Simcoe were giving a dinner in honour of their representative and I had accepted an invitation to attend the banquet and give an address. When this matter came up, the Toronto Globe and other newspapers starting hitting pretty heavily at the Postmaster General, but I have fairly broad shoulders and I bore up under it pretty well. It never made me lose any sleep or anything of that kind, because I felt I was acting as I should act and in justice to all. I did not at that time intend to carry out the promise to assist at that banquet until some of the newspapers twitted me and said that I did not have the courage to meet the people of Simcoe. I went there and I want to say to the credit of the people of Simcoe that never before in all my political career of thirty-five years did I receive a heartier or warmer reception.

An hon. MEMBER: The press did not say so.

Mr. VENIOT: Of course the hon. member may have his opinion of the people of Simcoe. I have a very high one. I addressed a gathering that night of 1,200 people and while I preferred discussing other subjects, I discussed the Simcoe matter. Mr. Whittaker was in the audience and I discussed the matter without any recrimination whatever. I pointed out the facts just as they were and when I came to the second report of the inspector, in reply to the criticism of the Globe that I had sent the inspector a second time in order to justify myself, and to prove that I had nothing to do with the matter, and that the statement in the press that the inspector had gone there and had never visited or interviewed Mr. Whittaker, was wrong I read that report as I have read it in the house. As I say, Mr. Whittaker was in the audience and I asked him whether that interview was correct or not. I there and then made the statement that if that were not correct and if the inspector had reported what was false; if Mr. Whittaker would tell me at the meeting or come to me after the meeting and show me it was false, I would have the inspector dismissed inside of twenty-four hours. Mr. Whittaker never said a word in the meeting. He met me after the meeting and he did not attempt to contradict anything contained in that report.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He has since contradicted it.

An hon. MEMBER: Under oath.

Mr. VENIOT: Not under oath.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not said, "under oath."

Mr. VENIOT: Not under oath, because under oath he does not refer to the visit of the 3rd of March. He refers only to the visit somewhere around the 18th or 20th of February. Therefore he did not contradict the report, and he cannot contradict it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He has contradicted the minister's account of what occurred at the meeting.

Mr. VENIOT: I make the statement that that took place at the meeting. Does the hon. member wish to contradict that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Whittaker contradicts it.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member for Leeds does not know, I think, if I may say so without wishing to be impolite, that he ought to keep silent.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I know what Mr. Whittaker said.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not want to discuss the matter with any heat if I can avoid doing so, although I feel I have been wrongly criticized.

Mr. GOTT: With or without occasion?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think my hon. friend can complain very much of the Postmaster General.

Let me point out one other matter on which the hon. member for Leeds forgot to enlighten this house. He says that I acted in direct violation of the Civil Service Act; that under that act six months' probation or trial must be given to every successful applicant. I want to say to my hon. friend that if he had read all the documents on that file, and I think he did, he would have found a decision on that point given by no other than our friends opposite when they were in power in 1919. What is that decision? The Civil Service Commission was attempting to enforce that section of the act with reference to the six months' probation to which my hon. friend has referred, and the Tory government of that day, no doubt for political reasons, asked the Justice department to give a ruling on the point because they did not agree with the commission. Before giving that ruling, I will quote the section of the act. Subsection 1 of section 13 of the Civil Service Act of 1918, which is the same provision which my hon. friend quoted, reads:

> The deputy head may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

My hon. friend chose very carefully to stop reading right at that point, and that is the gentleman who wishes to give all the facts and details to the house. But let me go further. Let me show wherein the hon. gentleman erred and was not fair in his presentation of his case. Let me show that he was not fair when he attempted to say that I had acted in this matter in violation of the Civil Service Act. What do we find? Here is a ruling of the Department of Justice, dated December 9, 1919, asked for by the Tory government and given by a Tory department of justice, not by a Liberal department of justice. What do they say in that ruling? Here it is:

> If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he thinks it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the charge of any duties; otherwise it is conceivable that cases of considerable prejudice to the public service may arise.

There is the opinion of the Justice department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will the Postmaster General allow me a question? Does he say that that ruling is on this file?

Mr. STEVENS: Where is it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If he does, I wish to say to him that he is mistaken. It is not on this file.

Mr. VENIOT: It may not be.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why say it was?

Mr. VENIOT: I had not the file in my hand.

Mr. STEVENS: But you said it was on the file, and you charged the hon. member for Leeds with deceiving the house.

Mr. VENIOT: One moment, please. The hon. member for Leeds asked me a question and I am going to answer him.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Postmaster General has charged me with bad faith in not disclosing to this house the ruling which he has just read, and which he said was on this file, but which I now tell him is not on this file, and I had no knowledge of it.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the hon. gentleman going to make a speech?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think the Postmaster General ought to accept my statement and withdraw any charge of unfairness or misrepresentation of the facts against me. I want to assure him that I have tried to present the facts fairly.

Mr. VENIOT: Since the hon. gentleman says that I was mistaken in saying that that ruling was on the file, and he now states that it is not on the file, I certainly accept his statement, but I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that ignorance of the law is no excuse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. VENIOT: When the hon. gentleman was preparing his brief to submit to this house he should have gone fully into everything connected with this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me go one step further.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Where are the files?

Mr. CLARK: The Postmaster General has no more teeth to put into it.

Mr. VENIOT: There is one thing perhaps I can boast of; I think I have as much brains to spare as the hon. gentleman, if not more.

Mr. HANSON: You have a good opinion of yourself.

Mr. VENIOT: I take it that this is a little friendly banter, and I know that hon. gentlemen opposite who are interjecting will be sports enough to take my interjections in the same spirit.

Let me go a step further. I am told that the certificate issued by the Civil Service Commission should be accepted as a direct appointment of the applicant to the position, and that there is nothing which proves otherwise. Now, what does the notice contain which is sent out to the successful applicant who has qualified as eligible for the position? This is what it says—

Mr. CAHAN: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Postmaster General has read from what purported to be an opinion of the Justice department. Having read from that opinion it is his duty to table it, so that it may be available for hon. members to read.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know that I will unless the Chair says so. I do not think that is a proper point of order. However, I have no objection whatever to tabling it since that has been requested—not that I consider it a proper point of order—as soon as I have had the opinion of the Justice department properly certified. I have not got it here properly certified, but I know it is correct because I copied it myself.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that the hon. gentleman lay on the table what he is reading from.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. VENIOT: I have no objection whatever to tabling it after I get through using it, although I am not compelled to do so. I was going on to refer to the certificate.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not leave any words out.

Mr. VENIOT: That was only a slip of the tongue, not a slip of the mind.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): My hon. friend the Postmaster General has referred to that very point on many an occasion. I may say that for my part I have not been educated along the line that I make slips that serve my own purpose.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the hon. gentleman ought to be asked to take back those words, Mr. Speaker, if by those words he meant that I made a slip of the tongue here to-day to serve my purpose. That is unparliamentary, and I shall not go on with my speech until I get a ruling from the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is a well-known rule that the word of an hon. member must be accepted. The hon. minister in making his statement said it was merely a slip of the tongue, and his word in that respect must be accepted by the hon. member.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. You gave a ruling; then I asked the Postmaster General to accept my word and retract the intimation that he hurled at me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. GOTT: What do you want?

Mr. POWER: Show your education.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman in his remarks made no reference whatever to the Postmaster General.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I take it that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Macdonald) was referring to a statement made by the Postmaster General.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not.

Mr. VENIOT: Let him say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member for Richmond in the remark he made was not referring to me, then I think he ought to say so and not leave another hon. gentleman to say it for him.

Mr. GOTT: But the Postmaster General—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Come on, Richmond.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member for Richmond should be ready to comply with that request. If he was not referring to the Postmaster General, it is an easy matter for him to say so.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, bosh.

Mr. GEARY: Do I understand the ruling of the chair to be that because an hon. member has made some reference which some other hon. member may apply to himself if he choose, the hon. member making the reference must withdraw it? He has not indicated anybody.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I heard the hon. Postmaster General reading from a document, and it was charged that he had left out the word "without", referring to some gentleman using a cane. I also heard the statement of the hon. member for Richmond, and I took it that he was referring to that incident.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If he was not, it is for the hon. gentleman to say so.

Mr. BENNETT: He does not have to say so.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him say so.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, you have given your ruling, and until that ruling is obeyed by the hon. member, or reversed by this house, I do not think I should be called upon to go on with this debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Suit yourself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not feel that any injustice is being done to the hon. member for Richmond. I think Hansard will show that I am justified in asking him to say whether or not he referred to the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely no.

Mr. STEVENS: The Speaker has no such right.

An hon. MEMBER: Stand up, Richmond.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker has no right to cross-question a member of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) will tell you that the Speaker's function is not to cross-examine a member as to what he said.

Mr. MARCIL: In answer to the leader of the opposition, I may say it is the invariable custom of the house that the ruling of the Speaker is not subject to debate, but may be appealed from.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I rule that in my opinion the hon. member for Richmond did refer to the Postmaster General, and I ask him now to withdraw his statement as applied to the Postmaster General.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the remark I made was not applied to the Postmaster General. It referred to a certain statement which he made in reference to my mentality.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I am very sorry indeed if—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. VENIOT: One moment. I am very sorry indeed if any reference of mine to the mentality of the hon. gentleman has offended him.

An hon. MEMBER: Well, withdraw it.

Mr. VENIOT: I would be the last person in the world to do so; but the hon. gentleman must not forget that there was considerable banter being exchanged across the floor, and if he is not sport enough to take, as well as give, some of it, it is not my fault.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is enough.

Mr. BENNETT: The Speaker is responsible.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I think my hon. friend should go a little further,—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the hon. member rising to a point of order?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Yes. I think my hon. friend should go a little further as regards his remarks to certain members on this side of the house; he should withdraw those remarks.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, when this interruption took place I was referring to the certificate generally issued by the Civil Service Commission. This is what I find—

Mr. GOTT: That is where I come in.

Mr. VENIOT: I never referred to my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Surely the minister should be given an opportunity to make his speech to the house. During the last fifteen minutes there have been continuous interruptions.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite do not want any speech. If so, there is one way open to them, and it is quite easy. There are old enough parliamentarians opposite to know what I mean by that.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that a threat?

Mr. VENIOT: Now, I find the following in this certificate from the Civil Service Commission:

> This is to certify that you have been selected to fill the position named above after examination in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, and of the rules and regulations thereunder, and that you are qualified to be appointed on probation at the salary shown above.

That is as far as the Civil Service Commission can go. But "appointment on probation" was in 1919 interpreted by the Justice department to mean that the deputy minister, who has the power to refuse a certificate, is not compelled to place anyone on probation. But allow me to read the next paragraph:

> Please note that no arrangements should be made to report for duty until instructed to do so by the Post Office Department. In this connection your attention is especially called to section 15 of the Civil Service Act and to the interpretation of that section as given by the law officers of the crown as quoted below.

Here it is, and this is what I say was on the file that the hon. gentleman had before him.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Postmaster General permit a question there?

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: I am asking this for the sake of accuracy. I have before me the file, and in it I find, "Copy P.O. 37882 certificate of appointment of postmaster." I presume that this is the document to which the Postmaster General refers. It is addressed to Charles Rex Bowyer. Is that the one?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I am reading from the Whittaker one.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no reference on this form—

Mr. VENIOT: It is the Whittaker one. Now, the fourth clause in small type at the bottom of that certificate issued by the Civil Service Commission contains the ruling of the Justice department. It is here, and I will pass it to the hon. gentleman if he wishes.

Mr. STEVENS: On this form I do not find those words; that is all.

Mr. VENIOT: At the time this controversy took place in the press all these points were brought out and published, and I am surprised if the hon. gentleman did not notice it. I know that from expressions of opinion I have heard this afternoon from the opposite side any statement I may make regarding my attitude towards the returned soldiers may be taken with a good deal of doubt by my hon. friends. But I want to say this: No man has a higher regard for the returned soldiers than I have. I had occasion during the war to pass many sleepless and worried nights because of my own boys who were fighting at the front; and when such newspapers as the Toronto Globe and the London Free Press have seen fit to ask the public, "What has this man Veniot or his family ever done for Canada?" I think that to-day I may be excused if I make a personal reference to myself and my family in order to dispel that feeling which these newspapers are trying to spread abroad, that I acted as I did in connection with the Simcoe matter because I was antagonistic to returned soldiers being properly treated.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to go back to the records of the militia department, turning to the year 1915. The records then will show what the Veniot family did in the last war, beginning immediately after its outbreak. It will show that two of my sons went to the front and won their spurs on the battle field. It will show that the old man himself, when he felt that the enemy was pressing us, had enlisted to go to the front and was turned down for political reasons. It will show that two of my other sons, who are medical men, enlisted and that because they had to receive the title of honorary captain they too were turned down and others taken in their place. It will show that in 1917, when the destiny of the empire hung in the balance and it was thought necessary by some that conscription should be enforced, I gave my services to Canada and Great Britain free, and that I enlisted no less than almost one whole battalion of the French Acadian people of my native province. And it never cost the Dominion of Canada one dollar for my services. A public meeting was called in the town of Bathurst where I resided and the town council was asked to vote $500 for expenses to keep up a recruiting office; and we were asked to name a volunteer recruiting officer who would give his time free. I was not blessed very much with the goods of this world; I could not contribute large amounts in cash to help to carry on the war. But I had my health; I had the ability; and I knew I could influence my own people to enlist. I was chosen at that meeting, a public meeting in the town of Bathurst, and within five hours after I was chosen word came from military headquarters at St. John that P. J. Veniot's services could not be accepted, although I offered them free. That is something to the credit of the Veniot family. And let me say here that the youngest boy of my family enlisted when he was only sixteen years of age. He was in the same position as this boy Bowyer of Simcoe. If you read the newspapers that have attacked me on this question you will find that never once in their editorial criticism did they mention the fact that Rex Bowyer was a returned soldier; they left the impression throughout Canada that I had consented to the appointment of a civilian instead of a returned soldier by the name of Whittaker. So widespread was that impression in Canada that I received letters from branches of the legion in Kamloops, in Victoria and in Vancouver, calling my attention to the situation and condemning me for giving this position to a civilian. But when I pointed out the facts I received back from each one of these organizations the finest letter that could possibly be written to a man.

It is true that Mr. Whittaker as a returned soldier and a disabled man deserves all the sympathy and assistance that can possibly be given him, and it is not because he receives 100 per cent disability that I would attempt in any way to prevent him from earning anything so that he might add to the pension he already receives. But I wish to lay this down here and now and I wish it to be understood: I know that the returned soldiers of the Dominion of Canada do not require, in the public service of this country, that any of their comrades should be taken into positions where, under properly qualified officials, they are reported as being physically fit, thus preventing other returned soldiers from getting their due—soldiers who up to that time had received no recognition from the country for which they fought and bled.

What was the Bowyer case? Young Bowyer, sixteen years of age—

Mr. BENNETT: The same age as Whittaker.

Mr. VENIOT: When Bowyer enlisted he was sixteen; he was sixteen when he wished to go overseas. At that time, under the law, his parents had to give their consent, and the parents refusing to give such consent to their child sixteen years of age, the boy deserted home; he ran away and enlisted under the name of Musgrove. And as such he was recognized on the army list; as such he returned from the front; as such he got his certificate of discharge. When he applied—and now I am coming to the point where I will explain why there was a delay in proceeding at the beginning—when, I say, young Bowyer applied for this position he applied under the name of A. Rex Bowyer—I am not quite sure of the initials, but the name was Rex Bowyer anyway. Report come in to my department from the inspector wherein it was pointed out, as read by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), that the boy had enlisted under and was discharged under the name of Musgrove. But here he appeared applying as Rex Bowyer. I immediately gave instructions to discover what it meant. I felt there was fraud somewhere; I felt that somebody was attempting to perpetrate a fraud. Here was a returned soldier applying for a post office under the name of Rex Bowyer, while his discharge papers showed that he enlisted under the name of Musgrove. A quiet investigation took place; I interviewed the Department of National Defence and had them follow his record from the day he enlisted to the day he returned; I traced him from then until the date of his application, and it was about two months before I was sure that young Bowyer was not attempting to perpetrate a fraud on the department.

With reference to the question of residence, that file will show that it was I who took up the question of non-residence and directed an investigation to be made in order to ascertain the facts. That took more time and finally, after receiving a report from the inspector setting out the circumstances, I notified the commission that in my opinion Bowyer was a resident of that place. However, under the act the duty of deciding the residence of an applicant devolves upon the Civil Service Commission and not upon the Postmaster General.

That was the position to that point. I had to decide the matter on the report of the only officer qualified under the Civil Service Act to make a report as to the mental and physical qualifications of an applicant; when that report was placed before me I decided that Mr. Whittaker was not physically fit for the work. Therefore, after consulting with the deputy minister, who had the power of accepting or rejecting the recommendation of the commission, the certificate was rejected. I did not recommend anyone to the commission; I never do. When there is a rejection the commission is asked to make another choice, and as their second choice they picked Rex Bowyer, who to my mind should have received the appointment, notwithstanding the suffering Mr. Whittaker went through and notwithstanding the affliction he endures. I believe a large number of the returned men throughout Canada will be satisfied with this decision when they learn the facts and when they find that I gave this recognition to a young man who, in order to serve his country, deserted his own home and went to the front under an assumed name. That is the position I take.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the Postmaster General regard it as a special merit that this young man enlisted under an assumed name rather than under his own name?

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly I would not consider it a disgrace to any young man to change his name and fight for his country after his people refused to permit him to enlist.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no evidence in the record that his parents declined to give him permission to enlist. The parents of the other man consented to his enlistment.

Mr. VENIOT: There is nothing in the record to show that Whittaker's parents consented, but what difference does it make?

Mr. GEARY: Whittaker was also under age when he enlisted, was he not? They were both mere lads of sixteen.

Mr. VENIOT: Then they both deserve credit for it. I am not attempting to disparage Mr. Whittaker at all; I did not know his age.

Before I conclude my remarks, or my defence—because I understand that this is a motion of censure against the Postmaster General—let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I find no fault with their method of procedure. If they are convinced that I should be censured because of my conduct in this matter they are quite at liberty to entertain that opinion, but that will not change my feeling that in all fairness and justice, after reviewing the case and considering my duty to the department, to the public and to the returned men, I did what was right.

Mr. CAHAN: Simply to satisfy my own mind, would the Postmaster General state to the house the nature of the heavy work which was required to be done at the Simcoe post office and which precluded Whittaker from the appointment?

Mr. VENIOT: I have already defined the work of a class 2B postmaster.

Mr. CAHAN: I have listened very patiently but I have not been satisfied as to the nature of the heavy work which would have been imposed upon this applicant if he had been appointed.

Mr. VENIOT: I have said all I can say in that regard, and I do not think I should be called upon to say any more in order to attempt to satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman feels that way about it we will discuss the matter further later on.

Mr. VENIOT: In case something may be thrown across the floor of the house after I have finished speaking, with regard to the general impression that while speaking at Simcoe I made a threat that if my decision was changed I would resign as Postmaster General—

Mr. HANSON: No chance.

Mr. VENIOT: That is another interjection to which I might reply in a like manner, but I am afraid my hon. friend would be offended if I did so.

Mr. HANSON: I do not want to hurt the feelings of the Postmaster General; if he feels that way about it I will take it back.

Mr. VENIOT: Thank you. I have here a certified verbatim report of what I said at Simcoe, including my remarks in that connection. Among the audience was a qualified shorthand reporter who took down what I said and who has prepared a certified transcript, and after reviewing the whole situation I went on to say:

> And if I had for one moment a doubt that I did an injury; if I for one moment had a doubt that I did wrong—yes, I'd change that decision, and I would do it with a heart and a will. Convinced as I am that I have done no injustice—

I was speaking to about 1,200 people in Simcoe:

> —to anybody, convinced as I am that I have kept strictly within justice and within the law, that decision will remain as it has been taken, and if changed P. J. Veniot can remain no longer Postmaster General of Canada under our system of responsible government.

There is no threat to resign in those words; I was stating facts. If my colleagues in the government considered that I had done wrong; if they took up the point and decided against me, under our responsible government only one course would be left open to me. Of itself their action would have placed me outside the executive council, and I would have had to abide by that decision. That was the statement I made, but certain newspapers have called upon the government to take action because I threatened to resign. There was no necessity for me to make any threats of any kind. To-day I am administering one of the heaviest departments of the government; it has pleased the Prime Minister to call me to his cabinet, and he has entrusted me with the responsibilities of my present position. For that I feel deeply grateful to him; he has honoured me and the people whom I represent, and I should be loath indeed to do anything which would place an additional burden upon the shoulders of my leader and my colleagues in the government. Acting as I did in this case, I acted with the full responsibility of a head of the department. I reviewed the whole situation and took ample time to go into everything, and having reached that decision I have no remorse whatever. There is no remorse of conscience on my part, and were I called upon to-morrow to consider a similar question I would treat it in exactly the same way.

Our friends opposite seem to be so keen for the returned soldier, but allow me to direct their attention to a duty which they are not performing. If they are the champions of the returned soldiers, why did they not stand up for them at all times and upon all occasions? Why did they not stand up for them when the Civil Service Commission was turning down returned soldiers and appointing civilians in their place? I am accused of turning down returned soldiers, but I have never turned them down unless I felt I had a good reason to do so, and civilians were not always appointed in their places. I have a list of certain appointments which were made by the Civil Service Commission and I would like to comment on a few of these cases.

The first case refers to Kinkora, P.E.I. The application of a returned soldier named Monoghan, was turned down by the commission and a civilian named Carvill was appointed in November, 1928.

The next is Becancour, Que. A returned soldier named Peloquin was turned down and a Mrs. Dube, a civilian, was appointed by the commission in June, 1920.

The next case refers to Dutton, Ont. A returned soldier, named Henry Locke, was turned down and a Miss Kellop got the appointment in February, 1923.

The next refers to Fergus, Ont., where the vacancy occurred in 1922. Applications were received from six returned soldiers and two civilians. Three were found to be non-residents, another named McDonald, withdrew, and a returned soldier named Steele remained. Insinuations as to character were made, and J. B. Bayne, a civilian, was named by the commission in place of Steele.

The next case I wish to refer to is that of St. Marys, Ont. Postmaster Robson resigned in June, 1917. Doctor M. Steele, the representative of that county at the time, was written to and asked to recommend a soldier. He replied that there was no soldier available, and recommended Berton Fox Lancaster. Lincoln Rice, a soldier, applied but was not considered.

The next case refers to Stanley, N.B., and my hon. friend will see that I have not forgotten this case. There were several applications made in this instance, and I think two were from returned soldiers. A returned soldier suffering from tuberculosis was put in temporary charge of the office pending a permanent appointment through the commission. He applied for a permanent appointment along with another returned soldier. Two civilians also applied for this vacancy. When the inspector went to Stanley to investigate this matter he saw the returned soldier in charge of the office, and the civilian applicants, but did not see the other returned soldier. He reported to that effect, and said:

> I had an interview with his wife. She is a well-educated and smart woman, and the neighbours tell me that this man is all right.

He had been a carpenter by trade previous to the war. On the basis of this report the commission issued a certificate in favour of the second returned soldier, but I refused to accept the certificate on the ground that the other man, who was temporarily in charge was a disabled soldier and should be recognized.

Mr. HANSON: Was the report to the effect that the returned soldier was not qualified or capable of filling the position?

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. HANSON: That is the report, because I have read it.

Mr. VENIOT: The interim report was not to that effect.

Mr. HANSON: You tried to get your district superintendent to change the report.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not.

Mr. HANSON: You had some of your men do it for you.

Mr. VENIOT: It was not done at my request nor at my suggestion.

Mr. HANSON: I will have to take that answer, I suppose.

Mr. VENIOT: Of course you will.

The inspector reported that owing to the tubercular condition of this applicant, and from what he had heard from the people, it might be dangerous for this man to be left in the office. Acting under the regulations, I then ordered a medical examination of this man. That examination was held and I received a doctor's certificate to the effect that that infection would not be a danger to the public. After I received the letter from the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) with reference to the physical condition of this applicant and stating that he was about on his last legs and asking me to look into the matter, I immediately got in touch with the medical authorities. I received a report to the effect that this man had a very severe attack of tuberculosis and would live but a short time. I then gave instructions to my deputy to write to the Civil Service Commission withdrawing the refusal of the first returned soldier and accepting his certificate. I gave as my grounds for that action the fact that this man's physical condition prevented him from continuing at work, and also that he might die in a very short time.

Mr. JONES: Why did the Postmaster General not consider the four returned soldiers who made application for the postmastership at Norton? Messrs. Homer, Read, Ward and Price were all applicants, together with a number of civilians.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member is taking me at a disadvantage, but I think I know something about the Norton case.

Mr. HANSON: The Postmaster General knows all about that case.

Mr. VENIOT: The vacancy occurred in either 1923 or 1924. An investigation was held into a charge against the postmaster of political partisanship. This occurred at least three years before my time.

Mr. JONES: The postmaster was not changed until last February.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member will follow me he will see whether or not I am stating the facts. I may be a little out in my dates, but I know we received applications from returned soldiers. A certificate was issued in favour of Ward, a returned soldier, which was left in abeyance. I took charge of the department on either the 23rd or 25th of September, 1926. From 1927, on, between times, I was going over the records of the department to ascertain what matters were left in abeyance, so that I might be able to dispose of them and start off with a clean sheet. Among others I found this case at Norton and I let it drift along as it had drifted along under the former Postmaster General. After about a year or less than a year in cleaning up these matters in abeyance, I refused to accept the certificate issued in 1924, I think it was, or 1925, as the case may be, in favour of Ward and I ordered that the postmastership be declared vacant and the position advertised.

Mr. HANSON: Why?

Mr. VENIOT: Because I was not going to accept responsibility for something that had been pending for five or six years. I wanted a clean sheet.

Mr. HANSON: The minister wanted another man.

Mr. VENIOT: The vacancy has been advertised and I believe the reports are in the department or before the commission, I do not know which.

Mr. JONES: No postmaster is appointed yet, only an acting one. The Civil Service Commission would not allow the minister to override them.

Mr. VENIOT: I never appealed to the Civil Service Commission in the matter. There cannot be found in the files of the Civil Service Commission a document to which my name is attached in connection with any of these appointments attempting to influence the commission one way or the other. When I had occasion to write to the Civil Service Commission, I wrote to them openly and freely. Everything is there to be seen. There is nothing to be hidden in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I understand that, under the act referred to by the minister sometime ago, the Postmaster General or, I think, technically the Deputy Postmaster General, has the right, after an appointment has been made by the Civil Service Commission, to reject the nominee and ask for a further consideration. In each of these cases cited by the Postmaster General in regard to returned soldiers during recent years, did the Postmaster General exercise his power under that section?

Mr. VENIOT: I have no power under that section.

Mr. STEVENS: The Postmaster General did not quite catch my question. I want to be fair to him. I said that technically it was the Deputy Postmaster General, but we all know it is the Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know that I am bound to reveal to the house what takes place between my deputy and myself. We follow the act.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Postmaster General be good enough to follow my question?

Mr. VENIOT: I have answered the hon. member's question.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to make it clear. Has the Deputy Postmaster General, whether in consultation with the minister or not, exercised his power under section 13 of the Civil Service Act of 1918 in regard to the appointments to which he has referred?

Mr. VENIOT: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I did not catch the first question. The deputy has exercised his power and he has a right to exercise it.

Mr. STEVENS: I see a colleague of the minister laughs. I am not deluded at all by the answer of the Postmaster General.

Mr. EULER: I laughed because the hon. member laughed.

Mr. STEVENS: Go ahead. Our turn will come later.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me come to a case that is quite close to home, that of Elora, Ontario. This occurred in the post office at Elora, I think sometime in the month of October, 1928. This was during the time when the newspapers were attacking me so severely in regard to the Simcoe matter and pointing out that the chairman of the commission was the proper person to state whether a man was qualified for the position of postmaster or not, and that, he having so pronounced, I should accept his decision. I want, if I may use the term, to clear the skirts of the chairman of the commission. I never received any official word from him pointing out that, in his opinion, Mr. Whittaker was the proper person and physically fit. I am referring only to what I saw in the press and I am taking it as I found it. It was stated in the press that the chairman of the commission was the one qualified to say whether Mr. Whittaker was physically fit or not and that, he having said so, I should accept Mr. Whittaker for the position as he was a disabled soldier. What do we find at Elora? Within fifteen days after all the trouble at Simcoe, a vacancy occurs at Elora; applications are made; the Civil Service Commission receive a report from the Post Office Department and they decide on the question. There are three soldiers who are applying for the position at Elora. One is Mr. Bell, a returned soldier, but not a disability man. The second is a Mr. Brikker, a 20 per cent disability man, and the third is Mr. J. K. Macdonald, an 85 per cent disability man, but with his limbs unaffected. I received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission in favour of Bell, a non-disability man. I held up that certificate and I am still holding it up because I consider under the ruling of the Civil Service Commission, fair play was not given to those two disability men. In this case I wrote a letter to the commission asking why the 20 per cent disability man and the 85 per cent disability man were not considered and the position given to a non-disability case and pointing out that each of these men was reported by the inspector as being physically fit to do the work of that office. I received a reply something to this effect: That in the Macdonald case in answering the question: "Have you been reestablished?" he said: "Yes, on my return from the war I was given a place by the Canadian National Railways, a lower position than I occupied before with less wages and with no hope of promotion." The Civil Service Commission consider that sufficient to reestablish a soldier. I say: It is not, and I have as much right to interpret reestablishment in that case as has any member of the Civil Service Commission. I am holding up the Bell appointment until the matter can be gone into further. I make reference to this matter to show that all the blame for the non-appointment of returned soldiers should not be placed upon the Postmaster General.

Let me take, as another illustration, the case of the Williamstown post office. A certificate of appointment was given in 1923 to Alexander T. Macdonald, a civilian, a man who is not a returned soldier, while another applicant, Angus B. Sullivan, a returned man, was turned down by the Civil Service Commission.

I do not wish to take up much more of the time of the house. Let me, in conclusion, refer to the great hullabaloo, if I can use the term, that has been made as to my political bias in questions of this kind. I want to admit to the house that I am a Liberal. I have always been a Liberal, believing in the policies of the party to which I am proud to belong. I have been a hard hitter, as is well known in my native province. I have been hit hard and I have hit hard. I ask for no quarter and I give none. I am prepared at all times to stand on the decisions I give, the actions I take, after mature deliberation in regard to them. But I wish to add to that: notwithstanding my adherence to Liberal principles, there is advocated by the Liberal party one principle from which during my whole political life I have never turned aside, and that is, conscientiously do your duty to yourself and your country, and brook no interference with what you consider to be such. I see some hon. gentlemen over there laughing. They are judging your humble servant by their own half-bushels; there is no doubt about that, because we have had example upon example when they were in power of the way in which they cut the political hedge. Why, Mr. Speaker, the record of our friends opposite in the matter of dismissals and appointments when they were in power is such that really if I were a member of that party, when I compared its record with my own, I would hang my head in shame. What do we find hon. gentlemen opposite doing when they were in power? I do not mean the gentlemen opposite me to-day, but their party, although some of them were no doubt members of the party then. I have been accused of guillotining hundreds of postmasters since I came into office. It is true that I have dismissed some postmasters. It is true that some postmasters have had to go by the board for certain offences. It is true that there have been some dismissals—I am not talking now of civil service appointments—because I felt that the public would be better served by the appointment of someone else. But if you look at the record of our friends opposite, and compare that with my record in three years, during which 490 changes in the different post offices throughout the country have taken place upon various grounds, which I shall not undertake to enumerate now—

Mr. JONES: If that is the total number of dismissals under the present Postmaster General, they must have all been in the maritime provinces.

Mr. VENIOT: No, they were not; they were spread all over Canada, and these dismissals took place for reasons that could be given. But my hon. friends opposite never hesitated. There is the record to show that in the province of Quebec the dismissals were so numerous that the postal superintendent of the district of Quebec had to write to Ottawa and ask for more help because he could not get the new postmasters into their positions quickly enough to maintain the service. Inside of a period of eighteen months our friends opposite, when they were in power, dismissed no less than 1,890 postmasters.

An hon. MEMBER: When was that?

Mr. VENIOT: From 1912 to 1914.

Mr. ROWE: That was when rural mail delivery came in.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: They were not rural postmasters.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to ask the Postmaster General to state in fairness to this house whether these dismissals to which he refers in 1912 to 1914, totalling as I see by the record under my hand, some 1,600, were not caused by the closing of post offices due to the establishment of rural mail routes, the number of which established during that period was some 1,800, according to a return made by this government on April 4, 1929.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to go into these matters. I was simply making a general statement, but if any hon. gentleman opposite wishes to have the evidence, I can produce it. The hon. gentleman wishes this house to believe that all those dismissals that took place when his party was in power were due to the establishment of rural mail routes.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: Most of them.

Mr. VENIOT: I say not one-tenth of them, and the records show it.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no.

Mr. VENIOT: They were all postmasters properly established, and let me give you an example of the way hon. gentlemen opposite were dismissing them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The conditions were different altogether. There was no Civil Service Act.

Mr. VENIOT: No, there was no Civil Service Act, but of the four hundred odd changes that I have made since I have been in office, seven-tenths of them did not come under the act, and yet my hon. friend says I am applying the political guillotine.

Mr. HANSON: Many of them were taken out from under the act.

Mr. VENIOT: Not in the post office department.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, before your time.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman has brought this matter up, so let us see how some of these dismissals were made. Take the Bankhead post office. Let us see how that dismissal was made in 1912.

Mr. BENNETT: It was made on my recommendation.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly; I knew the hon. gentleman would admit it. Let us take another one at—I will spell it—B-i-s-h-e-r, or c-h-e-r.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know it at all.

Mr. VENIOT: Let us take the Carstairs post office, there is another.

Mr. BENNETT: And Cochrane is another.

Mr. VENIOT: Cochrane is another. The hon. gentleman remembers them all. Let me go a little further. Last year or the year before I put on record in this house that during the time of that shadow government election, there were no less than eight postmasters in the county of Antigonish dismissed by telegram sent from Ottawa to the superintendent of the postal service in the province of Nova Scotia. I could go on ad infinitum with these dismissals by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MANION: When the hon. gentleman was telling it in the house he did not stick very close to the facts.

Mr. VENIOT: I stuck to the facts. I had the telegrams and I read them in the house, and I can produce the file if the hon. gentleman wishes to have it. I will produce it if he will read it in the house.

I think it is time, Mr. Speaker, that I was winding up my remarks. There is not much that I can add. I wish first to thank the members of this house for their patience in listening to me at such length. I wish to thank my friends of the opposition for their interruptions, because they always seem to stir me up and give me more spawl to defend myself. I wish to thank the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) for having brought this question up, so that now it can be properly aired on the floor of the house and a vote taken upon it, and I hope when the vote is taken, after the question has been thoroughly aired, that we shall have heard the last of it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Postmaster General said that the delay in sending the reports to the Civil Service Commission was due to inquiries as to this man's residence.

Mr. VENIOT: Part of the delay.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would he be good enough to tell the house when inquiry was first made as to Bowyer's residence? My reason for asking is that the first I find in the file was in December after these reports had been sent to the commission and long after the six months had expired.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not feel that I should attempt to confine myself to dates. I do know that orders were issued to have this matter of his residence looked into long before that date.

An hon. MEMBER: Why is it not on the file?

Mr. VENIOT: We do not always issue orders in writing. You call your officials in, direct them what to do, and they do it. That is done in every department. That I think was what was done in this case.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is much edified by the self-adulation of the Postmaster General. There is a saying, somewhat old, "Let another praise thee."

Mr. VENIOT: You ought to follow that.

Mr. McINTOSH: Take a hint.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the Postmaster General has not heard that saying, or if he has heard it he has not profited by it. A very considerable part of his speech consisted of self-adulation, self-glorification, a statement of his consistency in matters political, an affirmation of his convictions, and the great claims he had to public recognition because of the merits of the services he had rendered to Canada. I do not consider that to be at all relevant to the matter now under consideration.

The next part of his speech consisted of allegations in respect of dismissals that had taken place under former administrations. Some of them related to the time when there was no Civil Service Act, and, speaking for myself, a large number of those that he mentioned were cases in which dismissals were made because of violations of the terms and conditions of an order in council approved by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, providing that where civil servants, including postmasters, had been guilty of offensive partisanship, as certified by a member of parliament, dismissal should follow. This was the case in Willow Bunch last year; the offending postmaster was dismissed. It was the case in Cochrane and in Carstairs. That should be the case with respect to the chairman of the tariff board—and one day possibly will be.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me? Why is it right when my hon. friend does it—and I do not question his right—and wrong in the case of the member for Willow Bunch and some other members? I am puzzled by the distinction.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not for a single moment, Mr. Speaker, suggest it was wrong.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What is wrong?

Mr. BENNETT: With that nice choice of English that always characterizes the member for Saskatoon, he has asked a question. But it is difficult to hear it. It is something like his objection a few days ago in connection with the conduct of this house—very violent in one place, very restrained here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: But at any rate, Mr. Speaker, I have not found any fault with respect to what has been done where there has been justification within the terms of the regulations to do it. What we are contending to-day is that the Postmaster General has himself given reasons why this house should censure him. The reasons that he himself has given this afternoon would of themselves be ample ground for the motion now launched, if there were no other reasons in the world; for I say no dispassionate, judicial body listening to the Postmaster General's speech could fail for a single moment to record the judgment which we ask this house to record, namely, that his conduct has been oppressive, unfair, and contrary to the spirit and intent of the Civil Service Act with respect to Whittaker, the applicant, for the postmastership of Simcoe.

This, like many other matters mentioned by the Postmaster General, to him seems to be just an insignificant instance in the history of a great country such as this. In that regard I cannot express my views better than by quoting from an editorial in the Toronto Globe:

> During the past few days, in the consideration of this unusual and intensely human issue, the Globe has learned how largely the so-called little things of life loom in the public estimation—the tug on the heartstrings, the poignancy of sympathetic memories, the keen sense of decency and justice. There is nothing the matter with the sentiment and the spirit of Canadians. They have not forgotten, nor has the oft-deplored materialism of the age warped or destroyed the British instinct for fair play. The communications from women—from mothers—in all parts of the province are most impressive, and it is a good omen for the weal of our Dominion that party politics are pushed into their proper place. A very considerable share of the protests—the most emphatic protests—are from Liberals. One mother whose eldest son is sleeping in France says that she was "brought up in a Liberal home, and have always worked for the Liberal cause, but gratitude and justice to the dear boys who sacrificed themselves for all of us come first. If Mr. Whittaker does not receive justice, then I am a Liberal no more, or at any rate not the kind of a Liberal who will support a party who does that sort of thing."

That quotation from the great organ of Liberal opinion indicates how it regards this matter, small though it may be in importance so far as the great number of cases is concerned, but tremendously important as affecting the life of Whittaker.

Now, sir, it has been apparent during the latter part of the address made by the minister that his principal object in speaking as he did for the last twenty minutes was to attack the Civil Service Commission. He hurled complaint and criticism against that body. The Civil Service Commission was set up by parliament in an endeavour to remove from this country the bane of political patronage. Whether or not it has succeeded remains to be seen. But every enemy of the commission cheered vigorously the observations of the Postmaster General, and every hon. gentleman who desired that the patronage of this country should be exercised on the basis of merit freed from political control was silent during those attacks. For some reason that I cannot understand the hon. minister as one of his instances cited what took place in November of last year when he said that a man who had disability as a returned soldier was passed over by the commission and someone else put in his place. The statute has never said that being a returned soldier alone qualified a man for a position in the civil service. It merely said that preference should be given to him. I cannot understand why these attacks are being made against the Civil Service Commission, this continual sniping, the members of the commission not being here to answer for themselves, the attacks being in a sense a reflection on the administration itself, because it is the duty of the minister of the crown under whose department the Civil Service Commission may fall to see that the commission is defended in this house and ample opportunity given it properly to present its case to this tribunal. That opportunity was not afforded to the Civil Service Commission this afternoon. An attack was made—

Mr. POWER: What about the tariff board?

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance defended that board. An attack was made against the Civil Service Commission this afternoon by the Postmaster General, and no attempt was made to point out what were the conditions applying to the cases he cited. I would remind him of this, the very procedure to which he had recourse in this case, namely, the refusal of his deputy to give his approval, has always been open to the minister with respect to all the cases he mentioned. Then why should he point out this case as one in which he exercised those powers and fail to state that he could have invoked those same powers in the other cases in reference to which he attacks the Civil Service Commission? That is the position which I am sure will suggest itself to every hon. member. I confess I cannot understand why he should have taken that course.

What are the facts of the Whittaker case? That is the case under discussion this afternoon, and upon the principle involved in the failure of the department to appoint Mr. Whittaker to the postmastership at Simcoe a motion of censure against the Postmaster General has been moved. He has seen fit to deal with a large number of cases in New Brunswick, Ontario and various other parts of Canada, and if the facts as he related them are correctly stated, and, as he said, he had to deal with them very hurriedly, then certainly this vote of censure should not be limited to the Simcoe case but should be general in its application to the whole conduct of the hon. gentleman as Postmaster General.

Now, let us look for a moment at the advertisement. It contained these words:

According to law preference is given among candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, first, to persons who are in receipt of a pension on account of disabilities received as a result of war service, who by reason of such service are unable to continue their pre-war occupation, and who have not been successfully re-established; and secondly, to persons who have been on active service overseas or on the high seas.

Those terms are an integral part of the advertisement upon which Mr. Whittaker and others offered their services to the country. It gives a preference—mark you, not necessarily the whole preference, but a preference—first to the disabled man and secondly to the man who is not reestablished.

There were several applicants for this position. Amongst those applicants were Mr. Whittaker and Mr. Charles Rex Bowyer. Mr. Charles Rex Bowyer did not come within the first description of the preference mentioned in the advertisement. He was not a disabled soldier; he was not in receipt of any disability pension. That you will find at page 70 of the return. Therefore, so far as Mr. Bowyer was concerned, he did not come within the conditions of the advertisement under which a preference was to be given. I do not think there will be any difficulty about that; it is clearly established. And that may be the explanation for the cases mentioned by the minister this afternoon when attacking the civil service. It may have been that the cases to which he referred, of returned soldiers having applied for other positions, were cases in which they were not disabled and therefore were not entitled to first preference.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not leaving the impression that returned soldiers who are not disabled have no preference?

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend had followed me he would not ask that question. I read the two sections of the advertisement. I am sorry I read so rapidly; I will read them again for the minister.

According to law, preference is given among candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, first to persons who are in receipt of a pension on account of disabilities received as a result of war service, who by reason of such service are unable to continue their pre-war occupation, and who have not been successfully re-established.

That is the first. The second is:

To persons who have been on active service overseas or on the high seas.

Preference therefore is given to returned men, but there is a first preference given to disability cases, which preference does not attach to other returned men. But added to the disability there must be the other secondary conditions, namely, not having been successfully reestablished, and being unable to take up previous occupation. Mr. Bowyer came within the second class of cases. He was not in receipt of a disability pension, although he was a returned soldier.

Now the minister dwelt at some length on the fact that Bowyer enlisted under the name of Musgrove at the age of sixteen. The record shows that such was the case, stating that he was a minor. It also shows that Mr. Whittaker enlisted at the age of sixteen, presumably with the consent of his parents. Further, it is perfectly clear that when the applications came in, so far as the Civil Service Commission was concerned, they showed that there was no man named Bowyer who had war service. Therefore Mr. Bowyer did not come within the class entitled to first preference as returned soldiers. But the minister says it was disclosed later to the commission that he had a record as a returned soldier under the name of Musgrove, under which name he received his medals, his discharge and his recommendation. That was cleared up. But the Civil Service Commission had no knowledge of it. The minister said he had; and why did the minister intervene? Is not this the fact? The member for that riding, as I shall presently show, and the Liberal organization in that county, said, "We must interfere and get this job for Bowyer". That is the record, as I shall show in a moment. The name appears of Mr. Taylor, the member for the riding, and certain statements he made were printed in the Globe newspaper. It is clear that what transpired was this—that friends came to him as they come to all of us. And why should they not come to us? They come and ask to have certain appointments made. I am not going to be so unfair to the member for that riding as to suggest that it was not in good faith that friends of Bowyer came to him and proposed that this was a position he could fill, expressing the desire that this man should be appointed as postmaster at Simcoe. But it was apparent, when this effort was made, that there was no man named Bowyer who came within the preferential class; and the facts were then uncovered, which appear on the file, showing that Bowyer had served in the war as Musgrove. But still there was a difficulty. The Civil Service Commission made a recommendation. Mark you, it is not denied in this house that Mr. Whittaker came to this city of Ottawa and met the Postmaster General, that he walked with him down the corridor in these halls and indicated to him just how well he could walk, how great his disability was, what his injuries were, and how fit he was to discharge the duties of the office at Simcoe. That is not denied. And bear in mind further that the Postmaster General, on the very threshhold of the matter, saw fit to write a letter in which—and I say this in fairness to him—he placed himself on record as indicating on whom he believed the responsibility rested. For in 1927, on February 28, he wrote a letter in which he said:

> I am in receipt of yours of 24th instant with reference to the postmastership at Simcoe, and I note what you say in favour of Mr. Whittaker, who is an applicant. As Mr. Whittaker is a disabled returned soldier—

Mark these words, the minister himself drawing the distinction.

> —and as the act gives a great deal of preference to such, no doubt he will stand an excellent chance before the Civil Service Commission, who have the absolute control in a position of this kind.

Now, those are the words the minister used, and which he used again this afternoon. Is it any wonder that a resolution is now before this house censuring him for his conduct, when he writes a letter in which he states that the Civil Service Commission has absolute control in a position of this kind? The Civil Service Commission, having the absolute control, having received the applications and having regard to the terms of the advertisement, sent out their notice in due course to Mr. Whittaker under date of May 29, 1928. However, before that notice was sent it is well for this house to remember that two members of the Civil Service Commission, Doctor Roche and Mr. Tremblay, had seen Mr. Whittaker and that the minister himself had seen Mr. Whittaker, who had walked up and down the corridors of this building to indicate that he could walk without a cane, although he had had amputations below the knee in both cases. The knee joints articulated on both legs, as the minister pointed out, one leg having been amputated below the knee and the other below the ankle. Mr. Whittaker demonstrated that he could walk, and according to his affidavit which was read into the record this afternoon, and which in his solemn, sworn statement, the minister told him he could not see any reason why he was unfit to be postmaster. That statement has not been denied.

This is a serious situation. What happened? You have several applicants, one of them a disabled returned soldier, who therefore is entitled to first preference. In the second place you have a returned soldier who is not disabled and who is working on his father's farm; he does not come under the first preference but is included in the second preference.

Then my hon friend reminds me of something else of which I intended to speak. The advertisement required that applicants should reside in that locality. At the time it is quite apparent that Mr. Bowyer was residing at Mount Albion, which is not far from Hamilton, Ont., while Simcoe is some considerable distance from that city. According to Mr. Bowyer's own letter, which was read this afternoon, he would not take the responsibility of saying he was a resident of Simcoe; he had moved away to this place where he was looking after a farm. His residence would be designated as Mount Albion according to any standard which might be applied in order to determine residence, but he still had some property at Simcoe and he said, "I think I might be said to be a resident of Simcoe because I have property and am assessed there." That was the way he put it; he did not attempt to deceive anyone but merely stated the facts. Under these circumstances the following notice was sent to Mr. Whittaker:

> Civil Service Commission of Canada
> Notice of Appointment of Postmaster
> Date: May 29, 1928.
> Post Office: Simcoe, county of Norfolk-Elgin, Ontario.
> Name of appointee: Mr. George Edward Whittaker, O.A.S.
> Address of appointee: Simcoe, Ontario.

Salary rate: $2,040 per annum, with an annual increase of $120 until a maximum of $2,280 has been reached.

(Appointment subject to physical fitness.)

Then the certificate goes on to state:

This is to certify that you have been selected to fill the position named above, after examination, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, and of the rules and regulations thereunder; and that you are qualified to be appointed on probation at the salary shown above.

Please note that no arrangements should be made to report for duty until instructed to do so by the Post Office department. In this connection your attention is especially called to section 13 of the Civil Service Act, and to the interpretation of that section given by the law officers of the crown, as quoted below.

By order of the commission,

Secretary.

There is no doubt that Mr. Whittaker received notice that he had been selected by the Civil Service Commission for the postmastership of Simcoe; that is quite clear. It is also clear that in the notification he received it was stated that he was not to go to work until he received notice from the Post Office department, and that his appointment might be only on probation. There can be no doubt on that point. That did not involve his appointment, but the Postmaster General says this afternoon—and I cannot understand any minister of the crown endeavouring to take that position—"I have no right to do this; it is the deputy minister who can approve or disapprove of these appointments, not the minister." I cannot conceive of any minister trying to shelter himself behind his deputy, because a deputy who would do what the minister did not permit or authorize would lose his position forthwith.

Mr. VENIOT: I would like to offer a word of explanation, because I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. I am not trying to shelter myself behind my deputy; I take full responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for a moment would I think the Postmaster General, after his strong statements as to his great courage, would endeavour to hide behind the skirts of anyone else in a matter of this kind, but the fact is that he blames the deputy minister and will not accept responsibility himself.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: We will see what Hansard says.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 18, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Marcil.

Second report of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe).

THE LATE HON. J. W. EDWARDS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that this House of Commons has witnessed a more sudden passing of one of its members than that which has taken from our midst the Honourable Dr. J. W. Edwards, member for Frontenac-Addington. Not twenty-four hours ago, honourable members on all sides of the house were glad to have the opportunity of expressing their pleasure at Dr. Edwards' return to his accustomed seat in this chamber, after an absence of but a day or two, occasioned by what at the time was regarded by many as a severe though not serious indisposition. It is now but too evident that Dr. Edwards must have known, even on Monday last, that his days were numbered. In the circumstances his coming back into the house yesterday afternoon was but one more example of great personal courage and of a sense of public duty which were characteristic of the whole of his public life.

That the House of Commons has been deeply touched by the death of one who has had a long association with its affairs, was apparent this morning when, despite the lack of opportunity of having public intimation made of the funeral service which was held in the forenoon, most of the members of this house, and, I venture to say, all who were aware of the service, were present in person to pay their last tribute of respect to his memory. That tribute, and the one which was paid by his fellow-members yesterday, is much more real and adequate than anything which it would be possible to express in words.

At the same time, I may, perhaps, be permitted, speaking more particularly for those of us who sit on this side of the house, to say how much we, in common with hon. members opposite, feel the loss which our country has sustained in the death of one who, though still in his sixty-fourth year, had had a long career of public service, in the course of which recognition of his abilities found expression in his appointment as a minister of the crown.

As one who was a graduate in arts and medicine of one of our leading Canadian universities, and who had followed the profession of teaching as well as that of a physician, Dr. Edwards with his native ability was well qualified to take an important part in the public life of this country. That those who knew him best were of this view is evidenced by his return to parliament in 1911, 1917, and 1925 and 1926, and by his appointment as a minister of the crown in 1921, to which I have just referred. We who were his fellow members in the House of Commons also shared that knowledge.

I confess that those of us who sat immediately opposite to our late friend felt, at times, that some of his criticisms and censures were unduly severe; that they proceeded from a sincere motive and from an undaunted courage, none of us doubted.

There was, however, another side to the doctor's nature which was apparent to us all, and by which I am sure he would most wish to be remembered; it was his wide knowledge of public affairs, his ability and fearlessness as a public speaker, and, above all else, a great faithfulness in the discharge of his public duties as a member of parliament.

While his loss to the commons will be great, it will be particularly felt by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I desire, on behalf of the members of the government to extend to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition and to those who sit about him, our sincerest sympathy in the loss which he and the Conservative party have sustained in the passing of one of its foremost members.

There is one other expression of sympathy which I know all hon. members will wish to have made at this time, and which perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, will be kind enough to convey, and that is a mesage of profound sympathy to Mrs. Edwards and to her son and daughters in their overwhelming bereavement. I am sure few things we have witnessed have touched any of us more than the constant devotion, one to the other, of Dr. and Mrs. Edwards. Through all the storm and stress of his political life she was an ever faithful companion. I can see them now as they walked together toward these parliament buildings but a day or two ago, and I shall always recall the kindly smile which greeted me as we passed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

It was that greater mellowness which came with years and which helped to reveal in increasing measure a keen sense of humour and a genuine kindliness of heart that won for Dr. Edwards the place which he had in the esteem and regard of members of this house. It will be remembered more and more as we leave behind the harsher aspects of the conflicts of party debate which, after all, are but of the day.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the very touching tribute which the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has paid to our fellow member is greatly apreciated by those who sit to your left. Doctor Edwards was our colleague, and perhaps we who were more intimately associated with him better understood his nature and appreciated his merits, but the observations of the Prime Minister leave no room for doubt that in this house he had made the influence of his personality strongly felt, and as the years passed, his true worth was but the better recognized. We mourn Doctor Edwards as one of the stalwarts of our party, one whose exposition of the principles of the party with which he was associated was at all times given with conviction, with earnestness and sincerity, and for that reason our grief is more than mere passing sorrow.

While we have lost a great party leader and might say with one of old, "A Mighty Prince has this day fallen in Israel," the loss to his constituents and to his country must not be under-estimated. No constituency was more loyally or more faithfully served by the member representing it in this house than the constituency represented by Doctor Edwards. His profession enabled him to have a very singular hold upon the affections of his constituents, for every medical man who is a member of the house realizes that he has a great advantage in being able to speak to his constituents in terms denied to many others of us. That Doctor Edwards was greatly beloved by those he represented many of us have reason to know, for we have seen manifestations of their affection in more ways than one.

While the loss to our party and to his constituents is great, I feel that the loss to this Dominion is greater still. I know of no man who had a greater love and affection for his country and a more real devotion to its well-being than Doctor Edwards. He had a firm faith and a profound conviction that this country was destined to play a very great part among the peoples of the world. He yielded to no man in his confident faith and belief that our true destiny was to be found within the empire of which he was so devoted a servant, and at all times, whatever might be the matter engaging his attention, he made reference to that fact.

I think you will agree with me, sir, when I say that in losing Doctor Edwards we have lost a great member of parliament. I cannot recall of whom that observation was made, but certain it is that it was made with respect to one who about two centuries ago played a great part in the parliamentary history of England. Doctor Edwards was a great House of Commons man. He believed in our traditions. He had faith in representative government; he believed in the institutions of parliament, and respected and revered them. He had regard for forms, not for form's sake, but because he believed as most of us do, that in the maintenance of those forms we have the best guarantee for the preservation of the institution which we call parliament.

Then there was that side of his life which was so little known to many of us until we knew him more intimately—he was a great friend. His loyalty to his party was known to all, but his devotion to his friends was little understood. He was honoured by thousands of his fellow-Canadians by being placed in a position of very great authority in a powerful organization in this country, and yet I recall his saying to me that no man could point to a single observation that he had ever made in which he attacked any man's religion or denied to any one of his fellow-citizens the right to worship his own God under his own vine and fig tree. He had that tolerance which sometimes was denied to him. He had it to a singular degree. His love for his friends was very strong, and in this House of Commons, though sometimes his courage and the strength of his convictions found expression in terms that some of our friends took exception to, yet upon analysis, stripped of the surroundings under which the words were uttered, I think few could find cause for complaint or for just criticism.

We have indeed lost a friend, loyal, devoted and faithful friend, one whose service to his country cannot be measured by the accumulation of material possessions, but who has left behind him by his example and by the magnificent addresses which he delivered from the Atlantic to the Pacific a feeling of faith in his country, based upon a stalwart Canadianism, coupled with a firm belief in the destiny of our empire and of this Dominion. These things will not easily nor soon be forgotten and as the years pass on I am satisfied that the feeling which was manifested yesterday when he returned to this House will be recalled as indicating the true measure of esteem and regard in which he was held by his fellow members. I recall, as the Prime Minister has mentioned, the words he spoke to me in the hospital only two days ago, and his appreciation of the manifestation of interest in his well-being shown by those whom he regarded as his political opponents, their inquiries as to his health and the hopes they expressed for his ultimate recovery, touched him greatly. I feel certain that his coming back to this house yesterday was influenced largely by a desire to express to those who had been so kind and had taken such an interest in his well-being his appreciation of their interest in his recovery.

I can say nothing more except this, that we do sincerely appreciate the observations that have been made by the Prime Minister, and we grieve with the devoted wife and family in the loss they have sustained. I should like to join with what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has said in that regard, for only the day before yesterday I saw sitting beside the doctor's bed his devoted wife. Such relations are indeed an inspiration to every man who sees in them the development of the best in family life which, after all, is the foundation and the strength of all the institutions of our country. Love of wife and family, devotion to the companion of his life and to his children, were strongly manifested in our deceased colleague. It might be said of him, that though dead he still liveth amongst us. While there may be acute differences about many matters, there can be no difference of opinion as to the sincerity of his motives, the singleness of his purpose, the probity of his conduct, the integrity of his character, his great love for home and wife and children, his generous affection for his constituents and kind-hearted regard for his fellow men, his devotion to his country, his love for his empire and respect for this house of which he was so long a member.

We will long mourn him as a faithful and devoted friend whose loyalty was beyond question, whose devotion was beyond cavil, and whose single purpose in life was to serve his country well and who loved his fellowmen to the fullness of his great heart. I am sure too that we had too little appreciation of the breadth of his vision, the greatness of his intellect, and the power that he wielded throughout this country for the well-being of the commonwealth. Perhaps the words of a great poet truly express our sentiment:

> He has outsoared the shadow of our night;
> Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
> And that unrest which men miscall delight,
> Can touch him not, and torture him again.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening at six o'clock we did not anticipate that we would be called upon to mourn the loss of one of its prominent members. When we saw Dr. Edwards in the chamber yesterday afternoon we all hoped that he had fully recovered from his indisposition of Monday, but unfortunately we are now called upon to mourn his death.

The late Dr. Edwards had taken a very prominent part in the public life of this country for many years past. He was a man of strong convictions, and he was not afraid to voice those convictions on all occasions, and he showed a fearlessness in debate which it would be well for most members of this house also to display.

He was a great humanitarian. Those who had an opportunity of knowing him only slightly became aware of the tremendous interest that he took in the inmates of our penitentiaries, and it was one of his life-long ambitions to see that the men and women who for the time being were restrained of their liberty should be given a better opportunity to become useful members of the community than had been accorded them in the past.

Primarily, on behalf of the prairie provinces, may I express our appreciation of the deep interest which the doctor took in our welfare. We have heard him many times in this house debate the question of the return of our natural resources, and he discussed it on many platforms. I am sure that the western people appreciate very fully the tremendous amount of labour which he expended on our behalf in order to see to it that the western provinces were placed on an equality with the other provinces of the Dominion. I am sure we all regret that he had not lived to see the fruition of his labours.

We in this corner of the house desire to be associated with the remarks of the Prime Minister and of the leader of the opposition in conveying to Mrs. Edwards and to the family our sincere regrets on this occasion.

[Mr. Bennett.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CUSTOMS PROSECUTIONS IN PRINCE COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings):

1. How many cases for infringement of the Customs and Excise Acts were prosecuted in Prince County, Prince Edward Island, during the last fiscal year?

2. What are the names of the justices of the peace before whom such cases were heard?

3. How many convictions were procured?

4. In how many cases was an attorney employed by the department, and what are the names of the respective attorneys?

5. What remuneration was paid to each of such attorneys for services?

6. How many customs and excise officers have been employed in Prince County during the last year, and what are their names and respective salaries?

7. Was any payment made to said officers out of moneys received from the sale of seized liquors? If so, what amount and to whom?

8. How many appeals were taken to superior court, and what were the results of such appeals?

9. What attorney was employed by the department in prosecuting such appeals, and what amount was paid to such attorney for his services?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, in order to give the information asked for in this question a great deal of time and labour would be required, as the records of the information desired are not kept according to counties. We could give the information for the whole province of Prince Edward Island. If the hon. member would be content with such information we would be glad to give it to him in the form of a return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

WILFRED D. BOURGEOIS

Mr. PRICE:

1. How many years' service did Wilfred D. Bourgeois have to his credit, as fishery guardian, in Cocagne district, Kent county, New Brunswick, and also on fishery patrol boat Pontiac, on Northumberland straits?

2. Were his services satisfactory? If not, why was he permitted to continue?

3. Did he apply for appointment as fishery overseer for Kent county and did the Civil Service Commission recommend him?

4. What information was laid against him, if any, of what nature was the complaint and by whom was the information laid?

5. On what grounds was he rejected and upon whose recommendation?

6. Did Wilfred D. Bourgeois serve in France during the war?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. He was not employed on a yearly basis. He was engaged the following number of days in the following years:—

		Days
1920-21	May 24–Mar. 31	265
1921-22	Apr. 1–Mar. 31	288
1922-23	April 11 days
	Aug.-Nov. 65 "	76
1925-26	Nov. 21-30	8
1926-27	Aug. 13–Nov. 7	87
	Engineer on C. L. "Pontiac"
1927-28	Sept 1–Oct. 9	39

2. Though they were so regarded by the fishery overseer for the district, a commissioner who inquired into the efficiency with which he discharged his duties in 1921 and 1922 did not find that they were efficiently performed.

3. Yes.

4. The report of the commissioner referred to in No. 2, was on record. Also the member for the constituency stated that the appointment of Mr. Bourgeois would not inspire cooperation on the part of the fishermen and would not be in the best interest of the service.

5. The best interest of the service. Answered by No. 4.

6. It is understood he did. The man selected is also a returned soldier and was equally rated by the civil service examiners with Mr. Bourgeois for the position.

WARDENSHIP OF BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. When did the position of warden of the British Columbia penitentiary become vacant?
2. When did Inspector Jackson assume duty as acting warden?
3. Has the said Inspector Jackson while acting as warden been residing at night at the Georgia hotel or any other hotel in Vancouver?
4. What expenses have been incurred by the said Jackson since becoming acting warden?
5. Did the said Jackson make the investigation and report on which the late warden, Lt.-Col. Cooper, was asked for his resignation?
6. Was the warden's residence at the said penitentiary burned at night while the said Jackson was in charge of said penitentiary but at a time when the said Jackson was sleeping in the said Georgia hotel in Vancouver?
7. Was the said residence a total loss?
8. What was the value of same?
9. How did the fire originate?
10. Was any insurance carried?
11. How many escapes have there been from the said penitentiary during the time the said Inspector Jackson has been acting warden?
12. When did the position of deputy warden become vacant?
13. When was the Civil Service Commission asked to fill the said vacancies?
14. Will appointments be confined to residents of the province of British Columbia?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. February 17, 1928.

2. February 25, 1928.

3. Yes, Inspector Jackson resides at the Georgia hotel in Vancouver, at night.

4. Total expenses—five thousand four hundred and thirteen dollars, and fifty-five cents ($5,413.55).

5. Inspector Jackson made reports in connection with two investigations held into the management of the penitentiary at New Westminster by ex-Warden Cooper. Ex-warden Cooper was not asked for his resignation.

6. The Warden's residence at British Columbia penitentiary was discovered to be on fire at about two a.m. on February 7, 1929. Inspector Jackson was sleeping at the Georgia hotel, Vancouver, that evening. He was at the fire before it had assumed serious proportions.

7. Yes.

8. It is difficult to place a fair valuation on the warden's house. It was built early in the nineteenth century, and was for a time the residence of the governor of British Columbia when same was a crown colony. It was condemned many years ago on account of "dry rot." British Columbia newspaper accounts value it at about five thousand dollars ($5,000).

9. The fire is believed to be of incendiary origin.

10. No. The general policy of the government is not to insure any of its properties.

11. Inspector Jackson has not been deputy warden. During the time he has been in charge of the prison as acting warden, there has been one escape.

12. May 31, 1928.

13. The warden, 26th March, 1928: The deputy warden, not yet.

14. No.

RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. When will the report of the radio commission be presented to parliament?
2. Will any legislation be introduced this session based on the recommenation thereof?
3. Will there be any change in the granting of station licenses which expire the end of April?
4. What steps will the government take to eliminate the advertising nuisance which now exists?
5. What regulations to protect the public will be afforded during the coming year?
6. Does the government propose to continue the present system on May 1st next, re the granting of those licenses?
7. Have any complaints been received from radio fans about the advertising nuisance, and regarding what stations, and will the complaints be tabled?
8. What has been the cost of the radio commission, and what salaries, living allowances and travelling expenses have been paid each member of the commission and officials?

Mr. CARDIN:

1 to 7. The royal commission to inquire into the radio broadcasting situation in Canada which is composed of Sir John Aird, Chairman, Mr. C. A. Bowman and Dr. A. Frigon, with Mr. D. Manson, an officer of the department as secretary, has not yet completed its inquiries. It is not anticipated that the commission's report will be received in time to present to parliament at this present session. It is not expected that there will be any change in policy regarding broadcasting until the report has been considered. Complaints about advertising have been received from time to time. This matter is being considered by the commission and will be covered in its report.

8.

	Remuneration	Living allowance	Travelling expenses
Sir John Aird ..	$2,900	$1,150	$2,688 12
Mr. Bowman ..	3,185	1,380	753 06
Dr. Frigon	3,080	1,460	920 84
*Mr. Manson, secretary ..	—	1,080	934 96
Office expenses: Stationery, telephones, telegrams, etc.			$1,478 43
Total to 31st March, 1929..			$21,010 41

*Mr. Manson is paid as an officer of the department.

WELLINGTON BARRACKS

Mr. QUINN:

1. Did the government or any members of the government receive a copy of the resolution passed by the city council of Halifax, the Commercial club and the Progressive club, in connection with the restoration of the Wellington barracks?

2. Is it the intention of the government to make the necessary repairs to the Wellington barracks, injured during the explosion of December 6, 1917, in order that the same may be used again by the military authorities?

3. Is the government contemplating the return of the headquarters of the Royal Canadian Regiment to Halifax?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.

2. Under consideration.

3. Any movements of troops from time to time will be governed by existing need and the interests of the service.

[Mr. Church.]

CALL LOANS

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. What amount of money was loaned by the Canadian banks in call loans during the year 1928, and for the months of January, February and March, 1929: (a) in Canada; (b) elsewhere than in Canada?

2. What proprtion of the amount so loaned was the property of the depositors?

3. What rate of interest was received by the banks on the amounts so loaned: (a) in Canada; (b) elsewhere than in Canada?

4. What rate of interest was received by the depositors on their money so loaned?

Mr. ROBB:

1. (a) Call and short loans in Canada outstanding at December 31, 1928, were $265,799,886 as compared with $241,964,697 at the end of the previous year, an increase of $23,835,189; at January 31, 1929, the total was $268,037,092, being an increase of $2,237,206 over the figure for the previous month and at February 28, 1929, the total amounted to $268,422,281, an increase of $385,189 in the month. March returns not yet received; (b) Call and short loans elsewhere than in Canada outstanding at December 31, 1928, amounted to $292,693,175 as compared with $290,584,174 at the end of the previous year, an increase of $2,109,001; the amount outstanding at January 31, 1929, was $326,763,021, being an increase of $34,069,846 over the figure for the previous month, and at February 28, 1929, the amount outstanding was $328,133,789, being an increase of $1,370,768 in the month. March returns not yet received.

2, 3 and 4. Not reported under Bank Act.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

BEDFORD POWDER MAGAZINE—ADDITIONAL UNITS

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Were any additional units to the powder magazine, at or near Bedford in the county of Halifax, constructed during the calendar year beginning January 1, 1928?

2. If so, was the construction work done by contract or otherwise?

3. If by contract, to what person, partnership or company was contract awarded?

4. If not by contract, what person, partnership or company did the construction work?

5. Were tenders asked for in respect to such construction?

6. If so, were they asked for by public advertisement, and in what newspapers?

7. If not asked for by public advertisement, by what method were tenders called for?

8. What persons, partnerships or companies submitted tenders and what were the respective amounts of such tenders?

9. What amount has the person, partnership or company which did the construction work actually received as payment or part-payment in respect of the same?

10. Are any further sums payable, or claimed, in respect to such construction?

11. If so, what amount or amounts (a) as balance of contract price; (b) as extras?

SALARIES OF DEPUTY MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) to an answer made to a question yesterday. The question is as follows:

What are the names and salaries of all deputy ministers, and of all acting deputy ministers for the fiscal year 1927-28?

You will note, sir, that I asked for information respecting all of them. I find in the answer brought down that the names, for example, Dr. Doughty of the Archives, the Clerk of this house, and the Civil Service Commissioners, are omitted, and there are very many other omissions which are quite apparent. I now desire to ask the Secretary of State to bring down this additional information.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I may tell my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, that there is a distinction between deputy ministers who serve under ministers, and superior officers having the rank of deputy ministers. If in a new question my hon. friend would specify the officers that have been omitted I will see that he gets the proper answer.

SIMCOE ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General if he will lay on the table the opinion of the Department of Justice to which he referred yesterday; also the correspondence upon which that opinion is based?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Yesterday I laid on the table what I had read; but I have not the correspondence. If there is any I will table it.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Vote 314, page 71 of the estimates. When the committee had this vote before it yesterday it was decided to take it item by item.

Outside Service — Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can the minister furnish the committee with an estimate of the revenue and expenditure of his department for the year expiring March 31, 1929? The last report which we have is for the year ended March 31, 1928, which report has been printed and distributed. I think the committee would be glad to have the figures, either complete or estimated, for the year just closed.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The returns for the fiscal year 1928-29 have not yet been completed and it would be quite difficult to submit those figures. We may be able to give partial figures up to the 31st of January. However, I will have the matter looked into with a view to submitting all the figures we have. When a quarter is completed it generally takes a couple of months to get in all the returns from outside, compile them and have them ready; my secretary tells me it requires three months. Any information we have I will certainly try to have ready.

Mr. HEAPS: When a similar item in the estimates was being discussed last year the question of wages paid to postal employees was brought to the attention of the committee, and on this occasion I wish again to discuss that question. I believe the wages these employees are receiving run from $90 to $120 a month, and out of this sum there is deducted 5 per cent for superannuation. This is in itself an actual reduction in pay, because in a great many cases no equivalent is given to the postal employees for the money they pay into the superannuation fund. I believe the Postmaster General has placed on the records of the house certain corespondence that passed between himself and the Civil Service Commission, and it was indicated that he was favourable to giving an increase to the postal employees but that the Civil Service Commission stood in the way of the proposal. Somehow or other, while I appreciate the efforts made by the Postmaster General to give to the postal employees an increase in wages such as they are entitled to, and which I believe is endorsed generally by members in all parts of the house, I do not think he has gone quite far enough. I believe that if the government were determined to give to these workers increases in salaries, ways and means could be found to do it. During the past few days there has been done by the government something which in my opinion places the question now in a completely new aspect. I understand that parliament created the Civil Service Commission for the purpose of determining the salaries and the conditions under which employees of the government should be engaged; and if the government have confidence in the Civil Service Commission then I presume it is quite right and proper for them to accept all the findings of that commission. Within the past few days, however, the Minister of Finance has intimated to parliament the appointment of a special commission which, so far as I can see, is brought into existence for no other reason than that he has no confidence in the findings of the Civil Service Commission. If such is the case with regard to professional and technical employees of the government, I want to know why the same action should not be taken with regard to the postal employees. If a special commission is to be appointed to investigate the salaries of professional and technical employees, in my opinion there is a thousand times more need to investigate the salaries of men receiving less than $100 a month. The Minister of Finance informs the house that he has appointed three big business men to constitute that commission. My opinion is that the appointment of this commission by the government amounts to a vote of want of confidence in the Civil Service Commission. If the government had confidence in the Civil Service Commission it would not be necessary to appoint a special commission to review their findings; and if the government had no confidence in the findings of the Civil Service Commission with respect to professional and technical employees, I cannot understand how they can have confidence in the commission's findings so far as postal employees are concerned. In spite of the fact that the Postmaster General and members on all sides of the house recognize that the salaries paid postal employees are too low, no action is taken by any responsible minister to appoint a commission to investigate the salaries of these employees. I would offer a suggestion to the Postmaster General. There is certain legislation on the statute books in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and I see no reason why the government, having appointed one commission to investigate matters with regard to certain employees, should not put that act into operation and appoint a board representative of the postal employees and the government, with a third party, to investigate salaries in this connection. I do not want to discuss what has been in the past the policy or platform of the Liberal party with regard to employees of the government; that I think is well known to minister themselves, but I do say that, living as we do in an era when it is claimed there is so much prosperity in Canada, the employees of the government have a right to expect a decent living wage. No minister of the crown, no member of this house, can stand in his place and claim that $90, or $100, or $110, which is being paid to postal workers, is anything approaching a living wage. Therefore when the salaries of postal workers are under discussion I think the Postmaster General should make an explicit statement as to the attitude of the government and of himself towards these employees.

Mr. VENIOT: In reply to the hon gentleman, or rather hon. member—

Mr. HEAPS: Gentleman too.

Mr. VENIOT: Of course—both. I cannot give any explanation about the appointment of a special commission touching technical officers; that is not in my line. All I can say is that the postal department has followed as closely as possible the act in its recommendations, where it thought fit, in the matter of increased salaries to postal workers generally throughout the department. There are some technical men in my department, but they come under another class; and so far as I am concerned, as head of the department, I have always felt that wherever it was possible, and wherever deserving, our employees should be paid adequate salaries. But the act fixes a rate, and certain regulations are laid down to be carried out by the Civil Service Commission. When an application is made to them for increases or additional help, which in some cases would mean promotion, the head of the department has nothing whatever to do with the fixing of salaries; it is entirely in the hands of the commission, and as I said before I must, as head of the department, abide by their decision.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the Postmaster General tell the house why, when recommendations were made by the commission to the government in the case of technical employees, the government did not accept those recommendations?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not in a position to answer that question; I can only speak for my own department.

Mr. HEAPS: But I would point out that the commission was not appointed by a minister but by the government; consequently the Postmaster General is bound to assume some responsibility for the appointment.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly I would share my responsibility with the other members of the government, but the answer to that question is not supposed to come from me.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the Postmaster General give me any information as to why the postmaster at Rathburn was dismissed; also as to whether or not anyone has been appointed to fill the vacancy, and if so, upon whose recommendation.

Mr. VENIOT: The information I have is that action with regard to the dismissal of the postmaster at Rathburn was taken by the department following the discovery of a shortage of $196.62 in his accounts through an inspection made on October 5, 1928, and a further shortage of $63 found during an inspection of October 18, 1928. I will not say any more; I will leave it at that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the position with regard to the postmastership at Kitchener?

Mr. VENIOT: An order has been issued for the dismissal of the postmaster at Kitchener, and notice of the vacancy is to be advertised immediately.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What were the grounds for the dismissal?

Mr. VENIOT: On the ground of a very grievous irregularity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a very general term.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman wants the information I will have to give it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have been requested to ask for the information.

Mr. VENIOT: I will give it. For some time it was suspected that certain moneys were being lifted from envelopes, mail matter, in that office. At first suspicion was not directed towards the postmaster but towards others, but through our secret service system the postmaster was discovered mishandling these letters. On that evidence being produced to me, to my deputy and to the officials of the department I suspended the postmaster. I have gone further into the matter and found it was even more serious than at first reported, and as a consequence his dismissal has been ordered.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has there been any prosecution in the matter?

Mr. VENIOT: Not yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the government contemplate taking steps to prosecute?

Mr. VENIOT: We do not always prosecute.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any reason for not prosecuting in a case so grievous as this?

Mr. VENIOT: There are reasons for which we do not prosecute for offences of that kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know there are a large number of prosecutions directed against letter carriers and men occupying similar minor positions; has the minister any good reason to suggest why there should be no prosecution in this case?

Mr. VENIOT: Sometimes it is quite easy to prosecute, and at other times it is quite difficult.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is never difficult to dismiss, though.

Mr. VENIOT: Not when they are stealing; no.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister a right publicly to brand a person with stealing when he intimates that he has not sufficient evidence upon which to base a prosecution? If there was an offence which would warrant the use of the word "theft" as applied to any citizen of this country, surely there is reason for prosecution. If there is not enough evidence for that prosecution, no such stigma should be attached to the name of any man.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not use the word "theft" in regard to this man.

Mr. STEVENS: The Postmaster General used the word "stealing," at any rate.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I said "a grievous offence." I related the facts and hon. gentlemen can interpret them as they wish. An hon. gentleman opposite made some reference to dismissals, and I said, "Yes, when they are stealing."

Mr. STEVENS: Does the Postmaster General think he can use that phraseology in this house in answer to an hon. member and then wiggle out of the dilemma by saying he was not referring to this man? The sole topic of conversation between the minister and hon. gentlemen on this side of the house was this particular case at Kitchener, and I want to register a serious objection to a minister of the crown, under the protection of parliament, attaching to citizens of this country a stigma by telling us the offence is grievous and then going on to say that there is not sufficient evidence on which to proceed with a prosecution.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say we had not sufficient evidence on which to proceed with a prosecution; I said that in some cases it was difficult to prosecute and in others it was quite easy. That refers more to the circumstances of the offence rather than to the facility with which a prosecution could be proceeded with. It was not my object to attempt to disparage the character of any official who unfortunately has become guilty of irregularities under our system of administration, but hon. gentlemen opposite publicly asked for certain information. I would prefer not to make such statements; when an hon. member asked with regard to Rathburn I felt inclined to ask him to come over and have a look at the report instead of reading that report to the house. When the matter of Kitchener came up the questions directed at me by hon. gentlemen opposite came so rapidly that I endeavoured to give the details in order to justify my action in dismissing this official.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not the well-defined policy of the department to prosecute in all cases where there is sufficient evidence of theft? I have understood that to be the policy for many years. I recall a case which occurred in my own constituency in the spring of 1921, before I became a member of this house; a boy, a clerk in the post office at Fredericton, whose name I am not going to mention since he has been punished and is now trying to redeem himself, was caught stealing money from unregistered letters. The mother came to me in great agony, as naturally would be the case, but on taking the matter up with the district superintendent I was informed that it was the invariable rule of the department to prosecute such offenders, and if he had been sentenced by the police magistrate to three years' imprisonment there could be no suspension of sentence.

Mr. BENNETT: Which is the minimum sentence.

Mr. HANSON: There was no suspension of sentence under the criminal code, and this man served his time, or such part of it as he had to serve until he was released on parole. I was told that they had no recourse; that it was not up to the Postmaster General to withhold the necessary instructions for prosecution. It seems to me that this is a case which requires a little further explanation on the part of the officials of the department or of the Postmaster General.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know anything about the details of this case, although it has been referred to me as being a very grave one. From the answer of the Postmaster General I would assume that there was something very bad in the conduct of the former postmaster at Kitchener. I gathered from the remarks he made a few minutes ago that the irregularities at least amounted to theft. If that be so, and I understand that is true, why is not this man prosecuted? Does the Postmaster General take the position, when in possession of the facts, that he can idly stand by? Surely no minister of the crown is going to hush up a criminal offence.

Mr. BENNETT: Hush, hush is the policy.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The law provides that a man who does not take steps to prosecute under these circumstances may himself be liable for the offence of compounding a felony. I always understood that in regard to the Post Office department of Canada every offence was prosecuted. Our criminal code contains special provisions covering thefts in connection with post offices. A man who steals a dollar or two from a till may go to gaol for ten days, but if he steals one cent from a letter he must go to gaol for three years. That is the minimum sentence the law allows in the case of theft from a postal letter. I would ask the minister if there is anything in this case which precludes him from giving the facts to the house.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I have all the facts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not want unnecessarily to interfere with or embarrass any person, but the house is entitled to the facts. Kitchener is one of the important cities in western Ontario, and inquiries have been made of me, and others in this house, as to the facts of this case. I made inquiry on a former occasion and the only answer I received was to the effect that the postmaster had been suspended. I think the minister should elaborate the matter a little more than he has done, and give some reason why prosecution has not been instituted.

Mr. VENIOT: I have given all the details regarding the irregularities which would point to anything in the way of dishonesty. There was another irregularity in connection with the matter, the excessive drinking habits of the postmaster. I think that was the point which induced me rather to condone—if I may use that term—the action of which he was first accused. I am told that in the condition he was in that night he would perhaps not be responsible for the act which was committed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a defence in law.

Mr. VENIOT: I know it is not; I am not a lawyer, but I know that that is not a defence. Whether rightly or wrongly, whether or not my judgment was astray, I did decide that dismissal would be sufficient punishment for the man under those conditions. When I had the matter in hand I considered his family, and also the fact that if the matter came into the hands of the court I could not interfere. I thought it would be better to show leniency in this case, as I have shown it in other cases. I do not wish to deny that I have shown leniency in many cases where I felt I was justified in doing so, and I will show it again.

Mr. HANSON: I asked the minister to declare the policy of the department, but he has ignored me absolutely. I do not mind that personally, but I think we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot answer them all at once.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to know who gives the Postmaster General discretion in cases of this kind. Does he submit them to the Department of Justice? Why should one man be singled out for leniency, and another prosecuted? Who made the Postmaster General the judge as to who should be prosecuted and who should not? I was told nine years ago that the department had a well defined rule on this point, and that nothing could be done in the case of a man who had been caught and had confessed. In this case a very serious misdemeanor—

Mr. VENIOT: And who was in the hands of the law at the time.

Mr. HANSON: I am not just sure about that; I am rather inclined to think that that is the case. But that does not alter the principle which underlies the whole procedure. I suggest that it is a funny state of affairs when the Postmaster General can constitute himself a judge as to whether or not a man shall be prosecuted. Such discretion should not be vested in any man. If there has been thieving and dishonesty in a particular case, the man should be prosecuted. I understand that the department, under Mr. Murphy, laid down that policy years ago, and that it has been rigidly adhered to ever since. I am astonished to learn that the Postmaster General exercises a discretion as to whether or not any of his friends or his non-friends shall be prosecuted.

Mr. VENIOT: I will say to the hon. gentleman that there is no such thing as friendship.

Mr. HANSON: Let me point out to the minister—

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman had his chance and he sat down.

Mr. HANSON: No, I did not. I am not quite through; I have one more observation to make. It was this kind of administration which undermined the customs service of this country. We had a striking illustration of that fact in an answer given the other day by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), when he told us of the money which had been lost to this country by reason of the administration of that department under a previous minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was a report made by the inspectors regarding this matter?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give that report to the house?

Mr. VENIOT: The investigation upon which that report is based was carried on by the secret service of the department. I would not like to give that portion of the report which would reveal the name of the person making the report, because that would break down the discipline, so to speak, of the secret service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps the report itself will give us all the information we want. Will the minister read it?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not the report here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let the item stand.

Mr. VENIOT: I will take a note of it and have the report here this evening. Since I have made the mistake of showing leniency in the past, I will guarantee that I will show none in the future.

Mr. BENNETT: A moment ago you said you would.

Mr. HANSON: That is pure bluff.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then we have gained a point.

Mr. VENIOT: Not in this discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister does not mean to ask this house to accept seriously what he said a moment ago, "and I will do it again," and he was cheered by his supporters.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not very loudly.

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite right, but he was cheered. He now says he will not do it again; that he will see that the law is enforced.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman says that I am not carrying out the law, and they blame me for that; I am going to carry it out

Mr. BENNETT: The Postmaster General is a servant of the people of Canada. He is bound by statute to discharge his duty; if he fails in his duty he is subject to the censure of this parliament. He has now, from his seat in the house, told the people of the country that he plays favourites in the administration of the criminal law of Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: That is absolutely not true; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the section.

Mr. VENIOT: That section does not prove that I said what the hon. member said I said.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to say what he said. Sections 364, 365 and 366 deal with the question of theft from post offices. Section 364 reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, or for any term not less than three years, who steals,
> (a) a post letter bag; or
> (b) a post letter from a post letter bag or from any post office, or from any officer or person employed in any business of the post office of Canada, or from a mail; or > (c) a post letter containing any chattel, money or valuable security; or > (d) any chattel, money or valuable security from or out of a post letter.

It is the duty of the Postmaster General to place the report and the precis of evidence before the law officers of the crown. He is not the law officer of the crown to decide what shall be done. What wrecked Ramsay MacDonald's government? It was wrecked because there was an interference with the administration of law, or there was thought to be one on the part of the law officers of the crown, and on a vote in the house the government was defeated and had to resign. That was in respect to an editor called Campbell.

Mr. POWER: Was there not a letter involved?

Mr. BENNETT: There was, and the Ramsay MacDonald government was destroyed on account of a lesser offence than that which the Postmaster General to-day said he was guilty of in this case. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) says: "What?" This is what: The Postmaster General says that an officer of this country was guilty of theft. Did he prosecute him? He says no. When he was asked: Did you put it before the law officers of the crown? he replied: I did not. He said that he exercised his discretion. He used the word "condone." Now he says: "I will do it again." Loud cheers! Now he says: "I will not do it again." Groans! I put this question to the house, and from the house to the country: Is a postmaster general, whose duty is as defined by law, permitted to do what an attorney general in England was not permitted to do? My hon. friend yonder is an eminent member of the legal profession.

Mr. POWER: I am not.

Mr. BENNETT: He remembers Sir Patrick Hastings, the Attorney General, was thought to have interfered slightly with the prosecution of Campbell, and because he did that, the government went out. This country has always been jealous with respect to the administration of law. I know what is going on in other cases and let there be no mistake; before this committee finishes with the Post Office estimates, there will be many other cases discussed. The discussion of these estimates is only starting. This is only one of a long series of matters in which the Postmaster General has marked his inefficiency and incapacity for this high office. This is not my opinion; it is the opinion of the Toronto Globe and of the Farmers' Advocate, a perfectly independent journal, which, in an editorial that came to hand this morning, reviewed his activities. I think, until we get further evidence, until the minister brings down his report, we can let the matter stand.

What is the duty of the Postmaster General? I know I can bear out what his predecessors thought their duty was. Where they had evidence of wrongdoing that might amount to theft, they understood that their duty was not to arrogate to themselves the responsibility but to place the report in the hands of the law officers of the crown, whether it be the crown prosecutor of the county or the law officers of the crown through the Department of Justice, and allow them to say whether there should be a prosecution or not.

I know two cases which were launched in my constituency. It is true they resulted in dismissal because there was not sufficient evidence on which to base a conviction, the evidence being that of an accomplice; but they were launched. Let me ask the Postmaster General: Has he a record of any cases in which theft has been charged against high officials and in which no action has been taken, and where they are still in the employ of the government and not dismissed? This is being treated as a joke, but it is something of the same sort as wrecked a government in England.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not treating it as a joke.

Mr. BENNETT: If one were selfish in one's desires, all one would ask for would be for my hon. friend to continue what he is doing. That however, is not the desire. The point is not that we may reap some political benefit; but what is more important than all the political benefit there may be, is that the administration of justice should be without suspicion and without the possibility of there being dark passages in the history of judicial processes in this country.

Mr. CANNON: Is it not a fact that in those proceedings in England, to which the hon. member refers, proceedings had been instituted and were then stopped? That is where the trouble came in.

Mr. BENNETT: I said: there was thought to be an interference by the law officers of the crown in the case against Campbell. I referred to that because the Postmaster General put himself in the position of saying: I am going to stop proceedings before they start. I do not think the Solicitor General was present when the Postmaster General used the word "condone." It is the duty of the Solicitor General to advise his colleague and the government. I put this question to him: As a matter of law, is it competent for the Postmaster General, under the provisions of the criminal code, to condone a felony, to say: We will not take proceedings? Does that not rest with the law officers of the crown, whether they be of the county or of the Dominion itself, through the Department of Justice?

Mr. CANNON: There cannot be any such thing as condonation of felony unless proceedings are taken. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend did not quite mean that, or else he did not understand my question, or else he is not serious. The very essence of the provision of the criminal code is that compromising in order to prevent an offence being prosecuted, is in itself an offence. Perhaps my hon. friend has the code beside him. The difficulty is that the minister is arrogating to himself the position of a judge and of a crown officer. We are not contending that the crown officers may not report against proceedings being taken. There is not one of us who does not know what this responsibility involves, but it is one of the prices we pay for being in public life and it is one of the prices we pay for our citizenship. I know when I was actively engaged in the practice of my profession, I had, in connection with corporations, to deal with exactly the same problem that the Postmaster General had to deal with. I realize in a private company the position is one of extreme difficulty in regard to compromising in the case of offences. I know railway companies that are compelled to prosecute by reason of the responsibility involved. I know the case of a bank where a prosecution was taken and where the accused was convicted and sentenced to four or five years' imprisonment, but in two or three months he was out on ticket-of-leave. That is the executive as distinguished from the administrative side of government. The administrative side of government has to see that the law takes its course. If, after the conviction has been made, the executive sees fit, for reasons that may be good, to lessen the punishment, that is a matter of the exercise of clemency by the executive. There may be extenuating circumstances, but it is distressing, unpleasant, that men who occupy positions of authority, have these disagreeable things to do. I trust some hon. gentlemen read the speech of Mr. Asquith when the case involving Sir Patrick Hastings, Campbell and Ramsay MacDonald came up, because it is a speech every public man might do well to read. It showed how extremely determined people in England were to see that the law was properly administered; that there should be no possible suspicion. Is it putting the Postmaster General in a fair position to have him say: In one case I did not prosecute; in another I did. Suppose it should turn out that in a case in which he did not prosecute a political supporter was involved, and that in a case in which he did prosecute, it was otherwise; would not that put him in a very difficult position, in a highly improper position? I think he will agree that that is so. Under those circumstances I think the minister has indicated certainly a very strange disregard for what we conceive to be his duties. He says: I will do it again. He says: Just because you have said that, you watch how I will administer the law—the inference being: Some of our friends are going to get into trouble.

Mr. VENIOT: No. That is unfair.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why this defiant attitude of saying: "I will do it in the future," in view of what we have said here?

Mr. VENIOT: Because you felt constrained to point out to me what you thought was my duty, and if I am convinced that you are right, I do not intend that you shall in future ever find it necessary to say that I did not carry out my duty in that respect.

Mr. BENNETT: This attitude of mind is so new and novel as to permit us to offer our hearty congratulations to the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: It is a fair and an honest one, at least.

Mr. ADSHEAD: With regard to this item for allowances for postmasters, I was present at the convention of the postmasters last year, and while they appreciated very much the salary increase which the Postmaster General had granted, they felt that he was giving them something with the one hand and taking it away with the other, because the commission which they had received for many years on the sale of postage stamps and money orders was taken away from them. That was a serious cause of complaint, and I would direct the attention of the Postmaster General to it and ask him to restore to the postmasters throughout the rural districts the commission which they formerly received on the sale of postage stamps and money orders.

So far as the Civil Service Commission is concerned, I would be the last to advocate putting the appointment of civil servants and the question of their salaries into the hands of members of parliament, yet rightly or wrongly, I find that there is a great deal of discontent with the decisions of the Civil Service Commission. One class of civil servants, the postal employees, have come to me and asked that they be taken out from under the Civil Service Commission and be administered either through patronage or direct through the Postmaster General. I have had another class come to me who felt satisfied with the Civil Service Commission, and who said that under no circumstances did they want to be taken out from under it. I do not know whether it would be well to have a commission to investigate the Civil Service Commission, but some of their decisions have been unsatisfactory to a considerable number of the civil servants.

In regard to the postmasters in the rural districts, I would ask the Postmaster General to restore the commission on the sale of postage stamps and money orders so that the rural postmasters will really be getting the salary increase which they were promised.

Mr. GEARY: I hope the point raised by the hon. member for North Winnipeg will not be passed by. Similar representations have been made to many of us; I am not alone in that. I expect every hon. member has had representations made to him and has studied the question in regard to the pay of men such as those to whom the hon. member for North Winnipeg has referred. I would ask the Postmaster General to indicate the view of the government so that we may see if there is not some way of getting over the difficulty and getting something for these underpaid men. It is all very well to put up the Civil Service Commission as a buffer, but as I understand the commission's attitude, it is that if they raised the pay of this class they might have to raise the pay of another class. Well, if the other man's pay is such that it ought to be raised, that is no answer. In some way we should see that justice is done to these men, who are shamefully underpaid at the present time. For instance, some were supposed to get an increase of $120 or $240, I forget which, but as it worked out, when you take the cost of living bonus into account, they are really receiving a lower rate of pay than they were before the increase was granted. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this house should take up this matter, and in some way or other find itself able to do justice to these men. If the only objection in the minds of the Civil Service Commission is that if they give these men fair play, they will have to give the other men fair play, it seems to me the house might remedy the whole thing by giving consideration to a plan for meeting the situation.

There are men receiving $75, $80 and $110 a month. That is not enough for a man to live on. This government should have no man doing a class of work which is worth a living wage to whom it does not pay a living wage, and there are as well men in higher grades who seem plainly entitled to more pay than they are getting. I would ask the minister to take this matter up a little more fully in the house and explain the exact situation, and perhaps we may be able to find a solution that will do justice to these men. I shall have more to say when the minister has answered me.

Mr. McGIBBON: There is a case I want to bring before parliament and the country which I think presents the most disgraceful exhibition of partisanship that has ever been exhibited in the Dominion of Canada. I refer to the dismissal of the postmaster in the small village of Uffington, a man who had efficiently discharged the duties of this position for thirty-one years, a man who is crippled and has not walked since he was five years old, and who to-day is seventy-one. He was kicked out of office, so to speak, by this government, without even the formality of a notice, and a young able-bodied man was appointed in his place. This aged man who was dismissed has now to depend upon the charity of the people of the county. I make this indictment against the Postmaster General because he is the high executioner of officials in this country. I have asked for the correspondence. I have gone through it as it had been brought down by the department, presumably official and presumably complete, and there is not one single charge made in all this correspondence against that man. He drew a small salary of $220 a year, not very much it is true, but still enough to keep him from poverty. I think I can say this on behalf of the Postmaster General, that he acted in this case without a knowledge of the facts. I sent him a wire to that effect at the time, stating that I did not believe he would be a party to this man's dismissal if he knew the facts. There has been sent to the government a petition signed by practically every resident who gets his mail at that post office, but the government has refused to reopen the question and to-day this old man is dependent upon the cold charity of his fellow citizens of the township. I say that when political partisanship is carried to such an extent that a man who has given the best years of his life to the service of his country is kicked out on the street, after thirty-one years of service, it is a disgrace to the government of Canada and a disgrace to any department of the government.

Mr. VENIOT: Was that the Uffington post office?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes. I could excuse the dismissal if some restitution had been made, but no restitution has been made although as I say, a petition has been sent to the government signed by practically every individual who gets his mail at the post office. Worse than that, sir, there were three returned soldiers living in the municipality, any one of whom could have been appointed to this position if necessary. They informed me that each of them offered to take the position and hand over the salary to the late postmaster in order that he might enjoy the remaining few years of his life in ease. That was not done. The post office was moved a quarter of a mile away from the centre of population, and the position given to a young able-bodied man who is quite capable of making a living in any field of endeavour that he may select.

I feel I should be derelict in my duty to my riding and also to the principles of the Conservative party if I did not bring this case before parliament and ask the Postmaster General, even at this late date, to give some redress. Surely the poverty-stricken public servants of this country who give the youth and the mid-day of their lives to the service of their country should not be kicked out in their old age and left to the charge of their fellow-citizens. Again I ask the Postmaster General to redress this wrong, and I ask also that this house urge him to take appropriate action.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Muskoka has painted a very sad picture of the condition of the former postmaster as a result of his being thrown out on the street in his old age. I must admit the old gentleman was a cripple, but when my attention was drawn to certain conditions in connection with the office that fact was not known to me. However, I doubt very much whether I would have desisted in the course I took had his condition been made known to me. My hon. friend perhaps has not all the record of this office. For years past irregularities had taken place. I am doing now what perhaps charity should prevent me from doing, but when I am forced with my back to the wall, in self-defence I think I am justified in this action. I hate to have to expose these things to the public, but I am compelled to say that that man on different occasions was found short in his accounts. Irregularities were found in his office—

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was that the reason he was dismissed?

Mr. VENIOT: That was one of the reasons.

Mr. McGIBBON: I will answer that later.

Mr. VENIOT: That was one of the reasons, together with complaints that the office was not in a centrally located place.

Mr. HANSON: That is an old complaint.

Mr. VENIOT: It was suggested that the office should be shifted to the larger business centre of the district. Those considerations combined were what drove me to make the dismissal. My hon. friend says there is a salary of some few hundred dollars attached to the office.

Mr. McGIBBON: There is a salary of $220.

Mr. VENIOT: It was not at that time; it was only $60. It has been raised, I think, to $100 in the ordinary way. I find the total revenue of the office is only $252.

Mr. McGIBBON: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. VENIOT: One moment. I am pointing out that the revenue is only $252, therefore the salary could not be $220. Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to bring forth such evidence as this. It is not my fault;

I have to do it in self-defence. Hon. gentlemen who are attacking me on these changes in office must take the responsibility. On the one hand, I am accused of not wishing to prosecute this one or that one for theft; on the other hand, I am condemned because I am not leaving in office men who are found short in their accounts. Let me explain that I do not use the word "shortage" as synonymous with the word "theft." There are many cases of shortages where the postmaster is thoroughly honest, but a continuation of these shortages shows that the postmaster is not administering his office as it should be administered, and consequently he should not be left in charge.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the Postmaster General say that this postmaster was dishonest?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am asking the question.

Mr. VENIOT: I said there were many cases in which irregularities could not be treated as dishonesty.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was he dismissed for dishonesty?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say that. I said one of the reasons for his dismissal—

Mr. McGIBBON: I am asking for information, and I am entitled to it.

Mr. VENIOT: I will give the answer. One of the reasons for his dismissal was irregularities. I pointed out that on occasions he was found short in his accounts, and he made good the shortage.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be good enough to read the correspondence bearing on that?

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I—

Mr. McGIBBON: I have the whole correspondence before me, and there is no reference on the file to any such thing.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman will find out that there is.

Mr. McGIBBON: There is not such a thing in this file.

Mr. HANSON: It is an incorrect return.

Mr. STEVENS: The old practice—a deleted return.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the hon. minister through?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. McGIBBON: Then my first complaint is that this house has been deceived by the return tabled. I say any minister that would so deceive this house is not worthy of his office. I demand that the Postmaster General lay upon the table the document from which he quoted. It is a rule of the house. I make that demand, Mr. Chairman, and I ask you if I am not within my rights.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is within his rights.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very well. Then I want to know why that document was not in the return ordered by this house. Its omission is absolutely in defiance of the order of this house. I am going to insist as a matter of right that every file tabled shall be an honest and truthful file. The file produced is not an honest and truthful file if the minister's statement is correct. But let me go a step further. Again I ask him, as I asked him a moment ago, if this postmaster was dismissed for dishonesty.

Mr. VENIOT: I gave the reply. I said the word "dishonesty" could not be applied in many cases to the word "irregularities," but that this postmaster had been found irregular in his accounts.

Mr. McGIBBON: And that was one of the reasons why he was dismissed?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: How long ago?

Mr. VENIOT: This has been standing three years, and with the complaints coming in from people as to the location of the office touching—

Mr. HANSON: Was that against the postmaster?

Mr. VENIOT: No. There were complaints as to the location, that the large tourist business carried on in that section necessitated that the site be changed, the old office not being centrally located. In view of that I went into the whole record, and finding these other evidences against the gentleman I thought it was time that the change should be made.

Mr. BOYS: Was an investigation held in connection with it?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, the inspector held an investigation and reported.

Mr. BOYS: Surely the minister will admit that the report should have been part of the return.

Mr. VENIOT: I certainly do, and I cannot understand how it is not.

Mr. STEVENS: The same as happened yesterday in another case, precisely—deliberately left out.

Mr. VENIOT: I may say to the committee that I did have a conversation with the hon. gentleman touching the matter. He will remember. I called him aside and told him what the report would reveal; I said the report would reveal shortages. I went further and referred to another matter not connected with the post office and which I do not wish to mention here; it was between the hon. gentleman and myself. I told him I would bring the returns if he so desired, but that these returns would show that the postmaster had been found short on certain occasions. Now if that is not there it certainly is not my fault, and I will see why the full report has not been brought down.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Postmaster General has said either too much or too little. He has indicated very clearly to-day that this postmaster was dismissed on account of shortages in his accounts.

Mr. VENIOT: I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. McGIBBON: One of the reasons, very well. I will take the Postmaster General at his word and I will read to the committee a letter signed by him dated September 26, 1928.

Rev. John Coburn,
Room 518, Wesley Buildings,
299 Queen St. West,
Toronto 2, Ontario.

My Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of yours of the 25th instant with reference to the change of the postmastership at Uffington, Ontario, and note your representations in favour of Mr. Buckler, who, you state, is a cripple and has been so from his birth; and you further state that he has given entire satisfaction to the whole community and this action will not only inflict injustice upon him but will very greatly displease a large number of people.

For your information, I may say that it has been represented to this department that the location of the post office was in a private residence and was very inconvenient for both the residents of the place and also for a large number of tourists who visit Uffington. It became necessary therefore, in the interests of the public, to have this office placed in a better location.

I want the committee to note the next sentence:

This is the only reason for the change.

Am I to believe the Postmaster General when he dictated that letter or am I to believe him to-day? That is the question to which I want an answer. I do not believe that any man can successfully lay a charge of dishonesty against that postmaster. The Postmaster General cannot do so. I ask therefore: Was the Postmaster General telling the truth when he dictated that letter, or is he telling the truth to me this afternoon when he is on his defence? I ask for a reply.

Mr. VENIOT: I was, yes, to a certain extent telling the whole truth, just the same as I told the hon. gentleman himself privately; I did not wish to divulge to the public the shortcomings of this postmaster.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am demanding it.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not wish to divulge his shortcomings in a letter to a private individual; and of course, if I am to be condemned for that and an attempt made to prove I am lying—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why did you say it was the only ground? You did not have to say so.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not want to tell the gentleman the other ground.

Mr. McGIBBON: My duty to my constituents is to voice their grievances in this house. Much as I love the Postmaster General I do not pretend to be derelict in my duty. I want him to give to the committee any evidence he has as to the dishonesty of this postmaster.

Mr. VENIOT: I will give it; I will have the return.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want it now.

Mr. VENIOT: You cannot get it just now.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then I say it is not in existence. Furthermore, it is not true.

Mr. LETELLIER: Withdraw.

Mr. STEVENS: Withdraw nothing.

Mr. VENIOT: I want the hon. gentleman to go on record as making these statements. I did not say withdraw. I want him to go on record.

Mr. McGIBBON: If the Postmaster General thinks he can put anything over me like that he is mistaken. I am here to see that my people get a fair deal, which they have never got from the Postmaster General. And I am not through yet; I have other cases as well.

Mr. PARENT: You are welcome.

Mr. BENNETT: I am greatly interested in what the Postmaster General has said because it affects the whole public life of Canada. He reads a letter in which he says, "This is the only reason I take this course," and he now says it is untrue. He knew it was untrue at the time he wrote it.

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. My hon. friend said that the reason he wrote that letter in that way was that he did not desire to make public the real reason, the man's shortcomings.

Mr. McINTOSH: He simply wanted to protect the man as far as he could.

Mr. VENIOT: Who would not in charity?

Mr. BENNETT: The Postmaster General talks about charity. It covers a multitude of sins, but—

Mr. VENIOT: I don't see any of it over there.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not the point. The Postmaster General is laughing, but it strikes at the foundation of our institutions if I cannot believe what a minister of the crown writes me with respect to a transaction—when he comes to parliament and says, "I did not tell the truth because I wanted to protect someone." That is the whole story.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not the sense in which it should be taken.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is the story. The minister writes a letter to the Rev. Mr. Coburn of Toronto, and in a single sentence he makes the statement, "This is the only reason why this man was dismissed." Now he says that was not the reason at all; he says the reason for the man's dismissal was a shortage in his accounts.

Mr. VENIOT: No, one of the reasons.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the reasons, then. Therefore when he said "only" he was stating what was not true. And he says it was not true. I ask him, I ask the house, I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) whether a falsehood of that character can be justified—because that is the correct term.

Mr. POWER: The Solicitor General is a law officer of the crown and not keeper of the Postmaster General's conscience.

Mr. BENNETT: Keeper only of the privy purse and not of the king's conscience. But my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) will admit that it is a rather serious thing. Suppose the people of Canada could get a sort of photograph of the minister's loud laugh with respect to this matter concerning a falsehood told to a minister of the gospel for the purpose of trying to protect someone. That is the position now and he justifies it. That is the position he takes, and I am perfectly content that the people should know it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want the minister to tell the committee the extent to which this man was short in his accounts, and whether he made them up or did not make them up.

Mr. VENIOT: I said he made them up.

Mr. McGIBBON: To what extent was he short in his accounts and how often?

Mr. VENIOT: $142.59.

Mr. McGIBBON: On more than one occasion, or is that the total?

Mr. PARENT: You could not get any more out of the revenue of the post office.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister tell us—

Mr. McGIBBON: I have asked a question: How many times was he short in his accounts? I think the house should remember that in many of these little country post offices all the revenue goes into one little box, from which all payments are made and from which the postmaster also deducts his commission, so that if the inspector walks in on a certain day and does not find the amount of cash in the till which should be there, it is hardly fair to say that the postmaster is short in his cash and is dishonest.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say he was dishonest.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then if he was not dishonest why should he be dismissed for dishonesty?

Mr. POWER: If he cannot keep his accounts he is incompetent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would point out that he was considered quite competent for thirty-one years under Grit and Tory administrations, until the present Postmaster General took office. However, I have asked for some information and I think I am entitled to receive it. I want to know how often this man was found short in his accounts and whether he has made up the money or is reluctant to make it up.

Mr. VENIOT: He made it up in part. He was to send the money to the bank the next day; he sent only $110 and on June 2 he made up the other $20.

Mr. STEVENS: In what year?

Mr. VENIOT: In the year 1927, and that left a shortage of $12.51, which I understand was made up later on.

Mr. McGIBBON: When was he dismissed?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot give the exact date.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then I will tell the Postmaster General: It was last fall, a year after he was found temporarily short in his cash.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that information upon the file?

Mr. McGIBBON: No, none of this information was on the file, although it should have been there. I say a minister is not playing fair with public servants when he comes to the house with an excuse of this kind. In the first place, if the Postmaster General was convinced that this postmaster was dishonest he should have dismissed him at the time, but this man was left in office for a year and a half, when he was dismissed at the instance of the defeated Liberal candidate in that riding. That correspondence is not on the file either. I say that when a minister comes to the house and tries in this way to justify the dismissal of a public servant a year and a half after he has been found temporarily short in his accounts; when a minister blackmails that official in this parliament and throughout the country in this way, he is not playing fair with his great office. I say that the public officials of Canada have a right to have their reputations as well as their positions protected by ministers of the crown. If the Postmaster General were consistent and honest, and if he believed what he has said here to-day, he would have dismissed this official at the time and prosecuted him in the courts. Having done neither of these things I say it ill becomes him or any other minister to come to parliament two years later with the excuse he has brought here to-day.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he would answer my question as to whether he has considered giving back to the rural postmasters their commissions on postal orders and postal notes.

Mr. VENIOT: That commission has not been taken off in the way my hon. friend seems to understand it. The commission on postal orders, postal notes and stamp sales has been bulked and raised from 50 per cent to 70 per cent. In some cases we have discovered that this has been working some injustice, and we are now regulating the matter as we receive the returns. No injustice will be done the postmasters after the procedure is all ironed out.

Mr. IRVINE: The matter to which the hon. member for East Calgary has just referred is one in which I am particularly interested. I know some rural postmasters have declared that they have suffered somewhat under under the regulations made last year, and I am glad to hear the minister say that he intends to look into the matter and straighten it out. Most of these postmasters give excellent service to the public; on the whole I think they are perhaps underpaid, and I am glad the minister will take up the question.

Mr. VENIOT: The commission is 70 per cent on the first $1,000 of revenue, with a minimum salary of $100; 30 per cent on revenue from $1,000 to $10,000 and 20 per cent on revenue over $10,000. That is the present scale for rural postmasters. If this scale does not give fair play, matters will be adjusted the moment we are notified, and we are considering this question to-day.

Mr. FRASER: Could the Postmaster General tell us the effect of the change of regulations?

Mr. VENIOT: I think the previous rate was 4 cents per order; we have done away with that.

Mr. FRASER: What was the charge for such an order?

Mr. VENIOT: My deputy tells me that an order up to $10 costs 5 cents.

Mr. FRASER: And of that 5 cents the postmaster received 4 cents? Then what change has been made?

Mr. VENIOT: The commissions have been bulked. The former commission on stamp sales was 50 per cent, and when the new regulations took effect the commission on postal orders, notes and stamps was raised to 70 per cent.

Mr. FRASER: Then the previous commission on postal notes was 80 per cent.

Mr. VENIOT: The postmaster would receive 40 cents for a $100 order.

Mr. FRASER: I am afraid the minister does not see the point.

Mr. VENIOT: I see the point but I cannot give my hon. friend the answer just now; it requires some figuring, and I cannot do that mentally.

Mr. FRASER: That very point has been brought to my attention on several occasions; it has been intimated that the amount received by the postmasters has been reduced notwithstanding the fact that the commission has been raised from 50 per cent to 70 per cent on all revenues, so it is not, as the Postmaster General would lead the public to believe, an increase of 20 per cent in their commission.

Mr. VENIOT: We received some complaints along those very lines, which have been or are now being looked into. We received some definite and specific complaints from postmasters claiming that their salaries had not been increased because of the action in increasing the percentage. When their specific cases were laid before the department it was shown quite clearly that they were mistaken. I do not say that it will not affect the post offices with revenues of $10,000 and upward, or even those with revenues from $1,000 to $10,000, but it does not affect those below $1,000. All the cases which have been represented to us are the subject of investigation, and if it is found that that percentage does not give them what was intended, then another system will be adopted which will give them what they are entitled to.

Mr. FRASER: Following up the argument of a moment ago, that the postmasters claim that their salaries have not been increased under the new regulations, there is another thing which has been brought to my attention in connection with the rental of post office boxes. I believe the revenue which the postmasters derive from these boxes has also been reduced, and the two things put together make a substantial reduction in their revenue.

Mr. VENIOT: The rental from the boxes in rural post offices goes to the postmaster; we do not get anything.

Mr. FRASER: The rate of rental was lowered from $4 per year to $2.50, or something like that.

Mr. VENIOT: We increased the rental of boxes at certain places. I think I stated to the house during the session of 1928, in answer to a question as to why we had not increased the rentals in certain places, that the rentals on boxes in two hundred places were below the general rental throughout the Dominion. In order to put those places on a uniform basis, we increased the rate. In some places where the rate was $2, we made it $3; in other places where it was $3, we made it $4, and so on. There has been no reduction in box rentals that I know of.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. HANSON: The rental at some places was $10.

Mr. VENIOT: That is for the large double box. There must be something wrong with that statement that the rentals have been decreased.

Mr. FRASER: I do not think I am wrong. I am sorry I have no correspondence regarding the matter. I had several discussions with one of the postmasters in my constituency, and he pointed this matter out to me. I have nothing in writing so I am rather at a loss.

Mr. VENIOT: I can assure the hon. member that there has been no reduction.

Mr. FRASER: On my side, I can assure the minister that there has been a reduction, but I am sorry that I cannot prove my case.

Mr. VENIOT: I will go into it and if I discover the hon. member is right I will let him know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of this discussion my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) introduced a matter which I consider to be of very great importance. Particular cases were brought up and the attention of the Postmaster General was diverted from this particular matter. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) came back to the same question, but before he could get an answer some special cases came up again and attention was again diverted.

I refer to the salaries which are paid to postal workers. It is very generally acknowledged that these salaries are not as high as they should be. This is not a matter which concerns a few individuals, as do the cases which were brought up, however important they may have been, but it is a matter which concerns thousands and tens of thousands of employees of this government. I would suggest further that it is a matter of very great interest to the citizens generally, because there is not a class of civil employees who come into such close contact with the general public as do the postal workers.

There are two aspects of this matter which we should consider. The first is: What are the services of these postal workers worth? I submit that they are doing work of an extremely important and responsible character. There are occasional instances where theft occurs, but I am glad to say that they are only occasional; I wonder that they are not more frequent. I do not say that because a man is being paid a low salary he should yield to temptation, but when a man is engaged in a responsible position he should not be subjected to the temptations to which the low paid postal worker is subjected. These men are required to collect money on their routes; they should be paid with some regard to such responsibilities. Further, there is an immense amount of detail connected with their routine work. We are all accustomed to receiving our letters with great regularity, and it is remarkable how efficient the service is. I submit that the men who are so largely responsible for that efficiency of service are not being paid accordingly.

When the matter is considered from the angle of what is required in order to allow a man to live decently, I think we must admit that these men are not being paid a decent living wage. There are individuals receiving as low as $75 and $80 per month, and large numbers who receive less than $100 per month. I do not think that anyone in this house will say that $100 per month is a living wage for a man with a family to support. A large number of these postal employees are married men, and on account of having a steady position many of them have established homes. They should be paid sufficient salaries to enable them to occupy a decent position in the community.

I have not the statistics at hand, but they have been placed on Hansard again and again and no object would be served by having them placed on Hansard once more. We all know the range of salaries, and we all know how low those salaries are.

I think the member for South Toronto is quite right when he insists that the government should be a model employer. It is not even up to the average. When one considers the responsibilities which are placed upon the ordinary postal workers, the government is much less a model employer. I am afraid that in many instances the low salaries received by the postal workers is apt to lower the general wages paid in the community. I know of particular cases in my own constituency where postal workers have been receiving less than allowances being granted by the charity organizations of the city. A condition like that is nothing less than a disgrace, and should not be allowed to continue —simply because there is no group that has the political strength effectively to demand the rights of these poorly paid workers.

The Post Office department is a self-supporting department, in fact it is the only revenue producing department in connection with the government. Why, then, should we be niggardly in dealing with the people who are largely responsible for producing this very large revenue? The Postmaster General has had this called to his attention again and again, and he tries to hide behind the Civil Service Commission. I do not think that is fair. Some of us have been very strongly in favour of a civil service commission. We have tried our best to prevent any return to the old patronage system, but if the Civil Service Commission is in the wrong, we should right that wrong and force action on the part of the commission. As far as I can see the Postmaster General is simply making this an excuse. Again and again this matter has see-sawed backward and forward between the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission, until we do not know just where the responsibility lies. The other day we had the case of the professional and technical officials of the government; the government refused to take the advice of the Civil Service Commission. Perhaps they did right, but the fact is that they refused to take the advice of the Civil Service Commission and when the commission did not advise in the way the government liked, the government took the responsibility of appointing a commission. That commission was announced the other day and I presume its report will largely override the position taken by the Civil Service Commission.

My colleague, the hon. member for North Winnipeg, urged this afternoon: if it is necessary or if it is possible or if it is advisable to take such action in the case of technical officials, might it not be done in the case of these poorly paid employees? I do not think the Postmaster General can escape that responsibility. In reply he simply says that he had not the sole responsibility: that the cabinet must act. He is a member of the cabinet, and if he is in earnest about securing higher wages for the men in the employ of his department, he will ask the cabinet to do what was done in the case of the technicians. There is no reason why he should not do so. A commission could be appointed, or if the minister were in earnest the matter could be otherwise dealt with, by the government itself. I would therefore ask again the question which the Postmaster General has not seen fit to answer: Does he regard the action of the Civil Service Commission as final? Does he approve the action of the Civil Service Commission in refusing to raise salaries? I would like to have an answer to that question, and then I have one more.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I laid on the table of the house the other day the correspondence in connection with that matter, and it will be found that, in reply to the letter of the Civil Service Commission stating that they could not see their way clear to change their decision, I expressed my regret that such a worthy class as those postal officials, whose class had been seeking readjustment of salaries, had not been differently dealt with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, as I understand the matter, the Postmaster General admits that the salaries now being paid are not sufficient?

Mr. VENIOT: I said so. I would not otherwise have recommended an increase.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Further, he regrets the position taken by the Civil Service Commission. Then I ask: Will the Postmaster General, in the case of the men in the employ of his department, do what was done in regard to the technical men of the civil service? Is he prepared to do that?

Mr. VENIOT: I have no answer to that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Postmaster General shakes his head. Then I have a very slight regard for the interest the Postmaster General has in the matter, and I think we have to discount very largely the protestations he has made so far.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like the Postmaster General to state explicitly whether or not he is prepared to follow the precedent set by the Minister of Finance and appoint a commission, or committee, or board under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, to inquire into the salaries of the postal employees. He can say yes or no, so that we shall have it recorded in Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it is unfair for the hon. gentleman to ask me to give an answer to that. It is a question of policy with the government, and I do not think any one minister could give an answer in that way.

Mr. HEAPS: At an earlier stage of this discussion, the Postmaster General said that the Minister of Finance was responsible for his actions and that the Postmaster General was responsible for his own. In other words, the Postmaster General did not wish to assume any responsibility for the appointment of the commission appointed by the Minister of Finance. If that be the case, then he assumed his full responsibility for his actions in his own department. Why is he trying to shunt that responsibility on to the whole cabinet? I am quite willing to allow the item to stand over until he has consulted his colleagues, if he wishes to do so.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we ask if the minister is prepared to make that recommendation to the cabinet?

Mr. VENIOT: I will consider it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have asked a definite question and I do not think an unreasonable one. The minister has stated that the salaries now being paid are inadequate and that the Civil Service Commission is the cause of the difficulty. Is he prepared to take action and recommend to the cabinet such a course as that suggested?

Mr. VENIOT: All I can say is that I think the hon. gentlemen ought to give me some little time to consider the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask that the item be held over till the minister has considered the matter.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the Postmaster General define the term "postal helper"? It is not clear to me what class or classes of men it includes. For example, does it include letter carriers?

Mr. VENIOT: Postal helpers are those who come into the service and begin, so to speak, at the foot of the ladder. We call them postal helpers in the city and town post offices. There is a pool, as it were, there, and from those postal helpers are taken the men who become letter carriers and so forth.

Mr. STEVENS: Does that include sorters?

Mr. VENIOT: Sorters may be taken from there by way of promotion, but generally from the pool go the porters, letter carriers and so on by way of promotion.

Mr. MacLAREN: Then the term "postal helper" does not include a letter carrier? Is that correct?

Mr. VENIOT: The letter carrier would once upon a time have been a postal helper.

Mr. MacLAREN: But not as such?

Mr. VENIOT: No, he would be promoted from postal helper to letter carrier.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to suggest to the minister not only that he let this item stand, but that he withdraw his estimates for the time being. It appears, to me at least, that the minister has only to do with political partisanship. Here we have a matter of government policy and the minister says that he cannot speak in regard to policy. Surely this is the first time that a minister responsible for a department has come before the house and stated that he has no power to speak on matters of policy. Yet he seems to have full power to indulge in dismissals and refusals to accept nominees sent to him by the Civil Service Commission. He does not hesitate to disregard the law as it stands on the statute book, but when it comes down to being a responsible minister, responsible to this house and to the people of Canada, responsible for providing a decent livelihood for his own employees, he tells us that he cannot speak for the government in such matters.

Mr. STEVENS: Who can, then?

Mr. CLARK: If the Postmaster General cannot, I think we should invite the acting leader of the government, in the absence of the Prime Minister to tell the house what is the government's policy in this regard? The minister tells us that the postal workers in this country are underpaid. If he has come to that conclusion, he has probably known it for two years, if not longer. He comes to this house to-day with that admission. Furthermore, he came to the house two or three days ago and admitted that it was possible to deal with such a situation because in a similar instance where the Civil Service Commission had failed to deal equitably, in the view of the government, with another section of the civil service, the government determined upon a different course. Here is a much worse case, in my opinion. It involves a very large body of civil servants in this country, the most poorly paid of all the civil servants. They are doing a very responsible work for the benefit of everyone of us as citizens of this country. I believe it is the duty of the government to take this matter in hand and to see that these civil servants are equitably dealt with and if it is proven conclusively to the government that they are not being fairly dealt with, not being paid a living wage, then steps should be taken immediately to deal fairly with them. If the minister cannot inform the house now how they are to be dealt with, I suggest not only that this item stand over, but in view of the spectacle we have had in this house during the last two or three days of the minister's incompetence and political partisanship, that all the post office estimates be allowed to stand until we can get a minister in the department who can answer in a responsible way for the department.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be on my feet too often, but I think it is worth my while to reply to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I want him to understand this: Any policy which the government lays down in connection with the administration of the Post Office Department I am prepared to take the responsibility of carrying out. The question that has been brought up this afternoon arose in this way. One hon. gentleman wanted to know if in view of the fact that the Civil Service Commission had refused to recognize the recommendation which I had made on behalf of increased salaries for postal helpers, postal clerks, and so on, I would guarantee or promise to adopt some policy in that connection such as was adopted in connection with the technical and professional men. To that I replied that was a policy for the government to determine. There has been no policy determined upon in that respect so far as I know, and for that reason I said that as Postmaster General I was not able to speak for the government as to whether or not they would extend that policy to other departments. That is the whole situation. There is no attempt on my part to shirk responsibility or to excuse my actions in the department on the ground of the non-compliance of the Civil Service Commission in the recommendation that I made to increase the salaries of the civil servants that we are dealing with at the present moment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have a curious triangle here. We have, first of all, the Postmaster General. On the other side, we have the Civil Service Commission. Apparently divided authority! No one knows who is ultimately responsible. No one will face the issue. The Postmaster General, in an attempt to escape blame, now suggests a third party, and that is the government. Apparently he does not and cannot speak for the government. He dissociates himself more or less from responsibility for governmental action. So we have the three parties: The Postmaster General, in one corner; the Civil Service Commission, in another corner, and the government in a third corner. We would like to know how to get at this puzzle.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I can help the hon. member. If he will help me to abolish the Civil Service Commission, we will then have only two parties instead of three.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think that is the solution, and with all due thanks to the hon. member. I would suggest that it is the Postmaster General who will have to answer this question. If the Civil Service Commission has to be abolished, if it is incompetent, if it is failing to function, let us get rid of it, or at least let us change the personnel. We hear a great deal about responsible government. If there is an absolute division of responsibility as between the Civil Service Commission and the government and a deadlock has ensued, I think there is not the slightest doubt where we all stand for the government must be supreme, and we will have to hold the government to its responsibility.

Mr. POWER: That is good sound doctrine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it is, and I want to hold the Postmaster General to that to-day. As it is now, the government declines to assume its responsibility and simply keeps the Civil Service Commision as a sort of shield behind which it hides. I do not think that is fair to the Civil Service Commission. It seems to me that if the commission is in the wrong in this matter, the government has to assume the responsibility of setting the commission right, and it has actually taken steps to do that in this other case of the professional and technical officials in the civil service. The least the government can do is to take similar steps or such other action as may commend itself to the government, in the case we have now before us. But we must locate responsibility more closely than that. When it comes to post office estimates the Postmaster General speaks for the government; that is generally considered to be the case, and I think the Postmaster General is in a position even to-day to say whether the government will take action along this line. Certainly he is in a position to tell the house if he is prepared to make such a recommendation. He can clear his own skirts to that extent, by telling the house that he is prepared to do in his department what has been done in other departments. He refuses to do that. The whole country should know that it is not the Civil Service Commission that is finally responsible; it is the government. If the government will assert its control over the Civil Service Commission in this matter, I will back up the government to the extent that it is necessary. I am sure others will do the same. I am one of those who believe in the principle of the Civil Service Commission, but if the Civil Service Commission has become useless, if it has become an obstruction to progress, I urge that we get rid of it and let the responsibility rest with the government.

So I submit that the Postmaster General is confusing, or attempting to confuse, the issue here by dividing the responsibility as between himself and the government and between himself and the Civil Service Commission. We have a right to have this matter cleared up, and I urge again that this item should be held over until such time as we can have a definite reply from the government as to what remedy it proposes to adopt in what has become a very serious state of affairs.

Mr. STEVENS: Last year and the year before, together with other members of the house, I discussed this question. To-day my hon. friends to my left have discussed it with considerable vigour and certainly with great intelligence and fairness. The minister treats their appeal with silent contempt, in part at least. He has given some answers of a very irresponsible character, answers that one might accept on the hustings, perhaps, from an experienced campaigner speaking before an audience which had no knowledge of the facts and no particular right to demand them. But I want to call the attention of the minister to this fact—and I notice he is paying no attention to me; I will direct my remarks to the Minister of Finance, who is leading the house. If the Prime Minister were in his seat I would direct my remarks to him. I am going to point out to the government that this great body of civil servants in an official document made this statement. I am going to read the whole statement in a few minutes in order to give a resumé of the history of this problem, but first let me read this passage:

> In view of the above facts, are not the employees of the government thus affected justified in their dissatisfaction with the present machinery, or lack of it, for adjusting salaries?

They say there has been no response to their demands, and they continue:

> We look to you as an elected representative of the people to use every legitimate means at your command with a view to remedying the conditions outlined.

That is one of the most sacred rights of any citizen of this country—to appeal to the elected representatives of the people to present his just claims before the government or before parliament. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the most sacred right that we enjoy as members of parliament is that when the house is voting money for the running of the king's government the people's grievances shall be first adjusted. Now, this is a grievance; it is a serious grievance. The minister, I am justified in saying, ignores it. He assumes an attitude of indifference—I will put it that way. To what? To the request and demands—apparently justified, because he himself admits that he recommended them—to the request and just demands of a large body of the civil service.

I have before me an appeal, signed by Mr. Knowles and Mr. Gardner, national president and national secretary respectively of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, with offices in Regina. This appeal is dated last year, and in it they present their case. I think it would be rather interesting if the committee would follow the sequence of events in connection with this matter. They say:

We are taking this method of protesting against the very dilatory and unsatisfactory operation of the Civil Service Act in respect to salary adjustments.

They are not complaining of the act. They say that the act is not being fairly and properly administered, and that they are not securing their rights under it it because of dilatoriness on the part of someone. Then they go on:

Our experience during a number of years follows, and in both the reason for our attitude and for your information.

Then they proceed, and I call the attention of the committee to this:

In June, 1923, the parliamentary committee appointed to inquire into the operation of chapter 12, 8 and 9 George V, an act respecting the civil service of Canada, reported as follows:

"Your committee therefore recommends that immediately after reorganization has taken place salary revision and adjustments be proceeded with without delay. Pending this revision the bonus to be continued."

At the commencement of 1924 fiscal year no provision was made for revision of salaries and the bonus, admittedly a necessity under the existing low salary ranges, instead of continuing as recommended was reduced 33 per cent, creating considerable agitation among civil servants generally and the lower grades particularly. The government responded by requesting the Civil Service Commission to revise salaries, commencing with the Post Office Department.

On the completion of such revision it was found that instead of removing the cause of the agitation, namely, loss of remuneration, it aggravated the loss and in a number of instances allowed less remuneration than after the bonus reduction was in operation. Protests from all over the Dominion leading to the dislocation of the postal service in some parts was one result, and the following declaration of the government policy was another:

"The government's policy is that when the Civil Service Commission has submitted its report upon the salaries for the entire civil service that opportunity will be given to the representatives of the employees of the Post Office Department or in other departments of the government who have objections to file against the salary revision proposed by the commission, to fully present their views to a sub-committee of the government and to discuss such matters of differences as fully as may be necessary to insure a thorough understanding, and it is hoped a final and satisfactory agreement on the points in dispute."

That is the quotation of the government's own declaration. Then the letter goes on:

Accordingly representatives of the employees met a sub-committee of the government on June 5, 1925, giving their evidence in writing. The sub-committee of the government did not attempt to come to any agreement, contenting themselves with listening to the evidence submitted and asking questions, subsequently notifying the delegation that no decision could be arrived at till the balance of the civil service had been consulted.

On September 14, 1925, an order in council known as P.C. 1644, wherein the minister recommends that such report be forwarded to the Civil Service Commision with a view to having that body make an upward revision of the salaries in question. Despite frequent appeals of the staff side the report of the revision was not brought before parliament until 1927, allotting a widely advertised flat rate increase of $120 with certain exceptions, the exceptions being in the majority.

Customs, postal and other employees found themselves in a position, through the manipulaton between bonuses and salaries, of being told that having received an increase in salary in 1924 of $240 per annum, that they would now only receive $60. No cognizance was apparently taken of the loss of remuneration by bonus abolition, a loss that bore most heavily on those who received the most bonus, the lower paid positions.

What is the result of the salary adjustments under the Civil Service Commission since 1919? One illustration will suffice, and be it understood that though this illustration is taken from the postal service, we could quote others from other departments who are in exactly the same predicament. Minimum salary on entrance to postal service as letter carrier, now postal helper, in 1919, $780, plus bonus of $480, making a total of $1,200 per annum. At present, salary of $1,020, no bonus, making a loss of $180 per annum, despite so-called salary increases of $240 in 1924 and $60 in 1927. Maximum in 1919, salary, $1,260, plus $396 bonus, a total of $1,656. Now receives $1,500, maximum salary, a reduction of $156, and takes a longer time to reach the maximum. As before stated, postal clerks and other grades in other departments in similar positions, especially in the lower grades, are similarly affected.

The position was brought before parliament last session and created some debate, during which the Postmaster General on behalf of the employees of his department promised to recommend to the Civil Service Commission a higher classification as a means of overcoming the difficulty. We are now informed that he made such recommendation and that the Civil Service Commission refuses to acquiesce, for reasons that up to date we have not been able to ascertain.

In view of the above facts, are not the employees of the government thus affected justified in their dissatisfaction with the present machinery, or lack of it, for adjusting salaries?

Where to put the blame for these conditions we do not know, as we are continually buffetted from department to commission, from commission to government, and vice versa, with no recourse not even that of an arbitration board.

Our requests, in view of present-day living costs, are reasonable. They are $300 increase on the salaries of 1924, and a minimum salary of $100 per month for all full-time adult occupations in the service.

There should be no debate on the latter subject after scanning the cost of living figures in the official Labour Gazette. From 1919 to 1928 is a long time to carry on one-sided negotiations and would not be tolerated by organized employees outside the government service. We look to you as an elected representative of the people to use every legitimate means at your command with a view to remedying the conditions outlined.

This is signed by Mr. Knowles and Mr. Gardner, as I have already intimated. There is an accompanying letter in which they also appeal for the presentation of their case. My hon. friends this afternoon have presented this case once again. The minister says, "Oh, well, I recommended it to the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service Commission didn't do anything." Then he was asked, "Did you press the matter? What is your opinion?" He replied that he wrote to tell them he regretted that they had done nothing.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance; there is very little use appealing to the Postmaster General—I am sorry to say it, but I do not think there is much use appealing to him. But I appeal to the Minister of Finance as leader of the government in the house at the present time: Is it reasonable, is it fair that these employees should be driven from pillar to post, or, as they put it, from department to commission and from commission to department, and then back to the government again? Is it conducive to good service? Does it encourage the lower paid civil servants to give to the country that willing service which alone can make for efficiency?

I do not believe I have the figures under my hand, but the other day I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) for certain information, and again we have an illustration of what I was going to call equivocation—at least it is evasion. I asked the Minister of Labour whether the statisticians of the Department of Labour, in their estimate of the minimum amount required for food and the bare necessities of life, had suggested $85 a month. That question was answered, no. Yet in answer to another question they say that it was figured out at $21.36 per week. Taking that figure, you will find it will run to about $90 odd per month; and that does not include many things known to be indispensable to ordinary decent living—not essential to comfortable living but things that are bare necessities. Now, with respect to mature employees, men with families and women if you like—mature employees, I say, not apprentices—I would ask this question: Will the government consider fixing a minimum rate of $100 a month? That, frankly, is the request, with of course, some advances for experienced and trained men. Is it an unreasonable request? The government ought to answer that question. Do they repudiate the grounds upon which it is based? The minister simply sits in his seat, ignores the question, shakes his head and says he expressed to the commission his regrets in the matter. I should like to know just what is behind the dispute between the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission. The lips of the members of the commission are sealed; they cannot reply to the government. They cannot reply to the minister, for if they did they would probably be removed from office pretty promptly; some excuse would be found to have this done. The minister can come into the house and throw the responsibility on the Civil Service Commission; and he does it obviously with effect, because the hon. member for Quebec South and others are constantly calling for the abolition of the Civil Service Commission. Now I want to say, from my experience of the last twenty years, that in my estimation the Civil Service Commission, with all its faults, is the finest safeguard which the civil servants in the country have. It is this, with all its faults and weaknesses; and under no circumstances should this country listen for a moment to the suggestion that the Civil Service Commission be abolished as an institution or that the Civil Service Act be repealed. It will not do for this government longer to permit the Postmaster General to treat this matter so flippantly.

What did the Postmaster General do yesterday? In case after case, instance after instance, he inferentially laid the blame on the Civil Service Commission. But he did not tell the house, he would not admit to me under questioning, that he had it within his own power, under section 13 of the act, to correct the very condition for which he was blaming the commission. Then I asked: What about your deputy? And he said, "I am not responsible for what the deputy does; I cannot control my deputy". That is sheer nonsense, sheer evasion, simply trimming and bluff. The minister has been lauded, and desks have been thumped on the other side, because hon. gentlemen there view him as a fighting minister, because he came into parliament last year and the year before—I have forgotten whether he did the year before that as well—and stood in his place and thundered forth his brazen defence of his actions, when we had not the material to query him and cross-check him. We are not in the habit in this house of questioning the presentation of a case by a minister. It is historic in this house, I am glad to say, that when a minister stands in his place and gives to the house what is supposed to be a statement of fact the house accepts that statement. I regret very much to say it, but after witnessing the Whittaker-Bowyer case yesterday, after witnessing the case presented to-day, and allowing my mind to run back over the dismissals in regard to which the minister has thundered forth time after time in this house—after witnessing these and many other instances I would want to check the files very carefully before I came to any responsible decision on the presentation of any statement by the minister. It is a matter for regret that one has to say so. Take the instance, only this afternoon, of the postmaster at Kitchener. The minister said, first, that the man was suspected, that certain moneys were being lifted—he used the word lifted—from the post office in Kitchener. I pause to ask the house whether this picturesque language of the minister, this language of the gutter as a matter of fact, "lifted"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, language which—

Mr. POWER: What is wrong with that? Who made my hon. friend a censor of the English language?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not a censor of the language.

Mr. POWER: If "lifted" expresses the idea the minister wished to convey, why should he not use it?

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to the use of the word in this place—a word used in the slang of the streets.

Mr. POWER: I don't know that even that is out of place in this house.

Mr. STEVENS: All right; let it go at that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It doesn't shake him at all.

Mr. STEVENS: Let it go. The minister said that certain moneys were being lifted from the post office in Kitchener. He said that the postmaster was discovered "mishandling these letters". And then he said: "I have gone further into the matter and found that it was even more serious than at first reported". Then he said: "Sometimes it is easy to prosecute and other times it is difficult"; and my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) said: "It is not difficult to dismiss", and the Postmaster General then said: "Not when they are stealing". Then, when I called him to task and said he had no right to charge a dismissed official with stealing unless he had previously taken steps to prosecute that individual, the minister said, "Oh, I did not say he was stealing." What is this house to do with a minister who will evade plain and simple language in that manner? Subsequently, during the discussion pro and con, it came out that this postmaster unquestionably had been dishonest and had been stealing; the Postmaster General said he did not prosecute him and that he would not prosecute in the future in similar cases, and he said further that he condoned this particular case. After all this the minister expects the civil service of this country, who have appealed to him time and again, to have confidence and faith in his utterances, when he tells us that he recommended to the commission that certain things be done, and when they sent back the request unfulfilled he expressed his regret to them in writing. I want to tell the minister that that is not going to go.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have developed a wonderful sense of humour during the past few days; when these matters are brought up and we seek to bring case after case to the attention of the house we are met with ribald laughter instead of having the facts faced, the problems dealt with and the questions answered. There is no answer except this: The minister has not been administering his department on that plane which generally has been established throughout this country for the administration of such an important branch of the government. From all the mass of information we have, with much more to come, it is a fair inference that the minister has been playing politics with the most sacred rights of his department. Some may think that a pretty strong statement, they may believe it should be supported by facts. I venture to say that it will be well supported before long.

What has been the practice of the minister? A file is asked for by an hon. member under the rules of parliament. His request is passed unanimously by this house. The file is laid on the table, the hon. member goes to the labour of examining that file and in some cases asks the department for redress before bringing up the matter in the house. Then he comes here and presents his case, as my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) did yesterday in which perhaps was one of the most moderate and gentlemanly speeches delivered in this house this session. There was not a word or syllable, not an action of a gesture which could be complained of in that presentation; fact after fact was brought out, and what was the answer? The minister rummaged among some papers on his desk and brought out a document from which he quoted some extracts; then he charged my hon. friend with an attempt to deceive the house. No more unfair and more unparliamentary reply has been given any member during this or many past sessions by a minister of the crown, especially when that member depended upon the fairness and the honesty of the department to furnish all the papers upon which he based his case.

This afternoon another hon. member presented another case based upon a file for which he moved in this house, as is his right; his request was granted unanimously, and again we had the same spectacle. The minister pulled out a paper from which he pretended to quote, but when he was asked to lay it on the table he could not do so and did not do so; he threw out the inference that there was something terrible in that paper which would wreck the life of my hon. friend's constituent. The minister has done that scores of times; he has tried to run the bluff, "Oh, my hon. friends are forcing me into this; I did not want to publish the name of this or that man." With tears in his voice the Postmaster General complains that we are forcing him to take this action. Why was not that report on file; why was it not disclosed? When it was disclosed, what did it amount to? It had reference to a poor old country postmaster, receiving a salary of $60 a year, who had kept his post office for thirty-one years. Two years ago an inspector walked into his office and found him short in his accounts. We have not the report of the responsible officer of the department; we have simply the innuendos of the minister implying that this poor old man, who has been in the employ of the government for thirty years, has been dishonest. He does not make the direct statement; he is too cute for that, but he makes an insinuation and an innuendo.

Mr. VENIOT: There was no insinuation about it; I told the hon. gentleman that if the file was not complete I would look into it.

Mr. STEVENS: It was an insinuation and an innuendo that the man was dishonest, and when we obtained the facts they disclosed nothing of the kind.

Mr. VENIOT: The inspector's official report is there and it will be produced.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it will be produced, but why was it not on the file? Do not mind us; why did not the minister place it on the file for the information of his own friends, who have as much right to it as the man who asked for it? That is a document of parliament, not a document belonging to the hon. member for Muskoka.

What were the facts disclosed by the minister? They were that this old man, thirty-one years in the government service, was found short in his accounts by an inspector who walked into his house, where the office was kept, and checked him up. Everyone knows that in these small post offices scattered all over Canada by the thousands inaccuracies of account are frequently found. I do not say, with the minister, that I condone this sort of thing; I do not condone it, but I venture to say that when the report comes down—and we have a right to see the correspondence and all the documents attached to the report; we do not want any more slippery evasion—it will disclose that the responsible officer of the department did not find this man to be dishonest. But in any case, if he was dishonest why was he not proceeded against two years ago, when the offence was discovered?

Then the minister said, "Oh, that was only one of the reasons," but we find a letter written by the minister to a clergyman stating that the sole reason was something quite different. The minister gets up before the house and says brazenly, "I did not want to ruin this man's character." Let me tell the minister that there is no safer custodian of a confidential communication about a man's character than a gentleman of the cloth, a clergyman of any church; he is the proper man to whom these things might be disclosed. The clergyman to whom that letter was written was the proper person to receive any confidential information that there was something more in this dismissal, but that was not done. These facts were hidden; the report is not included in the file, and the minister says, "I would rather not do this but you are forcing my hand." When a flagrant case of violation of the act is brought to his attention, and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) mentions an instance where the son of a widowed mother is given three years in the penitentiary for a less aggravated case, and he is asked to explain, what does he say? He says, "In future I will observe the law; I will prosecute; I will put these fellows over the road; I will show you."

Mr. VENIOT: I never used the term, "I will show you."

Mr. STEVENS: All right, I will withdraw that. There has not been an instance since the minister has been in the house where he could not slip out when he was caught in a fair argument. What did he do? He stood in his place twice or thrice and he said, "Oh, you will not have anything to complain of in the future; I will enforce this law." It is the mannerisms of the minister which convey more than his words.

Mr. VENIOT: The mannerisms of the hon. gentleman are beautiful.

Mr. STEVENS: He is peculiarly proud of his ability to bluff, and he has been trying to bluff this house for three years. Time will not permit at the present—there will be ample time to do it before the item passes —to show the instances where the minister has been less than frank with the house. It is about time that the government met and considered the whole question of the administration of the Post Office department under the hon. minister. His predecessor, the Hon. Charles Murphy, was not guilty of this sort of thing. When the hon. gentleman who now presides over this house was Postmaster General, he was not guilty of it. There was little cause for complaint with regard to the administration of this department until the hon. minister was brought up from the province of New Brunswick to take this high position. He has failed utterly to appreciate the ordinary amenities of this house. Not one of his colleagues does that, and I criticize—

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member said the same thing last year regarding the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke); he will likely cover the whole cabinet.

Mr. STEVENS: What I said about the Minister of Immigration last year, and what I will say this year when the estimates come up, is that I had a high regard for the minister's character. I think perhaps there are few men in this house who have a finer character than he has. But that did not prevent me from saying then, as I will say when the estimates come up—the hon. minister has forced me into this argument—that the Minister of Immigration is not competent properly to administer his department. During my long experience in this house I have never known of another minister who has attempted to put his estimates through in the manner adopted by the Postmaster General.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. VENIOT: Before recess, I promised to place on the table a report in connection with the Kitchener affair. I have the report under my hand and in placing it on the table. I request that it be not made public. It is a secret report with information on which we base our action, and I feel justified in asking the committee not to allow it to go to the public.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think it might be tabled leaving out the names of the operators, because we do not desire to make it public?

Mr. VENIOT: I shall place it on the table. In connection with the Uffington matter, I endeavoured to get in touch with the various branches and as I had three branches of the department to communicate with, it was impossible to do so in the short time between six and eight o'clock. I shall therefore crave the indulgence of the house to permit me to place the balance of the report on the table to-morrow as soon as the house opens.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the minister had time to consider the question of an increase in salary for the postal employees?

Mr. VENIOT: So far as I am concerned as the minister in charge of one of the departments, I have very seriously considered an increase in salary to the officials under discussion. Not only the latter part of last year, but the previous year I did what I considered to be my duty in connection with the recommendations I sent to the Civil Service Commission. It is not for me to criticize the action of the commission in refusing the request that I sent to them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me to state whether or not it was the intention of the government to proceed in this case along the same lines as those adopted in connection with the technical employees. I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the government to find whether it is their intention to proceed along those lines; but may I point out that, to my mind, the two cases are not similar. In one case the Civil Service Commission recommended an increase to the technical employees of the various departments, and when the increase was recommended by them it was thought necessary that the matter should be further looked into in order to see how those technical men should be classified. In the case referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre the Civil Service Commission did not recommend any increase and under the Civil Service Act, as I understand it, the matter lies there for the present. I can assure the hon. gentleman I have done what I consider to be my duty under the circumstances, and if there is any other effort I can make on behalf of those men, I am prepared to make it. I am not at this moment prepared to say in what direction that effort will be.

Mr. STINSON: The minister has been called by some papers of Canada "the political guillotine." Either he is entitled to that name or he is not, and the only way to clear up the situation is to take these cases individually, present the facts fairly, get all the information before the committee, and give the minister an opportunity of making his defence. If he makes an adequate defence, he should give us credit for affording him an opportunity to do so. If we bring these cases forward, present all the facts fairly, and give him that opportunity, then the country will be satisfied.

I purpose dealing with the dismissal of a postmaster at Picton, the overriding of the appointment by the Civil Service Commission, and the appointment instead of a nominee of the Postmaster General. I have the file from which I am going to give the facts as fairly as I can and if I leave out any documents or parts thereof that the minister thinks should be included, I should be glad if he would call my attention to the matter in order that we may have the facts fairly and squarely before the public. Smith, who was postmaster at Picton, was dismissed on the fourth day of August, 1927, for political partisanship. The order of the privy council sets forth that this was the basis of his dismissal. The case was investigated by Mr. J. A. S. Plouffe, a barrister of Sudbury, who finds him guilty, largely, in my opinion, on suspicion, and that is as set forth in Plouffe's own report of the matter. After setting forth the evidence that he had taken, he makes the following finding:

> It is interesting to note that the mail always came regularly to the box-holders, except during the electoral campaigns aforesaid. The majority of the witnesses making complaints were known to be active partisans for either Mr. Horsey or Hon. Mr. Raney. I infer from the evidence that the delay or non-receipt of the mail, as the case may be, was caused by either one of the postmasters at Picton, Wellington or Milford.

Finally, he says:

> I suspect that a great number of these irregularities originated at the Picton post office and were caused to be made by the postmaster himself or by his servants. The postmaster says that he was not aware of what was going on. It might be so, but he, who is responsible for the work, conduct and behaviour of his servants during office hours cannot entrench himself behind the excuse that he does not know what is being done or said by them. If he had no actual knowledge of what took place in these particular instances, he had at least constructive knowledge of it.

And then he finds him guilty of partisanship and recommends his dismissal. That was a dismissal on suspicion rather than on an actual finding. Smith, in making his defence, denies very categorically the charges that were made against him, and even puts it up to one witness to say whether the evidence he gave was true or false. He says:

> I also wish to draw your attention to the statement made to the court by Robert Purtelle, who seemed to act for the complainant. When I was being sworn I made oath saying I had not done one act of partisanship in any way or even knew of a single piece of mail unduly held in Picton post office. I asked Mr. Purtelle if he believed what I had sworn to, and he frankly and truly stated to the court he did so believe.

The Postmaster General recommended the dismissal of Smith for partisanship and at the same time gave instructions that the office be placed in the charge and control of Robert J. Purtelle, who was the secretary of the Liberal association, and who, in his sworn evidence, stated that he had been the organizer for both Mr. Horsey and Mr. Raney in the last two campaigns. The attention of the Postmaster General or of his department was called to the fact that a man by the name of Gerald H. Way, then assistant postmaster at Picton was an applicant for the position. He also was a soldier, with an honourable discharge given in January, 1919.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the hon. gentleman say that Mr. Way was a returned soldier?

Mr. STINSON: I said that he was a soldier with an honourable discharge. He was not overseas, and I am making no such claim.

Mr. VENIOT: I just wanted that made clear.

Mr. STINSON: The Postmaster General prior to the dismissal of Smith wrote asking to have Purtelle placed in charge, under date of July 25, 1927, as follows:

> As the postmaster at Picton, Ontario, has been found guilty of political partisanship and he will be dismissed by an order in council, just as soon as such an order is passed you will appoint Mr. Robert J. Purtelle as temporary postmaster.

Mr. HANSON: Who was he?

Mr. STINSON: He was secretary of the Liberal association, also the Liberal organizer for Mr. Horsey and Mr. Raney in the last two campaigns.

Mr. BENNETT: They being the defeated candidates?

Mr. STINSON: Yes. There is no evidence on file as to why Purtelle should be appointed over Mr. Way, who was the assistant postmaster and was an applicant for the position. Mr. Way had had some twenty-three years experience in that post office, and he was then on duty there. Apparently the only basis there was for the appointment of Robert J. Purtelle is contained in a letter written by one Masten of Bloomfield, who sets out Purtelle's qualifications in that letter. This letter was written to the district superintendent and passed on by him with his report to the Civil Service Commission. The first paragraph reads as follows:

Regarding the appointment of a postmaster for the town of Picton, I beg to present a few reasons why the present incumbent Mr. Robert Purtelle might be confirmed in the position to the advantage of the service, the gratification of his host of friends, and in recognition of his public spirit and vigorous intelligent effort in the service of the country and in promoting the cause of Liberalism.

The last clause of that letter reads:

Mr. Purtelle and his family are staunch Liberals and people of influence in this county, and I, like many others, feel that splendid service will be assured, the public pleased, and the Liberal cause advanced by his permanent appointment to the office.

That is the only thing I have been able to find on the file as a reason for Mr. Purtelle's appointment over Mr. Way, who has had twenty-three years experience in that office.

Mr. SPENCER: Who wrote that letter?

Mr. STINSON: It was written by S. Edgar Masten, of Bloomfield.

Mr. VENIOT: To whom?

Mr. STINSON: To the district postal superintendent and passed on by him to the Civil Service Commission, with a report on the parties to be appointed. Following this applications were asked for. The office was duly advertised, and the applications were in by the 18th of October. The Civil Service Commission asked for a report from the district superintendent at Ottawa, under date of November 21, 1927:

With reference to your communication of the 13th ultimo advising that the postmastership at Picton, Ontario, has become vacant through the dismissal of Mr. S. A. Smith, the commissioners would be pleased to receive the report of the district superintendent in this connection at your earliest convenience.

That letter is addressed to the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General at Ottawa by the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. The report was supplied to the Post Office Department on the 5th of December, 1927, but it never was forwarded to the Civil Service Commission until the 23rd day of December of that year.

It seems to me that if the Civil Service Act is to be fairly administered, the Civil Service Commission should have an inspector of their own to make reports instead of depending on the inspector of the department. That would ensure an independent report. The report of District Inspector Low is dated December 5, 1927. In it he sets out that the office is a class 2B office, and he classifies the applicants. I will give the particulars regarding Purtelle and Way:

Robert J. Purtelle

Educational qualifications—Good.
Accommodation offered—Government building.
Location offered—Centrally located.
Residential qualifications—20 years.
Experience—3 months post office experience.
Character and integrity—Good.
Time willing to give to post office—Full time.

Gerald H. Way

Eucational qualifications—Good.
Accommodation offered—Government building.
Location offered—Centrally located.
Residential qualifications—40 years.
Experience—20 years post office experience.
Character and integrity—Good.
Time willing to give to Post office—Full time.

The applicants rank in order of merit, from a post office standpoint, as follows:

Gerald H. Way is a man of fine appearance forty-three years of age. He was born and brought up in Picton and has lived there practically all his life. He is well known, and bears a splendid reputation, and seems to be very popular. Mr. Way enlisted in 1918, but did not accompany a regiment overseas. He was in training at Petawawa camp, and was honourably discharged in January, 1919. He entered the post office in 1905 as a clerk where he has been employed. He became assistant postmaster in 1911, and has a thorough knowledge of post office work. He is a person of good habits, and commands the respect of all who come in contact with him. Mr. Way is single and resides with his father.

Robert J. Purtelle is widely known in the vicinity of Picton where he has resided for twenty years. He is well educated, having taught school for a number of years, thence going into the canning business, and latterly conducting a seed store. He is a clean living person and bears a good character. Mr. Purtelle was appointed acting postmaster in September, and although not yet thoroughly familiar with the workings of the office no doubt would be efficient as he is making an earnest effort to be successful.

The Civil Service Commission received that report on December 23, 1927, and issued their certificate of appointment to Gerald H. Way, on February 13, 1928. It is the usual form of certificate issued in such cases. Accompanying Way's application was his discharge from the army, which shows that he was honourably discharged. On February 23, 1928, the Postmaster General wrote to his deputy telling him to reject the certificate. This is the letter:

With further reference to the post office vacancy at Picton, Ontario, which I authorized on February 14, to hold in abeyance, I now wish to instruct you to refuse the certificate of the commission issued in favour of Mr. Gerald H. Way.

Mr. STEVENS: Who wrote that?

Mr. STINSON: That is signed by the Postmaster General, P. J. Veniot.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely not.

Mr. STINSON: It will be observed that in his letter the Postmaster General simply instructs his deputy to reject the certificate, without assigning any cause for so doing.

Mr. RYCKMAN: A law unto himself.

Mr. STINSON: However, the Deputy Postmaster General, in writing the Civil Service Commission did attempt to assign a cause. This is his letter of February 24, to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission:

Referring to your certificate of February 13, covering appointment of Mr. Gerald H. Way to the above postmastership, permit me to inform you that this matter has received the attention of the Postmaster General, and to state that Mr. Way is hereby rejected as unsuitable under section 13 of the Civil Service Act.

Section 13 of the Civil Service Act, which will be found in volume 1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, deals with an entirely different matter altogether. It reads as follows:

The rate of compensation of an employee upon appointment to a position in any class in the civil service shall be at the minimum rate prescribed for the class; provided, however, that when the appointee is already in the civil service in another position, the rate of compensation upon appointment to the new position either through transfer or promotion shall be the same as that received before such appointment or, if there be no such rate for the new class, then at the next higher rate, but no appointment shall in any case be made at less than the minimum or at more than the maximum rate prescribed for a class.

There is no doubt that the Deputy Postmaster General intended to refer to section 24. I presume there has been a re-numbering of the sections and that section 13 in the old act has become section 24 in the new one. Section 24 reads as follows:

The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

This explicitly provides that cause must be assigned for any rejection and reported to the Civil Service Commission. Neither in the letter from the Postmaster General to his deputy, nor in the letter from the deputy to the commission, is any cause assigned for the rejection, and that in spite of the fact that his own inspector had reported on Gerald H. Way as being a fit and proper person and had placed him in the category of merit as No. 1 for the appointment. There is nothing in the opinion of the Justice department, quoted yesterday by the Postmaster General:

If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he thinks it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the charge of any duties.

There is nothing in the statute that permits the exercise of any such power of rejection as the minister invoked in this case, nor is there anything in the opinion of the Justice department to justify his action, because Gerald H. Way was in charge of the office for twenty-three years, and the department's own inspector reports him as a fit and proper person to be appointed. On March 26, 1928, the commission issued a fresh certificate in favour of Robert J. Purtelle.

From the above facts it is evident that the Postmaster General has absolutely flouted the appointment of the commission notwithstanding that yesterday he stated that these appointments are altogether under the control of the Civil Service Commission, and the Whittaker file contains two or three of his letters to the same effect. That, I repeat, is the view expressed by him in his own letters. Moreover, his inspector reported strongly in favour of Way, who has had twenty-three years' experience in postal work. Although appointed by the commission he was given no opportunity to enter on the duties of the office, for the Postmaster General promptly instructed his deputy to notify the commission that the appointment had been rejected, but without assigning the slightest cause for taking such action.

Now, we have been told that the former postmaster was dismissed for partisanship. Well, the man who has been put in his place was, according to his own sworn testimony, the secretary of the local Liberal association, and acted as Liberal organizer for Mr. Horsey and Mr. Raney in the last two campaigns. If any substantiation of this point is needed it is to be found in the letter from Mr. Masten stating that the man has been a good, staunch Liberal and that it would please the local Liberal party if he were appointed to the office. Robert J. Purtelle, the man appointed, was the man who fathered the claim of partisanship against Smith. He files an affidavit based upon opinion and not fact, as follows:

I, Robert Purtelle of the town of Picton, in the county of Prince Edward, do solemnly declare that I heard Mr. Alexander McKee tell Mr. J. H. Roberts, Inspector of Postal Service, on December the 27th, 1926, that he (Mr. McKee) was in Picton post office on an election day and he (Mr. McKee) saw Samuel Smith, the postmaster instructing an elector how and where to mark his ballot and directing him to the polling booth to register his vote.

And it is on that affidavit and one or two others that the investigation is started. Now when we turn to McKee's evidence as given before the investigator we find it is entirely different from the affidavit filed by Mr. Robert J. Purtelle. McKee simply sets out in his evidence as follows:

Alexander McKee, being duly sworn, said in substance: That he resides at Picton and knows the postmaster. That he has seen Mr. Smith during the federal campaign of the year 1925 directing a man where to vote. Witness says that the man in question asked the postmaster where the polling booth was, and the postmaster told him where it was.

This is entirely different from the affidavit as sworn to by Mr. Purtelle. Now the very fact that Purtelle was the man who started the investigation, who gathered the evidence for it, and gave evidence, was sufficient to bar him from the appointment where a man was being dismissed for political partisanship. If the administration of the department by the Postmaster General were ever so good, is not Canada paying too high a price for that service if it is developing in the country a disrespect for law and order? A minister has no more right than any other man to disregard the statutes of this country; yet the minister has openly violated the statute in this case, because the section makes it incumbent upon him to assign the reason for the rejection of an official after appointment is made by the Civil Service Commission. And there is no pretence at assigning any cause in the present case. Way was entitled to preference by reason of the fact that he had twenty-three years of experience in the post office; and he was entitled to preference on the part of the Postmaster General, if the statement made by the Postmaster General yesterday was sincere, that he was anxious to look after the welfare of soldiers, because Way was a demobilized soldier. Way was entitled in any event to come under the provision of section 24 as to probation. If you accept the cause assigned by the deputy, at least he should have been given the opportunity to take advantage of section 24 of the act, which exists for that very purpose, of trying a man, where he is appointed to office, in order that the act may be fairly and squarely administered.

Now I have read into the record the letters and documents that fairly deal with the matter and I do not think I have left out any part that really adds to the file in any way. But the whole thing is absolutely clear on its face, that Purtelle was appointed for no other reason that that he was a political partisan, and that Smith was dismissed for alleged political partisanship as to which there was absolutely no direct evidence; because the investigator says, "I suspect these things are true", but he does not give it as a finding. I submit, in view of the facts, that the minister had no right to do what he did and that there was no authority, either in the act or under the legal opinion from the law offices, giving him the right to act as he has done in this case.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member having treated the Picton post office question, it is but right that I should tell the other side of the story. I am charged with refusing to appoint Mr. Way because, first, he was a soldier; it is said I should not have refused him. Under the Civil Service Act Mr. Way, as a soldier training at Petawawa camp, where he was, had no preference.

Mr. STINSON: That is right.

Mr. VENIOT: Then why refer to it?

Mr. STINSON: Because you said yerterday that you were very partial to soldiers.

Mr. VENIOT: The second charge is that I should not have refused the certificate in his favour because of his experience as assistant postmaster. Let me point out that, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, Mr. Way was assistant postmaster for twenty-three long years. I think that is right.

Mr. STINSON: No; he was appointed assistant postmaster in 1911.

Mr. VENIOT: But he was in the service, a regular employee in a classified post office, for twenty-three years. Will the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson) explain to the committee how it is that in 1912, when Mr. Petit was put out for political interference, Mr. Way was not then promoted by the Conservative party. Why was he not recognized?

Mr. STINSON: He was a much younger man.

Mr. VENIOT: He had then been in the service seven years. He was appointed to the service in 1905.

Mr. STEVENS: There was no Civil Service Act then.

Mr. VENIOT: Of course not; my hon. friends hide their political guillotine behind the statement, "There was no Civil Service Act".

Mr. HANSON: Does that justify your breaking the statute?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not break the statute.

Mr. HANSON: I say you did.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not. While I do not wish to put my legal talents against the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me at least I can put up good sense and judgment. In 1911 W. V. Petit was dismissed because he acted as a political partisan, and no investigation was held.

Mr. BENNETT: Certified by the member for the constituency.

Mr. VENIOT: Exactly. And S. G. Smith was appointed in his place. This Mr. Way had then been seven years working in the office, and S. G. Smith had no post office experience whatever.

Then let us come to the last appointment. Mr. Smith was dismissed for political partisanship; affidavits were produced charging him with certain offences along that line and, I believe, with interference perhaps not on his part but by employees of the post office in the distribution of certain political circulars during the election. That investigation was held according to law, and on the report of the investigating commissioner I recommended to the executive council that Mr. Smith be dismissed, which was my right under the order in council first passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, later accepted by the present government and unanimously confirmed by the House of Commons. This position was advertised; Mr. Way was an applicant, together with Mr. Purtelle and I think one or two others. The result was that the Civil Service Commission did issue a certificate in favour of Mr. Way, but since the investigating commissioner felt satisfied, according to his report that responsibility should rest somewhere in the office for the non-distribution or mishandling of these circulars during the election, which circulars should have reached their destination at a certain time but did not, and in view of the fact that Mr. Way, the assistant postmaster, must have been a party to the non-distribution according to the evidence, I did not think I was justified in accepting the certificate of the commission, which I refused. That is the whole story.

Mr. ARTHURS: Was there an investigation?

Mr. VENIOT: There was an investigation and it was proved that these circulars had gone astray in some unaccountable manner, and either the postmaster or some of his assistants were directly responsible.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): Shall the item carry?

Mr. KENNEDY: Now that we have an open season for complaints in connection with the Post Office Department I suppose I may as well have my say also. I wish to bring up a case in connection with a postmastership within a few miles of my own home in the Peace River country, in which it appears to me discrimination has been shown against a returned soldier.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the name of the office?

Mr. KENNEDY: Waterhole and Fairview. Just about a year ago a vacancy occurred in the Waterhole post office through the resignation of the postmaster, Mr. Craig, and Mr. Henry Sigler, a merchant of the village, received the temporary appointment. Later on a permanent appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission, as this office carried a salary of about $900 a year. I believe Mr. Sigler applied for the position but the appointment was given to Mr. Smith, a returned soldier and a married man with four or five children. Technically there may be a way which the Postmaster General can justify what subsequently happened, but in actual fact I believe there is no justification for what took place.

Previously the railway had reached only to Whitelaw, but later it was extended to Fairview. Waterhole had been the centre of a farming district, and when steel was laid to within four or five miles of Waterhole the whole village was moved to Fairview, which became the new centre of the district. It was recognized by the department as well as by everyone in that district that when the rest of the village, including the bank, three or four stores, some garages and so on, was moved to Fairview the post office at Waterhole could not very well carry on with the bulk of its business going to the new town. Mr. Smith, who had been appointed to the Waterhole office by the Civil Service Commission, applied for the new post office realizing that the Waterhole office could not continue as a salaried office but would probably become attached to a local store and would carry with it only a small remuneration. Notwithstanding the fact that all the business moved to Fairview, the Fairview office was opened as a new office altogether and Mr. Sigler, who had moved his store from Waterhole to Fairview, was appointed postmaster. According to the file Fairview was a non-accounting office promising a salary of $100 a year until such time as the revenue justified an increase, and Mr. Smith was informed that if the Waterhole office could not keep up the business, as everyone knew it could not and as the department must have known, the salary would be reduced.

My point is that, the whole village having moved to a new centre which was bound to take away 95 per cent of the business from the old office, the logical and fair thing was to move the Waterhole postmaster, who was giving his whole time to the post office, to the new office at Fairview. It is possible to crawl out of this situation by a technicality, but everyone who has known western Canada knows that when a railway comes within a mile or even five miles of an old village, the business moves to the new town at the end of steel.

I do not want to read the correspondence; I think I am giving a fair review of it. Smith made a statement to me which I am going to offer for what it is worth; I have always found him a truthful man. He told me that Mr. Reilly, from the office at Edmonton, came to Waterhole and asked him if he would be good enough to sign his resignation as postmaster at Waterhole to permit of his being moved to the new post office at Fairview. He did so and on the afternoon of that same day Mr. Sigler was sworn in by Mr. Reilly as postmaster at Fairview. This is why I also feel that politics have been played in connection with these appointments, and why I believe that in this matter there has been a discrimination against a returned soldier in favour of someone who was not a returned soldier.

Mr. BENNETT: What Mr. Reilly was that?

Mr. KENNEDY: James J. Reilly, district superintendent at Edmonton.

Mr. VENIOT: I have not before me any notes on the Waterhole and Fairview offices, but from the Postmaster General's report I find that Waterhole has a revenue of $1,630 annually. When it became necessary to open an office at Fairview we did not consider that we should transfer the postmaster from Waterhole to Fairview. It is true that the opening of the office at Fairview has reduced the revenue at Waterhole, but that is no reason, from an administrative standpoint, why this transfer should take place. We followed out the regular practice in the opening of new post offices, and we appointed a new postmaster.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not ask for the resignation of the old one?

Mr. VENIOT: We did not ask for it. I have not the record before me and I would not like to make any positive statement. I will have the record here to-morrow and we can see just how the matter stands.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister also bring the record concerning the change in postmasters at the village of St. David's, in the county of Lincoln?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There has been a great deal of interference by the Post Office Department with appointments made by the Civil Service Commission. There must be something radically wrong with the system when a person can be notified by the Civil Service Commission that he or she has received an appointment and should report for duty immediately, and then be informed by the department that he or she is not to receive the position. I ask the minister to be good enough to get the record of the case I am going to refer to. This occurred in connection with the post office at New Westminster, but it does not have any relation to the appointment of a postmaster.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not the postmaster?

Mr. McQUARRIE: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand it applies to the building or the surroundings.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It concerns the appointment of a stenographer. When there have been so many cases where the department has interfered with the Civil Service Commission, I do not suppose the minister can be expected to remember all of them.

Mr. VENIOT: I have a pretty good memory.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There was considerable publicity given to this case, and considerable objection made to the action of the department. Applications were called for in September of last year. A competition was duly held, after which a young lady in my constituency received a notice which I will read to the house. I will quote this in full for the benefit of the Postmaster General. It is as follows:

Notification To Report For Duty
(Permanent Appointment)
Local Competition

AT:TM P.O.-C27-130 Date: Sept. 27, 1928.
Name: Miss Margaret Isabella Moore. 18380-C1.
Address: 2405 Linden Ave., New Westminster, B.C.
Dept.: Post Office.
Branch: New Westminster, B.C.
Title of position: Stenographer Grade 2.
Salary rate: $1,080 per annum.
Vice: Harold G. Wade.
Place to report: New Westminster, B.C.
Person to whom to report: The Postmaster.
Date to report: Immediately.

W. Foran,
Secretary.

Upon receipt of that notification the young lady reported for duty on October 1. She had another position, but as this was a better one she handed in her resignation. She reported to the postmaster at New Westminster but was informed that he had not yet received any notice from the Post Office Department. She was told that probably this would come in due course, and she waited until the 29th of that month before inquiring again. She was told then that no word had yet been received, and I think she had some correspondence by wire with the Civil Service Commission. After considerable delay she was informed that the department had refused to confirm her appointment and someone else had been appointed to the vacant position. The appointee was a boy under the age limit required by the department, the son of a very strong Liberal in the town.

It seems to me that there must be something radically wrong with the system when the department steps in and countermands an appointment made by the Civil Service Commission. I would be very glad indeed if the minister would bring down the file in connection with this case.

Mr. VENIOT: The case related by the hon. member is somewhat of a surprise to me. With appointments of that kind the system has been for the Civil Service Commission to establish a waiting list. The commission would not for a moment delegate the appointment of a person whose name was not on the civil service waiting list, provided that there was on that waiting list some person prepared to take the position offered. I do not want to go any further into the matter without having the file before me, but I would be very much surprised if any file that we have would show anything of that kind.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There can be no doubt the notice was sent out and received by Miss Moore.

Mr. VENIOT: I doubt that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have a copy of the notice under my hand.

Mr. VENIOT: How is the notice signed?

Mr. McQUARRIE: W. Foran, secretary.

Mr. VENIOT: That is the secretary of the Civil Service Commission. He sends the notice out to the parties. I think I am safe in saying, although I will produce the file, that there was no notice from the department to that effect. Had the hon. gentleman let me know in advance, I would have had the file with me. I will get it for the hon. member.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I stated that the postmaster said that he had not yet received a notification from the Post Office Department. That is the trouble. Surely it is most unfortunate that a system like that should be in force.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member will get the file in the morning.

Mr. CLARK: Has the minister filled the post office vacancy at Sutton, Quebec?

Mr. VENIOT: I have no record with me, of the Sutton post office, but I can get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. CLARK: Last year a return was laid on the table and at that time the vacancy had not been filled. I wonder if the minister would bring that file up to date.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: I should like for a few minutes to direct the attention of the committee to a dismissal which took place in Lunenburg county in 1926, the papers respecting which should have been tabled in response to an order for return of last year. I have some papers which were tabled and I want to draw those to the attention of the committee as well. The order for return passed the house on the 30th April, 1928. The return was brought down on the 11th May, 1928, and it concerned the dismissal of Howard Robar at Sarty's in the county of Lunenburg, a very small post office. The facts are these: Mr.

Robar had been postmaster there for some years. He was a cripple and almost wholly dependent upon that office and the carriage of the mail for his living. I want to read to the committee the facts on which he was dismissed as disclosed in the file. The first reference to the subject is dated the 6th December, 1926, and it is headed:

Memorandum for the Deputy Postmaster General

Re Sarty's, N.S.

Please have the dismissal and appointment made as recommended and notify Mr. Duff it is being done.

(Signed) P. J. Veniot,
Postmaster General.

That is the first reference in the file. Obviously that file is not complete, and the Postmaster General has not complied with the order passed by the house. There must have been some previous communication from Mr. Duff and there was such a previous communication referred to in another letter from the department, because I find in the file this letter dated December 10, 1926:

Lunenburg, Nova Scotia.

William Duff, Esq.

Dear Mr. Duff:

Re Sarty's. In reply to your communication of the 26th November, recommending the dismissal of the postmaster at Sarty's, permit me to say that in accordance with your recommendation instructions have been given for the transfer of the Sarty's post office to the charge of Mr. Edwin Sarty as postmaster.

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Postmaster General.

The remainder of the file consists of routine correspondence, but nowhere in the file does there appear a letter of November 26 or any other correspondence emanating from Mr. Duff. I ask the Postmaster General—and he is welcome to the file which I have in my hand so that he can look it over himself—whether he has complied with the order of the house and has given the house the full information asked for in the order. This is only one more instance where, for some purpose or another, information has been deliberately suppressed. Further, Mr. Robar was in no respect a political partisan. He took no part in the election, and, as I say, he was a cripple and almost wholly dependant upon the office for his living. No reason is given for his dismissal, but the man who was appointed to take his place is a violent political partisan. Will the Postmaster General complete the file at this late date?

Mr. VENIOT: Before answering the question whether I will complete the file, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he has stated that the man in question was wholly dependant upon this office for his living. The office had a revenue of $32 per annum and the salary was $60 per annum.

Mr. ERNST: And he drove the mail.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member is talking about the dismissal of a postmaster at a salary of $60 a year. If that gentleman has to depend for his living upon that $60 a year and he was dismissed, perhaps I have done him an injustice. As to the question about the completion of the file, all the file will be produced which is not the minister's personal file and marked "personal."

Mr. ERNST: I submit that if the minister made a dismissal upon the recommendation of any person, the reasons for that dismissal should be given to the committee. Furthermore, with reference to the minister's rather cheap statement about the small salary connected with the office, he knows or ought to know that the person who kept the post office also drove the mail and received something in addition to the ordinary postmaster's salary.

Mr. VENIOT: The Postmaster General might know by the file, but I do not think he should be expected to carry all these contracts in his head.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to ask the minister whether a post office employee or a postmaster who is dismissed is entitled, if he so requests, to the reasons for his dismissal?

Mr. VENIOT: I should say he would be. There may be cases where it is not done, but I think it should be.

Mr. CLARK: Then why, in the case to which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has been referring, were the reasons not given?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not understand him to say that the postmaster asked for the reasons.

Mr. CLARK: I will make it quite clear. Not only did the postmaster ask for them, but it looks as if he was a Liberal, because he indicates in the letter that he had always voted right.

Mr. VENIOT: It sounds like Satan rebuking sin to hear a Conservative stand up for a good Liberal.

Mr. CLARK: How he voted is a matter of indifference, to me at least, but the man by a letter dated December 18, 1926, addressed to the Postmaster General, makes a request for the reasons for his dismissal, and the answer is contained in the following letter dated Ottawa, December 29, 1926, addressed to Howard Robar, Sarty's, N.S.:

Dear Sir,

I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 18th December, regarding the postmastership at the above-mentioned office.

In reply, I may say that your remarks have been noted.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) E. J. Underwood,
Chief Superintendant of Post Office Service.

There is something seriously wrong with a department that permits that sort of an answer to be written to a man who has been a postmaster anywhere; this particular man had been a postmaster for many years, and that is the sort of answer he gets. I suggest that if that letter was written on the responsibility of the civil servant who signs it, he should be taken to task. That is no sort of an answer for a civil servant to make on his own responsibility. However, I would assume that that answer was dictated under instructions of the minister because it reads, "I am directed to acknowledge." I assume that the direction was given by the minister, and this minister when he is requested to give reasons for the dismissal simply writes and says, "Your remarks have been noted." I do not think that is consistent with the dignity of the office which the minister holds. I think this house is entitled to know why this postmaster was dismissed. Apparently the only way in which the minister can give those reasons is by consulting a letter from a member of this house—he was not then a member, but a defeated candidate—whose letter is referred to in this file. If there are any reasons given in that letter for the dismissal, the minister now says that he will produce that letter if it is not private. If it is private, it should not have been referred to at all in the file, but as it is referred to in the file it should be on the file. It is no longer private; it is a matter of public business that concerns every member of this house and the electors at large. I think the minister should put the letter on the file. I think, further, that the minister should have the common decency and courtesy to answer the letter he received from the postmaster asking reasons for his dismissal.

Mr. ERNST: I have several more of these incomplete files to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister and of the house. If there was only one that was incomplete we might put it down to inadvertence, but it happens repeatedly. I have five files in my hand only one of which appears to have the appearence of completeness, all the rest being obviously incomplete in that something has been deleted or suppressed.

The second one refers to the dismissal of a woman postmistress at Conquerall Banks in the county of Lunenburg, Mrs. Albert Rafuse. The facts of the situation are that Mrs. Rafuse, who is the widow of Captain Albert Rafuse, had kept the post office at Conquerall Banks to the satisfaction of the people there. Her husband died in the early part of 1927, and she conducted a general store, which was at the most central point in the village. In June 1927, for what mysterious reason the Postmaster General alone knows, he wrote the following letter to the Deputy Postmaster General:

Ottawa, June 22nd, 1927.

Mr. L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

In the interest of the postal service at Conquerall Banks, N.S., I have decided to dismiss the present postmaster at that place and have him replaced by Captain Oxner. This is not a Civil Service Commission appointment.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) P. J. Veniot.

There is nothing further on the file as to the reasons for that dismissal or as to who recommended Captain Oxner. Knowing the district, I am credibly informed by the people there that when the dismissal took place a search had to be made to find a person who would take the office, because most everyone wanted Mrs. Rafuse to retain it. Finally Captain Oxner agreed to take the office if it was taken away from Mrs. Rafuse. The only local reason assigned for that dismissal is this: Mrs. Rafuse and her husband had been life-long Liberals, but her husband voted against the gentleman who controls the patronage in Lunenburg county. Mrs. Rafuse herself either did not vote at all or she voted as she had always voted in years past, but the rumour locally is that Mr. Duff was incensed at the fact that the husband had changed his politics after so many years; Mrs. Rafuse was dismissed, and the only reason given is in the Postmaster General's letter, and that is a blank so far as a reason is concerned. I want to ask the Postmaster General why that woman was dismissed, and on whose recommendation. I think, Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. VENIOT: You have got the answer there. I instructed the deputy to make the dismissal. It was made on my recommendation.

Mr. ERNST: I certainly do not intend to accept an answer like that. That is no answer at all. There must have been someone who recommended the dismissal and suggested reasons; there must have been a departmental investigation, and so forth. There must be some reason assigned by the Postmaster General before he can dismiss a public servant and justify the dismissal before the House of Commons.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I feel that I must join with my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg in a protest against the discourteous attitude of the minister in this matter. It is an insult to the members of the House of Commons to refuse to give the reason for the dismissal, to refuse an answer to a courteous question on a matter of public importance. I do not think the minister is justified in simply saying that the member has the answer in his hand when that answer is merely a statement to the effect that the minister has decided to do so-and-so. This house is entitled to the fullest explanation from the minister in matters of this kind, and I feel satisfied that the house will insist on these explanations being given.

Mr. ERNST: Before this item carries, I expect an answer to a question fairly put.

Mr. VENIOT: The only answer I can give the hon. gentleman is that if I received a recommendation I acted upon it, and if that recommendation came to me marked "personal" I do not think the house would say that I should put that personal letter on file. I do not know at the moment whether it was marked "personal" or not. I will look it up. But it has not been the practice in the past to put a letter marked "personal" on the file. But if the house insists upon it, there is only one thing for me to do, and that is to obey the orders of the house and put the letter on the file. Personally I feel that I am justified in holding back a letter that is marked "personal" when I take the responsibility for carrying out whatever recommendation may be contained in it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a very important principle involved in the observation which the minister has just made, and I think the government should give it its careful consideration. Assume a minister of the crown writes a letter to a member of the pension board marked "personal," asking that certain action be taken. Is that a public document or not if action is taken? The Postmaster General has been receiving letters from a defeated candidate in Lunenburg county marked "personal," according to his own statement.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know about that; I said I would look it up.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member think that he did, or do I understand him to say that he has no memory of it?

Mr. VENIOT: I say I have no memory of it. I will look it up. I think if the letter was not marked "personal" I should have put it on the file.

Mr. BENNETT: That is an entirely different thing. The minister said this house would not require production of a letter marked "personal", recommending certain action in connection with the public service of this country. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will tell him that that is a position he cannot take in this house. I think the Minister of Justice will advise him that when a letter addressed to a minister of the crown is the cause for official and public action being taken it must be placed upon the file, or at least that portion of the letter which refers to the action taken. I may mark my letter to the minister "unofficial and not for the file," and that may be all right; but when I mark a letter "personal", and it may involve many matters, and action is taken upon any part of the letter, that part upon which action is taken is no longer a personal communication because it is addressed to a minister of the crown. I think his colleague will tell him that that principle has always been recognized by this house. The general principle is that there can be nothing personal in letters directed to a minister of the crown upon which official action is taken. There are variations from that general principle, as there always are from all general principles, but that is the rule.

A good deal will have to happen—and I say this with much regret—before we can yield to any such rule as that enunciated by the Postmaster General. The Minister of Justice in times past occupied a seat to the left of the Speaker; he may do so again; and I believe he is too fair a public servant when a great principle such as this is involved not to rise superior to his position as a member of the government and to regard himself as the legal adviser of the people of this country; and in this capacity I am confident he will tell his colleague that any letter addressed to a minister of the crown, upon which action is taken by that minister, cannot by any possible chance be kept off the file because the correspondent has seen fit to mark it "personal". That is the principle which I think the Minister of Justice will say has always been observed in our parliament. I hope it will continue to be observed. Otherwise what becomes of our parliamentary institutions? If the defeated candidate of the government in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg, the present member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) was able to mark letters to the Postmaster General "personal", and so interfered with the public service in the county of Lunenburg—I say if—and thereby those letters are excluded from the departmental files and so escape inspection by the members of this house, what becomes of responsible government? There is no such thing. It would mean that if the Minister of Justice himself, desiring to deal with a matter of public business, writes a letter to the Postmaster General, and does not mark it "private" it will be put on the file as a matter of course. But if a defeated candidate writes a letter to the Postmaster General on which action is taken resulting in an unfortunate woman being deprived of a postmastership in a little village of Nova Scotia, and that letter is marked "personal", it cannot be brought down. That is not the law. I think the minister will say that when he sat to the left of the Speaker that was not the practice of the government of the day, and I do not think it would be the practice advocated by the Liberal party when they are again sitting to the left of the Speaker.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can throw a little light on this matter. It is a great pleasure to me to-night to be able to act, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said, both as the member for Antigonish-Guysborough and as the defeated candidate for Queens-Lunenburg. It is not often that a member of this house can occupy that dual position.

Mr. ERNST: And control the patronage for two constituencies.

Mr. DUFF: What is that? Of course, Mr. Chairman, I cannot remember exactly what happened in connection with those two matters which my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) brought up. It is quite possible the file is complete; it is quite possible that I wrote no letter; it is quite possible that I saw the Postmaster General personally. But I want to say right here to the hon. leader of the opposition that I am neither a coward nor a hypocrite—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: —and if there is a letter on file from me with regard to Sarty's post office or the Conquerall Banks post office, for God's sake produce them quick.

Mr. BENNETT: That is fair. At least we can say this, the hon. gentleman has waived the privilege, if there was any; so the minister is free in the matter.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right. Let us take the Sarty's case first. My hon. friend has said that the gentleman whom I recommended, Edward Sarty, was a very strong partisan. That is quite true. Mr. Sarty is a good Liberal. Mr. Robar is a good Tory.

Mr. Robar took the place of a Liberal in 1911, shortly after the Tory party came into power. My hon. friend speaks of this gentleman depending upon a $60 office for his livelihood. My hon. friend should be very careful how he talks about the people of Lunenburg; nobody in Lunenburg lives on $60 a year.

Mr. ERNST: I did not suggest anything of the kind, and my hon. friend will take my word for it. The Postmaster General said it.

Mr. DUFF: Very good. He said this gentleman was dependent upon the post office for his living. If my memory is correct, and I think it is, Mr. Robar at the time was a storekeeper, so he was not depending entirely upon the post office for his living. His store was situated at the extreme end of the North river district in the county of Lunenburg. I think I am safe in making the assertion that his store was at least three-quarters of a mile from any house at the very extreme end of the district, which was within a mile of the post office occupied by Mr. Meisner. I was asked by the people of the district—and I have on my file a number of letters from prominent people of the North river district—saying that the post office was in an inconvenient place, that in 1911 it had been taken from a very central place. I have no objection to the action of the Tory party at that time. When they are in power they should look after their friends, something that the Liberal party do not attend to often enough. When the complaint came that this post office was not in a central position, on the recommendation of the people in the district, I recommended, either in a letter to the Postmaster General or in a personal interview, that it was in the interests of the public service to locate the post office in the centre of the district where it would best serve the public. Now, what about Conquerall Banks? My hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg left the impression—I think I am fair enough in saying—that the person in charge at Conquerall Banks is a woman. That is not true. I will give my hon. friend this opportunity to say whether that is so or not. Did he say so?

Mr. ERNST: I certainly did. And the file bears me out.

Mr. DUFF: All right. He said the occupant of the office at Conquerall Banks at the time of dismissal was a woman. I have not my file at hand, but I am positive that Albert Rafuse was the postmaster when the change was made, and Captain Oxner was appointed. The woman was not postmistress. A man was appointed, but my hon. friend tried to make out that this woman was a widow at the time the change took place. That is not correct.

Mr. ERNST: It is quite correct.

Mr. JACOBS: She may have been a grass widow.

Mr. DUFF: She was not even a grass widow. I recommended the change in the post office at Conquerall Banks at the request of at least 75 per cent of the citizens of that place. In fact, while I have recommended a good many dismissals, and have succeeded in some cases, I have never made a single recommendation unless a majority of the people asked for the change. If I am asked by the people, whom I had the honour to represent for a number of years, I say it is my duty to make a recommendation in furtherance of their request. That is the reason why Albert Rafuse was dismissed—the prominent people in the district asked that the change be made.

Mr. ERNST: I want to correct the impression of the hon. member as to who was postmistress or postmaster at Conquerall Banks, Lunenburg county, and I have no doubt he will accept the authority of the file of the department. I have under my hand, in the file, a copy of a letter dated Ottawa, June 28, 1927, at which time, I may say, Mrs. Rafuse was a widow. The letter is addressed to the district superintendent of postal service, Halifax, and reads:

> The district superintendent is informed that the Postmaster General has authorized the dismissal of the postmaster at Conquerall Banks, N.S., in the interest of the postal service, and he is requested to transfer the office from Mrs Ella A. Rafuse, present postmistress, to Captain Norman Oxner, as postmaster, and report the date of this transfer as soon as effected.
> Letter of notification in favour of Captain Oxner is herewith.

This is signed E. J. Underwood, chief superintendent of post office service.

I do not think I need comment further on the Conquerall Banks case; and with reference to the Sarty's case I may make only this observation, that I hope the remarks of the hon. member are more dependable in this connection than the remarks he made about the post office at Conquerall Banks.

Mr. DUFF: That is smart.

Mr. BENNETT: So the electors of Lunenburg thought.

Mr. ERNST: Further, with reference to the present Sarty's post office location, it is by no means in the centre of the district; in fact it is very much the other way, being considerably to the north end of the district. My hon. friend said that he did not know whether he had written or had seen the Postmaster General. I may say that under date December 10, 1926, I have a letter as follows:

> William Duff, Esq.,
> Lunenburg, N.S.
> Re Sarty's
> Dear Mr. Duff,
> In reply to your communication of the 26th November, recommending the dismissal of the postmaster at Sarty's, permit me to say that in accordance with your recommendation instructions have been given for the transfer of the Sarty's post office to the charge of Mr. Edwin Sarty as postmaster.
> Yours sincerely,
> (Sgd.) L. J. Gaboury,
> Deputy Postmaster General.

I can only suggest that the hon. gentleman refresh his memory before referring to the matter again. Now I will ask the Postmaster General to answer the question I put to him before the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) took part in the present discussion, namely: Upon whose recommendation, so far as his records show, was Mrs. Rafuse dismissed as postmistress, and why was not that recommendation brought down as part of the file in response to the order of the house?

Mr. VENIOT: I have answered that.

Mr. ERNST: No.

Mr. VENIOT: It is pretty hard to give an answer that will satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ERNST: Satisfy the house.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is you I am trying to satisfy just now. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough says that it was on his recommendation, and that refreshes my memory to that extent. I think that is correct. Now, if he has written a letter it was, as I said before, marked personal and I felt that I should not produce it. There is precedent in this house to justify the non-production of private letters on a minister's file.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another thing altogether.

Mr. VENIOT: It may be, but I took it that it was upon the same principle that I was going, and if it worked in one case it should work in the other. However, the hon. gentleman says that he releases me from that responsibility, if he has written me a personal letter, and therefore I will produce it if it is on the file.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In regard to the Upper Branch post office in Nova Scotia, the letter has been put on the file. It was not marked personal and evidently it is from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, who was at that time the defeated candidate for the riding of Lunenburg. The Upper Branch post office is in the electoral district of Lunenburg, as I understand. I should like to ask the minister this question: Will he act on the request of a Liberal member of this house in the dismissal of a public servant without requiring any allegations or reasons or cause? Is the mere request of a supporter of this government sufficient justification, in the mind of the minister, for the removal of an official, or must there be cause alleged?

Mr. VENIOT: Cause is given in all cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I look over the file in the case of the Upper Branch post office and I find that the following communication passed:

Lunenburg, Nova Scotia,
November 26, 1926.

Hon P. J. Venoit,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Veniot:

In the interest of the postal service of this constituency please arrange to have the post office now in charge of Brown Rhodenizer, Upper Branch, transferred to Colin Sarty of that place.

Yours sincerely,
William Duff.

No reason, no charge.

Mr. VENIOT: He gives a reason.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the file that is produced and there is no reason given.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. VENIOT: He says, in the interests of the public service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is no reason.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friends made dismissals with much less reason.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is no reason at all. Then comes the direction of the minister:

Please have the dismissal and appointment made as recommended and notify Mr. Duff it is being done.

(Sgd.) P.J.V.

Now here is a case where a postmaster, a humble one it is true, was dismissed purely at the request of a defeated candidate, who makes no charges. There is no cause for the removal, but it is made, I fancy, carrying out the idea of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough as stated in this house to-night, that he is an out and out believer in the pernicious spoils system: To the victors belong the spoils. This was the political doctrine on both sides for many years and it was condemned by both sides of this house and a law was passed, practically by the unanimous consent of all parties in the house, known as the Civil Service Act of Canada. It was passed for a particular purpose, namely, to do away with the spoils system.

Mr. DUFF: Nothing to do with dismissals.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, absolutely to do with dismissals, to prevent such dismissals as were formerly made, and which were unjustifiable, on political and partisan grounds. I have this to say, that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has very candidly stated that he believes in that spoils system, and I think probably he has a very active sympathizer in the present Postmaster General. But while the hon. gentleman from Antigonish-Guysborough may be a believer in that system which once prevailed in Canada, but which by universal consent was put down, my hon. friend the Postmaster General has no right to disobey the law of the country; he should act in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the Civil Service Act. But from what we have heard in the last two days in the discussion of these estimates, I say that he has persistently disregarded the provisions of that law, and we are justified in inquiring into case after case, as we propose to do, before this item passes. Action will have to be taken. The law must not be disregarded by any minister of this or of any other government, and we propose to get to the bottom of the matter.

Mr. VENIOT: If this thing keeps up much longer—

Mr. GUTHRIE: It will keep on for some time.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, I am prepared to keep it up as long as you can and am well able to do it. I was going to say that if this thing keeps on much longer this house will be imbued with the idea that our hon. friends opposite have suddenly taken the wings of political purity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The old story.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I will tell the old story. My hon. friends were in power in 1926 for three short months, and if I made as many dismissals in proportion to the length of time I have been in office as they made in that short time my present record would sink into insignificance. In 1927 and 1928 I laid on the table of the house reports of the department; in one such report was a telegram issued while they were in office which accounted for the dismissal of seven postmasters in the county of Antigonish, on the recommendation of a then member of the cabinet. Apparently there was no harm in their doing this sort of thing but it is a crime for the present Postmaster General to accept the recommendation of an hon. member of this house or of the man looking after the interests of the Liberal party in a certain district with regard to dismissals in small offices which do not come under the Civil Service Commission.

Let me go further; in my own county a temporary postmistress in an office which is under the Civil Service Commission was dismissed on July 4, 1926, and in the county of Bonaventure another dismissal was made and a gentleman appointed on the recommendation of the Minister of Health of the shadow government. This gentleman who was appointed was the right hand man of the Conservative party there and when he received the appointment he wired back to the department, "I cannot accept the position but please appoint my wife", and his wife was appointed. That is what happened when hon. gentlemen opposite carried on in 1926; they were in power only from July 1 to September 14, and look at their record. Even then they had no authority from the people of Canada.

Mr. CLARK: They had more than the present government has to-day.

Mr. VENIOT: They probably had more then than they will have for a very long time to come. Why, in certain sections of the maritime provinces it was broadcast that the only thing you had to do was to ask for a dismissal and the government would carry out your wishes. The shadow government dismissed Liberals who had held office; when the Liberals returned to power many of these postmasters who had been unjustly dismissed by hon. gentlemen opposite were reinstated, and because we took this action we are committing a crime and hon. gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror to think that such things should take place in this day and age. If I use language which is too rough I may be taken to task by that paragon of perfection in the English language, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), but the political conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite is the most reprehensible ever seen in this Dominion of Canada.

I do not wish to take up the time of this committee in recriminations; I wish to give the committee the information with regard to any questions they may ask and I desire to give that information as honestly as possible, but in order to expose the political hypocrisy of some hon. gentlemen opposite it has become necessary for me to take up some time in this way.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we all listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for South Wellington; his remarks recall to mind something I read some time ago and which runs like this: "When the devil was sick the devil a monk would be; when the devil was well the devil a monk was he." My hon. friend from South Wellington was a member of the shadow government of 1926, and I am going to give just one instance of what occurred under that government. I do not want to take up too much time; I could give many such cases but will not do so. When my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) was not a member of parliament and when he was not even a defeated candidate he recommended certain dismissals of postmasters in the county of Lunenburg. My hon. friend the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Manion), who is not in his seat at present, did us the honour of visiting Lunenburg during that famous election. I do not believe he had been in the county over half an hour before telegrams were being sent to Ottawa instructing the officials of his department to dismiss certain postmasters in the county of Lunenburg.

Mr. RENNIE: Is the correspondence on the file?

Mr. DUFF: I do not know what you are talking about. If you want to make a speech after I am through get up and make it; all you do is interrupt other speakers.

This is the case, Mr. Chairman: In 1912, shortly after our Tory friends came into power, they dismissed the postmaster at Pleasantville, just four miles below Conquerall Banks. No investigation was held in his case; he was simply fired from the position and a gentleman who voted for the successful candidate was appointed postmaster. In the spring of 1926, if I remember correctly, this postmaster had the misfortune to die, and the people of Pleasantville wrote me that a vacancy existed in the post office there. I consulted my friends in that vicinity and they suggested that the old postmaster, who was dismissed in 1912 for no good reason except that he voted Liberal, should be reinstated. I recommended to the Postmaster General of that day, just before the 1926 election, that this old postmaster should be reinstated, giving as my principal reason the fact that he was fired by the Tories in 1912, and he was appointed accordingly. About a fortnight after he was appointed the shadow government came into power and a few days later the hon. member for Fort William, who was acting as Postmaster General in that government, came to Lunenburg. While I have no definite information on this point it is my belief that the hon. member who is now complaining about Conquerall Banks, was the gentleman who recommended to the acting Postmaster General that this old postmaster be fired and a lady put in his place.

An hon. MEMBER: Was he fired?

Mr. DUFF: Of course he was fired.

Mr. VENIOT: And here is the wire that fired him. On August 11, the acting Postmaster General wired his secretary from Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, as follows:

For fourteen years Miss Jean Fraelick did work of postmaster for her father at Pleasantville, N.S. Because of father's death the office given to Allen Rafuse a month ago. Great injustice appears to have been done thereby and petition signed by patrons being sent forward. Please have Miss Fraelick reappointed immediately by wire and advise me Thursday at New Glasgow.

Miss Fraelick had never been postmistress, therefore she was not dismissed. On August 12, Doctor Manion received word by wire at New Glasgow that orders were issued as requested.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member has referred to my colleague who is absent to-night on an engagement he made about a week ago.

Mr. DUFF: I apologize.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. STEVENS: This matter was dealt with somewhat effectively in Hansard of 1926-27 at page 2297. The following extract relates to it:

I consulted the member for the district after the hon. minister made the charge, and largely on his statement I remember the facts as he brought them back to me. These are the facts: A man named Fraelick was postmaster at Pleasantville for fifteen years. He was a cripple and his daughter did the work. He died just about the time of the smash-up here last session. He was replaced by a political henchman, and his daughter was cast aside. Practically every person in the community signed a petition requesting that the girl be given back her late father's job. That is the case which I had taken up once before on a wire from my hon. friend the present member. As apparently the case had not been considered I wired at once to Mr. Gaboury, who is sitting in front of the minister to-night, and demanded —having looked into the facts on the ground— that the petitioners should be granted their petition to have the girl reappointed.

Mr. DUFF: If she had never been appointed how could she be reappointed?

Mr. STEVENS: She had been doing the work of her crippled father.

Mr. DUFF: Her father had been crippled with rheumatism for only about a year. He was a rigger, and a rigger cannot be crippled.

Mr. STEVENS: Hansard continues:

An hon. Member: She was a Liberal.

Mr. Manion: My hon. friend interjects that she was a Liberal. I do not know about that. But the proof that her appointment was a good move is that the present Postmaster General has not dismised her and she is still postmistress.

Mr. Veniot: She is not there now because she got married, and consequently her office became vacant.

Mr. Manion: My hon. friend is a smooth politician and is an adept at getting away with a great deal of oily, slippery, political material.

Mr. DUNNING: Something like what we have been hearing to-night.

Mr. STEVENS: To continue:

Mr. Veniot: There are two of a kind.

Mr. Manion: Thank God, no. I am not in the hon. gentleman's class at all, I do not pretend to be a politician.

Mr. DUFF: He was in that class for a few days.

Mr. STEVENS: To continue again:

I repeat here to-night without fear of proof to the contrary being produced on the floor of the house that there were no wholesale dismissals during the time we were in office. I do not deny there were a few dismissals where proof had been given to me that officials had so acted as to justify their dismissal.

Mr. VENIOT: I am being blamed for the same thing.

Mr. STEVENS: Hansard continues:

But I resent the attitude of my hon. friend. I have enough sense of humour to take a joke, but I certainly resent his trying to put me in his class, because I never was and never will be in his class as a politician.

There is more here, but I will not detain the house by reading further. The point is this: A man named Fraelick had the position of postmaster at Pleasantville for fifteen years, the latter part of which he was crippled and his daughter did the work.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. STEVENS: And he died about midsummer and she was replaced.

Mr. DUFF: By another cripple.

Mr. STEVENS: I hope my hon. friends are laughing at the joke and not at the cripple, because, after all, it is not a joking matter. I know the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysboro (Mr. Duff), even with his partisanship, is at least a pleasant, bluff, outspoken man, and all his sympathies would be with the cripple.

Mr. DUFF: They were both crippled.

Mr. STEVENS: A moment ago the minister was giving us quite a lecture about dismissals. There is no doubt that dismissals have been made. The hon. leader of the opposition mentioned this afternoon the principle which had been adopted by this house, and particularly by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden and I think by the present leaders on both sides of the house. It is this: After an election, if it can be shown that a public servant went out of his or her way in a partisan manner to take part in the election, he or she was subject to dismissal from office. That is to say, it is not a part of the duty of a public official to participate in a partisan manner in an election. That is the principle.

Mr. VENIOT: The Civil Service Act distinctly states that.

Mr. STEVENS: No one is questioning the minister about dismissals of that character. I have in my hand a return made on March 9, 1927—I am presuming, Mr. Chairman, that this return which was made to parliament is correct—moved for by the way, by our late member, Mr. Edwards. The return with the questions is as follows:

Subject: The names of the postmasters dismissed from office since the last federal election for political partisanship and in what counties the offices are situated.

That the proper officer do lay before this house a return showing:

1. The names of the postmasters dismissed from office since the last federal election for political partisanship, and in what counties the offices are situated.

2. The names of the postmasters removed from office at the request of:

(a) Liberal members of parliament;

(b) Liberal candidates defeated at the last election;

(c) Conservative members or defeated Conservative candidates;

(d) Progressive members or defeated Progressive candidates;

(e) Liberal-Progressive members or defeated Liberal-Progressive candidates;

(f) Members of other parties or defeated candidates of other parties.

The general answer to that is this, and I will repeat the question so that the answer can be attached:

Postmasters removed from office at the request of

(a) Liberal members of parliament.

Answer:

List attached.

I find a list of two sheets of foolscap with about seventy names.

Mr. POWER: Is that for the whole of Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: This was in March, 1927, dismissals since the election of 1926.

Mr. DUFF: I am not the only hero then?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The trouble is they are not quite so frank as my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: That is the difference.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to give my hon. friend credit for that frankness.

Mr. BENNETT: He can say: "I'm Alone."

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I'm alone.

Mr. STEVENS: The next is:

(b) Liberal candidates defeated at last election.

Under that heading I find a list of about seven.

(c) Conservative members or defeated Conservative candidates.

Answer:

None.

Mr. DUNNING: None of them ever asked for a dismissal, I suppose?

Mr. STEVENS:

(d) Progressive members or defeated Progressive candidates.

Answer:

None.

(e) Liberal-Progressive members or defeated Liberal-Progressive candidates.

Under that heading, I find a list of three.

(f) Members of other parties or defeated candidates of other parties.

Answer:

None.

That is the list. The names are given and it merely illustrates what I have said, namely, that many members taking advantage of that well known and well accepted principle, demanded that these should be dismissed for partisan purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: The seventy my hon. friend mentioned were not seventy members but seventy dismissals.

Mr. STEVENS: Seventy recommendations.

Mr. DUNNING: Is the number of members given?

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps if I mentioned the constituencies, they would be recognized. Somebody suggests that we might call the roll. The list is as follows:

Gaspe, Kent, Gaspe, Gloucester, Gloucester, Montmagny, Bonaventure, Lake St. John, Restigouche-Madawaska, Restigouche-Madawaska, Nipissing, Brome-Missisquoi, Restigouche-Madawaska, Bonaventure, Gaspe, Bonaventure, Kent, Gloucester, Gaspe, Gaspe, Gaspe.

This is one I am startled to see:

Weyburn, Dorchester, Montmagny, Northumberland, Gaspe, Gaspe, Gaspe, Gaspe, Gaspe.

It makes you gasp.

Gloucester, Timiskaming North Riding, Pontiac, Willow Bunch, Quebec-Montmorency, Nipissing, Bonaventure, Gaspe, Gaspe, Compton, Kent, Gaspe, Brome-Missisquoi, Charlevoix-Saguenay, Gaspe, Gaspe, Kent, Willow Bunch, Temiscouata, Charlevoix-Saguenay, Gaspe, Restigouche-Madawaska, L'Islet, Gaspe, Dorchester, Kent, Montmagny, Montmagny, Yamaska, Bellechasse, Kent, Restigouche-Madawaska, Gloucester, Gloucester, Gaspe, Willow Bunch, Megantic, Kent, Willow Bunch.

That is the list of seventy as I said.

Mr. DUNNING: About half a dozen constituencies in the whole of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister last year made certain statements. This is what he said as reported on page 3231 of Hansard:

Let me give the record from 1911 to 1917 and may I say to my hon. friend that I did not take any time during the dinner hour to prepare this; I had it already prepared. What do we find? We find that from the first of October, 1911, to the 31st December, 1912, they dismissed 908 postmasters. That is not degrading the service. We find that from the first January, 1913, to the 30th September, 1917, they dismissed 696 postmasters. These are the gentlemen who now say that the Postmaster General has degraded the Post Office department because, forsooth, in the last two years there have been 421 changes.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I have in my hand another return which is rather interesting. This is a return to an order of the house dated April 4, 1929, showing when and where the first rural mail route was established, number of rural mail routes established in each of the provinces, number of post offices closed in each province in each year in consequence of the establishment of the rural mail delivery, number of new post offices opened. In that return there are some very interesting figures. The minister has been twitting this side of the house with having wiped out a number of postmasters during our term of office. These are the facts. During the period of the Conservative regime, that is from 1911 to 1921—

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Union government?

Mr. STEVENS: That is including the Union government. There were established under Conservative governments and the Union government 3,339 rural routes in this country out of a total of 4,281. Let the house grasp the significance of these figures. Rural mail delivery was first introduced in 1908, and the following shows the number of routes established in each year:

Fiscal Year	Rural mail routes established
1908	36
1909	209
1910	155
1911	214
1912	296

That is the first year of the Conservative regime.

1913	1,021
1914	780
1915	634
1916	298
1917	145

Then they dropped off during the rest of the war period and they fell right off after that. During eleven years of Liberal administration there were 952 rural routes established as against 3,339 during the ten years of Conservative administration. The number of routes established under the Liberal regime from 1922 to 1929 are as follows:

Fiscal Year	Rural mail routes established
1922	12
1923	26
1924	27
1925	26
1926	23
1927	47
1928	141
1929	36

Following the other column of figures showing the post offices closed as a result of the establishment of these routes, we have the fact that during the Conservative period 3,339 rural routes were established, and 3,237 post offices were closed because of the establishment of rural routes. That is where the heavy closing of post offices and dismissals come in. Unquestionably, I am assuming from the general record that we have, there were dismissals for political partisanship just as we have them in this return and the committee ought to face the situation frankly and admit that, where partisanship is demonstrated, where public officers go out of their way to interfere in the politics of the locality, they do so at the risk of losing their positions, and as the minister very properly says, it is part of the law. But when we bring forward bona fide case after case where there has not been political partisanship, where the minister has not observed the law, do not let the minister charge us with having at some time in the past made dismissals. Furthermore, as my hon. friend from South Wellington very properly said a moment ago, the practice of dealing with public officers of Canada strictly on the spoils system as it was known in days gone by is now a thing of the past, and I think we ought to be glad of it. The spoils system was practised in the past on all sides of politics both here and in other countries, and to the south of the line it was notorious, and in a sense still is, but in this country in 1918 we passed the Civil Service Act. I well remember it, because I happened to be one of the members elected in 1911 on a pledge that I would bend every effort to assist in bringing in a Civil Service Act. In 1918 such an act was introduced after a great deal of study and thought by both sides of the house, and it was accepted by both sides of the house. My hon. friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has been most assiduous in his advocacy of the Civil Service Act. The only thing in recent years that has in any way impaired confidence in that act has been just such cases as we have had brought to our attention under the administration of the Post Office Department, which incite—shall I say?—among the followers of the government a desire to reintroduce political interference in these matters. We cannot blame a Liberal association, or a Conservative association, if the Conservative party were in power, in some part of the country for endeavouring to push forward their favourites. You cannot expect to stop that, but the minister has no right to give way to that pressure in violation of the Civil Service Act. That is what we are complaining about. We are not complaining that the minister has received letters or that members bother him; that is to be expected, but the minister can take refuge, as he ought to do, in the statute itself. Here is the Civil Service Act, chapter 22 of the revised statutes of 1927. It is an excellent piece of legislation, covering every conceivable matter in connection with this subject. Section 55 reads:

> No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the civil service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election, or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds.
> 2. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the civil service.

So there is no question about it, and if my hon. friends opposite find a Conservative postmaster or any other officer who has been appointed by a Conservative government in the past who has violated that section of the act, they can bring it to the attention of the Postmaster General or the other minister concerned, and it is then his duty to institute a proper inquiry, and to dismiss the official if the charge is proved. But there is this to say: Such a civil servant, whether he is here in Ottawa or elsewhere, is entitled under this law and under the accepted principle of the civil service of Canada to a hearing; he is entitled to an opportunity to defend himself. What we are complaining of is the disregard of this law.

My hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) yesterday intimated that this law ought to be abolished, and he invited us to join with him in abolishing it. We have no sympathy with that view at all, or at least I have not. It is not a question here whether the Civil Service Act is to be observed or not. It is the law and it must be observed until parliament takes the repeal of that act into consideration.

The minister has answered us altogether too frequently with the tu quoque argument. That is not enough.

Mr. VENIOT: You have not shown both sides of the question.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give one illustration of my point. A moment ago we were discussing the case of the Picton post office. The minister intimated that Mr. Way was appointed in 1905. He was undoubtedly a Liberal appointee because at that time the Civil Service Act was not in force at all. In 1911 the postmaster at Picton was dismissed. Mr. Way had been in that office then for about six years, and the Postmaster General says: You should have promoted him to the postmastership. He went on to say that inasmuch as the Conservatives did not promote him to the office in 1911, that justified him in refusing to promote him in 1929.

Mr. VENIOT: I said nothing of the kind. I gave a reason why I did not consider that he should be promoted, and that was not the reason.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister argued that at some length.

Mr. VENIOT: No. I merely pointed out that the Tory government at that time should have recognized Mr. Way, but they did not recognize him for promotion.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister used it as an argument in defence of his present position. What is the present position in that case? It is this: Mr. Way has now been in that office nearly twenty-four years. The minister's own officer gave him an excellent recommendation, pointing out that he was a fine appearing officer, well liked by the public and popular in the district, efficient in his work, of excellent character, and had served twenty-three years in the office. In the interim, in 1918, we passed the Civil Service Act, the act which does away with the old system of direct appointment upon the recommendation of a member or candidate or whoever has the patronage. Under the Civil Service Act the minister proceeded to call for applications for this office. He received two applications. One of them was from an individual whom he had put into the office temporarily. I am not going to pause to question whether he got the permission of the Civil Service Commission to do that or not; I take it for granted that he did.

Mr. VENIOT: No need of it.

Mr. STEVENS: He was put in at the minister's instigation at all events, and was in there for three months as a temporary employee, while Mr. Way had been there for twenty-three years.

Mr. VENIOT: Seven years under you.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will not surely charge me after that remark with a wrong interpretation of his previous argument.

Mr. VENIOT: That is only a statement of fact, and it does not please the hon. gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS: It pleases me immensely because if I was wrong for seven years the minister is three times wrong for twenty-one or twenty-four years. If that is the measure of the heinousness of the offence of the Conservative party, how deep is his offence? But the point I am making, and I am going to keep the minister to it, is that we are now controlled by a statute. The minister is controlled by this statute, and he defies it. He is obligated by his oath of office to observe this statute, which is a part of the statute law of Canada, but he persistently, time after time, in case after case and instance after instance defies this statute. The Civil Service Commission under this statute passed by parliament sends out notifications to the citizens of Canada on a set form—I have one in my hand—notifying applicants who have complied with the statute, made their applications, and have been examined under the statute, that they have been successful. The examiners have compared them with others and justified them for the appointment, and the Civil Service Commission has sent out certificates of appointment to these individuals. The minister steps in and says: I won't take them. We know the reason. The reason is that some political friend of the minister interferes. I do not blame the political friend. I do not blame the Liberal organization. You must expect it from them as well as from other political organizations. But I blame the minister for accepting, in defiance of the statute, the recommendation of any organization or any individual and reversing the action of the Civil Service Commission. In the Picton case it is aggravated. There is no excuse and there is no escape. In the Picton case the gentleman who was put in temporarily for three months and later appointed permanently was one of the individuals who brought charges against the postmaster. He was actively engaged in the election. I do not blame him for that. But the point is, it establishes beyond peradventure that he was appointed for his political services. In fact we have on the file a letter indicating that certain persons should be appointed, and they were appointed, because it was going to be of advantage to the Liberal party. That was the reason, and the sole reason—not the sole reason for the appointment, but the sole reason why the statutory decision of the Civil Service Commission was defied. Furthermore, the appointment of Mr. Way was strongly backed by an official report of an inspector of the post office. The minister cannot escape from these things. I think he has found some difficulty in finding in the long period I have been in parliament any recommendation from me in any way interfering with the administration of the Post Office Department.

Mr. VENIOT: I have not looked up the hon. gentleman's record.

Mr. STEVENS: I invite him to do it.

Mr. VENIOT: It might have been done verbally.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I rarely ever go there. I invite him to do that, not in any vainglorious way, but for this reason. From the moment I became a member of this house, and this is my twentieth session, I have assiduously stood by the principle of Civil Service Commission appointments. I will tell you why. I had six hundred civil servants in my riding in the earlier days when the whole of the patronage was in my hands, and I earnestly sought for civil service reform and appointment so that I could get away from the hopeless task of dealing with such a condition. As a matter of fact, we did not dismiss a soul in the Vancouver post office, with all its large staff. The minister will find recommendations from me for appointments during those years before the act was passed because in every instance they were referred to me, as such appointments were referred to every member; but not since the Civil Service Act came into force.

Now, I invite the minister, and I invite the government, seriously to consider this condition of affairs. The story is not half told. We have brought only a few cases forward. The minister has not yet faced this question seriously. He has treated it more or less as a joke. He has replied to us by saying: Oh, well, it was a disgrace to the public life of Canada the way the Conservatives acted. But the minister must remember that we are not dealing with the Conservative party of ten or twenty years ago, or with the Liberal party of ten or twenty years ago.

Mr. VENIOT: But what about the shadow government?

Mr. STEVENS: All right, I will deal with it.

Mr. VENIOT: You made dismissals then.

Mr. BENNETT: For partisanship. Reasons were given in every case.

Mr. VENIOT: You dismissed them during the election and gave them no chance to prove their innocence. What right have you to exercise political patronage and condemn me for doing so?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because those we dismissed were partisans.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I gave reasons in the Fraelick case.

Mr. VENIOT: In the Fraelick case the lady was not appointed at the time we had this telegram nor during the election. She remained in on the appointment made by the hon. gentleman who was then Postmaster General. She sent in her resignation because she was going to get married, but after her marriage she wished to continue. She remained in office under the name of her husband, recommended by William Duff.

Mr. STEVENS: He apparently had a sense of fairness.

Mr. BENNETT: No, conversion.

Mr. STEVENS: I am trying to point out to the minister that he certainly will not make much headway by his attitude of mind on this question. We are taking a very sound position and it will not do for the hon. minister simply to say that the Conservatives did so and so. Let me remind the minister of my little talk with him last night. He had cited seven or eight cases where soldiers were overlooked, and he asked us what we were doing. These were appointments made while he was Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: Not all.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, many of them since he or Mr. Murphy, his predecessor, has been in office.

Mr. VENIOT: Some twelve.

Mr. STEVENS: He said to us: What were you doing that you did not protect the interests of those soldiers? But what was he doing? Last night I asked him very frankly: Why did you not exercise your prerogative in regard to these cases after the Civil Service Commission had made its recommendation as you had done in the cases of Whittaker and Bowyer. Oh, he intimated to me —I will quote his words in a moment—he had very little to do with it, that the statute named the deputy minister. I said, yes, the statute names the deputy minister, but we know, and he knows, that the deputy minister does not act except on the authority of the minister. He sought to evade the question, and he did it quite skilfully. I have the little dialogue here. I am quoting from page 1666 of Hansard, dealing with the discussion last night:

Mr. Stevens: I understand that, under the act referred to by the minister sometime ago, the Postmaster General or, I think, technically the Deputy Postmaster General, has the right, after an appointment has been made by the Civil Service Commission, to reject the nominee and ask for a further consideration. In each of these cases cited by the Postmaster General in regard to returned soldiers during recent years, did the Postmaster General exercise his power under that section?

Mr. Veniot: I have no power under that section.

"I have no power under that section." The letter read to-night is a straight, unvarnished order to do it—a letter from himself to his deputy, instructing him to tell the Civil Service Commission that the appointment would not be accepted. But last night he said, "I have no power under that section." If under that section he had no power to deal with the cases of these returned soldiers, how did he get power to give instructions in the other case? The minister was not frank; he has not been frank with the house since he brought down his estimates. He is not playing the game.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I am playing it too much.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a very serious principle at stake in connection with the Civil Service Act, and it is this: certain persons secure appointment through competitive examination by the Civil Service Commission. Having passed the examination they are entitled to receive appointment, but there is a reservation, which has a distinct and definite meaning and intent. It appears, I think, in section 13 of the act, if I recall rightly, wherein the minister or the deputy minister is empowered, in the event of an appointee sent over by the Civil Service Commission being incompetent or unsuitable, to call for a second appointment from the commission. And why is that in the act? For this very simple reason. The Civil Service Commission makes its examination—I am not going to go into the details—on certain grounds, allocating certain marks for certain qualifications. There is a verbal examination and a written examination; there is an examination on educational qualifications, and there is an examination on technical qualifications. There is also an examination as to health, intelligence, suitability and so forth. All these things are factors, and it is possible that the commission might choose an individual who by temperament, or by some peculiar physical disability, or for some other reason, might be more or less an irritant in a department; that is to say, an impossible person from the standpoint of temperament. I know of such people myself, who could pass examinations, probably well. It is therefore provided in the statutes that in a case of that kind, an abnormal case, the minister may reject the appointee. But he may not do so for the purpose of appointing his own choice; he may not defeat the purpose of the act. He can ask the Civil Service Commission to make a second appointment. Now why does the minister persist in the course he has followed? Take the case referred to by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) to-night. A young lady tries the examination; she seeks to enter the civil service as a life work. She passes her examination, receives notice from the commission that she is appointed, resigns her present position, and goes and reports for duty as she is instructed to do by the government of Canada. Can we expect private citizens to understand not only all the intricacies of the statutes of the land, but all the idiosyncrascies of the minister? Can we expect it? Not very well. They act on good faith, believing that when they receive a document signed by a government official the Dominion government is behind that document. So this young lady resigned her job and reported for duty. They dilly-dallied for a month, and then she was coolly told that the Post Office department had not ratified her appointment. And in her place was put a young man, a boy in fact—under the civil service age by the way—who was the son of a very prominent supporter of my hon. friend; not that he is any the worse for that, but it is a rather significant coincidence. It is the same in case after case, incident after incident. The Civil Service Commission's recommendation is repudiated by the minister and a particular friend substituted.

Now the country asks the government, the country is expecting of parliament, a vindication of the Civil Service Act. That is what the country is asking for—a vindication of the act. And we intend, so far as we are concerned, to insist that the facts be brought out. I am inviting the government, as I did this afternoon and do again to-night—not the Postmaster General, because that I conceive to be hopeless, but I do invite the government as a whole—seriously to take this matter up. They can do it in conclave if they like, but let them take it up and tell the house whether or not the Civil Service Act is to be a joke, whether it is to be defied, or whether we are going to pay at least reasonable respect to its provisions. That is what we ask, and we claim that we are on sound ground. These cases that have been brought up have not been fairly answered; they have not been frankly met. The frankest thing we have had to-night is the outspoken declaration of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) who stated that he was for the spoils system, that he believed in it and was willing to fight for it, that he had made a recommendation—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear him say that.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he did, and I admire him for his frankness. I think he is to be commended on that score even though we cannot agree with him on the principle behind the declaration. I certainly think it was a refreshing change from the attitude of the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman has already spoken several times on this question and I have attempted to answer him and others. I have always thought that the hon. gentleman would at least give some proof of being fair when he is stating to the house what he calls facts. There are always two sides to the medal, two sides to every argument. When the hon. gentleman tried to excuse his friends for the very large number of dismissals they made in the first eighteen months they were in power, by saying that nearly all these were brought about by reason of the closing of post offices through the establishment of the rural route in the Dominion, he instanced the number of post offices that had been closed. On the other hand he did not tell the house—and I say that he should have been fair enough to do so—the number of new post offices that were opened each year and which in many cases, in some years, counter-balanced the closing of the old.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: The record is here and cannot be denied. Hon. gentlemen may say "oh, oh" as much as they like, but let me give an instance. Take for instance the opening of new post offices last year in the province of New Brunswick, from the members representing which I hear "oh, oh." Those established were 22 and those closed 21.

Mr. ERNST: What about 1912 and 1913?

Mr. VENIOT: In 1912 and 1913 the record will show around 300. The hon. member took the record from 1912 to 1921 and he gave the total. Let him give the yearly closings.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give them; I gave them once but I will give them again. These are for the fiscal year, I presume. The government return from which I am quoting says 1912, which means, I suppose, March 31, 1912. I will give first the rural routes established and secondly the post offices closed:

Year	Rural routes established	Post Offices closed
1912..	296	270

Mr. DUNNING: Those are purely closings consequent upon the establishment of rural routes. They are not all the closings.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. DUNNING: Those consequent on the establishment of routes.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Year	Rural routes established	Post Offices closed
1913..	1,021	872
1914..	780	820
1915..	634	522
1916..	298	310
1917..	145	134
1918..	64	189
1919..	55	67
1920..	22	37
1921..	24	16
1922..	12	19
1923..	26	26
1924..	27	24
1925..	26	35
1926..	23	33
1927..	47	70
1928..	141	99
1929..	36	..

The figure for those closed in this year is not given.

Mr. VENIOT: Thank you for the information. According to the figures my hon. friend has just given, about 1,300 offices were closed in 1912 and 1913 through the establishment of rural routes, but in the first eighteen months hon. gentlemen opposite were in power there were 1,604 dismissals.

Mr. STEVENS: If I might be permitted to interrupt the minister, will he give the exact dates? That is the only fair method of comparison.

Mr. VENIOT: It does not reach 1914.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will lump a few years together he will get fair comparison.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to argue with the hon. gentleman as to the exact month or hour these dismissals were made, but the record does show that hon. gentlemen opposite made 1,604 dismissals during the first eighteen months they were in power, and I defy the hon. gentleman to show that those dismissals occurred through the establishment of rural routes.

Mr. STEVENS: I would say about 70 per cent of them occurred in that way.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all; the dismissals were made simply because hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to put their friends into office. That is all I wish to say; I simply wanted to show the hon. gentleman that he did not give both sides of the story, because when he gave the number of offices closed he did not give the number of new offices opened in the same period.

Mr. ERNST: Then give them.

Mr. VENIOT: If you want the information, look for it; you are making the argument.

Mr. ERNST: The minister began by announcing that the new post offices opened exceeded the number closed in many years; apparently the figures do not suit his purpose at the moment, since he does not give them. I want to deal with one specific case to which the minister referred in order to justify his claim that patronage was practised by the so-called shadow government. He gave as an example a case which occurred in my county, the case also mentioned by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), the only dismissal of a postmaster in either Lunenburg or Queens county during the time the shadow government was in power. The facts of the case have been given in this house by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who was Postmaster General at the time, but perhaps I might repeat them. Mr. Fraelick, the father of Miss Fraelick, held the office for some fifteen years; during the latter part of his life he was a cripple and his daughter looked after the office. Immediately after Mr. Fraelick's death and almost before he was buried, I am informed that the office was transferred to Mr. A. L. Rafuse, who also is described as a cripple. I am not aware of his physical condition, but I do know that he is a merchant of some considerable standing in the district and did not need the post office in order to support himself, whereas the Fraelick family were dependent upon it. Further, a petition was presented signed by practically every resident of that district with the exception of Mr. Rafuse and his immediate relatives, asking that the office be given back to Miss Fraelick; that petition is in the department, but although the Postmaster General wants the record kept straight he has never tabled it in this house.

Mr. VENIOT: Was not the office given back?

Mr. ERNST: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: In my time?

Mr. ERNST: No.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. ERNST: No, it was transferred back by the hon. member for Fort William. That is just what my hon. friend complained about.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member is making a mistake. The records will show that the lady in question took charge of the office on her father's death and that in June of that year, before I was Postmaster General, an appointment was made. After that appointment was made, however, the Postmaster General in what we call the shadow government dismissed that appointee and appointed the lady.

Mr. ERNST: That is what I have stated.

Mr. VENIOT: The lady then retained the position and was not dismissed afterwards.

Mr. ERNST: No; who said she was?

Mr. VENIOT: The petition referred to by my hon. friend is on file, and on that petition, which came to me after I was sworn in as Postmaster General—

Mr. ERNST: It was there before that time.

Mr. VENIOT: It may have been, but I handled it. A request was received for the dismissal of the lady in question, and I took up the matter on this petition. This lady had resigned to marry but she wanted to go back and keep the office; the resignation had not been put into effect and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough recommended that this lady be allowed to remain in the position and no change was made.

Mr. ERNST: I have no dispute with the statement just made by the minister. I said that when the hon. member for Fort William was Postmaster General the office was taken from Mr. Rafuse and given to Miss Fraelick on the petition signed by every resident of the district except Mr. Rafuse and his immediate relatives. If the Postmaster General wants any further confirmation of the public attitude with respect to that matter, as to whether or not it was patronage in the ordinary sense of the term, he has only to look at the results of the elections of 1925 and 1926. In 1925, before the change was made, the present member for Antigonish-Guysborough received a substantial majority in that district; in 1926 the same people, indignant over the change in the post office, gave me a substantial majority. That is the most conclusive answer I can give my hon. friend as to whether the action was taken in the public interest.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SHORT: I would like to ask the Postmaster General to be good enough to-morrow to bring the file—the complete file—in connection with the dismissal of the postmaster at Waterford, Digby county, Nova Scotia, in order that we may discuss that matter then.

Mr. VENIOT: Very well.

M. ERNST: I would like to draw to the attention of the committee another dismissal, this time in the county of Queens. A gentleman by the name of Mr. M. A. Harlow, a man of advanced years who was postmaster in the village of North Brookfield in the county of Queens for nearly forty-five years and whose son was killed serving overseas, was dismissed from office. The file relating to his dismissal, or what purports to be the file, was brought down in conformity with an order of this house in 1928. I want to read that file to the committee in order to show just what caused the Postmaster General to dismiss this old servant of the crown who had held that office for so long, who had lost his boy, overseas, and who was depending in a large measure upon this position. I desire to read a letter written by the Postmaster General under date of December 13, 1926 and addressed to Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, at Ottawa:

My Dear Sir,

You will please make arrangements for the removal of the postmaster at North Brookfield, Queens County, N.S., and appoint in his stead Mr. Nelson Frank of that place.

Your very truly,
(Sgd.) P. J. Veniot.

That is the only reference made in this file to the cause of dismissal; the remainder of the file contains only the ordinary routine business of dismissal. There is absolutely no cause assigned in this case for the dismissal of this old servant of the crown. There is nothing to indicate on whose recommendation he was discharged; there is nothing to indicate what the cause or the reason was, and I know that a very strong political partisan, in fact the leading worker of the party to which the Postmaster General belongs, was appointed in his place. I would like to ask the minister if he is prepared to complete this file and to give the committee the information to which it is entitled. Obviously the file is not complete, and I desire to know whether the postmaster will undertake to bring down this information.

Mr. VENIOT: I will bring down the information if it is not on a private file. I have stated that before and I will go no farther. I have a right to adhere to that practice, because it has been the practice of the house not to produce any documents on the ministers' private files, which are marked "personal". I am not going to be driven to take that action in this case.

Mr. ERNST: I assume that it was upon the recommendation of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) that this dismissal took place, but can a member have a public servant of this country dismissed and have his letter treated as sacred by simply marking it "personal"? If that is the practice of the Post Office Department, there is something radically wrong. If a member wanted a particular action taken by any minister of the crown, all he would have to do would be to put "personal" across his letter and the minister could say, "This is on my private file and I will not produce it." That is the stand which has been taken by the Postmaster General. I ask the members of the house: When a public servant is dismissed should not the reason be given to the house; have we not the right to know? We are here representing the people. I am here representing the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg, and the people of my constituency want to know why this action was taken.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, as I have said before this evening, if this house desires to pass supply it can not be passed on that statement. We owe a duty to the public which is of far more importance. I hope the house realizes what is involved in this, and as it is near eleven o'clock the Postmaster General will have an opportunity before supply is next moved to consider whether or not a letter, upon which a public official is dismissed, can be marked "personal", and therefore not brought down to the house. That is the question at issue. Supply has been withheld in other countries for less reason than that, and I feel perfectly certain that on mature consideration the government will not take that position. Remember that governments do not endure forever, and it is establishing a precedent.

Mr. HEPBURN: The shadow government had its day.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say that there is one member who should be very thankful for that because it enabled him to become a member of this parliament for a short time.

If it were not so serious we would not take up the time of the house discussing the matter, but, as I say, governments do not last forever and our position to-day may be the position of my hon. friends opposite some other day. When the Postmaster General said that this principle was applied in the past, he was speaking of an entirely different matter. A personal letter written to a minister about a personal matter and placed upon his personal file is privileged, and this house has so ruled. But a letter marked "personal" which deals with the public business of Canada cannot be made personal merely by marking it so. That principle has been laid down by parliament from the first time the production of papers was called for, because parliament claims the right to redress grievances and it claims the right to know what the grievances are before supply is granted. The only time this matter can be placed before parliament is when supply is being sought. It would be an intolerable thing if all you had to do was to mark communications to a minister "personal" and know that they could not be brought down as part of the file. I do not think there is a minister in this country except the Postmaster General who would suggest that that be done. The rules to which he referred are rules which deal purely with personal communications. For instance, if I write a letter to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and say that I hope he is enjoying better health and I very much regret that he has been laid up for so long a period, his secretary, if he keeps it at all and does not send it to the waste paper basket, puts it upon the personal file and that is the end of it. But if I say to the minister in that letter, "I strongly recommend that John Smith be appointed a judge of the county court. He has qualifications of a very peculiar character and they should not be overlooked—"

An hon. MEMBER: And the man is appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think he would be appointed upon my recommendation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, yes, he would.

Mr. BENNETT: I know one hon. gentleman in this house who would not call that a personal communication in respect to that part of it, and that is my hon. friend the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DUNNING: He might write to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and point out that fact.

Mr. BENNETT: He would take that part of the letter which deals with public business and say, "I am not treating this as a personal matter." But when an official is actually removed from office upon the recommendation contained in a letter which may be marked "personal" and the Postmaster General says that that letter must be treated as private, he is going beyond any precedent which will be found in the records of this country. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough is not the only gentleman who has used such letters, and the evidence will be forthcoming when the session progresses. I think the Postmaster General might well reconsider his position, as I am sure the government would not expect supply to be granted unless that very ordinary request were granted.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 19, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Ninth report of select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

On the motion of Hon. Charles Marcil, the first report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament was concurred in.

TRANSFER OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend from St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) a few days ago asked for a return with respect to the return to the prairie provinces of the natural resources in so far as concerned correspondence with the province of New Brunswick in relation thereto. There were one or two letters that were written just about the time the return was brought down, and I understand that my hon. friend would like to have the return supplemented with these letters. I now table them.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Outside service — Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. VENIOT: I was asked yesterday for certain explanations and certain reports. I was asked by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy)—

Mr. SPENCER: If the hon. minister will allow me, the hon. member for Peace River asked me to let him know if the minister was going to bring down this information. He is engaged elsewhere at the moment, and perhaps the minister would give this information later.

Mr. VENIOT: Very well. There was also a letter written by the hon. member for Antigonish-Gusyborough (Mr. Duff) in connection with the Sarty's post office, and which was on my own personal file. I considered it personal and did not put it on the file that was brought down, but as it seems to be the desire of the committee that the letter should be on the file, I am now tabling it.

Mr. BENNETT: We required only that part of the letter which dealt with the post office.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, and I now table it. In connection with North Brookfield, it was claimed that a return tabled in 1928 was not complete, the only reference to the dismissal being a letter of instruction from the Postmaster General to the deputy. In this case also I am laying the complete file, including my own file, on the table.

In connection with the case brought up by the hon. member for New Westminster, I wish to read to the house my report on that case, and then to table the file. My report is as follows:

When Miss K. T. Mawson, the postmistress, requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place, in response to her request for a statement of the duties of the position it was stated that stenographic work took up about one-half of the daily period, the other half being occupied in assisting the regular employees in the different departments where required. The Civil Service Commission reviewed the duties of the position and decided that it should be changed from postal clerk to stenographer grade 2, on account of the fact that his general duties were stenographic. The postmaster, however, represented that there were certain duties which he would not care to require a female to perform. Subsequent to Miss K. T. Mawson's resignation in July, 1928, Mr. Harold Wade was taken on and was appointed to the permanent staff as stenographer grade 2, as from January 29, 1926. In April, 1928, Mr. Wade was promoted to postal clerk, and the commissioners were requested to furnish the name of a male stenographer to replace him. They were unable to do so, and gave authority for a local selection. In consequence Mr. S. W. Thomas was employed temporarily from September 1, 1928. Subsequently the commission held a competition for stenographers at New Westminster, and on September 28, 1928, they submitted the name of Miss Margaret Isabella Moore, one of the successful candidates, in connection with the filling of the position permanently. In view of the postmaster's representations, however, the services of Mr. Thomas were retained and Miss Moore was not offered employment. It is understood that the Civil Service Commission advised Miss Moore, in reply to her inquiry, that the reason she had not been accepted by the department was that a male stenographer was necessary.

That is the explanation given to me by the officials of my department. It was purely a departmental matter and did not come before the minister at all. I am now laying the file on the table so the hon. gentleman can examine it.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) asked for some information regarding Waterhole post office and Fairview post office. Here is the history of the case:

Waterhole is an old established office. It was opened on August 15, 1912. On January 29, 1928, Mr. David P. Smith, returned soldier, was appointed postmaster. Mr. Smith is still postmaster at Waterhole. Prior to Mr. Smith being appointed Mr. H. Sigler was acting postmaster. Mr. Sigler was applicant for the postmastership at Waterhole, and asked that if he were not successful in the appointment there he be considered as an applicant for the position of postmaster at Fairview.

Fairview post office. In 1920 authority was given for the opening of a new post office at Fairview, 4½ miles from Waterhole. In submitting the application for the new office the district superintendent stated that there were two applicants, namely, Mr. Sigler and Mr. Levesque. In the first instance authority was given for the opening of the office at Fairview under the postmastership of Mr. Lesveque. In September the Postmaster General suspended action as he understood that Levesque was a non-resident. In November, 1928, the office was opened in charge of Mr. Sigler, who had been the former acting postmaster at Waterhole. Mr. Smith, the postmaster at Waterhole, inquired in regard to the possibility of his getting the appointment at Fairview, presumably on account of the increase in business at Waterhole, many of the residents having left for Fairview. Both offices are in operation at the present time. Mr. Smith is postmaster at Waterhole, and Mr. Sigler is the postmaster at Fairview. Up to the present time the postmaster at Fairview, Mr. Sigler, has been paid a salary of $100 a year. The postmaster at Waterhole, Mr. Smith, is still paid at the rate of approximately $1,000 a year.

The revenue of the Fairview post office from November 1, 1928, to the end of March, 1929, is $986. The revenue of the Waterhole office for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, is $1,423. The salaries will be adjusted on the above revenue bases at April 1, 1929.

Now, if the hon. gentleman wishes a copy—

Mr. KENNEDY: I have a copy here. But my contention, Mr. Chairman, is that Smith was appointed to the Waterhole office by the Civil Service Commission. He is a returned soldier. All that exists at Waterhole to-day is the post office, a part of one of the three or four stores that were originally there, and a bunch of yawning cellars, the buildings having been moved to Fairview. The bank has also been transferred to Fairview. In a word, there is practically nothing left at Waterhole. The reason that Waterhole in the past was a revenue office was due to the fact of its being the centre of the district so far as general business was concerned; but for the future the Waterhole post office cannot be anything else than merely a small country office for delivering mail. There is no question about that, because all business must go to Fairview, with its two banks, the only place where it can be transacted. In the very nature of things the Waterhole office must be attached to a store or given to someone who does not have to devote his full time to it. The civil service appointee is left there where he cannot make a living as postmaster under the natural order of things, as is well known to the post office superintendent of the district and to anyone else familiar with the circumstances.

My contention is that when the town and the business was moved to Fairview, the appointed postmaster should have been moved there as well, with his office. It is purely a case of appointing a man through the minister—a political appointment, if you like—and leaving the other man, appointed by the Civil Service Commission, at Waterhole, in a job that is bound to run out as far as he is concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: He is left in the hole.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, he will be in the hole all right. This office at Fairview has a peculiar record. I find on the file a letter from Mr. Levesque to the Postmaster General which reads as follows:

June 19, 1928.

In view of the fact that the Alberta government is extending the Central Canada railway fifteen miles west of the present terminus at Whitelaw to a townsite, which at present appears will be called Fairview, I wish to submit my name as desirous of obtaining the post office at the new town, whatever name is selected.

As the contract for the completion of the extension calls for early fall, I trust you can see your way clear to accept this as my application for the post office.

In support of this application I am taking the liberty of referring you to the Hon. Mr. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior.

Yours very truly,

J. D. Levesque.

On August 13 the district superintendent at Edmonton made two recommendations with regard to the appointment of a postmaster at Fairview. The first in order of merit was Henry Sigler, Fairview, the second J. D. Levesque, Peace River. He states in this report that the revenues of the office at Waterhole will be affected adversely by the establishment of the new office. On August 25, 1928, we have this memorandum for the Deputy Postmaster General:

Re Fairview. Establish office and appoint Levesque.

In spite of the fact that he was second on the list. Now there is nothing to indicate what has happened, but I understand Mr. Levesque was a non-resident so far as Fairview was concerned. There was a general and vigorous protest against this appointment by, I believe, the Canadian Legion, and as the minister has said, we have instructions issued by himself to suspend action. Very little was done for some months with regard to the opening of the office, and while the town of Waterhole was being moved to the new site of Fairview a number of people who had become residents of Fairview and who had previously been resident in Waterhole, wrote to the Postmaster General asking for the establishment of a post office. I wired the Postmaster General, and I think I made it perfectly clear that it was necessary to establish a new office; and it was also made clear that some change would be required with regard to the revenues of the post office at Waterhole. The following telegram was despatched, dated November 14, Fairview, Alberta, addressed to P. J. Veniot, Postmaster General, Ottawa, Ontario:

Waterhole village moved during last month five miles northeast to Fairview, Alberta. New town end of steel, E.D. & B.C. railway. Fairview has six elevators, two banks, six stores, no post office as yet. Post office should be established immediately.

(Sgd.) D. M. Kennedy.

Prior to this Mr. Smith, who was Postmaster at Waterhole, realizing what would happen when the town was being moved, wrote as follows:

Waterhole, Alberta,
September 24, 1928.

Postmastar General,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

I wish to know if I could be transferred from Waterhole post office to the new post office at Fairview. If not, I wish to apply for the Fairview appointment. What salary would the postmaster at Fairview receive the first year? My reasons for the transfer are: There will be a school in Fairview, the nearest school to Waterhole is 1½ miles distance, also the salary for the Waterhole appointment in the near future, I have heard, will be decreased.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) D. P. Smith,
Postmaster, Waterhole.

On November 17 we have the following memorandum from the Postmaster General to the Deputy Postmaster General:

Re new post office at Fairview, Alberta

Referring to memorandum September 8, you are hereby instructed to proceed immediately with the establishment of an office at Fairview. Mr. Henry Sigler, who is given first place in the district superintendent's report, of the 13th August, is to be placed in charge as postmaster.

This is rather a peculiar statement. Mr. Henry Sigler, it is said, is to be appointed postmaster because he is given first place by the district superintendent, but he was given first place before when Mr. Levesque was appointed. The report giving Mr. Sigler first place over Mr. Levesque was in the hands of the Postmaster General before he appointed Mr. Levesque. Then we have a wire to Mr. Leger, district superintendent of postal service, Edmonton, Alberta, under date of Ottawa, November 17, as follows:

Re Fairview. Take immediate steps to open office with Henry Sigler as postmaster.

(Sgd.) E. J. Underwood.

On November 21, 1928, Mr. Smith wrote to the Postmaster General as follows:

Waterhole Post Office, Alberta.
November 21, 1928.

The Postmaster General.

Dear Sir:

In connection with the appointment for Fairview post office, I wish to know if Mr. Sigler has been appointed temporary postmaster, and if there is a chance of myself getting the appointment. If not, I would like to know how this office stands, will it be closed in the near future and salary decreased meantime.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) D. P. Smith, P.M.,
Waterhole, Alberta.

On November 29, 1928, we have the following letter from E. J. Underwood to D. P. Smith, in reply to the letter I have just read:

D. P. Smith, Esq.,
Postmaster,
Waterhole, Alberta.

Dear Sir:

In reply to your communication of the 27th November, regarding the opening of the post office at Fairview, permit me to inform you that there is no vacancy at that point as Mr. Henry Sigler was placed in charge as regular postmaster.

As regards the status of Waterhole, I may state that it will depend on the amount of patronage given it in the future. It is observed that it is over four miles from the townsite of Fairview and the question as to whether it will be maintained or not will depend on its revenue. The same applies to the salary attached to this office, which will be revised at the end of the present fiscal year and after the Fairview post office has been in operation for some months.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) E. J. Underwood,
Chief Superintendent of Post Office Service.

And then we have some correspondence between the Postmaster General and Mr. Reilly, who is good enough to ask Mr. Smith whether he would resign his job at Waterhole in order that he might be transferred to Fairview—just about five hours before Reilly went to Fairview and appoint Mr. Sigler as postmaster there.

Now my point is that this returned soldier, who was appointed by the Civil Service Commission to the office in that district, should have been given the new office, which is and must be an important office, the others being merely subsidiaries. There was no misunderstanding so far as the department was concerned; it was understood in Ottawa as well as in Edmonton what was happening. In the first place Mr. Levesque was appointed on the recommendation of somebody whose letter is in the Postmaster General's file but is not produced in this file. Mr. Sigler had been recommended by the district superintendent at Edmonton first in order of merit and Mr. Levesque second, and after Mr. Levesque's appointment had to be cancelled Mr. Sigler months later was appointed on the direct recommendation of the Postmaster General.

How can we expect a department the size of the Post office department to be efficiently administered and to be kept up to date if we are going to have the man at the head of the department taking charge of the details of appointments, political and otherwise, in the various small post offices throughout the Dominion? You might as well have Sir Henry Thornton going out west appointing section foremen. The Postmaster General has simply been playing politics in this instance, and anyone who is going to take up his time playing politics in this way cannot in my judgment pay proper attention to the big affairs in connection with his department. In addition to that we have a direct case of discrimination in actual fact against a returned soldier in favour of political appointees, and that is the reason why I speak on this occasion.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot see how it is possible that the hon. member (Mr. Kennedy) can say that there is any discrimination. In the first place, it was at an early date that the present postmaster at the first-named office, Waterhole, was appointed and accepted the position under the Civil Service Commission. For the same reason that I cancelled the appointment of Mr. Levesque at Fairview, because of his not being a resident, the Civil Service Commission would cancel the appointment of Mr. Smith to Fairview; because under the act no returned soldier nor anyone else can be considered who is not a resident of the place. That being the case—

Mr. KENNEDY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman when he was speaking and surely he will accord me the courtesy of listening to what I have to say. There has been a little too much of this jumping up and interrupting the minister when he is endeavouring to make explanations. Surely the hon. gentleman who stands so firmly by the Civil Service Commission would not want me to undertake to violate the law; although no doubt he feels I should have done so in this case, surely he would not encourage me to do so. I had no option in the matter; there was only one thing to do and that was to appoint a postmaster to the position at Fairview, which was done. That is the only explanation I can give; there was no question of discrimination in my mind. The hon. gentleman has quite often referred to my discriminating against returned soldiers, and I feel the time has come when perhaps he might be told that my record with regard to returned soldiers from the beginning of the war to the present day is at least equal to if not better than his own.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would like to correct the Postmaster General; I did not make a general statement with regard to returned soldiers but I did make a statement with regard to this returned soldier.

Mr. VENIOT: We know what your intentions were, anyway.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to draw the attention of the minister—

Mr. VENIOT: Would my hon. friend allow me to complete the returns I am to table? I was asked for a return having to do with the Waterford, Nova Scotia, post office, which I now submit to the house. I was also asked to complete the file in connection with the Conquerall Banks post office by adding certain letters which were on my own file. I am submitting herewith the additional letters; I think they are all from Mr. Duff and since he asked yesterday that they be submitted I have no hesitation in doing so.

Mr. GOTT: Are all the files in the department dissected?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think I need answer that remark. Now I wish to submit another return in connection with the Uffington post office, and in doing so I wish to apologize to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) because of certain figures I stated to the committee yesterday. This correction does not take away from the seriousness of the occurrences at that post office, but in revising the file which came from the finance branch of the department I find that instead of a shortage of $142 in 1926 the actual shortage was $24.43. However, that irregularity was continued later on and in 1928 a further irregularity was shown by an inspection on June 7, so with that explanation I am submitting the remainder of the file. Hon. members must remember that there are three different files in the department covering each of these matters, which may account for some of the files which have been submitted to the house not being complete. Then the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) requested information with regard to the postmastership at St. Davids, Ontario. When I left the department to come here that report was not ready, but they were working on it and if it comes in during the afternoon I will table it.

Mr. CLARK: The minister promised to bring a file for me, or to complete the file with reference to Sutton, Quebec.

Mr. VENIOT: When I left the office they were bringing the correspondence up to date; I may have it this afternoon.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister state whether or not a postmaster has been appointed at Sutton?

Mr. VENIOT: I could not say from memory. I have something here with regard to St. Davids, which just came in, and which I will table. Mr. E. D. Lowry was suspended and resigned on November 18, 1927; a Civil Service Commission certificate was issued in favour of A. E. Woodruff; the certificate was accepted and he was placed in charge on March 1, 1928. As soon as the file with regard to Sutton comes in I will give it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Could the minister tell me how many postal workers there are in Canada? I see the term used freely and I understand that it includes letter carriers in the cities. How many letter carriers are there and how many postal workers?

Mr. VENIOT: I will secure the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to page 791 of Hansard for 1928, where the following question appears:

Dismissal of Postmasters

Mr. Brady:

1. How many postmasters were dismissed throughout Canada from October 1, 1926, to February 1, 1928?

2. During above period, how many of those postmasters were dismissed in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Veniot:

1. 421.

2. British Columbia	7
Alberta	9
Saskatchewan	34
Manitoba	11
Ontario	32
Quebec	122
Nova Scotia	106
New Brunswick	99

Mr. Chairman, that is a period of exactly sixteen months, and not two years as the Postmaster General has stated. Upon figuring that out I find there is an average of twenty-six dismissals for each month; in other words, one postmaster was dismissed for every working day during a period of sixteen months. Apparently the Postmaster General thinks that the day is lost when he does not dismiss a postmaster. I would like the Postmaster General to furnish information as to how many of these dismissed postmasters were appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

I would like to refer to a question which I asked on March 18, 1929, as follows:

Post Office Department—Civil Service Recommendations

Mr. Stewart (Leeds):

What is the total number of cases in which the present Postmaster General, his deputy or his department, or either of them, have rejected or refused to accept the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission as to appointments?

Mr. Veniot: 32.

I would ask the Postmaster General to bring down the file referring to each of those thirty-two cases. We have only had two or three so far, and as this is a very important matter we would like to have, and I think we are entitled to have, all these files.

The Postmaster General has suggested that I am ignorant. I have endeavoured to obtain some information from the document from which he read and which he said was in the file, and upon which his remark was based. I asked the minister to table the document from which he was reading, and he did so. I now show that document to the house. The house can see that it is one sheet of foolscap paper filled in with long-hand writing, apparently copied by the Postmaster General or someone in his office. It simply contains a copy of Section 13 of the Civil Service Act, 1918, and what is said to be the ruling of the Department of Justice made on December 9th, 1919. I asked the minister yesterday if he would give the house the correspondence which resulted in the ruling referred to here. It is perfectly clear that it did not come from the Department of Justice in that form, and we would like to know from which department the request for this ruling came. If this information were furnished I could be enlightened on this ruling, and then he would not be able to reproach me in the future with being ignorant.

Mr. VENIOT: I told the hon. gentleman last evening that I would have the correspondence looked up, and I am endeavouring to find it.

Mr. GOTT: It may come in two parts like the return I got.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I want the correspondence from the Department of Justice; the letter accompanying this ruling.

Mr. VENIOT: The Department of Justice will have to provide their own correspondence; I will provide anything that is in my department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The minister gave the house to believe that he had the correspondence from the Department of Justice.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not do anything of the kind. I read the ruling of the Department of Justice as I found it, and which ruling I know is correct. I read it to the house and I was asked to put it on the table, which I did. I did not say that it was from the Department of Justice, I simply said that it was the ruling made by that department in 1919. I read the ruling and then a point of order was raised that, having read from the paper, I should put it on the table. I placed the very paper I had in my hand upon the table of the house.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Postmaster General left the impression that he was reading from the actual ruling of the Department of Justice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not fair.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. minister says that is not fair, but will he dispute that that is not the ruling?

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing to show that it is the ruling.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. members know it is.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know it, and I would like the information.

Mr. BOYS: Will the Postmaster General inform the committee at whose instance the ruling was made, and to whom the ruling was sent? If it was sent to his department one would imagine that it would be on one of the files. There is a little controversy over this matter and we should have it cleared up.

Mr. VENIOT: I said I would do that, and I cannot do any more.

Mr. BOYS: Does the Postmaster General know whether or not the ruling was asked for by his department? If he does not know that, then let the information be obtained.

Mr. VENIOT: I know the Civil Service Commission published their certificate stating the ruling of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BOYS: I am not disputing that at all; that is not the issue before the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: I have promised to get the correspondence and will endeavour to find out how the ruling was asked for.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister say at the moment whether or not—

Mr. VENIOT: No, I cannot.

Mr. BOYS: If the minister would permit me to finish he would have a better opportunity to answer it intelligently. Does the minister know whether his department asked for the ruling, and whether the ruling was addressed to his department?

Mr. VENIOT: It was made in 1919.

Mr. BOYS: That is not an answer to my question. I do not care whether it was made in 1919 or 1921; was it made at the request of the minister's department, and was the ruling given to his department?

Mr. VENIOT: I think it was, but I will find out and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. STEVENS: What we want is the ruling itself.

Mr. VENIOT: It was made in 1919.

Mr. DUNNING: As it applies to all departments, what difference does it make?

Mr. VENIOT: I really believe the Civil Service Commission asked for it.

Mr. GEARY: Is the hon. Postmaster General speaking to the house or is he just gossiping?

Mr. VENIOT: A little louder, please, so I may be able to enjoy the laugh too.

Mr. GEARY: I can tell whether the hon. minister is addressing the house by his standing up or sitting down.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is a good sportsman and I think he will agree that the Postmaster General has been more than generous in answering all sorts of interjections from hon. members opposite. They did not show him the courtesy of always rising in their places, and as a matter of good sportsmanship I feel the hon. member does not desire to convey the impression that the minister is mumbling his answers.

Mr. GEARY: If my remark has annoyed the Postmaster General or the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), I shall have great pleasure in setting their minds at rest. I do not intend to hurt them any more than I can help.

During the debate yesterday the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson), reviewed the series of remarkable events which had occurred in connection with the Picton post office. The Postmaster General attempted to reply to the remarks of the hon. member, and I would like to quote part of that reply which appears on page 1705 of Hansard. The minister said:

> I am charged with refusing to appoint Mr. Way because, first, he was a soldier; it is said I should not have refused him.

> The second charge is that I should not have refused the certificate in his favour because of his experience as assistant postmaster. Let me point out that, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, Mr. Way was assistant postmaster for twenty-three long years.

This is the argument that the Postmaster General advances against what was set up by the hon. member for Victoria:

> Will the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson) explain to the committee how it is that in 1912, when Mr. Petit was put out for political interference, Mr. Way was not then promoted by the Conservative party. Why was he not recognized?
> Mr. Stinson: He was a much younger man.
> Mr. Veniot: He had then been in the service seven years.

Of course the Postmaster General had not the facts in his mind when he referred to the matter, because Mr. Way at that time had been in the office for six years. He was a young fellow of twenty-two years of age, and he was not recommended, nor does the record show that he even applied for the position. As a matter of fact, he was advanced, as far as one could expect him to be advanced at that time, to the position of assistant postmaster at Picton.

But even supposing that was not the case, I wish to draw the attention of the committee to one feature of the answer of the Postmaster General to charges of great importance that have been levelled against him in the house. His answer was to refer back ten, twelve, fifteen years to what some other party did when it was in power. Even, for the sake of argument, accepting his contention to its fullest extent, I ask hon. members: Does it put this government right that a preceding government did wrong? The Postmaster General's contention is that he is right in this case because a preceding government did the same thing. If a preceding government did something that was wrong, as I suppose most hon. members on the opposite side are prepared to accede to, then my hon. friend's contention gets him nowhere. His argument means only that the Postmaster General adopts revenge as his guiding motive in making appointments to postmasterships. As the cases that have been brought up have shown, the Postmaster General has been guided by one principle, and one only, not that of getting the best man for the position, not that of serving the public in the most efficient manner possible, but—and he glories in it—that to the victor belong the spoils and that the post office is fair game for patronage. That will have its reflection at some future date in the minds of the people of Canada. The Postmaster General smiles at that remark. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough very frankly admits that that is his proposal. Let me say that from this side of the house we have watched hon. members opposite during the discussion, and while the faces of many of them, as the details were brought out, showed the shame they felt at the position in which the Postmaster General had put them, still they apparently decided to applaud his action, and hon. members opposite must assume the full burden of acquiescing in and supporting these actions of the Postmaster General and the government.

The Postmaster General may smile, but I feel that this matter is one of very serious import. I shall be very much surprised if we do not find that the fire that has been lighted here to-day will blaze throughout the whole of Canada, not only in Conservative quarters but even in those normally supporting the government. My hon. friends may well take it to heart whether they should not join in some condemnation of the way in which this department has been managed, because they will hear about it when they go back to their constituencies. The people of Canada will not stand for manipulation, for political purposes, of the offices of this country in a service on which they depend day by day. I have some sympathy with the position of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough; he is frank; he says plainly: What are these offices for? Surely they are to be awarded to the people who support us. He can conceive of nothing else. That is his idea of politics, and he is frank enough to admit it. When I listen to the hon. member, the words of Byron come into my mind:

> He was the mildest manner'd man
> That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat.

For him I have a certain amount of grudging admiration because of his frankness, but not for members of the government who sit quietly in their places, because, unless they object actively and conscientiously, they must take some of the burden that the Postmaster General is loading on to the shoulders of the government and of his party at the present moment.

This file which I have in my hand narrates the story of the Picton post office. I shall go through it, not too tediously, I hope, but with sufficient thoroughness to impress certain points upon the minds of hon. members. Let me say in advance—and I think I can support my statement by what I shall show later—that the whole matter will develop simply and solely into a shameful plot to seek an opening with which to reward a partisan helper of the Liberal party. From beginning to end, involved as it may be, it is simple to find the thread. It had its inception in the desire to reward a party worker, and it was carried through ruthlessly and without regard to any of the amenities of life in this country. It was carried through without sportsmanship, and I thank the Minister of Railways for that word. It was carried through in a way that reflects discredit on this government and on the country. I will ask the minister if he will give me a little help in regard to the file. I do so because the information in files we have received has not been complete and I think this one is in no less a state of incompleteness than some of the others. The file begins with four affidavits upon which presumably was founded the procedure, first, to oust the postmaster, and, second, to place a friend in the position thus made vacant. The affidavits are by Edward Sprague, Robert Purtelle, Hiram Ellis and Durward Cole. The first letter that we have is from the Postmaster General to his deputy, Mr. Gaboury, under date of April 1, enclosing four affidavits. Two or three of these deal with the political activities of the postmaster himself. It reads:

> I desire to have an investigation held, first, into the political activities of this official.

That is the postmaster.

> You can leave the charge of allowing gambling in the office for a later date.

I suppose if they could not get rid of him on the ground of partisanship, they would have a second string to their bow, and bring the man once more before a committee.

> You will have the investigator call upon Mr. Robert Purtelle, John Edward Sprague and Durward Cole as witnesses and they will also provide further witnesses for the investigation.

It is quite plain, from reading that, that there was other correspondence. These four affidavits did not find their way into the possession of the Postmaster General without some correspondence, because in the affidavits there is no mention of the fact that these men headed by Mr. Purtelle would present further evidence. Therefore, on its face, the file, if it was a complete file originally, bears evidence of mutilation, and if it was not a complete file originally, it bears evidence of some negligence, almost criminal, in its preparation. I should be glad if the Postmaster General would take note of that, because I should like to see the letter Mr. Purtelle wrote. I judge it was he who came and saw the Postmaster General and put up the scheme to him, or who wrote a letter which the Postmaster General, according to his custom and practice, has put away in some personal file. I should like to know what Purtelle said, because he is the man who ultimately got the postmastership. He is the man who put up the whole plant—I call it that deliberately—and he was the active organizer for the Liberal candidate in the last election.

I call attention to this man Purtelle, now in the dignified position of postmaster of the thriving town of Picton. Mr. Purtelle sent an affidavit to the Postmaster General, which the Postmaster General evidently thought enough of to forward to his official as part of the basis of an investigation to be held. This affidavit was read yesterday, but it is too good to leave unread again. Purtelle solemnly declared:

> I heard Mr. Alexander McKee tell Mr. J. H. Roberts, Inspector of Postal Service, on December the 27th, 1926, that he (Mr. McKee) was in Picton post office on an election day and he (Mr. McKee) saw Samuel Smith, the postmaster instructing an elector how and where to mark his ballot and directing him to the polling booth to register his vote.

Everyone in this house knows this much about the rules of evidence, that hearsay, to begin with is not supposed to be good evidence because you do not get direct to the man himself who is concerned, but hearsay of hearsay is pushing to an absurdity the taking of evidence and cannot be relied upon in any degree whatsoever. I want to compare what Purtelle swears to in that direct declaration with what was sworn to by McKee when face to face with the investigator. All he swore to in that investigation is that he resides at Picton and saw Mr. Smith during the campaign tell a man where to vote.

Mr. STEVENS: Why shouldn't he?

Mr. GEARY: Certainly, it would be the duty of any decent man to help another man out. But Purtelle stretched that simple act to look like an incrimination of the postmaster telling an elector to vote Grit or Tory, or some other ticket, for I do not know what Mr. Raney was running for then.

There are two branches to the case, as I said. First of all, they had to get rid of Smith, who had been there for years. He had given offence to nobody, and was well thought of. There was no possible way of getting him unless "a plant" were framed. Purtelle wanted the job. He had worked for the Liberal party, and this was the reward he wanted to get. He found the Postmaster General perfectly agreeable to entering into the scheme with him, and this scheme was concoted by which affidavits would be forwarded and so sent on for an investigator to look at, and something might come of it. I am not going to go through the evidence. Plouffe, a gentleman in Sudbury, a political friend of the government, was told to go down to Picton and make an investigation. But he did not do so for months. He knew well what was expected of him. Finding it difficult through Mr. Purtelle's agency to get a place to hold the investigation, finally he suggested that he go down to Picton and go around to witness after witness and get evidence from them and call that an investigation; but Purtelle was wiser. He knew there would be an awful row, and that the postmaster would say that he should have an opportunity of listening to the evidence and putting questions to the witnesses if he so desired. So Plouffe came down and made the investigation. The evidence is available for any member to read. It is of the flimsiest possible character, but if the evidence was flimsy, the finding was still more flimsy. I would not have thought that any man who has anything of the judicial in his make-up at all, who has anything in his make-up that inclines him to see fairness to the under-dog, would have bothered with the evidence for five minutes. He would have cast it aside and said, "I cannot get him on that; there is nothing in that finding; I will try and get him in some other way." But not so with the Postmaster General. I do not know whether the Postmaster General read the evidence and the finding or not. Mr. Plouffe had a great deal of trouble finding what was wanted, and that was some act of partisanship on the part of the postmaster. Everybody knew that that was what was wanted. The Postmaster General knew that that was what was wanted. Plouffe knew it, and Purtelle was urging him on.

The finding is simply this. Hiram Ellis, one of the witnesses, said that he saw a man gambling for money with dice in the post office, but that was not the ground on which action was taken later, so I do not need to take up the time of the committee with that. Cole said that a certain room in the post office to which the mail couriers had access resembled a Tory committee room. He was a pretty solid Grit, and how he knew what a Tory committee room looked like I do not know, but he probably had some conversation with somebody in the mail sorting room in which the question of politics came up. It was an isolated case, as appears from the evidence. The postmaster said that he knew nothing of this. He had heard that there was some throwing of dice in the room, which he stopped, and he had heard nothing further about it, and believed that that was the end of it. Plouffe says that if the postmaster did not know all these things, he had at least constructive knowledge, as it was his duty as postmaster to exercise careful supervision. I would like hon. members to bear in mind that this finding is directed purely and solely against the postmaster. There was no indication that anyone else in the post office was concerned in the slightest way as having any responsibility for these things. Later on the importance of that will be apparent, but there is nothing in that biassed finding that indicates that any other official of the post office had any knowledge of the practices that were alleged to be going on.

A very amusing part, if you can find amusement in a tragedy, is the finding of this man Plouffe. But before I touch that, let me say that certain circulars came into the post office every day during the campaign, tied together in a bundle, with a label on, for rural free delivery. On that label were stamps affixed, and what the postmaster in that office did, and it was a very good practice, I suppose, was simply to hand the bundle to the courier on the route, and the courier delivered them to the boxes along the route or took them to another post office from where they would be delivered. All that was done in the Picton post office was to take these bundles of circulars, tied together and labelled and hand them to the courier. There was no dispute about that at all. There was evidence that sometimes these circulars did not arrive when they should have arrived if posted at the hour certain men alleged they were posted. But how uncertain that is is shown by the affidavit of a man who said that he had posted them in the forenoon, and by the evidence of another man, who was a leader in that part of the conspiracy, who said he had posted them in the afternoon, and because these circulars did not get to the rural boxes next day before 3.30 the Picton postmaster is alleged to have held them up in the post office. Hon. members from the rural districts know well that these circulars may have passed through three or four different offices. In this particular case they passed through the Wellington post office, the Milford post office, the Picton post office, and then to the courier, and the Postmaster General must have known, if he had any desire to be fair, that if there was any delay—delay was not proven anyway—that delay might have occurred at the Wellington post office or at Milford or along the route. The evidence of the postmaster was that these circulars left his post office promptly on time. Plouffe says in his report:

> The mail always came regularly to the boxholders, except during the electoral campaigns aforesaid. The majority of the witnesses making complaints were known to be active partisans for the Liberal side.

If the postmaster at Picton wanted to be dishonest, why would he hold up circulars going to Liberals who had always voted Liberal and would vote Liberal anyway? What harm or what good would it do for him to hold them up? Surely he would not be ass enough to do a thing like that. Now I read the reason for the finding of partisanship:

> I infer from the evidence that the delay or non-receipt of the mail was caused by either one of the postmasters at Picton, Wellington or Milford, and I suspect that a great number of these irregularities originated at Picton.

Now, that is his finding. Mr. Chairman, you would not hang a dog on evidence like that. No man with the slightest sporting instinct or the least sense of fair play would deprive a man of his livelihood on evidence even ten times as strong as this flimsy finding. It is the flimsiest, slightest excuse for the exercise of political patronage that has ever come to my notice, and the Postmaster General should be thoroughly ashamed of himself and the government associated with him should repudiate the whole thing and reprimand the Postmaster General for his inexcusable action in the matter. It is incredible that this state of affairs should be allowed to continue in this country. Party politics? Of course. Political patronage? Of course. People believe in it to some extent. I saw my hon. friend from Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) and my hon. friend from Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and, I am sorry to say, my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Gray) applauding a statement made on this side that the Postmaster General thought it a day wasted when he did not fire a postmaster. That is their idea of "one good deed a day." They are the sort of boy scouts who are supporting the government.

I do not want to delay the committee longer than to say that to clear the way for appointing a friend this shameful deed was done and Smith, a postmaster of seventeen or eighteen years' standing, who had given entire satisfaction, was ruthlessly thrust out of the way. For what purpose? Purtelle is still unprovided for. He started this business and has done his best, a mighty small best, but still they have him there and must get him into the office. So they advertise. In the ordinary course of events the department sent out its investigator to examine the applicants. He rated them numerically, first, second and third. Number 1 was a man named Way, who had been in that post office for twenty-three years; number 2 was Purtelle, who, it was arranged, was to get the post office; and number 3 was somebody who apparently was not considered seriously for the job. Way was appointed by the commission. The matter had to be attended to, and the Postmaster General actually wrote a letter at once to his deputy to reject Way. He could not say that Way was not fitted for the office, because his own department had said that he was eminently qualified and the best man for the job. The Postmaster General did not dare disparage Way on those grounds, but simply wrote his deputy, Mr. Gaboury, to reject the appointment. The letter is almost unbelievable. I do not know what Mr. Gaboury thought of it. It was one of those times when he had to shield his superior. This is not the first occasion on which the Postmaster General has found it necessary to shelter himself behind his deputy. I think it was the day on which this made-believe report came in that the Postmaster General wrote to his deputy:

With further reference to the post office vacancy at Picton, Ontario, which I authorized on February 14, to hold in abeyance, I now wish to instruct you to refuse the certificate of the commission issued in favour of Mr. Gerald H. Way.

Mr. Gaboury, acting under orders, had no choice but to write to the Civil Service Commission. I am confident Mr. Gaboury knew that what I might call colloquially this "rough stuff" could not be put through without giving some plausible reason, and no doubt feeling conscientiously obliged to follow the provisions of the statute, he wrote to the Civil Service Commission on February 24 as follows:

Referring to your certificate of February 13, covering appointment of Mr. Gerald H. Way——to the above postmastership, permit me to inform you that this matter has received the attention of the Postmaster General, and to state that Mr. Way is hereby rejected as unsuitable under section 13 of the Civil Service Act.

Way had been appointed, remember.

That was an attempt by Mr. Gaboury, without any knowledge of the circumstances —not a word had been communicated to him to put him au fait with what had been going on—to follow the instructions of his minister. He knew that under the act he had to assign a reason, so he put it in blanket form, "unsuitable." This does not meet the requirements of the statute at all, which provides:

The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months: and the cause or rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

The ostensible cause of rejection is the unsuitability of Way for the postmastership, but there is not even a suggestion anywhere throughout the file that Way was unsuitable. As a matter of fact the post office inspector found that he was the most suitable of the applicants, and the commission were of the same view. Here is the sort of man he was.

Mr. RYCKMAN: A man of special qualifications.

Mr. GEARY: Yes.

Gerald H. Way—

This is from the inspector of the minister's own department.

—is a man of fine appearance, forty-three years of age. He was born and brought up in Picton—

The other fellow had not been.

—and has lived there practically all his life. He is well known, and bears a splendid reputation, and seems to be very popular. Mr. Way enlisted in 1918, but did not accompany a regiment overseas. He was in training at Petewawa camp, and was honourably discharged in January, 1919. He entered the post office in 1905 as a clerk where he has been employed. He became assistant postmaster in 1911, and has a thorough knowledge of post office work. He is a person of good habits, and commands the respect of all who come in contact with him.

And that is the man they fired as being "unsuitable," that is the man whom Mr. Gaboury represented to the commission to be "unsuitable." I am sure he did that against his own wish.

Mr. STEVENS: Under instructions.

Mr. GEARY: Yes, under instructions in order to get rid of Way. Had Purtelle been third or fourth, the other men ahead of him would have been treated exactly in the same way until Purtelle was reached, because the whole plan from beginning to end was to get Way out of the job and put Purtelle in. The government cannot evade responsibility, but they have sat as dumb as oysters. When they passed the order in council they had this wretched finding of so-called proof before them, and it was on that finding that they solemnly acted. Probably they said to their colleague: Mr. Postmaster General, this is getting a little bit thick. To which we may imagine he replied: I told them down in Simcoe that you would either have to stand for me or lose me. And so he gets through this order in council. He knew it would be put through, for fourteen days before the meeting of council he actually wrote to the appropriate official to prepare this order because it was going to be passed at a meeting of council a fortnight later. I repeat, the government must take responsibility for this ruthless action. They cannot sit quiet under this Veniotism that is pervading all the actions of this department. It is staining any record the government ever had and holds up the government before the country as traffickers in political patronage. If I know the people of my country at all, it will be a long time before they will forget what the Postmaster General and his colleagues and the men behind them have done in connection with just such jobs as this. I do not know how they can countenance his action. But perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it is one of the "cool-headed" things that the government has set its hands to. If it were not that my hon. friends opposite have taken such a dislike to sanguinary adjectives, I would call their conduct cold-blooded. To be capable of bringing about the dismissals complained of, the minister responsible must be as ruthless as Nero and utterly callous in his disregard of the family, the reputation and the home surroundings of the men so harshly dealt with. But to the Postmaster General these men are simply pawns in the political game. That is his conception of politics, just as it is the conception of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. Every consideration of decency and fair play is swept aside by the Postmaster General if he thinks the good of the party in any particular section is going to be served by the dismissal of a trusted public servant. As I say, he acts as ruthlessly as Nero himself.

There is very little further that I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GEARY: There are some points that I hope other members will emphasize to show the unfairness of the whole transaction from beginning to end. Now I come back to the alleged defence yesterday of the Postmaster General. He said:

> That investigation was held according to law, and on the report of the investigating commissioner I recommended to the executive council that Mr. Smith be dismissed, which was my right under the order in council first passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, later accepted by the present government and unanimously confirmed by the House of Commons.

Suppose I do not object to its being his right, is it his duty? Does his right mean that he is always to exercise it like Shylock wanting his pound of flesh at the expense of all considerations of mercy, decency and fair play? He goes on:

> This position was advertised; Mr. Way was an applicant, together with Mr. Purtelle and I think one or two others. The result was that the Civil Service Commission did issue a certificate in favour of Mr. Way, but since the investigating commissioner felt satisfied, according to his report—

This was what the minister said no later than yesterday.

> —that responsibility should rest somewhere in the office for the non-distribution or mishandling of these circulars during the election,—

You heard what was said about that.

> —which circulars should have reached their destination at a certain time but did not, and in view of the fact that Mr. Way, the assistant postmaster, must have been a party to the non-distribution according to the evidence,—

When there was not a word of evidence about Mr. Way.

> —I did not think I was justified in accepting the certificate of the commission, which I refused. That is the whole story.

If that is the whole story, why did not the minister do the obvious thing, and in assigning a reason for his rejection, say to the Civil Service Commission what that reason was? The fact is that it never occurred to him until yesterday; it was not in his mind. The finding of the investigation was that between Picton and Milford and Wellington, amongst the carriers on the routes, some circulars were delayed. The evidence is not at all clear that they were delayed, but admitting that they were, the postmaster at Picton swore definitely—and his statement made was accepted by Purtelle as true—that they were delivered by him in good time and that the delay must have occurred in the country, which was a natural thing.

They wanted to get Mr. Way and could not get him; they wanted to get Mr. Smith and could not get him except by a made-up report and finding. Why did they not call Way? He was there. Why did they not call the postmaster at Milford? He was there. Why did they not call the postmaster at Wellington? Why did they not call any of these carriers who deliver mail? They would have told the story. They did not wish to do so; these men might have told the truth and excused the thing or put it in such a light that Mr. Smith could not be got rid of and therefore there would be no place for Purtelle.

This is just a resumé of what appears in the report, and it will stand still further investigation. And the further you look into it, Mr. Chairman, the more you will see that the people of this country have before them now such a scandalous state of affairs in the administration of the Post Office Department that it should be cleaned up and cleaned up properly. We should know all the details and workings of the department, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself or some member of his cabinet must take responsibility; or if he feels strong enough let him get up and give an expression of opinion regarding what the Postmaster General has done to the disgrace of officialdom in this country.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) asked me for certain information. I have the figures. The number of postal workers in the city post office and railway mail service—this would include all that the hon. gentleman asked for —is 10,005.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many are letter carriers?

Mr. VENIOT: They are subdivided as follows: letter carriers, 2,710; postal clerks, 3,009; railway mail clerks, 1,364; postal helpers, postal porters, postal chauffeurs, 2,922, making that total of 10,005. I was asked yesterday by some hon. member—I have forgoten who—whether I could give a report regarding the gross earnings and expenditures for the year ended March 31, 1929, or up to the 1st of January. I have this report which I will lay on the table and the hon. member can get it.

Mr. BRADY: While this estimate is before the committee I want to say a few words, first, on the need of a revision in respect to the lower classes of civil servants. But preliminary to what I am going to say I wish to make this observation. I feel that the time has come when we should recognize the fact—I think it is recognized by parliament and by the public—that the administration of the department under the Postmaster General is in a very serious condition and reflects gravely upon the high dignity of the people themselves as well as upon the government which is in power. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that any impartial critic could listen unmoved in this house for the past few days to charges so serious and reflecting so severely upon the high dignity of this parliament and of one of the most important departments in the country. What do we find? We find charges that strike at the very root of all that is worthy and in keeping with the high morality of the people. We find that breaches have been openly committed and have been passed over as if they were of a trivial nature. What, I ask, can be so serious, what can be so deserving of public criticism as the act of a minister who sets at naught the Civil Service Commission and treats the Civil Service Act as though it were a mere piece of parchment, using his high office for the purpose of furthering political ends? Sir, I say that the government cannot now stop at this particular point; they must bring the matter to a conclusion and there must be a thorough investigation into this department. I refrain this afternoon from adding further to the list already presented to the house. To do so would not accentuate the gravity of the situation; it would be merely adding one or two or three more cases of a similar character to what we have already heard. Let me say, however, that the position of the Postmaster General to-day is such that he is bound, morally as well as in the interests of himself and of the government of which he is a member, to demand—he should demand it himself—that all these charges be entered into, and if he is not guilty then parliament will be big enough and able enough to accord to him the justice to which he is entitled. But I do not think that is possible, so I will proceed to discuss the subject which I wish to bring up.

When the estimates covering these salaries and allowances were before the committee last year the question of the salaries paid the lower grades of civil servants was discussed, particularly with reference to postal clerks, railway mail clerks, mail carriers and customs clerks, and during that discussion we found that many married men with families to support are included in the classes to which I have referred. In many cases these men are supposed to have an education more or less equivalent to high school entrance; we found that their examinations were such as to demand ability, a good intellect and physical health. The examination was both oral and written, in fact, these examinations included what are known as intelligence tests, and the work which these men are called upon to do requires hard labour, long hours and fidelity to the last degree. Anyone who has ever visited a post office employing nine or ten clerks will realize the amount of work entailed and the loyal service which is given. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know of a body of men more loyal and devoted to their work than the civil servants included in those classes which I have mentioned. When the heavy seasons come on twice a year, these men are continually on the job, and the extension of the commercial side of the Post Office Department has placed additional burdens upon them.

In spite of the fact that from all sides we are told that we have great prosperity in Canada we find these men in rather a pitiable condition; we find that the salaries of civil servants extend from $750 a year on up through the scale to the highest paid employees of the government, who receive from $10,000 to $12,000. There is a mighty gulf between the higher paid civil servants and the great majority of the lower classes. Recently it has been proposed that the salaries of nineteen deputy ministers should be increased, nine by $2,000 a year, nine by $1,000 a year and one by $500 a year, which would give them an average salary of $10,000 annually, and in addition to this a commission has been appointed to inquire into the question of salary revision with regard to the technical and professional men of the service. That commission consists of Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Doctor Murray, president of the university of Saskatchewan and Sir George Garneau, of Quebec city.

I wish to say that there is no more important body of men in Canada to-day than the technical and professional men who are looking after the research work of this Dominion. I believe the whole country will agree, and in fact it is an axiom, that the foundation of Canada's future must depend upon the work of these highly trained men, without whose assistance the government cannot hope to succeed and without whom industry must fail, because day after day industrial activities are changing and new developments are coming forward all the time. If we do not maintain in Canada a highly trained body of technical men engaged in research work we will be left far behind in the race for commercial supremacy. Therefore I trust that the commission will see to it that these technical men receive an adequate salary for the important work they perform.

In the past it was often thought that a university man was merely a theorist who loved to get away from the common walks of life, but I wish to say that the story of national research throughout the world redounds to the honour and the glory of university men of all countries. To-day we find men who have spent four years in college and perhaps another four years in post graduate work receiving salaries of about $3,300 annually. Is it the opinion of this committee that men possessing these high qualifications, men who are working hard and who, engrossed in their work, think nothing of time, are well paid by a salary of that kind? I say that is not so.

Now let me come to the lower classes of civil servants. Last year the Postmaster General stated that he recommended to the Civil Service Commission that increases be granted to postal clerks, mail carriers, railway mail clerks and others, and he stated that the commission had refused to accept the recommendation. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that there is hardly a member of this committee who has not propounded to himself the question which I now ask: What is the relationship between the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission? Is it any wonder that for three years past no progress has been made with regard to the reclassification and adjustment of the salaries of these men when on the one hand the Postmaster General recommends and on the other hand the Civil Service Commission objects? We have been told, and it has been proved by his actions and statements, that the Postmaster General has a great power with regard to the appointment of postmasters. He must have some power. Hence it is there is what may be called a deadlock, and no progress has been made. It is quite evident that no progress can be made so long as these conditions exist. The letter giving the reasons why the Postmaster General's recommendations could not be accepted is worth reading, and here are the words:

> The commission believes that the salaries paid this class of employee are equitable and comparable with other salaries paid for somewhat similar kinds of work in other government departments, and feels that if any increase is recommended for the postal classes that a corresponding increase must be recommended for customs classes and certain classes in the Department of Immigration and Colonization, as well as for a considerable number of other classes in other departments of the government service who are engaged in work of a nature not much different and carrying as great responsibility as that of employees in the Post Office Department.

Mr. Chairman, is that the reason why the commission refused the request made to parliament last year? Is that argument convincing enough when evidence has been produced here that a great number of these men, many of them married, are receiving such low salaries? The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) asked a question the other day, as follows:

> How many employees of the Customs department, Post Office department, Interior department or Public Works department in the cities of Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver receive $65 per month? How many receive between $65 and $75? And how many between $75 and $85?

The answer given shows that there are 266 employees in this salary class. What do we find? We find in that class many men who are supporting families of two, three, and four children and they are receiving what is less than a living wage, according to the labour bureau. They are receiving just enough to pay for board, fuel and light, but what about the expenses for clothing, boots and shoes, the dentist, the doctor, and a number of other necessary expenses?

This session of parliament should not prorogue until we have a definite statement from the government regarding this class of civil service employees. I looked up the statistics regarding the wages paid in the case of industrial occupations, as compared to the salaries paid in the civil service. I obtained the former figures from the Bureau of Statistics, and the later figures from the Department of Labour. The base of 100 is assigned to the year 1913, and here is what we find: In 1913 the industrial occupations were paid 100, the base, while the civil service salaries were the same figure of 100. In 1928 the industrial wages had increased to 187.6, while the civil service salaries had increased only to 163.8. The important branches of industry showed an increase between 1913 and 1928 amounting to 87.6 per cent, while the civil service salaries lagged behind and only showed an improvement of 63.8 per cent. The figures of the Department of Labour show that the cost of living increased 58 per cent in the same period, so it can be seen that the industrial workers' wages have more than kept pace with the high cost of living while the civil servants have not had the opportunity to improve their standard of living. That situation should be convincing enough to the public, to this parliament and to this committee. The government should recognize that the time has come when steps should be taken to reclassify and adjust these salaries in order to bring these well deserving classes of civil servants into line with the industrial workers.

I would like to mention the fixing of a minimum at $100 per month. Can $1,200 per year be considered as anything else but a minimum wage for mail carriers, postal clerks, and three or four other grades? A great number included in these classes are receiving only $75 to $90 per month. A great number never reach the maximum of $1,500 per year. It takes seven or eight years to reach that maximum, and many of them find that they have to go out and obtain seasonal employment which will bring them a larger return. Is that being fair to this very deserving body of civil servants?

Another thing which interested me during the course of the debate of the last few days was the sad story which brought to our attention of what was called malversation. I think it speaks well of the probity of this great class of workers that so little pilfering or stealing has taken place. I do not know of any body which is entitled to as much respect for their honour and integrity as are these men who are engaged in such important work, and on such meagre pay. I think no apology should be offered, nor is any apology needed, for any member of parliament to advocate that these civil servants should receive due consideration and that the matter of adjustment of their salaries should be taken up immediately. The public at large are watching very interestedly the proceedings of the Civil Service Commission. The salaries of the deputy ministers are to be increased and I wish to show the house that their salaries have risen very high in the last ten years. In fact, I find that in the last ten years the salaries of deputy ministers have increased by 100 per cent. There may have been a very good reason why the deputies should have their increases first and I trust this is the right one. The government may feel that, by increasing the salaries of the deputy ministers first, it may be better able to increase the salaries of the technical and professional men and then bring up the question of the salaries of the lower classes, so that the gulf may not be too wide which separates them from the top. The people of Canada appreciate the fact that the civil service of all grades are entitled to a living wage. In the last session of parliament the arguments advanced why reclassification and adjustment could not take place were, to my mind, nothing more than "passing the buck," if I may use that term. No sound arguments were given why this problem should not be taken in hand. If the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission were in earnest, progress could certainly be made. Are we to have another year pass by without a readjustment being made in regard to the lower grades? I hope not.

Coming back to the position in which we are to-day, I believe that the honour of parliament is at stake. At this very moment throughout the length and breadth of Canada we are being told that the high offices which should be sacred under all conditions, have been used for lower motives than that of the public interest. It is a pitiable travesty upon the intelligence of the people of Canada to have it said in this house that because in the past things were done that were derogatory to good government, they should likewise be done to-day. That is not my view. I think the public of Canada will not take that view, but they will demand purity and integrity in every department that appertains to the well-being and interest of the people. Why should the Civil Service Act be set aside? When people sit for an examination and pay to get it; when they receive their marks for it, they believe that merit alone will decide. That apparently is not the case. Why should men have to travel hundreds of miles, as I have known them to do, to sit for some examination and then find that, though they passed first, either they did not get the position or it was months and months afterwards before they were able to get the jobs for which they passed? Is that the case in other countries ? I do not think so. We stand for legislative purity. If there is a Civil Service commission whose duty it is to hold examinations in various parts of Canada, and if they are carrying that out rightly, there should be no danger that the right man does not secure the position. Whatever may happen in this house; whatever explanations the government may later offer; whether or not they may accuse this side of the house of using a dramatic episode to further their own interest, that will not avail, because the gravity of the situation is such that the people of Canada, realizing the importance of justice being done, will speedily come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when a full investigation should be made into the relationship that exists between the department of the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission. The question is this: Who is responsible? Is there a liaison between one and the other? Are they acting independently, or is one subordinate to the other? This is a very important matter which parliament should understand, and I trust, before this item passes, the government will decide upon a definite policy and let parliament and the people of Canada know what it is.

Mr. BALDWIN: Many years ago, I, like many others in the Dominion of Canada, was appointed postmaster at the splendid sum of $10 per annum. That was under the government of Sir John A. Macdonald. I cannot understand what the hon. member who has just closed his remarks means about university men, after four years preparation and an additional post graduate course of four years, being able to get a salary of only $3,000 a year. I have known many young men in the past fifty years, especially in the last ten or fifteen years, who have taken technical courses of two years—naturally they were adapted to the course or they would not have taken it—and who are being paid salaries of many times $3,000. I cannot understand why we need university men who have also undertaken post graduate work, spending eight or ten years in getting an education, for the position of rural mail driver or country postmaster. It seems strange to me. I would think that their fathers and mothers would become martyrs in furnishing the money that would be required for so much worthless education for a position of that sort.

An hon. MEMBER: Why worthless?

Mr. BALDWIN: I have had ten years of Sundays in my life, and we have all spent a few years in infancy and childhood, and then we sleep one-third of our time, and if out of the time that is left we are going to spend eight or ten years in getting an education at a university simply to become a rural mail driver or a country postmaster at the end of it all, I cannot see that it is worth it. I think people have got to come down nearer to earth. The earth gives us all we need if we use it well. We have to scratch mother earth to earn our daily bread.

Let me give my own experience as a postmaster. After being postmaster for thirty-six years I voted for reciprocity, and I was driven out of office. In my opinion too many post offices have been closed up in this country and too many rural mail routes established. My particular office was at the outlet of a lake, in quite a business centre, with two churches, a school, and a Catholic mission. I have one of the biggest stores in the country and sell all sorts of merchandise. I would not say for one minute that a young man should spend eight years at a university and do post graduate work before I could recommend him to the Postmaster General, and have the post office at Baldwin's Mills reopened. I should want a young man who was honest and intelligent. I was willing to accept the office in the old days at ten dollars a year. I was a grist miller by trade, and I was intending to build a store, and I built it and filled it. I think that a post office in a country store attracts customers. I do not see why a person of ordinary intelligence could not entertain the customers without having to spend four years at a university and four years in post graduate work, nor do I think that eight yearss' university training is necessary to become a rural mail driver. It is true that a postmastership is a sacred trust.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BALDWIN: You make too many speeches and talk altogether too much. I waste very little of the time of the house myself. I remember the first time I ran for parliament. I ran against a very brilliant man, and I promised my constituents that I would not waste the time of this house by speaking whenever the opportunity occurred, but only when duty demanded. But I am on my feet now, and I propose to explain a few matters.

I was saying that the office of postmaster is a most sacred trust. When I was put in charge of a post office, the arrangement was to furnish the postmaster with a certain quantity of stamps, and when he ran short, he would order more. I think it was a splendid arrangement. Thirty years ago the postmasters were allowed to keep on hand stamps up to fifty, seventy-five, a hundred or a thousand dollars' worth, depending upon the size of the post office, and the postmaster was charged with those stamps. I think every hon. member knows that when a postmaster runs short of stamps he must send the necessary money to Montreal or Ottawa or to the chief post office in his district to get a further supply, and send cash with order. How this man could be short, I do not understand. I always mix my business right together. I have no time to take inventories, keep cash accounts; I work fifteen hours a day. Anybody in my employ does not have to steal from me, and if the inspector had called at my office he would have found fifty dollars' worth of stamps somewhere around my establishment. I would not be short, but some of these kitchen post offices may have been short, I suppose. It is a very sacred trust, but I think any honest and intelligent person is qualified to fill the office.

The hon. member who preceded me delivered an oration, rather than saying something that applied to the practical things of life. I know, of course, that an education is good for a young man, if he has lived long enough to know what he is adapted to; he can then qualify for the vocation or profession he intends to follow, but why the hon. member delivered an oration on university and post graduate education in connection with rural mail couriers and country postmasters, I cannot understand. To get such an education you may use all your money and get into debt, and then it might be natural for you to steal if you got the chance. I do not want to mention it, but it is an absolute fact that it has been rather too common in this great Dominion for men in the larger post offices to steal. If a postmaster was allowed two or three thousand dollars' worth of stamps, he would sometimes live beyond his means, and by-and-by report a burglary. The inspector goes there and finds that not a nail has been pulled, not a screw removed, not a panel broken. In fact, some of these postmasters were so derelict in their duty that they did not lock the vault. Some of them would accuse the night watchman and say that he had robbed the mail. I have known men to try to get the night watchman imprisoned, but when I had something to say about it, I would get Mr. Coolican at Ottawa to send out a real detective, without fear or favour for anyone, one that did not care for Liberals or Tories, and get him to make a thorough investigation. Perhaps the postmaster was a man of considerable influence, and could fool the auditors that were brought in, for figures can be fooled, but figures will not lie. I would tell the detective to work on the theory that the man was guilty, and to get the money back, and the accused has sometimes broken down and said to the detective. "You have come here to arrest me?" "Yes." "Would it be an extenuating circumstance if I reimbursed the government?" "It certainly would," says the detective. "Then I will try." The detective goes back. He says, "Now, Mr. Gentleman, I want you to tell me when you commenced this theft. Write it all out." When the confession has been made the detective says: "Now, you resign from this office." The man says, "All right, but I don't want to resign." The detective retorts, "It is not for you to say. Hand your keys right over and get out." The fellow says, "But I want my hat and coat." "Get out!" says the detective, "I will throw them out to you."

But coming back to my oratorical friend who preceded me, I cannot see the necessity for a man of university training to act as a country postmaster or a mail carrier either in our urban centres or rural districts. It is so amusing to me that it prompted me to get on my feet, and, Mr. Chairman, having expressed my views thereon I will not encroach further on the time of the committee.

Mr. BRADY: Did not my hon. friend misunderstand the question about technically trained men? Is it his interpretation of "technically trained men" that they are to be found in post offices or on rural mail routes?

Mr. BALDWIN: Louder, please. My hearing may be very poor, but my hon. friend's question is wholly incoherent to me.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to offer my personal congratulations on the decorum you are preserving in the house. When a member rises in a regular manner to ask a question he is generally met with an onslaught from the opposite side of "Sit down." The members who say "sit down" in such a trenchant manner are usually sitting behind some other members. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) referred to the fact that he had been appointed postmaster under Sir John A. Macdonald. May I ask him with what political party he was then affiliated.

Mr. BALDWIN: I will tell my hon. friend now: with whichever party I considered honourable and capable.

Mr. GOTT: My hon. friend's answer puts me in mind of the coloured boy who was charged with stealing chickens. The judge said to him, "Rastus, are you the defendant?" Rastus replied, "No sir, I'se the man who stole the chickens."

Mr. BALDWIN: I did not run the government, so had no opportunity to steal.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Chairman, for a very few minutes I want to discuss the dismissal of the postmaster in the town of Leamington, Ontario, Mr. W. G. Gidley. I have under my hand a return that was brought down during the session of 1927, showing that a number of citizens of the town of Leamington and the township of Mersea, a political organization, petitioned the government as follows:

We the undersigned citizens of Leamington and Mersea township herewith petition for an investigation of the conduct of Postmaster W. G. Gidley of Leamington post office in refusing to distribute certain mail matter, which was properly stamped and posted during the recent provincial election campaign, and other conduct unbecoming, which will be brought forward at such investigation.

I want to put on record the names of the men who signed that petition for the edification of the people in the riding that I have the honour to represent. They are:

Robert Fairful; Thos. R. Smith; F. S. Moss; J. H. Conover; A. J. Askew; D. A. Jeffery; Newton Askew; Robt. Maxwell; A. J. Quick; John R. Hope; J. Latam; A. W. Bennie; Joseph Ainslie; George Wiper; Maxwell Latam; Gordon Laurie; R. R. Brett; R. D. Moorhouse; Edmond J. White; Frank T. Sheik; Geo. Gibson; J. D. McIntosh; Jas. E. Burgess; James Richelle; R. H. Latam; J. M. Latam; S. Settirington; Chas. Hyatt; Bert E. Wigle; Malcolm Wigle; Emerson Wigle; Carl B. Roach; A. E. Roach; J. E. Gillanders; T. J. Willan; L. J. Tofflemine; Geo. R. Fox.

Mr. BOUCHARD: All Liberals?

Mr. GOTT: Certainly. In all thirty-seven I think.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Is that a list of postmasters dismissed in your constituency?

[Mr. Gott.]

Mr. GOTT: Oh, no, this would not even start the list of dismissals under the present Postmaster General.

Under date of December 13, 1926, the Postmaster General's department received the following letter:

Dear Sir:

A petition as has been forwarded to you under registered mail signed by numerous citizens of the town of Leamington and the township of Mersea. We the Liberal Association of Leamington and Mersea do hereby endorse the complaint lodged in the accompanyingg petition. Mr. Thomas Rowley, the Liberal candidate in the last federal election, will be in Ottawa in the course of a few days and proposes to discuss this matter with you.

The matter was duly discussed, and needless to say, although the charges did not warrant dismissal, the postmaster was dismissed. Now I want to read another petition that came to the Postmaster General, signed by eighty-two residents, all business men and reputable citizens of the town of Leamington:

To the Honourable Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

The petition of the undersigned residents of Leamington and vicinity humbly sheweth:—

Whereas W. G. Gidley has been postmaster for the town of Leamington for the past seven years and during all that period he has efficiently and obligingly filled that office, and in the opinion of the undersigned has improved and systematized the working of said office.

And whereas it has come to the knowledge of the undersigned that your department is contemplating the dismissal of the said W. G. Gidley and we believe without sufficient cause for such removal and, as we have been informed, without a proper investigation and without an opportunity being given to the said postmaster to rebut and refute any of the accusations made against him, which is not consistent with the principles of British fair play.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOTT: I might say to the hon. gentleman who "oh, oh-ed" that this man whom I am speaking of is a returned soldier with an excellent record.

Mr. DENIS: I do not dispute that.

Mr. GOTT: I do not like to see a returned soldier "oh oh-ed."

Mr. DENIS: I did not do so.

Mr. GOTT: You were either "oh ohing" the returned soldier or me.

Mr. DENIS: No objection.

Mr. GOTT: The petition proceeds:

Therefore your petitioners pray that you may be pleased to withhold any contemplated action toward the dismissal of W. G. Gidley as postmaster for the town of Leamington until at least a proper investigation be made of the charges preferred against him and a fair opportunity be given to the said W. G. Gidley to face his accusers and an opportunity to present his evidence as against the said charges.

There is a petition that the Postmaster General should have acted on forthwith. It is signed by eighty-two reputable citizens of the town of Leamington. In the file as brought down during April, 1927, there was nothing to show that the postmaster at Leamington should have been dismissed, but after the house rose another section was brought down. Last session I desired to discuss this subject when the Postmaster General's estimates were before the house, but I would not have been able to do it in an intelligent manner because the return came down in two sections, one section which was misleading, and the other section in such form that the Postmaster General could have refuted any arguments that I might have put forward on behalf of the dismissed postmaster. Now I do not propose to go into the details in connection with the appointment of his predecessor, in which the decision of the Civil Service Commission was overridden for some time. Indeed, not only in the Postmaster General's department but in almost every department of state to-day the decision of the Civil Service Commission is overridden when it is to the advantage of the party to put in their own people.

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. GOTT: I can take almost any department of state to-day and show you where, in the town in which I live, the Civil Service Commission has been overridden not once but time and time again.

Mr. FORKE: I dispute that statement.

Mr. GOTT: You refute it?

Mr. FORKE: I dispute it.

Mr. GOTT: Then I want to say to the Minister of Immigration that in the town of Amherstburg there were three appointments in the last two years in which the Civil Service was overridden.

Mr. FORKE: The Department of Immigration?

Mr. GOTT: No, not in the town of Amherstburg. One was under the Postmaster General, I think, although I am not sure; but one was under the Minister of Public Works. Now, as I say, I have not the time to go into the full details and read them all into the record, but I should like to have this put on record for the edification of the people I represent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want to refer again to the case I mentioned yesterday. The Postmaster General was good enough in his opening remarks this afternoon to make an apology to me. None was either requested or desired or needed. I do think though that in justice to the postmaster of Uffington, who has been dismissed, the Postmaster General should tender an apology to that gentleman. Whether he intends to or not—and I am rather inclined to be generous enough to think that he does—that man's reputation has been tarnished. He is seventy-one years of age and unable to walk, being a cripple. It was bad enough for him to have to give up his job without a cent to live on and to-day he is dependent upon the kindness of others; but it is much worse that the reputation of himself and of his family should be tarnished.

I have here the further returns which the minister was good enough to bring down to-day, and I find that on one occasion last summer when the inspector walked into the postmaster's office he found this man short eleven dollars and some cents; that amount should have been in the till and was not there. I am taking the inspector's figures, although the Postmaster General says it was only seven dollars and some cents. But the money was almost immediately put up and, according to the information I have, his accounts were certified to by the inspector as being correct. I appeal to any member of this house: How many men who are handling public funds can have an inspector walk in on them any hour of the day, not knowing that he is coming, and always have every last cent in the till? I ask any reasonable man this question: If there are a few dollars missing at the moment, not in the proper place, when an inspection is made, is that any indication of dishonesty? According to the inspector's report there was, as I say, some eleven dollars odd not in the till, but the postmaster put up the amount and his accounts were certified to as correct. I am not going to repeat what I said yesterday in regard to the dismissal, but I should like the Postmaster General to clear the matter up so far as the honour and reputation of this man are concerned. He is an old man, is unable to walk, and has not a cent in the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Old age pension?

Mr. McGIBBON: That has not yet been adopted in Ontario, and it would be his only salvation. I am going to ask the Postmaster

General to make a statement to the effect that there has been no dishonesty on the part of this man, because I do not believe that the Postmaster General is of that opinion.

Mr. VENIOT: Referring once more to the matter, I think that if the hon. member will read what I said yesterday he will find that it does not convey the impression that I thought this gentleman really dishonest, because I said there were irregularities that could not be classed as dishonesty.

Mr. McGIBBON: Just one.

Mr. VENIOT: But in cases where attention is frequently called to these irregularities and no heed is paid by the parties to whom such attention is directed, it becomes a matter for action. In this case, when the first irregularity took place—and I regret, as I have said before, that last night in the heat of debate I could not put my hand on the precise figures when I mentioned the sum of $142, because I have no intention to represent it as greater than it was—this postmaster was severely reprimanded and was told that if such a thing occurred again severe action would be taken. But notwithstanding that, in June, 1928—I believe it was around that date, because it was some time around October or December, 1926, that he was reprimanded, although I am not sure of the dates—the report of the inspector shows that there was a similar occurrence. Now I do not wish to hurt anyone's character; far be it from me; and if my remarks left the impression that it was because of dishonesty I wish to say that it was because of these irregularities in his accounts. I do not believe that the gentleman is fitted for the office, because of his age, and in addition there were these irregularities. That is what I believed at the time and what I believe now.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am glad to have that much from the minister. I am within the judgment of the house when I say that he was not quite so moderate yesterday, and even to-day he has overstated the case. I have in my hand the latest file which the minister was good enough to give us, and there are really only two cases, one several years ago involving $24 and one in 1928 in which the amount, as the Postmaster General says, was $7 or, according to the inspector, $11 odd. I submit in all seriousness that when a man is handling public funds as a postmaster in a store, or in any other place you like, if an inspector walks in upon him at any moment and happens to find a few dollars not in the till, that is not a very serious reflection on the man. I am not excusing him, but surely there are degrees in dishonesty; and, as I said, I rather think that the Postmaster General yesterday gave the impression to the house, which impression got out to the country, that that was the reason for this man's dismissal. I do not believe it was, and I do not believe the minister will say so to-day.

Mr. VENIOT: I know the hon. member wants to be fair. I said it was one of the reasons.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, I will compromise so far as to say that the minister gave it as the major reason. But I want to correct the impression that has gone abroad through the press that there had been gross irregularities on the part of this postmaster. As a matter of fact, only on two occasions was his cash found to be a little short, and he made it up on each occasion. The minister gave the impression yesterday that he was a long time making it up, but on the last occasion it was made up while the inspector was there. I leave it to the honesty and good judgment of any hon. member whether I am asking too much of the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I have said enough.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have an opportunity to speak on these estimates in order to bring up some of the delinquencies of the Post Office department with regard to Victoria, British Columbia. It seems to me that the Postmaster General expects Victoria to finance some of the other post offices throughout Canada. I have been looking up the records and find that in the estimates this year he is giving us the very munificent increase of $340 over last year. Further, I find that the earnings of the Victoria post office for the year ending March 31, 1928, were $24,321.03 more than they were in the year ended March 31, 1927. Does the Postmaster General think it fair to give us an increase of only $340 when the earnings of that office were so greatly increased, or does he intend to make the officials work harder, as has been the case during the last year or two, and take the profit out of them?

I have here a letter, a copy of which I have sent to the Postmaster General, which I desire to read. This letter was forwarded to me by a citizen of Victoria, and I was asked to present it to the Postmaster General. The letter is as follows:

Victoria, B.C.,
April 5, 1929.

To the Assistant Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

Upon behalf of the residents of this section of Victoria I would bring to your notice the lack of service at present given to the public in the matter of letter delivery.

At the present time our first delivery is more often than not after the noon hour and has been as late as 1.45 p.m. this in spite of the fact that we reside seven blocks from the general post office.

The matter has been taken up with Postmaster Gardiner who has done the best he can with the staff he has and it would appear that there is too much work for the men to get through with. I understand (and this information did not come from the post office) that the slowing up and clogging of the delivery system is mostly caused by the large amount of Vancouver newspapers now delivered here in a.m. delivery which at present post office rates is likely handled at a loss to the government.

Now sir we most respectfully suggest that these papers be not delivered until p.m. delivery or that Mr. Gardiner be supplied with the number of men needed to handle the business as we are sure that it cannot be known to you that such a service, as outlined, is in effect here.

Trusting that you will give this matter your kind attention.

Yours respectfully,

I have mailed a copy of that letter to the Postmaster General's department and I want to impress upon him the need for this service.

Mr. VENIOT: We will go right into it the moment I receive that copy. I do not know of any official report as to this condition, but we will go into the matter as soon as I receive a copy of that letter.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I want an investigation into the Victoria post office; for the last two or three years the business of the office has so increased that the men have been overworked. I want it distinctly understood that there is no question as to the fidelity and earnestness of the whole staff from the postmaster down, but we do claim that too much work has been put upon them, particularly since the government have not seen fit to arrange for any increase in salary. The technical men are being looked after, but the mail men who walk the streets of our cities cannot get an increase. In my own district of Victoria when the mail bag is full they must pick up two or three bundles of papers which they relay, leaving them on a veranda or in a house and going back for them after they have delivered some of their other mail. I am sure two or three additional men would relieve that situation; some better system could be put into effect in Victoria without a great deal of trouble. Is it right that a city whose post office revenue increased more than $24,000 in one year should have an increase of only $340 in the estimates? I ask the Postmaster General to go into that question also.

The technical men practically have had their increase granted; perhaps they are entitled to it. I like to see everyone well paid, but if the Postmaster General would see that the salaries of these men were increased he would be doing a great service. I would like him to correct me if this statement is wrong: I understand that the men who walk the street carrying mail from house to house have no chance to get into the inside service. Is that so?

Mr. VENIOT: No, that is not so; they can be promoted.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I just asked that question for my own information, because I did not want to be misinformed. The outside men must endure the vicissitudes of the weather, and most of them are broken in health; that must be the case even more in the east than in the city from which I come, but at all events I think the department should take that into consideration and advance the salaries of these lower salaried men.

Then I want to ask if it is to be the policy of the government in the future to appoint a commission whenever a branch of the service requests an increase. That is the precedent which has been set by this government, and in future any branch of the service asking for an increase no doubt will ask the government to appoint a similar commission.

Now let us see if the government is playing fair. I notice in the estimates an item of $800,000 increase for air mail services. Is it not a fact that, at best, for some years to come the air mail service will be uncertain or just an experiment? Does it seem fair to the post office employees that this amount should be placed in the estimates for such a service when the regular service employees cannot secure a slight increase? I would not care so much about the increase if they were not worked to death. In conclusion I ask the Postmaster General to look into these matters and do justice to Victoria. I could bring him half a dozen letters similar to the one I read a few minutes ago. I promised my constituents that I would bring up this matter in the house and I believe we are entitled to more consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I wish to offer a few observations with regard to what I consider a glaring flouting of the Civil Service Act; I refer to the post office at Billings Bridge. That post office became vacant early in December, 1927, as a result of the improper conduct of the postmaster, a man named Dowler. There was a shortage of funds and after an investigation it was proved beyond doubt that Dowler was responsible and he was dismissed, which was the proper thing to do. The Deputy Postmaster General got in touch by letter with the hon. member for the county of Russell (Mr. Goulet) pointing out the reason for the change and asking the member to nominate some reliable person who could be temporarily placed in charge of that office. The shortage in the accounts was in connection with the issuing of money orders and the Deputy Postmaster General asked that the temporary appointee should be a person who could be trusted to issue money orders. He also stated that steps would be taken to fill the position permanently in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act. The member for Russell replied on November 30, 1927, to a letter from the Deputy Postmaster General dated November 22, 1927. The hon. member nominated a prominent business man of the village named Campbell, and that gentleman was appointed. Ordinarily one would ask why the Civil Service Commission was not notified and asked to take immediate steps to fill the position permanently. Campbell continued in this temporary position and we find that the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, whose apparent duty was to notify the Civil Service Commission as to this vacancy, did not notify the commission until March 19, 1928. The following letter was written on that date by Mr. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission:

> I beg to inform you that the postmastership at Billings Bridge, electoral district of Russell, Ontario, is vacant owing to the dismissal of Mr. George M. Dowler, O.A.S., in connection with shortage in his accounts.
> You will find herewith copies of poster notices issued by the district superintendent of postal service at Ottawa.

Poster notices in French and English were enclosed with the letter. The notice reads:

> Applications are invited from residents of Billings Bridge and locality possessing the necessary qualifications for the position of postmaster at Billings Bridge.
> Salary and allowances $1,000, based upon the revenue of the post office; rent allowance $150; forward allowance, $9; allowance of one cent on each postal note issued (in the event of money order business being reestablished, allowance of four cents on each money order issued and one cent on each money order paid).
> Qualifications required: ability and education to efficiently perform the duties of office.

The notice stated that the applications should be received by the district superintendent of postal service, Ottawa, not later than March 27, 1928. That notice was sent to the Civil Service Commission on March 19, 1928, and the applications were to be received not later than March 27, eight days later.

There may be some reason for this delay, but I do not think it is a clear one in this case. I looked for an explanation in the correspondence which took place between the Deputy Postmaster General and the member for the riding, and I found a letter from the Deputy Postmaster General to the hon. member, but it is in French and I cannot read it.

An hon. MEMBER: That is too bad.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): That is too bad, but I will give the house the substance of it. The Deputy Postmaster General, in the correspondence to which I have referred, informed the hon. member of the vacancy and the necessity of filling it, having regard to the public inconvenience occasioned thereby. He said it was necessary that a permanent appointment be made at once; that it would be necessary to make a new appointment and replace Mr. Dowler. The hon. member for Russell replied to that letter, and on December 16, the assistant deputy minister wrote him a letter apprising him of the temporary apointment of Campbell. The hon. member wrote to the Deputy Postmaster General on December 20, asking that the matter be allowed to stand until they could have a conversation with reference to it. The Deputy Postmaster General replied to that letter on December 22, stating that the matter would be held up until they could discuss it. In other words, the delay from December to March was due to the desire of the officials of the departments to confer with the local member regarding this matter, a matter which under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, should have been attended to immediately. The position should have been advertised and applications received by the district superintendent, which applications should have been reported upon to the Civil Service Commission so that the matter could have been dealt with. But that was not done.

The time expired on March 27, and within that period applications were received from J. L. Brule, a resident civilian; D. T. Campbell, a resident civilian—the temporary appointee; John Sinclair, a resident civilian; and C. W. Cummings, a non-resident civilian. It seems to me that the district superintendent could have proceeded and made his report, and we find that he did make a very extensive report which covers three pages of this return. This is return No. 185, dated March 9, 1929, made on the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) acting for the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). In this report Mr. Low, district superintendent, refers to the four applicants. He gives the detailed answers in respect to the oral examination and the written examination made by each of these men, Brule, Campbell, Sinclair and Cummings, and he also makes lengthy comments. But that report was not sent to the Civil Service Commission. I do not understand why it should not have been sent on, because the very object of getting a report is to advise the Civil Service Commission. It was, however, not sent to them.

On April 2, the district superintendent received an application from another man, Phillips. That was in his hands just about the time he made this report. That was not sent on, but the department took time to make an investigation of the application. I find from the file that the district superintendent makes two lengthy reports in regard to Phillips, although the application was received on April 2, which was too late. Phillips was a returned soldier, a man who had not been wounded, and who had no disability. He had served overseas, and he had lived in the district for some time. April 16 is the date of the district superintendent's first report in which he reported favourably in regard to this man. On April 19 the chief superintendent of the postal service writes back to the district superintendent, asking him to state where Mr. Phillips' name should appear in the order of merit of the applicants. In other words, although the time had gone by within which applications might be received, the officers of the department were quite willing to consider this application and ask where it should be placed in the order of merit.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 84, to incorporate the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada—Mr. Young (Saskatoon)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Interpretation.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would like to hear any amendments, Mr. Chairman, that have been made in committee.

The CHAIRMAN: There were no amendments to this section.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Provisional council.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would ask the promoter of this bill what communications have passed between this organization and the various medical organizations of the provinces.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): All the medical organizations in Canada have been notified of this legislation. It has been discussed for several years, and so far as I know there has been no objection from any medical organization in Canada.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Fellows.

The CHAIRMAN: This section has been amended by adding after the word "persons" in the thirteenth line of page 2, the words "domiciled in Canada."

Mr. BOURASSA: Whether they are Canadiians or not? Can you admit members who are not Canadian citizens?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Admittance of physicians and surgeons as fellows.

Mr. BOURASSA: I think this is the important section. I well remember in the old days in the House of Commons when Doctor Roddick, of Montreal, introduced a bill in some respects similar to this, and one of the matters under discussion then was with regard to the clash there might be between this federally incorporated body and the various provincial medical organizations, and as to whether a physician belonging to one of the provincial organizations could practise in another province under the privileges which he acquired from the central body. Is the object of this legislation the same?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Perhaps I had better give a short explanation to the house. This bill is asked for by the Canadian Medical Association, which, as its name implies, includes in its membership medical men from every province in Canada. This has nothing whatever to do with education; it has nothing to do with the licensing of medical men. The Canada Medical Act has to do with the licensing of medical men in the provinces. The whole object of this bill is to encourage post graduate education. When a man has been graduated for three years and is licensed to practise medicine in one of the provinces of Canada, he is eligible to be admitted to fellowship in this organization. The idea is to encourage post graduate education, the fellowship being a recognition that the post graduate studies have been taken. This body has nothing to do with education.

Mr. BOURASSA: Nor with practice?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): No.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is a marked distinction between this bill and what is called the Roddick bill, under which the medical council has to arrange for examinations and award some recognition to anyone passing their examination. That was and still is subject to the approval of each province. At the present time any province can separate itself from the Dominion council. As the hon. member for Saskatoon says, the purpose of this bill is to encourage a higher standard of education. Anyone who wishes to submit himself for examination may do so; it is entirely a voluntary matter. It is not in connection with qualifications for practice. It is somewhat similar to the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, in Edinburgh and in Dublin. It is intended as an incentive to medical men, both physicians and surgeons, to aspire to higher qualifications and, therefore, higher standards.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

On section 8—Admittance to fellowship.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Chairman, there is a typographical error in the first line of subsection (c); the word "be" should be "by". The line should read: "The council may by by-law," and so on.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Diplomas.—Register.

Mr. BOURASSA: What would be the effect upon the profession of these diplomas?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): This refers simply to the form of diploma on admittance; it has nothing to do with anybody else.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. But what are the diplomas for?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): They are merely certificates granted to members when they pass the special examination.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On section 13—No personal liability.

Mr. SPENCER: Who is to be responsible for the liabilities of the institution?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The institution itself.

Mr. SPENCER: Each member must be liable to a certain extent.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): There is no personal liability. That is all.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I ask the hon. member who, I think, is directing the bill, regarding the word "royal"? If I recall rightly, under the rules of parliament a company or an association is not permitted to use the word without permission of the sovereign. I wonder whether that formality has been observed in this case.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It was inquired into, and we were advised that if the bill passed this house it would be sufficient warrant for the use of the word "royal".

Mr. STEVENS: I want it clearly understood that I am not in any way objecting to the bill. But I recall several instances within the last ten or fifteen years in connection with other associations and companies where an attempt to use the word "royal" was in no case permitted by the committees of the house that had the matter under consideration, except, I think, in one or two instances where it was shown that permission of the sovereign had been secured. While it has been argued that we find the use of the word in such titles as The Royal Bank, The Royal Trust Company, and one or two others—

An hon. MEMBER: Royal baking powder.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and royal yeast; but that is a little levity on the side. As I say, we have the word in use in those cases, but the institutions received their charters very much in the same way as we are passing this bill, and the formality of securing the necessary permission of the sovereign was not given proper consideration; but, as I say, during the past ten or fifteen years it has been recognized as necessary that such permission should be secured.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I suggest that in this case the word "royal" is not used for advertising effect. Its purpose is to bring the college into harmony with similar colleges which exist in England, in Scotland and in Ireland, and to give the institution a standing.

Mr. BOURASSA: My hon. friend says that this has nothing to do with education, and of course I take his word for it. There is evidently nothing in the clauses as far as I have been able to read them through hurriedly—they were not read by the Chair—but at the same time the title conveys the idea of an educational institution. Why not call it an association?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): We are simply adopting the same title as that of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, in Edinburgh and in Dublin. It is really not intended to have any control of education, nor, as I said before, has it anything to do with the licensing of medical men. It is simply an organization of medical men formed to promote a higher standard of professional education in the Dominion. It will be observed that every medical man must be a graduate of three year's standing of a medical school or university and must also be licensed to practise medicine in one of the provinces of Canada before he is permitted to take the examination. Having passed the examination and become a member, he in effect tells the world that he has taken this post graduate course. The idea is to encourage a larger number of medical men to continue their studies in the interests of the general health of this country.

Mr. BOURASSA: But could not this be broad enough to enable the college to establish a post graduate course, and therefore become an educational institution? Did not the old historical institutions of Great Britain and Ireland at some time or other provide for the training of their members, and is it not therefrom that they derived their titles?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That is not my opinion, Mr. Chairman, and certainly it is not the intention in this case. There is no possibility either now or in the future of setting up any curriculum or any teaching body or faculty, there being no provision in the bill for this purpose.

Mr. MANION: May I say a word, Mr. Chairman, in support of my hon. friend's remarks? As has been pointed out, there is a Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in England, in Scotland and in Ireland, and there are members of this house who have taken degrees at one or other of those institutions. But they are not colleges in the sense understood by my hon. friend from Labelle. They simply hold examinations. But more recently there was formed in the United States an American college of surgeons. I may be wrong, but while we say this proposed royal college is modelled on the British institutions to which I have referred, really its purpose is to put us on a par with the American college.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Yes; but not to put us on a par; it will be vastly superior.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is ultra patriotic in that regard. The American College of Surgeons was established some years ago and a number of prominent Canadian physicians and surgeons obtained their degree there. Now, with the establishment of this institution, Canadians will doubtless be quite satisfied to take their degrees in this country. I have said a word in support of the bill because I consider its object a worthy one. I share the view of the hon. member who has introduced it.

Mr. BOURASSA: This college is really what its Latin equivalent signifies—a "collegium"—and not a school.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Subsection (b) of section 8 provides that candidates wishing to be examined for fellowship in the college shall be graduates of not less than three years' standing of a medical school or university approved by the council, and shall hold license to practise medicine in at least one of the provinces of Canada. They are graduates from some recognized school. I do not think that "college" here means school.

Mr. BOURASSA: Would not this institution be enabled under the charter to establish a kind of post graduate course of its own?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not that I can see in the bill.

Mr. KAISER: The great majority of medical men, whether or not qualified by virtue of their status to become fellows of his college, are quite in favour of the bill, and we expect that the institution to be founded will perform a very useful service to the public as well as to the medical profession. I might refer however to section 12 which provides that the college may acquire property by gift and so forth:

> Provided, however, that the annual value of the real estate held by the college shall not exceed the sum of $50,000.

I presume that "the annual value of the real estate" means the assessed value. This college will likely have its home in one of the great cities of Canada, probably Toronto, and it will be necessary to construct a substantial building to house the college. It seems to me that this sum should be at least doubled.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want to join with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in advocating the passage of this bill. I think it is time that Canadians had an institution of this kind of their own. In the past we have been too prone to pride ourselves upon the degrees we have won in colleges either within the British Empire or in some of the American states, and I hope the time has come when Canadian academicians will stand on their own feet. Surveying the field of industrial and scientific research, I think we may safely say that no universities in the world to-day, of all those that loom up on the intellectual horizon, are greater than the universities of Canada. There is no country in the world where the medical profession has attained greater achievements than in Canada. This legislation therefore is only, so to speak, to put the final seal of accomplishment and of recognition upon the profession. It is no secret in the medical profession that every member of that profession prizes most the degree obtained from the Royal College of Surgeons of London. It is true we get degrees from Edinburgh and Ireland as well. But speaking as one whose pleasure and honour it has been to have graduated from the Royal College of Surgeons in England, I recognize this as one of the greatest achievements of my life; I believe it is recognized in academic and medical circles as one of the most coverted honours to have graduated from that college. I am not prepared, however, to admit that we in this country should not establish an institution of our own, whose degrees it will be equally the ambition of every Canadian to secure. I have much pleasure in supporting the bill; it is, I think, a measure which is long overdue. We Canadians have too great a tendency to hide our light under a bushel. We are not good enough advertisers; we do not make the accomplishments of our people known to the world in the way we should. All we need do is to scan the achievements of our universities and to take the standing of our professors, and I say without fear of contradiction that the Canadian is the peer of any not only in the British Empire but in the world. I join with others who have spoken in urging the favourable consideration of this bill, for I know that this legislation will be of benefit to scientific education in Canada.

Mr. KING (Koctenay): I do not desire to delay the passage of the bill, but as a medical man and a graduate of a Canadian medical school I feel I ought at least to say a word in support of it. As my hon. friend across the way (Mr. McGibbon) has observed, Canadian medical institutions are outstanding not only on this continent but throughout the world, as institutions that give a broad medical education. This is proved by the fact that Canadian graduates have been able to go to various countries where medical science has attained a high standard and there compete with those who have had the best training in the world's universities. The bill does not affect in any way the institutions now engaged in the education of medical men in Canada, but it will give to Canadian graduates or graduates from other universities an opportunity to secure what I am sure will be a coveted degree in the profession of which I am glad to have been and to be now a member. I thoroughly endorse the bill and the proposal it contains. Our medical profession has so advanced in Canada, and has attained such a standing in the medical world, that I believe we can now very well proceed to found an institution to be known as the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: I took part in the debate in this house at the time the Canadian Medical Association was created, and the conclusion arrived at then was that that legislation could not become effective until the various provinces had endorsed it. In connection with that legislation the question arose whether a university in Quebec or in Ontario could grant a diploma which would be recognized in any other province.

Mr. McGIBBON: That was a licensing body.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that this bill does not touch that question at all. I believe that the Canadian Medical Association has since granted diplomas enabling medical men to practise in any part of the Dominion. I understand that that is the system.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Without examination.

Mr. McGIBBON: Only in adjoining provinces.

Mr. MARCIL: That does not affect in any way the powers held at present in the provinces. The only other point to which I wish to draw attention is the use of the word "royal." I think it would be wise to not pass the title until the Secretary of State can communicate with the imperial authorities with regard to the use of that word. This question has been discussed in this house several times, and each time this communication from the British government was requested.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In that regard I took the trouble to communicate with the Solicitor General, and his opinion is as follows:

In reply to your letter of the 15th instant regarding the use of the word "royal", I may say that the usual practice is to obtain the consent of His Majesty to the use of the word. I observe, however, that in the case you have in mind the intention is to have the name including the word "royal" conferred by act of the Dominion parliament, and, while you will appreciate that it is not my function to advise you, I think the passage of such a bill, to which His Majesty is a party, would render it unnecesary to apply to His Majesty for consent.

PREMIER GUARANTEE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committe on Bill No. 74, respecting the Premier Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Lawson.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time.

Mr. BOURASSA: Why is this extension of time requested?

Mr. STEVENS: This bill passed the banking and commerce committee without amendment and unfortunately the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring it is absent to-night. I do not know of any objection to the bill, but of course if the hon. gentleman desires special information the hon. gentleman who has the bill in charge must give it. The chairman of the banking and commerce committee is not here either.

Mr. BOURASSA: It sometimes happens that companies—in the old days this was done by railway companies—ask for a charter under which something is to be done within a certain length of time; then they come back to parliament from time to time to extend their powers before making use of the powers already granted. I have heard this practice spoken of frequently as an abuse of the powers granted by parliament. Why fill up the statute books of the country with bills granting powers which are not exercised?

Mr. STEVENS: I speak subject to correction, but I think the facts are these: I understand there are certain obligations resting upon a company under the general act and it is not unusual for something to come up which prevents the company from complying with some technical portion of that act. However, I can assure my hon. friend that none of these bills ever passed the banking and commerce committee without the consent and approval of the Superintendent of Insurance, who does very good work in watching matters of this kind. I cannot assure my hon. friend that that was done in this case, but that has been my experience.

Mr. SPENCER: I was in the banking and commerce committee when this bill was presented and the Superintendent of Insurance was asked if he thought the bill should pass. He said he thought the bill was perfectly in order and that the committee should pass it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: According to section 1 the effect of this bill is simply to extend until April 15, 1930, the time for applying for the license and the going into operation of the company. Section 1 shows that the company had to make application for the license before April 14, which was last Sunday; they were not in a position to do so and this bill simply provides that the time be extended until April 15, 1930.

WAPITI INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 32, to incorporate the Wapiti Insurance Company.

Mr. BOURASSA: What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. THORSON: The amendment may be found on page 255 of No. 42 of the votes and proceedings, and is to this effect:

This act shall come into force on a date to be specified by the superintendent of insurance in a notice in the Canada Gazette, and such notice shall not be given until this act has been approved by a resolution adopted by at least two-thirds of the votes of the members of the company present or represented by proxy at a meeting duly called for that purpose, nor until the superintendent of insurance has been satisfied by such evidence as he may require that such approval has been given and that the provincial company has ceased to do business, or will cease to do business forthwith upon a license being issued to the company.

I understand that this amendment was inserted by the senate committee at the request of the Superintendent of Insurance.

Mr. SPENCER: Is this the case of a company with a provincial charter now securing a federal charter in order to do business in other parts of the Dominion?

Mr. THORSON: I did not know there was a provincial company in existence, but it would so appear from the amendment.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the seconding reading of Bill No. 88, for the relief of Minerva Elliott.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the hon. member kindly explain ?

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): I have the bill before me as well as the printed copy of the evidence upon which the bill is based. I do not think the hon. member desires me to read the evidence, as he probably has received a copy of it, but if he has not this evidence before him I will send my copy down. The ground upon which the divorce was granted is with one exception the only ground for divorce in Canada. The case was properly proved before the senate committee, and comes to this house for approval.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): We appear to be in the same position this evening as has been the case on previous occasions. Three bills have been called and allowed to stand. I have not the evidence relating to this particular case and I do not know if it has yet been proven; we are being asked to ratify the action which has been taken. I have not read this evidence because, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said the other day, if one attempted to read all this evidence his brain would be turned into a garbage can, and I do not propose to submit myself to that danger.

Mr. CLARK: Would the hon. member vote for the bill if the case had been proven?

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not think the question is quite fair. I told the house that I would vote on principle against every one of these bills.

Mr. CLARK: Why worry the house?

Mr. BOURASSA: I will say quite seriously that it is a question of principle with me. I think we have the right to declare ourselves against any such bill. If the house overcomes that objection, every member has the right to know whether in passing judgment he is ratifying something which is right or something which is wrong. Apart from the question of principle which applies to all divorces, there is the question of equity which applies to each individual case. If this house is ratifying something which it does not know anything about, how can it pretend that it is acting either as a parliament or as a judicial body?

An objection was made the other day by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) which was quite fair. His objection was that it might not be proper on second readings to examine the evidence in each case; that this might well be done when the house was in committee of the whole and considering the report made by the private bills committee. I think it would be our duty to examine each case at that time because, after all, this house has to pass judgment upon the findings of its own committees. The house has to ratify, amend, or differ from the findings of its committees. If this were not the case the house would cease to exist the moment it referred any matter to any committee; it would mean that the gentlemen composing each committee would be substituted for the house, either as a legislating body or as a judicial body. As has been stated very properly by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), this parliament is acting in a judicial capacity. As far as that is concerned, I am prepared to admit that we ought not perhaps to review the evidence of each case on the second reading, but we should know enough about the case to know whether we were warranted in sending it to the private bills committee.

I had to go to Montreal and arrived in the house only at half-past seven, and I could not take up all these records and pick out the one connected with the bill which is now called.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member read all the evidence which comes from the agriculture committee, the railway committee, the private bills committee, and all the other committees?

Mr. BOURASSA: If the hon. member will allow me I would point out that there is a difference.

Mr. McGIBBON: There is no difference.

Mr. BOURASSA: The evidence heard before the various committees is taken either to enlighten the house upon some general measures of legislation—

Mr. McGIBBON: It never gets to the house.

Mr. BOURASSA: Or it is giving to the house new legislation or new matters affecting administration or government. Until last year there were very few people in Canada who realized that parliament was not acting only as a parliament, but was acting also as a court of justice. I am quite sure that many members of the house had never realized that this was not ordinary private legislation which was going through; that we were acting as a court of justice, and, therefore, that we should take all precautions in law and equity which any court of justice has to take. With the volume of this work growing from year to year it is intellectually and physically impossible for the committee charged with the examination of these cases to carry on with their work, and I do not say that in any spirit of disparagement of the committee of the senate or the private bills committee. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out last week, it has been necessary at times to look through the halls and corridors in order to find a quorum for the private bills committee to vote upon a batch of twenty or thirty of these bills. No tribunal would ever attempt to deal in such a manner with twenty or thirty cases of law; the most trivial cases are always considered on their merits. Is the annulment of a marriage a less important thing than the most trivial cases that come before police courts or criminal courts or civil tribunals every day? We have let the system grow without realizing the seriousness of our responsibilities. I say in all earnestness it is not a matter of pleasure for me, any more than it has been for any other member who has taken the same position, to delay the business of the house. I would not feel insulted at all if anybody accused me of blocking this legislation in order to give the house time to reflect over it. I am doing this in a sincere desire to do something good for my country. I think the government should examine the situation and come to some decision with regard to all these bills and the principle and basis of them. It is for the purpose of emphasizing upon the minds of the members of the government, the members of the house and the people generally, the seriousness of the situation that has grown upon us, that I for my part have taken this view, and I think it was also the view taken by other hon. members who have approached the question from another angle.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing the charges dealing with practically the only ground upon which divorce is granted were proved to the hilt in the senate committee, would my hon. friend still oppose the bill?

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: I have not read the evidence in this case, but I have in a number of them and in every single one in which I have read the evidence, the charges have been proved to the hilt. If my hon. friend says that it is not on the question of proof he is opposed to the bill, he would simply vote against it no matter what the evidence was, and he would still let people come to parliament, this being the only course they can take in Ontario, and spend $500 to $1,000 and yet, although they conform with the law, produce the evidence which is reported and presented to the house—and my hon. friend has a copy of it in his room; as far as I know every hon. member gets it—he will deny to those people a right which is held out to them as citizens of Canada. Surely that is unfair.

Mr. BOURASSA: What I have been trying to emphasize in these various debates, not only this year but last year, is the necessity of amending the constitution and, short of that, of amending the procedure. In years past the question has been discussed only academically; nothing has been done. The same procedure has been going on from year to year and the senate is complaining about it.

Mr. BOYS: So far as I know, the only complaint the senate make is that they want a different forum; they want a judge, who is trained to this sort of thing, to do it, and not have the time of the senate and of this house wasted as it is from year to year.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so, but at the same time that raises the bigger issue which I am not going to discuss to-night, because some other occasion will be found to discuss it—that is, the question of provincial as well as federal jurisdiction.

Mr. McGIBBON: Which does the hon. member stand for?

Mr. BOURASSA: Unhesitatingly for the exclusive and absolute jurisdiction of the provinces in all these matters.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then why is the hon. member opposing the wishes of the province of Ontario?

Mr. BOURASSA: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I myself suggested an addition to the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the second reading of a public bill—that it should be left to the province of Ontario, and objections came from Ontario representatives.

Mr. McGIBBON: And voted differently.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not know, but many of them voted against it also. I voted against it precisely because the house refused to define and limit the scope of the bill by leaving it in the hands of the Ontario legislature to have it put into force or not. On the one hand I consider that parliament morally and constitutionally cannot force a court upon either Ontario or Quebec; and on the other hand I do not think parliament should assume the responsibility of establishing a court of that nature without the province interested exercising its power of expression of opinion.

Mr. BOYS: Has my hon. friend not on many occasions by his silence supported the first, second and third readings of many divorce bills in the House of Commons?

Mr. BOURASSA: As I explained to the house the other day, I have let those bills pass on division. It was the custom to call each one and say "carried on division", and I explained to the house, and I repeat to my hon. friend, who is very fairminded and who seems to be exercised over my conscience in this matter, that I have come to the conclusion it is not the proper way to act. Because I think I have done something wrong in the past, I am endeavouring to do right in the future.

Mr. McGIBBON: When did the hon. member become a Saul of Tarsus?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not speaking for any other member; I am speaking simply for myself, and I think this method of saying "carried on division" is not sufficient; it does not carry the meaning which the hon. member for North Simcoe wants to attach to it—that we agreed to these bills. But I consider it does not sufficiently emphasize the objection we have on principle to divorce.

The only reason I have taken this attitude is to try to have the government think over the situation and come to a decision. The other day the leader of the opposition said something which is absolutely true. Even in private matters the government has the responsibility of the business of the house. The government has the responsibility of the general direction given to legislation, whether it be private or public. The proof of that is that if any piece of legislation appears to the government to be contrary to the interest of the country, or even, from a narrow point of view, to the interest of the government, it has the right and duty to appeal to the house to oppose it. That is one reason why I am trying—call it obstruction if you like; it does not matter to me—to emphasize the importance of this question. I do not want to do it any further on the second reading with regard to the evidence, but there is one more point made by the hon. member for—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having expired, the house will resume in committee of supply.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Outside Service — Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): When the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the application of Mr. Phillips for the position of postmaster at Billings Bridge. On page 85 of the return to which I referred this afternoon, I find a report from the district superintendent to the postal service branch at Ottawa in regard to Mr. Phillips. It is too long to put the whole report on record, but I will read part of it. It says:

In conversation with Mr. Phillips it was ascertained that he is a garage owner at Billings Bridge and conducts a taxi service. If he were given the postmastership his wife would look after the office. He stated that she had the better education, as she had been a school teacher for nine years.

Mr. Phillips was one year in England and three years in France, as a chauffeur and mechanic, but suffered no disability.

The chief superintendent then asked for information as to the order of merit of Mr. Phillips, and a further report was sent by the district superintendent to the postal service branch dated April 20, 1928. It reads:

With reference to departmental memorandum of yesterday's date, concerning an application from Mr. W. T. Phillips, for the postmastership of Billings Bridge, which was received after a report was forwarded regarding the various applicants for the postmastership, and in connection with which the district superintendent was requested to state where Mr. Phillips' name should appear in the order of merit of the applicants, it is desired to say that Mr. Phillips should precede Mr. D. T. Campbell.

In conversation with Mr. Phillips and his wife, it was ascertained that Phillips, in the event of being appointed postmaster, would continue the operation of his taxi service. It appears he has two cars on the road; the one manned by a driver during the day time, and the bulk of Phillips' work is performed after 6 o'clock. He states he would be in attendance at the office at mail hours and during the greater portion of the day, but that if post office business were slack he might absent himself. It is clearly to be seen that Mrs. Phillips would be the one who would be in constant attendance at the post office and the district superintendent was very favourably impressed with the woman's appearance and intelligence. She has been in this country fifteen years and previous to moving here was nine years a school teacher in England. Unquestionably she has the requisite qualifications to discharge the duties of the office when money order business will have been restored there.

As stated in the previous memorandum, it is the intention of Mr. Phillips, if he is appointed postmaster, to remove the office to the former site, but instead of a grocery and meat business being run in conjunction with it, he would subdivide the front portion of the building where passengers for the Hunt Club could be sheltered.

That report goes to show that Phillips and his wife between them are quite capable of taking charge of the office. That report was sent to the postal service branch, Ottawa, but no action was taken to send it on to the Civil Service Commission.

Then on the 17th day of April an application was received from one Henry Lemoine, which was forwarded by the district superintendent to the postal service branch on the 25th of April. Attached to the application were recommendations from P. C. Lemoine, of Sorel, Quebec, and one by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. No report was asked in regard to Mr. Lemoine, and no report was sent on to the Civil Service Commission.

On June 20 the chief superintendent of the post office service requested his district superintendent to ascertain what arrangements the present acting postmaster at Billings Bridge would make for the proper discharge of the money order business. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that it was in connection with the money order business that the defaulting took place. A report was made by the district superintendent on June 23rd in regard to arrangements for the money order business, and while I shall not quote the report in full, it shows that the work was very unsatisfactory, that the office was left in charge of a boy of eighteen with a limited high school education, that Mr. Campbell, the temporary appointee, was working for the International Paper Company up the Gatineau and was home only every two weeks, that while the superintendent was there he found that the mail courier desired to obtain stamps from the office and could not get them, that a patron of the office wanted a money order for nineteen dollars and the boy could not give it because they were all locked up by Campbell when he went to the market. That was the condition of the post office, and yet Campbell was retained as temporary postmaster until March 14, I think, of this year. The position had not been advertised. They did not send a report to the Civil Service Commission in order that something might be done to relieve the situation, and that is the kind of service that the people of this community were getting. Dowler was put out of office in December, 1927, on account of a shortage in his accounts and here was the work of the office being attended to in a very unsatisfactory manner.

On the 25th of June the deputy postmaster general found it necessary to communicate with the hon. member for Russell, acquainting him with the conditions and stating that it was necessary that something should be done. On July 3 the district superintendent made another full report to the postal service branch in regard to the conditions at Billings Bridge post office, reiterating what had previously been said as to the unsatisfactory conditions at that office, and yet nothing was done. But they were still open to receive applications, because I find in the file another application dated August 29 from a man named Edward Sutherland, a returned soldier. This application was received by the district superintendent and sent on to the postal service branch on September 4, but still no action was taken. I also find in the file a memorandum dated October 18 signed by Mr. Coolican, and why this was not sent to the Civil Service Commission I do not know. I will put it on record:

Memorandum for the Deputy Postmaster General

Re Billings Bridge

Electoral district, Russell.

Revenue, $2,600.

The deputy postmaster general is informed that the Billings Bridge post office is vacant since December, 1927. The office is in the temporary charge of Mr. David Campbell.

The vacancy was advertised from the 18th to the 27th March last and applications were received from the following (order of merit):

Joseph L. Brule, resident civilian.
D. T. Campbell, resident civilian.
John Sinclair, resident civilian.
C. W. Cummings, non-resident civilian.

Applications were later received from the following:

Applicant—Date of Application

W. T. Phillips, O.A.S., 2nd April, 1928.

J. H. Lemoine, resident civilian, 18th April, 1928.

Ed. Sutherland, resident returned soldier, 29th August, 1928.

I would ask hon. gentlemen to note the next clause:

It will be noted from the above that Mr. Hector Doresa mentioned is not an applicant to that office, at least in so far as the department or the district superintendent's office are aware.

The application of Hector Doresa, the man who got the appointment, had been before Mr. Coolican, the assistant deputy postmaster general, and yet he states innocently or otherwise that his application was not before him. The memorandum proceeds.

As regards the applicants who submitted their applications before the closing date of the competition—27th March—it may be stated that—

(1) Mr. Brule is still an American citizen.

(2) Mr. D. T. Campbell, the acting postmaster. has not proved very satisfactory since he took charge of the office.

(3) Mr. John Sinclair is stated by the district superintendent not to have the necessary qualifications, whereas—

(4) Mr. Cummings is a non-resident.

In his report covering Mr. Phillip's application the district superintendent stated that he should be placed second in the list.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the date of that?

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): October 18, 1928. It is rather interesting to note that in this same file I find an application signed by H. Doresa, dated August 3, 1929—it must mean 1928—on a form supplied by the Civil Service Commission, which is properly filled up. Hon. gentlemen will notice that Mr. Coolican's letter is dated October 18, and he says in that letter that no application was received from Mr. Doresa. It would be interesting to know where that application had been all that time.

Mr. VENIOT: May I call the attention of the hon. gentleman, in order to have the record correct, that the applications at that date went to the Civil Service Commission, they never came to my department at all.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): How did this application go direct to them?

Mr. VENIOT: That was very often the case. Why attempt to make an argument out of it?

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): Let us follow this a little further. That application was accompanied by a petition and a report by D. F. Rowe, superintendent of employment. According to the poster notice applications were to be sent to the district superintendent. There is nothing here to show it came from the commission. I do not wish to say that the minister's statement is not correct, but there is nothing in the file to show that.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no need to explain it.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): Then in October why did not the department, following the report to the Civil Service Commission, have the position further advertised? This was not done until some time in December. It will be remembered that they advertised first in March, 1928, and then again in December. But in the meantime the man who apparently they wanted to appoint, Mr. Doresa, had filed another application, that is, he had filed it while the advertising was going on. Then the matter was taken into consideration by the department and the report was made on February 12, 1929, and all the applications were sent forward, Hector Doresa, class A, standing at the top of the list. It is only fair to say of Mr. Doresa that he is a returned soldier, that he had been disabled and was in receipt of a 100 per cent pension, and that in every respect, apparently, he was well recommended. But I would point out that it was only after Doresa's application was received, all those months of delay having intervened, that the advertising was attended to. The Civil Service Commission acted on the recommendation and appointed Mr. Doresa.

It may be interesting also to note that from December, 1927, until March, 1929, the Civil Service Commission had written eleven times asking for a report in regard to this man. The letters are dated April 27, May 22, June 21, July 10, August 1—this was the first occasion on which the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General replied and said they were not yet ready to send on the report. Then there were other requests by the commission on October 4, October 30—and again the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, by letter dated November 22, 1928, stated that they were not yet in a position to send on the report. Yet he had the report in his possession covering the four men who had applied before March 27, 1928. He had a report in regard to Mr. Phillips and in regard to Campbell. I may say that Campbell's application was accompanied by a petition signed by 218 persons served by the post office. I do not contend that Campbell as a matter of fact was entitled to the position in view of the investigation, but I say the delay was inexcusable, and it seems to me its purpose was to prevent the Civil Service Commission from functioning. Then we find the Civil Service Commission writing again on December 18, 1928, and on January 19, 1929. All applications were in at that time, yet the commission's letters were not answered. Finally on February 20, 1929, the commission sent a further request for the report and the Deputy Postmaster General sent it forward. That is the report to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the whole matter from beginning to end indicates that the applications that had been received were for some reason or other not suitable, but this is not disclosed in this file. The department were continually in communication with the member for the riding. He was informed of the course of events, and his advice or information was requested, and he invariably gave it. The delay in the first instance was wholly due to a request by the member that the vacancy should not be advertised. When the department found that Campbell, who was a temporary employe, was not carrying on the office satisfactorily, and had in their hands at that time seven applications for the position, there was no excuse under the sun for withholding the report from the Civil Service Commission, and so enabling the commission to act. I submit that the action of the department savours very much of a desire on their part to act independently of the commission, and that the exercise of patronage was uppermost in the mind of the minister, who apparently was determined to act on the maxim "To the victor belong the spoils."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. VENIOT: No, Mr. Chairman. I certainly would not consent to having it carried without replying to the hon. gentleman. If one were to believe the hon. member who has just taken his seat, one would conclude that in connection with the Billings Bridge vacancy nothing but politics was played. Now, as I have said before, there are two sides to every story. There are two sides to this case, but the hon. gentleman, although he has the full record before him, has presented only one side. The first advertisement for this vacancy was, as he stated, issued on March 27, 1927. In due time four applications were received. The inspector reported on those applications. If the hon. gentleman had read that report he would have seen why the applications were not forwarded to the Civil Service Commission. The applicants were (1) Joseph L. Brule, resident civilian, an American citizen—no need of sending his application to the Civil Service Commission; he could not be considered under the act; (2) D. T. Campbell, resident civilian, acting postmaster, according to the qualifying officer proved unsatisfactory; (3) John Sinclair, resident civilian, eliminated under qualifications by investigating officer, as he was not capable of filling the position; (4) C. W. Cummings, non-resident civilian, and his application could not be considered under the act because he must be a resident of the district. Everyone of the four is eliminated except D. T. Campbell, who had some post office experience, and was then acting postmaster. Under those conditions it was seen immediately that it was no use sending this report to the Civil Service Commission, and that it would be better to re-advertise the vacancy. And one reason why that position was taken was that from the second day of April on—and especially on the 2nd day of April—the department received applications. The department received an application from W. T. Phillips. This application could not be considered because it had been received after the date fixed for the receipt of applications under the first advertisement. But having gone over the reports, and seeing that it might be necessary to advertise again, we held W. T. Phillips's application on file; and immediately, within a very short time after that—and Phillips is a returned soldier—there came in another application from Edward Sutherland, a returned soldier, on August 29. That was followed by applications from other returned soldiers. The Doresa application was not received through the department, and according to the wording of the report which the hon. member read to the house on the blank form on which it was set out, it must have gone to the Civil Service Commission, who would send the application to the postal district superintendent, who in turn when the proper time came, when the second advertisement would be published, would send it in to the department, so that the inspecting officer qualified under the act might examine this applicant. That was the procedure, and all along, while it appears that there has been a good deal of delay between the first advertisement and the second, it was not due to anything political because, if it was, Campbell, so far as I know, was the man who could play the political game or call upon the Liberal party to assist him in getting this position. But Campbell was not considered at all. After that report he was eliminated; and when finally we decided, I think in December, to advertise a second time, we received a number of applications, Hector Doresa's application being in in the meantime. He was a returned soldier, a disability case.

Let me pause here to direct the attention of the committee to a very vicious personal attack made upon the Postmaster General in the London Free Press because the Postmaster General was not giving any opportunity to Doresa to be an applicant. I am blamed by the Tory press for not giving him an opportunity, and I am blamed by Tory members for having given him one, because it was politics to do so. That is the position, and I know the house will excuse the expression if I say, "You are damned if you do and you are damned if you don't." That is what happened in this case. Doresa finally got it, and the Tory press was asking for him to get it. But he did not get it from me but through the commission. This went along, and the second advertising took place. Doresa, a returned soldier and a disability case, was an applicant. William T. Phillips, a resident returned soldier, was an applicant. And other applicants were:

Mrs. K. Campbell, resident civilian.
Edward Sutherland, resident returned soldier.
Mrs. V. E. Dowler, resident civilian.
Jos. Henri Lemoine, resident civilian.
Jas. Henry McCullough, resident returned soldier.
John Sinclair, resident civilian.
Andrew Amos Brulé, resident returned soldier.

There was the situation when the second advertisement was issued, and there are the applications we received. Upon the receipt of these applications there was no delay. There were five returned soldiers, and just as soon as it was possible to do so the report of the qualifying officer was forwarded to the Civil Service Commission. On March 16, last the commission issued a certificate in favour of Doresa and that certificate was approved of by the department over which I have the honour to preside.

Now there are the facts. The hon. member states that Doresa got the job because I wanted to play politics. I may say for the benefit of all that I got about the heaviest going over that a man ever got for the appointment of Doresa—although I was not responsible for it—from political friends who desired someone else to get the position and whose wishes were not complied with. I got a trouncing for it, and I get the same lashing to-night because this disabled returned soldier got the position.

That is the case as it stands, and I hope the house will understand that in this matter at least there was not the shadow of playing politics. No matter what I may have done in other cases, this is a case in which I can in all conscience say that there was absolutely no shadow of politics in it. I did not know a single applicant; I did not know their politics until, the appointment having been made, political friends came to me and opposed the action which, as they thought, I had taken in appointing Doresa.

Mr. MANION: How did my hon. friend happen to make a mistake in this case?

Mr. VENIOT: Just like all good fellows, one is apt to make a mistake occasionally. I know some you made when you were Postmaster General.

Mr. MANION: And the hon. gentleman is inventing mistakes I did not make.

Mr. VENIOT: If I make a mistake I am honest enough to admit it, but I am afraid my hon. friend will not consent to the admission on his part.

Mr. MANION: I certainly will not admit any mistakes that the minister says I made.

Mr. VENIOT: I never knew a Tory yet who would admit that he had made a mistake. Now, that is my explanation in connection with this matter. Before going further, Mr. Chairman, I may say that some files were said to be missing in connection with the Sutton post office. I wish now to complete that file and lay the information on the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would seem as though hon. gentlemen opposite had decided not to allow the Postmaster General to make much progress with his estimates, at least this week. I see in the votes and proceedings among the notices of motion, a motion in the name of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart):

That the debate on the amendment of Mr. Stewart (Leeds), to the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go again into committee of supply, be revived.

As hon. members well know, the rules of the house provide that a motion which is taken up on Wednesday on going into supply drops if that motion is not disposed of at the end of that day. When the house made that rule I think it was intended that in the event of a motion being so dropped it should not be revived. However, I have no doubt that in the present instance hon. members opposite would assume that the government had some special reason for not wishing to revive this particular motion on Monday next if it were strictly to follow the rules. And if the Postmaster General desires, as I believe he does, to have the motion revived so that it may be disposed of by vote of the house, the government will support him in that regard. I think it should be understood hereafter, however, that when an amendment is made on going into supply on Wednesday and is not disposed of, but is dropped according to the rules, the government should not be expected to permit that motion to be revived at a subsequent time.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister will pardon me for interrupting him, but I think on a previous occasion last year or the year before we had a similar experience and the motion was allowed to be revived, not by the government but by the interpretation of the rules by the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it was done by consent.

Mr. STEVENS: We could not consent to the government interpreting the rules for us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will admit that the rules speak for themselves, and a rule which provides that a motion shall be dropped if not disposed of by a certain time is intended to prevent that particular motion being revived on a subsequent occasion. At any rate, such is the view of the government with regard to this particular matter. I am mentioning this only that hon. gentlemen opposite may know hereafter that if they decide to introduce an amendment on a Wednesday to a motion for the house to go into supply, either that amendment must be disposed of on that day or it will be considered as dropped.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely the Prime Minister is not going to override parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all; I am just stating a rule of the house, and that the government intends to stand by the rules.

Mr. McGIBBON: As interpreted by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am giving the view taken by the government on this particular rule of the house and the interpretation which will be given the house in debating the rules. I have been given to understand, possibly without foundation, that until this particular motion of the hon. member for Leeds is disposed of, hon. gentlemen opposite do not intend, if they are able so to do, to permit the passage of any of the estimates of the Postmaster General, and in the circumstances I think we are simply consuming the time of parliament to little or no advantage in continuing further at this time with these estimates. Therefore I would suggest to the Postmaster General that at this stage he move that the committee rise and report progress, that we may proceed with some of the non-contentious legislation on the order paper and make a little progress. We would then propose that some of the railway measures be taken up and advanced a stage before the week is ended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no objection to the committee taking up something else if it meets the convenience of my right hon. friend, but I must not be understood as assenting to his proposition that under the rules the present motion will lapse. It would be very nice for him if it did lapse, but that was not the case last session under similar circumstances. This is my point: The motion can be moved again as a new motion if it is not disposed of. I agree that anything which has been disposed of by the house cannot be renewed during the same session, but in a conversation which I had with Mr. Speaker last session, I am not sure whether it was in the house or privately, he told me the motion could be moved again on the appropriate day.

There is no necessity for moving the motion a second time or for moving a similar motion on another question such as the Picton post office, for example, which is a very similar case. I think the motion had better be proceeded with on Tuesday. I do not agree with the interpretation given the rule by the Prime Minister, but at the same time, if all parties are willing, there is no use discussing it further at present. Let the matter proceed on Tuesday, and in the meantime let us go into the railway bills.

Mr. VENIOT: No matter what the interpretation of the rule may be I am anxious to have the Simcoe matter fully debated. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before the motion is put I would like to ask the minister to look up the file he was kind enough to produce to-day in connection with the St. David's post office. Several letters are missing from that file; certain letters are referred to in communications which are on the file, and those letters so referred to are not included. They cannot be private in any sense, because they are from officials of the department.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly they will be produced.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I want to have them in order to see what part the department took in this business.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Before the motion is put I want to take exception to the statement of the Prime Minister that if we continue this evening we will be wasting time. The Postmaster General made a statement to-day with regard to the appointment of a stenographer—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think the motion is debatable, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. McQUARRIE: —at the New Westminster post office. I want an opportunity to reply to that statement.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The last time we were in committee on these bills it was agreed that we might go into committee on all the bills, which are identical except for the schedules.

Mr. STEVENS: Are these all going to the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: They are all back from the committee.

MURRAY HARBOUR—GEORGETOWN

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 43, respecting the construction of a Canadian National line from a point on the Murray Harbour branch to a point on the Georgetown subdivision of the Canadian government railways in the province of Prince Edward Island. —Hon. Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill was discussed the other night and I do not think I have anything to add to what I then said.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I do not want to appear unduly critical in this matter, but in all sincerity I want to offer some suggestions which I believe are better than those presented by the minister. I am inclined to agree with the remark he made the other evening that it would have been better to discuss this question in the railway committee, but the minister will remember that this was the first bill to come up when the committee first met and while I was there I had not had an opportunity to consider it at the time.

The minister made another remark on Friday evening with which I wish to disagree; he stated that he did not care to take the opinions either of myself or of the hon. members for Queens.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is hardly fair; I said I would not care to take those opinions with respect to technical matters of railway construction and so on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): The minister remarked that he would prefer to take the technical advice of his own officials.

Mr. DUNNING: No, the advice of the railway officials.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): That is quite right, and I agree with that statement to a certain point, but familiarity with these conditions should lead to the application of common sense, and I think those who live along the proposed extension are well able to give good advice to the minister or the head of the railways and of course the technical officers of the railway should be responsible for carrying out the work.

The Murray Harbour railway is about forty-eight miles in length; there is a point about twenty-three miles out on the road, or practically in the centre, from which a six-mile section could be built. I refer to the proposal to make a connection from a point at or near Uigg station to Montague. To my mind, this would give the best connection possible and would mean the building of about four miles less railway. As far as the freight haul is concerned there would be a considerable saving in operation because Georgetown is equipped with terminal facilities which were put in by the government a couple of years ago and which are specially equipped to handle the principal commodity from that point—potatoes. From Murray Harbour, the distance via Uigg and Montague is about forty-two miles, while the distance via Peake Station would be about fifty-five miles, and when you consider the route proposed in this bill you will find the mileage of the connection is increased to sixty-five miles. There would be a little advantage gained on the Charlottetown end of the line via the proposed route which would apply to shipments via the car ferry, but there would be a shorter operating mileage on the Georgetown end. The proposed route would mean a mileage of twelve miles on the old line and ten miles on the new in order to connect with the main line, or twenty-two miles in all, while the Hermitage and Peake Station route would mean fifteen miles by the old line and only six by the new, or only twenty-one miles in all on shipments from the Charlottetown end.

There is another matter about which I presume the minister knows something, namely, the agitation which has been carried on for the past twenty years by certain residents of the island in the vicinity of Fort Augustus and Johnston's River, who are asking for a railway connection which I think would be better than the proposed line. There would be this added advantage which should appeal to the Canadian National officials; it would go through the territory of Johnston's River and Fort Augustus and the railway would pick up from 250 to 300 additional carloads of freight in the course of a year. The people are situated too far from the railway and they are using the river for transportation purposes. A little steamer calls once a week, but that service is very inconvenient, and they are forced to use motor boats, schooners, and every form of water transportation. Building an addition five miles to connect Mount Herbert or Mount Albion Station with Pisquid would give a better connection with the main line and pick up this additional business.

Then there is another very important question to be considered, which would eliminate all other proposals, namely, the immediate rebuilding of the bridge. There is no doubt that the bridge will have to be rebuilt sometime, and the government is proposing to spend $370,000 on this branch line and will probably spend $400,000 by the time they complete the "Y" at Southport. The cost of the bridge is estimated at $760,000, and I think it would be good policy on the part of the government to consider immediately this bridge proposition and make a complete job of the whole matter.

That is all I have to say with regard to the matter. I am making this appeal in all sincerity and I feel that any one of the suggestions I have offered would be better than the one which is being adopted by the railway.

Mr. DUNNING: Did the hon. member make to the railway authorities the suggestions he is now making? As he knows, they have been investigating this matter for some time past and I am surprised that the hon. member, with the knowledge of the locality he has displayed, did not in the railway committee ask these questions regarding the economics of that particular proposal, when the men responsible for making the decision were present. I may say that no one else has anything to do with it; the railway officials undoubtedly heard the views of the people in the locality, and I know enough of the people of Prince Edward Island to appreciate the keen interest they take in all matters affecting their welfare, particularly with regard to the island railways. Personally, I am in no position to tell the hon. member that a line a mile this way or a mile that way would or would not be the best line. Under the system we have of operating the Canadian National Railway system, all matters of that kind are determined by those responsible for managing the property. They come to me to try to convince me that economically the proposal is a sound one, but the people in the district make their representations to the railway officials who are immediately concerned with planning the road. I do not pretend to be able to debate with the hon. member the question whether one or another line would be right or wrong, but I submit that the hon. member had his opportunity when the railway officials were before the committee. He was present at the meetings of the committee and it seems strange that he did not take that opportunity of cross-examining those who were immediately and in the first instance responsible.

Does the hon. member suggest that this bill should stand until we have the opportunity of obtaining the views of the railway officials upon the suggestions he makes? I am not disposed to press the matter against his serious objection, but the railway officials have advised me that the proposals they are making for the solution of this problem met with the general approval of the people affected. It is quite true that people desire a railroad to be as close as possible to their own particular piece of property, that those who are a little distance away would like to have the road a little closer. As they have said in the west. "I do not want it on my farm, but I would like it to be on the farm next to me." These problems always arise in connection with the location of railway lines. I always take the attitude that the railway officials who are responsible for looking into the economics of these matters have listened to all local representations.

If the hon. member cares to suggest that this bill be held up, I am not disposed to press it unduly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I would not like to take the responsibility of holding up the bill. As I explained before, the very first intimation we had in regard to this matter was when the bill was placed in our hands in the railway committee room. The minister knows it was the first bill presented the first morning the committee met.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is wrong, because each of these bills was preceded by a financial resolution and was on the order paper for some days before it was moved.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): That may be so, but I was not here the first ten days of the session, and I may have missed it on that account. That was the first knowledge I had of any kind with regard to it. I think the minister will admit it would be practically impossible for me to discuss it intelligently at first glance. I am sorry I was not in a better position to take it up at the time. I do not feel like going so far as to ask the minister to hold up the bill unless he thinks my representations give him sufficient reason for doing so.

[Mr. Dunning.]

While we are on the question, there is only one other matter I should like to ask the minister about. It has been suggested that, regardless of the additional haul, there will be no increase in freight rates. Is that official?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. JENKINS: In regard to this bill I may say that a number of sections of the country in this particular locality are desirous of having the route changed. My colleague (Mr. Sinclair) and I have had representations from different parts of the country along the line of those suggested by the hon. member for Kings; that is to say, not only from the district which has evidently been selected by the authorities, namely, Lake Verde to Pisquid, but also from Kinross to Montague, from Hermitage to Peake's; and from Mount Albion, Hazelbrook and Mount Herbert to one point on the eastern line. We have made all these representations to the department and I presume they were thoroughly gone into by the officials. We presented all these different matters as they came in. All the representations made to us were fully discussed with the department, and this is the result as brought in by the railway authorities. As the minister has clearly pointed out, we do not select the portions of the country through which the railways are to run. That is done by Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors, on the advice, I presume, of their engineers. I am sorry we cannot oblige all the people who are asking for these different routes, but the case is out of our hands, and entirely in the hands of the railway authorities. I just want to make it clear that representations have already been made to the proper authorities in every one of these particular cases.

The CHAIRMAN: All sections of this bill were carried the last time it was before the committee.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUNNYBRAE—GUYSBOROUGH

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 44, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Sunnybrae to Guysborough in the province of Nova Scotia.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DUNDAS—DUNNVILLE—CAINSVILLE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 45, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point on the Dundas subdivision near Brantford to a point on the Dunnville subdivision near Cainsville in the province of Ontario.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. RYERSON: When this bill first came before the house there was very little information available in reference to the plans of the Canadian National Railways, who are asking for this line. This is for a cut-iff around the northern part of the city of Brantford, just a little outside the city limits. The municipalities interested, namely, the county of Brant, the city of Brantford and the township of Brantford, had no information whatever in reference to this road. When the matter was brought to the attention of the railway company, they arranged that their engineers should go to Brantford and take the matter up with the municipalities. This was done and at that conference satisfactory arrangements were made or the plans were disclosed in such a manner as to satisfy those resident in the county. They were deeply concerned at first because the original plans showed the crossing of a number of highways in and out of the city of Brantford, and they were interested in knowing whether they were grade or separated-grade crossings. Assurances were given to the county residents in reference to this. The city of Brantford was concerned with an old agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company whereby all passenger trains on this division would go through and stop at Brantford. The matter was brought to the attention of the railway officials, and a conference was arranged in the city of Ottawa between representatives of the city of Brantford, the city council headed by Mayor Beckett, and officials of the Canadian National Railways. At that meeting satisfactory assurances were given that the intention of the railway company was to facilitate the handling of through freight, and that no passenger service would be interfered with. In view of these conferences there is now no opposition to the bill from my constituency, that of Brantford city.

Mr. DUNNING: There is none from anybody.

Mr. RYERSON: I am therefore supporting the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: This is one of the unanimous proposals.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GARSON—FALCONBRIDGE MINE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 46, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point on the Garson branch to the Falconbridge mine in the province of Ontario—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUDBURY—FAIRBANK

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 47, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point on the Sudbury branch to a point in the township of Fairbank in the province of Ontario—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MELFORT—ABERDEEN

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 48, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Melfort to a point near Aberdeen in the province of Saskatchewan—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CENTRAL BUTTE—MAWER

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 49, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Central Butte or Mawer to a point in township 18 or 19, range 10 or 11, west of the third meridian in the province of Saskatchewan—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The title of this bill was changed in the railway committee to read "An Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Central Butte or Mawer to a point in township 18 or 19, range 10, 11 or 12, west of the third meridian in the province of Saskatchewan".

Mr. BOTHWELL: The schedule is also amended, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN: It is amended to correspond with the title, by inserting "eleven or twelve" after "'ten" in the second line thereof.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NEIDPATH—SWIFT CURRENT

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 50, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Neidpath to a point on the Canadian Pacific railway near Swift Current, in the province of Saskatchewan—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RIDGEDALE—THE PAS

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 51, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Ridgedale, in the province of Saskatchewan, thirty miles toward The Pas, in the province of Manitoba—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNITY BRANCH LINE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 52, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Unity to a point near the provincial boundary in township 36 or 37, in the province of Saskatchewan—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HAMLIN—GLENBUSH

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 53, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Hamlin to a point near Glenbush, Medstead or Robin Hood, in the province of Saskatchewan —Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BULWARK BRANCH LINE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 56, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point at or near Bulwark to a point in township 38 or 39, range 8, west of the fourth meridian, in the province of Alberta—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HEMARUKA—SCAPA

The house resumed from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 57, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Hemaruka to Scapa, in the province of Alberta.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SWIFT CREEK—TETE JAUNE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 58, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from a point near Swift Creek to a point near Tete Jaune, in the province of British Columbia.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NEW WESTMINSTER—LULU ISLAND

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 59, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from New Westminster to a point on Lulu Island; in the province of British Columbia, with branches therefrom.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ST. WALBURG—BONNYVILLE

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 54, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from St. Walburg, in the province of Saskatchewan, to Bonnyville, in the province of Alberta.—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: A new section 10 has been added, reading as follows:

10. The provisions of section 14 of chapter 11 of the statutes of 1928, relating to the making, with the approval of the governor in council, of agreements between the companies therein mentioned (comprised in the Canadian National railways and others) for amalgamation, purchase, sale or leasing of the undertakings of the companies so mentioned, or parts thereof, shall also apply—

(a) to the making of half-interest agreements, or agreements giving joint and equal rights to other companies;

(b) to the making of running rights agreements of any description, whether for a fixed period or in perpetuity;

(c) to the making of any such agreements (except for amalgamation) between any of the companies mentioned and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Section agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the note to this schedule? Are we legislating in respect to the schedule, or is this note merely for guidance? It is something entirely new. Is this a proper way to pass an act of parliament, with a note on the bottom of it saying that an agreement has been entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Should not that be struck out?

Mr. DUNNING: The note is there only to express the conditions under which there would be a reduction in the amount of money to be voted and mentioned in the schedule.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That should not be a part of an act of parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: The note was intended as a qualification to the schedule, restricting the amount which would be received by the company under the authority of this act provided the agreement referred to in the note to the schedule was carried into effect.

Mr. BENNETT: That should be covered in a section of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Better let that stand.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in the hands of my draftsman, of course, but I am inclined to agree that it had better be redrafted. The law officers have advised me that those words are a part of the schedule, that they qualify the rest of the schedule. Perhaps my hon. friend would give a little attention to that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is doubtful whether a note made by a draftsman to the schedule of a bill could be considered operative as part of the statute law. I think it would be much better to cover it in a section that would express, in terms somewhat similar to those of this note, the meaning which the minister has in mind, or say, as my hon. friend from South Wellington suggests, subject to an agreement that may be entered into.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is part of the schedule it is bona fide a part of the act, because the schedule is by the terms of the bill itself made a part of the act. However, I will let bills containing that particular feature in the schedule stand because I am anxious to have the matter absolutely right from a legal point of view.

Mr. BENNETT: The schedule could not be considered to comprise what is actually only an explanatory note thereto. The word "schedule" is not properly used with respect to that. If you said, "subject to an agreement," it would be different, but this is simply an explanatory note made by a draftsman. I would say that a new section should be drafted to carry out the purpose which the minister has in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: The intent of the qualification is not to make the schedule subject to the agreement, but to provide that if the agreement is carried out, the amount of money to be voted will be that much less.

Mr. BENNETT: It is subject to a condition that if the agreement is entered into, the vote will be that much less.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I will let this bill stand and every other bill containing this particular feature in the schedule. I think there is only one other bill with that feature, and that is Bill No. 55, respecting the Youngstown or Dobson branch line.

Schedule stands.

Progress reported.

ALLIANCE—YOUNGSTOWN—DOBSON

The house resumed, from April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Alliance to a point near Youngstown or Dobson in the province of Alberta—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: I would ask that this bill be allowed to stand for the reason which I have just mentioned.

Progress reported.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 60, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Has this bill been to the railway committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, where it was the subject of thorough discussion during two sittings of the committee.

On section 1—Jurisdiction of board over tolls on international bridges, etc.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think this parliament has power to deal with the tolls of international bridges except by convention?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, up to date every international bridge has been brought about by the incorporation of two companies, one American the other Canadian. The intention is to control the tolls, in so far as the jurisdiction of Canada extends, which in these cases is to the middle of the river. I presume that American legislation or some convention would have to be arranged with respect to the matter. It has not been difficult in actual operation, but my hon. friend will remember the discussion of a year ago as to the desirability of having one authority instead of the various authorities which now exist, and we thought it well to make that authority the Board of Railway Commissioners rather than the governor in council, as is the case in some of the acts dealing with international bridges. In this way we make the ordinary toll authority look after these tolls.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we suggested that last session, and the minister was agreeable at the time and promised to look into it.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: A case went to the privy council with respect to the tolls charged by the old Grand Trunk express company, and one of the matters that gave me some thought after we dealt with the subject last year was the extent to which we could legislate. All we could do, I suppose, would be to see that no person should pass off the bridge without paying a toll, regardless of whether he paid when he got on. Presumably the American authorities would deal with the other side of it.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Issue, sale or other dispositions of capital stock.

Mr. DUNNING: Struck out.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Is it intended that this measure should apply retroactively, so to speak? Because there are outstanding securities in connection with some of the tunnels based upon the tolls which are to be paid under agreement. Perhaps the minister will realize that the St. Clair tunnel was a separate company promoted by the old Grand Trunk, in which interest on the securities was provided for by a charge against the tolls payable by the Grand Trunk under contract with the tunnel company. Would it be intended that this legislation should in any sense affect that agreement? It might be important to consider it from that standpoint. I am speaking from memory, not having looked into the matter for several years.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, while the first section does give the board its general powers notwithstanding anything contained in any special act heretofore passed, with respect to any agreements which may exist by prior legislation the board would have authority naturally under its general powers to take into account any considerations of that kind in determining what were fair tolls. I admit the particular application in that special case.

Mr. BENNETT: I just happened to think of it.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I am not sure of the status of it at the moment, but it was considered when the officers were going into the matter, and we are assured that while the board has power, it is not necessary for it completely to ignore a situation such as the one outlined by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I was thinking also of the Michigan Central tunnel.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Leases and contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that amended in committee?

Mr. DUNNING: No, that passed the committee.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: The sections have been renumbered?

Mr. DUNNING: They will be.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GRAND MERE—EAST BURRILLS
PILKINGTON—NIAGARA JUNCTION
ROSEDALE SOUTHEASTERLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in measures to provide:—

1. That the time for completion of the Canadian National railway line between Grand Mere and East Burrills, in the province of Quebec (1927, c. 13), be extended from 31st August, 1930, to 31st August, 1931, with the same location and mileage, an increased estimate of average expenditure per mile from $213,038 to $294,430, and an increase in the estimated cost of from $1,683,000 to $2,326,000.

2. That the time for the construction or completion of the Canadian National railway line between Pilkington and Niagara Junction, in the province of Ontario (1927, c. 14), be extended from the 31st August, 1930, to the 31st August, 1932, with a change of location to a point near Montrose Junction, at a decreased mileage of from 16·7 to 7·0, an increased average expenditure per mile of from $69,700 to $107,143, and at a decreased estimated cost of from $1,164,000 to $750,000.

3. That the estimated mileage for the construction of a Canadian National railway line, being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly in the province of Alberta (1924, c. 30), be decreased from 39 to 26·19; the average expenditure per mile (one-half) be increased from $23,642 to $34,936; the estimated cost (one-half of total by company) to remain at $915,000, and the location changed to run from Rosedale to a point in section 4, township 26, range 16.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: This resolution has for its object making necessary adjustments in connection with the last three year program of branch line construction for the Canadian National Railways. When the resolution is adopted three separate bills will be required to give effect to the terms of it. The first line affected is the line from Grand Mere and East Burrills which was provided for in the legislation of two years ago. It will be remembered that on one occasion there was some discussion as to the very heavy expense per mile involved in this proposal.

Mr. BENNETT: There was.

Mr. DUNNING: And in the committee considerable inquiry was made of the officers responsible as to the reason for such heavy expense. In actual practice the work has cost even more than that provided for in the original act. I am advised that as the work was opened up, in the majority of the larger cuttings a soft material was encountered at varying depths, from eight to eighteen feet, to ths bottom of the cuts, which in places were up to sixty feet in depth; and as the work progressed slides and slippings began to occur and continued to grow worse, in both the sloughing in of the cutting and slipping or sliding out of the embankments as the heavier parts of both the cuts and the embankments were reached. This condition has necessitated already the handling of much more material than originally figured upon, and before the work is complete it now appears that the quantities also required to be moved may be double the original figure in the estimate. The right of way had been estimated to cost $110,000 whereas $218,000 has been paid, and there remains considerable right of way yet to be settled for.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only about six miles.

Mr. DUNNING: A very short cut-off.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a terrific cost for right of way.

Mr. DUNNING: I may tell my hon. friend that I intend to ask that this bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in order that all technical and detail questions may be answered by the officers themselves, which is of course a much more convenient place to go into details in a matter of this sort than in committee of the whole house. The extra amount involved in this case is $643,000 over the amount provided for in the existing legislation.

Mr. GEARY: Seven miles.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The second item in the resolution relates to the Pilkington-Niagara Junction proposal of two years ago. Before this act was asked for, one of the proposals, to answer the same purpose, was to build a line from Pilkington to Montrose Junction, there join the Michigan Central railroad and obtain running rights over their line to Niagara Junction near Bridgeburg. This is the same as the present proposal by the requested amendment. At that time negotiations with the Michigan Central made it appear there was no hope of their assenting to such an arrangement.

The Pilkington-Niagara Junction line would make two crossings of the Michigan Central, the original proposals for which were protected diamonds; this, however, was objected to by the Michigan Central. An estimate was then made for grade separations of these tracks, which indicated an increased cost over the total amount voted of about one million dollars. This led to further studies and interviews. The present position is that arrangements have been made with the Michigan Central that will give the Canadian National Railways joint and equal running rights over their line Montrose Junction to Niagara Junction, the terms for which are to be worked out. In order to make use of these running rights, the Canadian National would build from near Pilkington to Montrose Junction, and to effect this the present amendment of the act is being asked for, which changes the terminating point to Montrose Junction, decreases the length of the line to build about ten miles, reduces the amount voted by $414,000, and extends the time to complete by two years. This new proposal gives a route a fraction of a mile shorter and accomplishes all the purposes of the other. It requires less capital outlay, would give an opportunity to put the outskirts of Niagara Falls on this route for passenger business, and would share in the handling of the products of industries established, and that would be established, on the line Montrose to Bridgeburg. In this case there is a reduction of $414,000 in the amount asked for.

Mr. STEVENS: And an increase in the mileage cost.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. That is another point which should be gone into in detail before the railway committee when the law officers are there. It is a slightly different road and slightly heavier work.

Mr. GEARY: An increase in mileage.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a fraction of a mile shorter. The third proposal has reference to Rosedale southeasterly, a line in the province of Alberta. It will be remembered that the authority given in this case was for a joint undertaking of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways in order to obviate duplication of track down the Red Deer valley from Rosedale.

Mr. BENNETT: It is practically completed now.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The original intention for the joint section was for 39 miles, Rosedale to Bullpound creek. At that time the Canadian Pacific Railway intended to build easterly from near Bullpound Creek as also was the intention of the Canadian National Railways, the former taking a more southerly route than the Canadian National going easterly. Since the act was passed, the Canadian Pacific Railway decided to build southerly and join their Empress-Bassano line at Rosemary. This necessitated their staying in the bottom of the Red Deer river valley for the last twelve miles of the original proposed joint section in order to be able to cross the river to the south, and not start to climb out of it on an easy gradient which was the first proposal and what will be the proposal of the Canadian National Railways line. This change now means that only 26.19 miles instead of 39 miles will constitute the joint section. The Canadian Pacific undertook the construction of this line, the Canadian National undertaking to pay half the cost.

The amount provided in the act was half of the Canadian National's estimate of the cost of the 39 miles. Under the conditions of the act the shortening of the line reduces the amount to be expended, and that now proves less than sufficient to pay half the cost expended, by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Less than half the amount expended by the Canadian Pacific Railway, you mean.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is right. The amendment asks to shorten the mileage to 26.19 miles, to provide the same amount of money but to increase the estimated expenditure per mile from $23,462 to $34,936. As I said at the outset, after these bills are introduced and read the first and second times I intend to ask that they be referred to the railway committee where all questions of detail regarding them may be dealt with.

In regard to the general program authorized two years ago, I might say that while these three lines show an aggregate deficiency of $229,000 as compared with the original estimate, it is only fair to the management to point out that the twenty lines authorized under the 1924-27 program were completed for $2,340,000 less than the maximum amount authorized and within $44,000 of the minimum allowed under the various acts. Including the two lines in question it is anticipated that the 1927-30 program, covering fifteen lines, will be completed well within the amount allowed. In other words, of the thirty-five lines undertaken in the two programs to which I am referring only two have proved to overrun the estimated expenditure, and taking the thirty-five lines together it is estimated that they will be construced at a cost considerably less than the aggregate amount originally authorized. These two lines which involve increases, therefore, are the only two out of the thirty-five lines in connection with which it is necessary for me to come back to parliament and ask for more than the original amount voted, with the qualification that taking all the thirty-five lines together they will be built for less than the aggregate amount voted by parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: While it is true that these resolutions, when reported, will result in the introduction of bills which may be considered by the standing committee on railways and canals, it does appear to me with respect to the Grand Mere line, about which we had considerable discussion two years ago, that it leaves open the question as to whether or not any such line in this country can secure traffic which will result in paying at least $115,000 per annum for interest on the money involved in the construction. It amounts to about $2,400,000 in round figures, and the net earnings of railways in Canada in the most successful sections heretofore have not been sufficient to assure a return upon that amount of money at 5 per cent. If my memory serves me aright the mileage is between seven and nine.

Mr. DUNNING: I am informed that it is 7.97 miles.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to be sure, because there is nothing here to indicate the exact mileage and my memory was about eight miles. My hon. friend will see that this means practically $300,000 per mile. There is not a mile of track in Canada which cost $300,000 to build which ever has been able to produce traffic sufficient to pay interest on that amount.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question of the production of traffic involved.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why is the line being built?

Mr. DUNNING: It is entirely a matter of the controlling grade.

Mr. BENNETT: But there must be some traffic in sight which will warrant this expenditure for a reduction of grade to that extent. The minister will recall that when the grade viaduct was built at Lethbridge it was a long time before the railway company which owned that property concluded that they could produce enough traffic to warrant the substitution of the viaduct for the long haul with heavy grades which was to be abandoned. In connection with this Grand Mere undertaking I have been always worried about spending $300,000 a mile; that is a tremedous sum of money and it means that someone must earn $15,000 a mile, somewhere, in order to pay the fixed charges on that construction regardless of upkeep, wear and tear and everything else connected with the administration of railways. It is a very heavy charge upon a railway, and as yet I have not been satisfied that the resultant advantages are quite apparent.

Then there is another question I desire to ask the minister: Was this work done by contract or was it done by the company?

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised partly one and partly the other.

Mr. BENNETT: Then my hon. friend will perhaps recall the discussion we had with respect to right of way. If my memory serves me aright, this road is being cut out of the side of a hill, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: In part it is being cut through a hill.

Mr. BENNETT: And the result has been that the lateral pressure has been so great that slides have occurred.

Mr. DUNNING: It has pushed in at the bottom.

Mr. BENNETT: The cost of the right of way seems to be enormous; it is hard to believe that a right of way in any part of Canada except in a town or city should cost nearly $300,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Not that much.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister gave the figure of $290,000, as I caught it.

Mr. DUNNING: We have paid $218,000 already, and some remains to be paid.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it involves about $294,000, and the line is less than eight miles in length. That means the payment of $35,000 a mile for the right of way, and assuming it is of standard width the minister will realize what that means.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it could not possibly be standard width. For the sixty foot cut there would have to be a sufficient right of way—

Mr. BENNETT: If there is a sixty foot cut of course it would not be the standard width, but think what land could be acquired for $35,000 a mile in almost any part of Canada with the exception of cities and towns. These are questions which merely suggested themselves to me during the observations of the minister, because I know nothing of the matter beyond the explanation given a couple of years ago, and my memory is not very clear about that. However, it does occur to me that this matter raises questions of sufficient importance to warrant its being carefully looked into, because it means just that much less money available for construction in sections of Canada where profitable traffic may be expected. I think the minister will agree that $2,500,000 goes a very considerable distance in some parts of Canada in providing railways, and it is not difficult to provide traffic which will produce at least some return upon that amount of money. I find it very difficult to see just how that is to be done in this instance.

Mr. DUNNING: From the point of view of the management this never was a traffic-producing proposal; it was advanced entirely for the purpose of reducing operating costs in connection with the present volume of traffic between Garneau Junction and Montreal, and was designed to overcome the controlling grade on that section. As my hon. friend will appreciate, I did look with some concern on the proposal when it was first put before me two years ago; it semed a large amount of money for such a small mileage of railway, but I do not remember a proposal coming to me from the management of the Canadian National Railways at any time on which the operating department, from the point of view of operating economics, were more insistent than with regard to this proposal. I am sure they will be pleased to come before the railway committee and give the reasons for the faith which is in them with respect to this particular matter. I am glad my hon. friend mentioned the viaduct, because in every case where operating economics are given as the reason for an expensive proposal of this kind I ask the management to supply me with a complete analysis of the situation; I endeavour to have them show me, so far as my understanding will permit me to go in the matter, the reasons for the faith which is in them that as a result of spending this amount, money will be saved in spite of the large capital expenditure involved. When the original proposals passed the government and were subsequently passed by the house, I have no hesitation in saying that at that time I was convinced that the cost would be justified by the operating economics produced in such a congested traffic district and over such a high operating grade.

My hon. friend referred to the cost of the right of way, and I think that should be inquired into when the matter comes before the railway committee. A very large area of land will have to be acquired in order to accommodate sixty-foot cuts in the class of material to which I referred a few moments ago as existing at this point. The slope will have to extend a long distance back and it will involve the acquisition of a considerable amount of property. It will be quite within the competence of the committee to inquire, and in fact I will see to it that the officers of the railway come to that committee prepared to give full information, as to the point of view advanced by my hon. friend. In fairness to him I must say that it is a constructive point of view, and I believe we should look at these Canadian National proposals from that angle. I agree with him that this is hardly the place to get to the bottom of it, but it is the proper place to initiate inquiries of that character. I apprehend that his inquiry is in no sense intended as a reflection upon those who are responsible, but is rather an inquiry as to a matter which involves the voting by this parliament of a large sum of money.

Mr. GOTT: What is the main and alluring feature in this matter?

Mr. DUNNING: The main and alluring feature is the fact that we are hauling our trains from Garneau Junction to Montreal over a very high hill; our heaviest motive power can only haul less than half what the same motive power can haul upon a reasonable grade and by making this improvement we can double the amount of freight which can be hauled by one engine over the section. I cannot give my hon. friend the actual figures as to the saving, but that is a rough idea of the improvement which will be brought about. Of course, I might have answered that we are now into this thing so far that we shall have to finish it, but I do not urge that because it is a proper matter to be considered before the committee. I like the officers of the Canadian National Railways who are responsible for the spending of money—I am not speaking so much of the president as of the officers responsible for the operation and construction of the road—to feel that when they are spending money they are spending the money of the people of Canada and they must be prepared to come before a committee of the house and there state the reasons for the faith that is in them with respect to any such technical proposal. I think that is a sound principle and I am sure the officers and management of the Canadian National Railways welcome that attitude.

Mr. BENNETT: It has nothing to do with politics.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know in what county this is, but it sounds like a good Liberal county.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the purchase of the right of way?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is touching a very sore spot so far as hon. members behind me are concerned, because I know that many of their constituents have complained of being robbed with respect to the purchase of the right of way.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all the more reason for suggesting that the observation of the minister is correct. As I apprehend the position of the house in connection with a matter of this kind, it is exactly the same as a board of directors to whom the general manager of a road makes a report that there should be a reduction in grade to enable the road effectively and efficiently to discharge its function as a common carrier. In the first instance the representations are made to the management by the district and general engineers; thence they go to the minister, and the minister has to be satisfied. That is the reason I asked the minister why the past expectations had not been realized, and he has given an explanation as to the increased cost. Then the minister refers it to the House of Commons by way of a resolution in order that we, for the shareholders, may be satisfied that the judgment exercised is such as to warrant so large an expenditure. As the minister has been good enough to say, the criticisms which we have offered are not criticisms of this particular proposal at this particular point, but they are based upon a desire to ascertain whether or not the expenditure is warranted at this time, having regard to the traffic which may originate at one end and be carried to the main line. The minister now says that the officials of the company will be able to satisfy us upon that point.

Mr. DUNNING: It is their responsibility to satisfy us.

Mr. BENNETT: They have satisfied the hon. minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not have to be satisfied with respect to this particular $643,000, because I saw no point in worrying very much about it. I have had a long experience with engineers; some of them say I am rather hard on them because I sometimes use the phrase, "What is your estimate? Let us double it and add twenty per cent," and then I start to provide for the expenditure. That is an exaggeration, of course, but it reflects credit on the Canadian National engineering organization when we consider that they have succeeded in building thirty-five lines for less than the amount authorized. That is rather a new thing for engineers to do.

Mr. GEARY: The work is done largely by tender?

Mr. DUNNING: By tender so far as the grading is concerned; by the company's forces with respect to track laying, ballasting, and so on.

Mr. GEARY: By how much do you soften the grade by means of this particular construction?

Mr. DUNNING: It cuts the existing gradient in half. I cannot give my hon. friend the exact proportion but that information will be before the railway committee.

Mr. GEARY: What is the governing grade on the existing line?

Mr. DUNNING: One and one-quarter per cent.

Mr. GEARY: Anything over one per cent is considered a heavy grade, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to branch line construction we endeavour to obtain a standard grade of five-tenths of one per cent.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 166, to amend an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Grand-Mere and East Burrills, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall this bill be read a second time?

Mr. BENNETT: Stand.

Mr. DUNNING: Might I suggest the second reading?

Mr. BENNETT: The only point was that it is not printed. I was not interposing an objection.

Mr. DUNNING: We might read these bills a second time by unanimous consent in order to send them, when printed, to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house, Mr. Dunning moves, seconded by Mr. Marcil, that this bill be now read a second time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

PILKINGTON-NIAGARA

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 167, to amend an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Pilkington and Niagara junction in the province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

ROSEDALE SOUTHEASTERLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 168, to amend an act for the construction of a Canadian National railway line, being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, April 22, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

RESTORATION OF DIVORCE BILL

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton) moved:

That Bill No. 91 (letter K of the senate) for the relief of Frances Gwendolyn Snow Lott be restored to the order paper for second reading at the next sitting of the house.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*CIVIL SERVICE—SALARY INCREASE OF LOWER GRADES

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Is it the intention of the government to increase the salaries of the lower grades of the civil service who did not receive the $120 flat increase in 1926?
2. If so, will provision for such increase be made during the present session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I might mention to my hon. friend (Mr. Garland) that it is customary for the government to make known in the estimates, its intention with respect to civil service salaries and that with reference to the question he has asked this is the course which will be followed.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—NEW PIER

Mr. STEVENS:

1. What is the cost of dredging for the new pier in Vancouver harbour west of the Ballantyne pier, and what amount of material is to be moved?
2. What amount of material will be required to make the gravel fill for the said pier, and what is the cost: (a) total, and (b) per yard?
3. What company has the contract for said work, and when was the contract let?
4. Were tenders called for the said contract? If so, when were the said tenders received, what notice was given and how many firms tendered?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. The cost of dredging is included in the price per yard for placing gravel fill. 85,000 yards. See answer to No. 4.
2. 700,000 cu. yds,, of material will be required to make the gravel fill for the pier; (a) Total cost $168,000; (b) Cost per cu. yd., 24 cents in place.
3. The contract was let to North Western Dredging Company, Limited, 28th December, 1928.
4. Tenders were not called but the commissioners were offered an opportunity to obtain the necessary 700,000 cu. yds. of gravel fill required at a rate below competitive prices, the price for the fill to include the cost of dredging 85,000 cu. yds. of mud from the pier site before the gravel fill was placed. The commissioners represent that the cost of gravel fill for this new pier is 21 cents less per cu. yd. of fill in place than the cost of similar fill required in the construction of the Ballantyne pier.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS—PACIFIC SERVICE

Mr. PLUNKETT:

1. How many of the Canadian National Steamship Company's ships or vessels have been operating in the mercantile or passenger service on the Pacific ocean, out of British Columbia ports, during the years 1928 and 1929?
2. What are the names of such steamships and their tonnage?
3. What was the original cost of each vessel?
4. Have any of these ships been sold during the years 1928 and 1929?
5. If so, what was the name of and value received for each vessel sold?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Canadian National Steamship Company, 4 each year; Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, 8 each year.

2. Canadian National Steamships:

	1928	1929
Prince Rupert, deadweight tonnage	1100	No change

3. Prince Rupert, $518,658; Prince George, $539,104; Prince John, $138,574; Prince Charles, $282,667; Canadian Coaster, $719,365; Canadian Farmer, $755,528; Canadian Observer, $758,723; Canadian Rover, $715,995; Canadian Importer, $1,671,502; Canadian Miller, $1,594,782; Canadian Seigneur, $1,593,505; Canadian Ranger, $1,580,995; Canadian Winner, $1,686,443.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—PART H-8

Mr. FRASER:

What are the details of the payment on Part H-8 Auditor General's report, 1927-8, bond insurance, $157.30; live storage minister's automobile, 12M, $144?

Mr. FORKE:

(a) Bond insurance: The sum of $157.30 was paid the Fidelity Insurance Company of Canada for bonds on the following officers of the department for the amount mentioned in each case, the rate for the insurance being 25 cents per $100 per annum.

MUTTON AND LAMB MONTHLY EXPORTS, 1928-29

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. What are the monthly export figures from Canada in each of the months of the years 1928 and 1929 of (a) mutton; (b) lamb?

2. To what countries were the exports made?

3. What was the price per pound in each case of all such exports?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

LICENSED DISTILLERIES

Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing the name and location of each licensed distillery in Canada, and showing the amount of duty, excise, sales tax and other charges (each separately) paid during the last fiscal year.

BRANTFORD DOG INQUIRY

Mr. RYERSON:

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence taken, police reports, accounts, and all other information, in connection with the dog inquiry at Brantford.

PORT ARTHUR ARMOURY

Mr. COWAN:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, tenders, contracts, vouchers and payments made by the government or any member thereof, and any person, firm or corporation, in connection with repairs or improvements to the armoury in Port Arthur since January 1, 1928.

PEAT FUELS LIMITED

Mr. CANTLEY (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all agreements, contracts or releases thereof, entered into between the Minister of Mines or any department or officer of the government and Peat Fuels Limited; also a copy of all correspondence between the right honourable the Prime Minister, the honourable the Minister of Mines or any department of the government and Peat Fuels Limited, or any officer or employee of that corporation.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I have intimated to the hon. gentleman that we are quite willing to bring down the correspondence between the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior with Peat Fuels Limited, but it includes a great deal that is not relevant to the question. Subject to that understanding, I will bring down the correspondence.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE—EMPLOYEES WITHOUT CERTIFICATES

On the motion:

For a return showing the names, positions occupied and salaries received of all persons employed in the several departments of the public service without certificates from the Civil Service Commission during each of the past five years.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish this motion to be dropped from the order paper. I propose to amend it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAPERS RELATING TO DISMISSALS OF POSTMASTERS

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, may I at this time lay on the table some papers asked for on Friday?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) asked for correspondence in connection with the ruling of the Department of Justice. I may say that no communication was had between the Department of Justice and my own department. I am now submitting the ruling which was given in 1919 at the request of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and in 1922 at the instance of the Civil Service Commission. I am laying the paper on the table as I got it from them.

Then the hon. gentleman referred to the number of postmasters dismissed from October 1, 1926 to February 1, 1928, and asked how many of these were appointees of the Civil Service Commission. I lay this information on the table for the hon. member's use. The hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Geary) has stated in regard to the return on the Picton case that the file is not complete and referred to four affidavits by Edward Sprague, Robert Purtelle, Hiram Ellis and Durward Cole, and intimated that there was correspondence transmitting these affidavits which had been omitted from the return. In this connection I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that there was no correspondence accompanying those affidavits. They were personally handed to my secretary by Mr. Charles Hanna of Belleville.

PRIVATE BILLS

PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DIVORCE

On motion of Mr. Clark, Bill No. 93, for the relief of Elsie Alice Hervey, was referred to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

CALVERT MITCHELL CARRUTHERS

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth) moved the second reading of Bill No. 96, for the relief of Calvert Mitchell Carruthers.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Sanderson moves, seconded by Mr. McMillan, that Bill No. 96 be read the second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May we have an explanation from the mover and seconder of this motion?

Mr. SANDERSON: This bill appears in my name and the case is a very simple one.

The evidence can be read in about five minutes by any hon. member. One of my hon. friends opposite asks me to explain the bill. He has before him the evidence taken before the senate committee and I think he will agree with me that this is a bill which should get its second reading and be referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Briefly, I may say for the information of my hon. friend, the petitioner is a well known physician and surgeon in a city in the province of Ontario. The respondent did not appear before the senate committee. The petitioner and the respondent were married in the city of Kingston on January 1, 1923 and the respondent was married in Lima, Ohio on October 8, 1928. As I say, the respondent did not appear before the senate committee, but the man whom she married in Lima, Ohio, was present and gave evidence. The case is not complicated; it is very simple. I am not a lawyer, but I see no room for argument over this bill. Let me say that the fact that I sponsor this bill is no indication of my attitude towards the principle of divorce. I do not consider that the principle of divorce is in question at all at the moment. As for that principle I yield to no hon. member in this house my sincere conviction, although I will not now state what it is—but will do so if the opportunity ever warrants it; I voted against the bill from the senate for a divorce court in Ontario because I thought that public sentiment in the province of Ontario did not demand the establishment of such a court. The only method which we have of granting divorces is therefore the procedure which we are following this afternoon. Whether divorce is right or wrong is apart from the question. I deplore the fact that there are so many applications in Ontario, but at the same time we are bound to deal with them and this is the only machinery we have for the purpose. I would therefore ask the house to give the bill its second reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I note that the senate committee on divorce, in making their report, say that the requirements of the rules of the senate have been complied with in all material respects. Will the mover of the resolution give the house some idea of the requirements of the rules of the senate?

Mr. SANDERSON: No hon. gentleman knows the requirements better than does my hon. friend, and I do not propose to enter into any argument with him.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): This is the bill in regard to which it was my purpose to say something but I understand that the evidence given will not be considered until the bill is in committee. My point is this. I believe that the house should now consider whether the requirements at present demanded for the obtaining of divorce are satisfactory. I have nothing to say on the question of divorce, but this country recognizes divorce as does the country across the line. We pay mutual respect to marriages in the two countries, and when a couple have been legitimately divorced and legitimately and legally married, then I think the question should be raised now as to whether that condition should or should not be called adultery. At present we hurl from each side of the line the epithet, at people legitimately married, that they are living in a state of adultery. This question I intend to bring up in connection with this bill in committee of the whole.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must thank the promoter of the bill for having given an outline of the case. It is a distinct improvement on the procedure we have had in the past. However, I would say that the question I asked has a direct bearing on the case. As yet it has not been explained to me just what are the requirements of the senate; I do not think we know exactly on what we are voting. I have been in the house some eight sessions. When a member first comes here I imagine he takes these bills as matters of routine, but as the years go on some of us begin to inquire with regard to the principles involved and I confess frankly that I do not know exactly under what rules the senate works in these matters. If I am not mistaken—and I speak subject to correction by the lawyers present—we have no statutory arrangements with regard to divorce, hence we hardly know just where we are.

I have heard it stated in this house that there is only one ground for divorce, but that is not correct; to my knowledge divorce has been granted in this house on other grounds than that of adultery, and as far as the powers of this house are concerned, I see no reason why wider grounds should not be recognized. Personally I am inclined to think that there is a danger in over-emphasizing the mere physical act of adultery in making it the only ground for divorce. The other day I came across an interesting statement in the Life and Letters of the Earl of Birkenhead;

> It must be admitted by all the right-minded people that the duties of chastity and continence shall be insisted upon. But so to limit the causes of divorce is to ignore the fact that the spiritual and moral aspects of marriage are incomparably more important than the physical side.

And again:

It is not to the public welfare that utter unsuitability for the marriage state whether the cause be moral, mental or physical, should not involve the same consequences.

That is the considered opinion of one of the most eminent British jurists, so I do not think we can sweep away all arguments of that kind and maintain that divorce can be granted only on one ground.

Further than that, much of this evidence would not be received in a court of law. Since these discussions began I have read a number of the cases and I find very often that the fact that the parties registered at the same hotel is considered evidence of improper relationship. I can quite readily understand that anyone desirous of securing a divorce could easily arrange a frame-up under such circumstances, and collusion might be very common. We have no information before us with regard to a situation of this character. Registration at a hotel might be accepted as evidence in a court of law, but no evidence is adduced to show whether or not the person dressed as a woman really is a woman; a man could dress as a woman and register with the man seeking a divorce, and that would be sufficient to secure a divorce.

Mr. GEARY: There is a provision for physical examination.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The laws of evidence are there, but the practice in the senate committee does not take account of such considerations. Very often we are dependent upon the evidence of men who are professional detectives, partners at that. Such evidence may not be sufficient, and may not be fair to the respondent.

We have been assured that the people who come here seeking divorce do so as a matter of right, but I do not think that is the case either. All these bills are prefaced by a petition; these people come asking a special favour, and so in rejecting their applications it cannot be said we are doing any injustice. Each case must be judged on its merits. The promoter of this bill has joined with the Minister of Railways—

Mr. SANDERSON: I object to the word "promoter." I am not the promoter of the bill; I am sponsoring the bill which stands in my name.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like very much to have the distinction drawn between "promoter" and "sponsor." It is hardly conceivable that the hon. gentleman should bring forward a bill and ask this house to pass it when he is not in sympathy with it. He would throw upon us the responsibility of rejecting it, yet he says he is opposed to the principle of the bill. I submit that this is subversive of political morality.

Mr. SANDERSON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I did not say I was opposed to the principle of the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member is opposed to the principle of divorce.

Mr. SANDERSON: I said if the time ever came for me to declare myself in this house on the principle of divorce I should be very glad to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: Do it now.

Mr. SANDERSON: This is not the proper time; the principle of divorce is not before us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend takes the view that the principle of divorce is not now before the house. The other day I understood the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) to take the ground that the principle of divorce was before the house in each bill, and if the principle of this bill is not the principle of divorce I do not know what it is. So here we have one hon. gentleman saying this is not the time to discuss the principle of divorce, while the leader of the opposition is strongly of the opinion that this is the time when the principle of divorce should be discussed. What are some of us ordinary members to do in the face of opinions of this kind? In any case, the hon. gentleman who seconded this motion—

Mr. McMILLAN: I did not second the motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, whether or not this motion is before the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: In putting the motion to the house, in accordance with the custom, I called the name of the hon. gentleman sitting next to the mover, as seconder of the motion. If I was wrong in using that name the motion is not properly before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I should like to have the motion before the house in order that I may continue what I have to say.

Mr. HEPBURN: I am prepared to second the motion of the hon. member

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Then it is necessary to put the motion again. It is moved by Mr. Sanderson and seconded by Mr. Hepburn that Bill 96 be now read a second time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Thank you. Since the motion is only now properly before the house I suppose my forty minutes will begin from this time.

There is another question which has come to my mind very definitely during the course of these discussions. The leader of the opposition has taken the ground that parliament is a high court. I do not know that from a legal standpoint I am competent to differ from him, but I cannot believe that in any real sense, in the sense which concerns us in dealing with these bills, this parliament is a court.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt for a moment? A moment ago I understood him to mention the name of the Minister of Railways. I am anxious to leave the chamber and I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would go ahead and connect me with this bill in the way he wishes in order that I may hear it before I leave. I did not gather what he was saying.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will go back: I was suggesting that the promoter of this bill, who objects to that word and who would like to be called the sponsor, agrees with the Minister of Railways that we, as members of parliament, are simply judges and that at this stage we have nothing to say with regard to the underlying principle involved. The Minister of Railways together with the promoter or sponsor of this bill voted against a divorce court for Ontario, but they come now and say, "Well, we are in a hopeless position; having voted against a divorce court for Ontario there is nothing else we can do but go ahead with bills of this character. We are simply judges having nothing whatever to say with regard to the principle involved." It is a curious situation when we consider that on one occasion we sit here as law makers and, with the help of the Minister of Railways and the promoter of this bill, reject a bill which sought to take these matters out of our hands; then a few minutes later we appear as jurors, supposed to carry on under regular and judicial procedure; and we are told that we, as jurors, cannot discuss the underlying principle of divorce.

Mr. DUNNING: In quoting my remarks the hon. member goes a certain distance correctly, but I think he knows himself the point at which he departed from that path.

[Mr. Hepburn.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should be glad to have an explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the principle is concerned, once the house has determined that a certain method shall not be followed then it is thrown back upon the method which the constitution of this country provides, and that method this bill seeks to follow. The hon. member talks about the principle, but I think he is a little bit confused as to what principle really is in relation to a bill of this character.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have thought all along that the underlying principle of these bills was the principle of the granting of divorce.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill falls within the scope of the constitution in connection with divorce, that is all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have no constitution with respect to divorce; we have a constitution which says that it is within the competence of parliament to grant a divorce, but the constitution does not say anything with regard to the circumstances under which the divorce shall be granted. Under the constitution we are quite free to give these matters to another court. It is quite true that the house, with the help of the Minister of Railways and the sponsor of this bill, has rejected that particular method, but I take it that the Minister of Railways and the sponsor of the bill are beginning to get restless when they realize the result of their action.

The Minister of Railways joins with the leader of the opposition in saying that to a certain extent we are a court.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is quite correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And that we have to act more or less as impartial jurors. I submit that that is absolutely impossible. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and other members of the house have disqualified themselves from voting on a measure of this kind. The hon. member stood in his place and said, "Under no circumstances whatever can I vote in favour of these bills." I submit that he would be challenged in any court in Canada and would not be permitted to sit as a juror. That would be true also of the majority of those who voted against the Ontario divorce bill. Those who voted against that bill on principle—there may be some who voted against it as a matter of political expediency—and whose position is that under no circumstances are they justified in passing any act for the granting of divorces, are absolutely disqualified from acting as jurors in a court of this character. They are prejudiced jurors; they have declared themselves, and the people who, as we are told, have paid their money and gone to a great deal of expense in coming here with petitions for divorce are faced with the curious situation that approximately a third of their jury are prejudiced. I challenge their right to vote on a bill of this character. The same thing is true when these bills are before the private bills committee, because approximately one-third of the members of that committee have conscientious convictions with regard to the granting of divorce. They are opposed to it, so they are prejudiced jurors. I take it that they would be challenged in any court of justice, and I challenge them here to-day. We want to do the fair thing to those who come before this house; if they have a right to a divorce let us give them that divorce, but do not let us put ourselves in the position where a third of the members of the court are so prejudiced that the case cannot receive a fair hearing. Some of us are driven to the rather extreme position of voting against these bills, not because we are opposed to divorce but because we are opposed to the whole procedure, and at the present stage we see no other way of accomplishing our purpose of bringing about a change in procedure.

If I understand the rules aright, any five members of the house can demand a roll call vote. A few of us in this corner of the house, along with one or two on the other side, have called for these divisions. But what about the forty, fifty or sixty other members who on religious grounds are opposed to divorce? Why do they not call for a roll call division—if they are in earnest about preventing divorces? Why do they not do everything they can to protest against divorce? Why do they not realize what is going on in the house and come out openly and do all they can to prevent these bills passing? Because they know perfectly well that this is not a true court; they know perfectly well that in this atmosphere we cannot conform closely to judicial procedure; hence for years they have let these bills slip through and the speaker has simply declared them passed "on division." So far as I am concerned I do not intend to take the responsibility of continuing to ask for a roll call division. A single member has only a certain amount of power or influence in this house, but I do urge that we should ask that a vote be taken, if only the yeas and nays. I would not like to be accused of holding up the house by insisting upon a roll call division each time, but I should like to have every bill passed separately and with some semblance of decorum.

Some of us have been accused of introducing this matter simply because we were piqued at the non-passage of the Ontario divorce bill. Personally, I have no interest in that bill. It is true I sponsored it—to use the term of the sponsor of this bill—in the house, but I did that because year after year it has come up and no one has taken care of it. When it was defeated I was in no different position from that occupied by other members, but there seemed to be no way of impressing this house and the country with the seriousness of the situation other than by bringing on a debate or a series of debates of this character. I have no intention of resorting to mere obstructionist tactics. The course followed has been actuated by the desire that the house should be more clearly apprised of the seriousness of the situation. Later on, some of us may feel called upon to move certain amendments in committee, amendments which, I believe, ought to be placed in every divorce bill.

The leader of the opposition made rather a telling point when he said that we ought not to go into the details of evidence at this stage. I will not insist on those details being brought out in the house, but we ought to have, as in this bill we have already had, a certain outline of the case.

If ever I felt any qualms of conscience with regard to taking up the time of the house in connection with such matters as this, they have been all set at rest by some of the communications I have received in the last few days. Only last Friday night I had a letter from a poor woman whose husband is seeking a divorce. The case will come before us a little later on. For reasons that I think the house will appreciate, I do not want to give publicity to the name of the woman, but I wish to read the letter as an instance of what is going on and how unsatisfactory the present procedure is. The case is a Quebec one. I have not had time to go down to the city of Montreal to investigate the matter. Years ago I had something to do with trying to determine the authenticity of certain documents and I remember we used to distinguish between internal evidence and external evidence. I have no external evidence at all with regard to the genuineness of this case, with regard to the truthfulness of the woman's statements, but there is certain internal evidence which would indicate that her statements are true.

Mr. BROWN: Has the case been passed on by the senate committee?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has been before the senate committee and is shortly to come before us. I would rather the hon. member did not ask me the particular name.

Mr. BROWN: There is no danger of my doing that. The demand for details will all come from elsewhere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me read a few extracts from this letter. She says:

I have never had the chance to defend myself, and for five years I had had to endure insults from my husband's people. I have never been really mistress of my home.

Again:

I have been a good wife and mother for five years with this one exception and all that I have done—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is quoting from a letter and he must know perfectly well that if he reads a letter, he must lay it on the table. If he does not want to table the letter, he should not read it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no rule in this house which makes me lay a private letter upon the table.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I object to the reading of private letters in the House of Commons. My hon. friend is insisting on all evidence coming out, but he is giving us only partial evidence. Surely we should have the whole of it, not scraps.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am reading a letter that came to me. I have not tried to make this a point of evidence in the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is it if it is not evidence in the case?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This does not directly relate to the case that is before us. It is an illustration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then my hon. friend is out of order. He is not discussing the case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am discussing the principle underlying these bills, and I would ask the house to permit me to use this letter simply as an illustration to show how unsatisfactory the present procedure is. I am within my rights. Let me begin again.

I have never had the chance to defend myself, and for five years I have had to endure insults from my husband's people. I have never been really mistress of my home.

Again:

I have been a good wife and mother for five years with this one exception and all that I have done I have been driven to do by the high-handed methods of my husband and his people. If I lose my baby I lose everything worth living for. . . . I was married at twenty and my baby came before I was twenty-one. I have been married five years. My other baby has died and I had an operation to please my husband so I could not have children. The child——is all I can ever have, whereas my husband could marry again and have other children. Is it right or fair to take my only child from me? He is only four and needs his mother. God knows my heart bleeds for him. . . . He (my husband) receives $300 per month salary . . . . I receive no money from him and am not in a position to earn my own living. . . . . If my husband were made to support me and our boy, I know he would come back to me. Our baby would draw us together. His people are trying, and succeeding in keeping us apart . . . . I know I have been very foolish and made myself open to suspicion, but that is no reason to crush me altogether. . . . I love my baby. Please won't you ask them to give him back to me. If my husband does not love me and will be happier with someone else, I want him to do what he considers best. Only give me back my baby. . . . . You are my last hope and if this appeal fails, I am lost.

Naming it.

Some of us perhaps have regarded these bills with some levity. I do not think there is a single hon. gentleman in the house who will not be touched by an appeal of that character, even as I was touched on Friday night when I received it. Here is a poor woman who has had practically no opportunity of defending herself. This is an uncontested case. I am not sure whether she had the opportunity or the finances to come to Ottawa to defend herself. She speaks about being a good wife and mother with this one exception. Possibly she committed an indiscretion, perhaps worse than an indiscretion. We know nothing, however, about the character of her husband. He, too, may have committed indiscretions, but I recall the saying attributed to one of the teachers in the old days. When a woman taken in adultery was brought to Him, he said: "Go and sin no more." That is not the attitude that is being taken by the house. This woman at the request of her husband, has voluntarily rendered herself sterile; then the child has been removed, not under the mandate of this parliament, and I doubt if under the mandate of a court. The child was simply carried off, and the mother is without her baby. The man is well able to support her; she is receiving no support whatever, and we have in this letter the apealing cry of motherhood:

If my husband does not love me and will be happier with someone else, I want him to do what he considers best. Only give me back my baby.

We read away back in the book of Genesis that Esau, deprived of his birthright by the trickery of his brother Jacob, "cried with an exceeding great and bitter cry." A woman who, at her husband's request, rendered herself incapable of bearing another child, has her only child torn from her, and she says: "He is only four and needs his mother. I love my baby." Then in her naive way she says: "Please won't you ask them to give him back to me."

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Does the hon. member know whether or not the statements he has read from this letter are genuine?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I prefaced what I had to say with this statement, that I had been accustomed to distinguishing between external and internal evidence. I have nothing whatever to go on with regard to the external evidence; it is not out of keeping with the evidence as presented before the senate committee, but I would say—and I have been accustomed to dealing with cases not dissimilar to this, having sat for many years on the board of a children's aid society, and I know something of what imposture is—that this letter appeals to me as being a genuine cry of a woman in trouble.

Mr. BOYS: I think a wrong impression is being left on the house and on the country. Let me say at once that I have no sympathy with a man who tries to do what is referred to in that letter, but that case is not before this house. My hon. friend, however, would almost suggest that this unfortunate woman, and many others like her, have no opportunity of presenting their defence. Does he not know that she has every opportunity of presenting her defence before the senate committee? Does he not know that, if she is without funds, she can make application and the husband will be compelled to provide her with sufficient funds to make her defence before the committee? Does the hon. member not know that he himself can go before the senate committee when the case is heard and there present a defence for this woman, or make a motion that she be called as a witness in her own behalf?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That case to which I referred had already been passed by the senate committee, and it will presently come before this house.

Mr. BOYS: We can deal with it then, when it comes before the private bills committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it will come before this house, but if I rise in my place on the second reading of the bill I shall immediately be told that I have no business whatever to discuss the details of the case in this house.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member says that this bill will come before this house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Would the divorce bills which have already been voted on, and against which my hon. friend voted, have ever had a chance of coming before the private bills committee if the action which my hon. friend and those sitting around him are taking had prevailed?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. The bills would have gone to a proper court where the cases could have been properly tried.

Mr. BROWN: The bills would have been thrown aside altogether.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There would have been a court created—

Mr. BOYS: If my hon. friend wants to help this woman, let the bill pass and then he can bring any evidence he desires before the private bills committee, and if he proves there the accusation which he has made against this man, I for one will vote against that particular bill in the committee.

Mr. BROWN: I am quite sure I will.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite sure that the stand just taken by the hon. gentleman is a credit to him, and I think it is the feeling of all the members of this house, but I would point out that it was only incidentally that I knew anything of this case. This poor woman saw in the papers that I had been speaking on divorce, and that was the only reason she knew there was such an individual in existence, and hence she took the trouble to write to me. There may be scores of cases of this kind in these three hundred that are to come before this house.

Mr. STEVENS: But surely my hon. friend does not wish to leave the impression that this woman did not know that she was being divorced. She had to receive a notice, and she could have written a letter to the senate divorce committee, or she could have appeared before that committee herself, and could have appeared there as a witness with her expenses paid.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: She could have written a letter to the committee, but it could not have been put in as evidence.

Mr. STEVENS: But she could have been called and had her expenses paid. That is the point my hon. friend is evading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no, my hon. friend is going too fast. He says that this woman could have written a letter to the senate divorce committee. I say that if she had written a letter, even if she had made an affidavit, it would not have been received before the senate committee. I am not sure whether the woman knew that she might appear before the senate committee. But further than that, it may be that she was guilty of adultery. I do not know. It is quite conceivable that she may have been guilty, but even putting the worst construction upon the situation, supposing she is guilty, should we necessarily because of that act of adultery turn her out on the street and leave her in such a position that she will be deprived of the comfort of her child? I imagine that if she appealed to the court after a divorce was granted by parliament, the court would not turn the child over to her custody. We are blocked wherever we go, and it is because we are so hopelessly blocked that I feel free to appeal to the members of this house to do something—I do not care what it is. I do not want to impede the procedure of this house, but I want parliament to take some action that will relieve us of complicity in maintaining this impossible situation. I do not know whether I can appeal successfully to the government, or to the Prime Minister. I think the Prime Minister, who is more or less responsible for the business that comes before this house, ought surely to begin to realize that we cannot indefinitely prolong this kind of thing. He has been sitting in this house for a good many years, and he must have seen that there is no adequate provision for our considering these cases in any judicial manner. He must see further that if five or six members undertake to do it, we can block the proceedings in connection with every private bill that comes before the house from now on. I do not want to do this, but I suggest that that very fact demonstrates to us that in our rules of order we have not contemplated dealing with hundreds of these cases as they now come before us.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I, as one member of the government who did vote for the bill to establish a divorce court, ask the hon. member if he does not seek to block the proceedings of this house, and is he not by his vote protesting against the opinions of his fellow-members who do not see eye to eye with him?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

An hon. MEMBER: He is a poor loser, that is all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As one who voted for the bill to establish a divorce court, I do not understand the position my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is taking, nor do I think he is going to further the chances of passing such a bill through this house by his action, if I may be permitted to say so. As one who voted for a divorce court, I do not appreciate the tactics of my hon. friend, opposing every divorce bill that comes up in order to force his fellow-members who do not see eye to eye with him to vote for a divorce procedure which they do not feel inclined to support.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not opposing every bill that comes up. I said that if I had adequate knowledge of the details of particular cases, I reserved to myself the right to vote on the merits of those cases.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend can have recourse to the committee where he can air every objection that he has to every one of these bills.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so, but the hon. gentleman must recognize that while what he says is formally correct, in practice very few members of this house are going to read through the evidence of three hundred cases, coming one by one before the private bills committee. I for one do not propose to do it. The other point that I did make this afternoon was this—

Mr. GERSHAW: Before the hon. member goes on to another case—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not going further. I have just about done.

Mr. GERSHAW: I would point out that the reading of that very sad letter conveys a rather wrong impression. The statement is made there that the woman went to have a certain operation performed at the request of her husband. I would point out that no reputable doctor and no hospital allows such a thing. It is entirely illegal for the purposes mentioned in that letter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure that my hon. friend, who is a medical man, must know, as a great many of us who are not medical men know, that operations of this kind are being performed constantly.

Mr. GERSHAW: Not for the reasons mentioned there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, even for those reasons, because this is not an isolated case. I am not suggesting that my hon. friend himself would perform such an operation, but there are medical men who will do it.

Mr. HOWDEN: I doubt very much if you could find a reputable hospital in Canada that would permit such an operation.

Mr. BROWN: I would ask the hon. member, how can he maintain consistency by saying that he is going to vote on the merits of each bill—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not.

Mr. BROWN: I understood my hon. friend to say that he was going to vote on the merits of the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no, the hon. gentleman is mistaken. My own position is this: I said at the very beginning that I took the position personally—it is entirely a personal matter—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has elapsed.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Before speaking on the principle of the bill, may I, in order to clear up any misunderstanding there may be as to the powers of this parliament in legislative and judicial matters, read paragraph 844 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> The proceedings of parliament in passing private bills partake of both a judicial and legislative character. The promoters of the bill appear as suitors while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties to the suit. The former may prove that their own interests will be advanced by the success of the bill and no one may urge any objection; yet, if the house apprehends that the bill will be hurtful to the community, it may be rejected.

I would not undertake to define exactly what constitutes a bill of divorce, but in view of the fact that to-day we have on the order paper seventy-seven divorce bills, I think the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant our careful consideration. What would happen if we had seventy-seven railway bills, or seventy-seven patent bills, or the same number of any other kind of private bills? We would not pass them as a mere matter of form. Yet these divorce bills strike at the very root of the nation, at the family itself. A former minister of justice, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, who occupied that office in the late Conservative government, defines a bill of divorce in these words:

> An act that grants a divorce is a private act, like any other private act. The house as well as the senate must enact it. The parties come here asking for it, just as they come with other private bills when they want to get something that the general law of the country does not give them. And it is precisely because the general law of the country says: once you are married you can never marry again while your consort is alive, that when one wants to be relieved of the operation of that general law, he comes to the parliament of Canada and asks for a law for himself; and each one of these petitioners goes away, where he succeeds, carrying with him a law that is a law for him —a law that takes him out of the operation of the general law.

This view is also shared by the Hon. Mr. Nickle, a former distinguished member of this house, who on one occasion introduced a divorce bill, and after a long discussion it was passed, but it failed in the senate. At the time Mr. Nickle said:

> It is well known to every member that any person who has the means and cares to present a petition to parliament if he is in a position to demonstrate that adultery has been committed has a moral right to divorce, but in Ontario and Quebec, because we have no divorce courts, there is no legal right to divorce.

Mr. BOYS: Does not my hon. friend agree that there is no general divorce law either in Ontario or in Quebec? Therefore, so far as those provinces are concerned, there is no forum except parliament before which parties seeking a divorce may appear.

Mr. MARCIL: Divorce is not recognized either in Ontario or in Quebec.

Mr. BOYS: There is no divorce court in either province; that is the point.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not want to quote again the views of Sir Hector Langevin which I gave to the house last week, but he was solicitor general when the British North America Act was passed, and he said then that they were not introducing the principle of divorce either in Ontario or in Quebec. However, they found divorce courts already established in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and therefore the matter had to be taken into consideration with regard to the other two provinces. The fathers of confederation were wise men. They decided not to establish divorce courts in Ontario and Quebec, but to place the power of granting divorce in the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and in this way make it more difficult to secure a divorce; for they were of opinion that it would not be in the interest of the country to facilitate the granting of divorce. Their wisdom was proved by the fact that in the following ten years only seven applications for divorce were granted by parliament. Last year there were 785 divorces. I am glad that there are two provinces in this Dominion with an admirable record in matters of divorce—Prince Edward Island and Quebec. I respect the views of every member of this house. The people of the west may have different ideas on the subject. The Divorce Act, passed in 1857, has been applied to the western country. At the time that the member for West Calgary introduced the measure before the house with regard to Alberta and Saskatchewan, it was argued that the hearing of these cases by the courts would reduce the number of applications for divorce; but the very contrary has happened. And if we establish divorce courts in Ontario and Quebec the same thing would happen. The people of these two provinces have a right to divorce courts if they so decide, but up to the present they have decided that they do not want such courts. Neither province has yet asked for the establishment of divorce courts. I question very much, even if we had passed the bill recently introduced to establish a divorce court in Ontario, whether we would have been acting within our powers, for the British North America Act, as has been said repeatedly, is a contract between the various provinces, and the consent of the Ontario legislature would have to be secured before we could impose a divorce court on the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have agreed not to discuss the evidence in this or any other case at the present stage, for the very good reason that that evidence is not yet before us, not yet having been dealt with by the private bills committee of this house. In the old days nine senators were required to form the senate divorce committee, but to-day I notice that that committee is composed of only five members. I do not know whether they have to be unanimous or whether a bare majority could accept the evidence adduced before them as being sufficient to warrant a divorce; but in the latter event we would have three senators reporting in favour of a divorce bill their report of course being accepted by the senate, and then in turn this would be automatically accepted by the private bills committee of this house if we followed the usual practice. To this we object. The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) objects on another ground: he desires to have these cases sent to a divorce court to be set up in Ontario. I object to divorce on the ground that marriage is sacred, that it is a contract for life and cannot be dissolved except by the death of one of the parties. That was the view in England for eighteen hundred years until the passing of the Divorce Act in 1857. But before that time the matrimonial courts annulled marriage for certain reasons. In Quebec we have what are known as judicial separations. Under this procedure husband and wife may separate, and at the same time fair and reasonable provision may be made for alimony and for the custody of the children. We cannot do that; all we can do is to grant a divorce. By so doing we throw the children out on the street and put the guilty party on the same footing as the innocent. So we are establishing in effect the principle of polygamy, for a man may secure a divorce this year, marry again, and next year apply for another divorce, and, that having been granted, marry again, and continue this course indefinitely.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will admit, however, that the injured party is denied in Ontario or Quebec the right of redress that is available in all the other provinces.

Mr. MARCIL: They get no redress here.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But the hon. member will not deny that in any of the provinces the courts are there for the purpose of giving redress.

Mr. MARCIL: That may be an argument in favour of sending it to the courts. But at the present time the principal reason why these divorces are becoming so numerous is that there are certain classes of people who get married to-day with the idea that if matters do not go as they expect they can always resort to a divorce court, and if that is not effective in the province in which they reside they can come to parliament, believing that in doing so they automatically obtain a divorce. When they come here they ask a favour; it is a law of exception in this case, because there is no divorce law in either Ontario or Quebec.

I do not wish to delay the house, Mr. Speaker, when the majority have declared in favour of divorce, but I think it my duty to show the grave responsibility which parliament assumes in allowing this state of things to continue. I should like to cite a few words to indicate what has taken place in the United States. Let me quote the Rev. Dr. Gwynne on Divorce in America under State and Church. This reverend gentleman is secretary of an association in the United States whose object it is to preserve among all peoples, irrespective of creed and race, respect for the sanctity of marriage. This body is known as the Sanctity of Marriage Association. I quote:

Let us now look at some results of this anarchic condition of our legislation, as they are seen in the official reports of the Bureau of the Census. It is not until 1876 that we get any authoritative information in regard to divorce in the United States. The following table shows the increase for fifty years, in ten-year periods:

Ten years ending Dec. 31, '76..	122,121
Ten years ending Dec. 31, '86..	206,595
Ten years ending Dec. 31, '96..	352,263
Ten years ending Dec. 31, '06..	593,362
Ten years ending Dec. 31, '16..	975,728
Total..	2,250,069
Total of persons separated in fifty years..	4,500,138
Total of minor children made orphans in fifty years..	1,689,662
Total of persons bereft or dishonoured in fifty years..	6,189,800

That is what divorce is accomplishing. There was a time when divorce was practically non-existent in this country, but it exists to-day, and if it continues it will be ten times worse ten years from now. In my opinion therefore we should call a halt; divorce should not be granted by parliament at all. In the provinces where divorce is granted the matter is largely one of provincial rights, civil rights being within the province; the solemnization of marriage comes within the purview of the province. For these reasons I can add only one more objection to the principle of divorce and declare that I will oppose it as strenuously as I can every time the opportunity presents itself.

One point is raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) as to increasing the grounds on which divorce may be granted, and not confining it simply to adultery. I do not know why in Canada the cause has been limited to adultery; I do not know on what ground we proceed, whether it is the practice in England. But I find in this book of the Rev. Dr. Gwynne, with an introduction by Doctor Manning, quotations from the Bible which I do not care to read now seeing that they are familiar to all hon. members of this house—quotations from St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, and verbatim utterances from our Lord and Saviour; and there is absolutely nothing in all these references which authorizes the remarriage of divorced persons. There is no authority in the Bible for it. So that on what ground divorce has been limited here to the single cause of adultery I fail to see. If we were to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre we might adopt the practice of the United States. There is only one state in the American Union which has never established a divorce court, and that is South Carolina; but in the other states they have as many as fifty-two different causes for divorce. A man is divorced in one state and is married in another, and so on, and altogether there is a most chaotic state of confusion. For many years in the United States a strong effort has been made for the limitation to the federal authorities of the granting of divorce, in order to stem the ravages of the evil. I will say no more, and I hope that more of us who are conscientiously opposed to divorce, and who realize its ravages, will take the opportunity when it arises to voice their opinion, because they know in their inmost hearts that divorce in Canada has reached the stage where it has become a real and a grave problem.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I was in hopes that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would give an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I believe that everyone in the house agrees that the question now before us is one of great importance; it is important not only to the individuals who may be concerned in the bills before parliament, but from the point of view of parliament itself; and it is also important to the general public. We were told by the sponsor of this bill that the people of Ontario were not ready for divorce courts. I might reply with equal confidence and authority and tell the hon. gentleman that the people of Canada are not yet ready for the kind of thing we are doing; and if the people of Ontario are refusing to have divorce courts then I as a member of this house am prepared to refuse to follow the present course. Then where does my hon. friend get? I hope the seriousness of the question will induce the Prime Minister or some other member of the government to indicate to the house some reasonable way out. I would suggest that we either, first of all, drop all divorce cases; or secondly that we take them seriously, considering them as they ought to be considered, in a dignified manner, and enlarging the powers of parliament to deal with all phases of divorce, giving authority to the senate committee to look after the children of divorced people, and also the power to deal separately with the cases which may come before the committee, from the point of view of remarriage and on the basis of the merits of each individual case; or, in the third place, if we do not do that, that we proceed as early as possible to refer the matter to the proper courts to deal with. Now, what course shall we pursue?

Mr. ARTHURS: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister is more responsible for the situation than I am.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. A point of order has been raised.

Mr. ARTHURS: A good deal of this debate has evidently been out of order. There is a rule of the house which provides distinctly that questions arising in a previous debate in the same session may not be referred to. In this house a bill has been introduced and carried forward to second reading, and which was passed by another house of this parliament, providing for the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario. The whole subject matter of many of the speeches of hon. members who, shall I say, are delaying this house, has consisted in the fact that they are offended by the action of this parliament, to which they should be subject. We have passed upon this matter for this session at least, and any hon. member speaking to any divorce bill before this parliament, either now or during the rest of this session, should be confined strictly to the merits or demerits of the particular case which he is discussing.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no objection to the remarks of my hon. friend; I am glad to note that they do not apply to me. I am just about to conclude my remarks by asking that the Prime Minister or some member of the government respond to the urgent appeal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), not only in respect to the present bill before the house but in respect to other bills of the same character which will come before the house later. I have pointed out the courses open to this parliament, as I see them. I do not suppose any hon. member wishes to be associated with the present way of doing this kind of business. If the bill we are now considering goes to the private bills committee, where we may obtain information which will enable us to pass the bill in committee and send it back to the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the hon. member is well taken in principle; when the house has passed judgment on a question that question cannot be revived during the same session, but may be revived at another session. However, as I stated the other day, various divorce bills have been introduced, one of which is now before the house; some hon. members are in favour of these bills while others oppose them, as is their right, and it is rather difficult to determine the difference between the general principle of whether or not a divorce court should be established and the point at issue. It is all the same question and I cannot prevent the speakers who oppose these particular divorce bills from bringing up their objections against the principle of divorce itself. However, it is easy for so able a parliamentarian as the hon. member now speaking to confine his remarks as much as possible to the bill presently before the house.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall endeavour so to do; my only reference to the matter to which Your Honour alludes was made in reply to the statement of the sponsor of the bill. I am sorry he was so sadly out of order and I am sorry I followed him in that regard.

I turn again to the Prime Minister in the hope that he will show us some way out of the dilemma, because it must be clear to every hon. member of the house that if we are seriously to consider the three hundred divorce bills which will come before us, we must either sit continuously or not do the work very well. I believe the Prime Minister must agree that this matter of divorce has become too great a task for this parliament to undertake. It is one thing for parliament to have the constitutional right to grant a divorce or a separation when such a thing occurs once a year or something like that, but it is another thing for parliament to consider three hundred of these bills each year together with all the other things to which we must give our attention. That is the situation which has developed during recent years, and that is the situation to which I hope the Prime Minister will address himself now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That I may be in order I would make it clear that I am simply seeking to answer a question relating largely to procedure. I gather that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is of the view that by this time the government should see that this method of dealing with divorce bills is anything but satisfactory, or in other words that under the present method it is within the power of a few members of this house to block the entire business of parliament, if they so desire, in order to demonstrate their dissatisfaction with the prevailing system of granting divorces through the agency of private bills.

I must confess that up to the present time I have not been able to see a way of dealing with these matters other than by a divorce court on the one hand or by private bills on the other. As my hon. friend is aware, during the present session this house decided against a divorce court for the province of Ontario, and that method cannot be considered again at this time. Until some other method suggests itself I fail to see a better way of dealing with the situation than that which has prevailed heretofore. I think the discussion which has taken place so far and what has been demonstrated as to the amount of time which will be consumed if all individual bills for divorce are to be considered in this house, have made it evident that some method other than that at present in force should be followed, but I would remind hon. gentlemen that the matter is not one to be solved in a moment or by the stroke of a pen. I will say to hon. members of the house that the government will continue as we have been doing to give very serious thought to this question; I could not promise that we will find a solution during this session of parliament, but I would express the hope that by another session, by conference in the interval with members of the house and by other methods, we may find it possible to effect some arrangement which will enable those seeking divorce to secure such redress as should be given them by a means which will commend itself more completely to parliament and avoid a recurrence of a situation such as we have at the moment.

I can only appeal to the common sense of the house in this matter; the government must follow the rules of parliament and the government wish to uphold the rules. It might be possible for the remainder of the present session to allow bills to pass second reading and to go to the committee as has been the case in the past, and for hon. members who wish to raise objections to particular bills, to raise those objections in the committee, it being understood that between now and next session the members of the government and other hon. members of the house will do what they can towards finding some means of freeing parliament from the necessity of continuing to deal with divorce bills along the lines which we have followed thus far.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the Prime Minister takes his seat may I ask a question? It seems to me that the answer given is very satisfactory as far as it goes, but we must consider what we are to do for the remainder of this session. I have raised the objection that a number of hon. gentlemen are not competent to sit in judgment on these bills nor because of their religious convictions on this particular question are they competent to be members of the private bills committee. Would it be possible for us to follow the precedent set by the senate, by which divorce bills are sent not to their private bills committee but to a special committee composed of those who have an open mind in regard to the question of divorce? I do not ask for an answer on this point to-day, but I would suggest to the Prime Minister that possibly this might be a way out even for this session. We might appoint a special committee composed of those who are not on principle committed one way or the other; that might relieve the pressure on the private bills committee and at the same time permit of greater impartiality in these matters than is possible under the present system.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to say just a word in support of the attitude taken by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has made himself absolutely ridiculous by his attitude on this question. The hon. member introduced a bill in this house, as was his right; that bill was defeated by the votes of hon. members who have an equal right to express their views. The hon. member was not a good enough sport to take his—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon. member would speak a little louder I would be able to hear him.

Mr. McGIBBON: I hope the hon. member will be equally pleased when he does hear what I have to say. I say that the hon. member was not even a good sport; he introduced a bill into this house, which he had a perfect right to do—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to a point of order. It has not been my conception of order in this house that personalities could be exchanged between one member and another in describing the action taken by a particular member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not gather that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has made any personal reference to an hon. member, but he falls into another error; he is referring to a past debate of this session.

Mr. McGIBBON: It was not my intention to discuss the personality of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), or that of any other member in this house; I am simply discussing the attitude he has taken when, having been defeated on a certain bill, he still persists in blocking the business of the house. As one coming from the province of Ontario, and as one who voted against that divorce bill, I say, with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), that this debate is not facilitating the purpose he has in view. When the province of Ontario asks for a divorce court then it will be time enough for this house to consider it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member in order in discussing a question which has been already disposed of by this house?

Mr. STEVENS: We have been discussing it for two weeks.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to the present bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know whether or not you are complimenting me, Mr. Speaker, when you restrict me within narrower limits than has been the case with other hon. members who have spoken on these bills. We in the province of Ontario are not going to be dictated to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, either on this question or on any other. If he thinks he is going to gain his object by blocking the business of parliament in order to force upon the province of Ontario something which it has not as yet asked for, he is taking the wrong way to accomplish his ends.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has in a very few words this afternoon done much to eliminate the present source of trouble and pave the way to a serious and constructive settlement, not only of the bills which may come up this year, but of the whole question. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it has been psychologically impossible to discuss any one of these bills without discussing what I call the basic principle of them all. The comment on rule 92 which was read a moment ago by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), illustrates the whole system. The private legislation dealt with in paragraph 844 refers only to occasional private bills; but these hundreds of divorce bills arise from this fact, or principle of law, that matters have to be dealt with as private legislation, either by parliament or by the local legislatures, according to the subject, when they cannot be dealt with properly by courts of judicature.

It has been made quite clear during the course of these debates that this method, call it obstruction if you like, is the most effective manner in which to bring to the consciousness of the house and of the country the importance of this question. This discussion has made at least one point clear in the minds of many members of both houses—a point which had been quite obscure in the minds of the people of the country, and certainly in the province of Quebec—that applications for divorce do not come to parliament merely and exclusively as petitions from certain individuals to obtain the redress of certain individual grievances. It has been amply demonstrated that petitions for divorce come before this parliament because, under our constitution—as far as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned—this is the only legislative and judicial body which can deal with the question. I have endeavoured, without any spirit of antagonism or animosity toward anyone, to bring home to the minds of the hon. members of the house the fact that this question must be dealt with one of these days in a radical fashion.

Therefore, to that extent, I agree with the hon. member for Bonaventure; but in order to respond in a sympathetic spirit to the invitation of the right hon. the Prime Minister to all members of the house to present their views towards the satisfactory settlement of this important question, I must take exception to other comments which have been made by the hon. member for Bonaventure. The hon. member for Bonaventure has referred to the declarations made at the time of the Quebec resolution by Sir Hector Langevin when these very important questions of marriage and divorce were being discussed. I understood the hon. member for Bonaventure to take the same view as did Sir Hector Langevin, that jurisdiction respecting marriage and divorce had been confined to this parliament in order to prevent the extension of divorce to Ontario and Quebec which had not been afflicted with that plague. But Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin did not realize that in wishing to avoid one issue they simply raised a broader one. They did not consent to have divorce enacted for Ontario and Quebec, but they had divorce enacted for the whole of Canada including Ontario and Quebec. They forgot that basic principle of the constitution to which I referred the other day, and to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) replied, "Well, it is elementary law": the moment you establish a principle of law you assume the moral obligation to supply the judicial mechanism to put it into practice. My point of view is that the parliament of Canada, having accepted the responsibility of legislating upon marriage and divorce for the whole of Canada including Ontario and Quebec, has left itself open to the receipt of petitions from any inhabitant of Ontario and Quebec. They can apply to this parliament for a divorce, parliament acting in its dual capacity of a legislative body and a court of justice.

That brings us back to the awkward position which was described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). If we are a court of law, then he is absolutely right when he says that my humble self, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), the hon. member for Bonaventure, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and many others are prejudiced upon principle upon these questions. In fact, if we are imbued with the basic principles of our creed it is just as wrong for us to vote for any divorce law or any individual divorce bill, as it would be to vote for a bill of this house similar to those introduced into the English parliament in the time of Elizabeth, or Edward VI, or Henry VIII, declaring that the practices of our religion were blasphemy. It would arouse the indignation, not only of every Catholic member, but of every fair-minded member of the house to put us back to the days of the sixteenth century and to ask parliament to place the stamp of blasphemy upon any article or creed of religion believed in by any hon. member. We have, thank Heaven! passed those days in every part of the British Empire.

I admit, I repeat, that we went for years without reflecting upon the basic issue contained in these bills, but now we are realizing it; and my purpose in raising these debates was simply to bring to the attention of hon. members that, believing as we do, we cannot go on doing what we have done for years past, proclaiming to our people that we are opposed to the principle of divorce, and then letting pass every bill of divorce that comes before the house. It has been said that we ought not to vote for the principle of divorce, if contained in a bill transmitting from this parliament to another body, a court of justice, a jurisdiction granted to parliament by the constitution to be exercised in a judicial manner; in other words, that we cannot transfer to a court of justice those powers which we exercise, but that the principle of divorce is not contained in the three hundred bills before us. That opinion may be held by very respectable people in Quebec, including priests, but I do not think it is good teaching, good law or even good common sense.

Therefore in that spirit I suggest to the members of the government; in the same spirit I suggest to the leading men of the opposition, including and beginning with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who is undoubtedly one of the best legal minds of the country, that they approach this question with a spirit absolutely foreign to any thought of party gain or appeal to this province or that, to this creed or that. We will accomplish nothing if we approach the question from the point of view of party gain. There are in the house a large number of members representing millions of law-abiding citizens who are opposed to divorce on principle and who are horrified at the manner in which divorce has grown, just as there are other members who, in an equally respectable manner, one which would call for my respect if not for my adherence, would be horrified at the idea of the house adopting from year to year a series of measures that would, for example, prepare the way for the breaking of the British Empire. To me it would not appeal as much as it would to them, but I would respect their viewpoint. Therefore I think this question should be approached at the same time from the viewpoint of those who are opposed to divorce and from that of those who, not being opposed to divorce, want divorce granted or refused according to some principle of law or practice and some respect for equity.

It has been suggested that if we amend the rules of parliament with respect to divorce bills, we could see, for example, that justice is done to the children; that something is done for the support of the innocent party and the children who may remain in the custody of the innocent party. But there again you strike the rock of constitutional objection, because we cannot deal here with civil rights or property. We are entirely precluded from that. So that my humble contribution to the preparation of a remedy for the situation is to repeat what I said last week. Let us go to the root of the question and, finding that the whole problem of marriage and divorce is intimately connected with the matter of civil rights, with the matter of property; that already all the provinces of Canada have exclusive jurisdiction over the solemnization of marriage, let us come back to the spirit of the constitution and simplify the whole matter by handing the whole problem over to the provinces. This is the only way that we can get rid of the objections, and that we can at the same time give satisfaction to Catholics and to Protestants, to believers in the principle and practice of divorce and to those who do not believe in it.

Moreover, it is the only manner in which we can ascertain whether Ontario wants a divorce court or not. Some say Ontario wants it; some say it does not. Without referring to any past debate I say to-day that I do not yet know. Personally I would be prepared to vote to-morrow for a court of divorce for the people of Ontario if they wanted it, but I have no evidence to that effect. But if we hand the matter over to the provinces, then the people of Ontario, through their legislature which deals with civil rights, with the solemnization of marriage, with property, will be able to take up the whole question of marriage and divorce and establish courts of adjudication to pass judgment upon those questions as upon other questions of civil rights and property. This is the best we can do, and it is the suggestion I offer. I am quite sure if the solution were taken up in a broad way by representatives of the various parties in the house, they would secure for it the agreement of an overwhelming majority of the people of this country irrespective of creed, race and province, because it is the sensible solution, the solution in keeping with the constitution.

Moreover, a point which has not yet been understood, in the province of Quebec, at least, and which I want to emphasize now is this: that if courts of divorce, as Sir Hector Langevin pointed out and as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) pointed out this afternoon, were established in the eastern provinces prior to confederation, the courts of divorce working at present in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan were established by federal legislation. This was unknown to the people of Quebec until a few weeks ago. I have seen printed in works that are considered as classics in Quebec, the statement that the Dominion parliament should not start the precedent of establishing divorce courts because it had never done so before; that divorce courts existed in the seven provinces because those provinces established them. Therefore, a classical author whose work is used in several of the colleges in Quebec, ignored the fact that the divorce courts of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta existed only under the operation of two federal acts, one passed in 1886, if my memory serves me aright, establishing in Manitoba all English laws as had been in force on the 15th July, 1870, and the other passed, I think, two years afterwards, establishing also all English laws in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The result was the introduction, under federal legislation, of the divorce law of England of 1857 in those three provinces.

And what about the judicature? This is a most interesting point, which exemplifies the point I made last week, and which was immediately ratified, so to speak, by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). When a divorce case was taken before the supreme court of Saskatchewan, the judge excused himself on the ground of having no jurisdiction. He said: I see no statute conferring jurisdiction upon me to adjudicate upon divorce. The question was taken to the privy council and the privy council, putting into force that long-standing principle of British jurisprudence, declared: Where there is a law there is a tribunal to adjudicate upon it; and since the federal parliament of Canada has thought proper to introduce all English laws, including the divorce law, in the province of Saskatchewan, there must be a court of law to adjudicate upon such issues, and the supreme court of Saskatchewan, which exercises the same jurisdiction as similar courts in other provinces or in England, is the tribunal to which every ratepayer of that province has the right to appeal. All those questions were absolutely unknown to the people of the province of Quebec, and I dare say to the people of the province of Ontario.

These debates, Mr. Speaker, have not been useless, let my hon. friends on all sides admit. They have been raised, not for the pleasure of obstructing legislation or playing upon the nerves of anybody, but so far at least as I am concerned, and I think in this matter I can speak for my hon. friends on the other side, with the sincere object of finding a solution for one of the most important problems of government, of legislation and of public order. These days have not been lost, these debates have not been in vain, and if the Prime Minister, with the help of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), after consultation with the members of this house and with enlightened men from the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario can find a solution for this great problem, they may be assured that after some years have passed, it will be looked upon as one of the most important achievements of this parliament. It will have been a greater service done to the country than the passing of many of the appropriations and administrative bills which this house spends many hours discussing every session. I do not say this in any spirit of disparagement of hon. members who take more interest in other questions, but simply because in my opinion this is a more important problem.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, to put a practical conclusion to these remarks, I may say that for this session I am prepared to let pass on division the second reading of these bills. I do not promise to let them pass through the committee and receive their third reading without pointing out some discrepancies in the evidence, but I admit at once—as this question was put to me the other day by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys)—that the question of evidence, so far as I am concerned, is entirely subordinate to the question of principle. I consent to let this procedure go on for this year because, as the Prime Minister says, a question of this nature, with all its complexities, cannot be settled at once. Indeed, if the Prime Minister had suggested that he was prepared to settle it this week, I would have taken advantage of my years and have advised him to make haste slowly because this is an important matter. At the same time I request from him, as a Canadian citizen, more so than as a member of parliament, and I request also of his colleagues, and of the members of the opposition, and of every member of this house, that they give sincere and serious consideration to this problem and be prepared to make to the house whatever constructive suggestions they may have, so that we may bring to this vexed question a solution that will be as much in harmony as possible with the requirements of the various provinces and of Canada at large.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I call the other divorce bills on the order paper separately, putting a motion for each bill?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Whilst we are yielding, and quite rightly, I think, after hearing the Prime Minister, I think the least that we can do is to have the motion for each bill put separately, and the sponsor of the bill should be in his place as is the case with other bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no objection. That is the rule.

THE I'M ALONE INCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether or not we shall have the publication at an early date of the notes passed between the United States and Canada with regard to the I'm Alone.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I anticipate that in the next day or two, possibly by Wednesday, we shall be able to lay the paper on the table.

SUPPLY—PROCEDURE

RESUMING ON THURSDAY OR FRIDAY DEBATE ON AMENDMENT

On the order for the house to go into committee of supply:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): When the house rose the other afternoon, by reason of six o'clock being reached, there was under discussion a motion moved by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) in amendment to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair. Last year we followed with respect to such motions a practice which I understand has met with some expressions of disapproval. It will be recalled that the then member for Victoria, B.C., Mr. Tolmie, moved an amendment, when the house was moved into supply, expressing regret that no action had been taken to prevent the importation into Canada of certain fruits. The motion was discussed but had not been concluded when the house rose, and the next day the Speaker left the chair as a matter of course. Later a motion in similar terms was moved by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson), and on that motion the vote was subsequently taken. The practice then followed would involve in this instance the moving of the amendment made the other day, but proposed by an hon. member other than the hon. gentleman who then proposed the amendment. In order that the matter might be considered by the house the hon. member for Leeds gave notice to revive his motion, so that we might settle the practice if possible and have no uncertainty about it in the future. Having regard to what took place last year it is desirable that we should decide the question in some manner. I have not indicated how, in my opinion, it should be settled, but I felt that it might be decided by Your Honour, in view of what might be said by hon. gentlemen sitting on the government side of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Friday evening I anticipated the possibility of this matter coming up to-day and I expressed then what I felt to be the view, with respect to the rule as it had been drawn up, of a committee of this house, which presented its report to the house, which report was subsequently adopted. If the committee had intended that motions introduced on Wednesdays as amendments to the motion for the house to go into supply should be similar to like amendments on Mondays or Tuesdays, I think they would, in the report they presented to the house, have pronounced themselves to that effect. The rule provides that an amendment which is moved on Wednesday drops unless it is then concluded. Last year, as my hon. friend says, there was a discussion with respect to reviving a motion which had been brought in on Wednesday, as an amendment to the motion to go into supply, and Your Honour, addressing the house, expressed the view that if the motion had been submitted in good faith by the hon. member who moved it on a Wednesday, the house, controlling its own procedure, would be at liberty to allow the motion to be revived. Members on the government side accepted the view expressed by hon. members opposite that the motion had been introduced in good faith, on the assumption that it might be revived at a subsequent time, notwithstanding the rule which provided that it should be dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the rule say that it should be dropped?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the rule is that it is dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think that order No. 7 went as far as that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I wished to make the other evening is this: While for the reasons stated, that course was taken last year, we feel, now that the matter is coming up anew, we should know definitely whether it was the intention of the house at the time the rule was adopted to have it apply to Wednesday amendments in a manner similar to amendments moved on going into supply on Mondays. If Mr. Speaker deems this to have been the intention of the committee which amended the rules the government will of course accept whatever His Honour may direct. But I do submit there was an intention in the minds of the committee that motions brought in on Wednesdays as amendments on going into supply should be treated differently from those brought in on Mondays or Tuesdays.

Mr. BENNETT: As this is a point of order and I have already made some observations, perhaps I may be permitted to add a few more words with respect to it. I think the point the Prime Minister has raised overlooks the fact that the real reason behind this is that the Speaker has left the chair. On Thursday he leaves the chair automatically; on Wednesday the amendment was that he do not now leave the chair. But having left the chair on Thursday automatically without motion it follows that it is very difficult to continue the discussion on the amendment that he shall not leave the chair when he has already done so. That was the real difficulty we had to meet last year and which we did meet in the manner I have indicated. Perhaps Your Honour has before you the journal showing what we did in those circumstances when the member for Halton moved an identical motion to that moved by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., because of the fact that the Speaker having left the chair you could not continue a debate on a motion that he do not now leave the chair, for in reality what we were endeavouring to prevent happening had already happened—he had automatically without motion put left the chair. That is the real difficulty that has to be met either by reviving the rule or the practice we made continuing last year.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last year the member for Victoria, B.C., when a motion was made that I should leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply, moved an amendment thereto on the dumping duties, if I remember well. The debate went on until the house ajourned. The next day was Thursday and automatically I did leave the chair when the motion was made to go into supply. Then later on the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) rose to address the house, two or three days afterwards, on the 10th of May, I think. Prior to that as objection was taken that the debate had lapsed, I quoted what May says, page 476:

If an adjourned debate on such an amendment is standing upon the order paper when supply, for consideration of which in committee it is not necessary to propose the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair, is to be taken, the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate is removed, and procedure on the amendment lapses, in order that the Speaker, in obedience to standing order 28 may leave the chair without question put.

Last year my ruling was that if the procedure had lapsed the question itself did not lapse. A question which has been decided by the house is a judgment of the house and it cannot be revived during that session. But when as in that particular instance the procedure lapses it does not follow that the question itself lapses and it can be revived. Here is what May says at page 234, 12th edition:

When an order of the day has been read, the proceedings thereon may be cut short by the adjournment of the house whilst those proceedings are in course of transaction, or before their resumption, when they have been postponed at a quarter past eight o'clock. An order of the day, in such cases or if, when the order is read, no day is appointed for its future consideration, drops off the notice paper, as the house has made no order thereon.

That is the case in the present instance.

In committee the same result may be produced, either by a failure of a quorum of the house, or by a resolution directing the chairman to leave the chair. To replace a dropped order of the day upon the notice paper, a motion is made before the commencement, or after the close, of public business, to appoint the order for a subsequent day. These motions, which are made without notice, are usually treated as purely formal motions.

In the British system of parliamentary government the greatest latitude is given in regard to freedom of speech and the discussion of public matters, and when a question accidentally lapses by some definite rule that question may be revived. It is a dropped order, as May says, and it can be revived. In the present instance the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), having given due notice to revive his lapsed motion is perfectly in order in taking it up to-day. Last year—and I speak from memory—the motion was not made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson), but as far as I remember there was an agreement between both sides of the house that the question should come to an issue and the hon. member simply continued the debate.

I therefore rule that the present motion is in order; the superseded debate can be revived, subject of course to the decision of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: There is another point, based upon your present ruling, Mr. Speaker, which will require decision ultimately; that is the question of whether, with respect to the revived debate, those who spoke upon it formerly have the right to speak again as though it were a new motion, or whether, being revived, it is a resumption of the debate rather than a new discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a dropped order but the house revives it. What has been said before cannot be repeated. The debate simply continues. Those who have not spoken on the motion may speak, but those who have already spoken may not speak again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to ask another question with regard to the revival of a motion of this kind. Is any latitude to be given as to the time within which a motion is to be revived? Would it be the first day thereafter on which the Speaker is in the chair and a motion is made for the house to go into supply, or may it be revived at any time before the end of the session?

Mr. SPEAKER: The notice is given; then the motion is called and it is for the house to decide if it will carry or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This debate was discontinued on Wednesday; it could not be continued on Thursday or Friday because on those days Your Honour left the chair automatically. Should the motion to revive the amendment necessarily come on the first day we seek to go into supply thereafter, or may it come at any time during the remainder of the session?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think it would be the first day, as a matter of practice.

Mr. SPEAKER: May says:

To replace a dropped order of the day upon the notice paper, a motion is made before the commencement, or after the close, of public business, to appoint the order for a subsequent day.

I must give a broad application to this practice; the motion should be presented at the earliest moment, because it is liable to be dropped again. Of course, when the motion is made for the revival of this dropped order it is for the house to say whether or not it wishes the question to be revived. The house may vote either for or against the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to point out that on Friday evening I made it quite clear that with regard to this motion the government had no intention of opposing its revival; I simply intended to bring to the attention of the house the anomaly which now has arisen with reference amongst other things, to the future date when the motion might be revived.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it important that we should have this matter settled because, as Your Honour has already intimated, it is a question which undoubtedly may arise frequently during the remainder of this session. If a substantive motion to revive is necessary it seems only necessary for me to point out that, since the government has a majority, the motion never may be revived and therefore could not be dealt with, which is exactly the opposite to what His Honour the Speaker now intimates should be done. That was one of the reasons which influenced us last year in adopting the practice suggested by Your Honour, instead of reviving it by a substantive motion, as perhaps the Prime Minister will recall, in order that no question might arise with respect to the fact that the Speaker had automatically left the chair in the meantime and it would seem senseless to move an amendment which would prevent him from leaving the chair when he had already left it. The suggestion of Your Honour on that occasion was that someone on this side of the house, if he so desired, when the Speaker was about to leave the chair on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday could move an amendment in terms similar to those of the amendment previously moved. The reason that the amendment could be in the same terms was the reason just given by Your Honour, namely that the house had not decided the question. Once the house decides the question it may not again be heard during the current session, but the house not having decided it and there being no expression of the will of the house with respect to the matter, as the authorities put it, it was thought desirable that we should revive the motion by moving a new motion. The Prime Minister has pointed out, and I believe this was in the mind of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), that if the motion is revived we are reviving something which has been disposed of by the house already through the Speaker leaving the chair automatically; therefore the motion that the Speaker do not leave the chair is no longer one which could be intelligently placed before the house with respect to that matter. The ruling of last year certainly offered a logical solution of the difficulty, namely that the opposition might, if it so desired, move a substantive motion in terms exactly similar to those of the motion which had lapsed by reason of the Speaker leaving the chair at six o'clock and supply being carried on next day by reason of the fact that the Speaker left the chair automatically. That is the real difficulty as I see it, and I think we should arrive at a solution which will avoid inconvenience, difficulty or acrimonious misunderstandings in the future.

Mr. SPEAKER: These seems to be an agreement with regard to the continuation of this debate, so I will ask hon. gentlemen to allow me to write my ruling in this case. At all events, my ruling to-day is substantially the same as that given last year.

Mr. DUNNING: If the suggestion of the leader of the opposition were followed it would bring up the difficulty as to speakers once again. If the motion is a new motion, which I understand was the case under last year's procedure, I take it that a new debate opens immediately in which those who participated in the former debate could take part, and because of that fact we might have an endless succession of speakers. The method suggested to-day by Your Honour avoids that difficulty; the motion for revival brings about the continuation of a former debate, which preserves the order of speaking just as though the debate had not been interrupted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last year the hon. member for Halton,—I speak from memory,—when he rose to speak, said he intended to present a motion similar to the one which had been dropped, but I have no recollection that he did make the motion; there was an agreement on both sides that there should be a revival of the debate. If I may be allowed to do so I will give my ruling in writing, so as to fix what seems to me sound jurisprudence.

Mr. BENNETT: The Journals of the house of Monday, May 14, 1928, at page 403, show:

Mr. Anderson (Halton), seconded by Mr. Stirling, moved in amendment thereto:

That all the words after the word "that" be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:—

"in the opinion of this house the necessary action should be taken by the government forthwith to effectively control the importation into Canada either on sale, or on consignment, of natural products of a class or kind produced in Canada, under conditions which prejudicially or injuriously affect, or threaten to prejudicially or injuriously affect the interests of Canadian producers.

That was a motion which had been moved by the hon. member Victoria (Mr. Tolmie).

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know whether it would be possible for Your Honour to modify your decision of last session. At that time I thought that it was a slightly erroneous decision in view of the precedents which I had then gathered together. These precedents showed that the motion and the proposed amendment thereto on the next day on which a motion was necessary to go into supply were entered by the Clerk of the House upon the orders for that day. In the minds of previous speakers of this house it was considered as a motion which had been temporarily superseded and which revived of itself without any further substantive motion. I have not the precedents with me to-day, but at that time I thought there was just a shade of difference between them and what I understood to be Your Honour's decision on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As Your Honour has thought it well to give your decision in writing, I would suggest to my hon. friends opposite that we might continue with the debate of last week without at present committing the house either way as to what the future practice will be.

Mr. BENNETT: When we rose the last day we discussed this matter I had the floor, and perhaps I can proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Unless it is desired to call it six o'clock. I must say that I have not my papers with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be only fair, Mr. Speaker, to take up some other matter between now and six o'clock, and resume this debate at eight o'clock this evening. I would suggest that we take up one or two of the resolutions relating to railway matters.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ACQUISITION OF THE QUEBEC, MONTREAL AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY

The house in committee on Bill No. 72, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway.—Mr. Dunning.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Authority to purchase.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill has been called because it is one of those which has been before the railway committee and has been thoroughly examined there.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not here when the matter was last considered, but there appears to be some opinion that the road is not worth $6,000,000. There seems to be an impression that a report was made on a previous occasion fixing a much lower price.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that I have not my papers with me at the present moment, but I have sent for them. The members of the railway committee, who are also members of this committee, will remember that the railway officers who undertook all negotiations with respect to the acquisition of this particular property gave the particulars as to the replacement value of the property and the value of the equipment. I may say that the value of the equipment is much above the normal equipment value which would be required for a road of this mileage, and it had a very important bearing upon the price factor. With a small extension which can be arranged for in the future, this line will provide the Canadian National Railways with a water grade line down the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and will obviate the necessity of considerable double tracking on the existing main line through what is the third most congested section, from a traffic point of view, on the whole Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the mileage of this line?

Mr. STEVENS: The schedule of the act says that the whole comprises a railway mileage of 191 miles.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the figure I had in mind. The great economic advantage to the Canadian National is the fact that it will save double tracking over a severe grade on the main line. This line formerly belonged to the Delaware and Hudson and a water grade will be secured which can be connected with the existing main line at a point past the summit of the grade for which double tracking would be necessary if this line were not acquired. This line traverses a very important and quickly developing industrial area south of the St. Lawrence river from Montreal to Sorel, and when the bill was before the house previously I gave the names and the populations of the different towns through which it passes. The officers of the Canadian National consider this a good buy from the point of view of railway economics in connection with the national system.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister know what weight of steel is laid?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not that information.

Mr. BENNETT: We are paying $31,000 per mile for the road.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps we had better let this stand in the meantime. The information was given in committee that the amount of equipment is far in excess of the amount normally involved in such a line. The equipment purchases made by the Delaware and Hudson for this line had to do with that company's car relationship in Canada, and the equipment is an important factor in the matter. I shall be glad, if my hon. friend desires to press the matter to allow the bill to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole matter was very thoroughly discussed in the railway committee:

Mr. BENNETT: It is about $31,000 a mile for the line?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: One would like to know what weight of steel is used, what type of locomotive, and whether or not the roadbed is in fair condition.

Mr. DUNNING: The roadbed is in fair, but not good, condition. The equipment is in excellent condition. I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Sections 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 130, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

[Mr. Dunning.]

He said: As I explained in response to a question when the bill was introduced, it seeks to make a number of minor amendments to the Canadian National Railways Act, amendments which are made necessary by references which were rather mixed up in the revision of the statutes but which will become clear to anyone reading the sections which are designed to correct the errors. There is, however, one important provision which is contained in section 2 of the bill. It can be dealt with probably more intelligently in committee of the whole than at this stage of the bill. Briefly, it seeks to make available to the Canadian National Railways the provisions of the Expropriation Act, and as it will be of some interest to my legal friends in the house, I can say that the object of it is to endeavour to secure a uniform procedure in connection with large matters of expropriation which, from the point of view of the Canadian National, can be more conveniently carried on through the exchequer court, than by the means available in various parts of the country. As is well known, the exchequer court can, in minor cases, delegate to a district court or other judge an investigation, but by this amendment it will be possible, in large cases, to make available the machinery of the exchequer court. In looking over the debates at the time when the Canadian National Railways Act was originally passed, I gather that there was then a very substantial desire to make available that machinery, but the matter was not pressed and the ordinary provisions of the Railway Act were made available. After looking into the matter with some degree of thoroughness, I am of opinion that, as regards large expropriations such as are sometimes involved in matters connected, for instance, with the Montreal terminals and so forth, the exchequer court is better machinery than would otherwise be available. For the information of the house I may say that such expropriations as have taken place in Montreal recently have been taken under the Government Railways Act by the minister in order to make available the provisions of the exchequer court procedure instead of the ordinary procedure which would be available in such cases. I would suggest that all these various features can be better dealt with in the committee stage of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be a matter of gratification to the minister that he has in this bill settled one question, that is, who brought in the act for the consolidation of the Canadian National railways. There is no question about that because he will admit that the statute is the Canadian National Railways Act of 1920 and at least the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was not in power at that time. So we know from the government itself who consolidated the national railways, who provided the machinery by which the consolidation was carried out, and this act is to make certain that other roads will be brought within the scope of that act. There is just one difficulty about expropriations through the excehquer court—

Mr. DUNNING: Before my hon. friend leaves that point, he will admit there is a great deal of difference between the authorization in spirit and the authorization in practice.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. gentleman, because otherwise my statement might have been incomplete. He will recall that the proceedings in the Privy Council were not terminated until after the right hon. gentleman had accepted office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend brings up that point, because I have looked into it and I find that the decision of the Privy Council was given after we had consolidated the roads under the act, and not before.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is I do not think the right hon. gentleman can be exactly correct. I think the present government passed the order in council providing for it, but if the decision in the Privy Council had gone against the country, the consolidation would have been made impossible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question before the Privy Council was simply a point of law. We had appointed Sir Henry Thornton and the consolidation had taken place under an order in council we passed before the Privy Council had decided the point of law.

Mr. BENNETT: I never like to contradict without having the record beside me, but I happen to recall the summer in which the decision was given, because I heard it given in the Privy Council, and I think Sir Henry Thornton was not appointed until after I returned from England.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my hon. friend the exact date.

Mr. BENNETT: At any rate, we have settled one question: namely. that the act was passed in 1920, and the further fact that this government passed the order in council under that statute, without the statute the order in council was impossible, so at least—

Mr. DUNNING: The act was a dead letter until the order in council was passed.

Mr. BENNETT: Without the act there could be no order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: And without the order in council there could be no Canadian National system.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the system, but no consolidation of it. The system existed in the statute, but the railways were not consolidated until the order in council was passed. The hon. gentleman may say that he is the stepfather of the enterprise, but the father was the statute passed in 1920.

There is one thing I have to say about the use of the exchequer court. It works a great injustice against people in a small way in life, who are really unable to grapple with the situation. This session I have received several letters amongst them one this morning which I received from British Columbia in connection with the expropriation by the government of property near North Vancouver for a rifle range. The exchequer court took proceedings and arrived at certain conclusions. These people were told that they could have $75 for a lot of land which cost them, with taxes since they bought it, several hundred dollars. They say: We are wholly incapable financially of embarking in exchequer court litigation. The provisions of the old Railway Act enabled one right in the community, with the aid of a district court judge, to carry on these proceedings, and it could be done without the aid of a solicitor at all. Frequently the owner himself presented his case, brought in his witnesses, and had it disposed of. Certainly I have known very great injustice to be done where people are placed in a position such as contemplated by this bill. I agree entirely with what the minister has said with respect to large matters in a city like Montreal, for instance, but might it not be desirable to say, "Where the sum tendered by the government for the land taken does not exceed" so many dollars,, so as to make clear the question of juridiction. I am only throwing out this suggestion at the moment for the consideration of the minister, because on the second reading of the bill I am not going to take up the time of the house needlessly, but when it comes back to the house I should like to discuss that phase, having regard to the cases that have been brought to my attention recently in connection with the Vancouver rifle range, where if the information that I have received is correct, considerable hardship has been done to the owners of property in that locality.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY—SIMCOE POSTMASTERSHIP

By unanimous consent the house resumed from Wednesday, April 17, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Robb for supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stewart (Leeds):

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this house the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe."

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock last Wednesday I was directing attention to the fact that under the provisions of the Civil Service Act any objection to a particular candidate named by the Civil Service Commission must come from the deputy minister, not from the minister himself. That fact was referred to by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in one of his public addresses. But, as he said the other day, he was prepared—as indeed he must be under our institutions—to accept responsibility for the actions of his deputy. I merely say that to close the matter with which I was then dealing.

But before I proceed more particularly with the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) I desire to point out that in Le Droit, under date of April 20, 1929, an article appears in which it is alleged that the attack against the Postmaster General is being made virtually because he happens to be of French origin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say how strongly we resent such a statement in the public press of this country A free translation of the article—which I will not read in full lest it should empty the house—would be this in part:

These attacks need hardly surprise us since Mr. Veniot himself has done all he could to provoke them. It is a crime for certain people to see that constitution is respected, to see that the two official languages are on a footing of equality, and that the field of action of the French language is extended a little. We do not fear to say that certain people object to the father of the bilingual postage stamp more than to the minister who is charged with favouritism.

Could anything be more injurious to the peace and happiness of the commonwealth, could anything be more subversive of the unity of this Dominion than the publication of an article of this character—it is signed by Charles Gautier—in which it is asserted that the minister because he is the father of the bilingual postage stamp is being attacked in this house, when as a matter of fact the true reason for our criticism is his inefficiency in the conduct of his department. This is another passage from the same article:

All this noise about certain appointments or dismissals is like a tempest in a teapot; it is the madness of fanaticism against a minister who is convinced that the sun shines for everybody, and acts accordingly. A minister who, like Mr. Veniot, tries to put in practice the letter as well as the spirit of the constitution deserves the support of all political and national elements.

Those of us who recall a report of a speech by the Postmaster General that appeared in the public press of Montreal—in regard to which the hon. minister stated that he had been inaccurately reported—find here a reflection of exactly what was said on that occasion. Here is an appeal being made once more to racial origin and to political predilections, the kind of appeals of which the Postmaster General is a past master, and we resent with all the strength of which we are capable this editorial allegation that the effort on the part of the opposition to bring to the attention of the Canadian people the gross inefficiency that at the present time characterizes the conduct of the Post Office department is in any sense influenced by the fact that the minister happens to be of French-Acadian origin. It would make no difference to us from what race he is sprung. We are not dealing with the man, we are not dealing with his racial origin, we are not dealing with his religion; we are dealing with the Postmaster General, with the man who has been entrusted by the Canadian people, through the Prime Minister, with the conduct of a great department of the government, and if in the conduct of that department it becomes necessary for those who sit to the left of the Speaker to draw attention to the gross inefficiency of his administration, we shall resent such a construction being put upon our criticism, and we shall ask the Canadian people for their judgment as to whether this sort of thing which has been going on for the last ten years is to be continued, whether our efforts to bring about the correction of abuses and maladministration are to be frustrated at every turn by an appeal to the bilingual issue. It is time that such appeals be frowned upon, it is time that some more effective answer was made to the charges directed against the hon. gentleman's inefficient administration of his department.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply which deals with the case of the appointment of a postmaster at Simcoe. With that I propose briefly to deal, for it is now apparent not only from the number of cases which have been brought forward in this house, but from the letters which every member to your left is receiving as to what is happening in his district, now that attention has been focussed upon the Postmaster General's department, that a general motion only will satisfy the people in this regard. It is no longer the Simcoe post office; it is every post office where the minister has had an opportunity at the behest of Liberal members to exercise political patronage in this department of the public service.

Let me for a moment draw the attention of the house to the fact that in the effort to promote a decent public service and bring it under the control of the Civil Service Commission many, many difficulties were experienced. Those difficulties were raised not any more by the Liberal party than by the Conservative party. But it was fortunate that at the particular moment the Union government was in power and found it possible to place upon the statute books legislation that enabled us to have a civil service so far as possible free from politics. What was the purpose of the Civil Service Act? The purpose, first of all, was to promote efficiency in the public service and, secondly, to assure continuity in office so long as the civil servant did not interfere in the politics of the country, and thereby give a dignity to the service of the crown that had been denied in days gone by.

I repeat what I said the other day, that at the election of 1911 a very large number of the public servants believed that because the Liberal party had been in power so long they were perfectly within their rights in taking an active part in the elections of that year. They did take an active part, and they paid the price by being removed from office. I well recall the circumstances under which Mr.—now Sir Robert—Borden's government passed an order in council providing that if members of the House of Commons would certify over their signatures that given individuals in their communities had been offensive partisans at the election, they should be removed from office. I also recall that the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier approved of the general terms of that order. Action was taken accordingly, and when last session the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) was able to stand up in this house and say of his own knowledge that he believed a given person to have been guilty of political partisanship, you will recollect, sir, that at once I said the incident was ended so far as we were concerned. He was absolutely within the order in council, and the postmaster who he said, of his own knowledge, had been guilty of offensive partisanship undoubtedly must have expected to be relieved from office. Why? Because it has always been contended, before the Civil Service Act was passed at all, that any servant of the crown who saw fit to take part in elections publicly must be prepared to yield up his position if the fortunes of war went against him. The Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, former Minister of Finance, laid down a principle—I do not know that I can repeat the exact words—that any person appointed to a public position, as a servant of the crown, must first of all discharge his duties as such. He was not thereby debarred from taking an interest in public affiairs, or to exercise his franchise if he so desired, but he must not interfere actively in the politics of the country, for, by so doing he ceased to be a servant of the public.

This Civil Service Act with all its defects, as we all must realize, was made possible in its present form when a union government was in power. It is the duty of all of us, whether we sit on the right or the left of the Speaker, or whether we constitute a group of lesser numbers than those who sit directly to the right or to the left, to assist, in my judgment, in promoting the efficiency of that act. It should be maintained in all its power and efficiency, and no government in power to-day —and they may not be to-morrow, meaning by to-morrow some future time—would dare say that the act should be repealed. This act should not be tampered with, and that is why we as a party are taking the strong stand that we are taking to-day. It was held by the privy council many years ago, in a case that came up from Australia—and the member from Marquette (Mr. Glen) will remember it—that no public servant could be dismissed from office without cause being assigned and a reason given, to enable him to defend himself and his reputation from all that is involved in being dismissed from office without an opportunity to be heard. Only the other day you will recall that General Booth was removed from office by the high council of the Salvation Army. An injunction was applied for and granted by Mr. Justice Eve. Why? Because it is an elementary rule of our law that a man who occupies a position such as he did must not be removed from office unless he has had an opportunity to be heard, and has been given the reasons for which it is proposed to dismiss him. Mr. Justice Eve granted the injunction.

I recall, as I stand here, the case of an Indian agent dismissed by order in council, and he does not know to this day why he was removed. But I also recall, too, that Mr. —now Sir Robert—Borden laid down the rule that no man should be removed from office without having an opportunity to defend himself against the charges laid against him.

Many of the cases that were read the other day by the Postmaster General are cases in which men were active partisans. They had to be removed from office because of that. I recall two cases in the city in which I live, one of them, I believe, a collector of customs, the other occupying a position in the land office. Both tendered their resignations immediately after the election, because they had gone out and taken an active part in the election. The postmasters named by the Postmaster General the other day were dismissed because they had taken an active part in the election. Any man who went out and took an active part in the elections of 1925 and 1926, whether he be a Liberal or a Conservative, must have known at least the consequence of his own act. He must now expect the consequences and give up the office which he holds, because he has seen fit to participate actively in a political campaign rather than give his service to the state in the way in which I have indicated.

Now, look what has happened in this country. For sixteen months, from October to February, the Postmaster General on an average has dismissed one postmaster a day. That is the return to this parliament. That is his record, one a day. And what is more, Sir, let us turn to his record in connection with the Civil Service Act; take the Department of Justice, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Finance; take any of the other departments and compare the number of cases in which the Civil Service Act has been overridden with the number of times it has been overridden by the Postmaster General. You had the figures given you the other day. Practically as many as all the other departments put together. The Postmaster General has seen fit to overrule the Civil Service Act of this country to that extent. Was that accident? Does anyone think that all those men were dismissed, as mere accidents?

And that brings me to this case from Simcoe. I dealt with the facts the other day, and now it would seem to me the situation is simply this: a vacancy; applications for the appointment; a decision by the Civil Service Commission; a rejection by the deputy minister. And then you ask: was that rejection warranted on any ground of high public policy, or by the statute itself? And, unless you can affirmatively answer that question then indeed you fail. If the Postmaster General, through his deputy, rejected, without warrant, then on the ground of high public policy—meaning by that the efficiency of the post office service —this motion is warranted and it should be adopted by this house.

What are the facts? Without going into them in further detail to-night, it is only necessary to point out that, first of all, you have an amputation case. You have a case in which the disabled soldier was a soldier who had suffered the loss of both his limbs below the knees, one below the ankle and the other between the ankle and the knee. The amputation cases are not easily taken care of in this country. It is not easy to re-establish the amputation case. It is not easy to provide positions in the public service for those who have suffered an amputation of both legs. There are a limited number of positions which they can fill. They are very limited in number. In some instances they are able to operate elevators with but one arm, or with one leg. You find them doing work of that kind. But there is a limitation upon the work that they can do, and that is the reason, I take it, that the statute provided for a preference being given to the disabled soldier over the ordinary case of the returned man. His disability gave him a preference over his fellow, the man who fought side by side with him, the man who came out of the war whole in body while he came out with his legs gone, or his arms gone, or suffered a disability recognized by pension. He then receives at the hands of the law, under the statutes of this country, a preference over the man who came out of the war whole. This man had a preference given to him by law, and the Civil Service Commission in reckoning that preference gave him the position. And why? We have it that Doctor Roche and Mr. Tremblay both saw the applicant. They realized that he was fit to discharge the duties of postmaster at Simcoe. The Postmaster General says "I say he is not. This man could not handle mail bags, could not do the work that I think he should be able to do". And yet that excuse was not brought up until long after he had been awarded the office by the action of the Civil Service Commission itself. Was it warranted? Is there any question but that there was political interference which brought about this situation? Is there any doubt about it? In making his defence the other evening the Postmaster General referred to certain things which took place at the meeting in Simcoe. I hold in my hand a copy of the Simcoe Reformer of October 18, 1928, a Liberal paper—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: It is independent.

Mr. BENNETT: I confess that I am not in a position to state with any degree of authority; I assumed it to be a Liberal paper from its name, but names do not always correctly interpret political opinions. The other evening the Postmaster General said that Mr. Whittaker seemed rather convinced by the story told by the Postmaster General in his speech at Simcoe. According to this paper Mr. Whittaker is quoted as follows:

If Mr. Veniot is correctly reported, what he says absolutely untrue. His motive for attributing these statements to me is very clear, in that such a declaration on my part would absolve Mr. Veniot and his followers from all suspicion of patronage in my case. I had not intended to say anything more for publication about my side of the question, but in view of this absolute fabrication I feel compelled to make public what actually happened in this regard from the beginning, and to expose certain untruths contained in Mr. Veniot's address at Simcoe.

Last summer, after word of the appointment of Mr. Bowyer to the postmastership had come through, I was approached by a member of the local Liberal executive, presumably delegated by W. H. Taylor, M.P., the Liberal member for Norfolk, and was offered a proposition somewhat as follows: The local Liberals, backed by the member, were to agree to lend me their support in securing an appointment at Brantford, Ont. In return I was to promise to maintain a discreet silence in regard to my treatment at the hands of the Postmaster General and not to be seen conversing in public with any person known to be of the Conservative stripe. In addition, I was to be bound by the conditions of a letter which they were to submit for my signature and which was to be made public prior to the public announcement of my appointment. The purport of this letter was to the effect: (1) That I had no grievance against the local Liberal member or any of his followers. (2) That I was now satisfied that I would not have been physically able to handle the position of Postmaster at Simcoe. (3) That I felt duly grateful to the postal department for their foresight in refusing to allow me, in spite of myself, to assume a position the duties of which they considered, in the kindness of their hearts, to be far to onerous for a man in my position.

After due consideration of the principles and ethics involved in this proposition, I, as an ex-soldier of His Majesty's forces, could not bring myself to be a party to a dishonourable scheme of this kind. Consequently my answer to their plan of barter could only be a flat refusal.

Nothing further happened in regard to the purchase of my silence until the evening before Mr. Veniot's meeting in Simcoe. It was the night of October 3, when my friend Sam Morris of Port Dover, also an amputation case, was approached by A. A. Winter, K.C.S, of Simcoe. They were attending a meeting in Port Dover in connection with proposed improvements to the harbour, at which Hon. J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works, was present. In the course of their conversation, Mr. Winter stated that the local Liberal party were prepared to secure for me any job which I would be able to handle, and at this time suggested that Mr. Morris get in touch with me and arrange an interview with the government party the following night in Simcoe to discuss the possibility of finding me a position.

Accordingly the interview was arranged through Mr. Morris, but for some reason Mr. Winter dropped out, and we went to Mr. Veniot's meeting with no definite appointment in prospect. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. Morris accompanied me to the platform, where we secured the attention of Mr. Taylor, M.P., who at once brought up my refusal of the Brantford proposition. I reiterated my stand in this regard. He then expressed his willingness to remove the conditons of acceptance referred to above, since he admitted being resposible for having them attached to the proposal.

It was at this time that Mr. Veniot approached us, and after shaking hands with us, as a matter of course, he stated that he would help me get the position. He remarked that I was not to consider the post office episode a personal matter and that he bore me no hard feelings. This was all that was said between us, and, after shaking hands again, Mr. Veniot bade me good-bye.

The statement which he attributes to me as having been uttered at this meeting constitutes an absolute falsehood and a deliberate attempt to lead the public astray, as well as a contemptible effort to justify his position by shifting for onus for his high-handed conduct from his own shoulders.

Before departing, Mr. Taylor said that we would have a talk about the matter of the Brantford position. Ten days have elapsed and I have heard nothing more about it. In any event I could not conscientiously become a party to such an arrangement, which savors of the same political patronage as has permeated the entire case. I wash my hands entirely of all dealings with the men who, in my heart, I believe have been guilty of the basest treachery to a man who fought for his country and sacrificed both limbs on the fields of France.

I will not read the rest of the article, which is a discussion of what took place at Simcoe; I am not concerned with that at the moment. This is the statement made by Mr. Whittaker in reply to the remarks of the Postmaster General. We all remember the kind of letter the Postmaster General wrote in connection with another case, in which he left out the important facts. Asked why he did not state those facts as they were; asked why he was willing to write something which he knew to be untrue he said he did not desire to hurt anyone's feelings. What confidence can we place in the word of a minister who writes such a letter as that? I put that question to this house, and there are hundreds of people throughout Canada to-night asking the same thing, men and women who have read the debate, men and women who hold small offices as postmasters and postmistresses throughout our rural communities; they are asking themselves that question to-night just as I am putting it to you. Heretofore it always has been the rule that when we had such a letter as was produced the other evening over the signature of a minister of the crown, we could rely upon it as representing the facts, but we now have a minister of the crown saying it was not true, that he knew it was not true and that he wrote the letter in that way for some purpose other than the real reason appearing on its face. I say that conduct such as that does merit the disapproval of the Canadian people through their representatives in this parliament.

I have not had an opportunity to look up the records, but some effort has been made in that direction in order to see if there ever was another case such as that, and so far as I have been able to find out there never was another. There it is. Some of my hon. friends who have followed the debates in other countries will remember that in one case in England a minister of the crown was peremptorily dismissed by his Prime Minister because there appeared to be some suspicion of a lack of frankness on his part. Hon. members may recall that within the last few years one minister of the crown resigned his office, great though it was, because of some suspicion attaching to the attitude he had taken with respect to a public matter, and those who have followed affairs in India will recall that a prime minister dismissed from office a minister of the crown who had given a letter to the public under circumstances which raised some suspicion as to the bona fides under which it had been done. We in Canada sometimes follow a looser practice and allow ourselves to be deluded by outside considerations. With the facts as stated I have no hesitation in asserting that Mr. Whittaker would have been postmaster of Simcoe to-night if some one had not interfered for political reasons.

Let us see what that interference was. There is the statute—not the regulation—which says that the applicant must be a bona fide resident of the locality; that was read to this house the other afternoon and I will not read it again. Mr. Bowyer did not reside nearer to Simcoe than two miles from Hamilton. He was assessed on a piece of property in Simcoe, but his letter clearly indicates that in his opinion he at least was not residing in Simcoe at that time. There is the statute; the inspector found him at Mount Albion; the other gentleman sent out to investigate found him there also. Therefore I say we have no satisfactory answer to the question which hon. gentlemen are asking themselves in this house: Was the rejection warranted? That is the question which must be answered; everything else sinks into insignificance. Stripping this case of everything else we have just one question to answer: "Was the rejection of Mr. Whittaker warranted?" Everything was regular up to that point; the vacancy, the advertisement, the application, the investigation, the appointment to office as far as the Civil Service Commission could do it, the report that he was physically fit, the inspection, the visit to Ottawa by the applicant and the rejection by the Deputy Postmaster General, who, you will recall, the other day in another case which was dealt with by the Postmaster General pointed out that he took a certain action because the minister told him to do so. That is part of the record. As I say, we have the rejection by the Deputy Postmaster General, and the only question this house can ask is very simple. It is this: Was that rejection warranted? When the members of this house vote upon this motion they vote yea or nay to that quetion, "Was the rejection warranted"? Was the Postmaster General warranted in rejecting this young man who had suffered two amputations and who walked up and down the corridors of this building, parading himself before the Postmaster General in order to demonstrate his ability to walk without the aid of a cane. He sold his business to obtain the better job. He points out that he was receiving a pension for his disability; he was within that favoured, ultra-preferred class. I ask the members of the house, sitting as judges, whether that rejection was warranted? Is there one of us who is free from political bias who would say that upon those facts the rejection was warranted? That is what we must vote upon; that is what the issue is; that is what this amendment to the resolution to go into supply means.

When we find the public journals endeavouring to inflame the public mind by making the appeal to forty per cent of the population of this country that the attack upon the Postmaster General is being made because he is of French origin, we say that that is an insult to the house, and we on this side of the house will continue to do our duty. We make that answer to this and all similar cases. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) can make some other answer to his constituents in Regina and elsewhere, but we will stand for even-handed justice for every man and woman in this country regardless of race or religion.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman's followers in Saskatchewan are now going in the directly opposite direction.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. minister said that, because the only report I ever saw was the report of a public speech made by the Premier, Mr. Gardiner, himself in Saskatchewan and to which I directed the minister's attention last year.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to send my hon. friend a copy.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be glad to see it. As the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is now in his seat I would ask him to define to the house, in order that it may not be said in the remote sections of the constituencies of this country that appeals are being made to racial animosities and prejudices, what the constitutional rights of the French and English are under the constitution with respect to bilingualism. I ask him to define that so that there will be no misunderstanding. It is the duty of the Attorney General of Canada to do that.

The article in Le Droit says that the Postmaster General is being attacked because he is the father of the bilingual postage stamp. Before supply is granted I want the Minister of Justice to define the constitutional rights of minorities and majorities, and then it will be seen that there never has been a departure by the Conservative party from those rights as established by the constitution. It will be remembered by those who know the political history of this country that the Conservative party, because of a judgment of the privy council defining the rights of minorities, went down to defeat and almost suffered extinction at the hands of the electorate. Those are the facts, and it is time that this sort of thing was discontinued, that efforts to make political capital out of such statements in the by-ways and hedges of the remote sections of the country be stopped.

When the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada has defined what the position is in law; when he has defined the constitutional rights with respect to bilingual postage stamps and other matters of that kind, then he will find that no voice has been raised against the enjoyment to the full of the rights of all men and women under the constitution, be they majorities or minorities. The old red herring has been dragged across the trail—the old effort at which hon. gentlemen opposite are past masters; the effort which has served them so well in days gone by but which will not continue to serve them again. The record will be placed upon Hansard to show that there is no doubt that there has never been a time when this has been the case. It has been said within the shadow of parliament that an attack is being made on the Postmaster General for one purpose only, and in the discharge of our constitutional duty we must point out these facts.

This is a very serious matter to those of us who have been endeavouring as best we can during the last year to keep down such agitations to stop them whenever we have seen them, and to endeavour to promote unity, harmony, respect and regard for the constitutional rights of all peoples in this country. When a statement like this appears in the public press and is allowed to go uncontradicted it is taken as being admitted, and gathers force and strength as it travels along.

But that is not an answer to the question. Was the rejection warranted? I have heard no words from the Postmaster General which would establish before a responsible judge or jury the fact that it was warranted. It is upon that question that we will presently vote. This resolution is limited to the Simcoe post office, but there are many other cases which will be dealt with before supply is granted to the Post Office Department. We will vote upon this resolution and presently upon a general resolution, in the public interest, and which touches the administration of the post office, declaring that the utter disregard of the Civil Service Act, and gross partisanship in dismissals to the extent of one per day for sixteen months by the Postmaster General merits the condemnation of this housse.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first of all I desire to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat

(Mr. Bennett). I hope he will pardon me if I think that the greater portion of his remarks have perhaps no bearing whatever upon the resolution which is now before the house.

He made a statement at the beginning of his remarks with regard to the censure which should be placed upon a certain newspaper for saying something which did not have a tendency to promote harmony and unity among the peoples of this country. I am going to leave it to the house and to the country as to whether the remarks with which the hon. gentleman prefaced his address would have the tendency of promoting harmony and unity among the peoples of this country.

Because my time is limited I desire to refer first to what the hon. gentleman said in his remarks the other evening. I read his statement with a good deal of care, and I must say in this connection that I am not interested in making a defence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), because, in my humble opinion, Canada has never had, among the excellent postmasters general who have presided over the department, a gentleman who has conducted the affairs of that department with greater efficiency and with more regard for public service than my colleague the present Postmaster General has done and is doing to-day. I feel that I should make some reference to the remarks made the other evening by the hon. gentleman when he referred to my hon. friend the member for Norfolk-Elgin (Mr. Taylor), and said that he was going to show his connection with this particular matter. I will read what he said: It appears at page 1671 of Hansard:

> But the Civil Service Commission had no knowledge of it.

That was the question of Mr. Bowyer's entitlement.

> The minister said he had; and why did the minister intervene? Is not this the fact? The member for that riding, as I shall presently show—

And as he never did show.

> —and the Liberal organization in that county, said, "We must interfere and get this job for Bowyer." That is the record, as I shall show in a moment.

I followed his remarks the other evening and I listened with great attention to his remarks to-night with some expectation that he would carry out the promise he then made to show that the hon. member for Norfolk-Elgin or somebody else had interfered in the matter so as to enable Mr. Bowyer to get this position. But though he made that promise, which apparently came so readily to him at the time he was making those remarks, neither in his subsequent remarks the other evening nor in his remarks to-night has he said one word that would by any possibility connect the hon. member for Norfolk-Elgin with endeavouring to obtain this appointment for Mr. Bowyer as is suggested in that paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: I read what Mr. Whittaker said.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that he made a suggestion that he was going to prove what he said, and he carried on with that flourish of trumpets which is so peculiarly his own. But he took great care never to get back to it again during the whole course of his speech.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the hon. member could not have been listening.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why did he not get back to it? Because evidently he has read the record and he knows that from one end of it to the other there is not the slightest vestige of evidence to bear out that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: It was on the minister's personal file, I suppose.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Whatever file it is on, my hon. friend promised to prove it and he did not do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I read what Whittaker said.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let us just consider this. What are the facts?

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me. I regret I interrupted the minister and I shall not do so again.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will try to keep to the facts in connection with what the record shows. I have only forty minutes, but I do not object to interruptions as long as they do not take too much time.

Let us consider the facts. It is only fair to the returned soldier who has not obtained the position, that all the efforts and misrepresentations that may be made from any side of this house shall not prejudice him. Let us get clearly into our minds first of all that this is not a contest between a Liberal and a Conservative. Both applicants were Liberals.

Mr. McGIBBON: One was an official Liberal. The other was not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know exactly what my hon. friend means by an official Liberal or an official Conservative, but I know what an artificial Conservative is. In order that there may be no question in regard to the matter, may I call attention to the gentlemen who recommended Mr. Whittaker. First of all the file shows that he was recommended by Doctor W. A. McIntosh. Anybody who knows anything about the county of Norfolk-Elgin and the town of Simcoe knows that Doctor McIntosh is one of the most influential Liberals in the town of Simcoe, a former president of the Liberal Association and a prospective candidate in that riding in the 1926 election in the Liberal interests.

The next recommendation comes from Mr. Groff, manager of the Bank of Montreal, not an active politician but a man who is known to be a prominent Liberal in the town of Simcoe. Next comes George Williamson, whose letter shows that he was in favour of Whittaker and at the time of writing the letter, dated the 22nd February, 1927, addressed to the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Mr. George Williamson was president of the Liberal Association of the town of Simcoe. Also in the editorial of the Globe newspaper of the 6th October, 1928, it is shown that this young man voted for Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the general election of 1917, and it shows perfectly clearly that, although he was a disabled returned soldier at that time, he was a very enthusiastic Liberal. That is the question with regard to politics, and I cannot understand why, in view of those facts which my hon. friends must know, they would endeavour to argue that the matter is a political one.

What is the next point? I must get it clearly into the minds of every hon. member and everyone in the country that this is not a contest between a returned soldier and a civilian for this office. It is a contest between two returned soldiers, and, if I may say so, two of the most gallant young returned soldiers who were privileged to come back from France and Flanders, because they both served in the war with distinction and with great credit to their country. It is true that Bowyer had to give a wrong name in order to get his enlistment because he was very much under age, being only a little over sixteen. Mr. Whittaker was a little over seventeen. Both enlisted before they were of military age. Unfortunately Whittaker was in France for only eight months when he suffered a very severe injury resulting in the loss of both feet and making him what is known as a double amputation case. The other boy remained in France for, I think, two years, fighting for his country with great gallantry. He came back with honours and medals. Therefore, in that respect the men are equal.

Then comes the question referred to by my hon. friend as to the disability. One man, Whittaker, had a total disability—and this is something that I refer to with some hesitation, but I think the facts should be clearly before the house before we vote on this motion—and he was obtaining the pension that is given to a man who is 100 per cent disability.

Mr. McGIBBON: So much more to his credit.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was not asking my hon. friend for that suggestion, and I do not know that it is helpful in the discussion. If, however, he insists, I have no objection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Except that it is taking up my hon. friend's time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. That is the situation. Very shortly afterwards, in 1918, Whittaker was taken on the staff of the Soldiers Settlement Board. For nearly six years he had a position with that board, receiving somewhere around $1,800 to $2,200 a year.

Mr. PRICE: Which was coming to him, which he received as remuneration for his services.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Surely nobody would suggest that any department of this government would pay anything that was not coming to anyone. He earned it. He was hired and he received that salary. He received it, of course, in addition to his pension, making between $3,400 and $3,500 that he was drawing altogether. He thought that he could better himself by taking a position which he was offered with a jam company in Simcoe, where he received a somewhat smaller salary, perhaps a little less than he was getting with the Soldiers Settlement Board; but he was at home and naturally, I suppose, the expenses were a little less.

I want to follow Mr. Whittaker's statement just a little further because my hon. friend was good enough to refer to the fact that something took place at some meeting at which I was present. The meeting to which he refers took place in the town of Port Dover. I will just read the clause which he read, and then leave it to the judgment of the house to say what was the impression they received from that statement. He said:

> Nothing further happened in regard to the purchase of my silence until the evening before Mr. Veniot's meeting in Simcoe. It was the night of October 3, when my friend Sam Morris of Port Dover, also an amputation case, was approached by A. A. Winter, K.C., of Simcoe. They were attending a meeting in Port Dover in connection with proposed improvements to the harbour, at which Hon. J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works, was present. In the course of their conversation Mr. Winter stated that the local Liberal party were prepared to secure for me any job which I would be able to handle, and at this time suggested that Mr. Winter get in touch with me and arrange an interview with the government party the following night in Simcoe to discuss the possibility of finding me a position.

I do not want to do this young man an injustice but I leave it to the judgment of the house to say if the reasonable inference from that statement was not that these discussions took place at the meeting which I attended, and I want to say positively that no such discussion took place in my presence. I see that my hon. friend disclaims any intention to convey that impression. If so, I accept his intimation. Nothing whatever was said at the meeting I attended with regard to Whittaker obtaining a position or anything of that kind, and I say that whoever drafted that statement did not at all events successfully make it very clear that that was what he intended to convey.

Certain things have been said by him and read by my hon. friend with regard to false statements being made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). I want to refer to certain statements that were made by Mr. Whittaker, and I leave it to the house to judge. Mr. Whittaker made an affidavit, and in his statement he says—I do not know just what to think of this, but it appears in the Globe of the 15th of October:

> As a matter of fact I had owned the business only four months and naturally had not a chance to discover if it were a profitable business. I would never have made any declaration about it if the Civil Service Commission had not advised me that if I wished to show that I was properly re-established—

I think he means "not" properly re-established.

> —it would be necessary for me to take an affidavit to the effect that my business was not paying. Mr. Veniot has now used this affidavit as an instrument to prove that I lost nothing by selling my business. I can only say that if I had not received my notice of appointment as postmaster I still would be the owner of that business, and I am sure that I could have made a success of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend who is so ready with his "hears, hears", will listen to the kind of success this man said, in his affidavit, dated April, 24th, 1928. He states:

> (1) In February, 1928, I purchased a monumental stone business believing it to present an opportunity for successful re-establishment.
> [Mr. Elliott.]
> (2) That I had only a layman's knowledge of said business.
> (3) That since entering this business I have steadily depleted my financial resources without any adequate return.
> (5) That I see no prospects of securing more capital and I shall be obliged on this account to relinquish said business at a considerable loss.

There you have his affidavit that he could not carry on the business unless he could get more capital, that he saw no prospects of getting more capital, and he must relinquish the business at a considerable loss. Then you have his statement later that he is sure that if he had retained the business he would have made a success of it. All I have to say is that those are his statements, and the house can take them for just what they are worth.

Something has been said with regard to the duties which the postmaster had to perform. Some suggestions have been made by hon. members that the duties of the office were changed after the applications were in, making the duties more onerous than they were formerly, and making the office a class 2B, which it was not before. Perhaps I should give to the house just what was said in that regard. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) says at page 1657 of Hansard:

> And the classification was changed after the application was made.
> Mr. Veniot: No. The hon. gentleman is not stating the exact truth. I do not mean that offensively at all.

I know he would not. Then the hon. member for Vancouver Centre goes on:

> But the Postmaster General will admit that the change to class 2B took place after the application was made.

That shows that my hon. friend, who always wants to be fair, while desiring to be fair, at least has a most suspicious mind. I just took the trouble to look the point up. The dismissal of Lawson took place on the 15th of January, 1927. The chief superintendent of the post office service on that date issued this letter to the district superintendent at London:

> The district superintendent is informed that the Postmaster General has authorized the removal from office of Mr. I. D. Lawson, postmaster at Simcoe, in view of incompetency. The office is to be placed for the present under the temporary charge of Mr. Charles E. Kaid, of Simcoe, the transfer to date from the 1st of February, and concurrent with the temporary transfer, the office is to be changed to the grade 2B basis.

That was on the 15th of January, the date of dismissal of the former postmaster, and one month and two days before the advertisements were issued asking for applicants to fill the position that had been vacated. That decides to a certain extent, when it becomes a class 2B office, what the salary is to be. The minimum salary is $2,040 per annum with annual increases of $120, and the advertisement that went out was in accord with that understanding. It also stated that the applicants must be either natural born or naturalized British subjects and residents of Canada for three years, and must possess the ability to perform efficiently the duties of the office. After all, I submit that that is the real test of the kind of postmaster they were trying to get—he must be a postmaster who could efficiently perform the duties of the office.

Next the suggestion was made by my hon. friend, but it was not pressed in his remarks, and so I shall pass over it very briefly, that Bowyer was not a resident of Simcoe. It is quite apparent that when the inspector first went out to make his inspection, Bowyer and his wife were on one of Bowyer's father's farms near Hamilton. Bowyer apparently had not been reestablished to anything like the same extent that Whittaker had been. He reported that Bowyer was not a resident of Simcoe. Now, I appeal to my hon. friend's fairness, if the member for the riding, the Postmaster General, the Deputy Postmaster General and the inspector were trying to make out a case to have Bowyer appointed, would it have been reasonable for the report to have been sent in as it was that Bowyer was resident outside the locality and in the vicinity of Hamilton.

Mr. ARTHURS: They cannot give the inspector all the instructions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And he cannot have all the wisdom. The inspector gets pretty definite instructions. If my hon. friend will look at the book of instructions issued to each inspector he will find that he has to make these examinations, bearing in mind the class of duties that are to be performed, the amount of mail to be handled, the distance it has to be taken, the number of rural routes to be served, and the handling of the mail bags.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the hon. minister lay a copy of those instructions on the table?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sure the Postmaster General will accommodate my hon. friend.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will it be done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend wishes it.

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are public property. My hon. friend will understand that these are all departmental regulations. I wondered whether my hon. friend's suspicions with regard to residence and to the grade of the post office being changed arose from a naturally suspicious mind, so I obtained the voters' list for the town of Simcoe. It is based on the assessment that was made before applications were called for. I find at page 74 Bowyer's name and his wife's appear as tenants. The fact of the matter is that his father had several farms in the vicinity, and this boy, who perhaps was not quite as efficient as he had been before he went overseas, worked for his father on several of the farms, and his explanation at the time the inspector made his inspection was that he and his wife were during the summer visiting at a farm in the vicinity of Hamilton. The finding is that he was all the time a resident of the town of Simcoe. So I think perhaps that disposes of the question of residence.

Next we come to the question of how these appointments are made, what is required. It will be found that as far back as 1918 an arrangement was made between the Civil Service Commission and the postal department as to appointments to the postal service. On account of the necessity of appointing officials who would be able to perform the duties, which duties were better known to the postal department than to the Civil Service Commission or anybody else, the postal inspectors were to pass upon these various applicants. That is the practice which has been followed since that time. In that connection may I call the attention of the house to the statement made by the chairman of the commission, Doctor Roche, to Mr. Williamson, in a letter of February 24, 1927:

> No doubt you are acquainted with the procedure in filling such positions. The position is locally advertised by the department, applications to be sent in to the district superintendent of the postal service, London. This officer will despatch one of his inspectors—

That is, the district superintendent of postal service at London, will despatch one of his inspectors.

> —to Simcoe on a certain date to interview the applicants, and it largely depends upon the report of the inspector and district superintendent as to who receives the appointment.

In a letter dated February 26, 1927, addressed to Colonel Parkinson, who was then Deputy Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Doctor Roche made a similar statement. He said:

> The commission however largely depends upon the report of the post office inspector and district superintendent of postal service, who, after interviewing all the applicants, place them in order of merit from the post office standpoint.

And another similar letter appears at page 107 of the file, written to Mr. Beverly Anderson, who had interested himself on behalf of either Mr. Whittaker or Mr. Collver, in which it is stated:

It will largely depend upon the nature of that officer's report as to who will secure the position.

That was the practice, and it was followed in compliance with the regulations. I have the letters here, but as my time is short I will not trouble the house to read them. One is dated February 22, 1918—shortly after the act came into force—and is from Mr. Foran, secretary of the Civil Service Commission, to Doctor Coulter, the answer being dated February 26, 1918. These brought about the arrangement by which the local postal inpectors were to make the examination of the applicants. A postal service inspector did make that examination and reported thereon. The same applies to Mr. Bowyer. In a letter of March 10, 1927, Mr. Foran, secretary of the commission, writing to the superintendent of the postal service at London, says:

Mr. Bowyer is being advised that his application has been transferred to you for the necessary report on his qualifications.

I think the house perhaps has not received from my hon. friend from Leeds or from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition as clear an impression as is desirable that these examinations are not made by the Civil Service Commission's inspectors, but by the inspectors of the postal department.

Now, what is the report? When the report comes in the man placed first on the list is John Alexander Wallace. He had no previous postal experience. He represented Norfolk county in the Dominion parliament from 1921 to 1925, and he served on the board of governors of Toronto university and of the Toronto General Hospital. I think he was the Progressive member for the riding at that time, and I do not believe you could find a man better qualified to make a good postmaster. However, he was a civilian and was passed over. From the standpoint of political advantage to the member, I have no doubt that that would have been the most advantageous appointment to make. He was evidently a man of prominence in the community, but his case never was pressed. The next man reported on was Charles Rex Bowyer. This is the report of the examiner:

[Mr. Elliott.]

Charles Rex Bowyer is a married man, 28 years of age. Has a good education. Resided at Simcoe until about a year ago, but is now living at Mount Albion. Has had no postal experience, but would devote his entire time to the work. Was a student previous to enlistment and since discharge has been farm manager for his father, W. A. Bowyer, and is engaged in looking after some seven or eight farms owned by his father. This applicant states that owing to his being a minor he enlisted under an assumed name, that of C. R. Musgrove, and served twenty-seven months in France with the R.C.H.A. Discharged by reason of demobilization. No physical disability. Is a fine type and impressed me favourably.

The next man is Donald Smith. Then there is the name of Grover C. Murdock. He was not a returned man. He is the next on the list, and Whittaker was only seventh on the list. So that if Bowyer had not been appointed, in all probability one of the other returned men would have come in next instead of Whittaker.

Well, the examination was made, and the report reached the Civil Service Commission in due time. But on account of the difficulty in identifying Bowyer with Musgrove—because that was the name under which he enlisted as he was under age—some considerable time was taken in making sure that he was the same man, and, on February 18, 1928, Mr. Foran, the secretary, addressed this letter to the Deputy Postmaster General. I will just read the last paragraph because it is No. 32 on the file, and the whole letter appears on the file:

I should be glad, therefore, if the department could furnish the commissioners with a definite report, at as early a date as possible, with reference to Mr. Whittaker's physical fitness for this postmastership.

The report comes in a little later, and is dated 5th March, 1928, and is as follows:

When questioned, Mr. Whittaker stated that it would be impossible for him to do any heavy lifting.

If the Simcoe post office were a revenue office, the postmaster could, if necessary, hire an additional clerk to perform the heavy work and in the case of a city office, there would be sufficient other work so that it would be necessary for the postmaster to perform duties of a heavy nature, but, in the case of a 2B office, it is my opinion that what is required is a working postmaster.

His appointment, therefore, would probably make it necessary to add an additional employee to the 2B Simcoe post office.

I find my time passing pretty rapidly, but I want to call attention to this: The notice was issued. Now, what I say is this, that the judgment that was being relied upon by the Civil Service Commission, in making this appointment, was the judgment of the inspector from London who reported that Whittaker was unable to perform these duties, and you will note—if my hon. friends will be good enough to look at the appointment dated May 29, 1928—that it contains this clause which, I venture to say, will not be found in many notices if in any other; it certainly is not in the appointment when Mr. Bowyer was notified:

(Appointment subject to physical fitness.)

It also calls attention to the fact that:

The deputy head may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

And the ruling of the Department of Justice dated the 9th December, 1919—and I think this is very important; it is on the bottom of the notice that was sent—

Mr. DUNNING: Sent to whom?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To Whittaker. The ruling reads:

If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he think it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the discharge of any duties; otherwise in conceivable cases considerable prejudice to the public service might ensue.

Mr. PRICE: Will the minister permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: Was Whittaker given an opportunity to show what physical fitness he had to carry on?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was just hoping that would be the question my hon. friend would ask: Was Whittaker given an opportunity to show what fitness he had to carry on? My contention, Mr. Speaker, is that in view of the report of the inspector who, by arrangement between the Civil Service Commission and the post office, is the inspector upon whose judgment the Civil Service Commission must depend, he never was appointed. What would be the sense, I would ask my hon. friends—

Mr. PRICE: He was recommended by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would ask, what would be the sense in giving him a trial? What would be the sense in giving a trial to a man who had been reported by the competent official as being quite incapable of performing the duties of the office to which he was about to be appointed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer the question.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why would you take a man who was reported by the inspector as being incapable of performing the duties and give him a six months' period of probation?

I am now going to come to what I think is a complete answer to this resolution. What does the act say? The act says, section 24:

The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head of the commission.

Mr. CAHAN: Whittaker had been appointed subject to probation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh no. My hon. friend has not, I am afraid, been paying the attention which he usually pays. He had been appointed subject to a certificate of physical fitness, and no certificate of physical fitness had ever been made to the inspector who is the judge as to physical fitness, and who reported that he was physically unfit.

Now, I also want to call attention to this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg the hon. gentlemen to kindly listen to the hon. member.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to say I would not object to the question, only the time is very short, and I had hoped that my hon. friends during this discussion would get into their heads what really took place in connection with this matter.

I referred to the question of rejection. I want—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): In my observations in this house I have always been impressed with several things which emanate from the other side of the house. One is that on every possible occasion my hon. friends hug the old flag to their bosoms, raising shouts of patriotism. Another is how, when they find some unfortunate individual, they can depict most terrible conditions and pose as the champions of such an unfortunate.

I refer to the famous McConachie case in Halifax. In the present case hon. gentlemen opposite are taking advantage of the infirmities of a poor unfortunate soldier in order to make political capital. The expression has been coined to-night that we might differentiate between an official Liberal and an official Conservative; some further reference was made to an artificial Conservative, and I would particularly refer that expression to hon. gentlemen opposite if they are really sincere in their desire to look after the interests of returned men. I would ask them to turn their attention to the provincial government of Ontario, and in this connection I am going to refer to just one town, the town of Simcoe, whose post office is under discussion now. I find that since 1926 the provincial government has appointed many men in that town; they appointed the clerk of the surrogate court, a civilian and a Tory; the issuer of motor licenses and the examiner for motor licenses, civilians and Tories; the entire staff of the liquor store, all Tories and all civilians with one exception. Those appointments were made during the time my good friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) was on the Liquor Control Board. I do not know just what effort he made to curb the greatest exponent of patronage in this country, Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, or whether he made any effort. I would also point out that just recently the jailer of the town of Simcoe resigned and according to the Brantford Expositor his successor has been named already in the person of George M. Boughnee, a civilian and a defeated Tory candidate in that riding.

Now I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they are not humbugging the people of Ontario at all by putting their feet in one direction and their face in another with regard to the returned men, their duplicity is so apparent that they are not going to get by with it. My riding adjoins the county of Norfolk, in which county this controversy has arisen, and I want to assure the Postmaster General that he has nothing whatever to fear with regard to these unfair attacks. I say that Mr. Whittaker, a poor unfortunate soldier, has been caught in the whirlwind of this Tory barrage, and is finding himself left with so many public utterances which are not true and according to fact that I believe he is sadder and wiser for having been a tool in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) read certain extracts from the Toronto Globe with regard to a statement made by Whittaker in which he said an attempt had been made to buy his silence. In order to refresh the memory of the house I will read just what Mr. Whittaker said:

> Last summer, after word of the appointment of Mr. Bowyer to the postmastership had come through, I was approached by a member of the local Liberal executive, presumably delegated by W. H. Taylor, M.P., the Liberal member for Norfolk, and was offered a proposition somewhat as follows: The local Liberals, backed by the member, were to agree to lend me their support in securing an appointment at Brantford, Ontario. In return I was to promise to maintain a discreet silence in regard to my treatment at the hands of the Postmaster General and not to be seen conversing in public with any person known to be of the Conservative stripe. In addition, I was to be bound by the conditions of a letter which they were to submit for my signature and which was to be made public prior to the public announcement of my appointment.

I do not hesitate a moment to read that statement because I want to read something else which has a direct bearing upon the question, another statement of which I believe the leader of the opposition had full knowledge when he read Mr. Whittaker's statement to the house. Surely he wants to be fair, so why did he not go further and read the reply which was broadcast throughout the country by Doctor English, who was named by Mr. Whittaker as having been the intermediary between the Liberal party and himself in the attempt to buy his silence?

Mr. BENNETT: I can assure the hon. gentleman that I have not seen the document to which he refers.

Mr. HEPBURN: You are going to hear it now and I will tell you that I do not think you are going to like it very much.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEPBURN: Be patient; you cannot disturb me in the least. Here is what Doctor English said with regard to his being a party to this so-called conspiracy:

> Doctor Sanford English, whom Mr. Whittaker presumes was directed by Mr. Taylor to approach him last summer, declared to The Advertiser, without reservation of any kind, that he went to Mr. Whittaker, who is his personal friend, entirely of his own free will, without Mr. Taylor's knowledge, and that Mr. Whittaker, in attaching Liberal significance to his conversation, is going quite beyond the mark of truth.

From his actions I am beginning to think that Mr. Whittaker must be a Conservative.

> "The Liberal executive did not send me; I went of my own free will, interested in George Whittaker's case as a friend." Doctor English said. "I thought he did not receive fair play, because the Civil Service Commission should not have sent out the notice of his selection until his appointment was approved by the postal department, and that was the only reason, outside of our personal friendship, for my going to him."

"Mr. Whittaker intimated to me when I spoke to him several weeks ago that he did not think he was physically fit for the Simcoe postmastership," Doctor English continued. "I then suggested to him, all as my own idea, that he should state that and other facts in a public letter, and then proceed to get another job if possible."

"I don't happen to be a member of the Liberal executive, and no newspaper, no indivdual, Mr. Whittaker or anybody else has the right to insinuate for one moment that I went to him as a go-between for the Liberal party," Doctor English concluded. "I went to him solely as a personal friend and a fellow war veteran. Mr. Whittaker has given me a raw deal, because it was all my own idea."

The leader of the opposition went further and quoted more so-called scandal; he gave another statement by Mr. Whittaker in which he said:

It was the night of October 3 when my friend, Sam Morris, of Port Dover, also an amputation case, was approached by A. A. Winter, K.C., of Simcoe. They were attending a meeting in Port Dover in connection with proposed improvements to the harbour, at which Hon. J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works, was present. In the course of their conversation, Mr. Winter stated that the local Liberal party was prepared to secure for me any job which I would be able to handle.

That very definite statement was read in this house. I have in my hand the denial not only of Mr. Morris, who is the publisher of the Port Dover Maple Leaf, but also of Mr. Winter, K.C., of Simcoe. Mr. Winter said:

The statement made by Mr. Whittaker that I approached Mr. Morris, of Port Dover, in connection with this matter is absolutely false. Mr. Morris will bear me out in this statement.

Here is the signed statement of Mr. Morris:

Colonel Winter's statement is correct. He did not approach me with any offer or in any way in regard to the case. The offer, as reported, was made to Whittaker long before the Port Dover meeting.

The offer in question was the offer made by a personal friend, Doctor English, whose statement I have read to the house.

This unfortunate fellow was driven even further by those who I believe tried to make political capital out of the Simcoe postmastership. In order to establish himself in Class A of the eligible list he had to prove that he had not been properly re-established. On his return from the war Mr. Whittaker was placed with the Soldiers Settlement Board, which position he held for six years, and from which he resigned voluntarily. In order to put himself in class A of the eligible list he had to make a certain affidavit, which I wish to read to the house. He purchased a monument works, and I have here his statement with regard to his financial standing after having purchased that business in Simcoe. He said:

I have been informed that to secure this preference it is required that the disabled ex-service man shall not have been re-established. I think I may claim that I am not re-established. When I made application for this position a year ago, I was then working under contract for St. Williams Preservers, Limited, Simcoe, Ontario. .This contract was terminated in October last. From October to February, this year, I was unemployed.

It might be claimed that I am now re-established in business. I would like to say, however, that the effort I have been making to re-establish myself is not proving successful. I thought I saw an opportunity when I used my small savings to purchase this monumental stone business but I have been losing money steadily. I have had no experience in this business and I find that my ignorance, coupled with my inability to do any of the actual skilled labour required, is too great a handicap which my resources, now depleted, could not overcome.

Following that statement, this man made a sworn affidavit as follows:

(1) That in February, 1928, I purchased a monumental stone business believing it to present an opportunity for successful re-establishment.

(2) That I had only a layman's knowledge of said business.

(3) That since entering this business I have steadily depleted my financial resources without any adequate return.

(4) That my experience during the past three months indicates that competition in this business is so keen as to force me either to seek more capital in order to carry on or wind up affairs.

(5) That I see no prospect of securing more capital and shall be obliged on this account to relinquish said business at a considerable loss.

This affidavit was taken at Ottawa, and whoever was behind Mr. Whittaker prevailed upon him to make an affidavit which I am going to prove to the house was absolutely false. I do not know just who did it, but certainly there was influence working behind him. Here is what Mr. Whittaker said in his own statement:

Mr. Veniot made such capital out of the fact that I had stated that my business was not a paying one.

It is true that he said his business was not a paying one, but that is an affidavit which was made in the city of Ottawa when he was probably surrounded by a few of his Conservative friends. The statement continues:

As a matter of fact, I had owned the business only four months, and naturally had not a chance to discover if it were a profitable business. I would never have made any declaration about it if the Civil Service Commission had not advised me that if I wished to show that I was properly re-established it would be necessary for me to take an affidavit to the effect that my business was not paying. Mr. Veniot has now used this affidavit as an instrument to prove that I lost nothing by selling my business. I can only say that if I had not received my notice of appointment as postmaster I still would be the owner of that business, and I am sure that I could have made a success of it.

I want the house to get the significance of these various statements made by Mr. Whittaker. It proves to me quite clearly that this unfortunate fellow certainly had powerful influences working behind him for the one purpose of making political capital out of his infirmities.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the hon. member be good enough to give the date of that affidavit?

Mr. HEPBURN: This affidavit was made in Ottawa on April 24, 1928.

Our political friends went much farther and tried to introduce politics into the Canadian Legion. I happen to be a member of the Canadian Legion in the city of St. Thomas, and a resolution was introduced into that body for the sole purpose of discrediting this government. What was the result? The Canadian Legion threw out the resolution by unanimous consent. Why did they do that? They are not interested in choosing as between one or another returned man so long as the government is carrying out the principle of giving the returned man the preference. I will not quote this resolution, as it appears in the records of the Canadian Legion.

The report of the inspector showed very clearly that Mr. Whittaker was not physically able to handle this job. Any member of this house with any knowledge as to how a man is handicapped through having to walk on two stumps can realize that he could not carry on.

Mr. PRICE: Did he not carry on a grocery business under his own name?

Mr. HEPBURN: He never worked in a grocery store, nor did he ever own a grocery store.

Mr. PRICE: Did he not do that before he made application to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please.

Mr. PRICE: Was not the inspector sent there as a friend of the department?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

[Mr. Hepburn.]

Mr. HEPBURN: The inspector reported that he was not physically fit to carry on the work in a class 2B post office, and if he were appointed it would be necessary to put another man on the staff to do the work for him. What would be the position of Mr. Whittaker then? He would be holding a nominal position and drawing salary, and the other man would be doing the work; in other words, he would have his pension supplemented by something like $2,040 per year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is what has happened now.

Mr. HEPBURN: There are many double amputation cases in this country, and if it is fair to put Mr. Whittaker in an office where he would hold a nominal position and thereby supplement his pension, why is it not fair to extend that privilege to every other double amputation case in this Dominion? This country prides itself on trying to do the fair thing by its returned men. Last year I sat on the pensions committee and I believe that we made it possible for all returned men to obtain equity and justice. I believe we pay the highest rate of pension of any country in the world, and if any returned man with a hundred per cent disability is not able to obtain sufficient to live on, then it is up to the pensions board to supplement his income; it is not up to any particular department to give him a nominal position and appoint another man to do the work.

The motion which is before the house reads:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe."

What is the spirit of the act? I think it was pretty well set forth, by a letter which was written by Doctor Roche, in which he outlined the usual procedure followed in filling an appointment of this kind. He said:

I have received several similar letters on behalf of this gentleman, and have no doubt that he would make an excellent postmaster. The commission, however, largely depends upon the report of the post office inspector and district superintendent of postal service, who after interviewing all the applicants place them on order of merit from a post office standpoint. If Mr. Whittaker has not as yet been re-established, his disability would of course entitle him to the preference, and I can assure you that the very best consideration will be given his claims by the commission before an appointment is made.

The point I desire to make there is that the usual procedure followed by the commission is to have the proper inspector in that district make a report. That procedure was carried out in the first report of Inspector Murray, who is a very capable man, and who stated this with regard to Mr. Whittaker:

George Edward Whittaker is a married man, twenty-eight years of age. Has a very good education. Has resided in Simcoe for about two years and eight months. He has no postal experience but would devote his entire time to the work. Was at school previous to enlistment and since the war has been an adjuster for the soldier settlement board, and is now accountant and office manager for the St. William's Preservers at Simcoe. Enlisted in the 55th battery and served in France eight months with the 22nd battery and discharged as medically unfit and recived 100 per cent pension. This applicant has a double amputation below the knees, and I do not think he would be able properly to attend to the duties of the office with this disabilty.

That was the first report of the inspector. The Civil Service Commission then sent out the inspector to get another report as to the physical ability of this man to carry on.

Mr. IRVINE: They sent out the same inspector, did they not?

Mr. HEPBURN: The same inspector, and this is what he said with respect to Mr. Whittaker:

I would say that on the 3rd instant, I again interviewed Mr. Whittaker, and would say that his right leg is amputated about three inches below the knee, his left at the ankle, and he walks without the use of a cane. He states that he was with the St. Williams jam factory for three years and in that time was off for one month with a blister in his right stump. He also states that it is necessary for him to go to Toronto at intervals for adjustments to his artifical limbs.

When questioned, Mr. Whittaker stated that it would be impossible for him to do any heavy lifting.

If the Simcoe post office were a revenue office, the postmaster could, if necessary, hire an additional clerk to perform the heavy work, and in the case of a city office there would be sufficient other work, so that it would not be necessary for the postmaster to perform duties of a heavy nature, but, in the case of a 2B office, it is my opinon that what is required is a working postmaster. Apart from the postmaster, there is one man in the office, who works from 5.30 a.m. to 9 p.m., with some hours off for meals. His actual working hours are 12 hours each day, and in his absence the postmaster does any heavy work.

If the department requires a working postmaster at Simcoe, it is my opinion that an additional male clerk will be necessary in the event of Mr. Whittaker's appointment, as he is not physically capable of performing any heavy duties.

Mr. SPENCER: What reason is there for sending the same inspector twice to cross-examine this man?

Mr. HEPBURN: Certain men are allocated to certain postal districts; they cover those districts and become very familiar with them.

Mr. BENNETT: They asked for a definite report.

Mr. HEPBURN: The Civil Service Commission asked for this second report. W. J. May, district superintendent, chief of the whole district, concurred in the report of his inspector. This is what he said:

Replying to departmental memorandum of the 24th ultimo file POS—Simcoe, having regard to the physical fitness of George Edward Whittaker who was an applicant for the position of postmaster, the district superintendent would advise that Inspector Murray interviewed Mr. Whittaker on the 3rd instant, and his report in connection is enclosed for the information of the department and commission.

It would appear that Mr. Whittaker's disabilty would not permit hm to perform the duties such as would be expected of a postmaster of a grade 2B office, and his appointment, therefore, would probably make it necessary to add an additonal employee to the establishment of the Simcoe post office.

The charge has been made of political partisanship and almost everything else; but as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) pointed out, this is not a matter of choosing between a Grit and a Tory. Mr. Whittaker told me repeatedly, while he was lobbying here in Ottawa, that he was a strong Liberal, and that all his people were Liberals. The Globe depicted him on one occasion as being carried on his father's back to vote for Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was also pointed out that the men who recommended him were not only representative Liberals but executive Liberals in the riding. It was not a matter of choosing between a returned man and a civilian either, because both men had enviable war records. I have under my hand a telegram from the Canadian Legion of the town of Simcoe. Strange to say, they were backing another man entirely; outside of both of these men they chose a third. The telegram reads:

Norfolk county veterans endorse candidature of Mr. Roy Collver for position of postmaster at Simcoe. Your cooperation requested.

So it seems to me that the Postmaster General instead of disregarding the spirit of the act, really carried out the spirit of the act, and when Mr. Whittaker was proved to be physically unfit for the position—and I am very sorry for him—the next in order of merit was chosen, that is the first on the eligible list of returned men. I can see nothing wrong with that. If anybody disregarded the spirit of the act, it was the Civil Service Commission when, knowing Whittaker was physically unfit, they issued a certificate in his favour.

An hon. MEMBER: And he was seventh on the list.

Mr. HEPBURN: Yes, and on top of that he had been reestablished. Another significant fact is that after they had issued this certificate, they put this notation on it: "Subject to physical fitness". Apparently they thought they were not doing the right thing, and yet the Postmaster General has to bear the brunt of all this. I tried to find out, from the Civil Service Commission and others, who had advised Mr. Whittaker to take this false affidavit. It was not done officially. Whoever did it, did it unofficially. I think the Postmaster General has been the victim of circumstances in this case, and were it not for the disgruntled Globe and our Conservative friends endeavouring to make political capital out of it, nothing would have been said about the matter. The most unfortunate part of it is that Mr. Whittaker did not keep his position in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment, land settlement branch. He had a good position there which he was capable of filling, but he thought he was moving into better fields. That of course, was his own business. When, however, the question is one of seeking a position which he is not fitted to hold, I do not think it is fair to the country that we should appoint Mr. Whittaker to an office, and then appoint another man to do the work for him.

I am going to vote in support of the Postmaster General, and I believe I am doing the fair thing. I am not going to take up more of the time of the house because I think too much time has already been wasted. I could quote many newspapers, favourable to the Postmaster General, including even The Farmers' Sun, the comment of which might be of interest to our friends from the west. This is what The Farmers' Sun has to say:

> There are 17,000 postmasters in Canada and the Deputy Postmaster General refused certificates of ex-soldiers in four cases, as follows:
> (1) Because the ex-service man intended to keep his other job and farm out the post office to somebody else at half price, pocketing half the salary himself.

The Tory papers certainly made a great fuss about this until the boomerang came back and hit them in the face.

> (2) Because of old age and unfitness for the position.
> (3) —

And this is the important one, in this case:

> —For physical unfitness.
> (4) For lack of proper qualifications.

We must have some regard for the qualifications of men seeking public office. I could instance a case in a town in my county where a returned soldier was chosen for a position and within a few months he had embezzled about $1,700 of the country's money and had got away. Another man was put in his place and he also got away with a considerable sum of money. Then a third man was put in and he is serving efficiently and well. This goes to show how careful we must be in getting a man qualified to fill the office. In my county there was another case where several returned soldiers applied for a position. They were all disqualified and a lady who was the cousin of a former Conservative member for the riding got the position. At that time there was no howl from my hon. friends; they were meek as cats, in spite of all their apparent sentiments in favour of returned soldiers.

Let me say to the Postmaster General that he need have no fear with regard to the sentiment of the clear-minded people in southern Ontario. While the rubbish put forth across the floor might appeal to unenlightened minds, there are very few of them, if any, in that particular district.

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): It is not my intention to permit the remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) to pass without some observations which I have to make in connection with this appointment. I am sure it has been clear from the beginning of this debate that the matter of appointments by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) has been, from start to finish, one of political expediency. For the past week the Postmaster General has not been able to get one item of his estimates through, and he has met with severe criticism because of the fact that political interference has been permitted to intermingle with his duty. This has been apparent from the various cases that have been brought to his attention. The criticism he has received has been such as has never been directed towards any previous minister of his department.

Who was this man Whittaker, about whom there has been so much talk? He is a returned soldier, having lost both of his legs below the knee. At the time of his appointment he was running a store, which called for considerable energy. He was in the grocery business.

Mr. HEPBURN: No, he was not.

Mr. PRICE: My hon. friend knows all about it. I am speaking now. He was running a general store.

Mr. DUNNING: No, he was not. He never had to do with a general store.

Mr. PRICE: I may be in error, but in whatever business he was working, it required considerable physical energy, and he carried on. What occurred? A position as postmaster was advertised and he applied to the Postmaster General for appointment. He was recommended to the department of the Postmaster General for appointment. What happened? It was found out that his political leanings were not of the right kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. PRICE: They were not of the right kind and some excuse had to be made to get him out of the position. That excuse was similar to the one offered in other cases that have been referred to on the floor of the house during the past week. They set about forthwith to send an inspector to investigate. I do not know his name, although I presume it was given to-night. I believe the same thing occurred in this case as has occurred in New Brunswick since the present administration took office, and especially since the present Postmaster General was appointed, namely, that a suitable official was sent to perform the duties of investigation. The strongest objection that I have heard to-night and the last few days against this man's fitness to fill the position, was with regard to his physical condition. The postmaster has to sort the mail, lift the bags, and do certain little duties, but to hear the arguments advanced to-night from the other side you would think in order to handle the mail bags the postmaster had to be a Sandow. What are the Canadian government railways doing to-day? Let me ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) if there are not in the employ of the government railways to-day switchmen, on whom the precious lives of hundreds of people depend, and who in some cases are performing their duties efficiently minus an arm or a leg. These men are supposed to be alert and active and strong enough physically even to turn a switch with one arm, a switch that either turns a train into a siding or runs it out on the main line. Does not the minister agree with that?

Mr. DUNNING: May I point out that it is the man's brain that determines whether he turns the switch one way or the other? The arm simply carries out the dictates of the brain.

Mr. PRICE: I am very much surprised at the minister making such an observation, because it requires considerable physical force to turn a switch. Did the minister ever turn one? No, and that is why he does not know. I have, and I know. That is a pretty lame excuse, and it must be apparent to the people throughout this country that the excuses made by this administration, particularly in connection with the Postmaster General and his appointments and dismissals, and the manner in which investigations have been conducted, do not reflect credit on the present administration.

Let me give only one little example, and this is a very mild case compared with others that have been brought forward. At the little village of Hartland, the postmaster, Mr. McCullum, died. He had as his assistant, Miss Currie, a very nice young lady, who had had previous experience in the postal service at that place. In the usual course Miss Currie was asked to act until such time as a permanent postmaster or postmistress should be appointed. This she did. Eventually the position was advertised, but in the meantime Miss Currie was advised that a Mr. Lasky would take charge in her place. Among those applying for the position was Miss Currie, who had previously acted as assistant to the postmaster, Mr. Lasky and a returned soldier. The Civil Service Commission recommended that the returned soldier be appointed, returned men having the preference, but before his appointment had been confirmed by the Post Office department, he received notice that under the rules and regulations of the department another appointment had been made, and that he would not have the opportunity of demonstrating whether or not he was fit for the position. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the whole thing has been political from start to finish. It has been a question all along of political expediency. I want to say to the Postmaster General and to the government that in making appointments such as they have, they are flying pretty strongly in the face of public opinion. Furthermore, should the Postmaster General continue in this way there will be investigations which possibly have not been contemplated in the past, and with all due regard for the ability of the Postmaster General, let me tell him that he will come in for more criticism than he has met with during the last week.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) started out this evening rather warmly, making the whole ministry practically responsible for the utterance of a newspaper called Le Droit published in the city of Ottawa. I hope the hon. gentleman himself will never be held responsible for newspaper articles, and I think it is unfair to hold the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) responsible for the utterance of this newspaper. As some hon. members of this house may know—the French members read Le Droit daily,—it is an independent newspaper which has been criticising the government every second day for not making appointments according to its own views. The paper has been carrying on a very intensive campaign especially against the Department of Justice because certain appointments have not been made, in the province of Ontario, where there is a large proportion of French-speaking people, and generally throughout the country. Some months ago this paper conducted a very extensive campaign regarding the civil service, taking up that old issue which has been threshed out thoroughly in the last fifteen years, that the French-speaking people have not their proper percentage of appointments in the various departments at Ottawa. This newspaper, therefore, cannot be considered as an organ of the party.

The hon. leader of the opposition also referred to the bilingual stamp.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, I did not. I read from the paper that referred to it.

Mr. MARCIL: When in connection with the diamond jubilee of confederation a meeting was called two years ago, presided over by the Governor General, I was appointed vice-chairman of a committee, which included Sir Lomer Gouin, Sir Robert Borden, and Senator Graham, to organize for the celebration. Remembering that confederation had been brought about by the representatives at that time of the two great races in this country, that Quebec was the keystone of the arch of confederation as it exists to-day, and that without the consent of Quebec there would never have been any confederation in this country, we decided unanimously in this committee to have a celebration that would appeal to both races, that our publications would be in both languages, and the jubilee celebrated throughout all the provinces. We asked for the cooperation of all the provincial governments, and incidentally we made the suggestion that as the language of the International Postal Union is French, it would be an appropriate occasion to place at least one French word on the Canadian stamps of this country, showing that French is one of our official languages. This was done on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Marler, seconded by Mr. Tom Moore, both members of the committee. The proposal carried unanimously, and was transmitted through the governor in council to the Postmaster General. I mention that to show that this request was made by a non-political committee brought together for the purpose of organizing the celebration of the jubilee of confederation. The leader of the opposition, for whom I have a great deal of respect and esteem, may be called upon some day to fill a still higher position than the one he now occupies. Would he allow me to ask him to glance at the past history of the Conservative party and to remember that there was a time when the province of Quebec was the backbone of the Conservative party in this country, and that the greatest of all Conservative leaders understood the spirit and did not stick to the letter, when he came to deal with the people of the province of Quebec? Minorities the world over are sensitive of their rights, sometimes of their duties, and they wish to be treated fairly and honestly. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, who knows Quebec thoroughly, and who has had occasion since he has been chosen leader of his great party to speak in Montreal, the city of Quebec, and other parts of the province, will at all times be a friend of the idea of concord and union in this country. Canada can only stand when the two great races understand each other thoroughly and give to each other that which is their due. I need not go back into the past history of the province or of Canada. We all know what the French-speaking people have done for this country, and what they are doing at the present time and are prepared to do. I hope that for his own sake and for the sake of the party that he now leads he will not permit the mistakes made by the former leaders of the Conservative party, those who trod in the footsteps of Sir John A. Macdonald and lost power as a consequence through alienating the people of the province of Quebec.

There is another question that I should like to lay before the house. The impression should not go abroad that civil service reform was initiated by the Conservative party. I had the honour in 1908 to be associated with the late Hon. Sydney Fisher, then Minister of Agriculture, when he introduced the first Civil Service Act. That was the first attempt to establish civil service reform in this country. From 1867 to 1873 and from 1878 to 1896 the Conservative party were in power, but they found no time to introduce a civil service act to bring about civil service reform. It was not until 1908 that, as I have said, the first move was made in this direction. The act applied to the inside service.

In 1911 there was a change of government, and in 1921, just before the general election, the Conservative party realized that in adopting the Civil Service Act of 1918 they had gone too far, and the Spinney bill was introduced by the late Hon. Mr. Spinney, who then represented the county of Yarmouth, for the purpose of taking away from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission certain classes of employees, one being rural postmasters. These men had never been considered civil servants; they are not now, being part-time employees. The Spinney bill was intended to eliminate precisely this class of men. The late Hon. Mr. Edwards, whose absence at the present time we regret, was one of the strongest supporters of the bill, as was also the late Sir Sam Hughes, another of the strong men of the Conservative party. Mr. Spinney gave this brief explanation of the purpose of his bill:

> I first wish to state that it is conceded that when the Civil Service Act was framed and enacted in 1918 the commission was given powers and obligations entirely in advance of those entered into by either the United States or Great Britain, imposing duties beyond the ability of any commission, however efficient they may be, to accomplish without some sacrifice to the public service.
> On account of serious complaints against the administration of the Civil Service Commission, for reasons already assigned, from both inside and outside parliament, it was deemed advisable to appoint a special committee of the house to make careful inquiries into actual conditions and, if necessary, to offer practical suggestions in order that a remedy might be applied.

The bill had practically the unanimous support of the Conservative party, and it proposed to exempt from the operation of the Civil Service Commission three classes; one, men employed on railways and ships; two, postmasters; three, labourers. We were on the eve of an election. We have a saying in Quebec, the more things change the more things happen again. Well, I have seen this parliament change nine times, and I have seen the same game played by the same men on both sides of the house—in one way when they are sitting to the left of the Speaker and in another way when they are sitting to his right. It was thought at the time by the Conservative party that the bill if enacted would afford opportunity of making a large number of appointments throughout the country; but such strong opposition developed that finally the bill was withdrawn. In 1914 hon. gentlemen who were then members of the house will recall that the late John Sinclair, member for Guysborough, moved for a return showing the number of dismissals that had been made by the Conservative party in the last three years following the general election of 1911. It took a couple of sessions to get the return. When it came down it showed that there had been eleven thousand dismissals and twenty-two thousand appointments in that period of time. It had been explained that the introduction of the rural mail service was one of the reasons for the large number of dismissals. In my county I have only a very small mileage of rural mail service, and certainly the numerous dismissals of postmasters there were not for that reason; they were dismissed purely for political reasons.

A moment ago the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price) condemned the Postmaster General's conduct in regard to the dismissal of certain officials in New Brunswick. Let me cite an instance of a man who played probably the most important part in encompassing the defeat of the present Postmaster General, at the time that he was appealing for reelection as premier of New Brunswick, and bringing into power his successor, the Hon. Mr. Baxter. I refer to Mr. Angus McLean, the man who organized the pulpwood and waterpower resources of Grand Falls. He was postmaster of the post office at Chaleurs; he lived hundreds of miles away. He had the work done by the clerks in his office. He took a prominent part on the hustings against the Liberal party in New Brunswick, and when I called the minister's attention to this, he said, "The member for Bonaventure will allow me to apply the law to Mr. Angus McLean." I am sorry the member for Westmorland is not in his seat, for I am sure he must be familiar with these facts. Mr. Angus McLean returned the compliment by doing me the honour of coming into my constituency and making speeches against me, but I am glad to say they had very little effect on the electorate.

For many years I have had the honour to represent a constituency where the people agree to live together in harmony. One-third of my constituency is English-speaking and Protestant. The Anglicans generally are Conservative, the Presbyterians, Liberal. For forty or fifty years up to 1870 the French-Canadians gave practically a solid Conservative vote, but in 1890, the Hon. Mr. Mercier, who was then one of the greatest public men in the province of Quebec, carried the constituency by the strength of his appeal to all classes of the population. In 1891 an English-speaking Protestant was elected by an overwhelming majority of the Roman Catholic vote, although his opponent was a Roman Catholic.

It shows the broadmindedness and tolerance prevalent throughout the province of Quebec.

The postmastership at Simcoe has been thoroughly discussed. I would remind the house that up to 1918 our political history discloses that the principle followed by both parties was "to the victor belong the spoils". An attempt was made to change that state of affairs, but the Conservative party overdid itself, and to-day I have no doubt that the members of the Civil Service Commission—especially the chairman, Doctor Roche, with whom I had the honour to sit in this house for many years when he represented the constituency of Marquette—would be the first to declare that the commission is not equipped to look after the outside service as it should be looked after. What happens? The Civil Service Commission calls upon the inspector of the district. He is not the official of the Civil Service Commission. He is the official of the post office, called upon by them before they make a report, and, as the late Mr. Spinney said, the Civil Service Commission have to accept the report of the post office inspector. They have no other officials at their disposal.

The Civil Service Commission costs over a quarter of a million dollars a year. It costs half a million dollars a year to equip it with all the necessary officials it needs to carry on its work. So that I think we should go back to the principle that we used to have in the old days, which was a very old principle of the British constitution. After all, the Postmaster General is responsible for what takes place in the Post Office department. He is responsible to this house, and we individually are responsible to our constituencies. When an election takes place in Calgary, the voters there vote yea or nay, for or against the leader of the opposition, who carries on his back the faults and the advantages of his party, the iniquities and otherwise which may be charged against it. We are all in the same position at election time. We have to answer for all that has been done.

When I came to the house first there was no Civil Service Commission; there was no railway commission; there was no soldiers re-establishment commission; there were none of these various commission, which have taken away from the representatives of the people the privileges they used to have in the old days. I receive many letters to-day from my old constituents, the oldest among them, because I have reached the second generation now, telling me that at such and such a time I could have obtained appointments on the Intercolonial railway. The Minister of Railways and Canals at that time had the administration of the road. I could appoint a snowshoveller, a section man, or one of the working gang. But that to-day is impossible. An application is received by a member who forwards it to the minister, and that is the end of it so far as the member is concerned. And still we have to render to our people an account for all these things. The people look to us; they look to the member of parliament who is responsible for everything that is going on. He has to render an account for the actions of all these commissions; he has to vote the money in this house. I am compelled to repeat what has been repeated very often: we have removed responsible government from the shoulders of those on whom it used to rest. Responsible government should rest upon the representatives of the people. The Postmaster General is in exactly the same position as all the other ministers, but when we consider that he has 17,000 employees under him is there any comparison possible between him and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for instance, or the Minister of Justice? Why, in my constituency there is not a single employee of the Department of Justice. The only man who comes into my constituency having any connection with that department is a non-resident judge who sits once or twice a year. I have no representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce in my constituency, therefore, there can be no change in that respect. But I have nearly 100 post offices, and that is the case generally throughout the whole country.

All things considered, I think that the Postmaster General deserves the thanks of this country for the energetic manner in which he has carried on the duties of his office. In the old days, when the Liberal party came into office in 1896, the post office department was at a very, very low ebb. Sir William Mulock, who took charge of that department, was perhaps the greatest of all our postmasters general. He introduced penny postage and put Canada on the map of the empire; he brought about efficient service in the Post Office department, and, all in all, was as I say the greatest of all our postmasters general. The present Postmaster General is following in his footsteps, following the principles laid down by him, introducing reforms as the country develops. He has introduced, for instance, the air mail service, establishing rapid communication and transportation from one part of the country to the other. If for no other reason, therefore, than to second him in his valuable efforts I think this house will take the view that not only in relation to this case of Simcoe—where, after all, the Postmaster General should have something to say, otherwise he is a nonentity, with no privileges at all— but in relation to other cases as well, this amendment should be thrown out by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, there are three parties in this house, at least so-called. I have always looked on a political party as a group of men who have gathered around a set of principles, and who have organized for the bringing of those principles into effect.

In dealing with this question, I may say that this is one of the questions that this group in this corner is often called upon to decide as between the two parties. This little group has often been placed in this position before. Now, we decided years ago to vote on the merits of any question before the house. In this case a vital principle is concerned, and one on which for many years we, as an organized economic group, have pronounced repeatedly. This, as I see it, it is not a case of deciding on anything specific, or deciding as to the discharge of one postmaster and the appointment of another in his place; although I know that in that regard a good deal of hardship has been created even since the last federal election, which we can easily find to be the case where some of these country post offices have been established in conjunction with a store. A man who is appointed postmaster in a given district sets up a little business, and the first thing we know he is thrown out of office because of party politics, and then he has to move his business. That is a real hardship; and I should think that, at this late date, 1929, more than sixty years after confederation, this game of party politics should come to an end.

As to the amendment itself, it is a question of patronage in general, so far as we are concerned, and we are utterly opposed to such a thing. We cannot overlook the fact that since 1921, I am sorry to say, this government has done practically everything in its power to discredit and destroy the work of the Civil Service Commission. In fact, one of the members of the Liberal party, speaking on the budget a little while ago, advocated that "to the victor belongs the spoils." I refer to the member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff).

Every year a greater number of appointments is made subject to the proviso, "notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act." The little group in this corner are here in support of certain definite principles in this matter, and even when deciding as between the two parties, with whom a principle does not seem to count for a great deal, we have, as I say, to decide on the merits of the question. And we also have to take into account the course we are expected, by our constituents, to follow. Every member who calls himself a Liberal-Progressive, even if sitting with the Liberal party, must find it rather hard to vote with the government on a question of this kind. As one of the speakers to-night has already said with regard to the discharge of civil servants, this is a case of political expediency. To the members in this corner this whole case looks like one of party expediency, and I do not want this incident to pass without letting the house know where we stand on this question. In closing I want to say that we are unalterably opposed to patronage in any form.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this discussion but for the remarks just made by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). However, I feel it my duty to tell the house of my experiences with the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). The hon. member for Rosetown has intimated that it might be hard for the Liberal Progressives to support the government on this occasion, and he has suggested that we should express ourselves against what he calls the violation of the principles of the Civil Service Act by the Postmaster General.

Since coming to this house I have had several experiences with the Post Office department. I have had one or two experiences with that department within the last year or so, since the present Postmaster General took office, and I want to say that I found him absolutely insistent that the provisions of the Civil Service Act with regard to returned soldiers be strictly observed. I have had no occasion to recommend the dismissal of any postmaster. I hold just as firmly as do hon. gentlemen opposite the view that these matters should not be questions of patronage, but according to my experience during the last two or three years, in the face of strong requests coming from members of the Liberal party for the appointment of certain individuals to office, the Postmaster General has stood firmly by the position that the law should be observed and that the soldiers should get the preference to which they are entitled. In that position I strongly uphold him.

The hon. member for Rosetown frequently assumes this holier-than-thou attitude, intimating that we who sit in this row and who call ourselves Liberal-Progressives are not true to the principles which we have enunciated time and again in regard to the Civil Service Act. In view of his remarks to-night I felt it my duty to pay at least this tribute to the Postmaster General, and to say that in my experience he has been true to those principles and to my knowledge has refused on more than one occasion to yield to pressure which was brought to bear upon him in order to have him depart from the principle that returned soldiers should receive a preference.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): In view of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) I want to direct the attention of the house for a moment or two to the facts which were placed on the record by my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), but which I feel perhaps are not yet quite appreciated in connection with the motion before the house. The motion is:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this house the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe."

My hon. friend from Rosetown has suggested that there is some great question of principle involved in connection with which he feels he should record his vote on this occasion. I submit that if the facts which have been placed on record by the Minister of Public Works are carefully examined it will be found that no question of principle is involved in any way. If I may say so, this is simply a flimsy attempt to find some ground for criticism of my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), particularly in connection with returned soldiers. My good friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) prefaced his remarks by a great deal of discussion with regard to dismissals and with regard to the Civil Service Act; he even travelled as far as India and finally cited the case of the Salvation Army. I do not know what that had to do with this case; after all what we are dealing with is a vote of censure on the Postmaster General with regard to the appointment of a postmaster for the town of Simcoe. So we must discover the facts with regard to that particular case and it is on those facts that we must decide how we are going to record our votes.

[Mr. Brown.]

A vacancy occurred early in 1927 and, as the Minister of Public Works pointed out, that office was immediately declared a 2B office, which is an office requiring what is called a working postmaster. That is, it required a postmaster who would not simply sit in an office and direct proceedings but who would take a direct part in the work, who would be prepared to do his share in the handling of mail bags, the sortation of mail, the taking of those bags to the place of delivery to the courier, the lifting and emptying of the bags on the table, the standing and sorting of mail into the boxes, and so on. Perhaps I know more about these things than some hon. members, because I happened to have a father who was a postmaster. All this work must be done in connection with a 2B office and in January, 1927, not after the applications were received as was suggested by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) but immediately after the vacancy occurred, that office was declared a 2B office and the advertisement issued. I am not sure that the advertisement has been put on record, but it indicated plainly that it was a 2B office by the fact that the salary to start was $2,040 per annum whereas, as we all know, revenue offices are on the basis of a small salary plus a percentage of the revenue received.

As has been pointed out by the Minister of Public Works there is an impression abroad in this country that this is some sort of dispute between a disabled ex-service man and a civilian. It is well to remember that according to the record, which is on the table of this house, no less than ten ex-service men and fourteen civilians applied for the position, twenty-four applicants in all. There were not simply the two ex-service men to whom reference has been made during this debate; I think there were at least six or seven ex-service men who had good records and who were well reported upon by the inspector. That advertisement described those who were eligible for appointment as follows:

According to law preference is given among candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, first, to persons who are in receipt of a pension on account of disabilities received as a result of war service, who by reason of such service are unable to continue their pre-war occupation and who have not been successfully re-establishd; and secondly, to persons who have been on active service overseas or on the high seas.

Candidates must be Britsh subjects and must have resided in Canada at least three years.

The leader of the opposition mentioned the fact that the statute made a prescription with regard to residence, but I would ask hon. gentlemen to note that the statutory prescription with regard to residence has nothing to do with the particular locality but requires three years residence in Canada. The residence provision is in the advertisement itself, and the advertisement states that applications will be received from residents of Simcoe and locality. There is the advertisement; according to law preference is given to candidates possessing the necessary qualifications who have disabilities and have not been re-established, and after that come those who have seen service overseas. Who is to decide as to who "possess the necessary qualifications"? What are the regulations of the Civil Service Commission? To whom do they look to decide who has the necessary qualifications? One of the hon. members in the far corner asked about the sending of an inspector. I have in my hand the instructions which were issued by the Civil Service Commission in February, 1918, to the various post office inspectors, asking the inspectors to co-operate in reporting in connection with the qualifications of candidates. The commission do not use the officers on their own staff, but utilize the post office inspectors for the purpose of deciding who possesses the necessary qualifications. That has been the practice since 1918, and applies to other departments as well. Generally speaking, a report is made by an officer of the department for which the appointment is to be made. The Minister of Public Works has read half a dozen letters which go to show that in this particular Simcoe case the Civil Service Commission asked the Post Office department to pass on the qualifications of the candidates. I will not read them all, because my hon. friend has put them on record, but the following letter, written by Mr. W. Foran, the secretary of the commission, to Mr. May, the district superintendent of postal service at London, is very significant. The letter is dated March 10, 1927, and reads as follows:

> You will find herewith an application for the postmastership at Simcoe from Mr. Charles R. Bowyer. Mr. Bowyer is being advised that his application has been transferred to you for the necessary report on his qualifications.

The secretary of the Civil Service Commission sends that application to the superintendent of the Post Office department in order that a report may be received as to his qualifications. That application is sent not to the minister, but direct to the district superintendent.

The Minister of Public Works quoted several letters in which Doctor Roche, the chairman of the commission, pointed out to those who were recommending candidates that the commission largely depended upon the reports of the post office inspector as to who would get the positions. He outlines the whole procedure in a letter of February 26th, 1927, to Colonel Parkinson, as follows:

> The commission, however, largely depends upon the report of the post office inspector and district superintendent of postal service, who after interviewing all the applicants place them on order of merit from a post office standpoint. If Mr. Whittaker has not as yet been re-established, his disability would of course entitle him to the preference, and I can assure you that the very best consideration will be given his claims by the commission before an appointment is made.

The definite statement is made that that is the procedure which is followed in all cases, namely, that the post office inspector is the one who makes the report and whose report is recognized by the commission.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): After considering these reports, does not the final authority rest with the commission?

Mr. RALSTON: It is quite true that in law the final authority rests with the commission, but these people are the agents of the commission, and I am going on to point out that the commission appoints these agents and say in effect, you are the ones to decide.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not to decide, to report.

Mr. RALSTON: I will permit the hon. members to interrupt in order to ask a question, but I am going to try to continue my argument without being interrupted too much.

I admit that the commission have the legal jurisdiction, but the commission use as their agents the inspectors of the Post Office department, and they are the ones from whom they ask a report.

The applications come in and they are sent to Mr. May, the district superintendent at London. Mr. May sends them to Mr. Murray, the inspector for that particular district, and Mr. Murray goes and interviews the candidate. He did that in this case, and finally sent in a report which is found at page 130 of the return. This is a very long, detailed report setting out the particulars of the candidates, their residential qualifications, their disabilities, and all about them placing them in order of merit. He reported on no less than twenty-two candidates, besides two whom he was unable to interview. As has already been pointed out by my hon. friend, the candidate at the top of the list in order of merit, is a civilian named Wallace, the next is Mr. Bowyer, the seventh on the list is

Mr. Whittaker and Mr. Collver is in ninth place. They appeared to have very good candidates in Simcoe. The report has this to say about Mr. Bowyer:

Charles Rex Bowyer is a married man 28 years of age. Has a good education. Resided at Simcoe until about a year ago but is now living at Mount Albion. Has had no postal experience but would devote his entire time to the work. Was a student previous to enlistment and since discharged has been farm manager for his father, W. A. Bowyer, and is engaged in looking after some seven or eight farms owned by his father. This applicant states that owing to his being a minor he enlisted under an assumed name, that of C. R. Musgrove, and served 27 months in France with the R.C.H.A. Discharged by reason of demobilization. No physical disability. Is a fine type and impressed me favourably.

The next ex-service man is sixth on the list, he is Mr. Wark, who, by the way, is ahead of Mr. Whittaker. He had no physical disabilities and was very well recommended. The next, the seventh, is Mr. Whittaker, about whom the report has this to say:

George Edward Whittaker is a married man 28 years of age. Has a very good education. Has resided in Simcoe for about two years and eight months. Has had no postal experience but would devote his entire time to the work. Was at school previous to enlistment and since the war has been an adjuster for the soldier settlement board and is now accountant and office manager for the St. Williams Preservers at Simcoe. Enlisted in the 55th battery and served in France eight months with the 22nd battery and discharged as medically unfit and received 100 per cent pension. This applicant has a double amputation below the knees and I do not think that he would be able to properly attend to the duties of the office with this disability.

The next returned man is ninth on the list; that is Mr. Collver, and the report says:

Roy Ward Collver is a married man thirty years of age. Has a good education. Has resided his entire life in the vicinity of Simcoe as he lives on Nixon No. 1 R.R. two miles from Simcoe. Has had no postal experience but would devote his entire time to the work. Has been mostly engaged in farming. Enlisted in the 133rd battalion and served about two years in France with the 14th battalion. Discharged by reason of demobilization. Has now an appeal before the federal appeal board for a pension and it is stated that he will receive 75 per cent disability. It is thought that this applicant's disability would prevent his proper performance of the work.

The inspector said that this man who had a 75 per cent disability could not properly perform the work. If it is contended that politics were being played in this particular instance, Mr. Collver would have been a very attractive man to appoint, because he was recommended by the Norfolk Veterans and Colonel Pratt and by Mr. Anderson. He is the ninth on Mr. Murray's report and has a 75 per cent disability. Yet he was turned down because it was felt that a 75 per cent disability would prevent him from doing the work of that office, and yet the hon. gentlemen opposite say that a man with a 100 per cent disability should have obtained the position. Let us put it the other way; they say that the Postmaster General should not accept the report of an inspector who says that a man under those circumstances could not carry out his duties.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the hon. minister know that the Postmaster General approved the appointment of a man at Billing's Bridge who had a 100 per cent disability?

Mr. RALSTON: I have no idea of what he did in that case, but I would imagine that Billing's Bridge is not a 2B office.

Mr. VENIOT: The Postmaster General did not appoint him, it was the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the same thing.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the report of March 28, 1927. There was some delay, as has been suggested by the Postmaster General, because some difficulty arose in connection with Bowyer's enlistment, and there was a very sharp letter from the Postmaster General with regard to the residential qualifications of some of the candidates and he certainly showed no partiality for Bowyer in that letter. I think it was in October, 1927, when these applications reached the Civil Service Commission. But officials of the Post Office department were not the only ones who took time in connection with the matter. Although it was in October, 1927, when the applications reached the Civil Service Commission, the first word from them was the following February, February 18. Therefore, I do not think the matter of delay is important one way or the other in connection with this particular case. At any rate the report goes to the Civil Service Commission and, as the record shows, an inquiry is instituted with regard to Mr. Bowyer's residence. It is found he is resident in Simcoe. On February 18, 1928, comes this significant letter which is found on page 144 of the record. Let it be remembered that the Civil Service Commission had before them the report of Mr. Murray which I have read, which stated that he did not consider Mr. Whittaker was able to carry on the duties of the office, and in which he also reported on the other applicants. This is a letter which comes from the Civil Service Commission. Does my hon. friend suggest that the commission were still going to act on their own judgment, or were they accepting that of the Post Office department? Listen to this. This is dated February 18, 1928:

With further reference to the postmastership at Simcoe, Ontario, I am directed by commissioners to say that they will be prepared to select Mr. G. E. Whittaker, O.A.S., for this position, provided the department feels that he possesses the necessary physical fitness to perform the duties.

I am to point out that the commission is endeavouring, in common, with the Past Office department, to provide for seriously handicapped cases to as great a degree as possible, and postmasterships have been mentioned as particularly suitable employment for such applicants. In this case the Amputations' Association is strongly supporting Mr. Whittaker, as well as the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, both claiming that his disability will not prevent the proper discharge of his duties. I should be glad, therefore, if the department could furnish the commissioners with a definite report, at as early a date as possible, with reference to Mr. Whittaker's physical fitness for this postmastership.

There was a recognition again that the decision was to lie with the Post Office department. They say: We are ready to recommend him if you say he is fit. What happened? The Post Office department then asked for another report, and on page 122 of the record will be found a letter written from the department at Ottawa to the superintendent, enclosing a copy of the letter of the Civil Service Commission and asking that a full report be made. That letter is sent to Mr. Murray who, on March 5, 1928, makes a full report which has been read and which was put on the record the first day of the debate by the Posmaster General. Mr. Murray goes into the matter very thoroughly, and he finds once more that Mr. Whittaker could not properly fulfil the duties of the office. That report is forwarded to Mr. May, district superintendent, who concurs and makes some further report about it to the same effect. It goes to Mr. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, and he forwards it to the Civil Service Commission. I ask hon. gentlemen in all fairness: would they not expect there would be nothing more about the matter?

What happened? That report goes to the Civil Service Commission on March 16, 1928, and on May 29, two months and a half afterwards, the Civil Service Commission issues a notice to Mr. Whittaker, but, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Public Works in a brand new form, a form that I think has rarely if ever been seen before in the files of the Civil Service Commission. It bears the notation: "Appointment subject to physical fitness". This means: we hereby certify that you, Mr. Whittaker, are qualified for the position provided you are physically qualified. The Post Office department had already decided that he was not physically qualified, and that report had gone to the Civil Service Commission. That is the appointment to which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) refers as being the appointment or decision of the Civil Service Commission. It is not a decision at all; it is a conditional certificate—if you are physically fit, you can be taken on. The Postmaster General says that he does not hide behind his deputy. In view of the report of the inspector, he issues written instructions—and they are on the file—to his deputy stating that in view of the report of the inspector he cannot accept the certificate with regard to Mr. Whittaker. Mr. Gaboury accordingly writes to the Civil Service Commission telling them the same thing and asking them to make a new appointment.

What is the result? The result is that, not the Postmaster General, nor Mr. Gaboury, nor Mr. Taylor, nor anybody else but the Civil Service Commission, without any further correspondence, issues a certificate, without any condition in it, in favour of Mr. Charles R. Bowyer, selecting him as postmaster of the post office at Simcoe. Those are the facts. That is why I said when I commenced my speech, that it seems to me we are getting a bit off the track when we are talking about questions of principle in dismissals. We have a simple question to decide: Did the Postmaster General act arbitrarily or reasonably? Had he reasonable grounds for acting as he did in connection with this particular case? My hon. friends say that he acted directly contrary to the spirit of the act. I have only a moment to refer to the act. As the hon. member for Leeds suggests, under the act the Civil Service Commission had the right to make appointments, but section 24 reads:

The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

2. Where a person is rejected, the commission shall thereupon select another person to take the place of the one rejected.

Mr. STEVENS: Does not that section clearly indicate that a probationary period must elapse before the rejection occurs?

Mr. RALSTON: I only want to point out, in answer to my hon. friend, that in 1919 an opinion was asked for by the Department of Agriculture with regard to that particular section. I have before me the correspondence that has been tabled. I will not take time to put it on record, but I will read the paragraph which is an answer to my hon. friend's question. The department were asking the same question of the Department of Justice: Must we take a man on if we do not consider he can do the work? Can we reject him without a period of probation? The answer of the then deputy minister, Mr. E. L. Newcombe, now a Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, is dated December 9, 1919. It is quite a lengthy document, but this paragraph occurs in it:

If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he think it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the discharge of any duties;; otherwise in conceivable cases considerable prejudice to the public service might ensue.

Mr. STEVENS: But "the deputy of course, like other individuals, must yield compliance to the law as justly interpreted." Let the minister read the whole thing.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to read the whole thing.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is not advisable to read it.

Mr. RALSTON: It goes on:

The fact that the man selected is not as good as his predecessor; or in your words, not a man of reputation or outstanding ability, would not, I should think, in the absence of other objections, justify the deputy to reject him, provided he have passable qualifications. The deputy, of course, like other individuals must yield compliance to the law as justly interpreted—

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: And an interpretation in accordance with the opinion of the then Deputy Minister of Justice would be regarded by most people in this country as being "justly interpreted."

—no matter what his view may be as to the policy of the law; and it must be realized that the provisions of the Civil Service Act are designed to limit selections for office to those who apply and compete, rather than to enable a deputy minister to obtain the officer who in his opinion is the best available for the position; moreover, even among the competing class, returned soldiers are by law preferred if they obtain sufficient marks to pass the examination.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I do not think that I can add to the above in the absence of further particulars as to the nature of the information or inquiry upon which you refused to accept Mr. Betts, and as to whether or not he was afforded an opportunity of probation.

So well and so authoritatively was that extract which I read first regarded by the Civil Service Commission of that day, not the Civil Service Commission under the Liberal government, but the Civil Service Commission of that day under the Union and Conservative government, that that extract which I have read was incorporated into the notice which goes out to every applicant, including Mr. Whittaker, and his attention was called to section 13 of the Civil Service Act, which is the probation section now section 24, "subject to the following interpretation," given to it by the Department of Justice, and then that particular portion of the opinion was printed right on the face of the notice which he received. In other words, it told him that he could be rejected without a period of probation.

Do my hon. friends suggest that in view of that we can fairly charge that my friend the Postmaster General acted directly contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Civil Service Act, when as a matter of fact he acted in absolute accord with the act as interpreted by the Deputy Minister of Justice? I do not think that that is a fair conclusion to come to; I do not believe it is a conclusion to which this house or this country will come. I say that my friend the Postmaster General —I am speaking to some gentlemen on the other side of the house who have had the responsibility of running departments—has some responsibility to the public service of this country, and he has some responsibility with regard to his officials, to these men he appoints expecting them to do their work. They make reports to him in the regular course of their work, and if those reports and recommendations were overruled by a blue pencil in the hands of the Postmaster General, and he said, "I will do something else," there would be a very loud hue and cry with regard to a man who would ride over the opinion of his responsible officials. It seems to me to be the case of being damned if you do and damned if you don't. In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the Postmaster General accepts the opinion of officers whose honesty has not been called in question in the slightest, men who themselves have been nominated or designated by the Civil Service Commission themselves to make these investigations and report, I believe that this country will absolve him of any arbitrariness and of any unreasonableness or of any intention but justly and fairly to observe the Civil Service Act and to administer the department entrusted to him.

I think there is also some justification for the department's conclusion to be found in outside evidence altogether, evidence not within the reports; for I find that the gentleman who recommended Mr. Whittaker, Mr. Johnson, the manager of St. Williams Preservers, Limited, told the Civil Service Commission at the time that he had been carrying on as a bookkeeper. Another man in the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment who recommended him says that he finds his present work, which Mr. Johnson had said was that of a bookkeeper "rather arduous" and he would like to go into the post office where shorter hours would make the work desirable. But in view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that one man at least in that post office was at work from 5.30 a.m. to 9.00 p.m., I question whether he would get the benefit of the shorter hours that he expected. Another man, Mr. Groff, who made a recommendation, said that Mr. Whittaker was "unfit for duties requiring physical activity." All these recommendations are on the file. These ought to be considered when we are passing on whether the Postmaster General had reasonable grounds for the conclusion he came to.

There are also on the file a couple of letters which I should like to read. There was a letter from the Postmaster General to Mr. Sutcliffe, of the Amputations Association. The Postmaster General there wrote a letter which, it seems to me, ought to convince most people in this country that he is trying to do and has been trying to do the fair thing for the ex-service men. He writes:

> I note what you say touching efforts having been made to modify the preference given to returned soldiers under the act. Let me assure you that such attempts will never receive my support. I am prepared at all times to give preference to returned soldiers wherever their physical disability does not render them incapable of doing the work of the position they apply for, but I claim that it is not fair that the postal service should be called upon to provide positions for men who cannot do the work owing to their physical disability. If their disability is so great as to exclude them from such positions, I feel that the Pensions Act should be changed so as to give such men greater financial assistance if what they are receiving now is not considered sufficient. It would be better to do this than to seek to place these unfortunates in public positions which call for such work as would render the service they are willing to give inadequate, and consequently lower the standard of efficiency exacted by the public.
> Canada, to my mind, owes it to the 100 per cent disability men to place them in a position where it should not be necessary for them to apply for public positions in order to live in comfort and provide for their families.

That is the expression of the man who is now being charged with having acted arbitrarily and gone directly in face of the Civil Service Act in order to deprive ex-service men of their rights and particularly the 100 per cent disability cases.

May I say one thing more to indicate the reasonable ground which the Postmaster General had? There was some talk in one of his letters in regard to Whittaker being re-established. I do not know whether he was re-established or not. I only hope he was. I happen to know intimately a veteran who is in a very similar position to his and nobody sympathizes with him more genuinely than I do in the plight in which he finds himself. I know some of the difficulties of the amputation cases but at the same time I believe that veterans themselves will consider that the Postmaster General was on pretty sound ground not alone in connection with the public service but for the benefit of returned men generally, and I believe that the ex-service men themselves will agree that it is not in the best interests of the returned soldiers to insist on being put into positions where they are not physically fitted to carry on because that simply lends support to people who are seeking to take away the preference which is given to ex-service men. It enables them to argue, that the efficiency of the public service is being injured by this provision.

But the Postmaster General said something about Mr. Whittaker being re-established. What was the position? I just want to see if he was reasonable in connection with this, and I think his reasonableness in connection with the whole case might be judged by it. Major Ashton, of the Soldier Settlement Board, writes that Whittaker was employed five years with the board, that he received several promotions and salary increases on merit, and that he resigned from the staff of the board in August, 1924, to go with the St. Williams Preservers, Limited. We know that he had the position there of bookkeeper and office manager for two or three years until October, 1927. His own letter says that his contract was terminated—I understand that it was terminated voluntarily, and he left the St. Williams Preservers, Limited, and went into a monumental stone business. He was, as a matter of fact, bookkeeper in the St. Williams Preservers, Limited, when he made application for this position. Later in February 1928, he bought the Monumental Stone business. The Minister of Public Works has read the declaration and the statement which Mr. Whittaker made in the papers with regard to his prospects in this business. I do not make any choice between those two statements and hon. gentlemen can take whichever they like, but I do submit that the Postmaster General ought not to be charged with being arbitrary or unfair when he forms the opinion that Mr. Whittaker was reestablished within the meaning of the act. Be that as it may—

Mr. SPEAKER: It being eleven o'clock—

MESSAGE FROM HIS MAJESTY THE KING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs a message issued by His Majesty the King from Craigwell House today. I think hon. members would be interested in hearing it, and if the house will give me permission I will, notwithstanding that we are past the hour of adjournment, read the message. It is as follows:

In looking back on my long illness and recovery my heart is full of thankfulness of far deeper origin than any mere sense of relief.

I have been brought back from danger and weariness of the past months by the wonderfull skill and devotion of my doctors, surgeons and nurses. And help has come from another source of strength; as month after month went by I learned of the widespread and loving solicitude with which The Queen and I were surrounded. I was able to picture to myself the crowds of friends waiting and watching at my gate and to think of still greater numbers of those who in every part of the empire were remembering me with prayers and good wishes. The realization of this has been among the most vivid experiences of my life.

It was an encouragement beyond description to feel that my constant and earnest desire had been granted—the desire to gain the confidence and affection of my people. My thoughts have carried me even further than this. I cannot dwell upon the generous sympathy shown to me by unknown friends in many other countries without a new and moving hope. I long to believe it possible that experiences such as mine may soon appear no longer exceptional: when the national anxiety of all the peoples of the world shall be felt as a common source of human sympathy and a common claim on human friendship.

I am not yet able to bear the strain of a public ceremony but I look forward on some appointed day to joining with my people at home and overseas in thanking Almighty God not merely for my own recovery but for the new evidence of a growing kindly significance of the true nature of men and nations.

In the meantime I hope this message may reach all those even in the remotest corners of the world from whom I have received words of sympathy and goodwill.

(Signed) George R. I.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 23, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 169, respecting the Great Lakes and Atlantic Canal and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Smith (Stormont).

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Third and fourth reports of select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE OF DIVORCE PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge) moved:

That the petitions of Gladys May Carter, Nellie Farrell, and Cecilia Leta Rice (nee Smith), severally praying for the passing of an act to grant a divorce, and to dissolve the marriage of the petitioners, which were presented to the house on the 17th April, instant, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin) moved:

That the petitions of Vera Maud Gendron (nee Carpenter), and Edith Spencley (nee Smith), severally praying for the passing of an act to grant a divorce, and to dissolve the marriage of the petitioners, which were presented to the house on the 17th of April, instant, together with the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, Carleton (for Mr. Casselman) moved:

That the petition of Dewlyn John Chubb, praying for the passing of an act to grant a divorce, and to dissolve the marriage of the petitioner, which was presented to the house on the 17th of April, instant, together with the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. L. S. R. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved:

That the second report of the select standing committee on standing orders, presented on April 18, be concurred in.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the effect of this report?

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): It dealt with a petition which was presented a day or two late on account of misunderstood information received from the senate.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

PAPERS RELATING TO CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not certain documents might be laid on the table of the house with respect to the convention between the United Kingdom and the United States of America in regard to the regulation of the liquor traffic, which convention was signed at Washington on January 23, 1924, and ratified on May 22 of that year. I have seen published in the press what purported to be copies of official correspondence which took place between the government of Great Britain and the government of the United States during the two years prior to the signing of that treaty, and I would like to ask that the official correspondence which took place just prior to and during the negotiation of the treaty be laid on the table of the house in order that we may have authentic copies before us.

Then I understand from the public press, although not of recent date, that that draft convention was presented to the Imperial conference at London, where it received consideration and I understand certain proceedings took place with regard to it, together with certain official correspondence between the government of Great Britain and the government of this country before the treaty was actually signed. If there is such correspondence which in the public interest could be produced I should like to have it laid on the table in order that we may know exactly under what conditions Canada gave adherence to that treaty.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think it should be possible to lay on the table at an early date the correspondence requested by my hon. friend and I will endeavour so to arrange matters.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAPERS RELATING TO DISMISSALS OF POSTMASTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River)): On Friday last, I think, the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) referred to a ruling made by the Department of Justice with regard to section 4, or at that time section 13, of the Civil Service Act, dealing with probations. Yesterday the Postmaster General tabled some papers relating to this matter, but he did not table the full file of the case from which the ruling the department originated. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) or the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), between whose departments the correspondence took place, to table that correspondence for the information of the house.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I was asked to lay on the table all the correspondence I had, and my department had at that time no correspondence with the Department of Justice. Therefore it can not be said that I did not produce the full file so far as my department was concerned. I could only produce what I could gather from the Civil Service Commission and from the Department of Justice, and that is what I laid on the table yesterday. If the other departments have any correspondence it is not up to me to produce it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am asking that one of the ministers of the departments concerned table that information as it relates to the discussion on this question.

SUTTON POSTMASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): A few days ago the Postmaster General undertook to table the balance of the file relating to the post office at Sutton, Que. He tabled an additional file but it does not seem to be complete without the Civil Service Commission file, so I would ask if he would table that file with reference to this post office.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I produced everything I had in my office. It is not my place to run after the Civil Service Commission for their file, but if it is absolutely necessary I would ask the Secretary of State to take up the matter, since it is under his department.

Mr. CLARK: Then I would ask the Secretary of State if he would be good enough to secure the file from the Civil Service Commission relating to the post office at Sutton, since these other files are not complete without that additional information.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I will undertake to produce that file. In a general way I might say that the best method of obtaining complete files is to place motions on the order paper.

Mr. CLARK: These files were laid on the table as the result of such a motion, but additional papers have been asked for which necessitate the production of the Civil Service Commission file.

NEW WESTMINSTER POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I would make a similar request with regard to the appointment of a stenographer in the New Westminster post office. The Postmaster General brought down his file, and it seems necessary now to have the Civil Service Commission file in regard to the same matter.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

NORTHERN ONTARIO PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) when I may expect the return which was passed by the house on April 8?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): I expect to be able to table the return within the next few days. I can not say definitely within a day or two, because the various branches of my department have been very busy.

CIVIL SERVANTS UNDER $100 PER MONTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): On March 13 I placed some questions on the order paper with regard to the civil service, and on April 4 those questions were passed as an order for return to this house. I have heard nothing of the matter since, and I would be glad to know when these papers will be brought down.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I have a note here concerning all these orders for returns and I may tell my hon. friend that this order is promised very shortly.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): On February 28 I directed a question to the Prime Minister in which I asked whether it was the intention of the government this session to introduce an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act regarding trial by jury, and the Prime Minister promised an answer in a few days.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is my impression that the Department of Justice has been giving attention to this matter, and if I am not mistaken the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) stated some days ago that it was his intention to introduce such a bill. I believe he has answered the question.

SUPPLY—SIMCOE POSTMASTERSHIP

The house resumed from Monday, April 22, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Robb for supply and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stewart (Leeds).

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have only a very few moments at my disposal, so the house will pardon me if I go hurriedly. When the house rose last night I was discussing the reasonableness of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in coming to the conclusion that Mr. Whittaker had been re-established, and I said that whether or not Mr. Whittaker's business prospects were as he said in his affidavit, in which he stated that he would probably have to sell at a loss, or whether they were as he stated in the newspaper, in which he said he expected to go on successfully, it seemed to me there was ample evidence by which a reasonable man could come to the conclusion that Mr. Whittaker had been re-established.

I want to make just one point in this connection. There is an idea abroad throughout the country, due to regulations regarding long service pensions, that a man's salary is affected in some way by his pension. That is so in certain cases with regard to long service pensions, but I want hon. gentlemen to understand that disability pensions do not affect a man's salary in the public service in any way. That is to say, Mr. Whittaker could be enjoying the position which he held for five years with the soldier settlement board; he could be enjoying his position as book-keeper and office manager with the St. Williams Preservers, Limited; he could carry on his own business and his revenue would be in no way affected by his pension or his pension by his revenue.

I would like to point out one matter which I think has been omitted from the record. The other evening the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in reading the notice of appointment which was sent to Mr. Whittaker and which appears in Hansard at page 1672, only read down to the signature of the secretary. I feel sure that he must have intended to go on, but his attention was apparently distracted and as a result the certificate does not appear in the record complete. I have only a moment or two left, but I think it is important that that certificate be completed. The balance of the certificate which the hon. leader of the opposition read into Hansard at page 1672, is as follows:

Civil Service Act, 1918: Sec. 13. (1) The deputy head may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

(2) Where a person is rejected the commission shall thereupon select another person to take the place of the one rejected.

(3) The commission shall, after investigation, decide whether the name of a rejected person shall be struck off the list as unfit for the service generally or whether he shall be allowed a trial in some other position for which he may be eligible.

(Ruling of the Department of Justice dated the 9th December, 1919: "If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he think it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the discharge of any duties; otherwise in conceivable cases considerable prejudice to the public service might ensue.")

Then follow sections 14 and 31 of the act regarding oaths to be taken by officials.

The last paragraph which was read by the hon. leader of the opposition directed the attention of Mr. Whittaker to the ruling of the Department of Justice, and Mr. Whittaker therefore knew when he received that so-called notice, which after all is not a notice of appointment, but a certificate of selection subject to the physical fitness of the applicant, that he was not entitled as of right to probation under the ruling of the Department of Justice.

I would like to say a further word with regard to probation. It seems almost unreasonable to talk about taking a man on probation who has been reported on by the responsible officers of the department, not once, but twice, and not by one officer, but by three, and solemnly putting him on probation for one, two, three, or six months. What would happen? Mr. Collver, who has only a seventy-five per cent disability, and who had been reported on as physically unfit, would want to be put on probation next, and so on down the line. We have the minister taking the position, which seems to be fair I believe in the opinion of members of this house, that those are the reports the commission has asked for, those are the reports which came to him, and on those reports he made his decision.

Our friends have talked a good deal with regard to the fact that Mr. Whittaker was a one hundred per cent disability case. As I said last night, we all realize his disability and have every sympathy with him as a disabled veteran with a fine war record, but let us not forget the fact that the difficulty with regard to ex-service men is not confined to one hundred per cent disability cases. Sometimes I find even more difficulty; I believe other hon. members of the house find more difficulty, and the Department of Pensions often finds a great deal more difficulty in endeavouring to re-establish men with 30, 40, and 50 per cent disability. These men are receiving only a portion of the full pension and they have difficulty in finding jobs where their limited capacity can be utilized and thus enable them to make up their income to a living standard. We must remember that while this is a one hundred per cent disability case, at the same time there are other cases of disabilities, perhaps not so great but in connection with which the men have almost as great a handicap in the labour market as men with one hundred per cent disability and who are receiving one hundred per cent pension.

Mr. SPEAKER: Time.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing to-day, as we have on one or two previous occasions, an amendment to the motion to go into supply. That amendment is as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this house the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe."

I wish to draw particular attention to the words in the resolution "in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act." The terms of the act have been discussed at considerable length, but the only attempted defence has been that which was made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) last evening, and during the few minutes remaining to him this afternoon. The action of the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) has identified the government with the Postmaster General in regard to this particular case and in regard to the other cases which have been brought forward as illustrations in support of our argument and in support of this amendment.

Let me refer first to the Minister of Public Works. Last night he referred to the action of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in this regard as being exemplary. He said it was the action of the best postmaster general which Canada had ever had. He also stated that the opposition had no right to bring this matter forward because the two individuals who were more particularly concerned were Liberals. Because Mr. Bowyer and Mr. Whittaker were Liberals the Minister of Public Works asked what right the Conservative opposition had to bring the matter forward. I will answer the minister very definitely. The right we have of bringing this matter forward is the right of every citizen of Canada to have his grievances aired in parliament; that is the right. That is a right which we propose to use on behalf of any citizen whose case appeals to us as being a fair and proper one to bring to parliament. Rarely has there been a case which has been more clearly within that right than the particular case now before us, where the government itself, through the action of one of its responsible ministers, has over-ridden and derided the Civil Service Act.

My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence intimated that the Postmaster General had no other course open to him. As I proceed this afternoon I trust that I shall be able to show that there was a different course, not only open to the Postmaster General, but obligatory upon him to follow.

There are three parties to this dispute. In the first place, there is the public; in the second place, there is the civil service of Canada; and in the third place, there is the Postmaster General. Mr. Whittaker is the victim in the case, but the parties to the dispute are the three whom I have mentioned.

In regard to the public, there is the right of citizens of Canada to apply for admission to the civil service of Canada. They have a further right; if they comply with the provisions of the Civil Service Act, they have the right to expect, if they are successful under that act, that they shall receive as a reward for their application whatever position may be vacant. There is another right the public has. It is clearly set down in the statute that certain forms of examinations shall be followed, and a decision shall be arrived at as a result of those examinations. The public has still another right; they are the taxpayers of Canada and they have the right to demand that the government of Canada and its ministry shall follow the act in letter and spirit, as we say in our amendment. I pause here to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that unless the government, whether it is this government or any other government, enters into the administration of the Civil Service Act in spirit as well as in letter, then there can be no successful administration of that act. If a minister, or the government itself, is to be permitted to evade that act by a strict or a strained interpretation of the letter of the law, or by a disregard of the spirit of the law, then there is no hope for the successful administration of that act.

If this house by rejecting this resolution approves of the stand of the Postmaster General, as the government is asking the house to do; if this house does that and approves of the actions of the Postmaster General in this case and in scores of other cases of which this is but an illustration, then I say that you are undermining the confidence of the people of Canada in the civil service and you are disorganizing the civil service itself. You are reducing the efficiency of the service and you are interfering with discipline and coordination within the service. What hope is there for the civil servants of Canada if this act is ignored, this act which is their charter of liberty, shall I say?—under which they expect, when they claim rights, their rights will be respected?

As regards the government, I have already intimated that the government has identified itself in this matter with the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot); it is behind him and, through the mouth of its spokesman put up last night, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), it has declared that he is, in this action and in his record with regard to these matters that we have brought forward during the last few days, the best Postmaster General that Canada has ever had.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. STEVENS: We now have not only the government but the whole party behind the Postmaster General. What are the facts in this case? They are clear and comparatively simple. In the first place, there is a post office vacancy; second, there are twenty-two applications to fill the vacancy under the terms of the Civil Service Act. Let me pause at this moment to bring to the attention of the house what the Civil Service Act states, because this is not some regulation that may be passed at the will or the whim of a government. It would be well for the house to realize that this is a statute of Canada, brought into being by, I think, the united opinion of the parliament of Canada, as a necessity in this day. It is a departure from what obtained twenty, thirty years ago. The minister has repeatedly stated, and in fact his sole defence is that years ago, in 1896, 1905, 1911, 1912 and so forth, Conservatives or others have done as he has done in this instance. But the Civil Service Act was passed in 1918 for the purpose of doing away with the very abuses which, he states, were practised by Conservatives, Liberals and others in years gone by. The Civil Service Act is the product of parliament in response to a nation-wide demand for a departure from the old spoils system and for the erecting in this country of some orderly method of dealing with the great civil service. It is quite clear to anyone that twenty, thirty, or forty years ago the civil service of Canada, in its scattered condition as it was then, was a comparatively small affair. When I went into the west thirty-five years ago there were comparatively few people and the settlements on the prairies were few and far between, with very little of the civil service organization in that vast west. What is the situation to-day? There are several million people, great cities, well organized communities, immense public business, hundreds of millions of dollars being collected here and there and passed on to the treasury of Canada. Under what?—a civil service who now come under the act, and the necessity for the act has been demonstrated beyond all peradventure. So we have twenty-two people making application under the act. What does the act say? It says:

> Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any employee to a position in the civil service.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What section is that?

Mr. STEVENS: Section 19. Section 20 states:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided, all appointments to the civil service shall be upon competitive examination under and pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Then it goes on with a description of what the commission shall do. Among other things it states:

> The appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

That section was inserted in the act for a specific purpose. Let me dissociate it from the local picture we have before us. It was realized that a vacancy might occur in Vancouver and that someone in Ottawa, desirous of moving to the Pacific coast and enjoying the salubrious climate of my city, might make application. As a matter of fact, in years gone by they used to do that in large numbers, but it was recognized that it was unfair to have a nation-wide competition for a position in one locality. Therefore the act provided that the applicant must be a resident of the locality. I turn over a couple of pages and I find another provision. This is a very sacred one in the eyes of the people of Canada. It provides:

> The commission shall prepare and maintain a special list of persons in receipt of pensions by reason of their services in the war who
> (a) have from causes attributable to such service lost capacity for physical exertion to an extent which makes them unfit efficiently to pursue the avocations which they were pursuing before the war;
> (b) have not been successfully re-established in some other avocation; and
> (c) desire to be placed on such list.

In other words, it sets up the preference list. What happened? As I say, twenty-two applications were made, but I shall refer to only two, because it is not necessary for the moment to deal with the others. One was Mr. Whittaker and the other was Mr. Bowyer. In the first place, Mr. Bowyer was disqualified under section 21, not being a resident of the district. In the second place, he was without question re-established. Mr. Whittaker, on the other hand, was a double amputation case in receipt of 100 per cent pension, but a resident of the district and reported by the officials to be competent for the position. It is true that over a period, a hiatus of six months, where there was a long delay in making the final selection, due entirely—and this is significant—to negligence or delay on the part of officials of the Post Office Department to make their report, some question arose whether Mr. Whittaker could physically carry on the job. After the Civil Service Commission under the terms of the act received the reports of the inspector of the Post Office Department, they gave a certificate which was read by the minister a moment ago and which, I think he said, was a certificate of application. As a matter of fact, the certificate is one of appointment of postmaster. Those words are in large leaded type at the head of the notice.

Mr. RALSTON: It is a certificate of selection.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says it is a certificate of selection. I am going to read the certificate itself. It is headed:

Civil Service Commission of Canada
Certificate of appointment of postmaster.

Mr. RALSTON: I would ask my hon. friend to read the certificate.

Mr. STEVENS: This was one of the last points of defence of the Postmaster General. He said that it was not an appointment; that it was just an intimation that the man was selected. Not only was it an appointment, but it was so accepted by Mr. Whittaker. According to the file Mr. Whittaker sold out his business. Not only did he do so, but he did not hear for over a month afterwards that he was rejected. How did he hear this? He heard it from a newspaper report. That was the first intimation he received. Then he learned from his competitor, Mr. Bowyer, who subsequently got the job, that Mr Bowyer knew all along that he was going to get the job although Mr. Whittaker was allowed to go on thinking for one month after this notice of appointment was given that he had the job. But this is not the only case.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. CANNON: What does the paper itself say? That is the point.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall have a lot to say about this paper, I may tell the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), before I am through.

Mr. CANNON: Read it.

Mr. STEVENS: I will read it, certainly, and if my hon. friend is very anxious I will deal with that part now, although I had intended to take it up later. It says:

Certificate of Appointment of Postmaster

As the Solicitor General apparently wants all the hieroglyphics, I will give them too:

PO-37882 Copy May 29, 1928

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. STEVENS (Reading):

Post office Simcoe, county of Norfolk-Elgin, Ont.
Name of appointee—Mr. George Edward Whittaker, O.A.S.

Not the name of the selectee, you will note, but the name of the appointee:

Address of appointee—Simcoe, Ont.
Salary rate—$2,040 per annum, with an annual increase of $120 until a maximum of $2,280 has been reached.

Now I come to the point that my hon. friends opposite want to inveigle me into reading, and which I am going to read and deal with. The minister has just said within the last twenty minutes that this man was rejected because he was re-established.

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said a moment ago that this man was rejected because he was re-established.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot contradict the minister, but invite him to read Hansard and see if I am not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I invite my hon. friend to read it too.

Mr. STEVENS: On the certificate is printed this note:

Appointment subject to physical fitness.

An hon. MEMBER: Ah!

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend in the back seat says, "Ah!" Now what does that qualification mean? It means this: Mr. Whittaker was a double amputation case. Much has been made of that fact. The Postmaster General says that this man could not properly handle the position because he had to handle large sacks of mail; that was the argument of the Postmaster General. Now in this post office we find that there are five clerks. The Postmaster General says that Whittaker was rejected because he was physically unfitted to handle heavy bags of mail. Here is a post office with five clerks, and the chief occupation of the postmaster, according to the Postmaster General, is to handle heavy bags of mail. The thing is absurd.

Mr. VENIOT: May I correct my hon. friend, who, I am sure, does not wish to state anything that is wrong? I did not say that Whittaker was rejected because of that fact. I said that he was rejected because of the report of the inspector which stated that fact.

Mr. STEVENS: We have a new reason for his rejection almost every moment. Every time you knock down one argument, another is raised. I say that the Postmaster General has repeatedly stated during the last few days that this man could not handle heavy sacks of mail, and I leave that to the judgment of the house. What are the facts? Mr. Whittaker was found to be qualified in every way, but during that hiatus of six months of which I spoke, the query was insinuated, not in the Civil Service Commission, but in the Post Office Department that possibly Whittaker was not physically fit, and so the Civil Service Commission—the body constitutionally authorized to decide—I invite the Prime Minister to remember—say, after studying all the reports that Whittaker was fit for the position, that his physical fitness was a question which might possibly be demonstrated under section 24.

Now we come to section 24, and I come to the Minister of National Defence. But first I will take the Postmaster General. The other day he stated in his place—I have the Hansard here, but I shall not trouble reading it—that my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) had attempted to mislead the house because he did not read all the file, and then the Postmaster General produced a little scribbled piece of paper which I have here, and read from that what he said was the opinion of the Justice department. What he read was this:

> If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he thinks it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the charge of any duties.

and so on. The Postmaster General said: This is the opinion of a Tory Minister of Justice, given to a Tory government, and he left the impression on the house that the Tory government had worked up this opinion in 1919 for the purpose of circumventing the statute. What are the facts? We have now, due to the persistence of hon. members on this side of the house in demanding the full report, the letters before us of Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice. This letter is dated November 3, 1922:

> I have the honour to reply to your letter of the 20th ultimo.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Does he not know that the opinion that is cited in 1922 is only a repetition of the opinion given in 1919?

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to read the letter? The letter itself will show.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The opinion was given in 1919.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman contain himself in peace for a moment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will try.

Mr. STEVENS: The letters reads:

> I have the honour to reply to your letter of the 20th ultimo, asking to be advised whether under section 13 of the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, a deputy head has the right to reject any person assigned or appointed to a position under his control or direction, without giving the said person any trial whatever in the position.
> I may say that I considered this question once before in connection with the case of a Mr. Betts, who was selected by the Civil Service Commission for the position of superintendent of the experimental station at Lacombe, Alberta, and I enclose herewith copy of the opinion which I gave Doctor J. H. Grisdale, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, in connection with this case. I think it will be found to answer the question submitted.

The point is that Doctor Grisdale in 1919, for reasons best known to himself, and not as the action of a Tory government—that much we know—made a request of the Deputy Minister of Justice for an opinion, and he got this opinion. Before I read this opinion, I want to draw attention to the use that has been made of it both by the Postmaster General and by the Minister of National Defence, and I want to say this to the Minister of National Defence: He is a counsel, a barrister at law, of ability and wide experience.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends who say, "Hear, hear," cannot applaud that statement too highly so far as my opinion of the minister is concerned. I want to put to him this, and the very excellence of his standing, thus evidenced by his colleagues, will add weight to what his answer must be. Supposing he is practising before the courts of any province in this country. He is pleading a case, and in his argument before the court he cites a judgment that had previously been handed down by another court, and in citing that judgment he reads one or two clauses which give to the court a certain viewpoint of that judgment from which he was quoting that was contrary to the whole judgment. In what light would such conduct be considered? Would it not be considered as reprehensible on the part of counsel? Is it not a distinct violation of the ethics of the bar for an eminent counsel to quote one portion of a judgment, which gave an altogether distorted view of the whole judgment? That is a hypothetical question. Now I turn to what the Minister of Defence actually did last night. If I recall rightly he commenced reading:

If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated—

Mr. RALSTON: That is the place.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister read:

If the deputy be reasonably satisfied upon preliminary examination of the person nominated that the latter is unsuitable or not qualified for the duties of the office or employment to which he is assigned, I think he may, if he think it advisable, reject him without entrusting him with the discharge of any duties; otherwise in conceivable cases considerable prejudice to the public service might ensue.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend stop there?

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment please. Then I intervened and said to the minister, did he think that was a fair interpretation of section 24, and I asked him to read the whole thing. Then he read the following two clauses:

The fact that the man selected is not as good as his predecessor; or in your words, not a man of reputation or outstanding ability, would not, I should think, in the absence of other objections, justify the deputy to reject him, provided he have passable qualifications.

The deputy, of course, like other individuals must yield compliance to the law as justly interpreted no matter what his view may be as to the policy of the law; and it must be realized that the provisions of the Civil Service Act are designed to limit selections for office to those who apply and compete, rather than to enable a deputy minister to obtain the officer who in his opinion is the best available for the position; moreover, even among the competing class, returned soldiers are by law preferred if they obtain sufficient marks to pass the examination.

He stopped there. Now I ask the house to consider this part which he did not read at all, but which is in the same judgment and is Deputy Minister Newcombe's interpretation of section 24. This section I shall also read in a moment.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? If he will refer to Hansard he will find that I read that portion.

Mr. STEVENS: I am doing so.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said I did not read it. I read every word of what my hon. friend is going to read. The only portion which was not read was the first.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend started where I started.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. My hon. friend is generally courteous in debate, and I ask him to retract what he has just said about my not having read what he is now going to read.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to read it. If the minister will be patient he will see where I am coming to.

The deputy, of course, like other individuals must yield compliance to the law as justly interpreted—

Then he went on:

—no matter what his view may be as to the policy of the law; and it must be realized that the provisions of the Civil Service Act,—

I am not questioning that he read the balance.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I thought he said I stopped there.

Mr. STEVENS: No. He read the balance down to the end. But he did not read what I am now going to give to him. It preceded all this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Why the groan? I want the house to follow this, and I leave it to hon. members to say whether under the opinion of the Justice department as I shall now read it they are justified in taking the stand they have taken:

The question submitted by your letter of the 17th ultimo, with regard to the rejection of Mr. Betts, who was recently selected by the Civil Service Commission for the position of superintendent of the experimental station at Lacombe, Alberta, may be one of some difficulty; but in my view the governing provision, which is section 13 of the Civil Service Act,— Now section 24.

—although it provides that the deputy minister may at any time time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned to a position under his control, seems to contemplate that there shall be some period of probation intervening;—

That was the very question I asked the minister. Now, what does section 24 provide?

The deputy head may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

My point in this whole thing is that the Postmaster General through his deputy—and in this case his deputy did it under his instructions—rejected the nominee of the Civil Service Commission without giving that nominee an opportunity for probation at all.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me now?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to give up my time to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend would just point out that the portion which I read, and which I proposed to confine myself to, was the portion which is printed by the Civil Service Commission in their notice of appointment as the rule governing these appointments.

Mr. STEVENS: I can assure the minister that the portion printed on this notice from the Civil Service Commission which was handed to Bowyer does not contain the words he read a moment ago.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, it was Whittaker's certificate I quoted, not Bowyer's.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. STEVENS: Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not quarrelling with the minister—

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you.

Mr. STEVENS: —about the last part of that clause, but I say that in the light of the words which I read just now, "although it provides that the deputy minister may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person assigned to a position under his control, seems to contemplate that there shall be some period of probation intervening," entirely vitiate the interpretation put upon the opinion by him.

Mr. RALSTON: Read it all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Read the rest of the sentence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend starting off with one picayune clause—

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is the governing clause.

Mr. STEVENS:—now insists on my reading every word of this simply to occupy my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, read the rest of the sentence.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not read the important part.

Mr. STEVENS: I did. My point is that the spirit and letter of the Civil Service Act has not been observed. Under the section the deputy head may reject an appointee, but it is implied here that it shall be during a period of probation, and the only discretion given to the deputy is that such period of probation may be modified or restricted where there is disability of a character that cannot be overcome on the part of the appointee.

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the gravamen of the whole business, Mr. Speaker. If the government are going to interpret the act in the way that the Postmaster General is interpreting it, I want to say to the Prime Minister that the civil service of Canada will be undermined. This man—after walking up and down the corridor at the request of the minister, to show whether or not he was fit, and the minister saying to him that he felt there was no unreasonable disability, after going through a personal examination by the Civil Service Commission, after passing his examination, after being appointed by them—then under this section I say he was entitled to probation.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, after being appointed by them.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: If one cannot read the record and have it accepted by this house—

Mr. ELLIOTT: But you have not read it.

Mr. STEVENS: I have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: My point of order is that my hon. friend is reading from a written document, and he is not reading the portion which is relevant to the case—

Mr. MANION: That is not a point of order.

Mr. RALSTON: —which says the appointment is subject to physical fitness.

Mr. STEVENS: I just wish to say this, and I will say it briefly to the Prime Minister: I did read those words "subject to physical fitness". I dealt with that, but I have been interrupted again and again, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is a trivial thing. As a matter of fact, my hon. friend said I was reading from a document and did not read it all. What I did read was evidently to his discomfiture.

The gravamen of this whole case rests in the interpretation of section 24. The Justice department has given an interpretation of that, and the interpretation is as I have read it, that it presupposes a period of probation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: It does not.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends deny that. I will read it again, but in view of the governing provision, which is section 13 of the Civil Service Act, I think it provides that the deputy minister may at any time before the expiration of six months reject any person appointed to the position under his control, which seems to contemplate thereby some period of probation intervening prima facie if rejection follows upon failure to make good in the discharge of the duties of the office, which this man was never allowed to try. And I am disposed to think that the person selected should at least have an opportunity to present himself. I can, however, imagine cases in which the deputy would be justified in rejecting an appointee: Here are the words upon which they now base their rejection. I put it to the Prime Minister. Here is a suppositious case: A man is appointed; he passes the examination but he is an epileptic. Nobody knew it. I have known cases of this kind. He comes into the office; he is subject to those fits. That is a case where he might very properly be rejected. Or a man may be appointed to a position. He is able to pass the examination, as many persons are, and he comes to the office, and it is found that he is diseased, or has a violent temper, or something like that. But that was not so in this case. This was a case where the Civil Service Commission said that this man was qualified in every respect, except—

Some hon. MEMBERS: It did not.

Mr. STEVENS: —except in one respect, that he was a double amputation case. But he had taken the trouble to come to Ottawa personally to interview the Postmaster General and the Postmaster General said this—I am reading now from an affidavit of Mr. Whittaker's:

> While in Ottawa I was introduced to the Hon. Peter J. Veniot, Postmaster General, and, after explaining to him the purpose of my visit to Ottawa, he suggested that we walk together along a corridor of the House of Commons in order that he might be able to judge of my ability to walk about. I complied with his suggestion and he then said that he could not see anything in my condition that would prevent me from discharging the duties of the office for which I applied. He also stated that, as the Civil Service Commission gave a preference to disabled men, I should have an excellent chance of securing the appointment, and I was assured that he had no objection to such appointment.

And that, Mr. Speaker, has been read here several times and not yet contradicated. There is much more argument that one could enter into, but with the interruptions of my hon. friend I have not the time. I want, however, to fasten this thing down. The point the Minister of National Defence made last night was that this man was rejected because of section 24 of the act, which empowered the deputy minister to reject him for physical disability in this case. But, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Time is up. Is the house ready for the question?

The house divided on the amendment (Mr Stewart, Leeds), which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We will take up item 314, page 71. When this vote was under consideration before, it was agreed that it should be taken item by item.

Outside service—Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. KENNEDY: The other night the Postmaster General was replying to my statement with reference to Waterhole and Fairview, and his remarks may be found at page 1730 of Hansard. Perhaps I should have answered him at the time, but I did not catch exactly what he said and was not sure of the words he used until I read them in Hansard. Here is what he said:

> In the first place, it was at an early date that the present postmaster at the first-named office, Waterhole, was appointed and accepted the position under the Civil Service Commission. For the same reason that I cancelled the appointment of Mr. Levesque at Fairview, because of his not being a resident, the Civil Service Commission would cancel the appointment of Mr. Smith to Fairview; because under the act no returned soldier nor anyone else can be considered who is not a resident of the place.

Then the Postmaster General went on to say that in asking that Smith be given the Fairview office I was asking him to break the law. The point is that Smith was in charge of the old office at Waterhole, which office distributed mail to Fairview, and therefore he should have been transferred to the new office. When part of the town was moved to the new location, leaving the old office at Waterhole, I think he should have been considered eligible for the position. If that argument is not conclusive I would quote section 21, subsection 3 of the Civil Service Act:

> Except as to appointments to positions in the headquarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as possible, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

It seems to me that if a man is in charge of a post office serving a particular village, in the nature of things he must be considered a resident of the locality in which that office is located and which it serves. In the case of Mr. Levesque, he resided sixty miles away in the town of Peace River. So I think I was not asking the minister to do anything which was not strictly in accord with the terms of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LADNER: This item includes an appropriation of some $16,000,000 for mail services—

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing only with the first item, which was the way the committee decided to deal with this vote.

Mr. McQUARRIE: On April 19 the Postmaster General read a statement which he said had been prepared by the department in reference to the complaint I made with respect to the appointment of a stenographer, grade 2, in the New Westminster post office. This statement appears in Hansard at pages 1727 and 1728, but it does not seem to be very accurate. Some mistakes appear which may be due to copying and some misstatements of fact are apparent, which no doubt occurred inadvertently. The first line of this statement is as follows:

When Miss K. T. Mawson, the postmistress, requested that a male stenographer be appointed—

Something is wrong there; Miss K. T. Mawson was not postmistress at New Westminster; a postmaster was in charge of that office. Later in the same statement I find the following paragraph:

Subject to Miss K. T. Mawson's resignation in July, 1928—

As a matter of fact Miss Mawson did not resign in 1928, but on July 23, 1925. That is shown by a letter in the file dated November 20, 1925, signed by the postmaster at New Westminster. This is rather important because of certain events which occurred after Miss Mawson's resignation. If we have the right date, namely, July 23, 1925, instead of July, 1928, it makes considerable difference. I think the minister will accept the statement that the resignation was made in July, 1925, instead of July, 1928.

While it is quite true that the Postmaster at New Westminster suggested in 1925 that it would be better to have a male stenographer in his office, his suggestion was questioned by the chief superintendent of post office services. In a letter from the superintendent to the postmaster, dated November 13, 1925, the following statement appears:

However, it is of the opinion—

That is, the department is of the opinion —that suitable work can be found in an office the size of New Westminster which a female stenographer could suitably perform in the time not occupied in stenographic duties. This is the action that is being taken in other offices of the same grade as New Westminster when the postal clerk position requiring a knowledge of stenographic work becomes vacant, and it is found to be working out satisfactorily.

The minister makes another allegation that the request for the appointment of a stenographer at New Westminster was for a male stenographer. I refer to a letter dated June 27, 1928, from the postmaster at New Westminster to the chief superintendent of post office service at Ottawa, and which reads as follows:

Authority having been given for the promotion of Mr. Harold G. Wade, at present employed as stenographer grade 2 in the New Westminster post office, to the position of postal clerk, I would ask that authority be given for the employment of a stenographer in his place.

That is not for a male stenographer at all, but simply for a stenographer. I find also that the advertisement which was issued by the Civil Service Commission in connection with this matter called for a stenographer and not for a male stenographer.

I think the Postmaster General endeavoured to give the impression that there was not very much in this case, that no one could have any real complaint. In that connection I would point out that there are some thirteen ladies in my constituency who believe that they have a complaint, and particularly the young lady, Miss Moore, who was notified by the Civil Service Commission that she had received the appointment and that she should report for duty immediately.

In the British Columbian of November 3, 1928, the following letter from Miss Moore appears:

To the editor:

Perhaps you would be good enough to allow me space in your paper for the following:

A raw deal has been given to some fourteen girl stenographers and myself, all of New Westminster, by the authorities at Ottawa, or rather of New Westminster. I want to let these girls know just what has happened and how we have been so unscrupulously gulled. The examination held on August 31 for a position in the post office was purely camouflage, which is easily seen by the way matters finished up. Three girls passed the examination, but I unfortunately, having the highest marks, was accepted by the civil service secretary and instructed to report to the postmaster immediately for duty. This was on September 28. A few days later the usual credentials as to character, health, etc., were received and duly filled in as required. (I might say that these papers were addressed to me care of the New Westminster post office.) During October I wrote the civil service secretary twice asking why the postmaster was not notified of my appointment, and may say that to date none of my letters have been answered. However, on the 29th I sent a night letter to the secretary peremptorily demanding a reply, which came on the 31st day of October informing me my services were rejected as it was a male stenographer that was required.

Now, by placing yourself in my position, you can understand what my feelings would be and how my Irish did boil. Needless to say, more anathemas than prayers were hurled at the Dominion government in Ottawa together with its satellites in New Westminster.

I would call particular attention to the following:

The only deductions one can make from the above are, that the position was never intended for any of the girl candidates; the department is guilty of extorting money from us girls without any intention of giving a quid pro quo for fees collected; there was outside interference in the course of the civil service department, or why the cancellation of the appointment?

What I would recommend is that candidates before sitting for examinations for government positions be required to show cards of approval from the party executive. That the powers that be make sure of the candidates' political persuations before blocking appointments. Various other recommendations I can suggest later.

In closing I wish to strongly impress on my fellow candidates the seriousness of the situation. Our liberty is at stake as the perpetrators of an action of this kind are capable of doing anything to gain their ends, so it is up to us to show by our resentment of such treatment that we refuse to countenance such dirty tactics in their arbitrary methods of civil service appointments. I can assure you I will leave no stone unturned to help in any way that is in my power to see that fair play is given civil service candidates.

It may be information to the "big guns" of the party in New Westminster that a promising young Liberal has been the victim of the dirtiest deal their powers could hand out.

I apologize, Mr. Editor, for taking up so much of your valuable space but would ask you to publish this in the interest of justice so that "right not might shall rule mankind and be acknowledged stronger".

Margaret I. Moore.

The suggestion which Miss Moore makes in that letter, namely, that the department never had any intention of giving this appointment to a female candidate, appears to be borne out by the statement made by the minister, because that is the reason stated why Miss Moore was not given the appointment. What is the effect of that? It is that thirteen girls were allowed to sit on this examination, and the successful candidate, who was notified that she was appointed and that she was to report for duty immediately, was not given the place at all. Instead, the position was given temporarily to a boy of seventeen years of age on the nomination of the defeated Liberal candidate in the last election, Mr. C. C. Knight, who now resides and has been residing in the city of Ottawa for most of the time since the last election.

The file shows what happened. It seems that when a request was made for a stenographer in the New Westminster post office, there was no eligible list in the possession of the Civil Service Commission, and the commission therefore authorized the department to suggest an appointee for the position. An appointment would, of course, be only temporary, subject to confirmation, and, I presume, qualification by the person appointed. The department, having been notified to that effect, wrote to Mr. C. C. Knight, the defeated Liberal candidate, asking for his nomination. Mr. Knight nominated this boy Thomas, and at the same time stated that the boy was only seventeen years of age. When that nomination was received by the department, Mr. Knight was told that the boy could not be appointed because he was under age unless no other candidates were available. It appears that other candidates were available because these thirteen young ladies took part in the competitive examination to which I have already referred. It was pointed out by the department that such an appointment might be made temporarily, provided that no others were available, as I stated.

This boy, Thomas, wrote on the same examination, took part in the same competition that the thirteen young ladies took part in; but he failed, he did not pass. He was, however, continued in the position. In March of this year another examination was held, and this boy, who had then reached the age of eighteen years, again took part in the competition, again failed, but is still in the position. He is still acting as stenographer in the New Westminster post office although he failed twice in examinations held by the Civil Service Commission for that particular position. I think the inference is fairly clear that he is held there by reason of the political influence which my good friend, Mr. Knight, has with the department, and that the department has been able, for the purpose of helping Mr. Knight and his friends, to keep this boy in the position notwithstanding, as I say, the fact that he is not qualified for it at all.

I find in the file a memorandum dated 6th October, 1928, from Mr. P. T. Coolican, general superintendent of postal services, in reference to this matter. I am not going to read the whole letter, but there is a side note which reads:

> You need a male clerk steno. Try and keep Thomas. Write to Com.

I suppose that is the commission. That is signed "L.J.G." I suppose those are the initials of the Deputy Postmaster General. Well, they have kept Thomas in the position and he is still there. I do not know whether they are going to have another examination or not or whether they will be able to get some kind of examination that he will be able to pass. But the fact remains that during all this time Thomas is holding the position although he is not qualified to do so, first, because he was under age and second, because after he reached the age of eighteen years, he could not pass the examinations of the Civil Service Commission. It seems to me that that is a disgraceful condition of affairs. It is really a crime to allow thirteen young ladies to take part in an examination and to pay $2 each as the prescribed fee for the examination when it never was the intention of the department to have a female stenographer in the office. In any event the $2 should be refunded to each one of those young ladies.

Mr. VENIOT: The commission should be asked to refund it. The Post Office Department never received it.

Mr. McQUARRIE That is the unfair part of the matter. The commission notified Miss Moore, without any conditions at all, that she had been appointed to the position; that she was to report for duty immediately, and by reason of that notice from the Civil Service Commission Miss Moore resigned the position which she held, and reported for duty. The Postmaster General himself is responsible, if not his department. He says that the matter never came to his attention, but someone in the Post Office Department is surely responsible for the young lady not getting the position. I defy the Postmaster General to show from his own file that the request in this particular instance was for a male stenographer. It was nothing of the kind. No such request was made after 1925 and in this particular case it was not to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Miss Mawson, but to fill the vacancy created by the promotion of Mr. Wade who had been appointed to the service in 1925 or 1926. I cannot blame the Civil Service Commission. The commission carried out the request of the department and made the appointment in due course. It gave the appointment to the candidate who secured the highest marks. The Postmaster General says: Well, you should apply to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not. I said that in regard to the money paid in you should apply to the commission. Stick to what I said.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I say that Miss Moore is quite right when she says that the department took from these thirteen young ladies the sum of $2 each under false pretences.

Mr. VENIOT: One moment, please; there you are again. The department received no money from the applicants. The money goes to the Civil Service Commission, and they handle it. We know nothing at all about it. Therefore the department did not receive the two dollars under false pretences.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Of course, that does not excuse the Postmaster General or the Post Office Department at all, because there was no fault in the Civil Service Commission. This examination was a farce and nothing else, and it was a farce because the department decided to accept the recommendation of a defeated candidate and gave the appointment to this young fellow Thomas, instead of following the law and allowing the appointment to go to the candidate who got the highest marks.

I have pointed out that the letter which I read from the chief superintendent of the postal service at Ottawa, date November 13, 1925, has established the principle that a female stenographer is quite suitable for such an office as New Westminster. After that time there was no request for the appointment of a male stenographer in the New Westminster post office, so the explanation given by the Postmaster General in the statement that he read is not accurate, but is in fact very misleading. I submit that if we are going to have a Civil Service Act and a Civil Service Commission they should mean something, and when a competitive examination is held the successful candidate should get the appointment unless there is some good reason to the contrary. The reason to the contrary which the department produces is that the department decided that a male stenographer was required in the New Westminster post office. I think this condition of affairs should be changed. I quite agree with Miss Moore and the other ladies who wrote on that examination that they have been badly treated, and I think that the Post Office Department as well as other departments of the government should see that some arrangement is made, whereby candidates for civil service positions shall have at least justice and a fair deal.

Mr. VENIOT: Right on this point, I am a little surprised at the hon. gentleman taking up Hansard and reading from it to show where the report which I read to the house the other day does not agree with the file as to the duties and the name of the postmaster, for the hon. gentleman has in his possession, or should have, a copy of what I read to the house.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I got it in Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not correct in Hansard.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How can you blame me for that?

Mr. VENIOT: I blame the hon. gentleman for not reading from the original. I gave him a copy of the original, and I put a copy on the table here. The hon. gentleman got that copy.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are entitled to read the statement in Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: I know you are, but if the hon. gentleman had read from the original he would not have undertaken to prove that my statement as read in this house was not according to the record. For instance, I am now reading from a copy of the document which I laid on the table and which the hon. gentleman got.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Which one is that?

Mr. VENIOT: My reply in the house the other day.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the date of the document?

Mr. VENIOT: April 19, 1929, as reported in Hansard April 19, 1929.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have not got that document on the file.

Mr. VENIOT: The original which I read to the house, reads:

When Miss K. T. Mawson resigned, the postmaster requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is not here.

Mr. VENIOT: Hansard says:

When Miss K. T. Mawson, the postmistress, requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place—

Mr. MANION: It was up to the Postmaster General to correct the error the following day.

Mr. VENIOT: My attention never was drawn to it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have pointed out that Miss Mawson resigned in 1925.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman said that this was not according to the record.

Mr. McQUARRIE: No.

Mr. VENIOT: And it is not according to what I submitted to the house. Hansard is in error; I do not know how the error occurred. Here is what I submitted to the house, and placed on the records on the table. This is what I read to the house:

When Miss K. T. Mawson resigned, the postmaster requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place.

Hansard reads:

When Miss K. T. Mawson, the postmistress, requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place, in response to her request for a statement of the duties of the position—

Mr. HANSON: Is that request on the file as brought down?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no doubt it is. The next paragraph goes on—I am reading what I read to the house the other day:

Subsequent to Miss Mawson's resignation in July, 1925.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Hansard says:

Subsequent to Miss K. T. Lawson's resignation in July, 1928.

The error is not mine.

Mr. STEVENS: Wade is not the man we are talking about at all.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend read from Hansard to show that Wade was not promoted at the date stated in Hansard, and that therefore my record was wrong. This is what I read, and I want to put it on Hansard, and I will give the exact thing I read to the Hansard reporter so that there will not be any mistake.

Mr. HANSON: Blame Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no blame at all. I laid the record on the table after I read it just as I am going to read it now.

Mr. STEVENS: Hansard is your words.

Mr. VENIOT: No, not if it does not correctly report what I said.

Mr. STEVENS: Hansard does not contain a record left on the table, but documents read by the minister.

Mr. VENIOT: I read that document which I laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS: Your quarrel is with Hansard, not with the hon. member.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member heard me read that statement, and he heard me say that I was placing the record on the table.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Surely the minister would not expect me to remember the whole document.

Mr. VENIOT: No, but you expect me to remember a whole lot, and if I do not remember it all correctly, you try to pull me up very quickly. This is what I read to the house at that time:

When Miss K. T. Mawson resigned, the postmaster requested that a male stenographer be appointed in her place.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That was in July, 1925.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman let me read this statement?

In response to a request for a statement of the duties of the position, it was stated that stenographic work took up about one-half of the daily period, the other half being occupied in assisting the regular employees in the different departments where required.

Mr. McQUARRIE: When was that?

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman will let me read the whole letter, he will find out:

The Civil Service Commission reviewed the duties of the position and decided that it should be changed from postal clerk to stenographer grade 2, on account of the fact that the essential duties were stenographic. The postmaster, however, represented that there were certain duties which he would not care to require a female to perform. Subsequent to Miss Mawson's resignation in July, 1925, Mr. Harold Wade was taken on and was appointed to the permanent staff as stenographer grade 2, as from January 29, 1926.

In April, 1928, Mr. Wade was promoted to a postal clerkship and the commission was requested to furnish the name of a male stenographer to replace him. They were unable to do so and gave authority for a local selction.

In consequence Mr. S. W. Thomas was employed temporarily from September 1, 1928.

Subsequently the commission held a competition for stenographers at New Westminster, and on September 28, 1928, they submitted the name of Miss Margaret Isabella Moore, one of the successful candidates, in connection with the filling of the position permanently.

In view of the postmaster's representations, however, the services of Mr. Thomas were retained and Miss Moore was not offered employment. It is understood that the Civil Service Commission advised Miss Moore, in reply to her inquiry, that the reason she had not been accepted by the department was that a male stenographer was necessary.

That is what I read to the house the other day.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Did the postmaster at New Westminster in 1928, after Thomas had been in this position, request that his services be retained? If so, was that representation made in writing, and where is it?

Mr. VENIOT: That would be entirely a matter of administration. I do not know of any case where it ever comes before the minister. It would be done by the superintendent of the Vancouver district—I think New Westminster is in that district—through the local postmaster and inspectors, thence to the chief superintendent of mail service and through him to the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General at Ottawa. So far as I am concerned personally, this is the first time I have heard of the case. When it came up the other day I asked the head officials of the department for a statement. I read to the house the statement as given to me. If any injustice has been done in the matter, after I get through with my estimates—and some days I have not been able to give attention to anything else—I will give attention to the case and see whether any injustice has been done. Further than that I cannot go at the present time. With reference to the hon. gentleman's charge that an injustice has been perpetrated upon the thirteen applicants through the retention of the two-dollar-fee paid by them, that is something with which the Post Office department has absolutely nothing whatever to do. It comes entirely under the Civil Service Commission. I think it is not proper for the Civil Service Commission or any other branch of the government to retain the fees of unsuccessful candidates, and I think the practice should be changed. But, as I say, that is not within my province, it comes entirely under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HANSON: If it was the intention to employ only a male stenographer in the New Westminster office, why did not the department request that only candidates of the male persuasion be asked to write on the examination?

Mr. PARENT: The Civil Service Commission again.

Mr. HANSON: No, the department had something to do with it.

Mr. VENIOT: I have no answer to make. It was clearly a matter of administration—not outside my province, it is true, but never submitted to me.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Coolican must have known about it.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON: If they did not tell the young ladies that they would be rejected on account of their sex, then the departmental officials are to blame for the injustice done.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister has not yet answered my question: Whether the postmaster at New Westminster made a request that Thomas be retained in the position. If so, was that request in writing? And if in writing will he produce it?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know whether the postmaster made such a request or not, but if he did so in writing I will produce the document.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If he did not do so this statement is rather misleading. It says—

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member had better wait to see if the postmaster did so or not.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It says:

In view of the postmaster's representations, however, the services of Mr. Thomas were retained—

That can be explained in no other way than that the postmaster at New Westminster requested that Thomas be retained in the position. I challenge the minister on that, and I say no such request was ever made by the postmaster. I should also like to know whether Thomas is going to be retained in the position, notwithstanding the fact that he has been unsuccessful in two examinations, which would go to prove that he is not qualified.

Mr. VENIOT: So long as there is no waiting list established by the Civil Service Commission as a result of examinations held under their discretion, temporary employees can be taken on at any time. The moment the commission establish such a list they forward it to the department, whereupon any temporary employee must be taken off the job and the first in order of merit on the waiting list appointed. That is the practice.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it the intention of the department that there shall be a male stenographer in the New Westminster office?

Mr. VENIOT: If the postmaster recommends it, yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: But the postmaster did not so recommend in this case at all, as I pointed out.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not prepared to admit that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The files show there was no recommendation on the part of the postmaster in this particular case that a male stenographer should be appointed. His request was for a stenographer, without any reference to sex. That request was made in July of last year in the letter I read.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not offering this as an excuse, but simply to point out what may have happened. The information may come to the department through the inspection of the office by officials from Ottawa or from some other section of the service. They would find out the requirements of the office and report thereon when they returned to Ottawa or to their own head office. I will inquire how the request came to the department here for the employment of a male stenographer.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Then I understand the Secretary of State is going to bring down the civil service file in connection with this matter.

Mr. RINFRET: Yes.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Mr. VENIOT: To prevent any error, did the Secretary of State make a note of the right name? I thought he wrote down Victoria.

Mr. RINFRET: I made the necessary correction. The return has been ordered and should be available by to-morrow.

Mr. MANION: I have been looking over the salaries of the different post offices and am curious to know upon what basis the salaries are fixed. I will demonstrate my point by taking a few of the offices which appear below the item in the estimates with the respective population as given in the Canadian Almanac of 1929. If there is a mistake in the latter figures, which I presume are for 1928, it must be imputed to the publication. For example, the city of Medicine Hat has a population of 10,500, and the salaries paid are $55,000. The city of Fort William, which I have the honour to represent, had a population of 23,500 in 1928—it is more than that at the present time—and its salaries are $63,000. Medicine Hat, in other words, with less than half the population gets nearly the same amount, within $16,000. And then over on the next page, take Brandon with a population of 17,000 and salaries of $71,000. Take Kingston with a population of 22,000; it has salaries of $97,000. Take New Westminster with a population of 20,500, it gets $93,000 in salaries. Moncton, with 21,000 of a population, gets $118,000 in salaries. Saskatoon, with a population of 40,000 in 1928, gets $181,000 in salaries. And one more; Regina, with a population of 40,000, gets $331,000 in salaries. The population, it is true, jump from 10,500 to 40,000, the highest I have named, but the salaries jump from $55,000 to $331,000, and it just strikes me that probably there is a very good explanation of it. I presume there is practically no increase over last year, but I have been a little puzzled to understand those differences. I can understand it in some cases. I purposely left out such cities as Victoria, Vancouver, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, because while they also demonstrate the point no doubt their salaries would be greatly increased because of incoming overseas mail.

Mr. VENIOT: What page of the estimates are you referring to?

Mr. MANION: Pages 71 and 72. The populations, of course, are not given; I have taken them from the Canadian Almanac for 1929, and I think they are correct. As I say, there is probably an explanation for all this, but at the same time the discrepancies which exist are rather strange.

Mr. VENIOT: Take Moncton, for instance, with a population of about 21,000 and salaries paid $118,000, and compare it with some places that have more population and less salaries paid. Moncton's revenue previous to the establishment there of the Eaton concern was $165,000 a year. Now I think it is close to $400,000, if I am not mistaken; I am just speaking from memory. The hon. member will understand that population is not the basis of salaries at all.

Mr. MANION: I quite understand that.

Mr. VENIOT: I would imagine the same thing obtains in Brandon, and also in Medicine Hat, accounting for the rapid increase of revenues there. In Saskatoon and Regina, as in Moncton, the mail order houses, I think, bring about that abnormal increase in the revenue compared with the population. And the revenue is the factor in conjunction with the volume of mail upon which salaries are based, and on which help is hired; and those salaries are established by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANION: I quite understand that. Take Regina and my own city, Fort William. Fort William with a population of 23,500 has salaries of $63,000. Regina with a population of 40,000—we will take it as double—has a salary list of $321,000, or practically five times as much. I should like to know the difference in income between Fort William and Regina. Could the minister give me the incomes from those offices?

Mr. VENIOT: The revenue of Regina is $869,000. The Revenue of Fort William is $83,000, or nearly $800,000 more revenue at Regina. As revenue is the factor in conjunction with the volume of mail and business conditions, that can be readily understood.

Mr. MANION: Before we depart from it—perhaps this will demonstrate the minister's point, and I am not criticizing—perhaps he could give me some of the other cities that I mentioned. Take Medicine Hat, what is the revenue there? Its population is 10,500 and its salaries are $55,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Medicine Hat has $39,900.

Mr. MANION: Revenue?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes—$39,993.

Mr. MANION: Just to demonstrate the point that revenue alone does not govern, I wish to point this out: Take Medicine Hat with a population less than half that of Fort William. It has a salary list of $55,000 against a salary list of $63,000 for Fort William, but it has a revenue of much less than half. In other words, its salary list is nearly as great as the salary list at Fort William—it is more than five-sixths—but its revenue is much less than half. Would the minister go further? I would like to get the figures for Saskatoon.

Mr. VENIOT: I may say, while we are looking that up, that Medicine Hat is a large distributing point for mails, and there is a great deal more work done there than the revenue would show. That is a distributing point for different sections.

Mr. MANION: For rural mail routes and that sort of thing?

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, no, for railways as well; a concentration of mail there for distribution to certain points.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister give me Saskatoon on the same basis?

Mr. VENIOT: Saskatoon, $311,000.

Mr. MANION: Well, that bears the argument out better. Would the minister give me one more, Brandon?

Mr. VENIOT: $103,208.

Mr. MANION: I just wish to say that the information given me by the minister is satisfactory. I wished to find out what the reasons were. I presume the same conditions existed in the past, but it looked strange because I knew the populations were not so vastly different. I think the matter is reasonably well explained by the minister. At the same time I find myself wondering if the differences are all just. I am wondering if possibly an investigation along that line might not be very worthy of consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: They are all lined out on a certain principle.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): May I call attention now to the city of Sydney? I find that the city of Sydney has a population about the same as most of those mentioned, and its salary list is very much lower. We have Eaton's establishment there and many other concerns.

Mr. VENIOT: The revenue at Sydney is about $64,000. I can assure hon. gentlemen that these salaries are all based on the work of the office and regulated by the Civil Service Commission. Where it is necessary to increase the staff of an office the Civil Service Commission receives recommendations from the department, but those increases are never made until the commission secure all the necessary information and grant us authority. The whole thing is worked out on the basis which I tried to explain to the hon. member for Fort William a short time ago.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): In smaller cities such as Brandon do they have house to house delivery?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BELL (St. John): I would like to ask the Postmaster General if it is true that Mr. H. Fortier, chief inspector of service at Ottawa, is now in charge of the district superintendent's office at St. John, New Brunswick, and if so why it was found necessary to have him so placed. I would also ask why it was necessary for the chief superintendent of post office service to visit St. John on March 25 last. Rumours are circulating freely in St. John regarding conditions in the post office of that city, and I feel it my duty to ask the minister if he will be good enough to supply the house with this information and to bring down all correspondence in relation thereto.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I shall be only too glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with that information by bringing down all the correspondence, but I may tell him that Mr. Fortier is not now in charge of the district superintendent's office there. Mr. Fortier and Mr. Underwood were sent to St. John to study conditions in that office and district. Just here I may tell the hon. gentleman who represents St. John and others who come from the province of New Brunswick that there is some serious misunderstanding with regard to the post office administration in that city. I am looking into it now in an endeavour to straighten out the matter. Mr. Fortier and Mr. Underwood, one of them an efficiency man in the matter of financial administration, so to speak, and the other an efficiency man in the matter of operation, were instructed to go and did go to St. John, where they remained for three or four days, and they have made a partial report. Their work is not finished yet, but I hope these two gentlemen may iron out certain difficulties which have arisen in that city in connection with the administration of the office and the discipline of some of the officials under the district superintendent. This is what we are now working on.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. MacLAREN: Who is in charge of that office now, or who is acting as district superintendent?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no acting superintendent; the regular district superintendent, Mr. H. W. Woods, is in charge.

Mr. MacLAREN: Then who is the next senior officer in that department.

Mr. VENIOT: Inspector Emerson.

Mr. MacLAREN: In the absence of the superintendent who takes over his duties?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no strict rule, but generally in the absence from duty a district superintendent, while he remains in the province the senior inspector takes his place. I know the point the hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would like to state the point and then the minister can answer it. I understand him to say that he does not necessarily put the next senior man in charge in the absence of the superintendent?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no direct rule.

Mr. MacLAREN: What is the usual practice?

Mr. VENIOT: I was coming to that.

Mr. MacLAREN: You said you were going to answer my question, but as yet I have not put the question.

Mr. VENIOT: I knew what was coming.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the minister will please sit down I will proceed with my question.

Mr. VENIOT: I thought I had answered it.

Mr. MacLAREN: First I wanted to ascertain from the minister the practice followed during the absence of the superintendent, as to who acts in his place.

Mr. VENIOT: Will you allow me to answer that question?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, not just yet. Then the minister said that there is no strict rule, that usually the senior officer takes charge, but evidently there are some exceptions. When the minister answers my question would he please tell us why Mr. Emerson did not act in the absence of the superintendent, although we understand that he was appointed to succeed him, which appointment was countermanded. I would like an explanation on that point.

Mr. VENIOT: In answer to the first part of the question I have already said that there is no fixed rule. There is a practice that when the district superintendent is absent from duty but within the province or within the country, the senior officer is the man who takes his place. I might state the circumstances in connection with the case which has been referred to. The health of Mr. H. W. Woods, the district superintendent of the St. John postal district, had been failing. He had informed me of that fact himself, and I had received the information from others, and noticed it especially when I visited St. John about the end of November or early in December last. When I returned to my office I took up the question of arranging for mail transportation to the West Indies under the new steamship arrangement, to see if we could not work out some scheme to facilitate the handling of the mail. In view of the fact that Mr. Woods' health was failing, I thought that he could be placed in charge of that work and sent to the West Indies. He could take two or three weeks to do this work and at the same time his health might be improved. Mr. Woods received instructions to that effect, and placed the senior postal inspector in charge of the work during his absence. I countermanded that order and instructed that Mr. Griffiths be placed in charge until Mr. Woods returned.

Mr. MacLAREN: I gather that the practice of the Postmaster General is to place the next senior man in charge when the superintendent is absent from his office but still in this country.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not the absolute rule.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understood the minister to say that that was almost the invariable rule.

Mr. VENIOT: It is usually the practice.

Mr. MacLAREN: But when the superintendent leaves the country the junior is put in charge. If anyone can interpret that form of reasoning I shall appreciate it very much.

Mr. VENIOT: I can change that around as I think it necessary in the interest of the service. I thought it was necesary in this case, and I did so.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Will the minister produce the correspondence in connection with the closing of the post office at Homeville, N.S.?

Mr. VENIOT: I will produce that tomorrow.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the minister tell us who is next in seniority to the superintendent?

Mr. VENIOT: The superintendent is certainly not senior to anyone in the office; he is junior to every one.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Who is next in order?

Mr. VENIOT: I think I have already stated that the senior is Mr. Emerson.

Mr. JONES: I would ask the Postmaster General to lay the correspondence in connection with the following post offices upon the table of the house: Norton, Beulah, Tooleton, Thornbrook, Jeffry, Gibbon, Head of Millstream, Jordan Mountain, Jemseg, Wickham, Shepody, Cambridge.

Mr. VENIOT: When does the hon. member expect to get those?

Mr. JONES: It is only a matter of form; they could be got together in a few minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: They cannot be laid on the table in the way the hon. member says they can.

Mr. JONES: In that case, I would ask that the correspondence in connection with Norton be laid on the table. I understand the postmaster was dismissed and four returned soldiers, Ira W. Reid, Charles T. Homer, Preston D. Price and George Ward, among six others, applied for this position. I would ask the Postmaster General to table the correspondence regarding this postmastership, along with the correspondence from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: I will do that. It might be interesting to explain to the house just how the documents asked for are produced. The originals are not produced and laid upon the table; copies are made from the originals. I have a list here of thirty-two returns of which notice has been given for production tomorrow. In preparation for those requests, I have had sixteen stenographers at work all day Saturday, a part of Sunday I regret to say, Sunday night, all day yesterday and up to tweleve o'clock last night, and they are working to-day. The return with regard to Norton is among those which have been asked for, and it will be produced to-morrow, but it would take five or six days to supply the information which has been asked for. I would like to ask the hon. members to go over this list and pick out the particular cases they desire laid on the table.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to mention about four or five. There is St. Boniface, Brussels, Macoun, Spruce Lake, Brigden, Waterdown and Lawrencetown.

Mr. VENIOT: That is a new one. It was not asked for in the list, but I will produce it. I do not know whether I can get it to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I could not tell whether it was a new one or not, because I did not have the name.

Mr. VENIOT: I have them all before me. I shall be able, I think, to produce most of them to-morrow and if I cannot get the Lawrencetown file ready for to-morrow, I will try to have it ready for Thursday.

Mr. JONES: I did not finish the list. I think Cambridge was the last one I gave. The others are:

Forks in the parish of Brunswick.
Coal Creek in the parish of Chipman.
Upper Greenwich in the parish of Greenwich.
Hillsdale in the parish of Hammond.
The Range.
Pamdenec.
Shanklin.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman cannot expect to get these files to-morrow, but I will do the best I can. I will get stenographers to copy them and submit them to the house as soon as possible.

Mr. JONES: I wish to thank the Postmaster General. I know he will get them out as soon as possible, because I would like to bring some of them before the house.

Mr. COTNAM: I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he would lay on the table the files and correspondence in connection with the Pembroke post office with regard to the two appointments to the postmastership since the death of the late postmaster, Mr. Moffatt; also the files and correspondence with regard to the appointment of a postmaster at Foresters' Falls in the township of Ross; also the files, correspondence and tenders submitted with reference to rural route No. 5, Cobden, Ontario.

Mr. DUFF: I would like to ask the Postmaster General to bring down all the returns in regard to all dismissals from September 15, 1911, to December 17, 1921, and all appointments made during that time.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it is time to draw the line. I have been asked to-day to produce files—and I have no objection to producing them—which mean the work of at least fifteen or twenty stenographers for five or six days or more.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. DUFF: More than that.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not referring to the hon. gentleman's request. To carry out his request I would have to engage probably 100 stenographers for five or six months. Let me ask the committee: Is it fair to ask for all these returns without making them orders of the house? I am prepared to do what I can; I have no objection to producing these returns, but I cannot produce them within the next six or seven days or more.

Mr. STEVENS: There is plenty of time; the session is still young.

Mr. DUFF: There is a saying in Scotland: "There shall be no step-bairns in our family." Certainly if our hon. friends across the way are entitled to information, I am too, and I am going to demand it. If the minister brings down returns with regard to what has been asked by my hon. friends of the opposition, I am entitled to all information from September 15, 1911, to December 17, 1921, and also during the time the "shadow" government were in power from the 1st of July to the middle of October, 1926.

Mr. VENIOT: We will do the best we can.

Mr. GEARY: In regard to the St. John matter which was brought up by my hon. friend a few minutes ago, the minister departed from his usual practice of appointing the senior to take the place of the superintendent who had gone away. I do not know whether my hon. friend asked for the file in that case or not, but I am rather curious about it from what I have heard in the house this afternoon and I should be glad if the Postmaster General would advise the house of the grounds upon which he departed from his usual practice, whether he made a personal investigation or whether he was acting on the advice of his deputy or other officials. Did he act from personal knowledge of a more or less definite kind?

Mr. VENIOT: That is internal business which sometimes it is not well to give out, but I am prepared to assume the responsibility for my action. I felt I was justified, under the conditions existing, to do as I did. I discovered on my initiative what was occurring.

Mr. HANSON: What were the conditions exising that prompted the minister to overrule the appointment of the senior assistant inspector? The minister has said either too much or too little. He ought to tell the house and the country frankly if there is any reason why Mr. Emerson should not be appointed.

Mr. GEARY: To be frank with the committee, the Postmaster General should give us the whole history of this transaction.

Mr. VENIOT: As I said a little while ago, the whole matter is under investigation.

Mr. GEARY: But as to the action that has already been taken.

Mr. VENIOT: My object in taking action was to bring about the investigation which is now under way.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 87, for the relief of Lera Ethel Vallance.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Frances Gwendolyn Snow Lott.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 102, for the relief of Emily Munnings.—Mr. Hubbs.

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Alfred Rescorl.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Isabella Einboden.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 111, for the relief of Frederick Davenport.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 112, for the relief of William Greig Green.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 118, for the relief of Marjorie Grace Coleman.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 121, for the relief of Sylvester Wilfred Kerr.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 124, for the relief of William Ernest Foulkes.—Mr. Cahan.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Ernest Carl Bouck.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 137, for the relief of James Lynham.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 139, for the relief of Bessie Stephen Lee.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 143, for the relief of Irene Sagar.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 144, for the relief of Clifford Wilson.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 146, for the relief of Mina Thompson.—Mr. Thompson.

Bill No. 150, for the relief of Frank Arthur LeNoury.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 152, for the relief of Thomas Booker..—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 153, for the relief of Marion Isabel Kemp.—Mr. Arthurs.

Bill No. 155, for the relief of Louisa Martha Weston.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Elizabeth Crawford Copping.—Mr. Arthurs.

Bill No. 155, for the relief of Arthur Alderton.—Mr. Arthurs.

Bill No. 163, for the relief of Bella Solnik.—Mr. Lawson.

Motions for second readings agreed to on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Private bills being exhausted, the remainder of the hour will be devoted to public bills and orders, to be found on page 7 of the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Public bills?

Mr. SPEAKER: When the first hour from 8 o'clock is not exhausted with private bills the remainder of the time is devoted to public bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that according to the motion?

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend certain provisions of the criminal code respecting the possession of weapons.

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Speaker, I explained this bill on its inception. It has been before the house for two or three years. It was introduced by the Hon. Senator Belcourt in another place and has passed the senate, and on two or three occasions has reached the appropriate standing committee of this house. It is rather long. It involves the sale, permit for use, and having in possession of firearms. I think it is directed largely against the sale of revolvers. The hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke to me about it the other day, and I understand he is quite willing that it should go to the committee so that the details of it might be examined there. If the house is of the same opinion I suggest that it should be sent on to the committee, where it can be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): This is a hardy perennial. There has been, so far as I can ascertain, no demand for legislation of this kind. We are fairly well protected in the various provinces of this Dominion by the present law. This bill, letter B of the senate, if carried out in its entirety would require that every man who had in his possession any ancient weapon as a trophy should take out an annual license for it, and the same for every such weapon in his possession, which would be absolutely foolish. And, if you run through the whole matter, the penalty is excessive. One thousand dollars and costs is the penalty for the first offence.

I do not want to take up unduly the time of the house, but the bill provides that there shall be a record kept of every sale and every transfer. In other words, if a party of hunters go out and trade rifles while on the hunt they are liable to a penalty, if this bill goes through, of $1,000 and costs. The thing is absurd on the face of it. As a matter of fact, the trouble with this country is that we are being over-legislated; we have too many laws, laws about which, in many cases, we know very little; we may be guilty of offences against those laws without any intention of doing wrong. I would therefore move, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be read a second time six months hence.

Mr. GEARY: This motion is debatable, is it not? My hon. friend (Mr. Arthurs) has stated objections to the bill which I think are very sound. A great many persons carry a shot gun or a rifle into the woods on perfectly legitimate business, or for the sake of sport, and they do not want to be embarrassed. But that can be attended to very well in committee. There are one or two other features in this bill, however, that should not be lost sight of. One is the procuring of revolvers by the criminal class. This bill has been endorsed by the police constables' association. I notice a letter here from the chiefs of police of Toronto and Montreal. Toronto and Montreal are centres in which great difficulty has been experienced of late in dealing with criminals, all of whom, apparently, carry firearms. The chiefs of police are officials who have in their hands the ferreting out and prosecuting of criminals, and they think that if there was some way of tracing the weapon with which they are armed when caught it might be of great use.

I am sorry to say that I cannot add much more than that. My friend says there is no demand for such legislation. There certainly is a demand from the police department. If there are details in the bill which have to do, in some way, with the disposal by a shopkeeper of his stock in trade, or a sportsman having in his possession a rifle or a shot gun, I think the committee can very well take care of that. The main purpose of the bill, as I see it, is to restrict the holding of revolvers and arms of that type by people unauthorized to hold them, and to restrict in such a way the purchase of revolvers that they will not get into the hands of people who should not be entrusted with them. That is the principle of the bill. One might speak for an hour on it and get no further than that. I suggest that as the house has had the courtesy to send this to the appropriate committee in other years, where it has rested, unable to get further because of prorogation following soon after, we might do the same with it this year and there defeat it, if we please.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why waste the time?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I gathered from my hon. friend (Mr. Geary) that he had discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and that the minister had no objection to the bill going to committee in order that it might be further examined.

Mr. GEARY: That was it; he expressly stated so.

Mr. DUNNING: I have on numerous occasions in this house voted against killing a bill without adequate discussion, and for the principle of referring bills of this character to committees in order that they might be further inquired into, even though I might oppose the bill itself. For that reason I feel inclined to vote against the six month's hoist before adequate discussion of the measure has taken place. I think it should be discussed and examined before the appropriate committee. That is only fair, and, for that reason, speaking for myself only, of course, I shall vote against this form of closure.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): This bill has been before the house on previous occasions and has been discussed at very great length. The objections, which have been pointed out and which I think are valid, are numerous indeed. One reason why I think this bill should be defeated on its second reading is that its promoters, who, from our previous discussions, can learn something of the sentiment of the house, should take a reasonable time to redraft the bill and bring it before the house in more simplified form so that it may be expected to accomplish the objects which they state they have in view, and eliminate those parts of the bill which seem to be utterly ludicrous.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Two years ago, if I remember rightly, Mr. Speaker, I was sponsor for the bill introduced at that time in the senate by Senator Belcourt. Numerous objections to the proposed legislation were raised in the house; the bill was referred to a committee and, if my memory is correct, most of the objections to the bill were overcome by changes which were made in that committee and the bill in its new form was far more acceptable than when it was first presented. I feel very much like my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning); instead of killing this bill outright by supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) I would suggest that it be referred to a committee where the interested parties might appear.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has my hon. friend read the bill?

Mr. CANNON: I have read the bill. I would not say that I approve of all its provisions but I think it might be sent to a committee before which the interested people could appear, instead of killing it as we will if we support the amendment.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I think this bill has been before this house five times. On one occasion it was sent to a committee which amended it very considerably, but now it is brought back to the house almost in its original form. I do not see any object in taking up the time of parliament by appointing a special committee; so many committees are meeting now that no one would have time to attend the meetings of such a committee. Let the promoters of this bill revise it and bring it back in a more acceptable form. It has waited five years now, and no injury has been done.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the point of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) is well taken, and as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has indicated, this bill has been discussed on several previous occasions. I remember once when it was absolutely laughed out of the house because it was so ridiculous, so it is hardly an argument for members of the government to suggest that this amendment is a form of closure in connection with this bill.

The facts are that the promoters of this legislation appear never to learn by experience; they come back time after time, almost turning the city of Ottawa into a Canadian Chicago. One would think we were living in that city, to read some of the sections of this bill. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it can be taken seriously. Let me just quote one passage from it:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction thereof to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour, not exceeding two years, or to both such penalty and imprisonment, who,—
> (a) not having a license therefor from the Minister of Justice or his authorized agent, after the thirty-first day of December, 1929, imports, brings, transports into Canada, or transmits by post, or manufactures, makes or deals in, or sells to, barters with, gives or lends to or repairs for any person, any weapon of the following kinds or of any like or similar kind:—
> (i) any cannon, trench-mortar, machine gun, revolver, pistol, air gun, or shot gun or rifle known as sawed-off or riot gun;

That one section is an indication of the hysterical character of this legislation, which I understand comes from the other house. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we might be well advised to send back this bill to their honours in the senate with the suggestion that they go into the matter a little more carefully and not consider Canada another Chicago.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. GEARY: May I ask what has become of the well known views on disarmament of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)?

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty on this occasion to rise in protest against this infringement on the liberties of the Canadian people. We are not bolshevists—

Mr. HANSON: Too much prohibition.

Mr. McGIBBON: I stand second to no man in this country in upholding our laws, but I think these infringements upon the liberties of our people have gone almost too far. This bill has been before the house some five times; I have opposed it upon each occasion, and I will continue to oppose it because I still have confidence in the common sense, the decency and the honesty of the Canadian people. We are getting too much law; we are infringing too much on the rights of the people. If my memory is correct, in other days no voice was raised more powerfully in this house when this question was discussed than that of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon).

Mr. THORSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: If it is not too hard.

Mr. THORSON: Are we to take it that the hon. gentleman wishes to preserve the right of transmitting trench mortars by post?

Mr. McGIBBON: If we could turn those mortars on some of the members of the government who are supporting this bill I would answer yes. In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Canadian people I must protest against this bill; it is not the only bill of this character which will come before this house, and I expect to have something to say in connection with the others. However, I think the time has come when we must stand up for our rights in this country. I remember how the Solicitor General voiced his condemnation of this legislation in the past; if I had time I would like to quote the speeches he delivered in this house when we considered similar bills in other years, but I shall not do so. I have very much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Amendment (Mr. Arthurs) agreed to on division.

DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

RIGHT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO ESTABLISH DOMICILE

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75, respecting the domicile of married women in proceedings for divorce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WARD: I think at the outset, Mr. Speaker, it would be well if I read the bill, since there appears to be a feeling on the part of some members of the house that the bill has something to do with the divorce laws of Canada. That is not the case; it has no bearing at all upon the laws now governing divorce in this country except that it will enable the women of Canada to enter actions for divorce upon the same grounds as those upon which they are now instituted by the men. The bill provides as follows:

1. This act may be cited as The Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1929.

2. For the purposes of this act a married woman,

(a) who is judicially or otherwise separate and living separate and apart from her husband; or

(b) who either before or after the passing of this act has been deserted by and lived separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years, and is still living apart from her husband;

may acquire a domicile for herself as though she were a feme sole and may commence an action for divorce praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that entitle her to such divorce in any court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii.

The bill, I repeat, has no bearing whatever upon the present divorce laws of Canada. I make that explanation in order to clear the minds of those who think that we are attempting to make divorce easier, or anything of that kind.

It is, I understand, the settled law that in Canada the domicile of a married woman is the domicile of her husband no matter where he happens to be. It is also I understand, the law that the jurisdiction of the provincial courts in provinces where there is provision for divorce, and the jurisdiction of parliament, depend on the question whether the applicant is domiciled, in the one case in the province, and in the other in the Dominion of Canada.

There are many women in Canada whose husbands have deserted them and in some cases remarried and settled in other countries —in this case another province is another dominion or another country—and these women are deprived of the right of obtaining a divorce by reason of this rule of law. I know of three or four such cases in my own riding, and, considering the position which has been given to woman with respect to property, the exercise of the franchise and many other matters, I think it is time that she was put on the same basis as her husband with reference to his important domestic matter. In other words, I believe that the old rule of law making the woman's domicile absolutely dependent upon the domicile of her husband should be altered and that woman should be given the right to establish a domicile of her own, separate and independent from that of the husband. This is only a matter of common sense, reason and fair play. There is no sound reason why an obsolete rule of law should be invoked to deprive women throughout Canada of access to the courts in order to obtain redress in the same way that men can. I am urging it for the consideration of the house simply for this reason.

In my own province and the neighbouring provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia the courts have jurisdiction in divorce. Any man, no matter where his wife lives, can come to any of these four provinces, acquire a domicile and seek redress from the courts by way of divorce. But women who have lived all their lives in these provinces, who are citizens and voters and in many cases large property owners paying taxes and generally carrying out all the honourable demands of society, are denied the right of access to the courts because it happens that their husbands have deserted them and acquired a domicile in some foreign country. It is ridiculous to say that because the woman's husband has deserted her and has gone to Mexico, Australia or China, her domicile is removed to one of those places. I know women who have never left the province of Manitoba but who have been told that their domicile is in England, South Africa or the United States. For these reasons I have thought fit to bring in this bill and urge it upon the attention of the house.

As I know that this matter involves a great many difficult questions of law and as I am a layman, I am presenting it to the house for consideration in this general way in the hope that a number of the lawyers in the house will join in the debate and express their views on the subject. I know that many hon. members of the legal profession are familiar with the question and can give us a full explanation of the points involved, considered from the standpoint of the law.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has explained, this bill is for the purpose of establishing the domicile of a woman who wishes to sue for divorce. Speaking for myself personally it is impossible for me to support this bill, as I am against the principle of divorce, and also because I believe this bill would facilitate the procuring of divorces.

Under the laws as at present, if a husband and wife who had been living in Ontario, their last domicile being in that province, separate and the wife goes to reside in Manitoba, then if she desires to sue for divorce she must do so in the province in which she was last domiciled, her legal domicile being her husband's domicile. Manitoba has divorce courts and Ontario has not. The result of this bill would be to enable a woman to take procedure in Manitoba and would only facilitate the granting of divorce. For these reasons I cannot support this legislation.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I think the bill goes farther than the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has stated. This bill applies not only to the province of Alberta but to every province in Canada, and it simply means this: it enables the province of Nova Scotia or Manitoba, or any other province where divorces are granted, to be made into a Reno. Any wife who desires a divorce need only leave her husband and go to Manitoba and establish a domicile there. She could sue for divorce and compel her husband to come from any other province to defend that action.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That privilege is granted to the husband at the present time, is it not?

Mr. CAHAN: I would not put it in just the way the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has put it; at the present time the wife's domicile is the domicile of her husband.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the event of a husband desiring to obtain a divorce he can do what this bill purports to give the wife a right to do.

Mr. CAHAN: Under the present law the wife's domicile is that of her husband; when the husband selects a domicile in some particular province that is his wife's domicile for all purposes, not only for the purpose of divorce but for every purpose in connection with their civil life. This law certainly would override the civil law of the province of Quebec, and would come in direct conflict with the civil law in other provinces of the Dominion. It would make a complete revolution in the civil status of married woman. This matter, therefore, should receive every attention and should not be passed as being something of minor importance.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry indeed to hear the words of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) a few moments ago, because he touched only one remote phase of the question. I would like to submit to the house one type case in which gross injustice is now being done. Take the case of a married couple residing in any given place: the husband deserts his wife—and it is not an unusual thing—he goes away and the wife remains in her home town or locality. That is not her domicile, because her husband has run away and grossly deserted her. She is the victim of his evil propensities. That is undoubtedly an injustice to the decent womanhood which finds itself in that position. I have, for instance, knowledge of a case in a western city where a young couple, both minors, were married. Their parents found the youngsters and they were separated. The young man went away and the woman, who was under age and who was married to him, is living still, as she was then, in the home of her parents. Ten years have passed. They do not know where the young man has gone. He has vanished, and she has no domicile except her husband's unknown domicile, wherever that may be. In regard to what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has just said about the question of property and many other rights, they are determined upon the ipse dixit of this chap who has run away.

Heaven knows where. That is not a state of affairs which should be tolerated. I am not saying that the bill in its present form is perfect. I think my hon. friend put his finger upon the weak spot in the bill, but it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: Subclause (b) of section 1 would cover the case my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. STEVENS: We are considering now the question whether the bill should be given its second reading, but I agree with the point my hon. friend has raised that one clause is altogether too wide. By striking out the words "or otherwise separate", we could cure that, but I ask that the matter be given some consideration. I have in my hand the judgment of a judge referring to this, indicating that the discrepancies in the law ought to be considered by parliament. Time is too short to precipitate a full discussion, but I ask either that the bill be allowed to pass its second reading and be sent to a committee for study, or at least that the government should give to it consideration, if the Solicitor General will pardon me for putting it in this way, other than the personal wishes of the Solicitor General.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend will remember that I prefaced my remarks by saying that this was just my personal opinion; that I was not speaking for the government.

Mr. STEVENS: But the Solicitor General is speaking as solicitor general of a government and weight is attached to his words not only because of his position, but also because of his great legal learning in regard to these matters.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): There is one observation which I should like to add to the remarks that have been made. It seems to me that there is also in this bill a principle of wide concern and application to the people of Canada, that is, the matter of equal rights of the womanhood of this country in comparison with the rights the men hold. There has been through modern times a strong development in equalizing the social, political and economic rights of the womanhood of this country. This is not a question of the principle of divorce; it is not a question where the convictions of any hon. member should interfere with his sense of justice and duty to the womanhood of Canada with regard to its right to equal treatment with the men of Canada. I am one of those who believe that the time has arrived in our civilization when the women of Canada, and, in fact, of other countries, do not have to regard themselves as having an inferiority complex, or rather, when the men should not regard themselves as possessing a superiority complex. I should like to place before the house the simple thought that underlying this bill is the fact that the attitude of the house will be a declaration whether or not the parliament of Canada, which unfortunately possesses only one woman and a good one at that, will deny to the women the principle of equal treatment in this matter as well as in all social, political and economic matters.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume in committee of supply.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Outside service — salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. GEARY: When the house rose at six o'clock, I think the Postmaster General was in the midst of an explanation in regard to the St. John post office.

Mr. VENIOT: I had nothing more to say in regard to the St. John post office.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think the hon. gentleman said anything. I do not know that his present attitude is so unusual after all. I am going to ask him categorically whether or not he will take the committee into his confidence at least to the extent of informing it as to the reasons that prompted him to exercise some authority, which I suppose he has, to put an officer of junior rank over the head of the senior in charge of the district about St. John, New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: I have already stated to the committee that for some time I had in view an investigation into the discipline, if I can use that term, in the administration of the office in the city of St. John as well as in the inspectoral district of that section. Certain difficulties had arisen there which were a subject for investigation by two of our expert officials who were sent from Ottawa, expert, first, in financial administration, and, second, in the operation of the office. When the question arose through the absence or leave of absence from Canada of the district superintendent, I felt, from my observation of affairs in St. John in the last year—and I have visited that office frequently and have had occasion to discuss its administration and operation with my head officials—that I was doing what I considered right in placing the gentleman I did place, in charge as acting district superintendent. This I felt would bring matters to a head, and certainly I was not mistaken, for matters are coming to a head. The investigation is still in the air, so to speak, still going on quietly, and until it has been completed and reports have been made to the department by the responsible officials, I feel that the house should not ask me to go any further into the matter.

Mr. CLARK: I would ask the Postmaster General whether he has secured from the Civil Service Commission the file with reference to the post office at Sutton, Quebec.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman should ask the Secretary of State.

Mr. CLARK: On the orders of the day to-day I asked the Postmaster General this question. The Secretary of State was in the house, and he undertook to produce the file.

Mr. VENIOT: I have not got it.

Mr. CLARK: Then I would ask the Postmaster General if he will tell the committee why the postmaster at Sutton was dismissed.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the record will show that. I will have it brought down; I think we have it.

Mr. CLARK: This is a matter which the Postmaster General has known for some days would be brought before the committee, and information with respect to it has been requested on several occasions. I think we might have the information now. I am sure the minister's deputy would be able to give him the information.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to be understood as refusing to give any information. I have nothing to hide in connection with any post office or in connection with my actions respecting any part of my department. I am prepared to give all information possible. I think the file has been asked for and laid on the table; I do not know that I have a copy of it with me. The part that was said to be missing was that part of the file that would be furnished by the Civil Service Commission. That was asked for only this afternoon, and it was impossible for the Secretary of State to obtain it from the commission in time to present it this evening. The best I can do is to call his attention to the matter and have the file completed by the production to-morrow of the papers from the Civil Service Commission. I can assure the hon. gentleman that no matter what item we may be on, he will not be precluded from discussing this matter.

Mr. CLARK: I am quite prepared to accept the undertaking of the Postmaster General to produce that part of the file, but that portion of the file has nothing whatever to do with the question I am now asking, namely, why was the postmaster at Sutton dismissed? He was a man by the name of Olmstead. I am quite convinced that the minister's deputy can give him the information for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: The deputy says that he cannot give it off-hand, and I do not think it is right to expect it.

Mr. CLARK: I would ask the minister if he has any personal memory of having dealt with that post office.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I have.

Mr. CLARK: I would like the minister to give us his memory of the circumstances.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I shall not undertake to speak from memory for fear that I might be depending upon my memory too much and make a mistake. I will bring down the record to-morrow, if the hon. gentleman is satisfied to accept my word.

Mr. CLARK: Possibly the Postmaster General has that file here.

Mr. VENIOT: I am just looking through my papers now to see if I have it.

Mr. CLARK: We can wait.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not see it here.

Mr. CLARK: In order that there may be no misunderstanding to-morrow, may I ask the Postmaster General whether he will give a statement to the house to-morrow as to the reasons for the dismissal of this official.

Mr. VENIOT: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. CLARK: And bring down the balance of the file from the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. VENIOT: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. CLARK: And also make a statement to the committee why the office, which was advertised in October, 1927, has not yet been filled?

Mr. VENIOT: I will give all that information.

Mr. SHORT: I want to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General and of the house a dismissal which took place in my constituency. This is only one of many. I refer to the dismissal of the postmaster at Waterford, Digby county. I asked for the file a few days ago, and as usual, I got only a part of it. From the files that are brought down by the Postmaster General there is always something missing, and from this particular file the most important thing that is missing is a largely signed petition from the residents of that district.

In looking over the file I find first a letter from the defeated candidate in my constituency, Doctor Lovett, asking for the dismissal of the postmaster at Waterford, Digby county. He says in that letter:

> I am asking for the dismissal of George Johnson, postmaster at Waterford, Digby county, Nova Scotia, on the ground that he is a Tory partisan and took an active part in the last federal election in the interests of my opponent, the Tory candidate. I would recommend and urge the appointment of Mr. Leslie Sabean, of Waterford, to fill the vacancy caused by the dismissal of the present postmaster.
> Yours respectfully,
>
> (Signed) L. J. Lovett, > ex-M.P., Digby-Annapolis.

I want to say to the Postmaster General that this man Johnson is not a partisan. He had been postmaster in this district for many, many years; in fact, the post office in this district had been situated in this same house for fifty years, the office having been handed down from father to son. This postmaster took no active part in any political campaign. He is not a partisan. He did vote, I think, for me; I do not know positively, but I have every reason to believe that he did. But is a man to be called a partisan and is he to be deprived of the franchise simply because he holds a little sixty dollar position? Is that the policy of this government? It seems to me that every country postmaster in my constituency who is suspected of being a Conservative has been dismissed. Doctor Lovett, the defeated candidate, whom I had the pleasure of defeating on two occasions, was a member of this house for four years, from 1921 to 1925. During that period he made no dismissals at all, but he is taking his revenge now on these poor country postmasters drawing salaries of sixty dollars, because he could not take it out of anyone else.

The next letter on this file is one from the chief post office superintendent at Ottawa to the district superintendent at Halifax, advising him to appoint Mr. Leslie Sabean as postmaster in the place of Mr. George Johnson. Next is a letter addressed to Doctor Lovett from the Deputy Postmaster General advising him that instructions have been given to dismiss Mr. Johnson and appoint in his place Mr. Leslie Sabean. The next document on this file is a form of transfer signed by the chief superintendent of the post office service. This is followed by a letter from Mr. Sabean, who had been appointed to the office, refusing the appointment. It is dated March 14, 1927, but does not appear to be addressed to anyone. He writes:

> Dear Sir,—
> I am unable to accept the position at Waterford as it is my intention to move away from here. Sorry not to have been able to let you know before.

Mr. Sabean never moved away from the district; he is living there yet. On March 21 the Deputy Postmaster General wrote to Doctor Lovett informing him of Mr. Sabean's refusal to accept the position and asking to be given the name of another reliable party. Doctor Lovett never answered this communication, but the Postmaster General was not satisfied to let the matter rest there, and on May 3 he writes Doctor Lovett:

> Permit me to draw your attention to the correspondence relative to the proposed change at Waterford, N.S. As you are aware, the dismissal of the postmaster was authorized by the Postmaster General, but your nominee, Mr. Leslie Sabean, declined the appointment. You were informed of this vacancy on March 21, and I would be pleased to hear from you as soon as possible.

Evidently Doctor Lovett was satisfied to let the matter drop, but the Postmaster General wanted the head of this little sixty-dollar postmaster to go into the basket with the rest of them. Doctor Lovett did not reply until May 31, nearly a month later. Finally he went to Leslie Sabean and then sent this letter to Mr. Gaboury:

> Re Waterford Post Office
> Mr. Leslie Sabean has decided to accept the position of postmaster at Waterford. Will you please see that his appointment is made, and oblige.

Evidently they were forcing the appointment on Sabean.

An hon. MEMBER: Did they increase the salary?

Mr. SHORT: Not until they appointed their own Liberal nominee; then they raised it to $100. The correspondence goes to the post office inspector at Halifax with instructions to make the appointment. Again Mr. Sabean declined. This is the third time that they tried to force the office on him. Then follows a letter signed by the district superintendent at Halifax, addressed to the chief superintendent of the post office service. It is dated June 15, 1927, and is in this form:

With reference to departmental memorandum of the 7th instant, and to previous correspondence regarding the vacancy in the postmastership at Waterford, the district superintendent has to report that Mr. Leslie Sabean on again being notified that the office was to be transferred to him writes as follows, under date of the 14th inst.:

This is what Mr. Sabean says:

"I have decided not to take the post office even for a short time, as I still intend to move away from Waterford,—

And he winds up his letter:

"—and why make unnecessary bother."

That shows how far the Postmaster General goes with these little sixty-dollar offices. Under date of August 11, I find that Mr. Coolican, the Acting Deputy Postmaster General, wrote to Doctor Lovett. It will be noticed that another official has taken up the correspondence—of course at the dictation of the Postmaster General. This is the letter:

Re: POS—Waterford, N.S.

Dear Dr. Lovett,—

Permit me to refer to previous correspondence regarding the vacancy in the above postmastership and to say that I would be glad if you were now in a position to submit a recommendation in this case at your earliest convenience.

As stated in a letter from the Deputy Postmaster General, dated the 22nd June, Mr. Leslie Sabean, whom you had recommended for the position, declined to accept the office.

Now this is the reason why Mr. Sabean declined to accept the office. As I say, this post office was situated practically right in the centre of the district. It had been located in the same house for fifty years under two or three postmasters of the same family. Each of these officials had given entire satisfaction to the community. The last of them was very popular, and as soon as the people heard of his dismissal a petition was circulated and signed by practically every resident. This was sent to the Postmaster General, but it does not appear on the file. That explains why Mr. Sabean would not take the office, and the Postmaster General could not get anyone else in the district to accept the position until along in the latter part of September, the 21st to be precise, when Doctor Lovett write the Postmaster General as follows:

I am now in a position to recommend the appointment of Mr. Wm. Walker for postmaster at Waterford, Digby county, N.S. This appointment would be in the public interest.

Think of it! Mr. Walker's house is not conveniently situated, and many residents declined to have their mail sent to that post office. So the change is not very much in the public interest. I see there is another letter on the file, dated November 2, 1927, from the district superintendent at Halifax, to the chief superintendent at Ottawa, in which he says:

Referring to departmental memorandum of September 28, the district superintendent has to say that the transfer of the Waterford post office to Mr. William Walker was effected on October 20.

The office was moved three hundred yards west but the travel of the mail courier was not affected.

Now, as a matter of fact the district superintendent never was in that locality at all or he would not have made the statement that the office was moved three hundred yards. Really it was moved three-quarters of a mile. That is the kind of service we are getting down in certain sections of Nova Scotia. In the twenty-mile district in which this office is situated there are six other offices, and every one of them has been changed since 1926, and in each case it has resulted in great inconvenience to the locality served. Yet not a charge was laid against any one of these postmasters. The only reason for their dismissal was the recommendation made by the defeated candidate. If he could have his way, every departmental official in my constituency would have to get out—every one of them, because that is the disposition of the defeated candidate. He tried it in the customs last year, and when the matter was investigated they had to appoint the man the Civil Service Commission nominated. Unfortunately, none of these postmasters came under the Civil Service Act. They could not point a finger at Mr. Johnson, as postmaster, unless it was because he was supposed to have voted for the Tory candidate. Is it a crime in this country for a man to vote for a Tory candidate? Are none of those sixty-dollar a year postmasters able to exercise their franchise? That seems to be the disposition of the Post Office department. If Doctor Lovett wanted these removals, he was a member of this house from 1921 to 1925 and all he had to do was to stand up in his place in this house and ask for the dismissal of those postmasters and it would have been granted. He was not so much interested in the men then because he was a member, but since his defeat he wants to take his revenge upon these underpaid country postmasters, and that is the way he does it.

This is only one case of many that I have in my constituency. I could call the Postmaster General's attention to another one in my constituency, in Annapolis county. The post office there had been in the same house for twenty-seven years. They could not get any person in the district to accept the office, and they closed it altogether. That is the condition there. I asked for a rural mail route in that district after that, and I wrote to the Postmaster General regarding it. He said he would make inquiry. He sent the district superintendent down to interview Doctor Lovett and asked him what he thought about this rural mail route in the district, and Doctor Lovett advised against it. Is the Post Office Department going to take the advice of every defeated candidate, as to how our postal department should be run? It seems so in these small country offices. I say it is a disgrace to the postal department of this country. It never occurred under the administration of any other Postmaster General.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHORT: Never, Never have there been so many petty dismissals in the province of Nova Scotia as have taken place since the present Postmaster General has occupied office. This gentleman that I have reference to here served as postmaster under the Liberal government from 1896 to 1911. He was good enough for them; why is he not good enough for the present government? Now they are scalping, and every man who holds a petty office and who is not one of their faith has got to walk the plank. I am going to tell the Postmaster General, though, that so far as political expediency is concerned he has made a great mistake in this case, because I doubt if a Liberal candidate could go in there at election time and get half a dozen votes where they used to have a majority. And I doubt if Doctor Lovett personally knows this man at all; but he was told by some of the heelers in the constituency that these petty postmasters must go, and that is the reason and the sole reason. I say it is a disgrace to the post office department to think that every country postmaster, simply because he exercises his franchise at election time, is obliged to lose his office.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I would just direct the hon. gentleman's attention to a comparison I am going to make. If it is a crime for the present Postmaster General to dismiss on the recommendation of friends of the party certain postmasters, what can we call it when we look at the record of Nova Scotia from the 1st of October, 1911, to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: —to the 30th of September, 1917, when there were 254 postmasters dismissed on the recommendation of defeated and elected candidates.

Mr. SHORT: How many of those postmasters who were dismissed were replaced by rural mail services?

Mr. VENIOT: Since we are on that question, I just want to deal with that. Every postmaster dismissed from 1911 to 1917 was dismissed irrespective of the closing of post offices for the opening of rural routes. The record shows that. Just let me give an example or two to prove it.

Mr. SHORT: How many in Nova Scotia in that time?

Mr. VENIOT: In Nova Scotia there were very few rural routes opened, and there were 254 postmasters dismissed.

Mr. SHORT: That is from 1911 to 1925.

Mr. VENIOT: Let us look at it. In the province of New Brunswick there were 91 dismissals, and there were 32 rural routes opened. Supposing for a moment that the contention is correct, that these dismissals are contingent upon the closing of offices or the opening of rural routes, there still remains a difference of some 60 there.

Mr. HANSON: That does not follow, that one rural route would close several offices.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but there was not a single dismissal recorded as a dismissal connected with the opening of rural routes. In the province of Saskatchewan there were 57 dismissals and there was not a single rural route opened. Take Manitoba. There were 43 dismissals and there were only 2 rural routes opened. And, as I stated before, every rural route opened which resulted in the closing of an office is not taken into account in the 1,604 or 1,608 postmasters mercilessly dismissed without thought of an investigation by our friends opposite when they were in power. I have dismissed some, it is true. I do not attempt to deny it. I am prepared to take that responsibility as I should take it as the head of a department. I have dismissed some, but I have not dismissed the number that my hon. friends say for political purposes, not anything near that number. And let me say here that not a single postmaster who comes under the Civil Service Commission was dismissed by the present Postmaster General without an investigation first being held under oath in compliance with the order in council referred to the other night.

Mr. SHORT: You could not do otherwise.

Mr. VENIOT: And on the personal certificate of a member representing the county.

Mr. CLARK: Would that investigation appear in the files produced relating to the dismissal of any particular postmaster?

Mr. VENIOT: It certainly would.

Mr. CLARK: The evidence would be there?

Mr. VENIOT: The evidence I think is there.

Mr. CLARK: Well, I will tell the Postmaster General that so far as the file concerning the dismissal of the postmaster at the town of Sutton is concerned there is no such thing in the file. There is no such investigation indicated. The dismissal there is on the personal signature of the Postmaster General, so far as I can ascertain, without any investigation whatever; and there is also the statement in that file that that particular postmastership comes under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Does my hon. friend see there a report from an inspector?

Mr. CLARK: Yes, but there is nothing to indicate that an investigation was held under oath.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman reads the file he may find in the report of the inspector sufficient to warrant the Postmaster General in taking action on the investigation of one of his own officials.

Mr. CLARK: There is absolutely nothing in this file of that kind and, what is more, the report of the inspector is entirely favourable to the postmaster, in spite of which the Postmaster General dismissed this man. I will undertake to say that no evidence under oath was taken, that there was no proper investigation, and that the statement made by the Postmaster General just now is incorrect.

Mr. VENIOT: That statement is correct, and my hon. friend has no right to say it is not.

Mr. HANSON: I am not so very much concerned about the dismissals in my constituency; so far as I can recall there have been only three. The most important one was at Canterbury Station, and if I were so disposed I might move a vote of thanks to the Postmaster General for having dismissed this gentleman, because I think he will be my very best political worker in that part of the county at the next election. I venture to say that his dismissal will be worth fifty votes to me.

However, that is not my purpose in rising at this time. I regret that I was out of the chamber this afternoon when the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Bell) made a request with regard to the bringing down of certain correspondence having to do with the conditions existing in the office of the district superintendent in the city of St. John. I would like to ask the Postmaster General to supplement what he has promised to bring down by the correspondence from and to his department or any official thereof, addressed to or coming from the district superintendent or any of his assistants in reference to the alleged irregularities of Mr. Griffith, covering a period of two years.

Mr. VENIOT: I said I would bring down the file.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister bring down the entire file covering a period of two years?

Mr. VENIOT: When I say I will bring down the file does my hon. friend think I should qualify that statement?

Mr. HANSON: I have heard of such things as mental reservations.

Mr. VENIOT: So have I, and the hon. gentleman knows to what I am referring.

Mr. HANSON: I do not know. I do not want any mental reservations in this case; if we can have the complete file it will suit my purpose.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the minister if it is his usual practice to override the reports of his superintendents?

Mr. VENIOT: Not generally; I do not think it is.

Mr. GEARY: He did it in the Picton case; the direct recommendation was overruled.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like the attention of the Postmaster General for just a moment.

Mr. VENIOT: I should not be expected to answer everyone at the same time. The Picton case has been brought up and I would like to know if the hon. gentleman wants to discuss it.

M. GEARY: Yes, I would like it discussed.

Mr. VENIOT: Then my hon. friend had better go ahead.

Mr. GEARY: Does the Postmaster General intend to meet the objection I have just raised with regard to the Picton case?

Mr. VENIOT: What was the objection?

Mr. GEARY: Why did you override the very favourable report of the inspector?

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman will tell the house how that report was overridden I will take up the question.

Mr. GEARY: The district superintendent definitely recommended a man named Way for the appointment, in a very favourable report. The minister wrote a letter to his deputy in which, without assigning any reason, he said, "Reject this man Way." Way had been in the office for some twenty years and was placed at the head of the list by the minister's own official.

Mr. VENIOT: I discussed that question the other evening, as the hon. gentleman will remember; if he wishes to have the discussion gone over again I am prepared to do so.

Mr. GEARY: Very well.

Mr. VENIOT: At that time I drew attention to the fact that, technically speaking, I did not override the recommendation of the qualifying officer, the inspector of the department; I refused to accept the certificate issued by the Civil Service Commission in favour of Mr. Way. This gentleman had been in the office since 1905; he had been there seven years when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1911 or 1912. At that time they dismissed the postmaster, or there was a vacancy of some kind, and they refused to recognize the ability and the qualifications of Mr. Way after his service in that office when they appointed another gentleman to the position.

When that office became vacant in 1927 or 1928, after an investigation into what was supposed to be and what later was proved to be the political activities of the postmaster in the handling of mail matter during the election, after which inquiry the postmaster was dismissed, the vacancy was advertised. Mr. Way was an applicant; he, as assistant postmaster, was almost as much to blame as the postmaster for the irregularities which took place, since he looked after the mail in the absence of the postmaster. So, under the evidence which to my mind was sufficient to bring about the dismissal of the postmaster for mishandling the mail, I did not think Mr. Way was a fit and proper person for the position, although he may have had the necessary knowledge to carry on the work of that office.

Mr. GEARY: There are just two points in the explanation of the Postmaster General to which I intend to refer. In 1911 this man Way had been some six years in that office; he was then 22 years of age, a mere boy. He did not apply for the position but he was recognized by the Postmaster Genaral of that time, and was made assistant postmaster. During the investigation to which the minister has referred Way's name was never mentioned.

Mr. VENIOT: No one said it was.

Mr. GEARY: He was the assistant postmaster. We need not go into the evidence again, because the evidence would not justify anyone in making a dismissal.

Mr. VENIOT: The other evening the hon. gentleman went into the evidence and quoted only two or three witnesses. Why did he not quote the other witnesses?

Mr. GEARY: There was not another witness who gave evidence worth listening to.

Mr. VENIOT: I have all the evidence here.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Way's name is not mentioned in the evidence either directly or indirectly. When the minister instructed his deputy to reject the nomination of Way, if he had a reason for that action why did he not state it as he was supposed to do under the act? He did not even communicate that reason to his deputy but simply instructed him to reject Way's application.

Mr. VENIOT: Because he was not suitable.

Mr. GEARY: The minister did not say a word about his suitability; he did not mention a reason at all, but of course the deputy, knowing the law, had to put in some sort of justification. Was the fact communicated to the deputy that the Postmaster General did not think Way suitable because of the political activities of the office? It does not appear anywhere in the file that he did so, and as a matter of fact he did not. That was not the reason; the reason was that Purtelle and the party behind him at the very inception had made up this plot to get rid of the existing postmaster and later appoint Purtelle over the heads of everyone else. If the minister had a reason he would have mentioned it, but the minister did not have that reason; there is not a word in the evidence, which was carried to such a length that I do not think it could be considered evidence, to suggest that anyone under the postmaster had anything to do with the alleged irregularities in connection with the mail, and throughout the investigation Way's name was not mentioned. It is idle for the minister to say that he had that in mind; obviously, if you take the history of the case from the beginning, what the minister had in mind was simply to assist the local political ward-heeling association to put the chief ward heeler in office.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I would like to detain the committee a few moments while I read some evidence which I have in connection with the case I brought before parliament a few days ago. This matter concerned the dismissal of the postmaster at Uffington, the reason given being that of irregularity. I received an affidavit to-night which I would like to place on Hansard. It is as follows:

Province of Ontario
District of Muskoka.
To wit:

We, Henry and Ada Byham of the township of Draper, district of Muskoka, farmer and married woman, make oath and say:

That on the 5th day of September, 1928, when the post office inspector came to remove the local post office at Uffington we were personally present and in answer to a question by the late postmaster as to the reasons of removal the inspector replied that there were no complaints or irregularities reported. When further pressed the inspector added that the post office had been removed through the political processes of Mr. J. B. Johnson, the defeated Liberal candidate.

I bring this forward only because this man's reputation has been damned in this house and in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: There is also an affidavit made by the postmaster which states that on the day the inspector called he was $7 short in his accounts; at least there was that much money which was not in the till. He explains that a man had come into the post office for a money order and had promised to bring in the money for it in an hour or two. The postmaster gave him the money order and in the meantime the inspector arrived. That is all the evidence the Postmaster General or his department has been able to resurrect in order to justify the dismissal of this man. Not only has he dismissed, but, as I said a moment ago, his reputation throughout the length and breadth of this country has been damned. I have another affidavit which I would like to read to the house, as follows:

Province of Ontario
District of Muskoka.

I, Henry Buckler, of the township of Draper, in the district of Muskoka, taxidermist, make oath and say:

1st. That on the 9th day of October, 1928, I was in the Orange hall at Uffington, and talking to Mr. Ben Johnson, the defeated Liberal candidate at the last dominion election, about the post office being taken from me and given to Sam Hawn, when Mr. Johnson said, "never mind, Harry, I will fix you up better than you ever were."

2nd. And Mr. Johnson seeing Sam Hawn close by he called him over and said to him "Sam didn't you say you would give Harry Buckler four years' salary?" Sam thought a little while then he said, "I do not think I said four years, I think I said four months' salary, Mr. Johnson."

Is any more evidence needed to show that this whole thing was nothing more or less than a political dismissal without one tittle of evidence to justify it? It is bad enough to dismiss the man, but it is infinitely worse to damn the man's reputation throughout the length and breadth of Canada on the little evidence the department has been able to produce. I bring this matter to the attention of the committee only in the hope that I can clear this man's character in his old age and not have his name go down under the disgrace of having been dismissed because of irregularities in his office.

Mr. ESLING: During last session, in the month of February, I asked the Postmaster General for a return of all correspondence and documents in connection with the dismissal of a postmaster in my district. That return was tabled by order of the house, but I now ask the Postmaster General if he will not lay on the table the missing correspondence in order to make the file complete. We all know the outside operations of these matters, but it is the inside political intrigue which cause us to ask for returns of correspondence.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the hon. member tell me the name of the particular office?

Mr. ESLING: It is Renata post office. I ask for this information because if a man is to be dismissed without a charge, without an investigation, without an inspector's report, or the opportunity for a hearing, then I submit that there is very little security for the average rural postmaster. If there is a covetous partizan—it does not make any difference to what party he may belong—waiting there to grab his job, and if the minister is permitted to place upon the table of this house a file after stripping it of every evidence of political influence—or perhaps the better term would be political sculduggery, because that is what it is—then I submit that there is not very much protection for the average civil servant.

I would like to relate a few facts in connection with this case, which is different in many respects from the other cases which have been brought to the attention of the house. Renata is a little community on the Arrow lakes in British Columbia. The chief industry is fruit-growing and the only access to the outside world is by water. In January of 1927 the postmaster at that place indicated his intention of retiring, as he was going to leave the district. At that time there were 62 adults receiving mail at this office, and 55 of them signed a petition for the appointment of one Peter Friesen to the position of postmaster. I have the letter from the Deputy Postmaster General acknowledging receipt of that petition and, as is customary, stating that the matter would receive consideration. On February 21, 1927, I went to see the Postmaster General personally. I then wrote him a letter referring to the conversation of that day, reading in part:

> You have a petition bearing 55 names of Liberals and Conservatives alike, who ask that Mr. Peter Friesen succeed Mr. Weive retired. In view of the fact that there are only 50 electors at Renata, you can see that citizens, regardless of party affiliation, have recommended Mr. Friesen, and I trust you may see your way clear to meet their wishes.

The Postmaster General replied that the matter was receiving consideration. On February 25, the district superintendent at Vancouver sent Mr. Friesen a wire stating:

> I beg to inform you that I am in receipt of a telegram from the department to-day, which, for your information is quoted hereunder:—
>
> "Re Renata: P. H. Friesen appointed to postmastership. Proceed with transfer."
> (Signed) District Superintendent.

That is a wire from the department at Ottawa to the superintendent at Vancouver, who in turn repeats it to Mr. Friesen. On the 8th of March an official letter, confirming this appointment, was received by Mr. Friesen and he assumed the office on the first of March, 1927. That establishes the fact that Mr. P. H. Friesen was appointed postmaster for this office by the Postmaster General himself after due consideration. But there happened to be in that community a gentleman who for three elections had been the Liberal returning officer and also the Liberal roadmaster, which gave him more or less leverage in the way of votes or influence. He was also the Liberal justice of the peace. I have a letter dated December 13, 1926, stating that the local Liberal whip, as one might call him, made the boast that at any time he chose he could take that post office away from the then incumbent, and that furthermore, he proposed to be the postmaster of that place within a period of six months. We have Mr. Friesen taking over the office on the first of March, 1927, and on the 2nd of May, only two months later, the Postmaster General sends a wire to Mr. Friesen relieving him of his appointment, and appointing the local Liberal whip. Without any charge, without any report from an inspector, without any opportunity on the part of Mr. Friesen to be heard, the Postmaster General tells this new postmaster to turn over his office to his Liberal successor. That notice went forward in the shape of a letter from the Postmaster General and it should be remembered that this was just two months after he had appointed Mr. Friesen. I do not know where he got the inspiration, and there is nothing on the file to suggest why he should make any change. There is nothing on the file by way of an inspector's report, but he writes to the Deputy Postmaster General saying:

[Mr. Esling.]

> I have since discovered that this post office under Friesen is not situated in such a way as to give the most satisfaction to the public. I therefore authorize you to have W. J. Doherty appointed, and that notice be given to Friesen that he is retired from the service.

Mr. Doherty was the local Liberal whip. The Postmaster General says that some time ago he had a recommendation for the appointment of Mr. Doherty. Then by way of a reason for retiring Mr. Friesen he suggests that he has discovered that the new post office is not in a suitable location, notwithstanding the fact that it was near the wharf where it had always been and that Doherty's location was about half a mile out of town. This "some time ago," to which the minister refers, must necessarily have been a date between Friesen's appointment on March 1 and the appointment of Mr. Doherty on May 2, so that the question is: Who recommended the change? That is a matter which is not on file. The Postmaster General could not be expected to know all applicants for small offices throughout the Dominion, so that somebody must have brought the matter to his attention, and that is what we should like to know about. What was the political influence that suggested to the Postmaster General that Mr. Friesen should be retired, and what reminded him that Mr. Doherty had been recommended some time ago? The question is: Who recommended him and why should that recommendation, in all fairness, not be included in the file? Another question one would naturally ask, is: How did the Postmaster General discover that this post office was not in a suitable location? He was never in Renata. I have never had the honour of meeting the Postmaster General in my constituency in British Columbia, and yet there is no correspondence.

Mr. VENIOT: I have been in British Columbia. I have been in Victoria.

Mr. ESLING: Its a long trip between Victoria and Renata.

Mr. VENIOT: I have not been in Renata.

Mr. ESLING: When the Postmaster General comes to British Columbia, I shall be glad to take him to Renata just to show him the location which he does not consider suitable. By actual measurement Mr. Friesens' office, in the vicinity of which there had been a post office for many years, was only ten chains from the wharf, whereas the new location was exactly forty-five chains, or something over half a mile. I ask: Who recommended the change? I think what we are mostly interested in is that when a return is brought down we should have it all. Why should the minister be permitted to withhold that portion which has any political bearing on the matter? I should like to ask who complained.

In regard to this matter there was a very peculiar letter which went from perhaps the oldest and most substantial resident of that district, a responsible fruit shipper, to the district superintendent. The district superintendent in turn sent it on to the Postmaster General, and it is acknowledged. The revenue from Renata is less than $200, but at the time the change was made it was more than $200. This citizen writes to the district superintendent, and it appears that there was fear that this Liberal whip, Mr. Doherty, would be appointed to the office. He says:

> Fearing that William Doherty might be appointed Renata postmaster I wrote on January 12—

That would be January 12, 1927.

> —to the Postmaster General asking that a reliable party be sent in here to make inquiry before any appointment was made.

We have had the Postmaster General on several occasions during this discussion state—and he was correct—that any post office with a revenue of less than $400 did not come within the scope of the Civil Service Commission. This correspondent goes on to say:

> I received answer bearing date of January 25 from which I quote.

Then he quotes the Postmaster General as saying:

> This matter is still in abeyance and is in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, who have absolute control of such appointments.

That statement may have been an oversight. I do not expect the Postmaster General to know offhand just what the revenue of each post office is, but he could very easily find that out. The letter goes on:

> Soon after Peter Friesen was appointed, and we felt very thankful that the matter was settled and in a very satisfactory way for the great majority of Renata citizens. Mr. Friesen, with the help of Mr. Wiebe, retiring postmaster, got his office in good shape and in a very convenient place between the wharf and the store. But this week like a "bolt from the blue" notice came that in two days the inspector would be here with orders from Ottawa to transfer the office to William Doherty, whose place is over half a mile from the wharf (45 chains by my blue print).
> There surely has been misrepresentation somewhere. Two petitions have gone in to headquarters signed by the great majority of the residents of Renata. William Doherty is roadmaster and by that means he controls a few voters who would not sign the petition. William Doherty is also Justice of the Peace, appointed on the recommendation of one man and in spite of our protest. Now he is made our postmaster and that against almost universal protest—it would be universal if he had no government money to disburse.

When Mr. Friesen was removed, the district superintendent at Vancouver sent word to the office at Renata that an inspector would arrive on the 11th of March to make the transfer. This correspondent writes with respect to that:

> We had hoped the inspector would be sent in to make a report.

The inspector arrived on the 11th of March. The letter continues:

> Now that he has been here he told us that he can make no report to Ottawa as to the situation here unless he is asked for it. Are we condemned without a hearing to deal daily with a man universally disliked?

So we have here, Mr. Chairman, the case of a postmaster being dismissed without any report being made to Ottawa. We have an inspector being sent to that post office to make the transfer, and he is not permitted to make a report to the department unless he is asked for it. But surely some kind of report must have been made by the inspector, and I suggest that that report be included in the correspondence to be brought down because I think it must have a material bearing on this case.

Here is another phase of the matter. The Postmaster General gave as a reason for making this transfer that he discovered that the location of the post office was not suitable. That hardly agrees with the circumstances and it hardly agrees with the protest which the Postmaster General must have on his file. because I have here a letter dated May 18, 1928, which was sent to the Postmaster General. It is important, but it is not contained on the file. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General assigns as a reason for making this change the unsuitable location of the post office, I submit that this letter has a pronounced bearing on that point.

In the correspondence that has passed between the Postmaster General and the Deputy Postmaster General respecting the Renata post office, the following passage occurs:

> I have since discovered that this post office under Friesen is not situated in such a way as to give the most satisfaction to the public.

This statement is absolutely contrary to the facts of the case, as Mr. Friesen's location close to the wharf is the logical centre of business in that locality, whereas the present location is more than half a mile distant from the wharf and could hardly be more inconvenient, especially during the shipping season. That letter. Mr. Chairman, must be on the minister's file, but it is not on the file brought down, and that indicates some inclination at least to relieve the file of any evidence that the reasons given by the Postmaster General for the change are contradicted by the residents of Renata.

Here is a petition signed by forty-three citizens, and remember that there are only sixty-two people who get their mail at that post office. They say in this petition that the new office is half a mile distant; that Friesen's office was by all odds the most suitable and the most acceptable to shippers and those who had business to do with the boats, and yet the Postmaster General does not include this petition, in the file brought down.

There is nothing on the file to indicate how the Postmaster General discovered that the location was not suitable. There is nothing on the file to indicate who recommended Mr. Doherty for the postmastership at Renata and surely there must have been some correspondence between the date of Friesen's appointment and the date of his dismissal. There is nothing on the file in connection with the inspector's visit on the 11th of May, and he must have made a report to Ottawa. There is nothing on the file regarding the petition of forty-three residents of the locality, protesting against the removal of the postmaster and the removal of the post office. All I ask, Mr. Chairman, is that the Postmaster General please lay on the table to-morrow the missing correspondence in connection with this dismissal and the new appointment, so that those of us in that part of the country may have a better knowledge of just who it is that is conducting this underground political sculduggery, and who is the go-between for the Liberal postmaster at Renata and the Postmaster General. I think we are entitled to have this information, because the people there were perfectly satisfied with their postmaster, and there has been nothing presented to this committee to indicate why the change was made except the statement that the Postmaster General says that Mr. Doherty was recommended some time ago. If he was, why did not the Postmaster General give consideration to appointing Mr. Doherty at the time Friesen was appointed? What was the motive behind the suggestion that Friesen was not the proper man and that the location was a poor one when a great majority of the residents of that district say that the new location is the poorer one by half a mile? I have a letter saying that some people near the old office and near the wharf pay a man to go and get their mail from the post office because they do not want to walk that distance to get it.

I am willing to overlook a great deal in this connection, Mr. Chairman, but, remember. this is a matter of vital interest to that little community, just as much so as the dismissal of a postmaster at some more important point is to another community. All I ask is that the file be completed. I happen to know something of the correspondence that has gone to the Postmaster General, and I ask him to lay it on the table to-morrow Then if it is not the correspondence to which I refer, I shall have to repeat my request.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be permitted to divert the attention of the committee a little from this tremendous accumulation of evidence of the partisan action of the present Postmaster General in regard to the administration of his office, and to appeal rather to his sympathies, to the softer side of his nature, while I say a word on behalf of those members of his staff who are referred to under the title of postal workers.

A day or two ago the Postmaster General was good enough to give me some information in regard to the number of postal workers who are paid by the Port Office department. The number is rather large. The total, according to the memorandum given to me, is 10,005, subdivided as follows:

Letter carriers	2,710
Postal clerks	3,009
Railway mail clerks	1,364
Postal helpers, postal porters, postal chauffeurs	2,922

Making a grand total of 10,005, comprising that class of the Post Office department known under the general heading of postal workers.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in regard to a very large portion of those ten thousand employees there is but one opinion in this house, and the Postmaster General himself must share it, and that is that they are a very much underpaid part of the service. I am fully aware that a week ago to-day when I made an appeal in this house on behalf of the rural mail carriers I was met by a very definite refusal on the part of the Postmaster General. I well remember, too, that in the appeal which I then made I received no support whatever from the government side of the house; not a single Liberal stood up and offered even a word of sympathy with regard to the remuneration which is now paid to our rural mail carriers. Three individuals did stand up and give as a reason for voting against my proposal that under the Civil Service Act rural mail carriers would have to be between eighteen and thirty-five years of age, and that if my motion carried it would disturb all the old carriers. Some hon. members have a very scrupulous regard for the Civil Service Act when it suits their particular purpose; but it is an act of this parliament, it can be changed in a moment at the will of this parliament, and all that would be necessary in the case I have just quoted would be a section providing that the age limit shall not apply to rural mail carriers; this would clear up the difficulty. But I regret to say I was not very fortunate in my appeal on behalf of the rural mail carriers: every Liberal and every Liberal-Progressive voted down the proposal. I am going to make an effort to-night to convince the minister that he should do something for the postal workers. This matter has been aired every session for the last eight or nine years. This session it was brought up by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) supported by another of the independent group from Winnipeg, and elaborated and supported by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens); but never a word during the whole week's discussion from the Liberal benches or the Liberal-Progressive benches to support the proposal that the postal workers should receive a little more money for their services

I suppose the postal workers know, and the people of Canada know, that the only way in which larger remuneration can be granted to them is by action of the government. No individual member in this house can make a proposal to increase the wages or salaries of these postal workers. It rests entirely with the government to make such a proposal, and until the government decides to act nothing can be done. Session after session we have urged upon the government this question of the under-payment of the postal workers. Session after session the government has declined to act, and I cannot recall a single supporter of the government ever saying a word to help these unfortunate postal workers obtain adequate pay to maintain themselves and their families.

Now, the answer which the minister made last week when the appeal was made by the independent members for Winnipeg for an increase in pay was the one which he always makes when it suits his purpose—that he has no power under the law as it now stands to do so, because he says that is a matter which under the Civil Service Act must be arranged by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners. That is very true as the matter stands to-day, Mr. Chairman. The act does provide that those salaries shall be fixed, varied, increased or otherwise dealt with by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners. But the Civil Service Act is not like the law of the Medes and Persians. The Board of Civil Service Commissioners is not above this parliament. The will of parliament must prevail in any case, and if the Postmaster General and the government express any willingness on the subject it will prevail in this parliament. Let the Postmaster General consult with the Minister of Finance on the situation which exists, and which he knows exists, in regard to this matter. Let him lay before the Minister of Finance the real state of affairs in regard to these postal workers. Then what is the answer? It cannot be said that the Board of Civil Service Commissioners can negative the will of this parliament—not for a single moment. I do not know anyone more adept in evading and avoiding and circumventing the Civil Service Act than the Postmaster General. He has done it time and time again. The discussion during the past week has demonstrated that fact. When he wants to evade, to avoid, to override or to circumvent the act he seems well able to do it. But the act is not a sacred thing. As I said, it is not like the law of the Medes and Persions. Every year certain positions are taken out of the Civil Service Act. Every year there is a return made before the parliament of Canada within the first ten days of the session showing what positions have been taken out of the operation of that act. Every year, according to the will of this house, we make appointments disregarding the Civil Service Commission altogether Not a session passes when we do not in the estimates pass item after item making new appointments, fixing new salaries, without consulting the Civil Service Commission. We do it by including them in the estimates. Take the estimates for last year of the Department of Labour, and take the estimates for last year of the Department of National Revenue; appointment after appointment will be made and has been made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. That is the will of the House of Commons.

If my hon. friend the Postmaster General has any real desire to deal fairly with these postal workers, let him not say that the Civil Service Act prevents his doing so, because such is not the case. If he desires to do it, if he desires to deal fairly with these men, all he has to do is to arrange with the Finance minister to bring in a supplementary estimate and we can pass it, according to law, in five minutes. There is nothing in the act to stop that.

Mr. VENIOT: You know that is not correct.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know it is correct, and I know we are doing it this year and have done it in other years.

Mr. VENIOT: You are only playing to the gallery.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just let me point out what I mean. We desired last year to appoint a special secretary to the Prime Minister of Canada. That should have been done by the Civil Service Commission; the salary should have been arranged by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Not under the act, sir.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This was in the External Affairs department. So we put in the estimates last year an item, which reads "Secretary to the Prime Minister, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act". We have done it time and time again, and if we so desire we can bring in a supplementary estimate, or the Minister of Finance can, voting a sum of money to pay these postal workers anything that we decide they are entitled to. Do not let the minister repeat in this house that he is powerless. Surely parliament is not powerless. Surely we have not appointed a commission that can overawe or override us. Are we not supreme? Then if we are, there is the way out of the difficulty. But is the minister, is the government willing to do it? That is the question. They have shown no willingness, no desire, to take any action in the matter.

Why criticism of this government in regard particularly to the salaries of the civil service of Canada is this: When it comes to the higher grade salaries they are not niggardly, they are fairly generous; when it comes to a question of increasing the salaries of gentlemen of technical or professional knowledge, they take other means of getting round the Civil Service Act. They appoint a royal commission of three or four very distinguished Canadians to inquire into the situation and to report. For those higher officials they are reasonably awake to the situation; they seem quite capable of providing the necessary salaries for technical experts, professional men, or deputy ministers. They do not turn the deaf ear to that class. But when it comes to the men in the lower grades, to the postal workers, "Oh," the minister says, "what can I do? Look at that Civil Service Commission; they will not recommend it." I believe that the lower grades of the civil service in Canada have been very badly treated by this government. The government has pursued a most dilatory course in considering their claims. Up to the present time they have successfully avoided action. They have sent those unfortunate people from pillar to post. The application goes to the government for an increase. "Oh, we cannot do it," they say; "go to the Civil Service Commission." Then some kind of commission is appointed to report on the matter; it is considered, a report is made to parliament, the government pigeonholes the report, and nothing is done. And so from the year 1923 down to this date there has been request after request, consideration promised, consideration delayed. Reports have been made but action has never been taken. I think the civil service of Canada has shown wonderful patience in the matter, but there comes a time when patience becomes absolutely worn out. That time has pretty nearly arrived, I think.

What does the Postmaster General think of a situation like this? Take the case of the letter carriers. We ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) what the actual cost of living in Canada is, and he says that for the bare necessaries of life for a family of five the cost in the month of January—I am giving January of this year—was $21.55 a week. Now, that is only for food, fuel, and rent. The climate of this country demands that we have warm clothing, but for food, fuel and rent, for a family of five, according to the Minister of Labour—and I fancy his report is pretty accurate—the cost of living is $21.55 per week, or an annual payment of $1,225, without clothing. And do you know that there are any number of postal workers in this country who are receiving $80 a month? A number are receiving $90 a month. Ninety dollars a month would bring a man $1,080 a year, but they deduct, I believe, in the case of letter carriers, 5 per cent for superannuation fund, leaving a net salary of $1,020 per annum; yet the Minister of Labour assures the House of Commons and the people of Canada that for the bare necessaries of life in Canada in January last the cost of living was at the rate of $1,225 per annum. Does not that demonstrate to a conclusion that the department is not paying these men sufficient to enable them to enjoy a decent living? A single man may be able to exist, but we are rather inclined in this country to encourage the married state and the production of large families. We need large families in Canada, yet we have on the one hand the statement of a responsible department that it takes $1,225 per annum to keep a family of five in food, fuel and rent, apart from clothing, and, on the other hand, sitting in the same government a minister who will not pay the men even that amount. Surely one has only to cite these facts to secure the sympathy of the minister, to get his willingness, to act, to have him say, "Yes, I will help out; I will do something for those unfortunate servants in my department who are underpaid." I do not say that the whole 10,005 are underpaid, but I do know that a great many in this class are underpaid according to the standards which the minister's own government has applied to the public generally. Surely, Mr. Chairman, we can appeal to the Postmaster General on a situation of that kind without any accusation of partisanship and succeed in getting not only his sympathy but his action in this matter. My suggestion is that he talk over this matter with his colleagues at once. Do not let this session pass without action; do not put it off until another session; do not wait until the eve of a general election to make the announcement. The Postmaster General will get far more credit for action this session than he will if he delays until next year; it will be more genuine if it comes during this session than if he waits until the eve of a general election. Why can we not get some support for this application from Liberal members opposite? Why can not we get some backing from the Liberal Progressives in this house Why have they remained silent during five days of this discussion?

Mr. POWER: They have not had a chance to speak.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will have a chance in a few moments. I believe that if any considerable number will back my proposal we will succeed this session in righting this wrong, because it is a wrong.

This government cannot say that they cannot afford it; after the budget speech we know they can afford it. The 2,700 letter carriers in Canada could each be paid $200 a year more for the amount of money spent last year on motor cars, according to the Auditor General's report; you could pay them $200 a year each for the $500,000 you wasted for a house in Washington; you could pay them another large amount for the tens of thousands of dollars you have been wasting in North Bruce in order to elect a minister of the crown at the next general election. A minister of finance who comes to parliament and closes his financial year on April 1 with a surplus of $60,000,000 in his treasury can pay every one of these 10,000 postal workers an additional $250 this year; that will take $2,500,000 of his surplus and still leave him $57,500,000 to play around with. Do not say the country cannot afford it this year. This is the year to make the application, the year in which we have the surplus that has been referred to, while men are receiving from this government a rate of pay which will not enable them to maintain their families in decency.

Surely this is a situation which must be remedied. Year after year the request is made; year after year I fancy ministers are deluged with requests, of which I suppose every member of the house receives copies. But whether the government are too careless about it, whether they are too much occupied with other matters, whether the time of the Postmaster General is too much occupied in dismissing postmasters and hunting up new men for these offices, I know not. I feel like advising the postal workers to take what satisfaction they may out of that parable of our Lord in respect to the unjust judge.

I do not suppose in this committee anyone but myself and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will recognize the reference, but if the postal workers will look up the eighteenth chaper of St. Luke they will find that in a certain city there was a judge who feared not God nor regarded man. There was also a widow in that city who came unto him asking him to avenge her of her enemy and he would not for a while, but afterwards said, "Though I fear not God, nor regard man, yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me." Now I think we had better tell the underpaid officials in the Post Office department to keep up their requests until they succeed in wearying the Postmaster General and worrying this government, and on the principle expounded in the parable of the unjust judge perhaps some day they may succeed. However, I can assure them that in any event they have not very long to wait; soon there will be in power in this country a government which will listen to their appeals and which will be prepared to satisfy promptly every just and reasonable demand.

I hope I have not said anything harsh to the Postmaster General; I realize that he received a very doubtful compliment this afternoon when he obtained a majority of only twenty-seven on the vote on the amendement and his feelings at the moment may be a little ruffled. I am trying to appeal to his sense of justice and of fair play. Here is the opportunity; here is the grievance; here is the government with a surplus of $60,000,000, a government which at times can be wildly extravagant. Surely we can get a little additional salary for the letter carriers, the postal workers, the postal porters and all the others included in those 10,005 men now working day in and day out for the Post Office department, a great many of whom are not being paid enough money to keep body and soul together.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to find that my hon. friend has been driven to such an extremity that he quotes sacred history in order to plead the case of the postal workers, or perhaps I should say he was appealing to the galleries in order to cover up the inconsistencies of which he and his party were guilty when the postal workers appealed to them when they were in power in 1919 and again in 1921. At that time they asked for bread and were given a stone.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They were given more than they are getting now. They were given a bonus then, which they are not getting now.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. VENIOT: When the postal workers of the country appealed to the government of that day they were referred to the Griffenhagen commission, and through that commission they were placed under the Civil Service Commission as it is now constituted. From that day to this they have been under that commission; that was the response given by the Tory party to the appeals made by the postal workers of that day.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We gave them the bonus.

Mr. VENIOT: There has been no necessity for the postal workers of Canada to be afraid to appeal to the Liberal government on any occasion, at least since I have had the honour of being Postmaster General. The postal workers will testify that on all occasions, at all times and in every possible way they have received my sympathetic support and that on different occasions I have strongly recommended to the Civil Service Commission that they consider the situation of the poorly paid postal workers of Canada. I guaranteed to the Civil Service Commission that the government was prepared to place in the estimates an amount sufficient to cover the higher classification and the increased wages they might recommend for the postal workers, the postal clerks, the postal helpers and the railway mail clerks of Canada. I have failed in my efforts as far as the postal helpers, postal workers and postal clerks are concerned. I have partly succeeded with regard to the railway mail clerks, and in the estimates this year there is an amount to cover increases in salary to the railway mail clerks as recommended by the Civil Service Commission.

My hon. friend says there is an easy way of accomplishing this end; according to him all we have to do is place in the supplementary estimates an amount of money sufficient to meet the increases to which we consider these postal workers entitled. Why, Mr. Chairman, last night I was roundly denounced by the hon. gentleman's leader because I was not living up to the spirit and the letter of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I grant that, but—

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt my hon. friend when he was speaking. To-night I am asked by the first lieutenant of the leader of the opposition to ignore completely the Civil Service Act and place this amount in the supplementary estimates, while as an old parliamentarian my hon. friend knows that cannot be done without an amendment to the Civil Service Act as it stands to-day.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is parliament supreme?

Mr. VENIOT: If a supplementary estimate is brought down and voted by parliament contrary to the statute, the Auditor General would refuse to recognize it. Everyone knows that he is supreme in these matters, and no one knows it better than the hon. gentleman who is now leading the opposition in the absence of his leader. They talk about the poor postal helpers, the small pay they are receiving, and such things, but talking to the galleries in this house is quite cheap.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is looking for the spotlight now?

Mr. VENIOT: I would like to give the house once more the evidence of what this government has attempted to do to encourage the Civil Service Commission in recognizing the just claims of those who are classified as postal workers, postal helpers and postal clerks. I would like to read the last communication I sent to the Civil Service Commission after they had refused point blank to consider the recommendation made by myself that an increase be made in the salaries of these men. This matter had been under consideration for nearly one year and I had written to them pointing out that the estimates had to be arranged for the coming year and that it was the intention to place sufficient in the general estimates to meet an increase in salary to the postal helpers, postal workers and postal clerks, provided the commission would do its duty and recommend such an increase. They replied on March 9, refusing to comply with my request, and on March 11 I wrote as follows:

> I note you say that the matter has been placed before the board of commissioners and that after full consideration of the subject matter contained in my letter the commissioners have decided to confirm their decision of May 2, 1928, which was that further increase in the compensation of these classes is not justified.

That is the decision of the very body which the hon. members contended last night I should follow in every respect. That is their answer, and they are the only ones qualified to give an answer. The letter continued:

> I wish to thank you for the information but at the same time I regret that your commission has not seen fit to accept the recommendation of the department in favour of the postal clerks, letter carriers and mail porters, because I am convinced that they are deserving of better pay than they are now receiving.

That is the policy laid down by myself with the full authority of the government. When that was placed before the Civil Service Commission they refused absolutely to take advantage of the power given them under the statute to grant an increase, and they say the increase is not justified. The hon. gentleman may appeal to every kind of feeling and prejudice, but the fact remains that that commission, placed there by them when the postal workers were appealing for a living wage, and when they were in a position to grant it without any reference to the commission, refused to grant such an increase. Hon. members may pound their desks—we know exactly what that means—but the fact still remains that when the hon. members opposite had the power to increase the salaries of these men they ignored that opportunity and placed the power in the hands of the very commission which is saying today that they are not justified in accepting a recommendation that these poorly paid employees of the government should receive an increase in salary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the Postmaster General misconceives the actual situation. He says that we on this side of the house expect him to live up to the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act—we certainly do, and in every particular. We expect the government to do the same thing. But how can it be said that parliament is bound by its own creature? Is this Civil Service Cimmission an autocracy? Are they above the will of the people as expressed in parliament? It is nonsense to say that they are.

Mr. VENIOT: Change the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The power that created it can change or destroy it. I do not advocate its destruction, but I say that the minister is not blocked, nor is this government blocked if it desires to bring in an estimate containing the words "notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act." That action would be perfectly valid; it is constitutional it is the will of parliament which is supreme. The minister is not supreme; he is bound by not only the letter but the spirit of the act. So is this government bound by the act, and we expect them to live up to it. I am pointing out to them a way out of the difficulty. The minister says that he realizes that these men are underpaid. He says, "I have made a plea to the commission and the commission will not grant it; I know their case is a just one, but the commission will not consider it." The position has only to be stated to reveal its absurdity. My complaint is that the Postmaster General has not shown any willingness to grant these men a living wage. A government which can squander millions of dollars and still have $60,000,000 of a surplus in the treasury, surely can find a way to pay a living wage to men who, as everybody in Canada knows, are not receiving such a wage.

Mr. VENIOT: To prove to the house that the hon. gentleman is not interpreting the opinion of the postal workers, in a part of Canada at least, I would like to read to the house a telegram which I received this morning. This telegram is dated at Toronto, which is not exactly a Liberal stronghold, and is addressed to the Postmaster General at Ottawa. It reads:

> We, the postal workers of the department in Toronto, desire to go on record as strongly opposing the tactics being used to discredit you and your efforts in promoting the improvement you have and are inaugurating in the service.

That is sent on behalf of some three or four thousand postal workers in the city of Toronto. The telegram is signed by E. J. Purvis.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. VENIOT: He is one of the head executives.

Mr. HEAPS: I have received letters from the city of Toronto within the past few days which ask for the very things which have been recommended by the hon. member for South Wellington. I have one letter signed by A. McMordie, the national president of the organization.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have received letters also.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to deal for a moment with the remarks of the Postmaster General. It seems to me an extraordinary position that we find ourselves in at the present time. We have the Liberal party, through the Postmaster General, saying that they are in favour of giving to the postal employees an increase in their pay; we have the Conservative party also committeed to the same principle, and I am sure I can speak for all those who sit in this corner of the house that we are also in favour of giving to the postal workers an increase in their present remuneration. Therefore the house is practically unanimous on a certain course of action, and there are three individuals who stand in the way of that action being consummated. If the government were anxious to put into operation the increase in the salaries of the postal workers, I believe, they could very easily find ways and means of doing so.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will do it if you give us a chance.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. When the Postmaster General spoke a few moments ago he said, I think, that he had advised his colleagues in the cabinet that he was prepared that they should grant an increase to the postal employees. I hope I am not doing an injustice to him, because I could not hear very well what he had to say. I jotted it down as he spoke, and I understood him to say that he could not convince his colleagues in the cabinet.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not. I would not say that.

Mr. HEAPS: I said: I hope I am not doing him an injustice. I understood him to say that he could not convince his colleagues to insert in the estimates an item for an increase in salary to the postal employees.

Mr. VENIOT: No. Take it back .

Mr. HEAPS: If he did not say that, I absolutely withdraw that statement. I could not hear him very well. Did he convince his colleagues to that effect?

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member will allow me, I said that in communicating with the commission and asking them to grant the increases we recommended, I wanted it done because it was the intention to place the item in the estimates for this year. I was doing it with the consent of the government, and therefore I was laying down the government policy.

Mr. HEAPS: What is there at the present juncture to prevent the placing in the estimates of an amount that will take care of the increases to the postal workers? I understand the question was raised that the Auditor General might object to such an item being placed in the estimates. I think the government can do in that respect exactly as they have done in many others. If there is any doubt on the question, they can say something like this: "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act," this item goes into the estimates. Then we overcome the difficulty so far as the Civil Service Act is concerned. For instance, the Washington item for $100,000 in the estimates reads:

> Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments.

If this appears so many times in the estimates for 1930, there is no reason why the same thing should not apply in regard to the postal workers.

Let me go a little further. The Postmaster General referred to the question of observing the letter of the act, stating that by not granting to the postal employees the increase proposed, he was not overruling the Civil Service Commission. He knows as well as I do, and as well as any other hon. member does, that within the past few days the government have overridden a decision of the Civil Service Commission in regard to salaries. I am referring to the question of the salaries of the technical employees. The Civil Service Commission made a recommendation to the government. It makes no difference whether they recommended an increase or anything else; the fact is they made a recommendation to the government, but the government refused to accept it. The government have also refused to accept the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission in connection with the salaries of the postal employees. Why should there be a difference between the higher paid men and the lower paid men of the service to the disadvantage of the latter? If the government were to show any consideration in this particular question, it should be to the lower paid men in its service. They have appointed a commission. This commission was constituted by order in council, so that the whole government were responsible for its appointment. The other day I asked the Postmaster General to do exactly with the lower paid postal employees as the government did with the technical employees who may be receiving anything up to $7,000 or $8,000 a year. The postal employees have appealed to the minister; they have appealed to the Civil Service Commission; they have appealed to parliament, and they have been turned down in every case. What are they to do? If they went on strike, we would hear a howl from one end of the country to the other. What does the Postmaster General expect these low paid postal workers to do at the present juncture in order to obtain redress? If he can answer that question, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. HEAPS: I want that question answered, and yet the minister sits in his place and says that he is unable to answer it. I know it is a difficult question; but will he answer this one: How does he expect a government employee and his family to live on $85 a month? I know he cannot answer that question. We as members of the house have some responsibility in this matter because they are employees of the government, and as was pointed out by the hon. member for South Toronto, we ought at least to be model employers in regard to those who work for the government. I do not think there is in the house anyone who will say that $85 or $100 a month is anything like an adequate living wage.

Let me come to other cases where the government are able to grant increases. In regard to the deputy ministers they grant them increases amounting to $1,000 and $2,000 per annum and the question of the Civil Service Commission does not enter into the matter at all; but when the question is one of the lower paid employees, there always seems to be an obstacle in the way of giving them that to which I believe they are absolutely entitled.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—PROCEDURE

RESUMING ON THURSDAY OR FRIDAY DEBATE ON AMENDMENT—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house, may I be allowed to give the ruling I promised yesterday?

On Wednesday, April 17, Mr. Robb moved that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply.

Mr. Stewart (Leeds) moved in amendment that all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this house, the Postmaster General has acted in a most arbitrary manner and in utter disregard of the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act in connection with the recent appointment of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe.

Debate thereon was interrupted on Wednesday at six o'clock by the adjournment of the house under standing order 6; and on Thursday, the 18th, when the order was called for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, I had to leave the chair without question put, under standing order 28. This rule which does away with a motion for the house to go in supply on Thursday and Friday was passed in 1913. The revision of 1927 did not deal with this matter.

The leader of the house having agreed that debate continue on Mr. Stewart's amendment, there was no necessity to give a ruling, but the house requested that I render a decision in order to settle the practice which should be followed in the future under the same circumstances.

I have listened with great interest to the able argument set forth by several prominent members and I have carefully compared our standing orders with those of Great Britain. Standing orders 6, 7 and 28 must be construed together in accordance with the broad statement laid down by Lord Mansfield, namely:

> Where there are different statutes in pari materia, though made at different times, or even expired and not referring to each other, they shall be taken and construed together, as one system and as explanatory of each other.

I have come to the conclusion that if debate on the amendment to the motion for leaving the chair is interrupted by the eleven o'clock adjournment, as was the case last year, the procedure is not annihilated but suspended by the operation of standing order 28, because standing order 7 provides that:

> All business not disposed of at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

It is well established under our practice that the expression "next sitting," "next sitting day" and "next sitting of the house" when used to state the time until which a question is ordered to stand over do not mean the following calendar day, but rather the next day on which it will be convenient to resume the proceedings on that question. It seems, therefore, that if debate is interrupted at eleven o'clock under standing order 7, the question is not superseded or lapsed, but it can be resumed without a motion to that effect on the first occasion that motion is made for the Speaker to leave the chair for supply, which may be on any of the three first sitting days of the following week. Sir Erskine May's comments on this point do not entirely apply to our House of Commons because the eleven o'clock rule at Westminster is not the same as ours. I am of the opinion that no motion is necessary for the resumption of this debate when it is interrupted at eleven o'clock.

But the situation is different if the interruption is caused by adjournment of the debate at any time or by the adjournment of the house at six o'clock on Wednesday. Standing order 27 provides that the question then under consideration shall stand in a certain precedence on the order paper, but no order is therein given to proceed with it. In that case, I am of the opinion that May's comments, as found at page 527 of the 13th edition, will apply. The procedure on the amendment lapses. But can it be revived?

The answer must be given from the broadest point of view possible. It must not be forgotten that when the house passed standing order 7 compelling adjournment at eleven o'clock, it very materially curtailed the length of debate in such cases as the one under consideration.

Formerly an amendment involving want of confidence could be discussed from Monday until Wednesday at six o'clock in the afternoon without interruption and the question could be exhausted in that time, but now with only six hours' sittings on Monday and Tuesday and three hours on Wednesday, it seems that the minority or, as it is called, the opposition, is at a great disadvantage, as Thursday may be reached before all the members who wish to speak have had an opportunity to do so.

If the question lapses, an expression of opinion cannot be given by the house on what may be a most important grievance. The government's policy can neither be vindicated nor challenged. I do not think such a situation was ever contemplated by the authors of standing order 28 or by the committee which recommended standing order 7 in 1927. It is a well-known principle in parliamentary law that the House of Commons can rescind its own decisions, suspend its own orders or revive any superseded motion.

No notice is necessary in Great Britain for a motion to revive an order of the day which has been dropped or set aside by abrupt adjournments or any other procedure. But our standing order 45 leaves no room for doubt. Every resolution of the house, and that means every decision, must be preceded by a notice.

I think I am on safe ground in ruling that when an amendment like Mr. Stewart's is removed from the order paper by the operation of standing order 28, the question itself does not lapse, but the procedure thereon is suspended over Thursday and Friday, and a motion to resume (I say advisedly "resume" and not revive) may be made after notice, but this resumption must take place the first time that the ministry moves the house into supply, and by neglecting to do so on that occasion, the mover waives his right to bring up his amendment at a later date.

In giving a decision which will settle our parliamentary jurisprudence for the future, I must not lose sight of the principle that the right of the commons to challenge the administration of public affairs should be fully preserved.

This house,

as Lord Palmerston said, is the mouthpiece of the nation, the organ by which all opinions, all complaints, all notices of grievances, all hopes and expectations, all wishes and suggestions which may arise among the people at large, may be brought to an expression, may be discussed, examined, answered, rejected or redressed.

In the present case, Mr. Stewart (Leeds) should have moved after due notice that the debate be resumed on his amendment as soon as the government made the motion that I leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Last year, debate could have been resumed automatically and without a special motion on Doctor Tolmie's amendment which had been interrupted at eleven o'clock by the operation of standing order 7.

Two different situations arise in the premises because the application of standing order 28 depends upon the interpretation of standing orders 7 and 27.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 24, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hay.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REFUND OF INCOME TAX

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a return showing: 1. The names of persons to whom refunds of not less than $500, under the Income Tax Act, have been made in the past five years, and the amount of such refund in each case.

2. The names of all persons or corporations in arrears or default of income tax, during each of the past five years, and the amount involved in each case.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Dropped.

Motion dropped.

OUTSTANDING SURVEY ACCOUNTS

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all correspondence and documents relating to the following payment in the Auditor General's report, 1927-8, Part K-31:

Outstanding survey accounts of previous years, for particulars see Auditor General's report, 1922-23, and correspondence in Auditor General's report, 1908-9, page K-151-155. $22,-743.55.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): With the permission of the hon. gentleman I would like this motion to stand until next day.

Motion stands.

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE

Mr. DICKIE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government, in connection with the Winnipeg post office from the 1st February, 1928, to date.

Mr. VENIOT: I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me exactly what he wants. Does he refer to the post office generally or to the postmastership?

Mr. DICKIE: One of the officials in the department has taken up the matter with me and I have told him my reference is to the postmastership.

Mr. VENIOT: Then it is understood that the motion is to be taken in that way.

DOMINION ARSENAL, LINDSAY—PAYMENTS TO E. A. MCPHEE

Mr. PECK:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), tc an article which appeared in the Border Cities Star of Saturday, April 20, which reads as follows:

> Robb's next budget promises a surplus of one hundred million dollars and a record of a period of prosperity the greatest in the history of the nation, Mr. Odette declared.

I would like to ask the minister if his departmental officers are working upon the next budget, when we may expect that it will be brought down, and what surplus there will be.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should put that in the form of a notice.

ARCTIC REGIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) when he will table the report of Porsild Brothers on the Arctic regions. I notice there is a vote in the estimates which I presume is based upon that report, and I think it would be very instructive to the members to have the report when they are considering that particular vote.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): If the hon. member will make a formal request for the report I will be glad to table it.

Mr. FRASER: I make that request now.

PORT COLBORNE ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in view of the limited capacity of the government elevators at Port Colborne, the serious grain congestion which is occurring and the consequent diversion of the grain to Buffalo, I would ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) whether the government contemplates the enlargement of the elevators at Port Colborne. The capacity of these elevators is only 2,000,000 bushels, and a great number of vessels are tied up there and other vessels are being diverted to the port of Buffalo.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): As hon. members know, that port is used as a transfer point in order to transfer cargoes from the large lake vessels to the smaller St. Lawrence river boats. The problem to be solved is the shortage of the small boats in relation to the number of the large boats arriving at the elevator. Subject to further study, I would say that an increase in the storage facilities would not be a solution of the problem. Last year, and for several years past, the elevator has handled more grain than any other elevator in Canada, handling over 70,000,000 bushels of grain last year. I shall be glad to ask my departmental officers to give attention to the point raised by the hon. member, and if there is anything that can be done I can assure him that the government will give it favourable consideration.

PRIVILEGE—HON. R. B. BENNETT

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think I am within the judgment of the house when I say that I rarely refer to newspaper criticism of myself. I realize that one of the incidents of the position which I occupy is that I must be criticized. The other evening I had occasion to direct attention to an editorial which appeared in Le Droit, and it has been alleged that I did not correctly interpret or translate the sense of that editorial. The editorial appeared in the issue of April 20, and I am sure that hon. members will realize that I am conscious of my imperfections in pronunciation when I do not endeavour to read it in the original. I have asked the Clerk of the House if it would be possible to provide me with a translation made by an official translator, and in order that there may be no misapprehension as to what this article contains, I will read the translation I have received. It is as follows:

[Mr. Speaker.]

These Accusations

Attack on the Postmaster General—Political favouritism—The rights of the Ministers —Fanaticism and Bilingualism

The Postmaster General, Mr. Veniot, has been this week and will continue to be for several days more, the object of the attacks of the Conservative opposition, so long as the house has not passed the estimates of his department.

These attacks hardly surprise us, since Mr. Veniot himself has done all he could to provoke them. It is a crime for certain people to see that the constitution is respected, to see that the two official languages are on a footing of equality and that the field of action of the French language is enlarged a little. We do not fear to say that certain people object to the father of the bilingual postage stamp more than to the minister who is charged with favouritism.

And these charges of favouritism, what do they amount to? We are not silly enough to ignore that notwithstanding the existence of the Civil Service Commission, political colour has something to do in the choice and appointment of a candidate, to whatever position he may aspire. Political patronage is still being exercised. The government endeavours to appoint as many of its own supporters as it can, and this is quite human. Should it be asked, perchance, to practise self-abnegation to the extent of giving the preference to its opponents? No, and this is why it may be said without danger of error, that under the present administration a Liberal has a better chance of entering the civil service than a Conservative. And should Mr. Bennett become Prime Minister to-morrow, it is quite probable that the Conservatives would have easier access to public office. And so, Mr. Veniot stands at good advantage in the present debate. All he has to do to defend his case, is to admit himself guilty of all the charges laid against him, while stating vigorously that his political opponents did much worse when they were in office.

But the minister has no need of using this argument ad hominem. He has already given the number of postmasters dismissed under his administration and stated in each case, the reason for such dismissal.

It is also alleged as a crime against Mr. Veniot that he has not always accepted the candidates recommended by the Civil Service Commission, and the case of Mr. Whittaker is mentioned with the contention that the minister did not want this man as postmaster at Simcoe. The commission itself had declared this returned soldier unable to fill the job and Mr. Veniot had another returned man appointed in his place.

According to the Civil Service Act, the ministers have the right to reject the candidates of the commission. And this is practised in every department. Thus, during the last three years, sixty-one candidates were rejected in this way: four in the Department of Agriculture, five in the Department of Finance, nine in the Department of National Revenue, twenty-three in the Post Office Department, five in the Department of Public Works, one in the Department of Justice, etc. If one takes into consideration the fact that the Post Office Department employs nearly eleven thousand hands, it is evident that Mr. Veniot has not taken advantage of this privilege any more than his colleagues, but even less, due allowance being made for the number of employees.

And so, there is no reason to feel uneasy with regard to Mr. Veniot. The administration of his department is as good as in the past if not better, and the postal service has not retrograded as far as we know. All this noise around certain appointments or dismissals is like a tempest in a tea-pot; it is the madness of fanaticism against a minister who is convinced that the sun shines for everybody and acts accordingly. A minister who, like Mr. Veniot, tries to put in practice the letter as well as the spirit of the constitution, deserves the support of all political and national elements.

That is the article which I shall now place on Hansard with the original. The following is the original:

Ces accusations

Une offensive contre le ministre des Postes.—Favoritisme politique.—Les droits des ministres.—Fanatisme et bilinguisme.

M. Véniot, ministre des Postes, a été cette semaine le point de mire des attaques de l'opposition conservatrice, et il le sera encore pendant plusieurs jours, tant que les crédits de son ministère n'auront pas été votés.

Ces attaques ne nous étonnent guère, puisque M. Véniot lui-même a tout fait pour les provoquer. C'est un crime, pour certaines gens, que de faire respecter la Constitution, que de placer réellement les deux langues officielles sur un pied d'égalité, que d'élargir un peu le champ de rayonnement de la langue française. Nous ne craignons pas d'affirmer que l'on en veut plus au père du timbre bilingue qu'au ministre soupçonné de favoritisme.

Que valent d'ailleurs ces accusations de favoritisme? Nous ne sommes pas assez naïfs pour ignorer que, malgré l'existence de la commission du service civil, la couleur politique a quelque chose à faire dans le choix et la nomination d'un candidat, à quelque poste qu'il aspire. Le patronage politique continue de s'exercer. Le gouvernement s'efforce de nommer le plus possible de ses partisans, et c'est très humain. Faudrait-il, par hasard, lui demander de pousser l'abnégation jusqu'à donner la préférence à ses adversaires? Non, et c'est pourquoi on peut admettre, sans courir le risque de se tromper, que, sous l'administration actuelle, un libéral a plus de chance d'entrer dans le service civil qu'un conservateur. Et si jamais M. Bennett était demain premier ministre il est assez probable que les conservateurs auraient un accès plus facile aux fonctions administratives. Aussi, M. Véniot a-t-il beau jeu dans la discussion actuelle. Pour les fins de son argumentation, il n'a qu'à se reconnaître coupable de tout ce dont on l'accuse tout en criant bien fort que ses adversaires politiques avaient fait pire lorsqu'ils étaient au pouvoir.

Mais le ministre des Postes n'a pas besoin d'user de cet argument ad hominem. Il a déjà fait connaître le nombre des maîtres de poste congédiés sous son administration et donné, pour chaque cas, la raison du renvoi.

On fait également un crime à M. Véniot de ne pas avoir toujours accepté les candidats présentés par la commission du service civil, et l'on cite le cas de M. Whittaker dont le ministre n'aurait pas voulu comme maître de poste de Simcoe. Ce vétéran avait été reconnu par la commission elle-même incapable de remplir ses fonctions et M. Véniot fit nommer à sa place un autre vétéran.

D'après la loi du service civil, les ministres ont le droit de rejeter les candidats de la commission. Et cela se pratique dans tous les ministères. Ainsi au cours des trois dernières années, il y a eu soixante et un refus de la sorte: 4 au ministère de l'Agriculture, 5 aux Finances, 9 au Revenu national, 23 aux Postes, 5 aux Travaux publics, un au ministère de la Justice, etc. Si l'on tient compte du fait qu'il y a au ministère des Postes près de onze mille employés, il faut en venir à la conclusion que M. Véniot n'a pas usé de ce privilège plus que ses collègues et même que, toutes proportions gardées, il en a usé moins.

Il n'y a donc pas lieu de s'alarmer sur le compte de M. Véniot. Son ministère est aussi bien administré que par le passé, sinon mieux, et le service des postes n'a pas, que l'on sache, rétrogradé. Tout ce tapage autour de certaines nominations ou démissions, c'est une tempête dans un verre d'eau, c'est la rage du fanatisme contre un ministre qui est convaincu que le soleil brille pour tout le monde et qui agit en conséquence. Un ministre qui, comme M. Véniot, s'efforce de faire passer dans la pratique la lettre et l'esprit de la constitution, mérite l'appuie de tous les éléments politiques et nationaux.

Charles Gautier.

Yesterday morning I received from the director in chief of the newspaper, a communication which was in the sense that his attention had been directed to what appeared in the paper, and that apparently I had been misinformed. I will therefore give merely the sense of that letter and not endeavour again to impose my bad pronunciation upon the house but I will ask the permission of the house to put the original on Hansard:

Ottawa, le 23 avril 1929.

L'honorable M. R. B. Bennett,
Chambre des communes,
Ottawa.

Monsieur,

Je vois dans les journaux de ce matin que vous avez accusé le Droit d'avoir insinué que l'opposition conservatrice en voulait à M. Véniot parce que celui-ci était de lignée acadienne. Le Droit n'a fait une telle insinuation, ni dans l'article auquel vous faites allusion, ni ailleurs. Il n'a même pas songé un seul moment à la faire. Vous aurez été sans doute mal informé.

Etant donné la violence avec laquelle vous avez attaqué le Droit à ce sujet, je vous demanderais de lire cette lettre à la prochaine séance de la Chambre des communes.

Veuillez croire, monsieur, à ma parfaite considération.

Le rédacteur en chef,

Charles Gautier.

I will refer further to what appeared in the paper yesterday as translated by the official translator. This is the translation of what appeared:

Parliamentary News

An unjust attack. The Conservative opposition keeps up its obstruction of the Postmaster General's estimates

(By Charles Michaud)

The leader of the opposition stated yesterday that "Le Droit" had accused the Conservatives of making war on the Postmaster General because the latter is an Acadian and consequently of French descent. "Le Droit" has never said anything of the kind. The question is who could have so misinformed Mr. Bennett. Accordingly, the editor in chief of this newspaper immediately wrote, this morning, the following letter to the leader of the opposition:

Hon. R. B. Bennett,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I see by this morning's newspapers that you have accused "Le Droit" of having insinuated that the Conservative opposition bore ill-will to Mr. Veniot on account of his Acadian parentage. "Le Droit" has made no such insinuation, either in the article to which you allude or elsewhere, and has never even thought for a moment of doing so. You have doubtless been misinformed.

In view of the violence with which you have attacked "Le Droit" in this matter, I would ask you to read this letter at the next sitting of the House of Comons.

Believe me, etc.

Let us not forget that this Mr. Bennett who unjustly attacks "Le Droit" is the same Mr. Bennett who, Thursday last, in the House of Commons, awarded the following certificate to Mr. Edwards, who had just been called away by death:

"No man could point to a single observation that he had ever made in which he attacked any man's religion or denied to anyone of his fellow-citizens the right to worship his own God under his own vine and fig-tree. He had that tolerance which sometimes was denied to him."

The Grand Master of the Orange Order of Ontario, author of "The Wedge", a book which bears on its cover the picture of a priest, armed with an axe, destroying British institutions, must have smiled in his grave on hearing such praise. We, who know better, find the author of the lines just above quoted rather ill-acquainted with the deeds of the deceased member of parliament.

I did not deal with this matter yesterday because I was in the chamber but a very few minutes, but I received the letter yesterday morning and had I been in the house a sufficient length of time to hear the orders of the day called, I would have dealt with the matter. I desire merely to say that when I read from the translation of the original article which I produce, I did so in good faith believing that it correctly interpreted what was stated. The official translators have confirmed that translation. I shall not in any sense traverse the articles to which I have alluded. I merely desire to say that in any discussions in this house, my voice shall at all times be raised to promote harmony and unity amongst the races which comprise this Dominion.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

SUTTON POSTMASTER—NEW WESTMINSTER POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Yesterday the Secretary of State undertook to lay on the table the Civil Service Commission file relating to the post office at Sutton, Quebec.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I have been in communication with the Civil Service Commisison on this matter. I am informed that the return was tabled last year on the 29th May, I think it was, and it contained all letters on file with the Civil Service Commission at the time. The Civil Service Commission is now at work copying this file, and it may be available at any time. As soon as it is handed to me, it will be tabled.

At the same time I might refer to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) whose request was of a similar nature, but for a complete file, because it was a new request concerning the appointment of a stenographer in New Westminster. I have seen the file which is a very extensive one. It will also be copied, but it may be a few days before I am able to procure it from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that, since the return of last year was tabled, a supplementary file has been tabled by the Postmaster General, containing certain letters and documents from the Civil Service Commission. That file is not complete and it does not contain certain documents which are obviously in existence. All that I am asking now is that those documents should be produced. I am quite satisfied, if the Secretary of State will get the Civil Service Commission file, he will find the missing documents and they can be laid on the table of the house in an hour's time.

Mr. RINFRET: I fully agree with my hon. friend that he is entitled to all these documents. If a new return had been asked for this year in the ordinary way, a complete return would have been tabled in due course. But my hon. friend made a request during a debate on the Post Office estimates; the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) tabled what he had in his department, and it was only yesterday he drew my attention to the fact that other letters were with the Civil Service Commission. I may say on behalf of the commission that the demand for returns this year has been exceptionally heavy and it was only to-day they were able to complete a return for the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer). They are working now on the very thing my hon. friend is asking for.

SUPPLY—ST. JOHN POST OFFICE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, I desire to make one or two observations. I was not present during the discussion yesterday in connection with the Post Office estimates; but I have been visited by a gentleman whom I regard as being a highly reliable person and I ascertained from him that in the city of St. John a situation exists of the gravest character. I have consulted with members who represent that constituency in the house, and I have been advised that rumours are very prevalent in the streets of that city and elsewhere in New Brunswick about that situation. I refer to the situation in connection with the district office, that is, the office responsible for the conduct of the postal business in that province. I observe, from looking at the debate, that reference was made to three gentlemen: Mr. Woods, who is the chief; Mr. Emerson, and Mr. Griffiths. It is apparently a common rumour on the streets of St. John that the junior inspector had very grossly insulted his senior officer; that everyone knows of the matter; that officers have been sent from Ottawa to take charge of the office; that grave irregularities have been discovered; that reports have been made to the Postmaster General or his deputy—my informant is not quite certain as to which—and they disclosed a situation that is very serious from the public standpoint.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) who is temporarily leading the house, that it will serve no useful purpose to precipitate further discussion upon the Post Office estimates, thereby wasting public time, until we have before us the files connected with the matters to which I have referred. The gentleman to whom I referred at the outset came to me saying he felt it was my duty to bring these matters to the attention of the house, and I would be derelict in my duty did I not stand in my place and state the position which I now take. It is my desire and the desire of those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, not to impede public business, not to take up time for the sake of doing so, and I suggest that if the minister would provide that the files dealing with this situation be made available, possibly in one of the rooms of the house, with one of the members of his staff present, it might enable us to ascertain to what extent these reports are justified; for according to the information which I have received, Mr. Speaker, in the manner I have indicated, the minister has received very definite information touching the conduct of at least one of the inspectors involving very serious allegations regarding honesty and the dealing with and payment of moneys. All these are matters which we should not permit longer to continue to float as rumours vague and undefined about the streets of a great city, but rather we should get to the bottom of the matter, and if there is anything in it, we should deal with it at once. If there is nothing in it, that is the end of it, and the rumours are disposed of.

I gave my promise that I would endeavour to have this matter brought up at the earliest possible moment, and in the very earnest desire to expedite rather than impede the transaction of public business, I make the suggestion that the post office estimates be held over until such time as we shall have had an opportunity to investigate the matters to which I have referred, and then having obtained the information, instead of wasting the time of the house trying to get the information piecemeal here, we should be able to precipitate a discussion around the concrete matter to which I have referred. In that event there would be no delay, no waste of time, and no opportunity for its being said that we had in any sense delayed rather than assisted in the conduct of public business. When I say "we", I mean any of the members of the house who seek information in this way; because I realize, as you must realize, Mr.

Speaker, having occupied the office of postmaster general, how impossible it is for a minister to get copies of all the files prepared at one time. But we might be able to deal with the situation as I have indicated, and in that way precipitate a discussion that would be concrete and directly connected with the matters we have been discussing.

There are a number of files that have been mentioned that we might thus be able to deal with; I do not recall what they were, but they were mentioned yesterday. As the Minister of Finance has stated that it is proposed to deal with the estimates of the Public Works department for the moment, we can deal with them in committee, and if there is any other business we might dispose of that to-day, and then to-morrow morning we ask that the opportunity be afforded to the members on this side of the house, with the minister's official present, to inspect the files to which I have referred to see whether or not these reports are warranted and what they disclose in connection with the post office situation in the district of New Brunswick, the headquarters being the city of St. John.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the observations made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) are not at all unreasonable; indeed, on behalf of the government I desire to say that they are most reasonable, and I speak as one who has been in opposition. I am sure that my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) will be prepared to view the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the opposition in the spirit in which it is offered, and to regard the request that he made on behalf of the opposition as a most reasonable one. I will leave my hon. friend the Postmaster General to deal with that.

It is the intention of the government to-day to go into supply on Public Works, and if we make sufficient progress there are some bills on the order paper standing in the name of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) that we might advance.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I would like to say a word before we go into supply. I feel that the request of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is a very reasonable one. So much did I feel that such a request, if made, would be a reasonable one, that when the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) yesterday asked me about that matter, after I had attempted in some way to explain the situation although without going fully into it, and he interjected the question whether I would lay the correspondence on the table, I immediately said yes; but after due consideration, and in view of the fact that the investigation into some of these difficulties is now going on, I was going to suggest to the hon. member for York-Sunbury to-day, if I went into supply, that the correspondence be not laid on the table, but that he have an opportunity with me or with one of my officials to go fully into the correspondence, because I felt that while we were carrying on this investigation and endeavouring to discover the foundation of the difficulties in the St. John district it might not be right to lay all this information on the table. I am therefore pleased indeed to accept the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition that the original file in the possession of an official of the department be placed in the hands, say, of the hon. member for York-Sunbury and whomever he wishes to have associated with him, so that he can go over the whole thing.

Let me say, to correct what is perhaps a wrong impression that grave irregularities were discovered at the time the two gentlemen mentioned yesterday had visited the post office at St. John—

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to assure my hon. friend the Postmaster General that I was simply trying to indicate to him the information that had been conveyed to me, and I thought it was in the public interest that the matter should be cleared up. I was not indicating whether I believed it or did not believe it, but merely stating that such rumors were prevalent.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not quite consistent with what really took place. What took place was this: There were charges made of irregularities, and charges of want of discipline. There was the report of this fight, if I may use the word, between the chief of the district, Mr. Woods, and one of the subordinate officers.

Mr. BENNETT: Which one was that?

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Griffiths. When I heard of this, and knowing, previous to that, that there was some lack of discipline in that office, I sent to St. John two men who we consider are experts, one in operation and the other in financial administration, not at that time to go into any charges made, but to start an investigation into the disciplinary end and discuss with these two fighting fellows, if I may use the term, the cause of this lack of discipline and lack of respect on the part of an inspector for his superior officer, the superintendent. They went into that, and they brought back to the office here in Ottawa statements of charges touching financial affairs. Those are on file, and that part of the investigation is to be continued. I shall be only too pleased to submit these papers.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I might ask my hon. friend a further question, with his permission. My informant had been advised that these two gentlemen—one of them, I think, was Fortier and the other Underwood —had gone down there and that the minister himself had visited St. John during the Easter recess and was thoroughly familiar with the situation that developed. That was the information given to me, and it might enable the minister to make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. VENIOT: I was in St. John at the opening of the airport there—no, it was the Easter recess; my hon. friend is right. I think these two men were there before I got there. I knew they had been in St. John, but I did not know they were there at the time. I visited St. John for two days and I found these gentlemen there. They had been there two days. I met them in the hotel. I knew what they were there for, because instructions had been issued from Ottawa. They remained another day, and then came back to Ottawa. They made me familiar with the disciplinary end of this fracas between the officials, but I told them I did not want to hear further about any irregularities until I got back to the office.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The offer made by the Postmaster General is very satisfactory so far as it goes, but it does seem to me to be a little narrow. He said we are to have an opportunity of examining the original file, but I failed to hear him say that we would have the privilege of making copies of any of the documents we might require. I should like to have that incorporated in the offer.

Mr. VENIOT: I may say to the hon. gentleman that in view of what took place yesterday I have had copies of the file made, so there will be no difficulty in that regard.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Since the house appears to be in a very friendly mood at the moment, and as the minister is apparently dealing courteously with members on this side of the house—

Mr. DUNNING: He always does.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There have been occasions when that has been in question, and such occasions may again arise. I wish to direct the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that although the matter of increase in salaries of our postal workers has been raised, and although he has protested again and again that he made recommendations to the Civil Service Commission in this regard, no statement as to the character of those recommendations has yet been laid on the table of the house, and I would ask him to be prepared to table a copy of any recommendations made by him to the Civil Service Commission in relation to postal salaries.

Mr. VENIOT: I laid those on the table over a week ago, and I referred to them yesterday. They are in the possession of the house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I refer to the minister's personal recommendations to the commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 119, page 31 of the estimates.

PUBLIC WORKS—CHARGEABLE TO INCOME

Public Buildings

Nova Scotia

Halifax—immigration building—payment to Department of Railways and Canals for accommodation—$25,000.

Halifax quarantine station—improvements, repairs, etc.—$15,000.

Halifax naval and ordnance establishment—new buildings—$50,000.

Halifax—repairs to buildings and wharfs at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard—$46,000.

Halifax—tractor for postal purposes—$1,300.

Hantsport—public building—$15,000.

North Sydney public building—addition—$4,500.

Pictou public building — improvements, repairs, etc.—$5,500.

Sherbrooke—public building—$15,000.

Truro public building—addition—$8,000—Total—$185,300.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) for a declaration of the policy of the government with reference to the ever-recurring question of the erection of public buildings in the various provinces. I notice in this vote an item of $15,000 for a public building at Hantsport. If my geography is not astray, that is in the constituency of Hants-Kings. There is also an item of $15,000 for a public building at Sherbrooke, which I understand is in the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough. Those two constituencies are represented in this house by supporters of the government. Other much larger communities, many of them in need of public buildings, are entirely ignored by the minister. I think we ought to have a statement from him informing us under what circumstances these two votes are in the estimates and what is the policy of the government. I remember last session trying to extract this information from the minister, but he very skilfully declined to be drawn. I now return to the question because later on when we come to the province of New Brunswick I desire to revert to it. There is no doubt that many places are seeking the erection of public buildings, places where the revenue must be much greater than the revenue at Hantsport or at Sherbrooke. I am not seeking to belittle either of these two important places in the province of Nova Scotia, but I do submit that they are both rather small communities, with correspondingly small revenues. I should like to know what justification there is for this expenditure in these two places, because I think we all realize that next session we shall be asked to supplement the present vote by an amount equally as large if not larger. Therefore I invite the minister at the very outset of his estimates to give to the house a statement of the policy of the government in respect to this matter.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, it is rather interesting to hear my hon. friend repeat the question which for two years I have endeavoured to answer to the effect that the policy of the government was as far as possible to erect public buildings only in places where the service was such that they were urgently required. It is rather interesting also to note—and I may say to my hon. friends on this side of the house that I rather hesitate to refer to this fact—that of the vote for public buildings in the province of Nova Scotia amounting to $185,300, the expeditures in constituencies represented by government members of the house total only $30,000, if the glance I have taken over them is correct.

Mr. HANSON: And none at all in the other constituencies represented by Conservatives.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of the total vote, $155,000 is to be expended in constituencies represented by gentlemen on the other side of the house. The total expenditures in constituencies represented by gentlemen on this side are the two items of $15,000 each for the erection of post office buildings which are urgently required. The $15,000 for Hantsport is a start, the total for building, fittings, grading, sidewalks and contingencies being placed at $24,500. The $15,000 for Sherbrooke is to provide a site and commence a building, the total cost of which will be $28,500. So that the total expenditures contemplated by these two items are just in the vicinity of $50,000.

Mr. HANSON: What is the total cost of the Hantsport building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For building, fittings, sidewalks, clerk of works and contingencies, $24,500. I should hardly expect my hon. friend to think that we could spend $185,300 in the province without spending something in some Liberal constituency.

Mr. HANSON: I should be astonished if it were otherwise, knowing the minister as well as I do and the operations of his mind. But let us outline the situation as he has given it. He says that the buildings are to be placed only where urgently required. He goes on to tell us that out of that $185,000 all but $30,000 is to be spent in constituencies represented by Conservative members. Let us take the very first item, $25,000, for the Halifax immigration building. That is merely a bookkeeping entry, representing an amount paid by one department of government to another; it is paid by the Public Works department to the Department of Railways and Canals, and no money at all will be passed, although they may go through the form of issuing a cheque. So that as regards that item at all events the minister's assertion is not carried out. You are renting accommodation from another department of government; that is all that means. And with respect to every other item in the total for Nova Scotia, of $185,300, they are all simply repairs or additions to existing buildings. But that is not what I asked the minister about at all. What I asked him was to give us a statement as to the policy of the government with respect to the erection of public buildings, now that that policy has been resumed since the war. He has told us that buildings are to be erected where they are urgently required. May I ask him whether there are any other points in Nova Scotia, outside Hantsport and Sherbrooke, where public buildings are urgently required. An analysis of the vote does not bear out the situation as he has described it to the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. friend wants to be fair, and I take it—if I may put it this way without seeming to be impolite—that he has read over the facts in regard to which he speaks. He need only go to the third item, with reference to the establishment of new buildings, Halifax naval and ordnance, to realize that we are spending there, not for repairs as he has stated, but in the erection of a new building in that riding, which I am sure he will not argue is represented by any of the Liberal members, the sum of $50,000. That quite contradicts the statement he has made. As I say, I know he made it unintentionally and in good faith; but it proves that he has suspicions which are absolutely unfounded. That is the situation in that one riding alone, and I doubt very much whether the new construction there is more urgently required than new buildings in any other place. But we are spending there, as I have stated, $50,000.

Mr. HANSON: Have tenders been called for in connection with these buildings? I admit at once that I overlooked the new ordnance building.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know it was unintentional.

Mr. HANSON: I did not wish to be unfair to the minister. But I would point out that this $50,000 is purely a departmental matter; it is not for a building to be put up in the interests of the general public. It will never be a public utility such as the building at Hantsport or Sherbrooke. It has no doubt been asked for by the technical officers of the Department of National Defence, and so far as the public are concerned they will never be allowed inside it. Will these buildings be put up by tender and, if so, will Mr. A. S. MacMillan be the successful tenderer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. MacMillan may construct these buildings if he is the lowest tenderer.

Mr. SHORT: I presume your department will see that he is the lowest tenderer, because he seems to get all contracts let by the department in Nova Scotia.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend does not mean that. He is another gentleman who I know wants to be fair, even in spite of that almost suspicious mind of his. And I can satisfy him by going over the tenders in connection with various works in this country, from one coast to the other, that a great proportion of those who are the lowest tenderers are not supporters of this government.

Mr. SHORT: Not in our province.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not believe that either my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman will get up and say that the men who have tendered for public works in Canada, whether it be buildings or harbours or anything else, have not been judged on the sole question as to whether or not their tenders were the lowest. That is the test, and if Mr. MacMillan is the lowest tenderer he will get the contract. If he is not the lowest tenderer, and if some friend of the hon. gentleman is—unless he is on the black books by reason of having fallen down on some contract before—he will get the contract if he puts up 10 per cent of the cost. I can assure my hon. friend that this is the policy of the department.

Mr. HANSON: What is the population of Hantsport, what is the public revenue, and what departments of government are intended to be housed in the building here? The same with reference to Sherbrooke.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposed building at Hantsport will be a one and a half storey brick structure and will provide accommodation for the post office, with living quarters for the caretaker. The post office is at present located in a section of the ground floor of a large building. The floor area is only 429 square feet, of which 156 feet consists of lobby, the remaining 273 feet providing working space. These quarters—and I wish to direct attention to the fact that this is the communication we have received from the Post Office department in this matter—are not adequate for either lobby or working space, and it is recommended that a post office building be erected. In regard to the other one—

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to call attention to this, because it will appeal to my hon. friend that this site is a place where a public building is really needed. An order in council was passed on January 7, 1914. Bear in mind the date—January 7, 1914. It granted authority to purchase from Mr. Whitman, for the sum of $1,000, a piece of land situated on William street, Hantsport, Nova Scotia, having a frontage of 93.9 feet by a depth of 100 feet. The land in question is required as the site for the proposed public building at that place. My hon. friend will be one of the last to argue that sites were selected in 1914 for public buildings which were not required for the public service; he will remember that those sites were selected by his friends. This site was purchased in 1914, and I think perhaps that will allay the suspicion he seems to have that this is not necessary

Mr. HANSON: I have not said anything of the kind; I do not intend to oppose the vote but I am asking the government for a declaration of policy which will cover the whole Dominion. I am not opposing this vote but it is up to the minister to justify and explain it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the postal revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue for 1927-28 was $2,767.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And the population?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population was 683.

Mr. HANSON: And what about Sherbrooke?

Mr. STEVENS: What is the building to cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: As I told my hon. friend, the total is expected to be about $24,500. The site has been already provided.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There are many other cases of that kind in which the minister is not acting.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but we are getting along, making some progress; we cannot do it all in a year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What will be the total cost of the Sherbrooke building

Mr. ELLIOTT: I gave it before, but I shall be glad to repeat it. It is expected that the total cost, including the site, which has not been provided, will be $28,500, of which $1,500 is set apart for the site.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the population?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Very much the same as the other town; about 700.

Mr. HANSON: Is the minister sure of that? My information is that it is very much less.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that according to the census of 1921 the population was 679, and it is greater at present.

Mr. ERNST: What was the revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue was $3,291.

Mr. SHORT: I do not wish to oppose either of these votes; in fact I am very much in favour of them. I am glad the minister has listened to the advice of the members for those districts and given post offices to these towns, because I believe these smaller places are entitled to public buildings. However, I must direct his attention to the fact that he has not provided one building in any constituency with the exception of these two which are represented by friends of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SHORT: My hon. friend says hear, hear. He is living in the dark ages, when the spoils system was in effect. If that is the policy in the province of Quebec I want to tell my hon. friend that in Nova Scotia we are above that sort of thing. My hon. friend belongs to the last generation; the spoils system is out of date not only in this country but in every civilized country throughout the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. SHORT: Because we should be treated equally. We are entitled to some consideration; we pay the same revenue.

Now I am going to turn my attention to the minister for a moment. I am glad to see that at last he has decided to make a start in these two towns. A few moments ago we were told that the site for the Hantsport building was purchased in 1914, so it is time the building was constructed. But I want to direct the minister's attention to another town nearly twice as large as this and with three times the revenue. I refer to the town of Bridgetown in Nova Scotia. In 1925, when this government was in power, the then Minister of Public Works visited Bridgetown and was so impressed with the need for a public building that he decided to purchase a site, for which $5,000 was paid. When Doctor King was there he said it was disgraceful that the post office in a town as large as Bridgetown should be in such a condition, and he repeated that statement in this house when these estimates were up the first year the present minister was in office. I have repeatedly made application for a grant for a public building in that town; the people of Bridgetown have petitioned this government for that appropriation; the board of trade passed a resolution praying that this building should be constructed, but nothing has been done.

I brought up this matter last year; the minister is quite familiar with it, but no action has been taken in that regard. The town of Hantsport, however, with about one-half the population and one-third the revenue, is able to secure an appropriation of $15,000 for the construction of a public building. Does the minister consider that fair play to the people of Nova Scotia? Why should not my constituency be entitled to the same consideration shown the constituency of Hants-Kings or that of Shelburne-Yarmouth? If we were all treated fairly we would have no comments to make on these estimates, but you do not listen to our requests, so you must expect us to criticize these votes. We want to know why partiality is shown.

I would like to have some explanation from the minister as to why this building at Bridgetown has not been constructed, when in 1925, before the election of that year, the then Minister of Public Works considered the post office in that town a disgrace to the department and thought the public of Bridgetown entitled to much better accommodation. A site was purchased, and during the election campaign of 1926 my opponent promised the people of Bridgetown that a public building would be erected there in the near future if he were elected. Nothing has been done as yet and I say that in fairness to these other towns the minister should bring down in the supplementary estimates sufficient sums to provide public buildings in these other places.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would like to have the opportunity of making an explanation which I am quite sure will be satisfactory to the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr Short). I recall very well the pleas which he has made for a building in this particular town, and he always makes those pleas in a manner which would be very hard to resist were the money available and were it possible to meet with his wishes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Another case of being almost persuaded.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) knows that it is not sufficient to have me persuaded; I must persuade the treasury board, and I am glad the Minister of Finance is present. I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house will agree that in all probability his generosity is not anything like the generosity of the Minister of Public Works.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the villain in the piece.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If it were I would have a much easier time. The hon. member (Mr. Short) failed to hear what I said before, or he has overlooked the fact that we are not omitting the providing of buildings in Conservative ridings in his province of Nova Scotia. The third vote on the list is for $50,000 for a new building at Halifax.

Mr. SHORT: That has nothing to do with the minister's department. It is only a case of paying the bills; the obligation is upon the Department of National Defence. That has nothing to do with this case whatever.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. friend thinks that that is a perfectly good argument, but I have told him already that the reports we have received from the Post Office Department state that they require the accommodation, just as do the departmental requisitions made in regard to that building.

Mr. SHORT: I must take exception to that. The minister can get the Post Office Department to agree that they need every building; he can get them to agree to anything he wants them to.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the hon. member overrates the amiability of the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Because they would not agree to that as easily as he thinks. I think every department of the government has asked for and suggested that we erect buildings, but where the treasury board have found that we could not put up the buildings we have been forced to erect the ones which seemed the most necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: From a political standpoint.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. SHORT: That is rather inconsistent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) says that that is done from a political standpoint. I want to appeal to the fairmindedness of my hon. friends, and ask them if they will not be courageous enough to admit—in spite of what they would like to do on behalf of the various constituencies that they are appealing to—that when we spend $185,300 in the province of Nova Scotia, and only $30,000 in Liberal ridings, they are being treated pretty fairly.

Mr. QUINN: How many ridings are there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are not as many as we hope there will be another time. However, they are very well represented.

Mr. QUINN: They would need to be.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Upon the invitation of some hon. members of the house I had the great pleasure of visiting that province last summer. It is partly my knowing the fine sensibilities of the people of that province that accounts for the great care which has been taken to see that they get absolute fair play in the preparation of these estimates. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that there has been generous treatment of the ridings represented by the hon. members opposite. The various departments are very generous in recommending further buildings, but we must go over those recommendations and pick out the ones which seem the most urgent, and do the best we can with the money provided for the different services.

With regard to the particular case mentioned by the hon. member, the facilities there are not so bad but that they can carry on for a short time. Like a great many other places, a building could be put up but it does not seem as urgent as at other places. The erection of this building at Hantsport has been under consideration for the last fifteen or sixteen years.

Mr. HANSON: There was the little matter of a war intervening.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no doubt that that had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. SHORT: I must take exception to the remarks of the minister when he calls the attention of the house to the $185,300 for Nova Scotia. He wants to lead this house to believe that that amount is being distributed among the different ridings in Nova Scotia. But when we look at the vote we find that the first item is $25,000 for an immigration building at Halifax. That building is for the Department of Railways and Canals, and this item is purely a matter of bookkeeping. The next item is $15,000 for a quarantine station at Halifax.

Mr. HANSON: That is for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. SHORT: That has nothing whatever to do with the port of Halifax; it is absolutely necessary to have that quarantine station there. The next item is $50,000 for naval and ordnance establishment at Halifax. That is not for the advantage of Nova Scotia; that is for the general advantage of Canada, asked for by the Department of National Defence. Another item is for $46,000, repairs to buildings and wharves at R.C.M. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard. The minister is trying to leave the impression that this $185,300 is being distributed through the different constituencies of Nova Scotia. Let us see what the estimates disclose. The only two ridings for which an appropriation for public buildings is being made are both represented by friends of the government. Three ridings out of the total of fourteen are represented by government supporters, and for two ridings out of the three a public building is being provided. There are eleven other constituencies for which nothing has been done.

As I say, I have no fault to find with these items because I believe they are needed, but I would point out to the minister that there is much better accommodation at Hantsport than there is at Bridgetown, a town twice the size. I am glad to see the vote for Sherbrooke, but we are finding fault with the fact that nothing has been provided for our constituency and we are going to continue to find that fault until we finally get something. I am very glad to see that the previous Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), is in his seat, because he may tell us about the condition in which he found the Bridgetown post office when he visited there three years ago.

Mr. HANSON: Just before the 1925 election.

Mr. SHORT: Yes, when he purchased a lot in the town. The then Minister of Public Works considered the post office there such a disgraceful place that he immediately gave instructions for the purchase of one of the best lots in the town for a new site. I commend him very much for that, and had he remained minister of public works we would have had a new building there long before this. I have no fault to find with my hon. friend who occupies the position of Minister of Public Works at the present time. While he has never given me a new appropriation, he has certainly listened to some of my applications in reference to repairs.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member has fared pretty well.

Mr. SHORT: The government have looked after their own properties which they already have there. In some instances the minister has done remarkably well; in others he has not done so well.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I can say is that I hope I shall be able to do better in the future.

Mr. VENIOT: I know this is not quite regular, but when the Speaker was in the chair I promised that certain returns asked for would be tabled. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to the committee that the reports that I said would be tabled before six o'clock will be placed in the hands of the clerk as tabled this afternoon, so that the members can inspect them.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I trust the Minister of Public Works will listen to a plea that I am going to make this year. Last year I made a plea to him on behalf of the post office at New Waterford, in the county of Cape Breton South. Since that time we have had a visit from the Minister of Public Works and we have also had a visit from the Postmaster General. I did not see the Postmaster General, but I saw the Minister of Public Works, and we were all delighted to have both of those hon. gentlemen visit us. With regard to that particular post office, I want to say, on behalf of the town of New Waterford, that it is an incorporated town with a population about six times as great as that of the two towns of Hantsport and Sherbrooke put together. It is an incorporated town with all civic advantages such as water, sewer, concrete sidewalks and everything of that sort, but the post office accommodation is very much inferior to what they have in either Hantsport or Sherbrooke. The Postmaster General saw the post office there last year, and if I am correctly informed he said that we must have a new post office. Why is that town deprived of proper post office facilities? The minister is perfectly frank in saying that political considerations must have some weight. I quite agree with that; but there is a limit to which political considerations should go, and in such a place as New Waterford, where the post office and customs revenues and population call for a decent service and a decent service is not available, I think, in all fairness, the minister should give some consideration to the matter. Last year the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was generous enough to give the matter support, and I want him to join with me this year.

Mr. HANSON: Make him minister of fisheries and the hon. member will get it.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): We on this side of the house would welcome the appointment of that hon. gentleman. I hope he is going to join with me this year in insisting that a vote be inserted in the supplementary estimates for a post office in New Waterford.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know something about the needs of New Waterford. They were brought up before; in fact, they have been brought up from time to time. This is one of the many places where, as I said before, they could do very well with a public building if the funds were available and could be secured without an expenditure that my hon. friends opposite and my hon. friends on this side of the house would think was not justified at the present time; because it must be remembered that all these buildings cannot be provided for in the same year. It has been considered that, in view of the facilities which New Waterford has, some of the others were more urgent. I hope the treasury board and the government will become more liberal later on and that we shall receive further grants for this particular department. But may I point out to my hon. friend that, even as economical as we have been in this department, we receive criticism from the other side of the house that we are spending too much money at the present time.

Mr. SHORT: The minister does not spend it in the right locations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let me say to my hon. friends: You cannot get it all in your ridings at the one time. New Waterford, however, is a place that is under consideration and I have no doubt it will come in its regular turn according to urgency.

Mr. CANTLEY: I want again to bring to the attention of the Minister of Public Works the matter of the extension of the New Glasgow post office. What is he going to do in regard to that matter during the present year? Does he contemplate carrying out the arrangement that we discussed and which, I think, he promised to carry out two years ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member will hardly go that far.

Mr. CANTLEY: I know my hon. friend disputes that, but at the same time he does so with some little mental reservation. He remarked, in regard to the erection of public buildings in Nova Scotia and elswhere, that such must depend upon the urgency with which they were required. He is thoroughly familiar, I take it, with all the circumstances surrounding the New Glasgow post office, and it should not be necessary again to remind him of them. Will he be good enough to say what he proposes to do in regard to the matter?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think I can say anything more than I have said to my hon. friend in conversation a short time ago, except that I am not going to get into an argument with him as to whether I promised at any time to put up a public building there. He will realize perfectly well that I could not make a promise of that kind, because in the first place a great many things that I recommend to the treasury board are cut out by that board. If I made a promise to my hon. friend, which I did not do, I may tell him frankly that he is the only man I ever promised anything to, because I realize as well as anybody else how impossible it is for a minister to make a promise that anything will be put in the estimates, because you do not know whether or not the item is going to be in after the estimates have been considered by council, and even after they have passed the treasury board you cannot be sure. I do not think it would help my hon. friend for me to express an opinion. The matter has been receiving consideration, is still receiving consideration, and I hope we shall be able to meet the desires of my hon. friend some time in the not far distant future. That is the best I can say.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be met anyway after the next election.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend is unduly optimistic.

Mr. CANTLEY: "Some time" is a long way off. This matter has been before the house for five successive years. The building we have is nearly fifty years old. The office has produced in the last fifteen years a revenue of over half a million dollars, or over one thousand dollars a day. The floor space is not anything like sufficient for the staff that is attempting to operate in the building. Conditions are entirely unsatisfactory; plaster is falling down and has been falling down for some time, and the building has been in disrepair for a very considerable period.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is an addition to the present building that my hon. friend is requesting.

Mr. CANTLEY: Exactly. I think the minister will remember the situation. Plans were prepared some years ago for an extension to that building to provide the necessary accommodation, but the amount was thought to be excessive, and after some consultation with the minister revised plans were prepared which reduced the cost very considerably, about twenty-five per cent. The situation is unsatisfactory in the extreme, as I think the minister will admit if he recalls all the circumstances. How long is such a condition of affairs to be allowed to continue in the town of New Glasgow, which is a large and growing town, with office accommodation entirely inadequate for serving about twelve thousand people, an office which is distributing mail to a large number of rural routes, handling from sixty to seventy-five bags of mail every day, and dealing with the mail coming in and going out on ten or twelve trains daily, an office where the floor space does not provide in the busy season for handling mails ten square feet of space to each postal operative? That is a condition of affairs which I think cannot be duplicated in any part of this country east of the city of Montreal. The matter has been brought to the minister's attention by the Liberal candidate in the last election, and by the Liberal candidate in the election before the last, and they write that they have exhausted all their resources and all their patience in bringing the matter to the attention of the minister. Now I ask the minister and I ask this house, is it fair that that condition of affairs should prevail over a long period of years, and particularly during the last five years? It is useless for the minister to tell me that after he has prepared his estimates they have to run the gauntlet of council, the Minister of Finance, the house and all the rest. That does not answer the question at all, because the minister can get $15,000 or $20,000 for other buildings in places where the conditions are nothing like as onerous, and he knows it. I would like to know what he is going to do about it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope my hon. friend will not be too imperative in his demands.

Mr. CANTLEY: Too what?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Imperative.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am, and in this matter have been, the most long-suffering man in this house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend's plea when he sees me privately is much stronger than the one he makes in this house, because in private conversation he never accuses me of the things that he is now suggesting. However, there is no question about it. This is one of the many places that are receiving consideration at the present time, and I have no doubt that it will be dealt with in the not far distant future. That is all I can say. I am not for a moment attempting to argue with my hon. friend that an addition to the accommodation at the place he mentions is not required. I have the place very clearly in mind and all the conditions. It is not a question of a new building, but a question of an addition to the present premises, and I have no doubt that that addition will come in due course.

Mr. CANTLEY: May I ask the minister if he has decided that nothing will be done this year? Will he tell me that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is pretty hard to say.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask the minister a question that will relate to all the public buildings in these estimates? Will there be a fair wage clause satisfactory to the Minister of Labour inserted in all the contracts which the government lets, and will union labour be employed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad that some hon. member asks me a question that is easy to answer. There is no question that a fair wage clause is and will be inserted.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Satisfactory to the Minister of Labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I asked because the last clause I saw was impractical.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Without attempting to place upon the shoulders of my esteemed colleague the Minister of Labour anything that I should bear, he furnishes all the fair wage clauses that are put in our contracts.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And with respect to union labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know about union labour. I do not think you could always get that.

Mr. MacNUTT: I do not rise for the purpose of offering any criticism of the vote for public buildings in Nova Scotia. I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and the hon. member for Hants-Kings on being successful in securing a vote for these necessary public buildings. I had the pleasure of living some seven years in the little town of Sherbrooke, and I can vouch for the necessity of a public building there. While the population as stated is somewhat small, Sherbrooke is a very large distributing centre for that portion of the county, and I am very glad that the people there have at last received recognition of their claims for a better public building. I hope the hon. member for Hants-Kings, having secured the ear of the government, will endeavour at the next session to get a vote for a public building at the other end of the county in the little town of Shubenacadie and in the sister town of Stewiacke where I have the honour to reside. Both these towns are much larger than Sherbrooke and yield a greater revenue to the government. In both cases lots were purchased years ago for these long-hoped-for public buildings.

I notice in this vote an item of $8,000 for an addition to the Truro post office. At the time this vote was up last session I pointed out that the government architect reported that it was impossible to make the necessary repairs and additions in such a way as to render the building suitable for the use of a town of the size of Truro. He advised a new building, The Postmaster General—I regret he is not in his seat—replied that he considered the addition to be placed in the rear would make it as good as a new building. Now we have $8,000 added to $24,000 voted last year, a total of $32,000, or almost the cost of the new building which was asked for and for which a suitable lot had been purchased. This I think bears out my contention at that time that a new building would cost very little more than the repairs to the old one.

However, my purpose in rising was to refer more particularly to a remark made by the Minister of Public Works. A few moments ago he said the policy of the government was to accept the lowest tender regardless of party affiliations of the tenderer. I direct his attention to the now famous Bedford Basin magazine contract, which has been in the public eye for some time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend say that that is a contract in the Department of Public Works?

Mr. MacNUTT: It may have been in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was speaking about the rule in my own department. I cannot speak for other departments.

Mr. MacNUTT: At the time tenders were invited the Standard Construction Company of Halifax was the lowest tenderer. Several other firms tendered and their deposits were returned to them, but the department retained the deposit of the Standard Construction Company. It was charged that I had an interest in the company, and word came to Ottawa that the tender of the Standard Construction Company must not be accepted. For months and months the deposit was held at Ottawa until finally new tenders were called for. The Standard Construction Company again submitted the same figure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I interrupt my hon. friend?—because I know he desires to be fair about the matter. There are certain reasons applying in other departments that do not apply in the Department of Public Works with regard to accepting the lowest tender. Where the work is of a technical character it may not be as easy to follow the practice of my department, and I want to say it is not always easy to do it here. The case to which my hon. friend refers must be subject to some such conditions. I would take it that it would be more advantageous to deal with this matter when the minister of the department is present. It is something I know nothing about.

Mr. HANSON: He is here now.

Mr. MacNUTT: I understood the minister to say the policy of the government in every case was to accept the lowest tender.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I said that was the policy in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. MacNUTT: Since I have made reference to the matter I may as well conclude my observations in regard to it. At the time when the new tenders were called for the figures of the original tenders were public property. The Standard Construction Company tendered again at the same figure they had submitted on the first occasion. The result was that Mr. MacMillan—who by the way is a personal friend of mine—knowing the figures submitted by the Standard Construction Company in their original tender placed his figure a little lower and secured the contract. Now, I am sorry if I have cast any reflections on the Minister of Public Works, but I merely wished to refer to this matter.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, there is a rule which perhaps my hon. friend overlooked, that matters under discussion before a standing committee should not be discussed in this committee. Further, the matter which he has brought up is not relevant to these estimates. But I do feel that I might be permitted just a moment in brief reply, although I shall be glad indeed to go into the transaction fully when my own estimates are up. I have not the file here nor the dates. I think he is under some misapprehension in connection with certain of the statements he made. Public advertisements were inserted for tenders. Several tenders were received. I think they were on three different bases, that is, according to the work being done in three alternative ways. All the tenders were very much above the estimate of the department. The Standard Construction Company submitted the lowest tender on, let us say, plan A. Mr. MacMillan, I think, was second. The one tender was $109,000 odd, and the other $116,000 odd. Both these tenders were regarded by the officers of the department as high. If my hon. friend looks at the file he will see that the deputy minister himself recommended that both these tenderers be asked if they could not quote lower prices in view of the fact that their tenders were considerably above the amount voted and the departmental estimate. Both firms were written exactly the same letter at the same time. The Standard Construction Company replied that they could not reduce their figure. Mr. MacMillan replied submitting a figure of $107,000 odd, and he was awarded the contract. Let me say to my hon. friend that so far as I am concerned, and I am sure so far as the officers of the department are concerned, nobody had any idea that he was interested in the Standard Construction Company, and I can assure him it would not have made any difference if they had. I know enough of Nova Scotia affairs to be aware that he had been out of the Standard Construction Company for some years. I know also that Mr. Gould happens to be a good Liberal, as is also Mr. MacMillan; so there is no question on that score. It results that the deputy minister of the department got the work done for one or two thousand dollars less than would have been the case if the original tender had been accepted. I want to assure my hon. friend that he has not heard the last of this case, and he will have ample opportunity to discuss it when the estimates of the Department of National Defence are before the committee.

Mr. ERNST: The matter is scarcely relevant, but the Minister of National Defence has said either too much or not enough. If he wants to give a complete explanation he might have added that the Standard Construction Company when they put in their tender a second time expressly stated that the amount of their first tender was public property on the streets of Halifax.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. The fact that the first tender was public property did not affect the case one way or the other.

Mr. ERNST: It affected the department.

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all. This was after the tenders were opened. I have no doubt you will find that Mr. Gould discussed the matter of his tender, that he did not keep the amount secret after the time was up—

Mr. ERNST: Are you sure it was not Mr. MacMillan?

Mr. RALSTON: That is a remark hardly worthy of my hon. friend, but perhaps it is typical of the sort of remarks he makes. I do not know, and I do not believe that Mr. MacMillan was here in connection with the tender, but the hon. gentleman will have full opportunity to inquire into the matter. I very distinctly repudiate, however, any suggestion that from the department, either directly or indirectly, Mr. MacMillan got the slightest suggestion as to the amount of Mr. Gould's tender.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): We accept, of course, the statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), but at the same time it is a very remarkable coincidence that when these tenders were received they were considered not satisfactory. The gentleman who performed the work paid a visit to Ottawa with the result that new tenders were asked for, and that gentleman or his firm, or one of his firms, because he has a great number that get all government work down our way under one name or the other—that gentleman got the contract at a couple of thousand less than his previous tender, knowing the price named by the Standard Construction Company. I would ask the minister, how much in excess of the tender of Mr. MacMillan was the actual cost?

Mr. RALSTON: I never thought of the matter coming up, but my hon. friend will have the fullest information. The matter is before the public accounts committee and he will have full opportunity to find out. But I suggest this is one contract he did not delay.

Mr. QUINN: Injustice has been done another tenderer.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I rise to a point of order. I submit that the present discussion is out of order. We are discussing Public Works estimates, and other estimates not before the committee have been gone into. We should confine ourselves to the business before the committee.

Mr. HANSON: I think the point well taken; but by the same token I want to ask the minister, who was former minister of public works, whether he did publicly promise the people of Bridgetown in 1925 that a new post office would be erected, as stated on the floor of the house to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. HANSON: And whether he did not in furtherance of that promise authorize the purchase of a lot in 1925. I should like to know why the post office was not built.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I had the pleasure of visiting this town in Nova Scotia and I did recommend to council the purchase of a lot. The property was purchased. I am not minister of public works, and whatever recommendations were made have been considered by council and acted upon.

Mr. SHORT: Did the minister state to the people there that he considered they were entitled to a post office and that the present one was a disgrace as a public structure? And did he not make pretty nearly the same statement on the floor of the house when the estimates of the present Minister of Public Works were under consideration in 1927?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I did not make a statement of that kind. I did probably indicate to the people there that it would be desirable to have a public building, but that was all right. And that was all, I think.

Mr. HANSON: What was the point of spending $5,000 for the purchase of a lot in the town of Bridgetown in 1925 on the recommendation and at the instance of the hon. gentleman who was then Minister of Public Works, if the then minister did not intend to build a post office? Why buy the lot? Were you farming it out for pasturage, or what? I submit that the Minister of Pensions and National Health must have gone as far as it is alleged on this side of the house that he did go, namely, that when he received authority and spent money for the purchase of a lot he must have promised the people of that community that he would build a post office there, where the people are suffering from lack of accommodation. If that is true, how can the government square themselves with their lack of performance? That is the gravamen of the charge against the administration, not particularly against the present incumbent of the office but against the whole administration. They either impliedly or expressly made a promise to the people of Bridgetown which promise they have not carried out. What is the justification? They have spent millions elsewhere in public works. The reason of course is apparent to me: the county voted wrong from the standpoint of the government, both at the election of 1925 and at the succeeding election of 1926. And I want to point out that that county will continue to vote wrong, from the government's standpoint, so long as they fail to implement their promises to the public of that community.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): You admit they voted wrong?

Mr. HANSON: From your standpoint. I do not admit anything of the kind you imply. There is no reason why the hon. member for Stormont should take that view.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As regards the preparation of the estimates now before the committee, and with reference to the question whether the site was purchased in 1925, or 1914, or whenever it was, we have to consider a number of cases where sites are already owned by the government. So far as I am concerned we have not gone into an analysis with respect to the time at which any site was purchased. I have endeavoured to make clear to my hon. friend that it was a question as to just what the accommodation is at the present time and what were the possibilities of the people getting along, for another year at any rate, without a new public building in that place. I am quite frank in saying that a number of buildings have been stricken off the list where we could very well have justified their erection.

Mr. HANSON: Where were they?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have before me only the list in the estimates but I am satisfied that my hon. friend will not find in the estimates buildings that have been put up in any place where they were not extremely urgent.

Mr. SHORT: The point my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) wants to make is that the Minister of Pensions and National Health considered that it was very urgent that a post office or a public building should be put up at Bridgetown, and a lot was purchased for $5,000. There was a building on that lot and they went so far as to tear it down, leading the people to believe that a public building would be erected immediately. There was an old hotel on the lot, which is one of the best business sites in the town, and I do not think the price was exorbitant. Certainly the then Minister of Public Works, when he visited Bridgetown, led the people to believe that a public building would be erected there; there is no question about it. Why did he purchase the lot if he did not intend to put up the building? The Minister of Public Works says that public buildings are being built only where the need is really urgent. Well, the town of Hantsport is not half as important as Bridgetown. The people in Hantsport have better accommodation today than have the people of Bridgetown, although the revenue of their post office is three times less than the revenue of the Bridgetown office. And the population is only half. You cannot justify expenditures on those grounds. I am perfectly in accord with the vote for Hantsport and Sherbrooke, but the same treatment should be meted out to these other towns; and unless the government does that we are going to take exception to these votes.

Mr. QUINN: I just want to point out to the Minister of Public Works the niggardly and miserly way in which he is treating the province of Nova Scotia. If we look at the first four items in this vote we find first an item of $25,000, which is an annual vote for the immigration building. This is simply transferring money from one pocket to the other, robbing Peter to pay Paul; the Immigration department pays the Railway department $25,000 and that money is charged to the province of Nova Scotia. The next item is $15,000 for the Halifax quarantine station, which is a national expenditure. That building is maintained for the reception of immigrants coming to this country, but they do not come to Nova Scotia. We get no foreign immigrants; the immigration policy of this government has not reached us yet. We do not receive any benefit from this item; these immigrants all go to the west but we have to maintain a quarantine station for which we are charged $15,000.

The next item is $50,000 for a naval and ordnance establishment. What for? Are you going to build a nest to encourage the birds to come there? We have no navy in Canada; we have only two little borrowed tin ships, but Nova Scotia is charged $50,000 for a naval establishment. That should not be charged against the constituency of Halifax; it should be charged to the Department of National Defence. The next item is for $46,000 for repairs to buildings and wharfs at the R.C.N. barracks and the H.M.C. dockyard. This is also a national expenditure which brings no benefit to the city of Halifax.

If we total these four items we find that $136,000 of the $185,300 devoted to Nova Scotia is included therein, so we have left the magnificent sum of $49,000 for the whole province, which contributes much more to the revenues of Canada than it has ever received. Of that $49,000 which will be spent in Nova Scotia $30,000 goes to the two Liberal constituencies which have been mentioned, so the eleven constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house get $19,000.

Mr. HANSON: Shame.

Mr. QUINN: You may well say "shame." I say this is miserly, niggardly treatment of the little province of Nova Scotia which has done so much for this country and which played such a prominent part in confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. QUINN: I thank hon. gentlemen for the cheers; I am proud to hear them acknowledge what Nova Scotia has done. I do not take those cheers as derision or ridicule, because I challenge any hon. member on that side of the house—

Mr. DENIS: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUINN: Yes, any hon. gentleman opposite; I challenge anyone to dispute the fact that Nova Scotia played a prominent part in Canadian confederation. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that we are being treated in a niggardly, miserly way.

Mr. DENIS: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUINN: My hon. friend should not be so fresh. The story is told that when Sir Charles Fitzpatrick sat in this house a young fellow like yourself, sitting on that side of the house, upon being rebuked for interrupting, excused himself as being a young member, but Sir Charles said, "No, not young but fresh." That should keep you quiet.

As I have already stated, $19,000 is spread over eleven constituencies in Nova Scotia. In Halifax we get $1,300 for a tractor for postal purposes, and I think even that is a revote from last year. On the other hand Hantsport, represented by my hon. friend from Hants-Kings, is given $15,000 for a public building. I do not criticize the Minister of Public Works on that account, but I do ask him why we should not all be placed on an equal basis. The hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald) has drawn to the attention of the Minister of Public Works on several occasions the need for a public building in New Waterford, but no attention has been paid to that request. Sherbrooke, however, springs up like a mushroom, just as Kensington did a couple of years ago; Sherbrooke, a little village of 500 people, is given $15,000 while New Waterford must wait. I suppose it will have to wait until the government changes.

Mr. POWER: Or the member.

Mr. QUINN: Now let me direct the attention of the minister to something else. I have been looking over the figures as to the money given the other provinces. To be exact, $49,000 goes to Nova Scotia; New Brunswick, the majority of whose members sit on this side of the house, is given $115,500; Quebec gets $937,200; Ontario is given $1,683,600; Manitoba receives $433,600; Saskatchewan, with which province the government is flirting, is given $842,000; Alberta, with which it is also flirting, gets $596,700, but poor British Columbia, where there was a change of government a few months ago, gets only $160,500. They suffer with Nova Scotia.

If this is the business administration of which there is so much boastful talk why is it that such important parts of this Dominion as the extreme east and the extreme west are neglected simply because they do not send a majority of members to support the government? If the government wish to maintain a business administration every province throughout Canada should be placed on an equal basis, and if the government wishes to win some votes in Nova Scotia it had better play up to that province much more than it is doing at present. In the general estimates I see a vote of $75,000 for the county of Antigonish and nearly $100,000 for Yarmouth, together with almost $30,000 for Hants-Kings. That is not the way for the government to win the people of Nova Scotia. You must deal more generously with them; the representatives on this side of the house from Nova Scotia were sent here because that province has been neglected in the past, not only by Liberal governments but by Conservative governments as well. That is why hon. gentlemen on this side advocate maritime rights. We are not getting justice from this government and I tell the Minister of Public Works that if this is the treatment he is going to accord the people of Nova Scotia the government will soon obtain the answer of the people of that province.

Item agreed to.

Public Works—Charlottetown public building —improvements and repairs—$2,500.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister why he is so niggardly with the province of Prince Edward Island. Are there no more Kensingtons there? Is there no place in that province where a public improvement is urgently required? I am sure if you ask the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald) he will tell you of many places in Prince Edward Island which in the public interest urgently require a substantial allotment of money for public buildings. Why overlook this little island? I am sure the minister must have some reason to offer.

Mr. POWER: It is the three Liberal members.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If any idea remains in the minds of my hon. friends that these estimates are arranged for political purposes, this vote must convince them that the idea is not correct. The improvements and repairs to the public building at Charlottetown were things which seemed more urgent than other things which had to be omitted in other provinces.

Item agreed to.

Buctouche—public building; Forest City—building for immigration and customs-excise purposes; Ste. Croix—building for customs-excise and immigration purposes at international bridge; St. John quarantine station—Partridge island—new pipe line; St. John quarantine station—Partridge island—water supply; St. John quarantine station—Partridge island—improvements, repairs, etc.—$115,500.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister why he has neglected to provide accommodation at McAdam which I have been asking for for the last five years. A vote was provided last year, and there is a revote this year for a building at Forest City. This was not asked for by any public body, although it has probably been asked for by the customs service or the immigration service, and to that I take no exception. The town of McAdam has a revenue of nearly $50,000 per annum, of which $4,600 is derived from the post office. Buildings are being rented for the customs department, the immigration service, and the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture. I made it my business to write a letter to the minister some months ago with regard to this situation. I pointed out to him that this building was required and that I had urged it upon his predecessor without success. I described the character of the town, which is a railroad town with a population of about 2,500, all being very highly paid and skilled mechanics.

The post office accommodation there is a disgrace to the government of Canada. They use a little wood box owned by the postmaster, for which I believe they pay a rental of $80 per year, which is too much for the accommodation given. It is out of keeping altogether with the size and importance of the town and with the amount of public revenue derived from that point.

A customs house is required as well, with floor space for the Department of Immigration, which maintains three offices at that point. Accommodation should be given to the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture, because they maintain a veterinary surgeon at that point, it being one of the principal ports of entry from the United States.

There is no excuse for the government failing to provide this accommodation, especially when they can provide $25,000 for a public ouilding at Buctouche. This place is the headquarter for all the big bootleggers in New Brunswick, and they pay no customs revenue on their liquor importations. This is the principal port for the illicit smuggling of liquor from St. Pierre-Miquelon and all down the Caraquet coast. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) knows very well that the bootlegging business in New Brunswick is located in Buctouche. I know attempts are being made to stop this traffic, and I give due credit to his department for the efforts they have made.

I would mention also the city of Moncton, which provides a postal revenue of nearly $300,000. When the member for West Kootenay (Mr. King), the present Minister of National Health was Minister of Public Works, that department paid about $50,000 for a site in that city. This purchase was made after the election of 1921 to fulfil a pledge made by the then member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp). This government has not done a single thing to implement the promises which were made to the people of Moncton at that time, and yet it can find funds to erect a building at Buctouche, where I venture to say the per capita revenue is not one-tenth or even one-twentieth of the revenue received from Moncton.

I would like to point out to the minister the situation prevailing in the town of St. Stephen. This is one of the most progressive towns in the province, the seat of some of the largest manufacturing establishments in the maritime provinces. For years the postal accommodation here has been wholly inadequate. I understand that plans were prepared and prices asked for, but the town has consistently voted against the Liberal party—I will be frank and tell the house that it will continue to do so—and as a result of the political attitude of the inhabitants of that town their requirements have been ignored by the Department of Public Works.

Referring again to McAdam. The minister cannot say that the accommodation there is ample. The customs house is located in the Canadian Pacific railway station, and is wholly inadequate to the requirements of the port. There are seven or eight customs officers at that port and the men are herded into one little room, while the collector has a little congested room as his own private office. It is not too late for the minister to take care of this great public necessity, but I will say to him quite frankly that no candidate of his party will ever carry McAdam; he will get no return in votes, but he will be performing a duty to a very important community in the province of New Brunswick.

I notice the government is always able to take care of the requirements at Saint John. I am not finding any fault with that, but I would ask the minister to realize that that city is not the whole province as has been said on many occasions. I presume that the new pipe line is necessary, although it will be an expensive undertaking due to the physical conditions which exist, but I want to tell the minister that we are not satisfied with the attitude of his department with respect to these questions. As far as I am concerned, I intend to see that a public building is built in the town of McAdam; if I do not get it from the minister I will get it from the government which I support.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, no one can accuse the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) of being extravagant with his estimates for New Brunswick. He is practising great economy. There are six items altogether, and five of them have to do with immigration. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) has said, the main portion of the immigration work is the passing of people through to the western part of the Dominion. When we exclude the items for immigration there is only the one item for Buctouche remaining. I would ask the minister in the future, provided he is in position to deal with it, to scrutinize carefully the requirements of the province and determine upon such new buildings and such new work in order of urgency. That he should say that the erection of buildings should be spread over a period of years, is correct, but it does not follow that a building such as the one in Buctouche should be the one which should be selected. On the contrary, the building for Buctouche would come well down on the list. There should be a list in accordance with the needs. We have heard something about the need, which is unquestionable, for a new building in Moncton and the minister cannot go on without paying some attention to that railway city of the maritimes, an enterprising and growing town. I know that the other instances just given by the hon. member for York-Sunbury are equally correct. The minister is now having a building erected in Buctouche. I do not know whether that is needed or not; but supposing, for argument's sake, it is, it does not, in my opinion, come on the list for this year. There are other appropriations which are much more needed, and which would serve much more useful purposes were they placed in the estimates, rather than what I might call almost the one estimate for the province of New Brunswick, because immigration work is general for the whole Dominion and we benefit in it to an infinitesimal degree.

Mr. PRICE: Referring to this item, I wish to say a word or two with regard to the necessity for a new post office in the city of Moncton, and I propose reading the reports of the deputy minister and other officials in that regard, and making a few observations on the situation as it exists there to-day. The city of Moncton is a railway centre for the maritime provinces generally, and there is great need for more public buildings there. As has been stated by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the present Minister of Public Works purchased a site a few years ago. I have no fault to find with the site; I think it is a very good one, but they paid an exorbitant price, $49,000, for a site which is assessed in the city of Moncton for about $30,000. The fact, however, is that a political partisan desired to dispose of a site, and that is what took place. The sum of $1,000 was paid for legal fees and advertising in connection with the matter. The department has rented the premises for $40 a month and I think at the present time we are receiving something like $45. It has been pointed out that the present building, which accommodates the post office and the customs, together with the additions which I shall mention later, has been in existence for forty-five years. At the time that building was erected, no doubt it was properly placed, having regard to the situation in that city. But the city has grown since then when it had a population of about 5,000, until to-day it has a population of about 22,000. The following is a memorandum dated December 1, 1923, from Mr. P. T. Coolican, general superintendent of the postal services branch:

> With reference to the Deputy Postmaster General's letter of the 6th April, 1922, and previous correspondence, in regard to the question of the erection of a public building at Moncton, N.B., I would be glad if this matter could receive special consideration, and, if possible, an item placed in the estimates to provide for this building.

This is another memorandum submitted by Mr. Coolican under date of December 27, 1923:

> With reference to my communication of the first instant, in regard to the question of the erection of a public building at Moncton, N.B., I wish to inform you that an officer of this department recently visited Moncton and he is strongly of the opinion that something will have to be done without delay to provide suitable accommodation at this point.

The Deputy Postmaster General reported upon this matter on May 30, 1921, as follows:

I beg leave to direct your attention to the inadequate postal accommodation at the above named place. Representations have repeatedly been made to your department in this regard, but on account of the financial stringency, no action, with the exception of the rental of space in the Harris building, has been taken.

The Moncton office is congested to an almost unworkable degree. This is due largely to the fact that the present post office was built about the year 1885, when the population was only 5,000 whereas the population is now about 22,000. The city has built up west and northwest of the present site, and consequently, the present building is in the southeasterly section of the city, thus making it inconvenient for possibly 75 per cent of the inhabitants.

Then he goes on to state what the revenue has been in the past. He says:

The revenue of the Moncton office has increased from $69,333.31 in 1919 to $323,273.38 for the year ended March 31, 1921.

Those figures have risen until last year the gross revenue was $482,578.82. The total expenditure, including contingencies of $1,741.13 was $116,300.98, leaving a net revenue from the Moncton Post office of $366,277.84 per annum. I would think that under those conditions, and in view of the innumerable inconveniences, it is pretty nearly time the government took steps to build a decent post office in the city of Moncton, and if necessary utilize the old post office as a customs house. Something simply has to be done. The locality is very difficult for postal deliveries, and it is very inconvenient for anyone to get service at that office. The post office also has to rent additional premises for the mail order business, for the air mail service, and so forth.

I also wish to make reference to the customs accommodation. At the present time the customs department is paying an exorbitant rent for the quarters which it occupies. George A. Robertson, who was previously a merchant in the city of Moncton, and is now retired, rents to the provincial government a store at the corner of Main and Duke streets, on the opposite corner from where the present quarters of the cutsoms department are situated, floor space covering an area of 4,800 square feet for $125 per month. together with the use of a basement. The building occupied by the customs department was offered for rental at $65 per month or $780 per annum. To-day a middleman gets the difference between $65 and $166.66 per month, or a rake-off of $101.66 per month. The customs department has a two-year lease on this property, which expires I think in August of this year. That is a condition of affairs that should not exist. The excuse was made in connection with a former property owner from whom the department rented that his prices were excessive. A man by the name of Wilbur got 81 cents per square foot for the rental of his premises. Mr. Ryan, who at present rents to the Customs department, gets $1.05 per square foot, or 24 cents per square foot more than the price at which the Robertson store rents to the New Brunswick liquor commission.

As is well known, the department have been carrying on under difficulties at Moncton. The premises are not suitable. I have repeatedly called the attention of the former minister of public works, Hon. Mr. King, and of the present minister to the situation at Moncton during the last three or four years, and I have heard the minister in his statement this afternoon point to the many different places throughout the Dominion, all of which he said could not be served at one time. There is no question about that, but if it takes four years to convince the minister of the necessity of building an extension to the breakwater at Cape Bald, it is going to take one hundred and sixty years to convince him of the necessity of building a post office at Moncton at an expenditure of some $400,000. I would ask him if he thinks it is a fair deal to the people of the locality for which I am speaking at the present time, that they should not have a decent, respectable building. Moncton is one of the finest and most up-to-date cities in Canada, with its paved streets, many miles of cement sidewalks, beautiful parks and beautiful churches; but the post office is a disgrace. If a man wants to go through it he has to traverse a labyrinth of canals to reach it. It is also in an insanitary condition. I would urge the minister and the government to have this situation at Moncton cleared up. Previous to the last election a large hole was dug on the post office site, and the rumour was prevalent that a post office was going to be built. In fact, tenders have been called for repeatedly, but absolutely nothing has been done. I think if the Minister of National Revenue would look into this matter I mention, where a rake-off is being taken by a middleman amounting to $100 a month, he would put a stop to it. I regret very much that an item for a public building in Moncton has not been included in the main estimates, but I hope that when the supplementary estimates are brought down they will include a vote of five or six hundred thousand dollars, which is just a little over the net receipts per annum from the Moncton post office, for the building of a decent and respectable public building in that city, because the building at the present time is a disgrace.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In reply to my hon. friend, I do know something about the situation at Moncton. Anything that may have occurred in connection with the renting of the building to which he refers does not belong to the Department of National Revenue but to the Department of Public Works, for which I am responsible.

Mr. HANSON: Then we will pass it on to you.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and I take it freely. The situation is this. I quite agree with what the hon. member has said, that we are not very well situated in the city of Moncton at the present time so far as the facilities for carrying on the various departments of the government's business are concerned. That has been the situation for some years With regard to the rentals of which my hon. friend spoke, I regret that I have here only the details relating to places for which there is an estimate, but I do know something about that particular matter. In the year 1927 we were renting premises in the city of Moncton at approximately $2,400—I am not going to bind myself to a dollar or so. The landlord sought to raise the rent by $600, which would have made it necessary for us to pay a rental of $3,000. We made diligent inquiry to see if there were not other premises which could be rented at an amount which we thought was reasonable. The premises referred to by my hon. friend were then under lease to a man by the name of Ryan, I think. At the time he had been in possession for about two years under a four year renewable lease.

Mr. PRICE: Wilbur, I think, is the name.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We left the Wilbur premises and went into the Ryan premises at a rental of $2,000 a year.

Mr. PRICE: But with less space.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not quite as satisfactory as the larger space, but we were able to save $1,000 a year in rent. What our lessor is paying to the original lessor I am not exactly able to say, but I do not quarrel at all with my hon. friend's statement that it is considerably less than the rent we are paying him. But I think he will be fair enough to bear in mind that our lessor leased the premises in 1925 when property in Moncton was not nearly as much in demand as it was later, and a good deal of that time the premises were vacant. He did considerable repairs to the property and leased it to us for a term of two years, which expires I think this coming August, with the right to us to renew our lease. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that under the circumstances we could get no better accommodation at the time for the rent we are paying, and I think he will further agree with me that we have effected a saving of $1,000 in the rental as compared with the arrangement made by our predecessors.

I do not find fault with my friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) for his criticisms, but I would call his attention to the fact that the items in the New Brunswick vote, with the exception of one for $25,000, are for public works in ridings represented by members on the other side of the house. It has been asked why Buctouche was selected for this expenditure. Let me state that the order in council providing for the purchase of the site was passed on August 6, 1913, and in the intervening years we have owned the land and received nothing from it. It is another of the cases which was thought to be more urgent than any of the others mentioned by my hon. friend's friends when they were in power. I think they were correct. In my view it is one of the most urgent cases in the province. Having held the site for sixteen years without getting a cent of revenue from it, we now propose to utilize it. I thank my hon. friends for the fairness of their criticism in connection with these various items.

Mr. PRICE: Of course, during the war years the administration of which the minister speaks was not in a position to embark on expenditure for a new public building in Moncton; every available dollar was required for other purposes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quite so.

Mr. PRICE: Is not the minister convinced from what he finds on his file and from what I have said that a new building is absolutely required at Moncton to accommodate both the customs and the post office? I can assure him that the file contains reports from Mr. Gaboury, from the architect, the present postmaster and his predecessor, stating that a new building is a necessity.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Whether a new building is a necessity or not depends to a large extent upon how much it is going to cost and what your present premises are costing. Undoubtedly the government offices would be better housed in a half-million dollar building than in the premises for which we are paying a rental of $2,000.

Mr. PRICE: In addition to that you own the post office.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. There is no question that it would be infinitely more expensive to build new premises. Financially, we can do better by remaining tenants. But I do not think my hon. friend can complain that we have selected Buctouche instead of Moncton for expenditure on a new building in view of the fact that the party which he supports evidently thought it more urgent to provide accommodation at Buctouche than at Moncton or they would not have purchased a site in the former place.

Mr. PRICE: I have mentioned nothing about the Buctouche one.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, but my hon. friend is not the only member of his party from New Brunswick.

Mr. PRICE: Is the new building at Buctouche for a post office or for a customs house?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For both.

Mr. PRICE: Will the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) say whether or not it is correct that within the last three or four years the customs house in Kent county has been closed and the people there obliged to go to Shediac to transact their business? Shediac is in my constituency. Will he say, further, whether or not an order has been issued for the closing of the customs house at the latter place on May 1, with the result that the residents will then have to go to the city of Montcon in connection with their customs business?

Mr. EULER: We have closed some two hundred offices throughout the country. I do not remember the names of them all, but it is quite possible, and perhaps probable, that what my hon. friend states is the fact. I cannot say without looking up the files.

Mr. HANSON: The Minister of Public Works has dealt with the situation at Moncton, I presume because he realizes how serious it is. But he does not undertake to do anything to remedy that serious condition. That is the quarrel I have with him at the moment. He admits all the charges made against the deficiencies of the present lay-out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is not that doing pretty well?

Mr. HANSON: I should like to get in behind him and galvanize him into action. What we want is action, not palaver about this, that and the other thing.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: We shall be very glad to have my hon. friend get in behind us. I understand that a number of other hon. gentlemen on this side of the house contemplate the same course, and we will welcome them.

Mr. HANSON: I will get in behind the minister if he will propose a vote of half a million dollars for a post office at Moncton, or of $25,000 for a public building at McAdam, or of a substantial sum to extend the accommodation at St. Stephen; if he will do this I will get in behind him. It will not do to admit these matters and then do nothing. Public opinion will demand this accommodation. The minister is not spending his own money; the Minister of Finance is not spending his own money. It is public money and the public have a right to demand this accommodation. I wish to tell the Minister of Public Works and, quite frankly, the Minister of Finance as well, that we will continue to drive at these things until action is taken. I do not wish to hold up the estimates; I am quite satisfied to let this vote go through. But I warn the minister that we must have some action from himself and his department. He cannot play favourites; if he does we will check him up. There is no question about this: the reason he has given for the public building at Buctouche is not the controlling reason. The fact that the government bought a site there in 1913, when someone had power or influence enough with them to get them to buy the site, is not the reason why the building was put up there. The minister knows that; he knows he has done it to please his follower from Kent; and I congratulate his follower from Kent upon getting a public building in his native town, the town where he resides. But at the same time we will not have the public service neglected in other places, and I say candidly that it is being neglected in St. Stephen, in McAdam and in the city of Moncton.

Mr. SHORT: The Minister of Public Works has spoken about a number of lots purchased in 1913 and 1914 and has advanced the argument that it is a good investment to put up buildings on these sites. That was his excuse, or one of his excuses, for the erection of this building in Buctouche—because the lot was bought in 1913. Well, I want to inform the government that in 1913 or 1914 a lot was bought in Middleton, Nova Scotia, where a public building is required. If it is a good investment to put up a building in Buctouche because the government owns a lot there, it is an equally good investment to put up one in Middleton where it has owned a lot since 1913 or 1914. That seems to be the principle on which these buildings are being constructed, and on that principle a building is due the people of Middleton. I want to say to the minister, therefore, that we shall expect to find in his estimates next year a vote for a building to be erected on that site in Middleton, Nova Scotia. From his own statement he considers it a good investment to use these lots which are owned by the government, and we can expect him to carry out this policy with regard to Middleton.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

SUTTON POSTMASTERSHIP

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): By unanimous consent I beg to lay on the table supplementary return regarding the appointment of a postmaster at Sutton, which return was asked for by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark).

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 25, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Tenth report of select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

Sixth report of select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

NEW WESTMINSTER POST OFFICE

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I desire to lay on the table of the house copies of letters, documents, and so on from the file of the Civil Service Commission concerning the appointment of a stenographer at New Westminster.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. GEORGE PARENT, Quebec West, (for Mr. Jacobs) presented the second report of the select standing committee on public accounts as follows:

The select standing committee on public accounts beg leave to present the following as their second report:

Your committee now have under consideration certain items contained in the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1928, as referred to the said committee.

It is deemed advisable by your committee that certain other items which are contained in the Auditor General's report for the previous year also be taken under consideration. Your committee therefore recommend that the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1927, be referred to the said committee.

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, there is an apparent misunderstanding in connection with this report.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should give notice.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am not opposing the motion, Your Honour. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) is making this motion in place of the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). When the committee was in session yesterday I made two motions, and I think the hon. member for Quebec West has not quite grasped the import of what took place.

The first motion was for the production of material in connection with the Matane dredging contract. This matter dealt with items from the Auditor General's reports of 1924, 1925 and 1926, and it was then suggested that without leave of the house it would not be possible to have the reports for those three years taken up.

The second motion was in relation to the Beauchemin library, and dealt with extracts from the Auditor General's reports for the years 1926, 1927 and 1928.

In view of the fact that information is sought in regard to these matters, and the files relating to entries appearing in the Auditor General's report for those respective years are asked for, it was thought that the house should be requested to refer to that committee all of the entries and all the files relating to the various years. The hon. member for Cartier undertook to bring that matter up and place it before the house. I am quite satisfied that that was his intention but he has been unexpectedly called away, and I am asking now that the hon. member for Quebec West place the matter before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the circumstances, I think the motion had better stand.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): May I draw this to your attention, Mr. Speaker: My information from the hon. member for Cartier is that owing to certain religious observances in which he is at present concerned, it will not be possible for him to be present in the house until some time next week. I think the work of the committee should not suffer meanwhile, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Quebec West will concur with me that the matter is as I have stated. Therefore I ask that the motion may be so altered as to enable the committee to go on with its very necessary work.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion had better stand.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Since the motion has been called, a rather serious situation has developed. I am not saying at the moment that a deliberate endeavour has been made to prevent investigation, but the fact is that two very prominent members on the opposite side of the house are energetically taking action that, if carried to its finality, would result in the investigations never being completed. I need hardly point out to the house that it has been a rule from time immemorial that when an item is under consideration in the public accounts committee, you may trace it back to its origin without any further reference to the house. Unfortunately, however, the contention has been made—and a majority vote in the committee succeeded in carrying the views of that majority, of course—that you cannot investigate an item, the details of which appear in a previous auditor general's report, beyond the year preceding the year just ended. I need hardly say that such a contention, if carried to its finality, would render nugatory any effort made by the public accounts committee.

The rule, as I understand it—and I have asked some of the oldest members of the house—is perfectly clear, that if in the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1928, there appears an item indicating that payments have been made to A. B. and it becomes necessary to trace the matter back to its origin, even as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said, to confederation itself; if it is a continuous series of transactions, then you can trace it back to its origin without referring the matter to the house. That looks on the face of it so sensible as not to require discussion. The hon. gentleman who has made the motion has an entirely different view. He believes the house adopted another rule. I do not find any evidence of the adoption of such a rule. The public accounts are on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) referred to the public accounts committee. It will be recalled that last year a little conversation took place with respect to that owing to the late date in the session at which the public accounts were referred; and without prejudice to our position. At the moment, the motion of the hon. member for Quebec West is a motion intended to empower the committee to go back beyond the Auditor General's report for 1928 with respect to a certain related item, and of course the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will realize just what that means. You cannot carry on your discussion with respect to the final payment of an account unless you can go back to its origin and trace it down, because it is based on a contract either express or implied, a contract in writing or a verbal contract given by one of the departments. That may be five or six years ago. I know of one ten or eleven years back.

Mr. MANION: The Welland canal.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the Welland canal contract was signed in—

Mr. DUNNING: There are a large number of Welland canal contracts dating back quite a number of years.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the Minister of Railways. They go back at least six or seven years and they are being projected into the future. Suppose in 1929 the public accounts committee is investigating the accounts of March 31, 1928, with respect to any one of those contracts: I think the house has ruled time after time—and the committee has always thought it was so plain it was not necessary to come back to the house—that you can investigate from the origin of the contract down to the date you are then considering, on the assumption, of course, that the matter has not been previously investigated, and if so, the details are available. Payments of public moneys are authorized either under statute or by contract. There may be a written contract or sometimes only a verbal contract and the duty of the public accounts committee is to investigate the soundness of the payments; whether they were warranted or not; whether the prices paid were reasonable; whether tenders were called; whether the moneys voted and paid reached the source indicated by the account or some other source. The public accounts committee is endeavouring to function, not as a party machine, but for the purpose of indicating to the people of Canada whether or not the money is properly expended in accordance with the will of parliament. If it has not been, this committee is going to ascertain that fact. The mere fact that the chairman of the committee is absent to-day or to-morrow should not be a reason for holding up the matter. Summer will come and winter too, if we are going to have only one meeting of the committee a week and then have it met by such a motion as that which has been considered during the last few days. For that reason, I think the observations made by the hon. member for West Hamilton, which indicate that a certain resolution was to be submitted to the house because a majority of the committee determined that it would be against all precedent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: There was no vote in the committee at all.

Mr. MANION: I was in the committee and I opposed it throughout.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: There was no vote.

Mr. MANION: No, but I opposed it throughout.

An hon. MEMBER: The ayes and nays were called.

Mr. BENNETT: On every occasion where it has been possible the majority of the committee has been summoned to prevent these investigations from being carried on.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask the minister to read the record. I know what he has seen in his experience in connection with public accounts. The committee has now adjourned until next Wednesday. On Wednesday an effort will be made to have it meet on Thursday at ten o'clock, and on Friday at ten o'clock. Surely hon. members remember that the public accounts committee, when an opposition was investigating the Arctic accounts, sat for days and weeks and it dragged into a month before they got all the horrid details brought to the attention of the public. We are going to endeavour to do the same thing this year and to do so means that the will of a majority is not going to impose itself against the right to investigate the public accounts of Canada which represent moneys paid by the people of Canada and not by any one party. Let that be clearly understood.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I fail to see just exactly what the leader of the opposition has been asking for. I understood that the request of the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) was that a certain report, which is before the house at the moment, should be amended before it is accepted.

Mr. BENNETT: To carry out an agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a matter of changing the wording of a report, and a report that was signed by the chairman. The chairman happens to be absent at the moment; but if my hon. friend will permit me the time necessary to telephone him, I will endeavour to get his consent to make a change that is a matter, as I gather it, not of any consequence beyond that of having the committee meet, if possible, at an earlier date.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): May I interrupt the Prime Minister just a moment? As the Prime Minister rose to his feet, I think the hon. member for Quebec West was about to say something further, and possibly he was about to express his acquiescence in what I had asked for. If that is the case, we can make progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If other members of the committee are agreeable, it will facilitate matters, but the chairman who signed the document ought to know, before that document is changed, if there is an intention to alter it. I should not think we would be losing very much time if the motion were to stand over for another day. If it can be settled at the moment, so much the better. I object, however, to my hon. friend taking advantage of a discussion of the kind when a certain courtesy is being asked of the government—

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a courtesy; it is a matter of right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do not insult the members of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see why my hon. friend the leader of the opposition should lose his temper over it. It is not as serious as all that. The government is entirely in accord with the view of my hon. friend that the public accounts should be investigated whenever it is thought desirable to have them investigated, and that the fullest opportunity for investigation should be given. No one takes any other view.

Mr. BENNETT: They act the other way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a most unfair reflection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is possible that we can arrange to meet my hon. friend in the way that has been suggested, but if the other members of the committee have some substantial reason for not acquiescing in my hon. friend's request at the moment, we shall have to ask him to let the matter stand until to-morrow, and in the interval I will get into communication with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, may I say—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am only speaking in answer to what the Prime Minister has just said. Is that out of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I think by unanimous consent we might hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I would like to say a word in answer to the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Having been a member of the public accounts committee for many years, I strongly resent the hon. leader of the opposition insinuating or seeking to create the impression in this house that the public accounts committee are trying to prevent hon. members on the other side of the house from investigating in the committee any matter in connection with the public accounts. There is no such intention and there has been no such action on the part of any members of that committee since I have been a member of it, and that is a good many years now.

The report which has been presented by the chairman was discussed last Wednesday before the public accounts committee, and my recollection is that the committee unanimously consented to this reference to the house because some members of the committee thought that we did not have power to go into the public accounts of years gone by. The chairman himself stated that he did not think we had that power. The committee therefore agreed that we should refer back to this house and seek authority to investigate the public accounts of years gone by and go into the files. I wish to repeat that there has been no intention on the part of the committee, and no action taken, to try and prevent a thorough investigation of any item in the public accounts.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): As a member of the public accounts committee, I was present throughout the whole discussion yesterday, when not only did various members on the other side of the house sitting on that committee take the attitude that we could not examine further back than the present Auditor General's report, but the Solicitor General himself (Mr. Cannon), a member of the government, stated that the reference of the house to the committee concerned only the Auditor General's report which is lying on the table at the present time; that is, for the year 1927-1928. That was the attitude of the whole party on the other side of the house sitting on that committee—absolutely. I argued against that at considerable length, as did others, and in the end, because the government members were in the majority and we could not do anything else, we agreed to refer back to the house for a ruling.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Before my hon. friend sits down, I would like to ask him if there was any objection on the part of any members of the committee to securing what they regarded as the necessary authority, namely, a reference by the house of the accounts in question?

Mr. MANION: There was objection throughout to going further back than the present Auditor General's report without first coming back to this house for a reference.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): As a member of that committee, I desire to support what the last speaker (Mr. Manion) has said, and to say a word in answer to the remark made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—"most unfair, most unfair." I would like to point out to the house the treatment that was accorded by that committee. It is true that by a majority vote at the meeting just previous to the last one we asked that we should be allowed to examine the files in relation to a contractor named MacMillan, whom I do not know, in regard to a matter in connection with Bedford basin. We said that we desired the file in order to find out the nature of the case, and to examine the officers of the department so as to have a complete story of the matter. The position taken by the majority on the other side, of course, was that we could not do this, that we could not find out whether there was a proper case or not to allege against MacMillan unless we had MacMillan himself present.

Mr. THORSON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, should the hon. member discuss the proceedings of the committee when the particular matter on which he is speaking is not before the house? The question before us is a motion to extend the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. gentleman is simply giving an illustration in leading up to his point that at the last meeting of the committee the opportunity was not given to the minority, I suppose, which they desired. The hon. gentleman will please come to the point.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will come to the point, Mr. Speaker, which is this, that a majority of that committee by a vote of nineteen to fourteen said that we were not to be allowed to examine the files or call the officers of the department and ascertain whether or not there was a case until we had Mr. MacMillan present.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct an impression which the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) left on this house. I understood him to say that the committee by a majority vote had taken a certain decision last Wednesday. I am a member of the committee and was present at the meeting of the committee. The hon. leader of the opposition was not present. The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) made a motion for the production of certain papers and certain files relating to a certain account, and the question was raised—it was put by myself to the chairman of the committee, for information—as to the rule that should govern in such cases. In the course of the discussion two points were raised: First, whether it was within the power of the public accounts committee to discuss items beyond two years back; second, whether the committee could go beyond the order of reference from this house. Earlier in the session the public accounts as contained in the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1928, were referred to the public accounts committee, and the question raised in the committee was whether the committee could go beyond that order of reference. Those were the two points raised.

There was no vote taken in the committee one way or the other. The chairman was of the opinion that the committee could not go beyond its order of reference and it was the general agreement of the committee that if it did not have sufficient power to go into the accounts that were desired to be examined, it should come back to this house for an extension of its power. There was no suggestion of blocking inquiry in any way, shape or form. There was no vote taken one way or the other with regard to the matter.

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): As a member of the public accounts committee, I resent very much what the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said with regard to supposed obstruction by some members of that committee. I am for fairness in discussion, and for nothing being hidden in connection with the committee's inquiry. I move that not only should MacMillan appear before the committee, but also the Minister of National Defence in the Meighen government of 1926, the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and the Minister of Railways and Canals in the same government, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black); that they should be invited to appear before the committee to explain why they stopped the contract, afterwards gave orders to the contractor to resume the work, and later cancelled the contract. I think they should explain their action to the committee.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, if I understand aright the difficulty which has arisen, it appears to me that a majority of the committee was of opinion that the committee could not inquire into anything beyond the single Auditor General's report which was referred to the committee on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). It has always been a rule that any item in that particular report may be inquired into and may be traced to its inception, no matter how far back it goes. But I agree that a new investigation should not be started in regard to an item which appears in past reports of the Auditor General, but which does not appear at all in the particular report under consideration by the committee. But that, Mr. Speaker, is fundamental. Surely the committee does not require instructions in regard to it. With all due respect, I think the majority of the committee has acted very strangely in bringing the matter before the house at all. If an item is in the report which has been referred to the committee, that item can be traced back to its inception, and it has been the custom for the last thirty years to do so. But I do not think the committee has the right, unless specially directed, to inquire into items which do not appear in the last report referred to it; that is, the committee cannot rake up matters contained in former reports of the Auditor General unless those matters are specially referred to it.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the public accounts committee and I do not know what happened there. I have nothing to say about its proceedings but my friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) has taken exception to the words I uttered, "most unfair". I was not referring to anything that has happened in the committee, but to the words of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition when he said that Liberal members were summoned to attend the public accounts committee for the purpose of preventing the proposals of my hon. friends opposite being adopted. I thought those words most unfair, and I still think so. The members of the public accounts committee who happen to be sitting on this side of the house have a duty to discharge in that committee, as well as my hon. friends opposite. It is their duty to attend there, and it is unfair to reflect on their attendance. It is rather difficult to please my hon. friend, for I remember last year when a certain committee was sitting he complained twice or three times in the house that Liberal members of that committee deliberately refrained from attending its sittings. This year he is complaining because they are attending. I think—

Mr. BENNETT: That was to make a quorum.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think those words are unfair, and I still protest against them.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to correct a statement made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a question of privilege. The Minister of Justice said that last session I complained because Liberal members did not attend the committee. I complained of their non-attendance at that time because there was not a quorum, and there could not be one unless they attended. Why did they stay away?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a great difference.

Mr. DUNNING: I desire, Mr. Speaker, to concur in the view expressed by the hon. member for South Wellington—with all due deference to the chairman of the committee, I suppose we can all have views on the matter under discussion—to the extent that wherever an item appears in the current public accounts, and its source is in the public accounts of previous years it is competent for the committee to follow that item back to its source. But may I point out that so far from this report being a reflection on the motives of the majority of the committee, the report itself, if adopted, will go much further than my hon. friends opposite desire to go,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: —because apparently not only will it permit the committee to trace the items which appear in the current public accounts back to their source, but it will also permit the committee to go into any other items which appear in the previous public accounts mentioned in the report. That is my reason for objecting to the unfairness of the insinuation—shall I say?—which emanated from the other side in regard to the matter. Without at all debating whether or not the items in the present public accounts can be traced back to their source, at least the majority of the committee desired the house to place every facility at the disposal of the committee.

Mr. MANION: You were not at the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I hold in my hand the report of the proceedings, and I will read it into Hansard for the information of the house. When motives are called in question the actual language used surely can be quoted. Let me read from the report:

> It is deemed advisable by your committee that certain other items which are contained in the Auditor General's report for the previous year also be taken under consideration. Your committee therefore recommend that the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, be referred to the said committee.

This is, the whole report for the previous year.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, while agreeing with the views of both the member for South Wellington and the Minister of Railways with respect to the logical procedure in matters of this kind, I must disagree with the implication of the last remarks of the Minister of Railways. I am wondering to myself what is going to happen if, every time an examination of an item that comes before the public accounts committee discloses that its source is to be found in previous accounts, that committee is to have to come before this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just a moment; if that committee has to come before this house for an extension of power.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will surely permit me to say that in my opinion—and I am not the judge; I presume the Speaker is—such a return to this house is not necessary, provided the item in question has its origin in previous public accounts.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we have said.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With that I agree; but the implication in the latter part of my hon. friend's remarks would lead us to believe that the majority of the committee had met that situation and gone much further.

Mr. DUNNING: It has.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I may be entirely wrong, but I hold the view that if the house adopts this report it will create a precedent which will require on every subsequent examination of accounts, other than those of the current year, that the committee must come back to this house in order to gets its powers extended for the purpose of such examination. If it is to be regarded as a precedent, I must object to it, not because I am a member of the committee but because I do not think it is the proper procedure. I do not think it is logical, nor do I think it will facilitate the work of the committee. If it is not to be regarded as a precedent, well and good.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a private member of the house—I am not a member of the public accounts committee—as soon as the report was read I at once intended bringing to your attention what I conceive to be a very serious principle involved in the report. As I understand the situation, it is this. It has been ruled by the chairman of the public accounts committee that it is not competent for the committee to examine into files on matters beyond the single year contained in the Auditor General's report, in this case covering the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928. I submit to Your Honour that the members of the public accounts committee have a perfect right to request production of the files and to examine officers of whatever department may be involved in regard to any item included in that year's report, and to follow that item as many years as it goes back in the records of parliament. If that is the case, then the submission to parliament to-day is unnecessary. If the adoption of this report is to be accepted as establishing the ruling of the chairman of the committee that it was not competent for the committee to go back beyond the current report of the Auditor General without a further reference to the house, then I would oppose very, very strongly the adoption of the report. And that is the understanding which we on this side of the house have of the ruling of the chairman of the committee. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has made what I conceive to be a perfectly proper interpretation of the rule, namely, that it is competent for the committee to follow an item back without reference whatsoever to the house; and if the house agrees to that then, so far as I am concerned, I have nothing more to say on the subject. If, on the other hand, the adoption of the report nullifies the opinion expressed by the minister, who is not at the moment leading, then it is a very serious matter.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I intimated that it was the Speaker who would determine the rule.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): The objection to the report, it seems to me, is this: It must be admitted that when any item in the present Auditor General's Report is under consideration, which relates to an antecedent contract running through two or three prior years, the committee has the undoubted power and authority to proceed to investigate the antecedents of that item, if it is, for example, a continuing contract or a contract on which payments were made, say, three years ago, the final payment falling within the last Auditor General's Report. You have the right to trace the item back to the initiation of the contract under which it arose. That seems to be conceded by the Minister of Railways. Now this resolution assumes, first, that the committee cannot investigate any item further back than the year which has just closed.

Mr. DUNNING: I read it carefully—

Mr. CAHAN: I have it before me.

Mr. DUNNING: —and I find in it no reference—

Mr. CAHAN: I find in it a clear intimation or implication to that effect. The report states:

> It is deemed advisable by your committee that certain other items which are contained in the Auditor General's report for the previous year also be taken under consideration.

That, if it passed, would create, it seems to me, the clear implication that although the item which appears in this last annual report might be investigated, it could be investigated only in case that the previous Auditor General's report is brought before the committee. And it is that implication which we oppose in this report. If it is the clear understanding that when an item has arisen in the last Auditor General's report, relating to a continuing contract, that item should be or may be investigated by the committee back to the last year and to the preceding year, or for any number of years until you reach the source from which the item arose—until you reach the contract under which it arose—then the case is different. It is therefore the implication in this report, that the committee cannot go beyond the last year unless by order of the house, to which we take exception. It is suggested that under the proposed order you could not go back beyond the second preceding year, whereas, as a matter of practice in this house, the item should if necessary be traced to its origin.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it has been made quite clear from this side of the house that we do not differ at all from hon. gentlemen opposite in the view that any item being investigated by the public accounts committee may be traced back to any number of years. That is perfectly clear. With respect to this particular report, we on this side of the house, might take the view if we wished to be unduly suspicious, that hon. gentlemen opposite in not wishing to have the report adopted, see some desire on the part of Liberals to have some items which appear in the 1927 report and which do not appear in the 1928 report not referred to the committee for investigation, because of what the investigation may lead to. I do not think that any purpose of that kind is contemplated. The committee was genuine in wanting to clear up to the satisfaction of everyone the difference of view which took place the other day, and if we are agreed on the main point, that an item may be traced back to its source, and that this report was brought down with a view of helping to make that possible in order to remove any difficulties in that direction, we may adopt the report.

Mr. BENNETT: No, withdraw the report; otherwise, as my right hon. friend will see, it limits investigation to 1927 and 1928.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. It may be that the majority would like to have that particular report referred to the committee—

Mr. BENNETT: It is now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that is the 1927 report. The 1928 report is the one which has been referred to the committee. I hope my hon. friend does not want to be placed in the position of preventing the 1927 report from being referred to the committee.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did not the Prime Minister, at the last session, say that there would be no objection to considering items in the Auditor General's report, 1926 and 1927? That is covered by the motion, and so long as it is understood, and the Prime Minister's statement implements that understanding, there is no quarrel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I not only said it last session but I say it now, and would be prepared to say it again next year.

Mr. BENNETT: Speaking to the point of order, it seems to me, as the Prime Minister has said, that we are more or less agreed. It does not seem to me to serve the purpose of the Prime Minister to adopt the report in the language in which it now appears, because, as worded, it will be a precedent with respect to the necessity of coming back to the house to obtain authority to deal with matters of this kind which have not originated in the current Auditor General's report. If the report of the committee is so amended as to provide for the consideration of items in the manner indicated, then we are all agreed upon it; but it cannot be accepted in the terms in which it now appears.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that certain members of the committee have asked for the production of documents which are referred to, not in the 1928 Auditor General's report but in the 1927 report, items which have not their origin in 1928? If that is the case, the resolution I submit is a perfectly proper one.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's question, but the chairman of the committee no doubt knows. The hon. gentleman himself was present and he would know.

Mr. POWER: I was not there yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is perfectly clear now—and we are agreed on this point—that the only question is as regards the language of the motion. It is desirable to have the motion so worded that it shall not be a precedent which would make it appear necessary to come back to this house to get authority to investigate items to their source.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have asked from the beginning that the motion stand.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the fact that the chairman is absent, and as the Prime Minister has properly said he has signed something which he might not desire to have someone else amend, the motion might stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: The report cannot be amended by the house but there may be a motion to refer it back to the committee with a view to its amendment in certain respects. I understand that it is the wish of the house that the motion stand, but if it is intended that the report be amended it must be referred back to the committee. Bourinot says:

> A report may be referred back to a committee for further consideration, or with instructions giving them power to amend the same in any respect.

Mr. POWER: Someone who was present yesterday must know what happened.

Mr. BENNETT: Not always.

Mr. POWER: Surely some member of the committee can tell us whether or not the items which are required to be discussed had their origin in the 1928 report.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not been suggested here that it was so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the wish of the house was that the motion should stand.

Mr. ERNST: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr Ernst, seconded by Mr. Barber, that the debate on the motion be adjourned. If the debate is not adjourned, hon. members who have already spoken might speak again to-morrow.

Motion stands.

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac) moved:

That the recommendation contained in the tenth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines respecting the reprinting of Bill No. 22, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NEWSPAPER VAPAUS

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): I beg to present a petition regarding a Finnish language newspaper published in Sudbury under the name of "Vapaus" by the communist Finnish Organization of Canada, asking for the suppression of the paper upon what appears to the petitioners good and sufficient grounds. This petition is signed by the following organizations: For the Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L., Sudbury branch, R. H. Hall, president; for the Sudbury High and Technical School Board, by the president; for the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, by Clara E. Andress; for the Women's Canadian Club by Catherine Moyle; for St. Joseph's Roman Catholic church, Sudbury, by T. H. Trainor; for St. Andrews United church, Sudbury, by Helen Parlow Matheson; for the Sons of England Benefit Society, Sudbury, by Charles H. Taylor; for the Catholic Women's League of Canada, Sudbury, by Teresa Racicot; for the Catholic Women's League of Canada, Copper Cliff, by Minnie F. O'Connor; for the Baptist church, Sudbury, by William Hay; for the Loyal Orange Lodge, Duke of York No. 1088, Sudbury, by A. E. Poulton and for the Catholic Women's League of Canada, Diocese of Sault Ste. Marie, by Teresa Racicot.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

Mr. DICKIE:

What is the total cost commissioned of the Canadian National Steamships, (a) Lady Nelson; (b) Lady Somers; (c) Lady Drake; (d) Lady Rodney; (e) Lady Hawkins?

Mr. DUNNING: 1. The Lady Nelson is the only one of these five steamships as to which a reasonably complete statement of total cost is yet available, the figure being approximately $1,538,270.00.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was the total expenditure in British Columbia each year by the Department of Fisheries since the inception of the department?
2. What was the total of the pack of sockeye salmon, by districts, in British Columbia, each year since the inception of the Department of Fisheries?
3. What was the yearly expenditure of the Department of Fisheries in the Fraser river district of British Columbia since its inception?
4. What was the yearly pack of sockeye salmon in the Fraser river district of British Columbia since the inception of the Department of Fisheries?
5. What was the amount of sockeye fry released in the Fraser river, its tributaries, including lakes, each year since the inception of the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. LAPOINTE (for Mr. Cardin):

1. See Fisheries Annual Report 1927-28, page 202.
2. See same report, pages 86-95.
3. Certain services are used for all districts. The cost of them for any one is not apportioned.
4. See above cited report, page 94.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

Mr. KAISER:

1. Under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the regulations relating to the same, how many animals in each province of Canada were affected during the fiscal year 1928-29?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

2. How many of each class of animal, in each province, were slaughtered under government authority during the above mentioned period?
3. How many owners in each province were compensated for loss of such animals during the said period, and how much was paid to each?
4. How many claims in each province of the Dominion on account of such slaughters are unsettled as of date April 15, 1929?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

ST. WALBURG—BONNYVILLE

The house resumed, from April 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 54, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from St. Walburg, in the province of Saskatchewan, to Bonnyville, in the province of Alberta—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): This bill has been considered by the committee, previously and when it was before us last progress was reported in order that I might have the legal officers of the department give consideration to a point raised by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) with respect to a note to the schedule. I think I can meet my hon. friend's point by moving that the bottom line of the schedule as it now appears be dropped to below the printing, which will mean that the qualification to the schedule will become a part of the schedule itself which will, I think, effect the object desired.

Mr. SPENCER: How will that read?

The CHAIRMAN: It does not change the reading at all.

Mr. DUNNING: The reading is not changed, but by dropping that line to below the printing in the bill the qualification will be included as a part of the schedule, which will overcome the objection raised the other day.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ALLIANCE—YOUNGSTOWN—DOBSON

The house resumed, from April 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Alliance to a point near Youngstown or Dobson in the province of Alberta—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a different amendment to this bill because the criticism was founded on different reasons. First, Mr.

Chairman, I move that in the last line of section 1 the word "the" be struck out and the letter "A" added after the word "schedule" in the same line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Now I move that in the fourth line of section 4 the word "schedule" be struck out and the word "schedules" inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Now I move that a new section be added after section 8, which will have the effect of making what was formerly a qualification a part of the bill itself. It will read as follows:

In the event of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company commencing to build within one year and completing in two years a line from Coronation to near Youngstown or Dobson, and joint and equal running rights are secured from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company between Lorraine and near Youngstown or Dobson for the company, that part of the line authorized by this act between Lorraine and a point near Youngstown or Dobson shall not be constructed and estimates of cost of construction shall be as set out in schedule "B" to this act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 9 will require to be renumbered as section 10, and I move that the letter "A" be inserted after the word "schedule."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that a new schedule, schedule "B," be added. Schedule "B" is mileage 9.5; the amount to be expended, $408,500; average expenditure per mile, $43,000. The effect of this will be that if the agreements contemplated between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways is carried into effect, then schedule "B" is the authority. If, through any unforeseen circumstances, these arrangements are not carried out, then schedule "A" becomes the authority for the construction of the line in question.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 130, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Definition.

Mr. BENNETT: These independent lines acquired would not become part of the system unless by order in council?

Mr. DUNNING: The section in that regard is identical with the present section. At the initiation it was not possible to include legislatively these various companies, but from time to time, as circumstances permitted, they have been brought into the system. In that respect, the section is the same.

Mr. BENNETT: Take the Kent Northern, for instance. This line should ipso facto become part of the Canadian National system, because that is the only way in which you can secure the proper operation of the line. When a purchase is made, it is made on the assumption that it is desirable in the public interests that the line should become part of the general system. The order in council probably would be passed, but my querry is whether or not there should be any question about our legislatively doing it, as we have done in some instances, without waiting for the order in council. Something might happen which might induce a government—I do not say this government—not to pass the order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: To use the illustration of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the Kent Northern; that point would be covered, because the Canadian National acquires the physical proporties of the other company.

Mr. BENNETT: And it is merged into the system?

Mr. DUNNING: It is merged into the system. The feature in the old act, and which is continued in this amendment, only relates to the companies which become part of the system as such but which are not merged in the corporate sense with it.

Mr. BENNETT: By the acquisition of shares?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Application of Railway Act and Expropriation Act to company.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned this matter the other day. It is very difficult for the small property owners to have recourse to the exchequer court, and these matters could be more readily dealt with by the county or district judge. I gather from the amendment which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has said he proposes to move that he thinks the suggestion is meritorious. I mentioned $1,000 the other day, but the minister proposes to make that sum $2,500, so that the exchequer court will deal with all cases in which the amount exceeds $2,500. I think that is a very good solution, because the $2,500 will bring these cases within the jurisdiction of the supreme court and if a litigant felt that there was some great principle at stake he could take an appeal to that court.

The amendment contains the words, "where the claim does not exceed $2,500." That is rather indefinite because a man might claim $5,000 and the government might make an offer of $2,000. I think it should be made absolutely clear and the test should be certain. As it now stands I do not think the test is certain, because we do not know to whose claim this refers.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to get the matter before the committee, Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment which the leader of the opposition has just referred to.

Mr. GEARY: Will the minister read it, please?

Mr. DUNNING: It would be an addition following the word "thereof" in the eleventh line of subsection (d) of section 2, and reads as follows:

Provided that such compensation may in any case where a claim does not exceed $2,500, be ascertained under the provisions of the Railway act beginning with notice of expropriation to the opposite party.

I discussed the point just raised by the leader of the opposition with the law officers from the point of view of the actual operation of such a procedure, and I am advised that "beginning with notice of expropriation to the opposite party" does immediately involve the making of a claim for compensation by the opposite party. We are therefore making the amount $2,500 based upon the claim made by the party who is being expropriated. I raised the amount to $2,500, having in mind the factor to which my hon. friend referred, namely, that it would allow greater latitude while at the same time leaving the operation of the amendment to be based upon the claim of the party whose property was being expropriated, rather than upon the action of the company who was expropriating.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be better to say "Where the claim of the owner does not exceed $2,500," and thereby remove any possible doubt as to the meaning of the language?

Mr. DUNNING: I defer to my hon. friend's legal knowledge in that regard, but, as he is aware, in expropriation proceedings other factors than ownership enter.

Mr. BENNETT: I know.

Mr. DUNNING: I am therefore afraid of complicating the language. The use of the term "opposite party" later on is intended to apply generally and to include owners or tenants or any others who might have an interest in the property. Probably my hon. friend would examine the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I have examined it. The point that I desire to make is that the term "opposite party" does not convey the meaning the minister desires to have us understand. I should think we want to make it perfectly clear that where a claimant sets up a demand for more than $2,500, he must go to the exchequer court, but where the demand does not exceed $2,500, the matter may be heard by the district court under the provisions of the Railway Act. The amendment reads:

Beginning with the notice of expropriation by the opposite party.

Should that not be "by the railway company?"

Mr. DUNNING: The wording is:

Beginning with notice of expropriation to the opposite party.

That has reference also to the provisions of the Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would be better if it read: "Notice of expropriation by the railway company." As my hon. friend will recall, this is the practice: first of all, the plan is filed at the registry office. Then notice is given of intention to take, indicating how much money will be paid. The owners or those interested, if dissatisfied, may go to the district court to have that compensation assessed. The difficulty is that the claim must not exceed $2,500, but the man has no opportunity to set up his claim until after the government or, at least, the railway, has filed its plan. The notice to take is the first step; then there is the opportunity to decide upon the sufficiency of the offer. The claimant has the option of indicating that he will not accept the amount offered, and that he requires a larger sum. Would it not be better to say: "After notice has been given by the railway company of expropriation," rather than "to the opposite party?" In that case you have no doubt that it begins from the time you give notice.

Mr. DUNNING: I am looking up the sections of the Railway Act. I always hesitate to change a purely legal draft without being sure of my ground. Section 215 of the Railway Act is the section dealing with the matter. It reads:

Preliminary to proceeding to arbitration to fix compensation or damages the company shall serve upon the opposite party—

The same language is used, you see.

—a notice, which shall contain

(a) a description of the lands to be taken, or of the powers intended to be exercised with regard to any lands therein described;

(b) a declaration of readiness to pay a certain sum or rent, as the case may be, as compensation for such lands or for such damages; and

(c) a notification that if within ten days after the service of this notice, or, where the notice is served by publication, within one month after the first publication thereof, the party to whom the notice is addressed does not give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by the company, either he or the company will be entitled to apply to have the compensation fixed by arbitration as provided in this act.

Apparently what the officers had in mind was to transfer the option of placing the case before the exchequer court or the district court to the claimant, rather than to retain that option themselves. I think that has merit.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not objecting to that, but does the provision make it clear that a claim which a man sets up for $5,000 has to go to the exchequer court, although he might ultimately receive $2,000?

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is clear.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that what it is intended to do?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Having regard to the fact that this country is so large and the facilities of treating with matters in the exchequer court are so limited, when you fix $2,500 as the criterion, as the minister has done, I think it is an exceedingly fair proposition. That will meet most of the cases I had in mind the other day. But I think it should be fixed in the statute itself as being either the sum offered by the railway company on the one hand, or claimed by the owner on the other. As the matter stands now, the man who might claim $3,000 would have to go to the exchequer court although he might be awarded $2,500. I am only suggesting to the minister, in the light of my experience, that it is hardly fair to ask persons from whom land has to be taken by expropriation, that they should go to the exchequer court. It is too expensive; it requires the employment of solicitors and lawyers to deal with forms and procedure, whereas the other method is very simple. I have known many men conduct their cases successfully before district courts and while I do not desire in any sense to delay the minister's legislation, it seems to me it would be preferable to say "where the sum offered by the railway company does not exceed $2,500." In other words, the law officers of the minister's department have told him to put the onus on the unfortunate owner. I suggest that it is rather desirable to put it on the railway company. I only do that because, as the minister himself realizes, in a province as large as Saskatchewan, for instance, there are many cases in which a man has his land taken from him by the railway, values it at three or four thousand dollars, and may get only $2,500, and the costs in exchequer court proceedings would be very considerable, and the court only goes to that country once a year. I do not think it conduces to the orderly conduct of affairs, in view of the small sums of money affected in this way, to put the onus on the individual I leave it entirely to the minister, but if the responsibility were mine, I think I would prefer to put it the other way and let the sum tendered by the railway company be the determining factor.

Mr. DUNNING: I confess to the committee that the sum suggested to me by the law officers of the railway was less than $2,500. It was in fact $600, to correspond with the normal jurisdiction of the district court judge

Mr. BENNETT: They have a jurisdiction of $1,000 in some of the provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know much law, but I happen to know—and this I pointed out to them—that strangely enough the district court judge apparently had wider financial jurisdiction under the Railway Act than under the act setting up his court in the first place. That is an anomaly that presently exists. Therefore I saw no reason to adopt any standard contained in any district court act, but for the reason advanced by my hon. friend I would rather raise the limit in favour of the claimant. With regard to $2,500, what I have in mind is the usual small expropriation for right of way which involves the crossing of a farm. There are very few farm crossings nowadays that take any such sum as $2,500. I had in mind that general situation in setting the sum.

Apparently the only point my hon. friend asks me to consider is whether I should not go a little bit further and make the basis that the jurisdiction should be determined rather by the offer made by the railway company than by the claim made by the owner. I would like to hear that point discussed a little further, if other hon. gentlemen who have had experience with these expropriation matters would give me their advice. I am quite open-minded about it, with this one qualification: More and more the exchequer court of Canada, in connection with small cases, is using that provision of the Exchequer Court Act or Expropriation Act which permits them to have hearings held by delegates of the court, rather than by the court itself sitting in different parts of the country. That practice is growing, and wisely I think, in connection with small expropriation claims. That is to say, the exchequer court may delegate a district court judge to hear the case, the district court judge not deciding it, but referring his evidence and his opinion thereon to the exchequer court, which in turn renders the decision.

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt very much if they have any power to do that in this case.

Mr. DUNNING: Not under the Exchequer Court Act?

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but this is the appointment of a tribunal to deal with a definite matter. That tribunal is the exchequer court, and the judgment must be a judgment of that court. That is one of the reasons why I pointed out to the minister the desirability of making it as easy as possible, because the poor unfortunate who fails in his claim will have nothing left, because of there being so much machinery to put in action. Although the exchequer court holds local sittings at various towns and cities in Canada, it is domiciled, so to speak, in Ottawa. It was that which prompted my suggestion the other day. I think the minister has met it exceedingly fairly. But I still doubt, having regard to the very great area of Canada and to the fact that there is but one court with two judges, whether it is desirable to fix the jurisdiction at $2,500 as the sum offered by the railway company, and if any greater sum is offered by the railway company, recourse can be had to the exchequer court. If it is less than $2,500, the claimant can avail himself of the provision of the Railway Act. I do not think that is unfair. But the minister is charged with responsibility in connection with this matter. The money comes out of the people of the country in the long run.

Mr. DUNNING: I am prepared to adopt for a moment the comfortable position of a judge on the bench and listen to argument. I am willing to make either decision in the judgment of this committee. If my hon friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has any suggestion to make, I shall be pleased to hear it. Personally I think there is a difference of opinion between the lawyers themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say, without trespassing too much on the time of the committee, that usually in arriving at the sum to be offered, the railway company is governed by the report of the engineers and appraisers. They realize that the responsibility is theirs, having compulsorily taken the land in the first instance, and they usually desire to ensure that they will not be compelled to pay a larger sum than they offer. I have been engaged in many of these cases both for the railway companies and the owners. I recall the entrance of the Grand Trunk into Calgary, in connection with which I acted for a very large number of small owners, some of whose lots it split in two. The railway company offered what they conceived to be a fair land value, but it was not adequate compensation for the lots, and the owners succeeded in getting a somewhat larger sum. I am speaking merely in the public interest in this matter, and I am sure the minister wants to place on the statute books a provision that will work no hardship to any honest claimant, at the same time protecting the public treasury from settlements that are forced, so to speak, by reason of local or other pressure that may be brought to bear in connection with matters of this kind. The local tribunal is a very complete answer, as the minister knows, because the county court judge understands the situation better than a person not residing in the locality.

Mr. GEARY: It seems to me that you are on sounder ground in basing the jurisdiction on the value made by the company rather than by the claimant. I think experience shows that it is quite likely that in most cases the railway company will be more nearly right than the claimant's idea of what he should get. The company is also better versed in the procedure, and better versed in judging what is going to result from the evidence that is given, and as to the sort of award the court is likely to make. So it seems to me that the company's estimate of damage is more likely to be right than is the estimate of the claimant, and I think you are on a sounder basis if you take the company's proposition up to $2,500 as being the basis of jurisdiction, rather than taking the claim made by a man who may have very exaggerated ideas as to the value of his land, and who who may be kept out of this simple court because his ideas are exaggerated.

Mr. BENNETT: And the responsibility for going into the other court will always be his, if you have it the way we suggest.

Mr. DUNNING: The officers of the company who deal with these matters advise me that the most extraordinarily exaggerated demands for compensation arise mainly in connection with small compensation claims—that the larger the actual amount involved, the less the degree of exaggeration in the claim of the claimant. That is the broad experience.

Mr. GEARY: That is natural too.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and I have no doubt that the officers, in considering it, had in mind that the legal advisers of the claimant would pay due regard to the court before which the claimant would have to appear in the first instance and present his claim in connection with these small amounts. However, in order not to take up further time, as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is anxious and ready to go on. I would suggest that we follow this course: strike out the word "claim" in the second line of the amendment, and insert instead the words "offer of the company." With this understanding, that we will report the bill out of committee and leave it for third reading in order that I may make absolutely sure that no complication will arise as a result of the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that will cover it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not question the legal advice of my hon. friend, but he will understand my desire to get the legal advice of the officers of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that entirely covers the situation, Mr. Chairman. I quite appreciate the minister's position. His duty is to take responsibility on the advice of his legal officers, and we do not happen at the moment to be in that happy position. If on third reading it is thought desirable we can again deal with the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The section will now read:

provided that such compensation may in any case where the offer of the company does not exceed, $2,500.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Amendment agreed to.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 122, page 31 of the estimates:

Maritime provinces generally — Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $50,000.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Before this item carries, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the minister, as I have for the past four years, to the most disgraceful condition of the post office facilities in the town of Oxford, Nova Scotia. When discussing this matter last year or the year before I asked the minister whether this new post office building was on his list for consideration of those that I understand have to be first submitted to the treasury board for approval, and he intimated that it was, and that the estimated cost was $35,000. There is nothing in the main estimates this year for the much-needed post office facilities in this town. The people there have been clamouring for a better service. The post office is conducted, as I have said at least four times before, in a shack. The population of Oxford is about 1,500, it is the hub of the county, and is the centre of several rural routes. Petitions have been circulated and forwarded to the government by the town council, and the board of trade, and many prominent citizens have urged the Department of Public Works to improve these deplorable facilities. May I urge once more on the minister that when the supplementary estimates are brought down this year provision be made therein for building a post office at Oxford. It would be well, I think, when the minister is visiting in the east, to view this particular part of the province and see for himself in what an inadequate building the Oxford post office is located. Recently the customs office was closed there and in future this branch of the public service as well will have to be conducted in this shack of a building which will cause the public still greater inconvenience. I appeal to the minister on the grounds mentioned and also on the decency of conducting public business in a proper standardized building that he include in the supplementary estimates this year a vote of $35,000, which has been estimated by his departmental engineers to be sufficient to provide adequate postal facilities at this point.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the total amount spent under this item last year?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): For a number of years the item has been fixed at $43,000, but it has always been found inadequate. Therefore we are asking for $50,000 this year.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): May I have a statement from the minister in this connection? I think I have been fair and reasonable in the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I apologize to my hon. friend if he thinks I am not paying attention to his request. I have again made a note of it, along with many other similar requests. I do not deny what the hon. gentleman says with regard to the advantage to be derived by having a new public building at Oxford, and perhaps if funds were available we could not justify refusing his request, but I do say that this is one of the places which is not any worse off than a number of other places where we have had to refuse such requests. However, his request is receiving consideration, and I shall be very glad to accept his very courteous invitation to visit Oxford to look personally into the situation if I get an opportunity.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I omitted to say that the Post Office Department instructed me in the past that the building at Oxford is totally inadequate for the proper performance of their duties. It is not a case of desiring a building simply for the ornamentation of the town; it is absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of public business. I shall be delighted to have the minister come to the county. I would not urge him to visit us just when there is an election, but on any other occasion he will be most welcome.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Thank you.

Mr. MANION: Are you taking one item at a time, Mr. Chairman?

Sir EUGENE FISET: No, the whole.

Mr. SHORT: They want them in bulk in Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN: We have been taking the whole resolution for the other provinces.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Surely the minister will explain some of these items.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to give all the information available relating to the different items. I would point out that the total asked for in connection with public buildings in the whole province of Quebec is under $1,000,000. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will feel that we have exercised the same care in granting only those that were absolutely essential as we are trying to take in respect to the other provinces.

Mr. MANION: We are not criticizing these votes but the item is a big one and we want a general explanation in regard to the more important votes. Here for example is $100,000 in connection with accommodation in military stores. The minister might tell us what need there is for this.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This item deserves attention. At the present time the military stores in Quebec are housed in quarters which are needed by the Quebec Battlefields Commission, who have moved to other quarters. The suggestion has been made that rather elaborate buildings should be provided and that they should be moved into these buildings. It is also suggested that if they are moved during the present year they be moved to the Carriere Lainé property in Levis, which belongs to the government and is now vacant. All we are asking for is the cost of removal; we are not making any provision at the present time for other buildings.

Mr. MANION: Take, for example, the item in connection with the Savard Park hospital, amounting to $80,000, of which this is a revote of $48,000. How much was spent in the past year and how much will be spent altogether?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount is for repairs and addition to hospital begun in 1928-29 under contract with Scott Brothers of Scotstown, Quebec, involving the sum of $83,870, and also for general alterations and repairs to the old building. The amount already spent is $43,736, and the revote asked for now is $48,000, together with a new vote of $32,000.

Mr. MANION: Is that the total?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the total for building work.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is this a quarantine hospital?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many patients were there last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry I cannot give that information. Those who come in will be under the jurisdiction of either the Department of Health or the Department of Immigration. I think the Department of Health would be able to furnish the information my hon. friend asks for. This accommodation has been requested in order to enable the Department of Health properly to carry out their duties at this particular point. The contract was entered into last year.

Mr. McGIBBON: Where was the work carried on before?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is not a new hospital but merely an addition to an existing hospital which has proved inadequate.

Mr. GARDINER: This is in connection with immigration work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, a quarantine station.

Mr. SHORT: How many of these items in this vote for Quebec are for new buildings?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There must be twelve or thirteen new buildings, nearly all small.

Mr. SHORT: You are dealing fairly generously with Quebec in the matter of buildings compared with the maritime provinces. There are two new buildings in Nova Scotia, onc in New Brunswick and none in Prince Edward Island. In other words, there are three new buildings in the whole of the maritime provinces compared with twelve or thirteen in Quebec. I do not want to complain about what Quebec is getting, but I call attention to the meagre amount provided for the maritimes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is about in proportion to population.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the population of Beauharnois?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Robb and a few others.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister tell us whether this amount in the estimates is the total; what is the total cost of the new building, and will there be another vote next year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is not the total.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It will not be the total?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The amount of $10,000 in connection with Beauharnois is to provide for the purchase of a site and towards the erection thereon of a public building for postal purposes. The chief superintendent of post office services reports that the present accommodation is entirely inadequate and he asks for this building. It is contemplated that the total building, fittings, concreting of sidewalks, contingencies and superintendence will run to about $30,000. The population of the town is 2,400, while that of the parish outside the town limits is about 2,700 more. This is one of the towns which are growing quite rapidly.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal revenue is $5,691.97. This is a district where it is expected there will be a very extensive development in a short time.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister a moment ago said that this estimate for Quebec was a very moderate one in relation to this year's votes. Here is a case where, as he tells us, the sum of $10,000 appears in the estimates whereas building and outfit will cost $30,000. Does that apply pretty generally to the rest of the estimates? Let us get the history of the next one and we shall be able to determine better. Will the minister give us some information in regard to the Cowansville public building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the case of Cowansville it is expected that the building will cost $41,000. This is towards the purchase of site and erection of building.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the population?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In view of the representations made by the district superintendent in his report regarding the inadequacy of accommodation afforded by the premises in which the post office is at present located, and the impossibility of providing improved accommodation in the present building, it is felt that this expenditure is warranted. It is recommended that an item be placed in the estimates for the erection of a public building at that point which will be adequate to meet the present and future needs of the community so far as postal facilities are concerned. At present Cowansville has a population of between 2,400 and 2,500, which represents an increase of about 100 per cent in the last ten years, and it is stated that there is not a single unoccupied store or dwelling in that town. The report further goes on to say, "I was in the office during the last inspection and found the lobby crowded to suffocation. It was only with the greatest difficulty that a person could force his way from one end of the lobby to the other." Then there is an additional difficulty here; there is also an objection to the present location of the office. It is situated at the intersection of two highways and in the summer time, with the continuous traffic over these two roads and the parking of buggies and automobiles belonging to patrons awaiting their mail, it is a very dangerous spot. In 1928 the revenue was $6,768, an increase from $5,327 in five or six years.

Mr. McGIBBON: What was the revenue in 1927?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue was $6,119 in 1927.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely the minister does not claim that to be a remarkable increase.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I was directing attention to the fact that in 1920 the revenue was $5,237 and that last year it was $6,768.

Mr. McGIBBON: That does not indicate that the place is growing so rapidly as was indicated by the minister's first statement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will also notice that in 1927-28 the customs revenue was $148,775 at this point, and this building is for customs as well as postal purposes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: From a cursory glance at these two items it would appear that they represent only about 25 per cent of the total expenditure which is to be made, and I suppose next year we will be asked to vote more money. So it would seem that the minister is not very accurate in his statement that the votes asked for are small, because the total cost of these buildings will be three or four times the amount of these appropriations. The minister says this is a case of need, but let me direct his attention to a case of need in my own locality.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLIN: My hon. friends need not laugh, this place is not in my constituency at all. It is a town whose population has doubled or trebled in the last few years; at present it has a population of about 5,000. The attention of the minister has been directed to this place repeatedly, and although the revenue is greater than that obtained from both these places, no accommodation at all is provided. The minister knows the town to which I refer; I am speaking of Thorold, which is in a constituency adjoining my own, where the need is possibly greater than that of any place of which I have knowledge.

Mr. BANCROFT: Where is the member representing that town?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The member has spoken about it; no doubt he has gone personally to the minister and I have heard him mention in this house the need which exists, but nothing has been done. It appears to me that the charge made the other day with respect to Nova Scotia could be made again in this case. In Nova Scotia only three towns were provided with public buildings, but the government were mighty sure that those towns were in constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen opposite. The minister said money was being spent in Halifax, but that money is spent to benefit the whole province and the whole Dominion. I am quite sure that if Halifax alone were considered not a copper would be spent, judging from what has been done elsewhere. The same thing applies in this case, and I would like to see a little more consideration given these small places which are growing rapidly and which need accommodation. There are several towns in this list about which I do not propose to say anything; with regard to Grand'Mère and Farnham, for instance, probably these buildings are needed, but I do believe that some of the other places mentioned could very well wait until more pressing needs are filled.

Mr. GEARY: Is the minister going to put a clock in this building also?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Clocks are getting pretty expensive, and we are cutting down expense as far as possible. That will be a matter for consideration.

Mr. GEARY: I might just suggest to the minister that since a clock was put in the Glencoe building he might finish the job and put in a weather vane so that he might always know which way the wind is blowing.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is more difficult in certain other ridings to tell which way the wind is blowing than in the riding to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MANION: Once more I want to direct the attention of the minister to a matter which I mentioned last year and which on one or two occasions I have taken up with him privately. The post office in my city has not been repaired for a great many years, although the city has grown very much since that building was erected. The accommodation is very insufficient; at Christmas time they find it almost impossible to carry on the work, and in general the post office is badly in need of some extension or alteration, not necessarily costing a great deal of money but sufficient to put it in good condition. I would like the minister to give consideration to this matter in the estimates next year. I am not going to press him to place an amount in the supplementary estimates this year, but just as a friendly suggestion I would say that next year, the year before an election, would be a good time to put in some work on that building. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in discussing this question now but I hope the minister will give it serious consideration when he is preparing his estimates next year. I think it should have been done this year, but for the moment I am going to overlook that in the hope that some attention will be given this matter in order that fair play may be given the people of that city.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I would like to direct attention to a situation which exists in my own county, where a public building is absolutely necessary, and to ask the minister if, during the recess, he received a delegation from the town of Georgetown, with reference to a post office in that place. Perhaps he might also say whether or not he received a delegation from the town of Oakville requesting some improvements there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Georgetown, in common with a great many other places, sent a delegation which made certain representations. Perhaps I can answer my hon. friend and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) at the same time. No doubt a building is needed at Georgetown, as well as improvements at Fort William and Port Arthur. I think I can fairly say that the Georgetown situation perhaps is not as urgent as the situation at Fort William, and neither of them are as urgent as those which have received attention.

Mr. BENNETT: Such as Hantsport.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Hantsport perhaps was the most urgent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What about Thorold?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Thorold is a place which has nearly doubled in population in the last three years, but I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that that place is not the only one in that part of the country which has nearly doubled in population during the last three or four years. I know the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) will be fair; he knows that we have had to incur heavy expenditures in that very riding to provide for a public building at Niagara Falls.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The necessity there was caused by a fire.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is quite true, but it is also due to the great increase in business.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is for the general good of the country, not of the city.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend will agree that we have been treating that section of the country with great consideration. I would say to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) that the same thing would apply to Georgetown.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): The expenditure at Niagara Falls is necessitated by the protection which this country is giving to the exportation of liquor to the United States; the government is spending far too much money in that direction. Why should we protect the United States?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was a fire and explosion at Niagara Falls which practically demolished the whole building.

Mr. GARDINER: What exploded?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The boiler.

Mr. STEVENS: The building must have been full of booze.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We intend to erect a building which I hope will be in keeping with the growing needs of that community. It will be a much more expensive building than the previous one.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am very curious to know in what riding the city of Chatham is?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is not as well up on the geography of the western part of Ontario as upon the geography of other sections. Chatham is in one of the most beautiful ridings in that great western Ontario section, a riding which was represented in this house by my hon. friend's brother.

Mr. POWER: And well represented too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it received pretty good treatment from this government when my hon. friend's brother was here, and I hope it will continue to receive as much consideration.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They needed the post office as much when he was here as they do now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue was hardly as large. I would tell my hon. friend that this is a very delightful part of the country, next to Middlesex one of the finest.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has been very good in giving me information. Will he go down the line and tell me in what constituency the town of Exeter is?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Exeter is in another excellent constituency; it is in South Huron.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister tell me what constituency Fort Frances is in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is the constituency of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan).

Mr. ELLIOTT: Another constituency which is exceedingly well represented.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I do not want the minister to get away from Georgetown. Georgetown is one of the most needy places in the Dominion of Canada at the present time as far as post office accommodation is concerned. As far back as fifteen years ago an estimate was put in for the purpose of building a post office, and the people purchased a site and have had it waiting there all these years. The post office is very small, the entrance to it is poor and the accommodation for the public is about as bad as anything you could find in this country. There is considerable revenue from the office as a number of rural mail routes start from this point. I would like the minister to take this matter under serious consideration and endeavour to implement the request made by the delegation which came down here asking for the early erection of a post office building. I would like to know if the minister gave any encouragement to that delegation as to the erection of a post office building within, say, the next year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not like to say that we got down very definitely to dates, but it is one of the places which must have a public building some time in the future, and that not very distant. I would direct my hon. friend's attention to this fact, which I think distinguishes Georgetown from the two places mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln—probably as conversant with Ontario in general as any member of the house. As far back as 1914 my hon. friend's friends thought that a building was necessary at Exeter, and a site was purchased. The same thing applies to Fort Frances, referred to by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) on many occasions, and I think he will be one of the first to stand up and say that he thinks the necessity for a building at Fort Frances was very urgent. A site was purchased for $16,500 on September 28, 1912, and a site was purchased in Exter on March 18, 1914. Unfortunately Georgetown was not considered quite as urgent at that time by my hon. friend's friends, because during the time they were buying sites in these other more urgent places, no site was selected for a building in the town of Georgetown. I think that is one of the best tests of urgency.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I differ with the hon. minister; a site was purchased and it is there to-day. As I said before, an estimate was provided in 1914 for the building of a post office in Georgetown.

Mr. McGIBBON: Seeing that the hon. minister is in such good humour this afternoon and as he is admitting that the revenues are quite large, I am going to call his attention to the condition of the wharfage at Bracebridge. As the minister knows, that part of the country is very dependent upon the tourist trade and during the summer months great demands are made upon the wharf facilities. The department has the information regarding the needed improvements there. A new wharf is not needed and it is not going to cost much money, but the improvements would be of very great assistance to navigation. I hope when the minister brings down his supplementary estimates he will be good enough to include this small item of a few hundred dollars. I thank the minister for his promises.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let us have no misunderstanding about this. I am not going to quarrel with my hon. friend about the necessities of the case, but we are dealing now with public buildings and he is referring to a matter which comes under the heading of harbours and rivers. This matter has received consideration by the engineering department, and the representations which have been made by Bracebridge and several other places in that section of the country are receiving the very best attention.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I would correct my statement. I said there was a site or plot for a post office in Georgetown, purchased not by the government, but by the town itself. In 1914 an amount was placed in the estimates for the erection of that post office, but the intervention of the war prevented the building of it. At that time it was considered very necessary to have a post office in that town. I am bringing the fact to the attention of the minister in order to assist him in coming to a decision.

Mr. CHAPLIN: To come back to the Fort Frances public building for which the sum of $35,000 is placed in the estimates, what is the total cost of that building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will be much more than $35,000. This amount of $35,000 is required towards the erection of a public building on a site on Scott street, at the corner of Portage avenue, for postal purposes.

Mr. MANION: That is the same site that was purchased some time ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. The proposed building will be a two-story, L-shaped brick structure, having a frontage of 94 feet on Scott street by a depth of 54 feet on Portage avenue, and will provide accommodation for the post office, National Revenue, Indian Affairs, immigration, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and living quarters for the caretaker. The total estimated cost is as follows:

Building—$75,000.
Post office and customs fittings—$6,000.
Grading and sidewalks—$1,500.
Superintendence—$2,000.

Mr. GARDINER: When this item was before the house last year, I called the minister's attention to some new sidewalks built in the parliament grounds. Can the minister make any reply to my question as to those sidewalks, and does he notice they are deteriorating this year to a greater extent than last?

Mr. STEVENS: They are scandalous, disgraceful.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot quarrel very much with what my hon. friend has said or what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said. The matter was under consideration at the time is was referred to in the house a year ago. Under the contract we had with the contractors, they were not bound to make the repairs.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year the minister produced a contract by which they were bound.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but my recollection is that it did not bind them to make the repairs. At any rate, I think they were wise enough to know that one of the reasons we give in the department for refusing to accept a tender is that work has been bad in the past. They were men enough to say: We will make the sidewalks right, and they attempted to make them right. Due very largely, I think, to the fact that the contract was let perhaps a little late, and the frosty weather came on before the concreting was completed as it should have been, the job turned out badly. They made some repairs; the repairs they have made are not satisfactory, and they have undertaken to rebuild the sidewalks at their own expense and without cost to the government.

Mr. GARDINER: That is very satisfactory I would call the minister's attention to another important point, and that is to the coating of the concrete. The minister will see that in many places the finishing coat is not more than a quarter of an inch thick. What officer of the department was looking after the inspection of this work, and is he still in the employ of the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I could not give my hon. friend offhand the name of the inspector, but I know the inquiry revealed to me the fact that frost had something to do with the matter. I do not think my hon. friends can tell, by looking at the sidewalk now, just what the real cause of the trouble may have been. He knows very well, of course, that as regards mixing cement, unless it is properly set or kept warm, it is liable to be injured by frosty weather.

Mr. GARDINER: I am talking about the finishing coat.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That applies to the finishing coat. The rest does not make much difference. At any rate while we are on this subject I should like to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that very frequently the work of the department does not get started until the middle of the summer. Last year, for instance, I do not think our estimates were passed until the middle of June. I am not finding fault with anybody in regard to this, but it is worthy of consideration by hon. members in every section of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: The estimates were not taken up until very late in the session.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but the difficulty was that our estimates were not passed until the middle of June. I am not objecting to the criticism which can be made; I think that is proper and it is helpful to the officers of the department; but I think it is in the interests of every hon. member who is anxious that this business should be carried on in a proper way, that the estimates of the public works department should be got through, if it is possible to arrange to do so, so that we would have warm weather for doing the work which is largely work that cannot be done after the frost starts. It is very largely seasonal work and if you do not get your men started preparing the tenders until the month of June, as was the case last year, a great deal of work that should be finished in the warm weather will not be completed until the frost comes. I want, however, to say to the credit of the two gentlemen who are the contractors in connection with the work in the parliament grounds, that I hope whoever lives to see the house meet another year will find that they have done the job right.

Mr. SHORT: I hope the minister does not blame us on this side for the fact that he did not get his estimates through earlier. Why did the government not bring them down at the beginning of the session? The estimates are not brought down until about the middle of the session, and the supplementaries do not come down until just a few days before prorogation. No one is to blame but the government themselves that the estimates do not get through earlier. The estimates should be one of the first matters that the house should take up.

Mr. BENNETT: They used to be.

Mr. SHORT: Ever since this government came into power, or since I have been in the house, the estimates have not been brought down until away on in the middle of the session, and the supplementaries until just a few days before parliament prorogues.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows that the estimates are not passed until after the budget.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That has been the practice for years.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a new practice. The Minister of Finance is very clever; he brings his budget in before the rest of his more innocent colleagues get wise, and he is finished and has a nice, easy time afterwards. It was April 15 when the estimates started. The house has been sitting since February 7. Let the minister not forget that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The remarks of the minister regarding the lateness in bringing down the estimates have no bearing on the repairs of the cement sidewalks about which he is speaking. If those men want to make those repairs they do not need to wait for any estimates to be passed. They can go ahead with the work whenever they like, and if they leave the work until the frost comes, that shows they are delinquent in their work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not made myself clear, and I apologize. I want to be fair to the contractors. They had to do the work late in the fall. The fact that the frost started before the work was completed is, to my mind, partly responsible for the condition of the sidewalks. I am saying this without prejudice to our right to have them put in proper condition. There is no doubt that this cement work would have had a much better chance if they had got started on the work and completed it before the frost came.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have this to say in reply to the remarks made by the minister. No contractor had any right to go on with that work in frosty weather unless he took proper precautions to protect it. What were your inspectors doing? If that work had been properly supervised it would have been protected, and the work would have been good. There was some fault somewhere, either with the inspection department, or with the contractors for going on with the work in that kind of weather.

Mr. GARDINER: I am glad to hear the minister's statement in regard to the contractors being willing to rebuild these sidewalks, but in view of the contractors making such a slipshot job as they have done here, what are they likely to do on work that is not under the eyes of the members who can see what is being done? Is this typical of the character of the work done generally by the department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend think that is a fair question? Does he not know that every riding in this country is represented in this house?

Mr. GARDINER: But the members do not see all the work that is being done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Members even on this side have been very ready to make criticisms of bad work, and I hope they will continue to do so when bad work is found anywhere. Every riding is represented in this house, and if we are doing bad work in connection with this department I shall not only be obliged to the member who draws my attention to it or brings it to the attention of some of the officials of the department, but I shall endeavour to see that that bad work is remedied, and we will watch very carefully when that contractor is tendering on another job.

Mr. GARDINER: Before vote 117 for Ottawa public buildings comes up, I would like the minister to tell us who was the inspector who had charge of that work, and if he is still in the employ of the government. I would also like to know what was the nature of the mixture used for the finishing coat, and what was the depth of that finishing coat as called for by the contract.

Mr. GEARY: Is it not usual to have a provision in the contract that the contractor shall look after the work in connection with sidewalks and pavements for a certain number of years? That is in all city contracts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When my hon. friend was city solicitor for Toronto I think that was the practice, but I am advised that it is not the practice in cities to-day.

Mr. GEARY: I think it is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The question of my hon. friend from Acadia is a fair one; I think we should know who the inspector was. I made inquiries about it some time ago, but I have not been able to carry the name in my head; I will look it up. The mixture was the usual mixture for cement, and is supposed to produce a good job. The reason we are able to get the work replaced is that it did not produce a good job.

Mr. GARDINER: I would take it, from an examination of that sidewalk, that the finishing coat was not very good for a piece of work like that. I hope the minister will look into that point and give the committee the information in time for us to discuss it when the item comes up. That certainly is not a good finishing coat.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. KENNEDY: Would the minister give us an explanation with regard to the public building at Hespeler, and tell us on whose recommendation this vote is in the estimates?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is pretty hard to name anybody from that district who has not asked for it. This is one of the places where my hon. friends opposite thought it was necessary to have a public building, and they purchased a site for it on January 16, 1913. This building is being requested by deputations from Hespeler, including the town council, and from what I can gather from the hon. member who represents that constituency, he met with no opposition whatever to the idea of this building being constructed there.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is it a post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. We were in a rented building. I can assure my hon. friend that this vote was not put in for political purposes, but because the building was really required in order to provide proper postal facilities. That is the information we have in a report from the Post Office Department.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the population and the revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These young towns are doing pretty well under the present government.

Mr. BENNETT: Despite the government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Hespeler has made great progress.

Mr. GEARY: Put back that duty on yarn and it will do better.

Mr. BENNETT: The yarn we are listening to is the trouble.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend's remarks are intended for my colleague the Minister of Finance rather than myself.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think the member for that riding (Mr. Edwards) would be so remiss as not to ask for the post office.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do not think for a moment that he has ever let a month go by without asking for that post office. If he has, I have forgotten it. Here are a few details of this vote: This amount of $35,000—there is a revote of $15,000—is required to complete the erection of a public building on the corner of Queen and Cooper streets in the town of Hespeler for post office purposes. The work is being performed under contract by G. H. Thomas and Son, Limited, for the sum of $33,276. The cost of the site was $5,200. That was paid out some time ago. The expenditure for 1928-29, on contract, was $5,000. It is estimated that $35,000 more will be required. Tenders were called for, and the lowest tender received was for $33,276. An order in council was accordingly passed granting authority for the acceptance of the lowest tender.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister tell us who is the member for that riding?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That riding is well represented by my hon. friend from South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) who started out well, politically.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): He is going to finish well, too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad to hear that. The population of Hespeler is approximately 2,900. The revenue for the last fiscal year was $9,351. All the reports are that Hespeler is a growing town, and the absolute requirements of the department made it necessary to provide these facilities. The building we are now providing is not a bit too commodious, and if things go on as they are now doing there will have to be an addition to it before a very great length of time.

Mr. SPOTTON: Mr. Chairman, I feel rather lonely when I find every constituency contiguous to my own has received consideration in these estimates.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Evidently you have not looked at Harbours and Rivers.

Mr. SPOTTON: I am afraid to discuss harbours after a recent incident.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You are too timid.

Mr. SPOTTON: I wish to mention at the moment the village of Brussels, as the government owns a piece of property there. This of course was purchased just prior to the war. The building is in very bad condition. If the Minister of Public Works has not been in that building, at least I know some of his colleagues who have been there. One visited Brussels on a very important mission on September 12, 1927. I am not objecting to the vote for Exeter. I wish to congratulate the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and that part of our county on getting a new post office. I hope that since relative urgency in these matters seems to be based upon the good judgment of the previous administration in selecting sites—that appears to be the guiding star with the minister—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, it is a certain amount of corroboration.

Mr. SPOTTON: I hope the minister will compare Brussels and Exeter and tell us why the one was taken and the other left, because I know my people are expecting something, as it is not long since they were told, "Ask and ye shall receive." I find South Bruce, North Perth, Lambton West and South Huron—all represented by members on the other side of the house—have received a little donation from the funds of the Dominion of which the minister is trustee, and I congratulate them on their good fortune; but we have not received anything in Brussels. The building there is in very bad shape, in fact it is not any better than an ordinary livery stable. I would ask the minister to give his reason why he selected Exeter, for instance—I am not objecting—and left out Brussels, where so many of his friends in September 1927 were fully seized of the fact that something was very urgently needed with respect to post office accommodation. I do not want the minister to say that he is lying awake at nights because we are all asking for consideration. I know he is in a hard position, I know he cannot grant everything that is asked, but I would respectfully suggest to him that he keep his engineers or inspectors a little closer to their jobs at Ottawa. When I pick up a local paper here and there I find that an inspector or an engineer of the Public Works department or of the Marine department has been in a constituency looking over things and looking very wise, giving a nod here and a wink there. It is not long since that I saw an article in a western Ontario paper stating that two members of parliament were travelling about the district in company with an inspector or an engineer either from the Public Works department or the Marine department, I am not sure which. They were slipping around two contiguous constituencies exhibiting this official, and they felt so shy about it—their consciences must have been chiding them—that in one village, the paper says, they were shadowed by the local constable. Apparently they themselves felt that they were hardly doing the correct thing. Before the government chides us any more about asking for too much in the way of public buildings, I would respectfully suggest that they stop the practice of sending out departmental officials to look over constituencies with a view to finding an excuse for spending a little more of the people's money. I do not wish to labour this point, but since Hantsport, Buctouche, Exeter and all these other favoured places have received consideration—and the minister has said their cases must be urgent because sites were purchased in 1913 or 1914—I would ask him next year to be prompted by the same reason and build a post office at Brussels, and so carry out one of the many promises made by his friends. True, he did not commit himself, but on the other hand he did not in any way chide those who were making the promises. In the meantime if he will tell me on what he based his ultimate conclusion that Exeter should be taken and Brussels left, I may be able to justify his action to my constituents.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. minister would be justified by faith.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but my hon. friend has both faith and works. I am rather surprised to hear him compare the riding of North Huron with the riding of South Huron, because he looks alarmingly like the gentleman who was in my office not very long ago with a deputation from his riding expressing their great appreciation of what was being done by this department for that particular riding.

Mr. SPOTTON: No, what was being promised.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was being done.

Mr. SPOTTON: Promised.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The words of the deputation as I recollect them referred to what had been done last year to the harbour at Goderich, and stated what excellent results were flowing therefrom.

Mr. SPOTTON: We will discuss that when the harbours are up. We are dealing with post offices now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But I see some of my hon. friends wish to mix the two, and I am not objecting to that now. If he will look at the estimates a little further on he will see that for Goderich harbour there is an appropriation of $205,000. He is the last man that I would expect to object to this set of estimates.

Mr. SPOTTON: I did not object; I congratulated the member for South Huron on his good fortune and stated I was delighted to see Exeter get a public building. I was simply asking the minister to tell us how he reached his conclusion which resulted in his taking Exeter and leaving out Brussels.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that is what he was trying to do I am satisfied.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba

Brandon—public building—$50,000.
Dauphin public building—addition—$9,500.
Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc.—$35,000.
Emerson—building for customs and immigration purposes—$20,000.
Gretna—public building—$25,000.
Transcona—public building, $27,000.
Winnipeg—Fort Osborne Barracks—power plant—$9,100.
Winnipeg—hospital for Department of Pensions and National Health—$160,000.
Winnipeg post office—extension, $90,000.
Winnipeg public building—improvements and alterations—$8,000—Total, $433,600.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the whole of 124 carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was intended, Mr. Chairman. You were calling the Hespeler public building.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: That is the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: But the buildings at Ottawa have not yet been discussed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: It is no good for hon. gentlemen opposite to shout "carried." We want to know something about these buildings at Ottawa, particularly regarding one matter. Many departments of the public service are engaging in the same enterprises, especially with respect to research work. I think the minister should make some statement to the committee with respect to these matters.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Which item is my hon. friend referring to?

[Mr. Spotton.]

Mr. BENNETT: The last item called was the Hespeler post office.

The CHAIRMAN: We have been discussing indiscriminately the items in the resolution and not any one of them in particular.

Mr. BENNETT: The Ottawa items are all together; in vote No. 124 the Ottawa buildings all follow one after the other. On page 32 in the Ontario item there are these votes: Ottawa departmental buildings, fittings, etc., $60,000; equipment for Post Office Department, $26,000; forest products laboratory, addition and improvements, $10,000; Ottawa, laboratory of hygiene, $10,000; Ottawa post office, installation of pick-up table, $3,500; laboratory for Department of Mines, Booth street, and alterations, $100,000, of which $40,000 is a revote; Ottawa, towards purchase of building for government workshops, $12,200; and towards purchase of Daly building, $112,000. The Prime Minister will realize what I have in mind when I point this out. We are now endeavouring to establish a research department and I have been looking into the matter to ascertain what duplication there is. The minister will observe that we are providing for a laboratory of hygiene and a laboratory in connection with mines and minerals, and the new building discussed last year was to deal with certain other matters in connection with forest products which are being tested. Now the question is whether or not there is duplication of activities in the various departments. Why, for instance, should the Minister of Public Works deal with the matter of machines in the post office? Take that $26,000 for equipment in connection with the post office. Is this for the new machines that have been patented, for the purpose of lessening the amount of manual labour which has to be done, and which machines are merely leased and not bought? I ask this question because this is the only means whereby we may get information on the subject.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no departure from the practice that has been followed with regard to the fitting of post office buildings. This item of $60,000 is required for the purchase and installation of metal file cases, shelving and other fittings needed in the parliamentary and departmental offices in Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: All over?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. It is impossible to give in specific detail a list of the requirements, but I can give what we spent last year and in other years, and my hon. friend will see that this amount is required.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the $26,000 for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is to provide for the purchase of steel equipment for the money order branch of the Post Office department. It was asked for by the Postmaster General in a letter forwarded in April 1928.

Mr. STEVENS: That conveys nothing.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I might read the letter:

I wish to inform you that it is the intention of this department to submit a requisition to your department in the course of the next few weeks for steel equipment for the reorganization of the money order work in the Blackburn building, Ottawa. It is considered that this equipment will cost approximately $26,000. I am bringing this matter to your attention in case you may be able to place an item in the supplementary estimates to provide for the work.

This request was made a year ago but we did not see our way clear to comply with it at the time. As a matter of fact an item of $20,000 was provided in the supplementary estimates for 1928-29 but the treasury board, in cutting us down, cut it out, stating that they thought it could wait another year.

Mr. STEVENS: What sort of steel equipment is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are steel cases for filing the various money order records.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is sure they are just steel filing cabinets?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not these cancelling machines we hear so much about?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; this vote does not apply to them.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there provision in these estimates in that regard?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, not for Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the department replacing those machines bought four or five years ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not that I am aware of. The department supplies facilities largely for the various other departments which require them, and we endeavour to satisfy ourselves as far as possible not only that a particular department wants them but that they are absolutely necessary. There has been no request, so far as I know, for a renewal of the equipment the hon. member speaks of.

Mr. BENNETT: I have already referred to installations in connection with various laboratories. I shall have something to say in regard to dredging and the advisability of having some central organization in connection with the conduct of public affairs, but I will not go into that matter at the moment. Just now I am dealing with laboratories and other buildings of that character. We cannot possibly get along if each department claims the right to have one of these establishments; we cannot possibly make progress under such conditions in a country such as this. We are establishing this new department of research, about which we are all so anxious and which will serve useful purposes in this country, and what I want to point out in this connection is this: We are voting public money to establish, in several other branches of the service, undertakings which ultimately must be regarded as research in the true sense of the term, and I for one am opposed to that being done. I mentioned the matter last year when the Prime Minister was discussing the matter of research activities. We are engaged, for instance, in wood testing and activities of that sort, all desirable, all admirable in their way. But the Prime Minister having invited suggestions as to how public money might be saved, I suggest that we prevent duplication wherever possible; in other words, that a well organized department should take care of the very work which at present is being done in several departments of the public service. I do not think it is conducive to the public interest that one particular service should set up a research department of its own for testing purposes, say, another department do the same, and still another. We are endeavouring now to consolidate our activities, and while one could understand such duplication at one time it should now be avoided. I am not saying this in any critical or censorious spirit; I say it because I have been investigating the matter and I find that there is on the part of officials a tendency, which after all is but human, not to let go what they now have. I do not think however that we should expend public money to erect buildings which will indicate, on the part of this parliament, a desire to have more than one department dealing with questions of research, however manifold may be the activities of the various departments. I cannot consider it desirable that the departments should engage in these various enterprises.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my colleague (Mr. Elliott) will allow me to say a word on this matter inasmuch as it affects many departments.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, many of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a committee of the cabinet composed of ministers in whose departments research work is carried on, and the object of the committee is to centralize as much as possible all research work of the government. The committee has been considering this whole matter very fully having in mind the establishment at an early date of the new industrial and scientific research laboratories, and I can assure my hon. friend that these particular requests, especially from one or two of the departments, have been examined in relation to the larger equipment for which arrangements have been made. There is a special reason, which the Minister of the Interior would be able to give if he were here as to why one or two laboratories separately existing should continue so to exist, but I can assure my hon. friend that the government is entirely of his view with regard to consolidating scientific and industrial research work and will prevent, as far as possible, any overlapping of the service in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the country will receive the statement just made by the Prime Minister with great satisfaction, but a laboratory of hygiene, for instance, is perhaps one of the matters with which a well organized research bureau would think it had a great deal to do as a branch of its activities. In putting up these buildings I fear we may be promoting what I might call the sense of an independent branch of the public service rather than a coordinated branch having to do with research work. That is the point which I endeavoured to make, although I have not made it very clear. Perhaps we will ask the Minister of the Interior about the workshops, the mines and the forest products.

It seems to me that the Department of the Interior is hardly the department under which one would expect forest products testing operations to be carried on, for instance, because so far as the local situation is concerned the companies interested usually look after that work. However, I believe that with respect to export business this work has been very valuable; I might mention the work which has been done in connection with the tensile strengths of woods and so on. I should think that work would be very properly under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that is the reason I ventured to bring this matter to the attention of the house at this time. The observations of the Prime Minister quite assure me that the government are desirous of doing what I think most thoughtful Canadians desire in this regard, but to vote money for these separate buildings will put them in a bad way when they begin the work of consolidation. Many difficulties will be interposed; I am sure that during his investigations my right hon. friend has ascertained how difficult it is to overcome that great jealousy possessed by men which will not let them surrender any of their activities in connection with scientific work. The jealousy with which men will hold on to their little positions in an endeavour to maintain an organization is amazing, and these four items struck me as being so related to the large activities to which this country has very properly committed itself that I venture this criticism in the hope that the minister would lend himself to the expenditure of public money in such a way as to afford a foundation for the effort which will be made later on not to coordinate but rather to maintain independent organizations.

Item agreed to.

Mr. VENIOT: I know this is rather irregular, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to announce that I have here the remainder of the returns which were asked for and which will be laid on the table of the house for the benefit of any hon. member.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: The next item to be considered is vote No. 125, public buildings, Manitoba.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are you taking these up item by item?

The CHAIRMAN: We have been considering the resolutions as a whole.

Mr. BENNETT: You will never get supply through that way, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: It is for the committee to say whether it wants them called item by item.

Mr. STEVENS: That has been the practice, and we might as well follow it.

Brandon public building, $50,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is that building intended for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The intention is to arrange for the erection of a new public building to provide adequate accommodation for all government services.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are there any buildings there now?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is one building which was erected some years ago, but it is thought that the present building will be required as well as the one proposed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this a post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $35,000.

Mr. BENNETT: How much of that was used last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: About $20,000.

Item agreed to.

Gretna public building, $25,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal revenue for 1927-28 was $2,329, and the customs revenue $18,370.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What part of the province is Gretna in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in the constituency of Lisgar.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the population?

Mr. ELLIOTT: About 600.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the total cost of the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That will include the cost of the site?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The cost of the building is estimated at $17,000; cost of fittings, $3,000; grading sidewalks, and so on, $2,000; and contingencies and superintendence, $3,000. The site was purchased in June, 1913.

Item agreed to.

Transcona public building, $27,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the population of that town?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population is 5,300, and the postal revenue is $5,187.

Item agreed to.

Winnipeg—hospital for Department of Pensions and National Health, $160,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many patients were there in this hospital last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend that information. The necessity for this hospital arose from the fact that these patients were formerly housed in the Winnipeg civilian hospitals and they served notice upon the government that they were overcrowded and would not be able to accommodate these cases. We started the construction of this building a year ago.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has not the department more hospital accommodation in the Dominion than is really required?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is something which could better be answered by the department concerned. They succeeded in satisfying us that they could not get along without this accommodation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This was a very doubtful proposition last year, and we want to get some information about it.

Mr. McGIBBON: As a matter of fact the departments of health and soldiers' civil re-establishment are closing hospitals in a number of places in Canada, and it looks unreasonable to be spending more money for this kind of accommodation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: On January 11 we received the following from the Minister of Health, dealing with the necessity for additional accommodation:

> At present there is an extremely urgent situation in respect to hospitalization of pensioners in Winnipeg.
>
> Hitherto the department has maintained an eighty-bed hospital of its own, which has been chiefly used for convalescent cases and aged veteran pensioners, while the active treatment cases have been attended to by contract with the civilian hospitals in Winnipeg.
>
> Last spring this department received notification from both the Winnipeg General Hospital and St. Boniface hospital that, in consequence of civilian bed shortage in Winnipeg, it would be impossible to guarantee further accomodation for ex-soldiers as provided by them for the past ten years. You will remember, therefore, that appropriations were passed late in the last session for the building of a new wing to the existing departmental hospital in Winnipeg. Meantime temporary arrangements were made with the civilian hospitals to take a lessened number of soldier patients, in order to tide over the emergency. My medical advisors inform me that the situation at present is much more urgent even than last year in respect to bed shortage in Winnipeg, and that this department is at the present time incurring a great deal of extra expense in consequence of having to pay extra for private rooms and private nurses, because no public ward accommodation is available—this in spite of the fact that the St. Boniface hospital, for example, has cleared out the wing where formerly their help were housed, in order to provide additional beds.
> Neither civilian hospital will guarantee us any further accommodation, and are clamoring to have the present beds allowed for the treatment of ex-soldiers cut down to at least half of what the department has been using, because they cannot at present accommodate all their civilian patients, who have the first call on them.

Today there are seventy-four active treatment cases in the Winnipeg General hospital, sixty-two in St. Boniface hospital, and seven in St. Roch hospital, while the departmental hospital (Deer Lodge) is full and overflowing, and patients waiting for admission.

The urgency is so great that tentative arrangements are being considered for obtaining a part of the old Immigration building in Winnipeg, and fitting it up as an emergency hospital. If this is necessary, it will have to be done at a great expense which will not be recoverable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much has the department spent on this building already?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The expenditure to the 31st March was $215,516.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much will it take to complete it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $160,000 is expected to complete it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will that furnish it, too?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so. It includes laboratory and equipment.

Mr. MALONEY: What is the capacity of the new hospital?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the total accommodation is to provide for all the patients that I have already referred to, namely, seventy-four in one hospital, sixty-two in another, and so on. I think it is a 200-bed hospital.

Mr. McGIBBON: My point is this: if I am correctly informed, the department are closing hospitals in different parts of Canada. Could these not be so readjusted by moving the patients as to avoid the expense of building another elaborate hospital? The work of this department is, of course, diminishing all the time and this looks to me to be a waste of money.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will perhaps remember the discussion last year in regard to that very question. It is considered only fair to the pensioners who are receiving treatment in these hospitals that accommodation should be provided within some reasonable distance of their place of residence, and therefore we have to have hospitals in different areas. That was the explanation that was given at the time.

Mr. MANION: What is the total area that this serves?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think there is any hospital but this one between British Columbia and Winnipeg.

Mr. MALONEY: Will this item cover the equipment as well as the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It includes an amount of $10,000 for equipment.

Mr. MALONEY: $10,000 for a $350,000 hospital!

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are different kinds of equipment. This is additional to the equipment they already have. There is $10,000 for equipment, $10,000 for X-ray and laboratory, and there is the dumb waiter and various other installations. I think this finishes everything.

Mr. BENNETT: Here again we have the Department of Public Works constructing a hospital, according to the statement just made, of only 200 beds. The minister must have observed from the other figures he gave that there is not sufficient capacity in the new hospital to take care of the requirements. If he takes the figures he has already given us as to the crying necessity for this new institution and adds on to that Calgary and parts of British Columbia, he will find that the hospital is unable to cope with the situation. As the minister will perhaps recall, we rather hoped last year that before the country launched upon this undertaking, it would endeavour to construct the hospital as an added unit to the general hospital. I think the minister will remember that was the suggestion and it was to be looked into, the hope being that the government would thereby obviate the necessity of duplicating equipment and that facilities would be provided in the larger institution which would also be available in this one instead of having an isolated unit. We have a hospital at Deer Lodge and I think there is one at the Fort Osborne barracks.

Mr. THORSON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: When I lasted visited it, there was rather a considerable unit being maintained there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have a further explanation to make which perhaps I had better do before my hon. friend proceeds with his remarks. I am informed that I was in error in saying 200 beds. The information I receive from the Department of National Health is that the accommodation is 250 beds.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand the matter, the hospital cases are not increasing in number. They are decreasing, as my medical colleague tells me. Some effort should be made to correlate these added hospitals facilities to the facilities of a great city so that utilization could be made of the advanced scientific methods and apparatus that a great hospital has, because if we have to duplicate them with this hospital, we shall have a vast expenditure for which there can be very little warrant. This is another instance of unnecessary duplication with respect to a portion of the proposition, and this hospital should be attached as a unit to the larger hospital of the city so that the inmates of this hospital would have the advantage of the benefits of the great city hospital. That was a matter we suggested last year and it was understood that it would be looked into. I assume tenders were called for the hospital, the contract has been let and the building is partly completed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot think this sum is adequate to provide for proper facilities in the way of scientific and other apparatus such as is used in a returned soldiers' hospital, because my observation, and in fact, my knowledge is that it costs a great deal of money. Ten thousand dollars would not go anywhere in equipping a hospital.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What my hon. friend says about the suggestion being made a year ago is quite true as to making additions to the civic hospital—

Mr. BENNETT: With this very money to build a new unit.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —for additional accommodation; but I was advised that suggestion was not new by any means; that it had been threshed out years ago by previous ministers in the department, and that the department and the municipalities had never succeeded in getting together on a satisfactory basis along the line suggested by my hon. friend. It was tried, and the records show that during the war time it was thought that theory could be worked out. It is a theory that appealed to me after it was mentioned in this house a year ago, but the result of the trials and the efforts have been that apparently the civil and the military do not seem to get along so as to make the arrangements satisfactory to both.

With regard to equipment, it looks offhand as if this would not be sufficient to supply the necessary equipment, but I find on inquiry that they have a fairly adequate supply of equipment now. The thing they most need is bedroom accommodation and it is hoped that this will fill the requirements.

Mr. MALONEY: Is it intended that this hospital will be for the care and treatment of returned soldiers only?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Pensioners.

Mr. MALONEY: After these poor men have passed away, possibly fifteen or twenty years from now, what does the minister propose doing with the building and so forth?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would say to my hon. friend that the government will then consider what is the best thing to do under the circumstances.

Mr. MANION: This government might be back in power by that time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have no notion of making any change before then.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to supplement what my leader has said. I think the minister is proceeding on the wrong path at present. He says that it has not been found satisfactory to combine civil and military hospitals. There is in my riding one which I think is working very satisfactorily. Some years ago, about 1920, the government of Canada built an addition to the Gravenhurst sanatarium purely for military patients, and that has been probably one of the most successful soldier hospitals in Canada. Those who go there always want to return, and those who cannot get there are very desirous of going to that institution because of the good reports they have heard of it. I think the point raised by the hon. member for North Renfrew is a very important one. These patients are gradually growing less and less in number and it will not be so very long before they disappear. Then the government is going to have on its hands a lot of buildings and equipment for which it will have very little use. The department has already closed many hospitals in different parts of Canada; they have been or more or less scrapped. Here we are launching upon an expenditure for another 250-bed hospital. I think the suggestion that this should be combined with the civic hospital at Winnipeg is sane and rational.

Item agreed to.

Winnipeg post office—extension, $90,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Those of us who know the city of Winnipeg and are familiar with the circumstances under which the present site was chosen for a post office are very curious to know just what extensions are contemplated. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works has himself seen the post office in Winnipeg—

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have.

Mr. BENNETT: —and perhaps he is familiar with the circumstances under which that site was acquired for a post office. He might explain in what direction he proposes to make the extension, whether up or down or east or west.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We already have title to the property above and below. There is no question but that an addition must be made to the post office very shortly. This amount is to provide for the purchase of lot 122 and the building thereon on the east side of Garry street south of and at the rear of the post office building in the city of Winnipeg, in order to provide increased accommodation. The purchase of this property has been urged by the Postmaster General in a communication dated November 19, 1923, and by the Deputy Postmaster General in letters dated May 9 and 17, 1924, February 29 and November 14, 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it proposed to expropriate the land?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think not, if it can be purchased at what looks like a reasonable price. If it can be acquired for something like $90,000 my own judgment would be to take the responsibility for making the purchase.

Mr. BENNETT: This is in the rear of the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. PRICE: What is the explanation of this item of $400,000 for a public building at Saskatoon?

[Mr. Elliott.]

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that we take this vote up item by item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am in the hands of the committee, but I would think we would make better progress in that way. If there is any item included in the vote which some member of the committee would like considered, we will consider it if he mentions it, or else we will take the items separetely one after the other.

My hon. friend from Westmorland asked wtih regard to the $400,000 item for a public building at Saskatoon. This amount is required to begin the construction of a public building at Saskatoon for the housing of all the government services in that city. A site situated at the corner of First avenue and Twenty-second street was purchased in 1928-29 from Byers Brothers, Limited, for $53,000. It is the intention to erect upon this site a new building of six stories and a basement, with frontage of 138 feet on First avenue and 128 feet on Twenty-second street. It will be a brick structure, but the fronts on the above-named streets will be of stone. The building is estimated to cost $795,000—building, $740,000; fittings and boxes, $40,000; gradings and sidewalks, $2,000; contingencies, $13,000; or a total of $795,000.

Mr. MANION: I do not think those items total up to the amount the minister mentioned.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so.

Mr. MANION: What about the site?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The site has been purchased.

Mr. MANION: What did it cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It cost $53,000.

Mr. MANION: When was it purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was purchased in 1928-29 from Byers Brothers, Limited.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the minister aware when they purchased the site?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am reasonably well aware of all the circumstances, because this matter was considered a year ago. Part of it they had owned for some time, and part of it had been purchased not very long before the purchase by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: From the city?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They obtained the site with a view to building a theatre, and they were about to build the theatre at the time the government made the purchase from them.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would direct the attention of the minister to the fact that the postal facilities at Wynyard are very inadequate. I think it was drawn to his attention last year and again this year by the local Liberal association and other bodies. The post office is in a very small part of a public building owned by the town, and is entirely inadequate for the purpose, but no other suitable accommodation is available. Is there any possibility of anything being done this year to relieve the situation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is hard to say what may take place this year. I know a number of representations were made by my hon. friend and by others on behalf of Wynyard, and the matter has received some consideration, but up to the present time we have not seen our way to set aside an appropriation for a new building. I think it could be very well justified, but the case did not seem more urgent than some others that we had to postpone.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the minister had any report on the situation from the local inspector or some other officer of the department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I could not say offhand. As I have already explained, I have before me only the details relating to the estimates.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the minister get a report on the situation? Then I hope he will treat the case so sympathetically that something will be done, because really the need is urgent. If the postmaster could secure a suitable building he would do so, but there is none available. To make matters worse, I understand that the council require the space at present occupied by the post office, and the postmaster fears that he may not be allowed to retain the accommodation very much longer. It is really imperative that a new building should be provided very shortly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If there is not a comparatively recent report in the department I shall be very glad to have the matter looked into again and see what can be done.

Mr. EVANS: I had hoped to see in the estimates provision for a public building at Biggar. The Postmaster General himself has admitted the need of such a building, and I thought from what the Minister of Public Works told me that he was not averse to having a public building erected in the town. Biggar has a population of three thousand, and the post office yields a yearly revenue of $11,000. It is a railway centre and growing very fast. I think the minister knows the place very well. No suitable building is available for a post office. I do think the government should follow some well-defined policy in meeting the need for post offices in certain places. Gretna, although only one-fifth the size of Biggar, is being given a public building. Not only is Biggar a much larger town than Gretna, but its need for a public building is very urgent. I do not think it is fair to the people of Biggar to discriminate against them in this way. Seeing that the government does not follow any policy so far as population or need is concerned in allotting these grants, I should like to know what its policy really is. In looking over the estimates for Saskatchewan I see no grant is made to any but Liberal constituencies, and it does not seem fair that there should be this discrimination against Biggar when the need of proper post office facilities is so great.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It would be pretty difficult to make a grant towards a Conservative constituency in Saskatchewan. That is our first difficulty, if it can be called a difficulty, but I have not found it such. But, joking apart, I do know the town of Biggar, and something of its requirements, and I am aware that it together with a number of other towns might be provided with better post office facilities. Biggar is a much younger town than Gretna and other places which were in existence before there was even a townsite at Biggar; and the post office there is not in an old building, there being no very old structures in the town. My hon. friend never omits an opportunity to advance the cause, and the requirements of Biggar have been receiving consideration. The town is deserving of consideration, and I am sure will get it in its proper turn.

Mr. EVANS: Next year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot say next year, but I can assure my hon. friend that it will get consideration in the proper order of urgency.

Mr. PRICE: What is the net revenue expected from the $400,000 expenditure on public buildings in Saskatoon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal census for Saskatoon in 1901 was 113; for last year it was a little over 30,000.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It was 45,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend from Saskatoon admits that it is 45,000 now. I have no doubt it is not any more than that or he would have said so. The postal revenue for 1918-19 was $194,420.

Mr. PRICE: That is net?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Net; for 1927-28 it was $311,589.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Perhaps the local member can tell you whether that has increased.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt. But it is not in any special category from that fact because there are many other places increasing by leaps and bounds. The customs revenue last year was $1,059,772.

Mr. PRICE: Can the minister explain why we will not set aside sufficient money for a new post office in the city of Moncton which returns a profit of over $1,000 a day, while he can make an appropriation of $400,000 for public buildings in Saskatoon, where the postal revenue does not warrant such an expenditure? Will he please stand up and justify his action?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope my hon. friend will not expect me to start my defence until he finishes his arraignment. What did he say was the customs revenue in Moncton?

Mr. PRICE: There is over $1,000 a day net profit in Moncton, yet you will not put up a building there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not the customs revenue; what is that revenue?

Mr. PRICE: I think the revenue from the customs is just as large in Moncton as it is in Saskatoon.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will not contradict my hon. friend.

Mr. PRICE: I am speaking about the general revenue turned into the treasury and I want the minister to explain why he cannot put up a building in Moncton.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Unfortunately I do not know as much about Moncton as my hon. friend does, but he does not know offhand nor do I know what the customs revenue of Moncton is.

Mr. PRICE: I will say to my hon. friend, be careful you don't back into something. If you were before a court and the judge were hearing your case, with the information you have at the present time, and the way you are backing up, he would say, and very properly, "Be careful you don't back into something."

Mr. GOTT: I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that the postal department alone in Windsor had a net operating surplus in the last six years of $1,144,159. The post office in Windsor was built fifty years ago and both staff and business have increased, the net revenue for the last year having been $386,622, while the salaries paid amounted to $182,839.20. The customs revenue at the port of Windsor is $6,070,357.92. The minister will no doubt recall a splendid demonstration given him by the Liberals of Windsor when he visited the city and attended a banquet. At that meeting, if I mistake not, he promised a new postal building to Windsor.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was that last remark?

Mr. GOTT: I say that to my knowledge the minister, at this splendid banquet in Windsor, promised a new postal building to the city of Windsor.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I must say to my hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: You weren't conscious of it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I was quite conscious; and if there is one thing more than another I did not say to the people of Windsor it was that I was going to put up a building there. No one knows that better than my hon. friend does.

Mr. GOTT: Unfortunately I was not present at that banquet. The Minister of Justice laughs; I may tell him that I had an invitation to the function, and the only reason I was not present was the fact that I was not going to sit there and concur in the general activities of the evening. Now if the Minister of Public Works did not say to the people of Windsor, "We will construct a new building for you," may I ask him what he did say?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would refer my hon. friend to a copy of The Border Cities Star of that date which he will find contains, I think, the speech in full.

Mr. GOTT: With a full page heading.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. PARENT: It was worth it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And photograph.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That report makes it perfectly clear, if my hon. friend will read it, that I made no promise whatever.

Mr. GOTT: You got a warm reception, I will say that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I must say they are most hospitable people, and any representative of this government who visits a town that has done as well as Windsor has done since this government came into power would get nothing but a wonderfully hospitable reception. I cannot speak too highly of their wonderful cordiality and hospitality.

Mr. GOTT: The minister has said either too much or not enough. There is nothing in the estimates for any post office building there, and if he thinks that he can put it off until next year and then offer it as a bait to the people of Windsor I can assure him they will resent it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why is it that in a city the size of Saskatoon there are twelve postal substations? It seems rather extraordinary. There must be a reason for it, but what is that reason?

Mr. DUNNING: It is a very scattered city.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The revenue of the head office is some $272,000, and there are twelve postal substations. This does not occur in any other city of the same size.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I must say frankly that this is a departmental matter, rather within the post office than within the Department of Public Works. Perhaps I ought to have that information but I have not. There is no doubt however that they are not sub-post offices in the ordinary sense of the word. There are a number of places where postage stamps are sold. My hon. friend knows something about the layout of Saskatoon, and he will recall that the river Saskatchewan runs between two portions of the city. It is a large territory, and I think the twelve substations to which he refers include some districts outside, like Sutherland and some of the adjoining places.

Mr. DUNNING: It includes the university.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The university and other places the mails for which are made up at Saskatoon.

Mr. GUTHRIE: These, then, are merely places set aside in stores for the sale of stamps, money orders and so forth.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is all, so far as I know.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain the $100,000 for the Regina public building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is for the erection of an addition to the public building at Regina in order to provide adequate accommodation for all the government services in that city.

Mr. MANION: Will this complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it will not.

Mr. MANION: I see the Minister of Railways shakes his head; he is looking for more. How much will it take to erect this building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it will take about $150,000 in addition to this amount, at least.

Mr. MANION: Then there is another item of $28,000 for the Regina armouries. What is that for?

Mr. DUNNING: Amortized rent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required as a second payment in connection with a building for armoury purposes.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Railways says it is amortized rent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. As a means of providing adequate armoury accommodation a building is being erected by an organization incorporated under the name of the Regina Armoury Association. The city of Regina donated a site worth $40,000 in the northeast corner of the exhibition grounds for the proposed structure, and the association has raised an amount of money sufficient to construct a building to cost $350,000. An amortization arrangement was made and this is the second payment on account.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this not an amazing thing? Imagine the Dominion of Canada being a party to a transaction of this kind. It is true it has been done before by other governments, but that does not make it right. Imagine the Dominion of Canada letting private enterprise build a $350,000 armoury in Regina and paying $28,000 yearly under an amortization arrangement. I ask the minister if he does not think that little short of a public scandal. The Dominion of Canada, mark you, with a surplus in the treasury, allows private enterprise to obtain the gift of a site and erect thereon a building costing $350,000, and the government pays them $28,000 a year. For how many years, may I ask?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For twenty years.

Mr. BENNETT: Then $560,000 without interest is to be paid by this country in order to obtain a property built by private enterprise at a cost of $350,000, with the site donated by the city of Regina.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend hardly stated the matter fairly. He said the payments will amount to something over $500,000, without interest, but of course he knows that the interest on the cost of the building would have to be paid in any event, no matter who built it.

Mr. BENNETT: Not if it were built out of the revenues of the country, as are all other buildings.

Mr. DUNNING: The interest on the money would have to be met. However, my purpose in rising was to clear up one point only, because this arrangement was discussed in this house before it was agreed to and entered into. As my hon. friend indicated, this same policy has been followed previously by other governments.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister tell us where?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; in Westmount, Montreal, and I believe in one instance in Toronto.

Mr. BENNETT: And in Saskatoon, where they took up an old building.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say as to that, but in justice to those public spirited citizens who joined themselves together for the purpose of erecting this building it should be stated that the organization in question is entirely a non-profit organization, organized by the officers of the various battalions in the military district and consisting wholly of those officers. As a matter of fact, the organization cannot make any profit. It happened that the Saskatchewan military district was the only district in Canada without adequate headquarters accommodation; large sums were being paid in rent for various buildings there, but now military headquarters is well equipped in the new armouries under the arrangement approved by this house last year. I may say that the building is located on the exhibition grounds; the city, which owns these exhibition grounds, donated the site, and therefore the building can be used much more frequently for what might be called peace time activities than for normal military purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not present when this question was discussed last year, and that is my reason for bringing it up now. I have a very strong feeling against the Dominion of Canada doing this sort of thing. We have had a revenue surplus for many years, and if it were necessary to erect an armoury costing $350,000 in Regina that building should have been paid for out of the revenues of the country in the ordinary course. Under this arrangement we are paying capitalized interest over a period of twenty years; in other words, we have prevented ourselves from paying off this amount. That is the objection I am trying to make clear, purely a question of finance. My hon. friend knows, as do most of us, that we personally make contributions continuously to assist in maintaining just such organizations as this to which he has referred; I have done so for twenty-five years. I think a very great and useful service has been rendered in western Canada by military establishments, but the point I am trying to make is that it is altogether wrong that private enterprise should be required to construct an armoury and then, instead of getting their money back at once, have the payments extended over a period of twenty years, including interest at some rate which I do not know at present but which I will know very shortly. Really that is my objection. Now may I ask the minister what is the rate of interest?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: And last year we paid $33,500.

Mr. DUNNING: That included rents for other buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: Who maintains this building now? Has it been taken over by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The government takes it over at the end of the term, but the rental is not supposed to take care of the upkeep in the meantime.

Mr. BENNETT: Who makes the repairs?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume that under such an amortization agreement the upkeep will be borne by the government, who will eventually own the building.

Mr. BENNETT: Who heats it and who looks after the caretaking now?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The government pays the cost of heating.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not an imposition on private individuals to compel them to put up their own money for the construction of a public building in a city like Regina, and is it not an indignity to the Dominion of Canada that instead of putting a sum in the estimates sufficient to take care of this work and be done with it we have agreed to an amortization arrangement, with interest to be paid at 5 per cent for a period of twenty years, at the end of which time we own the building? We should have expropriated it at once and that would have been the end of it. The rifle range at North Vancouver was expropriated in that way. Of course my hon. friend says this organization was not formed in order to make a profit. The real fact is that somebody is putting money into a venture with the best sort of intentions, and we are giving them a twenty-year investment at 5 per cent guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. How many people are there who would not be glad to make an arrangement of that kind if they knew the government was going to come along and take over the investment on a basis of 5 per cent per annum, providing an annuity for a period of twenty years and paying 5 per cent in conection with the undertaking? Surely the principle is wrong. I know there is one hon. gentleman in this house, for whose busines judgment and acumen I have the very highest regard, who would not do it in the province he came from, and that is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). You could not have induced him to do it. Just think what this means. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been put in by private enterprise, and instead of buying them off and taking the building over, we are making an investment for twenty years with interest at 5 per cent. This country is paying $210,000 as interest for the privilege of taking the property over at the end of twenty years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You paid more than that for vacant lots in the city of Regina not long ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the remarks of the hon. member for Melfort add greatly to and brighten up the discussion in connection with this question which the minister is about to answer. I am sure it is very interesting, but passing over that for the moment—

Mr. DUNNING: Pass over it, it is pretty bad.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be pretty bad.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not introduce it, but it is pretty bad.

Mr. BENNETT: What were the lots acquired for in Regina?

Mr. DUNNING: I canont give you the exact figures, but it is probably ten times as much as they could be sold for to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: The Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the National Transcontinental railway were built by the people of this country for many times more than they could be sold for to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no building involved in the purchase of these lots.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was intended to put a building on them. Instead of that, the city of Regina gives the lots to a private corporation and instead of buying the corporation off this country has undertaken to pay $28,000 per annum for twenty years.

Mr. DUNNING: The lots referred to were not purchased for an armoury.

Mr. BENNETT: They were purchased by the government of this country for some purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: But not for armoury purposes. My hon. friend will remember that for years there was a standing offer by the city of Regina to give sufficient property.

Mr. BENNETT: It is wise for this house quietly to sit down and vote, in the days of surpluses when you have plenty of money, money in this way? Instead of buying the property at a reasonable price and extinguishing the private interest in it, you are paying $28,000 per annum for twenty years, which is $560,000, outside of the other expenditures in connection with caretaking, fuel, and matters of that kind, and $350,000 from $560,000 leaves $210,000. Divided by twenty, that amounts to something over $10,500 per year which is being paid by the Dominion of Canada for interest in connection with this matter. With the surpluses which this country has it should be able to find money enough to take care of the investment and not pay an annuity of $28,000 per annum to private interests over a period of twenty years.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend made a somewhat flattering reference to my business acumen. I would like to ask him if he knows of a similar case, similar in the sense that money was obtained at the rate of 5 per cent under such circumstances and with the prevailing rate being as it is? So far as the arrangement is concerned, I for one am prepared to defend it, because the rate of interest is low enough and it represents a real economy in that regard. In this connection I would refer my hon. friend to the relative rates prevailing when the Westmount armoury proposition was undertaken.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the one I had in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not suppose the Minister of Public Works has the agreement before him, but if my memory serves me correctly, when this matter was before the house a year ago it was stated that the agreement provided that the government retained the right to buy the property at any time. I think that is correct, but I am subject to correction from the minister in that regard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is my impression; I have been trying to check it up, but I cannot say positively.

Mr. DUNNING: The arrangement having been approved last year, it is quite natural for the minister not to have all the material here this year.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no approval given; there was just an item in the estimates.

Mr. DUNNING: Full explanation was given by the minister and the vote was passed subject to that explanation given one year ago Everyone proceeded on the assumption that the house having been made aware of what was contemplated had approved of it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not an approval of an agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: I have some respect also for my hon. friend's business acumen, and I would be ready to submit that agreement to him and ask if it was not a good agreement, once he grants the principle with which it commences to operate.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot approve of the principle. I would not care whether it came from Westmount or anywhere else, because I think the minister will agree with me that it is an indignity to the Dominion of Canada that a private enterprise—

Mr. DUNNING: I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I would say that the Dominion of Canada was not borrowing money at 5 per cent when Canadian national securities were being sold at 4.6 per cent on the world markets.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the rate was 4.72.

Mr. BENNETT: Last year?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I regret I was not here last year when this matter was discussed, but is there no way by which we can purchase the annuity? That is the point I desire to have cleared up.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: My memory of the agreement—this can be confirmed by the minister and the department—was that the right was retained by the Dominion to buy off the whole property at any time and terminate the amortization.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I happen to have an extract from Hansard showing the discussion which took place last year.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think you were; at any rate your name does not appear in connection with the discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Which is prima facie evidence that I was not here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Negotiations were under way at that time and were practically completed at the time the matter was presented to the house, figured on a basis of $33,500 per year at the rate of 5½ per cent interest. Later on we were able to come to an arrangement of 5 per cent, which accounts for the lower payment.

Mr. BENNETT: Has a formal agreement been drawn up?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Last year when the estimate was passed, there was no formal agreement. There now is, and the point I think it would be for the Attorney General of this country to consider, is whether there is any power in any minister, without any statutory authority, to commit the country to pay an annuity for twenty years. I have the information at last. There was no authority given to make such an agreement. That has to be done by statute. The executive of this country, without parliamentary sanction or authority, but by the authority of an order in council, have signed an agreement to commit Canada to pay $28,000 a year for twenty years. Can the government legislate for twenty years by order in council without regard to parliament? Is there an obligation on this country with respect to this matter? Where is the statutory authority? That was what I was asking.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think there is a very distinct obligation upon this parliament, having passed an agreement on the understanding that—

Mr. BENNETT: But there was no agreement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Parliament having passed the first payment with the distinct understanding that it was one of twenty payments at the rate of $33,500 a year, it would hardly repudiate it after it had been reduced by one-half of one per cent per annum, and now amounts to less than was approved by parliament a year ago.

Mr. BENNETT: But the Attorney General of this country is supposed to advise upon questions of law, and I put this question to him: What authority had the executive of Canada, without legislative sanction or authority, to sign a document that commits the Dominion of Canada to pay any sum of money for twenty years? When the minister said that this had been approved last year; when both ministers said it, not being present I did not desire to controvert it. When the Minister of Railways was the one to say what took place, followed by the Minister of Public Works, I then understood thoroughly that no agreement had been signed, nor was one signed until after parliament prorogued. All documents that are executed by the government must be either by reason of the prerogative of the crown or with statutory authority. Where is the statutory authority to warrant the signature being affixed to an undertaking to pay $28,000 a year for twenty years?

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the details were given to parliament when this vote was accepted by the committee of supply last year. It was part of the supply bill. Every particular was given; it was ratified by the house and, apart from that, the same thing has been done many times in the past. For instance, we are still paying for the famous Daly building.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly in the same way we are bound by a contract and parliament ratifies it every time supply is voted for the purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: The right of the crown to buy a building is undoubted, but the question is whether or not the executive branch of the government has power, without statutory authority, to bind the country to make payments of money for a period of twenty years. The Attorney General of Canada will remember that this question was discussed last year. The view I have entertained is that no statutory authority for the payment of money should contemplate any further period than the life of the government or perhaps a few months or a year beyond that, to enable an incoming government to consider the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree in principle that we should not bind future generations.

Mr. BENNETT: This parliament, without passing a statute—and that is the essential thing to keep in mind—and having given no authorization in the matter, finds itself called upon this year to pay $28,000 which we are voting. That in itself shows that there is no agreement, because, if there were, it would not be necessary to place this sum in the estimates. That is, if there is an agreement to pay, the government could pay it out of the consolidated fund under the authority of statute without reference to an appropriation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All leases of buildings are made in the same way, and we are voting the money every year.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not vote it for each separate lease.

Mr. DUNNING: We are doing the same thing in the case of the Daly building, in the case of steamship subsidies, which are voted each year but which are five-year contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: Some are and some are not. The point is this, and I do not think there will be any difficulty in finding authorities that support this proposition; without statutory authorization the executive should not endeavour to bind the future to the extent of the payment of money for twenty years. That is the position I take with relation to the matter. If it were intended that this agreement should be binding upon a future generation, there should have been a ratification of the agreement by parliament. That is the principle upon which a former Liberal administration acted in connection with the Yukon. It is a very serious principle. Surely the house must see where this leads: it puts the country in a very difficult position in the future.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I say in answer to my hon. friend's argument that the object of having this item in the estimates now is to have parliament pass upon it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Supposing it is skipped next year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me for a moment. That must be done every year during the twenty years. What greater safeguard can the people have than that parliament passes upon that item each year? I ask my hon. friend: When the general policy was submitted to the house—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has begged the question.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not at all. When the policy was submitted to the house and approved before the first payment was made, is my hon. friend going to argue that any subsequent parliament would repudiate an agreement that is one-half of one per cent per annum better than the one approved by parliament last year?

Mr. BENNETT: It is amazing that the Minister of Public Works would make that statement. First, there was no agreement. That was settled when parliament granted $33,500.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will call it a proposal. Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Does he think anybody had power to make an agreement? Could I have come to the house with an agreement before it had been submitted to parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, the only kind of agreement that should have been made was a provisional one subject to ratification by parliament, and this is not a ratification. Surely the minister knows that. Parliament has never seen or considered the agreement and, what is more, the minister now has made a statement that is amazing. He has said: Do you think any parliament would repudiate it? In other words, I have no right now to consider the matter at all. It is settled by parliamentary sanction. I saw the Minister of Railways smile when my hon. friend made the statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not smile at the Minister of Public Works. I smiled at my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says: Could anything be better than that parliament should pass on the matter for the next twenty years? And in the next breath he says: Does he think any parliament could repudiate it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I said "would".

Mr. BENNETT: Then why should we discuss it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I submit it to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but we have to take it willy-nilly. The whole thing is a mockery, and my hon. friend knows it. There was no agreement last year. An agreement has been signed in between times. Now we are asked to vote one instalment of that payment, and thereby confirm that agreement without its being submitted to parliament for approval. That is the story and all the sophistry in the world cannot do away with it. The good faith of this country is committed, so that we have to pay these amounts whether we want to or not, and because the government, by order in council, has done this, there is no opportunity of discussing the merits of it in any way, shape or form. In other words, government by order in council has superseded the legislative power and authority of parliament. The Minister of Justice will say so.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is surely unfair, for this reason: Had the Minister of Public Works entered into an arrangement or agreement for twenty years without advising this parliament, before he got the authority to spend the money, of the nature of the agreement which he contemplated entering into, my hon. friend's point, I submit, would be well taken; but before any agreement was entered into, what did the minister do? He came here with a vote sufficient to pay the first year's rental—

Mr. BENNETT: On a 5½ per cent basis.

Mr. DUNNING: On a 5½ per cent basis, and he said: "We hope to put through this kind of arrangement," and he outlined the kind of arrangement he proposed. Parliament approved the amount of money, but later on, after negotiations, the minister was able to get the rate of interest reduced from 5½ to 5 per cent; consequently, because of a smaller instalment being necessary this year, he comes to the house with a better arrangement than that which he communicated a year ago, and then the leader of the opposition says: This is a mockery; the house has never been consulted.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I said that the house had never had the opportunity to pass upon that agreement, and it has not now. Where is the agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: The house last year passed upon—

Mr. STEVENS: What date?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot tell the exact date offhand, but it is easily ascertainable. The house last year in passing this estimate passed upon the nature of an agreement proposed by the minister whereby the sum then being voted would be expended. The minister has been able to make a better agreement than the one he communicated to the house last year, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that there is some deception about it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say that. I said it was a mockery.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A milder term.

Mr. BENNETT: That special pleading does not get home either, Mr. Chairman. There is a rule which at least the gentleman who sits to the left of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Ralston) will tell him, if not the gentleman who sits to his right (Mr. Lapointe), that any confirmation or ratification of an agreement by parliament you should be able to find in the statute books of the country. That is an elementary rule. A resolution of parliament has no force in the courts of the country; a resolution of this house has not.

Mr. DUNNING: What about the Daly building?

Mr. BENNETT: I am saying that I disagree with the principle without a ratification or agreement of sale.

Mr. DUNNING: If this is not legal, the agreement with respect to the Daly building and the agreement with respect to the Westmount armoury are not legal, and if I hunted through past years, without reflecting on any government, I could find scores of instances of the same nature.

Mr. BENNETT: Not scores, but you may find several. The point I desire to make is this: When the Minister of Railways said that that agreement was communicated to this house, he certainly did not seriously mean it; for his colleague had said that the agreement did not come into existence until after the house rose.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not quoting me correctly. I said that the nature of the agreement which the minister purposed entering into was stated as a condition on the passing of the vote last year.

Mr. BENNETT: The mere statement of the nature of the thing does not constitute an agreement, and no man knows that better than my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. What we have done is this: We have agreed, by solemn agreement, to pay $28,000 a year for twenty years. There is no statutory authorization for it. The only authority is a statement made by the minister that he contemplated doing something that would involve an expenditure of $33,500 a year, not $28,000, and he now says: I have been able to do better than that, because I am only paying $28,000 for twenty years. Now I find that early last year Canadian 4½ per cents were selling in New York at 101, so we could have borrowed the money at 4½ per cent and paid that off, and saved this country one-half of one per cent on the purchase for twenty years.

Mr. DUNNING: You could not have got that rate for the government at the time the agreement was entered into.

Mr. BENNETT: What was that date?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot tell the date.

Mr. BENNETT: Then what do you know about it?

Mr. DUNNING: I have a distinct recollection of the difficulty of financing at 5 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Financing what at 5 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Financing the armouries at 5 per cent. I make no excuse for having given what assistance I could to the armouries' association to enable them to meet the condition which the Minister of Public Works imposed, which was to finance at 5 per cent. I do not think I am giving away any secrets when I say that it was finally arranged through the medium of the Royal Bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but that cock does not fight so far as I am concerned. My hon. friend might as well say that it was the Bank of Nova Scotia. I want to point out to my hon. friend that early in the year the direct securities of Canada were selling at 4½ per cent. The guaranteed securities always sell for less, and this country could have borrowed $350,000 at 4½ per cent, which is only $15,750 a year and the amortization fund of 2 per cent would not have brought it up within $8,000 of the sum we are now paying.

Mr. DUNNING: I would like to check your figures.

Mr. BENNETT: It is mental arithmetic—$350,000 at 4½ per cent is $15,750, according to my arithmetic.

Mr. DUNNING: You are quicker than I am.

Mr. BENNETT: $15,750 plus the sinking fund, and the result would have been that we would have had the armouries paid for in full and we would have owned them, and saved several thousand dollars per annum. The point I am making is that it is time that attention was directed to the undesirability of doing business in this kind of way. Immediately after the war when revenues were not buoyant it was suggested that this was a good way to do business, but when you have surplus moneys, and when you have markets where you can borrow at 4½ per cent on the direct securities of the country—

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think any bonds of the country were sold at 4½ per cent net to the treasury in 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: One of my friends ascertained for me that the 4½ per cent securities of Canada were quoted in New York at 101.

Mr. DUNNING: Not net to the treasury I think.

Mr. BENNETT: I could not say.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I just say a word in answer to my hon. friend? In his calculation he is starting with 4½ per cent. May I call his attention to the fact that he does not estimate any interest on the cost of the site which is being included as part of the agreement, or proposal, or arrangement, or whatever he chooses to call it.

Mr. BENNETT: But the site was given. There was no interest on that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was given by the city of Regina as part of this proposition.

Mr. BENNETT: Are we paying interest on that too? This is getting worse. I understand that we made a gift to the association, and now I understand that we are paying interest to the association on the money we gave.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is too shrewd to know that that is not fair.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not at all. My hon. friend started figuring how this government could have made this purchase at $350,000 on the basis of 4½ per cent. He spoke as if the property were worth only $350,000.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is what has to be paid.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think he will see it more clearly. This is not the purchase of $350,000 worth of property. This is the purchase of property for $350,000 in addition to a site worth $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Nonsense. The site is free.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend whose main talk is "Nonsense"—

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, nonsense.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my hon. friend just contain himself for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS: We have been waiting a long time.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. CHAPLIN: Let us get the deal anyway.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The city of Regina put up a site estimated at $40,000. This company is formed, and undertakes to expend the cost of putting up the armoury, which is estimated at $400,000, which we are able to get eventually for an annual payment of $28,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Tell us how the figure of $28,000 is arrived at; then we will know the details.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The $28,000 a year for twenty years is to pay not only the rental, but to give us the property at the end of the twenty years—not merely the $350,000 that the building cost, but the site that was presented as well.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But you are not paying anything for that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I call my hon. friend's attention to what took place? Last year, as shown by Hansard, I made this statement, which is to be found at page 2718:

> This is the first payment on the purchase of a building for armoury purposes in the city of Regina. As a means of providing adequate armoury accommodation it is proposed to erect a building by private enterprise by an organization to be incorporated under the name of the Regina Armoury Association. The city of Regina is prepared to donate a site worth $40,000, situated in the northeast corner of the exhibition grounds for the proposed structure, and the association proposes raising the necessary funds for the erection of an armoury building costing approximately $400,000. It is proposed to lease the building to the Dominion government on a rental-purchase basis at an annual rental of $33,500 for a period of twenty years, at the end of which time the building becomes the property of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: What becomes the property of the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The building.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly; but not the land.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The land belongs to the city.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They have given it. Now, in the purchase of the Westmount property or of any of the other properties, what was the procedure? Exactly that followed here, only we did not get a free site. Has there ever been in this house in connection with any of those arrangements that have been carried out such a proposition as my hon. friend now suggests? What would it mean? It would mean that the minister in charge must come to the house and say: This is what is proposed. I have not an agreement, of course, because I have not power to enter into any agreement until I obtain authority from the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I may not have power to get the agreement completed.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As a matter of fact, if my hon. friend's statement is right it was August before the final arrangements with the bank were made.

Mr. DUNNING: I forget the month, but about that time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: At the time the house was not sitting. My hon. friend's proposal would mean that I must first come to the house with the proposal.

Mr. BENNETT: Ratify the proposal by statute, of course.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would my hon. friend suggest that that practice has ever been followed in this country?

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly was in connection with the Yukon railway.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But in connection with the purchase of property of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say is wrong. There must be statutory authority for the exercise of this power.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then until authorization for entering into the agreement is made by parliament no agreement could be entered into.

Mr. STEVENS: No authorization ever was given.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Authorization was given because the item was agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not authorization.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Nobody knows it better than my hon. friend.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is the kind of authorization in connection with what are called rental-purchase agreements.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I defy my hon. friend to cite any rental-purchase agreement that has ever been entered into by any of the departments where such a statute has been passed as he suggests.

Mr. BENNETT: There are only two. The Daly building was not of that kind—it was a purchase by instalments; and the Wench building in Vancouver was purchased by the present government but they could not pay off—

Mr. ELLIOTT: The principle applies to all rental-purchases. You have to have your vote each year.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but the only two rental-purchases that I know of are the armouries in Saskatoon, an old building, and the other in Westmount. The Daly building was a purchase by instalments.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the difference in principle?

Mr. BENNETT: It is entirely different.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Lavut building in Montreal—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the other one.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And the workshop building in Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: Last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, we are pretty near at the end of the payments. When I call my hon. friend's attention to what would have to take place, I know he will be one of the first to admit that what he is now suggesting is a rather unreasonable procedure.

Mr. BENNETT: The only correct procedure.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has persisted in saying that last year parliament authorized him to enter into this agreement with the Regina Armoury Association. What happened is very clearly set out in Hansard and covers about a column and a half. What the minister read a moment ago is practically all that appears there in regard to the matter. I notice the item passed just before eleven o'clock on May 4 last year. This is all that was said:

Regina—armoury, $33,500.

That was the item called. Then the report continues:

Mr. Gardiner: Will the minister explain this item?

Thereupon Mr. Elliott, the minister, said what he read a moment ago—which I shall not repeat—stating at the outset:

This is the first payment on the purchase of a building for armoury purposes in the city of Regina.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend surely admits he will find there that I had something to say on the matter?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the Minister of Railways has about eight or ten lines in reference to it, which he will admit is not a very complete exposition of the agreement later entered into.

Mr. DUNNING: A very simple one.

Mr. STEVENS: I will read his words. I am quoting from Hansard at page 2719:

Mr. Dunning: Perhaps I might say that while the term "private enterprise" was used by the minister, the association which is being formed is a non-profit organization consisting of the officers of the various units in the city. In connection with the arrangement there is no private profit of any kind at all. The city itself is contributing the site, as I say the organization will be a holding company merely to enable the cost to be amortized over a period of years.

That, I think, is virtually all that was said about it last year. No one will contend that that constitutes serious consideration by parliament of a proposed agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: But it does constitute a complete explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: I would say a very meagre explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Let both hon. members be fair in this matter. Obviously parliament was in an amiable mood on that occasion because I see "Item agreed to" appears five times on this page; so the estimates were passing through in a fairly expeditious manner —there was no critical examination of the items. The point at issue is whether by merely voting estimates from line to line, followed by a general money bill at the end of the session incorporating all the estimates, parliament is by statute sanctioning an agreement of that kind. I think my hon. friend will agree that obviously that is not a statutory approval or authorization of the agreement to which he has referred.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the agreement did not exist then.

Mr. STEVENS: By statute we voted $33,500 last year, and absolutely no more. This simply authorized the government to pay out $33,500, nothing more. There is a moral obligation resting on parliament to carry out an agreement the minister has entered into.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no doubt of that. I think if the minister comes before parliament—or his successor who will soon follow him—and says: "This $28,000 is a moral obligation resting on this country; we entered into an agreement, and we must carry it out," undoubtedly parliament will vote the money to carry out the agreement. But, as my hon. leader has pointed out, would it not be better in future, and indeed in this instance, that such an agreement should be ratified by act of parliament, or else that that class of business should not be done at all? Personally I agree with my leader that the whole sum should have been voted last year—$350,000 for the construction of an armoury in Regina. Such things should be paid for out of the consolidated revenue of Canada and not be erected into a series of semi-capital issues, because they are neither one nor the other. My own opinion is that it would be far better for parliament in the future to frown upon this class of transaction, because the argument of the Minister of Public Works shows that we may expect more. An hon. member comes to the government wanting some particular and rather expensive piece of work done in his riding, and he cites Regina, Westmount, Saskatoon, and says, "In these cases you did so and so". By showing that $25,000 or $28,000 or $40,000 a year, over a period of forty years, will not look very bad in the estimates he may be able to persuade a kind-hearted minister to grant his request, whereas if parliament faced the full expenditure it would say—no, it is not warranted. And multiply a transaction of this sort by a number of instances and the country is let in for a very heavy sum. The long and short of it is that the country is still obligated in connection with this matter to the extent of half a million dollars. It would be far better for the minister to have brought in an estimate this year for the sum of $350,000 to pay off the whole business. The total for Saskatchewan is $352,000; I say, it would be better to add another $300,000 and pay the whole thing off if the agreement would permit this being done—and I presume, from what the minister says, that it can be done. For my part, at any rate, I do not want to endorse the theory that because an estimate is presented to parliament, parliament has therefore ratified the agreement, or authorized the government or the minister to proceed.

Mr. RALSTON: What about leases ordinarily, say a five-year lease?

Mr. STEVENS: We have entered into a large number, especially in Ottawa. My hon. friend is a lawyer; I am not. But I am under the impression—

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking of parliamentary practice.

Mr. STEVENS: I am under the impression that there is some general authorization whereby the government has the right to enter into leases for public buildings. The deputy is beside the minister and will undoubtedly be able to tell him whether or not I am correct.

Mr. DUNNING: That means this, if it means anything: that if the minister had entered into an agreement to lease this building from the armoury association for twenty years, or for any other period, paying the rental, it would have been perfectly all right; but because he added a provision whereby two per cent amortization should be paid, the government to own the property at the end of twenty years, then he has done something wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not saying that the minister has done anything particularly wrong. My leader says—and I entirely concur in what he says—that this principle is bad; it is not the course that should be followed by parliament. I ask the government to consider this. Suppose we multiply this instance year after year, increasing the number of such cases; parliament will never know—unless it issues an order each year for a statement to be laid on the table of the number of such cases—just what our liabilities are. This creates a liability of half a million; and I would point out that, on the balance sheet in the annual statement of a private company, it would have to appear as a contingent liability, an undischarged liability. But it is not included at all in the public accounts of the country; it does not appear anywhere, nor does the Westmount item, nor the Saskatoon, nor the Lavut. And the minister said he thought there were many more. It would be interesting to know. The practice is obviously a bad one, and I contend, agreeing entirely with my leader, that this should be voted out of the consolidated revenue and paid for outright. Take the Wench building in Vancouver. When that transaction went through I thought it was a great mistake.

Mr. POWER: The Daly building in Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, both of them; it was a mistake to purchase in that way.

Mr. DUNNING: Was authority obtained for the first payment on the Wench building? Was it done in the same way?

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking from memory, I believe the Wench building was purchased in this way. The government had the old post office site, with an old building on it—and by the way it is held now for $1,000,000. That site was given for $300,000 about four years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Given?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, given to a gentleman for $300,000. The late Mr. McPherson, the former member, who negotiated the transaction, was down here. And in addition to this, the government made an agreement to pay $400,000 at the end of a certain period, on which sum they now pay $20,000 a year interest. It was a mortgage.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend approved of that.

Mr. STEVENS: In that case you could not help it. But it was not similar to this; it was not an analogous case.

Mr. DUNNING: These fine legal distinctions are too close for me; I cannot get them.

Mr. STEVENS: It was a mortgage not yet due, and the government is paying interest upon it. I think myself the government could have got a much better arrangement in connection with the purchase of that building had they taken more time. Expropriation proceedings could have been taken, or some other method followed. What we object to is the principle involved in this sort of thing, without parliament having each year full knowledge as to how much we owe on just such transactions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Pages 32 and 34 of these estimates will show the agreements that are outstanding at the present time. Offhand, my information is that the first one was the Westmount armoury. That was $13,500 a year for twenty years.

Mr. STEVENS: It is here only as an ordinary payment. If it were cited in the item as intended to pay off a lease purchase agreement then the information would be correct.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I appreciate the argument of my hon. friends, because these are matters that are of interest to every hon. gentleman. The practice, however, has not originated recently; it was in vogue at the time the Westmount armoury transaction was put through, before the advent to power of the present government. That was an annual payment of $13,500. But may I point out that the next one, the Daly building, involved not a small amount but some $1,000,000, with ten payments annually. And that was done by my hon. friends.

Mr. BENNETT: No, by the Union government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. My information is that it was done by the Meighen government. That was the purchase of a $1,000,000 building. The next item was the workshops at Ottawa, appearing lower down on page 32:

Towards purchase of building for government workshops.

That took place under the present administration and involves a payment of $12,200 a year. The next one was the Wench building, which was purchased subject to mortgage, and the matter was done in the same way. In each case the agreement entered into was prepared and passed upon by the Department of Justice. The instructions of the Department of Justice, which the Auditor General follows, are that if you are going to lease a building in the ordinary way that money may be paid out of the general vote for rentals, but if you are going to purchase under what is called a rental-purchase agreement the proper way is that which has been followed in this case, and which, I need not repeat, was not instituted by the present government. The difference between this method and the ordinary rental-agreement is that the annual payment must be voted each year. That has been the practice.

Mr. IRVINE: Why not change the practice?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That might be a good idea if it were not for the fact that it is absolutely impractical, as I have pointed out. In this case we would have had to stay here until August before the negotiations were concluded. That is the difficulty. According to the Department of Justice this is the proper way in which this action should have been taken, and in spite of what has been said by my hon. friends I take it that this is according to law.

Mr. GEARY: The Department of Justice say that is the right way to provide for payment, of course, but I hardly think they would say that is the right way to do business of this kind. Is it the opinion of the Department of Justice that without an order in council and without any other authorization the government may go ahead and buy whatever they like? Is that the way these things should be done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; that is the way it has been done under all governments. The Department of Justice prepares the agreements and advises the Department of Public Works.

Mr. GEARY: On the assumption that it is properly authorized they see that the agreement is properly prepared.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They say that getting the vote this way properly authorizes payment, and that is the proper way to do it.

Mr. GEARY: But that does not impose any liability upon you to continue making the payments?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; that is why I am asking parliament to continue to vote the money.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister for whom I feel more strongly than any other member of the government is the Minister of Public Works, for I know what he is up against. I have never seen this agreement, but I suppose it starts off by saying that the Dominion of Canada, represented by the Minister of Public Works, agrees to do so and so. If the minister has signed such an agreement he has had no authority from parliament to do so. There are terms in that agreement which provide for yearly payments; of course those moneys cannot be voted except from year to year, and we find as a result that the minister has entered into a contract not authorized by parliament. If there is any default under the contract, therefore, it would involve the personal liability of the minister himself, because he should have seen that there was parliamentary authorization for the agreement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Surely my hon. friend as a lawyer, and quite a good lawyer, does not submit that argument.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I never was more serious in my life.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know what kind of lawyer my hon. friend is, and I know he does not mean that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I can refer my hon. friend to a case of that kind pending just now before the privy council, a case involving the same principle. If a government passed legislation to do a certain thing the government would have power to do that thing, but in the case before the privy council the government did not pass that legislation and one of the ministers undertook to carry out that action himself, under the impression that he had the approval of the legislature. As a result the whole matter is in question.

Answering my hon. friend frankly and seriously, I think things should be done in a regular way. By what right did the Minister of Public Works say he represented the Dominion of Canada in this matter? I should think the minister would be very anxious that no default should be made under this contract, otherwise he might have to part with some of the money which I am glad to say he made in this part of that province. Parliament should not be confronted by a situation such as this.

The Minister of National Defence referred to the power of the government to enter into a lease for five years or for twenty years. It is true that this government inherently has the power to enter into such a lease; it has the power to incur any expense necessary to the carrying on of the business of the country, but it cannot enter into a five-year lease or a twenty-year lease for the benefit of some private individual or corporation. Any expense which is necessary for the carrying on of the affairs of the country can be incurred by the government, with parliament reviewing the expenditure, but that is not the situation here. It seems to me that if important expenditures of money are to be made there should be a clear authorization by parliament. In a matter of this kind there would have been no difficulty in entering into an agreement subject to ratification by parliament; that would have satisfied the other parties and the agreement would have been ratified by parliament readily if such ratification were justified by circumstances, and of course that would constitute an agreement of the highest standard. My objection is that this is not good business; this matter concerns $560,000, and I do not think the public money is being handled in the best interests of the Dominion. We all feel sympathy for these men who have been good enough to devote their time and energy to a laudable cause from which the country benefits, but it is not strictly a business agreement. The same result could have been arrived at with less money paid out of the treasury. If there are to be any more undertakings of this kind I hope parliament will have an opportunity to consider them before they become finally binding upon this country.

Mr. GEARY: What will happen if parliament does not approve of this payment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then parliament must accept the responsibility for its refusal.

Mr. GEARY: What would happen? Would these people have no recourse?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They would have no recourse against me.

Mr. SPENCER: In answer to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin I believe the minister said this was the only way to pay off this amount of money. What is there to prevent the government from putting an amount in the estimates sufficient to pay off the balance of this amount in one year or in two years, instead of waiting for twenty years?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think there is any objection to paying off the amount, and I have no doubt that such an arrangement could be made in practically all these cases. However, apparently it was thought at different times by different governments that this was a better way of doing it, or else the house would not have passed the item.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is certainly a more expensive way of financing.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister ought not to say that; there are really no grounds for that remark. Will the minister lay on the table at the next sitting the agreement and the other documents?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will endeavour to have them by the next sitting.

Mr. GEARY: Is the government estopped from denying there is a contract by having made a payment?

Mr. RALSTON: The king can do no wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: There are too many lawyers here to-night.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it that there is nothing in the agreement which prevents this amount being paid off.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the minister say that he will include the necessary amount in the estimates next year and clean the matter up?

Mr. STEVENS: Or put it in the supplementaries for this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am very anxious to get these votes of mine through, and anxious also to give the committee all the information I can. But the hon. member for Lincoln knows as well as anyone else—

Mr. CHAPLIN: I know it would be good business to do it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have great regard for the business acumen of my hon. friend, and his advice goes a long way on both sides of the house, but that any particular amount will be in the estimates is something which I hope my hon. friend will not press me to say.

Mr. GEARY: I think the minister would much rather leave it for this party to pay.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In that case the annual instalments would have been paid.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): The next item is No. 127—public buildings, Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: We are calling these item by item. This afternoon I directed the attention of the committee to the fact that there had been a departure from this procedure.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): I was simply following the procedure which had been adopted to-night before I took the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: It was not adopted.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEVENS: We asked this afternoon that they be called item by item.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): Is that the desire of the committee?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a quesiton of the committee's desire, it is a question of the practice of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: In fairness to the Chairman may I point out to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that this is apparently a misunderstanding; we were following that practice this evening.

Mr. BENNETT: We succeeded this afternoon in getting back to the practice of calling the resolutions item by item. When the hon. member for Wetaskiwin asked about that $400,000 item we got away from that practice. I want to inquire about some of these items, especially those with regard to the pick-up table.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend is referring to the pick-up table installation at Saskatoon.

Mr. DUNNING: There is one at Regina.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Regina post office—installation of pick-up table, $3,500.

Mr. BENNETT: What is involved in this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to provide for what is known as the Cummins pick-up table for the Regina post office, as requested by the Deputy Postmaster General on September 18, 1928, as follows:

I wish to inform you that the department has decided to install mechanical pick-up machines in the Saskatoon and Regina post offices. These machines to be similar to those already in operation at Toronto and Montreal.

After examination of practically all devices of this kind, the Post Office department decided upon the Cummins table as being the most satisfactory. It is said to save the labour of several men.

Mr. KENNEDY: What does it pick up?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It picks up letters.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The same machine is being installed at Calgary.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was quite a long discussion a year ago with regard to this machine, and it was then pointed out that the department had decided that it was superior to any other.

Mr. DUNNING: It is being installed throughout Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the larger places.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this pay for the purchase of the machine, or is it on a rental basis?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is for the purchase of the machine.

Mr. FRASER: Where are they purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: From the International Equipment Company of Ottawa.

Mr. FRASER: Where are they manufactured?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are made in Chicago. This is the only large pick-up table on the market.

Mr. SPENCER: Is there any duty against them?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think there is.

Mr. SPENCER: So the government is penalizing itself in paying duty on a table to be used in a government department, and which is not made in Canada?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a bookkeeping entry; we have to get them wherever they are made.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There would be no duty if they were not made in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps not.

Item agreed to.

Regina public building—addition, $100,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is that for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We passed this item some time ago. It is for the erection of an addition to the public building at Regina in order to provide adequate accommodation for all government services in that city. The situation here is similar to the situation in Winnipeg. The facilities are not adequate and it is desired to utilize the building and the site now owned by the government, and adjoining property has been expropriated by the government.

Item agreed to.

Rosthern—public building, $32,000.

Mr. BARBER: What is that for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote of $21,000 from last year.

Mr. BARBER: What is the revenue of this post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal revenue is $6,871 and the customs revenue is $5,634.

Mr. STEVENS: Will this amount complete the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Saskatoon—public building, $400,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What is this for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This item was passed some time ago.

Mr. GEARY: I suppose in all these items we are getting no accurate idea at all as to the ultimate expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where there is a revote I think I can safely say to my hon. friend that it completes the building.

Mr. GEARY: I hope that is not the case with the Toronto customs house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not in this list.

Mr. GEARY: The minister may rely on an alibi for the moment. I do not wish to question the action of the committee in passing the item for the customs building at Toronto, but I should like to ask the minister when he is going to commence the work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are about to advertise for tenders. My hon. friend is perhaps sufficiently familiar with the local circumstances to know that we have been urging for the removal as soon as possible of the bridge that has been in the way on the site for some time. Plans and specifications are being prepared and I understand that within about a week advertisements for tenders will be issued.

Mr. GEARY: Are the plans prepared in the department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. I shall be glad to have my hon. friend look them over. They will be found satisfactory, I hope.

Item agreed to.

Alberta—Calgary post office—installation of pick-up table, $3,500.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What is the company that supplies these tables?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The International Equipment Company.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Of Ottawa?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Can the minister inform me as to the personnel of that company?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I cannot.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Can the minister's deputy enable him to answer the question?

Mr. ELLIOTT: He tells me that he does not know.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the minister buy from an outfit without knowing anything of the personnel? That is not customary. None of us do that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Post Office Department investigate as to what they want. The function of this department is largely to supply to the various other departments the facilities that they require. If they decide, for instance, upon a pick-up table of a certain kind, and if they insist upon that particular table, we want first of all to be assured that it is the only one of its kind procurable, so that we may have an opportunity of comparing prices. The International Equipment Company have probably supplied all the pick-up tables that have been purchased by the government for a number of years. There is a uniform price.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The department is a sort of purchasing agent for the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is somewhat the position.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Then I suppose we can get the further information we desire from the Post Office Department, or should we get it from this minister? Does the minister mean to say, from his remarks of a minute ago, that we have to go to the Post Office Department to get any information respecting the personnel of a company from which he is buying these goods, or do we get it from him?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have a purchasing agent, and while perhaps I should have made an effort to come into contact with this particular company, I have not found time to do so. I have not done so, at any rate, and I am very frank in telling my hon. friend that I do not know any of the personnel of the company.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the minister wish to lead the house to believe, from his last few remarks, that he carries on the personal negotiations in regard to all these contracts?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; I am trying to lead him to believe the opposite.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why does he try to do so when he knows this is being done by the departmental officials, and that they meet these people? No doubt somebody meets them, and they can surely inform us as to the personnel of the company.

Mr. POULIOT: If the price is fair, what difference does it make whether Joe or Thomas is the president?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know that the price is fair. How does the hon. member know? Does he know anything about it himself? Is he answering for the minister? Surely the minister is able to answer for himself.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend did not catch my "if." I did not give any information. It was just a reflection.

Mr. DUNNING: Just for the sake of information, I should like to ask the hon. member for Lincoln a question. I have not so far conceived it to be part of my duty to know the personnel of the various institutions with which the Department of Railways and Canals deals and I doubt if I could name one in a score. Surely it is not reasonable to expect the minister to know that. I doubt very much if the purchasing agent would know the personnel in connection with many institutions. He might know the salesmen or the officials in charge of tenders, in respect to some of the companies. If my hon. friend, on my estimates, asks me that question in connection with almost any company, I cannot answer it.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am sure the minister's chief officials will be able to tell him about the personnel of the companies with which his department is doing business. Nearly all the letterheads will state who the president and the secretary of the concern are. That is all we ask in this case.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure it would be difficult for me to answer.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not doubt that what the minister says is true, but that does not alter the facts. It is possible to have such information in respect to any company one is dealing with, and it is only reasonable that at least some of the personnel of this company should be known.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know whether I should trouble my hon. friend again with what I have already stated. This is the information that comes from the Post Office department:

> I wish to inform you that this department proposes to install mechanical pick-up machines at the following post offices during the fiscal year 1929-30: Calgary, Saskatoon, Hamilton, Ottawa and Regina.
> These machines to be similar to those already in use at Montreal and Toronto.

I could go back and find out what investigations were made by the purchasing agent when he purchased the machines for Montreal and Toronto, whether they were the first ones purchased or not. I know my hon. friend is not very serious about the objections he is making in this case, because he cannot refrain from smiling.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am smiling at the information. The information the minister is giving is entirely apart from what I have asked.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I cannot help my hon. friend.

Mr. FRASER: If the minister has the information so far in advance in regard to the number of machines he is going to use throughout the country, and if the Post Office department have made a thorough investigation of the machines, why does he not buy them from the manufacturers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know how you would buy from the manufacturers other than through their agents. That is what we do.

Mr. CHAPLIN: One reason why I asked for the information was that in many cases United States manufacturers of articles such as this, appoint officials from their own company as their agents in Canada, bring the goods in, pay the duty themselves and then resell their product. That is why I want to know whether this company is a branch of an American manufacturing concern, or whether it is a bona fide business proposition of somebody else selling their goods.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister say on which side of the Niagara river that firm is located?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Another bright remark.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the minister this question? We have a purchasing department. Here again is a principle to which I made up my mind I would try to direct the attention of this committee. We are purchasing vast quantities of goods of various kinds. We are installing pick-up machines, for instance, in several post offices, and in the larger cities I suppose there would be two or three of them. They cost $3,500 each. What do we maintain this purchasing department for, paying gentlemen very considerable salaries, if not for the purpose of dealing with matters of this kind? I find in the Public Works department one article, in another department another article, and in another department something else, and there is no coordinated effort to buy these various goods at the best prices obtainable. Dredges are used by several departments—by Marine and Fisheries, Railways and Canals, Public Works. There is no central purchasing organization, nothing to provide information in connection with many of these purchases which the different departments of the government are making, and each department is very jealous in retaining its rights with respect to the others. Instead of the Post Office Department asking the Public Works department, of all places in the world, to buy pick-up machines for the post offices, why is not all this purchasing done by a central agency? How is the Public Works department better equipped to make purchases of that kind than somebody else? How is it better equipped to buy filing cabinets, office equipment and that kind of thing? What is the purchasing department for, what are these men paid their salaries for, if not to enable the country to get the benefit that business gets by having purchasing agents? We all know the factors which a purchasing agent puts before a business executive. He prepares information as to the prices at which given goods can be bought, where they are made, the net cost delivered; and with all this information before them the management say yes or no, and that is the end of it. But here we have the Post Office Department writing a letter to the Public Works department—of all places in the world—to get filing cabinets and pick-up machines for the post office. The post office is a public work, it is true, but why should the Public Works department, which is charged with the responsibility of constructing and maintaining public buildings all over Canada, be bothered with making these purchases when we have a purchasing department?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The post office might as well have applied to the Health department.

An hon. MEMBER: Another bright remark.

Mr. BENNETT: When Sir Edward Kemp was chairman of the purchasing commission during the war, and Sir Hormisdas Laporte was with him, they evolved a purchasing system which I think challenged the admiration not only of this country but of all other countries as well. They kept minutes, they had their figures, and they are there yet as a permanent memorial to what they did. The Prime Minister said to us: Where can we save money? Money can be saved right here. In connection with many of the items I have been able to discover just by a little study, looking through the Auditor General's report and the estimates, if all the purchasing were put in charge of one central agency you could afford to pay a man a very large salary and still save at least half a million dollars a year. That is worth while; it represents the interest on a very substantial sum of money.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend's argument is rather an argument in favour of the practice that is now being followed. Perhaps it is not followed to the extent that my hon. friend would like, but just the same the Public Works department does purchase for several government departments. We purchase for the Post Office Department, for instance—

Mr. BENNETT: Do you purchase for the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think they do their own purchasing pretty well.

Mr. STEVENS: They will not let you in there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The cabinets and office equipment for the Department of Trade and Commerce, for instance, are all purchased through the one purchasing department.

Mr. DUNNING: You purchase filing cabinets, office equipment and furniture for the railway department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, we are carrying out in that respect the policy which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is arguing for, that as far as possible there should be one central purchasing agent for all the departments of government, with a man at the head who knows about costs and prices.

Mr. BENNETT: We already have a purchasing commission. I am trying to find out what it is doing.

Mr. STEVENS: It has gone so dead that the minister has lost sight of it.

Mr. BENNETT: They call it salvaging now, but it has not salvaged itself yet.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think we are agreed that one central purchasing department can purchase to better advantage than several. It gets back to the sound business principle on which the chain stores work, the purchasing for all the stores in the chain being done through one agency instead of individually by each store. That is why a number of these chain stores have made such a great success of their business. That is why the Public Works department—

Mr. BENNETT: Is so successful.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I should not say is the most efficient department in the government service—

Mr. BENNETT: But if the rest of the ministers were out, you would admit it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not deny it. I really think that what is being done is largely what my hon. friend is arguing for. Perhaps it could be carried out to a greater extent than it is at the present time. I think that if my hon. friend saw the recommendations that come from the purchasing agent, as I have done for the last two years, and scrutinized them closely, he would come to believe that when the purchasing agent recommends a certain purchase it is about the best purchase that could be made of that particular class of goods.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Who is the purchasing agent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. Dawson, and if my hon. friend will go up and discuss with him the prices, for instance, of office equipment of various kinds, I am sure he will be satisfied that the purchasing department is in the hands of a man who knows his business pretty well.

Mr. ADSHEAD: You have one central purchasing agent?

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the Public Works department only. Let us assume that a considerable number of yards of carpet are required and that it is of a kind not manufactured in Canada, that it can be secured only from England. Do I understand that there is any rule requiring the purchasing agent to buy that through a set of merchants in London, Ontario? Perhaps the minister would give us information on that point. In view of what he has said it would be highly interesting to know just why the public accounts indicate such large sums of money being paid to firms in London, Ontario, if the purchasing agent has such a large scope for his activities and exercise the authority which the minister has indicated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend will find that that is another example that proves the efficiency of the purchasing agent. It is perhaps the best example you could have of the care and good judgment he exercises in connection with matters of this kind.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad to know the minister feels that his buyer is so well acquainted with the value of all the houses in the Dominion that he has determined in his own mind that the market at London for certain things is much better than in Montreal, Toronto or some other large city. If something is required in the Department of National Defence, does the purchase go through the Public Works department or through some other agency, or is there a special buyer in the Department of National Defence?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will understand that the Department of National Defence would itself buy military clothing and other equipment.

Mr. DUNNING: Sam Brown belts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Ross rifles.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But if the Department of National Defence requires something that comes reasonably within the scope of the Department of Public Works they issue a requisition to us and we purchase accordingly.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We were supposed to have a purchasing department that was a real purchasing department and acting for all the various departments. How many of these departments have their own purchasing agents?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no purchasing department.

Mr. BENNETT: We had it for years.

Mr. DUNNING: I never knew of the time historically that the Department of Railways and Canals, for instance, did not have its own purchasing department. I think every department always has had a purchasing agency.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh no.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend can tell me any period of years when the Department of Railways and Canals did not have its own purchasing agent I shall be glad of the information.

Mr. IRVINE: If the post office has its own purchasing department, why does it apply to the Department of Public Works when it requires anything?

Mr. DUNNING: I will explain the matter as I understand it. While the Department of Railways and Canals has a purchasing agent, if the department requires anything in the way of office furniture or equipment of that character it applies to the Department of Public Works where such purchasing has been centralized for years. But when it comes to buying cement for the work on the Welland canal, or timber for repairing lock gates, and all that sort of thing over the canal system, with all due deference to my hon. friend from Lincoln, the purchasing has always been handled by the Department of Railways and Canals. I think there must be some misunderstanding between us, because I do not recollect the time when there were not several departments which had their own purchasing agencies, while at the same time, according to my understanding, the purchase of office equipment and buildings has been centralized for a number of years past in the Department of Public Works. I know if any office furniture, such as filing cabinets, pick-up tables in post offices and similar equipment, is necessary it is requisitioned from the Department of Public Works. But so far as buying machinery for the Department of Railways and Canals is concerned—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Cars, for instance.

Mr. BENNETT: Private cars; they don't buy any others.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Where do they purchase cars?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not mention cars.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The other minister did.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear him.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the minister say he did not?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear him. At the time I was trying to listen to the hon. member, I think from Peace River, who was on his feet.

Mr. BENNETT: Don't deny that other people may have heard. Learn a few lessons in the amenities, if nothing else.

Mr. KENNEDY: I understood that we had a purchasing commission.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It has gone out of business.

Mr. STEVENS: Chloroformed.

Mr. KENNEDY: Have we a purchasing commission?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my time in the government has been too short to answer positively, but I have no memory of any purchasing commission, other than the commission for the purchase of war material. My understanding with respect to that—subject to correction from other ministers—is that it went out of business before this government took office.

Mr. BENNETT: No sir.

Mr. DUNNING: We have a salvage commission, which has to do with seeing as far as possible that materials required by one department are not already in the possession of another department.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two of three statements made by the Minister of Public Works that should be checked. I am sorry to have to do this, but I do not propose that Hansard should go out with these inaccurate statements. He has left an impression on the minds of hon. members that the Public Works department does the purchasing for the Post Office Department. The hon. member for East Calgary certainly got that impression, and one other hon. gentleman made the same observation. But his department purchases equipment only, it does not purchase, for instance, stationery for the post office.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor mail boxes, nor the locks.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, the lock-boxes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking of the rural delivery boxes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course his department does not. It does purchase equipment for the post office in the way of furniture. The boxes with "D.C." on them I think are purchased through the Department of Public Works. But the great bulk of the purchases made by the Post Office Department we know are made by the department itself. The Railway department has its own purchasing agent; the Interior department in its manifold activities does much purchasing. The Public Works department does not purchase anything for the Interior department except office equipment, files and so on. The Public Works department does purchase equipment for buildings because it is charged with responsibility for buildings. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is pretty much what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the minister intended to leave that impression but—

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. friend does not want to be unfair, and I think Hansard will bear me out when I say that he has gained an impression that he should not have gained from what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: I am familiar with the purchases of the various departments, but the hon. gentleman from East Calgary is not.

Mr. DUNNING: How do you know; you cannot speak for him.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I cannot speak for him, but he asked because he said he desired to know. I know because for the space of a few minutes I had something to do with various departments of the public service; and what is more, during one period of my career as a member of parliament I made myself fairly familiar with the operations of the departments. I was much younger and more active then. During the war we had a purchasing commission, presided over by Sir Edward Kemp.

Mr. DUNNING: But it did not perform the functions of the purchasing agents of the various departments.

Mr. BENNETT: It became the central purchasing agency for all departments of the government.

Sir EUGENE FISET: For all items chargeable to war appropriation.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Rimouski is very familiar with that part of it, and his subsequent speeches when he was a candidate for election indicated that.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have no regrets for any speeches I made when I was a candidate and have nothing to retract.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad his memory is so bad.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It is more than you can say.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure it must be very delightful to the hon. gentleman to have forgotten his speeches. But the commission presided over by Sir Edward Kemp dealt not only with war purchases but with all purchases incidental to the conduct of government, because there were then no public works being undertaken in Canada, during the war, except two public buildings.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is exactly what I said—in charge of every purchase for all departments of everything chargeable to war appropriation.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were not chargeable to war appropriation, because there were no civil undertakings going on except two public works in the whole of Canada.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but there was a civil vote for every department.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course there was a civil vote. But I am talking about expenditures in connection with public works; and there were only two undertakings in connection with buildings in the whole of Canada, from 1915 until 1919.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with the department over which I now preside the work at Nelson was going on during a considerable part of the war.

Mr. BENNETT: I was talking about buildings.

Mr. DUNNING: Purchases is the point at issue.

Mr. BENNETT: They were not making any purchases at Nelson at that time.

Mr. DUNNING: Material purchases, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall have something to say in that regard in connection with expenditures going on at Churchill at the present time, and which I wish to have checked up.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be delighted.

Mr. BENNETT: I am interested for instance in the work of carpenters, paid 75 cents an hour, one of whom by the name of Scott I have in mind. He did not know the difference between a buzzsaw and a handsaw. Now, there was subsequently appointed a commission on which Colonel Lafleche sat, and associated with him was another gentleman whose name I do not recall.

Mr. POWER: Sir Hormisdas Laporte of Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: Colonel Lafleche was subsequently chairman of that body. The name of the gentleman associated with him I do not recall at the moment. Perhaps the hon. member for Rimouski will remember the name.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Walsh, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the purchasing commission which operated under the administration, from 1921 to 1925, prior to the minister coming into this house, and it was more or less chloroformed and became a salvage commission. That is the position. Last session I directed attention to the matter and asked the Minister of Finance what they did—this chloroformed commission which has now gone out to salvage the government. It was originally intended to be a purchasing commission. It was the intention of the government at that time that we should have a centralized purchasing body who would endeavour to save this country many hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend say that it ever functioned in relation to the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. BENNETT: In my somewhat cursory stopover at various departments I was never Acting Minister of Railways and Canals and therefore cannot say. But I can speak with respect to most other departments.

Mr. POWER: I do not want to interrupt the leader of the opposition, but I might point out that I happened to be a member of the house at the time the purchasing commission was in existence as such.

Mr. BENNETT: Which one?

Mr. POWER: The purchasing commission to which the hon. gentleman has referred, as it existed during the war and for a period afterward. During its lifetime it had the greatest powers such as the hon. gentleman ascribes to it; there were purchasing agents in all the departments. There was a director of equipment and supply in the Post Office Department, and he is still there. There was a director of contracts in the Department of National Defence, and he is still there; in fact, he has been in the department twenty-five or thirty years, the same man. There was a director of contracts or a purchasing agent in the Public Works department; there was one in the Department of Railways and Canals; and, although I do not know about the Department of the Interior, I think there was one there. These directors of purchases functioned during the time this super purchasing commission was in existence, and if after a while its functions were somewhat curtailed it was because the government came to the conclusion that they did not want any overlapping of responsibility. At least, that was the reason given in the house, and I think it was acquiesced in on all sides.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has stated the case correctly so far as the various departments are concerned. During the period of the war the commission presided over by Sir Edward Kemp met daily, kept its minutes, and dealt with the whole problem of purchasing, and it was estimated at the end of the war that it had saved the country many millions of dollars—not hundreds of thousands—as the hon. gentleman from Rimouski will recall. Then it was thought that by reason of being able to fix prices it could be utilized in various departments in connection with purchases, and it was so utilized, although that was not part of its original function. The various purchasing agents were responsible, through that commission, for whatever was purchased, and they were able to get better prices. After the war a commission was appointed, and my memory is that Colonel Lafleche was chairman. But that commission was objected to by certain of my hon. friends opposite for reasons that are fairly obvious, having regard to the ante-war conditions with respect to purchases; and so the old procedure was reverted to. We chloroformed the purchasing commission, as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said, and the commission is now a salvaging commission, whatever that may mean. No accurate definition has been given of it. The Minister of Finance last year, essaying the gentle art of sophistry, attempted to define its duties, but without much success; and no one has yet been able to suggest a satisfactory definition. The point is this. Why should we not be able to have this commission function as originally intended, so that the various departments that require the same things for the conduct of their business might be able to purchase satisfactorily—not to have several orders coming in, as they now are, through purchasing agents, an order from the International Machine Company here and someone else there, but by reason of just the very principle my hon. friend has mentioned, the chain store principle, obtaining satisfactory prices through centralization of requirements? In this way purchases might be made effectively, efficiently and to the best possible advantage of the country. That is the position we have endeavoured to indicate, and therein lies the answer to the question proposed the other day, as to how money might be saved in the conduct of the public service. I shall have something to say later on to the same effect in connection with dredging.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member (Mr. Power) tells the committee that during a certain period different departments had purchasing agents of their own. He knows very well that these purchasing agents did not purchase; they were purchasing agents only in name. They were men who were left in the department for the purpose of making up specifications of goods required and handing them over to the purchasing agent, who purchased them in one lot. That was the sensible businesslike way of doing it because goods can be purchased better in that way than in any other.

Mr. POWER: Now that my hon. friend recalls it to my memory, I remember perfectly well, when I sat on the other side of the house as he is doing now, wishing in my own little way to embarrass the government and to prevent them from getting their estimates through. I advanced arguments similar to the argument the hon. member is now making. But I said: Why in the world should you keep these purchasing agents if you are going to have a super-purchasing agent? Why keep these individual agents in the different departments? I suggested that if they were not acting as purchasing agents there was no use paying them three, four and five thousand dollars a year; there was no use doing so if they were only clerks who were required to sent out requisitions to the government contracts supervision committee. I do not know whether my hon. friend was then sitting on this side of the house, but if he was not at any rate someone laughed at me and assured me that these agents had functions to perform. I am sure they told me that, because otherwise they would undoubtedly have listened to me. They were either doing something useful or they were not, one or the other; if they were not doing a useful service they should have been abolished and if they were doing something useful they are doing it to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: At page 66 of the estimates I find the following details:

Government contracts supervision committee salaries including L. R. LaFlèche, secretary, at $6,000, and that of L. H. Beer, salvage officer, $5,000, telephones, telegrams, travelling expenses, stationery, et cetera; 1929-30, $21,200; 1928-29, $21,500; decrease $300.

That is the commission to which I was directing the attention of the minister. It is now called the government contracts supervision committee, and the salvage committee has become a salvage officer.

Item agreed to.

Calgary—public building, $300,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How far will that $300,000 go?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid it will not go very far; this will be a fairly expensive building, costing nearly $1,000,000. We are trying to cut down the expense a little, but we cannot do very much.

Mr. POULIOT: I would like to ask that the same amount be given to Temiscouata county.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

THE I'M ALONE INCIDENT

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table copies of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the United States with respect to the I'm Alone incident. I have no doubt the house will wish to have this correspondence printed, and if it is agreeable I would move:

That 750 copies in English and 300 copies in French of the correspondence with respect to the I'm Alone incident now tabled be printed forthwith and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, April 26, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

On the order for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Parent for the concurrence in the second report of the select standing committee on public accounts:

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I say "Stand"?

Mr. ERNST: Stand.

Mr. POWER: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was agreed that the motion should stand until the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), the chairman of the committee, who signed the report, was in his place. He is not present to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands, by unanimous consent.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

SALE OR TRANSFER OF SHARES OF STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): May I remind the house and the country that in the budget speech delivered on March 1, notice was given of a proposed change in part seven of the Special War Revenue Act, concerning the sale or transfer of shares of stock. It was provided that this change should go into effect on the 1st of May, next Wednesday. It is now apparent that the necessary amending bill may not be ready to receive royal assent before that date and it is proposed that the revised rates shall not be effectual until July 1. The officers of the National Revenue department have been notified accordingly.

The abolition of the Special War Revenue Act tax on cables, telegrams, railway and other tickets becomes effective on May 1.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Is it proposed that there shall be no amendments in the rate of the new tax with respect to mines and mining shares, or is that subject to discussion and reconsideration by the ministry when the resolution is before the house?

Mr. ROBB: It is subject to discussion when the resolution is before the house.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Just in that connection I notice the minister used the words "revised rates." Since he mentions there are going to be revised rates, I was wondering if he should not make them public at this time.

Mr. ROBB: The term "revised rates" is used because the rates as presented to parliament in the budget are revised rates.

NEWSPAPER VAPAUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, or the Solicitor General, or whichever power or authority the question should be directed to, in respect of a petition which was presented to the house yesterday by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre), a petition which asked for the suppression of a paper called "Vapaus." I should like to ask whether the officers of the house have examined that petition, and whether they have formally accepted or rejected it. In connection with the question, if I am in order, I should like to point out that Bourinot, third edition, page 348, says:

> All petitions should be respectfully and temperately worded. The house will refuse to receive them if they contain any reflections on the king or his representative in Canada, or on the action of parliament, or on any of its committees, or on the courts of justice, or affect "the legal and social positions of individuals."

I believe that petition shows disrespect to His Majesty inasmuch as it asks for the suppression of liberty, whereas His Majesty stands for liberty to all British people. In the next place it infringes the law.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman, to be in order, should give notice and move that the petition be not received in spite of the report which has been made. The matter is not debatable just now, but if the hon. gentleman will give notice and move that the petition be not received for the reason he alleges, he will be in order.

Mr. IRVINE: Has the petition been examined?

Mr. SPEAKER: All petitions are examined by the officers of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: After they have been presented?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So the petition is in the hands of the law officers of the house?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly. It is not before the house now. I will see what report has been made and will inform the house at the next sitting. The hon. gentleman can give notice and move that the petition be not received.

WESTERN AIR MAIL CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) a question, of which I have not given him notice, but I think he will be able to answer it without notice. I have received a telegram regarding the awarding of the air mail contracts for western Canada. It reads:

> Understand Western Canada Airways of Winnipeg will be granted entire western air mail contracts. When in Ottawa last month postal minister assured me that our company would be given consideration. You are aware I formed Great Western Airways and pioneered aviation here with board of directors fully able to finance air mail service between Winnipeg and Calgary. Disaster to my company not to be considered and grossly unfair especially after minister's promise to me.

That is from Captain McCall, an air man with a very distinguished record during the war. There is an article also in the Edmonton Journal of the 18th of February, complaining that the Commercial Airways, Limited did not have an opportunity to tender. Perhaps the minister will be able to remove the difficulties which these gentlemen are now experiencing by stating what are the facts in connection with the air mail service.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): No contract has been awarded for that service yet. That company is being communicated with for an offer.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to the current issue of the Financial Post very extensive pulp and paper consolidations are likely to take place, as a result of a desire on the part of banking groups to consolidate their positions. I should like to to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether his department has been consulted with reference to this new development in banking policy.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The first I have heard of it is the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth). I have not yet read the Financial Post.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last evening, we had passed the first two items of vote No. 127, which is as follows:

Alberta

Calgary post office—installation of pick-up table—$3,500.
Calgary—public building—$300,000.
Carway — building for immigration and customs purposes—$2,500.
Camrose—public building—$35,000.
Coutts—building for immigration and customs purposes—$2,500.
Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc.—$17,000.
Edmonton—grain inspection building—$5,000.
Edmonton—immigration building—$65,000.
Edmonton — public building — addition—$100,000.
Redcliff—armoury accommodation—$1,200.
Red Deer public building—addition and alterations—$2,000.
Vegreville—public building—$35,000.
Wainwright—public building—$28,000—Total, $596,700.

The next item is:

Carway — building for immigration and customs purposes, $2,500.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not understand that we had passed the item with regard to a public building in Calgary. I would like the minister to give some explanation of this item of $300,000 for a public building in Calgary.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): I do not know whether my hon. friend was present last night when the matter was under discussion. This amount is required towards the erection of a new public building to house all the government offices at Calgary. The proposed building will be an eight storey stone and brick structure situated on Eighth avenue at the corner of First street east. The building will have a frontage of 158 feet 9 inches on Eighth avenue by a depth of 120 feet on First street east. The new building proposed to be erected at Calgary was advertised in March, 1920, and tenders were received amounting to approximately $1,400,000. Those were the tenders at that time, and that is the best estimate that I can give to my hon. friend of what the probable cost will be. The building will contain 2,808,307 cubic feet which, at the price of $1,400,000, will be between 52 and 53 cents per cubic foot.

Mr. SPENCER: There is nothing in the votes and proceedings or in Hansard to show that Vote 127 was passed last night.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Hansard will show that this particular item was agreed to last night.

Mr. SPENCER: It should appear in Hansard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in Hansard. My hon. friend will see that the item was agreed to last night.

Mr. BENNETT: May I suggest the desirability of having that building faced with granite? When this building was discussed in 1914, it will be recalled that there was an item in the estimates of $250,000, but then the war came on. In 1920 tenders were called for a building of stone and brick. There is a very fine quarry of granite in the constituency of the Minister of National Health, and that granite has been found very serviceable. It makes an excellent building material. I was hoping that possibly alternative tenders might be called for the utilization of that granite. The Minister of National Health knows the granite to which I refer.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is only fair to my hon. friend to say that the present recommendations do not provide for granite proper. As my hon. friend knows, it is much more expensive.

Mr. BENNETT: It might not be very much more expensive.

Mr. ELLIOTT: However, I shall be very glad to consider the proposal of having alternative tenders, but I do not think we can make an exception of the city of Calgary in that respect.

Mr. MANION: When must the tenders be in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will understand that we will begin to prepare the plans now. We have the old plans that were provided in 1920. Tenders were called for then. Of course my hon. friends will readily understand that we are doing nothing by way of preparing new plans or anything else until the estimate is passed in the house.

Mr. MANION: Of course, the plan could be prepared and tenders called for on the supposition that the item is going through. I say that in justification of my question. The calling for tenders does not necessarily mean the job is going through anyway.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, but perhaps my hon. friend knows the difficulties in the architect's branch, and this applies practically throughout Canada. Owing to the fact that during the war years there was no public building going on here, we are not as flush of architects and draughtsmen as we would have been if our building program had been so extensive as to provide work for them. A great many of our architects at that time went across to the United States. Our requirement is that they must have resided here for three years to qualify for a position. The present staff is fully occupied on buildings with regard to which the estimates have been passed and there is no question of their going on.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I assume that the usual fair wage clause will be inserted in the contract and that as much as possible local labour will be employed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We will advertise for tenders. There will be no doubt about the fair wage clause, but I do not think it would be fair to the contractor to say that he must take labour from any particular district. He will have to be his own judge to a considerable extent as to that. Naturally labour will come from the district pretty largely.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I think that as far as possible the tradesmen and labourers should be local people, and that outsiders should not be brought in to lower the wages.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish to express my appreciation to the government for having listened to those eloquent appeals which I made some years ago for this post office, and for having decided ultimately to take action. I see now the proper way to go about these things, and I shall know better in the future how to proceed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In spite of what my hon. friend says, this building is going to be put up shortly.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin says he knows how to proceed to get these things. I think for the benefit of the house he might tell us a little more as to the proper procedure. I should like to know.

Item agreed to.

Coutts—building for immigration and customs purposes, $2,500.

Mr. MANION: What kind of a building is the minister getting for $2,500?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is to provide for the construction of a shelter over the highway and accommodation for cars on either side, and also two small offices, one for customs and the other for immigration officials.

Item agreed to.

Redcliff—armoury accommodation, $1,200.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the armoury at Redcliff?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is to provide for the purchase from Mr. H. O. Wheeler of a building for which we are now paying an annual rental of $240. It is not a very elaborate building, but it was thought better to buy it at $1,200 than to rent it at $240.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the entire purchase price?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And next year the building will have to be rebuilt?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; that remark arises from the suspicious mind of my hon. friend, but it is absolutely unjustified. The building is a two-storey brick structure one hundred feet by twenty feet with a floor area of 4,452 square feet.

Mr. BENNETT: Twelve hundred dollars?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, it is only because it is a bargain that we are buying it.

Mr. MANION: It must be a bargain.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What repairs are needed on the building? You do not get gifts of that kind without there being something behind them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I must say that at the price for which we are getting the building the vendor is not doing the repairs.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not wonder at there being a suspicious mind on a proposition of that kind.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course, I would not object if it was limited to propositions of this kind.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We had better get more particulars about it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend particulars, because he always asks for them in such a courteous manner that it is a pleasure to give them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Thank you.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The following repairs are required to put the building in first-class condition:

Re-cover roof with standard specification tar and gravel. The present roof covering has deteriorated to such an extent that patching would be poor policy. Owing to water entering the building the upper floor ceiling would require replastering. The heating plant also requires some overhauling and other minor repairs throughout the building. The total cost of above items I would estimate at $1,000. The main work of the structure is in good condition, and if these repairs were executed I would consider the replacement value of entire building would be $12,500.

Item agreed to.

Red Deer public building—addition and alterations, $2,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am glad to see the item for Red Deer, although it is rather small. Is it possible that part of this vote is to be donated to filling the unsightly excavation which has been the subject of correspondence between the minister and myself for the past two years?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. This $2,000 is required for the construction of a small addition at the rear of the Red Deer public building to provide adequate accommodation for the public.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am very glad to hear it because during busy times the building does not provide proper accommodation for the public.

Mr. BENNETT: I am rather familiar with that section of the country. I lost considerable money in ventures not far from there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You are not the only gentleman who enjoys that distinction.

Mr. BENNETT: Are the taxes to be paid out of the $1,200, the price of the Redcliff property?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We can get a clear title. When the question of renewing the lease was brought up the owner offered to sell the whole property to the government for $1,200 cash, stating that the revenue did not meet taxes and insurance, and as he could foresee little chance of conditions improving he hesitated to spend more money on it.

Mr. BENNETT: So that the taxes and insurance are more than $240 a year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should imagine so. But my hon. friend knows we do not pay taxes.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What purpose has the government in buying it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We already occupy it as an armoury.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have you a corps there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so. The Department of National Defence have requested that the building be obtained.

Mr. GERSHAW: I did not know that this vote was to be brought down until I saw it in the estimates. This building has been used for a long time by the government and as the rent paid is insufficient the owners are anxious to dispose of it. I can assure the committee that the government is not assuming any great responsibility in the matter. There are well established industries in Redcliff and the government will always require a building for the military unit and for other purposes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who is the owner?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. R. O. Wheeler.

Item agreed to.

Vegreville—public building, $35,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister might explain this item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Vegreville is 75 miles east of Edmonton. This amount of $35,000 is required for the erection of a public building on the corner of Main street and Second avenue in the town of Vegreville for postal and customs purposes. The proposed building will be a one and a half storey brick structure, 45 feet long by 34 feet wide, with a one storey annex 11 feet by 18. It will provide accommodation for the postal service and living quarters for the caretaker. Requests for the building have been received, at various times, from Mr. White, M.P. in 1910, the Hon. Mr. Calder in 1919, the Vegreville board of trade in 1919, the Vegreville Liberal Association in 1924, the Vegreville board of trade, transmitted by Mr. W. T. Lucas, M.P. in 1924. Requests have also come from other sources.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How large is the place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population is 1,852, according to Heaton's Annual. The postal revenue for 1927-28 amounted to $11,529.36 and the customs revenue for the same period, $11,116.91. The department have asked for the facilities.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This will be used as a customs building also.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The town of Vegreville is a very beautiful place and I am glad to see the item in the estimates this year. The post office building at the present time is a miserable affair, and in view of the importance of this town and the significance of such a building to the community I am pleased that the minister has submitted this item. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford) knows the town very well; he makes an annual airplane trip there. I am sure the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) also knows a little about about the place. He knows it is an excellent town and needs this accommodation very badly.

Item agreed to.

Wainwright—public building, $28,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There was an item in 1928-29 of $35,000. What is the total cost of the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This $28,000 asked for includes a revote of $18,000. It is to complete the construction of a public building under contract with the Permanent Construction Company Limited of Edmonton for the sum of $37,500; also fittings, lock boxes, sidewalks and so forth. The building will be a two-storey brick structure, 67 feet 4 inches by 33 feet, and will provide accommodation for postal and customs services, as well as living quarters for the caretaker.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia

Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc.—$40,000.

Esquimalt—general repairs and improvements at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard—$20,000.

Kimberley—public building—$25,000.

Port Alberni public building—improvements and alterations—$1,500.

Trail—public building—$50,000.

Vancouver—public building—to meet one year's interest at 5 per cent on mortgage of $400,000—$20,000.

William Head quarantine station—improvements, repairs, etc.—$4,000—Total, $160,500.

Mr. ESLING: The vote of $50,000 for the Trail building, is one item to which the government has given its serious consideration. The minister has certainly carried out his intention of providing additional postal and customs facilities in a community where he knows the accommodation has not been adequate although the need has been urgent. Trail is the greatest metallurgical centre in the British Empire, as hon. members know, and last year we were honoured with a visit from the Governor General, who officiated at the laying of the cornerstone of perhaps the handsomest city hall in the interior of British Columbia. I only hope that the Minister of Public Works will similarly honour us during the coming summer. I am sure he will be convinced, when he sees the place, that the vote is not quite large enough to meet the needs of the community. I should feel remiss if I did not acknowledge, on behalf of the citizens of Trail, the wisdom of the minister and of the government in providing this much needed accommodation.

Mr. POULIOT: At least this one is polite.

Mr. POWER: And that is very refreshing.

Mr. BARBER: I agree partially with what the hon. member has said in regard to the recognition on the part of the government of the requirements, in the matter of postal facilities, of such places as Trail. But there are other places in British Columbia which have been brought to the attention of the government in the last two or three years and which so far have not received serious consideration. This again brings up the question of the policy being pursued by the government in the construction of public buildings for postal purposes. Last year I brought to the attention of the house the requirements of a very important point in the Fraser valley; I refer to Mission City. The board of trade of that district has been continually communicating with members of the government, particularly the Minister of Health and the Minister of Public Works, on this matter, and last year I showed that Mission City is a very important point in a fast growing district in the Fraser valley. At that time I pointed out that a pre-war grant was voted by this house amounting to about $30,000, to provide for the purchase of a site and the construction of a building in that place. Of that amount $4,000 was expended for a site and the balance was re-voted at the next session, but owing to the war the matter was dropped. The revenue of this post office has been increasing continually; in 1927 it amounted to $6,669.21 and last year it increased to $7,323.45. The rented quarters at present occupied by the post office are very inadequate, and I believe something should be done for this district.

I would like to place on Hansard some votes which were passed during last session and this session for public buildings at other points:

	Revenue
	1924	1928
Rosthern, Saskatchewan..	$6,429 00	$6,871 00
Durham, Ontario..	7,145 00	5,950 00
Waterloo, Quebec..	6,673 00	5,928 00
Canora, Saskatchewan.. .	.....	6,673 46
Wilkie, Saskatchewan.. .	.....	7,265 24
Transcona, Manitoba.. ..	.....	5,187 60
Exeter, Ontario..	.....	5,899 64
Wiarton, Ontario..	.....	6,250 00
Gretna, Manitoba..	.....	2,329 00

Each of these places has a lower revenue than that of Mission City, so that I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to this request in his supplementary estimates, because I feel sure he has overlooked this very important centre. In comparison with these other places I think Mission City is entitled to something.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms—replacements, repairs, improvements, etc., $100,000.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the minister where the Dominion experimental farms in Canada are located.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The farms are at Charlottetown,, Summerside, Kentville, Nappan, Fredericton, Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Cap Rouge, St. Joachim, Lennoxville, Farnham, L'Assomption, La Ferme, Kapuskasing, Harrow, Morden, Brandon, Indian Head, Rosthern, Scott, Swift Current, Lethbridge, Lacombe, Windermere, Summerland, Agassiz, and Sidney.

Mr. MANION: The reason I ask is this: I notice there are a number of these farms in the maritime provinces and in Quebec while in Ontario the farm furthest west is at Kapuskasing. The other day I received a resolution from a farmers' organization in my constituency or at least in that section of the country recommending that the government establish an experimental farm on the north shore of lake Superior.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends laugh at that; they laugh at anything which does not affect their own constituencies, but perhaps it is not so easy to laugh when we are dealing with a government that is not very anxious to do anything in our constituencies.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend think that is a fair statement for him to make, representing the constituency of Fort William?

Mr. MANION: I think that is a fair statement. My hon. friend is rather touchy; he thinks I should be content because there is a little dredging being done in the harbours of Port Arthur and Fort William this year. As a matter of fact the money being spent there is being expended for the national welfare of this country, to facilitate the handling of the wheat of my hon. friends from the west. I am not unresponsive to that; I am glad it is being done for the good of the whole country, and naturally one does not object to money being spent in his riding, but as a matter of fact this is a national undertaking.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend referred to the expenditure of money in the ridings of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends opposite had a hearty laugh when I mentioned the need for an experimental farm in that thousand miles of territory extending from Kapuskasing on the east to Winnipeg. According to the list read by the minister there are experimental farms every two or three hundred miles or less in the eastern provinces, but here is a long stretch of country without one. The supporters of the minister laughed at my request, and I think I have a right to take exception to that. When I look at these estimates I find that a large proportion of hon. gentlemen opposite are looked after much more carefully than are the members on this side of the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They do not say so.

Mr. MANION: The estimates say so. However, I wish to point out the need of my section of the country as put forward by the farmers who have gone into a bush country, as compared with the farmers who have gone to the prairies where farming is much easier. The last experimental farm in Ontario is at Kapuskasing; I do not know where the first experimental farm is in Manitoba, but I believe it is in the neighbourhood of Winnipeg.

Mr. FORKE: It is at Morden.

Mr. MANION: That is southwest of Winnipeg, and that leaves an area of perhaps 800 miles without an experimental farm. That is a section of the country where it is very difficult for men to cut out their homes, because it is bush country. We all know they have to meet greater problems than the farmers on the prairies; their problems are those which were met years ago by the farmers in eastern Ontario, in Quebec and in the maritime provinces.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And in the prairie provinces also.

Mr. MANION: No, they are not in the same class at all; the men who go into these bush lands in northern Quebec, northern Ontario, the maritime provinces or in British Columbia have a much more difficult time than the men who go to the prairies, where the lands are cleared to a large extent by nature.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They are not cleared in the northern parts.

Mr. MANION: I differ with my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think you are right there.

Mr. DUNNING: I think you are wrong.

Mr. MANION: I am very glad to get the support of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in this regard.

Mr. DUNNING: He has never farmed there so he does not know.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not think the hon. member knows what he is talking about in that particular.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend appears to be the only one who does know what he is talking about in this particular or any other particular.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I know what I am talking about.

Mr. MANION: The farmers in the northern sections of Ontario should receive some consideration with regard to an experimental farm.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not object to that, but I was simply giving some information to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). His comparison was hardly fair because he was dealing with a condition with which he is not familiar.

Mr. MANION: Well, I am not absolutely familiar with the conditions in the prairie provinces, but I do know that people seem to think it is easier to go there than it is to go to northern Ontario and northern Quebec. It is quite obvious that bush lands are much difficult to farm, and I should not have to explain that to the hon. member.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member forgets that there is just as much bush country in the northern prairie provinces as there is in northern Ontario.

Mr. MANION: I am speaking of the prairie sections.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) is cutting that bush and he knows what he is talking about.

Mr. MANION: I wish he would stay there and go on cutting the bush.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I will reciprocate by saying that I wish the hon. member for Fort William would take up farming on the rocks north of lake Superior. This point is really out of order because the hon. member knows that it is the Department of Agriculture which conducts these farms.

Mr. MANION: It is the Department of Public Works which pays for the repairs.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was just going to call the attention of the hon. member to a fact which he has evidently overlooked, that the Department of Public Works does not have the selection of the localities where these farms are to be placed. As the hon. member for Melfort has said, that is decided by the Department of Agriculture and I think the hon. member, when he thinks it over, will realize that that is quite correct. Requisitions are made to the Department of Public Works for buildings in such sections as the Department of Agriculture has decided to establish experimental farms in. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that there is an experimental farm in northern Ontario, at Kapuskasing. It is quite true that that is some distance from the territory which he mentioned, but that farm is in operation.

Mr. MANION: That is 700 miles away.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That territory is not so very sparsely settled, so far as farms are concerned.

Mr. MANION: Or is very sparsely settled.

Mr. Chairman, I will admit that it is the Department of Agriculture which decides to put these experimental farms in certain sections, but I am doing preliminary work for that department with the Department of Public Works. I am not objecting to this item in the least because I am glad to see the farms getting the assistance and the repairs required. But when the Department of Agriculture does approach the minister, as I am endeavouring to have them do, I do ask him to give every consideration to this matter. The territory I have mentioned is rather a long overnight's walk from Kapuskasing, and it is a territory where it is very difficult for pioneers to go in and farm at the present time. The minister has been there and he knows it very well.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know it quite well.

Mr. MANION: When this matter comes before the minister I am sure that he will give it fair consideration. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) is sitting right beside him at the present moment and he usually supports me in any request for northern Ontario. I know if the minister will ask the opinion of the hon. member to his right he will back me up in what I am asking for that section of the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will tell the hon. member that the hon. member for Nipissing always supports any sugestions which are made for that part of Ontario.

Mr. MANION: We always stand together; I help him out too.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: He has been perhaps even more successful than my hon. friend from Fort William, but I think he is rather surprised to hear that he is still a bit dissatisfied.

Mr. MANION: The minister nearly made a slip then.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The decision as to where an experimental farm is to be located is a matter for the consideration of the Department of Agriculture and I would suggest to my hon. friend that his remarks would have had more weight if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr Motherwell) had been present in the house.

Mr. MANION: I will do it over again when he is present.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will be very glad to pass it on to the minister.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid that is a left-handed compliment which the minister has paid me, and I think he paid me another left-handed compliment when he pointed out to the house that the member for Nipissing is always more successful than I am.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to ask the minister if these are really experimental farms. The minister read a long list to the house and if they are all experimental farms, it is something new to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are learning something every day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not an intimate knowledge of all of them, but a list of experimental farms and branch farms was given to me.

Mr. McGIBBON: If the minister will look into that matter I think he will find that a large number of them are nothing more than demonstration farms. We have not that number of real experimental farms in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Probably so.

Mr. BENNETT: I know the one at Lacombe is called a demonstration farm.

Mr. SPENCER: Did the list which the hon. minister read include demonstration and experimental farms?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It included what are called branch farms.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton): Would the minister tell us how much of this $100,000 will be spent upon the experimental farm at Kemptville, and for what purpose?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The expenditures will be as follows: general repairs, $500; emergency repairs, $200; special repairs, painting of buildings, $300; repairs to the ice house, $150; greenhouse repairs, $2,000; repairs to poultry house, $200; and office furniture, $100.

Item agreed to.

Flags for Dominion public buildings, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: In my movements about the country I have observed flags flying at night, and the result is that the flags are destroyed. With respect to flying flags there are instructions that should have been in force in this country for a very long time. I have noticed, for instance, the flag on the post office building here is frequently put up until it falls to pieces and another one is put in its place.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What post office does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. BENNETT: I have observed this one at times. The situation has been remedied recently.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend mean in Ottawa?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend say that he has seen the flag flying after sundown?

Mr. BENNETT: I have certainly seen it flying after sundown.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think he is forgetting.

Mr. BENNETT: What is more, I have noticed the same thing many times in other places in the country. Hon. members will remember passing through communities and seeing flags flapping to pieces against the poles. Last year we spent $5,000 in buying new flags and this year we are going to spend another $5,000. Why should we wear out flags by leaving them up at night? I have gone into communities from the train late at night and seen flags flying, and I made my mind up to speak to the minister about the matter. I forgot about it and I decided that I would speak to the house about it. The deputy minister has, I understand, issued instructions with respect to the matter, and if they are not observed, and flags are permitted to be simply destroyed by the action of the wind, it strikes me that someone should be responsible in dollars and cents for them. To vote $5,000 every year for new flags to be destroyed is not sound economy.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend, or any other hon. member, or any other individual can give me the dates at which any flag on a public building in Ottawa has been left flying after sundown or at a time when it should not be flying, I shall be glad to have the matter looked into.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned Ottawa only as one instance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The instructions are positive that flags shall fly from sunrise to sundown. I am not out very much at night to be able to say what is being done. I have never seen the flag flying on the post office in the evening. I think my hon. friend is really under a misapprehension. I know he thinks he is right.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt I am right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If he can give me the date, I shall be glad to have the matter looked into.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from South Wellington, beside me, says that he recalls the same thing. There is just a tendency on the part of the Minister of Public Works, in the language of the street, to get "a bit too gay." His reply about not being out at night is absurd. Let us get down to business.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am listening to what my hon. friend is saying and I will answer him as soon as he has finished.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps an appropriation of $5,000 does not appear to him as being important, although it may be that somebody in London or somewhere else can supply the flags. That is not the question. The question is: Are we to have flags destroyed by flapping against poles and by the action of the elements, and then new ones put in their places. I did not limit my observations to Ottawa, and if I look at my papers I think I can fix dates and places where I have seen flags flying at night last year, not in one province but in several. My hon. friend who sits beside me says that he has frequently noticed instances of this kind in Ontario.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am just a little surprised at my hon. friend's attitude. I do not think it adds to the dignity of debate in parliament for the leader of either party or any other hon. member in the house to resort to such expressions as he has done this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend started it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just wait until I have finished. I intend to answer my hon. friend now. When he refers to an hon. member as "getting a bit too gay," he knows he is on weak ground, and he is on very weak ground when he refers to flags flying in the city of Ottawa after sundown. If he or the hon. gentleman who sits beside him can give me specific instances of flags flying on public buildings in Ottawa after sundown, I shall have the matter looked into.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not mention Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: I made to the Minister of Public Works an observation that in the common, ordinary, everyday expression he was "getting a bit too gay." This afternoon he has been regaling the house with cheap witticisms in his answers in regard to public business. In fact, hon. members have remarked it. We think the time has come when he should treat the matter seriously. If he thinks the dignity of parliament is raised by the remarks recorded in Hansard both yesterday and to-day, I am content, but I am directing attention to the fact that last year $5,000 was voted for flags and we are voting another $5,000 this year. If these flags were properly taken care of, the country would not need to be asked to spend $5,000 in renewing them. Incidentally, I said that I had come into this community and seen a flag flying on the post office building on a rainy night. I had come in on the train from Montreal. That is my recollection of what occurred. My memory may be defective, but I have remarked upon the same state of affairs in other places. I know in Alberta there are places where flags have been flying at night and flapping to pieces by the action of the elements. I mentioned the matter in the best of good faith, hoping that it might do something to save a little money. Then my hon. friend says: "I am not out at nights," and that is his answer to a serious question propounded in good faith to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I apologize to my hon. friend if I have interfered with his monopoly of cheap witticisms. I just want to say to him that I do not think he is doing himself justice this afternoon.

Mr. CANTLEY: I can give the minister some information in regard to flags. I can take him to towns where the flag has not come down for twelve months on end and, indeed, more than twelve months on end. I refer to public buildings. I have seen cases where a flag has been left flying until there is not one-third of it left. That is the situation as to some public buildings, there is no doubt about the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my hon. friend give me the name of the town?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CANTLEY: I will a little later.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps he might do so now?

Mr. CANTLEY: I will not do it now. Before I am through, I will satisfy the minister that my statement is quite correct.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I do not know just how serious the matter is about flags flying for possibly a few moments after sundown. I have not witnessed that myself, but I am more than surprised to hear the leader of the opposition criticize an item of $5,000 in connection with flags on public buildings for the Dominion of Canada, when the same hon. gentleman is trying to get the house to say that we should spend $200,000,000 on a highway.

Mr. BENNETT: This exhaustive criticism ends the matter.

Item agreed to.

Military buildings — repairs, fittings and additions, $50,000.

Mr. QUINN: Is any of this appropriation of $50,000 for repairs to the citadel at Halifax?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think so.

Mr. QUINN: At this time last year I drew the attention of the minister to the disgraceful condition of the citadel at Halifax. As hon. members know, Halifax is one of the first British possessions in Canada. Since 1749 it has been the headquarters of the British army and navy in this country until the Imperial forces withdrew from Halifax and were replaced by Canadian forces. During the regime of the Imperial authorities, the forts, barracks and buildings controlled by the army and navy were a source of pride to the people of Halifax and of the whole Dominion, but I regret to say that since they have been taken over by the Dominion authorities, these buildings have gradually sunk into decay. I pointed out to the committee a year ago that the walls of the fort at the citadel had tumbled down, and that they were being braced up with wooden braces. I drew that to the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Defence, who is not now in the house, and I asked if they would take into consideration placing an item in the estimates for this year for the reconstruction of the walls of the fort in the ancient citadel of Halifax. Halifax is the eastern gateway to this Dominion, and thousands of people pass through its portals during the year. Nova Scotia has built up an ever-increasing tourist trade, and citadel hill is one of the main points of historical interest that we have to show to visitors. As I pointed out twelve months ago, because of the disgraceful condition of the citadel hill, which has been neglected by this government since it has been under the control of the Department of National Defence, the service clubs of Halifax—the Progressive club, and others—feeling that the condition of the hill was a disgrace to the city have contributed out of their very meagre funds to try and give the slopes of the hill a decent appearance. I would urge the minister, in view of the historical value of the citadel at Halifax, to provide something in the estimates this year to repair the walls and give a decent appearance to the slopes of the hill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That, again, is a matter that is not under the Department of Public Works; it is under National Defence. I believe, however, that certain consideration is being given to the very matter which my hon. friend mentions, but I will not speak positively as to that. I regret that my colleague the Minister of National Defence is not here at the moment, but I shall be very glad to forward my hon. friend's representations to him.

Mr. FRASER: How much of the appropriation of $50,000 for repairs to military buildings was expended last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was expended up to March 31, $44,356.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask how much of this amount of $50,000 was spent on the military buildings in Kingston?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry I am not able to give my hon. friend that information. I have the details of the proposed expenditure for this year.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister supply me later with details of last year's expenditures, showing where it was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): At the same time will the minister tell the committee on whose authority the cover was removed from the Martello tower situated in the harbour at Kingston, in front of the old battery section? These old Martello towers are of great historical interest to visitors. I am very pleased to hear that something will be done in Halifax because that will, of course, open the way for consideration of work to be done in what is perhaps the next oldest city after Quebec and Halifax, namely, Kingston. The removing of the cover from the Martello tower in Kingston last year gave rise to quite a lot of criticism because it afforded some measure of protection to the tower. It has been a matter of criticism as to who ordered the removal of the cover. The minister having promised to give me the details of the expenditure on military buildings in Kingston, I would ask him if he can state to the committee now what work will be done this year out of this vote of $50,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think there has been any request for work at Kingston.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This is just an amount placed in the estimates out of which requests that are made from time to time can be met; is that the idea?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it would not be fair to my hon. friend to say that that was the case. Certain places have been indicated to us where the expenditure should take place.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Would the minister give the details?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount of $50,000 is to be expended as follows:

Toronto—Old Knox college, $10,200.
Montreal—drill hall, Craig street, painting, $3,000.
Montreal—drill hall, Craig street, installing plumbing fixtures, $4,700.
Montreal—accommodation for 3rd Victoria Rifles, $2,000.
Westmount—R.O.O.C. stores, pave land and erect roof over same, $3,100.
Chatham—armoury re-appropriate 2 basement rooms, $1,500.
Red Deer—gun shed—addition to armoury, $7,000.
Amherst—armoury—drainage, $4,000.
Prince Rupert—old immigration building R.C.N.V.R., $1,000.
Yorkton—new gun shed, $7,000.
Three Rivers—drill hall gun shed for 79th battery, $14,000.
Brockville—armoury—new floor, $4,500.
Gananoque—armoury—new floor, $2,600.
Napanee—armoury—new floor, $3,750.
Pembroke — armoury — new roof covering, $4,300.
Alterations, etc. to rented premises, $18,551.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That totals up to a good deal more than $50,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. They have asked for $91,201, and we are trying to get by with $50,000. With regard to the Martello tower at Kingston, that also is something over which this department has no jurisdiction; it comes under National Defence.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would ask the minister to give me details of the work to be done out of this vote of $50,000. The work is done by the Public Works department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would like to get the details of the work to be done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the repairs and work in connection with the old Sydenham hospital, which is now the military headquarters, be done under this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not think that would come under military hospitals.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): No, it is no longer a hospital, it is military headquarters. A great deal of work has been done there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If any request had come it would be in this list of requests, but apparently there has been no such request.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is rather peculiar because these are very old buildings, and every government has had to repair them year after year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think they make repairs to the one building two years in succession. But I shall be very glad to furnish to my hon. friend all the information we have in regard to it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): About what time may I expect to get that detailed statement? I should like to have it in time for the National Defence estimates.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can get it for my hon. friend by the next sitting of the house I think.

Item agreed to.

Military hospitals—repairs and improvements, $80,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister give the same details in this case? What military hospitals have been repaired?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The summary of requirements presented to this department for 1929-30 is as follows:

Ste. Anne de Bellevue	$17,500
Halifax, Camp Hill	9,500
Toronto, Christie street	6,500
London, Westminster	15,000
Winnipeg, Deer Lodge	5,000
Calgary, Colonel Belcher hospital	1,250
Vancouver, Shaughnessey	14,500
St. John, N.B., Lancaster	6,000
Contingencies	4,750
Total	$80,000

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): These are all hospitals under the Pensions department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are under Health, I think.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The Department of Health and Pensions. Then they are not really military hospitals; those come under military buildings.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is all we are taking care of.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—generally, $45,000.

Mr. FRASER: What was spent last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total vote was spent.

Item agreed to.

Purchase of stamp cancelling machines, $55,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I think we should have some explanation of this item. The stamp cancelling machines used in Canada have in some instances been leased; in others, purchased. I dare say the hon. minister has received, as I have, a communication from a firm in the United States that was prepared to manufacture in this country and sell to postmasters stamp cancelling machines. They were not permitted to do so because the postal department would not permit the postmasters to use them. That, of course, is a matter for the Post Office Department, not the Department of Public Works. What stamp cancelling machines are being purchased for $55,000, where are they being used, and by whom are they being manufactured?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to complete the payment on twenty-five stamp cancelling machines purchased by authority of an order in council passed on June 8, 1927, from Mr. G. H. Robert of Montreal at a cost of $2,500 for each machine. Delivery of three machines was made in 1928-29 and the sum of $1,500 was paid on account of the purchase price of same pending a final acceptance by the Post Office Department. The remaining twenty-four machines will not be delivered until 1929-30, and consequently it is necessary to revote the sum of $55,000 for payment of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where are they made?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think they are manufactured in Montreal by the Robert concern. The information I have is that they are machines of the A type, manufactured by G. H. Robert of Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been a good deal of discussion about these machines. Have they proved satisfactory? I received a communication stating that only a few of them had been delivered, and that they had not been entirely satisfactory, also that offers had been made from other sources but the department had said no. If these machines were required when the order was given for twenty-five, why is it that two years are allowed to elapse with only three delivered, and the other twenty-two not to be delivered until some time next year? It was also alleged that these machines were covered by an American patent and were assembled in Canada, not manufactured in the sense in which that term is properly used.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think there is something in what my hon. friend says as to these machines being largely in an experimental stage. The latest report I have from the Post Office Department is that for years the practice has been to rent stamp cancelling machines manufactured by the Postage Meter Company of Stamford, Connecticut. At present ninety-two machines are rented at an annual rental of $15,850. This company offered to sell these machines outright to the Post Office Department for the sum of $63,050, but the report on them was not altogether favourable. It was thought that it would be better to purchase these machines. I fancy the reason for the revote is that the department is trying the machines out to make absolutely sure that they are satisfactory before the balance of the purchase price is paid. The desire of the department is to buy a Canadian machine if it will fill the requirement, that is, a machine made in Canada, rather than continue the practice that has been followed in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a contract or there is not. If there is a contract, we should see it. My information is that the machine parts are brought into the country and duty paid upon them and then they are assembled here. That may be inaccurate, but I do know that a firm in New York offered to establish in Canada a factory to produce stamp cancelling machines, which they said they could sell for about $250 apiece. They offered to sell them to postmasters throughout the country, the larger machines to be operated by power and the smaller by hand, but the Post Office Department declined the offer. It seems to me that we should have definite information as to whether or not these machines are being manufactured or assembled in Canada, and whether or not they are covered by an American patent. If the latter is the fact, then of course we are no further ahead than when buying an American machine.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Postmaster General would be able to answer the question. We have only a limited amount of detail but I shall be glad to give such information as we have, and I think it bears out what the hon. gentleman has said. This order in council was passed authorizing the purchase of 25 stamp cancelling machines of a certain type, manufactured in Montreal, and the conditions of purchase included what he has mentioned. I have not the agreement here, but there was a stipulation that a quantity of parts should be kept in store in case replacements were needed, the services of a mechanic to be at the disposal of the department for one year free of charge. The memorandum I have from the Deputy Postmaster General states:

> The proposal of the Postage Meter Company is not favourable for the following reasons:
> Their products are not manufactured in this country.
> The duty, freight, sales tax, etc., are not taken into consideration.
> The speed of the Canadian machine is double the American type, and the date and time changes are automatic, eliminating the present handling of loose type and consequent delays in the despatch of mail; further, the centrifugal system of inking insures a gradual flow and precludes the damaging of letters as is common at the present time. . . . .
> Will you, therefore, kindly proceed to supply this department with the Canadian machine.

The reason why they have not been paid for during the last year are not here indicated, and the matter is still in a more or less experimental stage; it is being worked out.

Mr. BOYS: The machines were bought subject to their giving satisfaction.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: I presume also, from the fact of there being two revotes, that there must have been some reason why the money was not actually spent and the machines purhased. Perhaps it would indicate that up to that particular time the machines had not been satisfactory, and that it was felt the money should not be spent, but a revote asked for so that the department might be ready to pay when the machines were found to be satisfactory.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is about the size of it. We were asked to secure the revote inasmuch as the machines were still—

Mr. BOYS: Under test.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —being tried out.

Mr. BOYS: But surely it does not take two years to test machines like these. As a layman I should think that a month would do it. It is purely a matter of seeing that they stamp at the rate per minute called for in the contract and that the work is not blurred but is done efficiently so that it can be easily read. It does not take two years to do that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that certain changes have been found to be necessary in the machines and an effort is being made to work this out so as to render the machines entirely satisfactory. There is no question about the speed; they are much speedier than the previous machines. In certain other respects, however, they were not altogether satisfactory and attention is being paid to this aspect of the matter.

Mr. BOYS: What has been found to be wrong?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know; all I can say is that we were asked to revote the money. The machines were being tried out and the purchase had not been completed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why is the Department of Public Works concerned with this matter at all? This is a question of supplies for the Post Office Department; why does not that department look after it? Why charge this $55,000 to public works?

Mr. BOYS: The Department of Public Works does not buy mail bags.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the type of office equipment which apparently has always been included in supplies furnished by the Department of Public Works to the Post Office Department. It is included among such supplies as lock boxes and office furniture.

Mr. BENNETT: Not mail bags.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; but the mail bag is hardly office equipment in the same sense as a cancelling machine. The Department of Public Works, possibly, might very well have contended that the Post Office Department should supply these machines, but apparently equipment of this character has always been included as part of office furniture supplied by this department in connection with its buildings. I suppose that is the connection.

Mr. BOYS: What offices will get the benefit of these machines when installed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The large offices, the city offices.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is it not a fact that this item and that of tractors are the only two items provided by the Public Works department for the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are such furnishings as filing systems, cancelling machines, conveyers, tractors, pick-up tables and so forth which we supply. I think it may be said generally that the list includes all mechanical equipment that goes into buildings we construct.

Mr. FRASER: What is the total amount in the estimates for the Post Office Department for the year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can give the total for the purchase of these 25 machines.

Mr. FRASER: I mean, including all machines and other equipment such as pick-up tables, conveyers and so forth.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot give that information.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Were any tenders called for in connection with the contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should not imagine it was a contract that could be let by tender, because there is only one manufacturer in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a real complaint to be made in this regard. The Raymond Corporation offered to construct a factory in Canada to supply, not these identical machines but stamp obliterating machines, and the government declined to permit the sale of them to postmasters; at any rate, it declined to permit postmasters to buy them if they wanted to pay for them themselves, in face of the contract which had been made with the Robert Manufacturing Company. I understand, of course, that the Minister of Public Works in a sense is not responsible for that contract, which was made by the department under the control of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). But we should see the contract itself in order to arrive at some conclusion as to why an exclusive right like this should be given to a company—for it amounts to that when you decline to permit anyone else to sell similar machines to postmasters. You refuse to allow others who desire to establish a factory in Canada to sell large and small machines for use by country postmasters, and other equipment as well, such as power machines, hand machines and so forth. In the meantime these experiments are going forward and only three machines have been installed, according to the minister; I thought there were five. One of these machines, I am advised, is in the Ottawa post office. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know. The fact that we have not been requested to pay the money but to revote it is perhaps the reason why we have not scrutinized the present status of the matter as carefully as we should have done if we were asked to pass an order in council providing the money. Only $1,500 has been paid out of the whole vote—

Mr. BENNETT: No, $7,500.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are three machines, and $1,500 has been paid on each.

Mr. BENNETT: That is only $4,500.

Mr. BOYS: Is there anything in the contract giving this company the exclusive right to supply these machines and preventing others in Canada from supplying similar equipment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the contract is exclusive; if any hon. gentleman wants to see the contract, so far as I am concerned all the papers in my department in this connection are available.

Mr. BOYS: At the moment I would not think my leader altogether right on this point; I would think the contract should have been made by the Public Works department at the request of the Post Office Department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think we make all contracts where we have to pay the money.

Mr. BOYS: Then the minister might produce the contract, because the exclusive feature strikes me as rather serious. If the contract is to be in force for five or six years it means that the whole thing is in the hands of this one concern.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will understand that this is a very different class from an article for which there is a very general demand all over the country. This is something which never has been manufactured in Canada, something we were unable to obtain here previously. If an industry can be built up in Canada the government are anxious that that be done.

Mr. BOYS: I am glad the minister is coming to that point of view; we have been advocating that policy for a long time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are agreed upon something, anyway. I think my hon. friend will see the fairness of saying to these people, "Go ahead and try to work it out and if you can get a machine equally satisfactory or almost as satisfactory as this machine you will get the business." In the meantime I think they should have a free hand and should be protected from outsiders, otherwise they would not enter into the contract.

Mr. BOYS: Without knowing what is in the contract and without the minister being able to inform us it would be improper and undesirable to offer any criticism, but it does seem to me that this is a matter which might well engage the attention of the committee. Perhaps before disposing of this item we should see the contract, so I think the minister might let the item stand until the contract is produced.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this is a re-vote; the same item has been passed several times.

Mr. BOYS: That is one of the reasons for this criticism. If everything were satisfactory a re-vote would not be necessary; the money would have been paid long ago.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would rather pass the item now if possible, and I will undertake to supply my hon. friend with all the information.

Mr. BOYS: So far as I am personally concerned of course I take the word of the minister at once, but is it really vital that this item should be passed at this time? If all the estimates of the minister were going through I would not try to hold them up because of this, but I do not suppose they are all going through now. However, I will leave it to the judgment of the minister; it seems to me that the request is fair and might be complied with, but if the minister prefers to pass the item and produce the contract later that will be quite all right. When will the contract be produced?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will produce it at the next sitting, before my estimates are completed.

Mr. BENNETT: Then this item might be passed on the understanding that we can refer back to it if we wish to do so after the production of the contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Very well.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 130; rents, repairs, furniture, heating and so on.

Ottawa public buildings and grounds—water, $45,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Would the minister give us some information as to the water supplied to the public buildings in Ottawa?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $45,000 is required to pay the corporation of Ottawa for water supplied to the various departmental buildings during the year 1929-30, by agreement between the Dominion government and the corporation of Ottawa as authorized by act of parliament passed June 4, 1925, and assented to June 12, 1925.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is the drinking water in these buildings now supplied by the city of Ottawa?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All the water coming from the taps is supplied by the city. There is a certain amount of bottled water supplied in the House of Commons and in several of the other departmental buildings but that is not provided under this contract.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Where does the bottled water come from?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is supplied by the Tally Ho Company.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What examination is made of the water?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend refer to the tap water or the bottled water?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The tap water.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The city bacteriologist tests the city water.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): And what about the bottled water?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot tell you anything about that; we do not buy it and we do not pay for it. It is paid for through the estimates of the House of Commons.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister tell us whether or not it is safe to drink the tap water at present? I am asking that question very seriously.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The city officials say it is safe, and I drink it every day.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am given to understand that the city water is not absolutely safe. What about this Tally Ho water? We should have some information; if that is perfectly safe water we should know by whom the examination is made.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to give all the information I can but that water is paid for out of the estimates of the House of Commons. My good friend the Sergeant-at-Arms tells me that the Tally Ho Company supplies certificates once a month showing the tests of the water which have been made, but the payment for the Tally Ho water is not made under the Public Works estimates.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston is very important. This subject has been under consideration year after year and apparently no negotiations have been entered into with the city of Ottawa leading to an adequate supply of pure water. The very fact that the water must be chlorinated is sufficient evidence that we are taking a certain amount of risk when we drink it, and I think I am within the bounds of truth when I say there is great danger of this water being contaminated by sewage. Its very appearance suggests that; one almost dislikes to take a bath in it, let alone drink it. I have not drunk city water since I came to Ottawa; I have been afraid to do so, and when the government pays $45,000 a year for water presumably for this and other government buildings I think that should warrant us entering into negotiations with the city. I would ask the minister if anything has been done in that connection.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I think not. The government has contracted for the best water supply available, and this is the water which is used by the citizens of Ottawa. According to reports which have emanated from the city council I understand that a filtration plant is about to be established, but we must remember that the water supply for this city has been a difficult problem. However, it is a municipal problem and this seems to be the best arrangement we are able to make at present.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not criticizing the minister for his arrangement because all municipal governments have to have some pressure put upon them. It is a well known fact that the city of New Orleans, which takes its water from the Mississippi river, has one of the purest supplies of drinking water on the continent, while the city of Ottawa with probably 110,000 people is pumping its water out of the Ottawa river which carries the sewage from the northern country. They have nothing more than a chlorinating system and it is quite patent to anyone that if that system should be defective for twenty-four hours there is the possibility of a typhoid epidemic. The department is probably one of the largest contributors in the form of revenue and some pressure should be brought to bear upon the municipal government to have them supply pure drinking water to the people.

Mr. MANION: In fairness to the city authorities, I think it should be mentioned that there has been a commission investigating the problem and I think they have decided upon a filtration plant. What the member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) says is absolutely correct, but we should not forget that the city is considering this problem at the present time and has under consideration the construction of a filtration plant to properly filter the water.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is being done now?

Mr. MANION: It is being chlorinated.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think the minister should be satisfied with the statement that this water is pathologically examined every day. I am rather surprised that a statement is submitted only once a month for the Tally-Ho water. That is not sufficient and does not give protection to the public. One or two cases of typhoid in the city of Ottawa might very well start an epidemic over the whole Dominion, when we consider that these are the days of quick transportation by automobile and train. I think there should be some statement from the minister that the water has been examined every day, and there should be a certificate of safety. There is no question that chlorination is quite safe, but the mere statement as to chlorination is not satisfactory unless it is regularly done. The minister should be able to furnish some statement of a safe water supply every day, or there should be a statement given on the days when it is not considered safe. The city can look after itself but there should be a statement issued in the house on the days when the water is found to be wrong. When we come to these estimates we can look into the matter of the Tally-Ho water and see that a statement is given more often than once a month.

Item agreed to.

Elevator attendants, $104,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: I notice this item is $7,000 more than it was last year. I may be responsible for this because on March 13—six weeks ago—I asked the minister regarding the operation of elevators in the building, especially on Saturdays. I understood the minister to say that these elevators would thereafter be operated on that day. The minister's statement was:

> However, if it is found that anybody is suffering inconvenience on account of inadequate elevator facilities, either going up or going down, we will endeavour to rectify it.

I would point out to the minister that this condition is not rectified as yet. His deputy minister is beside him and I understand he is the man in charge of the elevators and I expect him to carry out the distinct understanding which I had with the minister on that occasion. I trust that I will not have to bring this matter up again and that these elevators will be operated for the balance of the session.

Item agreed to.

Lighting, including roads and bridges, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will remember that we discussed last year the possibility of using the electric current from the turbines at New Edinburgh. One hundred thousand dollars represents interest at 5 per cent on $2,000,000, and I would like to know from the minister what progress has been made in connection with the utilization of these turbines.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The information is that the requirements for research purposes will take up practically all the power that we have at that site. It is the intention to utilize the power at the Edinburgh mills for supplying all power in connection with the research work, and the information is that there will be no surplus.

Mr. BENNETT: What does it cost per kilowatt hour for the government's requirements?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The difference between the rates charged the government and the ordinary city rates is that the government is allowed 15 per cent and 12 per cent discount against 10 per cent discount in the city rates. The alternating current lighting rate on meter is 5 cents a kilowatt hour for the first 30 hours' monthly use of the installed capacity, 2.2 cents a kilowatt hour for the next 70 hours, and one-half cent a kilowatt hour for monthly consumption in excess of the above. The discount when bills are paid within thirty days is 12 per cent if the transformers serving any building are owned by the company, and 15 per cent where such transformers are owned by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The last figure of one-half cent is a very reasonable one, but the 5 cent figure is very high. Does the minister know the average we pay per kilowatt hour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We use enough to get the half cent rate, and I understand it is the cheapest rate in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, the half cent rate is very cheap.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I would like to refer back to the question of elevators, and to ask the minister what salaries the elevator attendants receive. I understand that most of the men are returned soldiers and that their salary is only about $80 per month. If that is so I would ask that that salary should be raised to at least $100 per month.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is correct in regard to their being returned men. There are twenty-six operators at $105 a month, twenty-three at $100, two at $95 and fifteen at $90.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Why the discrimination if they are all doing the same class of work? Why should there not be a minimum salary of $100 a month?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We start them at a minimum and they rise to a maximum.

Mr. ADSHEAD: They can go up to $105?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And those who have recently entered the service are at $90?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are they mostly married men?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We do not have information as to that.

Mr. ADSHEAD: They ought to receive a salary of at least $100 a month, and I should like the minister to consider the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They will after they are in the service a certain length of time. My hon. friend, I think, will agree with me that a new man who has just been hired, should not receive as much as a man who has been in the service for some time.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It does not take long to learn how to run an elevator. After a month's work I think, if they are returned men, they ought to get $100 a month.

Mr. McGIBBON: What do they do between sessions?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are fourteen sessional men who are employed for seven months at $90 a month. All the rest are employed throughout the year.

Mr. McGIBBON: What do the fourteen do during the rest of the year? Are they off?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are off.

Mr. McGIBBON: What do the others do?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are employed all the time.

Mr. McGIBBON: What are they doing?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are running elevators.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the salary paid once or twice a month?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Once a month.

[Mr. Adshead.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: I think it ought to be paid at least twice a month to workingmen.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My deputy informs me that it was paid once a month prior to the last payment, but they are now being paid twice a month.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the minister not think the government might find some work for these men who are off at the end of the session? Could something not be found for them somewhere to give them an all-year-round job?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sure that different departments, if they have anything on which they can use them, will try to use them, but I would point out that if you are to keep expenditures within reasonable bounds, you can pay the men only for the time they are actually employed; you cannot undertake to furnish employment for the balance of the year for what are called temporary employees. Many of them fit into other positions during the rest of the year, but there is no assurance of that.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite agree on general principles with the minister, but in my opinion the working man or woman is the last person on whom to start economizing. After all, what would $90 a month for five months for ten or fifteen people amount to? These people have to live, and if we expect to have them here in the winter time as trained men, the government should endeavour to find some work for them in order to give them continuity of employment.

Item agreed to.

Heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $420,000.

Mr. MANION: How is the increase of $20,000 made up?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The increase is due to the employment of four men at the Sussex street property at a cost of $5,100 per annum, and to an increase in the quantity of coal at a cost of $15,037, due principally to provision for five new buildings.

Item agreed to.

Departments generally—char service, including $150 to E. Snowden for firing the noon gun.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that the char service is probably the lowest paid service in the government. I understand, although there is a slight difference between the char service engaged in the House of Commons and that engaged in the public buildings in Ottawa, those in the public buildings in this city receive about $32.50 a month, or less than $400 a year. Their hours are not long, but they are very awkward. They make it nearly impossible for them to get other work during the day. I understand no allowance is made when they are sick, and they have no holidays. A large percentage of them are widows. Could the minister not see his way to recommend an increase in salary for this service?

Mr. McGIBBON: I think that is a fair question for the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might say that the question is a very live one. It is receiving consideration all the time. We are not allowed to forget about it any month in the year. We are trying to do what is fair, and at the same time keep the expenditure within reasonable bounds. I cannot make any promise with regard to the matter.

Mr. SPENCER: I agree with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that these people are the last ones on whom we should endeavour to economize. Like everybody else, they have to live. If we consider that their day is completely cut up by the work they do in the government service, I think the amount they are allowed is altogether too little to give them even a low standard of living.

Mr. BENNETT: How many char people are there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are over 900 charwomen.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the number was 847.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Somewhere around 900. I have had interviews with them and I know something about their difficulties. Everybody has a good deal of sympathy with what has been said as to the person who has to earn a living cleaning an office and that sort of thing, but I am sure the house will agree with me that women who receive $1.25 for two and a half hours' work and many of whom have other work during the day because they are through at nine, are receiving all that can well be justified for persons in part time employment of that kind.

Mr. PECK: What difference would it make to give them $2 a day instead of $1.25?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The rate of $1.25 a day is for part time employees and they work only two and a half hours.

Mr. PECK: What would it cost to make that payment $2 instead of $1.25?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It would cost three-quarters of $900 or about $675; that is a day. Perhaps this is no answer, but there are very few public services for which the competition is as keen as for this one.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How many buildings are covered by these nine hundred? If you could cut down the number, perhaps you could give the rest decent pay. Can the minister give a detailed statement showing where these nine hundred are employed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The number of buildings, as of November, 1928, was 71; the number of men, 101; women, 779, or a total of 880 employees. The area covered is 2,372,429 square feet.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister has accounted for 880 of the 900. Where are the other 20?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not able to find the other 20. I was speaking approximately.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister any charwomen employed as all-day employees, and what pay do they receive?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have no charwomen who are all-day employees. We have six full-time men.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would like to find out where the 20 are which the minister has lost.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have lost more than that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Surely the minister can give us a little more accurate information than that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When I said 900, I was speaking approximately; I was not attempting to give the figure accurately. The figures I gave were for November, 1928, and I fancy that 900 is probably correct or nearly correct for to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How many are employed in this building and how many in the other buildings? This is rather a large number of employees.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The details are as follows:

Mr. BOYS: How many of these buildings are private residences?

Mr. ELLIOTT: None.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand the charwomen working in the House of Commons are allowed sick leave pay up to four days on presentation of a doctor's certificate, but that the charwomen in the outside service, who are doing work which is more regular and of a permanent nature, are not allowed this privilege. It seems unreasonable that they should not be given the same consideration as the smaller number of women working in the House of Commons.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the same applies to both.

Mr. SPENCER: But it does not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid I did not understand my hon. friend as clearly as I should. Is he referring to whole-time employees or to charwomen?

Mr. SPENCER: I am referring to charwomen in both cases. I understand that the charwomen employed in the House of Commons are allowed sick leave up to four days on production of a doctor's certificate. Will the same consideration be given to charwomen in the outside buildings?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The charwomen who are getting sick leave are under another jurisdiction. I am not going to criticize its action one way or another in this respect; but I do not think my hon. friend will say that we should establish the practice of granting sick leave to employees who are working only two and a half hours a day.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Who makes the regulation as to sick leave with regard to the charwomen employed here

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Speaker.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That seems very extraordinary to me.

Mr. PECK: Are these people under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. PECK: They are appointed by whom?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Those in the char service are appointed by my department; those engaged here are appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. PECK: Who determines their remuneration?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Department of Public Works.

Mr. PECK: Do you not think you are paying them an extremely low rate? What is your opinion?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Had my hon. friend been listening he would have found my opinion to be that they are pretty well paid. What does he pay to a woman who comes to work at his house for two hours and a half a day? I think $1.25 is very good pay.

Mr. PECK: I just wanted to know your opinion.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I expressed it before.

Mr. PECK: The general opinion throughout the country is that the smaller employees of the government, those who have no professional training, are paid at much too low a rate. I think it is not consistent with the dignity of the government to pay such low wages simply because they can get away with it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know this is a matter in which my hon. friend is interested, and I am sure he wants to be fair about it.

Mr. PECK: That is why I spoke.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The very fact that the crowd of applicants is as great as it is is the best evidence that they can do better here than in any other place in Ottawa.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think that is simply evidence that there are a lot of unfortunate women in very poor circumstances. They have to get up at five o'clock in the morning throughout the cold winter months and come up here in all sorts of weather, and if they miss a day they lose their job. The amount is not extravagant; in fact I do not think it is enough.

Mr. KENNEDY: Has the minister forgotten about that prosperity statement?

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the minister's statement go unchallenged that no consideration is to be given to these charwomen in time of sickness. I think he would do well to copy the example of the Speaker in allowing them sick leave for a certain number of days if they submit a doctor's certificate. Although they work only two and a half hours a day, the minister overlooks the fact that they often have to come a long distance, which means two journeys a day. These people should be given a little consideration in time of sickness.

Item agreed to.

Repairs, improvements, additions and maintenance, $700,000.

Mr. MANION: This is a large figure. Will the minister give us details?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This money is required for carrying out works of repairs, alterations, additions and improvements, and procuring furniture, fittings and other supplies in connection with the maintenance of Ottawa public buildings. Also for the removal of snow and ice from sidewalks and roads around the department blocks, parliament house, and repairing, maintaining and cleaning during summer months the pavements and sidewalks on Wellington street and government area, to the north, the plaza, Laurier avenue bridge, St. Patrick street in front of the Printing Bureau, Mackenzie avenue, sidewalks on Laurier avenue west, and Elgin street, fronting Cartier square, and all laneways, yards and areas adjoining properties rented or owned and occupied by the Dominion government. Also for keeping the grounds surrounding the Dominion buildings in Ottawa in proper condition. This is the estimate for 1929-30: Staff of 258 men, compared with 252 men in 1928-29. We require six more men. The estimated cost for these men is $417,466; for materials, supplies and extra assistance, $242,534; for Dominion observatory and Geodetic Survey building, $5,000; for standardizing electric distribution system, $35,000, making a total of $700,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is meant by "standardizing electric distribution system"?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is necessitated through the general standardizing by the Ottawa Electric Company of its distribution system throughout the city.

Mr. MANION: In regard to supplies, what are the large items?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The $242,534 provides for the purchase of materials, supplies and extra assistance required in the maintenance of the various buildings.

Mr. MANION: That is general. I should like a few particulars. For instance, how much is paid for furniture and for any other large items?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I can give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. BENNETT: We make direct appropriations for furniture, filing cabinets and various other matters in the way of general equipment, and now we come to a general vote of $424,000. That is my difficulty.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not the details asked for by my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) but I shall be glad to get them. It will be noticed however that the amount is $175,000 less than it was last year.

Mr. MANION: I was curious to know what it worked out at.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Last year's figures should not count. If the minister looks back a year or two in his estimates he will see that the old figure stood for years at $650,000 and it was suddenly raised to $875,000, being now $700,000. So that there is really an increase over the vote of former years. I have the old estimates here and the amount in 1927 and 1928 was $650,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You shouldn't keep those old estimates.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh yes, I intend to.

Mr. MANION: The minister will give later the items I asked for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Rideau Hall—allowance for fuel and light, $19,000.

Mr. SPENCER: How much of this was spent last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It has been about the same for years.

Item agreed to.

Telephone service, $105,000.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to telephone service the inquiry is as to how many telephones are purely public and how many private.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $105,000 is required for the payment during the fiscal year 1929-30 of the rental of the Bell Telephone Company's connections throughout the several departments of government in the city of Ottawa.

Summary of Requirements for 1929-30

Residence telephones:
Desk sets	68
Wall sets	50	118
Desk extensions	40
Wall extensions	8	48	$ 5,167 08
Direct connections office:
Desk sets	29
Wall sets	15	44
Desk extensions	12
Wall extensions	1	13	4,271 64
Private branch exchange telephone connections:
Desk sets	1,553
Wall sets	86
Desk extensions	481
Wall extensions	19	2,139	$43,796 52	$53,235 24
House of Commons for sessional service: (approximately)		275		4,287 45

This brings the total number of telephones to 2,637, and the expenditures amount approximately to $108,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How many residence telephones are there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: 118.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What would they consist of? Usually, where residences are concerned, the people who have telephones pay for them themselves. In my business or any other business I know of, in connection with which communication is had with residences, the residents pay for the telephones.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The list includes ministers, deputy ministers and private secretaries.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why should private secretaries or even deputy ministers have telephones given them? Has that been always the custom? Is that one of the perquisites of office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will recall the discussion in this regard a year ago. For years this has been the system. At one time it was thought that it should be abolished so far as private secretaries were concerned; that was twelve years ago. Some of the private secretaries felt that inasmuch as these telephones were being used largely in communication back and forth in departmental business, and with the salaries they were receiving, they did not need telephones unless they were supplied. The telephones were consequently taken out and I believe the new order of things lasted about a week, after which they reverted to the present system. That was during the Meighen administration.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did they go on strike?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, but they just were not so easily communicated with as before, and it was not advantageous to government business. I do not believe that if my hon. friend were running the office he would do with fewer telephones.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I run a business and I do not do what the government does in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: Are long distance tolls paid for by the crown?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If on government business.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely this is "a vicious principle," to quote the Prime Minister; it is worse than a vicious principle.

Mr. MANION: "A thoroughly vicious principle."

Mr. McGIBBON: Here are ministers receiving salaries of $10,000 and deputy ministers receiving the same, and the minister comes to parliament and seriously asks this house and the country to believe that the public business would be held up if these people were not supplied with this perquisite. The thing is ridiculous. If ministers need more money, if the deputies need more money, it is the duty of the government to come to parliament and say so and have the thing done openly. I think the one thing that is disgusting the public to-day with all people in public life—and we all have to contend with it—is the fact that these things are not done openly. We come here, and the general opinion in the country is that we are getting all kinds of perquisites, which I grant we are not, that are worth a great deal of money to us; in fact, we are looked upon more or less as a species of grafter. It is just things of this sort, not done openly, that create in the country at large that misconception of our work and duties here. If these people need more money the government should come out boldly and give it to them, but not take the money out of the public treasury for things which after all are not in the public interest. Where is the minister or deputy minister today who would not have a telephone in his house, and where is there a telephone in anyone's house which is not used largely for domestic purposes? Once or twice, or three times in a week there may be a business call, but after all the telephone is largely for the convenience of the family and not at all in the public interest. I for one object to this sort of expenditure.

Mr. PECK: Will the minister tell us exactly what perquisites the members of the government get outside their salaries. What advantages do they receive? I might explain, as the previous speaker said, that a good many people talk about the perquisites of the ministers; for instance, I understand that they are all supplied with automobiles and chauffeurs at the public expense. Apparently they are supplied with telephones also, and I would like to know what other perquisites there are.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know that I can think of any others at the moment; I think my hon. friend has covered them pretty well. He has a number of colleagues who are perhaps able to tell him just as well as any member of the government could. His question is quite proper and I do not object to it; there is the car, the chauffeur and the telephone.

Mr. BENNETT: Gasoline.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You cannot run a car without gasoline. As far as I am concerned, if there is anything the ministers are not given which my hon. friend could suggest and which would assist the ministers in carrying out their duties, I will be in favour of it. I will support anything which will increase the efficiency or conserve the time of the ministers, because I think that is necessary.

Mr. PECK: I do not want to be understood as saying it is wrong, but I want to point out that a minister would be just as efficient if he paid for his own car and chauffeur.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That would apply to telephones also.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is quite true, but probably he would not use them quite so much.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. PLUNKETT: Supposing I wish to call up the minister on the telephone tonight and his phone is busy owing to its use by the members of his family in connection with social engagements. Would that be increasing the efficiency of the minister? Are these telephones marked "for business only" or are they available for the social requirements of the entire family?

Mr. ELLIOTT: As far as my own telephone is concerned it is used for all the social engagements of all the members of the family. If my hon. friend or any of his colleagues wishes to call me up in a social way, so far as I am concerned that telephone will be always at his disposal. I should not think he would want any government to be carried on by ministers who would not allow their telephones to be used for social purposes. So far as I am concerned I shall be very glad to have him use my telephone any time he wishes to invite me out.

Mr. PLUNKETT: It is very easy to be gratuitous with the people's money; it is easy to spend it in this way, but the people must work hard for it.

Mr. GEARY: Is there any relation between the size of the motor cars and the size of the ministers concerned?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I think they depend more on the size of the ministers' hearts.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the size of the car have anything to do with the efficiency of the minister?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so.

Mr. SPENCER: Do any of the deputy ministers use government cars free?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I think so.

Mr. SPENCER: How many?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think they all do, but if my hon. friend will refer to a return laid on the table a short time ago he will find all the details.

Item agreed to.

Fittings, general supplies and furniture, $175,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is an item which illustrates the principle which I was asking the minister to elucidate. We have the details of expenditures for fittings in various branches of the public service; why should we vote this amount of $175,000 without details and with no knowledge of what is covered by it? We voted an amount for a pick-up table for Saskatoon, another for Calgary and another for Regina, but now we are asked to vote $175,000 with no details at all.

Mr. MANION: Before the minister answers that question I might point out another similar case. In this same item we have an amount of $420,000 for heating, salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, and the item following the one now under consideration provides another $405,000 for heating. What is the reason for that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: One item is for Ottawa and the other is for outside places. With regard to the question of the leader of the opposition I might say that we must supply these fittings to the various offices during the year, and we can only judge the details by what we supplied last year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the point. What does this amount cover? Is it for filing cabinets and that sort of thing?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Furniture and fittings for offices generally.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not the requisitions be available before the estimates are submitted, in order that the government might know exactly what is required? That has been done in connection with the other items I have mentioned.

Mr. ELLIOTT: A great many of these requisitions come in from month to month.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Are there any new buildings to fit out? What is the reason for the increase? There is a very substantial increase over last year's estimate, and that was an increase over previous years.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might answer that question by stating that the chief architect's memorandum, which was submitted some time before the estimates were prepared, suggested a vote of $200,000 for this year. We must rely very largely upon the requisitions of the chief architect, who has had a great deal of experience in connection with these matters. He recommended that the appropriation for 1929-30 be increased to $200,000, but we decided that we would try to keep it down to a minimum of $175,000. The vote for furniture and fittings for buildings was $135,000 for 1928-29.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And what amount was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We spent $134,909. According to the memorandum submitted by the chief architect, as far back as June 30 the vote was over-engaged by $3,662, to meet the demands. Since that date the over-engagement has been steadily going up until on the 14th instant the very best we were able to do was something around $19,000. In addition to this over-engagement the chief architect says he is holding requisitions which are estimated to cost approximately $23,000 to fill, and there are further orders which have been placed on condition that the parties wait for payment until the next fiscal year, which amount to approximately $4,000. There are accounts outstanding amounting to $3,700.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would point out to the minister that this item was only $125,000 in 1926-27 and $125,000 in 1925-26; the further this government goes along the more extravagant it seems to get.

Item agreed to.

Heating, $405,000.

Mr. MANION: That is for the outside buildings?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, outside of Ottawa.

Mr. MANION: Are tenders called for the supplying of this coal?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, by public advertisement.

Item agreed to.

Power for running elevators, stamp cancelling machines, etc., $85,000.

Mr. SPENCER: There was an item covering a cancelling machine in vote No. 129, and I see it again in this vote. Is there any connection between them?

Mr. CHAPLIN: This is for power to run the machines.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it the intention to use the power in the new Sussex street project?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would say to the hon. member that this matter was discussed when he was absent from the house. It is hoped that this power will be utilized for the research building which is now being constructed.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

Bill No. 63, respecting The Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 70, respecting Joliette and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Ferland.

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

On the order.

House in committee on Bill No. 22, to incorporate Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company.—Mr. Pettit.

Mr. MANION: I notice that neither the mover of the bill nor the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), both of whom are very much interested, is in the house. I think the bill should stand.

Order stands.

EFFIE MARGARET HILL

The house in committee on Bill No. 85, for the relief of Effie Margaret Hill.—Mr. Clark —Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the sponsor of this bill present?

The CHAIRMAN: Stand.

WILLIAM HENRY BLACKWELL

The house in committee on Bill No. 99, for the relief of William Henry Blackwell.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. MARCIL: When these bills were read a second time, I understood that we would take up the evidence when the bills were reported to the house and we went into committee. I notice the hon. member for Carleton is present. I should like to know what evidence there is in support of this bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The evidence in this case is that William Henry Blackwell was married to Blanche Gregory. I am not quite sure of the year, but some six or seven years after they were married a child was born to this couple. They lived together for some months after that. The wife deserted the husband, who is maintaining the child, and she took upon herself to live with another man from which union a child was born. She is still living with this man and this child.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether there is in the recommendation from the Senate anything about giving the child into the custody of the father?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The child is in the custody of the father, who is quite satsified to let it remain there.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. MARCIL: Has the private bills committee of the House of Commons heard any evidence in connection with this bill, or has it merely accepted the evidence given before the senate committee?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not intend any criticism of those members of the private bills committee who are supposed to attend the sittings of the senate committee, but I asked some of them if they had attended any of the sittings of that committee and heard the evidence given before it. They acknowledged that none of them had attended the sittings of that committee or had heard any evidence. They said they had had no time to do so, and I am not censuring them on that account This shows what an utter farce it is for members of the House of Commons to be appointed on the senate committee when they have no time to attend, and yet we are led to believe that because they have attended the House of Commons is represented and therefore members of the House of Commons know something about the evidence. I take this opportunity to urge the government to implement their promise next session or as soon as possible to ensure that the granting of divorce will not be the farce it is at present.

Mr. MARCIL: I would ask the hon. member if the members of the commons who were asked to attend the meetings of the senate committee go there merely as spectators to witness what was going on, or do they take part in the deliberations of the committee?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not think they have any vote, but they listen to the evidence so as to be able to report back to the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When we consented to have these bills given their first and second reading it was understood that there would be the fullest consideration in committee, but I am informed by members of the House of Commons committee on miscellaneous private bills that these bills passed the committee en bloc; so that so far as the House of Commons is concerned, not one tittle of evidence has been given to any member of the house other than is contained in the evidence as sent over from the senate.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I might say that the question was asked, "Is there any objection to this bill going through?" If there was no objection, the bill passed. That is all there was.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: These bills were passed through the committee without the evidence being brought up in any manner whatsoever. Therefore we have the curious situation that we are asked now, not on the second reading, but in committee, to pass these bills without their having been considered by any committee of this house. I would simply point out again that that is a very slipshod way of doing the business of the house. The sponsor of this bill has given us practically no information as to the reasons for this divorce other than that it has been recommended by the senate committee. There is one other question I would ask: Has the hon. member information as to whether the mother is satisfied that the father should have the custody of the child?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I would hardly expect that the child would want to live with the mother.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think that would settle the matter in any court.

JOHN WILLIAM TELFER

The house in committee on Bill No. 107, for the relief of John William Telfer—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—marriage dissolved.

Mr. MARCIL: May we have some explanation of this bill?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): As soon as I get the evidence I will send it over to my hon. friend.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not think that is the way to proceed in this house. The promoter of the bill ought to give an explanation and reasons why the bill should be adopted. Otherwise, I would ask that the bill stand.

Section 1 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: On division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported on division.

Mr. GARDINER: You might explain, Mr. Chairman, what you mean by calling "on division." I do not see any opposition at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am opposing all these bills, even if I do not say so every time.

Mr. GARDINER: If there is any opposition, it is all right to call "on division," but if there is not, I object to it.

JAMES ROSS CURRY

The house in committee on Bill No. 109, for the relief of James Ross Curry—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. MARCIL: May we have an explanation of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. MARCIL: The public expect that when this house passes legislation relating to any matter it shall be done in the ordinary way. It has been a time-honoured custom in this house to give an explanation why the bill under consideration should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. MARCIL: I am waiting for an explanation, Mr. Chairman. Is it to be published throughout the whole of Canada that we pass these bills blindly without any explanation whatsoever I wish to register my protest against proceeding in this way. If the hon. member in charge of this bill wishes it to pass, he should at least give us some explanation.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no debate on the section, I shall have to call it carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, we are not going to allow matters to go through that way. The hon. member for Bonaventure has asked for an explanation of this bill, and I think we have a right to have the details. We are not prepared to adopt this legislation until the sponsor of the bill gives us something on which to base a judgment. The evidence has not been before a committee of this house, and we have right to have it here.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no debate it is the duty of the Chair to call the clause carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the case of any other bill, Mr. Chairman, when an hon. member asks for an explanation it is forthcoming. That is all that has been asked for here.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out that the Chair cannot force the sponsor of the bill to give an explanation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then we shall have to vote down the bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): On the 9th of May, 1910, the petitioner, James Ross Curry, was lawfully married to Cora Lorine Curry. The license was duly obtained, and the marriage celebrated in the city of Buffalo, in the United States. At the time of the marriage the petitioner and the said Cora Lorine Curry were domiciled in Canada. In 1927, the said Cora Lorine Curry deserted her husband, and obtained on December 30, 1927, in the state of New York, a decree purporting to be a dissolution of her marriage. On July 28, 1928, she went through a form of marriage with one Gordon W. Loney, and has since lived with the said Gordon W. Loney. On February 13, 1928, in the city of Buffalo, the said Cora Lorine Curry committed adultery with one Gordon W. Loney, and the petitioner ever since he discovered that fact has lived separate and apart from the said Cora Lorine Curry. He is now applying for a divorce, which has been recommended by the senate committee.

Mr. MARCIL: Was this evidence brought before a committee of this house or a committee of another house?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): This evidence was brought before the senate committee. I am not a member of the private bills committee of this house, so I do not know whether the evidence was brought before it or not.

JANET GEE

The house in committee on Bill No. 120, for the relief of Janet Gee—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. MARCIL: May we have some information in respect to this bill?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The petitioner in this case Florence Velma Strachan, was married on May 2, 1921, to Alexander Swinton Strachan at Toronto. At the time of the marriage the parties were domiciled in Canada. In 1926 or 1927 in the state of Florida the said Alexander Swinton Strachan committed adultery. His wife is now applying for a divorce, to which she is entitled. This evidence was taken before the senate committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, what bill are we dealing with?

The CHAIRMAN: Bill No. 120, letter N1 of the senate.

Mr. GARDINER: I understood the hon. member was giving evidence relative to the next bill, No. 123.

[Mr. W. F. Garland.]

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): This petitioner is Janet Gee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, we cannot hear at this end of the chamber.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): In this case Janet Gee was married to Sidney Walter Gee in April, 1922. In October, 1928, in the city of Toronto, the said Sidney Walter Gee committed adultery and has since then on divers occasions committed adultery. The petitioner, Janet Gee, is now applying for divorce from her husband.

FLORENCE VELMA STRACHAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 123, for the relief of Florence Velma Strachan—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to on division.

On the preamble.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, before the preamble carries I want to know if there are any children involved in this case.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Yes, one child. The information will be found on page 7 of the evidence.

Mr. EVANS: In this case, Mr. Chairman, I beg to move the following amendment:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it as follows:

1. That section one of the bill be amended by adding the following words thereto:—

"and the said Florence Velma Strachan shall have the custody of their child, and the said Alexander Strachan shall pay annually to the said Florence Velma Strachan for her support and maintenance, the sum of five hundred dollars, so long as she remains unmarried; and the sum of two hundred dollars annually for the support and education of their child."

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman's amendment is not in order according to standing order 113:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole house, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one days' notice of the same has been given.

Therefore I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I would ask that the bill be held over. Under the present method of handling these bills there is no possible way of knowing what particular bills will come up on any particular day. I suppose a hundred of these bills have come to us in this way. I spent some little time during the dinner hour going over a certain number of the bills that appear earlier in this list, but the sponsors not being in their places the bills were allowed to stand. Consequently we are skipping down the list to other bills which we have not had an oportunity of considering, and we did not know whether or not they would be called. Under these circumstances I think we should be given the right to move an amendment in committee of the whole, especially as the bills have not been considered in detail in the private bills committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Is my hon. friend making a motion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am making a suggestion that under these circumstances this bill be held over until we have a chance to deal with it.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that the bill should stand?

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Chairman, it is only fair that this amendment should serve as a notice of motion. The custody of the child is the question raised now. It is too important to be set aside without consideration. I think the motion intended to be moved by the member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), in fairness to the parties concerned, should be considered as a notice of motion.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the private bills committee print its proceedings? It is not the privilege of every member of the house to be on that committee, and so there is no way in which they can follow its proceedings. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a member of the private bills committee, I would judge that he is derelict in his duty if he does not know what has taken place there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member is assuming a good deal when he assumes that I am a member of that committee. I am not.

Mr. VALLANCE: I said, if you were.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But the whole point is in the "if." I am not a member of the committee, and therefore have no opportunity to attend its meetings.

Mr. VALLANCE: I still ask the question, Mr. Chairman, if the proceedings of the private bills committee are printed. If not, there is no way whereby this house can have the evidence in this case other than as it was adduced before the senate committee.

Mr. MARCIL: These bills were taken en bloc by the private bills committee and there is no evidence submitted to this house from that committee; we are going on the assumption of evidence heard in another chamber.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the bills are passed en bloc by that committee the responsibility is theirs; it is not the responsibility of this house.

Mr. MARCIL: The responsibility of this house consists in endorsing that procedure.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is endorsing the procedure of a responsible committee of the house appointed for the purpose. The hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) has been objecting to all these bills and his whole complaint has been in regard to the evidence, which he has been neglecting to read. The evidence has been placed in his box and he has not read it. We have no other evidence to go on than that submitted by the senate committee.

Mr. ADSHEAD: As a member of the private bills committee, I told the house a little while ago that as each bill was taken up the question was asked by the chairman of the committee whether there was any objection to it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): A short time ago I was one of those appointed by this house to attend the divorce committee in the senate. So far this session I have not had much opportunity to attend, but in other sessions I have attended on several occasions, and I can say that they have done their work, in my judgment, very satisfactorily. A short while ago when some of these divorce bills were before the house I protested against the procedure we had been following, and I am still of the opinion I then expressed. In my humble judgment the proper course to follow is for this house to pass a bill granting Ontario the right to have a divorce court. Practically every member of this house, I fancy, believes that this is the only way in which these divorce cases can be satisfactorily heard. As every member knows perfectly well, the private bills committee of the House of Commons does not hear any evidence at all; we accept the printed evidence submitted by the divorce committee of the senate. I have no doubt whatever that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others who have raised objections in the course of the consideration of these bills have objected only to the procedure which we follow, and which is not thorough. We cannot deal satisfactorily with these cases in this way. As I pointed out the other night, when a marriage is dissolved the question arises as to how the wife is to be provided for and how the children are to be taken care of. The amendment moved to-night is at least evidence of a desire on the part of some hon. members to provide some protection for the women and children involved in divorce suits. At the same time, although I do not agree that this house and the senate should be devoting their time to the consideration of divorce cases, instead of passing a bill to establish a divorce court in Ontario, from which province most of the divorces come, I am of the opinion that now that we have served notice on the house and to the country at large that the present procedure is unsatisfactory, we can do nothing better this session than grant the divorces that have come before us, disposing of the cases in the best manner we can. In my view that would be the best course to follow. On a previous occasion I objected to this procedure because I felt that there should be an expression of opinion on the part of the house that in its judgment, after several years' experience, the present practice had proved unsatisfactory. In many provinces, including the province in which I live, there are divorce courts, and I can say to every hon. member that divorces are very much better disposed of in those courts than they are by the method which we are obliged to follow in this house. I cannot see that we are going to gain very much by simply blocking the passage of these bills, although I do not suggest for a moment that anyone is blocking intentionally. As I see it, the motive is to bring more forcibly to the attention of the house and of the country the undesirable character of the present procedure which we are obliged to follow in passing divorce bills. I think it would be better for us to allow these divorce bills to go through this year. There are some hon. members who are strongly opposed to the principle of divorce, but I do not think the principle is at all at stake in the discussion of these bills.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): There seems to be some doubt in regard to the children in this case and as I do not want to do any injustice I would ask that the bill stand.

Preamble stands.

WILLIAM HENRY LAVERTY

The house in committee on Bill No. 126, for the relief of William Henry Laverty.—Mr. Bothwell—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In this case the petitioner and respondent were married in the year 1911 and subsequently lived in Fort William, Ontario, until 1921, when the respondent left home. In 1925 she was found living in Vancouver under the name of Mrs. Edgar D. Casseday. Evidence was given before the divorce committee of the senate by an independent witness, a former resident of Fort William, who happened to be residing at Vancouver, as to the circumstances under which the respondent was living there. She had apparently obtained a divorce in Minnesota and had married this man, and they were living together as man and wife.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must thank the hon. member for such a clear statement; it is one of the best we have had. I am satisfied except on one point. I understand this woman obtained a divorce in the United States. Are not United States divorces recognized in such cases?

Mr. BOTHWELL: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have the legal point explained.

Mr. BOTHWELL: American divorces are not recognized in this country. The petitioner and respondent were domiciled in Fort William at the time the wife left home. Apparently she went to Minnesota and there acquired domicile which enabled her to obtain a divorce according to the laws of that state. But that divorce is not recognized in Canada, and, so far as our laws are concerned, she has in fact committed bigamy in remarrying.

Mr. MARCIL: A judgment to that effect was rendered in Montreal in the past month, in which it was held by Judge Lacroix that Canadians securing divorces in the United States remained, in the eyes of Canadian law, married to the first partner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We ought to have some statement of the case from the Minister of Justice. There are literally thousands of Canadians who have obtained divorces in the United States. In the phrase used in these bills, are they all to-day, "living in adultery"? Is the second marriage unrecognized and are their children by such marriage illegitimate? There are far-reaching consequences involved in the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are taking their chance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have a statement from the Minister of Justice, who is an authority on matters of this kind, as to the position of these people according to our Canadian law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would not like to say what position these people are in to-day, but I may tell my hon. friend that under the law a British subject desiring a divorce must secure it in the jurisdiction of his own domicile.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does that necessarily invalidate a marriage which has taken place in the United States after a divorce has been secured in that country?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not recognized here.

Mr. VALLANCE: It seems to me after the explanation given by the sponsor of the bill that this is the only place where this man may secure redress, the only court to which he can appeal as a resident of his province. The evidence as submitted by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) is conclusive; the only ground for divorce in this country is adultery and that adultery has been conclusively proved by the bigamous marriage of the other party.

On the title:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask again whether, as a matter of law, that will mean that the other party will have the right to marry again?

Mr. VALLANCE: She is married now. You have no jurisdiction over her; she is married and in the United States.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: She is not married according to Canadian law.

Mr. VALLANCE: She is not here.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I understand she obtained a divorce which is not recognized in Canada, and subsequently she contracted marriage with another man. Just what her legal status may be at this time I am not prepared to say, but as far as the petitioner is concerned he is seeking the only redress he may obtain.

JAMES CLAYTON POWELL

The house in committee on Bill No. 145, for the relief of James Clayton Powell—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Explain.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The explanation for this bill is found at page 5 of the senate evidence. Bernice Law was married on June 13, 1923, to James Clayton Powell by Reverend H. Caldwell in the city of Toronto. They lived together for some time in the city of St. Catharines; then they moved to the village of Drayton, in the county of Wellington, after which they moved to the village of Markham, and from there they moved back to Toronto. Three children were born of this marriage. The petitioner follows the vocation of a preacher and teacher, and the conduct of his wife made it impossible for him to continue in that work. She finally took it upon herself to live with one Kenneth Koehler of the city of Toronto; she lived with him for some time, and the petitioner is applying for this divorce.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Three.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What provision is being made for these children?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The petitioner, being a preacher would very likely look after these children.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: So far as this bill is concerned there is absolutely no provision for their custody.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he would be prepared to grant a divorce on the evidence to which he has listened to-night. Is he satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to justify the granting of a divorce?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not granting these divorces; I am simply asking for some little explanation, as I think I have the right to do.

Mr. FORKE: But my hon. friend wants the house to sit in judgment and say whether or not these people should get divorces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am simply asking that we have at least an outline of the details as we have them in connection with every other bill presented in this house. I think I am quite within my rights in asking that.

Mr. FORKE: Perhaps I do not get the point, but it seems to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants this house to sit in judgment and to decide whether or not these bills should be passed. I would like to ask him now, after he has heard the evidence, whether he is satisfied that it is sufficient.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have said repeatedly that I do not think we are a proper court. I have said that approximately one-third of the members of this house on their own confession, are absolutely disqualified as jurors because they say that whatever the merits of the case they will not vote in favour of divorce. They are not considering these cases on their merits, and I cannot be satisfied with such a court. So far as I am concerned I am asking only for an outline of the case, and I should like to be sure that when a bill is under consideration we shall not have read the evidence pertaining to another bill, as happened once to-night. That instance alone reveals clearly the slipshod method we have been following in these matters.

Mr. FORKE: I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman has said, but I want to know what is the use of going through all this farce of making a pretence of examining these bills. We are not gaining anything by it; we are not obtaining sufficient evidence. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to get sufficient evidence in this house would he like to have all these bills discussed in detail? Then all this evidence would be published and scattered all over the land from Halifax to Vancouver. If we are to adopt that course the evidence will be printed in Hansard and will find its way into every corner of the country. Would that make for morality and good living?

I have been with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre up to a certain point; I admit that the whole thing is a farce and that it is ridiculous that this house should be called upon to make these decisions. But the hon. member has made his protest; he has made it clear that we have come to a place beyond which we cannot go and that before another session comes round something must be done to meet the situation. He has gained his point; I think the country and this house realize that he is right, so why continue this thing? As the hon. member for Saskatoon has suggested, why not let these bills go through for this year, because they will go through anyway; then next year perhaps we will get something to meet the situation in the right way. I cannot see the use of wasting all this time.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Immigration has admitted frankly what we have been contending for a considerable time, that this whole procedure is a farce. The minister has made that statement to-night, and I think it is no small advance toward reform when a minister of the crown will openly make that confession. Now what are we to do about it; shall we continue the farce indefinitely? The other day we were urged to permit these bills to be given second reading without details being demanded. We agreed to that, but at that time I said I thought the least we could do in order to maintain any semblance of dignity and decorum in this house was first, to abandon the custom which has prevailed in this house of passing these bills en bloc; second, that the member who is sponsor of the bill should be in his place; third, that we should have at least an intelligible outline of the main facts connected with the bill. I suggested that the other day when a number of bills were before us for second reading. I am not trying to block these bills to-night, but I am simply carrying out the procedure suggested at that time. I am not going back at all on our understanding. I simply ask that when these bills are called there should be given, as was given by the member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell), a clean-cut, succinct statement of the case. In that particular instance I felt that the senate committee had done its work well and personally I felt that I was justified in voting for the bill. I raised no objection after I had heard the statement; I do not see how we can get along on very much less.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) will agree that the member for Swift Current was merely citing the case from the evidence. The hon. member pointed out that one-third of the members of this house were opposed to the principle of divorce, and until over fifty per cent of the members of the house are opposed to this procedure there is no other method of relief offered to these people. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) has raised a point which is very well taken, that in spite of the opposition raised by the member for Winnipeg North Centre these bills are going through. This procedure is giving a lot of publicity to something which the press of this country chooses not to make public, but apparently the hon. member desires to give publicity to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot let that pass. As I said some time ago, if we were to discuss these matters we would have to ask that the galleries be cleared; we would have to hold secret sessions because Hansard could not print the evidence. The evidence which is placed before us could not go through the public mails; it would be stopped as obscene literature. I do not desire to have all the details brought before the house, but I do think that we should have a short statement as was given by the member for Swift Current.

Mr. VALLANCE: He gave it out of the evidence as submitted before the senate committee.

CLARE DOUTRE WALTERS BERTRAM

The house in committee on Bill No. 147, for the relief of Clare Doutre Walters Bertram —Mr. McPhee—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. McPHEE: The evidence proves that the petitioner was married to Harry Alexander Bertram in 1916. There were two children by the marriage, now in the custody of the applicant. The evidence shows that on July 1, 1928, the husband, Harry Alexander Bertram, went to Val Morin, near St. Agathe, in the province of Quebec. He went to the home of one Bernard Adolphe Pfister, accompanied by Marcelle Morin, a young lady who was not his wife. They lived at this place for two days and they occupied the same bedroom at night. This evidence is substantiated by Charlotte Bigras who assigned them the room, as well as by two other parties who were living at the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If that is the evidence as given before the committee it seems to me that we should grant the divorce. But I should like to ask what provision is being made for the two children.

Mr. McPHEE: None whatever.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The father is not being required to support the children?

Mr. McPHEE: The applicant does not ask for that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no provision whatever?

Mr. McPHEE: The applicant does not ask for that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that we ought not to allow a divorce of this character without making some provision for the children. The father is responsible for bringing these children into the world and the least he can do is to support them until they are able to maintain themselves. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we allow this bill to stand until we can bring in an amendment which would make provision for the support of these children.

Mr. VALLANCE: Even in a common law court unless the applicant asks for what is suggested by the member for Winnipeg North Centre it is never granted. The applicant makes no such suggestion here, so why hold the bill up?

Mr. McPHEE: The applicant in this case is Margaret Duffield. She was married to William A. Duffield on October 10, 1913. The evidence proves that on September 19, 1928, the said William A. Duffield was living in adultery with one Mrs. Yapp, in the city of Hamilton.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Dominion public buildings—rents, $1,800,000.

Mr. MANION: I should like to have the minister give us a list of these rents. This may take a few minutes, but we are continually asking about them in the house and it would help if the list were placed in Hansard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The item is a large one and I think my hon. friend's request is reasonable. This amount of $1,800,000 is required for the payment of rents for the year 1929-30 of buildings leased for the various departments of the Dominion government, including the London, England, Canadian building, and to pay for the rental of buildings used exclusively by the militia department, also for the payment of taxes both at and outside Ottawa and the payment of telephones outside Ottawa. The requirements are made up as follows:

Rents	$1,691,972 66
Taxes	45,000 00
Telephones outside Ottawa	5,500 00
Contingencies	57,527 34
Total	$1,800,000 00

This is an increase over last year of $148,500. The increase is due to fifty-five new leases entered into during the year 1928-29, the principal ones of which are as follows:

1. Queen building at Halifax for the archives	$ 1,080
2. Mutual Realty building at Halifax for the Public Works	10,600
3. Aluminum Company building at Arvida, Quebec, for the post office	1,440

Mr. MANION: Are those the increases that are being given or the total number of rented buildings?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am giving the increases over last year.

4. Williams Machine Company building at Montreal for Post Office garage	$ 1,200 00
5. Building at 182 Shearer street, Montreal, for Pensions and Health	6,735 00
6. Accommodation at McGill University for Forest Products laboratory	10,000 00
7. Accommodation from Messrs. Doran at Niagara Falls for Post Office	4,800 00
8. Accommodation from Messrs. Doran at Niagara Falls for Customs	3,600 00
9. Knox college at Toronto for Militia	25,000 00
10. Accommodation from Canadian R. & H. terminals at Toronto for National Revenue	18,837 50
11. Duffield building at Hamilton, for Post Office, National Revenue and Health Departments	20,000 00
12. Farr building at Weston, Ontario, for Post Office	1,800 00
13. Bank of Toronto at Le Pas, Manitoba, for Interior Department	1,500 00
14. Canadian Pacific Railway at Regina for postal accommodation	6,750 00
15. Gibson premises at Drumheller, Alberta, for Post Office	1,100 00
16. Canadian National Railway at Edmonton for postal accommodation	5,200 00
17. Canadian Pacific Railway at Vancouver for postal station A	2,100 00
18. Canadian Pacific Railway at Vancouver for Post Office storage	2,805 00
Total	$124,547 50

The leases are, in all, 455, placed as follows:

	Number of leases
London, England	1
Nova Scotia	25
Prince Edward Island	6
New Brunswick	22
Quebec	72
Ontario	106
Ottawa	49
Manitoba	33
Saskatchewan	47
Alberta	48
British Columbia	44
Yukon	2
Total	455

Mr. MANION: I had intended to ask the minister to read the whole list, but as it is such a large one I do not wish to do that. Perhaps the minister could table the list and, if it does not take up too much space, if it could be placed on Hansard it would be of interest to the whole house to have that done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would be glad to table the whole list. It comprises many pages, but I think we have absolute details of everything.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why is there an item for taxes? I was under the impression that government buildings did not pay taxes. Is this for street taxes, local improvements and things of that kind?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My idea offhand is that while we do not pay taxes ordinarily for a building we occupy—

Mr. BENNETT: A building you own.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —if any building or any part of a building belonging to the government is leased to somebody who is not in the government sedvice, we must pay taxes, but certain of our leases provide for the department paying the taxes, and this amount of $45,000 includes both of these items.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I assume that this building and also the frontage of this property on Wellington street are under the control of the Minister of Public Works. There has recently been installed on Wellington street a red light signal system for motor traffic, but I am sorry to say that, so far as I have observed, motorists pay little attention to the signals. I have had one or two very narrow escapes myself, and perhaps for that reason I look more carefully than other people. To-day on three occasions I noticed cars running through at a pretty good clip, absolutely regardless of the stop signal. I notice also there are two representatives of the mounted police stationed at the gates I use. Why do these police officers not take the license numbers and institute prosecutions? One or two prosecutions would settle the matter. At the present time many motorists pay no attention to the signals. We have had accidents at this crossing, and members of the House of Commons have suffered. I just want to direct the minister's attention to the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I quite agree with my hon. friend and I hesitate either to join with him or to differ from him in the criticism of the city police. I think there is a good deal in what he says about the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was refering to the mounted police.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But we have no jurisdiction over Wellington street.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They could easily take the license numbers of motorists who break the law, and hand them over so that prosecutions might be instituted.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That was what I was going to suggest. Any citizen has a perfect right, if he notices the law being violated, to take the license number and lay an information.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But citizens, as a rule, do not go to that trouble. I could have done that, too, but I do not want to pursue a prosecution in a police court.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What my hon. friend says is quite true, and the police who are not specially charged with that duty and whose jurisdiction does not extend to the street in question also hesitate to lay information in regard to a matter that is outside their jurisdiction. That is the difficulty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As there are no city police on Wellington stret, so far as my observation goes—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, there are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, very rarely are they on duty on Wellington street. If the mounted police, who have the custody of these grounds and this building and who, I suppose, are interested in the safety of members of the House of Commons when they cross that street, would give the license numbers to the city police, I think the traffic could be regulated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I agree with my hon. friend except for just this one thing: I think it is desirable that the best possible relations should be maintained between the federal and the municipal authorities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Even if you kill off a few members in the meantime.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not objecting to our police laying the information. My hon. friends laugh. I do not want to be misunderstood. I did not say, "I am not objecting to killing off a few members," but that I do not object to our police laying the information.

Mr. FORKE: What law governs the traffic lights on Wellington street?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The municipal law.

Mr. FORKE: Is there a municipal by-law or regulation in regard to those traffic lights? I have been told that there is not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was passed recently, I understand.

Mr. FORKE: I have heard several times that there is no such by-law, but I may be wrong.

Mr. MALONEY: The sum of $1,800,000 is a fabulous amount to pay for rents. Capitalized at the ordinary bank rate, that would mean an investment of almost fifty million dollars, and fifty million dollars to be paid out by the government of this country for office accommodation seems ridiculous, particularly when we are spending millions and millions on the construction of buildings in this city and millions more for the construction of buildings in other parts of the country. This vote should he held over for very careful consideration, because the people of this country will find it hard to believe that we need to spend almost two million dollars in renting buildings throughout Canada, in small places as well as large.

Mr. BIRD: How much rent is paid for the government offices at The Pas, Manitoba?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The government pays $3,600 per annum to T. Creighton for the Post Office Department; $900 to the Royal bank for the lands and mines branch, and $1,500 to the Bank of Toronto for the Interior department.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the government's policy going to be in regard to renting buildings in the future? Year after year we have been voting large sums for rent, and pointing out the folly of it, but apparently we do not get anywhere.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How does my hon. friend mean? With regard to getting buildings of our own so as to get rid of paying rent?

Mr. McGIBBON: Certainly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will see from these estimates that a considerable number of buildings are being constructed by the government.

Mr. McGIBBON: But the rent is not depreciating to any extent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The number of people required to carry on the service and the accommodation required is increasing. We are trying to put up buildings as fast as seems reasonable.

Mr. McGIBBON: Last year's vote was $1,651,000, and this year we are paying $1,800,000. The vote is not decreasing at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend was present when I read details as to the additional services and the additional accommodation asked for by the various departments in order to enable them to carry on their business, which accounts for the difference.

Mr. McGIBBON: Cannot the government expand its building capacity to keep pace with the growth of the service?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are endeavouring to, and that is the idea of these new buildings. But my hon. friend will find that the cost for buildings owned by the government throughout the country will on the whole be greater than the cost of renting buildings.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then how does the minister account for private individuals erecting buildings and renting them to the government? They must do it at a loss, according to the minister's argument. It is ridiculous.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister surely does not intend us to believe that owning the buildings would be worse than renting them. Here we are paying $1,800,000 in rent, which represents a capital of $30,000,000 for interest and sinking fund. With $30,000,000 you could construct a great many buildings in Canada. If by saying that the cost of upkeep of new buildings would be more than we pay in rent the minister means that in some cases we pay larger rents than we should, I can understand it. But in this city there has been in recent years a new building occupied in its entirety by one department, and the company putting up that building have circularized the Canadian public stating that they expect from the rents received to pay off the bonds in a limited number of years and own the building free of encumbrance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What building is that?

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. BENNETT: The Norlite building. What about the Confederation building? What is it going to cost? It seems to me that it will not accommodate so very many offices. It may go up in the air quite a distance, but it is not very long in street frontage. How many tenders were received for the construction of that building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. friend will not expect me to carry all the details in my head, but I think I can give him nearly all the details in regard to the Confederation building, which is a building of more than ordinary interest. My recollection is that it will be from seven to nine stories high, with the tower a little higher. The frontage on Wellington street will be 200 feet, and on Bank street, 150 feet. The actual space that we will have for offices, after providing for corridors, rest rooms, elevators and that sort of thing, will be 175,000 square feet. There is in addition 7,500 feet of storage space.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the basement?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. I think if my hon. friend looked at the figures he would be satisfied that that building, although it will give better space I hope than we have anywhere else in Canada, and although we do not pay any taxes, will not be a great saving. There were, I think, five or six tenders received, the lowest being from Lyall and Company, amounting to $2,460,000 odd, which was substantially below the next tender.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it the usual form of contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: When do you expect to occupy it, and when it is occupied, will that decrease the vote for rentals the next year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The vote for rentals should decrease when we get into the building. It is not definitely settled by whom it will be occupied. We have a number of applicants for the new space. The contract calls for the building being completed on April 8, 1930. That is making a reduction of six months in the time originally estimated by the architect. According to the progress report we had a week or ten days ago, the contractors were up to schedule, and if that rate of progress continues the building itself ought to be completed by April 8, 1930. Of course the offices will have to be installed after that date, before the building can be occupied.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many tenders did you receive?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think five or six. I would refer my hon. friend to the vote in connection with it, when the whole matter can be discussed. We have not reached that yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What vote will it be under?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Vote 117 at page 30, new departmental building, $1,500,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the minister realize the significance of the statement he has just made to the house?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope he does.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then it is a travesty on the intelligence of the government. In effect it is this: Private individuals can erect buildings and rent them to the government cheaper than the government itself can do so for its own use. What greater condemnation could we want of the inefficiency of any government than the statement just made by the minister?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend want to be taken seriously? Let us consider for a moment what I have said and what he has said. I said you will get no space in the city of Ottawa like the space we will have in the Confederation building. For one reason it is more valuable. But the cost I expect will be higher than we are paying for the kind of space we are occupying now. My statement with regard to being able to rent buildings cheaper than build them does not apply nearly as much to a building like the Confederation block, which is a large building, as it does to the small buildings such as those contained in the list I was reading to my hon. friend a few moments ago. Of course, in that case we require quite a number of feet of space, but in a great many places where our requirements are more limited it is to our advantage to rent rather than build.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly will be a paying investment to build in Calgary.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is an example showing that where a large amount of space is required to house all the departments it justifies the erection of a large buildings; but my statement that it was cheaper to rent than to build applies, I suppose to two-thirds at any rate of our buildings.

Mr. GEARY: On the southeast corner of Wellington and O'Connor streets is a factory building. It is called an office building, but is built to factory specifications and looks no better than a factory in the industrial section of any city. The factory building to which I have referred has been erected very little more than a year, and I suppose the need for further accommodation was present to the mind of the government when the permit was allowed to go through for the Edwards building on the corner of Wellington and O'Connor.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is a former city solicitor and, I hope, has not forgotten that completely. Does he think we could have controlled the utilization of that corner?

Mr. GEARY: If this government in their desire to beautify Ottawa had even ordinary common sense they would not have allowed the Edwards building to go up. They were told before it was commenced that they might have the property. It is a reproach to the government that while trying to improve the immediate surroundings of this Confederation building they should allow the erection of the eyesore to which I have referred.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What does my hon. friend mean by saying that we could have had the property?

Mr. GEARY: Surely the minister knows what I mean.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You mean we could have bought it?

Mr. GEARY: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We could have bought anything down the whole street.

Mr. GEARY: Then I say if the government desired to beautify the surroundings of this building they wasted their money in tearing down buildings on the south side of Sparks street and allowing an eyesore like this Edwards building to go up immediately next the parliamentary grounds. I am quite sure the minister will find out that long before the Edwards building was put up the government might have had the site as vacant land. As soon as the Victoria chambers were destroyed by fire the government should have seen to the acquisition of the site.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend think the Victoria chambers were destroyed by fire? They were torn down to provide a place for this building.

Mr. GEARY: Whatever happened to them.

Mr. McGIBBON: They were antiquated and useless.

Mr. GEARY: If I understand the Minister of Public Works correctly, he is saying now that the government had no option but to allow the Edwards building to go up. That is not sense. If the government had desired to get that property, I wager it could have been acquired before a dollar had been expended in the way of new plans.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GEARY: Across from these grounds, on the south side of Wellington street, from the Rideau Club westerly the buildings are of very decent appearance; from Metcalf street easterly the government building is of very good appearance; but until that factory building on the corner of O'Connor street and Wellington is acquired at an expense, I suppose, of a million and a half—because the building is occupied and there is a growing value—until that building is acquired the surroundings of parliament hill cannot be improved. How much better the Confederation building would have been on the corner where the Victoria Chambers used to be. I cannot claim that I know as a fact that the government was offered the site, but I say the site could have been acquired before a dollar was spent on the new building. I think the minister has made a mistake that will not be repaired in the next fifty years, and in the meantime he has destroyed all opportunity of beautifying these surroundings by allowing that eyesore to go up.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The question of the land on which to place government buildings was not decided last year or the year before. I think back in 1912 it was considered advisable to construct government buildings under some definite scheme and to obtain quite a substantial amount of land for this purpose. The building on the corner to which my hon friend referred could have been purchased, of course, much more cheaply at that time than within the last year or two. I think all the buildings down to and including what is called the old Perley home were purchased in the year 1912 or thereabouts at a cost of about three million dollars. I will not quarrel with my hon. friend as to whether or not the wise thing at that time would have been to buy the property opposite the parliament buildings and grounds, but the government in its wisdom, in acquiring a site for a general scheme of government buildings, made a selection which included the property on which the Confederation building is now being constructed. I quite agree with my hon. friend that probably it would have been good business to have prevented the erection of any unsightly building in the vicinity of the property on which we intended to put up any of the buildings which we should construct; because the Confederation building is only one of a series. The same thing applies to all buildings on the other side of Wellington street right down as far as our property goes. There are many buildings down there which probably will be opposite very respectable government buildings to be constructed in the life of this government, within the next few years. The hon. gentleman suggests now that this government should go out and obtain all the property facing the buildings which it is intended to construct. I really do not think my hon. friend considered his argument before delivering it.

Mr. GEARY: You have not considered it since.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I always consider any argument which my hon. friend presents because I have the greatest respect for his views, but I must say that this respect has not increased with his last argument. As regards the purchase of this property cornering our present building, does my hon. friend suggest that, first of all, this government had a right to say what kind of building should be put up? He has already admitted that we could not. In the second place, does he suggest that we should have been justified in assuming that a bad building would be put up—a building that would not be a credit to that part of the city?

Mr. McGIBBON: You should not let any building be put up there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Who should not?

Mr. McGIBBON: The government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It could have been prevented by the purchase of the property.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is a better way.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How?

Mr. CHAPLIN: By arranging with the city so that unsightly buildings would not be put there. They are always ready to concede that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad my hon. friend takes so generous a view of what the city is always ready to do. The city, I presume, has passed upon that particular building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Without protest.

Mr. GEARY: I have listened to the minister's speech, frequently interspersed with "I agree". Of course he does not agree with anything. The whole object of the minister's speech is to try to get rid of the difficulty that has arisen because of a mistake the government has made in the last two or three years, and he does so by referring to purchases made in 1912. I have no doubt the purchases made in 1912 were fairly reasonable, but no one will say that because the government bought property in 1912 it is tied to that property in respect to the structures it erects in 1928. The minister during the last day or two has cited to the committee case after case where sites were purchased for post offices away back before the war, and there are still vacant sites upon which post offices have never been built. I do not say that the city would have listened to the government, but I have every reason to expect that it would have done so, and the city architect would have held his plans over, as is the usual course in connection with structures of this sort, until such by-laws had been passed as would provide for some control over buildings to be erected. But that is not the point. The point is this: the Victoria chambers were coming down. At the moment none of the other structures along there are coming down. But, as I say, the Victoria chambers were coming down, and I venture to say that the minister will find, if he does not know now, that before one dollar was spent on the present building the government had an opportunity to buy that land. That is the common report. The minister may deny it, because he has declined to get the information. But the government or the Prime Minister must know. It is known to some member of the government that that property, in a vacant state, was available to the government for purchase, and the government passed it up and allowed this other building to go on the premises. The minister talks about buying properties when the buildings fall down. The government did not wait for the buildings to fall down when they bought other property. They bought other buildings which were going concerns. There was for instance a theatre which they acquired, being obsessed with the idea of a memorial square. I fancy that the people of Ottawa or anyone who visits the city will say that the appearance of parliament hill will be much more seriously impaired by the Edwards building now on the corner of O'Connor street than it will ever be improved by the purchase of the property on Sparks street. I will not go over that argument because the money has been appropriated and the property bought. But no one will say that the property south of Sparks street was a good purchase; it was an extravagance that cannot be justified. And here is a property, costing probably less than half a million, which the government needed and on which there could have been erected a building in keeping with those that lie opposite parliament hill, instead of which the whole of parliament hill is ruined for the next half century despite the obsession of the government for beautifying the city. The fact is, they have not used common sense.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is one danger that suggests itself in connection with the argument of my hon. friend. The hon. member says that the government could have bought that land before building took place on it. Of course they could have bought the property if they had paid the price, but what would that entail? Other people with old properties along that street and desirous of turning them over would be in a position to go to the government and say, "You bought the Victoria Chambers and paid the price. We intend to build on our land and we think you had better buy our property also". It might be a very serious matter; it would be the beginning of a campaign to induce the government to spend a great deal of money along that street. It might be deemed desirable in the long run, but until the government and the house decide that it is, it would not be wise to follow the course my hon. friend suggests when so much land has been already bought and paid for. It is much more desirable to use land already owned than to buy more. At any rate, there would be that factor to consider in the case, that if a good price were paid for certain property the owners of other property would seek to justify the purchase by the government of such property on similar terms. They might even threaten to put up undesirable buildings in order to induce the government to purchase their land. I have heard violent attacks on this particular building in the last two years and I do not think they are altogether warranted. The building may not be covered with marble and sandstone outside, but it is apparently a high class office building. I noticed an item in the press to the effect that hon. gentlemen opposite had rented an entire floor, and I must say that I think they used good judgment in doing so. The building seems splendidly fitted for office purposes.

Mr. GEARY: It is a most excellent building for office purposes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend (Mr. Geary) is referring to a building which we shall reach eventually in the estimates. But I would point out that that building appears at page 30 and we are now at page 35, which has to do with an altogether different matter. I have no objection however because I realize that the Confederation building is one of interest to every hon. member of this house, and I do not know that anyone should object to the discussion of this matter whenever any hon. member feels disposed to bring it up.

Mr. GEARY: I was not discussing the Confederation building; I was discussing the piece of property across the road from it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That piece of property is not in the estimates at all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know whether it is in order to discuss this monstrosity down here in front of the parliament buildings, because I do not know whether it comes under this item of rents, and I do not care.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It certainly does not come under this item.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Very well, I will say nothing more about it now but I will have occasion to say something at another time. In respect to the item of rents, a few minutes ago the minister was kind enough to tell the house that these rents have gradually increased despite the fact that we are providing new buildings all the time, and he also told us that probably they would continue to increase. I can say to the minister that both he and other ministers who have occupied that position have told us that as new public buildings were constructed the rents would decrease. What is the history? Let us go back to 1926-27. In that year the rents amounted to $1,410,000. In 1927-28 the item had increased to $1,440,000; in 1928-29 it increased to $1,651,000 and this year it is $1,800,000. I do not know when the decrease is to take place, but I think it should come soon with all the buildings we are putting up.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What buildings have we put up in Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are talking of the whole of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For that matter, how many new buildings have been put up throughout Canada?

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have been buying them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not very many.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There was the Daly building.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was purchased long before this government came into office.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What about these other buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Very few buildings have been bought or erected by the government since we came into office.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps this whole question is out of order—

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not object to the discussion.

Mr. MANION: Since the hon. member for South Toronto has brought up the matter I have a couple of suggestions to make. I well remember, when the building was being erected a couple of years ago, bringing up the whole question in this house, and I have since not changed my opinion about its appearance. I remember I was rather severe about it at the time and termed it a ghastly architectural monstrosity, which perhaps was rather strong language. However, as one stands in this beautiful square and looks around only to find the whole effect ruined largely by the colour of that building, one metaphorically weeps. Again and again I have walked down the square and have felt sorry to see the whole effect ruined in this way. My hon. friend from Melfort has brought up the point of the high prices which might be charged the government, but the government has the right to expropriate; and if at any time the erection of a building is threatened which will ruin the beauty of this city the government would be quite justified in expropriating the land for its own purposes. But I have another suggestion to make, and perhaps this is something which should have been done before this; I believe I suggested it when I brought up the question a year or two ago. My suggestion, which I think should receive the attention of the minister and of the government, is that the city council of Ottawa should be approached by the government on behalf of the people of Canada, and asked to make such regulations as will prevent the erection of any building such as the one under discussion which would spoil the beauty of this city. I do not know whether any action has been taken in this regard; if this has been done I know nothing of it, and the minister has not referred to it. This government, representing the people of Canada, is spending vast amounts of money to beautify the city of Ottawa; with that we on this side have quarrelled on a number of occasions, because we have thought that the purchase and the pulling down of a number of fairly good buildings was an unnecessary extravagance. At any rate, that has been done, and since it was done for the purpose of beautifying the city—and to Ottawa's beautification no one on this side of the house objects, so long as it is not done at too great an expense—it should be the duty of the city council to cooperate with the government and put in force building regulations which would not permit buildings of this kind to be erected and so ruin the beauty of this city. To-day no doubt the city of Ottawa has fire regulations, and other forms of buildings regulations, but certainly the city never should have permitted that building to be erected in its present form. It is an eyesore to all who appreciate the beautification of the city, and it is an eyesore to every visitor to Ottawa. This is the second time I have brought up this matter and I sincerely hope that the minister will be able to tell next session that some action of this kind has been taken by the government. I do not know whether or not that has been done already; if it has I offer them praise for it, but if that action has not been taken I think the government should approach the city council of Ottawa to see if some regulation cannot be put into effect so that in future another building such as this may not be erected.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know that I am at liberty to say what has taken place with regard to certain interviews between the civic authorities and representatives of the government and of the federal commission, but interviews such as my hon. friend has suggested have taken place. The two parties are working together very cordially, I believe, and in the best interests of both. I know my hon. friend wants to be fair to the city council who permitted this building to be erected and to the corporation which built it. He has already stated that his objection is largely based on the colouring of the upper part of the building, and I think he will be one of the first to agree that that is something which the plan submitted to the city council would not indicate. I think the trouble is only temporary; probably the mixing of the mortar has something to do with the colour which my hon. friend finds objectionable.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the minister say that the city architect would not be able to appreciate what the specifications called for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not catch my hon. friend's question; I was trying to answer another question and it is rather difficult to answer one and appreciate another at the same time.

Mr. MANION: I have no desire to be unfair to the city council of Ottawa; I knew nothing of any approach having been made by the government. I compliment the government for making these efforts, but I believe the government is in a position of authority, spending as it does millions of dollars to make this city one of the most beautiful on this continent. I think the government would be absolutely justified if they insisted on these regulations. I have no desire, as I have already said, to be unfair to this city, and certainly I do not wish to be unfair to that hon. member of this house who is one of the owners of this building. He is a personal friend of mine and I regret to say anything concerning a building in which he is interested, but I have my duty to perform also, and my duty, as I see it, is to endeavour to assist the government and the city council in beautifying this city. Much as I regret hurting his feelings, or perhaps impugning the methods of the city council, I think it is time the government took a pretty strong position, if necessary, in order to bring about that result which the minister and the government profess to be anxious to obtain.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is another point which I might mention, and perhaps this is another matter which should not be stressed unduly. This question of jurisdiction should be avoided as far as possible. The government has jurisdiction to authorize the city of Ottawa to place building restrictions upon any particular street.

Mr. GEARY: Not this government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, the provincial government. I think the hon. member for South Toronto knows that the city of Ottawa did approach the government at Toronto. A bill was presented there asking for the very authority and the very control which was required, but that bill did not pass the Ontario house. I am not finding fault with the provincial legislature for that, because objections were raised by property owners in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps the hon. member will wait until I have answered the last question. They were not able to get legislation through the Ontario legislature which would give them the control which would have enabled them to prevent the very thing to which my hon. friend objects.

Mr. GEARY: It was a very poor bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the hon. member say that it did not provide for this very safeguard which he now says should have been taken?

Mr. GEARY: Yes, it did, but the area dealt with by the bill which was proposed by the city of Ottawa, and which I suppose was backed by the government, went all the way down to government house; it stretched across Connaught place and up Sparks and Wellington streets and tied up many properties which would never be used for beautification purposes. I think you will find also that the chairman of the beautifying commission at Ottawa was very heavily interested in a good many properties, and many owners thought that the bill should not pass.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The bill did not pass.

Mr. GEARY: There is no trouble in getting ordinary building restrictions passed by the Ontario legislature. We have such restrictions in the city of Toronto, perhaps to a greater extent than we need them, and the city of Ottawa, with streets immediately adjacent to parliament hill, should have no trouble at all in getting the legislature to provide safeguarding measures. But the important point is that the government had a chance to stop the erection of that building and did not do it. The government and the city of Ottawa prevented the sale of the Russell house because they were willing to go in and spend money on that site. The crux of the matter is that the government deliberately neglected the opportunity to acquire that property at a cost of probably a quarter of a million dollars or a little more.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I certainly do not want to prolong this discussion, and I am ready to drop it any time anyone suggests that it should be dropped. The hon. member who has just spoken has had a great deal of experience before the private bills committee of the Ontario legislature.

Mr. GEARY: You did not help me any.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I helped you a lot at times, much more than you are helping me to-night. I always admired the way in which the hon. member got legislation through, some of which I approved of and some of which I could not entirely agree with. He knows that there were objectionable features in nearly every bill which was presented to that committee. The committee was directed by officials who had been doing that work for many years and they nearly always pointed out objectionable features which they asked the promoters of the bills to have deleted so that the measures could pass in a reasonable way. I do not think his statement that the bill contained unreasonable features is any answer at all.

As to the other question, that we should have purchased all the property adjoining that which we now own, I am not saying that it would not have been a good thing, but I do say that it is much easier to defend our action to-night than it would have been had we purchased that property at the time it was available and given as our explanation that we intended to build on it so that a poor building could not be erected there. We would be leaving vacant that property which after a great many years of study all governments have been agreed should be the site for the erection of a series of buildings.

Mr. BIRD: I should like to stress the significance of the figures which the minister gave a short time ago. It appears that the department is paying $6,000 per year for rental in the town of The Pas in northern Manitoba. At 4½ per cent that represents a capital of $135,000, if my arithmetic is correct. It seems to me that a building could be erected there at a figure much less than that, which would house all Dominion government offices, and if so it would be in the interests of economy to erect such a building. I have been bringing this matter to the attention of the minister for the past two or three years and I must say that he has always met me very graciously. One thing I admire about the minister is the very charming way in which he turns one down. He kicks one downstairs with such inviting grace that you would really think he was helping you up. I like that, and I reciprocate that feeling. I understand the difficulties he has to contend with, but the total vote for public buildings is not a very big one considering the widespread necessity which exists for that kind of project. Speaking in a general way, I am strongly in favour of spending money on public buildings so long as their utility is proven.

Referring to The Pas, I want to take a minute to impress upon the house the very urgent character of the requirements there. Of all the towns in Manitoba there is not one other in which the requirements are so urgent. The committee will understand that this town is the hope of Manitoba at the present time. All eyes in that province are turning northward and are being focused upon this quickly growing community. Those members who have their daily meditations before the blackboards in the brokers' offices will know something about Flin-Flon and Sherritt-Gordon. These mines I am proud to say, are situated in the constituency of Nelson, representing one of the most promising mineralized areas in the whole of Canada. The Pas is the jumping off place for those two important points; and not only that, but The Pas is the base for all that romantic development which is going on up the Hudson Bay railway. In addition to all this, The Pas for many years has been the centre for administrative purposes for the whole of northern Manitoba, almost a continent. There is not another point in the whole of Manitoba that is more necessitous than this one. Almost every other concern, private or public, has generously recognized this necessity. Commercial companies, such as banks and wholesale companies, during the last year have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in building up substantial and permanent buildings in that town. During the last year there has been erected a building housing a daily paper which is now operating. There has also been erected one of the finest hospitals in the west outside of the big cities, and numerous other buildings, wholesale houses, business houses have been constructed. Last year the building program amounted to over a million dollars, and I am informed that it will far exceed that this year. As I say, every important public body except the Dominion government has recognized the necessity of The Pas, and the Dominion government least of all should be in that position, because The Pas for many years has been the administrative seat for the Dominion government and the importance in that respect will be realized from the amount of rent that is being disbursed there every year.

I do not want to detain the committee and I do not think it is necessary to do so, because I feel certain the minister is fully apprised of all I have said. As I said at the beginning, I am not going to pester him. This is a business matter; this is not a small, political matter at all. It is a matter of meeting the legitimate necessities of a very important part of our Dominion at the present time. I should like to see in the near future, without naming any dates, a modest yet adequate building erected in that town. I do not want to see that building plastered with unnecessary ornamentation: I would like to see it based on strict utility. I am sorry I cannot agree with some of my friends in their aesthetic and artistic views as to architecture. I was not able to follow them in their cry that the building on Wellington street is an architectural monstrosity. I think our views on this matter are somewhat second-hand. If I were building an office building, I would build an office building: I would try to achieve the result in the most direct manner, and I would feel confident that if I followed strict engineering principles and stayed true to the laws of utility, I would be more likely in the long run, to achieve something beautiful that would harmonize with its surroundings than I would by aiming at something that was falsely artistic. If you set out with some false idea of beauty by plastering a lot of Gothic gimcracks around parliament hill, you may in time arrive at an architectural monstrosity

For my part, I would like to see, within the next year or two in The Pas, a building that would be worthy of some of the buildings that are already there; for instance, the Catholic hospital, the provincial community building, which has stood there for a dozen years, and other buildings which I could name. Last fall at the board of trade banquet there I had to sit ashamed, representing the Dominion house, as I heard speaker after speaker point his finger to the neglect of the Dominion government in this matter. I did not altogether join with them in their criticism, and I do not do so yet, because I realize that most of the departments—and I am not altogether excluding the department of my hon. friend—have within the last few years responded fairly generously to the necessities of that northern country. But this is a demand that is somewhat different. This is something which is urgent, and it cannot be put off for a long time to come. I should like the minister to tell me not only that he is still considering the matter, but that he is considering it a little more earnestly and favourably.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make just two observations with respect to the acquisition of the site west of the supreme court building. When the Borden administration came into power in 1911, one of the first difficulties that confronted them was with relation to the acquisition of office space in this city. The minister has doubtless seen in his own department the plans which were prepared many years ago looking to the construction of a very fine series of buildings on the far side of Wellington street from the Rideau club down to the Bank of Montreal corner. I am not quite certain who prepared those plans, but my memory is that it was a very distinguished architect, and the late Mr. Ewart used to exhibit them with some degree of pride. After they had carefully considered the situation it was found that that site on Wellington street from the Rideau club to the Victoria chambers would cost a great deal of money, because banks, the club building and other buildings were in occupation, and the space would be somewhat less than what was available on the land west of the supreme court building. Those buildings were acquired partly by agreement and partly by expropriation, if my memory serves me aright. For the moment I am speaking only from memory. It gave the government a great deal of concern as to whether they should endeavour to take the property in front of the parliament buildings or the property west of the supreme court building. But if I remember correctly, in view of the fact that there was nearly twice as much property west of the supreme court building as there was from the Rideau club to the Victoria chambers, it was thought desirable to acquire the former property having regard to future requirements and the fact that you could not carry the Wellington street property out to Sparks street without expending too much money, whereas the property west of the supreme court building was between the river and the street. Accordingly that land was acquired, extending west of the supreme court building a considerable distance—I do not know how many feet it is—and a complete scheme worked out for a series of buildings. I presume the Confederation block, so-called, is the first unit in that building scheme.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I have in mind the scheme to which my hon. friend refers. After several contests by different planners and architects, the scheme of which the Confederation building is the beginning was finally decided upon, but it is not exactly the same as that referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but the general terms are much the same. It will be recalled that a commission was appointed headed by Sir Herbert Holt to make a report upon the city improvement generally. It will be recalled what the government did. This is the point of the criticism. The government undertook improvements and the beautification of Ottawa, and to carry out those improvements and that beautification spent something like $3,000,000 acquiring the property comprising the square near the post office, the Russell hotel building, and other buildings in that locality. But if the object is to beautify and improve, the government did just the exact opposite of what it had in mind when it let the structure on the corner opposite the Bank of Montreal, on the site of the old Victoria chambers building, be erected. When this vast scheme of building west of the supreme court buildings was undertaken, the government then had in mind the provision of office accommodation for all the public service in Ottawa, looking forward for half a century. That was the general conception of the undertaking. Then when the town planning commission made their report—it will be remembered that an engineer came from Chicago to Ottawa—the commission at the head of which was Sir Herbert Holt made certain recommendations, and in a broad and general way this park that you now have in front of the post office follows the report of the commission, though not in detail. The difficulty—I confess I have never been able to solve it—is how you can talk of the beautification and improvement of Ottawa when in front of this magnificent ten million dollar structure you permit that building to be placed on the corner. The minister says that it could not be prevented, but the hon. member for South Toronto has made it perfectly clear that there was an opportunity, and that opportunity should have been grasped instead of spending three million dollars on the acquisition of the properties to which I have referred.

May I say this further? I think it is abundantly clear that the property between the Rideau Club and the Victoria chambers would not be sufficient to give effect to the plans that were in mind at that time for the accommodation of the public service of this country, and the location of the buildings on the site west of the supreme court buildings became a necessity because there was no other site to which you could easily go, unless you did as was done in Australia, move the capital entirely away from the city.

While on the subject of the Confederation building, and to obviate the necessity of speaking again, may I say, although the matter is perhaps not strictly relevant to the item under discussion, that something should be done with respect to the building in which the Supreme Court of Canada is housed. The Minister of Public Works is a member of the legal profession, and is no doubt aware that there are very valuable books in that library that cannot be replaced with money. The building was an old carpenter shop in 1878, and it is now the home of the highest court in Canada. I cannot but think that, finding money as we have done for many other purposes, we should not permit this condition to continue. The present structure is finished inside with highly inflammable wood—white pine—much of it hand-carved and covered with shellac which will burn practically if you put a match against it. The greatest possible care must be exercised on the part of everybody about the premises to prevent the building being burned down. Such a loss—I am speaking merely as a member of the legal profession—would be very hard to contemplate; for there are books there that cannot be replaced. It is also very unpleasant to reflect on the fact that the home of the highest court in Canada, what we speak of as being the court of last resort in this country, should be housed in an old carpenter shop, to which some improvements, very few, have been made since 1878. If I were asked to-day to say what public service in Ottawa I regard as being most in need of a new public building, I would say that it is the Supreme Court of Canada. That is my profound conviction. I have been over most of that building. It is neither fire proof nor commodious. The minister this afternoon said that it took eight charwomen and one foreman daily to look after it, just keeping it in shape. Look at the floors and everything connected with it! If governments are trustees alike for this generation and the next, I would say that no greater trusteeship rests upon them than that of providing decent facilities for the Supreme Court of Canada. I was surprised to find in the estimates no appropriation for this purpose. I would strongly impress upon the minister and through him upon the administration, the necessity of taking action in this matter. After all, in the ultimate analysis law and the maintenance of the rule and reign of law is what all governments must have in mind, and if you do not house in decent premises, an institution such as the Supreme Court of Canada, you are going to have an unfavourable reaction in the matter of the general conduct of litigation and the maintenance of law and order in this country.

Mr. MALONEY: I really think that this item should stand, Mr. Chairman. We are asked to vote $1,800,000 a stupendous sum, for rentals. Further, we are asked to vote that amount without being furnished with any information worth mentioning. For my part I would like to have a list of all the properties leased, with the amount of the rentals, the ownership of the properties, and so on, before this vote carries and for that reason I object very strongly to this item going through to-night.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—water, $83,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is outside Ottawa?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Victoria, B.C. — astrophysical observatory (Little Saanich mountain) — maintenance, repairs and improvements, $3,000.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Leading up to the observatory at Saanich is a winding road, I should judge about a mile long. At intervals there are wide places where cars can pass, but for the most part the road is very narrow and anyone driving up there in a motor car is in great danger of an accident. It would take only a small amount to widen the road, and it is a work that should certainly be done, because many people who would visit the observatory are deterred by the fear of an accident. With the coming of the stage coaches and tourists from the United States, traffic has become very heavy, and it is absolutely necessary that this road should be widened. I would ask the minister if any work of that kind is contemplated under this item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The details do not show anything for a road. The $3,000 is made up as follows: Painting the exterior of the dome of the building, painting the interior floor, repairs to the engineer's residence, painting and decorating of the director's residence, electric light and water supply, painting exterior posts, gates, and so forth, and contingencies.

Mr. PLUNKETT: The condition of this road endangers public life. There are very bad spots at intervals of from 200 to 400 feet, and as the road winds it is impossible to see an approaching car. Should a driver lose control of his car coming down this mountain road there is certain to be serious loss of life. The people in the vicinity are expecting an accident any day. I would ask the minister to consider this and make the necessary provision in the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—Nova Scotia, $750,200.

Mr. BENNETT: A number of Nova Scotia members did not think this item would be reached this evening and they are not in their seats. Perhaps the minister would take some other province.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would suggest that we take up public buildings at page 30, item 117. This vote deals with the new departmental building in Ottawa, which has been pretty well discussed to-night. I am entirely in the hands of the committee.

Item stands.

Ottawa — new departmental building, $1,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister anything to say about the supreme court building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think anyone feels the necessity of a new supreme court building more than I do. I can hardly agree with all my hon. friend has said about the disgracefulness of the present building.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not use the word "disgracefulness".

Mr. ELLIOTT: I take it back; but his general description pretty well got to that point. It was built originally in 1878,—

Mr. BENNETT: It was built prior to that date and taken over in 1878 for the use of the supreme court.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. It was used as a carpenter shop while the parliament buildings were being erected. The exterior of the building is in fairly good shape. But I am not going to defend it. It is not the proper kind of building for the housing of the supreme court of Canada. I quite agree with that. But I do not believe the supreme court is as badly housed as some of the other services.

Mr. CANTLEY: The post office at New Glasgow, for instance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen will say that there are many places where the services at any rate are not any better housed. I think an expenditure of twelve million dollars on public buildings could be fairly defended; that is, an expenditure in addition to what is already being expended; but the necessary funds are not available at the present time. My hon. friend referred to this as the greatest court in Canada. I would call his attention to another court which is the greatest court in the empire, the privy council. It is housed in a very humble building.

Mr. BENNETT: A fireproof building, though.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. There is no question that when you have a lot of books and other inflammable material a fire would be very disastrous. Every possible precaution is being taken along this line. The question of a new building has been brought up from time to time, and I do not think a month goes by that somebody does not draw it to the attention of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. DUNNING: It has been drawn to my attention oftener than that.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think I can say anything further.

Mr. MANION: What special precautions are being taken against fire in the parliamentary library? It is a very beautiful building and contains a very fine collection of books and manuscripts. A fire would be very difficult to control in that building with its inflammable contents.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is equipped with automatic fire protectors and hose. Every possible precaution is taken to guard against fire. In addition to the equipment a man is on duty there all the time.

Mr. MANION: Twenty-four hours a day?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, day and night. Only the other day I went over the library with some of the officials of my department with regard to the very question that my hon. friend has raised. The old floors are very inflammable.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand that smoking is not allowed there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MacLAREN: Has a sprinkler system been introduced?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think that might be well worth considering. A sprinkler system is the main source of protection in the records office. Still more, I think, would it be of advantage in the library.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am obliged for the suggestion and I shall be very glad to have it looked into.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—parliament building, $90,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister be good enough to explain to us exactly what this means?

Mr. ADSHEAD: This item refers to the parliament buildings that we are in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Has the minister taken into consideration the desirability of improving the acoustic properties of the chamber? Many times we do not know what is going on, especially when exchanges are taking place between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. We do not want to sit here and be dummies, we want to know what is going on. It is rather annoying to any hon. member who has the floor to be told to speak louder, and it is still more annoying to us to have to cry "louder."

Mr. ELLIOTT: If we all had as good voices as some of my hon. friends opposite there would not be as much difficulty about the acoustics of this chamber. And if those members who talk almost continuously when discussion is going on would desist it would obviate a lot of our difficulty. The matter has received a good deal of attention. In 1922 a report was submitted regarding the acoustics of the chamber by Professor F. A. Saunders, of Harvard university, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was Cambridge, England.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before reading his memorandum I might observe, having been in another legislative chamber for some time, that this difficulty occurs periodically in every such chamber in the country. I know of none where complaints of this kind are not made, arising from the fact that the speakers are not arranged as they are in the ordinary auditorium. The arrangement in any of these legislative chambers is particularly difficult, but it has never been considered advisable to adopt the auditorium style. The statements which I shall read to the committee were made by the man who is considered the highest authority on the subject. He submitted his report in 1922 and again on June 26, 1926. He suggested that heavy curtains be hung in front of gallery openings and the openings under the side galleries, and that a heavy carpet be placed on the floor. This was done. Heavy insulating paper was also put under the carpet. The suggestions Professor Saunders made at that time were carried out. Complaints again arose regarding the acoustics, and Professor Saunders further reported after examination that he did not see how the acoustics could be further improved. Writing to the architect, he states:

As I have just returned from a visit to the houses of parliament at your suggestion, to consider the acoustical properties of the Commons chamber especially, I desire to send in a report of my investigation.

Four years ago you asked me to look over these same chambers, and I found at that time that they were not quite satisfactory. The acoustical treatment which had been recommended for them eight years ago by Mr. C. M. Swan, of New York, to Mr. Pearson had not been completely carried out. . . .

My conclusion is that both of these chambers are now entirely satisfactory and I strongly recommend that no further changes be made.

The acoustical requirements of such a chamber are particularly exacting. The room must be large, and the speakers placed in all possible positions with respect to the hearers; yet it is expected that a man speaking often only in a conversational tone will be audible from any point on the floor, or perhaps in the whole chamber.

It is a well known fact that sound produced in a room reaches the ear of a hearer by many paths. The direct line from the speaker is the ceiling, etc, and if these surfaces are hard, and reflect a large proportion of the sound energy falling upon them, the listener hears a much louder sound than otherwise. It is obvious, however, that this loudness is due to sound arriving late. . . . .

He goes on with a scientific dissertation on sound which is not very intelligible to me. Then he continues:

In my opinion this process has been carried out to just the right extent in both chambers. . . .

As a result of the tests, I feel sure that the house chamber is unusual in the clarity with which speech of very moderate volume can be heard and understood in it. When the house is not in session, an ordinary conversational tone is loud enough to be audible if one listens, and if one is not disturbed by extraneous sounds.

I submit that the greatest disturbance in this chamber comes from those who are talking while someone is trying to make himself heard, and no arrangement anyone can make will overcome that difficulty.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Perhaps it might be overcome if those in control would keep better order.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and we are all in control more or less.

Mr. BENNETT: Mostly less.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He continues:

It would hardly be wise, however, to count on so small a volume of sound being satisfactory when the house is in session. Yet, it was obvious when I was there that many of the members do not raise their voices materially above the ordinary conversational level in addressing the house. It may be an effect of the extraordinarily good acoustical qualities of the room that the members may sometimes think a low tone is sufficient, but when the press representatives and the public in the gallery are to hear, it seems to be absolutely necessary that the speakers should use as loud a tone as they would in any other hall, addressing an equal number of persons.

At your suggestion, I have also considered the question of supplying the house chamber with microphones and loud speakers. On the whole, my recommendation is decidedly adverse.

The report is quite lengthy and he refers later on to the curtain arrangements. The curtains of course should be kept as nearly as possible closed in order to facilitate hearing. And they are usually left partly open at any rate. On the whole the best information we can get on the subject from the highest authority rather indicates that for the size of the building the acoustic properties are fairly satisfactory.

Mr. SPENCER: In connection with the forty minute rule the suggestion was made last year, as a means of obviating a member's being cut short in his speech by reason of his being unaware of the time, that some device might be placed on the table whereby the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker could notify the member on his feet, say ten minutes beforehand. What has been done in that respect?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That question was considered and it was decided that while it might be advantageous to install some such system we had not yet reached the time here when it was necessary to resort to a device of that kind. It was felt that it would be better for the member to depend upon the clock in front of him and the clock to his right and to endeavour to follow the time as nearly as he could. In certain cases, of course, the forty minutes do seem to go very quickly and possibly if there were a bell which could be rung shortly before the expiry of his time it might help the member. I doubt it, however; perhaps it would disconcert more than it would help him. Moreover, it was thought that it would not add to the dignity of debate in the chamber to have anyone calling time five minutes before the end of the period.

Mr. SPENCER: Does it make for satisfactory debate to have a large percentage of the members cut short in their speeches?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It depends on the kind of speech that is being made.

Mr. SPENCER: Probably ninety per cent of the ministers have been accidentally cut short.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The minister might try to equalise the time; the time goes so much more quickly when one is speaking than when one is listening.

Mr. MANION: This discussion only shows the difference of opinion that exists, because I have never regretted seeing any of the ministers cut short in their speeches.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa — National Research Council laboratories, $750,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister explain this item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote from last year, and there has not been any great change in conditions since then except that Messrs. Rolph and Sproatt of Toronto have been engaged to prepare plans and work out a scheme not only for the first building but for the research buildings in general.

Mr. BENNETT: On the New Edinburgh site?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but the plans have not been presented yet.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the statistical department; has that been completely removed to the new location?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—addition to central heating plant, $200,000.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask for an explanation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to extend the heating plant in order to provide the additional facilities required for the new Confederation block.

Mr. CANTLEY: May I ask the minister what type of heating plant it is proposed to install?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is just to connect with the present heating plant, and I assume that my hon. friend is familiar with that plant.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, I understand that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposal is to tap in on the present heating plant for the new building. The cost will not be nearly so much in proportion to the additional heating accommodation since we already have this central heating plant in operation. I do not know whether my hon. friend has ever visited the central plant from which these various buildings are heated, but I would recommend that every member of the house do so. The work proposed under this item is an addition 45 by 56 feet and the installation of two 500 horse-power boilers with mechanical stokers. This is estimated to cost $200,000, made up as follows:

Addition to building..	$90,000
Boilers and mechanical equipment.	90,000
Contingencies..	20,000

Perhaps for the benefit of the house I might read the chief architect's report which was received on December 18, 1928, and which I found particularly interesting. The present heating plant consists of four 500 horse-power boilers capable of developing 650 horse-power per boiler without forcing. One of the four boilers is always kept as a spare boiler in case of a breakdown or for use when one of the other boilers is being cleaned. The three available boilers are therefore capable of supplying 1,950 horse-power under normal working conditions. The present working load on these boilers is 1,600 horse-power, so that 350 horse-power are still available for other uses. The new Confederation building, which will be heated from the central heating plant, will require 600 horse-power, with the result that additional boiler capacity will be required.

Then the chief architect goes on to recommend that two 500 horse-power boilers with mechanical stokers be provided. Though only one of these would be of use at present, the other boiler would be required when the next building is erected, and one boiler could be used as a spare in the meantime. It is considered economically advisable to provide two boilers at present, however. If my hon. friend thinks it desirable I should be very glad to read the whole report in order to show the manner in which the present boilers are fed. The coal is dropped from above, and I believe the designers of the present heating system deserve very great credit; I think it is one of the most efficient and economical heating systems to be found anywhere. At present the parliament buildings, the west block, the east block, the Langevin building and the post office are all heated from the one heating plant, and this stoking is done with a comparatively small amount of help.

Mr. BENNETT: Due to the overhead automatic feed, I presume.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and of course that reduces the cost. I have no doubt the day will come when some scheme of that kind, on a much larger scale, will be put into operation to heat practically all the large buildings in this district.

Mr. CANTLEY: The information given by the minister is about what I desired. I thoroughly agree with him in the advantages of a central heating plant; there can be no question of that, and the system we now have was quite up-to-date when it was installed. Now, however, the minister tells us that it is proposed to install two additional boilers of 500 horse-power each with mechanical stokers, and that is where I part company with him. Mechanical stokers firing boilers of that character in my judgment are a thing of the past. I would strongly urge upon him that he put in equipment which will use pulverized fuel. I would point out the great advance which has been made in that direction in the old country within the last two years, and particularly within the last year, during which very large installations of that character have been made with the very best results. I do not need to go into my reasons for advocating this system, but I would urge the minister to take the matter into very serious consideration before committing himself to another installation such as we have to-day, good though it may be. Its day has gone by; a much better and more economical system can be put in, and I think it should be considered.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If an entirely new system were being installed now I think my hon. friend's argument would be very good, but the serious objection to heating with pulverized fuel is that the whole plant we have at present would have to be changed.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not advocating the change of the existing plant; I am advocating the adoption of powdered fuel in the two new units which are to be installed. There is no reason why the two systems should conflict at all; it will not be necessary to disturb one single unit of the existing plant if you equip the new plant to burn powdered fuel.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, much as I value my hon. friend's opinion in the matter, the advice of my engineers hardly corresponds with his suggestion. Then there is the objection with regard to the smoke or soot being greater if pulverized fuel is used.

Mr. CANTLEY: If the minister will pardon my saying so, the smoke or dust will be very much less. To begin with, there will be practically no smoke and I doubt if there will be 5 per cent of the ashes and cinders which must be handled to-day. Those are known, proven and demonstrated facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have a heating plant in the city of Winnipeg which uses pulverized fuel and we do not have any difficulty with regard to smoke.

Mr. CANTLEY: You can get complete combustion, which is not possible with bituminous coal used by any other system.

Mr. SPENCER: Last year the house passed a resolution asking the government to test out pulverized fuel in one of the public buildings at Vancouver. I would like to ask the minister if that was done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think that was done by the Mines department. I know something about the results but not enough to justify my taking up the time of the committee with an explanation.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we have accomplished a very good day's work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 130, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, April 29, 1929.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Second report of the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.—Mr. Duff.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 170, respecting juvenile delinquents.

He said: This bill is a revision and at the same time a consolidation of the old act of 1908, incorporating certain changes which have been suggested by the conference which was held last summer of judges of juvenile delinquent courts and others interested in social work. The amendments relate largely to procedure and are of a nature to make the act work more smoothly.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OTTAWA BEAUTIFICATION—POST OFFICE SQUARE

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Regarding the property bounded on the north by Wellington street, east by post office building, south by Sparks street and west by Elgin street, did the government enter into a contract for the removal of the buildings?

2. If so, what sum was paid or received by the government under such contract?

3. Were the grounds to be levelled by the contractor?

4. What sum has been spent to date on this property exclusive of purchase price?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1, 2 and 3. Yes, with the Betcherman Iron & Metal Company, the contractor to pay the government $8,311 for the buildings. The grounds were to be graded evenly to the contour of sidewalks and lane.

4. $2,026, this sum was for grading preparatory to sodding, and sodding same, putting in a water supply for sprinkling the grass, laying out flower beds and providing proper soil, and for the purchase of plants.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton):

1. Has the railroad been completed to Churchill on Hudson bay?

2. Will the road be available for the transportation of passengers and freight by July 1st of this year?

3. What accommodation is there for visitors at Churchill?

4. What is the total cost of the road to date, and what amount has been expended since 1926?

5. Are there any facilities for shipping at Churchill?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Winter track has been laid to Churchill, but remains to be graded and ballasted and brought into shape for operation at all seasons.

2. No.

3. None.

4. (a) On the railway itself, $25,920,890.44 to March 31, 1929.

(b) Since 1926, $8,872,058.76.

5. Present facilities consist of temporary wharves and lighters.

ALFRED PEAT PLANT

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. Has the Department of the Interior finished its experimental work at the Alfred peat bogs, and, if so, what conclusion has the department arrived at with regard to the feasibility of producing and marketing peat fuel upon a commercial basis?

2. Is the plant which has been assembled at Alfred now completely efficient for the recovery of peat fuel and is it an adequate commercial unit for economical operation? If not, what remains to be done, and what alterations or additions does it require, and what will be the cost of necessary additions?

3. Will the government operate the Alfred peat plant this year?

4. If so, what tonnage of commercial fuel is expected to be recovered from the season's operations?

5. Has the peat bog plant at Alfred been transferred by the department to Peat Fuels Limited? If so, at what date and under what terms and conditions of lease, sale, operation or otherwise?

6. Is it the intention of the government to merchandise and market the production of said plant or will the same be handled as prior to 1927 or by Peat Fuels Limited?

7. Has the government considered the policy of paying a bounty based upon tonnage to be payable to producers who might embark in the industry?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): As the hon. gentleman who asked this question is in his seat, I might point out with respect to a number of these questions that unless we can secure an adjustment the matters will be referred to the exchequer court. I would like to ask my hon. friend to allow the question to be dropped, except that I will indicate to him a certain number of the questions which I can answer. The others cannot be answered without placing the department in an embarrassing position.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, I understand that my hon. friend is going to answer some of the questions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will answer such as I can.

Question stands.

COAL DRAWBACKS

Mr. CANTLEY:

What were the sums refunded by way of 99 per cent rebate of duty on imported coal used by iron and steel makers and/or other industries in each province of Canada during each year since these rebates came into force?

Mr. EULER: There is no record kept of amount of drawback paid, by provinces:

1908	$17,268 71
1909	24,466 98
1910	11,974 71

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TRENT CANAL WATER-POWERS

Mr. PECK:

1. What water-powers, developed or otherwise, on the Trent canal system, are still undisposed of and in the hands of the government?

2. What action, if any, is the government taking to sell or otherwise dispose of these powers?

3. What applications, if any, have been received by the government for the purchase or leasing of these powers respectively?

PEACE RIVER DISTRICT—HOMESTEADS

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. How many homesteads were filed on in the years 1926, 1927, 1928, respectively, in: (a) the Grande Prairie land district; (b) the Peace River land district?

2. What number of these homesteads, filed in 1928 in each land district, were second homesteads?

3. What amount of land has been disposed of in the Grande Prairie land district, and the Peace River land district, respectively, by: (a) homesteads; (b) grazing lease; (c) sale?

4. What townships in each of these two land districts have been surveyed and open for settlement?

5. What is the total acreage of land surveyed and still open for homesteads?

6. What additional land will be surveyed in 1929 in: (a) Grande Prairie land district; (b) Peace River land district?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OUTSTANDING SURVEY ACCOUNTS

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence and documents relating to the following payment in the Auditor General's report, 1927-8, part K-31:

Outstanding survey accounts of previous years, for particulars see Auditor General's report, 1922-23, and correspondence in Auditor General's report, 1908-9, page K-151-155, $22,-743.55.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): A number of these questions have been coming up from time to time with reference to the Auditor General's report. I think it would be well if the question was put more specifically and a statement given, rather than referring to the Auditor General's report. There is no objection to bringing down the papers.

Motion agreed to.

MORRISBURG—PROPOSED PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. CASSELMAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions, and other documents in the possession of the government, in connection with a proposed dock and/or customs house at or near the village of Morrisburg in the county of Grenville-Dundas.

IROQUOIS POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. CASSELMAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents in possession of the government (including civil service advertisements) in connection with the post office at Iroquois, in the county of Grenville-Dundas, from the 1st day of January, 1925, to date.

POST OFFICE AT MORECAMBE, ALBERTA

Mr. SPENCER:

For a copy of all correspondence and documents relating to the opening (during 1929) of a post office at Morecambe, Alberta, and the appointment of a postmaster in relation thereto.

TORONTO TERMINALS RAILWAY COMPANY

On the motion:

Third reading of bill No. 63 respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—Mr. Hocken.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) is ill and will not be present again this session, and as this is merely a matter of form, may I be permitted in his behalf to move the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time, and passed.

ANTOINE JOSEPH BOURDON

On the order:

House in committee on bill No. 85 for the relief of Effie Margaret Hill.—Mr. Clark.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Clark moves that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on private bills.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move an amendment:

That bill No. 113 (Letter G1 of the Senate), intituled: "An act for the relief of Antoine Joseph Bourdon" be not now referred to the committee of the whole, but that it be sent back to the select standing committee on private bills, with instructions that they have power to make further investigations.

Mr. CLARK: The hon. gentleman's amendment relates to a bill that is not before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: We have not reached Bill No. 113 yet.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The amendment is quite regular, but the motion is to go into committee on private bills. If the hon. gentleman will make his motion when Bill No. 113 is under consideration we can deal with it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We cannot deal with it then. It has been the practice of the house for some time to go into committee on a number of bills. I suppose the older practice was that the house should go into committee on each particular bill, but it is now generally accepted that when the Speaker leaves the chair the house shall consider in committee a large number of bills, and there is therefore no further opportunity to deal with any one particular bill. So that the only recourse I have, if I wish that a particular bill shall not be proceeded with, is to move now such an amendment as I have indicated to exempt that bill. I should like to say a few words on this matter when the question of procedure is decided, but I think I am acting in harmony with the rules in moving the amendment.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is quite within the rules in moving the amendment now. However, if he permits us to go into committee on all the bills on the order paper preceding the bill to which he has referred, the house can make progress. Of course, if he wishes to press the amendment now he is in order.

Mr. CLARK: May I speak to the point of order? The hon. member's amendment relates to a bill which is not at all before the house. It has reference to order No. 18 relating to Bill No. 113. The house is now dealing with Bill No. 85. As I heard the motion, it was that the house should go into committee on Bill No. 85.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Standing order 110 provides:

> All private bills reported to the house by any committee may, on one motion, be referred together to a committee of the whole house and such committee may consider and report one or more such bills at the same sitting.

Under that rule the amendment is in order at this stage.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): But the motion has reference only to Bill No. 85. If the motion included all these other bills the amendment would be in order, but that motion has not yet been made.

Mr. MARCIL: As the Speaker has pointed out, under rule 110 all private bills reported to the house by any committee may on one motion be referred together to a committee of the whole house, which committee may consider and report one or more such bills at the same sitting.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But has that motion been made yet?

Mr. MARCIL: The motion is to go into committee on private bills, and the bill to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has taken exception is one of those bills. So that the amendment is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This, Mr. Speaker, was the case to which I referred the other day. The house may remember that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), interpreting, I think the spirit of the house, stated that if the facts were in accordance with the extracts from the letter I read they would oppose this bill in committee. Now the trouble is that this bill went to the committee with a whole grist of others. As I understand it, neither the hon. member for North Simcoe nor the hon. member for Lisgar was present in the committee when this went through; nor did I know it was going through until the next morning after we had had the discussion. I was therefore unable to follow it up before it had passed the committee on private bills. It is for this reason that I take the rather exceptional method, but one quite within the rules, of asking that at this stage we do not press the consideration of this bill but refer it back to our committee for further investigation.

According to the evidence as presented to the senate committee, I notice that this was an uncontested bill. The respondent was not present. The petitioner made certain statements which were corroborated by the statements of two of his friends. The respondent was said to have lived at a rooming house, with one Arthur Hacking, and that, as far as I read the evidence, is the only direct testimony of her being guilty of the offence alleged. Further than that, the petitioner and his two friends state that the woman made admission of having had improper relations with the correspondent. That is about as far as the evidence before the senate committee goes; and I understand it is customary that when the petition is uncontested there is not a great deal of attention given to further inquiry into the case.

Only a day or so ago I received a second letter from the woman involved. I should gladly have avoided giving any publicity to her name in this connection, but since I am making a plea that this divorce bill be refused I think perhaps the only course I can follow is to take the house into my confidence and read this personal letter. Let me preface it by saying that I have no independent knowledge of the facts in the case. It may very well be that the woman is guilty; I have had no opportunities for making investigation. But I do think that when statements and charges are made, such as are contained in this letter, the least that can be done is to provide that the woman has a chance to be heard. If her allegations prove to be false, very well; if however, they should prove on investigation to be true, then I think that we should have done a very gross injustice had we passed a bill of this character without further inquiry. This is the letter:

Mr. Woodsworth,
Member of Parliament,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Received your very kind letter for which I thank you sincerely.

I noticed your reference to my letter in the Montreal Star and I wish also to thank you and Mr. Boys for your decision to vote against the bill.

My lawyer received the report of the senate committee the day before I wrote you and your letter has made it quite clear to me that there is no provision for custody of children and it is not within the powers of the federal parliament to deal with questions of alimony.

My first lawyer did not seem to take much interest in my case and the one I have now tells me that the Quebec law is very unsettled as to alimony and guardianship of children when a divorce has been pronounced, because the civil law of this province does not deal with divorce but only with separation as to bed and board.

In any case as you tell me that the federal law cannot help me as to alimony and as I have no money to go to Ottawa and appear before any committee, I will ask my lawyer to do everything possible, but I think the child is so young that he could very well be given to me by parliament especially now that circumstances cannot be interpreted as being unfavourable to me in my way of living.

My husband is trying to make you believe I was living with this man, if I understand the report correctly, but I was living with his mother as a boarder. The little money I did make I gave to Mrs. Hacking with the exception of money for my carfare to work, to keep the home going.

I sold my diamond to pay her rent and now she is trying to keep my few moveable belongings because she says I owe her money. I haven't even my clothes and have not the money to pay to get them. If it were not for these kind people I am with who are willing to wait until I can pay my board, I should be on the street entirely.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know whether I should rise to a point of order, but I do not think it is proper to read private letters in this house having regard to a matter which is under consideration here. In view of the fact that my hon. friend is in favour of a divorce court, and since his only objection here is that parliament voted against such a court, I would ask him if he thinks anyone would be allowed to send a judge private letters of this kind, and whether he believes such letters should be read in a court of justice in opposition to the evidence which has been produced.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know of no rule of this house which prevents me from reading this private letter. As to the propriety of my action, let me say this: Undoubtedly I believe in a divorce court; that is my only reason for having taken this matter so seriously, but the Minister of Justice was one of those who prevented the establishment of such a court.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My point is that no judge would permit such a letter to be read in court.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the Minister of Justice will agree with me that if in reality we are a court we should have the evidence before us, but that is not the case here. The senate committee did not have this information, and in our own private bills committee there was no consideration whatever of the details of this case. I am not putting forward this letter as evidence in the case; I am bringing it before parliament simply as the appeal of a poor woman for a chance to be heard. I ask that we send this case back to our committee where evidence may be heard, and then we will not need to depend upon this letter; we can summon the woman and other witnesses. Let her charges be carefully sifted. I am simply bringing forward the plea of this woman, and I know of no other way in which I may attain the object desired.

Mr. STEVENS: This case was brought to the attention of the house by my hon. friend the other day before the bill was referred to committee. Why did he not take advantage of that opportunity and bring these matters to the attention of the house?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made an explanation a few minutes ago, but perhaps my hon. friend was not present. This bill was considered by the committee the following morning, when the members of the committee who had spoken in favour of rejecting the bill if the woman's statements were true, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), were not present. I was not present either; I did not imagine it would come up so soon. I immediately called the attention of the hon. member for Simcoe to these facts in a letter which I wrote him, and as a matter of fact this fuller information, contained in this second letter, has come to me since that committee met, so I could not have presented this information before the committee. I wrote this woman immediately on receipt of her first letter; subsequently I received this second letter on which I now make an appeal to parliament. I could not have presented the second letter before the committee; I did not have it at that time. I think that very well illustrates the fact that because of the hasty way in which we grant these divorces we are not dealing fairly with all the people concerned.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Since my hon. friend says he knows of no rule which would prevent him from reading the letter I would quote rule 306, page 101 of Beauchesne:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit there is nothing in that rule which is relevant to the matter under discussion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly the rule applies; my hon. friend says the evidence is not sufficient, and he reads a private letter complaining about the evidence which has been taken with regard to this matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely the Minister of Justice is not arguing the point seriously.

Mr. CLARK: If my hon. friend is finished with that letter may I see it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not finished with it; I was interrupted while I was reading the letter. I will send my hon. friend a copy later. Now I will finish the letter:

If necessary, I can give the name of the doctor who performed my operation, also the hospital in Ottawa. I do not wish to do this unless it will help materially in my case, as the doctor was wonderful to me professionally and I would not care to give him undue publicity.

I heard my brother-in-law admit he had offered to get Mr. Hacking a good job if he would take me to a hotel and put me in a compromising position in order to get evidence enough for the divorce.

Also he has boasted to me that his brother would never have gone so far as to divorce me if it were not that he had made his brother do it.

He says he worked night and day trying to get evidence. I was grateful for what Arthur Hacking had done in refusing to help their plans so when he requested me to live with him and his mother I readily consented. I thought the money might as well help her as anyone else. I did not realize then that I was playing into their hands.

As I was not in Ottawa to defend myself, naturally they had the opportunity to put things in the very worst light possible.

My brother-in-law and his mother kidnapped the baby. He held me while his mother ran out with my baby.

After he was returned to me, my brother-in-law never let my husband rest until he made him leave me again.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. Bourdon refused to listen to me and he and his brother took the child away again.

I told him he could look after the baby better than I could but when I said that I thought he would come back to me.

During our trouble I thought Valmyre would be better away from it all. I did not realize things were as serious as they were. Please believe me when I say if I lose them both, I lose everything worth living for.

I have been very foolish and have done things which seem to be worse than they really are. Since this trouble started I hardly know what I am doing or saying. Arthur Hacking is very revengeful as he has sworn to do everything he can to make me lose my husband and child. He has told Mr. Bourdon some terrible things and he believed because he wants to believe.

I know if he did not get the divorce he would come back to me and I could make him forget all these terrible nine months. Will you not do all you can to give him back to me? Will you not give me the chance to make him forget and be happy once more with our little one? Our child needs most of all his mother, but he loves his daddy and needs him too. I am begging for life itself, will you give it to me?

Perhaps all this seems foolish when read with impersonal eyes but only God knows how my heart is torn for my two loved ones.

Are all my prayers and suffering these nine months to go un-answered and unheard? If it is not possible to do much for me, even a little will be appreciated more than you will ever know. As I said before, you are my last hope.

Please don't let them take my precious baby from me.

Again I thank you sincerely for your kind letter and efforts in my behalf, and shall wait for a favourable answer.

Sincerely,

(Sgd.) Mrs. Antoine Bourdon.

I think that letter makes it own appeal. This woman did not appear before the committee. I understand that if she had made application to the senate committee they would have given an order on her husband compelling him to pay sufficient money to permit her to appear and give her side of the case. Apparently she did not know anything about that; apparently the lawyer whom she consulted was very indifferent and did not inform her of her position. In any case, the matter came before the senate committee and she was not present; all the evidence was received from one side, from the petitioner and two of his personal friends. Under our procedure this matter has gone through the various stages until now it has passed our own committee, where it received no consideration of any kind. This is the last opportunity to do anything in the matter, hence the rather unusual procedure I have been forced to adopt. I cannot think that any member of this house will deliberately deny this woman the chance to be heard, and that is all I ask. She may be an imposter; she may be guilty; it may be that her statements are quite untrue. It may be that her charges with regard to the illegal operation are not well founded; I do not know nor am I in position to know, and I do not think anyone can know until she is called before our committee to prove her charges. I do not know whether our committee has ever investigated a case in this manner before, but I am quite sure it has the right to advance money to the women for her expenses. If the senate committee could have ordered the husband to advance money to bring his wife here to appear in her own behalf I do not know why our committee cannot do the same. In this case I am not holding up the business of the house because of the general procedure at all, but because I consider it a serious matter and one in which the rights of a citizen of this country are not being safeguarded, and I appeal to the house to permit an investigation by our own committee before we take a vote on this bill.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to express the hope that the house will permit this bill to be sent back for reconsideration by the private bills committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) brought this case to the attention of the house the other day, and I determined to do the best I could to have this matter investigated by the committee. However, for some reason or other, I did not receive my notification for the meeting of the committee. I do not suggest for a moment there was anything deliberate in that, I am sure it was purely an accident, but the fact remains that I did not receive that notice and hence I was not at the committee and had not the opportunity to direct the attention of the committee to this particular case. The hon. member is only asking that this woman be heard before our committee and that we ourselves judge her claim; I think that is a fair request. It has been said, and I believe it is true, that the expenses of this woman can be paid in order to permit her to give evidence in her own behalf.

Mr. DUFF: She had an opportunity to appear before the senate committee.

Mr. IRVINE: So far as I know this woman had no opportunity to appear before any committee, and I do not think she was aware of the fact that she could appear and have her expenses paid. Having no money herself she evidently did not know that she could make application for her expenses.

Mr. DUFF: She must have been notified.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not know anything about notification. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, the only thing to do is to bring the woman before the committee and investigate the case.

Mr. CLARK: If there is any doubt in the mind of any hon. member as to the facts not having been proven, or that there are any additional facts which should be brought out, I certainly have no objection to it going back to the committee.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Motion as amended agreed to.

The house in committee on Bill No. 85, for the relief of Effie Margaret Hill—Mr. Clark.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Right to marry again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. CLARK: No.

Section agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

ELSIE ALICE HERVEY

The house in committee on Bill No. 93, for the relief of Elsie Alice Hervey—Mr. Clark.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. CLARK: One child.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the sponsor of this bill know what provision is being made for the child?

Mr. CLARK: The child is with the petitioner.

Section 1 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

HUNTER WILBERT FAULKNER

The house in committee on Bill No. 97, for the relief of Hunter Wilbert Faulkner—Mr. Clark.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On the preamble.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children in this case?

Mr. CLARK: No children.

Preamble carried on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

FLORENCE VELMA STRACHAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 123, for the relief of Florence Velma Strachan—Mr. Garland (Carleton).—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to move an amendment to this bill, notice of which was given some days ago, as follows:

That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the following words thereto:
"and the said Florence Velma Strachan have the custody of their child William Swinton Strachan, and that the said Alexander Swinton Strachan shall pay annually to Florence Velma Strachan for her support and maintenance the sum of five hundred dollars, so long as she remains unmarried, and the sum of two hundred dollars annually for the support and education of their child William Swinton Strachan."

The CHAIRMAN: As this amendment raises a question of constitutional law questions, I must ask the hon. gentleman to let it stand until the matter is given proper study. It is a question which might be held to interfere with civil rights of those residing in the different provinces, and I would like some time to consider the question before giving a ruling as to whether or not the amendment is in order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out that this notice was given several days ago, and is quite regular. The proposal is advanced in this particular bill simply in order that this may be a test case. We took the first bill that seemed to be suitable, and if this amendment is in order and if legislation of this kind is within the competence of parliament, we propose to move similar amendments in connection with other bills. It does not seem fair that you, Mr. Chairman, should ask that this stand and that we should proceed to other bills where we would then have no opportunity whatever of making similar amendments. As the Chairman knows, we have to give notice before amendments can be made. We thought this would be a test case. Now you say that you reserve your decision whether or not the amendment is in order, and yet you wish us to go on with other bills. I do not think that is quite fair to those of us who are anxious to expedite business but who nevertheless desire to insist that it be given due consideration. If this amendment that we provide for the support of the children and alimony for the wife, is in order, then it ought to be placed in every bill of this character right down the list. If you, Mr. Chairman, let this case stand and then go on with the other bills, we would be quite in order to ask that other bills of this character should also stand until this principle is decided.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the wife asked for that provision for alimony?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. members are doing this out of the kindness of their hearts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As is known, alimony was granted and the support of the children provided for only in the first cases brought before the Canadian House of Commons. It has not been the custom to ask for this, and in the ordinary petitions it is not included. The women in such cases do not know they have the privilege of asking for it, and the lawyers do not so inform them. Indeed, the lawyers do not know; no one knows, as a matter of fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But if we granted this, we would be granting more than the petition asked for.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but why not? If there is a case of substantial injustice: if a woman has married in good faith and if for some reason her husband proves to be a worthless fellow or unfaithful to her, and after some years deserts her, she is thrown upon the world with no opportunity whatever of providing a living for herself. Marriage has at least some elements of a civil contract, and a wife under those circumstances ought to have some claim upon her husband. It is within the competence of this house to grant or not to grant this divorce; it is also within the power of the house to say under what conditions that divorce shall be granted. That can be done whether or not we go beyond the original terms of the petition.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I should like to be quite clear upon what authority my hon. friend suggests that the house is empowered to make any such order as is now sought. I cannot get the authority for it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not a lawyer. My hon. friend is a lawyer and probably he knows more about the legal side of the matter than I do. I must confess that I am relying largely on the general principles of justice. But I would point out that divorces are not being granted under statutory provisions; that there is no law under which we are acting in this matter; that it is the common law of Great Britain, and that we are simply following precedent. I am subject to correction, but I understand that it is competent for parliament to grant divorce for any reason whatsoever. It has been customary to grant divorce only on the ground of unfaithfulness or impotence. I think those are the only two grounds that have been recognized by the house, but I do not see any reason why we should not go beyond them. In other words, there is no statutory limitation, therefore I suggest it is open to us to say under what terms the divorce shall be granted. I submit that it is quite within our power to refuse divorce until such time as suitable provision is made for the children and the wife.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): How are we to know that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are discovering that we have no knowledge with regard to these matters. The evidence given before the senate committee does not reveal to us whether the wife has an independence or not; it does not reveal to us who is to take care of the children or whether the mother to whom the children are left is capable of caring for them. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that we in this house have a perfect right at least to make inquiries concerning the circumstances of the wife and children before proceeding to grant a divorce.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown not provide for alimony and for the custody of the children?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is quite a different thing from what my hon. friend is arguing for. The amendment interferes with property and civil rights, but the hon. member is not arguing on that ground at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon. member had followed me closely, I said that I thought we were within our rights; at least that we were following the precedent of the first case dealt with in the House of Commons if we provided for alimony and for the support of the children. That was done in the Campbell case, and that case has never been contested in the courts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not denying that, but I think my hon. friend would be on stronger ground if he would confine his argument to his proposal, namely, that the house do not act until assured alimony will be granted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, we may proceed in that way later on. In the meantime I suggest that since the action in the Campbell case has never been contested in the courts, we are on fairly safe ground in following that precedent. I was further answering the hon. member for West Hamilton when I said that there lay, even beyond that, the right of insisting that a divorce should not be granted until such time as adequate provision could be made for the wife and the children involved.

Mr. MARCIL: It must not be forgotten that divorce bills are sent to the house by people wishing to be exempted from the general law. The general law in Ontario and Quebec is the indissolubility of the marriage tie. These people come here and ask for a favour; they ask for special reasons, to be relieved from the operation of the general act. We deal with each particular case, but according to Bourinot it has been held in the past:

> In case, however, the house is not satisfied with the evidence on which the senate has passed the bill, it is always competent for the committee on private bills to go into such further examination of the facts as may be deemed desirable in the interests of justice and society.

I am opposed to divorce on principle, but in this case the hon. gentleman has certainly the right to ask that these bills be dealt with according to the principle of justice. If there are children born of any marriage, and if the applicant wants to be relieved from the obligations which he contracts when he becomes married, some way should be provided by which he may not be permitted to throw his wife and children out on the street without making provision for them. That is a matter of elementary justice.

This question of divorce is essentially a matter that affects civil rights, just as marriage does, and both marriage and property come within the purview of the province. The fathers of confederation, not desiring to implant divorce on Ontario and Quebec as it existed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but not knowing what to do with the child found on the doorstep, said: We will relegate this matter to the central authority to make it more and more difficult for divorce to take place in this country. The results showed that they were wise in their generation, for during the first ten years after confederation only seven divorces were granted by this parliament, and up until 1879, special committees were appointed by the House of Commons to deal with each case. But what do we see to-day? There have been 293 applications for divorce during this present session, and there are 80 divorce bills on this order paper for to-day. I think the time has come, therefore, when it is the duty of the House of Commons to look into this matter more closely with a view to discouraging people from applying to parliament for divorce, and to discourage the belief that all that it is necessary to do to secure a divorce is merely to send in an application and the divorce will be granted without any answer from the respondent. I hope that some means will be found next session to remedy this great evil. I do not want to delay the house on this bill to discuss the principle of divorce, but I may say that I was pleased to see in Saturday's Journal a pronouncement by the Church of England in Canada on this very question. It declares that divorce is the outstanding question for the Canadian people to deal with to-day. It reiterates the stand which that church has previously taken and calls on all its clergymen to bring this very important question to the attention of their people, and not to re-marry people who have been divorced either by the courts or by parliament. I was glad, I say, to see this pronouncement by the Church of England in Canada, because it shows that public opinion in this country is being awakened with respect to this matter.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I do not know the facts in this particular case, but apparently this woman believes that she is obtaining through parliament the redress to which she is entitled. We do not know at this time whether or not she desires an order for alimony against her husband, or whether she has the custody of the children, if there are any. But under this bill she is obtaining the redress that she has asked for, and while I am quite agreeable to the bill going back to the private bills committee for reconsideration, I do not think we have power to pass such an amendment as has been proposed. I do not believe it is within the competence of this house to make an order granting alimony to a person who has not asked for it, if indeed it is possible for us to grant alimony at all. It would appear to me to come under the heading of civil rights, and would therefore be under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature. I think it would be better if the amendment were drafted in such a way that the bill be referred back to the private bills committee to reconsider the case; otherwise this woman may be deprived entirely of the divorce which she desires, and possibly rightly desires. If we have to act upon this particular amendment, it may mean that instead of the petitioner being granted what she has asked for, she may be denied any remedy whatever. I would therefore suggest that the amendment be altered so that the effect will simply be to refer the bill back to the private bills committee.

Mr. SPENCER: May I inquire of the sponsor of this bill who has the custody of the children, whether it is the father, the mother, or anyone else?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The petitioner who is applying for this divorce has the custody of the child and seems to be quite satisfied to look after her own child. I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Bothwell) that the question of alimony is one for the civil courts; under chapter 184 of the revised statutes of Ontario, being the Deserted Wives' and Children's Maintenance Act, subsections 1 and 2, page 1904, redress to the petitioner may be given. I believe the motion of the hon. member for Rosetown is out of order. This bill was sent back before on the very same ground that it is now proposed to send it back. As far as I am concerned, I want to see everything done that can possibly be done for the child, but the petitioner seems satisfied to look after her own child, and she has as much right to look after her own child as the father.

Mr. EVANS: The amendment was moved in good faith, in the belief that we had the power to deal with this matter. I still believe that if parliament has the power to grant divorces, which is a most serious matter as between two married persons, it should have the power to say on what terms that separation shall be granted. The sponsor of the bill has told us that the woman has the custody of the child, but evidently he does not know whether she has the necessary means for its support. We know nothing about this case. Surely we have the right to amend these bills as they come before us. If we have not, then I say that the granting of divorce by parliament is simply a farce, and we have carried it on much too long. But as the suggestion has been made that the bill be referred back to the private bills committee, I have no objection, although I do not see that there is any need for it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The object, as I understand it, is to provide a test case to ascertain if we really have the power to grant alimony. If the amendment carries and we are later advised by the law officers that we have not the power, then the question will be settled so far as parliament is concerned. When I was speaking on this very question some time ago, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) took directly the opposite view to that which has been expressed here to-day, he said that parliament has power to deal with this matter, that parliament has actually granted alimony. I think it would be well to bring up a test case to see whether or not that power is intra vires of this parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to submit to my hon. friends that that is not the proper way to bring a matter of importance of this character to a legal test, simply to move an amendment to a bill in the House of Commons. In the first place, the absurdity—I was going to say—of the position we now find ourselves in is this, that the party has already the custody of the child which we are now solemnly asking parliament to give. I submit that that is really not the right way to proceed. The whole thing arises out of a difference of opinion among the members of this house, in the first place, on the principle of divorce, and secondly, as to the procedure under which divorce has been granted by parliament for a number of years. I have listened here for weeks now to very lengthy addresses by hon. members, particularly by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, my hon. friend from Labelle, and others, in which it seemed to be implied that those of us who have been more or less silent are entirely in favour of divorce being granted in a most reckless manner. I wish to say, and I feel impelled to say this by the continuity of these debates, that as far as I am concerned I am absolutely opposed to divorce. That is my personal feeling, but I do not come to parliament merely to give expression to my personal views on matters of this kind. I realize that it is accepted throughout the Dominion that divorce may be granted. The practice in two or three provinces has been to grant them through a petition to this parliament and an act being passeed; in other provinces, divorce is granted by the courts. It does not seem to me that we are discharging our duty properly, simply because we have personal prejudices in this matter, to seek to interfere with the redress that other people claim is their right as citizens. I admit to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre that it may appear to some that the manner in which divorce has been granted by parliament has been, we will say, somewhat rapid, but I do feel that he has been a little unfair, in fact I think very unfair, to the senate committee, because my experience in the last twenty sessions is that the senate committee, of all the committees of parliament of either house, has given its time to the consideration of its duties, and given it ungrudgingly, and I think to most, if not all, of the members the work has been most distasteful. Therefore I think it is rather unfair to them to be constantly insinuating, or at least leaving the impression in the minds of the public, that that committee is a callous body without any particular consideration for the rights of women and children, and that it deals with the petitions carelessly and recklessly. For instance, my hon. friend moved a certain bill back to committee a few moments ago. I sent out for the evidence and I have been reading it, and I must say that I can see very little reason to question the decision of the senate committee. However, we are quite willing, if a member brings forward the question of the safeguarding of the rights of one of the parties to the suit, to give further opportunity for dealing with it.

But coming to the matter immediately before us, I do not think that this parliament, without much consideration, should immediately adopt a system of granting alimony and the custody of children, when these matters are not cited in the petition, and when it has not been the practice of parliament to deal with them, and when we know that in the provinces there is a very elaborate procedure set up whereby deserted wives and mothers may obtain redress, and children be cared for. I do not think that as a matter of theory or to further some idea of abstract justice we should plunge into these matters and give a decision without consideration.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not think my hon. friend is correct. This is only a test case and the hon. leader of the opposition said parliament has the right to grant alimony.

Mr. STEVENS: I think in this case it is abstract justice. I believe I quote my hon. leader's opinion corectly when I say he holds that parliament, having the right to grant divorce, has also a perfect right to deal with all matters that arise out of the granting of divorce—the Minister of Justice might agree that that is a sound principle of law—and perhaps had done so in the past. But we are not calling that in question. For years and years a certain practice has been followed, and the Prime Minister declared the other day—I think a little tardily, his declaration should have been made last session; however, he did so, and with a degree of graciousness that my hon. friend ought to recognize—he declared that the government would take this very difficult problem into consideration and endeavour to find some solution.

Now my hon. friend is asking me to vote on an amendment which frankly we are not in a position to discuss. The proper place to have raised the question would have been before the senate committee when the case was first considered. It was not raised there, it does not appear in the petition, and it occurs to me that my hon. friends would do well to let this testing of a principle, as they describe it, be considered and determined in connection with the whole question which we understand the government is now going to take into consideration. I think it rather too bad that my hon. friends have felt that the course taken by them was necessary. I agree it is a pity that the government did not last year take notice of the accumulation of these cases, and endeavour to lead parliament into some solution of the difficulty of the administration of this branch of law. I am not saying that by way of censure of the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only solution that was proposed was rejected by the house.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with my hon. friend; but it has been shown by the discussion in the house that the problem is still here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister has told us very frankly that he recognizes that the problem exists, and he is going to find some way of adjusting the difficulty. I do not think my hon. friend should ask the house to deal with what I again say is an abstract principle of justice. It is not involved in this bill, the petitioner does not ask for it; therefore it is merely a question of whether we should carry on the practice in this way or not. The whole subject is to be considered by the government, and personally I do not think we should be asked to give an opinion on it at the present time.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre said that at the present time the mother has charge of the child. The amendment asks that the mother shall have charge of the child legally. To-day there is nothing to prevent the husband from taking the child away.

Mr. STEVENS: How does my hon. friend know that?

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre earlier this afternoon pointed out a case where a child was forcibly taken away from the mother. Therefore I think there is some reason in the amendment.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As I pointed out to my hon. friend a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, if it were a mere matter of objecting to the passage of this particular bill on the grounds that alimony and the custody of the child or children had not been decided, one could understand the motion, but to make a motion for these specific purposes—something which we have never been asked to express an opinion on, during the period that I have been in this house, at all events—in my humble opinion is an attempt to do that which is outside our jurisdiction. Moreover, the courts are available for the dealing with the question of the custody of the children or child. If one of the parents is deemed to be immoral, the court in every case that I have heard of, has made the other parent the custodian. The same procedure applies to alimony. This woman is not necessarily debarred from the courts of her own province if she desires to secure alimony. I do not think parliament is in possession of all the facts to deal with these matters.

Mr. CLARK: It appears to me that when these petitioners come before parliament seeking divorce they come well advised. I notice they are represented by very eminent counsel, some great constitutional authorities, strange as it may seem, representing certain of the petitioners. It stands to reason that they have given due consideration to the rights of the petitioners and they have asked for all that they believe parliament can grant. If the mover of this amendment wishes to have the powers enlarged we cannot enlarge them by voting on the present proposal. It seems to me that parliament should have a definition of the legal rights of petitioners for divorce; and that definition—as to the right for instance of parliament to grant alimony or to decide with respect to the custody of the children—should come from the legal department and not be inferred from a vote in this house. I think the hon. member who moved the amendment will agree that parliament is not a body competent to give a legal opinion. Parliament relies on the Department of Justice for its legal opinions, and in this instance, in my opinion at least, if there is anything to be explained the explanation should come from that department. The explanation should not be gathered from the result of a vote in this committee.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am opposed to divorce on principle, but as regards a definition with respect to the granting of alimony and the decision as to the custody of children I do not see any reason why this parliament, if it has the right to grant divorces, should not have the right also to consider these other questions. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who probably is better posted on the subject than I am—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: —made the statement that alimony was a civil right and that a woman getting a divorce could go to the civil courts if she wished to obtain alimony. But I would point out that if we dissolve a marriage here no right can exist in the matter of alimony for the simple reason that, after the dissolution by this parliament, there is no state of marriage in relation to the parties concerned; therefore there can be no civil right as regards alimony so far as the courts are concerned. After we have dissolved a marriage here how can the woman go to a civil court to get alimony?—there is no marriage. The only condition under which alimony can be granted is when the divorce is granted by the civil courts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought it was suggested that the Minister of Justice would speak.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, he remains as silent as he can.

Mr. KELLNER: After the divorce is granted here has the woman the privilege to go to the civil court in order to establish her claim in regard to alimony? The hon. member (Mr. Beaubien) has brought out this point and it seems to me the Minister of Justice should favour us with an expression of opinion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to have the question stand as a notice. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, with the conditions in which I am more familiar, I know that alimony can be obtained in the courts. Of course, there is no divorce there. The chairman, I think, has indicated a wish to reserve decision on the motion which has been made, and we have been discussing this matter an hour since he so intimated. Would it not be well to leave it at that pending his decision, after he has received advice from the proper source?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the subsequent bills?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend intend to make a similar motion in regard to every bill—not only to grant divorce to those who seek it but also to give them money for which they do not ask?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If this is intra vires and we are in harmony with the rules of procedure, I think it would be only right that inquiry should be made in each case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To grant them alimony even if they do not ask for it? The hon. gentleman is over generous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said that inquiry should be made in each case; I was explicit on that point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But if they do not ask for it why make an investigation? Why investigate whether they want it or not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Because in the past we have not been fair to the women in these provinces. The women of Ontario and Quebec have not had the opportunity of bringing their rights before any court where those rights can be properly investigated, and at the present moment we are simply pleading that in some way provision shall be made that women seeking divorces will not be thrown on the street and their children left to shift for themselves. If this bill is to stand until the Chairman reaches a decision, I do not wish to see other bills prevented from going through. But I wish to add some further considerations.

It has been said that it is open to the woman who is granted a divorce to enter action afterwards in the civil courts. I understand however that the trouble is that it is very difficult to get the civil courts to give a decision in such matters. I believe it is the general principle that the same court that grants a divorce ought to arrange the provisions under which that divorce is granted; and certainly there should not be the added expense, imposed upon poor people when they come to this parliament and obtain a divorce, of having to go on later to the civil courts to obtain the custody of children or to secure arrangements for their maintenance. I think it is quite proper that the rights of parliament should be defined, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) has suggested. But how is that to be arranged? This matter has been brought up again and again, and always we are met with the answer given by the Minister of Justice—"we will take it into consideration."

Mr. LAPOINTE: I thought my hon. friend was pleased the other day when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that the government be given an opportunity until next session to look into the matter. The hon. gentleman declared himself satisfied. But now he starts the whole discussion over again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister the other day stated that during the present session the house had decided against a divorce court for Ontario and that for that reason the question could not again be considered at this time. It was on that ground that some of us accepted his assurances. I have no doubt whatever that the Prime Minister spoke in good faith, believing that to be the situation. But after consulting the authorities I find that there is no reason why the matter may not be introduced at this session. It would be well, therefore, that the house should be clear on the situation. We are willing to let the matter stand if nothing else can be done. But if the question can be decided at this session it should be decided and not postponed, and thus an unsatisfactory procedure maintained in all these cases to be dealt with this year, and with the certainty of the difficulty arising again next year. Let me read from May 13 edition, page 299:

> When bills have ultimately passed or have been rejected, the rules of both houses are positive that they shall not be introduced again: but the practice is not strictly in accordance with them. The principle was thus stated by the Lords, 17th May, 1606—
> "That when a bill hath been brought into the house, and rejected, another bill of the same argument and matter may not be renewed and begun again in the same house in the same session where the former bill was begun. . ."

That is the senate, in this instance.

> "...but if a bill begun in one of the houses, and there allowed and passed, be disliked and refused in the other, a new bill of the same matter may be drawn and begun again in that house whereunto it was sent; and if, a bill being begun in either of the houses, and committed, it be thought by the committees that the matter may better proceed by a new bill, it is likewise holden agreeable to order in such case, to draw a new bill, and to bring it into the house."

Then follows a great number of instances covering a considerable period of time and coming down very nearly to the present. That simply means that under the procedure of our parliament, the senate having brought in this bill and it having been rejected by the House of Commons before a good many of the members knew just what was involved in its rejection, it is still open to us to reconsider our position. Further, now that members of the cabinet have stated very definitely that the present procedure is a farce; now that to-day we have another member of the cabinet saying that we in this house could not possibly know the conditions affecting the cases under consideration; now that the Prime Minister has declared the present procedure unsatisfactory and has stated his willingness to bring in some remedial legislation, it seems to me high time that we should insist on some action being taken at the earliest opportunity.

Let me tell the Minister of Justice that I was satisfied with the advance we made the other day, as I then considered it impossible for us to do anything further this session, but since my attention has been called to the fact that under the rules of this parliament it is quite possible for the government to introduce suitable legislation at this session, I am not quite so well satisfied.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What legislation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no reason why legislation could not be introduced similar to the bill which was rejected, providing for the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely my hon. friend knows that the bill to which he refers has been rejected by the house, and that is the end of that bill for this session. Even if his interpretation of the rule were correct would he think it fair to impose his views on the majority of the members of this parliament? Majority must rule, even when that majority does not include my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; the Minister of Justice need not become sarcastic in discussing the matter. I stated that according to the rules of this house it is quite within our competence to introduce that very bill again, and I think the temper of the house is such that another vote on the question might be very different from the vote we took some time ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is flattering himself; he has not succeeded in convincing the house to that extent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I was going to suggest that there might be other methods available. For instance, it has been suggested that it might be possible to refer the responsibility for granting divorces to the exchequer court. I know some members of the senate have been considering the advisability of empowering the exchequer court, which is a court of parliament, to undertake the investigation of or perhaps actually to recommend or grant divorces. If I understand the situation correctly, we have it within our power to charge a court to do what we want done. I think it is quite within the powers of this parliament to take that action.

Personally I do not think that would be nearly so satisfactory as the creation of a divorce court for Ontario, but I would say that by so doing we would meet many of the objections which have been raised to the establishment of such a court. In the first place it is clearly within our powers to take such action, and in the second place we would not have to wait until Ontario has expressed an opinion with regard to the matter, as some members have suggested should be done. That is one possible line of action that the government might take even during this session. With these suggestions, I do not think we have yet exhausted the possibilities of action to relieve the situation; therefore I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice and the government to the possibility of proceeding along these lines before this parliament prorogues.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am so much in sympathy with the general principle which my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre has been advocating for some time with regard to the proper forum in which petitions for divorce should be considered that it is with considerable regret that I am compelled to differ from him now. However, in connection with the matter now under consideration I desire to direct the attention of the house to this fact: Almost from time immemorial questions affecting certain domestic relations, questions of alimony, of the custody of children and so on, have engaged the attention of the leading courts in the British Empire, and it has been well recognized that only by those who have engaged in a lifetime of study and investigation of the law and of special cases has it been possible to reach decisions which are worthy of that law which we desire to see upheld. Under these circumstances the suggestion made by my hon. friend is tantamount to saying that parliament would hand over to a body of men, no matter how able, no matter how willing, men without training with no knowledge of legal precedents, with no ability to recognize the effects of the steps which might be taken with regard to the numerous cases which would come before them for consideration, with no appreciation of such a vitally important thing as the value of evidence, the duty and privilege of deciding questions which have come within the competence of courts and which they have been able to decide, as I say, only after lifetimes of endeavour and with due consideration of the best legal precedents obtainable. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any member of this house whose duty takes him constantly into the courts would undertake to say that any parliamentary committee, I care not from what body it may be chosen, would be as well qualified to deal with matters of that kind or, in fact, to render proper decisions upon them; I know I could not conscientiously take that position. So, without regard at the moment for the general principle which has been under discussion, I am compelled to say that for my part at least I must oppose a measure of this kind, which could only have the effect of submitting to men who, whatever their other qualifications may be, are absolutely unfitted to deal with them, matters involving decisions on questions of the very gravest consequence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: To which proposal does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I was not in the house when the amendment was submitted, but as I understand it, the effect and purport of the proposed motion was to give parliament the power to consider such matters as the granting of alimony and the custody of children.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Then I should be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not quite understand the point raised by my hon. friend. I do not want to repeat what I said, but briefly it was that according to May, from which I quoted, parliament has the power to reintroduce this whole question this session, and that it seemed to me that at this session the government might bring forward some sort of legislation which would help us out of our present situation. Parliament might create a divorce court, which I thought would be best, or it might, temporarily at least, refer the whole matter to the exchequer court.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think the hon. member for West Hamilton was referring to the amendment to this motion, which, as I understood it, certainly dealt with the question of alimony and the custody of children.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I rightly understand the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) it was just as the hon. member opposite has said.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me when the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown you doubted whether or not he was in order in moving it. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated that he did not want to tie up subsequent bills but intended to make a test case of this one bill. Suppose that when we refer this bill back to the committee we decide that we can give alimony in this case, what about the subsequent bills in connection with which petitioners be denied that right when they find that they have no rights in the courts of their own provinces? We doubt whether after a divorce has been granted they can go back to the provincial courts and obtain alimony, and we seem to be in doubt as to whether or not the hon. member for Rosetown was in order in moving his amendment. I think the house is tied up on the whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment as presented by the hon. member for Rosetown reads:

> That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the following words thereto:
> "and the said Florence Velma Strachan, have the custody of their child William Swinton Strachan, and that the said Alexander Swinton Strachan shall pay annually to Florence Velma Strachan for her support and maintenance the sum of five hundred dollars, so long as she remains unmarried, and the sum of two hundred dollars annually for the support and education of their child William Swinton Strachan.

When this amendment was moved I suggested to the committee that it was a matter of too grave a responsibility to be decided in a hurry, and I asked for some time to consider it. Since that time there has been considerable debate and I have had the benefit of listening to the opinions of many hon. gentlemen on both sides and also the opportunity of referring to some authorities. Section 92 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> 92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 13. Property and civil rights in the province.

To my mind the matter of alimony is one of civil rights, and for that reason I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I point out that you are not ruling merely on the question whether or not the amendment is in order, but you are ruling also that parliament has no right to grant alimony. That is the very thing we want to get decided.

The CHAIRMAN: That is my ruling.

Mr. EVANS: Like the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) I am opposed to the principle of divorce, but it seems to be necessary, and as long as it is necessary I would like to see this parliament conduct the procedure in a reasonable way. I have sat for eight years in this house and this is the first time I have seen any serious thought given to this great question of divorce. The debate has been worth while if we can attract the attention of the country and parliament to the necessity of having these bills dealt with in a serious way. Since this amendment may not be in order, and I am still in doubt, why not postpone consideration of this bill and all subsequent bills of the same character? It has been pointed out that the government can bring down legislation during this session to put this matter of divorce upon a reasonable basis and have it carried out by means of a reasonable procedure. The government can do that at once, can deal with the whole thing now, and we could deal later with this bill and subsequent divorce bills.

Mr. KELLNER: What is before the house?

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering Bill No. 123. All the sections of the bill were carried, and the question is: Shall I report the bill?

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

DOROTHY MADELINE HANSON CAMPBELL

The house in committee on Bill No. 149, for the relief of Dorothy Madeline Hanson Campbell—Mr. Clark—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. CLARK: Yes, one, who is with the petitioner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have you any knowledge as to how the child is being provided for?

Mr. CLARK: I am satisfied that it will be looked after. The father of the petitioner is well able to look after the child and is at present doing so.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

LERA ETHEL VALLANCE

The house in committee on Bill No. 87, for the relief of Lera Ethel Vallance—Mr. Casselman—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved?

Mr. CASSELMAN: There were two children but they have since been placed in the possession of foster parents under the Ontario Adoption Act. As they have been placed under the provisions of that act, the foster parents are responsible for their maintenance.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

MABEL LORENE DECLUTE

The house in committee on Bill No. 100, for the relief of Mabel Lorene DeClute—Mr. Casselman—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. CASSELMAN: No.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

EMILY MUNNINGS

The house in committee on Bill No. 102, for the relief of Emily Munnings—Mr. Hubbs—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children?

Mr. HUBBS: This gentleman went to England in 1916 after having lived with Mrs. Munnings for only three weeks. He went to England during the war, came back in 1918, went overseas again in 1920, and was there married. There are no children by the first marriage, and Mrs. Munnings did not live with him more than three weeks.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

MINA THOMPSON

The house in committee on Bill No. 146, for the relief of Mina Thompson—Mr. Thompson—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children ?

Mr. THOMPSON: There are three children, the oldest being twenty, the second nineteen, and the third seventeen. I understand they are supporting the mother now.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

LOUISA MARTHA WESTON

The house in committee on Bill No. 155, for the relief of Louisa Martha Weston—Mr. Casselman—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children in this case?

Mr. CASSELMAN: I have not been able to find out in this case whether there are children or not, I sent for a copy of the bill, but I could not get one from the distribution office.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I think we might ask that the bill stand until we find out whether there are any children involved.

Bill stands.

FRANCES GWENDOLYN SNOW LOTT

The house in committee on Bill No. 91, for the relief of Frances Gwendolyn Snow Lott—Mr. Garland (Carleton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any children?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): No children.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 98, for the relief of Marion Ruth Laidman—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

EDYTH MAY SHIELDS

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the second reading of Bill No. 94, for the relief of Edyth May Shields.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): One male child who has now attained his majority.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, on division.

MARY MELVINA GUERIN

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the second reading of Bill No. 95, for the relief of Mary Melvina Guerin.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any children involved?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): Four children of varying ages who until 1926 had resided with the paternal grandmother, but are now with the petitioner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question is whether in granting these divorces we are free to do so without some provision being made for the care of the children. I should like to have that assurance before the divorce is granted.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): While the mother is not by any means a rich person, she does not seek any relief in that regard from this court. If such relief is to be given, it can be obtained much more cheaply through the court at Toronto to which she has access.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, on division.

FLORENCE MAY FORBES

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 122, for the relief of Florence May Forbes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any children involved?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There were three children. The husband of the petitioner, unhappily, became a defaulter and fled the country some time ago. In order that the children of the marriage might be cared for, two of them were taken in charge by the wife's mother in England and are being brought up by her. The wife has charge of the other child here in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, on division.

SOPHIA LOVE

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the second reading of Bill No. 127, for the relief of Sophia Love.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Are there any children?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): There are two children, but the husband is in England and without the jurisdiction of either this court or the courts of the province of Ontario. The petitioner seeks no relief from this court in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You have no idea as to how the children are being provided for?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): The children are with the petitioner. The husband deserted his wife and is living in England, where he went through another form of marriage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time on division.

HARRY FREEMAN SWITZER

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast) moved the second reating of Bill No. 138, for the relief of Harry Freeman Switzer.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time on division.

MINERVA ELLIOTT

The house resumed, from April 19, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast) for the second reading of bill No. 88 for the relief of Minerva Elliott.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the children in this case?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): There is no living issue.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time on division.

SUSANNAH MUSSON SAVERY

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 156, for the relief of Susannah Musson Savery.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the children?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): In this case there is one child fourteen years of age. She is with her mother and is desirous of remaining in her custody.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time on division.

GREAT LAKES AND ATLANTIC CANAL AND POWER COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. A. N. SMITH (Stormont) moved the second reading of Bill No. 169 respecting the Great Lakes and Atlantic Canal and Power Company, Limited.

Mr. BENNETT: We should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Authority is sought to construct, improve, maintain and operate a combined canal and ship channel or deep waterway from a point below the city of Sorel to a point near Cornwall of not less than thirty-five feet for the passage of ocean-going vessels. The route of the proposed canal is to be from Sorel to Montreal, from Montreal to Laprairie basin, and from Laprairie basin to Cornwall. It is proposed as an alternative to improve and make navigable for ocean navigation the Richelieu river from Sorel to Chambly basin and to construct a suitable canal from Chambly basin to a point on the southeast shore of Laprairie basin. In view of the wide powers asked for in this bill, I think the best way will be to give it second reading and refer it to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where all the necessary information incidental to the project may be made available.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I am not desirous, Mr. Speaker, of opposing an application for the consideration of any reasonable project, but I submit that this bill is of grave importance. The powers asked for are of a very extensive character, and will affect directly the great St. Lawrence project which is now occupying the attention of the government of Canada and the governments of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Only recently the federal government approved of certain plans under the Navigable Waters Act with respect to the Beauharnois scheme, which involves the construction by a private corporation of a canal as well as a power plant. This will vitally affect those great projects. If we give this bill second reading it will of course be said that we have agreed to the principle of the bill. I notice the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) shakes his head, but I am stating what is actually the fact so far as parliament is concerned. Undoubtedly, when a bill of this character is brought forward we are supposed to consider on the second reading its broad general principle, in this case whether parliament is to agree to a private corporation constructing a series of canals in the St. Lawrence. I do not want my hon. friend, the sponsor of the bill, to think that I am merely captious in my criticism, but, speaking for myself, I am not prepared to agree now to the principle of any private corporation undertaking the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway. I think almost from confederation the question of the canalization of the St. Lawrence to the great lakes has been in the hands of the parliament of Canada. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent by the people of Canada on this great work. I think we ought not to give this bill second reading. Probably the government should have taken the whole question into consideration and have been prepared, when the bill came forward, to state their attitude in regard to it. It should not be the duty of any private member, especially on the opposition side, to now offer objections to the bill, because after all it is a question for parliament and particularly for the government to consider. If the government are prepared to endorse the bill publicly, then it becomes a question of policy whether we shall get behind or oppose the government in the matter. Speaking for myself, I am opposed to the principle of a private corporation being granted the powers set forth in this bill.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I should have spoken immediately after the sponsor of the bill (Mr. Smith) moved the second reading had not my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) been on his feet. With most of his remarks I am in cordial agreement. I for one am not convinced that there should be such a canal as is proposed in this bill, and certainly the government is not adopting the principle of permitting private corporations to enter into the business of canalization and charging tolls, when it has been the policy of successive governments for a great many years past to operate, for the marine traffic of this country, canals without any toll charges. The question which arises in connection with the bill is one which has been frequently referred to this house. When private parties petition for private legislation and pay the fees demanded by this house it is presumed that they will get an opportunity themselves to present the object in which they are interested and for which they desire parliamentary approval. There is only one place where petitioners can thus appear, and that is before one of the select standing committees of this house. That is the only reason why I should be prepared personally to vote for the second reading of this bill—in order that those concerned may have an opportunity of presenting to a committee of this house such arguments as are in their possession, such information as they have, which would warrant parliament in departing from what has been a principle of many years' standing in connection with undertakings of this character. I am absolutely opposed to the bill finally passing this house, but I am prepared certainly to allow the petitioners to come before a committee of the house and tell us all about it.

I do not pretend to know all that can be known about the St. Lawrence. I have studied the bill to some extent and find that in the main it does not relate at all to the St. Lawrence canal. It is a canal intended apparently to go overland to paralled the St. Lawrence for practically the whole of its distance. That may or may not be a merit, but for my part I am prepared to allow the petitioners to appear before the railways and canals committee and to endeavour there to demonstrate that what they propose is more in the interests of the people of Canada than is the policy now followed. I do not believe they can demonstrate it; I do not believe so for a moment, and I am myself opposed to the bill. But we should at least give them an opportunity to present their case.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the second reading of a private bill necessarily commit this house to the principle of the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: That of course is very debatable in connection with a private bill. But if my hon. friend puts his question in this form: Does the second reading of a private bill, which necessarily involves its reference to a committee of the house for its examination, commit this house to the final passage of the bill?—I can answer him definitely in the negative. It merely involves, in my judgment,—and I speak only as one member of the house—that the house in passing the second reading of the bill permits the petitioners to appear in the only way they can appear, before a select committee, there to endeavour to make out their case. I have indicated that personally I am opposed to the bill as such; but I see no way of treating petitioners fairly, after they have paid their fees, than at least to give them a hearing. That may not suit hon. gentlemen; I know it does not. But personally I have consistently followed that course—and, as I say, I speak only for myself in the matter. Certainly I do not deem myself voting for the passage of the bill in voting for the second reading; not at all; in fact, it would require a great deal of new information to persuade me that it is worth voting for at all. But I deem it wise that petitioners, whoever they may be, should have the right to appear before a committee of parliament.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would not trespass on the time of the house were it not for the observations of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). It is laid down in May clearly that when the house gives second reading to a private bill it approves the principle of the bill. It approves the principle, although the details of the measure may be considered in the committee to which it may be referred.

What is the principle of this bill? The principle of this bill is that a private company may construct a canal and charge tolls, undertake hydro-electric enterprises, construct bridges, and enter upon various matters of that kind. It takes some thirteen pages to outline the provisions of the bill. The Minister of Railways, whose department is directly affected, has said that the petitioner's have given their notice and paid the advertising fees and the fees due to the clerks of the House of Commons and the Senate, and therefore the bill, in his opinion, should go to the committee. I submit with all deference that the principle is that the house itself must determine whether or not it will change a principle which heretofore has been approved, and this house only should vote upon that principle, and not a committee of the house. The house should be convinced, and not a committee. In other words, if the hon. gentleman who introduces the bill is unable to prove to the house in his opening that the matter is one of such great public interest as would warrant this house in departing from the principle which heretofore has guided it in legislation of this character, the bill should not pass. He has not given any explanation to warrant any such thing being done, and as the matter now stands when we give second reading to the bill we have approved the principle of a private canal being constructed, paralleling the St. Lawrence river, with a depth of thirty-five feet and width of four hundred feet, and involving the possibility of tolls being charged, together with various other matters of that kind. I for one will recall to the house what is laid down by May with respect to private bills of this character. When you approve the principle of legislation it must then be assumed that some sort of bill will emerge from the committee to which that legislation is referred. The place to kill the bill, if you wish to kill it, is here and not in the committee; because having sent the bill to the committee you have indicated that you are in favour of the principle of a privately-owned canal, and you instruct the committee to prepare a measure accordingly, and if necessary so amending the provisions as submitted that there will emerge from that committee a bill carrying out the principle you have approved. For that I am not prepared to vote. It serves no useful purpose to take up the time of the house in a long debate, but certainly, if such a bill were to originate on this side of the house, I have no doubt what the Minister of Railways would say about it.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly the same as I have said in this case. My hon. friend will permit me to say that I have taken precisely the same ground with respect to bills in the same position emanating from across the way.

Mr. BENNETT: I recall the case of the Georgian bay canal bill. After lengthy discussion, and after attention had been drawn to what May has to say on the question, the bill finally went to the committee where, when it was considered, not a single member but one was found to vote for it. What happened was this: It occupied weeks of debate in this house and was given second reading, a very persistent lobby having been maintained to secure its second reading. The last minister who spoke upon it was the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler). When the bill reached the committee, however, one member stood up in favour of it. The house was then in the anomalous position of having voted by a majority for the principle of the building of the Georgian bay canal, although, when the bill reached the committee, there was just one hon. member who was loyal to his principles and who stood up for the principle of the bill being given effect to by legislation. That, it seems to me, is hardly the practice to be pursued.

If we have no desire to pass this legislation—and apparently we have not—I think the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) will be well advised to take the nays and yeas as indicating whether or not it is the intention of parliament to depart from the principle which has heretofore governed, namely, that canals of this character should be publicly owned and that no tolls should be chargeable in relation thereto. With all my friendly regard for the hon. member for Stormont, I beg to assure him that legislation is not based upon considerations of friendship when it affects the public weal, and I for one propose accordingly to vote against the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will say, yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will say, nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the nays have it. The motion is lost.

Motion negatived.

MESSAGE FROM HIS MAJESTY THE KING

TRANSMITTED BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to inform the house that I have received the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

Office of the Governor General's Secretary
Canada.
Ottawa, 29th April, 1929.

Sir,

I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to inform you that he has received the following message from Lord Stamfordham, private secretary to His Majesty the King:—

"I am profoundly grateful for the address presented by the Senate and Commons of Canada. The Queen and I have been deeply touched by the expression of thankfulness and loyal affection contained in this address, and by all other messages of loving sympathy and devotion which have been received from my people of Canada during my long illness. I trust that under Divine Providence I may soon be restored to full health and strength. George R.I."

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

FISHERIES NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I would like to ask the Department of Marine and Fisheries one or two questions based upon a report appearing in the Halifax Herald under date of April 26, describing the serious condition of the fishing community of Ingonish, in the country of Victoria. The questions are based upon this report, which is as follows:

A wave of indignation mingled with discouragement has struck this community during the past few days, due to the poor prospect of receiving a fair price for fish during the coming summer. The Leonard Fishery are offering 2½ cents for haddock, gutted; this it is felt is hardly better than last year, when the fishermen received the starvation price of 2 cents apiece round.

Continuing, the article asserts:

Now it looks as if the fishermen must undergo exploitation for another year and the high hopes entertained respecting the benefits that were to follow the remedial recommendations of the royal commission seem as dead as the fallen leaves of last autumn.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not in his seat, but perhaps he will answer my question to-morrow. I desire to ask the government, first: Has the government accepted the majority or the minority report of the fisheries commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would respectfully ask the hon. gentleman to give notice of this question.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This might serve as notice, since the minister is not present.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: My second question is: What is the policy of the government with respect to the abolition of the steam trawler, and third, what relief does the government intend giving the fishermen of this community?

Mr. SPEAKER: This will serve as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wish to refer to question No. 2, which I placed on the order paper on April 15, and which requests certain information with regard to the expenditure for national defence for the year ending March 31, 1914. This question has been on the order paper for some considerable time and I would like the information before the estimates of the Department of National Defence come up for consideration.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): If my hon. friend will look at the question he will see that in one sense it is not quite so easy to answer as he might lead the house to believe. He asks for the estimated expenditure on national defence for the year ending March 31, 1914. There was no department of National Defence at that time and the only way in which that information can be obtained is by taking the various departments which had any services relating to national defence and adding the amounts together. That requires clerical work, and if I may say so my hon. friend might do it himself about as well as it could be done by the clerks in any of the departments. Apparently this question just covers what was in the estimates.

Mr. SPENCER: I want authentic information; that is why I did not do the work myself.

Mr. RALSTON: The estimates for that year would give the figures.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister says these expenditures were made by several departments, and I want to make sure of my figures.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—TABLING OF FILES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I mentioned to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a matter which I think is of sufficient importance to be mentioned in the house now. We have been discussing the estimates of the Postmaster General, and by the arrangement arrived at the other day I think we have done something to expedite the conduct of public business, by having the minister bring the original files to his office to be inspected by members of the opposition without the delay which would be necessary if these files were copied. The multiplicity of cases which have been brought to my attention since we first discussed the estimates of this department render it impossible for us to hope to deal with them all in the ordinary way, and I therefore venture to suggest that the files relating to the cases which I shall presently mention might be brought by the minister to his office for inspection. One case deals with post office affairs at Levis, Quebec, and the other with the appointment to the post office at Mitchell, Ontario. I will not discuss them even in outline, because one is never certain that the information given is warranted by the facts as subsequently indicated by the files. I am bound to say that the Prime Minister thought this request not unreasonable, and since then the Postmaster General has indicated that he is arranging to have these files brought to his office in order that they may be inspected without delay. We are endeavouring to eliminate the discussion of cases involving dismissals, which tends to produce, as I think President Wilson said, more heat than light. Under these circumstances perhaps we can assist the government in transacting public business by pursuing the course I have indicated.

HARBOUR COMMISSION REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There is one other matter to which I would like to direct the attention of the government. I cannot find in the office downstairs which has the custody of documents tabled in this house any reports for the year 1928 of the harbour commissions of Toronto, Montreal, Three Rivers, Chicoutimi, Quebec, St. John, Halifax or Vancouver. Perhaps the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) will see that these reports are brought down before we discuss certain resolutions now appearing on the order paper. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is also interested in these matters in view of the report made by the audit board last year upon the affairs of the harbour commission of Quebec. I mention this so that when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries reads Hansard to-morrow he will see what we desire.

REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

PAPERS RELATING TO CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There is another matter I would like to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister, although I know he must have many things to give him concern at this time; I refer to the correspondence antedating the convention of 1924 between Great Britain and the United States, as requested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). We desire that this correspondence be brought down as soon as possible in order that we may have the fullest information before discussing certain of the estimates of the right hon. Prime Minister with respect to the Department of External Affairs.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition was kind enough to mention his intention of asking this question to-day, and I have obtained from the department a copy of the convention between His Britannic Majesty and the president of the United States of America respecting the regulation of the liquor traffic, which was signed at Washington on January 23, 1924.

I might say that when this document and others were asked for by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George I instructed my officials to ascertain from the British government by cable whether the correspondence might be tabled. That message has been sent, but up to the present there has hardly been time for a reply. For the present I will table the convention and will hope to be able to bring down the correspondence later on.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George understood that the Prime Minister was cabling Great Britain so that there would be no undue delay. I apprehend that if the Prime Minister does not receive a reply within a reasonable time he will send a reminder or a refresher, as the Minister of Railways and Canals might say, so that this matter will not be overlooked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I inquired as to when the message was sent, and I was told that a cable had been despatched immediately. I will follow up the matter at once.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not quite sure but I think the treaty and other documents were distributed to the members of the house some years ago, but inasmuch as this is a live question now, I wonder if this treaty could either be printed in the votes and proceedings or made available to the members by some other means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My impression is that the treaty was distributed to the members of parliament but there would be no objection to having the documents reprinted.

Mr. SPEAKER: It might be included in the votes and proceedings for to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be very serviceable.

SUPPLY

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): The first item is vote No. 131, harbours and rivers.

Mr. BENNETT: As some of the members desire to speak with reference to certain items in vote 132, could this vote be taken up first?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It makes no difference to me.

Charlottetown—reconstruction of railway wharf, $48,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Would the minister give us some information as to the work which is being carried on here?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote from last year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Does the amount cover the rebuilding of the property which was destroyed by fire last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, that is my understanding.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It is very difficult for the people of Prince Edward Island to understand why the rebuilding of this shed has been delayed so long.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the hon. member speak just a little louder and will my other hon. friends endeavour to keep a little order, because I cannot hear a word of what is being said?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): There was a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the province in connection with the delay in rebuilding this shed last year. The shed was destroyed some time during June and the rebuilding was not undertaken in time to make it available for the fall season. The people interested think that this delay was unnecessarily long and that the department should have taken some quicker action in order to make the building available for the fall traffic. I am not criticizing the vote in any way except to say that in a matter of such great public interest more energetic measures should have been taken to have the rebuilding done at once.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not the correspondence before me but my recollection is that the fire took place some time after the house rose. There was no money in the estimates to provide for the rebuilding and a governor general's warrant had to be obtained at the earliest possible moment. As I recollect, that was done and it is a great surprise to me to hear the hon. member say that the work was not proceeded with. I believe I have something among my papers which shows that the representatives down there have expressed their great appreciation of the expedition with which the department acted in regard to this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): We notice here in the House of Commons and in other places that all the representatives for some of the counties in Prince Edward Island do is to express appreciation to the government for what it happens to do. I have no further objection to the vote.

Item agreed to.

Souris harbour—breakwater repairs, $60,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Would the minister give us some information as to what work was done last year? There was $30,000 voted for this work a year ago and apparently only about $7,000 was expended. The vote has been doubled to $60,000 and I think some explanation would be in order.

[Mr. Macdonald (Kings).]

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount of $60,000 is required to complete the work now under contract with Mr. H. J. Phillips of Charlottetown, P.E.I. This contract consists of placing some 1,500 cubic yards of stone, from two to three cubic yards in size, in front of the outer block, and placing a further quantity of 2,500 cubic yards, from one to two cubic yards in size along the seaward face of middle section of the breakwater for a length of 460 feet. The total amount of stone to be placed is approximately 4,000 cubic yards. The amount expended last year to the 31st March was $8,347.57.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Was this contract made with Mr. Phillips last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Involving the whole $60,000 expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): This looks like a very large amount of money to which, of course, I cannot object, and I am not objecting, as it is being spent in my constituency, but the condition of the railway wharf at the same point and right alongside this breakwater, is very serious at the present time. To my mind, better service would be given to the community and to the town of Souris if a portion of this vote were made applicable to some repairs to the railway wharf. It is rather important because it is a transfer point for a large quantity of freight for the Magdalen islands. The shed on the railway wharf is in bad condition; the roof is leaking, and the merchandise that is being transshipped by the railway should be stored there until the boat calls for it. It cannot be stored there at the present time because it would be in danger of destruction on account of the leaky roof. In addition to that, farmers and business men have to store merchandise waiting for the steamer for the Magdalen islands and under present conditions the wharf cannot be used to any extent because goods cannot be protected from the weather on account of the condition of the roof. It would be better if an additional appropriation could be made for repairs to the railway wharf shed, but if the government cannot see its way clear to provide any more money, as only a small amount was expended last year and as it might not be necessary to spend the whole of the vote this year on the breakwater, I would suggest that a part of the appropriation be used to repair the shed. If that were done, there would be more real value given to the community and better service given to the town, especially in view of the fact that this shed is the only place where stuff can be stored for shipment to the Magdalen islands or to any other port.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Our instructions from the engineers are quite in accord with my hon. friend's statement made to the house a year ago, namely, that the matter which is urgent is the building of the breakwater. The other structures are in danger of being completely destroyed unless the breakwater is constructed. It is the protection for the rest, and the information that I have at hand is that it should be proceeded with first of all.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering vote No. 132. The item we are now considering reads:

Victoria—wharf repairs, $1,100.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, whether the item of $60,000 for breakwater repairs for Souris harbour was passed or not, but in any case I am sure that the minister will answer my question. Is it the intention of the department this year to see that proper accommodation shall be provided for the transfer of goods from the railway to the steamer, especially the government subsidized steamer for the Magdalen islands? The accommodation at the transfer shed is unsatisfactory now owing to a leaky roof and other defects. Will anything be done this year to remedy that condition?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is nothing in the estimates providing especially for that, but there is the general vote for work of that kind, and it is a little larger than usual this year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I hope the minister will keep the condition of that shed in mind, because it is a very important one. I hope that something will be done in this direction out of the general vote so that the accommodation will be made of some real use to the people. It is of importance in several ways, and particularly because the Dominion government subsidizes a steamship service there to the amount of $50,000 a year, anad surely when a steamship service is subsidized to that extent the transfer shed from the railways to the steamer should be such as to afford protection to the goods.

Item agreed to.

Westville—wharf, $10,600.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I wonder where Westville is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend not know the location? For his information I may say that it is Queens county on the south side of the West river.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It is rather difficult to understand why so much money is voted for these places. There is a vote of $8,200 for wharf reconstruction and extension at West river bridge, and this vote of $10,600 for the wharf at Westville. Can the minister tell us just what business is being done at these places to justify such an expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The district engineer reports:

Westville is a point on the south side of the West river about five miles from Charlottetown, where a small structure known as "McEwan's" wharf was built by the local government many years ago. It supplies shipping accommodation for the various communities in this vicinity, namely, New Dominion, Long Creek, Canoe Cove, South Shore, Nine Mile Creek and Fairview, same containing probably from 600 to 800 persons interested in the export of surplus farm produce and import of coal, lumber and general merchandise by water, as they are entirely cut off from any railway service. The wharf is also a point of call twice weekly for the subsidized steamer "Harland", but owing to recent development in the seed potato industry it has been found inadequate and vessels arriving in the busy shipping season have often to lie at the pierhead one outside the other. There are no statistics available as to the value of the business transacted over this wharf, but from personal observation covering the past twenty years or more I am of the opinion this would not exceed $50,000 per season. The wharf is still controlled by the local government, and as only small repairs have been made on it from time to time it is now in very bad condition and will shortly require to be entirely reconstructed. Under these circumstances shippers and others interested in obtaining improved facilities at the place desire that the present wharf be abandoned and an entirely new one built a short distance to the eastward, and I have no hesitation in advising the department that I consider that it would be better in every way to comply with such request. The proposed new site has an excellent approach both from water and land, with sufficient space for any warehouse accommodation that might eventually be required, while approach to present wharf is up a very steep hill, difficult to team heavy loads over, and the land surrounding it is neither available or suitable for the traffic that it is anticipated will follow improved shipping facilities at Westville.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Is that report from the district engineer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, the district engineer, Mr. Hyndman.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I have a great real of confidence in any report made by the district engineer, as I know he is a really practical man. How far is this wharf from the West river bridge wharf, for which there is a vote of over $8,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that it is three or four miles below that bridge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): When those of us who know the situation existing there compare the treatment the West river is receiving with that accorded to other points in the province, especially in Kings county, we cannot help wondering why it is that so much attention is given to certain points, two, three or four miles apart in one county, and no attention whatever to large sections in another county.

Mr. McPHEE: It is well represented.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I was going to suggest, when my hon. friend interrupted, that the representation apparently has a great deal to do with it, and I say that with all due deference to my hon. friends from Queens county. My hon. friend (Mr. McPhee) lived alongside the West river a few years ago before he moved west, and he knows as well as I do that the expenditure of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars on sections of the river there three or four miles apart is justified by the exigencies of the representatives of Queens county.

Item agreed to.

Bailey's Brook—extension to pier, $3,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, what is this item for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to construct a cribwork extension 240 feet long, 10 feet wide and 10 feet high to the eastern pier. An extension to the pier is required in order to straighten and constrict the channel, thus preventing the accumulation of debris which obstructs the traffic. About sixty fishing boats use this harbour during the fishing season, and the improvement suggested will be of great benefit to them in the handling of their fish. The annual value of the fisheries is $24,500. Three lobster factories are located in the district, which has a population of approximately five hundred.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CANTLEY: How much was spent last year, and who was the superintendent under whom the work was done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last year we spent $2,490 I have not the name of the superintendent. I shall be very glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. CANTLEY: Can the minister tell me under whose recommendation the superintendent was appointed, and if he continued throughout the season to carry on the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I could not answer that question offhand.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the minister had better let the item stand over until he has the information ready.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It would facilitate matters if my hon. friend saw fit to let the item pass, but I am not going to urge it. I will undertake to supply all the information he requires.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will you allow me to discuss the matter later?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Certainly, I shall be very glad to.

Mr. CANTLEY: With that understanding, all right.

Item agreed to.

Barrington passage—ice piers, $35,000.

Mr. ERNST: Would the minister explain on whose recommendation this is being done, and for what purpose?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Seventeen thousand dollars of this is a revote from last year. The amount is asked to be provided towards the construction of a second concrete pier at Barrington passage. The amount expended on the pier last year was only $104.

Mr. ERNST: They are ice piers. What purpose do they serve?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is claimed that under existing conditions the people of Cape Sable island are practically isolated during the winter months. The ferry which runs between Barrington passage and Cape Sable island cannot give regular service on account of the heavy ice fields which run up and down the passage making navigation unsafe. If the proposed piers were constructed across the passage they would keep the ice fields broken up in such small quantities that the ferry boats would have no difficulty in making daily trips.

Mr. ERNST: Does this represent the final expenditure, or will further piers be necessary?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It depends to a certain extent upon the results obtained. If the first two piers constructed have the effect of doing what the engineer thinks they will do, it is possible that something further along that line will be done.

Mr. ERNST: How much more?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are only two piers at the present time.

Mr. ERNST: What is the final scheme if this experiment proves satisfactory?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The $35,000 includes everything contemplated at the present time.

Mr. ERNST: The present expenditure is experimental, I understand?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Largely.

Mr. ERNST: If the experiment proves successful what is to be done further? Is there no definite scheme?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, this is experimental and there will be nothing definitely decided upon until the engineers have an opportunity of seeing how it works out.

Mr. ERNST: On whose recommendation, may I ask, is it being done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The engineer's.

Mr. ERNST: Is the minister quite sure? I was informed that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) promised this work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, it is the engineer. Part of his recommendation is as follows:

Under existing conditions, it is readily seen that the people of Cape Sable Island are practically isolated during the winter months, and the reason for this isolation is that the heavy ice fields which run up and down the passage do not allow the safe navigation of the passage, and it seems reasonable to believe that if ice piers were constructed across the passage at its narrowest part they would break the ice fields which flow back and forward through the passage during the winter. As the tide runs in and out of the passage four times a day, ice piers would no doubt keep the ice fields broken up in such small quantities that the ferry boats would have no difficulty in making their daily trips.

Mr. ERNST: Is it being done on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence? It is in his constituency.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know he has spoken on behalf of this.

Mr. ERNST: Before the engineers made their report?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it was after the engineers reported.

Item agreed to.

Brooklyn—dredging, The Mersey Paper Company, Limited, to contribute one third of cost, $70,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might explain this item. There is another one of a similar character.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is one of a number of similar projects which the government have been assisting. This amount of $70,000 is asked to be provided towards the following dredging at North Brooklyn, the Mersey Paper Company Limited to contribute one-third of cost: The work proposed at Brooklyn consists of the dredging of a dock and basin for the pier of the Mersey Paper Mill Company. The average dimensions of this work are approximately; length, 1,150 feet; width, 550 feet; depth, 23.1 feet below L.W.O.S.T. It is estimated that 176,400 cubic yards scow measurement of sand, clay and gravel will have to be removed.

The object of the work is to provide suitable berths and basin to accommodate large steamers which will be engaged in carrying the products of The Mersey Paper Mill.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this wharf remain under the control of the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Is $70,000 the total cost, or will it be $105,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total cost will be $110,000. Our information is that The Mersey Company are expending a large sum of money there, variously estimated between six and nine million dollars, in establishing a paper mill at North Brooklyn; and I believe their power development will involve a further expenditure.

Mr. ERNST: The power development is being done by the provincial government entirely, but the company have built their plant and pier there at their own expense.

Mr. GARDINER: The government has nothing to do with the pier?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Who will have access to the pier?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All those doing business with this large concern; it is not a public pier.

Mr. GARDINER: How far is the government going to go with this policy. It is ridiculous to do dredging in connection with private piers.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is the same policy as is followed in connection with dredging up to grain elevators. It is the policy of the government wherever there is a large expenditure of this kind creating considerable business development to endeavour to assist either in dredging or sometimes in actual dock construction. In this case we are assisting merely in the dredging.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the government endeavour to secure from the company the right of access to the pier on the part of the public?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The government have done so in cases where they have contributed towards the wharf. But where they are doing only dredging I do not recall any case in which that right has been sought.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It seems to me that the public should have the right to use the wharf. This was the case in connection with Anticosti island.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; but in that particular case additional construction was made to render the place a port of refuge.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Would it not be a good policy, wherever the government undertake to do dredging in connection with such operations as this, to provide that the public shall have the right to use the wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think that any question in particular arises in connection with the matter. Practically everyone who will have any business at the wharf is doing business with The Mersey Company, and I know of no objection on their part to such persons using the wharf. What applies in some cases does not apply here. There is a very large development in this case and I understand that a substantial investment is being made by the company. In making arrangements in a matter of this kind you try as nearly as possible to do the fair thing in view of what the company has done. I think we are getting all that we are entitled to.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It might happen, however, that a town would grow up on this site and someone might want to build a store or to do business of any other nature, and it would be very inconvenient if they could not land material at the wharf without first obtaining the consent of the company. When the government does dredging of this sort it should receive, it seems to me, something in the nature of a quid pro quo. Personally I see no reason why the public should not be allowed to use the wharf.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. ERNST: In this particular district, which happens to be in my constituency, this wharf is not required for public purposes. There is an excellent public wharf owned by the government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are two other wharves.

Mr. ERNST: Yes, there is a breakwater and there is a wharf in the district. There is no question about the public needing this wharf, for there is ample accommodation. Furthermore, dredging is always done to improve someone's waterfront or to render someone's wharf more accessible.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is there a company town growing up there?

Mr. ERNST: No, not do any extent.

Item agreed to.

Digby—repairs and renewals to pier, $6,000.

Mr. SHORT: Has the minister had any application with reference to dredging in Digby basin? He is aware, I presume, that Digby is the only entrance which the Canadian Pacific Railway have to Nova Scotia; that is to say, by steamer from St. John across to Digby. They have just given a contract for a very much larger steamer than is operating at the present time, an up to date vessel which will cost a considerable sum of money. This new vessel will draw very much more water than does the present boat, and it is absolutely necessary that dredging shall have been done by the time the boat arrives. Her construction will require about a year and it will take some time to do the dredging. I am wondering whether the minister has had any application from the town of Digby or from the Canadian Pacific Railway with reference to the necessity for dredging there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the details I have here there is nothing touching the matter to which my hon. friend refers. Of course, we are only supplied with the details of the items actually in the estimates. It is just possible that such a request has been made but neither my deputy nor myself has it in mind at the moment.

Mr. SHORT: I want to direct attention to the fact that this work will be absolutely necessary. The steamer now being built by the Canadian Pacific Railway for that service is 350 feet long, whereas the one now in use is less than 200 feet in length, so some extra dredging will be necessary. I do not ask this for the benefit of Digby at all but for the benefit of Canada generally, because this is the only Canadian Pacific Railway connection into Nova Scotia. I want to direct attention to the fact that some provision should be made in the dredging operations for the coming summer to take care of the necessary dredging at Digby basin because, with the present channel, at low tide this new steamer would be hardly able to turn round. As the minister knows, we have a great rise and fall of tides there; the average is 24 feet, and sometimes we have tides of 28 or 29 feet, so it is essential that this dredging should be done this summer.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand this is a Canadian Pacific Railway steamer to which my hon. friend refers, and evidently at the time they were making this request they overlooked the work he has in mind. However, I will be glad to have the matter looked into.

Mr. SHORT: They gave the contract for the new ship only two or three weeks ago.

Item agreed to.

Fourchu—harbour improvements—The British Metals Corporation (Canada) to contribute one-third of cost, $75,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this also for dredging?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I would like an explanation of the work intended to be done at this point.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for dredging at this point; The British Metals Corporation (Canada) is to contribute one-third of the cost. It is proposed to dredge the entrance channel generally 100 feet wide and 2,650 feet long, to a grade of 16 feet, with a turning basin at Cann's Point 600 feet long and 100 feet to 300 feet wide to the same depth. Through the rock area at the outer end of the channel, which is 700 feet long, it is proposed to limit the bottom width of the dredging to 75 feet. The completion of this channel and basin will provide for vessels of 17 to 20 feet draft and will give ample accommodation for local coastal vessels.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): What were the reports from the engineers? What class of dredging is it to be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: District Engineer Locke requested this appropriation, and according to his statement The British Metals Corporation (Canada), in their letter of April 10, 1928 to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, requested consideration by the department of the provision of shipping facilities for them in order that they might proceed with the shipping of concentrates produced from ore from their mines at Stirling, Richmond county, Nova Scotia. The company followed this up by their letters of August 17 and October 11, 1928, and their telegrams of October 26 and 31, 1928. There was also a telegram on January 21, 1929, from Mr. M. A. Patterson of Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Hon. J. L. Ralston also wrote in respect of this matter in May of last year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I asked about the dredging. What have the engineers reported as to the class of material to be removed, and what kind of harbour do they thing they can make?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I gave my hon. friend the size of the harbour, its length, depth and width. It is estimated that the rock excavation will amount to 16,000 cubic yards, place measurement, estimated to cost $8 per yard, and it is estimated that the dredging will amount to 186,000 cubic yards, at 50 cents per yard.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is this $75,000 the total cost or two-thirds of the cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total cost to complete the work will be about $200,000, and this is one-half of our contribution.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the government will pay $150,000 altogether?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How does the government propose to do the dredging at the entrance to the channel?

Mr. ELLIOTT: What does my hon. friend mean; does he mean by contract or day labour?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How is it proposed to remove the stone in the entrance? I have gone over this location very carefully; I was with the engineer when this harbour was inspected in 1926, and we found that the entrance was solid stone. How does the government intend to remove this stone?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the ordinary practice will be followed, so far as I know; they will drill and blast and then take out the stone with a dipper dredge.

Mr. BENNETT: They will drill and blast and then claim extras.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No doubt they will claim everything they can.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Is this work to be done by contract or by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it will be done by contract.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): In Nova Scotia we have found in the past that most of these contractors come back for extras. This will be a very expensive work if it is done by tender and contract, and I think it is up to the government to safeguard themselves in some way. A short time ago we had the case of St. Peter's canal; I notice that in the estimates this year we are providing an amount for 1925 extras.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask if this is a new harbour we are creating or if shipping has used this harbour previously?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Fishing boats and small coastal boats have used the harbour for some time but up to the present it has not been an improved harbour.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): For the benefit of the hon. member for Mackenzie I may say that Fourchu is an old harbour. We have 12 feet of water there, but extensive developments are made necessary through the increased shipping which will result from the mines at Stirling. Fourchu as a harbour was frequented as early as 1700.

Before this item carries I would like to thank the Minister of Public Works for the magnificent way in which he has treated the county of Richmond. I notice that there are a few other points which he has treated in a very substantial manner but the only way we can get action from the minister is to go after him as hard as we possibly can. I am very glad to see that he has remembered my old constituency in the way he has.

I understand that requests have been made on many occasions from the district of Main a Dieu, asking that a shed be placed on the public wharf there. I understand that the fisherman's union have sent a request that this should be built. The wharf was built in 1925 and the fishermen of the district have asked for a shed. The cost of building this shed would not be very much and it would be of great convenience to the fishermen.

I would like also to direct the minister's attention to the need of a public wharf at Louisburg. This is the oldest town in the province of Nova Scotia and is one of the larger towns in the province. It is without a public wharf and I claim that it is a disgrace for the government to allow this community to go this length of time without having such a public convenience. I would ask the minister to forget some of his friends in that district. The reason a public wharf has not been built is that his friends have secured options on all the available property in that district, and the minister is not in a position to decide which one he is going to purchase the property from.

Mr. POULIOT: Are they good friends or bad friends?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I do not think they are good friends, when they do a thing of that kind. I would ask the minister to take this matter under immediate consideration.

Another matter requiring immediate attention is the repairing of the breakwater at Gabarouse. I understand that some of the logs required for the purpose have been taken to the district of Fourchu and the breakwater at Gabarouse, which is badly in need of repairs, must be allowed to go by the board.

Item agreed to.

Glace Bay—wharf reconstruction, $16,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I am very glad indeed to see this vote in the estimates. Could the minister tell the house if that wharf has been taken over by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The negotiations are nearly completed but the agreement has not actually been signed.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): It will be taken over?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the intention.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): The intention is that this vote will be spent this year and not revoted next year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is getting into the realm of prophecy to a large extent. The completion of the agreement has taken a longer time than we contemplated and that is the reason for the revote this year.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): The terms have all been agreed on?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but it is impossible to say how long it will be before the agreement is completed. The work will not be started until that agreement is contemplated but I expect that it will be done this year.

Item agreed to.

Grass Cove—breakwater wharf, $2,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Will this vote complete that work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, this is to complete it. This amount is required to complete the work now under contract. About $31,000 has been spent on it already.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): What county is that in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is in the constituency of Cape Breton North-Victoria.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $80,000.

Mr. SHORT: I should like to ask the minister on what he proposes to expend this $80,000 and in what sections of Nova Scotia.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can only tell the hon. member where the general vote was expended and how it was expended last year. This is to meet the ordinary maintenance charges made up of several small items, many of which cannot be foreseen at the present time.

Mr. SHORT: I brought this matter to the attention of the minister last year when this vote was up and directed his attention to some dredging which was very urgently required at Battery point—known as Victoria beach—and I endeavoured to get the minister to make a definite promise that he would consider this matter during the present session. I was not very successful last year but I hope he will not turn a deaf ear to my pleas to-night. This is a very large fishing station right at the entrance to Digby basin, just inside the bay of Fundy. The government owns two breakwaters there but they are filled up with sand and dredging is very urgently needed.

I would also like to refer to the dredging which is required at Digby basin. The government should have its engineers look into this matter before the present season opens so that the dredging may be completed this year. I do not make this request from a local standpoint at all as it would be to the benefit of Canada generally. As I have said before, this is the only connection the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has in Nova Scotia. Their line of steamers run from St. John to Digby and before they can operate their new steamer it will be absolutely necessary that extensive dredging work be done there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We cannot do dredging work out of this vote; this is only for repairs to works already constructed.

Mr. ERNST: I notice the amount is increased over last year by some $15,000. There must be some purpose in increasing it in that manner. Is any part of it allocated?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course the more works we have, the more repairs we require. As a general rule we are reaching the point where we are extending the quantity of dredging being done in different places. The increase is not at all out of proportion to the increase in work of this kind that has been done in recent years.

Mr. ERNST: Does it bear some direct relation to the capital expenditure in the province?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It bears a direct relation to the amount of repairs it looks as if we would require this year to works that are already constructed. The engineers recommend that an additional amount be voted this year.

Mr. QUINN: Do I understand the minister to say that no dredging will be included in this $80,000 appropriation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. QUINN: The fishermen of Bald Rock in Halifax county requested an engine for hauling up their fishing boats. Will that likely be included in this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend propose the purchase of an engine?

Mr. QUINN: Yes, at Bald Rock. It is a public work. A skidway was provided two years ago, and the request came in from the fishermen for an engine. I think I mentioned it to the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That might be done out of this appropriation.

Mr. QUINN: It would be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I say it could be.

Mr. QUINN: Will the minister say, it would be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Possibly.

Mr. QUINN: No dredging is included in this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. QUINN: Will there be some way of providing an item for extra dredging? The constituency of Halifax is not very liberally treated under the item "Harbours and rivers," and I might point out that a small amount of dredging is needed at the harbour of Chezzetcook. There is only one wharf on the east side of the harbour which is being filled up with sand so that the vessels cannot get in. I bring the matter to the attention of the minister again and I ask that he would give it some consideration.

Mr. ERNST: Would the minister give me a little more information in respect to the item "Harbours and rivers generally"? Is it the practice of the department that the engineers simply say: We want $80,000 this year; or do they give a number of specific instances and say: We require $1,500 here, $1,500 there and other sums elsewhere in addition to a certain amount for emergencies?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can give my hon. friend a list showing what was appropriated last year and which was spent practically before the end of February.

Mr. ERNST: But is there any list of prospective expenditures this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: A large number of items are noted.

Mr. ERNST: Will the minister give me the list of those?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let me say to my hon. friend that the requests of the engineers are not by any means imperative or final. We have to take them into consideration, and we are hardly ever able to grant all or nearly all their recommendations. But already items noted for expenditure for 1929-30 include the following:

Mr. ERNST: The total of those is what?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not totalled because as yet we have not the estimates for many of them.

Mr ERNST: This amount of $80,000 is intended to include all those as well as emergencies which may arise owing to storms?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Repairs. We do not do any large repairs out of these. They are small, usually in the vicinity of or under $100. If there is a very urgent case we might perhaps go just a little bit further, but this is to meet urgent cases.

Mr. ERNST: Has it not been the practice in the past—this is my recollection—to vote a lump sum for dredging generally in the maritime provinces?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: I have just been advised by one of my colleagues that that item is in the estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a principle involved in this which applies to many cases of a similar character. When a bulk sum estimate amounting to over 10 per cent of the total estimates for any one province is granted by this house, it will be observed that it places in the hands of the minister a very substantial sum of money to be expended without regard to parliament. It will be observed that some of the items that we have voted do not exceed $1,000. Therefore any expenditure beyond $1,000 that is made out of this $80,000 vote is not being quite fair to parliament. The largest item which the minister read, if my memory serves me, was $750.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was one of $940.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not catch that, and the next largest, I think, was for $750. I do submit that it is a violation of the general principle on which supply is based if a bulk sum estimate is passed by the house without having some idea as to what is to be expended as a maximum in any one particular instance. That is the only reason I mention it. In days gone by, when those who now sit to the right were sitting to the left of the Speaker, those who are curiously inclined may have observed from the utterances of distinguished Liberals who came from the province of Ontario how strong their criticism was with respect to bulk estimates involving the possibility of the minister making expenditures under pressure from political supporters in any particular section, and that certainly would be the case here, judging from the reports that were read, and the number of cases that were singled out for favourable treatment in the estimates and those that were left untouched in the estimates and must be dealt with out of the larger vote if they are to be dealt with at all

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): What does the government intend to do with the $500 it is going to expend at Petit de Grat? Is that for wharf repairs?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is marked for breakwater repairs.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): What is it proposed to do with the $500 to be expended at River Bourgeois?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is for wharf repairs.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): To which wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Boyd's.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I may say that Petit de Grat has been asking for a public wharf for some time. The people in that community make their living exclusively by fishing. There is a small item in the estimates for dredging, but there was a much larger sum in the estimates in 1925 for that purpose, namely, $30,000, and it was not expended. This is a revote of some of that money. On the other hand, hardly a fishing boat goes out of River Bourgeois, and yet it has two wharves, one built in 1926, and the other taken over from A. J. Boyd ten or fifteen years ago. I say, Mr. Chairman, that we should not spend money in this way for political purposes, as was done last year at Soldier's Cove. The town of Louisburg also wants a public wharf; Petit de Grat wants a public wharf, and I would ask the minister to place a sum in the supplementary estimates for this purpose so that this needed work may be done. That will be far better than taking the advice of defeated candidates who want their fathers' wharves repaired. The entrance to the Grand river should also be opened We have had this matter up in the house on various occasions, and probably next year if there is an election on, the minister will have an item in the estimates for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

Little Bras d'Or—wharf, $2,300.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is that a government wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a cribwork wharf which it is proposed to construct, 20 by 35 feet. It is asked for by the district engineer, who states that the wharf is required to provide accommodation for Little Bras d'Or village and for the people living along the Bras d'Or channel and trading with the village by water.

Item agreed to.

Liverpool—dredging, $30,000.

Mr. ERNST: Is this appropriation to remove the bar which has formed across the river, and to which I drew attention last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think the hon. member drew attention to it last year, but I think that is the purposes of the vote.

Mr. ERNST: I am sure that I did bring it to the minister's attention last year, and I read a resolution from the town council.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is asked to be provided towards dredging a channel from near the highway bridge at Liverpool, out to a point outside the bar at the entrance to the harbour. Total length of channel is 3,890 feet. The inner 1,050 feet of the channel has a width of 200 feet and the remainder of the channel a width of 150 feet.

The district engineer reports:

The bar at Liverpool is formed by the meeting of the tidal flow from Liverpool bay and the currents from the Mersey river. Where the forces of both are neutralized an eddy is formed and all material flowing down the river or flowing in from the sand banks outside the harbour naturally begins to settle in said eddy. Under ordinary average conditions this filling in is comparatively small, but an unusually heavy storm, accompanied by extraordinarily high seas, has been known to cause a filling in of from 3 to 3½ feet. The people of Liverpool have at different times asked for a deeper channel than the one herein proposed, but the district engineer has suggested a depth to the proposed new channel of 16 plus 1 foot at L.W. O.S.T. This depth conforms almost precisely with the average depth of the immense body of sand lying outside the bar. By similarizing the depths of the channel and the outside deposit of sand, the likelihood of renewed filling in is reduced, also the 16 plus 1 foot depth, if fairly well maintained, should accommodate practically all the shipping which will enter Liverpool harbour in the future.

Mr. ERNST: That is the work which the town council resolution referred to last year? It is the removal of the bar to give sixteen feet at low water?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Malignant Cove—wharf extension—to complete, $1,200.

Mr. CANTLEY: What money was spent last year, and what is proposed to be done this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last year we spent $4,337.61 to March 31. This amount of $1,200 is required to complete the construction of the cribwork extension of fifty feet to the eastern pier. The work is asked for to provide shipping accommodation for the gravel industry.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will this complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Pictou—repairs to railway wharfs, $10,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, in regard to the repairs to the Pictou wharf last year, there seems to be some misunderstanding. On March 14th, 1928, the Minister of Railways and Canals in reply to a question asked by me, said that the repairs to these wharfs were to be carried out by his department. A little later, on April 12, the minister so informed Mr. James A. Fraser of New Glasgow. I think he confirmed the same information in a letter to the Board of Trade of Pictou some few days later. Now may I ask by what department were the repairs actually carried out, the railway or the public works department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The repairs that were made last year by this department amounted to $13,918.44 to March 31. I am not in a position to say what was done by the railway department in that district, but I shall be very glad, if my hon. friend wishes it, to tell him exactly what was done by my department.

Mr. CANTLEY: Would my hon. friend be good enough to explain why the Minister of Railways said the work would be done by the Railway department? He so informed me on March 14th, and this was confirmed by a letter from the Minister of Public Works of April 12, also by a letter addressed to Mr. James A. Fraser, New Glasgow, on April 18th, and again by a letter to some parties in Pictou. Then on April 19th the minister informed Mr. James A. Fraser that the work would be done by the Department of Public Works. What is the explanation of this change of attitude, one statement at one time, and an absolutely different statement at another time?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the explanation is that at the time the statement was made by the Minister of Railways and Canals the works had not been taken over by this department. They were not taken over until July, I understand, and that is why the apparent difference has arisen.

Mr. CANTLEY: Am I to understand that the wharves were actually taken over by the Department of Public Works in July last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: And before work was begun on them?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: All the work done was done by the Department of Public Works; is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All the work after they were taken over was done by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. CANTLEY: There was no work done before they were taken over by your department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. CANTLEY: Was the work done by tender and contract or by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work was done by day labour.

Mr. BENNETT: How much?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount was $13,-918.44.

Mr. CANTLEY: I understand that $25,000 was voted last year for this work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: How much was spent by the Public Works department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $13,918—nearly $14,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: How much material did you buy? Did you buy any from the railways?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not a list of the material.

Mr. CANTLEY: Under whose superintendence was the work done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: By Isaac R. Arbuckle as foreman.

Mr. CANTLEY: Who recommended him?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume that the district engineer made the appointment. I have nothing to show who recommended him.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is it not a fact that he was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. McColl?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is possible, but I have nothing to indicate on whose recommendation he was appointed.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. McColl appears to be the man in that district who controls all the appointments and the whole expenditure of the Public Works department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. CANTLEY: I judge so from the fact that he recommended the man as superintendent to carry on the work at another point further east. Later that man was dismissed on the report of one of the engineers that the character of the work done by him was the worst he had ever seen. Then I find that another man was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. McColl, that other work was carried on at the recommendation and for the benefit of Mr. McColl, and that Mr. McColl practically dictates to the department as to what should be done.

An hon. MEMBER: Is Mr. McColl a defeated candidate?

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have nothing on record to show there has been any dictation by Mr. McColl, but I have no doubt that his recommendation would receive very careful consideration.

Mr. HANSON: Who is he?

Mr. SHORT: Is he a district engineer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. SHORT: Why, then, should you take recommendations and advice from a layman with reference to your expenditures on public works?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In matters of this kind recommendations coming from someone in the district who is well known to the department, and whose recommendations in the past have worked out well, always carry weight.

Mr. SHORT: But the district engineers are certainly familiar with every part of the district and they would know best who should prove the most suitable man.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt the district engineer is the man who really settles the question as to the foreman.

Mr. SHORT: Who is Mr. McColl? You must know who he is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my memory serves me, he was the Liberal candidate in the last election.

Mr. SHORT: No, he was not; you are wrong there.

Mr. BROWN: Tell us who he is, then.

Mr. SHORT: We want the minister to tell us. He knows who he is.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I really do not know that I know the gentleman.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister tell us what influence Mr. McColl has? Why are his instructions taken, as apparently they are, with respect to all these matters?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt that if his recommendations were taken it was because the officials of the department knew who he was and in the past had found his recommendations satisfactory. There must have been some reason for it. I have no recollection of any personal acquaintance with him. That is all I can say. I have nothing in my papers to indicate.

Mr. FORKE: The leader of the Progressives would know.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) suggests he is one of his old colleagues.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That may be.

Mr. FORKE: I met him in Halifax and I know he is a very fine fellow.

Mr. CANTLEY: For the edification of the minister I might refer him to a letter dated September 8, 1928, which is addressed by the district engineer at Halifax to Mr. MacLean. Mr. MacLean was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. McColl and the letter states that after conversation with Mr. McColl it had been decided that all the outstanding accounts had not been forwarded, and that having been done the gentleman would not perform any further work. The letter goes on to say that the completion of pay rolls and accounts would be expected not later than September 14, 1928. No further work was done for some considerable time. Later Mr. McColl recommended the appointment of another man and he went on with the work. I want to know why Mr. McColl directs the operations of the department in Pictou county as he evidently does. He was not the defeated candidate; he never was a candidate for the federal house. Why does the minister take orders from him and obey his instructions?—because that is virtually what has been done in two or three cases.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know that I know who he is.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You said he was the Liberal candidate.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was under the impression that he was. And that perhaps is the best evidence my hon. friend can have that the gentleman's recommendations were not accepted on that ground. So far as appointments made by the engineer are concerned, I have no doubt he consults in each locality someone on whom he thinks he can rely. We endeavour to get the best foremen we can, and I must say that in all the work done there has been very little complaint in the district about our not having been able to secure the services of a competent foreman. Personally I have no knowledge of the matter.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. CANTLEY: I want to tell the minister that the record is full of instances that show McColl as having directed and practically controlled the work of the department in the county.

Mr. BANCROFT: Is that the Duncan report? What is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. JACOBS: It seems to me that if Mr. McColl is not permitted to function while the government is in power he certainly will not be able to do anything when my hon. friends come into office. He is making hay while the sun shines. I do not think any blame can be laid at the door of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. HANSON: That is a valuable contribution to the debate.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. McColl recommended Mr. MacLean. His work was not satisfactory, judging from the report of the district engineer, who reported to his chief that the work was the worst of the kind he had ever seen. Then there was further trouble with his accounts and he was asked to explain having put in an account for a certain amount of work. The engineer says that he was on hand on the day for which an item was put in for labour and that the man was not in attendance at the wharf at all and could not have done any work. The explanation then was that he was at home sharpening saws and doing other work of that kind. That is the type of man Mr. McColl recommended; but notwithstanding that, he is allowed to recommend another man to do the same class of work. There is no evidence that work of any consequence was done; the work remains undone. Is not that the fact?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was $14,000 worth of work done.

Mr. CANTLEY: Out of how much?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Out of $25,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: In other words, about one-half the work contemplated was done. The fact is that a state of affairs exists there which is not creditable to the department and they had better make a change.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. friend wants to be fair in the matter.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, I want to be fair.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, only a moment ago I drew his attention to the fact that this wharf did not come under the jurisdiction of the department until July 12.

Mr. CANTLEY: Pardon me; I am referring to the Arisaig breakwater, not the wharves at Pictou. All my discussion during the last few minutes has been with reference to appointments made on the recommendation of Mr. McColl, and I was instancing work carried on in connection with not the Pictou wharves but the Arisaig breakwater.

Item agreed to.

Port Maitland—breakwater extension, $50,000.

Mr. SHORT: Last year $50,000 was voted for this work which is being carried on in the constituency of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and there is $50,000 again this year. How much of that work was done last year and what expenditure was made out of that sum?

Mr. CANTLEY: We have not yet finished with the Pictou Wharf.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will recall it.

Mr. CANTLEY: That makes a difference; we are not through with the Pictou wharf yet. What is the intention of the department with regard to completing that work? About half of the work contemplated has been carried out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are asking for a revote of $10,000 which is to be provided towards repairs to wharves, as follows: repairs to east wharf, $2,750; repairs to shed wharf, $6,850; repairs to west shed wharf, $400, making a total of $10,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is for this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will that work be done by contract or day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should think day labour would be the only way to carry on that work satisfactorily, and I will give my hon. friend the reason. When it comes to repairing an old wharf, the condition of which cannot be ascertained until the flooring is taken up or something of that sort done, for years the practice of the department has been to do such work by day labour. It has been found that when such work is advertised everything is presumed against the old wharf and there are always extras, things which must be done and which could not be foreseen, making it necessary for the contractor, who is not sure just what may be the condition of the old wharf, to put in an estimate usually much larger than the amount for which the work could be done by day labour.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister has appealed to my sense of fairness, and I will admit frankly that probably he is correct in this case. However, I want to point out that the work done last year consisted almost entirely of re-covering the top of the wharf; and practically nothing was done with regard to the piling or the underwork. Both wharves are in bad condition with regard to the substructure and piling, and a very great deal more work must be done than it will be possible to do with the amount of money voted this year. I am thoroughly familiar with that situation and have known of it for years; the wharves have been neglected for a long time, and they are only standing to-day by the grace of God. That is the situation, and I trust that the minister will see to it that the work is begun immediately and carried on without delay until this amount of money is expended. I submit to him, however, that the amount voted is not nearly sufficient to complete the work as it should be done. I give the minister credit for having good intentions and for dealing with the work to this extent; I think perhaps he has adopted the most economical and indeed possibly the only way in which this work could be done, but I hope that in his supplementary estimates he will supplement this vote sufficiently to carry out all necessary work in connection with these wharves.

Item agreed to.

Port Maitland—breakwater extension, $50,000.

Mr. SHORT: Will the minister tell us how much money was expended on this work last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last year $15,132 was spent to March 31. This amount of $50,000 is required to provide for the completion of the work now under contract with Messrs. MacMillan and MacDonald, the amount of the contract being $62,711.95. Of this present vote $35,000 is a revote.

Mr. ERNST: Which Mr. MacMillan is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. A. S. MacMillan.

Mr. ERNST: Of Halifax?

An hon. MEMBER: Of Hudson Bay.

Mr. JACOBS: Surely the province can support only one Mr. A. S. MacMillan.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Apparently this firm includes Mr. A. S. MacMillan and Mr. C. R. MacDonald of Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Mr. SHORT: This amount is required to complete the contract? They did not complete their work last year, which I understand is an extension to the original breakwater there. I believe they have been working on this same breakwater for a number of years. Can the minister tell us how much money has been expended in this work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The recent expenditure was to provide for the construction of an extension to the breakwater 520 feet long, 20 to 25 feet wide on top, 32½ feet high at the outer end and building a break 400 feet long on the existing work. The amount of the contract was $62,711.95; inspection, contingencies and so on $2,288.05, or an approximate total cost of $65,000. The balance required is $50,000.

Mr. SHORT: Will this $50,000 complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister be good enough to tell us just how many contracts exist between Mr. A. S. MacMillan and the Dominion government? If he has not the information before him at the moment perhaps he might give it to the committee when his estimates are up again; it would be very interesting information. Just while we are on this item I would like to know if public tenders were called for, who the tenderers were and what were the different amounts of the tenders.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Tenders were called for.

Mr. HANSON: In what manner?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They were advertised. Perhaps I had better give my hon. friend all my information respecting this item. On June 6, 1928, the first call for tenders was received and Messrs. MacMillan and MacDonald were the lowest with a tender of approximately $58,033.53, which was accepted by order in council dated June 23, 1928. On receipt of a wire from the contractors stating that they had made a mistake in their unit prices, which should have been $62,969, it was decided to call for new tenders, which were received on July 25, 1928. The first tender was from M. A. Condon and Son and amounted to $69,808.96; the second was from MacMillan and MacDonald, amounting to $74,767.57, and the third was from J. W. and S. F. Comeau, amounting to $76,384.57. As the lowest of the tenders received on the second call, the amount of $69,808.96 was considerably higher than the price quoted by Messrs. MacMillan and MacDonald in their first tender, which amounted to $62,969. The matter was taken up with the firm and they agreed to work at unit prices, entailing an expenditure of about $62,711.95.

Mr. ERNST: Has this work been completed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This item is to complete it.

Mr. ERNST: Will this amount complete all the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. SHORT: Will the minister tell me the amount of the tender of J. W. Comeau?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That tender amounted to $76,384.

Mr. SHORT: I might say that Mr. Comeau is practically doing the work on this breakwater, so evidently Mr. Comeau and Mr. MacMillan, one being the lowest and the other the highest tenderer, have gotten together and split the contract in some way.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has given us some very interesting information, to the effect that on the second public call for tenders Messrs. Condon were the lowest tenderers, but nevertheless the contract was not awarded to them. Instead of that, a friend of the government was approached and asked if he would not do the work at his old unit price, and a contract was entered into practically without competition. I want to know if Messrs. Condon were asked, after the second tenders were called for, if they would do the work at the price previously tendered for by Messrs. MacMillan & MacDonald; was any offer made to them or did the department arbitrarily make a private contract—because that is what it amounts to—with Messrs. MacMillan & MacDonald.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I did not make myself clear to my hon. friend. The first tender which came from Messrs. MacMillan & MacDonald was for a total expenditure of approximately $58,033. My recollection is that that tender was based on certain unit prices, but a wire was received stating that a mistake had been made in the unit prices which were—

Mr. HANSON: We understand all that, but the minister has not apprehended my question. It appears that as the result of representations made by Messrs. MacMillan &

MacDonald the first tenders were abandoned and new tenders were called for. MacMillan & MacDonald were not the lowest tenderers; as a matter of fact they were about $5,000 higher than Messrs. Condon.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Who were $7,000 higher than MacMillan & MacDonald.

Mr. HANSON: Seven thousand dollars higher than the previous tender of MacMillan & MacDonald, who admitted that they had made a mistake in their unit prices and did not want to do the work for that amount of money. The department, in violation of the tender system and all that it implies, did not award the contract to Messrs. Condon, who were the lowest tenderers and who had every right to believe they would get the contract. Instead of doing that they go to their friend Mr. MacMillan, a second time and give him an opportunity to put in a third price which would be below the lowest tenderer. I want to know if that is the way to do public business. I am willing to bet without knowing anything about it that there will be claim for extras from MacMillan & MacDonald which will exceed their second tender price and we will be faced with another vote next year. Some explanation is due from the minister as to why Messrs. Condon did not get the contract in accordance with their tender and why the department, if they considered that Messrs. Condon's price was too high, did not give them an opportunity to bid on the lower price at which it was given to MacMillan & MacDonald. In all fairness to Mr. Condon he should have had the right to do that and I would like to know why he was not given that right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would like to ask the hon. member on what ground Mr. Condon had that right.

Mr. HANSON: Because he was the lowest of three tenderers on the second call for tenders, and if anbody had a right he certainly had one. He was occupying a preferred position with respect to the public tenders and I want to know why he was not asked if he would do it at the lower price, having regard to the figures the department had evidently compiled. I gathered from the minister that the department felt that all the tenders were too high. Is that not right?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. HANSON: That is what I gathered from what the minister said; the department felt that the price was too high, having regard to MacMillan's first offer. They got after MacMillan, who had failed on the second public competition, and they asked him to do it at a price somewhat lower than the price quoted by Condon. I want to know if Condon was given the opportunity to do it at that price.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think if the hon. member will permit me to repeat what took place he will be the first man in the house to say that we did the right thing. First of all, we called—

Mr. HANSON: You did the right thing by MacMillan.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And by the people of this country. First of all the hon. member said that Condon should have been given an opportunity on the second call to make a second quotation, and gives as his reason the fact that on the second call for tenders Condon was the lowest tenderer. If that is a good reason, applying to the second call for tenders, that the man who was lowest on that second call for tenders should have the first chance, then that is a good reason with regard to the first call.

Mr. HANSON: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps the hon. member will permit me to make my explanation.

Mr. HANSON: Did Mr. MacMillan not represent to the department that he had made a mistake in his unit price and it was too low?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and even allowing for the mistake which he made his figure was $62,969 and it was the lowest tender. Does the hon. member get that point?

Mr. HANSON: No, I do not understand that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will try to make it clear.

Mr. ERNST: Why was he not awarded the contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I will be permitted to make my explanation. We called for tenders and MacMillan & MacDonald were the lowest tenderers at a price of $58,033, but they wired us that they had made a mistake and my recollection is that they sent in the figures on which the estimate had been made, showing that instead of totalling $58,033 it should total $62,969. However, they were still the lowest tenderers.

Mr. HANSON: On the first call for tenders?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but just on the possibility that they had not made the mistake which they convinced us that they had made, the government felt that the safe course to take was to give everybody another opportunity of tendering.

Mr. PRICE: That is pure bunk.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If it is, then I submit to the superior judgment of my hon. friend in regard to matters of that kind; that is all I can say. We called for new tenders. The lowest tenderer was Condon & Son, with a price of $69,808; the next tenderer was quoting a price of $74,767.

Mr. SHORT: Who was that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: MacMillan & MacDonald. The highest tenderer was Comeau, with a price of $76,384. I submit that the proper course to take was that which my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is advocating, to give the preference to the lowest tenderer, not the second lowest tenderer. We should say to MacMillan & MacDonald, "Now, you tendered before for $62,969. True you were the lowest tenderer, but your second tender is $74,767." Under our contracts we are not bound to accept the lowest or any tender. We then find that if we had accepted what we were satisfied was the bona fide lowest tender on the first call for tenders, we would have had a contract for practically $7,000 less than the lowest tender on the second call. We say to MacMillan: We cannot accept your tender. Although you were the lowest tenderer the first time, we cannot even give the contract to you at the lowest of the second set of tenders, but if you will take the contract at the lowest tender that we have, which was your first tender of $62,969, we will make that an agreement. That was my recollection of the arrangement, and I think it will appeal to my hon. friend as having been a fair one.

Mr. HANSON: The fallacy of the minister's argument is this: that on the first call for tenders there was no tender from MacMillan and MacDonald that was acceptable. They practically withdrew their tender. I agree that the minister did the right thing in calling for new tenders. That was the only thing he could have done. He calls for a second set of tenders, and he finds that Messrs. MacMillan and MacDonald are not the lowest tenderers, but it is quite apparent the government wants them to have the contract. I do not know on whose recommendation this was. The Minister of National Defence has a right to recommend his friends if he wants to do so, and I would not find any fault with that at all. Mr. MacMillan did not get the contract in public competition, but as I said a moment ago, it is apparent that the minister and the government wanted Mr. MacMillan to have the contract, so they approached him and made a private arrangewith him. They never gave a single one of the other tenderers an opportunity to come in and say: I will do it for the same figure. If Messrs. Condon and Son had been willing to meet the reduced price of $62,969, in all fairness the contract should have been given to them. The minister is able to make out a case only becauses he can show that he got the work done for less than the lowest of the second lot of tenders. An injustice has been done to Messrs. Condon and Son just in order to give a contract to the minister's friends.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. HANSON: Before we leave the item for harbours and rivers of Nova Scotia, I am going to ask the minister to bring down a statement of all the contracts that thave been awarded to Mr. MacMillan by the government since 1926, and all the contracts that have been executed or are in the course of execution. We would like to see the magnitude of his work for the department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): And the reasons why he was favoured.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will answer the last question first. The reason he is favoured as any other man is favoured by the government, is because he was the lowest tenderer.

Mr. SHORT: He was not the lowest tenderer.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He surely was the lowest tenderer.

Mr. SHORT: He was not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Who put in a tender as low as $62,969?

Mr. SHORT: When the minister called for new tenders, MacMillan was not the lowest tenderer. When the minister makes a statement like that, I am quite in order in contradicting him.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He put in a tender for $62,969. Who else put in a tender as low as that?

Mr. SHORT: On the second call for tenders, Mr. Condon's tender was $69,808, and Mr. MacMillan's was $74,767. But the minister never asked Condon if he would revise his figure and he never asked Comeau if he would revise his. How long does the minister consider that a business concern doing business in that manner would last and have reputable firms deal with it?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It seems to be the custom of the Department of Public Works to declare tenders that come in to be unsatisfactory, then to have a visit from some firm which is the highest tenderer, with the result that this gentleman, a friend of the government, a man who is doing almost all this work in Nova Scotia and is creating dissatisfaction amongst his friends because he gets all this work, is given these contracts. Moreover, I have no doubt at all that if the work is unprofitable, there will be certain extras which may make it profitable. That applies, it seems to me, to almost every set of tenders for which the goverment calls. That is what happened in connection with the Bedford basin. The tender was declared unsatisfactory; Mr. MacMillan paid a visit to Ottawa with the result that he got the work, and I believe it cost more than the highest original tender.

Mr. ERNST: The Minister of Public Works is a member of the legal profession. Will he not agree with me that the situation is this: He publishes an advertisement calling for tenders. Those tenders constitute offers to the department, at which offers particular persons will do the work required. They are nothing more than offers, and, being offers, they can be withdrawn at any time before acceptance. Probably the minister will agree with me that far.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will say to my hon. friend just to clear that up: while the second set of tenders was being called—

Mr. ERNST: I was not dealing with those. I was putting forward an abstract proposition.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But as long as the deposit is held, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the tenderer cannot very well withdraw his tender.

Mr. ERNST: I just want to go on with my proposition. A tender can ordinarily be withdrawn. The minister calls for offers again. Surely the minister does not mean to insinuate or to suggest to the committee that, when calling for tenders a second time, the department retain the deposits of the tenderers in the first instance?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is exactly what we do.

Mr. ERNST: That is an irregular procedure, I would think.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a special safeguard.

Mr. ERNST: In any event, Mr. MacMillan chose to revoke his first offer. He revoked it by putting in an offer which was substantially higher. He could not have two offers before the department at the same time. If he did not have his first offer before the department, then only the second one remained. In the second call for tenders the department had three offers to do the work: Condon, $69,808; MacMillan, $74,767, and Comeau, $76,384. The lowest offer was that of Condon for $69,908. Under the prevailing practice the minister was bound to accept the lowest tender.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr ERNST: Well, if he did not accept it, he was equally bound, as a matter of courtesy and decency, to give the man who put in the lowest tender—and it was the lowest tender before the department, because MacMillan revoked his first tender—an equal chance with MacMillan to take the work on other terms. In the next place, the minister points out that MacMillan's contract price was $62,969. That is, he takes the work on the basis of his original contract price. I am going to suggest to the minister that there have been and will be extras in connection with this contract. That is obvious from the fact that if the contract price was $62,969, the minister would not now, before the contract has been completed, be calling for an appropriation of $65,000. Last year he had voted for this work the sum of $50,000 of which apparently $15,000 was expended. Of this year's vote of $50,000, $35,000 is a revote. If $15,000 was expended last year and the minister is asking for $50,000 further before the contract has been completed, it means that he is appropriating for this work $65,000, or between $2,000 and $3,000 more than the contract price, in anticipation of extras I suggest to the minister that next year he will be back with a further sum for extras.

Mr. DUFF: That is to pay the inspector.

Mr. ERNST: I do not think the inspector got paid under that vote. Surely the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough does not wish to suggest that the government would create a sinecure for some political friend.

Mr. DUFF: They always do. My hon. friend is ignorant. Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise.

Mr. ERNST: I am suggesting to the minister that there is $2,000 already appropriated for extras. I would ask the minister to tell the committee what the tenders were in the first instance. He has told us that MacMillian's was the lowest tender and amounted to $58,000 odd, but that MacMillian stated that he had made a mistake in his schedule, and he increased his tender to $62,969. I think the minister owes it to the committee to say who were the other tendering parties in the first instance and to give the amount of their tenders. In the second place, I think he owes it to the committee to say whether there was any change in the specifications when the tenders were called for the second time, because the tenders were all higher, and it would seem there must have been a change in the specifications to make such a change in Mr. MacMillan's tender. If there was a change in the specifications, why was the contract awarded on the basis of the first specifications?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to answer my hon. friend by calling his attention to what perhaps he overlooked when I was giving the details before. The amount of the contract is $62,711; inspection, contingencies, and so forth, $2,288.

Mr. ERNST: How much of that is contingencies and how much inspection?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Inspection, contingencies and so forth, $2,288.05.

Mr. ERNST: How much of that is inspection?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It all comes under the one heading. There is no division between them. The approximate total cost of the work was $65,000. The total expenditure last year was $15,132.83. This $50,000 was asked for when it was thought that the probable expenditure before the 31st of March would be over $15,000. I think my hon. friend will see that there has been no increase in the amount asked. As to any change in the specifications, I can assure him that there has been none. The second tenders were called on exactly the same specifications as the first tenders, and as an additional safeguard, when Mr. MacMillian asked to be relieved on account of the mistake and had satisfied the officials of the department that he had made a mistake and that his tender was $62,969, the second call for tenders was only made after the 10 per cent cheque of Mr. MacMillan on his first tender was retained.

Mr. HANSON: Why was that done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was done so that we would have security that we would not have to pay beyond that amount in any event.

Mr. SHORT: You rejected the tenders.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, we did not; and it was because we did not reject them that the deposit was kept. In that way we still have Mr. MacMillan, the lowest tenderer in the first call, bound; we had his 10 per cent, and it was with that clearly in mind that the second call for tenders was made. That was only done with a view to checking up whether or not the increase from $58,033 to $62,969 had been an actual bona fide mistake on the part of the tenderer, and whether or not that was the best price at which we could let the work. When the new tenders came in we still had MacMillan's old tender of $62,969 and his deposit, and we still had as the lowest of the new tenderers, Condon and Son, who I believe the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in saying, were a perfectly good firm. None of the firms that tendered was blacklisted; they were all good firms. The tender of Condon and Sons was for $69,808.

Now I want to refer to the argument of the hon. member for York-Sunbury that the lowest tenderer should have the preference. We still had the lowest tender on the first call; that is the $62,969, and where my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg makes a mistake is that he takes it for granted that we had not taken the precaution of keeping the first tenderer bound by retaining his deposit. I have proven conclusively to the satisfaction of my hon. friends that we have done exactly what the hon. member for York-Sunbury says the lowest tenderer was entitled to. We took the precaution of calling for the second lot of tenders. None of them was as low as the lowest of the first tenders. None of them was as low as the tender for which we still held the deposit. If it was our duty, as my hon. friend says it was, to go to the man from whom we had the lowest tender, who was still bound to us, and say to him, "Your lowest tender is $74,767. You ask us not to hold you to your lower tender because you had made a mistake. If you are going to get the contract it will have to be at the lowest of the first tenders, namely, $62,969," and the preference was given to the lowest tenderer—

Mr. HANSON: You did not say a word to Condon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not a word more than we did to the other higher tenderers. We followed the course which my hon. friend says was the proper course. We went to the lowest tenderer. Why would we go to Condon, whose tender was $7,000 higher than the lowest tender? I want to say just another word, unless there is something any hon.

gentleman wishes to ask in regard to this matter. With regard to the first tenders, I am not able to give my hon. friend the particulars from the information I have here, but I shall be very glad to furnish that to him. As to giving a list of all the contracts that MacMillan has with the Department of Public Works, I shall be very glad to furnish that, but I think my hon. friend asked for a list of all the contracts that MacMillan had from the government. That would necessitate my going to the various other departments.

Mr. HANSON: Of course the minister is not responsible for any other department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to furnish that so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned.

Mr. ERNST: I think before this item passes we should have the tenders on the first call.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is a perfectly fair proposition, and I want to say to the committee that the more this matter is investigated the better it will suit me.

Mr. HANSON: Then the item will stand.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: Would the minister bring down the complete file, not only the first tenders, but the complete file relating to this particular expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Certainly.

Mr. ERNST: That is, the expenditures of last year relating to the letting of the contracts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Everything.

Mr. ERNST: As the item is to stand I do not want to prolong the discussion. But simply as a legal proposition, surely when the minister calls for second tenders that is tantamount to the rejection of the first tenders. In other words, the offer is rejected whether you retain the deposit or not. Look at the position you would find yourself in supposing in the second case Condon had tendered for $60,000; would you have let the contract to Condon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: He would certainly have got it.

Mr. ERNST: Without going back to Mr. MacMillan?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Certainly, because he would be the lowest tenderer.

Mr. ERNST: Then when you call for tenders the second time it is tantamount to a rejection of the tenders in the first instance. You cannot ask a man to make a second offer and hold his first offer open; you cannot ask other people to submit tenders in competition with him. If it is a rejection, and I submit there is no doubt that it is, then the only offers you had before you were the three you obtained when you called for tenders the second time, on which Mr. Condon was absolutely entitled to the contract which Mr. MacMillan got. One reason which prompts me to say something relative to it is the fact that this is not the only instance in which Mr. MacMillan has not been the lowest tenderer and yet has got the contract. True, the other instance was in the Department of National Defence, but when you have that recurring it creates suspicion. In the National Defence contract the MacMillan tender was $116,000; that of the Standard Construction Company was $109,000 in round figures. In that case Mr. MacMillan was allowed to put in private figures and was awarded the contract for $107,500. When those things recur in case after case, we on this side of the house can be forgiven if we think that all is not well.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think anybody needs to ask forgiveness for criticizing any of the public accounts. I quite agree that if the department is being conducted as it should be those in charge will welcome investigation into the expenditures made. It is no compliment to furnish all the papers in connection not only with this item but every other item that passes through the department. It may be a little difficult at all times to safeguard as well as they should be safeguarded, the rights of the people whose money we are paying out but, so far as I am concerned, anything in the way of scrutiny I think is perfectly proper; and it is not merely the function, it is the duty of my hon. friend to demand it. So we are all agreed as to that. Now, as to the proposition of law, that by calling for the second tenders we had repudiated the first tenders, I think my hon. friend will reconsider the matter when he realizes—and this is a matter to which I gave some thought—at the time it was going through, and I am practically certain I am right and the deputy is of the same view—that we retained the first tenders. We did that to make sure that we would not lose the benefit of them in case they should be lower than the second ones that we would get. We called for tenders a second time in order to check up an error which it was claimed had been made. That is the object of stating in the advertisement that the lowest or any tender would not necessarily be accepted.

Mr. HANSON: Is not that put in for the purpose of being able to reject tenders from those who are on the black list, contractors who had fallen down on previous contracts?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is one of the reasons.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister think it a proper principle in connection with contracts for public works that there should be this continual private bargaining? That is the objectionable feature about this contract, that it was done—I do not say improperly—under cover without the other tenderers knowing anything about it. Reputable contractors will not tender for these big public works unless they think they are going to get a fair deal, and the minister will find that such men will be not available unless they are sure there is no private bargaining behind closed doors. That is the objectionable feature about this contract.

Mr. SHORT: Was there any change in the specifications from the first time that Mr. MacMillan first tendered for this work and time of his second tender?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that there was none.

Mr. SHORT: I should think you would be rather suspicious of those figures. In the first case his tender was $62,969, and in the next $74,767, a difference of $12,000. I would be rather suspicious of a contractor who put in tenders like that. This is the man to whom the contract was awarded, and on his first offer.

Mr. BENNETT: I put this to the minister. The calling for tenders the second time was, so far as the department is concerned, merely asking people to tender subject to an unknown tender which would be accepted if they exceeded its figures. In other words, the government said to decent people who desired to tender for the work: We will receive your tenders, you believing that you are tendering for the work, but you are really tendering against a tender which we hold in reserve. The very argument for retaining the deposit was that they were going to give that contractor the contract if they could, and all the tenders were against his tender. Is not that the situation? All the sophistry in the world does not get away from the fact that in the files of the department was that tender and when you put in the second advertisement for further tenders, of necessity those who responded were tendering against that secret pigeon-holed document. I say that is wrong. The intention was to give the family contractor of Nova Scotia the business, and nobody else, and that is what happened. I agree with what the member for Digby (Mr. Short) says, that when you see a thing like that it should make any engineer, any minister, or any deputy suspicious that the tenderer knows a good deal more about it than the tender indicates.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend's argument, perhaps, would have more point if it were not for the fact that such was not the case. When the tenders were opened, what occurred? Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that in point of fact the people who tendered did not know what the lowest tender was at the time the first set of tenders were opened?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They all do. Don't think that these contractors do not know what their competitors are doing.

Mr. BENNETT: I never suspected any leak like that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is done openly.

Mr. BENNETT: How could it be done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: When the tenders are opened they are public.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the first prices were announced before the second tenders were called?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: By whom?

Mr. ELLIOTT: By the committee of the department who opened the tenders.

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen a good deal of that and I am going to furnish some information about it presently.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend has. If he can suggest any way that is more open and gives every contractor from one end of the country to the other a fairer chance than that does, I should like to have his suggestions.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister wanted to be fair about it his notice would be: "Subject to a reserve tender of so many thousand dollars, sealed tenders will be received up to such-and-such a date at twelve o'clock noon for the construction of the work." He should have said, "These tenders are subject to a reserve bid of $62,000", or whatever it was, and then the tendering public would have known. Otherwise the public was tendering against a secret pigeonhole document about which no one knew except the minister and his friends. And they kept the man's cheque so that they could say, when the time came, "You have it now beyond peradventure; your cheque was never parted with". What other construction can be placed on the matter? If my hon. friend had to deal with it as a matter of law what would he say? He would say, "You are subject to a reserve bid". But not having so stipulated, the lowest of the second tenderers should have got the work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend has the facts as to what took place—the different calls for tenders; what does he say should have been done? What tender should have been accepted?

Mr. BENNETT: The cancellation of the first call for tenders was within the right of the government. But when it did not exercise that right it could not approbate and reprobate at the same time. It could not keep the tender of one tenderer up its sleeve and ask the world to tender, not knowing that fact. It should then, having called for new tenders, have made known to the tendering public that these new tenders were called for subject to a reserve bid of so many dollars by a known tenderer. If it failed to do that, then the department was not fair to the others who tendered. In other words, there either was or was not need of the first set of tenders. If they were rejected in toto then there was a new calling for tenders, and that new calling for tenders should not have been subject to the first call, because many things might have happened in the meantime; the price of material might have changed. But once new tenders were called for, then everything that took place under the first set of tenders was eliminated and should have been forgotten. If it was not, it was not fair to the other tenderers who, as I have said, tendered against a reserve bid. And that reserve bid was the bid that subsequently got the work. That is the story.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend makes that argument seriously—and I know he does, and it sounds well—he has used a most unfortunate expression in speaking of a reserve bid. I would ask my hon. friend a question as to his practice as a solicitor in selling farms, for instance, subject to conditions. When he has a reserve bid fixed, is it his policy, has it ever been his policy, to let the tendering public know what that reserve bid is?

Mr. HANSON: Very often.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Never.

Mr. HANSON: Excuse me.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, I will not say never, because I have never had the privilege of practising down in the province in which my hon. friend lives. But I know that they do not do it in the section where I have conducted sales—

Mr. HANSON: The public is notified frankly, "This property is subject to a reserve bid of so much"; and that is notice that if they do not reach that figure they do not get the property. That is often done. If there is no reserve bid you state in your advertisement, "Property sold without reserve". Did my hon. friend never hear that expression? Surely.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: There are two kinds of sales.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but I appeal to hon. gentlemen who have attended sales where there was a reserve bid. After a certain amount of bidding has taken place the auctioneer says, "This property is being subject to a reserve bid"; and he opens the envelope containing the reserve bid, which has been kept secret up until the time he looks at it. And even then he does not disclose what the reserve bid is. He says that the reserve bid not having been reached he must decline to knock the property down to any purchaser. I am speaking only of the practice that has been followed where I have practised law for a good many years. That is the practice, and I know of no exception thereto. Now, with regard to this question which I asked the leader of the opposition, his argument brings us to this point: The first man's tender and all the first tenders should, he says, have been obliterated; the proper thing to have done, if we were to call for new tenders, would have been to have forgotten all about the first tenders. But what would have been the position? We should then have had to grant this contract to Condon & Sons, whose tender amounted to $69,808. That is what my hon. friend says should have been done, and that would have meant our paying $7,000 more for the work than we did.

Mr. BENNETT: Are the extras settled yet?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The contract is not yet completed.

Mr. BENNETT: Every contract of which we have any record, so far as this gentleman is concerned, has always involved a claim for extras, and that would carry the figure beyond the first contract.

Mr. HANSON: One thought occurs to me. Why was not Mr. MacMillan held to his first offer? That is a very pertinent inquiry. Is the Department of Public Works in the habit, if a contractor says that he has submitted too low an offer, of doing what it has done in this case? If they wanted to protect the public treasury why did they not accept the offer of $58,000? It seems to me that would have been more praiseworthy. Why did they give him a chance to withdraw? They had a legal offer to which they could have held him; they had 10 per cent. They did not have to call for new tenders.

Mr. JACOBS: It was an error.

Mr. HANSON: I am addressing my remarks to the minister, not to the silent reserve at his side.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to the new minister.

Mr. HANSON: The point, I submit, is one to which the minister might direct his attention. I am curious to hear his defence.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am delighted to tell my hon. friend what strikes me with regard to his point. As I understand the hon. gentleman, he wants to know why we did not hold to his original offer the man who said, "I made a mistake when I tendered at $58,033; I really intended my tender to be $62,969". Now although I have not the engineer's estimate before me, my recollection is that not only was that $62,969 the lowest of the first tenders received, but that the $58,000 tender was considerably below the estimate. The object of calling—

Mr. HANSON: What was that estimate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to get the information, but apparently it is not here.

Mr. HANSON: At this point will the minister tell us whether Mr. MacMillan discovered his mistake before or after the tenders closed?

Mr. BENNETT: That is an important point.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it was after the tenders closed.

Mr. BENNETT: He suddenly discovered his tender was too low.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: The figures presented satisfied the department that it was an error. Subsequent tenders were called for in order to check that up and give the contractors an opportunity to show whether or not any one of them was willing to do it for that amount or less. Now I want to put this to the fairness of my hon. friend: The very fact that we received three tenders, the lowest of which was over $11,000 higher than the $58,000 tender and $7,000 higher than the tender which this man said he really intended to submit,—this very fact, I say, is the best evidence we could have that there had been a bona fide mistake and that the real tender he intended to submit was $62,969.

Mr. HANSON: That will all depend upon what the other figures of the first calling of tenders reveal.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That may have some bearing.

Mr. McNUTT: Did the wire received from the MacMillan firm specify wherein the error lay—whether it was in the unit price or in the extension figures?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think he claimed it was in the unit price.

Mr. SHORT: Do I understand that the minister has not the first tenders, or the figures of the first tenders, with him?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, I have not the list of replies to the first call for tenders; I cannot tell as a matter of fact whether there were others.

Mr. SHORT: The MacMillan tender was the lowest received on the first call, but the minister has not the others?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. SHORT: Probably the next tender was $62,900, and that may be the reason why it was given to MacMillan.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As I say, I am not sure there was another tender.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Would the minister give us the date on which the first call for tenders was closed and also the date on which Mr. MacMillan told the department he had made a mistake in his original tender?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I have the information my hon. friend requires. On June 6, 1928, the first call for tenders was received.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That was the opening date; what was the closing date?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was shortly before June 23, because on that date Mr. MacMillan was notified that his tender of $58,000 was to be accepted.

Mr. ERNST: Then after the tenders were opened and became public property Mr. MacMillan increased his tender by $4,000?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You had accepted his tender of $58,000 before you gave him a chance to make his tender of $62,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We first refused—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Just a moment; you said you notified him that his tender of $58,000 had been accepted, but he was subsequently given a chance to tender for $62,969. Will the minister explain at whose instigation this was done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think that is correct.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Then it is correct that Mr. MacMillan's tender, being the lowest, was accepted at $58,300, and later you notified him that the department had accepted his tender. Then he sent a telegram stating that he had made a mistake in his tender, and you gave him a chance to tender again for $62,969. If this is the way the public business of the Dominion of Canada is to be carried on I think it is a sorry reflection upon the government of this country.

Mr. JACOBS: Now that the hon. gentleman is a member of the house probably he will help improve the government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I am not talking to you at all; you are not the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You are not even nearly the minister.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I would like to ask the minister a question; he has probably answered it already, but I did not hear him. Were the deposits of the other tenderers in the first instance returned to them?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not in a position to say how many tenderers there were in the first instance; there is nothing in the details before me to that effect, but I shall be glad to furnish the information.

Mr. ERNST: The minister is to bring down the complete file?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. SHORT: And in the meantime the item will stand?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item stands.

St. Francis Harbour—breakwater extension, dredging and groyne, $33,000.

Mr. HANSON: In what county is this harbour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. SHORT: Is this work to be done by contract or by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is under contract.

Mr. SHORT: Who has this contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Thomas P. Charleson.

Mr. HANSON: Let us have the details of this item; we might find it as interesting as the last one.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to hear any suggestions my hon. friend may offer. This amount is required to provide for completing the following works at St. Francis harbour—

Mr. HANSON: Where is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough. This is to provide for a breakwater extension. A contract was let for this work on September 5, 1928, to Mr. T. P. Charleson of Ottawa; the amount of the contract was $23,445. The work will consist of a timber cribwork extension to the present breakwater, 16 feet wide on top and 300 feet long measured on the harbour face, together with an ell at the outer end, 50 feet long measured on the harbour face. This amount is also required for dredging. An order in council was passed on August 30, 1928, accepting the tender of the Beacon Dredging Company, Limited, of Halifax, for the removal of 13,750 cubic yards, scow measurement, from a crib site 45 feet by 100 feet to 10 feet at low water, and from a basin 450 feet by 50 feet to 110 feet wide to a depth of 16 feet at low water. This also includes a proposed groyne, which is designed to prevent the gravel from spreading along the breakwater and finding its way around the end. This groyne will be 100 feet long, 8 feet wide and an average of 8 feet high, built of solid crib work. The probable total cost of the work is $38,000; the expenditure made last year was $5,497; a revote of $30,000 is required together with a new vote of $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Who had the contract for the groyne? Was it awarded the Beacon Dredging Company?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The groyne is estimated to cost $768.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Who is the president of the Beacon Dredging Company?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot say.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Do you know any of the members of the firm?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Who signs their letters? There must have been some correspondence.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot say offhand; we will have it in the department.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Perhaps the mininster could tell us to-morrow?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. HANSON: I presume there was a public call for tenders, so perhaps the minister could tell us how many tenders were received, together with the amounts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Three tenders were received for this work in response to a public advertisement of July 20, 1928. The first tender was from Thomas P. Charleson, and amounted to $23,445; the second was from W. E. Landry, amounting to $29,303 and the third was from Charles McNeil and Alex. G. Fraser, amounting to $33,640.20. The chief engineer's estimate of the cost was $25,000.

Mr. HANSON: Has the contract been sublet, and if so who is the subcontractor?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not see anything in the details I have as to its being sublet.

Mr. HANSON: The department should know.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think it has been sublet.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): In what county is this place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in the same county I mentioned just a moment ago, Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): There was some work done there last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, $5,197.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Is that the locality where a lot of dredging was done and when they went to take the dredge out they found that they had to turn around and dredge themselves out?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not able to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): You had better get posted before you come back here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the hon. member state that there was some place where that occurred?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I understand so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could I have the name of the place?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Perhaps I can give it to you to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): That occurred at more than one place. You will remember that a year or two ago we were discussing L'Archeveque harbour. A dredge was brought in there and could not get out. Some overcasting was left there and I put a question on the order paper with respect to the matter. The minister answered that he had no knowledge of any overcasting having been left there. But the overcasting was left there in the little boat channel.

Mr. ERNST: I understood the minister to say that the contract price was $23,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: Why is the total vote $38,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is $33,000.

Mr. ERNST: There was $5,000 spent last year, making a total of $38,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is made up as follows: Breakwater extension, amount of contract, $23,445; dredging, amount of accepted tender, $10,312; groyne, estimated cost, $768; inspection and contingencies, $3,474.50; making a probable total cost of the work, $38,000, less probable expenditures for 1928-29, $5,000, leaving the balance required $33,000.

Mr. QUINN: What is the population of St. Francis Harbour, and what is the extent of the business done there? Why should such amount be expended on such a small place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that St. Francis Harbour is a fishing settlement on the north shore of Chedabucto bay, ten miles east of Guysborough and twenty miles from Mulgrave, the nearest rail connection. The population of the settlements from which the fishermen come to this place for the fish is about 200.

Mr. ERNST: How many boats come there?

Mr. DUFF: A gentleman named Walter McNeil, a very good Conservative, has about 250,000 cords of wood which will come down the river to be shipped from St. Francis Harbour.

Mr. HANSON: He would not be shipping it over the breakwater.

Mr. DUFF: That is all you know about it.

Mr. HANSON: I would not think so.

Mr. DUFF: Why do you say so?

Mr. CANTLEY: Who is the Conservative at Pictou?

Mr. DUFF: Walter McNeil.

Mr. CANTLEY: I never knew of a McNeil in Pictou county who did not vote Grit.

Mr. DUFF: Walter McNeil was a Conservative candidate in 1921.

Mr. CANTLEY: He did not stay that way very long.

Mr. DUFF: Thank God for that.

Mr. ERNST: I asked a question as to how many fishing boats used the harbour.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The nearest I can come to answering the hon. member's question is the value of fish marketed. That amounts to from $7,500 to $10,000 annually.

Mr. ERNST: Do I understand that this is being done for Mr. McNeil?

Mr. DUFF: I asked for it, so I should know why it is being done.

Mr. ERNST: Then it is being done for Mr. Walter McNeil?

Mr. DUFF: I would say partly.

Mr. ERNST: What proportion?

Mr. DUFF: Thirty-three and one-third per cent.

Mr. HANSON: To pay for his apostasy.

Mr. ERNST: I would like to know if Mr. McNeil is cutting this pulpwood from his own lands for himself, or is he cutting it for American companies?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount of wood estimated to be cut is 90,000 cords and the extent of the shipping operations is estimated to be 15,000 cords per year. There are also tracts of land adjacent to the Boylston Lumber Company's area which would produce 80,000 cords additional.

Mr. ERNST: Then it is being done for the 95,000 cords of wood?

Mr. DUFF: Two hundred and fifty thousand cords altogether.

Mr. ERNST: An exaggeration of 150,000 cords is not much for the hon. member.

Mr. DUFF: You are very smart, aren't you?

Mr. ERNST: I think the committee should be informed as to whether or not this wood is cut by an American company or is being shipped by a British subject.

Mr. DUFF: It might be owned by Russians.

Mr. HANSON: Is this another Matane case where the government is making a grant of the public money to assist in shipping raw material out of this country and depleting our natural resources? The government robbed the Canadian National railways of the carriage of pulpwood from that place by building a large pier to enable the American company to carry the pulpwood out of the province of Quebec to be manufactured in the United States.

Mr. DUFF: This is going to Liverpool.

Mr. HANSON: I do not dispute my hon. friend's word but I do not think he knows where it is going.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes, I do.

Mr. HANSON: If this pulpwood is being cut on the Hollingsworth and Whitney property then I can tell the minister it will be going to the state of Maine.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Boylston Lumber Company, Limited, a holding company, own over 8,000 acres of land on the Goose Harbour river, on which is standing about 90,000 cords of pulpwood. This company would immediately commence operations on a large scale if arrangements for shipping the wood could be made. At the present time it is practically impossible to ship any wood out of this section of the country, except by small schooners, and by taking the chance of loading wood in the bay without any protection. Under present competitive conditions it is impossible to carry on pulpwood operations, unless large quantities can be handled and shipment made by steamers.

Mr. ERNST: The committee should have some information as to who the Boylston Lumber Company is, and where the wood is going. In a former case, where the government were doing something for a purely British company, they contributed one-third of the cost. If this is a United States company and if the wood is to go out of Canada, I think the company should contribute the whole cost.

Mr. HANSON: I think the item had better stand until we get the information.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will provide the information.

Mr. CANTLEY: Can the minister find out if there is any wood there at all? I doubt if there is any.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have the report from the engineer as to the quantity of wood that is there. I think the item should pass.

Mr. HANSON: Let it stand. The engineer's report could not be first-hand. He did not cruise the property. He is giving what somebody told him.

Mr. ERNST: Is there on file any correspondence from the Boylston Lumber Company?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am not able to say. All the reference that I have under my hand is to the report of the engineer.

Mr. ERNST: Is there on the file nothing from anyone but the engineer? Surely the engineer does not pretend to give the amount of timber on a particular piece of property?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is "a petition from the residents of St. Francis habour transmitted and endorsed by Mr. William Duff, in a letter dated March 9, 1927," and there is the engineer's recommendation.

Mr. ERNST: We have the frank admission by the minister that the real reason for this being done is because the Boylston Lumber Company require it. If it were not for the fact that the pulpwood could not be shipped out without this being done, it would not be done. The committee should be informed who the Boylston Lumber Company is, and where the wood is going.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Walter McNeil is a very enterprising citizen of this country who has large investments in Nova Scotia, and I am pretty sure he is the manager of the Boylston Lumber Company.

Mr. ERNST: I should like to know who the stockholders of the company are and where the wood is going.

Mr. DUFF: How can we know where the wood is going?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can perhaps clear up my hon. friend's suspicion that this is being done entirely for the company, because after speaking about the necessity for providing facilities for getting the wood out, the engineer goes on to say:

> There is another reason for which these harbour improvements should be made, particularly the extension to the breakwater, and that is that St. Francis harbour is the centre of an important fishing district and if coastal steamers could call at that place, business connected with the fisheries would be very materially assisted and should develop. There seems to be no other means of providing a calling place for said coastal steamers except by the extension of this breakwater, therefore, to accommodate the fishing business and to encourage this important pulpwood operation. I would recommend favourable consideration of the extension to the breakwater, the construction of a protecting groyne on the outer side of the gravel beach and the dredging of a loading berth and approach thereto.

Item agreed to.

Short Beach breakwater extension, $7,500.

Mr. SHORT: Where is this Short Beach? Some of my hon. friends behind me want to know if this was named after me, but I repudiate any knowledge of it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in a very good section of the country. It is in Shelburne-Yarmouth.

Item agreed to.

Sober Island wharf repairs, $1,500.

Mr. MacNUTT: Where is Sober Island in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am in a position to tell where that island is. It is in the county of Halifax.

Mr. MacLAREN: I suppose the island is quite a small one?

Mr. McINTOSH: It has great possibilities.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population of the island is about 300, engaged wholly in the fishing industry.

Item agreed to.

South Bay, Ingonish—purchase, reconstruction and extension of Corson's wharf, $6,000.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): Has the government already purchased this wharf? I would like an explanation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: An order in council was passed on April 9, 1929, authorizing the acquisition from the estate of Mr. H. C. Corson of a wharf property, for the sum of $1,100, also the purchase from Mrs Bridget Peters for the sum of $50 of an additional fifteen-foot strip of land, adjoining the Corson right-of-way, required in connection with the proposed wharf at South Bay, Ingonish.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): On whose recommendation would that be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is a petition from the residents of North and South Ingonish, stating that a wharf at or near Corson's wharf would serve Ingonish Harbour, South Bay, Ingonish and Ingonish Centre in stormy weather, and provide a safe place for the steamer to land.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): Is it the intention to make it a government wharf for government steamers to call at? The petition must have been recommended by somebody. Who recommended it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not the names of the petitioners and I have not the petition. I assume that it would go to the district engineer. In his report he refers to the fact that this petition was presented.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): Is that to be a government wharf for government steamers to call at?

Progress reported.

At 11 o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 30, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Fifth report of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

PETITIONS

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas) moved:

That the petition of Lewis Coit Dargavel, presented on the 29th of April, praying for an act to dissolve the marriage between the petitioner and Grace Ethel Dargavel, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOODSWORTH

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday I stated that the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) was not present at the last meeting of the private bills committee. I find I was mistaken: he was present. I am sorry that I was misinformed, and hence misled the house.

INTERIM SUPPLY

ONE-SIXTH VOTE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that he has had a word with the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with regard to permitting interim supply to be granted. With that understanding I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the house to go into committee of supply to introduce a resolution to that effect.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): That is quite acceptable, Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself and those associated with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $40,909,873.57, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1930, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1930.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1930, the sum of $40,909,873.57 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1930.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is unnecessary to state that this supply is granted on the same terms as we granted interim supply a few weeks ago—without prejudice to our right to comment on the various items of the main supply bill, and that it shall not be taken that we accede to the soundness of any appropriation without the right to criticize it. I make that statement merely as a matter of form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Sections two and three agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Post Office

Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $16,305,000.

Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,176,175.

Yukon territory, $150,000–Total, $34,926,639.40.

Mr. BENNETT: A few days ago I ventured to direct the attention of the house to the fact that I had heard grave and disquieting rumours as to the administration of post office affairs in the New Brunswick district, I regarded the matter as of sufficient importance to suggest that the files dealing with the administration of affairs in that district in recent years be made available, and the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) having made such files available, it now becomes my duty to present to the house the facts as disclosed therein. I do so for the moment without any comment as to what the inferences to be drawn from them may be, and I leave it to the house and the country to determine whether or not a department which is administered as that department is should have the confidence of this country or of this house. The matters with which I have to deal concern the administration of the department in the district office. The office in New Brunswick is under the control of a single superintendent, Mr. Woods, and there are two inspectors, Mr. Emerson, the senior, and Mr. Griffith, the junior. As was indicated the other day at times relations between the inspectors have not been harmonious, for reasons which I shall indicate as I proceed to unfold the case to the house, but one of the difficulties came about in connection with shortages in one or two of the offices under the control of the district superintendent.

There is a small post office at Dupey's Corner, the postmaster of which receives about $144 a year; on investigation it was indicated that a shortage of $907.06 existed at this post office. The investigation of this office was entrusted to the junior inspector, Mr. Griffith, and in consequence of the investigation which he made under instructions from Mr. Atwater, one of the chief inspectors at Ottawa, he made a report which indicated, as I have said, a deficit of $907.06. In order that there may be no misapprehension in respect to these various matters I am afraid I must ask the indulgence of the house as I place upon Hansard the record as indicated by the file.

Office of District Superintendent of Postal Service.
St. John, N.B. August 2, 1926.

H. E. Atwater, Esq.,
Chief Inspector,
Inspection Branch,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

On account of complaints from the financial branch that the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, N.B., was delaying his remittances to the bank and also had not taken into account two error notices, the above-named office was visited and inspected by Inspector Griffith of this district on July 29th. At the completion of the inspection it was ascertained there was a deficiency of $907.06.

The postmaster was not present when the office was inspected but arrived home in the afternoon and Mr. Griffith collected from him the amount of $61.45 which brings the actual shortage down to $845.61. Duplicate and triplicate receipts and bank draft for $61.45 are herewith attached.

The first irregularity reported against this office was from the financial branch with reference to an alleged remittance of $170.00 per registered letter No. 377 entered in the postmaster's cash account on January 31st, 1926. After much correspondence the postmaster explained that he was of the opinion that this remittance had been destroyed by his four-year old child who accidently put same in the fire. The postmaster explained he was unable to pay this amount at once but made arrangements to send in $20.00 per month. To date he has made three payments of $20.00 each in May, June and July respectively. This leaves a balance of $110.00 in connection with this irregularity.

A further letter from the financial branch stated that an error notice, number not given, was forwarded to the postmaster in December, last, with reference to a remittance of $60.00 claimed at item 16 in the postmaster's cash account of the 30th November, forwarded under No. 353.

Another report was in connection with error notice No. 5899 for $10.00 to correct an error in the postmaster's return for the 31st of January 1926.

Another report was received regarding a deposit of $180.00 entered in the postmaster's cash account of June 8th alleged to have been forwarded to the Bank of Montreal on that date under registered number 463.

In the postmaster's account of July 22nd he claimed $608.57 worth of postal notes on hand. When the office was inspected on July 29th he had $173.51 worth of notes on hand.

The postmaster was instructed to make up his cash account to July 29th, inclusive, and forward same to the department, entering the amounts above stated on the debit side. Copy of financial statement is attached herewith.

Also attached you will find a translated copy of the postmaster's statement given to Mr. Griffith. It will be noted that he admits using post office funds for his own business, his method being to hold remittances and forward same after he had sold money orders, stamps and postal notes; also by claiming a larger amount of postal notes on hand than he had when the accounts were forwarded.

It will also be noted that the postmaster volunteers to make good this amount by monthly payments of $40.00. He was informed by the inspector that it was not likely the department would entertain this proposition and that he would be expected to forward the amount of the shortage without delay in order to avoid more serious consequences. The seriousness of his actions was drawn to his attention by the inspection officer and also in a letter from the district superintendent under date of July 31st.

The money order business of this office was closed out on July 29th and the money order books, postal notes, and equipment were removed. The office was l ft in the care of Mr. Hebert with a stamp credit of $25.00.

If agreeable to the department it is the intention to have an inspector again visit this office in the course of a few days to make a strong endeavour to collect the amount of the shortage.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) H. W. Woods,
District Superintendent.

That was the report made to the office at Ottawa with respect to the conditions existing in that post office. That report was acknowledged by the chief accountant on August 23, 1926, by letter which is also under my hand. It is directed to the district superintendent, and is as follows:

With reference to your letter of the 2nd instant, addressed to the chief inspector regarding the shortage in the accounts of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, I beg to say that the department is willing to consider the question of allowing the postmaster time to make the amount of his deficit good but before taking this up and endeavouring to fix an amount that should be paid each month I should like to be advised as to the postmaster's ability to fulfil any engagement in which he may enter. It is presumed that he has some business other than that of running the post office. Will you please let me know what is the nature of this business and whether its present standing is sufficient to guarantee the postmaster eventually making good all the shortage. What sureties, if any, can the postmaster give for the execution of any agreement in this connection?

That letter was signed by the chief accountant, and in due course a reply was sent from the district superintendent at St. John under date of November 9, 1926, as follows:

In reply to your letter of the 6th inst. regarding the balance due by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, and the assurance given that he would make good the sum of $200 by the 1st November, and at least $40 a month thereafter, would inform you that nothing further has been heard from this postmaster.

It is the intention of Inspector Griffith to visit this office within the next few days when a report will be made to the department.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) H. W. Woods,
District Superintendent.

At that time, as I have indicated, after crediting the amounts paid and deducting the salary and commission for October, amounting to $21, the balance due was $850.93. Then on September 9, 1926, a further letter was sent by the district superintendent, Mr. Woods, to the chief accountant of the financial branch, Mr. Austin Bill:

In reply to your letter of the 3rd instant, JAO/JMH, asking for a reply to your letter of the 23rd ult. regarding the shortage in accounts of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, N.B.—I beg to say that Inspector W. F. Griffith is expected to see the postmaster of Dupey's Corner some day this week and will give full information on his return to the office.

On December 1, 1926, Mr. Griffith wrote to Mr. Austin Bill and the letter, although marked personal, is now upon the file. I think, in the language of the editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press the other day, it will be admitted that no document is personal which deals with public business, as is the case here. This letter proceeds:,

With further reference to our conversation re shortage in accounts of the postmaster of Dupey's Corner, N.B. I beg to inform you I visited this office last week and while it was not possible to see Mr. Magee to ascertain whether or not he would endorse the notes for the postmaster I can personally assure you that there will be no doubt about the monthly payments as promised by the postmaster, and I would respectfully suggest that you concur in the arrangements set forth in official communication from the district superintendent's office of this date.

That letter is signed by Mr. Griffith and refers to a conversation he had in Ottawa with Mr. Austin Bill, chief accountant of the financial branch. On the same day a letter was sent, signed by the district superintendent and bearing under the signature the initial "G." It reads as follows:

With further reference to my memo of the 9th ult, and previous correspondence regarding balance due by the postmaster of Dupey's Corner, N.B., I beg to inform you Inspector Griffith visited Dupey's Corner last week and received from the postmaster the sum of $150 on account of the shortage.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The postmaster promised to pay at least $50 more by the 15th of December, and will complete the balance in twelve monthly payments.

The inspector is positively sure that the postmaster will be able to make the payments as promised, and it is respectfully recommended that the department concur in the recommendation.

Attached please find duplicate and triplicate receipts and bank draft for $150, as per above.

That letter was written by Mr. Woods, the district superintendent. It will be observed that in the letter written on the same day by Inspector Griffith he refers to Mr. McGee. Mr. McGee was not, so far as the correspondence indicates, in any way connected with the postal service and just why it was suggested that he should sign a note or give a guarantee for the default or deficiency in the Dupey's Corner office does not appear. I merely mention that in passing; otherwise, it might be thought that he was in some way connected with the office.

On December 3, 1926, two days later, the chief accountant at Ottawa directed a communication to Mr. Griffith, the inspector at St. John, reading as follows:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 1st inst. regarding the collection of the amount due the department by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner.

The matter has been taken up with the Deputy Postmaster General who has directed me to say that the offer of the postmaster to pay $50 a month can be accepted if the department has your personal guarantee that the payments will be duly and promptly made, or if a written endorsement of the postmaster's promise can be obtained in the form of a promissory note from Mr. McGee.

I would point out that it is necessary to have such assurance of payment as the postmaster has, both in the preparation of his accounts and in carrying out the promise already made not given the department reason to have great confidence in him.

I would point out that the suggestion of a personal guarantee to be given by Mr. Griffith comes from the chief accountant after Mr. Griffith had visited Ottawa and had discussed with him the deficiency at Dupey's Corner.

On December 11, 1926, Mr. Griffith wrote to Mr. Bill, the chief accountant at Ottawa, in these terms:

Replying to your AB-JMH of the 3rd instant with further reference to the collection of the amount due the department by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, I beg to inform you that I personally guarantee that the payments will be duly and properly made; that is, at the rate of $50 a month, not later than the 15th day of each month.

That note is marked "personal." It is quite true that it is now upon the files but just why a personal note should be written by a post office inspector at St. John, N.B., to the financial department of the post office at Ottawa, guaranteeing a deficiency or default in the accounts at Dupey's Corner post office in Westmorland county, does not appear.

The chief accountant acknowledged receipt of that letter, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding I am going to quote it. This letter is dated January 29, 1927, and reads as follows:

With reference to your letter of the 11th December, W.F.G./E., relating to the collection of the amount due to the Post Office department by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, in which you advised that you would personally guarantee that the payments would be duly and properly made at the rate of $50 a month and not later than the 15th day of each month, as no payment has been received this month I shall be pleased if you will advise me concerning this matter.

A reply to that letter was sent by Mr. Griffith on February 7, 1927, reading as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt fo your personal letter number JAO-JMH of the 29th ult., with reference to the collection of the amount due the Post Office department by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner. My absence from the office was the cause of same not being replied to sooner.

I may say that the postmaster has been sick in bed this last month or more, and was unable to make his payment in January. I am arranging to go down there some time next week and can assure you that a double payment will be forthcoming before the end of the present month.

I expect to be in Ottawa the early part of next week and will drop in and discuss this matter more fully with you.

Then we have a letter directed by the Deputy Postmaster General to his superior officer, namely, the Postmaster General, the present incumbent of that office. That communication is dated February 25, 1927, and reads as follows:

With reference to the attached letter from the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, N.B., to the Postmaster General, he is informed that on the inspection of the post office on the 29th July last there was established a shortage of $907.06, which was later reduced by adjustments to $874.93.

I might observe that the letter written by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner to the Postmaster General is not attached to this file but it is referred to in this letter of the Deputy Postmaster General to his chief. The letter continues:

The first payment received from him was $150 collected by Inspector Griffith and forwarded to the department on the 1st December. At that time the postmaster promised to make up the balance by a payment of $50 on the 15th December and monthly payments thereafter of the same amount. Inspector Griffith having recommended that this offer be accepted, he was advised that some further assurance of payment should be given. Mr. Griffith replied that he would personally guarantee that the payments would be duly and properly made not later than the 15th day of each month.

As no further payments had been received up to the 29th January Mr. Griffith was asked on that date to advise the department concerning the matter. He wrote on the 7th February that he expected to be in Ottawa the following week and would discuss the matter fully then. In an interview with the chief accountant Mr. Griffith said that he would see the postmaster personally on his return to New Brunswick and arrange for a double payment before the end of February.

In anticipation of this payment no further action has been taken by the department in the case.

That was a communication from the Deputy Postmaster General to his chief, who is now the incumbent of the office of Postmaster General. On March 23, 1927, the chief accountant at Ottawa wrote a further communication to the district superintendent, reading as follows:

When Postal Inspector Griffith was in Ottawa some weeks ago he stated that on his return to New Brunswick he would arrange for a double payment on account of the shortage in the Dupey's Corner account before the end of February. No word has been received from you in this connection. I shall be pleased to be advised as to the progress made.

Mr. Woods, the district superintendent, replied to that letter on March 2, 1927, as follows:

Receipt is acknowledged of the chief accountant's letter AB-JMH of the 23rd inst., with reference to the statement made by Postal Inspector Griffith when he was in Ottawa some weeks ago that when he returned to New Brunswick he would arrange for a double payment on account of the shortage in the Dupey's Corner account before the end of February.

The district superintendent begs to say that until the receipt of this letter he was not aware that the inspector had made this promise, and that on the return to headquarters of the inspector, who is now on field duty, the matter will be brought to his attention with the hope that the same may be adjusted to the satisfaction of the department.

That was the position on March 25, 1927. On April 14, 1927, a little less than a month later, the chief accountant at Ottawa again wrote to the district superintendent in these terms:

With reference to your letter of the 25th ult., HWW/M., in which you advised that Postal Inspector Griffith was on field duty and the question of the shortage in the Dupey's Corner accounts would be brought to his attention upon his return, as nothing further has been received relating to this matter I shall be pleased if you will advise me concerning the arrangements made as soon as possible.

On April 19, a few days later, the district superintendent replied to the chief accountant as follows:

Replying to your memo of the 14th instant, number JAO-JMH and previous correspondence, I beg to inform you that Inspector Griffith visited Dupey's Corner in connection with the shortage in the accounts of the postmaster of that office, and reports that owing to the illness of the postmaster, he was unable to make the payments as promised. It was arranged, however, that the sum of $150 will be forwarded to the department not later than May 5.

While the payments have not been made as promptly as promised, the inspector guarantees the department that the amount will be paid in full, and that the department will suffer no monetary loss.

To that letter the chief accountant wrote as follows on the 12th May:

With reference to your letter of the 19th ult., and previous correspondence, in which you inform me that owing to the illness of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner the promised payments have not been made but that arrangements had been made that the sum of $150 would be forwarded to the department not later than the 5th May, as no payment has been received I shall be pleased if you will advise me by return mail as to what action has been taken.

To that communication seven days later, namely, on the 19th May, 1927, District Superintendent Woods wrote as follows:

Replying to your letter of the 12th instant, JAO/JMH, referring to previous correspondence in regard to the indebtedness of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, N.B.

I beg to say that no payment has been received from this postmaster at this office, and on questioning Inspector Griffith, who has been dealing with this matter, he advises me that he has not heard from the postmaster since his report of the postmaster's illness on April 19th, and arrangements are being made to have the inspector again visit him at an early date.

On the 9th June the chief accountant again wrote the district superintendent as follows:

With reference to your letter of the 19th May—HWW/M—in which you advise that arrangements had been made to have an inspector visit Dupey's Corner at an early date with a view to collecting the shortage, as nothing further has been received in this division relating to this case I shall be pleased if you will advise me as to what action was taken.

I might inform you that after the salary has been applied to date the balance due is $668.93.

To that letter District Superintendent Woods sent this reply on the 17th June:

With further reference to the matter of shortage in the accounts of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, and in reply to your letter of the 9th inst, asking to be advised as to what action has been taken in this matter.

I beg to say that as stated in my letter of the 19th May, arrangements were being made to have Inspector Griffith visit Dupey's Corner at an early date.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Unfortunately, however, the inspector has not found it convenient to do so, and on the 13th inst. I made a personal visit and interviewed the postmaster, and received information from him, if corect would show that he has not been given full credit for all moneys that he has paid the inspector.

The inspector has not been in the office nor reported to me since the 6th instant, and I am awaiting his return to the office in order to get his explanation. As soon as this is received a full report will be made to the department.

I would ask you, therefore, to consider this confidential, and to hold the matter in abeyance until you further hear from me.

That letter was placed on the official file although the district superintendent marked it "confidential" and directed it to the chief accountant. I believe, in placing it upon the public file, the officer pursued the correct course. On the 20th June the chief accountant wrote to District Superintendent Woods in these words:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 17th inst. marked "confidential" regarding the shortage in the acounts of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner. Of course, you will realize that if there is anything serious in the transactions between the postmaser and one of your inspectors the matter cannot be kept from the heads of the departments. On the other hand, I am glad for the sake of the inspector referred to that it is not necessary to place your letter on file as it may cast reflections on him which are not justified by the unsupported word of a postmaster who has been grievously at fault in accounting for post office cash.

I note that you say that the inspector has not been in the office nor reported to you since the 6th inst. I would suggest that this is a matter on which a special report should be made to the department and not embodied in a "confidential" communication to one of the officials.

It was for that reason, I assume, that the letter was subsequently placed on the official file. I now come to a letter written on the same date, the 20th June, 1927, a very important communication. It was originally marked "confidential." It is dated at St. John and signed by District Superintendent Woods. It is addressed to the chief accountant of the Post Office Department at Ottawa, and reads as follows:

Referring further to the matter of shortage in the accounts of the postmaster of Dupey's Corner, and to my confidential letter of June 17 in which it was stated that I made a personal visit and interviewed the postmaster, and received information from him, if correct, would show that he has not been given full credit for all moneys that he had paid the inspector.

By referring to report from this office of August 2, 1926, WFG/S, it will be noted that Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, visited Dupey's Corner office on July 29, and at the close of his inspection he found that the postmaster was $907.06 short. After the inspection there was collected from the postmaster $61.45, which was deposited in the Bank of Montreal, Saint John, on August 3.

This reduced the indebtedness to $845.61.

According to our files the postmaster has paid nothing since, with the exception of $150 on December 1, which was placed to the Receiver General's credit in the Bank of Montreal on that date, as per deposit slip No. 2516.

Inspector Griffith, who was specially assigned this case, and who according to his letter of December 11 to the chief accountant, in response to one addressed to the inspector dated December 3, gave his personal guarantee that the payments promised by the postmaster would be duly made. Since then he has frequently been reminded of the indebtedness of the postmaster, and always gave assurance that the postmaster was all right and that he would see that the amount was collected, and on April 19, 1927, he reported that he had visited Dupey's Corner, but owing to the illness of the postmaster he was unable to make the payments as promised.

As I have not been satisfied with the course that the inspector has been pursuing in this case, and considering it strange that he would guarantee the postmaster's account, I decided to visit the office personally. This I did on the 13th inst., and in my conversation with the postmaster I concluded that there was something irregular going on.

The postmaster produced the following receipts, which I have now in my possession, for money paid to the inspector on account of the Post Office Department:—

Date of inspection:

July 29	$50
August 23	40
September 30	50

Besides this he stated, and verified the statement by entries in his registration book, that he sent to Mr. Griffith to his home the following amounts:—

Nov. 8—registered letter No. 526... $200
Dec. 2—registered letter No. 545.... 40

These registers have been traced and found that they were delivered by letter carrier to Mr. Griffith's house and signed for by Mrs. Griffith.

The $50 mentioned as being received on the 29th July I feel confident is part of the $61.45 that was deposited to the Receiver General's credit on August 3. This would mean that if the postmaster's statement was found to be correct there should be placed to his credit $330, instead of $150 as per bank receipt No. 2516, December 1, 1926.

On acount of the inspector's absense from the office I was unable to question him in regard to these discrepancies until this morning.

When asked how many payments the postmaster had made to him he replied that there were three, namely:

$ 60
40
50
Or a total of $150

and while he was unable to give the dates that he received these amounts he stated that from time to time he got the first until he received the third there would be about six weeks elapse.

He was then asked if the postmaster had made a payment at any one time of $200, and after hesitating a moment he replied "Yes", and stated he received it by registered letter. He was asked if he had received from the postmaster any other registered letter, but said "No". He was then told that the postmaster had stated to me that he had also sent by registered letter $40. The inspector then stated that he had no recollection of receiving this. He was asked if the $200 that he received from the postmaster by registered letter was on Post Office account, and he said "Yes". He was then asked why there was no record on the Dupey's Corner file of these amounts, and he stated that as he had become accountable for the amount due by the postmaster that he was holding them until the amount would make a fairly decent payment in order to make a good showing for the postmaster.

While the inspector has not yet admitted that he received the $40 that the postmaster says he sent on December 2, by register 545, I am quite convinced that he did receive this amount, and assuming this acording to my information there should be placed to the credit of the postmaster the following amounts:

August 23	$ 40
Spetember 30	50
November 8	200
December 2	40
Or a total of	$330

instead of $150, or a balance due from Mr. Griffith of $180.

It will be noted that the inspector received on or about November 9, $200, and that he did not place the $150 to the postmaster's credit until December 1, which would go to show that the reason he gave for not turning these amounts over when he received them is not a very substantial one.

Going into this matter a little closer I find that in a letter dictated by Mr. Griffith to the financial superintendent on December 1 he stated that he had visited Dupey's Corner last week, and received from the postmaster the sum of $150. In checking up his journal of proceedings for November I see that he refers to a trip to Dupey's Corner on November 15, leaving there that same day.

The postmaster advised me that he had not made any payment at any time of $150 to Mr. Griffith. It can, therefore, be assumed that he made incorrect statements in his letter of December 1.

Again in his letter to the chief accountant of April 19, he states that he had visited Dupey's Corner, and that owing to the illness of the postmaster he was unable to make the payments as promised. The postmaster said that he did not visit the office during the month of April, and there is no mention of his being at Dupey's Corner in his journal of proceedings for the month of April.

Mr. Griffith has just called upon me, and has delivered to me on account of the shortage of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, $180, and the same will be deposited in the Bank of Montreal, Saint John, this date.

That is the letter, as I have said, of the district superintendent, under date of June 20, 1927. Following that, a letter was sent by District Superintendent Woods to the acting financial superintendent, reading as follows:

Referring to previous correspondence concerning the indebtedness of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, I beg to report that the sum of $180 has to-day been deposited in the Bank of Montreal, Saint John, towards such indebtedness, and herewith are duplicate and triplicate receipts and bank draft for same.

Then followed on the 23rd of June, 1927, a letter addressed to Mr. Coolican, the assistant deputy postmaster general, and this becomes important, Mr. Chairman, in view of subsequent communications that I shall read. It is directed by the acting financial superintendent, Mr. Atwater, to Mr. Coolican, the assistant deputy postmaster general, and reads as follows:

Re Dupey's Corner, N.B., we find that original shortage was $844, and that at the present time we are still short about $469. The office only has a revenue of $144 yearly, and why the postmaster was ever allowed to go on as he did, I do not know as I believe the matter was taken up by Mr. Glover a year ago.

Instructions have been sent to the district superintendent to-day to inform the postmaster that he must make an immediate settlement of the balance, the reason being given that he has failed to keep his agreement to pay $40 monthly.

There appear to be certain very disturbing factors in connection with the payments that have already been made, and probably they will be reported on by the district superintendent.

That letter was dated the 23rd day of June, 1927. On the 24th of June, 1927, the next day, the acting financial superintendent, Mr. Atwater, wrote to District Superintendent Woods a letter which although marked personal is upon the file, and lest it be that a precis of it would not be satisfactory I venture to trespass upon the time of the house by reading it:

My attention has been called by the chief accountant to a very serious case in connection with the shortage at Dupey's Corner, N.B.

I find that out of the original shortage of $844, there still remains $469 owing the department, although it is nearly one year since the shortage was first brought under investigation. You will receive an official communication asking you to have this balance collected immediately.

Will you be good enough to see that personal attention is given to the matter, and that steps will be taken immediately to call upon the postmaster at Dupey's Corner to make good the balance of this amount without further delay. It cannot be expected that so large a sum of public money misappropriated by a postmaster can be left indefinitely for the postmaster to make good as he sees fit. The postmaster should have been placed under arrest when the shortage was first discovered if he failed to make it good. We have numerous cases, not nearly so seriou, one of them happened a few days ago, in which postmasters in other districts are promptly placed under arrest if they do not make good the shortage at once.

I do not know why the postmaster was allowed so much freedom, but it is quite evident that the case has been treated with a benevolence towards the postmaster, which is not usual. As the shortage took place a year ago, I am not aware of all of the facts, but in any case it is requested that this matter be adjusted without further delay.

To that communication District Superintendent Woods, on the 29th day of June, 1927, directed a reply, addressed to Mr. Atwater, the acting financial superintendent, reading as follows—and this letter becomes rather important in view of what subsequently transpired:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, 1-66 with reference to the serious case in connection with the shortage at Dupey's Corner, N.B.

The official notification to which you refer asking me to have the balance due by the postmaster collected immediately has also been received, and the postmaster under registered cover has been advised that it will be necessary for him to have the amount due, namely, $469.43, in my hands not later than July 5th.

You will remember that the chief accountant after consulting with the Deputy Postmaster General wrote a letter dated December 3rd to Mr. W. F. Griffith stating that the offer of the postmaster to pay $50 per month would be accepted if the department had his, Mr. Griffith's, personal guarantee that the payments would be duly and promptly made.

In response to this letter Mr. Griffith wrote on December 11th personally guaranteeing the account.

Will this demand made on the postmaster annul the guarantee given by Mr. Griffith, or will his guarantee still hold good?

I note that you say the postmaster should have been placed under arrest when the shortage was first discovered if he failed to make it good.

On July 31 the postmaster was written to and it was pointed out to him the seriousness of his position, and a number of sections were quoted from the Post Office Act among which was the following:

"Every officer of or connected with the post office who converts to his own use in any way whatsoever, or by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise or lends with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safe-keeping, transfer, disbursement, or for any other purpose, shall be deemed to have stolen so much of the said moneys as is taken, converted, invested, used or lent, and is guilty of an indictable offence."

He was told that the matter was being referred to the Post Office Department at Ottawa, and was advised that I was of the opinion that the department would not accept the offer that he made to the inspector.

A report dictated by Inspector Griffith was sent to you as chief inspector on August 2 giving information as to the shortage of the postmaster.

While this report did not recommend that criminal proceedings be taken against the postmaster, I may say that I was somewhat surprised when I did not receive authority from the department to do so, and I am at a loss to know why the postmaster was allowed so much freedom, and quite agree with you that he has been treated in a benevolent way.

It may be that the inspector's sympathy for him was made known to the department, but no early record of this is on file at this office, although a letter from the chief accountant dated November 6 refers to a conversation that took place with Mr. Griffith on October 14, which gave the chief accountant assurance that the postmaster would make good the sum of $200 by the 1st November, and at least $40 per month thereafter. Previous to this conversation the inspector had already collected from the postmaster $90 for which he had not given the postmaster credit. $40 of it was paid the inspector on August 23, and $50 of it on September 30.

It is quite evident that the inspector did not mention these payments to the chief accountant.

It is a sorry state of affairs when the action of trusted officials is such that their reliability is questioned, and it is regrettable that Mr. Griffith should so far forget his duties as an inspector as he has in this case.

I have my doubts as to the ability of the postmaster to meet this payment for I saw on my visit indications of poverty and distress, and the farm on which he lives belongs to his father and it is mortgaged up to its full value, namely, $1,400. However, he has been advised of the department's demands and you will be further informed in regard to the matter in a few days.

I am taking it for granted that you do not wish an arrest to be made until authority is received from the department.

On the 5th of July, 1927, District Superintendent Woods addressed a letter to the chief accountant, Mr. Austin Bill, reading as follows:

With reference to previous correspondence regarding the shortage in the accounts of Mr. Edouard R. Hebert, postmaster at Dupey's Corner, N.B., and in response to your letter of the 22nd ultimo, asking that the postmaster be called upon for an immediate settlement of the balance due, namely, $469.43.

The postmaster was written to on June 28 and advised that it would be necessary for him to have the amount of the shortage in my hands not later than July 5, and the following letter has been received from his father, Raymond F. Hebert:

"In answer to your letter to my son Edward, postmaster of Dupuis Corner, re shortage in his account, I must say that I had the occasion to meet the hon. Postmaster General yesterday and referred the matter to him and asked him to extend the time for one month to enable me to raise a part of the money and would make arrangement for the balance.

The hon. minister promised me to either write or phone you to-day.

Hoping you will grant me the extension of time, I am, sir, with thanks,

Yours very truly,

Raymond F. Hebert."

I am acknowledging the receipt of this letter and advising Mr. Hebert that the matter has been referred to the department.

I may say that up to the present I have had no communication either by letter or phone with the hon. Postmaster General regarding the matter.

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that that letter is dated July 5, 1927, and on the day preceding, according to the statement made by the postmaster, he had interviewed the Postmaster General with respect to this prosecution and requested that he be given an extension of time to make good his shortage of cash.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the hon. gentleman is making a mistake; it was the father.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank my hon. friend. It was the father of the postmaster. On July 9 the acting financial superintendent wrote a letter to the general superintendent of postal service, Mr. T. P. Coolican, reading as follows:

Referring to letter of the 23rd ultimo, in regard to Dupey's Corners, I am enclosing copy of report from the district superintendent at St. John.

I have sent a copy of this report to the Deputy Postmaster General.

The financial branch is following up the case as regards the collection of the shortage.

The district superintendent has been notified to have this amount collected without further delay.

The question of any action as regards Inspector Griffith in connection with this case is, of course, not a matter for the financial branch.

On July 9, the same day, the following memorandum appears to have been prepared by Mr. Atwater, the acting financial superintendent:

Memorandum for Deputy Postmaster General.

Please find attached copy of report from the district superintendent of postal service at St. John, in regard to collection of instalments paid by the postmaster at Dupey's Corners on a shortage in official cash at that office.

The district superintendent has been instructed to take immediate steps to collect the balance due by the postmaster, without further delay. This will be followed up.

In the meantime, the matter is submitted in connection with the regrettable action taken by Inspector Griffith.

Copy of a letter to Mr. Woods, dated the 23rd June, is also attached.

Copy of this report is also being sent to the general superintendent of postal service.

On July 14, five days later, there appears on the file this memorandum:

Mr. Gaboury.

When this difficulty occurred at Dupuis Corners Mr. Griffith personally informed me of arrangement made to get it straightened and I approved of his giving time to postmaster to settle and when all was paid we would dismiss him. I did not think it necessary to make the arrangement a matter of record. Griffith guaranteed payment. The postmaster's father saw me a short time ago and I told him if the amount was settled within next four months we would not prosecute and I know nothing about amount received by Mr. Griffith. Leave matters stand for a while.

P. J. Veniot.

That, Mr. Chairman, you will observe is dated July 14, 1927. It indicates at least one thing clearly in these words:

When this difficulty occurred at Dupuis Corners Mr. Griffith personally informed me of arrangement made to get it straightened and I approved of his giving time to postmaster to settle and when all was paid we would dismiss him.

Then follow these words:

Griffith guaranteed payment.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, without drawing any inference at this stage with respect to this correspondence, that that memorandum abundantly establishes the reason why they suggested a guarantee should be given by Griffith himself. The real reason why Griffith gave a guarantee in respect to this matter—

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think my hon. friend wishes to be unfair, but if he will look back he will find that this occurred in June or July, 1926, when I was not Postmaster General, and that Mr. Griffith had given his guarantee before 1927. So when it is stated that I saw Mr. Griffith, and so on, it refers only to the first time I became aware of the case.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. Postmaster General is quite right in saying the difficulty in the office at Dupey's Corners occurred at a time prior to his accession to office; but he overlooks the fact that it was in September, 1926, that we first have any reference to a guarantee being given by Griffith. Further, the minister's own signature to the memorandum of July 14, 1927, makes it clear that when his attention was directed to the difficulty at Dupey's Corners he discussed it with Griffith, with the result that I have just read from the memorandum.

Now, we find next that on the strength of that memorandum of July 14, 1927, Mr. L. J. Gaboury initialled this memorandum to Mr. Atwater:

Please close this case. P.M.G. instructions to me. L.J.G.

So whatever may have been his knowledge at the inception of this trouble, it is perfectly clear that by July 14, 1927, the minister had apprised himself of the situation, and that Mr. Gaboury had taken the action to which I have referred under instructions given by the minister. Let me follow it further. On

[Mr. Bennett.]

August 19, 1927, Mr. Atwater made this memorandum for the Acting Deputy Postmaster General:

After instructions were sent to the district superintendent St. John, on the 23rd June, 1927, to take immediate steps to collect the balance of a shortage owing by the postmaster at Dupey's Corners, a report was sent in dated June 29, by the district superintendent, indicating that certain moneys had been turned over to Inspector Griffith by the postmaster, Dupey's Corners, which had not been turned in to the department by the inspector until a considerable time after.

This matter was brought to the attention of the Deputy Postmaster General on the 9th July, but in accordance with instructions given by the Postmaster General at that time, it has been allowed to stand for the present.

Now, mark you, sir, that is the memorandum from Mr. Atwater, the acting financial superintendent, to the Deputy Postmaster General of Canada. It proceeds:

Since that time the case has come up in connection with the theft of mail matter at Shediac post office.

To which I shall presently refer.

The culprit in this case is a young man by the name of Leger, who was apprehended.

There is a dispute between Inspector Griffith and Leger in regard to the amount turned over to Griffith by Leger. It appears that district superintendent Woods questioned Leger in this matter, and a copy of Inspector Griffith's statement to the inspection service is attached.

There is no definite evidence that Inspector Griffith received any amount more than he accounted for from Leger, although he does not dispute the possibility.

In view of the fact that District Superintendent Woods has considered it necessary, having regard to the cases mentioned, to refuse his recommendation of Inspector Griffith's yearly increase, it would seem advisable that this matter should be definitely cleared up and the actual facts ascertained.

Since the department is aware that there is considerable personal animosity between District Superintendent Woods and Inspector Griffith, it would be very unwise to accept the statement of either one without independent investigation.

It is therefore suggested that as soon as the acting chief inspector, Mr. Fortier, returns to duty he should be instructed, subject to the Postmaster General's approval, to go to St. John and investigate these cases to ascertain what are the actual facts.

I shall not now refer to the Shediac case, which I shall deal with as a separate matter. Nor shall I refer for the moment to the recommendations made by Superintendent Woods with respect to Inspector Griffith; I shall deal with that also as a separate count in the indictment against the Postmaster General. Then follows a letter, written by the district superintendent to the chief accountant, Mr. Atwater, dated September 17, 1927:

Referring further to the indebtedness of the postmaster at Dupey's Corners, N.B., I beg to report that a further amount of $75 has been collected from the postmaster, and the same has been deposited in the Bank of Montreal, St. John, towards his indebtedness, and you will find herewith duplicate and triplicate receipts and bank draft for same.

Then we have on September 17 a report dealing with the situation in its entirety, signed by the district superintendent:

Enclosed herewith you will find copy of a memorandum sent to the chief accountant advising him that $75 has been placed in the Bank of Montreal, St. John, N.B., as a further payment from the postmaster at Dupey's Corners on account of shortage found in the postmaster's accounts as per reports from this office WFG/S, dated August 2, 1926.
