House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, April 4, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

DEATH OF MARSHAL FOCH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY FRENCH MINISTER OF TRIBUTE BY HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Legation of the French Republic
in Canada.

Ottawa, March 23, 1929.

Dear Mr. Speaker,—

On my return to Ottawa, I was deeply moved to learn of the manifestations of condolence by the House of Commons to the memory of Marshal Foch.

Appreciating highly the words of admiration and gratitude uttered with respect to the great leader of our armies during the war, I wish to express to you and beg you to so express to the House of Commons the deep feelings of gratitude on behalf of my government.

Kindly accept, dear Mr. Speaker, the assurances of my highest esteem.

J. Knight.

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux,
Speaker,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 84, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Totzke.

Bill No. 85, to incorporate The Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada.—Mr. Young (Saskatoon).

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERIES TREATY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table a copy of the convention between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fishery in the Fraser river system, signed at Washington, March 27, 1929.

I beg to move:

That 750 copies in English and 300 copies in French of the convention for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fishery in the Fraser river system signed at Washington, March 27, 1929, tabled this day, be printed forthwith; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. How many prisoners, male and female respectively, under eighteen years of age are confined at the present time in the penitentiaries of Canada?

2. What are the nationalities of these by numbers and not by name of inmate?

3. How many were sentenced by, (a) magistrates; (b) judges?

4. How many non-citizens of Canada are confined in penitentiaries of Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Males, 46; females, none.

2. Canadian, 37; American, 4; Italian, 1; Newfoundlanders, 1; Scottish, 1; Norwegian, 2.

3. 24 by Magistrates; 22 by Judges.

4. 611.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FREE PASSES TO CLERGYMEN

Mr. EVANS:

1. How many clergymen ride on free passes on the Canadian National Railways?
2. To what churches or denominations do they belong?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Sixty-five.
2. Thirty-four of these sixty-five clergymen are of Protestant faith, and thirty-one of Roman Catholic.

GOVERNMENT VESSELS—VISITORS

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Are officials or officers in charge of vessels owned or operated by the Department of Public Works or any other department of the government service, allowed to invite visitors or friends to take trips on such vessels?
2. If so, who may be invited and what is the charge per diem?
3. If allowed, does the government or any department of the government assume any responsibility in case of accident?
4. What invitations, if any, have been issued during the year 1928?

Mr. RINFRET:

National Revenue Department:

1. No.
2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.
4. None.

Marine Department:

1. No.
2. The contract for feeding the crews permits a charge of $1.20 per diem for passengers.
3. No.
4. The department is not aware of any invitations having been issued.

Fisheries Department:

Officials of the department or officers in charge of vessels owned or operated by this department are not permitted to issue invitations to friends or visitors to take trips on such vessels.

National Defence Department, Naval Service:

1. Only with the consent of the department.
2. Persons approved by the department, at the charge of the officer inviting such persons.
3. No.
4. Admiral Sir Charles E. Kingsmill, late Director of the naval service, with the consent of the chief of the naval staff, on board H.M.C.S. Vancouver.

Militia Service:

1. No. Civilians may be permitted to travel on regular duty trips in harbours, if in possession of a "pass" signed by the district supply and transport officer, or by his representative.
2. Nil. As in (1) above.
3. Individuals travel at their own risk.
4. Nil.

Public Works Department:

1. No.
2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.
4. No information in the department.

Department of Railways and Canals:

Officials or officers in charge of vessels owned and operated by the department are not allowed to invite visitors or friends to take trips on such vessels.

CIVIL SERVICE—MINIMUM SALARY

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the Department of Labour fixed the sum of $85 per month as the minimum amount necessary for the bare necessities of food, house rent, fuel and light for the average Canadian family?
2. If so, what additional amount is estimated as reasonable to provide for clothing, medical attendance, insurance, education and recreation or amusement?
3. How many employees of the Customs Department, Post Office Department, Interior Department or Public Works Department in the cities of Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver receive $65 per month? How many receive between $65 and $75? And how many between $75 and $85 per month?
4. Has the government received requests from organized bodies of the civil service to fix through the Civil Service Act a minimum salary of $100 per month for employees of the government?
5. If so, when will the government be prepared to make an official statement on the matter?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No. The weekly family budget published monthly in the Labour Gazette, February issue, page 237, shows the cost of certain staple foods, fuel and light and rent in January, 1929 ($21.55), as compared with the cost at certain previous dates. A footnote states that the budget is intended to show the changes in the cost of the items included, not to show the minimum cost for an average family; another footnote states that an allowance for the cost of clothing and sundries would increase the figures by about fifty per cent.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Customs department:

CASE OF GEORGE STARK

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the case of George Stark, who was sentenced to two years imprisonment and twenty lashes for an alleged robbery at a ticket office of the Montreal Tramways in Montreal? He was convicted of having held up a tramway employee named Caisse, but the said Caisse has now been convicted of having been the principal in the robbery, and has been convicted of perjury at the trial of the said George Stark?

2. Will the government take into consideration compensating this man for the unfortunate miscarriage of justice, under which he suffered?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2. The matter is not one which concerns this government. The administration of justice in the province is within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislature.

DOMINION MAPS—FRENCH EDITION

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Are there any maps of the Dominion of Canada published in the French language?

2. If not, is it the intention of the government to have such maps printed and distributed?

3. When will such action be taken by the government?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.

3. Received full pay in accordance with the regulations.

Re absences shown for fiscal year 1923-24:—

Prior to January 1st, 1924, each day, including Sundays and holidays was charged on sick leave owing to the fact that the regulations allowed sick leave by months; but the statutory leave was counted for working days only. This accounts in the year 1923-24 for the item July 16th to 31st being computed as 14 days statutory leave, whereas the item October 1st to 31st is sick leave and computed as 31 days.

[Mr. Euler.]

MILITARY HOSPITALS—PATIENTS AND STAFF

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. How many patients are there in each of the following:

ALLOWANCE TO PENITENTIARY INMATES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What has been done or will be done by the government or the Department of Justice, (a) to carry out the terms of a resolution adopted by the house in 1927 to pay an allowance to dependents of inmates of Canada's penal institutions under federal control; (b) to adopt measures to meet the provinces re providing proper institutions with the provinces for those of 16, 17 and 18 years of age?

2. Will anything be done by legislation this session to prevent those of 16, 17 years of age being sent to these federal prisons?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. (a) This matter is under consideration. (b) The meaning of this question is not understood. The government has, however, under consideration the making of provision at this session for the establishment of a special institution for the purpose of segregating young prisoners from hardened criminals.

2. No.

SETTLEMENT IN KINGS COUNTY

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings):

1. Were any farms, machinery or stock purchased by the government or any department thereof for settlement purposes in Kings county, Prince Edward Island, during the year 1928?

2. If so, what are the names of parties from whom purchased, the location, the settler's name, what machinery and stock was supplied to each settler, from whom purchased, and what was the price paid for each item?

Mr. RINFRET:

Department of Immigration and Colonization:

1 and 2. The department did not purchase any farms for settlement purposes in Kings county, Prince Edward Island, during the year 1928. It did purchase live stock, machinery and other equipment for persons settled in Kings county under the 3,000 British family scheme, but all such purchases were made out of loans advanced by the Imperial government to assist settlers in becoming properly established. No expenditures whatever out of Canadian government funds were made in the purchase of such stock and equipment.

IMPERIAL WAR GRAVES COMMISSION

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. What is the total amount expended by Canada through the Imperial War Graves Commission, (a) to March 31, 1928; (b) estimated to March 31, 1929?

2. What amount has been expended on war memorials during the same period?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. (a) $4,037,589.87; (b) $4,611,369.87.

2. By this department to March 31st, 1928; $1,225,150.75, for memorials of the Great war.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—QUEBEC

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Will the management of the national railways soon come to a decision in connection with a passenger station for said railways in the city of Quebec?

2. If so, will said station be in keeping with the importance of Quebec and the government railways?

3. What will be the total cost of the Canadian National Railways station at Toronto, including the approaches and all other expenditures in connection with said station?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The management of the Canadian National Railways reached a decision to make use of the Palais station in the city of Quebec for all passenger trains; the Canadian National having a half interest in this property.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The cost, to the Canadian National, of the Toronto Terminals Railway station at Toronto, including the grade separation work done by the Toronto Terminals Railway, will be $11,808,085. The Canadian National Railways' share of the cost of grade separation and other works which are exclusively C.N.R. will be $1,602,298.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—RECEIPTS, 1928

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. What is amount of money received by the Department of National Revenue for Canada during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, for:

(1) All customs duties and taxes provided by the Customs Act and tariff of Canada with amendments and by the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and amending acts on, (a) imported spirits; (b) imported wines; (c) imported ale, beer, porter and stout.

(2) All excise and sales taxes levied under the provisions of the Inland Revenue Act with amending acts and the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, with amending acts on, (a) Canadian potable spirits; (b) Canadian non-potable and denatured spirits; (c) Canadian wines; (d) Canadian ale, beer, porter and stout?

2. What is amount of money received by the Department of National Revenue for Canada during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, for:

Sales tax collections are not recorded, as applied to separate commodities, and returns are not available of sales taxes collected on beer, spirits and wines.

2. (1 and 2) The department has no record of customs or excise revenues collected on domestic or imported spirits, which were exported from Canada subsequent to customs or excise entry.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—PUBLICATIONS AND DISTRIBUTION

Mr. SPENCER:

1. How many men employed in the Department of Agriculture, publications and distribution branch, Daly building, are receiving a salary of twenty dollars ($20) per week, or less?

2. What are their salaries and duties respectively?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Eleven at present, but the majority are only employed for a short period during the distribution of special publications.

2. All these men are paid $17.10 per week. Their duties consist of filling and sealing envelopes ready for mailing, handling and opening packages of publications received from the printing bureau, and general labouring work. Occasionally they may be required to carry messages.

LOWER DETROIT RIVER CONTRACTS

Mr. GOTT:

1. Is it a fact that the Department of Marine and Fisheries refuses to acknowledge representations that have been made to them, after five years of sealed contracts for light and buoy service in the lower Detroit river; that they still refuse to put up same for tender in re-letting the contract which expires April 1, 1929?

2. Has the department received requests to have same let by tender?

3. Has the department received communications re letting contract from any other than present contractor?

4. Is it a fact that a communication regarding same, dated February 26th, was not answered by the department until March 13th and then only after another communication from the same party under date of March 10th had been received?

5. Has the government an offer from a reputable party, well equipped for the work, to perform the contract at less than the present contract price?

6. What is the present contract price?
7. What is the offer received by the government?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No.
2. Yes.

3. $170,627.31.

MAJOR GUSTAVE LANCTOT

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington):

1. When was Major Gustave Lanctot first appointed to the archives branch, in what capacity and at what salary?
2. What position does he now hold and at what salary?
3. What would his salary be according to the civil service rating?
4. When and by what amounts and for what reasons has his salary been augmented by special votes of parliament?
5. What amounts have been paid to him each year since his appointment to cover travelling and other expenses to various countries visited?
6. What countries were visited by him each year, for how long and for what purposes?
7. Is he at present absent on a foreign mission? If so, where and for what purpose?
8. Did he take with him scores of precious, (a) old documents, (b) engravings, (c) art records, and were these from the archives?
9. What is the description and approximate value of each of the articles referred to in previous question?
10. Where and by whom were these precious articles crated for transportation, when and for what amount and by what company were they insured?
11. Will Mr. Lanctot's salary and travelling expenses be paid by the government during his absence?
12. Has any advance been made to him by the government to cover, (a) travelling expenses, (b) living allowances? If so, what amount?

PRODUCTION OF DOMESTIC FUEL

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. Has any contract been entered into between the Minister of Mines or other department of the government and any person or corporation under the provisions of chapter 52, an act to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada, and, if so, how many such contracts are now in force, with the name of each contractor?

2. How many coke ovens are embraced in such contracts?

3. What was the tonnage of coal mined in Canada and so used in such coke ovens?

4. What was the quantity of coke produced under such conditions in such coke ovens?

5. What was the amount of bonus applied for and what amount has been paid under the provisions of this act up to December 31, 1928?

6. What was the total tonnage of all coke produced in Canada between April 14, 1927 (date of passing of act), to December 31, 1928?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes. One contract has been entered into with the Nova Scotia Tramways and Power Company, Limited, of Halifax.

2. The number of ovens covered by this contract amounts in all to eight.

3. As the plant has only recently been completed no authoritative information is yet available.

4. As the plant has only recently been completed no authoritative information is yet available.

5. The bonus applied for is 4% of the total cost of the works. As final cost sheets are not yet available the amount of subsidy to be paid cannot be calculated until such time as these are received. No amount was paid under the provisions of this act up to December 31, 1928.

6. 3,720,794 net tons. (Compiled from reports of Dominion Bureau of Statistics).

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HALIFAX HOTEL

Mr. QUINN (Halifax):

1. Were tenders called for the building of the Canadian National station and hotel at Halifax, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, who were the tenderers and what were the respective amounts of each tender?
3. What firm was awarded the contract?
4. Were sub-tenders called for plumbing, electric wiring, ventilation, sheet metal work, roofing and cut granite?
5. If so, what firms tendered and what were the respective amounts of tenders?
6. What were the names of the firms awarded the contracts?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.

2. Tenderers, as follows: Anglin-Norcross Limited, Montreal; E. G. M. Cape & Company, Montreal; Foundation Maritime Limited, Halifax, N.S.; G. A. Fuller Company of Canada Limited, Montreal; Robertson & Janin Building Co. Ltd., Montreal; The James Shearer Co. Limited, Montreal; Dakin Construction Co. Limited, Montreal.

The management do not consider it to be in the interests of the Canadian National Railways, nor in the public interest, to publish the amounts of these tenders. They state that the work was given to the lowest tenderer in each case, which is the policy of the railway in that regard.

3. Foundation Maritime Limited. (This firm was the lowest tenderer).

4. Yes.

5. (a) Plumbing, heating and ventilation: The Garth Company, Montreal; John Colford Limited, Montreal; L. E. Moulton & Co. Limited, Montreal; Hagen & Powers, Halifax and St. John, N.B.; Farquhar Bros. Limited, Halifax, N.S.; Thos. O'Connell, Montreal; James Ballantyne, Montreal.

(b) Electric wiring: Canadian Taverner Company Ltd., Montreal; Canadian Comstock Company Ltd., Montreal.

(c) Sheet metal work roofing and cut granite included in bulk tender of Foundation Maritime Limited.

6. (a) The Garth Company (who was the lowest tenderer).

(b) Canadian Taverner Company Limited (who was the lowest tenderer).

The same explanation as given in note in answer No. 2 applies as to these prices also.

LONG TERM FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What provinces of the Dominion have expressed their intention to make use of the Long Term Farm Loan Act?
2. Is the staff of the Federal Farm Loan Board as yet organized?
3. In view of the great need of the early administration of this act, when will the Federal Farm Loan Board begin to make loans?

Mr. ROBB:

1. Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec.
2. Headquarters staff in Ottawa is organized and rapid progress is being made in four of the provinces.
3. Forthwith, on the provinces having complied with requirements of the act.

BIENFAIT, SASK., BRIQUETTING PLANT

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. What is the total amount spent to date by the Department of Mines or any other department of the government in connection with briquetting Lignite or Bituminous coal at Bienfait?

2. When did these experiments begin and how much was paid in each year on account thereof?

3. What was the total quantity of briquetted fuel produced yearly during the course of the experiments?

4. What was the cost of the equipment now being operated in connection with the enterprise?

5. What are the terms and provisions of the arrangement under which the plan is now being operated, who are the present operators and what is their connection with the project by way of investment, lease or other commitments?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. $535,000—the amount granted by the government of Canada to the Lignite Utilization Board of Canada (created by order in council of August 22, 1918, P.C. 2064).

2. According to the records of the Lignite Utilization Board operations commenced October 1, 1918, and expenditures were as follows:

October 1, 1918—March 31, 1920..	$ 41,679 37
April 1, 1920—March 31, 1921.. ..	517,575 94
April 1, 1921—March 31, 1922.. ..	251,257 96
April 1, 1922—March 31, 1923.. ..	91,218 29
April 1, 1923—March 31, 1924.. ..	105,072 31
April 1, 1924—March 31, 1925.. ..	24,595 77
April 1, 1925—March 31, 1926.. ..	18,598 62
April 1, 1926—March 31, 1927.. ..	9,265 53
April 1, 1927—March 31, 1928.. ..	5,968 56

The above expenditure include grants to the Lignite Utilization Board from the governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

3. As the operations of the board did not pass the experimental stage, no record was kept of the production of briquetted fuel.

4. No information. The plant has been in possession of Western Dominion Collieries, Limited, since September, 1927.

5. The rights of the Lignite Utilization Board in the Bienfait plant were transferred to Western Dominion Collieries, Limited, absolutely, on their having satisfied the board and the governments concerned that they were prepared to forthwith install equipment deemed satisfactory for the manufacture of lignite briquettes. A plant with 200 ton daily capacity has been erected and is now in operation.

FRANK DUNLOP

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. What position, if any, does Frank Dunlop, of New Campbellton, Victoria county, Nova Scotia, hold in the Government service?

2. If employed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, does he hold any other position in the Government?

3. Who recommended him?

4. What salary does he receive?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Storm signal agent (part time) at New Campbellton, N.S.

2. Not under the marine branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

3. F. L. Kelly, ex-M.P., North Sydney, N.S.

4. $75 per annum.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES—DIRECTOR OF PUBLICITY

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has a director of publicity in the Fisheries department been appointed?

2. If so, what salary does he receive per annum?

3. Was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

4. Was the position advertised? If so, how?

5. What are the names of the persons applying for said position?

[Mr. Deslauriers.]

6. Has the person appointed any practical or theoretical knowledge of the fisheries?

7. Has he an assistant?

8. What remuneration per year does his assistant receive?

9. What other expenses are connected with this position?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.

2. $3,420 per annum.

3. Yes.

4. (a) Yes; (b) The position was advertised in the Canada Gazette, and by poster sent to the following on December 4th, to be displayed until the 27th: Members of federal parliament; postmasters at offices where the population exceeds one thousand; universities; libraries; secretaries of the Canadian Legion; employment offices throughout the Dominion; individuals who have requested the commission to notify them of vacant positions in publicity work; Business Newspapers' Association of Canada, Toronto; Association of Canadian Advertisers, Toronto; Canadian Association of Advertising, Toronto; The Canadian Daily Newspapers' Association, Toronto; The Canadian Fisheries Association, Montreal, Prince Rupert and Toronto; Canadian Weekly Newspapers' Association, Renfrew. (The fisheries branch also sent notices to other societies, fisheries and press, and to The Canadian Fisherman).

GABARUS, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-Cape Breton West):

1. How much money was expended in 1928 on the breakwater at Gabarus, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia?
2. What portion of this amount was for timber, logs, iron, nails, etc?
3. What portion of this amount covered cost of labour?
4. What disposition was made of material left over?
5. Was the amount expended sufficient to complete the necessary work?
6. Were any additional amounts requested to complete the necessary work?
7. Is the breakwater at Gabarus now in a satisfactory state of repair?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. $803.80.
2. $507.80.
3. $296.
4. 1,050 lineal feet of round logs and some sawn timber was taken to Fourchu and used in beach protection work.
5. Yes.
6. No.
7. Yes.

BOVINE TUBERCULAR TEST IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. DUFF:

1. How many cattle, in the province of Nova Scotia, which were subjected to the bovine tubercular test, were declared clear of any infection?
2. How many cattle so declared free of infection were afterwards found, when slaughtered for human food, to be tubercular to a very marked degree?
3. Will the Department of Agriculture or the federal government reimburse purchasers of cattle which were declared by veterinaries free from tubercular and found to be infected when slaughtered, to the full extent of the amount paid by said purchasers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. During the initial test for tuberculosis of cattle in the Nova Scotia restricted area, 185,896 animals passed a clean test. There was, therefore, no evidence of tuberculosis in these cattle. Some animals may, however, have been too recently infected to react, and occasionally also very badly infected cattle or cattle that have recently been injected with tuberculin may fail to react to the tuberculin test. The percentage of such cases is however very small, and the tuberculin test is recognized by all competent authorities as by far the most efficient means of detecting this disease in cattle.

2. Nine cases have been reported to the Health of Animals branch of cattle, which did not react to the tuberculin test during the test of cattle in the Nova Scotia restricted area, being found to be tuberculous when slaughtered for human food.

3. No. If, however, cattle which fail to react due to causes set forth above in a restricted area are slaughtered under the supervision of a veterinary inspector, and are found to be tuberculous, compensation may be paid at the regular rates.

DAYSPRING, N.S., MUNICIPAL FARM

Mr. DUFF:

1. Were certain cattle at the municipal farm at Dayspring subjected to the bovine tuberculin test?
2. How many cattle of said herd were declared by the veterinary as reactors?
3. What was given as reason by said veterinary for declaring said cattle reactors?
4. Were said cattle slaughtered and where?
5. How many veterinaries were present at said slaughtering and whom did they represent?
6. What were the opinions of said veterinaries?
7. Did any of said veterinaries take away parts of carcasses for laboratorial examination, and, if so, who?
8. What were the results of said examinations?
9. Will full compensation be paid the municipality of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, because of said examination of parts of cattle?
10. If not, why not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Three cattle.
3. They reacted to the tuberculin test conducted by him.
4. These reactors were slaughtered on the owner's premises.
5. Two veterinary inspectors, representing the Health of Animals branch, were present when these reactors were slaughtered.
6. Answered by No. 10.
7. The hyperemic glands and portions of spleen from the reactors were taken by veterinary inspectors J. W. Frank and R. B. Catt and forwarded to the Animal Diseases Research Institute, Hull, for examination.

Specimens were handed to Mr. Romkey, the warden of the Poor Farm, for transmission to Dalhousie university for examination.

8. Microscopical examinations of the specimens submitted to the Health of Animals branch laboratory were negative. Small animal inoculations were also made, the results of which are not yet concluded. Microscopical examinations of specimens sent to Dalhousie university were also negative, according to information received.
9. No.
10. The Animal Contagious Diseases Act and regulations established thereunder provide that cattle that react to the tuberculin test will be considered tuberculous. The compensation awarded for such reactors to the tuberculin test is two-thirds of the value placed on the animals by the veterinary inspector conducting the test. The value that can be placed on animals that react to the tuberculin test is limited by the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

1. What was the cost to the treasury of the Department of Justice for the fiscal years 1926-27 and 1927-28?
2. What are the names and respective salaries in each department of: (a) departmental solicitors; (b) departmental assistant solicitors; (c) stenographers and other clerical assistance, for the fiscal years 1926-27 and 1927-28, for the solicitors mentioned in A and B?
3. What are the names and amounts of salaries, fees or payments, made for legal advice or other legal service rendered by members of the legal profession, other than the items included in one and two above, for the fiscal years 1926-27 and 1927-28?

THE I'M ALONE INCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Prime Minister any statement to give to the house with respect to the I'm Alone incident which has been attracting so much attention in the press?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The incident to which my hon. friend refers has been the subject of correspondence between the government of the United States and our government during the past week and is being made a matter of formal representation on the part of our government to the United States government at the present time. I have no further statement to make at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the correspondence be brought down at an early date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In due course.

PENSION PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Will the government lay on the table a copy of order in council P.C. 8481 dated January 16, 1928?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): What is it about?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is in regard to the payment of pensions to soldiers already pensioned.

MEDICAL RELIEF FOR INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) directed a question to the government with respect to medical relief for Indians in northern Ontario, and on my behalf he was promised an answer.

The matter was brought to our attention some time ago and we have been in communication with the doctor who visited the band in question. I will content myself by reading to the house his telegram. In reply to our inquiry he wires from Cochrane, after visiting the band:

Newspaper reports of condition greatly exaggerated. Saw few children at post. Only one child very ill. Father decided to keep child home and have advised treatment and given medicine. Conditions are not urgent and as rivers are not open there are very few Indians at post.

VISIT TO WASHINGTON OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm). American press despatches published in the Canadian journals state that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been visiting Washington and calling on the President and other officials down there. Has the minister a statement to make to the house and to the people of Canada regarding the possibilities of trade agreement negotiations or negotiations of any other nature undertaken during his stay in the American capital.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can assure my hon. friend that I enjoyed the pleasure of a stay of two days in Washington, making personal visits and extending the usual courtesies. I called on the president out of courtesy but not for any official purpose.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Now that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is back with us, I would ask him the question which I put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) some weeks ago, and that is as to the delay in the appointment of a warden and deputy warden for the British Columbia penitentiary. These offices have been vacant now for almost a year and the matter is beginning to create comment, particularly in view of the fact that the present incumbent, the acting warden, is residing in an hotel in Vancouver and not at the penitentiary.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The Civil Service Commission has been asked to fill the position.

Mr. McQUARRIE: When were they asked?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A few weeks ago. However, I will refresh my memory and let my hon. friend know.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I should not care to enter this debate this afternoon but for one particular reason. I feel I owe it as a duty to the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this parliament to lay before this house what I believe to be the views of the people who reside in that constituency. In the first days of March we had delivered to us the usual budget speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). That speech contained nothing remarkable; as a matter of fact, I think it contained less than any other budget speech which the minister has delivered in this house since I have had the honour of being a representative in parliament.

Last year in speaking on the budget I stated that it was milkless, meatless, breadless and butterless; the Prime Minister, in speaking on a certain amendement in this house, stated it was a milk and water concoction, but I should say this is even worse, because there is no milk in it. On March 7 the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), then acting leader of the opposition, delivered a speech in reply to the budget, and I think everyone will agree that he made a most remarkable address which as yet has not been answered by any minister of the crown or any member of this house sitting opposite. Several cabinet ministers have attempted to reply, but I would say that so far they have not answered the speech made that day by the hon. member.

The Minister of Finance tells us that this year he intends to take out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada the enormous total of $454,942,000, and he tells us that this is $25,000,000 more than he extracted last year. Apparently he makes that statement with a great deal of satisfaction. Then he tells us that the customs revenues of Canada for the last fiscal year will amount to $185,000,000, an increase of $28,000,000 over the customs revenues collected during the previous year. That statement comes with very poor grace from a party which, when in opposition, year after year and over the length and breadth of Canada shouted that the tariff of this country was a tax imposed upon the people and that they, if returned to power, would reduce the customs tariff and not collect such an enormous tax from the Canadian people. Then the minister goes on to say that our ordinary expenditures this year are estimated at $355,200,000; capital expenditures are estimated at $24,150,000, so therefore the total expenditures for the coming year will be approximately $385,160,000, or an increase of $22,332,000 over the previous year. Yet in the face of that statement the Minister of Finance and the members of the government try to convince the country that they are actually diminishing the taxation imposed upon the Canadian people. By what process of political alchemy can this government tell us in one breath that they are collecting from the people of Canada $25,000,000 more than they collected in the previous year, and in the next breath tell us they are going to spend almost $23,000,000 more than was spent last year, at the same time claiming that they are reducing taxation? I think that matter was very well dealt with by the hon. member for South Wellington when he showed that while the government are reducing taxes which they imposed because of their extravagances during their entire regime, the total taxation collected from the people of Canada is higher than ever before.

Under the Conservative administration, for the five years from 1918 to 1923, the amount of taxes collected was as follows:

1919..	312,946,747
1920..	349,746,335
1921..	436,292,185
1922..	382,271,571

The amount of taxes collected under the Liberal administration for a similar period was as follows:

1925..	$346,834,479
1926..	380,745,506
1927..	398,695,776
1928.. .. .. ..(about)	422,000,000
1929..	454,942,000

So, according to these figures, in the five-year period the Liberal administration collected from the taxpayers of Canada $255,000,000 more than was collected by their predecessors during a similar period of years, notwithstanding the fact that the war was over and they were not confronted with the war expenditures which had to be made by the previous administration. It must be remembered that these taxes, which have been removed to a certain extent by the present administration, were imposed by this government because of their own extravagances, and now that they are reducing the taxes little by little they tell the people they are reducing taxation. The fact remains that the Liberal administration have collected in taxes more than was collected by the Conservative administration, and in spite of that fact the net debt of Canada has been reduced by only $90,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Where does my hon. friend get the five years of Conservative administration which he has used for comparison?

Mr. COTNAM: I gave the years; 1918 to 1923.

Mr. RALSTON: And my hon. friend calls that Conservative administration?

Mr. COTNAM: Yes. Yet in the face of these figures the Minister of Finance and the government tell us that they are economizing. We would like them to tell us just exactly where that economizing has been done. The Auditor General's report does not show that economy; the estimates do not show it, and I do not think there is a member of the government who can stand up in his place to-day and give the house one single instance where the government have practised the economy they have preached. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to tell the people to work and be thrifty, so long as his government can collect from them the taxes with which to carry on the extravagances they are practising to-day. The Minister of Finance says:

> . . . . the administration will refuse to support any extravagance in the spending of the taxpayers' money. To this policy we again solicit the support of hon. members in order that at the end of another year it may again be found that, continuing to live within the public income . . . .

On January 18, 1926, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and in the course of his remarks said:

> May I call attention to the fact, that, the total disbursements for the year prior to the present government coming into power amounted to $418,620,000, and for the year just passed amounted to $339,902,725. I am sure the reduction in the actual cost of carrying on the affairs of this country is a matter of great satisfaction to hon. gentlemen in every quarter of this house. That means a reduction practically from $51 to $37 per head of the population of Canada.

Since the hon. gentleman spoke on that occasion he has become a member of this government; and hon. members rejoice that the expenses of the government have risen from $339,000,000 to $391,000,000 per annum. This expenditure has been saddled upon the tax payers. This additional impost is equal to $5.36 per head, which means an extra contribution of $26 or $27 to be made by the average family living in this country. This expenditure has to be made to meet the extravagance of the government which is in power to-day.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) says that he has reduced taxation. He has reduced the tax on telegrams and transportation; the people who are wealthy enough to occupy compartment or sleeping berths have been given a 10 per cent reduction. But how about the sales tax? This tax affects the great mass of the people of Canada, and it is a burden upon the working people. This government upon coming into office, raised the tax from 3 per cent to 6 per cent. The sales tax could have been removed long ago had the government practised the economy which they are talking about at the present time. Twenty million dollars is remitted by the reduction of 1 per cent in the sales tax, but had the government practised economy that tax would have disappeared at least two years ago when an amendment to the budget speech was moved by the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). The government was asked to remove the whole tax, but I suppose the Minister of Finance is holding back that 2 per cent and next year he can hurl out the news that there has been a 50 per cent reduction in the sales tax. Just before the next general election he will be able to tell what he is doing for the poor people in the way of remitting taxes.

The government still manage to retain the excise tax on matches. This article is of prime necessity in every household throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, but the government still retain that tax which more than any other affects the poor. When the government were in opposition they were always preaching that they were the friends of the poor; in office they have become the friends of the rich and wealthy plutocrats and the big organizations to the detriment of the poor people of this country. They talk about the prosperity of Canada, and we are all delighted with the degree of prosperity there is at the present time. It has been rather interesting to sit on this side of the house and listen to some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, especially to some members of the government—to listen to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) bringing forth the specious argument that the people of Canada are prosperous to-day. One of the arguments used by the minister is the stock argument which has been advanced by every member sitting on the Liberal side of the house. They all go to the bank reports, the reports of the big moneyed interests, the big trusts, the big mergers and the big combines and endeavour to show from the annual statements of those corporations that the people of Canada are wealthy to-day. Unfortunately that picture of general prosperity is not a true picture of what is actually taking place. Every one knows that the farmers are not as prosperous as they should be at the present time, and everyone knows that the wage earners have not been enjoying that general prosperity which is supposed to be abroad throughout the Dominion. So far as the farmers and the wage earners are concerned, that general prosperity is always just around the corner and a little bit away from them. It is a difficult thing for the average individual to understand why the government does not go to the working man and find out whether or not he is prosperous; why they do not go to the farmer and cite his case to show that the farmers are actually prosperous. The former leader of the Liberal party did not pursue the same method in trying to show whether or not the people were prosperous. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that if the people were prosperous it was not necessary to cite statistics; that when the man in the street, the average working man, put his hand in his pocket and when the average housewife went to her pantry or larder they knew by what they found there whether or not they were prosperous.

Under this administration the farmer has never had a square deal. When our American cousins enacted the Fordney tariff, which was aimed against the farmers of this country, this government, in place of giving protection to the Canadian farmer, took that blow lying down. They were absolutely spineless; they never attempted to retaliate in any way or to protect the interests of our farmers. Every one knows that the American duty against Canadian farm products going into the United States is two or three times the Canadian duty against American farm products coming into this country. This government has allowed that situation to exist during its whole tenure of office. That is absolutely unfair to the Canadian farmer and has reacted against his best interests.

Not content with that, this government made a treaty with Australia and by order in council allowed that treaty to be effective as far as New Zealand was concerned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stampeded the country in 1921 when he accused the Conservative party of governing by order in council, but I venture to say that this government has passed more orders in council, than any other government we have ever had. Before that treaty came into force this country was importing butter to the extent of only 197,000 pounds per annum, and we had an exportable surplus of 24,000,000 pounds. But since that treaty came into force millions of pounds of butter have been coming in to compete with Canadian butter, although the Canadian farmer has to produce his butter during the winter months under the most adverse conditions. He has to house his stock and feed them during that time of the year; yet the New Zealand farmer, without having to construct outbuildings, without being put to the expense which the Canadian farmer has to meet, was practically given right of way and permitted to come in and steal the Canadian butter market from the Canadian farmer. The following table shows the importations of butter from New Zealand since this treaty came into force:

Year	Pounds

It is estimated that during the year 1929 the New Zealand dairying interests will sell in Canada in the neighbourhood of 30,000,000 pounds of butter to the detriment of the Canadian farmer. Is it any wonder that our farmers feel exasperated and humiliated owing to the manner in which the government has acted toward them? Is it any wonder that the Canadian farmer is depressed and feels that it is becoming increasingly difficult for him to carry on his operations?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in the house the other day, said that this milk was not now being used in just the same way; that it was being put up in different forms and sold as condensed milk, milk powder and so forth. But he neglected to state that whereas in 1926 there were produced in Canada 13,407,000,000 pounds of milk, in 1927 the production had dropped to about 13,000,000,000 pounds. That is, the actual milk production had decreased by almost 500,000,000 pounds in that year. He also forget to mention that at the same time the dairy herds in the Dominion had decreased by 101,000; that the number of swine—and the swine industry is the complement of the dairy industry—had decreased by almost 200,000, while the dairy herds in New Zealand had increased by 50,000 and their swine herds by probably 30,000 or 40,000, showing that the business which should legitimately have come to the mixed farming industry in Canada was being transferred, owing to the policy of the government, to the farmers of New Zealand, and they were obtaining the profits. I often wonder whether the government is working in behalf of the best interests of our own farmers and working people or for the farmers who dwell in lands other than our own.

Prior to entering into the New Zealand arrangement we were exporting pork, bacon, hides, lard, cheese, butter, milk and so forth, to the value of $88,000,000 per annum, and this money was coming into the pockets of the Canadian farmers. Last year our total exports of those products amounted to only $47,000,000. In other words, since the New Zealand arrangement came into force the farmers of this country lost $40,000,000 in connection with by-products of the dairy industry.

Everyone knows what has happened to the woollen industry of this country. According to all the information that is available we should have one of the greatest sheep industries of the world. It is estimated that we should be able in western Canada to support flocks of sheep amounting to about 25,000,000, but at the present time in the three western provinces there are only a couple of hundred thousand sheep. In eastern Canada the situation is somewhat similar; many farmers are supporting only one per cent of the number of sheep which they should have. This is due to the fact that owing to the tariff policy of the government the Canadian farmers have become so disgusted that they are no longer trying to maintain their sheep industry as they did in years gone by. Everyone knows that after the government tampered with the tariff, woollen industry after woollen industry was closed down. I have under my hand a list of the woollen industries that were closed down almost directly after the government tampered with the tariff on woollen goods. The list is as follows:

Name of Mill	Date closed
Canadian Western Wollen Mills, Vancouver	1926
Renfrew Woollen Mills, Renfrew	1927
Gulf Textiles Limited, Isle Verte, Quebec	1924
Amherst Woollen Mills, Amherst, N.S.	1923
Ernestown Woollen Mills, Odessa, Ontario	1927
Hawthorne Mills, Limited, Carleton Place, Ontario	1927
Pembroke Woollen Company, Pembroke, Ontario	1925

Let me say that the Pembroke Woollen Mills were operated and controlled by a former supporter of this administration and that owing to the policy of the government, that mill is in process of being dismantled at the present time.

Name of Mill	Dated closed
Harris and Company, Rockwood, Ontario	1925
Boyd, Caldwell and Company, Appleton, Ontario	1925
Boyd, Caldwell and Company, Lanark, Ontario	1925
Randle Brothers, Meaford, Ontario.	1924

There is a list of about fifty of them, but I am not going to read any more. Is it any wonder, in view of these facts, that the farmers of this country have become disgusted with the sheep raising industry which should be one of their great assets?

What has the government done in this budget or, for that matter, since it came into power, for the wage earners of the Dominion? Last year our imports from and exports to the United States were as follows:

Imports	$825,000,000
Exports	492,500,000

Most of our exports to the United States were raw products, products of the mines, forests and so forth, whereas in the neighbourhood of $400,000,000 worth, or practically one-half of our imports from the United States were made up of articles manufactured in that country from raw products which they had imported from the Dominion of Canada. Furthermore, most of those manufactured articles were such that, under a government which had at heart the true interests of the Canadian workmen and Canadian people generally, they would have been manufactured in this Dominion, in this way increasing the wages for our workingmen and at the same time helping our farmers by creating markets for them.

Let me refer now to the agricultural implement industry. Agriculture, as everyone admits, is really the basic industry of the Dominion. The present government tinkered with the tariff on agricultural implements, promising the farmers that they were going to decrease the price. As a matter of fact, as has been conclusively shown, the cost of agricultural implements in this country is just a little higher to-day than it was before the government tinkered with the tariff. What has happened in the meantime? Our importations of agricultural implements are as follows:

Date	Amount
1926	13,000,000
1927	18,000,000
1928	29,000,000
1929 (estimated)	40,000,000

Had a proper tariff policy been adopted, every one of these agricultural implements should have been manufactured in Canada providing additional work for the Canadian workingman, instead of which many of our workmen have been obliged to sell their homes, leave the Dominion and go to the United States to get the jobs denied them at home because the government has failed to act in their best interests.

The situation is similar in regard to the woollen industry. We are importing to-day $24,000,000 worth of woollen goods while our Canadian mills are operating at only one-half of their capacity and are providing only 30 per cent of the requirements of this country. The government are allowing $24,000,000 worth of woollen goods to come into Canada to the detriment of the Canadian workingman and the sheep industry. This government by a slight change in the tariff could provide that probably one-half of the total amount of woollen goods at present imported would be manufactured in this country, giving work for our workingmen and increased markets for our farmers.

The present administration during this session refused any additional grant towards the construction of a transcontinental highway, and in support of their refusal they brought forward some rather peculiar arguments. Some members went so far as to say that such a highway would cost $200,000,000. I do not know where they got that estimate; I do not know if there ever has been an estimate given of the actual cost of construction of a trans-Canada highway. The fact remains, however, that there is no single piece of work that might be undertaken in Canada to-day that would redound more to the best interests of all the people of this Dominion than the construction of a motor highway across Canada. It would bring the people of eastern and western Canada closer together, and that is what we need in this Dominion. It would bring our young men and our young women in eastern Canada into contact with their fellow-citizens in western Canada, and by making the people of the east familiar with that western land would perhaps tend to prevent the exodus of our young people to the United States. Everyone knows that highway construction throughout the history of the world has always preceded the material advancement of any country.

I think it was the Prime Minister who in an earlier debate this session, when he was trying to show that the New Zealand treaty had not reacted against the farmers of this country, made the statement that the American tourists coming into Canada were drinking so much milk that we were not able to make as much butter as before. If that is the case, the construction of a national highway across this country might offset to some extent the bad effects of the New Zealand treaty because, according to the Prime Minister's argument, the more tourists that come to this country the more milk will be consumed, although personally I have never been given to understand that the tourists come to this country to drink milk.

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) was very much afraid that the construction of a transcontinental highway might interfere with the success of the Canadian National railways. I have a statement here by Sir Henry Thornton, the president of the road, who, speaking at a meeting of the Good Roads Association in Toronto a short time ago, said that he wished that next year we would have two millions of automobiles in Canada instead of one million, because it would be conducive to increasing railway business in this country. He went on to explain that the automobile was the complement of the railway. So the argument of the Minister of Railways does not hold good.

It is not so very long ago that this government, which to-day is afraid to spend money for the construction of a transcontinental highway for the linking up of the peoples of the Dominion, that we might get to know the country in which we live a little better, was prepared, as they announced in the speech from the throne in 1925, to enter into the so-called Petersen contract. I wonder if the members of the government remember that Petersen contract. They were prepared to launch on that expenditure for the purpose of breaking what they said was a shipping combine in the north Atlantic which was breaking the backs of the producers in this country by causing high ocean freight rates, and in that way increasing the cost of living. But the Conservative party in this house exposed the fallacy of that whole argument, and the result was that the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the government of that day has since had the honour of being left at home in his constituency to cogitate on the fickleness of Dame Fortune.

This government is not prepared to do anything for technical education in this country. It is prepared to spend millions and millions of dollars where the expenditure is not called for, but when it comes to expending anything on technical education for the benefit of those who are the least favoured in this country, the government is not prepared to spend the taxpayer's money.

I wonder if this government, which is always talking economy, ever stops to consider the cost of the personnel of the cabinet itself. I think the greatest extravagance in this country at the present time is its own government. The seventeen members of the government are the biggest extravagance which we have in this country at this time. There was a time not so very long ago when this government did not have so many supporters in this house as it has now, and they brought down a speech from the throne in which they said that in order to cut down expenditures they were going to reduce the number of departments, but now, instead of reducing the number of departments, they are going to give us more and more departments, with extra cabinet ministers, and extra cabinet pay. It takes seventeen cabinet ministers to govern this country now, and in a short time we shall have eighteen, for a people of 9,500,000, while the United States, with 120,000,000 people, can be governed through seven cabinet ministers.

Then we have our embassy at Washington. Last year we bought a palatial residence for the Hon. Vincent Massey in Washington at a cost to the taxpayers of this country of $500,000. Whether we need an embassy down there or not is another question, but I would like to make a few observations on what it is costing us to keep the Hon. Vincent Massey down in Washington. According to the Auditor General's report this year, under the heading of Salaries and Wages, the Hon. Vincent Massey gets this title:

Envoy extraordinary—

I do not know whether there is anything extraordinary about the Hon. Vincent Massey. I never saw it anyway:

—and minister plenipotentiary, Hon. Vincent Massey, $12,000, house representation allowance, 2 months at $18,000, 10 months at $10,000, allowance for automobile, $2,000.

Then there is a list of first secretaries, commercial secretaries, chauffeurs, and so forth, with salaries ranging all the way from five to six thousand dollars apiece, and then at the bottom of the account we see this item:

Newspapers and publications, $893.22; postage, $319; rent of offices, $900; rent of rooms at The Mayflower for Hon. V. Massey—

I suppose the Hon. Vincent Massey thought he had come over in the Mayflower and was one of the original four hundred:

—April 1 to June 1, $2,541.69.

That money comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers in this Dominion. That is what we are paying for keeping the Hon. Vincent Massey in Washington, and what we would like to know is what we are getting anyway through having Mr. Massey down there.

The government could not spend any money for building a transcontinental highway; they could not spend any money on technical education to help the sons of the poor man, but when it comes to beautifying the city of Ottawa, they can pull down buildings at a cost of over $3,000,000 in order that you can get a bird's eye view of a little corner of the parliament buildings from the eastern end of the grounds.

Then we have our magnificent tariff board, costing this country $200,000 a year. If the Prime Minister would give the boys a bag of marbles and tell them to go out and play with them and have a good time, they would accomplish just about as much of useful work as this tariff board has done.

Then we have Mr. Newton Wesley Rowell, another extravagance of this government. He travelled across this country with the Customs Inquiry Commission, and he received in fees in a short time, less than a year, $44,060. That looks a good sum to the farmers and workingmen, many of whom are not drawing down more than $2 or $2.25 per day. I notice that the Labour department of this government tells us that the average living wage at the present time should be in the neighbourhood of $85 per month. I want to tell the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) and the government that there are hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who are subsisting on less than $60 a month. I could take the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister into homes and show them workingmen who are keeping their families and trying to pay their way, and are getting only $2 a day.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate with a good deal of care and have read a number of speeches delivered during its course that it was not my privilege to hear. I have also read over several times the budget speech and the budget proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), but I am not satisfied that he has proposed any substantial remedy for dealing with the problems confronting Canada to-day. Notwithstanding the fact that we have a somewhat relative prosperity, we have still a good many problems to deal with. On the tariff we have very largely a stand-pat policy, the same policy that we have had ever since the introduction of the National Policy.

It seems to me the government decided that because there was likely to be a good surplus this year it would get them by regardless of what criticism might be levelled at them. The budget surplus announced by the Minister of Finance is largely the result of world conditions, as well as the good crop or two that we have had in western Canada, and of course some other factors; it is not particularly the result of any government policy as far as I can see. In the course of his budget speech the minister, after reviewing certain conditions, is reported at page 594 of Hansard as follows:

> These, we believe, are factors which, coupled with good crops, have materially assisted in the expansion of our basic industries.

I think we ought to lay special emphasis on that word "coupled" in relation to his budget proposals. His "coupled with good crops" argument reminds me of the story of the Irishman who entered a tailor's shop with a button and asked to have a pair of pants sewed on to it. I believe that, looking at the budget surplus, the government are fortifying themselves against any criticism by repeating to themselves that passage of Scripture, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." But, after all, if there is to be any change of tariff policy it should be made in times of surpluses. The other day the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) pointed out that the time to make cuts in the tariff, if they were to be made at all in line with the proclaimed policy of the Liberal party, must be when we had surpluses. I think we had a somewhat similar thought expressed by the Prime Minister in days gone by. I remember when he was in Edmonton in 1924, after reviewing the difficulties he had had as Prime Minister, due to the fact that he was practically leading a minority party in the house, he is reported as stating—and I am quoting this from the Edmonton Bulletin of October 11, 1924:

> When asked to form a cabinet he was very diffident concerning the task, as it meant he would have to carry on, not as a government strongly supported, but really as a minority government depending on the support of one of the other parties in the house. Mr. King expressed his appreciation of the loyalty and support accorded to him by the Progressive members of the House of Commons.

That was one difficulty. The other stressed was the difficulty of Dominion finance, due to the fact that the Conservative government which preceded him had been very extravagant and had added tremendously to the national debt. Then we have this passage in the Edmonton Bulletin's report:

> When criticizing the present Liberal government, Mr. King asked his audience to bear in mind the difficulties that had to be faced, and he pointed out that if a Liberal government had been in power it would have been an easy matter for his administration to have lived up to the promises that were made when he appealed to the country in the last general election.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a budget surplus is not a guarantee of real democratic prosperity throughout the country. We have been told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) that the car loadings and so on of the railways are an indication of prosperous conditions throughout the country. With regard to budget surpluses, I would point out that for a number of years after the war, when the French government had tremendous difficulty in balancing its budget, it was generally stated that France was not suffering from unemployment to anything like the same extent that Great Britain, Canada and the United States were suffering. This advantage enjoyed by France was attributable, I believe, to the fact that she had not deflated her currency. As to railway carloadings being a criterion of the people's prosperity, I would point out that sixty pounds of wheat moving from any point in western Canada to Fort William or Port Arthur or Vancouver brings the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific the same revenue regardless of whether it is No. 1 northern or No. 6 northern, or even if it is feed. I know cases where farmers are up against a freight rate of 16 cents a bushel on their grain moving to Fort William or Port Arthur or Vancouver. Their initial pool payment was 11 cents a bushel, yet the threshing bill alone was 13 cents a bushel. I give this illustration to show that buoyant railway earnings cannot be taken as indicating more than 50 per cent of general prosperity throughout the Dominion. I think we shall find this year that the crop in western Canada last year was not all it was reported to be before it was actually harvested. It is possible that it will pay its way, but it will not lead to the development that followed the crop of 1927. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce also pointed out that the extra carload earnings meant an increase in railway employment; but railway statistics over a period of years do not show that to be the case.

It has been stated generally that when we have a tremendous increase in wheat production we are bound to have an increase in the prosperity of the farmers. I have before me the November, 1928, issue of Current History. It contains an article entitled The Farm Problem Made Clear, and what I am about to quote from this article in my judgment bears out some of the reasons for increased acreage and increased volume of wheat and other production in western Canada:

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Low prices frequently force the farmer toward increased production in order to meet inflexibly high prices, as was pointed out by Dr. E. G. Nourse of the Institute of Economics when he said in his paper before the American Farm Economic Association: "With prices per unit low and fixed obligations high, the utmost effort must be expended toward securing a large output." That is why low and unprofitable prices do not always result in decreased acreage.

So while I am willing to admit that we have a certain amount of relative prosperity, at the same time we have problems in abundance so far as the common people and the farmers of Canada are concerned.

For years one of the remedies proposed by the Liberal party has been the cutting down of the tariff. A few years ago the question of rural credits engaged our attention, and we hope that notwithstanding the very long time it has taken to put the Rural Credits Act into operation, it will be made effective in the near future. But I say again that the Liberal party has made definite pledges to this country. In 1919 it made pledges which have never been repudiated and which have never been thoroughly acted upon. Here is a resolution presented to the National Liberal convention in session in Ottawa August 5, 6 and 7, 1919. It was presented, according to the report, by:

Hon. W. E. Knowles (former member for Moose Jaw in the federal parliament, now of the Saskatchewan government).

Mr. Knowles said:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I will not detain you more than a very few minutes. This resolution is a straight, honest-to-God Liberal resolution; in it we join issue with the privileged classes and those who try to raise our revenues by the indirect method, and out of the poor people.

The rest of his speech is hardly fit to be read in the House of Commons, but if anyone wants to read it privately he will find it at page 164 of the report. However, the resolution itself reads:

Whereas, the national safety demands that the serious financial position of the country should be known and appreciated in order that steps may be taken to cope with the same, and

Whereas, on the 31st March last, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, the net public debt was $1,584,000,000, or, roughly, $220 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion, involving an annual interest charge of about $115,000,000, and thus imposing an annual burden for interest on debt alone of $15 per head of the population, and

Whereas, the estimated expenditure of the Dominion government for the present fiscal year is over $800,000,000, or, roughly, $100 per head of the population, and

Whereas, the estimated revenue is only $280,000,000, thus creating an estimated deficit of over $500,000,000—a sum equivalent to $62.50 per head of the population—which sum the finance minister proposes to obtain by borrowing, and

Whereas, national disaster will overtake this country should the present method of financing the country's affairs be continued, and

Whereas, both Great Britain and the United States at present raise more than 80 per cent of their revenue by direct taxation while Canada raises not more than 20 per cent,

Be, and it is hereby resolved:

(1) That the serious nature of the country's financial situation calls for the profoundest consideration of all patriotic citizens, and the exercise of the severest economy by the government;

(2) That increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions;

And yet, in the face of that declaration, in the last two years we have cut about 20 per cent of personal incomes, about 11 per cent of corporation incomes, and we have reduced the tariff less than 1 per cent in all the years the Liberals have been in power since 1921. I submit that there is one of two things the Liberal party can do: They can repudiate this resolution or implement it, and I think they ought to do either one or the other.

Now last year I made in this house a statement which has been misrepresented and I wish to refer to it again. I wish to refer to an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette in reference to that statement, and I shall also deal with the reference made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his budget speech last year to the statement in question. Let me say, when reference is made to this question of a deal, that I used that word deal, and I use it again. I wish to be clear on that point, because the suggestion has been made by some that it should not be used. The statement I made, which will be found at page 955 of Hansard of March 2, 1928, reads:

The parties on that side of the house are trading too much on the fact that we cannot get together with the Conservatives. Let me tell them that, if this sort of thing continues, they will find they are suffering from a delusion. It is not a very big step for the people of the west, and particularly the people of Alberta, to say that if we cannot get tariff reductions in a general way—and it looks as if that were the case—the only thing for us to do is to go and make the very best possible deal with the protectionists and see what they can do for us.

That sentence is clear, as clear as it can be—it referred to the people of the west as saying "make the very best possible deal." And what use has been made of the statement? Here in what the Montreal Gazette says. But before reading this article I may observe that I used an illustration of farmers in the west who are interested in dairying and who simply threw aside, for the time being, any desire they had for free trade in an effort to get protection for their own industry. And that was what was in my mind when I made that statement—that the action of the Liberal government was driving certain farmers to take that attitude of making a deal with the protectionists in order to get, if not equality with other protectionists, the most they could out of it. There is nothing clearer. The Montreal Gazette, on March 5, 1928, says:

Mr. Kennedy's Warning

Mr. D. M. Kennedy, who sits in the House of Commons for Peace River and represents the United Farmers of Alberta, has made a contribution to the budget debate which may or may not be regarded as elevating the tone of that discussion. He is reported to have expressed dissatisfaction with the manner in which the government is fulfilling its pledges to the people. It is not very difficult, of course, to find instances of failure in this regard, since the government and its followers, in appealing for the people's votes, exemplified an attitude of all things to all men, and proclaimed a variety of policies on tariff matters according to the understood requirements and sentiments of different sections of the community. No government could carry out all these policies, and it was inevitable that some of the campaign chickens should come home, sooner, or later, to roost in conspicuous places. The government itself has made an ingenious effort to defer the embarrassments attendant upon the homecoming of its political poultry, but Mr. Kennedy, for one, is dissatisfied with the result; wherefore he warns the Prime Minister and his associates that disciplinary measures may be taken.

Mr. Kennedy's protest possesses a certain special interest. He sat for Peace River in the last brief parliament, after the seat had been taken from the Conservative candidate by fraud. Mr. Kennedy had nothing to do with the work of Mr. "Baldy" Robb and the others, nor was it intended that he should be the beneficiary of their activities. But he occupied the seat, and when a petition was presented in behalf of the Conservative candidate, Mr. Collins, the government resisted its acceptance and it was not accepted. Mr. Kennedy stayed, justifying his action on the ground that he had, somewhere or other, lost more votes than had been taken from Mr. Collins. The importance of this episode was revealed in one of the hectic divisions of the session when the government was saved by one vote, including Mr. Kennedy's.

There never was such a division in that session, and I wrote to the editor of the Gazette asking him to inform me to what division he referred. I have not yet received any reply. But notwithstanding the fact of that lie, the Prime Minister uses this article, which is a libel on the Liberal party as well as a misrepresentation of my own attitude, in order to take a slap at me in the budget debate of last year. I will read his statement later. However, the only instance I know of where there was a really hectic division and where one vote changed the parties in the house, was the division in which I voted against the government and put them out. That was the one division, and I say that the article in the Gazette—whether I was right or wrong in voting as I did does not matter in the meantime—is a lie or misrepresentation. The article goes on:

In these circumstances may be found some reason why the member for Peace River—Mr. Kennedy was reelected at the next election—

Which is another misrepresentation, because I was opposed by both Liberals and Conservatives in that election.

—should speak to the government in plain terms, if he so desires, and he so desired on Friday last. He complained that he and his friends were suffering the disadvantages of both free trade and protection,—

I still claim that.

—while the manufacturers were receiving the benefits of both. He denied that the purpose of the U.F.A. is to bludgeon the government, though an attempt has been made to keep the Liberal party true to its pledges. Indicating the Liberals and Progressives, Mr. Kennedy is reported to have said as follows:

Then the quotation which I have already read appears in full. The article goes on:

Whether the member for Peace River used the word "deal" or the word "bargain"—reports of his remarks differ in this respect—is not very material, the sense being the same.

I had complained of misrepresentation, and I want the Prime Minister to hear this. The Gazette misrepresented the facts, and the Prime Minister, to make a case against me, last year cut a sentence right in two; and in his remarks, before cutting that sentence in two, he utterly misrepresented my statement. I quote from Hansard of March 13, 1928, at page 1299, where the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

He made a statement in this house the other evening to the effect that the most effective way a class group could act might be to see what bargain it could make with a party whose known principles were wholly opposed to its own.

What were his words? He said . . . . "the only thing for us to do is to go and make the very best possible deal with the protectionists and see what they can do for us."

That is the quotation from the sentence:

It is not a very big step for the people of the west, and particularly the people of Alberta, to say that if we cannot get tariff reductions in a general way—and it looks as if that were the case—the only thing for us to do is to go and make the very best possible deal with the protectionists—

That is a complete misrepresentation of that sentence. What I had in mind, and the illustration I used, was that the dairy farmers of the west, because of their dissatisfaction with the action of the government in connection with the Australian treaty, actually took that course; they stated that they were anxious to wipe out the Australian treaty purely on a protectionist basis. There is no question of that, but the Prime Minister made the statement that I said the only thing for a "class group" to do was to turn right around and make a deal with the protectionists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the statement to which my hon. friend is referring a statement made by myself in the House of Commons?

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why did not my hon. friend correct the statement at the time, if it was not right? I was merely quoting what he said.

Mr. KENNEDY: It is all very well to ask why I did not get up and correct a statement of that kind when I did not have the actual words before me. In the one case the sentences were all together and in the other case they were cut in two. As a private member of this house I want to say that I have a right to more courteous treatment than that from the Prime Minister. I do not care how hard the Prime Minister or anyone else on any side of the house attacks me with regard to principles or in argument, but I absolutely refuse to have my sentences carved in two, with a half used here and the other half somewhere else in order to make me say something I did not say at all. That is what was done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It looks as though my hon. friend were seeking to make a martyr of himself. What he has read to the house now simply corroborates what I said at the time I spoke. I took his words as they appeared in Hansard; I repeated them in the house when the hon. member was present and all he says now is that he could not have been expected to have known then what he had previously said.

Mr. KENNEDY: The argument advanced by the Prime Minister is a first class illustration of the type of argument used in a particular case. Two men were arguing about theology; one man told the other that by his way of arguing suicide could be justified by the Bible. To support that argument he quoted two sentences: "Judas hanged himself" and "Go thou and do likewise". I will stand by the sentence on the possibility of cooperation with the Conservatives any way it may be taken, but not when the first part is taken without the second part or the second part without the first.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to have my hon. friend stand by the whole sentence; that is all.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why did not the Prime Minister quote it all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I quoted what was essential.

Mr. KENNEDY: No, the Prime Minister quoted the part which misrepresented me; that is my claim. Just while we are on this question we may as well settle it; I said I would stand by that statement.

Is it possible for this group to cooperate with the Conservatives? Last year I placed on Hansard figures which showed that there was a difference of only about one per cent in the tariff policies of the two parties, on an average, and that difference is just about the same to-day. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister wishes to dispute that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Really I do not know what my hon. friend is after.

Mr. BENNETT: I would say he is after the Prime Minister.

Mr. KENNEDY: Very well; here is the statement I made last year, which will be found at page 201 of Hansard:

During the last election I was informed that some of my Liberal friends were very much peeved at me because I said that there was scarcely any difference between the Liberal and the Conservative tariff policies. I want to repeat that to-day, and so that there may be no misunderstanding, I should like to put on Hansard a statement covering all the years the Conservatives were in power from 1888 to 1897 and from 1913 to 1922. I have given the Conservatives credit in each case for one year after they went out. In the statement I have given the figures regarding the Liberals from 1898 to 1912 and from 1922 to 1926. In both cases I show the average tariff collections against all dutiable imports and against all imports dutiable and free, and taking the whole period during which both parties were in power respectively I find that there is a difference of just .8 per cent in favour of the Liberals. If you take all the years the Conservatives were in power you will find that the collections on dutiable imports averaged 27.4 per cent while in the case of the Liberals, during the whole time they were in power, the collections averaged 26.6 per cent, or a difference of .8 per cent. Taking the figures covering all imports we find, in the case of the Conservatives, an average of 17.2 per cent and in the case of the Liberals, 16.4 per cent.

Then followed the complete statement. I do not think I will read it, but I have worked out the averages on this basis, which I will give the house. During the years the Conservatives were in power their average as against all dutiable imports was 27.4 per cent, while the average of the Liberals was 26.5 per cent; the Conservative average against all imports was 17.2 per cent and the Liberal average 16.4 per cent, or a difference of about one per cent in the applied policy. This is not the so-called "known" but the "applied" policy. At that time I invited criticism of that statement, because I wanted to hear what the other side said about it, but so far as I could see the only answer was this statement handed in by the Prime Minister in which he gave a table showing the reductions in the customs duties on instruments of production in the basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing. Anyone who will look at the pages of Hansard containing that statement will be struck with the relatively large reductions which were made in 1924 and 1926, but were those strictly Liberal budgets or were they the result of Liberal administration? In 1923, in a by-election at Kent, New Brunswick, the Liberals lost one seat to the Conservatives and faced the House of Commons in 1924 with one less than a majority. During that year large reductions were made in the duties on agricultural implements. Then in 1926 we had about one hundred Liberals of a total membership of the house of 245, that was another year when large reductions were made, and I do not think either of these budgets in reality could be called Liberal budgets.

Then let us consider the statement made by the Prime Minister at Edmonton on October 11, 1924 as follows:

When criticizing the present Liberal government Mr. King asked his audience to bear in mind the difficulties that had to be faced, and he pointed out that if a Liberal government had been in power it would have been an easy matter for his administration to have lived up to the promises that were made when he appealed to the country in the last general election.

The argument advanced was that there was not a sufficient majority to carry out these policies, but the point is that the years during which real advances were made in accordance with that policy as laid down by the Liberal convention of 1919 were the years when the Liberal party were in a minority in this house. What has happened since the government came back with a majority, with the help of our Liberal-Progressive friends, who must accept some responsibility? There has been a distinct move away from direct taxation through the cuts in the income tax, while there has been practically no cut in the customs tariff even this year. That fact stands out so distinctly that it is impossible to examine the budget, having regard to the conditions existing in the House of Commons, without realizing that with a majority of the members of the house belonging to the Liberal party we cannot get away from the old protectionist policy introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald. When I use that argument some of my Liberal friends say to me, "What about the British preference?" The Conservative party should have the same credit for carrying on the British preference after it was introduced as the Liberal party gets for carrying on the old national policy of the Conservatives.

Can we cooperate with the Conservatives? This question of low tariff and free trade is not an idol to worship, any more than is the question of protection. I am not particularly interested in declared or known policies; I want applied policies. Whatever the Conservative policies have been in the past, I am willing to accept the statements which have been made these last two years. If they mean anything at all there is more real equality in the applied policy as defined by the Conservatives than there is in the policy of lowering the tariff less than 1 per cent on an average, and letting it go at that.

Mr. ROBB: I suppose the hon. member has arrived at that percentage by considering the large importations of alcoholic liquor from the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. KENNEDY: Any average you may take is subject to qualification. It is a wonder we did not have some of it last year, and that is why I made that statement in my speech on the address. No reference however was made to it. In a matter of this kind you have to deal with averages, because you are dealing with the whole policy. We are dealing with averages when we consider the income tax and in connection with the Conservative policy; that is the only basis of comparison which can be made.

The following statement, which appears on page 3785 of Hansard of 1925, and which was amplified last year by the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in the form of an amendment:

> That a tariff commission should be appointed representative of the three great classes of Canadian industry, agriculture, manufacturing and labour, and be entrusted with the duty of studying Canadian tariff problems, in their every bearing and of making from time to time such recommendations to the government as it deems in the general public interest with the reasons therefor, and with power also, where it finds unfair advantage is being taken of protective duties, of making recommendations to be given effect by the government for removing or reducing tariff schedules or imposing special excise taxes upon product in respect of which such advantage is taken, and that its reports, findings, recommendations and reasons therefor be given to the public.

As I understand the Liberal policy it is about 1 per cent below that of the Conservative, but the manufacturer can take any advantage he likes of the protection given, whether it be 20 per cent, 25 per cent, or 30 per cent. I do not know whether the Conservatives will carry out their declared policy, but they will have to come across with it if I can make them because I believe it would be a good thing to have one party in this house if it did nothing else but keep the one or the other of the major parties to the promises which they may make during election time. If the Conservative party can apply their policy, even though it is 1, 2, 3 or 4 per cent higher than the present tariff, it will be nearer to equality in tariff matters, so far as all the people of this country are concerned, than the policy which has been in effect for the last seven years.

The member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) made a statement last year, and I assume that he was speaking for his party or otherwise my argument does not amount to anything. This statement appears on page 620 of Hansard of 1928, and in part is as follows:

> 4. The stabilization in Canada of the costs of living and the costs of implements of production on such comparatively low bases as will enable our people, in producing and selling our surplus of national products abroad, to compete advantageously with the products of foreign countries in our common markets abroad.
> 5. The reduction of the customs tariff or the imposition of higher excise taxes, whenever and wherever necessary, to prevent the immoral use or abuse of the existing tariff, or any unfair advantage being taken of the tariff, as for example by those who would resort to profiteering by exacting unduly high prices for their products from domestic consumers, under the protecting elements of the existing tariff.

I think it was the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) who said in Toronto two years ago that the Conservative policy was not a policy of high or low tariff, but a tariff to develop Canada. I submit that a tariff which is used only to protect the market for the home manufacturer, if you have an organization which will prevent advantage being taken of the home consumer, comes nearer to equality so far as the consumer is concerned, and nearer to being fair than a tariff which is just 1 per cent under the Conservative tariff for the last forty years, and under which the beneficiary is allowed to take any advantage he desires.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we can cooperate with the Conservatives when that policy is applied, as against the policy we have had during the last seven years. During the last elections I told my constituents that so far as I was concerned I had no intention of worrying about Liberal or Conservative parties, but I intended to deal with matters on their merits, and I have tried to follow that policy for the last seven years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was the hon. member aware, when he made that statement, that the Conservatives were blaming this government for not raising the tariff, and they moved an amendment to that effect?

Mr. KENNEDY: Speeches have been made on both sides of the house, and if we were to take the statements made over there regarding reductions and compare them with the statements made over here advocating raising the tariff, they would just about counterbalance. What I am interested in is the actual application of the policies.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely you could not cooperate in asking that the tariff be raised?

Mr. KENNEDY: If you can prevent the fellow who gets the raise in tariff from taking advantage of it, that is a different thing entirely. As I have stated, it would come nearer to equality so far as the people of the country are concerned than anything which has been done by the Liberal party, in spite of all its pledges to protect the consumer.

As the balance of my remarks would bear on the amendment and the main motion, and because I have come to a point—

Mr. LAPOINTE: A crucial point.

Mr. KENNEDY: —where I can close my remarks, I will do so as my time has nearly expired.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the budget which has been discussed almost to the limit of sufficiency, but I only desire to take up the time allotted to me in drawing attention to a resolution which I placed on the order paper about six weeks ago, but which will not be reached owing to the action of the government in appropriating the private members' days for the rest of the session. My resolution was as follows:

> Whereas the affairs of the Manufacturers Finance Corporation were placed in the hands of a liquidator last year;
> And whereas a balance sheet was issued only a very short time before the liquidation, showing a very prosperous and satisfactory condition of the finances of the company;
> And whereas the interim liquidator has issued a report showing an apparent deficit of over $3,000,000.
> Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that the select standing committee on banking and commerce be instructed to investigate the said matter and to report if any means could be adopted for the better protection of the interests of the public.

I am unable to discuss that as a resolution and I have withdrawn it from the order paper in order that I may be able to discuss it now. Under some technicality of the rules I find that I can introduce a motion during the routine proceedings at the beginning of the daily session that this matter be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce. As that motion would not be debatable I am taking advantage of the opportunity to explain it now in the hope that hon. members will remember my remarks and support the resolution without any explanation being offered at the time it is introduced. That is the only way in which I can bring it before the committee on banking and commerce. I do not want merely to talk about it; I want to see some action taken in connection with it.

It is not necessary for me to go into the details of this unsavoury mess. It is sufficient, I should think, to make out only a prima facie case for its submission to the committee, and for them to take such action as they may deem wise. The facts as known to us all, as established by the press, will be sufficient justification. This company was formed for the very laudable and legitimate purpose of discounting commercial paper in connection with chattels such as motor cars, pianos, other musical instruments, and so forth. It was specially mentioned in their propaganda to sell their stock, how thoroughly secure the investors were. They were protected by no less than four or five separate provisions. First of all they had the lien on chattel itself, let us say a motor car or piano; secondly, they had the note of the purchaser who was supposed to have paid a substantial sum on it; then they had the note of the garageman who had sold him the car, and further back than that they had the note of the manufacturer. If that was not sufficient to guarantee the safety of the investment, there was a still greater protection. The whole risk was afterwards insured, the premium being, I think, about one-half of one per cent, by a very stable, strong English insurance company, whose assets were quoted at great length. So, if it was possible to conceive of an investment that was absolutely safe, surely that was the one.

What happened? In the summer it went bankrupt a year ago. About this time or perhaps a little later, they had an annual meeting and they issued a balance sheet. I am sorry I have not a copy of it before me, but it was quoted in the press at the time. That balance sheet was falsified and must have been deliberately falsified, because it represented the company to be in a prosperous and splendid condition. I think one optimistic shareholder said at the time that its condition compared favourably with that of one of the well known banks. At that very moment the company was bankrupt, not bankrupt in the legal sense, but insolvent, inasmuch as it was unable to pay its debts. The liquidator, a man of some note in the financial world and cautious as all liquidators are, announced a probable deficit of $3,000,000 in a comparatively small company of that character.

As recently as less than a year ago a high pressure salesmanship campaign was put on not only in this city, but even in this house, to sell the stock of this company which was then absolutely insolvent. I myself almost fell a victim to it; at any rate I became an object of their attention, but the saving Providence which watches over children, fools and drunkards prevented me from going the whole length of investing in it. Many other people, however, were bitten. It was astonishing to me, after I put the notice on the order paper, to find how widespread the losses were all over Canada and amongst every class of people, from the rich down to the poorest. I have received a number of letters and telephone calls in connection with the matter. A man whom I do not know stopped me in the street one day and bid me Godspeed in bringing the matter up. I understand he had been stuck for some $4,500. This is a typical example from Montreal evidently written by someone who was more familiar with French than with English:

We, the undersigned, submit humbly to your consideration:

1st. We have placed our economies in the Manufacturers Finance Corporation Limited, on urgent solicitations from their agents here in Montreal. They were assuring us that the company was doing good business and was prosperous.

[Mr. Neill.]

2nd. A few months after we had their shares they failed.

We ask earnestly that the said company be ordered by a court or by the government of Canada to pay back the money we put in their hands. etc.

Unfortunately I had to write and tell him that that was quite impossible; that all we could do was to try to prevent a recurrence of the same thing. I have under my hand a postcard sent me anonymously from Vanconver, and this is a typical illustration of their literature. It is headed in big red headlines: "How Much Do You Save?" and it goes on:

Your future—possibly, too, the welfare and happiness of your loved ones—

Note the pathetic appeal!

—depends on your ability to save and make profitable use of your savings. Resolve, this very day, to save systematically, be it ever so little. You'll be surprised how rapidly your savings accumulate and you will bless the day you resolved to start. We have revised an unusual method—

Thank goodness it was unusual!

—which will help you save systematically and earn six per cent on your savings. Our booklet "The Way to Independence" tells you all about it. It contains such useful information that is well worth reading. We will gladly send you a copy on request. Just fill in your name and address below and mail to us. You will be under no obligation whatever.

Then follows the name of the Manufacturers Finance Corporation Limited, a beautiful little picture of the book called "The Way to Independence," and a place for the name of the prospective sucker and his address. The man who sent me this evidently is somewhat cynical because he has put some interjections into it. This is the way he thinks it ought to read:

Mr. HEAPS: Did he think the hon. member was a prospect?

Mr. NEILL: This was sent out in Vancouver to secure prospects. The man thinks it should read not "How much do you Save?" but "How much did you save for McDonald Brothers?" Then he says that instead of saying "You will bless the day you resolved to start," it should read "You will bless the day you resolved to start putting these men in gaol." He says he thinks the beautiful little pamphlet headed "The Way to Independence" would better be called "How to get Rich Quick and how to Keep out of Gaol." He says that instead of "The Way to Independence" it should be "The Way to Three Million Dollars." In the space reserved for the name of the victim he inserts the name "Messrs. McDonald Brothers" and in the space for the address he puts "care of Senate, and out on bail somewhere." He also writes on the card:

> Actually sold stock when they, the company, were not solvent.
> Mr. Neill, all power to your bringing this matter up in the house. Stay right with it.

I will not go into it further. It compares on a smaller scale with the Home Bank disaster or more properly, perhaps, with what happened in connection with the Great West Permanent Loan Corporation. Hon. members will readily remember the audacity with which the Alexanders defended their position some years ago in the committee. I think they were later convicted on 160 counts of criminality in connection with the case, and they are now in gaol serving a three-year sentence. In less than three years they will be out with the money they robbed their victims of, but their victims will have to go without their money for the rest of their lives, and perhaps their lives will be in danger from lack of the money which would enable them to regain their health.

The main object in getting this before the committee is to endeavour to have some safeguard suggested for the future. I have not much hope that they can do anything for the victims of this particular piece of rascality. No doubt the criminal and civil courts will be available to do anything they can to collect the money from those from whom it should be obtained. I am looking rather to the future. It is a well known fact that we cannot by act of parliament make men wise any more than by act of parliament we can make them virtuous. I do not have much hope that we can do anything for people who are so credulous as to buy Brooklyn bridge or a street car from a total stranger, although I believe that both these things have happened in the last two years. Nor have I much sympathy with that other class which falls so readily a victim to so-called confidence men, because if you examine into these get-rich-quick schemes you will find that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they are based on the suggestion of cheating somebody else. As has been well said by Charles Dickens, there is a credulity of the knave as well as of the honest man, and the man who examines with the greatest shrewdness a business proposition put up as a sound business investment will very often fall for a suggestion of making easy money illegally, for instance, by tapping a wire and getting the results of a horse race, and then betting on it, before the public know the result. People will fall for that who could not be induced to make an unsound investment. I have not much sympathy with that class of people. But the victims in this case were good, sound business people, some rich, some poor, and people who had no reason to suspect that there was anything wrong with this company. After all, we must take these things at their face value to some extent, or we should never invest at all. Many years ago I saw a world-famous cartoon in Punch. It occupied two pages. On one page was a picture showing a highwayman holding up a regular stage coach. He was on horse back, and with his pistol he was ordering the passengers to stand and deliver. That picture was called "Highway robbery in 1782." On the other page was a picture entitled "Highway robbery in 1882," and it showed a richly upholstered office, in which a fat, oily, unctuous man, labelled "President," was reading out a balance sheet to a shabbily dressed widow with two children hanging on to her skirts. The widow was vainly trying to understand what the man was reading out. As I say, this picture was called "Highway robbery in 1882." Of the two robbers, I really prefer the man with the pistol because at least he took the chance of getting shot, and the still greater chance of ultimately being hanged, but the man who commits the robbery in the manager's or president's room, and can afford to engage lawyers to show him how to do it without bringing himself within the shadow of the law, is not held up to scorn at all, but very likely gets a seat in the House of Lords, in the old country, or a seat in the Senate, in Canada.

It is the ordinary business people and the poor investor that I wish to protect. A thing of this kind is very hard to detect, especially as in this case and in that of the Alexanders the real criminals were those occupying executive positions. I have good reason to believe that some of the directors of this company were inclined to be a little doubtful and sought to make inquiries, but it was easy to deceive them because the men to whom they had to apply for information were those who were guilty of the fraud, and naturally they knew how to cover up their tracks. It is a thoroughly bad thing when a company like this goes to smash because it discredits investment and prevents capital from being available to develop what might be bona fide, although new, industries.

There are two points which I suggest the committee might take into consideration. One would be that no executive officer, no manager or president occupying an executive position and drawing a salary from the company, should be allowed to lend money to himself. That is what wrecked the Alexander outfit; they lent money to each other. I lend the company's money to you on bogus security, and you lend the company's money to me on bogus security. In the case of this other concern, when an examination is made I think it will be found that the trouble was that there was a subsidiary company entirely under the control of one of the principal executive officers; it was really his private company with which nearly all the business was done, and it was done in a way which must inevitably have led to the results which followed. Had he been prohibited by law from lending money to himself directly or indirectly, perhaps it would not have happened.

The other feature which I suggest the committee might consider is this, that promoters of this character, or of any character, should be forbidden to advertise or to feature in their prospectus the names of a member or ex-members of the cabinet or of the House of Commons or Senate of Canada. There is only one reason why their names are put on, and that is to induce people to invest who otherwise would not. People have a great admiration for a certain member of parliament or senator. They know he occupies a high position, and they feel that if he has investigated the company and invested his own money in it, it is good enough for them. Even if the company succeeds, as it sometimes does, at least this practice cheapens our position, and if the company is not successful, which is more than likely to be the case because our names are not needed unless the company's success is at least doubtful—you never see the name of a member of parliament or senator used to boost the shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Imperial Oil or International Nickel, because they do not need our names; it is only companies whose success is doubtful that wish to have our names—if the company fails, our action is wholly bad because we allowed our names to be used as an inducement to people, who are less informed on finance than we are supposed to be, to invest their money.

There is also this suspicion. It is inevitably felt that either we got a block of shares at a very low rate or a commisison for the use of our names. Very often the opposite is the fact. Very often the member of parliament or senator loses all the money he puts in, just like the man in the street, but the suggestion is there, and it creates a very unjust suspicion against us all. It is very hard in such circumstances to get the man in the street to believe that we are as innocent as we perhaps really may be, whereas if our names were not allowed to be used, that could not happen.

I only ask that this should go to the committee, and that the committee should look into it and see if it is not possible to devise some safeguards, perhaps something quite remote from anything I have suggested, to check swindles of this character. I hope the house will remember the explanation which I have given now when the motion comes up, as it will, in a few days, and that the house will vote for it to go to the committee without debate, because the motion will not be debatable. I shall draw it widely, so that the committee will have full scope to do as much or as little as it sees fit, and when the motion comes up I shall only ask that it be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I fear the time has long gone by when an ordinary member of the house can hope to contribute anything of very much value to the budget debate. Still I regard it as a duty to my constituents to say something on this budget inasmuch as the industry in which I am particularly interested has received no assistance under it.

With regard to the budget itself there is very little to be said. I think it is pretty generally recognized that it is possibly the most innocuous piece of political literature that ever passed for a budget in this parliament. Just why the last speaker (Mr. Neill) saw fit to confine his remarks to a bankrupt concern in dealing with this budget, I do not know; possibly it was the result of an association of ideas. This budget cannot be satisfactory either to the protectionists to the left of the Minister of Finance or to the free traders to his right, but evidently they have both accepted it, possibly because both protectionist and free trader could feel that if he did not get anything, the man sitting at the other end of the chamber did not get anything either. But innocuous as it is, the budget met with the usual chorus of congratulations, both from the supporters of the government in this house and from the Liberal press throughout the country. There is a peculiar feature about this acclaim—the almost identical strain in which all the speeches are couched, and the almost identical phrases employed by the Liberal editors. Two themes run through all the congratulations: First, the great prosperity of the country; second, the great Liberal surplus.

With regard to this vaunted prosperity, there is a considerable difference of opinion.

There is a difference of opinion even among the Liberals themselves. All the supporters of the government whom I have heard acclaiming this prosperity utterly fail to point out exactly where it is to be found. In dealing with this question we find the same old principle of criticism to-day that prevailed yesterday and that I suppose will continue forever; that is, the criticism varies according to the province. The Liberal opposition in Ontario and the Liberal opposition in Nova Scotia deny that there is any prosperity. In Nova Scotia we have a Conservative government—a good government, a government that has been in power for three years and in that time has done more than the preceding Grit governments did in thirty years to develop the resources of the province and to undo the evils created by their predecessors in office. While the Rhodes government claims some little credit for whatever prosperity may exist in the province, the Liberals of Nova Scotia deny that there is any such prosperity. To illustrate the point I am making, I propose to quote two editorials from the leading Grit newspaper in Nova Scotia, the Halifax Morning Chronicle. The first editorial is from the issue of Saturday, March 2, 1929—the day after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) delivered his budget speech. It is couched in the usual laudatory terms and indicates clearly that is was written before the speech was ever delivered. It is made up of the usual political generalities that every person must employ when getting the obituary ready before the corpse is cold. This is the editorial:

> The sixth budget presented to the House of Commons by the present Minister of Finance was like those which preceded it, a distinctly Liberal budget. It was also a typical Robb budget—in the substance of its contents, in its concise and luminous presentation of facts, in the clear and comprehensive analysis of the national balance sheet, and the evidence it bore of prudent administration and sound financing. Mr. Robb is rivalling the reputation established by his great predecessor in office, Hon. W. S. Fielding, in his management of the public purse to produce recurring surpluses from year to year.
> The Minister of Finance in his lucid and businesslike survey of the year's operations was able to tell a glowing story of the rising tide of prosperity, of employment at a high level, of industries busily producing products for home consumption, and for foreign markets, of expanding trade with the world, of buoyant revenues, of a balanced budget, of a large surplus, of continued reduction in the national debt, of a decrease in the annual interest charges, and the prospect of sustained and enterprising development of the great resources of the Dominion which warranted optimism and confidence for the future of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the stuff.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Yes, it must be very gratifying indeed to the Minister of Finance. But that editorial bears all the earmarks of having been prepared long before the minister introduced his budget. A few days later, on Tuesday, March 19, 1929, the same paper contained an editorial on the question of prosperity claimed by the Rhodes government. The provincial government took credit to itself for having contributed a little towards creating prosperity in Nova Scotia, and the Morning Chronicle promptly took the government to task in these words:

> The attention of the legislature has been drawn to economic conditions in Nova Scotia as they to-day exist. It has been pointed out that the much-talked-of prosperity, in so far as this province is concerned, is confined mainly to those centres where there has been large spending of public moneys, or where certain subventions have been granted to certain industries. In other words it has been stimulated by artificial means.
> There is no tendency anywhere to discount these aids, but it is another matter altogether on the strength of these to assert that those engaged in the basic industries and dependent entirely on their own efforts for success are at the flood-tide of prosperity. The country knows this is simply not true. One member stated that fifty per cent of the farms were going behind, twenty-five per cent were standing still, while the remaining twenty-five per cent were making progress because of their better location.

Now I ask seriously, is this country prosperous? Is this statement about the rising tide of prosperity justified? I have listened with interest while hon. members on the opposite side have quoted statistics to show our steady growth of imports and exports; I have listened carefully while they quoted the glowing annual statements of our chartered banks and other financial institutions; I have also noted the impressive figures they presented to the house dealing with car loadings and railway earnings. All this is probably true. The imports and exports may be at a figure hitherto never reached; the bank clearings may be above all previous records; car loadings and all other evidences may be there. And yet I venture to say that seven or eight out of every ten men in this country are poorer to-day than they were twelve months ago. I will illustrate that by an actual happening in my own county. We have there the leading industry in eastern Canada. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company, formed some thirty odd years ago through the assistance of the Liberal government here, has fallen upon evil days on account of the actions of the present government. Up to 1921 and 1922 this industry was able to get along. Since that time this government has been stripping it item by item of the protection necessary for its maintenance, leaving it open to the competition of our neighbours, with the result that it went into liquidation three years ago. The liquidator at once took steps to employ the most efficient help he could get and eliminated all unnecessary expenses, so that last year this concern operated to 97 per cent of its capacity. Consider this for a moment. That concern was providing employment; it was going for all it was worth, turning out more products than ever before and thus contributing to the railways, to the earnings of the banks, to the exports and imports of the country, and to every one of those indexes quoted by members supporting the government, to show the prosperity of the country. Yet the men employed in that industry, 3,000 strong, are poorer to-day than they were a year ago. Ask these men how the mortgages on their homes stand; ask them whether they have succeeded in paying off those mortgages. Are they able to live better than they did before, to feed and clothe their families any better? The answer is, no. Thirty-three cents an hour is the amount paid for ordinary labour in that concern.

Now, you will never have and never can have prosperity in this country until the great body of the people are prosperous; and the test suggested by my hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) this afternoon, in which he quoted from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, is after all the real test of prosperity in Canada. Go among the great middle class, the labouring class, the mercantile class and the professional class, and ask them whether they are prosperous, and seven or eight out of ten will tell you they are not. A few are making money; a few are growing wealthy. But apply the acid test to actual conditions and you will find that the statistical house of cards falls to the ground. So much with regard to prosperity.

The other chord which these eulogists strike is the question of surplus. The Minister of Finance has taken out of the pockets of the people $69,000,000 more than is required to carry on the government of the country. Is any credit due him for that? Not unless he can put his finger on some policy, some piece of legislation and show that it has contributed to the surplus. Let him show that he has contributed thereto by saving, by economising. If he cannot do so he is entitled to about the same credit as is due the tollkeeper at the end of a bridge who takes credit for the traffic that passes over the bridge. With regard to the surplus test, the real point is this: Two things can be done. Either you can take a portion of the surplus to pay off the debt, reducing the interest two or three millions a year, or you can take that $69,000,000 and use it for the development of the resources of the country, creating new wealth greater by many times than the three millions you will save in interest.

I am glad to see my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) here. I listened with a great deal of interest to his address the other day and I wish to congratulate him upon it. Two or three things he said I must take exception to, but he will not mind that. He referred first of all to the visit of our leader (Mr. Bennett) to the maritime provinces; so did the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). The hon. member also referred to the gypsum question and to agricultural implements. Now, with regard to the visit of our leader to the maritime provinces, let me say this. During some thirty odd years I have been more or less associated with receptions of different kinds to various leaders of all political parties, Liberals and Conservatives, Republicans and Democrats. With receptions to all political leaders in this country in the last twenty-five years I have had something to do, whether opposed to them politically or not, and I can say this, that no leader of any party, Liberal or Conservative, ever made a more profound impression upon the people of the maritime provinces than did the leader of the opposition in his visit last year. He came to his own; he spoke to his own; they understood what he was saying, and he was offering them something they understood. And from a party standpoint we have been more than pleased with his visit there.

With regard to the question of gypsum, to which my hon. friend referred, there is, as the house is no doubt aware, a very large gypsum industry in the town of Windsor. They ship all the gypsum in a raw state, but I should be very much surprised if the people of Windsor would not very much prefer to have that gypsum converted into the finished article if there were a market for it. The hon. member knows, however, as I know, that there is not a large market in Canada for the finished gypsum; that market is pretty well covered now. Consequently the raw material must be shipped out, and to that there is absolutely no objection on the part of this party. And none was uttered by the leader of the opposition.

I come now to the third point, I must say it struck me at the time as an exceptionally strong argument. The hon. member was dealing then with the duty on agricultural implements and he cited various implements—harrows, manure spreaders and other implements, farm wagons and so forth. He pointed out the difference between the duty in 1921 and in 1928, and said:

I have figures covering a long list of agricultural implements and comparing the prices of January, 1924, with the prices after the reduction in duty, showing that the reduction actually was reflected in the price of the commodity on which the duty was reduced.

I must say that that statement struck me as an exceptionally strong argument if it were well founded in fact, so strong that I wanted to satisfy myself about it. I did not go to any bureau of statistics—I have heard so many statistics given in this house since I have been here; I have seen member after member get up and make columns of statistics do a skirt dance in order to prove a certain point; so in order to satisfy myself I went to the people who sell these things and got from them their price lists for 1921, 1924 and 1928. I took the items given by my hon. friend, together with some others which he did not include, and according to these price lists the prices were as follows:

Spring tooth harrows	$ 14 50	$ 15 25	$ 15 50
Disc harrows	45 00	51 50	50 50
Manure spreaders	187 00	216 00	180 00
Farm wagons, trucks	65 50	64 50	59 00
Cream separators	93 50	88 00	92 00
Hay presses	229 00	263 00	272 00
Hay rakes	47 00	51 50	50 50
Ploughs	23 00	22 25	21 50
Reapers	135 50	145 00	138 00
Mowers	83 00	90 50	87 00

It will be noticed from this list that many of these articles cost more in 1928 than they did in 1921, with a few exceptions. Some articles are a little lower, but there is an appreciable reduction in the price of only one machine; that is the manure spreader. In 1921 that machine sold for $187, in 1924 for $216 and in 1928 for $180.

Mr. ILSLEY: What month did my hon. friend take in 1924?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I took the price list for the whole year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does my hon. friend know that the price lists were changed shortly after the beginning of the year as the result of the reduction in duty? That was my argument. Unless my hon. friend's list for 1924 is based on the January prices of that year his figures are not of value.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I do not think there was much difference in 1924. I refer now to the one article which does show some appreciable reduction; that is, the manure spreader. It would appear that all these reductions in duty have only resulted in lowering the price of that one article.

Now I wish to refer to the matter I mentioned in opening my address; I want to join with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) in protesting against the refusal—because that is what it amounts to—of this government to implement the Duncan report with regard to the bonus on steel. That report was made in 1926 and this particular recommendation is found on page 37. To make my point clear I am going to read the recommendation in order to place it on Hansard:

It was pointed out to us that, at its inception, the Nova Scotia steel industry enjoyed national aid in the form of a bounty. This system of bounties prevailed for many years.

We were asked to recommend that a bounty should be again made available. In this connection we have thought it right to give consideration to a point which was emphasized in the course of the evidence, viz.—that a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty is given when imported coal is used for metallurgical purposes, and that this is tantamount to giving a bonus of that amount, since it means that the Dominion is yielding up money which otherwise under its general policy in regard to bituminous coal would accrue to it. While there are, no doubt, other angles from which this concession can be regarded, it does in its operation have the effect of a bonus, and it is difficult to see how the same bonus can be denied to native coal.

Having regard to the bounty system previously applied, and to this aspect of the application of the drawback, we recommend that a bonus should be given in respect of steel when Canadian coal is used in its manufacture, and that the bonus should be calculated on the basis of the present drawback for every ton of coal used in such manufacture.

There we have a clear and definite recommendation. In the preceding paragraphs the report refers to the customs tariff with regard to steel, and there it is made plain that the commission were not dealing with the customs tariff, since that matter was before the tariff board at that time. Just here I should like to point out that in my opinion the tariff board has absolutely nothing to do with the question of a bonus; these are two separate and distinct matters, having to do with entirely different considerations. However, the fact remains that the government have not implemented this recommendation, so what follows? Is there any excuse for that failure? The defence of the government has been left in the hands of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the representative of Nova Scotia in the present cabinet. I may say to him, having known him for so long and respecting and liking him as I do, that I regret very much that he saw fit to present the defence which he did in this connection. Far better indeed for him to have remained silent and allowed his friends in Nova Scotia to feel that while he had not succeeded in having that recommendation implemented he was working with that end in view. They would have appreciated the opposition he would have to meet from certain of his colleagues in the cabinet. One of the western statesman in the cabinet, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), was credited with having made the statement in a western town that the maritime people had only three ambitions; to be born, to get married, and to have a free ride on the Intercolonial.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the hon. member aware that the minister has publicly denied having made that statement?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): As far as I know he has never denied it in the house. but if he has done so I am prepared to accept his denial. I thought at the time that it was a very foolish statement for any politician to make, particularly a politician having ambitions for further political preferment and requiring the assistance of the maritime provinces to carry them out.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not forget the statement which the Minister of Finance made last year.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): We will come to him in a moment. There is another gentleman representing a western province, the Minister of Mines (Mr. Stewart). He was the author of the coke legislation which was supposed to confer such benefits on the coal industry in the east. He is the gentleman who, after attending some banquet in London, generously threw open the coal market of Canada and invited them to send their coal over here. Those two gentlemen in the cabinet, colleagues of the Minister of National Defence, could be depended upon to oppose any effort to have that recommendation implemented. And last but not least, the genial and gentlemanly Minister of Finance, whose opinion of the maritimes was crystallized in the epithet, "whiners", could be counted upon as being opposed to this measure. We in Nova Scotia realize quite well the opposition the Minister of National Defence would have met with in trying to have this recommendation implemented, but did he attempt it? He did not. We have the statement of the Minister of National Defence, which appears at pages 1032 and 1033 of Hansard. He devoted three columns of Hansard in an attempt to defend the government's want of action in connection with the steel industry.

[Mr. Finlay MacDonald.]

My time will not permit me to read his statement, but I will digest it and put my statement on record and leave it to the opinion of this house whether or not I am doing him an injustice.

From the beginning to the end of his defence of the government's want of action in this connection, the Minister of National Defence did not make one relevant remark. His first statement was that the interests of steel and coal in the maritime provinces were almost inseparable and were absolutely interwoven. It is true that they are allied industries, tied up together pretty well, but they are not interwoven.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the hon. member know that both the coal and steel industries, that is, the receiver and the company, are applying for the same relief? The coal industry is asking that a bonus be paid on coal, and the steel industry is asking that a bonus be paid on steel. Does the hon. member suggest that they are not bound up together?

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that they are asking for the same relief does not mean anything.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I will deal with that. The minister's statement continues:

> At the present time the coal industry in Nova Scotia is operated by a company under the control of those who own the bonds, and the steel industry is in the hands of and being operated by a receiver.

They are two separate organizations at the present time. Even though his statement be true, what would that have to do with the government implementing this recommendation?

Mr. RALSTON: Does the hon. member know that the coal industry has applied to the tariff board for that?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The tariff board has absolutely nothing to do with it.

Mr. RALSTON: The coal industry has so indicated.

Mr. BENNETT: They were sent there.

Mr. RALSTON: It appears in their brief.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GEARY: Take your medicine.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The bonus question is not before the tariff board. I do not care if three or four companies have put it in their briefs; it should never have been there.

Mr. RALSTON: When the hon. member is running a coal company he will have the opportunity of taking it out.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): That is quite uncalled for, because I am trying to make a serious argument by saying that the bonus would remove a discrimination against our company as compared with other companies in Canada. If the tariff board were honest and sincere they would have said immediately this matter was brought before them; "We will not consider that at all; that has already been ruled upon by a tribunal having equal jurisdiction and power with us."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. BENNETT: An extension was given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm).

Mr. QUINN: They do not want to hear it.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps the hon. member has been interrupted to such an extent that he might be given a little more time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Speaker has not the power to extend the hon. gentleman's time.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member can finish it on the main motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the house is unanimously agreed to give the hon. member more time he may proceed.

Mr. HEAPS: I object to any extension of the forty minute rule. If we are going to extend it, let us do away with it altogether.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I appreciate the courtesy of the Minister of Finance, but I must accept the ruling of Your Honour.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If we are going to complete this debate we should continue.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Each year the budget is looked upon as a barometer of the economic welfare of the Dominion. I think we can congratulate ourselves on the buoyancy of our revenue. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is to be congratulated on the way expenditure has been met by income, leaving a surplus of nearly $70,000,000 to apply towards the reduction of the national debt. But when we compare this with the net debt of the Dominion and the year's total estimated revenue of $454,942,000, and when we take into account the fact that much is made in the budget speech of the tremendous prosperity of the country, it leaves the ordinary man staggering with amazement at the awful extravagance and carefree attitude displayed by Canadians as a people with a debt of nearly $2,300,000,000. Supposing the fiscal year 1928-29 had been a very poor year in trade, one can quite conceive that instead of the boasted optimism, something akin to gloom would have prevailed.

While the revenues of the fiscal year in a measure justify the boast of prosperity for which all governments take credit when they can, we should now at the end of this year analyse the statement of the Minister of Finance, particularly regarding the boasted prosperity. All classes have not shared in the prosperity boasted of, and while urban industries along with those in the carrying trade of the Dominion have been able to show surplus earnings, this has been largely due to the heavy crop of wheat and other cereals from which the farmer was left no better off than he was before. While this condition has been brought about very largely by the low quality of the wheat crop owing to the heavy frosts in August, agriculture is not and cannot be on a permanent basis until it is freed from the burden imposed upon it for the sake of urban industries, particularly in Quebec and Ontario. To speak frankly, the boasted prosperity of the budget is not the prosperity of a commonwealth, but the concentration of wealth by the capitalistic class who constantly seek increasing power from parliament to filch a large part of the worker's earnings by purchase penalties on what he eats and wears. These penalties are imposed and collected without, in many cases, any regard for equity as between the classes, or for businesslike procedure or even for the furnishing of revenue for the administration of affairs.

There is a boast, too, that customs revenues have increased this year by $28,000,000. This to a country of 9,000,000 people should be a shame and not a boast, as it is mostly due to tariff levies on the necessaries of life. We collected this year through tariffs the sum of $185,000,000, or about $21 from every person, or more than $100 from every family. This is a tax that the poor pay as well as the rich. But let us remember that this is the average. The workingman with a family perhaps larger than the average pays the same per capita or accepts a lower standard of living. The situation is even worse than it seems to be by this calculation, because the class who can best pay the revenue is able to pass on the tariff charges to the worker or to the agriculturist. Only $58,500,000, an infinitesimal amount compared with the boasted prosperity, was collected from income which is based on dividends from capital invested in urban industries and the profits of bankers, loan companies and others who thrive on other people's adversities. There was collected, one might say, from the worker's necessities of life $127,500,000 more than was collected from the incomes of the rich. These figures should have been reversed.

The organized farmers of the Dominion have long sought free entry of all the necessities of life. They have also sought reciprocal trade relationships with the United States because this, to a large extent, would create permanency in agriculture and this would in turn tend toward a steadiness of trade and agriculture and a more continuous market at home for manufactured goods. The feeling in this house now seems to be to increase the general tariff for fear the United States would increase theirs. Such action is not and cannot possibly be of assistance in keeping the Canadian market for the Canadian manufacturer, but it gives Canadian manufacturers an advantage in meeting United States manufacturers in markets abroad by enabling them to dump Canadian goods at the expense of the Canadian consumer. That is, they will charge the Canadian consumer a price that will ensure them a profit over the whole of their output whether sold at home or abroad. That is what tariffs are for, and that is how they have worked out in practice in this country in the past. But the United States may put up their tariff wall as high as the heavens, it will not make manufacturing any dearer or any more difficult on this side of the line; all it will do is increase the cost of manufacturing in the United States and make their export trade more difficult than it now is, unless their manufacturers will, as ours have always done, put the burden on the home consumer and dump their goods in foreign countries. The higher a tariff wall is in any country, the harder it is for that country to carry on an export trade, because the cost of production is invariably raised thereby, despite all the pious protests of some of our manufacturers that they do not take advantage of their tariff in setting home prices. In any protected country where labour is well organized, high wages is a feature of protection, but wages never keep pace with the price-fixing power of the protected manufacturer and distributor. I should like to give an instance or two to show how it is done.

[Mr. Evans.]

Our Canadian millers have a duty of 50 cents per barrel on flour. This is just about sufficient to give them a monopoly of the Canadian market. I have in my hand the bulletin of agricultural statistics, published every month by the government.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EVANS: Before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to show how full advantage is taken of the tariff and how unjust an advantage is taken when a monopoly can be created by means of it. I was dealing with flour. It enjoys a protection of 50 cents a barrel, and this is just about enough to give to the Canadian millers a monopoly in their home market. For the month of December last the average price of flour, Manitoba patent, in Liverpool was $3.10½; in Winnipeg, $3.99½; or 89 cents cheaper in Liverpool than in Winnipeg. In this comparison I have taken the grade known as Manitoba patent, which is the second highest priced flour sold in Great Britain; sometimes it is the highest. No. 3 northern wheat—the highest priced Canadian wheat, quoted in Liverpool for the month—was $1.46 a bushel; the average price in Winnipeg was $1.08¾; or a difference in favour of the Canadian miller of 37¼ cents per bushel. Allowing 2¼ bushels to the sack of flour—and it will take a little more than that—the Canadian miller has an advantage of 84 cents on wheat and 89 cents on flour; he is therefore reaping an unjust profit of $1.73 per hundred pounds.

But this is not all. It does not matter in what city, town or village in western Canada the farmer markets his wheat, he always sells it on the basis of the freight rate from his home town to Fort William. But let me cite facts. Many times I have dumped my wheat into the hopper of one of the big mills at Saskatoon, and after agreeing on the grade I have had to accept Fort William prices, less the freight rate. Then quite often I have loaded up a six months', and sometimes a twelve months' supply of flour before moving out of the mill. After paying freight on my wheat all the way from Saskatoon to Fort William, I have had to turn around and pay freight on my purchase of flour all the way from Fort William back to Saskatoon. From Saskatoon to Fort William is nine hundred miles. Paying freight both ways, one way on the wheat and the other way on the flour,

I thereby pay the miller's freight rate on his export flour for at least eighteen hundred miles. This is one of the unjust and undue advantages taken under the tariff.

But let me put the Canadian miller to another test. I find for the month of December last, flour in Minneapolis was $1.21 per barrel cheaper than in Winnipeg. I am told that I should not take one month alone to fix the averages between the two cities. So I take the last seven months of 1928, and this is what I find: In June the price was 39 cents per barrel cheaper in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg; in July, 79 cents; in August, $1.11; in September, 96 cents; in October, $1.68; in November, $1.37; in December, $1.21. This surely goes to show the unjust advantage taken by the Canadian miller of the tariff as it stands to-day. It goes to show also the unbusinesslike and unscientific manner in which our tariff is made up.

But this whole budget, like its predecessor, tends to concentrate the wealth of the country in the hands of those who are already wealthy. Take a case in point. The budget provides that leather for the manufacture of gloves, mitts, and so on, is to be subject to a drawback of one-third of the duty paid, which is 15 per cent under the general tariff; whereas gloves and mitts carry respectively under the three schedules duties of 22½ per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. What shall we say of the callousness of the protectionist and of the government that will put leather practically on the free list, but will penalize the workingman by imposing a tariff duty of over one-third the value of the goods he buys manufactured from that raw material? This incident well illustrates the injustice of the tariff as it stands. And what shall we say in this case to the Liberal government who would impair the revenue by placing this raw material on the free list and at the same time robbing the workingman of one-third of his earnings, as on a pair of mitts?

Sir Richard Cartwright once said in this House of Commons that red parlour methods were followed in the fixing of tariffs and that Sir John A. Macdonald would often call the manufacturers together, as he did once at Hamilton, and assess them for the privileges they obtained under the tariff system. Now how much did the government assess the beneficiary in this case, for campaign funds or otherwise, who gets 33⅓ per cent on his raw material while the working man has to pay a 35 per cent duty on his gloves? Is this what my Conservative friends call a national policy? Is this what the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) calls red-blooded Canadianism? Is this what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) calls a virile, independent Canadianism? And is this, let me ask also, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) calls a fair tariff, as he did at Etters Beach last summer—"neither too high nor too low?"

Mr. McGIBBON: What do you call it?

Mr. EVANS: I call it absolute robbery. Now the United Farmers of Saskatchewan have repeatedly asked the Minister of Finance for the right to have the tariff advisory board conduct an investigation into the effect of the tariff upon agricultural implements and the ability of that industry to bear the unjust burden placed upon it. The hon. gentleman has not seen his way yet to comply with that request. He says that the tariff advisory board has not had time to advise, especially in cases where whole tariff schedules are concerned. Well, the tariff advisory board has just become a part of the Liberal electoral machine. Protectionists in this house are forever dwelling on the fact that many of our people go to the United States to seek a living. They would do well to turn their attention to the cause, which is the high cost of living. In the case of flour the cost to the manufacturer in Canada is less than in any other part of the world, but flour in the wheat fields to-day is dearer than in any other part of the world, even after it has been transported 5,500 miles. I submit that a fiscal policy that allows such abuses is a serious reflection on the intelligence of our people. It also has a serious moral effect on this whole country. Is it right or is it wrong? The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) the other day, speaking on the budget, said that he would deal very summarily indeed with anyone who took advantage of the tariff to fix his prices. I have in my hand the report of the proceedings of the third annual convention of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce held at Quebec last June, and C. H. Carlisle is reported to have said:

> No manufacturer who bases his prices on the tariff is fair either to his own particular company, or to that particular branch of industry, or to the Canadian people.

What shall we say to such statements? I have my doubts as to the sincerity of any man who will advocate a tariff for the sake of price-fixing and then say that he refuses to take advantage of it. To me it is simply unmitigated cant. Mr. Carlisle says it is not fair to the Canadian people; yet his company enjoys protection to the value of one-third in duty on the finished article, which is added to the prices of all rubber goods coming from his factory. He admits taking advantage of the duty to fix prices in Canada at least 7 per cent higher than they are in the United States, which country, according to our protectionist friends, is the very acme of high prices and protection. Mr. Carlisle enjoys free raw material for an article which when finished draws a duty of 35 per cent under the general tariff, and I find here in a manifesto issued by the research department of the United Farmers of Canada that the duty on rubber goods is absolutely so high as to be almost prohibitive, only $29,016 worth being imported. But for every dollar that went into the Dominion treasury in that case $156 went into the pockets of Mr. Carlisle and his company.

I have here a list of industries in Canada of which I will mention nine: Agricultural implements; automobiles; carriages and wagons; boots and shoes; harness and saddlery; rubber footwear; fruit and vegetable canneries; cotton goods, and woollen goods. Now I find that because of the duty we pay $22,581,000 more than the whole of the wages paid in all these nine industries. This surely ought to set the Minister of Finance thinking whether his budget this year is in any way a fair one to place before the country. On carriages and wagons, only $62,774 was imported, but the cost to the consumer was nearly $1,000,000 more. These are only a few incidents that go to show the absolute unfairness of the tariff system as it stands.

A machine which has come into use in western Canada in the last two summers and known as the harvester, commonly called the combine, has been paying a duty of 10 per cent. It is a harvester pure and simple, and the duty on harvesters is, I believe, 6 per cent. I hope the government will see that the proper classification is given this implement. When speaking on the budget last year I said that the tariff was advocated on the ground that it would provide employment for our working men and furnish revenue for administrative purposes. I cited the case of the fanning mills, and I have here a sworn statement from a friend in Regina regarding the statement I made last year that Chatham fanning mills are made in the United States. In this case they are imported free from the United States but the duty is added to the price paid by the farmer. The statement is as follows:

Canada
Province of Saskatchewan
To Wit:

In the matter of a certain shipment of fanning mills into Canada, and
[Mr. Evans.]
In the matter of a statement made by me to John Evans, M.P., which said statement was referred to by the said John Evans in the House of Commons during the session of 1928.

I, Archibald McLellan, of the city of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, hotelkeeper, do solemnly declare:

1. That in or about the month of September, A.D. 1919, I was crossing on the ferry boat from Detroit, Michigan to Windsor, Ontario.

2. That on the day on which I was crossing four drays each containing twelve Chatham fanning mills, being deposited six on each side of each load, or a total of forty-eight fanning mills were driven on to the boat near where I was standing at Detroit, Michigan, at about two o'clock in the afternoon.

3. That I was very much interested in the fanning mills as I formerly lived near Kemptville, Ontario and was a farmer, and had on many occasions visited my brother near Petrolia, Ontario, and was well acquainted with the Chatham fanning mill having used same on different occasions.

4. That I had on former occasions visited the factory at Chatham, Ontario, and was of the opinion that these fanning mills were manufactured in Canada.

5. That I therefore took particular notice of these fanning mills as they were deposited in the centre of the boat near the passenger run way and I had my hand on one of the fanning mills and examined it closely and as far as I could see the fanning mill was complete in every detail, and had printed on it the words: "Chatham Fanning Mill."

6. That I examined the mills very closely on account of my interest in the matter and as I was examining them I noticed an old gentleman standing near the fanning mills. I spoke to him and advised him that I had always understood that these fanning mills were built in Canada. He replied to me as follows: "O, no, not for a number of years, because an American firm bought them and they are built now in Detroit." I then asked the said gentleman if they paid any duty on bringing them across. He advised that they paid no duty and I asked him why not. He stated that the article was an unfinished product. I was very much surprised as I inspected the fanning mills thoroughly and from my examination thought that they were complete in every detail. I then asked him in what respect the fanning mill was not complete. He smiled at me and said "There is a zinc screen which they punch in Canada. They bring the raw material over and punch it in Canada." I suppose the cost would be about eight cents.

7. That when we purchased the Chatham fanning mills in the early days it was costing from $38 to $40 but I understand that at the time when I held the said conversation that they had increased considerably in price.

8. That I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of The Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at the city of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, this 19th day of June, A.D. 1928.

(Sgd.) Archibald McLellan.

(Sgd.) Jas. F. Bryant.
A notary public in and for the province of Saskatchewan.

What shall we say to this system which allows a practice of this kind? I repeat that our protectionist tariff system as it stands today is absolutely dishonourable and dishonest with respect to the working man and the farmer. A higher tariff is advocated in order to provide work for our people, when our supposed manufacturers can go across to the United States and have these machines built there and brought into the country free of duty, while the amount of the duty is included in the price paid by the farmers purchasing them.

There are many companies in Canada today which do not need tariff protection at all. I have in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of November 24 last, stating that Dominion Cottons are to split their shares again and that they are running to 90 per cent of their capacity. They have the power of price-fixing in connection with all their goods as it is, but our friends in the House of Commons are daily advocating a higher protective duty on those articles of clothing needed by our working people. I mention this fact because this company made very high profits, particularly during the war.

The Minister of Finance told us that the tariff advisory board had not had time in which to advise the government. According to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the tariff advisory board also has a number of advisers, so it seems that these advisers to the tariff board have not advised the board to advise the Minister of Finance to advise the government to put some of these articles on the free list. This is the question I want to ask: Did the tariff advisory board advise the Minister of Finance to place plate glass on the free list for the sake of manufacturers, when used in their factories only, while the finished article carries a duty of 27 per cent and 30 per cent? Mr. Speaker, the entire budget this year was concocted with the manufacturers at the elbow of the minister.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As usual.

Mr. EVANS: As usual, as my hon. friend says. In view of what we know of the tariff system and how it is maintained, it is only logical to conclude that the tariff advisory board is just a link between the manufacturers and the party managers; no doubt the personnel of the board will be changed if there is a change of government. This will be a little more expeditious than the reform of the senate, which the Prime Minister at a picnic in Saskatchewan last summer said was proceeding at a very satisfactory pace indeed.

When the hon. member for South Wellington was speaking he advocated a higher tariff against the United States and declared that this action should be taken in the interests of the manufacturers even if it did prevent the farmers of Canada from finding a market for about $100,000,000 worth of grain and cattle. The hon. member gave a long list of farm products with a total value of between $95,000,000 and $100,000,000, which would be affected, and said it would be only a temporary embarrassment. Evidently it did not matter to him that thousands of ranchers and farmers would be put out of business. He said we had nothing to fear in this respect; he urged drastic action on the part of the government and said if this government would not act some other government would do so. According to his suggestion, Canada should be hermetically sealed against outside competition for the sake of a class which has relied on the tariff for dividends because of its own incompetence, placing the burden of the tariff on the class which is able to meet outside competition. Because we oppose their greedy desires in this respect this hon. gentleman dubs us hard-shelled, thick-skinned free traders. The only thing of concern to the class for which he speaks is the privilege of fleecing all the consumers of Canada, and he moves an amendment which is nothing but a baited trap to catch unwary agriculturists. He condemns the Australian treaty—as far as that goes I do myself—but he forgets that that treaty was entered into to provide an advantage for the class for whom he speaks; the class who, he says, cannot exist except they become more and more the wards of this nation; the class for whose benefit the consumers of Canada paid $550,000,000 last year because of the $185,000,000 collected for revenue. The hon. gentleman said that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) could settle the question of unemployment with half a dozen strokes of his pen.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. G. S. RENNIE (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the budget and also on the tariff changes which have been brought down, referring especially to the way they affect the city of Hamilton, which I have the honour to represent. A friend of mine asked me the other day just what I thought of the budget, and I told him there was very little in it. He agreed with me and told me that he had come to the conclusion that you could not budge-it; that as it was a government measure the opposition would be unable to move it. In my opinion it is a simple budget, so simple a child could play with it and not be harmed, because there is nothing in it to explode; nothing in it to tell the people of Canada what the government is going to do. It is like the speech from the throne, which I understand is prepared by the government; but this one was very simple and had practically nothing in it. What was omitted from the budget had as great a significance to Canadians as what was included. Its omissions at once promise a continuance of the conditions which have driven away to a foreign country more than half a million Canadians within the last five years. From this point of view particularly, and for a reason which I shall elaborate upon later, I ask the indulgence of the house while I make some comments on the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance.

I desire to deal with the tariff, not so much with regard to its relation to capital as to its relation to labour and agriculture. It is not sufficient to say that this industry or that industry employs more hands to-day than it did ten years ago. It is not even sufficient to measure the expansion in ordinary terms of growth. We are living in a time when ordinary measures of expansion are futile. We are living in a country which has been invested by bounteous Providence with riches not duplicated in the history of the world. But once we are so administering our affairs that we are driving our sons and daughters to foreign lands where they have the opportunity for the expression of the talents of which we are so proud. It is not the foreign market alone which has been put in jeopardy—that would be lost first, of course—but the home market also is invaded; and nothing is more certain than that pre-eminence in the home market is the ideal which should be aimed at. The only country which fills me with apprehension so far as this question is concerned, is that country in which labour is better paid than in our own and where the standard of living is higher as well—I refer to the United States. Our working people have gone to that country and have found employment in every place where manufacturing is going on. These Canadian artisans are adding to the power and wealth of a foreign nation, while people in this country are suffering through lack of employment. I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his seat, because I intended to direct my remarks to him. Has he not been surrounded and pestered on the way to his daily duties by artisans who cry out, "We are not beggars, we only want an opportunity of helping to support ourselves and our families in the country in which we were born?" This is also the case in Montreal and Quebec; in fact it is a condition which exists in every part of Canada. Manufactories will always be found in the United States where men will be required to work; and our men are there instead of here in their own country. No nation can exist which has agriculture alone as an industry; there must be a mixture of industries to bring out the national mind and the national strength and form a national character.

Hon. members opposite sneer at the statement that thousands of our people have left this country to seek employment in the United States. Why has the government of the province of Quebec been taking steps, including the establishing of agencies, to induce these people to come back and resettle in their own province? If their people had not left the country, that government would not be trying to bring them back. Let any man visit the manufacturers in the United States and he will find the Canadian artisan toiling there and doing well, whereas if Canada had a judicious system of taxation they would be working here and doing very well in their own country.

Not only has this country been made a slaughter market by being overwhelmed by the sweepings of the United States, but at times it has been made a sacrifice market by ruinous proposals to suppress certain trades. We all can remember what the salt manufacturers of the United States did when the salt industry first started in Goderich. The salt manufacturers of Syracuse sent in their salesmen with instructions to undersell Canadian salt on the home market and thus crush this infant industry. The shoe trade was dealt with in the same manner by the leather manufacturers of the United States, and twenty-one shoe factories have been closed up in the province of Quebec alone.

In a young country like this, manufacturers are obliged to depend upon credit for the capital they have not themselves, and when such tactics are pursued by the United States manufacturers the Canadian manufacturer cannot escape defeat. He is unable to sell his wares in order to meet his banking arrangements and he becomes insolvent, the factory is closed, his employees are discharged and go to the United States. This is occurring continuously, and once confidence is lost it is not easily restored. The American manufacturers have the great backing of capital behind them, and are thus enabled to obtain an advantage

I cannot emphasize my convictions more clearly than by quoting from an address delivered in these historic chambers fifty-one years ago by that great Canadian, Sir John A. Macdonald. He said:

> The welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicious readjustiment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion. Such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen, now obliged to go in search of the employment denied them at home; will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade.

That I believe to be the great creed of Canadianism as propounded by Sir John A. Macdonald. His text and his conclusions of March 7, 1878, are as vital to-day to the well-being of Canada as they were then. The vision of that greatest of all Canadians may still guide us, and to excellent purpose.

I represent East Hamilton in this house, and for abundant reasons I consider it a great honour to represent that ambitious city. Hamilton since its birth has been the "Birmingham of Canada", still is the "Birmingham of Canada" and will continue to be the "Birmingham of Canada" so long as its workmen can be paid a just wage for their labour. For the information of the house I wish to mention a few facts regarding Hamilton, before showing how the budget and the tariff will affect that city.

Hamilton has a population of 154,000, with a tributary population of 400,000. I asked some questions in the house in regard to the revenues that were received by the government from the city of Hamilton and I got the following reply:

	Fiscal Year 1927-28
Revenue received from post office	$ 570,158 86
Revenue received from collection of federal income tax	3,944,635 37
Revenue from sales tax	3,490,593 70
Revenue from collection of income tax from corporations	2,669,272 46
Total revenue from customs collections	4,194,037 31
Total revenue from excise tax	3,477,199 62
Total	$18,345,817 32

The bank clearings amount to over $300,000,000. The people of the city of Hamilton are an industrious class, the majority of then toiling with their hands. By reason of its position at the head of lake Ontario it is a large distributing centre. It has good shipping facilities by rail, water and motor transport. Cheap electric power is supplied by two companies, one of which is the Dominion Power Transmission Company which gets its power from De Cew falls. This company was the pioneer company in electric power in the Dominion of Canada and deserves great credit for its pioneer work as well as the work it is doing at the present time, in connection not only with electric development, but also with transportation, having over fifty miles of street railway, with radial lines running to Brantford, Oakville and Beamsville. Hamilton is also supplied with electric power by the Hydro, of which the province of Ontario should be justly proud. These two companies supply power at cheap cost to many manufacturers in the ambitious city of Hamilton, and they also supply light for the city.

Besides the transportation provided by the Dominion Power and Transmision Company the city of Hamilton receives excellent railway transportation service from the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, which is the connecting railway with the Canadian Pacific railway, the Michigan Central and the New York Central. It is also served by the Canadian National Railways, and everyone knows the importance of this connection. Sir Henry Thornton, realizing the importance of the tonnage and transportation, has deemed it advisable, and properly so, to recommend the building of a new station, to which the city, on the basis of revenue earned, was entitled long ago.

I have stated that Hamilton is a small Birmingham, having 512 industries which give employment to 35,000 of its population, the production value being more than $135,000,000. I will not take up the time of the house in reading over the list. United States capital is invested in manufacturing in Hamilton more than in any other city of Canada, the amount being over $66,000,000, employing 12,000 working people and paying wages amounting to $16,500,000. The production amounts to $61,000,000.

Hamilton is proud that it has the largest agricultural works in the Dominion of Canada, the largest fence works, the largest works for manufacturing washing machines and wringers in the empire, the largest plough works, one of the largest tire plants, the largest saw works, and very large textile factories which require protection. This subject was fully dealt with last year by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards). It has large cotton manufacturers who recently had a strike amongst their employees. For what reason? Because they did not have proper protection so that they could pay their employees a decent wage. This was dealt with recently by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr.

Bell). There are also in the city of Hamilton the Canadian Westinghouse, possibly the largest blast furnaces in Canada, and the Steel Company of Canada who also operate a large coke and gas plant. A most up-to-date coke plant is operated by the Hamilton By-products Coke Ovens. These new coke ovens are assuredly up to date because they have been the special study of experts who have been sent by this government to study their methods of making coke and gas. Not only do they supply good coke at a reasonable price but they also supply gas for fuel.

I had the pleasure, at the first session of this parliament, of introducing to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) a deputation from the city of Hamilton, including the mayor of the city, members of the board of control and others, and those interested in the gas and coke plant. They wished to inform the minister that if the government would do some dredging in Hamilton harbour, they would build a dock for the use of the company to get their coal in by water and that the company would allow any boats to use the dock. This dock is almost completed, and consequently the company have kept faith with the government that did the dredging. The Minister of Public Works recognized that Hamilton harbour is one that must receive attention in order that the great industries located in the city may get their supplies in by water. Consequently, after he received the delegation that I had the honour to introduce, he deemed it advisable, and properly so, to bring down in the estimates last year an appropriation to provide proper facilities for Hamilton harbour so that boats can get to the docks which have been built by large plants on the harbour front. The minister, after meeting the delegation from Hamilton representing the city and the By-products Coke Ovens, had the government lend to the Hamilton harbour commission a considerable amount of money to build a warehouse and dock. Consequently the Minister of Public Works, and the government who acted upon his advice, must recognize that the manufacturing interests in Hamilton must not be neglected.

If the 512 industries in the city of Hamilton are to pay their employees a proper wage, so that they may have not only a full dinner pail but a wage that will enable them to live properly and decently, we must have a proper tariff which will afford protection for our skilled labour and prevent it from going to the United States.

Our raw materials are going to the United States to be manufactured and on their return a duty is paid on them. This is not right. If the raw material were kept in this country, the money paid for labour would all go into the pockets of our Canadian people. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will tell us that in many cases there is a drawback. That is true, but the chief drawback is that the government allows our Canadian resources to go to the United States when they should remain in Canada and the wages go into the pockets of the Canadian people.

In the absence of the Prime Minister, I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) if either he or the Prime Minister has ever studied what it costs to rear a family. If he has not, then even though he is a bachelor, I would urge him to make a study of the cost of bringing up a family in this country.

Mr. POULIOT: Why not ask the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett)?

Mr. RENNIE: The cost to the father and mother is enormous, and then there is the further expense for education. What happens after the boys and girls are educated and have to seek employment, whether at manual labour, school teaching, nursing, or in some profession? They find that under existing circumstances in Canada they cannot make a living here; consequently they drift to the United States. That is not right. If we had a proper tariff and proper protection for the industries of this country, our young people would be able to earn a living here and would stay at home, but as it is, they have to leave just at the time when their fathers and mothers are getting up in years and most require financial help, as well as the companionship of their own children; in their old age they are left alone. Moreover, I do not see that the government has done anything definite in the matter of granting them an old age pension.

Now I turn to the great agricultural industry, which also requires protection. The city of Hamilton lies in a great fruit-growing belt, the greatest in the province of Ontario, extending from Hamilton to Niagara Falls, a distance of fifty miles, and towards Brantford, Toronto, Guelph, Simcoe and other places. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, are the farmers in this great agricultural district making good profits from their hard work? I say no; it is all they can do to exist, and many of them are in debt. Why? Because fruits and vegetables are allowed by this government to be dumped into all the provinces of this Dominion. This is not fair, and so I say that the farmers require protection as well as the labouring class ,and that protection should be afforded them through a reasonable tariff.

I do not see that the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. King, Kootenay), is doing anything directly to further the interests of the maimed returned soldiers. We all know who won the war; we have been told it often enough. I quite realize that it is a very difficult matter for a pension board to determine that any particular disability a returned soldier is suffering from was caused by the war, but take it from me, if a man has been gassed, and later on develops asthma, bronchitis or tuberculosis, it is my opinion as a doctor that if he was previously normal the war was the cause of his disability. Even if it is not mentioned on his medical history sheet, that is no reason, to my mind, why he should not be granted a pension and receive hospital care. It is my opinion that the pension board draw the line a little too fine. They should be a little more liberal. It would not cost the taxpayers of this country five cents per year to make these poor maimed soldiers happy by giving them the hospital treatment and care they require for the rest of the days they have to live. After the war was over, our returned soldiers wanted to get to their own homes as soon as possible, and when taken before the medical boards and asked if they had any disability, invariably they said, "No", as they were afraid of being detained in hospital. The consequence is that a number of disabled soldiers have never had their disabilities entered on a medical history sheet. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think the pension board should be more liberal in their findings.

The government is destroying a great many very expensive buildings in the heart of the city of Ottawa. For what purpose? To beautify the city of Ottawa in front of the parliament buildings. This supposed beautification that is taking place is costing millions of dollars. Before indulging in all this extravagance I think the returned soldiers should, first be looked after, for had it not been for the soldiers who held the gap at Ypres, the right hon. the Prime Minister, the hon Minister of Public Works, and other hon. ministers in the government who are encouraging these expenditures would have had to study the German language a long time ago. I mean this: I am not saying it as a joke.

I understand that a commission has been appointed for the purpose of reporting as to the tariff this country requires. Most likely they will hold up their report, like other highly paid so-called servants of the government, until after there is a general election, and unless some proper provision is made for adjusting the tariff in this country before another general election takes place, this report will fall into the hands of the present opposition, which after the next election will be the government of Canada.

I agree with my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that the discussion of the budget should be held over and other business of the house gone on with until the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, has considered the tariff situation in that country, and one of my chief reasons for agreeing with my hon. friend was furnished by a depsatch from Washington in that great family journal, the Hamilton Spectator, headed "Increase in Tariff Warmly Criticised. Organ of Wall Street Fears Loss of Trade. Canada's Goodwill would be Wholly Lost to United States." I shall not take the time of the house to read the whole despatch, but anyone who is interested can read it in the Hamilton Spectator of Saturday, March 9th last. According to this article it appears that the United States are very earnestly considering what kind of tariff they shall impose against Canada, and they are doing this advisedly, because they do not want to lose the raw materials which they are now getting from this country. They have always treated us as friends, and they are trying to treat us as friends now. For what reason? In their own interests.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly interested in the very able speech delivered during this debate by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich). He is the first Canadian of Ukrainian descent to sit in this parliament and he and his people are to be congratulated upon that fact. There are many Canadians of Ukrainian birth or extraction in my constituency, and I had hoped that this speech would contain some message to them of what Canada, through its government, is doing to make them proud of their new home. My hon. friend has a great opportunity, because probably his speeches are translated and printed in the Ukrainian papers. It is regrettable that my hon. friend did not present a true picture of what is being done by the present government. He intimated that the tariff reductions made by the Liberal party were confined to soft soap, false teeth and cocoanuts, whereas he could have told them of the list of tariff reductions, which are matters of record, to be found in Hansard of March 13, 1928, beginning at page 1360. This list, which covers 19 pages of Hansard, shows the reductions made between 1922 and 1928. This is the greatest list of reductions that can be shown for any similar period since confederation. He could have told them that this government inaugurated old age pensions, which have been of immeasurable benefit to many of his people. He could have told them that because some of his people had been placed on poor land when arriving here as immigrants this government amended the Homestead Act so as to allow them to take up a second homestead. He could have told them that this government brought down an amendment to the Naturalization Act, which would have removed much of the difficulty and expense which his people now encounter when seeking naturalization. He could have given many enlightening facts to his people in that portion of his speech which he devoted to nursery rhymes and bedtime stories.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to deal for a few minutes with the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) which lays down the Conservative policy on the tariff. This amendment appears on page 758 of Hansard of March 7, 1929, as follows:

> This house regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for reasonably safeguarding and protecting the interests of those "engaged in agricultural pursuits or in industrial" employment in Canada.

In the course of his speech the hon. gentleman said—and I am quoting from page 757 of Hansard:

> ...We must introduce into the tariff of this country, to protect our own people, that element of protection which the Canadian tariff does not now afford.

It looks as though we were going to have a repetition in this country of the United States tariff campaigns of 1920 and 1921 in which the cry was "protect the farmer." Hon. members will recall that deflation in prices during 1920 left the farmers in a serious condition. In the United States this condition was to be remedied by protection on farm products. A great protectionist campaign was waged, and the farmers swallowed it hook, line and sinker. The sinker turned out to be the most effective part of the equipment.

This campaign was followed by the passing of the Emergency Tariff Act, May 1921, and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922. The latter was supposed to be the last word in protection for the farmer. But Mr. Speaker, the condition of the United States farmer grew worse after the passing of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill. Why? When the Fordney-McCumber bill was before the United States senate, Senator Underwood of Alabama said—I quote from page 27 of "Farmers Tariff Studies"—

> Where the fallacy of this argument comes is that under the guise of doing something to help the farmers in some particular item, their support is asked for a bill of which, as a whole, it seems that for every dollar the farmers may derive from the bill, they will pay $100 in taxes for the benefit of somebody else.

What did he refer to in that statement? I have under my hand the following items from the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922:

Pig iron	2.2	raised to	41
Bar steel	13	raised to	27
Structural steel	10	raised to	25
Cast iron pipe	10	raised to	20
Wrought pipe	20	raised to	27
Builders hardware & locks	20	raised to	40
Wire	26	raised to	41
Stamped ware	20	raised to	40
Sanitary ware—bath, sinks & lavatories	20	raised to	40
Nails	free	raised to	16
Sewing machines	free	raised to	15 & 30 if over $75 valuation
Gas engines	15	raised to	30
Pumps	15	raised to	30
Windmills	15	raised to	30
Hosiery & knit goods	36.9	raised to	66.6
Cotton thread	15	raised to	35
Aluminum	21	raised to	45
Salt	free	raised to	30.3
Leather gloves	13.7	raised to	50
Window glass	9.6	raised to	28

These are just a few items selected from the bill. It can readily be seen that the campaign of protection for the farmers was just a scheme to get the farmers' support for an increased tariff on manufactured goods. The increased tariff on manufactured goods affected the farmers' cost of production and left him worse off than he was before the passage of the Emergency and Fordney bills. The United States farmer got 42 cents a bushel protection on wheat, 12 cents a pound on butter and so on all along the line. These duties were put on to make the farmers feel that the tariff was framed in their interests. But the farmers of the United States have learned that these high duties on agricultural products were just fakes put there to keep them quiet while the tariff on manufactured goods was being boosted to the limit.

Senator David R. Walsh of Massachusetts reviewed the first year's operation of the Fordney Act, and I have here an editorial from the Manitoba Free Press of February 4th, 1924, which condenses the facts brought out in his speech: increased profits to manufacturers accounted for by higher prices—increased cost of living—no increase in wages paid to industrial workers—the farmers in sharp distress. I may be permitted, sir, to read the last paragraph of the editorial:

In short, the big manufacturers have benefited a great deal, the wage earners are about where they were before the law was passed, the general public are finding it harder to make ends meet and a large percentage of the farming population are in sharp distress. The high duties on agricultural products have proved a delusion and a snare. Since the passage of the emergency tariff bill in May, 1921, placing a duty of thirty-five cents a bushel on wheat (reduced to thirty cents in the Fordney-McCumber Act and raised to 42 cents in 1923) four hundred thousand farmers in the fifteen wheat-growing states have gone into bankruptcy.

Some might say that 1924 was too soon after the adoption of protection for the farmer for its benefits to be reflected on the farmers condition. During the congressional session of 1926, Senator Arthur Capper of Indiana, speaking before the United States senate on the plight of the American farmer, said that:— —the first five years of protection for farmers saw more farm foreclosures than the preceding twenty years.

Further evidence of the failure of this policy can be seen in the attempt, during the last three sessions of congress, to pass the McNary-Haugen bill—a bill which attempts to bonus the American farmer by artificial means.

Perhaps the worst condemnation of the policy outlined in the Conservative amendment is found in the fact that this very month, April, 1929, eight years after the United States Emergency Tariff Act and seven years after the passage of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, a special session of congress is being called to consider the plight of the American farmer. The policy adopted in the United States in 1921 and 1922 has practically ruined the agricultural industry in that country.

The amendment is held out as a bait to the Canadian farmer. In the same speech the hon. member for South Wellington advocates an increase in the tariff on agricultural implements and woollen goods, and asks for an element of protection which the Canadian tariff does not now afford. Other prominent members of his party followed, asking for increased tariffs on coal and steel. Since the Winnipeg convention they have advocated increased duties on farm implements, binder twine, automobiles, clothing, boots and shoes, and practically everything that enters into the cost of agricultural production. Then to cap it all the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) in his speech tells the people of Canada that increased tariffs do not mean increased prices.

The Canadian farmer is neither blind nor stupid. He will be able to see through this amendment and the speeches that accompanied it. He will recognize in this policy the same gallows on which the American farmer was hanged. The hon. member for South Wellington used the term "gold brick" several times during his address. Well, the proverbial gold brick was at least attractive on the outside, while his policy has nothing about it to attract anyone. No one can blame the Conservative party for going to the United States for a policy. That is their right. But we can attach a great deal of blame to them for bringing forward a policy that has proven a dismal failure in the country from which they imported it.

Political parties may well turn their attention to agriculture. Agriculture is Canada's basic industry. The estimated agricultural wealth of Canada for 1928 is over eight billions of dollars and the estimated value of agricultural production for the same year is $1,731,805,000. We hear a lot of idle talk about worn out soils, wheat mining, and suggestions that the supremacy of agriculture is just a passing phase in our history. But, sir, soil does not deteriorate if properly farmed; it becomes more productive under scientific tillage. The wheat yields of Canada are increasing. There has been a decided increase in the yield per acre during the past fifteen years. Agriculture is, and will continue to be, the greatest source of wealth production that we have. But, while agriculture is in a much better condition today than 1921, it is well known that the farmers generally are not enjoying the measure of prosperity that is found in other industries. It is because of this fact that I suggest that all political parties should turn their attention to this great industry.

What is wrong with agriculture? In our endeavours to build up industries in Canada, we have ignored our greatest industry. We have pampered and bonused our secondary industries at the expense of our agricultural industry. Agriculture must be considered with all our other industries if we are to have a properly balanced nation. The farmers are justified in demanding that their industry be placed on an equality with other industries.

What is the foundation on which our manufacturing industries have been built up? The right to buy their raw materials in the best markets. No government would interfere with that right. No government would dare to tax the raw materials of the textile industry, the paper industry, the farm implement industry, the rubber industry, or the automobile industry. The question then arises: Can we afford to give different treatment to the greatest wealth producer of all, the agricultural industry?

What are the raw materials used in agricultural production? Building materials of all kinds, including hardware and cement, household equipment, stable equipment, farm implements, fencing materials, tools, including blacksmith and carpenters' tools, clothing boots and shoes and harness. These are some of the raw matérials used in this industry and they are all taxed from 6 per cent to 35 per cent for the benefit of secondary industries.

The prices of agricultural products are fixed in the world's markets and cannot be increased at will to meet high costs of production. It will be readily seen, therefore, that the agricultural industry is working under a serious handicap when compared with other industries. In my opinion, this is the chief reason why the prosperity that is fairly general through Canada has not reached the home of the farmer. The Fordney-McCumber tariff act failed because it increased the cost of the farmer's raw materials, and gave him little or no benefits in return. The policy laid down by the Conservative party has all the earmarks and brands of the Fordney-McCumber bill. They admit that all is not well with agriculture, and they advocate an increased duty on butter. Butter costs the consumer in Ottawa 48 cents a pound to-day. How much will that price have to be increased to make the farmer prosperous? They want an increased duty on onions. Ontario grown onions are selling for 7½ cents a pound in Ottawa. They advocate an increased duty on fruits. Apples cost us in Manitoba, this winter, $3.85 to $4 a box for table use, and $3 to $3.25 for cooking apples. These boxes contain about 35 pounds of apples. They tell us that the apple growers are being forced out of business at these prices. The question naturally arises: how much must these prices be increased to make the grower prosperous, and what effect will that increase have on consumption?

The Canadian farmer knows more of economics than the farmers of any other country that I know of. He knows that increased tariffs on his products will not solve his problems. He knows that any policy which will be detrimental to the consumer will react against him, for the farmers make up more than half of the consuming public of Canada. He sneers at tariff walls, before which he must sell his products and behind which he must buy his raw materials.

We hear a great deal of talk about saving the home market for Canadians. Saving the home market for Canadians means, if it means anything, an embargo on imports. The farmers must export a large portion of their product; 38·5 per cent of the total exports for 1928 were made up of farm products exported in their raw state. This being true, we must receive imports in payment for these exports; for in international trading over a period of years goods are paid for with goods. If the demands of our Conservative friends for increased restrictions on imports are satisfied, the ability of Canada to export must be seriously curtailed.

Hon. gentlemen demand the exclusion of imports of the goods in which they happen to be interested. If their demands were satisfied, Canada would be reduced to ruin. It is only because the Canadian people refuse to permit embargoes on imports that we can go on selling our products abroad. So much for the amendment.

Now, my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) moved a subamendment which reads:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:
> "urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that this subamendment urges upon the government the consideration of these things. Well, the government being in the act of considering them, I suppose the hon. member has all he asks for in the subamendment, because we find in the speech of the Minister of Finance that the government has been considering and is now considering this very matter. At page 594 of Hansard for this year the Minister of Finance said:

> It is gratifying to note the steady development of inter-empire trade. Canada, the pioneer of the British preference, looks on empire trade as the key-stone of its external trade policy and desires in every way to foster closer trading relations throughout the British commonwealth of nations.

Further down on the same page I find the following:

> Many new trade channels within the British commonwealth are being opened and, in addition, the ever-increasing number of countries with which Canada exchanges most-favoured-nation treatment assists Canadian business to establish permanently "made-in-Canada" goods on the markets of the world.

Further on I find the following:

In so far as we have a fiscal problem, our task would appear to be that of readjusting, as necessity arises, our customs tariff schedules to meet new conditions, of removing inequalities where inquiry proves such to exist, of encouraging greater and more economical production of quality products, of assisting in the utilization of domestic resources and, other things being equal, of favouring those countries which favour our products. In applying these principles, availability of supplies, transportation costs, and the proximity of markets are factors which must be considered if all are to benefit and the Dominion prosper.

From this I gather, Mr. Speaker, that the government are considering the matters my hon. friend in his amendment asked them to consider. That fact, coupled with the fact that the subamendment is equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in the government, is sufficient reason why I should oppose the subamendment.

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to take part in this debate, although there are many more experienced, more capable and wiser members of this house than I. It gives me an opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the concise and convincing exposé of the wonderful condition of our country, due to the good administration of the Liberal party. It also gives me an opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon the success of your lectures at the University of Paris, and to thank you for the added glory you have brought this house and this country.

I am also glad of this opportunity to bring before the house a question which is very close to my heart; I refer to the conservation of our population. It is because I am so much interested in this matter I raise my voice in this debate to urge again upon the government as strongly and as solemnly as possible the desirability and advisability of giving a preference to our native sons in connection with the colonization of our vacant lands. Ever since I have been a member of this house I have tried to have this matter discussed. I brought forward a resolution during the short session of 1927 dealing with this question, but it was not reached before prorogation; last year my resolution was reached at five o'clock on a Wednesday afternoon and the house adjourned before anyone had time to give an opinion and before a decision could be reached. However, the idea has travelled; last year it was supported by a petition presented to the agriculture committee, signed by 125,000 people. It was supported by many societies and by a strong section of the press, particularly the farm papers, and recently the idea was supported by the Canadian Council of Agriculture at their annual meeting which took place in Winnipeg on February 25 and 26 last. The resolution passed by that body was as follows:

Whereas statistics clearly prove that the financial rewards obtainable by people engaged in agriculture are on a lower scale than those enjoyed by people in any other useful occupation; and

Whereas, despite this condition the farmers, in common with other classes of our people are taxed to pay part of the passage money spent in bringing more people to engage in farming;

Be it resolved that this council call upon the Dominion government to abandon wholly the present policy of giving assisted passages to agricultural classes; and

Be it further resolved that any inducement that may be offered to immigrants be as freely offered to Canadians living in Canada and to former Canadians now living in the United States.

Just here I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) to what the newspapers have been stating for the last few days. They have pointed out that at present the United States are contemplating turning out of that country hundreds of thousands of Canadians who entered more or less illegally, and I would ask the minister to try to bring some of those Canadian citizens who are to be turned out of the United States back to Canada and settle them on our vacant lands. A short time ago I had the honour of expressing my views in this connection in Toronto, and I am glad to say those views were endorsed by no less a person than the mayor of that great city, Mr. McBride.

This question was discussed last year in the agriculture committee, which conducted an investigation into immigration matters, and the committee made two suggestions which may be considered steps in the right direction. The committee recommended that the homeseekers' transportation rates, which existed before the war, be restored and that assistance be given Canadian youths trained in agriculture. The first suggestion of the committee was put up to the railways, who replied through the Canadian Passenger Association under the pretext that all railways in Canada were concerned, although it is a well-known fact that all railways are included in the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National systems. The reply was as follows:

Specially low fares for homeseekers from eastern to western Canada were inaugurated, as you will probably recollect, many years ago when it was difficult to secure settlers for the prairie provinces and it was necessary from a national standpoint to encourage the movement in every way possible. At that time there was very little business and commercial travel between the east and west.

Let me interject here that this paragraph from the reply of the railways seems hardly based on facts. These low rates to settlers were in force before the war, when hundreds of thousands of newcomers were pouring in every year in numbers which have not been equalled since, and when activity in western Canada was greater than has been the case since that time. These low rates made the development of the west possible and I know that a multitude of people, some of whom became members of this house, took advantage of those rates to move west where they founded prosperous communities and even towns. The answer of the railways continues:

As the settlement of the western provinces progressed, business and commercial travel gradually developed and the homeseekers' travel from eastern Canada steadily decreased. As the legitimate use of the fare gradually diminished, the railways in order to protect their interest against the advantage being taken of the fare by business and commercial travel gradually raised the charge.

I might remark here that the need of reduced homeseekers' fares has not greatly diminished, if we are to believe Mr. Beatty, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When he appeared before the committee on agriculture and colonization last year he stated that there were 35,000,000 acres of good land ready to be taken up within fifteen miles of the railways. The railways' answer continues:

The increase in homeseekers' fares has not been detrimental in so far as settlement of the west is concerned, isasmuch as the exceptionally low harvest help fares authorized each year meet the requirements of the actual land seeker from eastern Canada far better than the homeseekers' excursion fares, which is evidenced by the fact that for a number of years the majority of those in eastern Canada who desired to settle on the land in the west took advantage of these special harvest help fares. This gives them the advantages of working for farmers in the west and earning more than enough to pay their passage fares both ways, and those who decide to settle in the western provinces arrange to move their families at the time of the next harvest excursion, when they have their buildings and home under way and ready to receive them.

The harvesters' excursions may do a little good, but they occur at a season of the year which is not suitable for the establishment of a new home. It is in the spring, not on the approach of fall and winter, when a man wants to do that. But we had the experience last year that harvesters' excursions could be cancelled at a moment's notice in order to try out such experiments as the importation of out-of-work British miners. These men took the place of Canadian harvesters from the east who were available in sufficient number during this last summer to perform the work required to be done in the west. We hope that this experiment will not be repeated for, if we are to judge from the complaints which have been made, it was not a success. But they should be thankful for the free ride although they lacked the necessary experience and training to be successful harvesters. We cannot blame them for that, because it takes generations to make a successful farmer—you cannot make a farmer from a miner. At the beginning of the session the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) stated that although 8,000 of these miners came to Canada, only about 1,600 remained after the harvest. I would like to correct those figures by a statement which the Minister of Immigration was good enough to send to me. According to that statement a little more than 2,000 remained in Canada, but we cannot find out how many remained on the farm. I am inclined to think that many of them spent the winter in the Windsor station in Montreal and in the stations at Winnipeg, Regina, Toronto, and the other big cities of Canada. The Department of Immigration and Colonization may say that the experiment did not cost Canada any money because the scheme did not necessitate any special organization on their part, but they certainly received a lot of bad publicity in England. The railways lost money on the experiment. I am not so much concerned with the losses of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the losses of the Canadian National Railways were the nation's losses. The railways concluded their answer as follows:

Further, we are of the opinion that present conditions in Canada are such as to make it inadvisable to unduly encourage removal of individuals and families from one province to another. All provinces have vacant land and are anxiously endeavouring to not only hold their present population but to secure new settlers. Certain of the provinces have even felt the drain caused by the harvesters' excursions and have made protest against the arrangement.

That is news to me, as we have had no such protest in the east—not in Quebec, at least. The answer continues.

Our records indicate that from fifteen to twenty per cent of the harvesters who go west each year do not return to the east and that the majority of those who do not return actually settle on the land.

After very careful consideration the railways are strongly of the opinion that it would not be in the general interest to make any reduction in the present so-called "homeseekers' fares."

That is the answer which was made by the railways of Canada. I confess that I cannot see the difference between the removal of individuals and families from one province to another and the removal of individuals and families from one part of the British Empire to another; if it is bad in one case it is just as bad in the other. Of course, I am speaking from the Canadian point of view. If the Department of Immigration and Colonization expected any other answer than the one I have just read from the railways, when they put it up to them, they were very candid and naive indeed. The railways will not do willingly anything which will cost them money or which will not bring them immediate returns. That is why they refuse to install safety devices at railway level crossings in order to protect the public, and why they refuse to dispense with the services of negroes on the trains and to replace them by native Canadians. Such an attitude might be understood on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is an international business organization although Canadian in appearance. Their only concern is to make money for their international shareholders and bondholders. Patriotism, advancement of the country, improvement of the lot of the Canadian people, conservation of our population are all matters which do not enter unto their calculations. As an illustration, I might mention the fact that no effort has ever been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to develop the mining and colonization areas in the province of Quebec and to connect the city of Montreal with the Abitibi region and the transcontinental railway.

We may be sure that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not reduce its rates for the purpose of aiding the settling of the 35,000,000 acres of good vacant land within fifteen miles of the railway, of which Mr. Beatty spoke, unless it is forced to do so by parliament or the railway commission. But such an attitude is not so easily understandable on the part of the Canadian National Railways, which is the people's system and which is supposed to be operated in the interests of the nation. I submit that the conservation of our population is a matter of great national importance and is one which should engage the attention of the directors of our national railways.

It has been said that a citizen is worth $3,000 to Canada, and at this rate we are losing about $20,000,000 a year by emigration. Of course everyone admits that emigration is not as considerable as it was a few years ago, and that many of our citizens who left us are coming back. But nevertheless, too many farmers and sons of farmers are still leaving the land every year for the manufacturing cities of the United States. From my own county hundreds of such young men go every year. There is no place for them where they were born, and the cost of going to the 35,000,000 acres of good vacant land within fifteen miles of the railways is prohibitive. Emigration will continue and Mr. Beatty's 35,000,000 acres of good land will remain vacant as long as the best settlers in the world, the young Canadian farmers, are discriminated against in the matter of transportation rates. Our young farmers who cannot find land in their environment will emigrate as long as it costs less to go to Fall River, Manchester, Nashua, Biddeford and other American factory towns than to the Canadian vacant lands. These lands will not be properly settled as long as we give to settlers untrained and unaccustomed to our climate and to our conditions an undue preference over the native-born settlers. Very often the settlers whom we import at great cost do not stay. Our conditions are too different from those of their country of origin; we have no employment insurance, no sickness insurance, no maternity allowance, et cetera; life is very lonely in the settlement districts, and the settlers' cottages are not equipped with modern conveniences. Then our European settlers find out that it takes more than a few months' training to make a successful farmer. It is no wonder that they get discouraged and either go back home, flock to the cities or cross the border, and all the money we have spent to bring them here and to establish them has been spent in vain.

If we had spent one quarter of the money we have spent in the last ten years in the importation of European so-called settlers, to encourage settlement by our people, we would have stopped the emigration of thousands of young farmers and there would not be so much good land vacant in the vicinity of railways, because Canadians love the land and they have demonstrated that they can stay on it. If we continue our present policy there will soon be as many Canadians outside Canada as there are inside, and in spite of the expenditure of millions our rural population will remain stationary if it does not decrease.

In my humble opinion there is no advantage in paying people to come to Canada. Our country should be good enough and attractive enough to induce outsiders to make at least the effort of coming here on their own, as it offers to them all the desired opportunities of improving their lot. But I would be in favour of spending all we can to promote and foster colonization. I would be in favour of a bold, imaginative and vast plan of land settlement wherein the preference would be given to Canadian settlers. I would be in favour of assistance to young Canadian farmers trained in agriculture, in order to set them up in strategical locations where they could be models and examples to others. This plan was advocated by Dr. F. H. Barton, Dean of the Faculty of Agriculture of McGill university who, at my request, was called last year as a witness before the committee on agriculture and colonization. A recommendation in that sense was made by the committee, but in this case, as in the case of the recommendation for lower rates in favour of settlers, the Department of Immigration and Colonization merely put it up to the provinces and we have not heard of it since. I believe that if we make colonization easy, attractive and promising we shall have no difficulty in finding settlers who will remain on the land, we shall keep our own farmers in Canada and we shall attract so many settlers from the United States and Europe that not only will we have to stop paying people to come to Canada but we will have to pay them to keep out, or at least to impose some sort of quota restriction. Such a plan of colonization was outlined before the committee by Mr. C. A. Magrath, and in my humble opinion Canada would do well to study it and put it into operation.

Reduced transportation rates and establishment assistance in favour of bona fide settlers, beginning with our own people, are what will realize Mr. Beatty's dream of settling those 35,000,000 acres of good vacant land within fifteen miles of the railways. That is where we should spend our money. There is no sense, in my humble opinion, in spending millions every year to bring to Canada, in indiscriminate numbers immigrants whom we leave to shift for themselves after they are in the country. And this is the suggestion which, as a modest back bencher, I make bold to offer.

It is all very well to say that easterners should remain east; that farmers should stay in the province where they happen to have been born and that we should settle the cold regions of northern Quebec or Ontario and the rocky slopes of the Matapedia valley or of the Gaspe hinterland. That was said fifty or sixty years ago and the result has been the settlement on the south shore of the St. Lawrence of land which it would have been much better to leave as forest reserve. People were planted on poor, light, rocky soil the fertility of which soon passed; they struggled and worked in a most admirable way; but in spite of their exertion, thrift and ingenuity, many of them had to leave in debt and seek a livelihood in the factories. I submit that Canadian citizens are more useful to the nation in Canada than in the United States. Therefore, I believe that if by reduced rates and assistance a better distribution of population is obtained even at the expense of congested older sections, and our young farmers are prevented from deserting the land, the whole country will stand to gain.

There are two other matters which I would like to mention before I sit down. In the first place I rejoice at the success achieved by the Canadian National Railways, which have shown a surplus of $58,000,000 for the last year and promise even more favourable returns for the years to come. Lest we forget, let me say that this wonderful performance is due just as much to the untiring work, loyalty and devotion to duty of the personnel of the railways from the most humble call boy to the president, as to the general prosperous conditions of our national trade. Our railwaymen deserve the most sincere congratulations and praises of parliament and of the nation.

Might I say in passing that in my humble opinion we, the people of Canada, owe to the Canadian National Railways a duty which perhaps we are sometimes apt to forget. We owe them the duty of supporting and encouraging them. Let us remember that they are our railways; that their success is our success and that their gains are to the advantage of the country. Therefore, why not try to use them more to travel and to ship our goods? Why not make propaganda in their favour? Our railways can give in everything just as good a service as any other system. Let us be proud of them and let us work in their interest. Let us get the "C.N.R." habit. That is the practical way of showing to our railwaymen our appreciation of their wonderful achievement.

Since this debate has started we have heard a lot about trade, trade balance and returns, exchanges, importations and exportations, tariff and financial matters. One would think that Canada is a nation of shopkeepers only. Few members have discussed the situation of agriculture, which is the profession of the majority of Canadians and which is the profession of the people I have the honour to represent in this house. It has been suggested that agriculture has not shared as it should have in our vaunted prosperity, and I believe that is true. Therefore I wish to join with those who have urged upon the government the necessity of giving better attention, if possible, to the needs of the farmer, especially the eastern farmer who, rightly or wrongly, feels that he has been more or less neglected, perhaps because he is less vocal and less organized than his western confrère. The eastern farmer needs aid to adjust his methods to modern conditions, to improve his produce and to keep his markets.

I have been told by an official of the Quebec Department of Agriculture that three-quarters of the foodstuffs consumed in the large eastern cities come from foreign countries, although these cities, such as Montreal and Quebec, are situated in the middle of the richest farming country. Some say that a seasonal tariff would be a remedy. It is possible, but I rather believe that education and improvement in production and marketing methods would be more effective. In this connection I wish to mention the good service rendered to farmers by the demonstration and illustration stations of the Agriculture department and to congratulate the minister and his deputies, Doctor Grisdale and Doctor Charron, three real friends of the farmers, for their wonderful work in this respect. These stations do not cost much, and the good they do is immense. I have a few in my county, but not enough, and I know whereof I speak; we should have more. They are worth carloads of books of instructions and theories and millions of lectures, because examples are stronger than anything else. In those stations the farmers see the result which can be obtained by the best methods of cultivation. I venture to urge upon the Department of Agriculture the establishment of many more of those stations, in order to render agriculture more successful and more paying. They would teach our farmers to grow what the market demands; they would instruct them in the use of proper fertilizers, and in the classification, grading and preparation of their produce for the market, et-cetera.

I would also ask assistance in favour of young breeders' clubs, one of which is functioning with great success in my county, at St. Michel, and recently obtained a first prize in competition with the whole country. They are the best thing to encourage the improvement of dairy herds and of cattle generally.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by congratulating the government on the very creditable record of achievements which the budget of the hon the Minister of Finance has disclosed. More especially do I wish to congratulate them upon having re-established in the country that happy condition of peace, harmony, understanding and bonne entente between the different parts, classes and people, without which prosperity would have not been possible.

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I shall occupy the time of the house I propose to discuss briefly some of the issues that are of major importance to the people in the riding which I have the honour to represent, where I am sorry to say, the plight of the farmer is such and conditions have been aggravated by the inaction of the government to such an extent that it would be hard for me to portray conditions as they actually exist. There are several reasons for that, some of which are unavoidable.

First, the corn borer has ravaged 22,000 acres of our corn land. Second, the hog cholera epidemic of 1928 exterminated some of our finest grades and best hogs. Third, the supplementation of tobacco for corn has brought about chaotic conditions, and the plight of the tobacco grower is so serious that the farmers are greatly discouraged and hundreds of assignments have been made. Fourth, the importation of surplus American farm produce at distress prices, at distress times, has made the growing of early vegetables an unprofitable occupation. Fifth, there was the failure of the government to take cognizance of these conditions and its indifference to requests and demands, its failure to offer assistance when government action was necessary and could have ameliorated conditions. Last, and most important of all, and for which the government will in due time be called upon to answer, conditions are so grave that life-long Liberals in western Ontario are forsaking the party. There is division in the ranks of the Liberal party and strong opposition even to a seasonal tariff on vegetables, to which I shall make more extended reference later.

Before proceeding further with my remarks, I should like to compliment the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Letellier de St. Just), who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment, on contributing to this debate on March 14th last what to my mind was the finest presentation that has hitherto been made. There was more meat and substance and more actual thought in the preparation of that speech than in forty speeches such as were delivered by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). I know something of the pains the hon. member for Compton took in preparing and translating his speech so that he might deliver it in English. I realize possibly more than many other hon. members who sit with him the many hours he devoted to making the necessary preparation, and I wish to compliment him on the exceptionally fine presentation he made, more particularly as the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) gave him very little to work on.

I was amused when I heard the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) say in the course of his remarks—and I may say that I always get a kick out of his speeches—"We have the Conservative party representing Ontario at loggerheads with the Conservative party representing Nova Scotia." I should like to give a sample of party harmony which actually exists on the government side, between the twin members who occupy adjoining seats in this chamber, the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette), and the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Odette), and this would apply to almost any row on the government side of the house. The hon. member for North Timiskaming is officially reported in Hansard of March 11, page 857, as saying: "At the present time the fruit industry is fully protected," and the hon. member for East Essex speaking at Kingsville on March 1st last, is reported as follows in the Border Cities Star, of Windsor, in its issue of March 2nd, under these headlines:

> Action to keep out low-priced United States fruit and vegetables is sure if under-selling proved, says Mr. Odette, Liberal M.P. for East Essex.

The Border Cities Star goes on to say:

> Once Ottawa is shown proof that even a carload of United States fruit and vegetables is brought into Ontario from Detroit at less than Detroit market prices, the federal government, according to Edmund G. Odette, Liberal M.P. for East Essex, will act promptly to enact anti-dumping measures on behalf of the Essex county growers.

There must be some technicality about this, Mr. Speaker, I admit that I do not understand it. The proof is on file; it is on record, and the figures are indisputable.

I quote from the Border Cities Star of March 15 last:

> The following resolution was unanimously passed and will be forwarded to Ottawa:
> Resolved, that the Southwestern Ontario Vegetable Growers' Association, in session assembled at Belle River, do hereby strongly urge that the present federal government should immediately enact the necessary legislation to exclude from the Canadian market the following lower priced vegetables and early fruits, such as small berries, and fruits which have been successfully Canadian-grown, also tomatoes, lettuce, early potatoes and cabbage.

I remember quite well the references made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last session to the situation in the fruit and vegetable industries, following the visit to Ottawa of a large delegation free from political motives, urging the government to restore some means of protection similar to that provided by order in council 1088. I remember the Prime Minister saying that the government could, and he thought would, pass an order in council protecting any particular fruit or vegetable if conditions demanded it. Having this in mind last summer I wired the right hon. the Prime Minister, under date of July 3, as follows:

> Essex county has wonderful potato crop ready for the market. American surplus finding Canadian market, three hundred cars daily. Strongly advise rendering all assistance possible to farmers moving and marketing. Reduced freight rates, while preventing surplus importation, would assist materially. Wish you could see western Ontario crop, you would render requested assistance immediately.

Signed by myself. To which I received the following reply:

> Please be assured that the representations of your telegram just received will have careful consideration.
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

The reply was alluring, and as the Prime Minister himself made it assuring, we had hoped for some results. The crop came on. The total crop yield for the Dominion for 1928 was estimated at 90,975,000 bushels from 599,775 acres, or 17 per cent increase over 1927. Yet the American potato was permitted to come in, and sold, to commence with, at from 65 to 75 cents per peck, or about three dollars per bushel. Again the United States farmer and shipper gets the cream, and our farmers plough under thousands of acres for fertilizer. Potatoes are selling in western Ontario to-day in some places for 40 cents per bag of ninety pounds.

Mr. Frank Smith, a member of the New Brunswick legislature, was in Ottawa, I am informed, during the month of February, urging on the government the adoption of a seasonal tariff on potatoes. He proposed that the tariff be in effect for April, May and June. Potatoes are the chief crop in many parts of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The market for maritime potatoes is in the United States, Cuba, Ontario and Quebec. The United States tariff is almost prohibitive, yet the United States potato growers capture the early potato market of Ontario and Quebec. It is to conserve the early Ontario and Quebec potato market for the maritime provinces that the seasonal tariff is being urged.

If the proposed tariff was effective for April, May and June, it would not be of much use to the growers of Essex county and south-western Ontario. It is seldom we commence shipping potatoes before July 10, and if the tariff was off July 1 the American potatoes could be brought in and spoil the early market for our crop. To be of any benefit to us, the tariff should be on at least until August 1. That would give our growers two, and perhaps three, weeks to ship at a fair price.

The Amherstburg Echo, the leading weekly Liberal paper in western Ontario, had the following editorial in its issue of August 17 last:

Colchester south and other south Essex municipalities, which by reason of their fine soil produce early vegetables in large quantities, are shockingly hard hit this season and producers are losing heavily on such commodities as potatoes, cabbages, beans, tomatoes and cucumbers. The situation is so serious governmental investigation and action should not be delayed.

Here may I interject, Mr. Speaker, that in Essex county we have competition, first, from the surplus of the Virginia cabbage market, second, the surplus of the Mississippi tomato market, then the surplus of the Michigan potato market, and the surplus of the Louisiana cucumber market, the tail-end of their season meeting the first end of our production season. To continue the editorial:

The loss in Colchester south alone will run well up to fifty thousand dollars. Allowing such a ruinous situation to arise shows that the Dominion government had either not been well advised by its agents in Essex county or has been asleep at the switch. The Echo is not in politics, but it would be a traitor to its constituency if it failed to call attention to the disaster which has befallen so many of our people by reason of the government's removal of a dumping clause in the act where a fixed, fair market value for certain fruits and vegetables was put on by a former government. Just where government supporters in western Ontario were when this regulation was cancelled is a fair question to ask. They do not appear to have been on the job, or at least they did not succeed in having the clause retained or a better one substituted in its place. And as supporters of the government in power, they are the men who the people expect are looking after the interests of their constituents in this and in other regards. The Canadian Horticultural Council at its annual meeting adopted a resolution urging upon the Minister of National Revenue the advisability of establishing a list of fair values for fruits and vegetables, applicable at the port of entry, not the point of shipment, giving our farmers the same method of protection as motor car manufacturers have against the dumping on Canada of a flood of used cars from the United States. This seems a sensible request. Its adoption would have saved the vegetable and fruit growers of Ontario from being ruined. Who ever heard of a used car bought at, say, forty dollars in Detroit, being allowed to come through the Canadian customs without appraisal at a fair market value? Yet our Colchester south and other south Essex produce growers are allowed to be slaughtered by a flood of undervalued American farm products grown under conditions of low labour costs, while not a representative of the government stood up in parliament to plead their cause and protest against the injustice. Ordinary business sense would seem to have dictated a different policy, not to mention the question of political expediency. In the meantime acres of choice foodstuffs are being ploughed under in south Essex because their sales value will not pay for the harvesting.

Now the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) being in his seat, I hope, if he did not pay any attention to this editorial at the time of its publication, he will at least read it to-morrow in Hansard.

At the great Liberal rally in Kingsville on March 1—divided though it may have been—in the riding which I have the honour to represent, one of the speakers proposed that the Ontario government be called upon to follow the example recently set by the government of British Columbia and assure protection for early fruits and vegetables by imposing an inspection tax sufficient to set up a barrier against the dumping of imported products. More harmony in the Liberal ranks! The hon. member for east Essex objects to the proposal, and according to the Border Cities Star of March 2, says that protection for fruit and vegetable growers of Canada is a matter for the Dominion government to deal with, that the government does not intend to shirk its responsibility; and that the tariff to-day is exactly the same as it was when the Liberal government went into office—there has been no reduction. I like straightforwardness in public men. The last statement is misleading. The hon. gentleman knows, and if he does not, the people whom he represents know, that the rescinding of order in council No. 1088, passed by the Conservative government on July 10, 1926, removed the measure of protection, the nature of which had been sought by the fruit and vegetable growers of western Ontario for the past fifty years. I cannot take time to explain in detail order in council No. 1088 which the hon. Minister of Finance told a delegation on Friday, April 27, 1928, had not been cancelled. For the edification of the hon. member for East Essex I would ask him to refer to Hansard of 1928 at page 2486. The order was cancelled on March 19, 1928, the cancellation becoming effective on that date.

May I ask the government if the tariff advisory board has made any recommendation regarding protection, seasonal or otherwise, for Canadian fruit and vegetable growers? If so, what was the substance of the recommendation? Why has it not been implemented? Let me add, if they have made no recommendation I charge them with dereliction of duty.

I have taken up the challenge that the provincial government should provide relief for the growers through an inspection tax. What action will the Dominion government take if British Columbia proceeds according to newspaper reports? I hope they will not interfere. As apparently there is no relief forthcoming from the Dominion authorities, I wrote the Hon. S. F. Tolmie, Premier of British Columbia, and a former esteemed member of this house. I quote from my letter to him of March 7, 1929:

> The growers of Essex south are weary of waiting for action from the Mackenzie King government, who have put every possible obstacle in the path of the farmer, and I am of the opinion, from press reports only, that if it can be successfully operated in British Columbia, Ontario should be permitted to benefit through the plan emanating from your province.
> If this can be worked out from a provincial angle, south Essex will forget that we have a King government in Ottawa. I will, if it is possible, request our provincial government, either through legislation or regulation (according to your advice), to act on it at once.
> Western Ontario Liberals should have supported our proposals in the house last session, but because they failed is no reason why we should not pursue more intensely our convictions in this matter.

The only reason, Mr. Speaker, that has been advanced in this house for failure to implement legislation that will be beneficial to the vegetable growers is the fear that the consumers will be compelled to pay fabulous prices for their products. Let me say to the government that I have never favoured permitting the farmer to exploit the consumer. I have never suggested to this government nor have I suggested to any individual that the farmer should be permitted to exploit the consumer. But have hon. gentlemen ever considered the lamentable position the consumer would be in should the early vegetable industry be ruined? Here is a principle on which we should agree. In order to sell a few baskets of early tomatoes at $2 a basket the grower plants a large acreage. Following the sale of these few baskets a week or two later he ships hundreds of baskets at prices within the reach of the working man. A week later tons and tons of the primest fruit, at a margin which it would not pay him to handle were it not for the first prices he obtained, are put on the market. The point is this: the grower must get the rich man's price for a limited number of baskets in order to reach the humblest table. The strawberry industry in Essex county and western Ontario should provide one with a fine example of what may happen to all other products. For instance, while strawberries were once a gift of nature to be found on the poorest man's table, in the spring in the form of choicest fruit and in the winter months in preserves, they have in Essex county, Canada's most southern county, become now a luxury available only to moneyed people. The reason is obvious. The condition is due to cold storage shipping from the south and the low duties on an inferior, tasteless quality, and if it comes to pass that the consumer is one day obliged to depend upon American growers he will be accepting the table cleanings as long as he lives. The Canadian producer and the Canadian produce bring down the price to the consumer; they force down the prices of American fruit and vegetables. But in the interim the shrewed American producer, assisted by our laws and regulations, skims the cream of the Canadian market and leaves the Canadian producer and consumer with nothing but the leavings.

May I again be permitted to refer to the Postmaster General's speech. I desire to congratulate the hon. gentleman on being the Dominion's leading optimist. At page 926 of Hansard, speaking with regard to immigration and emigration, he says:

> What is the record?

And answering his own question he states:

> We find that since the termination of the war 270,666 settlers left the United States—American subjects, American born— and came across into Canada to settle, being to-day permanent citizens of this country.

I do not need to remind the house or the country of the real situation during the same period—and I select no special period but take that referred to by the hon. gentleman. What is the true situation in that same period? Almost that number with their dependents, of the Canadian expeditionary forces who served in the Great war are to-day residents of the United States. The Bureau of Statistics at Washington shows that for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, 73,154 persons, making 42 per cent of the total immigration into the United States, came from Canada. The report for the previous fiscal year showed that 41 per cent of the total immigration into the United States came from Canada; in other words, 81,506 Canadians left this Dominion in search of employment in a foreign country. What is the contrast? Our soldier boys, broken in pocket, in health and in spirit were forced by the fiscal policy of this government to seek employment in a foreign country, leaving behind many loved ones and the land from which inspiration for service arose, leaving behind the good old union jack, the beaver and the maple leaf, and what they imply, to become citizens of another country until such time as an economic problem can be solved which is beyond the reach of this government, and when they can return and obtain employment in the land they love so well. Oh, yes, the minister says that we obtained 270,666 settlers from the United States; and he asks, why were not both sides of the medal shown? The fact of the matter is—and both sides of the medal are shown, using the minister's own argument —that we traded our soldier boys, the cream and the flower of the land, for the Americans, through whose entry others will be forced to seek employment in Uncle Sam's domain.

I have not time to discuss immigration or emigration, for I want to deal with the question of tobacco; but let me remind the government that a baseball player with only a bat, a ball and the regular playing equipment, is as useless to the game if he has not the intelligence with which to make proper application, as a government, with all the legislation ever provided, is to a country if the courage is lacking to make the proper application for the safeguarding of our rights and institutions at all times and under all circumstances and conditions. May I suggest to the minister that his argument is as sound as that of the faithful old mother who was convinced that her son never indulged in the consumption of intoxicating liquors because he drank so much water in the morning.

The county of Essex was formerly divided into two constituencies, north and south Essex; now it is divided into three, west, east and south. Taking the two old ridings as a basis of computation, South Essex has increased in population in the last ten years by 2,300, while North Essex has increased 40,000. The reason is that industries have been established in North Essex. Subsidiaries of American plants have established themselves, not for the love of Canada, or Canadians, but because our tariff policy makes it advantageous for them to build here rather than to supply from the American plants and pay the duty. The result is far-reaching. It builds up Canadian industry, gives employment to Canadian workmen, and provides a larger and better market for our farmers. Far better it is, I submit, for the farmer of Essex county to furnish the people of Windsor and district with produce than for the Michigan farmer to supply that demand. Tariff and protection bring capital investment, industry, employment, wages and competition. Competition brings prices within the reach of the working man. Protection brings industry and one industry brings another. A protective tariff develops home industries and these industries promote others, giving employment and wages, and making for contentment in the home. A policy of protection, and one of fairness to all classes, is one which will be conducive to Dominion-wide prosperity in the home, in the factory and in our basic industry, farming. It is the only solution for our war and railway debts and the conserving of the youth of our Dominion.

The government should endeavour to reduce our national debt, and I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the Ontario scheme of debt reduction is worth looking into and studying. The government should endeavour to reduce our national expenditures by economy in the respective departments of state, and instead of adding 1,500 employees to the service should reduce the staff to that extent. Government in Canada costs too much per capita, and much as one might favour reduction in representation, I realize that to that end the start must be made from the town and county councils, to the legislatures, and to the House of Commons. A general reduction in representation should meet with unqualified approval, and Essex county to-day is leading the way in this regard in a substantial reduction in their respective councils.

Now I come to the question of tobacco. The late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave the tobacco growers their first protection of 10 cents per pound in 1897. Through the effort, personal endeavour, solicitation and recommendation of the late Mahlon K. Cowan, then member of the constituency which I have the honour to represent to-day, a beginning was made. In 1897 we produced 552,000 pounds of tobacco. The following year, with a tariff of 10 cents per pound on tobacco, we produced 5,500,000 pounds, or approximately ten times as much as the year before. In 1899 a further duty of 18 cents per pound was granted, making 28 cents, and that further increased production to 10,554,000 pounds. In 1918 an additional 12 cents per pound was granted by the Union government, bringing the duty to 40 cents per pound, and that still further increased production to over 20,000,000 pounds in 1920. That duty still stands. In 1928 we produced in Canada 40,956,400 pounds; as to the grades or varieties there are no statistics available. In 1920 we exported about 70,000 pounds of tobacco; in 1928 we exported 6,218,301 pounds, and again there are no statistics available as to grades. I hope the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture will listen to these figures: In 1928 we imported 17,943,070 pounds of tobacco, and of that total we imported from the United States 16,513,117 pounds, valued at $5,399,505. Again there are no statistics available as to the grades, but my contention is that practically all the tobacco imported from the United States was of the flue-cured variety, the growing of which we are now taking up more extensively.

When we had no duty on tobacco, the tobacco used in Canadian factories was all imported; when the duty was 10 cents per pound only 5 per cent of the tobacco used in Canadian factories was grown in Canada. When the duty was 28 cents per pound on foreign leaf, 30 per cent of the tobacco used in Canadian factories was domestic grown, and since we have had a duty of 40 cents per pound on foreign leaf, 48 per cent of all tobacco consumed in Canada has been domestic grown. I contend that if we increase the duty to 60 cents or 75 cents per pound, in three years 75 per cent of the tobacco used by Canadian manufacturers would be domestic grown, and our production would be greatly increased. In spite of what the tobacco commission have said I think there is a wonderful future for the tobacco industry; the commissioners were not men whose advice I could or would seek.

I have under my hand regulation No. 8, relating to the taxes on tobacco, snuff, cigars and cigarettes, under the revised statutes of the United States, from which I have ascertained that the United States duty against Canadian tobacco is from 45 cents to $1.85 per pound on unstemmed tobacco and from 50 cents to $2.50 on stemmed tobacco. The Canadian duty is only 40 cents and 60 cents per pound. In Canada rebates on duty paid are allowed when imported raw leaf is manufactured for export, and let me tell the Minister of Finance that this encourages Canadian manufacturers to use United States tobacco in our factories. Again, when tobacco comes into Canada it is permitted to lie in bond for two years. When automobiles come into this country the duty must be paid immediately, and I suggest to the minister that duty should be collected on every pound of tobacco coming into Canada, as is the case with other commodities. I think it is an insult to the intelligence of our tobacco growers that this article should be permitted to come into Canada and remain in bond until the Canadian tobacco is pushed off the market or until such time as it is to the advantage of the manufacturer to use imported tobacco.

[Mr. Gott.]

The Minister of Agriculture will recognize this document which I now hold in my hand; it is the report of the Tobacco Inquiry Commission, appointed in 1928. This report is a conglomeration of generalities clustered in radiant form, and with everything considered this commission cost the government more than $5,000. That money was spent with what result? The only result was that the farmers were advised to reduce their tobacco acreage. May I say that the minister and his deputy were exceptionally well received in western Ontario, and I think they came there with very sincere intent; they came realizing that a condition existed there which did not exist in any other part of Canada, and I believe they sincerely wished to be of some help. The situation was diagnosed by the minister and his deputy; when doctors diagnose a case they prescribe a remedy, and in this case the minister's prescription was a tobacco commission. Generally, in the practise of medicine, when one prescription fails another is tried, but the minister did not prescribe anything else. I have here a detailed report of the expenses of this commission. The commissioners received $20 per day each, and in addition the three commissioners received $12 per day as an allowance for living expenses. Then there were the expenses for the secretary, for hiring halls for meetings and so on, but in a word all they did was pass the responsibility and soft-pedal a very grave situation. I suggest to the minister that this investigation was a farce, and I will try to show the minister why I make that statement. The people in Essex county, both Liberal and Conservative, think it was a farce. Perhaps it was not a farce; it may have been a comedy in thirty-two acts, since it took thirty-two days to complete the investigation. The farmers were innocent; they thought this was in their best interests, but why did not this commission examine some of the buyers who sought to crush out the very lives of the growers? The net profits of the Imperial Tobacco Company in 1927 were $4,371,613; I have not seen their annual report for 1928 but I have been informed that their profits are well above the $5,000,000 mark, although I cannot speak authoritatively in this connection. However, I think the commission, if they had desired, could have gone into the enormous profits piled up by this and other companies, which in my opinion would have been more in keeping with the purpose for which they were appointed.

May I say to the minister that conditions existed which should have been but never were brought to light. The minister had the situation in the palm of his hand in 1927 and 1928; he could have made a name for himself in western Ontario then. He could have taken the bull by the horns—and when I say that he will know what I mean, being Minister of Agriculture—and not release one pound of bonded tobacco until every pound of Canadian tobacco of the grades that could have been used at once had been taken up. This would have brought the tobacco moguls to time. The minister had an opportunity to approach the moguls of the combine and throw a bomb into their works which would have shattered the organization for years to come, but he failed to do so.

Now I have some suggestions to make, and I trust that they are sufficiently constructive to be heeded. I place them in two classifications; first, those too late to classify, or rather too late to rectify, and in the second class those which can be heeded.

In the first class, the first point is that the assistance offered, though exceptionally well and sincerely intended, was offered to a dying cooperative when it should have been directed to the organization of a more extensive marketing system. The second point in this group is this: The minister had 5,000 tobacco growers in Essex and Kent counties massed and ready to organize on any fair and reasonable basis, but he dismissed them without action. The third point in this class is that interest waned because the minister was wrongly advised; dissension spread, jealousies arose, proposals and plans disappeared and the growers encountered their second consecutive season of failure in 1928.

Then as to the second class, I have the following suggestions to make, all of which I think can be heeded.

1. Do not waste the people's money want-only for the purpose of shirking responsibility.

2. Revert the expenditure to channels that will be productive of assistance to an industry which is at present struggling to survive the reverses of the past two years.

3. Consult the authorities of the Department of Trade and Commerce and cooperate in such a manner that Canadian tobacco, with the 49 cents a pound preference, can obtain a firm hold in the British markets.

4. Send men to the British Isles and keep them there until they establish, through display or otherwise, Canadian tobacco firmly in the British market.

5. Encourage Canadians to discard their prejudice against Canadian tobacco by means of an educational campaign, and keep Canadian tobaccos, cigars and cigarettes to the fore through cooperation with the Minister of Finance in the reduction of the excise duties on cigars and cigarettes, which duty has increased from $1,889,376.74 in 1912 to $23,569,-641 in 1928.

6. In view of the fact that Norfolk county and other sections of western Ontario are increasing tremendously their acreage of flue-cured, prevent the re-occurrence of the importation of millions of pounds of tobacco from the United States each year. The imports of raw leaf tobacco into Canada from the United States during the year ending December 31, 1928, amounted to 16,513,117 pounds; the import value of which was rated at $5,399,505.

7. In view of the fact that statistics are not available as to the imports into Canada and the exports from Canada of tobacco by grades, and this being important, I suggest that in the future a separate record be kept of same.

8. Eliminate the wholesale and retail smuggling of United States cigarettes, which smuggling is in open contravention and defiance of the law, by making the Canadian excise on cigarettes in proportion to and in conformity with the excise tax levied by the United States government on the production in that country.

Although there are many other suggestions which could be made, my final suggestion is:

9. Do not permit a pound of tobacco to come into Canada without the duty being paid at time of entry, and allow no drawbacks so that manufacturers who have a prejudice against Canadian tobacco may resort to bonded stock at opportune times in preference to Canadian tobacco. Do not permit fruits and vegetables to come into Canada in bond and lie in cold storage cars.

I trust the minister will consider some of the suggestions I have made, and if my services are required, I will help him, his deputy or his staff at any time in the drafting of regulations which will bring new life into an industry which means so much to our section of the country.

On motion of Mr. Heaps the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Friday, April 5, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the names of Messieurs Dunning, Glen, Ralston and Stewart (Edmonton West) be respectively substituted for those of Messieurs Gervais, Jacobs, Morin (Bagot) and Denis, and also that the name of Mr. Malcolm be added on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house, shall the motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

MAJOR GUSTAVE LANCTOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I wish to direct the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) to Hansard of yesterday, page 1231, where there appears a series of questions put by me which were supposed to be answered. I direct the minister's attention to the last question:

Will the Canadian government pay Major Lanctot's salary and also his travelling expenses and living allowance while he is representing the Royal Society of Canada, the Canadian Historical Association and the Canadian Authors' Association at various functions of a private character in Paris?

The answer to that question is:

No information.

I submit that that is no answer at all. Surely the Secretary of State does not want me or the house to believe that, with respect to a question of that kind, the government are not prepared to say whether or not they are going to pay Major Lanctot's salary. Surely the question is very simple and one which, it seems to me, should be answered. I protest that the answer given is no answer at all, and I have not been accorded the courtesy which a question of this kind calls for.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I am surprised that my hon. friend should take this stand. The questions were most extensive and in the few days at our disposal we endeavoured to deal with them all. I repeat that we are not aware that Major Lanctot is going to Paris for any other purpose than to represent the archives department at the French exposition.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I rise again, to a question of privilege if you like. I will put the question again to the Secretary of State: Will the Canadian government pay Major Lanctot's salary and also his travelling expenses and living allowance while he is representing the Royal Society of Canada, the Canadian Historical Association and the Canadian Authors' Association at various functions of a private character in Paris? I submit that the Secretary of State can answer, yes or no, whether the government intend to pay Major Lanctot's salary.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. RINFRET: That is not a question but rather an innuendo, and I am not informed that the facts are such as insinuated therein. That is why I replied officially that there was no information that Major Lanctot was going abroad for any other purpose than to represent the archives department at the French exposition.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Again I protest, this time against the word used by the Secretary of State. There is not a particle nor a shadow of an excuse for him to refer to my question as an innuendo. It is a simple question, put as plainly and clearly as possible. If the minister is not prepared to answer or if he does not intend to answer, very well; I can quite understand that, but I want to protest against the minister saying that any words used in that question are intended as an innuendo. The minister has sufficient knowledge of the English language to know that he has no right to use that word as he did use it, and I protest against such use.

Mr. RINFRET: I will admit I have no right to use the word as my hon. friend now uses it, but let me repeat that I have no information that Major Lanctot has gone abroad for any other purpose than to represent the archives branch. If, while in Paris, he chooses to attend one meeting, go to one theatre or visit one museum for a few moments, surely my hon. friend will not protest against that. The main purpose of his trip is to represent the archives branch.

Mr. BENNETT: At the public expense.

Mr. RINFRET: Naturally, since the archives branch is a branch of the public service. Further, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is all out of order.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to page 113 of Beauchesne, from which I read as follows:

The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated; nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets or controversial or ironical expressions.

I think the question was out of order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): On the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I submit that it is rather late to say the question is out of order, after the government have undertaken to answer it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Out of courtesy.

VISIT TO WASHINGTON OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I desire respectfully to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which I do not think he adequately dealt with in the answer he gave yesterday. In the Washington Daily Star and in the New York Journal of Commerce, despatches appeared, which have been reprinted in Canada, having to do with his visit to Washington, and in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, a very old and most reputable paper, the staff correspondent directed attention to the visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the following words:

> Negotiations are under way for an agreement to leave American tariff rates on Canadian farm products where they are in consideration for Canada's signing the St. Lawrence waterway treaty.
> The Canadian Minister of Commerce, James Malcolm, is in Washington on what is described as a purely social visit. He called on President Hoover and on various other American officials. And there is very little doubt his coming to Washington has to do with the feeling in Canada over the projected increase in tariff rates upon the farm products.

If these statements are erroneous, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make a clear and unequivocal statement with respect to them, because a few days ago he was very anxious about statements appearing in a Canadian journal, written by a Canadian correspondent. So I suggest that it is highly desirable in the interests of the people of Canada that they should know exactly what if anything has transpired in connection with his visit to Washington.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not had an opportunity to see the article in the Philadelphia Ledger referred to by my hon. friend, but my visit to Washington had nothing to do with any negotiations with regard to tariff or waterways matters. My visit was purely social; I called upon the president out of courtesy, he being the only official of the American government upon whom I called.

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian ambassador accompanied the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MALCOLM: Surely; he introduced me to the president.

Mr. BENNETT: The photographs indicate that.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INCREASED REMUNERATION FOR RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS AND OTHER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): I would like to ask the Postmaster General whether any action has been taken with regard to increased remuneration for employees of the Post Office Department including railway mail clerks, letter carriers, postal clerks and mail porters.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): In reply to my hon. friend I might say that in regard to mail clerks and porters I repeated to the Civil Service Commission this year the request I made last year, when I recommended that they take up the question of further compensation to these employees of the department. I received a reply from the Civil Service Commisison under date of March 9, 1929, as follows:

> Your recent communication confirming your previous recommendation for higher compensation for the classes postal clerk, letter carrier and mail porter, has been placed before the Board of Civil Service Commissioners.
> After full consideration of the subject matter in your letter the commissioners have decided to confirm their decision of May 2, 1928, which was communicated to the Deputy Postmaster General by letter of the same date, that further increase in the compensation of these classes is not justified.

This letter is signed by W. Foran, secretary. With regard to higher compensation to railway mail clerks, this question was taken up last year by the commission and at that time nothing definite was decided. During the summer vacation I again took the matter up; after consultations here in Ottawa between the executive of the railway mail clerks and the officials of the department a certain agreement with regard to the classification or grading of railway mail clerks was arrived at. That agreement was submitted to the Civil Service Commission for their consideration, and after some considerable discussion the question was finally decided by a system of grading in connection with the railway mail clerks. Under this system the clerks are divided into two classes, class A and class B, being railway mail clerks in charge of runs, railway mail clerks assisting and so on. The commission accepted that grading, but excluded a certain number of railway mail clerks, whom they did not grade. There are about 1,300 railway mail clerks, and under the system of grading adopted by the Civil Service Commission I think 242 of these clerks were not included. When that was reported to the Post Office Department I took it up with the Civil Service Commission and asked why these 242 clerks were not graded and why they received no consideration with regard to increased compensation.

In my first letter to the commission I suggested that all railway mail clerks should receive an increase of at least $60 per annum according to their grading, but they gave an increase of forty cents per hundred miles to the higher grade and twenty-five cents to the minor grade instead and in that way granted what was considered by the executive to be sufficient compensation. When the commission refused the minimum increase of $60 per annum which I suggested for the 242 clerks mentioned, I proposed that they at least give those 242 men, who were not included in the new classification, an increase of fifteen cents per hundred miles. The Civil Service Commission refused to consent to that. The railway mail clerks who were affected favourably have accepted the decision of the commission, but they are asking that the 242 left out be considered.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has referred to certain correspondence and has read in part from communications; will that correspondence be laid upon the table of the house?

Mr. VENIOT: I intended to say that that correspondence would be laid on the table.

Mr. BENNETT: The explanation would have been much better had it not been prearranged between the minister and the hon. gentleman who asked the question.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the rules of this house I was entitled to make the explanation.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, April 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said during the course of this debate with regard to coal, iron, steel, apples, onions, potatoes and tomatoes, but in carrying on the discussion I do not intend to deal particularly with the question of commodities but rather with what I would term the human factor. We are apt to gauge prosperity, if such exists in this Dominion, by the yardstick of how much is being produced in a given period. The mere fact that production has increased is taken as an indication that prosperity is general throughout the length and breadth of this country. When the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) spoke in this house the other day he said that there were some people who were loath to believe that prosperity really existed in the Dominion of Canada. I am one of those persons, and there are many millions of people in the country who are of the same opinion. In his effort last year to prove that we had prosperity in Canada, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) called the bankers, financiers and industrialists to his assistance. He does not bring those gentlemen forward as witnesses this year to prove that there is prosperity in this country, but satisfies himself with the term "we are prosperous." I would like to know who the Minister of Finance believes is the "we." There may be some people who will say that there is a certain prosperity, but it is what I would term a one-sided prosperity. I would like to know if the minister, or those who agree with his statement, would say that the men engaged on the farms, the mechanics and labourers, are prosperous at the present time. I do not think anyone will deny the statement that the banks, financial institutions and railways are prosperous, but the fact that they are prosperous does not mean that the general body of the people are sharing in that prosperity. Most of the shareholders in those institutions live outside of Canada, and if there are any juicy melons to be cut they are the ones who receive the portions. I do not know what portion of the melon the average man or woman in Canada would receive, but all the average workingman, labourer or agriculturist would get out of the melon would be just the pip. The Minister of Labour quoted figures to show that the volume of wages paid to-day to the men employed on the railways was greater than that paid a number of years ago. I feel constrained to reply to that, because of the fact that a statement made by a minister of the crown may, and probably will, receive wide circulation through the various avenues of publicity which a minister commands. He said that the wages paid on our railways in the year 1923 amounted to $253,320,000; in 1927 to $254,386,000; and that for 1928 the estimate was $276,000,000. In other words, there has been an increase in the wages paid during that period of approximately nine per cent. But the minister neglected to point out one fact. The official Year Book shows that 157,771 were employed on the railroads in 1923, and that that figure had decreased to 144,176 in 1927, or a reduction of 13,595 in the number employed during that five-year period. The question arises in my mind: What has become of those men who are not now required by our railroads? It is quite true that more money is being paid out in the form of wages, but the fact that a comparatively large number of men are receiving a slight increase in wages does not offset the fact that there are a large number of men who are without employment to-day. According to the figures of the minister, the wages paid on the railways in 1923 amounted to an average of $115.50 per month, and this average had increased to $126 per month in 1926. According to the figures submitted by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), the number of cars of freight loaded in 1923 was 2,851,000, and in 1928 that had increased to 3,696,000; in other words, there had been an increase in the number of cars loaded amounting to 845,000, or approximately 30 per cent. If we take into consideration the fact that a larger type of freight car is being used at the present time, it would not be out of place to say that there has been an increase of approximately 40 per cent in the freight haulage, and yet wages have only gone up nine per cent in the same period.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was good enough last year to give some advice to the people of Canada. He said the people should work and be thrifty; that was the sure road to success and prosperity. Unfortunately or fortunately, I do not know which, the people of Canada have not heeded altogether the advice given by the Minister of Finance, because, since the budget speech of 1928 the gambling that has been indulged in by the people of Canada has been unparalleled in the history of this Dominion. Consequently I can well understand why he is not offering any advice in his budget speech of 1929. But the minister —I do not know whether it was because they did not accept his advice—has this year gone so far as to tax those people who gamble in stocks and bonds and I heartily agree with his action in that regard.

When, however, the Minister of Finance tells the people that there is a wave of prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, I feel constrained to take issue with him. One can go from the Pacific coast right to the Atlantic and have great difficulty in finding traces of that prosperity amongst the masses of the people. I know it is quite true that when we consider the figures of banks, railroads and other large institutions, there is prosperity; large dividends are being paid. But that form of prosperity in the way of dividends and the clipping of coupons is not shared by the great masses of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Plunkett) told us some days ago of conditions in the city from which he comes. The minister himself visited Victoria last year during a by-election and in order perhaps to give a little more prosperity to the people of British Columbia or more particularly of the city of Victoria he had to make them very large promises. One thing I think the government ought to be thankful for was that the Liberal candidate was not elected in Victoria.

The members from Alberta have told us of conditions in their province. In fact, the discussion which took place in the house in regard to the grain act just prior to the Easter adjournment was in itself sufficient indication of conditions amongst the agriculturists in western Canada. The Minister of Finance did Winnipeg the honour of paying it a visit last summer. I do not know whether he found evidences of prosperity amongst the masses of the people there, but I am glad he visited Winnipeg because I heard that during the time he was there he was introduced to the Seven Sisters.

I come now to the province of Ontario. What do we find there? We find amongst industrial workers as well as amongst the farmers the same conditions as we find in western Canada. We have had in the house instance after instance of the conditions that exist there, of the conditions of industrial workers and of the strikes that have taken place. One instance to which I wish to allude at this time is the condition that now prevails in the city of Oshawa. Last year I brought to the attention of the house conditions in that city where the men had been out on strike and where they had had their wages reduced to the extent of approximately 40 per cent. On that occasion I tried to show how little that 35 per cent protection we give to the automobile industry really means to the men employed in that industry. This year, according to statements I have had given to me and letters I have received, I find that wage cuts have been made by the General Motors Corporation; that men have been discharged for no other reason than that they happen to belong to an industrial organization, and that men have been brought in from Germany and other parts of Europe to take the place of men who have worked for that company during the past twenty years. As I said a moment or two ago, I have received several communications and I am going to read extracts from one or two that have come to me within the past few weeks. This one, which is dated Oshawa, March 13, reads:

> Instances can be proved where Canadian citizens have been let out of their jobs and these imported Germans being put into their places. One reason for this is probably due to the fact that the Germans have agreed to pay back to the company the full amount of their passage money at the rate of $25 per month.

That is an indication that the passage money for these people was paid by the company to bring them from Germany so that they could take the places of men employed at the Oshawa factory of the General Motors Corporation. The writer continues:

> With reference to wage reductions throughout the plant, it is a fact that there have been wage reductions ranging from around 20, to in some cases, 50 per cent. The speed-up in some departments is so bad that men working in the paint department, the stamping plant, the assembly lines, the enamel plant, in fact the whole plant is speeded up to a point where the men are showing signs of physical exhaustion. In spite of the fact that the company agreed not to discriminate against union men, they have persistently followed a policy of intimidation and victimization and have in every instance denied the men any opportunity to clear themselves of such charges that might have been put against them.

I have in my file of correspondence a communication from a man who has worked in the General Motors Corporation for twenty years. He was discharged at a moment's notice and we are powerless in the house to do anything in regard to the whole situation. There is another case of a man who worked there who, when he was told his services were no longer required, was informed that he should go and see Jimmy Simpson who happens to be vice-president of the Trades Union Congress of Canada.

This is the case of a man who worked there for quite a long time and who was told to go and get his discharge slip. This is what he writes in regard to what happened when he went to the office:

> I was given a gold badge for long and satisfactory service, and was told that my services were no longer required.

Another man who had been there for three years was hired again by the company, and when they found that he had been formerly employed by them, his services were also no longer required. In the Oshawa papers and in papers in other parts of the country, you do not find a word being published in regard to conditions at the Oshawa plant.

[Mr. Heaps.]

I come now perhaps a little closer to Ottawa than Oshawa in order to examine some of this so-called prosperity with which members of the house are being continually regaled, and in which I am loath to believe. We are meeting here within a stone's throw of the city of Hull. Speaking in the Quebec legislature not many weeks ago, the provincial member for Hull Mr. A. Guertin had this to say about the prosperity in the city he represented in that legislature:

> The minister did not tell us that barely a month ago the Eddy Company warned the city of Hull that it could barely carry on unless reduction of civic taxation was granted. It formerly employed 2,000 hands, whereas it now has only 1,025, of which difference the abandonment of the match industry only accounts for 500. There are 2,000 unemployed in the city of Hull under the era of perfect prosperity boasted of by the government.

A little further on the same provincial member says:

> Continuing, the member for Hull deplored the many restrictions visited on the Gatineu district, whose inhabitants might no longer hunt game, carry firearms, enjoy freedom in fishing, or other liberty. All that they were offered in exchange was work in the shanties of the International Paper Company at a wage varying between $25 to $40 per month. Contract work was no better and generally ended in overwhelming debt for the man that took it on.

I have no need even to go to the city of Hull. I think of the statement made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in this house only a few minutes ago. When we are boasting of a surplus in the budget this year of approximately $70,000,000, the Postmaster General informs us that some of the lowest paid men in the Dominion of Canada, postal employees, cannot have a slight increase in their pay. Will the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) or any other minister tell me that these postal workers are enjoying some of this so-called prosperity? Yet the government sits there hopeless and powerless to intervene in a simple case of that character. I feel satisfied that if the government were determined to give these postal employees decent and reasonable wages they could somehow or other find ways and means of overcoming the civil service commission.

I will leave this part of the country now, and discuss conditions in Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces. I do not think that any member of this house, no matter on which side he sits, who has seen conditions in the maritimes with his own eyes, will say that there is prosperity in those provinces. I was in the maritime provinces myself just a few months ago, and I saw conditions in cities like Sydney and in towns like Glace Bay and I want to say to this house that any Canadian who sees for himself the conditions of the masses of the people there is bound to bow his head in shame to think that such conditions can exist in the Dominion of Canada, where we are boasting of our so-called prosperity. When you go into a place like Glace Bay and see young children ill-fed, ill-clothed, going about in the mud in the streets, with the sewage running down a little gully made right in front of the homes of these people, I say we have no right in this house to talk about prosperity until such conditions are remedied. We all have a responsibility in this matter, and I would go a long way myself to see that conditions in the maritime provinces are remedied in a real and proper way.

What are some of the conditions in the maritimes? Last year a committee of the ministerial association of the maritime provinces investigated conditions in the Dominion Iron and Steel works, and on the 5th day of November, 1928, they published their findings. I will read just one or two brief extracts from their report, and then perhaps my good friend the Minister of Labour will understand why I am one of those who are loath to believe that there is prosperity in the Dominion of Canada. The report says:

> The ordinary work day at the D.I.S. Co. plant is ten hours—from 7.00 a.m. to 5.30 p.m., with thirty minutes at noon for lunch. For night duty there is a twelve hour term, with thirty minutes at midnight for lunch. For the continuous operations, consisting of the coke ovens, blast furnaces and open hearth departments, involving approximately 1,000 men, the day term is eleven hours and the night thirteen throughout a seven day week.

That is, the men in this department work an average of eighty-four hours every week, sixty-six hours during the week on day duty, and one hundred and two hours for the week on night duty. A little further on the report says:

> Your committee cannot help feeling that this is a very cautious and moderate statement. We believe that the plight—it can scarcely be called other—of the some 1,000 men in the continuous operations is a scandal and a shame. To be on night duty, under the most favourable working conditions, from eleven to thirteen hours were trying enough, but when we know the necessarily almost intolerable conditions in which these men have to work, heavy manual labour in gas, smoke, heat, and in some cases, exposure to the elements summer and winter, the situation is nothing less than appalling, and their treatment utterly abhorrent to the dictates of humanity.

I will give my last quotation from this rather lengthy report:

> For the year ending June 30, 1928, as gleaned from the published statement of the corporation, there was an operating surplus of $2,200,000, as compared with $1,500,000 for the previous year, a total for the two years of the receivership of $3,700,000. (This before anything was set aside for interest on bonds or depreciation.) Now, of that amount, $2,000,000 has been retained for depreciation, $1,000,000 per year, the balance presumably being available for interest charges on bonds, and so forth.
> What suggests itself is this—Should $2,000,000 of the profits of the industry which the men at least had helped to make, be set aside, not for repairs (these were taken care of in course of the operations and charged to them), but for future replacements, while not a cent of this amount has been allowed for the better condition of the human element in the industry? It does cost money, doubtless a great deal, to replace the machinery of steel making. Unfortunately, it costs the industry little or nothing to replace men—there is nearly always a surplus of labour.

These are the wages paid in Sydney in the month of November last: The labourer, who we have just heard works from eleven to thirteen hours a day, receives 33 cents per hour; helpers, 36½ to 38½ cents per hour, and their hours are ten, eleven and thirteen hours per day, according to the shift they happen to be working; handymen, 42½ to 50 cents per hour; mechanics, 52 to 57 cents per hour. Mr. Charles Schwab, of the United States Steel Corporation, said recently before the United States investigating committee that the average wages in the United States for a similar class of labour averaged about 63.08 cents per hour.

It has been pointed out by several of the ministers and others that there has been an enormous increase in production in the Dominion of Canada. That is perfectly true. I do not think anybody will deny that there has been a great increase in all lines of industrial and even agricultural activity, but, of course, that does not mean that the people who have produced those commodities are necessarily any better off than they were previously, and I shall try to prove that in a moment or two. Labour efficiency has increased enormously in the last few years. About three years ago I placed figures on Hansard which showed that over a period of about eight or nine years the individual industrial efficiency had increased by approximately 40 per cent. Professor Michell, of McMaster university, Toronto, has made some rather interesting calculations along the same lines, and he arrives at somewhat similar conclusions to those at which I arrived when I made this study a few years ago. He points out that from 1890 to 1900 the value of production per worker increased 15.5 per cent, or 1.55 per cent per year on the average; from 1900 to 1910, the increase was 58.5 per cent or 5.85 per year; from 1910 to 1920, the increase

Now, he shows further that from 1920 to 1927, while production had increased by 52.8 per cent, on the average wages increased only 13 per cent. But even those statistics are not complete in themselves and therefore I shall add a little to them. According to our year books I find that the total wages paid in 1917 to men and women employed in industry was $420,094,869; in 1925, $452,958,655; an increase in dollars—not necessarily in purchasing power—of $32,863,786. In that same period the cost of living increased from 100 in 1917 to 116 in 1925. Therefore if we compare the purchasing power in 1925 with that in 1917—and these are the latest figures available in the Canada Year Book—we find there has been actually a reduction in purchasing power to the disadvantage of 1925; and if the purchasing power of the wages were calculated on the 1925 basis real wages would be considerably less than in 1917, the figures, as I make them out, being approximately $34,551,000. In that same period the number of persons employed had decreased from 552,968 to 466,602—a difference of 86,366.

It is quite true, as has been pointed out, that wages may have increased to the individual, but I might give a very simple illustration of how they have been increased. Let us imagine, for instance, a factory employing ten men, paying out ten thousand dollars a year in wages, and producing, say, forty thousand dollars' worth of commodities annually. At the end of one or two years let us assume that two men have been discharged, the remaining eight producing, say, forty-five thousand dollars' worth of commodities, but receiving nine thousand dollars in wages. Then there would be a relative gross reduction in the wages paid, and the general purchasing power would be correspondingly reduced, with the result that the ten people could not purchase the same quantity of commodities as before. This would leave the ten men, in a relatively worse position than at the outset, while those who owned the factory would be getting the benefit of the increased productivity, and the reduction of staff.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word or two in connection with the amendment to the amendment that was moved by my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) and seconded by myself. In this subamendment it is suggested that we give an increased preference to the people of Great Britain. I believe that is a policy that ought to commend itself to practically all the members of this house. The Conservative party have been preaching that doctrine for a number of years. We in this corner of the house, who have so often been accused of unfriendliness towards the mother country, to-day desire to give practical expression of our true friendship for the people of Great Britain by extending to them the benefits of a much increased preference.

There is another and perhaps a more important reason why we should give an increased preference to the people of Great Britain. At the present time both the public men and the press of the United States are expressing their intention of raising the tariff against commodities manufactured or grown in Canada. Well, if the people of the United States are not anxious to deal with us, then at least we can transfer our trade to those who are willing to trade with us. And Canada has no better customer than Great Britain. Indeed, our Conservative friends have been telling us in season and out of season, in this house and throughout the country, that we are buying many hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of goods from the United States in excess of what we are selling to them. For this reason it is claimed we should erect a barrier whereby the adverse balance of trade will be reduced if not entirely wiped out. If that doctrine of the Conservative party holds good in relation to the United States, then certainly it must hold good in relation to Great Britain. We sell to Great Britain far more than she sells to us. That being the case, I think Great Britain would be justified in complaining against this adverse balance of trade with us just as insistently as hon. members of the Conservative party complain about our adverse balance of trade with the United States. Therefore one means of overcoming that difficulty would be to grant an increased preference to Great Britain. In this way we in turn may become one of the best customers of the mother country.

In this connection, however, I wish to make one statement that I regard as of particular importance. It has been freely stated in the press, without any denial by any member of the government, that Canada might enter into a trade arrangement with the United States by bartering away our rights in the St. Lawrence waterway. I hope and trust that statements of such a character are entirely without any foundation. If we are to negotiate with the United States on matters of tariff, then we must confine the negotiations to tariffs. The waterway question should in no way be made a bargaining point between the two governments. If the United States wants to use water-powers which may be international in their character, that question must be settled on its merits, and no extraneous question must be allowed to interfere in any such negotiations.

If the United States does not want to deal with the Dominion, then we must find other avenues of commerce. I think my colleague who moved the amendment pointed out one of the avenues of trade now undeveloped is Russia. This country to-day is doing practically no business with Russia; whereas Great Britain, in spite of her diplomatic difficulties with the soviet government has still, I am informed, about twenty-three trade agencies doing business on behalf of the Russian people. Now, Canada has not within its confines one single trade representative of Soviet Russia. I cannot understand why our Minister of Trade and Commerce, who seems so anxious to develop our trade in all parts of the world, has allowed the occasion to slip by of adding a Canadian representative to the British trade delegation which is now visiting Russia.

A moment or two ago, Mr. Speaker, I referred to our trading with the United States. As I said, if the United States is not anxious to trade with us I am not anxious that we should trade with them. On the other hand, I view with considerable misgiving our entry into negotiations with the government of the United States for the joint development of the St. Lawrence waterway. Let me give my reasons for this disquietude. Two years ago, speaking at a banquet of the United Press in New York, the then president of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, made the following significant statement:

> The person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain of the nation, even when abroad.

One well known citizen of the United States, Mr. Vanderlip by name, commenting on that opinion used some rather caustic language in condemning the speech then delivered by the president of the United States. I should hate to think that where there is United States capital in this country the United States government might claim it to be a part of the United States domain. If that were the case then a great part of Canada would be to-day a portion of the domain of the United States. However, I do not believe that to be the true voice of a very large section of the people of the United States. Nevertheless, when the president of the republic uses language so emphatic, and we witness the subsequent actions of that country in places like Nicaragua, Haiti and elsewhere, we in this country ought to be extremely careful before bartering away any of the rights and heritages we may have in this Dominion. I rather prefer the United States of Abraham Lincoln, as represented by him on many occasions, and perhaps I might be allowed to quote a few sentences of his spoken on one famous occasion when he referred to labour in his country. I much prefer the United States of Abraham Lincoln to the United States of ex-President Coolidge, and as my time has about expired I will conclude by quoting this great American:

> Labour is prior to capital and deserves much the higher consideration. Who and what is labour? You are labour, if you work for a living. You till the soil, you mine the coal, you write the books and spin the yarn. You invent cunning machines, you serve and sell across counters and you build the dwellings of men, all the world over.
> In America you are the great majority. All that serves labour serves the nation. All that harms labour is treason to America! No line can be drawn between these two. If any man tells you he loves America yet hates labour, he is a liar. If any man tells you he trusts America, yet fears labour, he is a fool. There is no America without labour, and to fleece the one is to rob the other.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I desire in the few minutes allotted to me to discuss one essential question and to ascertain in what respect the policy of this government is leading, as I think, to permanent disaster in this country. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) smiles, but I am serious. If I had time I would consider in what the recent prosperity of this country, in 1927 and 1928, largely subsisted. I have taken 100 stocks on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges during the year 1927, and allowing for all retrogressions in prices I find that there was a net appreciation in 1927 of $743,302,691; and last year, the calendar year—dealing with 128 stocks, because some others had come into the market—I find that the net appreciation, after allowing for all retrogressions in prices, amounted to $1,033,908,892. So that as regards the credit available to individuals who were engaged in the activities of the stock exchange, they had an appreciation in the two years of $1,787,211,583. They enjoyed a very large measure of prosperity, and "they" included many thousands and even tens of thousands of people throughout the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Hon. gentlemen say, and say truly, that the prosperity of this country depends to a large extent upon the wheat crop of the three prairie provinces. But that appreciation was equal to four times the value of the wheat crop in 1928, which was estimated at $426,-

000,000; and it was equivalent to one and six-tenths of the value of the entire field crops in Canada in the year 1928. You will find that so long as activities of that character prevail there will be on the surface a fictitious prosperity which never reaches the homes of the great body of our citizens.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) has stated the policy of this government to be exclusively—I do not think the word exclusively is a misrepresentation—to devote the activities of that department to find markets abroad for Canadian products, and that policy is to be commended in so far as it deals with the surplus of production in this country. To that end, as he has told us on different occasions, we made a treaty with France in September, 1923. But I find that our exports to France have fallen in the fiscal year 1928 to about $5,000,000 less in value than in 1925. We made a treaty with Italy in January, 1924, and yet I find that our exports to Italy in the fiscal year 1928 were $4,000,000 less in value than in 1927. We made a new treaty with Belgium in October, 1924, and in our fiscal year 1928 we had increased our exports to Belgium by $4,000,000 over our exports in 1925; but that was $2,000,000 less than in 1926 and $550,000 less than in 1927. We made a new treaty with Finland in August, 1925, and I am glad to see that we had increased our exports to Finland by $800,000 in 1928. We made a new treaty with Australia and also gave new trade concessions to New Zealand in 1925, and in the fiscal year 1928 our exports to Australia were less than in 1927 by $4,700,000. Our exports to New Zealand in the fiscal year 1928 were $3,700,000 less than in 1925. We made a new treaty with the British West Indies in 1925, and our exports to these islands in the fiscal year 1928 were only $473,000 more than in 1926. I may say by way of comment that I have visited the British West Indies more times than I can remember, and I went through them with some care about fifteen months ago. So that I know something of local conditions; and while I hope to be disappointed, and while recent arrangements made by this government with the West Indies may be commended as a step on our part towards imperial unity and the assisting of dependent colonies of Great Britain, nevertheless—and I think I am a practical business man—I can see no hope during my lifetime at least for this country receiving any return from that trade, any compensation, adequate to cover the expenses of operation of the new ships costing, I believe, $10,000,000, as I predicted two years ago in a discussion with the Minister of Finance, together with a meagre allowance for depreciation and the annual interest on the capital expenditure. Therefore, while we may be commended for extending a hand to these colonies by reason of our imperial sentiments and our desire to promote and assist colonies of that kind, yet in my opinion we cannot hope for any adequate financial return from that undertaking. If we wish to do anything for the West Indies we must assume control of the administration, placing in charge competent men who will see to it that the productivity of those people is rapidly increased and that they assume a higher standard of living than they have ever enjoyed up to the present time.

British Guiana gave our export trade a preference from March 1, 1927, and our exports to that country for the fiscal year 1928 were $124,000 less than in 1927. We made a new convention with Czecho Slovakia in September of 1926, which was extended in January, 1927, and our exports to that country for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, were only $962,000 in excess of our exports for the previous year. I do not disparage these efforts, in many cases futile, on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to extend the foreign and external trade of this country, but it must be remembered that the net result of the intensive activities of this government in negotiating these trade treaties and conventions, on the whole, does not show a very great improvment in our export trade to these several countries, although there may have been some minor increases during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929. Any slight improvement in our export trade to these countries was only attained by granting very liberal tariff rates on their exports to Canada.

I believe that the whole difficulty is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues on the government benches unfortunately are actuated by the mistaken opinion that the scope of their official duties and responsibilities excludes domestic trade and embraces only the foreign or external trade of this country. Since I have been in this house I have seen no evidence that either the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture have been actuated by any strong desire—and if they have had the desire they have not exerted the corresponding effort—to increase the domestic productivity of this country upon which its real welfare must always depend. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we are represented throughout the world by groups of trade commissioners as intelligent and aggressive as any country could desire. That is very good; I hope they possess these qualities. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, because I like to look a man in the face when I ask him questions, but what has his department ever accomplished by way of extending the domestic or internal trade of Canada? What means has he taken to further, even in part, the production in Canada of the $1,220,000,000 worth of commodities which were produced abroad and imported for consumption in Canada during the last calendar year? If the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the staff of officials under his direction should devote their intelligence and their energies to promoting the establishment in Canada of industries which would produce commodities to the value of $500,000,000 of that total of $1,220,000,000 imported, which we could readily produce here but which we now bring in from foreign countries for our domestic consumption, chiefly from the United States, in a few years there would be an increase in employment throughout Canada sufficient to maintain an additional population of at least 1,250,000, and in my opinion, soon Canada would be enjoying increasing industrial activity of every sort and description from the Atlantic to the Pacific. As yet, however, sitting in this house for the last three years, I have never seen evidence of any honest effort on the part of the government, the members of the government or the officials under them to meet and solve this pressing problem of our industrial future. And when I say "industry" I do not mean manufacturing only; I refer to industry of the farms, the fields, the mines and the fisheries as well.

I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce has largely abandoned his real vocation, in devoting the high intelligence which we admit he possesses and the energy of the officials of his department to the extension of our external trade which, under existing conditions, is now of less importance to the general well-being and prosperity of Canada than the internal or domestic trade of the country. In fact, one who attempts intelligently to study the economic conditions of Canada cannot but regret to observe an ever-increasing effort on the part of the government and its supporting public press to overemphasize on all occasions the importance of the increasing foreign trade of Canada. Their arguments, it seems to me, are based on the undoubted fallacy that an increase in foreign trade is always indicative of the increasing general prosperity of the whole country. The real truth is that an increasing import trade often implies a deplorable decrease in domestic productivity and a corresponding decrease in domestic employment. I suggest that the principle which should guide the government and a parliament of this country has been long established by the experience of the most prosperous nations, namely, that the domestic or internal trade of a country is more profitable for the country as a whole and should be first considered, continuously conserved and never sacrificed merely to extend the volume of our foreign trade by unnecessarily increasing the quantity and value of our importations from abroad.

The surplus of our production in Canada over and above the domestic demand, and those foreign commodities for the production of which our own soil, climate and other conditions are unsuited, are the legitimate subjects of foreign trade, but a foreign trade which exceeds these reasonable limitations and sacrifices domestic industry to promote foreign industry is conclusive evidence that the country is not utilizing its own industrial resources and productive activities to the best advantage to its own people. It seems to me that no greater economic fallacy can delude the minds of men than that which measures the general prosperity and industrial welfare of the Canadian people solely or even chiefly by the extent of our foreign commerce, without serious regard, at the same time, as to whether those imports which swell the volume of that foreign trade might not be produced profitably in Canada.

It seems to me that the highest statesmanship of this country should seek to ensure the production in Canada of all commodities which can be produced from our own natural resources or from such raw materials as are readily available for the use of our industries, with as little labour as would be required to produce them in foreign countries and transport them to Canada. Our surplus home products could then be carried to foreign markets to pay for our purchases abroad. Commodities such as iron, steel, woollen, and cotton clothes, hardware and utensils of many kinds and descriptions can be produced in Canada with as little labour as elsewhere. They should be produced here, at least to the extent of our increasing domestic demand for such commodities. It is certainly the duty of Canadian statesmanship to promote such domestic production, primarily for domestic consumption and then any surplus which may be available could be sold for foreign consumption.

If Canada were unable to grow grain the volume of our foreign trade would be greatly increased, to the great disadvantage of this country. There would be first the necessity of importing grain to feed our own people; and secondly, the necessity of producing in and exporting from Canada a surplus of other commodities wherewith to purchase abroad and pay for the grain so imported. It seems to me that the increase in our foreign trade through the selling abroad of our raw materials, produced here by unskilled labour, in exchange for foreign manufactured commodities, produced by skilled labour, is a menace to the continuing prosperity of this country which should receive the attention of the government. The production by cheap domestic labour of low-priced raw materials for use in foreign factories leaves the producing country impoverisred and compels its skilled labour to seek employment in other countries. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I desire to say that by raw materials I mean those which are subject to further refining processes abroad after they are exported and which refining processes could, under favourable conditions, be effected by skilled labour at home. The exportation of raw materials, produced by cheap labour, is characteristic of a stage of civilization which is but a short advance from barbarism. It results in the slow but sure depletion and exhaustion, without adequate compensation, of the natural resources of the country which so devotes all its energies to encouraging such practices, and it also results in a lack of domestic employment for highly skilled labour which must then emigrate to seek a higher standard of living in other countries.

The people of new and only partially developed countries such as ours, which show the largest relative volume of exports and imports, very rarely enjoy such a considerable measure of comfort and prosperity as is enjoyed by those countries which encourage domestic production to meet the demands of the domestic markets. The motto of always buying where you can buy the cheapest and selling where you can sell the dearest can never form the objective of successful statesmanship in a country such as ours. This country is largely undeveloped and it can only retain the natural increase of its population by creating a diversity of domestic employment. It seems to me that the best interests of Canada can only be fully conserved when each and every citizen shall consider not only his individual welfare, but the welfare of the whole body politic.

The question of cheapness cannot be determined by single transactions, as the apparent interest of an individual purchaser is not always identical with the best interests of the community. The general prosperity of the whole country is expanded as its industrial activities are increased and its sphere of production enlarged and diversified, even though higher money prices are paid from time to time for domestic products over and above the prices which prevail in foreign markets. It is a fundamental law, with casual and special exceptions, that although the Canadian farmer may buy his clothing and other textile products for fewer dollars in England, Belgium or France, he can buy them upon the domestic markets in exchange for fewer bushels of grain or vegetables when their manufacture in Canada is encouraged and facilitated. When the Canadian buys or sells upon the domestic market he saves in a large way the costs of transporting his own products to a foreign market, as well as the costs of bringing the foreign products to the Canadian market. The money price paid is not the only material element in the transaction. The net profit is greater if he sells upon the domestic market a smaller quantity of his own products at a better price.

The prime objective of Canadian statesmanship should ever be to provide increasing, diversified and remunerative employment for our Canadian people. There are commodities such as wheat and pulp and paper which require a special exception. We are producing them in large quantities and the prosperity of this country depends to a large extent upon their continued production and sale abroad. But to devote our entire energies to their production, to the exclusion of encouraging and facilitating a vast number of domestic industries for the production of commodities for consumption at home, is, I think, a fallacy, and will only lead, as I said at the outset, to a deplorable retrogression in the industrial life of this country.

For the great majority of Canadians employment at remunerative wages is the prime necessity. Their continued remunerative employment at home is a matter of paramount economic importance to them and to the nation as a whole. The elevators of this country may be full of wheat, but they offer no relief to idle men and women who are compelled to emigrate to foreign countries to seek the employment which they have failed to find in Canada. The people of Canada are becoming convinced that that economic policy is bad for Canada which tends to deprive them of employment in Canada while opening wide our extensive and profitable Canadian markets to commodities produced by foreign workers.

One can go back and ask the question again: Why should we not produce wool on the farms in Canada and work it up into cloth in the woollen mills in Canada, instead of sending our raw wools to foreign countries to be worked up into cloth and re-imported to clothe our own people?

Why should we mine raw mineral products in Canada and send them to the United States and other foreign countries to be refined and manufactured into metal products, and thence import manufactured metal products of foreign factories into Canada to supply the demand of our domestic Canadian markets as we are doing?

We must all agree that ever-increasing domestic employment is the only preventive against increasing emigration from Canada, and that increasing domestic employment in Canada is the only incentive to desirable immigration into Canada. Our existing fiscal and economic policies compel our sons and daughters, who have intelligence and education, to seek new homes in the United States, while we expend millions upon immigration to induce unskilled and uneducated immigrants from abroad to undertake for low wages the production of raw materials in Canada for export to more prosperous countries.

The people of Canada are persistently asking in their homes, in their public debates, in their social intercourse: "Why should our sons and daughters be obliged to leave Canada for the United States to earn a living there, while we annually send hundreds of millions of money to pay there for the goods which they produce in the United States, and then sell to their fathers and mothers to be consumed at home?"

It is therefore true, I think, that to the extent that we Canadians import from abroad commodities which, under favourable conditions, could be produced in Canada by our own people, to that extent we impair the available domestic industrial employment of our own people and become more and more dependent upon foreign workers. Every million dollars in value of commodities annually imported, which could under favourable conditions be produced in Canada, deprives Canadians of $1,000,000 of annual revenue. Moreover, when we lose our home market for this million dollars' worth of domestic products, we can be compensated only by opening up new foreign markets for $2,000,000 worth of our own products. We can be compensated for our loss of domestic trade only by obtaining a double equivalent in our foreign or external trade. Therefore, if we purchase abroad $100,000,000 worth of products which have been or could be produced at home, we are not compensated by our sales in a foreign market to the extent of $100,000,000 in value of our own products. To be fully compensated, and to afford equal employment to our own people, we must find additional foreign markets for at least $200,000,000 of Canadian products per annum.

The impressive fact is therefore that whenever we import, instead of producing commodities which may readily be produced in this country, Canada is the loser by the change until our additional exports of our domestic products double the value of the new imports; and this loss to Canada will be decreased only by the percentage that the cost of purchasing and importing the foreign commodity is less than the average price in Canada of the domestic product, which is, in fact, a very small percentage indeed, especially when the contribution which the domestic producers make, as sales taxes, business taxes, income taxes and the like to the public treasury of the country for the purpose of carrying on and maintaining the administration of public affairs, is taken into consideration.

The entire value of any commodity produced in Canada is spent in Canada in its production, and yet ever reappears in the form of a new product. The expenditure of that value in its production not only gives employment in this country to its producers, but also serves to maintain all other classes of workmen and traders throughout the country, by furnishing a demand and market for their other diversified productions, especially for all our farm, dairy, and other food products. The foreign producer bears no part of the burden of maintaining municipal, provincial or federal governments in this country. He makes no contributions to the general development of Canada.

On the other hand, while producing in Canada, the Canadian producer spends in Canada, and yet the thing produced retains its entire value and thereby doubles the economic productivity and the increasing potential wealth of the whole country. The production of goods in Canada for consumption in Canada, instead of the importation of the same goods from foreign countries, for consumption in Canada, affords twice the employment in Canada that is given by the production in Canada of goods to be exported from Canada in exchange for foreign commodities which could be produced in this country. Therefore it seems to me that the government is going on an entirely wrong principle; it is adopting an entirely erroneous policy if it has a view to the permanent welfare and development of Canada and its future industrial and commercial prosperity.

I had intended to show in a brief review conditions which prevail in our trade relations between this country and the United States. The United States, with a total population of nearly twelve and one-half times our own, imports less than twice the amount of fully manufactured goods that are annually imported into Canada. In fact, Canada imported in the fiscal year 1928, $720,090,000 of fully manufactured goods, while the United States imported only $1,312,345,000 of fully manufactured goods, in their fiscal year ending June 30, 1928. If the people of Canada imported fully manufactured goods per capita only in the same proportion as the people of the United States, our annual import of such goods would have been reduced from $720,090,000 in 1928, to about $186,880,000; and we would now be manufacturing annually in Canada $533,200,000 worth of goods which we now import from foreign countries; and we would also be maintaining in Canada, in active employment, at least 300,000 more workmen with families, representing over 1,200,000 more people than we now have in Canada.

Canada's imports for consumption during the calendar year 1928, amounted to $1,222,318,000 or $126.56 per head of our estimated population of 9,658,000. The imports for consumption in the United States in the same calendar year amounted to $4,077,451,000, or less than $34 per head of their estimated population of 120,013,000. And yet there are some people in this house and in this government who seem to be so unsophisticated as to believe that the fact that Canada imports $126.50 per head of our population, as compared with the United States imports of $34 per head, is an evidence of Canada's increasing prosperity as compared with that of the United States. That is the whole burden of one or two of the addresses that I have heard from the opposite benches.

Each family of five in Canada, on the average, pays annually about $632.50 to maintain, clothe and feed the families of the workmen and workwomen of foreign countries, while each similar family in the United States pays only $170 for the same purpose, resulting in a proportionate annual saving for the United States of at least $462.50 for each and every family of five resident in that country.

If we merely maintained workmen in foreign countries in the same proportion as do the people of the United States, we would have had $1,021,000,000 more money annually to distribute in Canada last year for the maintenance of an ever-increasing Canadian population, and this sum of $1,021,000,000 is nearly twice the value of all the grain and grain products exported from Canada during the calendar year ending December 31st last.

I have the figures here of Canada's annual production of both primary and secondary products, as given by the statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it is now approximately $3,600,000,000 annually, or nearly $400 per head of our population, and yet of this $400 per head of the annual revenue of all the people of Canada from all their industrial and other activities, we sent abroad during the calendar year 1928, $126 per head to purchase foreign products; or in other words, we sent abroad nearly one-third of the revenue derived from all the productive activities of Canada to assist in maintaining foreign workmen in foreign countries, and, in particular, we sent abroad nearly 23 per cent of our entire revenues from the aggregate productivities of Canada, to support the industries of the United States.

When you look at the importations from the United States, you find that we spent during the calendar year ending December 31, 1928, in the United States the enormous sum of $826,000,000 to purchase United States products, or more than 67 per cent of our entire importations for the calendar year 1928. How can anyone imagine that we can maintain this country in a happy, prosperous and progressive condition when we send to the United States annually $826,000,000, giving employment to the people of that country to that extent? Is it any wonder that our sons and daughters desert us to engage in the industrial activities of the neighbouring republic?

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, as I am the only member of this house who had the good fortune to listen to your lectures at the Sorbonne in Paris, and to witness the increasing interest taken in them by an illustrious audience, I wish to join with the country in extending to you my most hearty congratulations. May I express the hope that this series of lectures, which has deserved the highest praise of outstanding men of letters and of statesmen, be printed for the benefit of those interested in Canadian questions on both sides of the ocean? I am sure that the reading of these lectures will bring to the mind of every Canadian the French saying: "Vous avez bien mérité de la Patrie, Monsieur l'Orateur."

My congratulations naturally go to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for the encouraging budget which he has introduced in the house this year. A net surplus of approximately $70,000,000, and a substantial reduction of $25,000,000 in taxation, means something in relieving the people of this country, who, shortly after the present administration took office, had the pleasure of seeing deficits turned into surpluses. However disparagingly the hon. members of the opposition may regard it, I do not see that a reduction of 33⅓ per cent in the sales tax, and the removal of taxation on railway tickets and telegrams, together with a lowering of the tariff, could alarm even the very few who are not directly benefited thereby.

While abroad I was proud to proclaim that Canada, which ranks twenty-seventh in population among the nations of the world, stands fifth in its export trade, which amounted in the year 1928 to $648,000,000.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in his able speech was free to admit that "Providence has continued to shower upon the country unbounded prosperity." It is with no little gratification that we on this side of the house, as well as the country at large, realize that Providence has made use of the Liberal party as the medium or agency through which the country has been relieved of the depression caused by the policies of our opponents.

During this budget debate we have not had the explosion of pessimism from hon. gentlemen opposite which has marked previous budgets. With muted strings, this year the opposition strikes the doleful note of "blue ruin." Enlightened by their experience in the past, they know that they cannot delude the country to the extent they delude themselves. There is not a note of political anguish of which our friends opposite are not masters. This year they repeat one after the other that to be wretched is the destiny of the Canadian farmer. The opposition know that their "whisper of death" has not prevented the country from rising to a greater national activity. The mournful warning about the closing of automobile and farm implement factories has not been borne out by the facts.

I read, for instance, in the Montreal Gazette of March 24, 1929:

> For the ten months ending October 31, 1928, the cumulative production of automobiles in Canada was 221,188 cars, having a sales value, f.o.b. plant, of $139,909,876, as compared with 169,331 cars valued at $110,736,126 made during the corresponding period of 1927. The increase this year amounted to 31 per cent in number and 26 per cent in value.

I will quote now from Agricultural and Industrial Progress in Canada, in its issue of February, 1929:

> There is no doubt but that to-day Canada is one of the most fortunately situated countries of the world, enjoying a degree of comfort and prosperity paralleled in few other places. The Dominion has completely recovered from all the effects of the war in more rapid manner than most nations involved, and having made up the distance lost during the period of hostilities, is taking yet more lusty strides upon a broader road leading to a greater destiny than she previously visioned.

I read again from the Montreal Gazette of March 18, 1929:

> Purchasing power of the people of Canada increased by half a billion during 1928,—

And so forth. Here is another quotation of March 23, 1929, from the same paper:

> Canada's foreign trade expanding. Volume nearly 85 per cent greater than at outbreak of war.

In regard to the tariff, the government evidently has not departed from its ordinary course. The Minister of Finance in introducing his fifth budget said:

> The policy of this administration is not a high tariff policy; it is a low tariff policy.

In 1924, under similar circumstances, while the tariff was reduced mainly in relief of four of our basic industries, the Minister of Finance said:

> Of these basic industries I would place agriculture in its various branches first; next to agriculture I would put our forests, our minerals and our fisheries.

Mr. Fielding, when introducing his last budget in 1923, said:

> The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed come into effect will be a moderate tariff, and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions.

The speech of the then acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) was, on the contrary, a well-qualified high-protection speech. Certainly his speech was heard with much more pleasure than profit. Its manner is no doubt better than the matter. But high as it may stand in oratory, this speech will, I am sure, have no bearing on the economic life of Canada. May I compare it to a seedless orange? —sweet to swallow, but deprived of all reproductive power. In other words, this speech, so brilliant in form, is frail in the understructure, its foundation being on the quicksand of higher protection. I wonder to what extent the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), with all his broadmindedness and his keen sense of national responsibility, would like to use his colleague's speech as a lifeboat to keep him safely afloat on the endless sea of golden wheat in the western provinces. This speech, echoed in every corner of the house occupied by the Conservative party, has rekindled the zeal of high tariff worshippers.

I propose to deal particularly with the agricultural side of the policy enunciated by the hon. member for South Wellington and by other hon. members opposite, who repeated the keynote of high protection struck by him as the only solution of the problems which confront the farmer.

When we come to consider the tariff issue in Canada we must bear in mind that high protection is a menace to our farming class, and even to our national unity. There is no country in the world where agriculture is so vital to the national well being as it is to Canada's, and therefore I propose to study the effect of the tariff on our farming class. Public prosperity may be compared to a tree. Agriculture is its root; industry and trade are the branches and leaves. If the root is injured, the leaves fall, the branches break off and the tree dies. Therefore we must look first to the welfare of the root of our national prosperity. It will be generally agreed that we can never do too much for the agricultural class. But is high tariff a solution for any of their problems? I think not.

The prosperity of the United States has been cited as an argument in favour of high protection, and though we cannot deny this prosperity, yet the extent to which American farmers have profited by it may be very much questioned. In spite of the fact that nearly all the protection possible has been given to the American farmer, his present situation does not give him much satisfaction. The cry for relief coming from the farming class of the United States and heard over the border does not speak well for the policy advocated by the members of the opposition. This cry shows at least that if high protection has showered prosperity on the United States, the farmers have benefited by it much less than the other classes of the population. They were far from getting their share of the questionable advantages of that policy.

And if high protection does not properly serve the interests of the agriculturist in the United States, a nearly self-supporting country, how can you logically press it in a country like Canada, which needs outside markets for the greatest bulk of its farm products? In this connection I may be permitted to quote from an article in the Journal of Farm Economics for January, 1928, entitled, Which does Agriculture need—Readjustment or Legislation? It is written by Professor G. F. Warren, of Cornell university. He is a recognized authority on economics. But lest it be objected that he is merely a theorist, I may add that he is also a very successful farmer. He writes:

[Mr. Bouchard.]

Statistical evidence indicates that we are in the eighth year of the most serious agricultural depression ever known in the United States. The depression involves primarily the producers of staple foods.

Throughout the whole article I fail to find any argument in favour of high protection. Evidently he does not think that high protection is the medium by which the farmers of the United States can be relieved. The subject of the article is also discussed by three other well-known professors, and apparently they reach the same conclusion as Professor Warren.

Now coming to the situation among the farmers in the United States, I would refer the house to the Congressional Record of the United States for the year 1928, page 7787. Mr. Blease, by unanimous consent of the senate, put on the record certain excerpts from various publications relating to the subject of farm relief and the farm loan system, and in an editorial appearing in the magazine Cooperation, published by the Cooperative League, New York City, on the question of relieving the farmer, the following comment is made:

Last year 2,000,000 people left the farms in the United States. More than half the population of this country is now living in towns and cities of more than 2,500 population. Only about one-fourth of the people are on the farms. The mortgages on the farms, unlike the people, are steadily increasing. The farms are slipping out of the hands of the farmers. The farmers are slipping away from the farms.

Senator Caraway, speaking in the United States Senate, is reported in the Congressional Record of 1928, at page 3614, as saying:

In 1919 the invested capital in agriculture was more than $79,000,000. In 1926 it had shrunk to less than $59,000,000.

And Mr. Greenwood, on May 24, 1928, is reported in the Congressional Record, House of Representatives, at pages 9736-37 as follows:

During the period of depression . . . 171,000 farms were sold at forced sale. It is estimated that almost 1,000,000 people have been forced to leave the farms because of these sales and failure. It has always been emphatically declared by some political economists that high protective tariff schedules spell prosperity. It is time for the farmer to come out of this deceptive delusion. . . . . Suffice it to say that I am not a free trader, neither do I believe in using the taxing power of the federal government as a means of robbery of the many for the benefit of the few. High tariffs cannot raise the price of commodities of which there is an exportable surplus. . . . . The export price controls the domestic price.

Mr. M. Nelson, of Missouri, on March 2, 1928, is reported in the house Congressional Record as follows:

Hoping to secure first hand information, I have just gone through replies to questions submitted to some 500 Missouri farmers.

Let me quote a few typical answers given to the questions:

Why have so many farmers failed in business since 1920?

Some of the answers given are:

Depletion; slump in the farm values and prices in everything produced on the farm; low buying power of the farmer's dollar; high cost of production; protective tariff; because the tariff cannot be made to do as much for the farmer as for the manufacturer.

And in reply to the question, "Would legislation by congress help the farmer?" some of the answers given are:

Repeal or reduce the tariff, thus placing agriculture and all other industries on the same basis.

Gradually take away protection from the so-called "infant industries" which have grown to be powerful and arrogant.

The final question was:

If not legislative action, what then is the greatest need of farmers?

To this question 26 per cent answered, organization, while 24 per cent replied, co-operation.

Whatever the political expediencies of the United States may be, we find that the leading economists of that country are taking a stand against the principle of high protection, particularly for the farmers. The prevailing, not to say unanimous, opinion is that high protection does not benefit the farmers. In a book written in 1924 by Professors G. F. Warren and F. A. Pearson of Cornell university, entitled The Agricultural Situation, we read at page 293 that the protective tariff in the United States protected only the sheep industry, flax growing and certain varieties of wheat. The protective tariff on other matters is said to have conferred no benefit upon the farmers.

One may read in the Journal of Farm Economics, of January, 1925, the views of Professor Hibbard, of the Agricultural college of Wisconsin. At pages 143-44 this authority writes:

What the situation will be a generation hence we do not know, but at present a tariff on butter and cheese is about as effective as Wonter Van Twiller's campaigns against the Swedes by proclamation. The conclusions, mainly adverse, do not mean that the tariff on dairy products should be repealed. They merely mean that not so much is to be hoped from the tariff on dairy products in the way of relief.

Now I wish to quote from the Gazette, a "low tariff newspaper" published in Montreal, certain views with regard to dairy products. Under date Washington, December 29, 1925, there appears an article under the heading, Cattle Tariff is Declared Futile, and a statement is made by:

Dr. Lynn R. Edminster, of the Institute of Economics, Washington, speaking here to-day at a conference on the tariff question called by the People's Reconstruction League.

The article in question reports this gentleman as follows:

Dr. Edminster believed the present duties, if continued, will gradually tend to raise domestic prices, resulting in substitution of other foods for beef, and cutting of profits to producers. He contended that efforts to stimulate the cattle industry through tariff will impose upon industry, as it now does, a burden which comes from support of general policy of protection in which the cattle man concedes much and gets little in return.

When we come to consider the condition of agriculture in the United States and measures taken for its improvement, we might refer to a report of the Business Men's Commission on Agriculture, published jointly by the National Industrial Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, Washington, 1927. At page 169, on the question of tariff readjustment, the following appears:

The principal effect of the protective tariff upon the American farmer is to restrict the market for those products of which he produces a surplus above domestic needs. The tariff in agriculture, as in other fields, is a double-edged and dangerous weapon.

Let us turn for a moment to France, another self-reliant country, to find out what the rural economists and the farmers there think about that matter. In his book Economie Rurale, Professor E. Jonzier, at page 74, says:

Waves of protection, having spread over a country, rarely bring about any other effect than the imposing of a tariff duty on all commodities and under such conditions there is no longer protection for anybody or anything.

What do the farmers think about protection, even in France, a self-supporting country? The National Congress of Agriculture in France, which met in 1925 and in 1927, was unanimous in recommending the lowering of the tariff on manufactured products, and an increased tariff for agricultural products was sought only in the event of the tariff on industrial products not being lowered. Just here let me quote a sentence from the Journal d'Agriculture pratique of April 16, 1927:

Agriculture and tariff reforms.

The National Agricultural Congress for the study of the customs' Act, organized by the National Federation of Agricultural Associations, was held on April 11, at Paris, in the Salle des Agriculteurs de France, under the chairmanship of Mr. Jules Gauthier, in the presence of a large number of distinguished guests.

Various recommendations follow, among others, the following:

Lower the duty on industrial products. And to the repeated applause of the entire audience, Mr. Garcin was able to assert that this was the desire of all French farmers who do not belong to the Agrarian party and only claim a moderate protection. If this reduction of duties on industrial products was impossible, then, but then only, the French farming community would request a higher protection on its products.

The farmers, he adds further on, request Parliament to work towards restoring tariff equality by a general increase of duties protecting farming products, if the proposal to lower the duty on industrial products cannot be effected.

In the course of a speech delivered on March 17, 1926, the Marquis of Vogue, speaking of an ex-minister of agriculture in France, said:

Mr. Meline had never erected the protection tariff as a tent for slumbering.

Then he went on to say:

We cannot think for a moment of bottling ourselves at home like in a closed urn: selling abroad or rather bartering our products is of the utmost necessity to us.

If a policy of high protection is declared by the best authorities and by the farmers themselves to be unsuitable for self-contained countries such as the United States and France, how much more so is that the case with regard to Canada, which depends so greatly on export markets? Protection for Canadian farm products can be effective only where no exportable surplus exists, and even then a surplus will be soon created to render protection inefficient. As soon as under-production is turned into over-production the prices fall; the alternation of ups and downs in the prices of produce, which would take place every few years, would discourage the farmers.

In order to present these facts I would ask permission of the house to place on Hansard statements showing first the agricultural and animal products which, according to their origin, do not enter into competition with domestic products, and secondly, agricultural and animal products the production of which considerably exceeds the consumption:

Agricultural and Animal Products which, According to their Origin, do not Enter into Competition with Domestic Products.

When we are asked to increase the duty on butter, cheese and eggs, we should remember that during the calendar year 1928 we exported 140,000,000 pounds of cheese as against our exports of 100,000,000 pounds of cheese during the previous year, but before discussing the Australian treaty I would like to consider for a few moments the opinions of the farmers themselves. I have in my hand the report of a delegation from the Canadian Council of Agriculture which came to Ottawa on April 2, 1924, from which I will read one sentence:

The need for immediate and substanial reductions in the customs tariff as a measure of relief to the agricultural industry . . . .

Mr. GOTT: What date was that?

Mr. BOUCHARD: April 2, 1924. The following comment was made at the twentieth annual meeting of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, held in Winnipeg on February 25, 1929:

Canadian farmers should be warned insistently against the danger of allowing themselves to be drawn into the vicious circle of protectionism. The farmers of the United States have listened to the specious plea that agriculture is entitled to receive the same protection as is accorded to other industries. Equal protection for all industries is impossible of attainment. It would, in fact, mean that none of them were protected. By an endeavour to share in the alleged benefits of protection the Canadian farmers must inevitably be the losers.

I would like to quote the remarks of two of the leading rural economists of the province of Quebec. In 1927 Professor Bois of the agricultural college at Oka said:

We levy, he says, a tax on goods which we wish to keep out of the country. But why and how are we to protect by means of the tariff a system of agriculture organized especially with a view to exportation?

We sell our butter and cheese to England and on foreign markets: how can we expect that a customs tariff will improve our situation?

The tariff is an excellent measure, inasmuch as it helps to develop the necessary industries which are too weak at the outset to compete with the older and more firmly established foreign industries, however, we must acknowledge that the tariff has also had the effect of allowing artificial industries to establish and maintain themselves in the country: we must also acknowledge that the tariff has had the effect of maintaining the high cost of living.

And so forth.

The tariff, however—

We shall return to this subject later on.

—perhaps may be of some benefit to the vegetable growers or market-gardeners. Here again, we must not exaggerate but remember two things: that in the country, there also exists both an urban and farming class and that the former is equally entitled to be treated as fairly as the latter. Excesses are detrimental to all.

Professor Charles Gagné, of the agricultural college at Sainte-Anne de la Pocatiere said:

To the question: Have our farmers an interest in claiming protection for their products? he answers: On the whole, we do not think so.

He bases his opinion on the two following reasons: A protective tariff, he maintains, can at the most but relieve temporarily the market on some of our farming products.

Everybody is aware, he states, that Canada exports more than it imports of these products; this simply means that the price is fixed abroad and not in this country. Therefore placing a protective duty, on products entering this country and of which we export a surplus can in no way be effective. The Americans or at least their economists realize now that protection is useless for the products of which they export a surplus.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) will pardon me if I do not follow him in the various recitations which he quoted from different articles in opposition to a tariff for farm protection. His remarks might be effective here but they certainly would not be across the line. The American farmer knows what he wants and he knows what he is after. He wants higher protection, and any argument put forward by the hon. member against that protection would have no effect so far as the United States is concerned.

For many years the annual presentation of the budget was looked forward to in all parts of Canada. The people were anxious to learn to what degree they would be relieved of the burden of taxation, or of other burdensome conditions which might apply with regard to their business or calling. After several years of disappointment that interest has died out and the present budget has practically passed unnoticed throughout the country.

We have heard a lot regarding the prosperity of Canada, and we on this side of the house rejoice in any measure of prosperity which there might be. But this prosperity should be general all over the country, and it is the duty of the government to do everything possible to remedy any condition which oppresses any section of Canada or any class of our people, whatever their calling or trade may be. Thanks to Providence, we have had large crops in most parts of Canada, but in many cases the crops have not been profitable to the farmer and the chief benefactor has been the transportation company. The mining industry has had a very good year, and the increased valuation of some of our mining stocks, as well as some of our other stocks, has had a great deal to do with the apparent prosperity.

Mr. DUNNING: They have gone down as well.

Mr. ARTHURS: They are still much higher than they were. After a slight set back, our pulp and paper industry is progressing and is giving employment, directly and indirectly, to a large number of people. But these three industries, agriculture, mining and paper, are to a large extent independent and are not controlled by this government or its lack of policy. This would also apply to the tourist trade, which has been growing year by year and is at present one of the most important assets of this country.

The exception to this rule is the agricultural industry, especially the fruit, vegetable and dairy sections. They have been asking in vain for protection in their home market, but owing to the opposition of certain members to the right of the gentlemen opposite, whose support is very necessary to the government, although their appeals have been heard they have passed unheeded. Every year we see more of our factories and workshops closed owing to the lack of fair protection against the products of cheaper labour and the competition of others who, after supplying their own markets, are allowed to bring in or dump their surplus stock upon the Canadian market. No new factories are being built in our smaller towns because it is impossible to get men to invest where our own markets are not assured and where a neighbouring country can and does raise its tariff overnight when we commence to export any article which can be profitably produced there. It is very hard to believe that this country is prosperous when we see the large number of factories in our smaller towns and cities which have been closed. Those factories were once busy, but the workmen who were employed there have mostly followed the industry which is now located outside of Canada. The result has been a loss of population in the towns and cities and the placing of a greater tax burden upon those who have remained.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), and other speakers on his side of the house, boasted that there had been a surplus and a reduction in the debt, but they did not say that this was owing solely to increased taxation. The government collected more from the people this year than ever before, even during or subsequent to the war, and almost all by taxation. A comparison of some of the figures will be very interesting. According to the Minister of Finance the income from taxation, leaving aside all other sources of ordinary revenue, will be $391,050,000 for 1928-29 as compared with $319,926,013 in 1922, the last year for which the Conservative party was responsible. Taking the year 1921-22 as a basis, we find that during the six-year period before and including 1922 we collected $525,808,963 in war taxes. This does not include customs duties. During the next six years following 1922 we collected $974,-618,136. In other words, during the war and up to and including 1922 we collected on an average $87,634,823 per annum, but after the war, from 1923 to 1928, we collected on an average $162,436,356 per annum. Thus after the war was over and after our expenditures for the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, hospitalization, physical training, war gratuities, and so forth, were practically over, war taxes nearly doubled; they increased on an average $75,000,000 per annum. This means an increase of $8 per capita, or $40 per family per annum, while the minister has been telling parliament year by year that he is reducing taxation by $25,000,000 or $30,000,000.

We also had a sales tax in 1921 and 1922, the average receipts for those two years being $49,818,907. But after the present government came into power this tax was doubled, and during its six fiscal years, 1923 to 1928, the average was $89,534,934, or an increase of over $4 per capita for every man, woman and child in Canada per annum on the sales tax alone.

Let us consider our customs tax, which is the bête noire of our Progressive friends. Our receipts in 1922 amounted to $105,686,645, while our receipts in 1928-29 will be more than $185,000,000. If the argument put forward by our Progressive friends were sound, that for every dollar collected by the government three dollars were collected by the manufacturers, we must be in very bad shape, because no such collection has ever before been made in Canada, even in war time. But the real reason for the increase in the customs is that by the steady withdrawal of the necessary protection but the retention of a duty, our factories have been closed and the goods that were previously made in them are being imported. There has been no reduction but rather, in many cases, an increase in price to the ultimate buyer while our factories are closed and our workers are out of employment.

We all know that the price of agricultural machinery has increased: that the farmer is paying more for his machines than he did under higher protection. But the speech of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) shows another feature of our trade troubles. As reported on page 827 of Hansard he was asked:

Mr. Stirling: Is this machine made in Canada at all?

Mr. Fansher (Last Mountain): To the best of my knowledge these machines are not made in Canada. I understand that the Massey-Harris Company have been manufacturing them in the United States and shipping them across the line.

What an object lesson: A great Canadian company, one of the largest in the world, once entirely Canadian, manufacturing in the United States machinery for use in Canada instead of manufacturing it in Canada as it should be. There is no reduction, but rather an increase in price. The real reason for all these troubles is that this government is kept in power by a certain group whose doctrine is free trade and whose slogan is: "Any tax is a good tax if taken from the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec," as 80 to 90 per cent of the taxes are. But the farmers of Ontario or of Quebec who face ruin owing to the importation of vegetables or fruit at dumping prices or the workmen in either of these provinces or elsewhere who find their employment gone, cannot find much consolation in the quotation: "For he that hath to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath."

The Minister of Finance and other speakers have dwelt upon the reduction of our debt, but with the vastly increased taxation the reduction should have been much more. In 1913 the total receipts of the government of the day amounted in round figures to $168,690,000, and even then the debt was reduced by $25,617,000. In 1928 the total receipts were $429,642,000 and the debt was reduced by $50,984,000. In other words, the receipts for 1928 were $261,000,000 more than they were in 1913. At page 619 of Hansard the minister gives a list of expenditures due to war for this year amounting to $162,911,000. The excess of receipts for last year over those of 1913 would pay that and leave over $68,000,000 to add to the reduction of 1913, so that the reduction last year, even admitting for the sake of argument that, as stated, all the increased expenditure was due to the war, should, on the same basis, have been $93,000,000. But the minister is not correct in stating that there is an increase of $162,911,000 due to the war. He charges to the war the interest on all the increase in the public debt since 1914, and that is unfair. Between 1914 and 1927 very large sums were voted for our railways for betterments and in order to save them from bankruptcy. I have under my hand only the figures from 1920 to 1927 inclusive, but during these years we made cash payments to the railways of $367,791,580 and, in addition, large sums were given as subsidies to railways. The figures are as follows:

1920	$123,590,232
1922	84,932,579
1923	23,710,617
1924	9,934,453
1925	10,000,000
1926	10,000,000

There was nothing in the fiscal year 1927-28. As a matter of fact, none of these payments should be charged to the war. It was absolutely essential that they should have been made in any event, and the increased debt to that extent should not be charged against the war.

Our friends opposite, in boasting about the reduction in debt, should remember that they have received large payments by way of reparations, repayments and so forth, every dollar of which should have been applied directly to the reduction of the debt which was contracted in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: Or paying reparations.

Mr. ARTHURS: These payments were as follows:

Reparations	$6,314,500
1923
Imperial government exchange.	8,199,333
1924
Imperial government exchange.	632,500
Redemption of bonds	8,305,760
1925
German reparations	659,311
Payment by Greece	479,526
Payment by Roumania	3,520,636
1926
German reparations	1,593,503
1927
German reparations	1,756,704
1928
German reparations	6,791,479
Housing	9,768,440
Repayment of loan by Belgium.	4,528,336
Repayment of loan by Greece.	195,000

From 1922 up to the present time there has been received by way of reparations and repayments of loans, $52,745,000, every dollar of which should have gone directly towards the reduction of the debt. In addition we have received very large sums by way of repayment of soldier settlement board loans, for which there is no account in the Auditor General's report.

So far as expenditures are concerned, some are warranted and others are not. The payment of about $3,000,000 to reduce maritime freight rates is justified, but if we continue to meet out of the public treasury the deficits on the eastern branches of the Canadian National Railway these deficits are apt not only to occur regularly, but to increase, especially in the case of the newly acquired lines. I am firmly of opinion that these deficits should be a part of the ordinary business administration of the Canadian National Railway, and should not be chargeable directly to the people of Canada.

Our grants to the provinces for old age pensions are necessary, but I still think, as I said at the time the act was passed, that this Dominion should have assumed the whole burden, and in that way we would not have two sets of overhead expenses. It would also have resulted in a uniform law, and the poor and aged could then get a pension, when otherwise entitled, without regard to residence in any particular province.

The payment of $2,190,000 to the Federal District Commission, largely for the improvement of certain small squares in Ottawa, cannot be justified, at least at the present time.

We are all anxious to do what we can to build up Canada and Canadian trade, but there is a vast difference between giving, not loaning, $2,873,000 to Quebec harbour, and spending $1,000,000 to cover deficits of the Canadian government merchant marine. The Canadian government merchant marine is exploring new channels of trade, and has been very successful in that work until other steamship lines have been prepared to supply the service. The sum is small compared with the subsidies which have been granted by the United States under the camouflage of mail subsidies.

The tariff changes proposed in this budget are very slight and will not affect the ordinary man to any considerable extent. This is also true of the proposed war tax reductions, which are all in favour of the wealthy man and the larger corporations.

The small reduction in the tax on railway tickets and the large reduction in the tax on sleeping and parlour car tickets are both direct benefits to those who can best afford to travel. The man on the farm or the workingman may save 3 cents a year on the average, but the brokers, the banks and the large companies will get the greatest benefit from the removal of the tax on telegrams and cable messages.

The sales tax, which should have been abolished long ago because it is paid by the poor man, has been reduced by one cent on the dollar. This reduction is so small that it cannot be passed on to the consumer, and it will benefit only the middleman. This tax should now be entirely abolished, in which case the consumer would receive the benefit of approximately 5 cents on the dollar in the purchase of all articles which are affected by the tax.

Another instance of how this government taxes the poor man and relieves the rich is shown by the tax on the transfer of stock shares. The minister proposes a tax of one cent per share on stocks up to the value of $3. The minister knows as well as I do that there are no $3 stocks on the market of a par value of $3. All these shares that are below $5 or $10 are $1 stocks. The minister knows also that the great majority of these stocks are sold below an average price of 40 cents, but if we take the average at even 50 cents a share, the tax amounts to 2 per cent on each transfer. I might add that many of the best mines we have in Canada had their stock placed on the market in the first place at around 10 cents per share, stock today which is very, very valuable. It is almost impossible to float a company with the stock placed at a very high figure. Every mining company requires capital for its initial operations, and the stock must be issued at a low price. On the other hand, if the tax upon $100 shares, the average price of which would run up to $200, were on the same basis of 2 per cent, the $100 shares would be taxed $2 per share, whereas the minister proposes to collect only 4 cents on each transfer of these shares. The thing is absolutely absurd. The minister is proposing to tax the lower priced stocks from fifty to one hundred times as much of their market value as he taxes the higher priced issues.

A short time ago a friend of mine read to me a parody on a great poem, which I think is quite pertinent. You all remember that verse of Longfellow's Psalm of Life:

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And, departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time.

My friend's parody reads:

> All King budgets tell our workers,
> They should work at every chance,
> But each year they wear behind them
> Larger patches on their pants.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 20, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Power to increase capital.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 1 as amended, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 62, respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company—Mr. Dickie—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time for completion.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill has been amended.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, it has been amended in committee, and section 1 now reads:

1. The Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, hereinafter called "the company", may within five years after the passing of this act complete and put in operation the line of railway which it was authorized to construct by section two of chapter eighty-three of the statutes of 1919, as amended by section one of chapter eighty of the statutes of 1924, namely: —from a point between Port Alberni and Bainbridge on the company's railway from Parksville Junction to Port Alberni, thence in a northwesterly direction, via Great Central lake and the valley of the Ash river, to Comox lake; and, if the said line of railway is not so completed and put in operation within the said period, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line of railway as then remains uncompleted.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I gave notice on the order paper of some amendments which I proposed to move either at this stage or at the third reading. The amendments were for the purpose of putting into effect certain suggestions I made on the second reading to render the bill a more workable one, and to provide for a better guarantee of the early completion of the work authorized. My suggestions were couched in temperate language and were made in a spirit of helpful, constructive criticism. At the time I asked the hon. member in charge of the bill (Mr. Dickie) to convey those suggestions to the promoters. To my surprise I found myself the object of immediate attack by hon. gentlemen opposite, as the house may recall. They accused me of an endeavour to prevent the building of this railway.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "attack" is not parliamentary.

Mr. NEILL: Also I was accused of making misrepresentations. Further, I was accused of baiting the corporation for political effect. These charges were made at a time when it was impossible for me to reply to them. But I do not feel called upon to do so now when I have the opportunity. Considering the source from which those charges emanate, I think they are more amusing than important. It was the same hon. gentleman a few years ago who told a committee of this house that I represented four thousand bolsheviks. Perhaps to his mind I did, because his idea of a bolshevik is somebody who differs from him in political opinions. However, I do not propose to be too hard on the hon. member. We must remember it is as natural for human nature to be true to type, as it is natural for water to run down hill. There is a certain form of mentality, Mr. Chairman, which at the first hint of opposition, or even of expression of a divergence of opinion from its own, throws reason to the winds, forgets logic and resorts to personalities rather than argument. That apparently is what happened in this case. I do not propose to reply in kind to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie). I prefer to preserve the dignity of debate; and besides, no one has yet discovered a method of throwing political mud without dirtying his own hands. I prefer to leave the hon. member in that position, to derive what sordid satisfaction he can from the methods he pursued on that occasion.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the whole of the charges by putting forward a question. Did you ever hear of a member of parliament opposing the bona fide construction of a railroad within his riding when the promoting company was the only company that could reasonably undertake the work, when the railway was much needed for the development of a large area, and when it meant the expenditure of three or four million dollars in his constituency? I think the answer to this question is the answer to the charges to which I have referred.

Now, sir, finding I could get no sympathy from the hon. member who was endorsing the bill, and who would not even consent to hand on my representations to the promoters —a courtesy I never saw refused in this house before—I took my courage into my own hands and approached them myself. I found them, as I expected, men of broad vision, men of affairs, and entertaining no idea of opposition because I happened to have ideas different to theirs, and certainly not the class of men to allow themselves to be baited by me or anybody else. The result of the little conference we had was that they agreed to introduce and did introduce into the bill in the railway committee certain amendments which gave me nearly all that I suggested on the second reading. They did not give me all I wanted—I never expect to get all I want or deserve for my constituents; we shall not get that until perhaps we reach a happier sphere. However, there is sufficient to justify me in saying that the bill is much improved and that there are better prospects of an early commencement and completion of the work. In other words, it is a reasonably fair compromise and enables me to accept it on behalf of my constituents. I therefore will not move the amendments I had intended submitting. I wish the bill godspeed in the hope that it will result in a reasonably early construction of this railway, which will do a good deal to develop an important part of my riding. This is something we shall all appreciate.

Section agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) for committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. ARTHURS: In representing one department of this government as more inefficient than another, I cite the Department of Immigration. I have no desire to attack any particular officials of that department; individually they are hard working men. But without proper direction, and without any settled plan or policy, they are helpless and the results are most deplorable. The people of Canada are aware of this and are demanding some real results from the large expenditure on immigration.

This year's estimates provide, in this connection, for $5,162,900, apportioned as follows: Immigration, $3,462,900; Land Settlement Board, $1,400,000; health branch in connection with immigration, $300,000. This does not include upkeep or rental of offices and buildings or of quarantine, or what may be in the supplementary estimates, nor does it include the very large sums spent annually by the Canadian National Railways and by the Canadian Pacific Railway, amounting to approximately $1,500,000; neither does it refer to the amount expended by certain of our provinces who maintain their own immigration officials. It does not cover the cost to and the labour of various charitable and religious organizations which have operated so successfully in past years.

The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) claims credit for every immigrant brought over to this country or coming of his own accord. Let us see what the situation is. According to the government report, from 1910 to 1920, which included four war years, our immigration was as follows:

British	687,215
United States	821,490
European	466,738
Total	1,975,443
Average per year	197,544

During the next period, from 1920-21 to 1924-25, our immigration was as follows:

British	273,887
United States	135,750
European	161,648
Total	571,285

Thus it will be seen that during this period approximately one-half the immigrants entering Canada were British. During the following year, 1925-26, the immigration was as follows:

British	37,030
United States	18,778
European	40,256
Total	96,064

In other words, the immigration from European countries was much greater than the British immigration, for the first time. During the following year, 1926-27, the immigration was as follows:

British	49,784
United States	21,025
European	73,182
Total	143,991

During that year the immigration from European countries was greater than the combined British and United States immigration. Then we take the last year for which we have a record, 1927-28, and we find the following figures:

British	50,872
United States	25,007
European	75,718
Total	151,597

Again the European immigration is equal to the combined British and United States immigration. We must also remember that the immigration to Canada from the United States is not composed entirely of Americans; the great majority of the people coming to this country from the United States are classed as aliens in that country. The United States Labour department returns for 1928 show that of the 25,007 people who left the United States for Canada 14,797 were aliens passing through the United States to this country. Thus we see that although we have spent millions of dollars more each year we are getting less immigrants and a lower proportion of British and United States citizens.

According to the returns of the United States Labour department 673,683 Canadians entered that country as immigrants during the last six years, and our returns show that over the same period we brought into Canada from all countries approximately the same number. The United States returns are for native Canadians, born in this country, fit physically and not criminals, so really we are expending over $5,000,000 a year in immigration in order to substitute for an average of 110,000 good Canadians an equal number of immigrants most of whom do not speak our language or understand our laws. I have nothing to say against any immigrant who comes to Canada to make a home for himself, but no matter how good he may be he cannot be as valuable to this country as one of our own young men, thousands of whom are still leaving our land through lack of employment caused by the neglect of this government. What this country needs is a policy which will tend to have our raw materials manufactured at home; we should keep our home markets for Canadian farm products and natural manufactures, thus giving employment to Canadians in Canada and making room for the proper class of immigrants from other countries, especially from Great Britain.

A few days ago I read a very illuminating editorial in the leading Liberal newspaper of Ontario, the Toronto Globe. This editorial deals with immigration. I am not going to weary the house by reading it all, since it occupies over a column of space, but I would like to read just a couple of short sentences:

> If Hon. Robert Forke's speech in the House of Commons on Friday is to be regarded as a major attempt at placing the immigration situation before the public, it must be considered as an unqualified disappointment. It carried too many alibi earmarks, found too many excuses and obstacles for which no solutions were offered, while it lacked the clear, ringing note in behalf of British immigration which the country has a right to look for, in view of the many professions of recent months that Canada wanted British blood and was prepared to use every effort to get it.

Further on the editorial continues:

> Has the trepidation of government supporters, depending upon the foreign vote for their seats, caused the minister to waver? His own loyalty to the British principle has not been questioned. Something must have happened to cause him to weigh the subject as he did with such evident desire to placate discontented interests.

That editorial appears in the Toronto Globe of March 18, 1929. This government has had over seven years in which to forward the policy which I have enunciated, that of manufacturing our own goods at home, but they have utterly failed in their task and conditions in Canada are worse so far as the working man or the farmer is concerned.

There is a motion on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), and although we cannot discuss it at present I wish to read it to the house:

> Whereas the Board of Grain Commissioners have failed in the administration of the Canada Grain Act, and particularly the so-called Campbell amendment; and,
> Whereas as a consequence there is widespread distrust of this body among the farmers of the western provinces;
> Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the members of the present board should be dismissed forthwith and a new board appointed.

If we substitute the words "government of Canada" for the words "Board of Grain Commissioners" and make a few corresponding changes, the resolution then would read as follows:

> Whereas the government of Canada have failed in the administration of Canada; and,

Whereas as a consequence there is widespread distrust of this body among the farmers and working men of the provinces;

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the members of the present government should be dismissed forthwith and a new government substituted therefor.

I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that this amended resolution would receive the approval of the great majority of the electors of this country.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the leaders of the Conservative party have once more pinned their faith to a policy of high protection, and in view of the further fact that when my time was called on the evening of March 11 I had just entered into a discussion of the conditions prevailing in Canada during the latter part of 1920, as they related to sugar, I propose to continue my argument at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will confine his remarks to the subamendment.

Mr. McMILLAN: I intend to speak on the subamendment. In view of all that has been said, and in view of the fact that they have been preaching their policy of high protection, I propose to show just what effect high protection had upon the price of sugar during the year 1920. At that time the refiners, evidently believing that the price of sugar would continue high for many months, made large purchases of raw sugar with the expectation of further profits. But for once they were mistaken. American sugar took a sudden drop and it began to flow into Canada at greatly reduced prices. The refiners became alarmed, they appealed to the government for assistance, and the members of the cabinet evidently decided that an avalanche of cheaper sugar coming into the homes of the Canadian people must be prevented at all costs. They became alarmed lest perchance some of our boys and girls might get a teaspoonful of cheap sugar and, in Scottish parlance, it might "pushion" them, so they at once invoked the dumping clause of the customs tariff, which had been devised for a very different purpose. Penalties were levied upon several consignments of imported sugar, but still the inflow of sugar continued. The government brought the board of commerce, which they had appointed, into operation. It made the amazing order of entirely prohibiting the importation of American sugar for the time being, and set a price of 21 cents per pound for Canada when sugar was selling at 12 cents per pound in the city of Detroit. Does anyone think that that board of paid civil servants would have made any such order had they not been coached by someone higher up, someone in sympathy with the refineries? But tremendous protests arose, in which even the government press joined, the government itself took fright, suspended the order, attempted to disavow all previous knowledge of it, laid the entire responsibility upon the hapless board of commerce, and set October 20, 1920, as a date for hearing the appeals of those who had appealed against that particular order. What were the facts? If we consult the press reports of that day we will find that—

Mr. BENNETT: It is perfectly obvious that the remarks of the hon. member have nothing to do with the subamendment.

Mr. CAHILL: The remarks of the previous speaker had nothing to do with the subamendment.

Mr. BENNETT: He spoke on the main motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled that where an amendment is moved to a main motion, and then a subamendment is moved, hon. members are entitled to speak on each separate amendment as if it were a distinct motion by itself. In fact, all the authorities say that it is a motion by itself, but they also state that when an hon. member speaks for the second time on one of the amendments he must speak on that very amendment and not refer to any other matter. The main motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. Guthrie, seconded by Sir George Perley, moved an amendment thereto. Then Mr. Spencer, seconded by Mr. Irvine, moved an amendment to the amendment as follows:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:

"urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

The hon. member spoke upon the amendment. He is now speaking for the second time, upon the subamendment, and his remarks should be confined to that particular subject.

Mr. DUNNING: The phrase "as a step towards freer trade relations" appears in the subamendment, and I would gather from the remarks of the hon. member that he is advocating that freer trade.

Mr. McMILLAN: I assure Your Honour that I will respect your ruling, as I must do, but I desire to make it very plain that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) is in the direction of freer trade relations and has a very particular bearing upon the requirements of household life. Sugar is one of the things which is used in every household, and before continuing my argument along this line I will address myself particularly to the subamendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) must obey the ruling of the Chair. The only question which he has discussed since commencing his remarks has been the importation of sugar from the United States. The subamendment deals with the enlargement or the increase of the British preference; he has not discussed that at all. The hon. member is simply playing with a ruling of the Chair, and he should be stopped.

Mr. CANNON: Without discussing the ruling which His Honour has just given, in fairness to all members of the house I would point out that if a strict interpretation of the rules of the house is given it should apply not only now, but later on in this debate when the subamendment is disposed of. I understand that the members who have not spoken already will be allowed to speak on the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment. What position will they be in when the subamendment is disposed of and they are allowed to speak again?

Mr. BENNETT: They must be limited.

Mr. CANNON: If they have not spoken on the main motion and the amendment, what position will they be in when the subamendment has been disposed of?

Mr. BENNETT: They can no longer speak.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly they can speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. Last year I gave a ruling on the question whether an hon. member could speak on the amendment and the subamendment. I ruled that members could speak on each, confining their remarks to the subject matter. My ruling was appealed from and sustained by the house, but I was not satisfied with that. I instructed the Clerk of the house to write to Mr. Webster, Clerk of the House of Commons in England, in order to find out exactly his views on the subject. By leave of the house I might read what he wrote in reply; it will answer the question which is now put. The letter is as follows:

28th March, 1928.

Dear Mr. Beauchesne:

Your letter of the sixteenth March reached me this morning. The decision referred to is certainly in accordance with practice here. After an amendment has been moved and seconded, the question on the amendment is proposed, and any member who speaks after that question has been proposed speaks to it and not to the main question. When the amendment has been disposed of and the main question is again proposed, any member can speak who has not already spoken on the main question, whether he spoke on the amendment or not. The mover and seconder of the amendment having spoken to the main question cannot speak again to it. The same rule applies of course to the case of an amendment to an amendment. The mover and seconder of an amendment are not penalized as compared with other members, because they speak both to the main question and the amendment which they are moving or seconding, in one speech. Briefly if there are three questions, members can make three speeches.

Yours very truly,

T. Lonsdale Webster.

So that every member can speak on each amendment, but it goes without saying that the speech must be relevant to that amendment. Otherwise we would start a new discussion covering the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, you will perhaps recall—your last observation directs attention to it—that on the question of relevancy the speaker's attention must be directed to the subamendment or the amendment under consideration, and it is clear that when a member speaks to the amendment and the main motion in one speech, and he does not reserve his right to speak on the main motion but makes his speech in terms referable alike to the amendment and the main motion, he is exhausting or should at any rate be held to be exhausting his right to speak in the debate. But if he is to speak two or three times he should at least direct his remarks positively to the subject matter of the question then before the house, which question is, in the first instance, the subamendment, in the second, the amendment, and, in the third, the main motion itself. There is no doubt about that in the world.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to direct his remarks to the subamendment itself. Of course the question of amendments and main motion is very involved but if we do not want to make chaos of the whole debate, hon. members must support the Chair in the principle that on each amendment the only question debated is the subject matter of that amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: On the question of relevancy I submit that very broad latitude is permitted by the very terms of the subamendment itself. The language of it is as follows:

—urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations.

Mr. BENNETT: The subject matter is the British preference.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend is at liberty to discuss the nature of the step proposed in the subamendment, what its implications are and what its advantages might be, his speech of course being directed to the subamendment.

Mr. McMILLAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the first place I would call your attention to the fact that Canada has now a British preference with the West Indies and Australia, which are both sugar-producing countries. The subamendment reads:

That this house urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations.

I would expect a subamendment such as that to come from my hon. friends across the way, but I am surprised that they would be sponsors of it if they would think seriously for one moment. Do they not think that the members of this government are giving this matter continuous consideration? If I was going to find any fault, I would find fault with the fact that possibly they are considering it too much. But apart from that observation I have no particular objection to the wording of the subamendment. I will, however, oppose it for the following reasons: the substance of the subamendment is now one of the cardinal principles of Liberal policy—the keystone of freer trade, not only with the motherland and the other British dominions but as well, with the world. Canada is the one nation since the war that has led the way in a policy of gradually lowering trade restrictions, thus demonstrating that she realizes she has now become one of the foremost countries in the world, and is willing to encourage international trade with all the world under fair, equitable and generous terms.

Second, the subamendment as introduced is simply a vote of want of confidence in the government. Does anyone believe that these hon. members who have sponsored the subamendment would think of driving this government to the country on an amendment such as this? They know there is no danger of this subamendment being carried, and that is the only reason why they moved it. The fact is that if they thought there was any chance of carrying this subamendment, every member who has sponsored it would be searching every nook and corner of these parliament buildings to try to get a hole big enough to crawl through in order to get himself out of the predicament.

Finally, I stand on Liberal principles, and endorse Liberal policy. My whole being has burned to lend some assistance to the onward march of human progress, and while we might deplore the snail-like pace at which our hon. friends are rumbling towards the promised land, yet when I cooperate with anyone, I pray God that it will be with those who manifest some real possession of principle rather than with the paragons of virtue who are continually parading their professions to the housetops and at every convenient opportunity are ready to place those professions on the public bargain counter, or, as in June, 1926, desert themselves, break the solemn bond of cooperation to which they had pledged their honour along with Liberals to put through the program of the government, and then join up with that shadow cabinet in their effort to put over the most indefensible act of power usurpation ever attempted in this house. When they could not succeed—

Mr. KENNEDY: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Did any member of this group in 1926 enter into a solemn compact or otherwise to whitewash corruption in administration?

Mr. McMILLAN: I might answer the hon. gentleman in this way, that there was a committee appointed to investigate the customs administration, and my hon. friend along with eight other members was on that committee. While they were in committee a certain resolution was proposed to censure the late Minister of Customs, Mr. Boivin. My hon. friend voted against that motion in committee, and yet when it came into the house he voted for a similar motion.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is not so.

Mr. McMILLAN: There was an agreement, and they deserted.

Mr. KENNEDY: Lest there be any misunderstanding, I wish to deny that satement.

Mr. McMILLAN: I well remember the late member for North Huron—

Mr. KENNEDY: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has just stated that when a motion was proposed in the committee in 1926 to censure the then Minister of Customs, I voted against it. There was not a motion proposed in the committee to censure the Minister of Customs that I voted against. There was a motion to report the Minister of Customs to the House of Commons, and I opposed that until the investigation should have been completed.

Mr. McMILLAN: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I read that motion in the proceedings of the committee to-day, and if it does not convey the meaning that I have placed before this house, I did not read it aright.

Mr. KENNEDY: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMILLAN: Let me continue. As I said, not only my friends opposite, but everyone who claims to support Liberal principles entered into a solemn agreement to try to put over the program which was placed before the house, and I well remember the late respected member for North Huron, Mr. King, coming into my office and telling me that there was such a split among the Progressives, so many of them had deserted, that he wondered what they would do. The moment he asked me I said at once, "Go back and tell them that above everything else you are going to respect yourself, respect the solemn bond to which you have pledged yourself." But that is what these gentlemen did not do.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman is far from the British preference.

Mr. McMILLAN: No, Mr. Speaker. I said a few moments ago that for three reasons I intended to oppose this subamendment, and I am now discussing my third reason. I have said that when I cooperate with anyone, I trust it will be with those who show some real possession of principle and will stick to their solemn bond of cooperation. But when these gentlemen saw that they could not sustain the movement which they had begun to keep that "two-penny ha-penny" outfit in power, the biggest scurry I have ever witnessed in this house in my time was the scurry of these hon. gentlemen to try to get back under the coat-tails of the Liberal party, rather than face their constituents. If those gentlemen were the only real champions of Canadian agriculture we might well cry out Lord help Canadian agriculture.

I do not wish to dispute the ruling of the Chair, but I do feel, so far as remarks which I made on the sugar question are concerned, that it must have been clear to every member of the house that I was about to touch a shoe which pinched very severely the members of the Conservative party and their record in days gone by. Not to carry that any further I will just say that I feel we ought to proceed even more rapidly along the lines of a well-considered tariff reduction. In that respect Canada has led the way in many lines, and she is leading the way to-day, although it may be very gradually, along the very lines which have been proposed in the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer). I really think myself, in face of the fact that Canada has a British preference with the West Indies and Australia, both sugar-producing countries, that my remarks should come within the bounds of this discussion upon the subamendment, but in view of the ruling of the Chair I shall not proceed any further along that line. In view of that ruling, I presume I am not allowed to do as the hon. gentleman who preceded me this afternoon has done. He devoted a great deal of his speech to the record of the financial administration of this government. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if I shall be in order in considering the financial record of the government any further?

Mr. MANION: Surely; it needs consideration. Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. The hon. gentlemen must address himself to the subamendment.

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): I am very much honoured to-night by the presence of so many ministers of the administration, and I am particularly glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in his place. It looks like old times with him back in the house, and I am sure that if the session continues we shall see a little more of the spirit which he used to exhibit in days gone by.

This debate has been rather lengthy, and it is not my intention to take up very much time, but coming as I do from a potato country, I may say that we had hoped for a budget that would give more relief to the labouring classes. In days gone by the great Liberal party always posed as the friend of the masses and not of the classes, but this budget has clearly demonstrated that the present administration have forgotten the policy which they formerly advocated in favour of the masses and the necessity for looking after their welfare.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in presenting his budget gave a catalogue of the so-called achievements of this government. To my mind this budget does not safeguard the interests either of agriculture or of industry. If anything has been done along that line, I fail to recognize it.

We imported from the United States last year something like 465,000 bushels of new potatoes, which came into competition with our own crop, and it looks as if this year would be a repetition of last year. Our present market for disposing of our potatoes is very poor. In my constituency, and I think this applies throughout Canada, the potato crop last year was a good one, but it has been very difficult indeed to find a market for it. If there is one thing lacking, it is adequate protection. When our farmers have a large crop, if something could be done by means of the tariff to stabilize the industry and enable the farmers to stand on their own feet, it should be done. I think the railways are to be commended for the special rates that they have put into effect. They acted promptly. In the St. John valley district both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National have done what they could to relieve the situation; they have reduced the freight rate to a certain extent. Along the Matapedia valley they have also reduced the rate by something like 25 per cent. While it is not really impressive from the standpoint of percentage reduction as compared with what was given in other districts, still I do not think we have very much cause to complain, because the crop in the Matapedia valley has been a very poor quality one, and it has been very difficult indeed for the people to get their potatoes to the market. However, I do feel that a little more protection would be better, and that we should not rest until we are at least "brick for brick", as the saying is, with the Americans. I believe we should take that course in the interests of our own people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the present time there is a great need in the country for better export and import traffic through the maritime ports. I think everyone will give credit to the administration for having done something along this line. I believe they have endeavoured to assist the ports of St. John and Halifax, and really have done something to put the National Transcontinental railway to some use. As we all recall, an enormous expenditure was made for the construction of that railway, I think upwards of $173,000,000, and if it can be put to work, if we can nationalize our ports in the maritime provinces and get our shipments through those ports—the administration have already started this movement and I trust they will see that it continues—it will be of tremendous advantage to the maritime provinces in particular and to Canada as a whole, for it will convince us that we must be self-dependent and stand on our own feet in this regard, particularly when we have at our command an excellent railway with a four-tenths per cent grade.

The Farm Loans Act was passed a couple of years ago, and we are anxiously waiting for the board to function. The province of New Brunswick has already enacted such legislation as is necessary in cooperation with the federal administration.

While in the past our ports have been developed and, as I say, to a certain extent encouragement has been given both to Halifax and St. John, the adoption of Halifax as a port of call for the White Star line was a move in the right direction. I believe it was only necessary to call the attention of the White Star management to the fact that they could utilize Halifax as well as Portland to cause them to make the test with the liner Regina. This turned out so satisfactorily that they at once determined to make Halifax a permanent port of call, and to discontinue Portland for this purpose, the latter port having hitherto been utilized by them for Canadian overseas traffic.

It is most regrettable, sir, to notice that recently the Montreal Corn Exchange persuaded the council of the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal to oppose strenuously the application to the Board of Railway Commissioners by the Halifax harbour commission and the maritime board of trade for a reduction of 35.5 cents to 19.34 cents per hundred pounds on grain for export over the all-rail route from Fort William, Port Arthur and Armstrong via the National Transcontinental railway to St. John and Halifax. The resolution passed by the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal was as follows:

Resolved, that the Montreal Corn Exchange Association urge the Council of the Montreal board of trade to strenuously oppose the application to the Board of Railway Commissioners by the Halifax harbour commissioners and the maritime board of trade for a reduction, from 35½ cents to 19.34 cents per 100 pounds, in the "all-rail" rate on grain from Fort William, Port Arthur and Armstrong, via the National Transcontinental Railway, to St. John and Halifax, for export, for the following reasons:

1. That the granting of the application would not increase the amount of grain handled through Canadian ports, for the reasons:

(a) That the export movement during the winter months (when lake and river navigation is closed) is actually conducted on the basis of "water and rail" rates, by reason of the great storage facilities established at Buffalo and Canadian bay ports, from which the winter requirements of the export grain trade are drawn and from which rates to the seaboard are equalized.

(b) That the all-rail rate applied for from Fort William and Port Arthur is considerably lower than that available via other routes to the Atlantic seaboard, i.e., water to Buffalo and rail to New York, or water to Georgian bay ports and rail to St. John and Halifax.

(c) That every seaport on the Atlantic in Canada and the United States is in competition, one with the other, and the rail carriers serving the different ports will not long permit any particular port to enjoy discriminatory freight rates.

2. That the only practical export rate basis which would be competitive with United States ports has been in effect to St. John and Halifax for a great many years, and any action which would upset this competitive rate basis would be fraught with the greatest possible danger.

3. That a reduction in the grain rate would seriously handicap the milling industry in Canada, especially those mills located west of Fort William.

4. That the ultimate result would be a serious loss of revenue to the Canadian railways and other transportation interests.

This old bogey, Mr. Speaker, that has been used many, many times, that the cut in the all-rail rate would mean retaliation on the part of the American railroads, is again to the front. The Montreal board of trade favours American ports at the expense of those of the maritime provinces. They also point out that the rate is lower than comparable rates to other ports. This is not wholly correct. At times, owing to fluctuations in lake rates, insurance charges and canal rates, this may occur, but only for short periods. The same old cry of retaliation was raised when the rate was lowered over the National Transcontinental to Quebec. What was the National Transcontinental railway built for? It cost the people of Canada upward of $173,000,000, and was built for the very purpose that the maritime board of trade is now urging. Apparently Montreal is not satisfied with handling the grain during the summer months, but when that port is frozen over during the winter they take the unpatriotic stand that it would be far better to patronize United States ports. Eighty-five per cent of the manufactured goods brought into the maritime provinces are supplied by Quebec and Ontario. I note with much satisfaction that the Toronto Globe is very fully in sympathy with the request made by the maritimes that the grain rate be reduced in order to give fair treatment to the ports of Halifax and St. John.

In that connection, sir, I may add that the city of Quebec at the present time is desirous of being included in the Atlantic region. As you are aware, Levis is included. Quebec now is seeking admission, and we only hope that the request will be granted, because we have much in common with the city of Quebec, and we trust that the Atlantic region will be extended on to the city of Montreal, where in our opinion it should be extended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to take up some other matters which are of interest not only to the people of my constituency, but I think to the government itself. First of all, I wish to deal with the Department of Public Works. Year after year in this house I have asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) to consider the construction of a post office in the city of Moncton. With a population of 22,000 the post office turns into the treasury over $1,000 a day net profit. The gross revenue was $482,578.82. After paying salaries to staff, postmaster, assistants, postmen, postal transfer agents at the Moncton depot, and allowing for contingencies to the extent of $1,741.13, there was a total expenditure of $116,300.98, leaving a net profit of $366,277.84. I think that record should commend itself to the minister. When you consider the dilapidated condition in which this building now stands, built forty or forty-five years ago, the unsanitary state of it and the unsatisfactory conditions generally under which the employees must work, it is very difficult indeed to think that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), with a treasury overflowing, should not be able to see his way clear to set aside one year's profits in order to construct a post office building in Moncton, a building which would really look like a post office and be a credit to the administration. I cannot stress too strongly the condition of that post office at the present time. There is one department for stamps and in another building money orders are sold, and so on; the various departments are so separated that it is exceedingly difficult, particularly with people who are not familiar with the operations of the office, for anyone to get service at all. I am asking the minister again to take the facts into account.

I would also direct his attention to the fact that at a place called Cape Bald, the fishermen at the present time are utilising a breakwater which has a T top on it, behind which they can go with their motor boats when storms are raging. That is the only place they have for shelter along a coast line of thirty five miles, and when a storm breaks they are obliged to put in there. They require an extension of 100 feet. This would cost only about $10,000 and the work should be undertaken. I am aware that considerable repairs are going on from year to year, and this has always been so with cement work in salt water. But this is a matter that should receive the minister's attention. We come to Ottawa and see the government spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in connection with a canal embankment, the work going on all winter, and we wonder therefore whether it is not possible for them to consider these weary fishermen who have to work their way along the shore in rough weather in an effort to find some shelter. If the minister would undertake the expenditure of $10,000 it would provide a shelter along the shore for these poor fishermen, and they and their families would greatly appreciate it. This is a humane proposal and I urge it upon the minister. I notice that in the city of Ottawa some very large expenditures are being made in connection with the work of the Federal District Commission. I wonder how the general public throughout Canada will like this. There are places in this Dominion where public buildings are in very poor condition to-day and where the public really require some assistance; they are looking for a do-something policy. Yet at the same time the Federal District Commission can spend $200,000 per annum. And who is benefitting by this expenditure? You are simply cutting a pathway, a strand, down through this portion of the city from Connaught place, and you have destroyed one of the best theatres in the city, the only place where a real opera could be presented. A very good hotel building has also been demolished. It seems to me that the government will have something to answer for when they go to the public, because the people, who are reading the papers carefully every day, are taking note of what is going on. Later on the government will be taken to task severely for the manner in which they are spending millions to-day, while they are failing to provide for the needs of the general public. I cannot understand a government going on with these enormous expenditures while the public is crying out for support for the vocational schools. What is the idea of starting to support these schools and then withdrawing your assistance? Is the same thing to be done later on with the old age pension system? After the system has been inaugurated, is the assistance to be withdrawn? Is it something of that nature? The people would like to know about these things. They would like to know whether the government are going to continue as they have been carrying on in the last few months.

I wish also to direct the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) to an important matter, and I am sorry that he is not in his place. To-day the government are carrying out a system of closing smaller customs houses. They have closed one in Kent county with the result that the people there are obliged to go into Westmorland county to do business. And now they are talking of closing the Shediac customs house. If they would appropriate the rake-off as between the man from whom they rent the building in Moncton and the original owner, they would have enough left to maintain the customs building in Shediac. I have not the figures at hand, but the government are paying something like $160 a month for the building to which I refer; they pay for so much floor space. Now the man who rents the building to the government pays to the man who owns the building something in the vicinity of $60; therefore he has $100 off the top. This is a situation which the government might look into with a view to providing the people of Shediac with a proper service. It does not cost more than $1,200 a year to maintain that service.

I regret that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) is not present. Ministers visit the maritime provinces when there is an election, and I do not know what keeps the hon. gentleman away. It has not been the custom in the past for the Minister of Railways to absent himself from that section of the country; as a rule, the Minister of Railways has visited the maritimes regularly. And particularly should a minister visit that part of the country to fix things up after making the statement that there are four things which the people of the maritime provinces do, namely: first, to be born; secondly, to get a free ride on the Intercolonial railway; thirdly, to get married; and in the fourth place to die. The minister on some occasions denies this but he is not denying it to-night. Now it is claimed that the Canadian National Railways are out of Politics. This government is paying its percentage towards the conduct of a labour bureau in Moncton. The government pays its share, the province of New Brunswick is paying its share, and the city of Moncton is doing likewise. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it would be absolutely impossible for a stenographer, a clerk or any ordinary clerical worker to obtain employment through that labour bureau; all such appointments must be made through the Liberal committee. I might say to the minister that there are other matters in connection with patronage into which I do not care to go to-night, but do not let him say that the Canadian National Railways are clear of politics.

I think without doubt the government of the day is the most extravagant government we have ever had in Canada. I have noticed statements by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that this is not an extravagant government and that they are practising economy, but I find that we have a tariff board which costs us $120,000 a year. The members of this board were not specially prepared for this work, and I think it is the opinion of the Minister of Finance that their findings are in accordance with their preparation. Then the government spent $542,000 for automobiles for one season; I hope they do not back into something

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to delay the house at this late hour; there are other matters which might be taken up but I do not wish to detain the house further to-night, so I will reserve my further remarks until the estimates are brought down.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to interject a word into the debate, if I may be permitted to do so, in order to ascertain from you just what interpretation we must place upon the rulings which have been made with reference to speeches delivered during the budget debate. I simply wish to call your attention to an apparent anomaly which seems to exist. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken discussed the affairs of the country generally, as he had a perfect right to do and for which I have no quarrel with him. However, I gather from your decision that having made this speech on the subamendment, as soon as that subamendment is voted down or otherwise dealt with, the hon. gentleman may rise again and discuss in a general way the government of the country. Then, the amendment having been disposed of, on the main motion he may make a similar speech, so we have this situation: A man who speaks towards the close of the debate on the subamendment may make three general speeches, whereas a man who speaks on the main motion at the beginning of the debate may speak only once. I must confess that I am somewhat mystified as to the course of jurisprudence in this matter, and for my own satisfaction and information and for the information of the members generally, I think it would be well if a definite rule were laid down as to just how many general speeches may be made during the budget debate.

My interpretation of your ruling may not be correct, sir, but I have discussed this matter with a number of my colleagues and they have come to the same conclusion. It would appear to me, therefore, that if we are to follow this practice there will be nothing to prevent any man who so desires from speaking for not 40 minutes but 120 minutes, and so the rule which we put into force some two years ago after so much study will be set at naught. For that reason I rise and interrupt the course of the debate, and while I do not expect you, Mr. Speaker, to give an answer immediately, I do urge that you and those who have to do with the conduct of this house endeavour to straighten out the matter so that it will be quite clear to all members of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last year I gave a ruling on that point, and that ruling was sustained by the house. I have consulted the highest authority in the realm, the Clerk of the English House of Commons, and he agrees with the ruling I gave. This evening I directed the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) to speak on the subject matter of the subamendment, because he had already spoken on the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

It is not so difficult to understand the ruling. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken made general reference to the policies of the government; he indulged in general criticism, and if he so wishes he is entitled to speak at another time on the amendment, but then he will have to speak directly to the amendment.

Mr. POWER: When the hon. member comes to speak on the main motion I have not the least doubt but that he will be able to discuss the affairs of the country generally, because if there is one thing which we do understand in the workings of our constitution it is that when the budget is brought down every member of parliament has a right to discuss all subjects which may be properly laid before parliament. So on two occasions at least the hon. gentleman would have the right to speak generally. I am not quarrelling with your decision, Mr. Speaker; on the contrary I am rather inclined to agree with it, but I wish to point out that if we are prepared to follow that practice we will set at naught the rule which we laid down two years ago that no member should speak more than forty minutes on one subject. I want to point out that the situation should be so cleared up that it may be understood perfectly by the members of the house that one speech on the budget, of whatever length, should be sufficient for any member.

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, before the debate is closed I would like to make a few remarks, although at this late date, after the great flow of oratory which has issued from the lips of the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the discussion, there is not very much left for me to say. Especially is that the case since the budget itself contains so little for us to consider.

While the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) contains a very glowing picture of Canada's prosperity as evidenced by the financial statement, and while it may give a large portion of Canada a feeling of satisfaction, I can assure the minister that it does not touch a responsive chord in the hearts of the people of the maritimes. They, as usual, have been practically ignored. The minister holds out no hope for the steel and coal industries, and it must seem very strange to the people of Canada, as I know it does to the people of the maritimes, that in the budget no mention is made of those two great industries.

In addition to this, not a word is said as to what the government will do with respect to the Duncan report. From the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) down the members of the government know very well that the Duncan report found in favour of the maritimes on some thirty counts, and this report was handed to the government in September of 1926. As a result, the absolutely unjust freight rates which then existed have been reduced and the government has carried out the recommendation of the commission in giving Nova Scotia a special annual subsidy of $875,000, to be paid until such time as the proper annual amount shall be arrived at. So far as I know, no effort has been made to arrive at that final sum which will be paid, not only to Nova Scotia, but to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. There does not seem to be any intention on the part of the government to do a single thing to put the Duncan report into effect in its entirety. That is a gross omission on the part of the Minister of Finance and it cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed.

It is a well known fact that the people of the maritimes have less of this world's wealth than the people in other parts of the Dominion. Nova Scotia was probably the most prosperous of the four provinces which originally entered into confederation. Their shipping brought them in great wealth. At that time the shipping tonnage in Nova Scotia was greater per capita than that of any other country in the world. In every village where shipbuilding was carried on beautiful homes were to be found, and other evidences of luxury were to be seen. The sea brought them wealth from every portion of the world. But those days are long past. Since 1867 conditions have changed entirely, and the maritimes have been steadily losing their population. Prince Edward Island has a smaller population to-day than in 1871, the date of the first census. In 1921 the population was over 20,000 less than in 1881. Since 1871 the population of the province of Nova Scotia has increased 35 per cent; in New Brunswick there has been an increase of 36 per cent, while Quebec has increased 100 per cent and Ontario 81 per cent. During the same period the population of Manitoba increased from 25,000 to 610,000, and that of British Columbia increased from 36,000 to 524,000. In 1901, Saskatchewan had a population of 91,279, which had grown to 757,510 in 1921, and the population of Alberta increased from 73,022 to 588,454. These figures show conclusively the situation in the maritimes as regards the relative growth of Canada. The average per capita wealth of the three maritime provinces is $1,443, while the average per capita wealth of the three prairie provinces is $3,259, or more than double. The figures for 1927 make the comparison between the maritimes and the Canadian west still worse.

In spite of these conditions the budget has nothing to say regarding the situation in the provinces which have suffered so much as a result of the union. This suffering is due to the fact that the contract made at that time has not been carried out. How can the government of this Dominion expect a virile people, nearly all of Anglo-Saxon and French-Canadian blood, to rest content under a treatment which is discriminating against them and reducing them to poverty? Justice has been refused in every direction. The budget holds out no hope for relief or fair dealing. Those who have will hold, and those who have not, that which they have shall be taken from them. Is this a treatment which a proud and patriotic people is expected to receive and submit to without protest? Let me assure this government that it is making a great mistake. The maritimes have no intention of being the outcast portion of the Dominion, nor will they submit forever to injustice.

The confederation agreement entered into in 1864, and later made effective by an imperial act, came into force on July 1, 1867.

The three factors which compelled this treaty and in consideration of which it was made were:

1. The necessity for defence.

2. The need for interprovincial trade once the union came into force, in order to hold the provinces together and give them a chance to live.

3. Transportation allied to both the first and second factors.

It was distinctly understood that the provinces must trade together, but that this could not be done with profit to the proposed railroad. Promises were made that Ontario in particular, as well as Quebec, would buy our coal, our fish, our manufactured goods, and our imports from the West Indies. Those provinces in turn would sell us foodstuffs, including flour, and so forth, and the meats which were then being bought exclusively in the United States. Hon. George Brown said that our coal was essential to the prosperity of Ontario; that they must have it if they were ever to manufacture. It was understood that when the connecting railroad was built it would be operated so that this interchange could be made at a profit. The fathers of confederation were all agreed that without interprovincial trade the provinces could not be held together.

One of the terms of confederation was that the trade of Canada should be carried on through the maritime ports during the winter period, not only the trade of the Canada of that day but of the Canada which they saw would exist when the great western prairies were taken into the union and developed. Had not those conditions been solemnly agreed upon, the British North American provinces would never have been united. Unless the maritime provinces could sell their products in western Canada, and unless the traffic of Canada came through the maritime ports, then their position in the union would be hopeless. This was acknowledged; hence the agreement.

That agreement has never been kept. As yet, Ontario has not purchased our coal in any quantity, and it is only recently that she has been buying some of our fish. Why? Because the freight rates have been so high that it made the business impossible. This has been a violation of the terms of the union. If, on account of the transport charges, maritime coal cannot be sold in Ontario or Quebec in competition with American coal, we have the right to have the freight rates cut to a point where business can be carried on. The same principle applies to our fish and the other products enumerated in the schedule. Why should they not be carried at a low rate when the great waterway system, developed at a cost of $400,000,000, is made free, not only to Canadian traders but to the people of the United States? Are the people of the United States to be used better than your brother Canadians? Are the children of the people of the maritime provinces to be driven to the United States in thousands because the rest of Canada will not implement its solemn contract, while at the same time you can give far better terms to the people of the United States who wish to use our trade routes? This discrimination has been going on for fifty years, and until the last few months there has been no attempt made on the part of the people of the rest of Canada to keep this agreement. Is it any wonder the people of the maritimes are enraged and are not in a mood to continue to live here under such humilitating conditions?

The same reasoning applies to the export business. It is not necessary to tell the members of the house about the enormous traffic which finds its way down through the United States to the Atlantic seaboard. Under our treaty rights that traffic should pass through the maritime ports. Again the matter is one of freight rates. Make proper export rates and these two Atlantic ports will thrive as Montreal has done. These statements are not hearsay: they are matters of history and they are confirmed by the Duncan report.

It is not in the interests of Canada that the maritimes should deteriorate as they have been doing for years. We should have our great national ports on the Atlantic and the Pacific and we should not be dependent, as we are to-day, on the United States for our transportation. Canada should be self-contained and should be mistress of her own destinies. We thought the transportation problem had been finally settled when Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought down his transcontinental proposal in 1904.

It is only fair to state that during the last year or so the port of Halifax has been beginning to come into its own. Canada knows the value that this port was to the empire in those fateful years, 1914 to 1919. It was a great port in time of war; it should be an equally great port in time of peace. It has the treaty right. There should be no more bickering over freight rates. Under the terms of the treaty the rates must be made so that trade can be carried on. It is not a matter for the railway board; it is a treaty matter, one in which the honour of Canada is involved.

In a country where protection of our vital industries has been adopted and practised by both political parties since 1878, a full half century, our coal and steel industries, on which the future of Cape Breton island and the maritimes depends, have been so sadly neglected that their treatment constitutes a political crime. If justice were done there would be 100,000 people profitably employed to-day in the coal, iron and steel trade of Cape Breton island. That is the considered opinion of men well able to judge. Can the members of this house realize what this would mean to the maritime provinces and the rest of Canada? Why should the great industries of the maritimes receive the treatment they have received when the great manufacturers of the other portions of Canada are so amply protected? Where are the coking plants that were to make it possible for our miners to raise more coal? The ones in existence are fed by United States coal while our miners suffer. I might at this point quote from a local paper as follows:

> In the session of 1927, parliament passed the Domestic Fuel Act in line with this recommendation—"An act to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada.

A few weeks ago an Ottawa despatch to this local paper gave the answer made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to a question raised by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), as follows:

> No payments have been made by the Dominion government during the fiscal year 1928-29 by way of bounty on Canadian coal used in the production of coke in coke ovens situated in Halifax, Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Hamilton, or in any other Canadian coke oven plants.

The article commented on this as follows:

> This confirms the worst fears of the people of this province. The Duncan report, as it relates to the question of coking plants, has not been implemented. And apart from the new plant of the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company in the city of Halifax, we know of no Canadian plant proposing to take advantage of the provisions of the Domestic Fuel Act.

Why is it that this Atlantic province cannot get a square deal and fair treatment? When we see foreign people treated better than ourselves who have borne the burden in the heat of the day, who have helped to develop this Dominion and who have seen our sons and daughters leave by the thousands to find opportunities in more prosperous lands, those of us who remain become embittered and wonder whether there is any justice in Canada. Every little while we are asked to put our hands into our pockets with the rest of Canada in order to develop new trade routes like the Hudson Bay railway, or the deep waterway system through Ontario and Quebec, or the huge railroad development from the Peace river or other portions of the west to Prince Rupert or elsewhere. while any demands we may make by which we may prosper are treated with coolness. Let the contract of 1867 be carried into effect in the spirit as well as in the letter of the law, and the people of Canada will see the maritimes prosper beyond their belief and become a great asset to this young and growing nation. Give us the freight rates that are necessary to make trade possible, that we were promised; give us a square deal regarding the tariff and others matters, and you need not have any fear regarding the future of the maritimes; it will be a country well worth living in.

While money has been spent like water for development in every part of Canada except the maritimes, our fishermen are left to drift to the United States and to sail in Gloucester ships. These fishermen are the hardiest and finest type of men that exist in any corner of the world. Every fisherman must be a hardy, brave man; one who is not cannot be a fisherman. These men leave in the very early morning and go out twenty or thirty miles to sea in small boats; they never know what weather they will have before they return home. If they are not provided with proper breakwaters, harbours and lights, they cannot follow their vocation. But still we hear a shout of merriment go up when the estimates come down for wharves, breakwaters and dredging in these little harbours, while the whole vote would not make chicken feed for the men who have those great contracts for canal construction, the Hudson Bay development and smaller works all over Canada. We have lost thousands of fishermen during the last twenty years and we stand to lose many more unless there is a wonderful change in this seat of the mighty at Ottawa. What policy has the government adopted to keep these fishermen at home? Has it a policy to-day? Has it fulfilled and implemented the Duncan report recommending the appointment of a minister of fisheries? Until a minister of fisheries is appointed and the whole system of fisheries is reorganized and placed upon a better basis than it is at present, our fishermen must remain in the same state.

Finally, the Duncan report has set forth the things that the maritimes have a right to have. It has made its recommendations, and except for two or three matters nothing has been done. It seems that nothing will ever be done without another convulsion, and I am fully assured that the next convulsion which arises in the maritimes will be a much more serious one than that which occurred in 1925. We expect the Duncan report to be implemented in full. We expect that the maritimes will be put upon a fair and equitable basis with the rest of Canada. That is all we ask, and less than that we shall not be willing to accept. That we demand and we want redress without delay. Probably our people are to blame for their negligence in not pressing their demands far more actively than they have done, but the government may rest assured that the maritimes are awake to-day; that they intend to secure these things that are rightfully theirs; that they will never be satisfied until they achieve these results and, furthermore, that they do not intend to wait another sixty years before justice is meted out to them.

Before I close I wish to summarize some of our demands. My desire is not to criticise every little matter with which I do not agree in the budget speech. I wish, however, to emphasize those things in which our provinces are vitally interested. You have been told, Mr. Speaker, how the population has decreased, and that the per capita wealth of our people is much less than one-half of that of all the west of Canada and just one-third that of Saskatchewan. Those two facts alone should be enough to warrant the government in having something important to state as to their policy towards the maritimes.

The terms made in 1867 regarding transportation have been deliberately and intentionally violated for half a century. If our provinces, and especially Nova Scotia, were to have their claims adjusted from the time they came into confederation, as has been promised Manitoba, it would take a large slice of the national revenue to compensate them for their tremendous losses. Our greatest loss, however, is in the loss of our native-born population. Hon. gentlemen know how well the natives of these provinces have done when they have gone afield. Members from our prairie provinces, I feel sure, will endorse my statement that the maritimers who have gone to the west are a very valuable factor in their population. It is acknowledged that they have done a great deal toward the upbuilding of the United States.

Look at the port of Halifax. It was expressly stated by Sir John A. Macdonald that that city should be one of the great emporiums of the world. Sir George-Etienne Cartier went further and stated that the traffic between Halifax and Liverpool would look like a ferry across the Atlantic once the traffic of Canada was directed through the port of Halifax. Until the last two years, however, one-half the time our harbour was almost without a sail or a smokestack. The fact that this wonderful natural port, which requires so little to make it the greatest port in the world, has been neglected now for over fifty years, is one of the things that anger the citizens of Nova Scotia. They know they were deceived. The promises made respecting this development were positive and definite. It was agreed that the trade developing in Canada, passing across the Atlantic during the winter period, must come through Halifax or St. John. That was one of the conditions of confederation.

The conditions of the coal trade need not be referred to. There again definite promises were made which, if carried into effect, would have made the mines of Cape Breton a hive of industry. More American coal is used in Ontario twice over than is produced in Nova Scotia. This, we are told, is a matter of freight rates. The freight rates can be so adjusted that business can be done. This trade was promised, but the steel industry is languishing because it cannot get fair treatment at the hands of parliament.

When we look, Mr. Speaker, at our ruined industries, our neglected ports, our half-developed coal fields, we see a monument to the injustice of the federal government. We see the trade of Canada steadily directed towards the United States. We see our resources gradually falling into their hands. A change must be made, and a change will be made I hope in the very near future. Our natural resources and our raw materials must be kept at home for our own people to develop, and I am sure that if that were done, we would have our young men and women, who are educated by the Canadian ratepayers, staying at home and building up their own country, instead of, as they are doing now, helping to build up a foreign country. So I say Mr. Speaker, let everyone in this fair country of ours have for his motto, "Canada for Canadians."

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I would be very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to support the subamendment but for two or three things. The subamendment in principle would perhaps be acceptable to me if it were slightly amended. It now reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:
> "urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

I presume that the object of the mover and the seconder of this subamendment is to help the people in the prairie provinces, and

I am quite agreeable to that. We in British Columbia are very much interested in the welfare of the prairie provinces. When they have good crops and get good prices for them, we directly reap the benefit of that in British Columbia. The prosperity of British Columbia is very much tied up with the prosperity of the prairies. We are their Pacific seaport. We get many of their people when they have made enough money to retire or desire a change of climate, and we are very glad to have them. We therefore certainly do not wish to do anything that would hurt the people of the prairie provinces.

It seems to me that the wording of the subamendment might be changed a little. In the first place, it proposes that all the material words in the amendment be stricken out. That, of course, is something to which I cannot agree because the amendment sets out the policy of our party, and I think all the members of the Conservative party in this house are solidly behind the amendment. We therefore could not consistently vote for a subamendment which strikes out all the words of our own amendment. If instead of striking out the words of our amendment, the subamendment had been added to the amendment, then I think I could have voted for it except for one reason.

I am quite in favour of increasing our trade with the other nations of the empire. I think we do not do enough business now within our own family, as it were, in this great empire of ours. I think that Canada could afford to do more business with our sister nations of the empire, could afford to buy more goods from them, and to sell more goods to them. We all know what has been accomplished by the empire marketing board, which is being financed very largely by the people of the old country. As a result of the work which they have already done, the trade between the dominions and the mother country within the past three years has been very largely increased, and particularly is that true of the mother country, because year by year in the last three years she has purchased very greatly increasing quantities of the products of the dominions of the empire. I would be very glad indeed to see any resolution passed which would tend toward increasing Canada's trade with the empire, and I would therefore suggest adding to the words of the subamendment, after "as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations" the words "of the British Empire." If we had the amendment to the amendment in that shape, I think I could support it. As a matter of fact, I might go so far as to say that personally, and speaking only for myself I would like to see some form of reciprocity among the countries within the empire if it could be worked out. I think it would be a good thing all round; the empire would be self-contained in every way, and we here in Canada would not have to be at all concerned with any tariff changes that might be made by the United States or any other country. At the present time, of course, we are looking with some degree of concern towards certain tariff changes which might be made in the United States. That is their business, and we have no right to criticize any changes they may make, but similarly we have a right to look after ourselves.

I notice also that Japan only recently has increased her tariff, and some of those tariff changes are aimed directly at business which is at present being done by Canada with Japan and by the United States with Japan. I am referring particularly to the lumber industry. The Japanese representatives have said that the reason for making these tariff changes is to assist the lumber industry of Japan, that there is no attempt on their part to attack any of the other nations or to injure them in any way, but that they are making these changes in a spirit of self-preservation, to build up their own timber industry again. We cannot object to that.

I think that the great majority of the people of British Columbia, irrespective of their political leanings, are in favour of the amendment which has been moved in this debate. Someone has said that the tariff is a matter of geography. That may be so. So far as British Columbia is concerned I have only to point out that in the last Dominion election the people of that province sent to this house twelve members of the Conservative party as against one member of the government party, and that one member happened to be a minister of the crown, which, of course, gave him a little higher standing.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course they have seen their mistake since.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have been very sorry for it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I may say that at the next general election that lonely Liberal representative will be missing, for he had a very narrow majority at the last election. There must be some reason for this practically unanimous Conservative representation, because it cannot be supposed that the people of British Columbia are not capable of intelligently judging the issues presented to them in the election campaigns. I will tell you the reason—the tariff. British Columbia is in favour of a fair measure of protection for its agriculturists and industrialists. I represent about 65,000 people. They are industrial and agricultural. I presume that I have more farmers in my constituency than are represented by any other member from British Columbia. Of course my constituency is one of the best in the province. I have been sent back here four times with large majorities. At the last election I got over a thousand votes more than in the previous election. In every campaign I have preached more than anything else protection for our farms and our industries. And that is what the people out there want. My farming community borders on the United States. We have a main, paved highway running down into the United States, and our farmers every day see coming over that highway large truck loads of the products of the farms south of the boundary line. So they know how their market is being interfered with.

Now, you may turn up statistics and tell me: Yes, but we get a comparatively small amount of those products from the United States. But please remember that just across the line from us they have a very great advantage climatically; they are two or three weeks ahead of us. Consequently they can bring in their products that much ahead of our products and get the cream of our market. That is occurring every year. Our farmers know it, and they do not like it. We as their representatives have been urging on the government for many years the necessity of at least equalizing our tariff with that of the United States. Nearly everything that is produced in British Columbia is unfairly treated by the United States tariff. I do not propose to go over the whole list, although I have it before me and if desired shall be happy to put it on Hansard. Let me refer particularly to some of the chief products of the farm. For instance, butter: the Canadian tariff is four cents a pound, the United States tariff, twelve cents a pound. Eggs: the Canadian tariff is three cents a dozen; United States tariff, eight cents a dozen. Hay: the Canadian tariff is two dollars per ton of 2,000 pounds; the United States tariff, four dollars a ton of 2,240 pounds. What does this mean? That it pays the Americans to send their products into the British Columbia markets and pay only a very small duty; whereas if our farmers desire to get into the Seattle market, for instance, the tariff practically debars them.

Many times I have had occasion to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to these items. It is said "he knows his onions, and is very familiar with other varieties of vegetables" but he does not seem to recognize the necessity of giving the people of Canada a fair deal. He simply throws up his hands and says, Oh, we cannot do anything at the present time. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) is kinder to us, and when he was out in British Columbia the last time he told the people that so far as he was concerned he would like to see the tariff on those items equalized. Well, if something of the kind is not done the people of British Columbia will not send a single Liberal to represent them in this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about the prosperity of the Dominion. I am not going to say that conditions are not prosperous in British Columbia. But in some lines we are not doing as well as we might. For example, we are producing a lot of eggs. My experience has been that the poultrymen of British Columbia are not making even a reasonable living from their poultry. We have some very large poultry farms in the province. Recently the poultry farmers formed a pool, and I notice that in a press report of a meeting held at New Westminster the other day those present owned 771,000 hens. It must be remembered that there were no more Conservatives at the meeting than there were Liberals, but they passed a unanimous resolution demanding that the tariff on eggs be equalized. As to beef cattle, our herds have been decreasing from time to time until now we do not produce as many beef cattle as we did a few years ago. The reason is lack of proper protection. I could go over the list with practically the same result. I do not think the protection we want is going to hurt the farmers on the prairies. I think gradually they will come to see that the policy of the Conservative party is not only the best for Canada as a whole but the best for themselves. I am confident that as the years go by we shall find that the prairie farmer wants protection just as much as the farmer in British Columbia, that is, when he goes in more for mixed farming. He is doing that already and he is noticing that he needs protection. I might point out another thing. When any of these prairie farmers remove to British Columbia they immediately change their ideas about the tariff and come out and support the Conservative party; a good many of them have done that for me in the elections in which I have been a candidate. As I said before, we should not spend as much money in the United States as we do. I am not going into the figures; they have been repeated here time after time. But the fact remains that we buy a great deal more from the United States than they buy from us, and the proportion seems to be increasing rather than decreasing. The people of the United States are business people, and they would take no exception to our putting the tariff of this country on such a basis as we might consider necessary to protect the Canadian people. As a matter of fact, I think they rather make fun of us for the weak-kneed stand we are taking at the present time. I have spoken to several former residents of the United States and they complain that the tariff of Canada has not been rectified.

I have mentioned a few items. I have another one in connection with dressed lamb. This is a resolution from the British Columbia Wool Growers' Association. That is not a Conservative organization, but at its annual meeting held on March 6 of this year it passed the following resolution:

> Be it resolved that the Canada Dumping Act, customs regulations thereunder, and other related acts if any which in their present form cannot be invoked to bring relief in this and other similar situations confronting the producers of agricultural products in British Columbia be so amended, at the earliest possible moment, in order that they may be applied whenever conditions warrant it. It is urgently suggested that when amendments are enacted they provide for the application of duties on an ad valorem basis.

In British Columbia we are very much interested in mines. I am afraid there has been perhaps too much speculation in mining stocks lately, and in that connection I think possibly the Department of Mines might do something more than it has been doing. I quite appreciate the work that has been done. I appreciate also the fact that the Deputy Minister of Mines is a very capable official, and other officials of the department are doing their best. But it is necessary for the government first to adopt a policy. There are too many wildcats in this country, and so far as I can see the government is doing nothing to discourage people from putting their money into wildcat propositions. I think it is quite necessary that mining stock should be sold on the markets of this country, as otherwise we should not be able to get the money requisite for the developing of the mines of Canada. At the same time, I do not think it is right that stocks and shares should be sold when they have nothing behind them. I do not think it should be possible for any company to put on the market stock behind which there is only a hole in the ground. The government in its annual report should, after proper investigation, expose all those wildcats which they are able to discover and locate. Something should also be done to assist prospectors. There can be no doubt that the mines which we know of in Canada at the present time do not represent a very large fraction of the mines which might be discovered. I have on other occasions urged on the government that something should be done to assist prospectors, to grubstake prospectors if you like. I know that is done in other countries, and I know it has been very successful. I would therefore suggest that the Department of Mines might do something in that direction.

In British Columbia we are also greatly interested in the fisheries. Last year the fisheries of British Columbia in the coastal waters represented some $27,000,000, or about half of the total revenue from fisheries in the whole of Canada. But the fishing industry of British Columbia is not in very good shape at the present time. Some of our varieties have become extinct. For instance, we had the sturgeon, a fish that produced a lot of revenue at one time. That fish when mature weighs from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds, and it would sell at 8 cents a pound. Large quantities of sturgeon were caught in British Columbia waters, but there are practically none there at the present time. They are all gone. Then the salmon of British Columbia are also becoming depleted. On the Fraser river, which was a few years ago the greatest salmon river in the world, one of the main runs, the sockeye run, has become practically extinct. In 1913 on the Fraser river alone they packed over 800,000 cases of sockeye salmon; last year they packed about 29,000. With sockeye salmon worth about $16 a case you see what the loss has been to the country. It seems to me that the Minister of Fisheries should take an interest in the British Columbia fisheries. I do not think the present minister has done so. So far as I am aware, he has made no survey of the British Columbia fisheries. I do not think he has ever been along the coast of British Columbia; I do not think he has ever been on the Fraser river; I do not think he has ever shown any interest at all in our fisheries; and I think I am safe in saying that the Minister of Fisheries has never attended a meeting of the marine and fisheries committee. That is all wrong, and I trust that if this government appoints a minister of fisheries it will appoint a man who knows something about fisheries, a man who will at least take some interest in the industry. Possibly I should not blame the present minister too much, because he is also Minister of Marine, which is a very large department in itself; and it is possible that by reason of his duties as Minister of Marine he has not had any time to devote to fisheries.

I have mentioned salmon; there is also the halibut. Halibut as well is becoming depleted. The halibut fisheries of British Columbia are very important, and you need not accept my own statement that there is a very marked depletion in those fisheries. If you care to look up the reports of the joint international committee, formed some three or four years ago, you will find that their last report calls attention to the very serious depletion of the halibut fisheries on the Pacific coast. I do not suppose the Minister of Fisheries would know the difference between a halibut and a salmon; I believe we should have some one as Minister of Fisheries who knows something about these matters and who will take an interest in his department.

I have mentioned sturgeon, salmon and halibut, and in addition we have the whale fisheries. That is an important industry as well, and those fisheries are becoming depleted also. There are a great many matters to engage the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and I think it would be proper to appoint such a minister from British Columbia, or at least we should have a man who would take an intelligent interest in this work.

We have our cabinet minister from British Columbia in the person of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. King, Kootenay). I think I can say that the minister has been paying a good deal of attention to the matter of pensions, but I am afraid the government is not so liberal as it might be in dealing with persons claiming pensions. I believe it is the desire of this house, and that desire has been evidenced whenever the matter has been up for discussion, that liberal treatment should be accorded the men who served overseas or to the dependents of such men, but I am afraid that the policy of this government or of the officials who are looking after that work is rather to keep such men from getting pensions if possible. I have come to that conclusion as the result of a number of cases which have been brought to my personal attention. I must say that whenever I have gone to the minister, as I have done in a number of cases, he has done the best he could under the circumstances and has adjusted some cases, but still I think there is room for improvement in that department.

However, I wish to deal more particularly with the Department of Health. I do not believe that department is doing very much to justify its existence, and in fact I do not know what it is doing that is of very great benefit to the country in comparison to the amount of money expended. I am afraid the government is not very considerate of the patriotic men and women who are trying to do work which really should be cared for by the government, and in this connection there are two organizations to which I would like to refer. The first is the Victorian Order of Nurses, and I think it is unnecessary for me to detail the important work done by that association. I need only say that one of their objects is to provide nursing service to poor people who otherwise would not get it, and they are carrying on that work in a great many cities and districts throughout Canada. They are enabled to carry on largely through contributions which they receive from private individuals, and the government assists them only to the extent of a grant of $10,000.

Then there is another similar organization, the Canadian Red Cross Society, which is doing a wonderful work in connection with the health of the Canadian people. That society cooperates with the government; I believe it takes care of all the immigrants who come into Canada. Up to and including last year it cared for some 130,000 immigrants, and it is estimated that this year will bring the total up to some 200,000. That organization has forty outposts throughout Canada and does a magnificent work, but it receives no grant at all from this government. Applications for such a grant have been made time after time without result, and I think it is a crying shame and disgrace to Canada that the government should be so parsimonious with regard to such an important matter.

There is also another question which is engaging the attention of the people of Canada; I refer to full time health units. I have before me a copy of a resolution which I have received from a great many women's organizations in British Columbia, as follows:

> Whereas it is expedient that the control of communicable diseases, and of maternal and infant mortality in childbirth, as well as the medical inspection of school children throughout the smaller towns and villages and rural areas of the Dominion of Canada should be made more efficient;
> And whereas the most satisfactory method of securing this result has been demonstrated in the province of British Columbia and Quebec and in many of the states of the United States of America, to be by the establishment of county or district health units in rural areas, such health units consisting of a full time medical health officer, sanitary inspector, public health and school nurses, and a secretary in charge of the clerical work;
> And whereas such units at present established are financed by half the cost thereof being borne by the local districts, one-quarter by the province in which the district is situated, and one-quarter by the Rockefeller Foundation;

And whereas the grants from the Rockefeller Foundation are of a temporary nature for a period of three years only;

Be it therefore resolved that the government of the Dominion of Canada, through the Minister of National Health of the Dominion, be requested to provide for financial assistance to the provinces of the Dominion in the same manner as is at present provided for the control of venereal diseases, to the extent of one-quarter of the cost of maintaining such local health units and thus assume permanently the portion of the cost of such units covered by the temporary grants from the Rockefeller Foundation.

I notice also that the Canadian Council of Agriculture has adopted a resolution along the same lines. That is something which might be taken up, and I hope the minister will seriously consider it.

Now, to change the subject, there is another matter to which I would like to refer, and that is the absence of an airport in the vicinity of Vancouver. This is urgently required. The government will do nothing to assist in establishing that airport, and I think it is making a mistake. It would be a great asset to Canada and is something which is absolutely necessary. I regret also to learn that the government does not propose to extend the air mail this year to the Pacific coast. An air mail over the mountains would be a great convenience and I think it would form one of the most important units of the system. The government should consider the matter and decide to continue the air service to the British Columbia coast.

I am very much pleased to note in connection with the Canadian National Railways that it is proposed to do certain development work in the vicinity of New Westminster. I congratulate the government, or perhaps I should say the Canadian National Railways, for adopting that program. I believe they are interested in New Westminster as a port because there is a saving to them of one cent per bushel on the grain shipped through that port. There is no argument about that; that is admitted. No grain coming over the Canadian National railways should be shipped through Vancouver at all. That may seem a rash statement, but the fact is that they do not enter Vancouver over their own tracks.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PASSES

Mr. GOTT:

1. How many annual or trip passes were issued by the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Railways and Canals to other than employees of the Canadian National Railways, other railways' employees, senators, members of the House of Commons and their families, excluding all passes legally issued to government employees, during the year 1928?

2. To whom were passes issued?

3. What was the occupation of those to whom passes were issued?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. No annual or trip passes are issued by the Canadian National Railways, or the Department of Railways and Canals, other than those permitted by section 345 of the Railway Act; section 31, subsection 4, of the Immigration Act and section 70, subsection 3, of the Customs Act.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

NOTE.—The law in respect to passes applies equally to all Canadian railways and any discretion in the application of the general statute rests with the Board of Railway Commissioners under the Railway Act, and not with any railway, or department of the government.

The Act provides that records be kept of all free or reduced rate transportation and quarterly returns of all passes issued are made to the Board of Railway Commissioners, whose duty it is to examine such returns with a view to seeing that the law is observed. In addition, representatives of the board visit regional and district headquarters of all railways and make an annual audit of the stubs of all passes issued.

*Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is there a reduced rate of railway fares on the Canadian National Railways for civil servants or is such reduced rate or pass confined only to deputy ministers?

2. What are the names and present salaries of officials enjoying rank of deputy minister who have benefited by such reduced fare or pass, and what is the amount in money of such special benefit in each case?

3. How many heads of families in the department of the deputy ministers referred to in question 2, receive a salary of less than $100 per month?

Mr. DUNNING: With reference to this question, there appears to be an impression in the mind of the hon. member that with regard to railway transportation there is some difference as between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific and other railways in Canada. I should like to make it quite clear that there is no such difference; all railways in Canada coming under the jurisdiction of the Railway Act are responsible to the railway commission with respect to transportation. In this respect the Canadian National Railways do not differ in the slightest degree from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I submit that it is rather objectionable to ask for information with respect to one of the railway companies under the jurisdiction of a common tribunal. It would appear to convey the idea that something is being done by one of these companies which is not according to the law.

With respect to the question generally, it will involve a very great deal of work; it might be required to stand as an order for return, but perhaps the hon. member would desire to give consideration to what I have said and let the question stand in the meantime.

Mr. SPENCER: In view of the explanation given by the minister I will be very glad to drop this question for the time being.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES

Mr. PRICE:

1. What amount has been paid for injury received in the service by the compensation board of New Brunswick to Canadian National Railways' employees during the past fiscal year ending March 31, 1928?

2. Under what conditions are claims awarded by the compensation board withheld from Canadian National Railways' employees?

3. Are skilled mechanics required to accept unskilled employment when the award of the compensation board is above a certain amount? If so, what is the amount?

4. Did the management of the Canadian National Railways mechanical department at Moncton instruct certain mechanics that their acceptance of awards allowed by the compensation board for injury would require them to revert to labourers' employment and pay?

5. Is the department aware that Fidele LeBlanc and Philbert Girouard, machinists in the employ of the Canadian National Railways at Moncton, who were awarded $1,245 and $1,250 respectively, have been informed that compensation in accordance with the findings of the board will be allowed them, only upon their agreement to accept unskilled labourers' employment with reduced pay during their future years of service?

6. What action, if any, will the department take about this matter?

Mr. DUNNING:

Fatal cases, awards..	$ 21,122 04
Permanent partial disability..	7,049 27
Temporary total disability..	33,433 83
Hospital surgical and medical fees..	3,141 55
Total..	$ 64,746 69

2. None are withheld.

3. No. A man's employment after injury depends entirely upon his capacity to perform.

4. No.

5. With reference to LeBlanc, this man was injured on June 16, 1921, through having his left hand caught between two driving wheels, resulting in the loss of his thumb and first finger and permanent injury to his second finger. In October, 1921, the compensation board awarded him $1,237.50, payable in monthly instalments of $20 each. Upon his return to work his immediate foreman was of the opinion that by reason of the injury received his ability and efficiency had been reduced 20 per cent and instructions were issued to demote him from the position of stripper to a machinist's helper. LeBlanc made a strong plea that he be permitted to retain his old position, stating that if this were done he would waive the award. This was agreed to and he was retained at his original work.

No award was made in the case of Philbert Girouard.

6. All such matters are dealt with by the management and the men, either personally, or through their organizations. Action by the department is, therefore, not necessary.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—OFFICE CLEANERS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. How many women who are office cleaners at the House of Commons are widows?

2. What are the working hours of these women?

3. Are they allowed any wages in time of sickness? If so, how much?

4. What is the monthly wage?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. 46.

2. 6.30 a.m. to 8.45 a.m.

3. Yes, if doctor's certificate is supplied. Up to 4 days.

4. $1.25 per diem.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. LUCHKOVICH:

1. How many members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who belong to the mounted service proper, apart from the non-mounted service, formerly known as the Dominion Police, are stationed east of Port Arthur, Ontario?

2. How many horses for this service are maintained east of Port Arthur?

3. What was the total cost for the year 1927-28: (a) for mounted men, as to salary, allowances or other charges; (b) for horses; (1) as to the total cost of horses; (2) as to the cost of equipment; (3) as to the cost of fodder; and (4) as to the cost of stabling?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The following are answers to the above questions, as far as I understand it:—

1. There is no specially mounted service proper, but there are 173 members of the R.C.M. police stationed east of Port Arthur, exclusive of "A" division, Ottawa, formerly known as the Dominion Police.

2. 31.

3. "a". As stated in No. 1, there is no specially mounted service east of Port Arthur. All are taught to ride, and do so when required on duty in the public interest.

"b". $5,478.07.

1. Answered by "b" above.

2. $844.57.

3. $3,571.

4. Nil.

BEAUHARNOIS LIGHT HEAT AND POWER COMPANY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the directors of the Beauharnois Light, Heat & Power Company?

2. What security has the government secured as to the performance of their contract in permit issued under the Navigable Waters Act or as to bona fides of this company?

3. What consideration has been given the government for permit issued?

4. Who is to indemnify any navigation interests for any damage sustained as a result of said works sanctioned of this company?

5. Who is to settle for any damages accruing to the Cedar Rapids Company, the Soulanges Power Company, Canadian Light, Heat & Power Company, or others with vested rights infringed on by this permit?

6. Have any protests as yet been received by the government from either the United States government or the government of the state of New York, as to claiming damages for breaches of the Washington treaty or Boundary Waterways treaty by the granting of this permit?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. No information.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The usual statutory requirements have been observed and the site and plans have been approved subject to conditions set out in the order in council tabled. Agreement covering conditions contained in order-in council has not yet been executed.

6. No.

L'ARCHEVEQUE HARBOUR, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton):

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Public Works to remove the over-casting left in the middle of L'Archeveque harbour, Nova Scotia, two or three years ago while dredging at that point?

2. What was the total amount of money expended on dredging at this point in the years 1925, 1926 and 1927?

3. Will the government bring down an itemized account showing the various individuals or firms to whom the above-mentioned money was paid?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. No dredging has been done at L'Archeveque on departmental account since 1924. No representations have been made concerning removal of material overcast in basin.

2. Nil.

3. Answered by No. 2.

CONFEDERATION BUILDING, OTTAWA

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. What department of the government undertakes the supervision of the construction of Confederation building, Wellington street, Ottawa, for which Lyall Company are the contractors?

2. What are the names of officials who have charge of this work for the department?

3. If not supervised by any department, what are the names and addresses of supervisors, and what remuneration do they receive for this work?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Department of Public Works.

2. This work is under the direction of the chief architect, T. W. Fuller.

3. Messrs. Campbell & Shepherd, Northern Ontario Building, Toronto, are supervising and providing inspection services for this work as agents for the Department of Public Works at a commission of $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MUSKOKA-ONTARIO POSTMASTERSHIPS

Mr. SIMPSON (For Mr. McGibbon):

For a copy of all correspondence between the Post Office Department, the Civil Service Commission, and any other person or persons, in connection with the dismissal of the postmasters at Rathburn, Uffiington, and Torrance. Also a copy of all similar correspondence and documents in connection with the filling of positions of postmasters at Utterson and Rossclair.

OLIVER, B.C., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. STIRLING:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. D. P. Simpson, the postmaster at Oliver, British Columbia, and the subsequent examination held by the Civil Service Commission as a result of which J. K. Anderson was informed that he was the successful contestant, including all recommendations, reports, memoranda and communications passing between the Civil Service Commission and the Postmaster General and any of his staff.

CHAS. A. PINCOMBE

Mr. JONES:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, documents and other papers with regard to the dismissal of Charles A. Pincombe, of Connors, New Brunswick, from his position in the National Revenue department of the public service.

[Mr. Elliott.]

MOTOR AND PLEASURE BOATS

Mr. SIMPSON (For Mr. McGibbon):

For a copy of all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Muskoka Lakes Association, or any other body in connection with taxing motorboats, canoes, etc., in the Muskoka lakes.

SIMCOE, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. GEARY (For Mr. Stewart, Leeds):

For a copy of all recommendations, memoranda, reports, or communications of the Civil Service Commission, in any way relating to the appointment of either George E. Whitaker or Charles R. Bowyer to the office of postmaster at Simcoe, Ontario.

REJECTIONS UNDER CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a return showing the names of persons appointed by the Civil Service Commission who have been rejected under section 24 of the Civil Service Act, in each department, for the last three years, with reason for the rejection in each case.

ST. JOHN-QUEBEC RAILWAY

Mr. MacLAREN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents whatsoever during the last twelve months between the government of the province of New Brunswick or any minister or official thereof, and the government of the Dominion of Canada or any minister or official thereof respecting the sale of the Saint John-Quebec railway. (Valley railroad.)

PORT ARTHUR AND FORT WILLIAM PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. COWAN:

Mr. COWAN:

For a copy of all advertisements, tenders, correspondence, and contracts, entered into by the government or any department thereof, in connection with the dredging contracts in the harbours of Port Arthur and Fort William, during the year 1928.

Mr. COWAN:

For a copy of all advertisements, tenders, correspondence, orders and contracts, in connection with the supply of coal for public buildings operated by the Dominion government in Port Arthur, during the year 1928.

Mr. COWAN:

For a copy of all tenders, correspondence, and contracts entered into between the government and any person, firm, or corporation, in connection with the ice breaking contract in the public harbours of Port Arthur and Fort William, during the year 1928.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE COMBINE

Mr. MANION (For Mr. Stevens):

For a return of all correspondence passing between F. A. McGregor, Registrar Combines Investigation Act, or any officer connected with the administering of the said act or any officer of the Labour department and Mr. Hugh Bell, secretary of the British Columbia Hothouse Products Co-operative Association, or any other firm or persons in British Columbia connected with an application for an investigation into an alleged combine among the fruit jobbing houses in the city of Vancouver, as set in the affidavit dated the 1st September, 1927, and signed by Wilfred Lawrence Dence, Frank Davies, A. C. Brown, James Gray Speller, Edward Brown and Hugh Bell, and an affidavit made by Hugh Bell dated the 1st day of September, 1927; and also a copy of the said affidavits together with a copy of the interim report of the said registrar, F. A. McGregor, or any officer attached to the Department of Labour, and all other documents concerning the above-mentioned matter furnished to the said registrar.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Unless my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has some word from the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) to the contrary, I believe there was some understanding between the hon. member and some of my officers that this notice would be allowed to stand for some time.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I am not familiar with the matter, but if that is so it might stand.

Mr. HEENAN: That is my information. It might stand for the present.

Motion stands.

SUBSIDY TO NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. LAPIERRE (For Mr. Duff):

For a copy of all correspondence between the Honourable E. N. Rhodes, Premier of Nova Scotia, or any other minister of the said province, and the Honourable J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, from July 1, 1926, to September 30, 1928, relating to the payment of the annual federal subsidy to the province of Nova Scotia; and the special grant, recommended by the Duncan commission to be paid to said province.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman in whose name this resolution stands is not now in his seat, but I might direct his attention and the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to the fact that, unfortunately for the country, I was out of office from June 28, 1926, to September 25 of that year.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The year mentioned is 1928.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but I was out of office during that period, and perhaps in fairness to my hon. friend the mover would like to amend the resolution in order to include us both.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution refers to the period from July 1, 1926, to September 30, 1928.

Mr. ROBB: But my hon. friend was the Minister of Finance from about June 28 to September 25, 1926.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that the motion refers to whoever was Minister of Finance. That is too small an observation for the Minister of Finance of this country to make; it is entirely out of keeping with the dignity of the office, but it is quite what we might expect.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT WITHOUT CERTIFICATES FROM COMMISSION

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River) moved:

For a return showing the names, positions occupied and salaries received of all persons employed in the several departments of the public service without certificates from the Civil Service Commission during each of the past five years.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: There are many positions which are exempted from the Civil Service Act. Does the hon. member ask for a list of all persons who do not come under the act?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I did not have reference to such positions as labourers, charwomen, or anything of that kind, but rather to those positions which may have been filled outside of the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are men employed at the Hudson bay as day labourers and who do not come under the Civil Service Commission; would the hon. member include those?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just what would the hon. member include?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Positions in the diplomatic service, secretarial work, and positions in the income tax department and Department of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member would amend this resolution, or leave it to the discretion of the government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would ask that the motion stand for the time being.

Motion stands.

INCOME TAX ACT—REFUNDS

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): moved:

For a return showing:

1. The names of persons to whom refunds of not less than $500, under the Income Tax Act, have been made in the past five years, and the amount of such refund in each case.

2. The names of all persons or corporations in arrears or default of income tax, during each of the past five years, and the amount involved in each case.

Mr. ROBB: The Income Tax Act contains certain provisions with regard to secrecy, and I am not sure whether this resolution would come under those clauses. In the absence of the minister, would the hon. member permit this motion to stand so that it may be looked into?

Motion stands.

THE I'M ALONE INCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether or not a despatch has been forwarded to the Secretary of State of the United States with regard to the I'm Alone incident, and if so, if a reply has been received. I ask that question because of the uncertainty which appears to exist in the newspapers. One press despatch says that a note has been forwarded, while another despatch from Washington contradicts that report. I think it is in the public interest that this situation be clarified by the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As I mentioned to the hon. leader of the opposition on Thursday last, the I'm Alone incident has been the subject of communications between the governments of the United States and Canada, through our minister at Washington. A number of communications have passed between our government and the minister with a view to having formal representations made to the United States government. The last of these communications was sent forward to-day and I expect that formal representations will be made by the minister at Washington either to-day or possibly to-morrow at the latest.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. BENNETT: They have not yet been made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The formal representations have not been made as yet.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a few moments of the time of the house, and I do so from a sense of duty which I believe I cannot evade. I desire to refer to certain important questions which have been raised in the course of this debate. While I have been unable to attend the opening sessions of the house, I have followed with the deepest interest the proceedings and the various discussions which have taken place. Never was I so proud of my membership in this house as when I read the speeches which were made in this chamber in approval of the resolution presented on the treaty to outlaw war. The debate was on a high plane throughout and would have done credit to any legislative body in the world. The true international spirit was apparent and manifested itself in all the views which were then expressed, and from all sides came the unqualified offer of the most intense cooperation for the furtherance of all moves which might lead to the establishment of permanent peace.

The world has moved forward; a new psychology of peace is gradually replacing the war psychology of the past, and it is no longer a sign of inferiority, a sort of inglorious stigma, to preach and advocate peace. Indeed, of all the beneficent effects of the League of Nations none is perhaps more commendable than the creation of a new international conscience whose feelings, whether or not they are officially expressed, are recognized and respected everywhere even by material strength and military power. This is the new international conscience which has given birth to the Kellogg pact and which has induced so many nations to accept compulsory arbitration of conflicts between states in order to replace violence and force by the rules of law and international justice. Nobody can fail to realize the supreme importance of a public act by which all the nations joined together to declare that peace is the only goal to be reached and that war should be outlawed and denounced.

But the value of this agreement will depend largely upon the subsequent measures, upon the steps which will be taken everywhere by all nations for the purpose of reaching what they all declare to be their goal. Peace will be secured if nations can eliminate as far as possible the usual causes of conflicts, the ordinary sources of difficulties. The League of Nations has been during the last few years and is now investigating what those sources of difficulties and causes of conflict are. I am going to refer now to what has been declared to be the main source of difficulties between nations and this brings me directly to the subject under debate. On the 26th September, 1925, the assembly of the League of Nations adopted this resolution:

The assembly, firmly resolved to seek all possible means of establishing peace throughout the world; convinced that economic peace will largely contribute to security among the nations; persuaded of the necessity of investigating the economic difficulties which stand in the way of the revival of general prosperity, and of ascertaining the best means of overcoming these difficulties and of preventing disputes; invites the council to consider at the earliest possible moment the expediency of constituting on a wide basis a preparatory committee which, with the assistance of technical organizations of the league and the International Labour Office, will prepare the work of an international economic conference.

The convening of this conference under the auspices of the League of Nations shall be a matter for subsequent decision by the council.

The council took action on that recommendation and organized the preparatory committee composed of leading men of many nations. This preparatory committee started to work and organized an economic conference which sat in Geneva on the 4th May, 1927, and whose session extended until the 23rd May, 1927. The members of this conference were appointed by the various governments. Other members were nominated by the council or by certain international organizations invited by the council and experts accompanied members or were invited by the president of the conference. It consisted of 194 delegates and 226 experts representing 50 states, some of which were not and are not now members of the league. The president of the conference was M. Theunis, a former premier of Belgium. One of the vice-presidents was Mr. Henry M. Robinson, an American representative. Canada was represented at that conference by the following:

Mr. Albert Matthews, investment banker, director, Toronto General Trusts Corporation.

Mr. Joseph Daoust, LL.D. J.P., president, Daoust, Lalonde and Company, Ltd., Montreal, former president of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, former president of the Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada.

Mr. W. A. Riddell, M. A., Ph. D., Dominion of Canada advisory officer accredited to the League of Nations.

Mr. Adam Shortt, C.M.G., LL.D. chairman of the Board of Historical Documents, (economic and political), Board of Historical Publications, Ottawa, formerly commissioner of the Civil Service of Canada, and Professor of Economics, Queen's University.

Mr. W. A. Wilson, Canadian agricultural products representative in Great Britain.

I said that the United States of America were represented there and indeed they had a very strong representation. I will take the liberty of giving the names:

Mr. Henry M. Robinson, president of the First National Bank, Los Angeles, and member of the Dawes commission.

Mr. Norman H. Davis, formerly Assistant Secretary of Treasury and Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. John W. O'Leary, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Alonso E. Taylor, director of Food Research Institute, Stanford University.

Mr. Julius Klein, director, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, U.S. Department of Commerce.

They were accompanied by the following experts:

Dr. Arthur N. Young, economic adviser to the Department of State.

Dr. E. Dana Durand, chief of the Research Division, Department of Commerce.

Mr. Grosvenor Jones, chief of the Finance and Investment Division, Department of Commerce.

Dr. Louis Domeratzky, chief of the Regional Division, Department of Commerce.

Mr. E. W. Camp, Acting Commissioner of Customs, Treasury Department.

Mr. Asher Hobson, permanent American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome.

Dr. Percy W. Bidwell, an economist of the United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. Henry Chalmers, chief of the Division of Foreign Tariffs, Department of Commerce.

Mr. John P. Frey.

Secretary: Mr. Somerville Pinkney Tuck, Consul of the United States of America at Geneva.

The conference divided itself into committees, the three main committees being one on agriculture, one on commerce, and one on industry. I have the official report of the conference here which, after discussion, was presented and adopted by the conference. I am sorry that time will not permit me to read some of the very important considerations in that report as to commercial policies. I shall confine myself to reading the conclusion:

In view of the fact that harmful effects upon production and trade result from the high and constantly changing tariffs which are applied in many countries;

And since substantial improvement in the economic conditions can be obtained by increased facilities for international trade and commerce;

And in view of the fact that tariffs, though within the sovereign jurisdiction of the separate states, are not a matter of purely domestic interest but greatly influence the trade of the world;

And in view of the fact that some of the causes which have resulted in the increase of tariffs and in other trade barriers since the war have largely disappeared and others are diminishing;

The conference declares that the time has come to put an end to the increase in tariffs and to move in the opposite direction.

The conference recommends:

(1) That nations should take steps forthwith to remove or diminish those tariff barriers that gravely hamper trade, starting with those which have been imposed to counteract the effects of disturbances arising out of the war.

Moreover, in order to ensure that this action is continuously pursued, the conference recommends:

(2) That states should proceed to the conclusion of commercial treaties on lines and under conditions calculated to ensure the attainment of the aims mentioned herein;

(3) That, in future, the practice of putting into force, in advance of negotiations, excessive duties established for the purpose of bargaining, whether by means of tarifs de combat or by means of general tariffs, should be abandoned;

(4) That the Council of the League of Nations should be requested to instruct its economic organization to examine on the basis of the principles enunciated by the present conference, the possibility of further action by the respective states with a view to promoting the equitable treatment of commerce by eliminating or reducing the obstructions which excessive Customs tariffs offer to international trade.

In this enquiry, the economic organization should consult with representatives of the various governments, including non-members of the league, and also so far as necessary with the competent bodies representing commerce, industry, agriculture and labour.

The object of the enquiry should be to encourage the extension of international trade on an equitable basis, while at the same time paying due regard to the just interests of producers and workers in obtaining a fair remuneration and of consumers in increasing their purchasing power.

I will quote one sentence from the general resolutions in the final report with respect to agriculture:

It is desirable that all hindrances to the free circulation of and trade in agricultural products should be removed, in so far as their removal does not endanger the vital interests of the different countries and their workers.

In those states in which customs protection is maintained, it should be reduced, both for industry and agriculture, to the lowest possible point indispensable to production; care should be taken to assist in the maintenance of an equitable balance between industry and agriculture and not to stifle one to the advantage of the other.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

The final resolution concerning economic tendencies affecting the peace of the world reads:

The conference:

Recognizing that the maintenance of world peace depends largely upon the principles on which the economic policies of nations are framed and executed:

Recommends that the governments and peoples of the countries here represented should together give continuous attention to this aspect of the economic problem, and looks forward to the establishment of recognized principles designed to eliminate those economic difficulties which cause friction and misunderstanding in a world which has everything to gain from peaceful and harmonious progress.

The conference recognizes that the reception and successful application of the principles stated in the resolutions of the conference depend, not only upon the good-will of governments and administrations, but upon an informed and supporting public opinion throughout the world, and for this purpose would welcome, in the economic as in other fields, the development of closer international cooperation by scientific and educational institutions, as well as the help of the press and other agencies of importance for the information and enlightenment of the public.

These recommendations were unanimously adopted by the conference except for the union of Soviet republics of Russia and Turkey. These recommendations were afterwards approved by the council of the league, which recommended that as far as possible they should be carried out by the various nations which had taken part in the conference.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. At the last session of parliament, certain of these resolutions were laid upon the table of the house and the Prime Minister was asked whether it was the intention of the government to submit them to parliament for approval or disapproval or discussion, and the Prime Minister declared that that was not the intention of the government. I submit, therefore, that it is not in order by this indirect method to bring about a discussion of these resolutions at this late stage of the budget debate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a public document from which I am reading. Surely my hon. friend is not serious when he suggests that I am out of order in reading the recommendations of the League of Nations or of the economic conference. These are public documents.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that when the government has positively declined to allow a discussion by this house of certain public documents—

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is at liberty to discuss this at any time.

Mr. CAHAN: Not at any time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend opposes it, he will align himself with Russia and Turkey.

Mr. CAHAN: I am perfectly prepared to align myself with Russia because Russia was one of the countries that so distinctly disapproved of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am very sorry that I do not please my hon. friend by reading these recommendations of the economic conference of the League of Nations.

Mr. CAHAN: It is an indirect approach that is not becoming.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am always anxious to please my friend, but surely I am not committing a criminal offence by reading these resolutions which have been adopted by the goodwill of all the nations of the world.

Mr. CAHAN: You should have the courage to submit to this house the resolutions of the League of Nations of which you approve.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this time will not be taken out of my forty minutes.

I say that the council of the league recommended to the nations concerned that they should conform their policies to the wishes thus expressed, and the assembly, which sat in September, 1927, following the conference, adopted unanimously a resolution in approval of the work of the conference and its recommendations. These are the conclusions, Mr. Speaker, which have been reached by the representatives of most of the nations of the world, acting with the cooperation and upon the advice of experts representing almost all the nations of the world, experts who have no political interest to serve and no financial axe to grind.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask a question? Have they since been approved by any legislative or parliamentary body in the civilized world, excepting the Soviet of Russia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know they have. I will take the trouble to give the names of certain nations which have approved of them. I have seen that stated somewhere in the documents.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not been able to find any.

Mr. MANION: Were they put in force?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have been put in force in Canada, and that is what I am coming to.

Mr. HANSON: What about the United States?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those recommendations were in line with the principles formulated by that international conference which I have mentioned. They are also, I submit with due respect, in accordance with the policies which have been followed by the government of Canada since 1921. Indeed, our representatives at that conference, and later the Canadian delegate at the assembly of the League of Nations, Senator Dandurand, could state with legitimate pride that Canada had already acted in accordance with the views of the conference, and had not followed the policy which was then unanimously denounced as an obstacle to the peace of the world and to economic inter-relations between states.

Mr. BENNETT: And he added that it was the only country in the world that had done so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are proud of that if it is so, which I do not admit; but we have the endorsation of the representatives of the nations of the world in the persons of their leading economists and outstanding experts. Surely we are in good company in putting those principles into practice.

Mr. CLARK: Where is the company?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend has not listened to me I am sorry. I thought I had made it clear that those principles had been accepted by all the representatives at the conference.

Mr. CAHAN: By the representatives of the United States as well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am coming to that: by the representatives of the United States as well.

Mr. CAHAN: And repudiated by the United States congress.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is for my hon. friend to say. I am sorry, I do not think I am very aggressive when I address the house, but it seems to be the practice on the part of my good friend to interrupt me very frequently.

Mr. CAHAN: Then bring before the house the report of the economic conference for full discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is one of the regrets of my life that what I say is always unpleasant to my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), although it is so far from my wish and my purpose. We have put those principles into practice in spite of the protests and notwithstanding the objections of many who preach in this country the very doctrine which they denounce as selfish hostility when it is practised by other countries. But, sir, the conditions in Canada to-day show that the economic conference was right when it formulated those principles as being sound economically for the progress of the various nations of the world. I do not think we have increased any item of our tariff since 1921, and we have reduced many. We may say, with a certain amount of pride too, that those who year in and year out were predicting blue ruin and bankruptcy and disaster, are compelled to-day to thank or to blame Providence for the prosperity now enjoyed by Canada, for the buoyant conditions in transportation, in banking, in industry, for the large and expanding trade of this country —all figures speak with such a loud voice that the whispers of death have been silenced, I hope forever.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other statements in the report I have read which to-day are also proved to be true in the clearest possible manner. What better evidence could we have of the danger of high protective tariffs, of their inherent menace to the peace of the world and to good international relations, than the words which have been uttered in this house at the mere suggestion of a possible increase of customs duties by the country to the south of us? Appeals have even been made to "red-blooded Canadians" for retaliatory action, suggestions have been made that parliament ought to adjourn or to prolong its sittings to take counteraction. It has even been suggested that the governor in council should be empowered to increase our tariff schedules should the necessity arise. Sir, the tariff policies of other countries are their own business—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —and certainly I will not venture to express any opinion thereon, except the hope that the apostles of high and higher tariff duties will not be more successful in other countries than they have been in this in carrying out a policy which was denounced so energetically and so unanimously by the representatives of all the countries sitting in conference in 1927.

But what if they succeed? Well, I believe that the Canadian people will not lose their heads. I am confident they will continue to trust the safe and sound judgment and the good, logical common-sense mind of my Scotch friend, the Minister of Finance, to deal with the situation. Those issues cannot be fought with heat and prejudice. If one market is closed to us, it is evident that we will have to find other markets; and if one market is made more difficult for our goods to enter, we will have to find other markets which are accessible. If it is necessary to modify certain tariff schedules for the purpose of developing a larger trade with nations which are desirous of trading with us, this may be done, but only in the Canadian interest and not at all as a result of a policy of retaliation or tariff war. In doing this, I repeat, Canadian interests, and Canadian interest alone, must be considered. Talk of red blood! Is it a manifestation of red blood to shape our tariff policies on the policies of foreign countries by imitation or in any other manner? Did it show a lack of dignity, was it a shameless action on the part of Britain to maintain her policies though her neighbours in the adjoining countries had protectionist tariffs, such as France, Germany and other nations? I know of no prouder words than those uttered by Sir Robert Peel in 1846 when, speaking to a world encircled by protectionist tariffs, he said: No matter what foreign countries do in the matter of removing their tariffs or not, Britain will act in her own way and in her own interests. And that Sir Robert Peel and other Britons were men of red blood no one could ever deny. The same words, or practically the same words were uttered by Mr. Asquith in 1903 when he replied to the argument for retaliation as set forth by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain.

Our neighbours will shape their policies in Washington and we will shape our policies in Ottawa in the interests of the Canadian people and in accordance with their views. Whatever may be my admiration for other countries, it does not go to the point of necessarily copying their methods and their policies and of looking at some social and political problems in the same way as they look at them.

Mr. CAHAN: Not even if expressed by an economic conference?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend allow me to proceed?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Though I do not resent anything coming from him, my time is limited. As I was saying, whatever may be my admiration for other countries I still prefer the Canadian vision, the Canadian mentality, the Canadian outlook, and I deem it very important to preserve our own national characteristics and maintain our own way of dealing with public questions. May I remark furthermore that I have never noticed a keen desire on the part of my protectionist friends to imitate even the United States when that country happened to lean towards freer trade. I know of some items which are being admitted free into that country and which are paying a duty in Canada; and they are of some importance. But, as I say, I have never yet witnessed any demand on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite for reciprocity so far as these items are concerned. I will not refer either to the reciprocity agreement of 1911 except perhaps to observe that only the other day I was reading a book of Mr. Underwood, The Drifted Sands of Party Politics, in which he says that the friends of low tariff in the United States deplored the defeat in Canada of reciprocity in 1911. He himself was leader of the Democratic party in congress at the time and had supported President Taft in that policy. Indeed, the policy of no truck or trade when things are going one way, and of retaliation when they are going the other way does not seem to me quite fair. After all, what we shall have to consider is whether a further raising of the artificial barrier at the border line of our country would be in the interests of our people en masse, whether it would make for greater prosperity, for greater harmony, for larger progress in our own country, whatever may be the effect on other countries. There lies the whole principle, and any other argument seems rather to be camouflaged rhetoric.

I should like to refer to one or two other matters but I am afraid my time is going. However, there is another question which I desire particularly to discuss, and I will come to it immediately. Canada can compete with the world, and is competing with the world, not with the weapons of retaliation, of distrust, of fear, of economic or other warfare, but with the weapons of sound organization, the energy of our people, easier transportation, better marketing, and credit being given to our citizens. This is done by leadership, by such leadership as has given to this country the policy of British preference, which I desire to discuss for a minute or two in connection with the subamendment which has been moved.

The subamendment, I am free to confess, is rather a shrewd motion. My hon. friends directly opposite have declared themselves to be afraid of the closing of the market which is nearer to us; my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) indicates to them other markets—he does so in this subamendment. Hon. gentlemen directly opposite have tried indeed to lead the hon. gentleman in the far corner to a stand against the government; but my hon. friend from Battle River is trying to align them behind himself in his own stand against us. Of course, this subamendment cannot be accepted by the government, and no one knows that better than the mover of the subamendment. It is a motion of want of confidence. The Minister of Finance has moved that the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means; my hon. friend from Battle River says: No; the house will not resolve itself into committee of ways and means but instead we will have a declaration for British preference. This of course would mean the defeat of the government, and those of us who have confidence in the government cannot vote for that motion. Even those who may not be in sympathy with all the policies of the government, but who prefer the government to any alternative or substitute which might offer itself—and that substitute can be offered only by my hon. friends directly opposite—are also unable to vote for such a motion. But I go further. What is the necessity for attacking this government on the question of the British preference? Is it fair to attack us on that question? Who were the originators of the British preference policy in Canada? They were the great Liberal leaders, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and W. S. Fielding.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Who borrowed the idea from Sir Charles Tupper—absolutely. I can quote you Sir Wilfrid Laurier to that effect.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will not discuss that question with my hon. friend; he is entitled to whatever comfort he can derive from it. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and W. S. Fielding initiated that policy. They made it the basis of the fiscal policy of Canada. We who are their political successors are also preserving that policy with loyalty and with care, and we are proud of the fact. I have always defended the policy of British preference; other markets were almost closed to us and it was necessary that we should find outlets for our Canadian goods. These were admitted into England free of duty, and it was only in the interests of Canada that we should take advantage of this situation, because I repeat that this was not a sentimental device; this action was taken and has been maintained in the interests of this country.

Was it not a good policy? The very first year after it was adopted, in 1898, our exports to Great Britain mounted from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000. That progression has continued; our exports to Great Britain for the twelve months ending January, 1929, amounted to $446,000.000 in round figures, while our imports amounted to only about $193,000,000. In addition, the goods we imported from Great Britain paid a duty of over $35,000,000, while our own exports entered England free.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; the hon. gentleman's time has elapsed.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, in common with every member on this side of the house, I am very glad indeed to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) back in his place, apparently fully restored to health. He has spoken to us this afternoon very charmingly, as perhaps he can better than many others, but like other charmers his speech is full of sweet nothings. It is hardly a year since we heard the whole story which was given us again to-day by the Minister of Justice, and I have yet to hear of any formal action on the part of this government indicating that it meant to change its tariff policy in any degree by reason of certain resolutions which were repeated by the minister this afternoon.

The Minister of Justice takes some credit for reductions in the tariff schedule; he says that Canada has led the way in this respect as he claims that Canada has so often led the way and intends to continue to lead the way in international relations. But my hon. friends to my left, who perhaps are as keen as any to observe changes in the tariff, stated last year, the year before and again this year that the changes in the tariff amounted to nothing at all as far as their interests are concerned. Indeed one hon. member declared, after a computation, that the changes made by way of reductions by the Liberal government over a period of six years amounted in all to something less than one per cent.

The Minister of Justice made rather a protectionist speech; he rather subscribed to the policy supported by the party on this side of the house, to which we have adhered for years, that we shall so draw our tariff schedules that they will take care of our own country and protect, so far as they can be fairly protected, those industries both agricultural and mechanical which have a right to exist in this country. However, the minister went one step further and spoiled that protectionist idea; he inferred, although he was careful not to put it in words, that he is disposed to let some economic conference meeting in Geneva settle the tariff question for Canada. First and foremost in that conference, according to the minister, were representatives from the United States. That country now proposes to put up its tariff once more, and if I take any meaning at all from the remarks of the Minister of Justice they were designed perhaps to say nice things, to vaunt his patriotism, but perhaps more than that to make some sort of gesture to the United States.

In 1923 Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, in presenting his budget speech, put on record the determination of the Liberal government to make overtures to the United States looking to reciprocity, and in fact he did communicate to the United States that his government were open to a discussion with regard to a reciprocity treaty. This was after 1911, and if the Democratic party, which unfortunately for itself never has been in power since, could not carry its views throughout the whole country, according to this Liberal government, the Republican government, if it regretted the defeat of the treaty of 1911, has had the opportunity since 1923 of concluding a treaty with this country having the same effect.

Mr. HANSON: Why stir up the dead?

Mr. GEARY: I am not stirring up the dead; I am just laying it away. The minister works himself up almost into a passion over the idea that this party has in mind an economic war against the United States. If that is so I have not heard of it. I fully subscribe to everything the minister has said as to the right of this country to look after its own affairs and the right of the citizens of the United States to elect representatives who will legislate for the benefit of the citizens of that country. That is their business and not ours. But, Mr. Speaker, the remedy suggested by my hon. friend is that we seek new markets; if we cannot find a market in the United States we should go abroad for new markets. Let me say to the minister that he does not need to go out of this country for markets. Let him and his government take such steps as will conserve the industries of Canada and make them prosperous, self-supporting and beneficial to all the people of this country. Let him and his government take even one step towards helping these industries in such a way that the home market in Canada will be maintained for all their products; let us look to the home market instead of looking far across the seas. That will be much simpler and much better for us and, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said on Friday, that is what the government has signally failed to do.

Mr. MILLAR: Might I ask my hon. friend just how large a population it will take to consume our 500,000,000 bushels of wheat?

Mr. GEARY: I am not too good at arithmetic, so I will let my hon. friend work that out himself. If it were at all relevant I would have pleasure in discussing the question with him.

Now I wish to say a few words with regard to the budget, Mr. Speaker, although there is very little to be said as to the financial proposals contained therein. The budget has been called innocuous, but I would hardly agree with that description. To me the financial proposals are not innocuous; they are harmful in that they do not lay down or propose any constructive action on behalf of the people of this country. To that degree they are not innocuous but positively harmful. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said the same; perhaps they are not cold in their reception of the budget but at least they are lukewarm. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) says the budget is a parcel of bare bones, but the government need not worry; he will swallow it. To my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Glen) the budget is a negative budget but he will vote in the affirmative for its adoption. He vociferously regrets that the budget contains no measure of relief to the farmers, but he will vote against the amendment expressing in terms that regret. However, the hon. member has one reason for congratulating the government; there is an omission which pleases him very much: The income tax has not been cut this year. How touching it is, Mr. Speaker, to recall the loyalty and devotion to the government of the hon. gentleman who, just one short year ago, joined with the government in voting for a 10 per cent reduction in the income tax.

Finding no particular gratification in the financial proposals, my hon. friends opposite turn to the surplus and the consequent reduction in the debt. I agree that is a matter for congratulation; it might well give them some feeling of pride, but under the conditions which exist to-day there is no difficulty whatever for any government prepared to maintain a certain level of taxation to produce within reasonable limits almost any surplus required. The only financial calls upon the government to-day are the ordinary expenditures of the country and the usual, stereotyped capital expenditure. The time has passed when war expenditures, railway advances and demobilization costs must be met from the funds of Canada, and no one knows that better than the minister. If I were to make any objection to or any criticism of the surplus I would say it was too large. I am given to understand that that amount is not required to amortize and pay off the national debt of this country. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is apportioning some $60,000,000 towards the reduction of the national debt, but the hon. members for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews) developed a plan for the consideration of the minister whereby the sum of nineteen or twenty million dollars would be set aside each year for a certain number of years and thus in time dissipate the whole national debt. If that scheme be sound, to my mind the Minister of Finance has no right to proceed on the present unscientific basis, and take some $60,000,000 out of the people of Canada when, by a more scientific method, $20,000,000 would answer the same purpose.

The public accounts for 1928, the last year for which they are complete—every figure I use will be taken from that volume—show that the annual average surplus of the Conservative government for the six years 1917 to 1922 amounted to $66,000,000, while the annual average surplus of this government in the succeeding six years, from 1923 to 1928, was only $64,000,000. In spite of the difficulties under which they had to work, and in spite of the strain to which they were subject at that time, the Conservative government had an annual surplus which amounted to $2,000,000 more than the annual surplus of the present government since 1923. There is not much comfort in that for the hon. gentlemen opposite, especially when they consider that during the last six years the government has been in office the full man power of the country has been engaged in the industries of field, forest and mine. They were years of bountiful crops, but the six years which preceded them were, first, years during which the business of this country was carried on under a very heavy strain; years when business and production were at a low ebb, and, second, the equally depressing post-war period, during which the country was using every effort to recover from the effects of the Great war. No comparison is fair which compares the last six years with the six years immediately preceding.

My hon. friends take much comfort in saying that in the last five years there has been a reduction in the national debt, and that the Conservative party were not able to reduce it but were forced to increase it during the preceding six years. How do reductions or additions in the national debt come about? Leaving borrowings to one side the money to be used by the government comes from, first, the consolidated fund into which go all the ordinary receipts from taxation, and, second, a small account which is called special receipts. Normally this latter account does not amount to much but it has been a very advantageous account for the present government, because they have been able to take $35,000,000 from that account during the last six years, as against $3,000,000 during the preceding six years.

The consolidated fund has to take care of the ordinary expenditures of the country, and it normally can take care also of the ordinary stereotyped capital expenditures of the country exclusive of the special expenditures for railway advances and subsidies, and war and demobilization costs. If there is a surplus in the consolidated fund and it has to be used to pay capital or special expenditures, then there is nothing left to apply on the reduction of the debt. To the extent to which money has to be paid on those accounts in excess of the balance in the consolidated fund there is an increase in the public debt. On the other hand, if there is nothing to be paid out of that balance, then there is correspondingly a decrease in the public debt. Keeping in mind then the fact that the preceding government had a surplus each year which amounted to $2,000,000 more than the present government, why is it the national debt was increased during the Conservative regime and has been decreased during the regime of the present government? We will have to turn to the capital account and special expenditure accounts to find the answer. First, let us take, the capital expenditure account; this is the capital account which covers the ordinary stereotyped capital expenditures of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: The Welland canal is an instance.

Mr. GEARY: As the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said, there are canals like the Welland and Trent, and there are also government railways which come under this heading. The only item at the present time under the heading "railways" is the Hudson Bay railway. Only two or three million dollars per year has been expended during the last few years, but in former years there were items of $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 and so on, deficits on operation of the Intercolonial railway. During those years we had the Intercolonial under our control, but that deficit has disappeared because of the action of the Conservative government in amalgamating that railway with the National railway system.

Another division of the capital account covers public works, government buildings in Ottawa, the shipbuilding program of the government in power, and certain things like the St. Lawrence ship canal. Those accounts do not vary to any degree from year to year, except by reason of some abnormal condition. As a rule, they can be paid out of the surplus in consolidated fund without any trouble. During the six years when the Conservative government was in power the expenditures on capital account including government railways and the shipbuilding program amounted to $221,000,000; during the last six years, through no change of policy, nor effort of good management, but only by reason of the necessity for the expenditure having disappeared, the Liberal government has been called upon to pay only $94,000,000.

But there are other special expenditures which have to be considered when we compare the two six-year periods; one expenditure is that of war demobilization, and the other is railway advances and subsidies.

It is not necessary to give any detail regarding the railway advances and subsidies. Everyone knows that these were necessary in the process of taking over the decrepit railways of the country and amalgamating them into one great system. That was an enterprise which was carried out by the Conservative party, and it has since been amply justified in every particular. Under the six years of Conservative rule the government was called upon to advance some $210,000,000, in subsidies and allowances to railways while the present government has had to pay only $131,000,000 during the last six years. In addition the Conservative government assumed the burden of $284,000,000 nonactive assets representing previous advances to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern Railways.

The third special expenditure account is that of war and demobilization. During the six years of the Conservative regime the government had to expend $1,462,000,000, on this account while the Liberal government during its term of office has had to expend only $8,000,000.

The addition of these capital and special expenditures shows that the Conservative government were called upon to expend $2,177,000,000, whereas the present government has been saddled with only $233,000,000. Is it any wonder that the public debt of the country was of necessity increased during that period? The people were taxed to the limit and no one can say that the Conservative party could have taken any more out of the people during those years. The Conservative party increased the debt by $1,807,000,000 or $370,000,000 less than the amount they were obliged to assume or pay out for abnormal capital expenditure for war expenditures and for subsidies and advances to railways. They were able to do that by good financing; not by taking too much money from the people but by conserving expenditures and showing a balance in consolidated fund which was more than the balance shown under the present government. Through proper management they were able to make a very much better showing with regard to the national debt than that made by the Liberal government which during the past six years has shown a reduction in the national debt of $125,000,000. One would not object very strenuously to all the glory taken, the boasting, if you like to call it so, of hon. members opposite in regard to this showing; but here is the unfair part of it, and it is to this I wish to direct most of my attention. In order to discredit the preceding government or to reflect credit upon themselves, this government and its members persist in comparing, as though they were on a comparable basis, the six years just ending of government by the Liberals with the six years immediately preceding of government by the Conservatives. Of course anyone in his senses knows that as between these two periods there is no proper basis for comparison. One would have thought hon. gentlemen opposite, realizing this, would at least be fair about the matter, but they have been unfair and they have made misstatements which amount to deception. I do not like to think hon. members would make such statements deliberately, and I can only ascribe their doing so to lack of knowledge of the true state of affairs and lack of attention to the public accounts. More flagrant than anyone else on the opposite side in this unfair comparison have been the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself and one of the members of his government. The Prime Minister has been time and again called to account for it but he still persists in making the same representations in regard to which he was corrected and which he must honestly know are at least that sort of deception that is more dangerous than the truth—a half truth. It is not long since the Prime Minister had occasion to speak about this same matter and he said that the public debt in 1919 had been increased by hon. gentlemen opposite—that is by this party—to the tune of $382,000,000. That is perfectly true. The impression to be left, apparently willingly by him, was that in the normal course of affairs the debt had been increased by that vast amount by a Conservative government. My leader (Mr. Bennett) corrected him saying:

That was direct payment for railways.

As a matter of fact during that year it was more for demobilization, but my right hon. friend did not know that, because he replied:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Not at all. It was made up of the general expenditures of hon. gentlemen opposite including these grants.

That is railway grants. Could anything be more unfair than that? It is as though he ignored a tremendous, special expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars and emphasized a small expenditure made in the ordinary routine out of the consolidated fund and out of the revenues of the country. It is just as though the right hon. gentleman had likened a mouse to an elephant because they were of the same colour; there is no more logic than that in making such a comparison. He went on to say:

In the next year—

That is 1920.

—there was not a direct payment for railways and yet in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, the public debt of Canada was further increased by over $674,000,000.

And here I object.

That is the way in which the country was being governed while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office in 1919 and 1920.

The implication is that the money was wasted. The truth is that the money was spent on the most righteous of purposes, largely in carrying on the war in which this country was engaged at the moment, and in amalgamating and giving to the people under public ownership a great national system of railways. That is the way the country was being governed, and we are proud of the fact that it was being governed in that way during those years. Canada will never cease to bless the Conservative government of those years for the fact that they brought into being under public ownership the Canadian National Railways and that they so prosecuted their efforts in regard to the conduct of the war that with the troops supporting them, they brought great glory to Canada. That is the way the country was being governed, and we take great pride in the fact.

My right hon. friend was again interrupted by my leader when he made a statement of the same sort. My leader said:

Due to the war.

My right hon. friend replied:

Due to their methods of financing. . . . We reduced expenditures and imposed some increased taxation for the purpose, mark you, to meet obligations which were left to us by the previous administration. At first about all that we were able to do was to hold the deficit at the point at which it had been the year before. The deficit instead of being $92,000,000 was brought down to $81,000,000 in 1922.

The right hon. gentleman and his cabinet had nothing whatever to do with bringing that down from $92,000,000 to $81,000,000. Mr. Fielding said that it was no part of the present government's work to deal with the spending of money in the fiscal year there referred to. The deficit was reduced by only $11,000,000, it is true, but it was reduced because conditions were improved. The present government had no hand in decreasing the deficit; it was none of their business at all. In spite, however, of the corrections of the right hon. gentleman's statement, he persists and his colleagues persist in that unfair and misleading comparison of those years of Liberal rule with the preceding years of Conservative rule.

The right hon. gentleman then went on to say that in 1923 his government began to function by way of imposing more taxation and reducing expenditures. An examination of the books will show that they did nothing in regard to reducing expenditures. There was a falling off of some $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 in expenditures, but this was not due to any change, because the expenditures of the departments, taking them by and large, about balanced with those of the preceding years. There were some millions of dollars less for elections and for pensions and other items which account for the decrease, but none of this was due to any change in policy on the part of the government. They said that the revenue was increased. The revenue was increased to the extent of $4,000,000 by taxes that bore so hardly upon the people that they had to take them off the next year.

They had to retrace their steps and take off many of those nuisance taxes which were not meeting with the approval of the people. The smaller increase in this debt that year was due to the fact that a great deal more money came through customs; some $10,000,000 came in from war refunds and there was a much smaller payment necessary for railway advances.

There is only one other speaker to whom I wish to refer and that is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He is not in his seat, but I shall not refrain on that account from saying what I desire to say. As reported on page 1029 of Hansard, after making the same invidious comparison, unfair and misleading as he should have known it to be, he made the following statement:

When my hon. friend compared the period of 1918 to 1922 with the period of 1925 to 1929, he made a comparison concerning a different Canada altogether.

With that I quite agree. That has been the burden of my remarks. Why was it a different Canada? He goes on to say:

A Canada which had emerged from the gloom which existed during the last five years of Conservative rule and had entered into the sunlight of prosperity under Liberal rule.

Probably that statement is put more unfairly than any of the other statements that have been made. The hon. gentleman was taking part in the war; he was doing his gallant best; he believed he was right; he surely believed the government was right, why at this stage should he take sides against the government which was endeavouring so to hold up our hands over there in France that success would ultimately attend the efforts of the forces. I do not think two years ago he would have said any such thing, but he says he is prepared to subscribe to that, to say the least, disingenuous statement of his leader and for that he must accept full responsibility himself. He is making a statement and a comparison, ignoring the heroic efforts of the people at home to maintain the forces in the field. That is exactly what he is doing.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend permit me? I expressly deducted every dollar that could possibly by any stretch of the imagination be deducted or appropriated to the war and demobilization expenses.

Mr. GEARY: My hon. friend did that. He made a calculation, but it is not that to which I am referring. I am saying that my hon. friend compared the six years of Liberal rule with the six years preceding of Conservative rule, and my hon. friend did not ascribe the heavier expenses under Conservative rule to the war. His inference was that the money was misspent by the Conservatives, and that there was a surplus under Liberal rule because they no longer misspent the money as the Conservatives did, not because they were relieved from the necessity of raising money for the war. His inference was that the Liberals had governed better and that the Conservatives had spent an undue amount in the preceding six years. My hon. friend says yes, we spent an undue amount. If my hon. friend can show one dollar misspent by the Conservative government I should be obliged for the information for the involved statement in his speech does not show it. If he takes those six years of Liberal rule and the six years of Conservative rule preceding, he will find that the Conservatives made a better showing on capital expenditures during those six years than did the Liberal party in the six years following.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will have to show that.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think that my hon. friend claims that there was any money misspent by the Conservatives.

Mr. RALSTON: I was talking about good and proper administration, and was dealing with the argument of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the administration in the last five years of Liberal rule had not been as effective and efficient as the administration of the Conservative rule because of the fact that more money had been spent and I showed where the money went.

Mr. GEARY: I am not going over these figures again. It is not at all the point to which I am taking exception. I am taking exception to the fact that the Minister of National Defence, ignoring the difficulties with which the Conservative government were faced and which they had to struggle against during the preceding six years, made a comparison in dollars and cents with the expenditures under this government and the expenditures under the Conservative government preceding.

Mr. RALSTON: I gave them credit.

Mr. GEARY: If my hon. friend thinks that it is fair to do as his leader and so many members opposite have done, to compare the two periods as though the war expenditures did not exist under the preceding Conservative government, well, I must allow my hon. friend to do it.

Mr. RALSTON: I was using the same five years that my hon. friend from South Wellington took.

Mr. GEARY: The principle of the thing is the same, and I am trying to show—it is not being done well, and it is perhaps nothing at all new—the true facts of the case. It is obvious that there is nothing to be gained by comparing the surpluses under the present government with the surpluses under the government which preceded it. That cannot be to the advantage of the party opposite, because their surpluses were not due in any particular to a change of policy or to betterment in management. They were due simply to one fact, that this government had been relieved of the impelling necessity of raising money, by borrowing, in order to carry on the war, and to pay the expense of getting the railways welded into the national system. With that in mind, and not to put too many figures on Hansard, I am going to leave the point. I am willing to discuss surpluses in any year with my hon. friend, how they were obtained, and whether they were justifiably obtained, and whether the government, in a proper manner, are reducing the national debt. These are matters of fair and open discussion. But when my hon. friend tries to compare the six years of Liberal rule with the six years of Conservative rule, with those war years and railway financing years, I say that he does not stand on solid ground, and my hon. friend and his party should rather take the patriotic view and admit that the capable sons and daughters of Canada, with her untold riches and natural resources, once the war was over, rose to their opportunities and gladly embraced the chance to restore themselves, and it is they who have induced the prosperity of this country, not the government opposite. They it is who have enabled this government, no longer faced with the necessities I have indicated, to show the debt reduction I have shown.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend leaves that point, may I ask him, is it not true that after deducting every dollar spent on the war and demobilization during the six years to which he has referred, there was still a deficit in the public accounts for those years?

Mr. GEARY: No, that is not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is true.

Mr. BENNETT: You had the railway.

Mr. CLARK: Did my right hon. friend deliberately omit the railways when he asked his question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the railways, I will deal with that question if my hon. friend wishes; I was going to do that to-morrow.

Mr. GEARY: The railways and the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said war and demobilization.

Mr. GEARY: Not the railways?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say railways, but with regard to the railways I will refer to that now if hon. gentlemen wish. My hon. friend said that it was not true that after allowing for the war and demobilization expenditure, there was still a deficit in the public accounts under Conservative administration, and that is why I asked the question.

May I say, with respect to the period to which my hon. friend refers, moneys were paid out to meet deficits incurred by railways that were not meeting operating expenses or fixed charges. The moneys that were advanced in the other period were advanced to a railway that was meeting operating expenses and could meet fixed charges, and went to the development of a railway system. That is an entirely different thing.

Mr. GEARY: When my right hon. friend says "other" he means the present government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: Is that quite true?—no, I do not think my right hon. friend has taken my answer properly. I think I have these figures under my hand, and I am very glad of the opportunity to give them to him.

In the preceding six years, railway subsidies were advanced by the Conservative government to the amount of $210,000,000; I take those figures from the blue book. In addition there was $284,000,000, representing advances to the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern railways which had been carried for a time as a non-active asset, but which was wiped out, quite properly, by the Conservative government of the day and added to the national debt. So the total expenses for railways was $494,000,000, whereas in the last six years there was paid $131,000,000, $77,000,000 of which to begin with was for expenses incurred in exactly the same way as those in the preceding six years. The balance was extended to the amount of $10,000,000 in one year, and $10,000,000 in another year, in advances to the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways were beginning to prosper, but they could not prosper at the beginning. They are prospering now only because the Conservative government in those six years preceding welded the scattered units into one great system and started the national system on its way. That is the only reason in the world. You would not have the National railways to-day if the Conservative government had not been in power. Nobody can dispute that because the records of this house show it. My hon. friend will have to admit that he himself opposed it in the session of 1919, and the battle was fought over their protesting and beaten bodies, and it was over their bodies that the Conservative party passed to the making of this great national railway. It is now beginning to pay. That is because it was a well-considered and well-advised scheme. It looked to the true interests of the country. The Conservative party looked forward with that same foresight which has always characterized the Conservative party right down from confederation. My right hon. friend would be taking what I think would be a most unfair position if he were to say that it was anything to the credit of his government that no moneys have been spent during the last six years on a going concern, and attempted to reflect any discredit on the railway expenditures which were made in the preceding six years, because the Conservative government were obliged to rescue bankrupt units from their bankruptcy and put them in a position where they could become a going concern. My hon. friends opposite are deriving great comfort from basking in the sunlight of the prosperous Canadian National Railway system. But this is due to no efforts of their own. It is due to the far-seeing policy of the Conservative party that to-day they find themselves in the happy position of having no railway deficits to make good and no subsidies to provide for our national railways. I have not the remotest idea, Mr. Speaker, how much more time is left to me.

An hon. MEMBER: Only a few minutes more.

Mr. GEARY: That being the case I must confine myself to the matter of the Canadian National Railways introduced by my hon. friend. He claims credit for its reorganization. All the facts should be brought out in a debate, and I know what the result will be; so does my right hon. friend. It will show that to the Conservative party and to the Conservative party only will belong the credit for this great enterprise. Another matter of transportation depended entirely—as did the Canadian National Railways—upon the capacity of the Conservative party to initiate and put into execution large schemes for the good of Canada. The Canadian Pacific railway was carried through to successful completion by the Conservative party in spite of the most bitter opposition on the part of the Liberal party of that day. The latter were men of no faith, men fearful of results, men without vision. This great national undertaking had to be planned and completed by the clear-sighted men of the Conservative party, who foresaw the advantages of a transcontinental railway in uniting the scattered provinces into one great country. And it was the Conservative party that undertook the deepening and widening of the Welland canal. The Hon. Frank Cochrane, at that time Minister of Railways, and his colleagues in the government, declared that in undertaking this work they were looking to the day when there would be a great waterway from the head of the lakes to tidewater. Like their predecessors who sponsored the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, they were farsighted men, they too had vision. There is no doubt that some day this great St. Lawrence waterway will be an accomplished fact, but not until the Conservative party is once more in a position to render that service to the country which it alone has shown itself able to render in regard to great national undertakings. The Liberal party has not shown itself big enough to grasp matters of such magnitude. All the great national policies concerning the welfare of this country have been instituted by the Conservative party, and all the great national undertakings initiated by the party have been carried through to a successful conclusion. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice referred to the British preference. Let him take what comfort he can for his party from that policy; I do not think he can point to one major development of this country that in any manner, shape or form can be ascribed to the Liberal party. The Conservative party, and the Conservative party alone, can be credited as far as government is to be credited with all the major developments that have made Canada what she is to-day.

I had intended to touch again on the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, but time does not permit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend who is claiming credit for the Conservative party in connection with all the great undertakings he has mentioned, what has happened to the Unionist party?

Mr. GEARY: I do not think my right hon. friend is quite fair. I called it the Conservative party, but I will call it the Unionist party, or, if he prefers, I will call it X. The point I am making is the unfairness of the comparison of the six years of this government with the six years of the preceding government. It was my hon. friend the Minister of Justice who called it the Conservative regime, he it was who made the comparison between the two parties, the one Liberal and the other Conservative. My hon. friend shakes his head.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think I referred to that at all.

Mr. GEARY: I am sorry if I referred to my hon. friend, it was the Minister of National Defence I had in mind.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part briefly in this debate, may I as a member from western Canada congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon the splendid financial statement which he has brought down for the approval of the house. It has been said that the popularity of budgets is something like the greatness of great men—some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and others have greatness thrust upon them. The budgets brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance for the last few years have become popular from three points of view. First, they are connected with a party that believes in retrenchment and in financial reform, a party with a financial history of which any Canadian ought to be proud. So this budget grows out of the viewpoint of the Minister of Finance, the viewpoint of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the viewpoint of the Liberal party in a financial sense; consequently it has grown in popularity since its introduction. And secondly, Mr. Speaker, it has become more popular because of the fact that it contains within itself the inherent qualities of popularity and stability. So notwithstanding the speeches we have had, some for and some against the budget, the opinion developed in this house is helping wonderfully in the formation of public opinion in its behalf throughout the Dominion and bringing about a condition of affairs that tends to make the budget appeal more and more to the people of Canada as the days go by. A further and a third reason for the popularity of the budget is that it is framed by the Finance minister with reference to the international situation. No budget not recognizing present-day international developments could really be a strong budget. Therefore this is a budget upon which Canada can courageously stand so far as its relationship is concerned not only with its neighbour across the International boundary but with the other nations of the world.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking of the prosperity of Canada, admitted that Providence had showered all sorts of prosperity on this nation but he qualified his statement by saying that the inclination of himself and of his party both in the house and in the country was that Providence and the people of Canada were to a major extent responsible for the prosperity announced in the budget. The hon. gentleman's theology and philosophy do not seem to be very sound. Providence does not cooperate by direct action; Providence cooperates through individuals and through governments to bring about national progress, national development and national prosperity. Providence inspires men to take action to organize a system of government that legislation may be passed for the welfare of the people generally. In other words, governments are the media through which national progress takes place. So Providence in cooperating with the people of Canada to bring about the splendid state of affairs which now obtains goes one better than did the good Tories of Toronto every time the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier visited that great city. They would turn out to hear him, they would listen to him, they would applaud him, but on election day—they would vote against him. Providence with Liberalism in the saddle goes beyond that kind of cooperation. He not only makes it possible for the Liberal party to come into power in Canada but when they are in power he cooperates with them in such a way that Canada's financial record is something of which we should all be proud.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in discussing the budget, made reference to the fact that Canada was geographically a very difficult country to govern. We all admit that Canada embraces a large area and is a large country to govern wisely. But we have no colour problem in Canada; we have no major racial problem here. Consequently when we hear hon. gentlemen talking about the difficulty of governing Canada, because of its being a large geographical unit extending from one sea to another, we are inclined to ask whether these hon. gentlemen know Canada from sea to sea, whether they know Canada province by province, whether they know Canada east by west and north by south and whether, knowing it, they understand the sentiments and objectives of the Canadian people. We have a large country to govern, but I believe that if we know our country as we ought and understand our problems as we should we can go forward and make history.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the national policy; he spoke of the notable things it had done for Canada. It was, according to him, a wonderful fiscal policy. But he did not tell us why in 1896 Canada was stagnant commercially, why Canada was at a standstill industrially, why Canada's imperial and world trade had become very diminutive in quantity. And the point is just this: that although the Conservatives introduced the national policy it took the Liberal party to understand the machine and to operate it in such a way, by adjustment from year to year and from decade to decade, as to promote the development of Canada and to bring about the prosperity and progress which we have to-day in this Dominion. The hon. member referred further to the many things the Conservative party had done from the standpoint of confederation. One would imagine, to hear him talk, that the Conservative party was really responsible for that great movement in Canada—the confederation or union, of all the British North American provinces on the shoulder of this continent and their consolidation from coast to coast, with the proud history which that union has written from that day to this. What are the facts? If we turn to history we shall find it indicated that the Conservative party was not the cause of that great movement—not at all. We know that one cause was the imperative necessity of wiping out the protective tariffs between the different provinces then existing. The protective tariffs of that day were detrimental to the development of trade and also to interprovincial cohesion; their removal became necessary and that was one of the causes of confederation in 1867. Another was the political deadlock which had come about. And still another was this: The people of the provinces were living in dread of the states to the south and consequently they did not feel themselves strong enough in a military way to combat the people across the boundary line. There we have the three and only causes of confederation, one political, one fiscal and one military. And when the movement took place Liberals and Conservatives combined, hand in hand, to bring about that great union under which Canada has prospered and which we hope will continue to grow stronger and stronger as the years come and go.

When we touch upon the question of confederation, when hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the extraordinary things done by the Conservative party, we ought to bring into the perspective some of the things which the Conservative party have not done. For instance, they did not stand by the Liberal party in fighting for the right to negotiate our own commercial treaties, which right was granted in the year 1907. They did not stand by the Liberal party in its action for the control of our immigration laws granted us in 1904 and for the bringing into existence of our navigation laws in 1870. They did not stand behind us in 1882 for the veto so far as the nomination of the Governor General is concerned; nor did they support the Liberal party in respect to its policy of securing Canadian representation on the privy council in 1897. And so far as the Ballot Act of 1874 is concerned, a great reform, the Liberal party had to put that act through by itself; and upon the secret ballot, to a large extent, has been built the political liberty and the financial and industrial welfare of this Dominion.

I noticed that the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), in his speech this afternoon used the term protection, and I was glad to hear him use that term; because sometimes when our hon. friends meet in national convention they seem to run away from it. They appear to be afraid of the expression. The last time—as a matter of fact I believe it was the first time in their history—they had a national convention, when they met in Winnipeg, they considered a resolution on the tariff. A copy of that resolution I have in my hand and that term protection does not appear in it. The resolution was moved by Mr. Haggerman, of Unity, Saskatchewan, a few miles south of the riding I have the honour to represent in this house, and it was spoken to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). The gentleman who moved the resolution came from one of the grain growing areas of western Canada and the idea was to have this resolution drafted in such a way that it would appeal to that section of the country and the rest of western Canada and thus secure the votes of the farmers and others on election day. Consequently the word protection is not used. In the first paragraph we are told about the wonderful growth, progress and prosperity of Canada under the historic fiscal policy, but the descriptive title of that policy is omitted. The reason for this we leave our hon. friends to explain. In the next paragraph we are told how adherence to this policy has brought about a gratifying development in Canada. As usual, our friends take all the credit for the development that has taken place in the Dominion since confederation. In the next paragraph they speak of revising and readjusting the tariff, and in the paragraph following that they submit the idea of a tariff commission, which was first appointed by the Liberal party. And in the last paragraph they deal with the question of preferential tariffs. Here is the statement they make on that question:

> And this convention expresses the view that while strong effort should be directed towards the establishment of a system of preferential tariffs—

As if the preferential tariff had not been established back in 1897.

> —throughout the empire, no preference should be given at the expense of the Canadian farmer or workman, and all such preference should be conditional upon the use of the Canadian ports.

The last part of that paragraph is of course Liberal policy. The statement is made that preferential tariffs must not bear upon the farmer or the working man. In other words, we have a sectional idea thrown into this explanation of policy, not recognizing the fact that if we are going to have empire preference it must be preference in a national sense. Sometimes one part of the nation will have to give a little, and at other times other sections of Canada will have to do the same; but as a whole a preferential policy is for all the Canadian people, and it is for us to stand by it, to develop it and to make it a greater instrument in tariff reform and in tariff adjustment than it was even when introduced in 1897.

We have heard quite a lot of discussion with regard to our national debt. I desire to touch that question briefly, and the thought comes to me that in discussing the national debt we should compare the records of both great political parties from confederation. This afternoon the hon. member for South Toronto said it was not fair to compare the reductions made in the national debt during the last few years, because the Conservatives were in power during the war and we should be as fair as possible and give them all the credit to which they are entitled. I want to do that, but I think it fair to compare the records of the two great parties on this matter from 1867 to 1929. When parties are in power they must accept responsibility; if a war comes along or upheavals of different kinds take place of course the party in power must accept the responsibility.

On March 31, 1928, our national debt was $2,296,850,232.92, and we are told that the estimated debt as of March 31, 1921, is $2,227,068,000. This year the reduction is approximately $69,000,000, and during the last six years we have paid off $226,708,000, or an average per year of $37,700,000. Previous to that the Liberal government made reductions in the national debt in 1900, 1903, 1904 and 1907; these reductions totalled $14,216,035, and if we add that amount to the reduction of $226,000,000 during the last six years we have a total reduction of $240,924,035. If that sum is divided by the twenty-eight years the Liberals have been in power we get exactly the amount the Liberals as a party have reduced our national debt. I think that is an eminently fair way of getting at the question in order to find out just what the Liberals and Conservatives have each done in the way of financially redeeming Canada; that is what each party has done by a policy of financial retrenchment and reform towards the solution of all the financial problems concerning Canada. We find that the Liberals have made an average annual reduction in the national debt of $8,571,428 for every year they have been in office. Now let us consider what the Conservatives have done. They were in power in Canada during thirty-four years; in 1871 they reduced the debt by $503,225; in 1882 by $1,734,129, in 1912 by $122,591 and in 1913 by $25,617,836. In other words, during their thirty-four years in office they reduced the national debt by about $27,000,000, which works out at the rate of about four-fifths of a million per year, or $822,875, to be exact.

There you have the record of the Liberals as compared with that of the Conservatives. The Liberals have faced the question of the national debt as a great responsibility; they have gone to work and reduced it, as any party should. From year to year the record of the Liberal party in connection with reductions in the national debt has been a splendid one, and it appears that year by year that record is getting better, because the cut of practically $70,000,000 this year is the largest reduction ever made. In thirty-four years the Conservative party made only four attempts to cut down the national debt, yet since the budget has been brought down hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us what we should do to reduce the debt. We have been told that we should abandon the policy that we have followed since 1922 and adopt a fixed method of paying off the debt over a term of years, and we have been told many times that the present leadership of the party is not as successful as it should be with regard to this great problem. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and his cabinet and Liberals generally are very well satisfied with what has been done by the party as a whole during the last nine years. We are told that we are not going fast enough and that we should inaugurate a sinking fund scheme in order to pay off the debt in forty or fifty years. If we continue the progress we have maintained since 1925 the national debt of Canada will be paid off in twenty-four years. Since 1925 we have reduced the debt by an average of $47,750,000 yearly, and if we continue at that rate for the next twenty-four years we will wipe out our national debt.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

It seems to me that this is a splendid record, but I have before me an article which appeared in Willison's Monthly, written by a Doctor H. P. Spaulding, in which he takes the opposite stand and says we are paying off our debt too quickly. He states that the Liberal party is using a sort of whirlwind method, that we are paying off sums of money from year to year which are too large, and that we should change our system and for the next five years pay $10,000,000 off the debt yearly. That would give us a reduction of $50,000,000,and we are told that at the end of the five-year period we should add $1,000,000 to that amount for the following thirty-five years, which would result in the national debt being wiped off in twenty-four years. In other words, Doctor Spaulding thinks we are going too fast, but to me that seems a very good proof that our policy with regard to this great question is sound. I believe that in times of peace we should face our national debt and reduce it as much as possible; we are responsible for the creation of that debt, and we should not leave it to be paid by posterity. When times are good we should reduce the debt as much as possible. It is not like building a hall for which posterity must pay, when they may have the use of the hall; this is an obligation which we should take seriously and solve in a way that will be to the greatest benefit to Canada as a nation.

So, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the national debt I would say we are going at it in the right way: I think we should continue just as we are doing at present until 1933 and 1934, when practically a billion dollars of our war debt will come due. That amount is all owed in Canada; when that comes due we should face that problem in all its aspects, and if we think we should do something different then let us evolve another policy and follow it through. However, with respect to our present method, I would say it is good, and I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the government on the wonderful financial record of this party during the last eight or nine years. I believe there is not a citizen of Canada who wants to be fair who would not say that the financial record of this government is bright and splendid and an honour to Canada.

In his address this afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) touched upon the question of imperial preference. Outside of the questions of tariff reform and financial retrenchment, I believe that that is a very important matter for the Liberal party to discuss. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the greatest statesmen that Canada has ever produced and whose name is honoured throughout Canada to-day, brought down that preferential policy, I believe he meant that to be the policy for Canadians in years to come. He believed that Canadians would accept that policy and would develop it loyally, patriotically and imperially. The Liberal party stands on that foundation to-day, and I believe we are on solid ground. For many years the Conservative party talked about loyalty and patriotism, talked about the wonderful empire to which we belonged, but it remained for Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of our party, to bring down that historic policy which will always be a factor in linking us more closely to Great Britain and the other portions of the empire. He brought down that policy the maximum development of which will make Liberalism stronger in Canada, and Canada a much stronger portion of the empire.

But what about the attitude of the Conservative party? The member for South Toronto told us this afternoon that we were making fiscal gestures toward the United States. During the course of this debate we have been told more than once that we are prone to barter away our fiscal liberties and have overlooked doing those things for our own country which would unite it more closely to the empire to which we belong. But what has history to say about that? What happened in Canada during the year 1849? We all know of the movement which took place during that year to bring about the annexation of this Dominion to the United States. Who took the lead in that movement ? Was it the Liberals of that day? No. The leaders of that movement were the ancestors, absolutely, of the Conservative party of the present day, and that movement was commenced because they felt that they had not a future in Canada.

We have been told this afternoon of the remarkable things the Tory party has done for the Dominion. We have been told about how they built the Canadian Pacific railway, but we were not informed how they failed to open up western Canada in order to make that great railway profitable. That undertaking could not be a success until the west was opened up. and that was brought about through the efforts of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party from the year 1896 onward. We have been told that the Conservative party is also responsible for the Canadian National railway system. That system is only another sample of the national policy. They brought the organization together to a certain extent on paper but it remained for the Liberal party to pick a man who knew how to run the machine and who was able last year to produce a surplus of $58,000,000. They had to pick a man who would make a great contribution in a railway sense to Canada, and Sir Henry Thornton has done that. We have to thank the Liberal party, and not the Conservative party, for selecting the right man to be put at the head of that great railway system. We have to thank the Liberal party for opening up the west in order to make the Canadian Pacific railway successful in a financial way. We have to thank the Liberal party for widening out the Dominion and giving Canada a start in playing a successful part in the development of our empire.

We have been told also that we should adopt a policy of retaliation. The principle of retaliation is always a false one. We should study our own fiscal problem; we should have a government which knows more and more about Canada; we should have faith in our Dominion and develop the necessary trade with the countries which will trade fairly with us and thus bring about the greater development of trade with them and the motherland as well. The import trade with the motherland has grown tremendously since 1868, when confederation took place, as is shown by the following figures:

1896..	32,000,000
1906..	69,000,000
1911..	110,000,000
1926..	163,000,000
1927..	214,000,000

Here we have an increase of $182,000,000 over the import trade for the year 1896. The drop in trade of $5,000,000 between the years 1868 and 1896 was one reason why Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the British preference and began to build up empire trade, one of the greatest steps ever taken by any Canadian to extend the trade of Canada beyond the boundaries of the Dominion. The above figures show what the British preference has done in the development of the import trade between Canada and the motherland. The following figures show the tremendous increase in our export trade with the motherland:

1896..	$ 62,000,000
1897..	77,000,000
1906..	127,000,000
1911..	136,000,000
1926..	512,000,000
1927..	542,000,000

Our total trade with the other portions of the empire was as follows:

1896..	$ 6,000,000

Those figures show our record of trade expansion and development with the motherland and the other portions of the empire. That is a great credit not only to the Liberal party but to Canada as a Dominion. We have also reduced the preferential rate from 21.6 per cent in 1922 to 16.4 per cent, which is the rate prevailing to-day. The preferential rate is the tariff rate which appeals to Canadians in the way of trade with the motherland, which trade is increasing in a way that is very encouraging.

When we come to solve the question of our fiscal problems with the United States we should not forget that we have a party possessing objectives as high and noble and as patriotic as any party could have. When we face that question I say, we are certainly going to solve it in a way which will be beneficial to our population as a whole.

Some people are wondering whether we shall be able to make the right kind of a bargain fiscally with the United States. Personally, I am not a bit afraid. I will stake a cabinet of Canadians against any cabinet in the world when it comes to bartering or organizing a fiscal policy which will be of lasting benefit to the country. Neither is there any danger of absorption by the United States nor by any other nation through the investments which have been made in this country. This is our present standing. Government securities in Canada total $4,200,000,000 and less than one-third of that total, or $1,300,000,000, is controlled outside of Canada. Surely we do not need to be afraid of economic control in regard to government securities. Railway securities total $3,500,000,000 and of that $1,400,000,000 is controlled outside of Canada. Mining stocks total $650,000,000 and one-half of that is controlled outside of Canada. Industrial securities total $4,050,000,000 and $1,300,000,000 of that is controlled outside of Canada. Trading establishment securities total $2,000,000,000, 90 per cent of which is controlled in Canada. Other public utilities total $3,100,000,000 and only one-third is controlled outside of Canada. In other words, out of a total of $16,000,000,000 of securities, only about $5,500,000,000 or one-third is controlled outside of Canada. So, financially speaking, I would say that we are on solid ground and, fiscally speaking, if our party and our leaders follow the reputation and the history of the Liberal party of the past, there will be no doubt about the future of Canada irrespective of what nation says: We will trade with you, or we will not trade with you.

In closing, I believe that while financial retrenchment is one principle of the Liberal party and fiscal reform another, there is still a further principle of great importance and Canada ought to be admired for adhering to it. That other principle which belongs to historic Liberalism is the principal of peace and the peace treaty that the Prime Minister of Canada signed last year in August in Paris is a proof that Canada is determined to play her part not only nationally but in an imperial and a world way in connection with international affairs,—that in a way I am sure will be gratifying to all Canadians. The Liberal party stands on the foundation principle of peace. It stands for internal peace, peace between one province and another, peace between the east and the west; peace, progress and development between Canada and the rest of the empire and peace with other nations. The idea is simply banishing war as an instrument of national policy and putting in its place the principle of peace. The sooner we take the lead in that—and we are doing so—the better for Canada. With regard to the question of peace not only within Canada but with other nations of the world we know that fiscally the Liberal party is doing what it can to work out a policy that will be of benefit to the whole Dominion.

Finally, in regard to Canada's relationship with the motherland, Sir James Owen, after visiting Canada in 1927, had this to say:

> The Canadians are developing along their own lines. One hears sometimes that they are being Americanized. There are no obvious signs of that. The Canadian does not speak like an American, nor does he think as an American. His outlook on life is less flamboyant than that of his neighbours across the border. There is in the Canadian a sobriety, a restraint, such as one would expect of a people who derive so largely from Scottish ancestry.

Then again Sir James says:

> Whether Canada will indefinitely remain a member of the British Empire is for the Canadians to say.

To that we will answer in the affirmative. He continues:

> I think the chances are that, having achieved their independence for all practical purposes, being linked to Great Britain and the empire by bonds intangible and spiritual, rather than material, the connection will persist, and may well become stronger with the passage of time, and the inevitable development of a common empire policy. But, whatever the future may have in store for us all, I am persuaded that Canadians will not surrender their independence, their nationhood, to become a mere appendix to the United States.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, "some men are born great, some achieve greatness, while some have greatness thrust upon them". I am in the latter category this afternoon in being fortunately selected to follow such an eloquent member as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McIntosh). I cannot agree with much of what he has said. I refer particularly to his statement regarding the reduction of the national debt. I cannot agree that surpluses should be wholly and entirely devoted to the reduction of our national debt while federal aid is refused to such important matters as technical education or the building of highways or provincial roads; and further, while we have upon our statute books legislation providing for the payment of old age pensions only one-half of which is to be borne by the federal government, the provinces which cannot afford to do so being expected to assume the other part of the burden. There are in this Dominion provinces—and I refer particularly to the maritime provinces—which because of their limited sources of revenue find it impossible to provide one-half of the money to pay old age pensions.

I had not intended to take part in this debate. After listening to the able address of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) I felt that the ground had been fully covered. I felt that he dealt with the budget address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in such a clear, concise and logical manner that there was little left for any other hon. member to dilate upon. I feel, however, that I was challenged by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) when he spoke in this debate and made references to the prosperity of my native province. He said that the prosperity there is remarkable. He referred in his address to the lamentations of hon. gentlemen opposite from Nova Scotia. I could not help pondering the terms that hon. gentlemen on the other side use when referring to hon. members on this side from the maritime provinces. The hon. member for Hants-Kings said "lamentations"; the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said "doleful utterances" and the Minister of Finance said "whinings". Judging by results, I think I am going to continue in my lamentations, doleful utterances and whinings if we can continue to get the definite results in the maritime provinces that we have succeeded in getting during the past three years. I do not think that such terms become hon. gentlemen, and I would ask them respectfully to refrain from using them in respect to hon. members of this house who are simply performing their duty to their constituents. I remember the terms and epithets used by hon. gentlemen opposite during the session of 1926 when hon. members on this side were presenting the grievances and claims of the maritime provinces. The question was asked, "What is meant by maritime rights?" and one hon. gentleman opposite said that it was nothing but Tory propaganda; another said it was a political catch-cry and still another, a slogan used to get into parliament. But that has not been borne out by facts, because the efforts of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house have proved fruitful of results. They were successful in having the Duncan commission appointed, and I would ask where were hon. gentlemen opposite when that commission commenced to function? Where were the Liberals of Nova Scotia when that commission took evidence in that province? They were conspicuous by their absence. Not one of them came before that commission to give evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend?

Mr. QUINN: Yes, I think my hon. friend did, but I believe he appeared in the interests of somebody.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked if my hon. friend appeared before the commission.

Mr. QUINN: Yes. I am pointing out that hon. gentlemen opposite are now taking credit for the appointment of the Duncan commission and whatever benefits followed from it.

Mr. RALSTON: In spite of the protest of my hon. friend.

Mr. QUINN: There were no protests from me. My only protest was in regard to the method of appointment of the commission. I would point out to my hon. friend that I gave the commission my wholehearted support, as did the whole Conservative party. May I further point out that Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his commission expressly thanked the Rhodes government of Nova Scotia for the splendid assistance which it gave to the commission in the brief which it presented.

The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Illsley) has spoken of the general prosperity throughout the country, and he referred particularly to the prosperity of Nova Scotia. I dislike very much referring to an hon. gentleman when he is not in his seat, but it is not my fault that he is not here at the moment. I would point out that his views with regard to prosperity in Nova Scotia do not coincide with the views that have been expressed by his Liberal friends in that province. An outstanding Liberal of Nova Scotia, a gentleman at the present time occupying a seat in the Nova Scotia house of assembly, Mr. A. S. MacMillan, in a speech delivered in the local assembly about the same time my hon. friend from Hants-Kings was making his speech in this house, referred particularly to the agricultural industry and the farmers of Nova Scotia. He said:

> Fifty per cent of the farms are going behind, twenty-five per cent of them are standing still, and twenty-five per cent of them are making a little progress.

Do these views coincide with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Hants-Kings? But we have other evidence. The junior member for Halifax in the local house of assembly also spoke of conditions in Nova Scotia and said that four members of his own family had had to go to another country in search of employment. The hon. member for Shelburne spoke along similar lines. Only the other day the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) told this house that he had personally visited the Cape Breton centres, and he told of the conditions which he saw among the miners and steel workers there. May I point out that the conditions among the miners and steel workers of Nova Scotia are in great measure due to the procrastination of this government in the matter of implementing to the full the recommendation of the Duncan commission with regard to assistance to the coal and steel industries. I shall not elaborate on that because it has already been dealt with in a very able manner by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald).

Another very important industry in Nova Scotia is the fishing industry. Only a few weeks ago a representative of the fishermen of eastern Nova Scotia came before a committee of this parliament and spoke of the conditions among the fishermen of Nova Scotia. Speaking before the committee on marine and fisheries, of which my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is chairman, Father Boudreau is reported as follows.

> Father Boudreau said he had many times seen the "gruesome picture of distress and poverty, numerous heads of families—fishermen, working hard, facing death itself sometimes in storms, and unfortunately losing their lives too often—I lost three men in one week in the fall of 1927—unable to get bare necessaries of life."
> He declared that everywhere on the eastern coast there were evident signs of distress. There had been a tremendous increase in the cost of living and in the cost of equipment.

I would ask the house if the views expressed by that clergyman coincide with the views expressed by the hon. member for Hants-Kings.

My hon. friend also said that prosperity was rampant in the city of Halifax. I would ask him if he reads his own Liberal newspaper, the official Liberal newspaper of Halifax, the Halifax Chronicle. What will he find there? He could pick up that paper any day during the last twelve months and see a whole page of properties advertised for sale for taxes. When people are unable to pay their taxes, is that an evidence of prospcrity? I am afraid my hon. friend has been in bad company, that he has been associating too much with the financial interests which have all been giving us such glowing reports of the prosperity of this country. As I pointed out to the members of this house a year ago, prosperity cannot be measured by the financial reports of the banks and financial institutions of this country. You have to go down among the workmen, the farmers and the fishermen, the mechanics and the labourers, to find out if there is real prosperity in this country, and as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, when they feel the jingle of the money in their pockets, they can tell you whether the country is prosperous or not.

Before I leave the question of the fisheries, may I read to the house a resolution which I have received from the municipality of the county of Halifax:

> Whereas it has been reported that the Department of Fisheries is about to abolish the office of inspector of fish curing and packing and have the work thereof done by the fishery overseers;
> And whereas the fishing overseers have with their present duties as much work as they can satisfactorily perform;
> And whereas the thorough inspection of the quality of fish cured or pickled and of the containers and a general supervision of the same by a competent official is an absolute necessity both to fisherman and the trade;
> And whereas the county of Halifax having a large fishing population and trade, is vitally interested in the matter;
> Be it therefore resolved that the county council of the municipality of Halifax county, strongly urge upon the Department of Fisheries of Canada, that the office of inspector of fish curing and packing be retained and a competent man be appointed at once to the same.

Having put that resolution before the house, I would ask the responsible members of the government present to take cognizance of it.

The Minister of Finance has told this house that the government has been practising economy. I take issue with him when he states that this is a government of economy. I say that it is a government of extravagance, and that has been demonstrated on many an occasion. Take only one instance, the building of a magazine and arsenal on the shores of Bedford basin at Halifax. A contract was let to the same gentleman I mentioned a little while ago, who seems to be a political favourite of this government, Mr. A. S. MacMillan. The contract was for $57,900. After various delays in commencing work on the contract the government paid him $10,948, which along with other extras brought the contract up to $72,138.30. This is taken from the Auditor General's report of March 31, 1927. I understand a considerable amount has been paid to this gentleman since that time. I have not taken the trouble to look at the total figures in connection with the building of the magazine and arsenal on the shores of Bedford basin.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that the delays were caused during the regime of the so-called "shadow government"?

Mr. QUINN: That may sound clever, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RALSTON: It is the fact.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason they cancelled the first tender.

Mr. QUINN: It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that this government has committed itself to an unwarrantable expenditure. But while it was spending too large an amount of money to build an arsenal for the storage of ammunition and other war material, the Prime Minister was in Europe putting his signature to the peace treaty for the renunciation of war.

On May 31, 1928, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) asked the following questions:

1. Amount paid A. S. MacMillan or MacMillian Construction Company by all departments of the government for all material supplied by them on account of Hudson bay or Hudson straits during the year 1927.
2. Amount paid to Halifax firms by all departments of the government during the year 1927 for supplies to Hudson bay and Hudson straits.
3. Whether supplies were by tender.
4. If so, give details of tenders.

Just one year later—very prompt—we have the answers to these questions. The Department of Railways and Canals answered the second, third and fourth questions as follows:

2. $30,336.96 was paid to Halifax firms during the year 1927 for all supplies on account of the Hudson Bay railway terminals.
3. Supplies were not by tender, with the exception of 400 tons anthracite stove coal, in bags.
4. Tenderers and prices for the 400 tons anthracite stove coal in bags were as follows:—S. Cunard & Co. Ltd., Halifax, $20.45 net ton. Dartmouth Coal & Supply Co., Dartmouth, $18 net ton.

The order was placed with S. Cunard & Co. Ltd., at $20.45 net ton, as their offer was for immediate delivery and this coal was urgently required for furtherance to Hudson bay.

There is another instance of extravagance. They paid $2.45 per ton more to one firm because it was a Liberal concern, than they would have had to pay to the other, and their only excuse is that the coal was urgently needed. I claim it would not have taken more than two or three days to have had the coal supplied at $18 a ton. The Department of Marine and Fisheries answered the questions in this way:

1. The amount paid Mr. A. S. MacMillan for materials supplied for the Hudson strait expedition (1927), $40,721.99.

MacMillan is not doing too badly. He seems to be getting a great deal of preference from this government.

2. The amount paid to Halifax firms for materials supplied for said expedition is, $139,511.43.
3. In all cases where the quantities and nature of the goods required warranted, the purchases were negotiated by tender.

By tender. It does not say by open tender, as is evident from the answer to the fourth question, where they set out the "firms asked" and the "prices quoted". They did not advertise in the newspapers for tenders, but they asked their political favorites to quote prices. We find again that A. S. MacMillan was successful, his price of $37,644 being accepted. There are six other concerns—Liberal concerns; I know them all. Evidently the government did not advertise in the public press for tenders for those supplies. The answer proceeds:

(2) Lumber and timber outside buildings contract. A. S. MacMillan, $650.

The same man again. Then I come to the next section of the answer:

(3) Provisions. Tenders were invited from—

And they give the names of three grocery firms. Several other concerns were not asked to tender. I submit this is simply extravagance, because if open tenders had been called for lower prices would have been submitted, and the contracts could have been given to the lowest tenderer. This is what any real business administration would have done. Next come the medical supplies. I find another Liberal firm figuring here. The head of the firm, Hon. Mr. Kinley, has been very prominent in Liberal circles in the province and aspires to be one of the leaders of the party in the local house. His firm was paid $3,112.38. Kinleys are not wholesale dealers in medical supplies. Why did not the government ask the National Drug and Chemical Company to tender if they wanted to practise economy? I submit that their ideas of economy are rather loose, to say the least.

I find another instance of the extravagance of this government. In the last couple of weeks the government have been advertising for applications for positions in the civil service representing a total annual expenditure in salaries of $70,120. I submit that as our country is not growing in population we should be prepared to get along with the civil servants that we already have.

Now, sir, I intend to refer again to the report of the Duncan commission on maritime claims. Let me quote from that report at page 28:

> Very considerable evidence was laid before us on behalf of the maritime provinces, to show that in the public pronouncements of responsible ministers over a long period of time, and indeed in the statutory obligations under which railway companies operate, there is to be found the most explicit pledge that Canadian trade will be developed through Canadian ports, and yet, in spite of that pledge, ports such as Halifax and St. John are, it is stated, not being fully utilized.

That brings me, sir, to something which has happened in the last few days in the city of Montreal. The maritime board of trade and the Halifax harbour commission have asked the Board of Railway Commissioners for a lower export rate on grain. A reduction in the rate to the port of Quebec has already been granted. Halifax and St. John are asking for rates to their ports in proportion to the rate granted to the port of Quebec. On March 13 the council of the Montreal board of trade endorsed a resolution adopted by the Montreal Corn Exchange opposing the application to the Board of Railway Commissioners by the Halifax harbour commission and the Halifax board of trade for a reduction from 35.5 cents to 19.34 cents per hundred pounds on the all-rail rate on grain for export from Fort William, Port Arthur and Armstrong via the National Transcontinental railway to Halifax and St. John. The endorsation will be forwarded to the Board of Railway Commissioners, the Montreal board of trade believing that it would be ill-advised for any action to be taken which would upset the present rate situation as between the various Atlantic ports in the United States and Canada. They decided to draw the attention of the railway commission to the serious loss in revenue to the Canadian railways and other transportation interests from rate reduction on an isolated commodity or on a movement to a certain port when general rate reductions are in contemplation. The application has been before the Board of Railway Commissioners for several months, but as yet no date for its hearing has been set.

[Mr. Quinn.]

The Royal Grain Inquiry Commission reported in January, 1925. A member of the commission was J. G. Scott, of Quebec, who submitted a supplementary report on "Transportation". In his report Mr. Scott declared that the railway companies:

> —should make the rates on export wheat and flour from Armstrong or Fort William to Quebec or Montreal 11 cents per bushel, and to Halifax and Saint John 12 cents per bushel, so that they may get the winter traffic, and thus carry out the recommendation of the Quebec Board of Trade, endorsed by the special committee of the senate. Moreover,—

The commissioner added.

> —it is the duty of the government to do this, because it was on the distinct promise to parliament in 1904, that the Transcontinental would cheapen the rates of freight upon western grain to Canadian seaports, that the people consented to the building of this railway, which has cost the country $160,000,000. It is a breach of faith with the eastern seaports to keep the rate of freight at such a figure as to prevent this being done, after the railway has proved its ability to do it, and do it profitably.

That is the report of a commissioner appointed by the Dominion government, and reporting in 1925.

Up to August, 1927, the rates on grain from the head of the lakes to Quebec and to maritime ports stood—

> To Quebec, 34.5 cents per hundred pounds.
> To Halifax, 35.5 cents per hundred pounds.

Or 1 cent greater to Halifax.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. QUINN: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was drawing to the attention of hon. members of this house the discriminatory rate on grain to the maritime ports of St. John and Halifax as compared with the rate to Quebec, and I was dealing with the protest of the Montreal Corn Exchange and the Montreal board of trade. This protest declared:

> . . . . the board of trade believing that it would be ill-advised for any action to be taken in the matter of rates which would upset the present rate situation as between the various Atlantic ports in the United States and Canada.

This attitude is very difficult to understand, because the rate situation was very much upset when the new rate of 18.34 cents per hundred pounds was given to St. Lawrence ports, creating a severe discrimination against the maritime ports. We have heard talk of retaliation or reprisals by the United States if Canada tried, through rail rate making, to keep her own traffic for her own ports. Why is it, if this is the case, that retaliation did not follow the announcement of the new St. Lawrence rate? It is useless to pretend that this new rate has not increased grain shipments through St. Lawrence ports very materially. In 1927 the deliveries to Quebec elevators amounted to 9,773,376 bushels while in 1928, after the new rate took effect, they amounted to 12,276,082 bushels, so it will be seen that the increase was very large. Let us remind those who talk of retaliation of what Commissioner Scott said in his report, at page 212:

> The fear of retaliation on the part of American railways is not well founded. Is it likely that they would reduce their rates to an unprofitable basis for their own traffic, simply as a retaliation because Canadian railways made rates to bring Canadian traffic to their own seaports? . . . . there is no sentiment about it. Why should we not carry our own grain, over our own railways, to our own seaports? As the senate committee reported to the government, this cannot be injurious to our railways, because it is an export traffic which practically they are not getting at all. The railroad tariff prevents it.

Let it be remembered that those are not the words of an irresponsible individual; they are the words and the advice of a federal government commissioner.

In their application for a 19.34 cents rate the Halifax Harbour Commissioners declare:

> Our board felt that before we could make any serious effort to attract grain to this port, this wide discrepancy had to be adjusted.

The maritime people ask, in all fairness, if such heavy discrimination should be permitted longer to exist. The application of the Maritime board of trade, dated June 29, 1928, states:

> 1. That the National Transcontinental railway was constructed for the purpose of creating a route to Halifax and St. John that would provide for, among other matters, the transporting of Canada's exportable surplus of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John at rates that would not exceed those to other north Atlantic ports.
> 2. That an all-rail rate of 19.34 cents per 100 pounds as requested in this application is necessary in order that the National Transcontinental railway be used for the purpose for which it was constructed.
> 3. That the board did, in general order no. 448, dated August 26, 1927, recognize this matter as one of national importance and directed the Canadian National Railways to publish an export rate, on grain, of 18.34 cents per 100 pounds to Quebec city. This order was complied with by the publication of C.N.R. tariff no. C.G. 93, G.R.C. no. E1268.
> 4. That the same conditions and circumstances surround the extension of the export rate on grain to St. John and Halifax as applied in the decision of the board with respect to the rate to Quebec city.
> 5. That, in view of the national importance of this matter, we would respectfully urge that it is expedient that this matter be given immediate attention by the board.

The case for the maritime ports is unassailable; this maritime claim is based on the soundest of ground.

I well remember, Mr. Speaker, the year 1904, when representatives of the Liberal government came to the city of Halifax; these included Right Hon. W. S. Fielding and the then Halifax representative, Mr. William Roche, who later was appointed to the Senate. I attended the meeting, and these two gentlemen asked the people of Halifax and the people of Nova Scotia to give them a mandate to build the Transcontinental railway, promising that if this mandate were given it would mean a tremendous benefit to the port of Halifax. That mandate was given; the people of Halifax and of Nova Scotia believed in the pledged words of those prominent politicians and sent a solid representation from Nova Scotia, fully believing that if they did so it would mean a tremendous benefit to the port of Halifax and to Nova Scotia generally. To-day, sir, I ask that those promises and those pledges be fulfilled, just as I have asked that the promises and pledges made by public men at the time of confederation should be kept. We are not here from the maritimes, as has been pointed out before, as supplicants or mendicants; we only ask for these things because we are partners in this great business, this great confederation known as the Dominion of Canada. We came into confederation believing that justice would be done to the maritime provinces, and we are demanding that the pledges and promises which were given be fulfilled. I put this matter up directly to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and ask that he bend every energy, use every influence at his command and obtain the support of his colleagues on that side of the house toward preventing the carrying out of the requests contained in the resolutions of the Montreal grain exchange and the Montreal board of trade. With his tremendous influence I know he can prevent the granting of these selfish and sectional requests.

I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted as being anti-American. I give credit to the great country to the south of us for the excellent management of their affairs, but I ask the government of this country to exercise the same care in administering the affairs of Canada. Canada has a great future; it is a country with wonderful possibilities and splendid resources of the farm, forest, sea and mines, and with the proper government administration, backed up with virile manhood such as we have in our country, I look forward with every hope and assurance to the day when Canada can maintain its position as a part of the greatest empire ever known; when it can take its place amongst the greatest nations of the world.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I am sure after you have listened to the different speeches which have been offered during the last three or four weeks on the important matter of the budget, or what is perhaps more properly known as the annual statement of the government for ths year 1928, that you will feel, as I do, that the quicker this debate is brought to a close the better it will be for all concerned. However, I have not raised my voice very often during the last three or four years, and I may be pardoned if I take up a few minutes in discussing certain questions which have been brought to the attention of the house during the past two or three weeks. I have listened with a great deal of interest to most of the speeches, and while I cannot refer to all of them, I would like to discuss some of the remarks which were made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Quinn).

In concluding his remarks the hon. member referred to speeches delivered by Mr. Fielding and the late Hon. Mr. Roche with regard to the Transcontinental railway. Although the hon. member did not intend to do it, he paid a compliment to the Liberal party when he spoke of the building and the completion of that road. If Mr. Fielding's ideas and the ideas of the Liberal party had been carried out, more grain would be flowing over the Transcontinental to the port of Halifax than is the case at the present time. When the Liberal party was defeated in 1911, and when our Conservative friends came into power, instead of trying to build up the port of Halifax through the construction of that road, they started in to cut the grades down and put in wooden bridges instead of the iron bridges which had been contemplated by the Liberal party and the Transcontinental commissioners. Therefore, the Conservative party and not the Liberal party is to blame for the fact that more traffic is not going through the port of Halifax to-day.

Let us compare the record of the Liberal party with regard to the port of Halifax with the record of the Conservative party. We do not hear anything about what was done for the port of Halifax between the years 1911 and 1921, the ten years during which our Conservative friends were in power. But what did they really do for that port? Practically nothing. It is only since the Liberal party came into power in 1922 that the port has been developed, and everyone knows that during the last three years the traffic through the port of Halifax has amounted to three times the traffic which went through it during the years of the Conservative regime, with the possible exception of the war period. Who has spent money on the port of Halifax? The hon. member reminds me of some people with whom I have done business; the more you do for them the less they appreciate it. If you do ninety-nine good turns for them and you can not do the hundredth, they will turn on you and rend you. That seems to be the attitude of the hon. junior member for Halifax. Does my hon. friend condemn the Liberal party because we are going to vote five million dollars in a few days for the Halifax harbour commission? Does my hon. friend condemn us because a contract was given the other day to the gentleman he named for $300,000 to cover certain work for the harbour commission? Does he condemn the expenditure of $2,500,000 for cold storage facilities in the port of Halifax, $700,000 of which is being voted this year? The hon. member said that nothing had been done for this country or for the province of Nova Scotia during the time the Liberal party had a solid sixteen here from the province of Nova Scotia. Let me say to him that since I have been in parliament I have done as much as he has, and a great deal more. I have stood up for the port of Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia, while he has voted against the things which this government tried to do for that province and that port.

The hon. member referred to the fact that the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) had spoken of the lamentations, the whinings and complainings of Jeremiah which came from the Conservative side. I do not think my hon. friend on this side of the house has used the right terms and the hon. junior member for Halifax, being musically inclined, will be able to appreciate what I am going to say. During the last three years, day in and day out, session in and session out, they have talked about the Duncan report and have endeavoured to take the credit for what the Liberal party has done. We have heard complaints made that the Liberal government has not fulfilled 100 per cent the pledges or the promises contained in the Duncan report, and when they keep talking about this matter they remind me of a night I spent last year in one of the theatres in the city of Ottawa. One of the vaudeville stunts that evening was a competition among old fiddlers. There were nine or ten of these fiddlers on the platform, some with whiskers down to their knees, and they had fiddles which were about one hundred years old. One of the contestants started and he ran over his fiddle, and there were wailings, gnashings of teeth, and caterwauling—that is the word I wanted to remind the hon. member of—and then the next one played his little piece. They all played just the same as my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, who have been playing, rasping and wailing on their fiddles, sometimes only on one string, and all being led by the leader of the orchestra, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). They complain that the Duncan report has not been carried out in its entirety, but I am going to show that not only have the Liberal party carried out that Duncan report in its entirety, but they have carried it out in one case to the extent of over 150 per cent; they have gone too far with it.

Before I take up that particular phase of the matter, I would like to refer to one or two things which were mentioned by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) with regard to certain contracts which have been given in the city of Halifax. In order to make his point against one of the Liberal members of the local legislature, he referred to a contract given to that gentleman two or three years ago by the Department of National Defence. It is quite true that Mr. MacMillan was given a contract, I think in June, 1926, by the Department of National Defence. Tenders were called for and when this government went out of power on the 1st of July, 1926, the contract had not been awarded. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) came in as Minister of National Defence and he and my good friend the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) met in solemn conclave and gave the contract to Mr. A. S. MacMillian. Does the hon. junior member for Halifax disagree with his colleague the senior member who gave Mr. MacMillian that contract at the price of his tender? What happened? Mr. MacMillan, after receiving the contract, assembled his plant, brought horses, teams and men from the county of Antigonish and started work. He did certain work there and then some of our Tory friends in Halifax—no doubt my hon. friend the junior member for that city knows something about this—thought it would never do to see this Grit contractor do the work and so they got after somebody in Ottawa with the result that he had to cease work. He had to send his horses home and he had to disorganize his whole staff, the result being that afterwards, when he was asked to complete his contract, he put in a bill for $9,000 for extras, and if anybody is to blame for his putting in that bill, the Conservatives at Halifax should assume the blame and not try to load it off on to this government or the contractor.

The hon. junior member for Halifax referred to Mr. MacMillan's contract at Hudson bay. I know, Mr. Speaker, you are most generous; sometimes I think you are perhaps a little deaf, because this afternoon the junior member for Halifax was unquestionably entirely out of order in referring to the contract which Mr. MacMillan had to take supplies to Hudson bay, the reason being that papers have been called for and the matter is now before the public accounts committee. But since you allowed the junior member for Halifax to mention the matter, perhaps I may be permitted to reply to him. Mr. MacMillan has nothing to hide in connection with the matter. The Liberals in Nova Scotia are willing to have the public accounts committee meet and Mr. MacMillan will come to Ottawa and give a good account of himself.

But my hon. friend says that another member in the Nova Scotia legislature, Mr. Kinley, sold $3,000 worth of drugs to the Hudson's bay expedition. My good friend, with tears in his eyes, complained because Tory druggists in Halifax did not have a chance to put in a price or to get this contract. Why should they? I want to congratulate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) because he did not ask Tory druggists or Tory contractors to contract for anything with regard to Hudson's bay. Perhaps I might have had something to do with that myself; I might have given him a hint that that was the proper way to do the thing, because this government is entirely too prone to give Tories contracts and positions when the Liberal party is in power. Let me say to the junior member for Halifax: It is true Mr. Kinley got a contract for $3,000 worth of drugs and he made the huge profit of $90 on that $3,000 contract.

Mr. BENNETT: How does the hon. member know?

Mr. DUFF: I happen to know. Perhaps I was the auditor. Mr. Kinley is quite willing to come before the public accounts committee and explain this little transaction of $3,000. He is a man who has given the best years of his life to the public service of the country and one who is now a member of the Nova Scotia legislature.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, while I permitted the hon. member for Halifax to refer to this particular matter, it was because at the beginning of the session the whole of the Auditor General's report is referred to the public accounts committee and the Chair cannot know in advance what subject matter will be taken up for investigation. Otherwise, we could not discuss anything in the house, because the Auditor General's report covers so many subjects.

Mr. DUFF: Well, Mr. Speaker, you and I need not have any quarrel about the rules of the house because we are both pretty well grounded in them. The junior member for Halifax this afternoon also complained that the government did not continue the aid for technical education and for highways. These are not matters for the federal government at all. If Sir Robert Borden, when he was Prime Minister of Canada, was good enough —or perhaps did not realize exactly what he was doing—to vote federal moneys for these purposes, that is no reason why the present government should do the same. My hon. friend complained that the Conservative government in Halifax, led by a previous Speaker of this house, was not able on account of lack of revenue, to put into effect old age pensions for which this parliament voted 50 per cent. My hon. friend evidently did not read the newspapers lately or the report which was filed in Halifax a few days ago by the provincial treasurer. because that report shows that this year the Tory government in Halifax collected $2,000,000 more than the Liberal party did in 1925. Consequently there is no excuse for not putting into effect the Old Age Pension Act. If the Conservative government do not do it, the Liberal government when they come into power will certainly see that the old people in Nova Scotia are properly cared for.

Mr. BENNETT: "A thoroughly vicious principle."

Mr. DUFF: It is too bad we have any poor at all, but they will always be with us. The junior member for Halifax referred to conditions in Nova Scotia. The other day the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) spoke about his trip through that province. I never go to Winnipeg or Toronto and come back and wail about conditions in those cities. Why should the hon. member for North Winnipeg, who had a nice trip to Nova Scotia, come back and, because perhaps in the town of Glace Bay the streets were not paved with gold or even with concrete, or there was not proper sewage, or some children perhaps did not have proper clothing, say that Nova Scotia was not in fairly good shape or condition? My hon. friend should be very very careful about making any of those remarks because that is either a provincial or a civic matter in Glace Bay. He should not forget that the president of the United Mine Workers for Nova Scotia is mayor of the town of Glace Bay. Perhaps Nova Scotia is not as prosperous as it might be or as we would like to see it, but there is no need for anyone in this parliament or anywhere else to try to make other members from different parts of the country believe that Nova Scotia is not in fairly good condition.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member mean to say that conditions in the mining areas of Nova Scotia are satisfactory to him?

Mr. DUFF: No, they will never be satisfactory to me. I would like to see every miner get $50 a day if the British Empire Steel Corporation could pay it. Conditions in the mining area, however, were never as good as they are just now since the Liberal government came into power in this country, and I will prove that in just a moment. They are so good in the county of Inverness—I see my hon. friend from Inverness smiles—that this government is appropriating $375,000 to buy out the Inverness railway. My hon. friend said that there was no prosperity in Nova Scotia. He bewailed the fact and he played on his old fiddle with his strings rasping up and down—Duncan report, 100 per cent; Duncan report, not fulfilled. He went on for five or ten minutes and he said that conditions in Nova Scotia were terrible. I do not want the house to take my word for conditions in our province, but the junior member for Halifax—

Mr. QUINN: I rise to a point of order. I did not say that conditions in Nova Scotia were unsatisfactory. I was quoting from representative Liberals in Nova Scotia in connection with the comments of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. DUFF: Then my hon. friend admits that conditions in Nova Scotia are good?

Mr. QUINN: You are not going to put words into my mouth.

Mr. DUFF: Of course not; I do not have to. But you put words into my mouth. Certainly the hon. member tried to make the house believe this afternoon that conditions in Nova Scotia were not good.

Mr. QUINN: I did not.

Mr. DUFF: I hold in my hand extracts from a certain newspaper in the province of Nova Scotia, one that is pretty well versed as to conditions in our province, and although it sometimes supports the Tory party, yet on the whole it is not a bad newspaper. Here is what it says, under the heading "Facts for Fact-Finders:"

1. Statistics compiled by Sydney B. Smith, Ottawa, for the Fnancial Post, list gains in business, 1928 over 1927, as follows:

Prairies	16.2	per cent
Maritimes	15.0	"
Quebec	13.5	"
British Columbia	12.0	"
Ontario	10.0	"

The maritimes thus stand first in business gains in all Canada outside the prairies.

That is from the Halifax Herald, the Conservative organ in Nova Scotia. But let us go a little further:

Facts for Fact-Finders

2. Nova Scotia led all Canada in gain in percentage of construction in 1928, according to MacLeans' figures quoted by Cockfield, Brown and Company. The following is a paragraph from the Canadian Business Preview of that advertising organization:

"With the exception of Manitoba and Ontario, there was a decided increase in building in each province. The largest percentage was in Nova Scotia with a gain of 408.6 per cent over 1927 figures.

Of course, the junior member for Halifax forgets that we are spending $3,000,000 to build a new hotel and railway station at Halifax, and that we are spending millions of dollars for other purposes in that province.

Mr. QUINN: Tell that to MacMillan.

Mr. DUFF: Let us look at some other facts about the province of Nova Scotia, which our friends on the other side try to make out is in such a deplorable condition, and they expect us to whine and caterwaul with them, to bring our fiddles here and all harp on that one string. I continue to quote from the Halifax Herald:

Roger Babson, famous economist and statistician, issues each month a map in colours showing the sales and credit opportunities of the different parts of the country. When a district is printed in gold it means that the sales opportunities in that district are very favourable.

For the first time in many years Roger Babson has put the maritime provinces in gold. This is what he says about them:

"Both New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have shown so sustained an increase in general business conditions that we have entered them as gold areas on the Babson's sales map for the first time in many years. The maritime provinces may be considered an excellent field for sales campaigns."

And yet the junior member for Halifax tried to leave the impression on the house this afternoon that the maritime provinces are not in a fairly good condition.

Mr. QUINN: My hon. friend—

Mr. DUFF: I did not interrupt my hon. friend this afternoon, and I think he might do me the courtesy not to interrupt me. He quoted this afternoon the saying that "some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." May I paraphrase that by saying "some men are born small, they never develop, but shrivel up and die."

Here is fact No. 4 for fact-finders, taken again from the Halifax Herald:

There is nothing wrong with business conditions in Halifax, Nova Scotia or the maritimes. We show an increase of 31 per cent over last year and our plant is working to capacity twenty-four hours a day.

That is from R. C. Moir, Ben's Limited, Halifax. I have another article here from the same newspaper headed "Optimism Generally Recognized." It says:

Business in the maritime provinces, especially in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, was never as good as it is to-day.

With regard to business conditions in the province of Nova Scotia, may I quote from another gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, a gentleman with great business ability, in the province of Nova Scotia. About a fortnight ago—I do not know whether it was during or before the Easter holidays—he went to Halifax to attend a meeting of a certain company in that province, and as president or chairman of the board of directors he sat at the head of the table and kept order during the proceedings. After the meeting was over he gave a statement to the press. It appears in the Halifax Herald, a Conservative organ. The article is headed, "Steel Company Directors Optimistic," and says:

There was a larger tonnage of steel put through the works at Trenton with some additional profit. Joint operation of the ore mines at Wabana has been found to be more economical than separate management.

The report shows the total assets of the company to be $31,544,073.29. Respecting the company's operations, the report says, "The prospects for the coming year are more hopeful—"

Listen to this, which is happening under a Grit government in power at Ottawa:

"The prospects for the coming year are more hopeful, as extensive contracts have been secured for the power shops, which will not only keep them fully occupied for some months, but will improve conditions at company's main works."

I congratulate the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) for having the good sense and the courage to make that report to his fellow-directors. May I add that part of that contract which the Trenton steel works is now getting the benefit of was given to them by the Canadian National railways on account of the increased business coming from the West Indies treaty, which some of my hon. friends opposite do not seem to think very much of. An order for 500 refrigerator cars for the transportation of fruit was given to this plant, and when the cars are built they will be sent to Halifax and St. John to move fruit which the West Indies steamers will bring from Jamaica and other ports in the West Indies.

With regard to the Duncan report, previous to this commission being appointed we were told that there was a certain corporation in the province of Nova Scotia which was strangling the life of that province. We heard the same old wailings, that the province was being strangled by a great octopus, and if the Conservatives were put into power they would see that this octopus was quickly unscrambled. Well, the Conservative government has been in power in Nova Scotia for three years now, and this octopus still remains as it was before 1925; no attempt has been made by the provincial government to unscramble it.

But there are two Duncan reports. One is known as the federal Duncan report, and the other is known as the provincial Duncan report, and I am going to make a comparison to show how the Conservative government in Nova Scotia carried out the provincial Duncan report, and how the Liberal government at Ottawa carried out the federal Duncan report.

The provincial Duncan commission was appointed before the federal commission, and although the former commission long since reported to the premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Rhodes, not one thing has been done about it. There has been no attempt made by the provincial government to carry out that Duncan report, and let me say in answer to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that most of that Duncan report referred to conditions in the mining area in Cape Breton. If any government has the responsibility of looking after the conditions of the workingmen in the province of Nova Scotia, it is the government of that province, and not the federal government.

Now what did the federal government do with regard to the federal Duncan report? We reduced the freight rates in the province of Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces some 20 per cent, giving relief to the people of the maritime provinces to the amount of about $3,000,000 a year. The Canadian National railways gave over a very large amount to the province of Nova Scotia for provincial and municipal taxes, and the Conservative government in power at Halifax, instead of passing part of that along to the municipalities, put it all in their own treasury. This parliament also passed legislation with respect to coking plants, to ensure that coal from the mining areas in Cape Breton, and from Stellarton and Springhill, should be used in the manufacture of coke. Then, sir, we gave a special grant of $200,000 to move coal during the winter months from Nova Scotia to Montreal and points further west. We also appointed harbour commissions for the ports of Halifax and St. John; and while I cannot discuss those harbour commissions, there is no doubt that money has been spent freely in the maritime provinces because of those appointments. Then $700,000 was voted for the erection of that great cold storage plant at Halifax.

The Duncan report recommended that certain districts in Nova Scotia should be given railway communication. I want to thank the government and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), the minister from Nova Scotia (Mr. Ralston) and the Canadian National Railways management for arranging that this session the Guysborough railway bill should again come before parliament. I hope and trust in the interests of that part of Nova Scotia that the House of Commons and the Senate will pass the bill so that the railway may be built in the very near future. In addition to providing money for the Guysborough railway this Liberal government—although the riding is represented by a Conservative—is setting aside $375,000 for the Inverness railway.

There is another important matter, and I referred to it at the outset of my speech. Not only has this government tried to carry out the recommendations of the Duncan report 100 per cent, but in one case they have carried them out 150 per cent. I was rather surprised to read in Hansard a few days ago, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), that in the year of Our Lord 1928 this government had paid to the Conservative government in Halifax the huge sum of about $1,300,000. The Duncan report recommended that till such time as a conference had been held and the matter of subsidies investigated, a lump sum payment should be made to each of the three maritime provinces, and in the case of Nova Scotia they named an annual payment of $875,000. We did not object to that, sir, we on this side of the house voted that this should be done, and in 1927 $875,000 was paid to the provincial government of Nova Scotia. But the following year, for some reason which I cannot fathom, this government were so generous that they carried out the Duncan report in this respect 150 per cent and gave the provincial government $875,000, plus $437,500. I do not agree with this.

But my hon. friends opposite do not appreciate this liberality, and in the house and before the country they charge that the government are not doing what they should do in carrying out the recommendations contained in the Duncan report. They say, Oh, you have done nothing for coal and steel. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to show that we did do something for these great industries of the province. We reduced the freight rates 20 per cent, and certainly the steel and coal companies of Nova Scotia benefited by that reduction more than anyone else. We have also, as I have pointed out, given $200,000 to assist the movement of coal to Montreal and points west. As we all know, the application for further tariff protection on steel is before the tariff advisory board. My only regret in regard to that application is that my good friend from Pictou, who is an able business man and who knows the steel and coal industry perhaps better than any other man in Canada, could not convince his own confreres and the steel companies of Ontario to get together and decide what they want in the way of further protection. The trouble is that the steel companies all over the country are divided on this matter, and that is one reason why the tariff commission finds it so difficult to decide what shall be done by way of relief, if any.

Now, let me make a suggestion or two in regard to improving the conditions in the coal and steel industry of Nova Scotia. One hon. gentleman on the other side of the house spoke of the conflicting interests in the various sections of this great country. That, sir, is why in my opinion we cannot raise the duty on coal, and as far as I am concerned my voice will be heard against any such proposal. I believe in lower tariffs. Two years ago I voted with the government to increase the duty on slack coal to 50 cents. This was all right; but certainly as a Liberal and a low-tariff man I would not agree to a further increase in this duty. If it were raised, say, from 50 cents to a dollar a ton, it would only mean that the consumers in this country would have to pay the extra price.

But there is a remedy, sir. I said, in answer to my hon. friend, that conditions in the mining area were better this year than they have been for a long time. The men are getting more days' work now than they have been in past years. But certain things might be done to still further improve the conditions. They are trying to take advantage of the movement of coal west on the three-dollar rate which was arranged by this government with the Canadian National Railways. I am told, sir, that the Canadian National can carry coal from Sydney to Montreal and further west for two dollars a ton; I am told that they can carry it even for $1.70. If so, the lower rate should be put into effect. A rate of two dollars a ton would mean a great deal to the coal industry of Nova Scotia, because millions of tons of coal now imported from the United States for use in Quebec and Ontario could be displaced by our own coal.

Then again, sir, the movement might be further encouraged in this way. At present it commences in December. My information is that if in the Sydney and Cape Breton areas the movement was started in November it would mean a great deal to the local mines. With regard to Springhill and Stellarton, the rate should apply all the year round instead of only during the four or five months in the winter.

Those are ways in which the coal industry can be helped, and I submit this would be a better course to pursue than to raise the duty on coal or to give bonuses to the steel industry. I think it would be better, in the first place, to allow the steel company to operate for a year or two under the new management to see whether or not they can improve the condition of the industry.

There is something else, sir, that can be done for the miners. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Smith) in discussing the coal question referred to the fact that New Zealand butter was coming into this country and the rest of Nova Scotia to the detriment of the farmers whom he represents. This question, Mr. Speaker, is like a two-edged sword, it cuts both ways. Does my hon. friend believe in increasing the duty on butter so that the miners of Springhill would have to pay more for this commodity? Does he want to go back to the days of Tory rule when they had to eat oleomargarine in place of butter? Another solution so far as the miners of Cape Breton are concerned is for this government to reduce the cost of living. I agree with the junior member for Halifax that the cost of living is too high; but that is due to the fact that about fifty years ago a Tory government put into practice the principle of protection, which enables our manufacturers to charge from 25 to 30 per cent more for their goods than they could get in the open market. Until such time as the duty is reduced, and consequently the cost of living also, the people in the maritime provinces, and particularly the miners in Sydney and Springhill, will not benefit.

I notice that my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) also referred to New Zealand butter in the course of his speech in this debate. I remember, sir, perhaps more vividly and distinctly than he does, that seven or eight years ago we had to buy oleomargarine for our fishing fleet. Is my hon. friend in favour of giving our fishermen oleomargarine to spread on their bread?

Mr. ERNST: No, Lunenburg butter.

Mr. DUFF: That, Mr. Speaker, shows how little he knows about fitting out the Lunenburg fishing fleet. Not ten pounds of Lunenburg butter have been used on any Lunenburg fishing schooner in the last ten years. The butter has to be bought all over the country, and sometimes we have to buy New Zealand butter to fit out the Lunenburg fishing fleet. Of course, if my hon. friend wants to give our fishermen oleomargarine, that may be all right so far as he is concerned, but I can assure him that the fishermen of Lunenburg county believe in having good grub. They want good butter for their bread, even if it does come from New Zealand. My hon. friend also played on a fiddle. I do not know whether he had any bow at all; I think he was playing over the bridge all the time. He complained that conditions were terrible among the fishermen of Nova Scotia. Well, of course, conditions are not as satisfactory as we should like to see them. But to bolster up his argument he made the statement that the average amount earned by the fishermen was $300 a year.

Mr. ERNST: Shore fishermen.

Mr. DUFF: Very well, shore fishermen; I am willing to concede as much as possible to the hon. gentleman. Of course, I must take the hon. gentleman's word under parliamentary rules, as you and I know them, Mr. Speaker. But for your private information I may say that quite evidently the hon. gentleman got his statistics from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and they are not at all reliable. Nor have they been reliable for the last thirty or forty years.

I am told that my time is nearly up and there are certain matters I shall not be able to refer to. However, I wish to touch upon one remark made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. The hon. gentleman reminds me of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He first complained that in this budget the reductions made in favour of the fishermen were infinitesimal; he regretted that the Minister of Finance had not done very much for this class of the population. That remark was intended of course to catch the votes of the fishermen in the county of Lunenburg. But the fishermen in Lunenburg county are intelligent people although they stray once in a while, as in 1926. Still, I say, there are intelligent people there and I am sure my hon. friend cannot catch any suckers in Lunenburg, especially with that kind of bait. He says that there are practically no reductions in the tariff, yet he bitterly complains because in the tariff there is a reduction on gasoline engines used by fishermen. Let me say this—and I do not say it egotistically or in any spirit of boasting; I merely want to show that I am a good Liberal and a believer in low tariffs. I am interested in two concerns which manufacture gasoline engines in the county of Lunenburg. Four years ago I was in favour of a reduction of the duty from 27½ or 25 per cent to 17½ or 15 per cent—I have forgotten the exact figures—and I am in favour of the reduction in this budget. And so far as I am concerned, even with the money I have in these two concerns, I should be willing to have the whole duty wiped out so that the fishermen might be enabled to obtain their engines at a lower price.

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): I expected that my hon. friend (Mr. Duff) would have something to say with reference to this wonderful Robb budget about which the Liberals have talked so much, but he did not mention the budget at all. The hon. gentleman's whole speech was a tirade against the Conservative members of Nova Scotia. Evidently those members who had previously spoken had touched my hon. friend in the wrong spot. The hon. gentleman says that the Liberals have done a great deal for Nova Scotia; they have implemented the Duncan report 100 per cent and in fact 150 per cent. I venture to say that my hon. friend would not appear in his own constituency and tell his electors that story; nor would he make the same kind of speech in Nova Scotia as he has made in this house to-night.

Mr. DUFF: I am going to send out 10,000 copies to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHORT: My hon. friend made pretty nearly the same kind of speech in this house in 1926. I remember his standing over there and speaking about this commission which was going to be appointed to investigate maritime rights which we were presenting on behalf of Nova Scotia. He said it was nothing but Tory propaganda, because there was nothing wrong with Nova Scotia; Nova Scotia was prosperous. That was his attitude: all you needed to do was to go to Halifax when a fair was on and see the automobiles driving in and look at the well dressed people who were on the streets. But when it came to his election down in that province it was a far different question. My hon. friend stated on the hustings there that he was in favour of the Duncan report; conditions were not right in Nova Scotia and, if he was elected, he was going to see that the report was implemented in full. He would see that it was carried out or he would resign his seat if elected. Does the hon. gentleman now stand up in this house and say that the Duncan report has been implemented in full?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. SHORT: Well, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the principal item in the recommendations of that report, referring to coal and steel, has not been touched by the government; so far as this item is concerned they have not turned a hand to give any assistance to the coal and steel industry. Yet the hon. gentleman says that the government have implemented the Duncan report 150 per cent. What has he to say in regard to the subsidy to the province of Nova Scotia? Evidently he has never read the report. The report stated that the $875,000 was an amount additional to the subsidy which was already being paid to the province. The government paid what the Duncan report suggested they should pay, and not one dollar more. So much for the hon. member; I will not refer to him again because it is not necessary. I might however observe this before I leave him finally. I was surprised that an hon. gentleman who is so much interested in the fisheries had nothing whatever to say about that great industry. He was so absorbed in his tirade against the Conservative members in Nova Scotia that he forgot all about the fishing industry.

Mr. DUFF: I am too modest.

Mr. SHORT: Now, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to say anything with reference to the budget, for the reason that practically everything which it was necessary for us to say on this side of the house was so admirably put forward by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in his excellent speech some weeks ago. I feel however, as a member from Nova Scotia, that it is incumbent upon me to say something in refutation of what has been represented by some of the Liberal members opposite. Those gentlemen would lead the house to believe that conditions in Nova Scotia are thoroughly prosperous. Now I am not a pessimist by any manner of means; I am an optimist, and I believe that there are some sections of Nova Scotia that are prosperous. But there are other sections that are anything but prosperous. Take the farming industry of Nova Scotia, the dairy industry and the fishing industry: not one of these great industries is prosperous; there is no prosperity about it. I was surprised at the attitude of my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) the other day. He suggested that there was wonderful prosperity in our beautiful province. As I say, I am willing and glad to admit that some sections are prosperous, and I hope the time is coming when the whole province will share in that prosperity. But that time will not come under this administration; we shall need to have a change of government before there is general prosperity in the country. The country will never prosper under this government.

My hon. friend from Hants-Kings would lead this house to believe that the Annapolis valley is one of the most prosperous sections of Nova Scotia. My constituency happens to join that of the hon. member and I venture to say that he dare not go down to his constituency and tell the farmers that they are as prosperous as he tried to make this house believe. It is true that they had a fair crop this year, but owing to lack of markets that crop did not pay the cost of production. We in Nova Scotia were not so fortunate in getting special rates on our potatoes as were some sections of Quebec, where the farmers were given special rates in order to permit them to send their potatoes to the markets of Montreal and Ottawa. Then our fruit crop was below the average this year; in some sections of the Annapolis valley the apple crop was almost a failure. It is true that the farmers received a good price for their apples but the returns were not anything like average.

The hon. member for Hants-Kings complimented the government on the reduction of one per cent in the sales tax; he said that was a wonderful thing for the people of Nova Scotia as well as for the people of Canada generally, and he thought the government should be commended for not wiping out the tax altogether. For years we on this side of the house have been advocating that the sales tax be completely abolished—not reduced at the rate of one per cent per year but wiped out entirely. The removal of the tax on telegrams and on parlor car tickets is no good to the labouring man; we on this side advocate those things which will help the workingman rather than the rich man who travels by pullman or the large concerns which send so many telegrams. Those taxes might be continued, but I presume that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is waiting until next year, when he will bring down his election budget, before he abolishes the sales tax. I am going to tell the minister, however, that he will get no credit for it then, because everyone knows that for years past we have been advocating the removal of the sales tax in its entirety.

Then let us consider the dairy industry, which has been so greatly affected by New Zealand butter coming into Canada practically free of duty. I am not going to say very much in that connection, but I have been asked by the Nova Scotia Farmers' Association to present a resolution which was passed at their convention in Truro last January. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas, in consequence of the persistent tendency to carry on dairying on too slender a margin of profit, or even at a loss, has resulted in a corresponding failure to cope with the ever growing demand of the home market, not to mention export trade for milk, cream, butter, cheese and ice cream supplied; and

Whereas the consequent shortage of the home made creamery pasteurized butter has resulted in opening the door widely to the importation of this necessary product from other parts of the empire under treaty privilege, thus enabling New Zealand butter, for instance, to be sold in Canada at prices with which Canadian dairymen cannot compete; and

Whereas the farmer who produces milk for human consumption is also so hemmed in by government regulations of health and standardization that his expenses have increased without any appreciable increase in his income; and

Whereas the dairy industry is now in such a state as to require an effective stimulant and guarantee of stability to bring about the necessary improvements and development to ensure progress and prosperity;

Therefore be it resolved that we members of the Nova Scotia Farmers' Association in annual convention assembled, do ask the federal government at once to increase the tariff on butter from the existing four cents to, say ten cents per pound, or to such a rate that after allowing the preference of three cents per pound, will give the butter industry sufficient protection to enable its paying the producers a rate that will be adequate to yield a reasonable profit on their investment of money and labour.

I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) is not in his seat; I intend to bring up a matter now with which he has to do and which is of great importance to the fruit growers of Nova Scotia. They are up against the problem of freight rates to continental Europe; they have been held up by the North Atlantic Shipping Federation in this connection, and I think this is a matter which should be looked into by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The federation insist that in order to obtain the 80 cent rate to Great Britain the apple shippers must sign a contract guaranteeing that all their shipments will be sent by these steamers; otherwise they are charged $1 per barrel. At the annual convention of the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association, which was held in January of this year, a resolution was passed which I intend to put on Hansard in order to bring the matter before the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, that we, the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association in annual meeting assembled, resent the ultimatum of the North Atlantic Freight Conference, whereby, all shippers using their lines to European markets are compelled to sign contracts to use these lines exclusively, or pay a freight on apples at the rate of 20 cents per barrel, in excess of the contract rate.

We can only consider such contract, removing as it does the possibility of using any boats outside the conference, as a serious threat against the welfare of our industry, in paving the way toward a general increase in the apple carrying rate.

We commend the action of the Canadian National Steamships in announcing that they would not be bound by the contract requirements of the North Atlantic Conference, and would petition the federal government to use such influence as they may possess that such contracts be not required in future;

And further resolved, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the federal members for Annapolis and Kings, and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I presume that my hon. friend from Hants-Kings received a copy of that resolution, but he did not mention it in his remarks.

Now I wish to pass on for a few moments and discuss our fisheries in Nova Scotia. This is one of our greatest natural resources, and it has been sadly neglected not only by this government but by practically all governments. I am not going to say that this government is the only one that has done nothing; we never have had a department of fisheries which has looked after that industry as it should be looked after in order to obtain from it all the benefits which the country should derive. The other day the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), during his excellent speech, stated that the fishing industry in Nova Scotia was going ahead by leaps and bounds. I think he must have been badly misinformed, because in looking up the statistics having to do with fisheries, I find that we have made practically no progress in that direction since 1910. The following figures show the value of the fisheries industry of Nova Scotia:

1918	15,143,066
1920	12,742,659
1921	9,778,623
1922	10,209,258
1923	8,448,385
1924	8,777,251
1925	10,213,779

The figures given by the Department of Marine and Fisheries show that no progress whatever has been made, and still the Minister of National Defence tells the house that the fishing industry of Nova Scotia has been going ahead by leaps and bounds. It would go ahead by leaps and bounds if we had a department of fisheries which understood the business. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) is a most estimable man, and I have great regard for him, but he is a lawyer. He is of the same profession as some of the ministers who have held that portfolio in the past, and I am not finding any fault with the government in that regard.

This great natural resource of this country was hardly mentioned in the house until what are known as the maritime righters came here. We have talked about fish, and I venture to say a great many members of this house have eaten more fish during the last three years than ever before. So long as I am here I am going to talk about the fisheries of this country, because I believe we can obtain the best advertising right on the floor of the house.

The Department of Marine and Fisheries has done absolutely nothing to help this industry. They appointed a royal commission to look into the fisheries of the maritime provinces, but what happened? That commission cost this country upwards of $80,000. They presented a report, and while many of the recommendations contained therein would have been of value to the fisheries, some of them would have been detrimental had they been carried out. This report was tabled a year ago but the government has taken no action on it at all. One of the recommendations made was that a minister of fisheries be appointed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was asked during the early days of this session if a minister of fisheries would be appointed, and he replied that the government had the matter under consideration and would appoint one at the opportune time. Of course that opportune time will not come until just before the elections, but it will be too late then. It may be good politics, but no government should play politics with a natural industry like our fisheries. The trouble with the Department of Marine and Fisheries is that they have been playing politics ever since this government came into power. Nothing has been done about appointing a minister of fisheries although they have appointed a deputy minister, or rather changed the title of the director of fisheries to Deputy Minister of Fisheries. That is the only change which has taken place.

The fishing industry will never make any progress until there is a reorganization of the department and an efficient minister appointed. They should appoint someone who knows something about the industry, a man of business training and experience. The Liberal party have such a man on their side; why do they not appoint him?

The fishing industry of Nova Scotia has asked this government time and time again to try to increase the production of fish and find new markets for those products. I was impressed the other day when the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) suggested that the Department of Trade and Commerce might well look after our domestic trade. What has that department done in an endeavour to find markets for our fish or other natural products? Nothing whatever. It has done very little to increase our trade with foreign countries, and I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce might well look after our domestic markets in an endeavour to find an outlet for our natural products.

As I said, we have asked the Department of Marine and Fisheries time and time again to do something to increase the production of fish and find new markets for us. What has happened? In 1925 Mr. J. J. Cowie, practically the only expert man they have in the department, was sent over to England to look up markets for Nova Scotia fish. After visiting different places in Great Britain, Mr. Cowie came back and reported that there was an excellent market there for fresh fish, provided that some assistance was given by the government to get the markets started and assist the industry in an educational way as to the preparing of the fish, as to the varieties best suited, and that sort of thing. But nothing was done about that report.

In 1927, Mr. Cowie, accompanied by Mr. G. R. Earl, of Yarmouth, N.S., was sent to Great Britain in connection with the imperial economic committee's inquiry into the marketing of the fish production of the empire. On their return they presented a very elaborate report. I cannot read the whole report, but I would like to quote a few sections in an endeavour to show the house how neglectful the Department of Marine and Fisheries has been. One of the sections is as follows:

It was pointed out there are two ways by which the situation in eastern Canada could be improved: One is by the shipment of fresh fish in ice to the British market. The committee was informed that it had been clearly demonstrated that such fish can be landed overseas in excellent condition but that transportation difficulties retard development until the volume of the traffic, by some means, has grown sufficiently to overcome them of itself. The other is by freezing the fish under the quick process known as brine freezing, which leaves the fish when defrosted, with all the original juices it contained when taken from the sea. It was pointed out that the Canadian fishing grounds were so near the shore in many places as to make possible the landing of fish almost alive, and, if frozen, could be placed on the British markets in a much better and fresher state than most of the so-called fresh fish landed there direct from the fishing grounds.

The committee was further informed that the marketing of brine frozen fish would have this great advantage: the fish need not be dumped on an over-supplied market, but could be held in storage until the markets had recovered and prices had risen.

The adoption of this means of marketing by the British trade, as well as the Canadian trade, would stabilize supply, demand and prices and push out the existing antiquated method of hurrying fresh fish to market and selling them immediately, whether the supply is such as to constitute a glut or a scarcity.

The report continues:

The opening up of this market would be of far reaching benefit to our shore fishermen particularly who produce fish of the more desirable quality. But as there are shipping difficulties to be overcome and as risks of loss would have to be undertaken in the beginning we would commend to the consideration of the department, the matter of giving to shippers financial aid of some kind during the few initial months to overcome discouragements that may arise from consignments arriving on unremunerative market days, and to enable them to enable them to hold on and continue until the trade has obtained a sufficient foothold to take care of itself.

The report concludes by stating:

We strongly feel that the establishment of central meal-making plants on the Atlantic coast is of as much importance as the finding of new markets for fish as a means of rebuilding our fishing fleets and retaining our fishermen. If, therefore, firms of standing engaged in the fisheries could be induced and encouraged to take hold of this means of development, there would appear to be no room for doubt that a shore fishery greater than has yet been on the Atlantic coast could quickly emerge from its present low unprofitable state.

To summerize, in conclusion, the main features of the foregoing report, which in our opinion would bring immediate beneficial results to the fishing industry of our maritime provinces, we would note that these are two, namely:—

1. The marketing of fresh fish in ice in Great Britain and

2. The establishment of meal-making plants to take care of the great amount of material at present being wasted.

That was a report made by Mr. Cowie in 1927 and still no action has been taken on it. They got this report, filed it away in a pigeon hole and nothing is heard of it again until some person like myself brings it up.

Mr. BENNETT: Until an election.

Mr. SHORT: That is right. That is when the people are going to have something to say about it. The government are waiting until next year when the budget comes down. No doubt the Minister of Finance thought he was doing something wonderful for the fishermen of Nova Scotia when he put needles for repairing fishermen's nets and brass swivels on the free list. I made inquiry as to what quantities of these two articles were imported and I was told they were so small that they were not enumerated at all. I have been in the fishing business pretty nearly all my life and I have never heard of fishermen in Nova Scotia using brass swivels. I think it must have been as a joke that somebody suggested to the Minister of Finance that he put those on the free list. The minister, not being a practical man, thought there must be something in it, but it is actually nothing but a joke. There is nothing in the budget this year for the fishermen or anybody else in Nova Scotia. I do not suppose there was ever a needle for mending nets imported into that province. I know I never heard of one being imported. Perhaps it was in order to sew buttons on their oil coats.

I trust that the time has arrived when something will be done in connection with this important industry. There are great possibilities in the fishing industry of Nova Scotia. We should be producing there not $10,000,000 but $50,000,000 worth a year, and we could do it. We have off the coast of Nova Scotia the greatest fisheries in the world, but the government do not realize this and do not appreciate their responsibilities. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not think he has any responsibility as regards the fisheries. All his attention is devoted to marine matters, but the time has arrived when he must pay some attention to the fishermen of the maritime provinces.

Let me say a word or two to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) with reference to breakwaters along the coast of Nova Scotia. There are perhaps more breakwaters in my constituency than in any other constituency in that province,, and some of them are in a very bad state of repair. Ever since I have been in the house I have brought to his attention the matter of dredging and repairs in connection with many of these breakwaters. It is true he has listened to me in a few cases and some of those breakwaters have been repaired, but many of them are at present in a dilapidated condition and repairs are urgently needed. My hon. friend would not allow a building in the city of Ottawa to get out of repair or go completely to ruin. Why should he allow breakwaters in which we have invested millions of dollars in Nova Scotia to become so dilapidated that they are no protection whatever to the fishing industry? They were constructed for the protection of that industry; indeed we cannot build up a fishing industry in that province without them. The minister is a very good-natured man and I think a great deal of him. I implore him this year particularly, because next year we are going to the country, to do something in this matter for his own benefit and for the benefit of the fishermen of Nova Scotia. He will get some of the credit, and I will take some of it myself. If the minister will simply take the reports he gets from his engineers in connection with the condition of those breakwaters in Nova Scotia and grant the expenditures they ask for, I shall be perfectly satisfied. I am serious about this matter and I trust that when the supplementary estimates of the minister come down they will include substantial grants for breakwaters, especially for those of my constituency in Nova Scotia.

Mr. E. S. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the year just ended, the press, banks and all large financial institutions of this country were highly gratified in being able to state that the financial and trade conditions were satisfactory, and that the future was replete with bright prospects.

The budget brought down a short while ago by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), officially confirmed these previous statements.

In a parliament composed like this one of two great parties and various groups, the budget always gives rise to a debate in which the views of pessimists and realists are reflected. The former's loquacity takes the form of an unrelenting criticism. It is the allurement of power which haunts them. And as they must use all expedients and have recourse to hair-splitting so as to uphold their stand, they always stick to one or two subjects of the budget in their criticisms, embodying them later in an amendment or subamendment. The subjects under discussion at present refer to agriculture, industry and the working classes to whom the government it seems promises nothing for the future.

We are preoccupied, to-day, with the problem of agriculture. It has brought on a change of government in Rumania, and at the last presidential elections in the United States, the American farmer has insisted on protection of industries in return for his vote. The campaign which is in full swing in England presents the same problem. The Labour party requires the stabilization of farm product prices. The Tories seek the support of the farmers by offering them as an allurement the policy advocated by Churchill in the shape of the lowest taxation for the basic industries. The Liberals have as remedial legislation in their program, an increase in exports and decrease in imports. In order to satisfy the farmers Lloyd George has advocated a program of state ownership of lands, which, we must admit, does not guarantee to the English consumer a greater production of farm products nor, for that matter, prices more in keeping with their purse.

As it was in the United States that the great protectionist movement was started on behalf of the farmers, let us study the remedies advocated by the champions of the farmers' cause. Senator Brookhart suggests that the farmer should be assisted by doles and that he should have the right to raise money to sell his crops. Mr. Chester Davis wants the farmer to regain his status through the disposal of the surplus of his crops and the assistance of a higher tariff. Mr. Davis forgets that the evil lies, not in the surplus produced, but really in the cost of production, when it is a question of competing with Canada on the markets of the world.

Senator Borah, forgetting for a moment the great interest he takes in the international relations of the United States, suggests to President Hoover a high tariff wall against all imported products. He fears, it is true, the opposition of certain manufacturers already protected who are more interested in the enforcement of the tariff clauses against foreign products similar to those they manufacture; and he even ventures so far as to state that certain manufacturers will demand an embargo; however, what does it matter, the American farmer must be protected by a measure which will increase the cost of living for the consumer across the border!

The American farmer is aware that the foreign market is drifting away from him, and that he must prevent, by a higher tariff wall, two billion dollars of foreign products competing with him on his home market. He was badly prepared for the after war depression; there lies the entire reason for the crisis he is at present experiencing.

The financial critic of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) discovered in this great protectionist movement which is developing in the United States the subject of his amendment to the resolution of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). His colleagues of the opposition found it possible to enlarge on the subject. As usual, it is the high protective policy they seek as a remedy to all the evils which Canada is supposed to suffer from at present. Allusion was made to unemployment, smoking smoke-stacks, well filled dinner pails—old stereotyped phrases which fit in nicely with the spirit of this definition which Disraeli gave of politics, "that it was the art of governing the people by fooling them." Echoes are constantly a threat against the spreading of a good opinion. The very moment that the American press spread throughout the world the news that the United States government would surrender to the pressure of the agrarian party in favour of a high tariff, our protectionists advocated a tariff of retaliation against the United States. An appeal to our national pride, using such terms as "red-blooded nation," etc., required us to polish our tariff weapons. Where would this lead us to, sir? To ask the question is to answer it; to the first step of oppression against the consumer by certain unscrupulous manufacturers—for let us not forget that the golden rule finds no place in business—who would take advantage of the high tariff to overcharge the consumer. And all this to afford a so-called protection to the Canadian farmer who, whatever may be said to the contrary, is in a much more enviable economic situation than his colleague in the United States, if we are to place any faith in an inquiry recently carried out by an important agricultural association of the province of Quebec. If we are to place any faith in the resolutions and data presented in 1925, at the meeting of the Catholic farmers of the province of Quebec, we find that according to conclusions based on an inquiry, eleven per cent only of the farmers interested contended that their present state, as well as the exodus of our country folk, was due to a rather low tariff. The high tariff, according to our hon. friends opposite, would be the great remedy to the new ills which they are endeavouring to find.

For some time past, it seems to us that the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, has become a bugbear. The systematic Mr. Hoover, like the silent Mr. Coolidge, will certainly not allow himself to be influenced by outside interests. How could he do otherwise? How could he be so little consequent with himself after the great speech he delivered at Erie, Pennsylvania, in 1925, when he characterized the tariff reforms, monopolies and price control as satan's arguments. Never will the United States have recourse to such means in order to balance their economic situation.

It is always interesting—and this is a balm to me—to recall some historical statements notably the one that the great Gladstone made in 1881 before an English audience, he said:

"Your trade superiority is assured as long as the United States adhere to high protection. Let your sleep not be disturbed by the fear that the United States will dominate England on the free markets, so long as high tariff is their motto."

If we go further back in history, we should not forget that it was freedom of trade which built up large prosperous Flemish cities like Ghent and Bruges.

Unemployment has been broached in the present debate as an agreement in favour of protection. It is highly proclaimed that protection is synonymous with high wages. Nothing is so erroneous from the economic viewpoint. Duties are not imposed with the idea of equalizing the difference of wages between European and Canadian workers. Our workers are better paid—and I lay stress on this point—because their efforts tend more to mass production and they can accomplish in a set time twice as much work as the average European workers.

It is Andrew Carnegie, the great American leader of industry, who stated that the cheapest products are always manufactured by high wage workers, using modern machinery; and we could further quote, in support of this assertion the great economists Maurice Low, Arthur Shadwell, W. M. Evarts and Leroy Beaulieu.

Since the President of the United States is quoted a little everywhere as an authority, I shall give his views on the subject of unemployment and the best means of relieving such a situation.

Nowhere does he allude to tariff as a remedy to unemployment. This is how he expresses himself:

The control of credit by banks during prosperous times, the careful supervision of affairs by business men and the retardation of large municipal, state and federal enterprises, when the business of the country is good.

These, sir, are the means he advocates to guard against unemployment. The high tariff, for certain politicians, has always been a doctrine. It is rather a ritual custom accompanying an old-time performance. Unemployment is less felt in Canada than in the United States. More than 2,000,000 unemployed walk the streets of large cities in the United States. The new American tariff, unless revised with care—and any practical man understands this—will never succeed in equalizing the wages paid in the spinning-mills of New England with those paid in similar establishments of the southern states.

Let us now turn to the realists, and I am one of them. I look upon concentrated optimism as a dangerous thing, however, I willingly surrender to facts. Canada possesses a genuine government looking after the nation's interests as a whole and refusing to allow itself to be controlled by those who would benefit by its being muzzled in order to further their own interests. Our financial situation is more than satisfactory, our trade is expanding, in fact all tends to show that Canada is acquiring a national conscience, a progress which asserts itself through unrelenting work of preparation. We refuse as practical people to believe in the proverbial accident which would lead nations to success.

In my opinion, the prosperity of this country asserts itself still more through the general satisfaction reigning everywhere, than through the testimony of bare statistics. The people witness our markets expanding, our treaties with other nations increasing our exports. Our ambassadors of trade, trade attachés who devote their time in making Canada known abroad, are properly speaking the authors of this trade expansion of Canada. Mr. Isaac Marcosson, the great journalist and economist of the United States considers that these ambassadors of trade are most precious in helping the economic expansion of nations.

I stated, sir, just now that optimism was sometimes dangerous. Of course, we are living in the twentieth century, and times have changed since biblical days when all could live happy in the shade of their vines and fig trees, but who could deny that the conditions have greatly improved in this country since the Liberal party took over the direction of affairs?

Sir, I should like to have seen a greater reduction in taxation. There is a tax—the income tax—which weighs heavily upon the people. I would even state that, in order to avoid paying this tax, many citizens have used their revenues to speculate on the exchange and have lost large sums in the recent slump in stocks. Unfortunately, it is impossible to suppress entirely this tax under the present circumstances. Our war debt, the enormous obligations that Canada must face forces us to maintain it. One word as regards the manner it is being enforced. I have no hesitation in stating that the rate of interest which those in arrears are forced to pay to the government is an exorbitant one. Ten per cent is an excessive rate, for you are aware as I am, sir, that it is not through evil designs that certain citizens put off paying to the state the income tax.

The government has again reduced the sales tax this year. It is therefore entitled to our congratulations. As we are, unfortunately, too much in the habit, in the House of Commons of adopting certain social legislation without thoroughly studying the situation, without considering as to whether the exchequer of Canada is in a position to meet these obligations, I would suggest that this tax, if it is maintained, be turned over to a special fund which might help in paying family allowances to our large families. It would be the people's tax returning to the people, and I cannot see any more practical means of helping this new social movement which has recently sprung up.

The province of Quebec has never complained. Our claims in this house have been very trifling compared to those presented to us by our hon. friends from the Maritime provinces. The government has been kind enough to remember certain districts of the province of Quebec by purchasing two railways, a purchase which for a number of years past had become necessary. The government is again entitled to our thanks for having given to a group of our compatriots settled in the Canadian west, in the Cold Lake district, the means of transportation which they had requested for a number of years past. Our people who settled in that district were, like our missionaries after all, the pioneers of colonization, and since we have thought proper to send them in those parts, since they have been looked upon as the best settlers of the Canadian west, it is but fair that those groups be given by our government all the consideration due to them.

I represent a labour division in Montreal; I was not elected to represent them in the House of Commons because I posed as a demagogue, but I know their needs and I have no fear in stating that, as a whole, they are satisfied with present conditions. But there is always a dark side to a picture. I openly state that it is the competition they have to meet at present from certain classes of European immigrants. It matters to me little whether they are of British, French or Flemish origin, etcetera, I state that Canada should cease inducing those artisans to come and settle among us; and I shall go one step further, I shall state that the moment these immigrants land in Montreal or Quebec, a job seems to await them. No doubt, the government takes no part with regard to such a situation, however, it seems to me that certain classes have a special preference and that these immigrants, on their landing in Canada, receive special advantages which have the effect of displacing, the native sons from jobs that they have earned by their work and intelligence. The Canadian artisans compare favourably with those in Europe. They hold responsible positions in all our workshops. Let genuine farmers be brought over, group them together in the west; so much the better. Our railways need them; our vast tracts of lands need hands to develop them. But I state that our fellow-citizens both English and French Canadians, born in Canada, suffice to fill in our large city factories the positions set aside for experts. Our provincial governments especially, and even the Dominion government have subscribed considerable sums for the development of technical education. Where shall we find positions for our graduates? What advantages shall we offer them if foreigners still continue to take the positions which by right belong to the students of our technical schools? Immigration commends itself and must be encouraged, but not to the extent of being detrimental in any way to the right held by our people to fill the first positions in the land.

Economists, sir, have their own way of solving the problem of unemployment. I do not think however that this problem can ever be solved by any government. That is my personal opinion. I state that the all important problem of unemployment must be solved by industry itself, and I cannot side with the views of Julius Barnes, the President of the Board of Trade of the United States, who persists in maintaining that artisans displaced because of modern machinery are absorbed by other rising industries.

Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labour also states, that industry itself should solve the problem of unemployment. Many means have been suggested. The five-day week, for instance, finds little support, even among labour unions. Industries are at present making enough profits to solve by themselves the problem of unemployment, and I do not think that the solutions to this problem will ever be found in any political measure, whatever shape or form it may take, be it tariff or otherwise.

The people—and I shall be frank about it —notwithstanding the present situation, felt somewhat uneasy. They note with some apprehension the intermarrying of millions in the shape of mergers and trusts. After all, it would only be right to establish a difference between this merging of industries and the great trusts which are established a little everywhere. It is an unfortunate state of things—and I avail myself of the privilege of being a member to mention the fact to the house, since it interests especially the working classes. I am not adverse to large industries. I shall always decline to take any part in stirring war between capital and labour, but what is to be said of the attitude, for some time past, of certain large manufacturers who, after our province had passed legislation in connection with labour accidents, endeavoured to protect themselves by dismissing from their workshops the fathers of large families? They are the same people who advocate and write articles in the newspapers under their own signatures or support in election times a self-styled policy opposed to the emigration of our people and who, to-day, put these very people whom they have dismissed from their workshops in the way of emigrating.

There is another question: how are we to prevent unemployment? The printing trade— and I have some knowledge of this business, having been a journalist for about twenty years—is, to-day, experiencing quite a serious crisis. Ask the owners of our large workshops, they will explain to you one of the causes of the emigration of our people. It is this: the great patriotic men who advise us to keep our people at home, those large manufacturers who would like to see all our fellow-citizens exiled in the United States return to us within fifteen days, have a very strange way of fostering our national industries by having their printing done abroad.

Our opponents have referred to considerable expenditures. In my opinion, it would be better for them to conform their actions to their principles, since, only a short while ago, they unanimously voted to burden the Dominion government with extraordinary expenditures in order to build up national highways and further subscribe for technical education, matters exclusively pertaining to provincial legislatures.

Mr. Speaker, I will close my remarks by saying that the amendment moved by the financial critic of the opposition rests on no sound argument so far as bringing prosperity to farmers, or steady employment to artisans. I am opposed, moreover, to the subamendment because it is contrary to the policy advocated in the past by Sir Wilfrid Laurier; and being aware as a realist—not as an optimist—of conditions, at present, prevailing in our own country, a prosperous state, one that promises much for the future and, as I stated at the outset of my speech, a state which gives general satisfaction to our people, I shall vote in favour of the resolution put forth by the hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (West Kootenay): Although many hon. members have spoken on this budget, I feel it incumbent to add a word by way of protest against the utter failure of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to provide in this budget any relief for the farmer, the fruit grower, or the poultryman, nothwithstanding the fact that the government admits that it has both the power and the machinery to restrict at a moment's notice the importation of surplus farm products from the United States at glut prices during a period when the Canadian producer hopes to secure a reasonable and fair return from his labour and expense.

May I also emphasize the protests which have come from various boards of trade, mining companies and individual operators and many others against the new provision in this budget respecting the tax on the transfer of low-priced shares.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, any budget which provides for a reduction of taxation is always greeted with approval and applause, and the one under review is no exception. The Minister of Finance stated in his budget announcement that it was the policy of the government to do away with the so-called nuisance taxes, but I think it will be generally admitted, after the country has had time to digest the provisions of this budget, that it means practically nothing beyond relieving the big fellow of his taxes and transferring the burden to the shoulders of the little fellow.

Let us take the proposals of the Minister of Finance with regard to the abolition of the nuisance taxes, as they are generally called. First of all, there is the abolition of the tax on insurance premiums. No matter to what city of Canada you may go you will usually find a huge structure in course of erection for one of the large insurance companies. Their profits are so great that they hesitate to distribute them among the shareholders, and they are therefore compelled to put them into buildings. I submit that in abolishing this tax the minister is simply relieving the large companies, for after all, the tax on insurance premiums is not very much of a nuisance to the man in the street.

Next the minister proposes to abolish the tax on railway tickets costing over one dollar, and on pullman and steamship staterooms, compartments, berths and parlour-car chairs. This is another tax that is not very much of a nuisance to the average wage-earner. These conveniences and comforts are indulged in largely by the representatives of large corporations and commercial concerns, which, of course, are glad enough to get rid of this tax; but let me ask, what particular nuisance is this tax to the wage earner?

Then there is the removal of the tax on cablegrams and telegrams. This is another of the so-called nuisance taxes. When I read that provision in the budget I thought how these thousands of civil servants earning $50, $60 or $75 a month, and the innumerable wage earners throughout the Dominion getting about the same income, must have thrown up their hats with joy and taken a day off and night out to celebrate their being relieved from this tax.

Now all these so-called nuisance taxes have been abolished. But the sales tax, which is paid by every man, woman and child, has been cut only one cent. That is a tax that the wage earner pays on his clothing, boots and shoes, wearing apparel and every kind of household necessity. If, for instance, he builds a modest home on the outskirts of the city at a cost of $2,500 or $3,000, he pays all the way from $35 to $50 sales tax on the material which enters into its construction; if to get into the city to his work he buys a low-priced automobile, his sales tax is about $30; if he builds a fence or a sidewalk, or buys a little paint or other materials to improve his property, he has to pay this sales tax. For several years the Conservative party has been endeavouring to have the tax abolished, and in 1925 Sir Henry Drayton brought in a resolution for its total abolition, but practically every member among the government's followers voted against it. In 1927 the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said, Well, if we cannot have this tax abolished absolutely, we will see if the government will not be good enough to the man of small income to remove the tax on clothing and boots and shoes. Again every government follower voted against the proposal. It is difficult to understand how some of them can explain their vote to their constituents; but no doubt by the time the next election comes around the sales tax will be abolished entirely.

In order to find some other way of raising funds in lieu of these so-called nuisance taxes, the government proposes to tax the little fellow by a tax on the transfer of low-priced stocks. On the purchase of a share costing less than $3 there is a tax of one cent; on shares costing from $3 to $20, two cents; on shares costing from $20 to $100, three cents; on shares from $100 up, four cents. Let me illustrate the injustice of this proposed tax. We will say the little fellow has $25 to invest, and he buys 500 shares costing five cents each. Heretofore on such a purchase he paid no tax; under this budget he is called upon to pay a tax of five dollars. By way of contrast we will take an insurance company or a trust company with funds to invest, say $250,000. The company can purchase 500 shares costing $500 each—we have such shares to-day in the case of Smelters—and the total tax is but $20, whereas prior to this budget it was $75. So you see the government is merely putting the burden on the little fellow and relieving the big fellow. Or if you want to take it another way, we will say the little fellow has $1,000 to invest, and buys $1,000 worth of ten cent shares. I cannot believe that the hon. Minister of Finance had figured out this proposed tax, for on such an investment the actual tax is $100. One hundred dollars on an investment of one thousand dollars. But the big fellow with plenty of money says, I will take a chance and put $1,000 into ten shares costing $100 each. His total tax is only 40 cents. There is such a striking disparity in these cases that it is no wonder so many protests have reached the minister.

There is another phase of this matter worth consideration. The money that this little fellow puts into cheap shares goes to work and develops some mining property. The big fellow puts his money in as an investment, for interest only. Experience has shown, Mr. Speaker, that the most successful and popular way of raising money for mining development is by the sale of these low-priced shares. The fact is that it was the sale of these so-called penny shares that was responsible for the first lode mining in British Columbia; it was that lode mining which was responsible for the construction of the smelter at Trail. To be sure, it was a very small institution in those days, but it was the sale of those low-priced shares which developed more mining properties in the district, and these in turn enabled the smelter to be supplied with custom ore and to carry on until research work has made it to-day the greatest and most important metallurgical institution in the British Empire. That of itself, I submit, is an argument in favour of the low-priced shares.

Take the huge mining developments to-day in Quebec and Ontario, in Manitoba and Saskatchewan; they would not get very far without the initial purchase of those low-priced shares by the little fellow. The business on the Vancouver stock exchange is just about a million dollars a day. On that exchange during 1928 eighty-seven million shares were traded in at an average price of 42 cents. This year there promises to be from seven to ten times that volume of busines. Similar conditions exist on the Montreal and Toronto exchanges. Prior to this budget the tax on the transfer of these shares was three cents per hundred dollars. This produced a considerable revenue for the government and did no harm to the public. But there is something still more interesting in the figures of the Vancouver stock exchange. Of the huge volume of business to which I have referred only two of the stocks traded in are of a higher par value than one dollar; two are ten cents par; three are twenty cents par; eleven are twenty-five cents par; nine are fifty cents par; twenty-three are one dollar par. On nine of these listed stocks the new tax would amount to between fifteen and twenty-five per cent at present market prices. So that one must almost admit that this is not taxation but in reality confiscation; and if the government insists on this new tax it will really mean that the transactions in these low-priced shares, instead of being carried on in our Canadian exchanges, will be diverted to exchanges across the line. The result will be that there will be bootlegged stocks as well as bootlegged liquor. In view of the numerous protests it is to be hoped that the government will either withdraw or modify this feature of the budget, because there is nothing in Canadian history which has so contributed to mineral development as the sale of these low-priced shares. And in view of this huge development which is now in progress it is difficult to understand how hon. members opposite, following the government, can vote for this taxation and hope to justify their vote when they return to their constituencies.

I am a firm believer in the income tax, on the principle that a man should pay in proportion to his prosperity. But I do think there are some phases of taxation which have been already embarrassing to investors in Canada, and one of these in particular is dual taxation. As the situation now is, a company is taxed 8 per cent on its dividends.

And it should pay; there is no question about that. But to tax that dividend again after it is distributed to the shareholders is dual taxation and dual taxation cannot be justified as a means of raising revenue.

There is another inequitable feature to which I would ask the minister's attention, and that is the failure to permit, in the preparation of one's income tax return, of deductions for local improvement taxes. In preparing one's return one is permitted to deduct the tax on land and on the buildings from which revenue is derived. But he is not permitted to deduct the special tax for the construction of sidewalk or sewer or street paving in front of his property. That to me is manifestly unfair, for this reason. In municipality A, let us say, all such local improvements are paid for out of the general fund, whereas in municipality B they are assessed against the abutting property. The public at large uses all these improvements and has the benefit of them, and it seems only just and reasonable that the owner of the abutting property should be permitted, in preparing his return, to deduct such taxes as well as the general tax against his property.

The other day we had a resolution from the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) concerning federal aid to highways, and I know of no federal appropriation which returns to the federal exchequer more money than does aid to good highways. There is no question in the world about the meaning of the resolution which the hon. member introduced. He intended that resolution to be practically a renewal of the grant on the same lines as provided in the act of 1919 whereby $20,000,000 was appropriated and apportioned amongst the various provinces, 40 per cent being contributed by the Dominion towards the construction of highways, the other 60 per cent being furnished by the provinces. Such a contribution from the federal government is justified, I contend, because the tourist and the motor car are the main factors in encouraging good roads. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), in his publication of March, 1928, makes the plain statement that it is estimated approximately that through the motor car tourist traffic distributed throughout Canada during the year 1927 the huge sum of $260,000,000. That was from tourist traffic alone. In addition there was collected during the past year, in excise and customs, on freight and passenger cars, the sum of $25,000,000. And as there are—I think this will be admitted—approximately 1,000,000 cars in Canada, each one of which pays not one cent less than $30 in sales tax, you have $30,000,000 from that source. The various provinces, too, collect annually by way of fines, registration and gasoline tax another $25,000,000, according to the report of the highways commissioner. One can readily see therefore that there is probably no disbursement from the federal treasury which would bring back such generous returns to the business interests of Canada as would a vote in aid of highway construction. It is difficult to understand how any member opposite can go back to his constituents and justify his vote against federal aid to the construction of highways, because every province is keen to have more roads built into the hinterland, and this aid from the federal governmnt permits of the construction of more central roads. One hon. minister felt he would be so embarrassed if his vote were recorded that he sidestepped the vote entirely.

As to policy, the budget states that it is the policy of this government to encourage production at home and the export of excess products. That may be all very well in theory; it sounds well, but actual evidence shows that the real policy of this government is to discourage production at home by encouraging the importation of surplus farm products from the United States.

The Canadian producer only asks that he be given an opportunity to sell his products in the Canadian market. It must be remembered that such conditions existed years ago, and that in 1921 the Conservative party enacted statutory provisions restricting the importation of surplus farm products. These restrictions were discontinued in 1922, and an amendment was adopted making it discretionary with the minister to apply the restrictions if he saw fit. Unfortunately he never saw fit to do so; from 1922 to 1925 the Liberals applied these restrictions only in the year 1923, when several large fruit importing concerns were penalized. However, their penalties were handed back to them, according to page 109 of the Duncan report.

Then we come to 1926, when the Conservatives came into power for a short time. While we were in office only a few months we worked fast on behalf of the farmers. We went into office on June 29 and it took the acting Minister of Customs (Mr. Stevens) only two weeks to pass an order restricting the importation of these surplus farm products. That was a good order; apparently this government admitted that to be the fact, because they passed a similar order in council in November of the same year. However, while the government considered this measure an excellent deterrent to the importation of farm products there happened to be a political alliance between Progressives and Liberals. We have heard a good deal about this hybrid grain ticket, but I would call this a hybrid political matrimonial alliance, by which those hon. members agreed to obey the Prime Minister so long as he met their wishes. It was not long until they demanded that these restrictions be removed; the Prime Minister hesitated to do so because several of his own ministers did not deem it expedient to adopt that course. However, this little group put the gun to the head of the Prime Minister and he had to remove the restrictions, which was done in March of 1928. Since that time many protests have been addressed to the government; we had protests against the importation of surplus strawberries and surplus crops of all kinds from many sources. The Conservative members moved a resolution asking that these restrictions be restored, but that resolution was defeated, Liberal members opposite were quite willing to sacrifice the farmers of this country.

We also had a rather amusing political situation in British Columbia in connection with the removal of these restrictions. According to a press despatch under date of May 16, I find that Hon. E. D. Barrow, the then Liberal Minister of Agriculture for British Columbia, expressed confidence that Canadian farmers would be adequately protected against attempts to dump imported produce upon their markets. Then a little later a telegram was sent by the then Premier of British Columbia requesting the government to restore the dumping regulations which had been removed by the order in council to which I have referred, and he asked Hon. T. D. Pattullo, then provincial Minister of Lands, to take up the matter. This will indicate the feeling of the people of British Columbia, not only of the farmers but of the Liberal party as well; we have both the Liberal Premier and the Liberal Minister of Agriculture of the province requesting that this situation be rectified, but nothing was done.

Then I would refer to the Minister of Health (Mr. King), and I do so because he is the minister from British Columbia. In defending section 47a he said that it was for protection against unfair and unreasonable competition and that the amendment was only intended to overcome conditions which arose at certain times when there was an unfair competition under which the grower of natural products could not exist. During the last session of this parliament I submitted several protests to the government which indicated conditions under which the farmer and fruit grower of British Columbia could not exist, but no attention was paid to those protests notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister said such conditions could be remedied at a moment's notice.

These two statements to which I have referred, coming from the Premier and the Minister of Agriculture of British Columbia, were made during April and May; there was a provincial election in the offing in July. The Premier and the Minister of Agriculture then became enthusiastic about having these restrictions restored and the matter almost became a campaign issue until some of their friends reminded them that from 1922 to 1928 the Conservative members of the British Columbia legislature had consistently and persistently urged a resolution asking this government to enforce these restrictions against the dumping of U.S. surplus farm products. That was rather embarrassing of course, because the Premier, the Minister of Agriculture and every Liberal member of the legislature had voted against that resolution. So they withdrew the dumping clause as an issue and took up other issues. You all know the result of that election.

The Minister of Health is the sole representative of our province in the cabinet, and he knows the adverse conditions under which the farmers, the fruit growers, and the poultrymen of that province are suffering. He took the trouble to go into the Okanagan district to ascertain just what those conditions were, but I submit that he, having been a member of the provincial legislature for many years and having been a minister in this government since 1921, should have known just what those conditions were when he voted against the restoration of these restrictions. I ask the Minister of Health to use his influence in urging the government to bring those restrictions into effect, which they say it is possible to do at a moment's notice, and thus give some relief to the farmers, the fruit growers and the poultrymen of West Kootenay and Canada.

Mr. A. GOULET (Russell) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time that I rise to address the house since 1925, when the people of the riding of Russell did me the honour of electing me to represent them in parliament. I trust therefore that my hon. friends will be indulgent towards me.

With pleasure I join the hon. speakers who have preceded me in this debate in order to extend to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), my hearty congratulations—no less sincere for being somewhat late—for the clear and precise statement which he made on the financial situation of this country. The budget which he has just brought down in the house is, I think, his eighth since he holds the strings of the national purse. All have been received with evident and well justified satisfaction; the last introduced on March 1st is an additional proof of the efficient Liberal administration under the sound leadership of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

Under the Conservative regime, the Canadian people awaited with uneasiness the end of each fiscal year. They foresaw that the statement of accounts would but confirm their doubts on the good faith of their government, that the announcement of the increase of the debt and thereby the decrease of its credit, would possibly be followed up by a peremptory demand—under the form of additional taxation—to cover the accumulated deficits. The present Minister of Finance has changed this state of affairs. Uneasiness has made way for confidence. The Canadian people calmly await each year the financial statement, knowing that their affairs are administered soundly and economically.

The financial statement for the year 1928-29 is most satisfactory, and the general prosperity which it discloses highly justifies the trust of the people in the Liberal government. It shows not only that our national revenues have been sufficient to meet our obligations, including the payment of $125,000,000 in interests on the public debt, inherited mostly from our hon. friends on your left, Sir, but also that the debt itself has been reduced by $70,000,000. A surplus of $70,000,000 from receipts of $455,000,000 is by itself a remarkable feat, and I am sure that the whole nation—with the exception possibly of hon. members on the left—will be thankful to the present administration. But we have greater expectations. This sum of $70,000,000 applicable to the reduction of our national debt foreshadows the redeeming of this debt in the near future.

I have before me an article published recently in Willsons Monthly, a serious publication discussing public affairs in Canada and the British Empire, and I shall quote the following extract:

> In his budget speech of March 1, 1929, Mr. Robb stated the present amount of the debt to be $2,330,835,086. For the past four years the average annual reduction of the debt has amounted to roughly $47,750,000. While for the past year alone it will amount to nearly $70,000,000. If we add together the amounts paid as interest on the debt and the amounts applied in reduction of the debt we find that for the past four years there has been applied to the debt an average amount of over $171,000,000. Taking the last year by itself, the total is over $190,000,000.
> If we continue to wipe out the debt at these rates, how long will it take to retire it completely? It may come as a surprise to many to learn that if the rate of reduction for the past four years is maintained, there will be no national debt in 24 years. If we keep up the pace we went last year the debt will be wiped out in less than 20 years.

In twenty years our national debt will be extinct if our Minister of Finance continues to present us with budgets like the one which now occupies the attention of the house.

The hon. members on your left, sir, although admitting that the country is prosperous, deny that the present state of our finances is due to the good administration of the country. They make use of all possible arguments in endeavouring to ascribe this prosperity to an entirely different cause. Their acknowledgment that after eight years of Liberal administration the country is prosperous is something in itself if we recall the alarm they raised during the electoral campaign of 1925, when they were seeking power by attempting to have the people believe that ruin awaited them if the Liberals continued to administer the affairs of this country. Forced to submit to evidence, they seem today more anxious for the future of their party than that of the country. They are aware that it is the Conservative party which the Liberal government is ruining by fostering national prosperity.

The hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. J. A. Mercier) quoted the other day certain statements given out by the leaders of our large institutions on the financial situation of Canada. The hon. member, I trust, will allow me to read again one of these statements, the one by the President of the Bank of Montreal, which is a further proof that the prosperity of the country is general and reaches almost every industry. Sir Charles Gordon says:

> Canada as a whole has enjoyed more prosperity than ever before; our live stock industry has shown marked improvement. Cattle have been in better demand at better prices than for some years past. Between 1926 and 1927 there was an increase of about 25 per cent in the output of our dairy factories, and progress has continued in 1928. One of the happiest developments has been the definite revival of prosperity in the maritime provinces, coming into line with the rest of Canada in this respect. Canada is great in agriculture, but the glory of her heritage lies in the variety of her resources. Minerals are steadily growing in importance. The tourist trade is of the highest importance; according to government statistics tourists from abroad spent $275,000,000 in Canada in 1927. Reports from all provinces report an even larger number of tourists, and the amount spent has no doubt also been greater in 1928.

The general prosperity of the country spreads to our railways. It is true that here our hon. friends disavow Providence and consider the financial situation of the Canadian National as their work. They congratulate themselves on the purchase of this railway. They now pretend to ignore what, in 1919, they were at great pains trying to convey, that state ownership of the Canadian Northern was not of their choice but that they were forced to introduce this measure to protect the shareholders. They forget to mention that it is thanks to the sound and honest administration of the Liberal government if the Canadian National is to-day in a flourishing state. The Liberal government neglected nothing to make a success of this enterprise of which it assumed the management when it was bankrupt. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and the President of the Canadian National (Sir Henry Thornton) are therefore entitled to our congratulations.

I am pleased, sir, to note that the budget includes a reduction in the sales tax and I express the hope that this tax will gradually disappear. It is no longer required and its disappearance will not be regretted. The income tax is certainly far more equitable, since it reaches especially those who can most afford to pay.

I have closely followed the debate on the budget and I am sorry to note that members have devoted too little time, in my opinion, to the study of problems connected with agriculture. Other industries have had their full share of the discussion; but agriculture notwithstanding its importance, was but touched upon. We should bear in mind that probably half of our population is either directly or indirectly interested in agriculture, and that the problems which concern and interest such a large number of our people is entitled to a more serious study. I would even venture to say that a wiser and more appropriate expenditure could not be made than the one which would foster prosperity and happiness among our farming classes.

I take this opportunity to congratulate and thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), for what he has already done for the welfare of the farmers. His task is difficult, but I am confident that he will bring to a happy issue what he has already so well begun. I wish to thank the minister, his deputy and also assistant deputy, for the special interest they have all taken in the beautiful county of Russell by endowing it with a demonstration farm for the preserving of home products, the first of its kind in Canada. This farm has given a great impetus to this industry in my county and its establishment has already been amply justified; it is only reasonable to hope that before long this industry will be flourishing not only in my riding but in all rural districts in Canada. You will no doubt be astonished to learn that the products of our demonstration farm are to be found already on the tables of our best hotels. May I ask hon. members, when they dine at the Chateau Laurier not to forget to ask for Indian corn preserved at Bourget. I guarantee them a real treat which will convince them at the same time of the excellent quality of this product.

Let me refer to another question. The hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) mentioned the case of a young Canadian who, having begged for a meal on the streets of Edmonton, was arrested and brought before the magistrate Having heard that he came from eastern Canada, he was given twenty-four hours to leave the city with the option of one month in gaol. On the same day, a number of immigrants, arrested for the same offence, were sent to the railway company which undertook to feed them. I had no intention to discuss the immigration question: it is an intricate subject which requires much study and especially interests the western provinces. I admit, however, after hearing of this incident, that it is my duty to make a few comments on the subject. The immigration problem is very much to the fore at present; the press is continuously discussing it, the public is daily taking a greater interest in it and the government are seriously endeavouring to solve the problem in a satisfactory manner. Much money is spent each year in an endeavour to attract to our western lands European citizens and, according to an agreement concluded for some time past, youths from 14 to 17 years old hailing from Great Britain and the north of Ireland, who wish to settle in this country are brought over at the expense of the Imperial and Canadian governments. Adults, themselves, who come over with the intention of settling on the land have almost their entire travelling expenses paid. I do not intend to criticize the government's policy, being of the opinion that this expenditure is justified; however, it seems to me that the first step to take in order to solve this problem of immigration and colonization would be to use every possible means at our disposal to keep in this county our people and thus stem the exodus of Canadians to the neighbouring republic. A practical way to attain this end would be to offer to the sons of our farmers the same material advantages that we beg immigrants from the British Isles to accept. I am convinced that the evil from which we suffer would not long resist this efficient remedy.

Most of the young men who emigrate are sons of farmers born and brought up on the farm, and they need no further training. They are already acclimatized and are the proper people to settle our fertile free lands in the west. Our old Canadian parishes which should be the natural recruiting grounds for our settlers, are unfortunately but the recruiting grounds of artisans for the industries of large American cities. There comes, in the life of most of the young people of our countryside, a time when they must leave their native village to go wherever they expect to make a livelihood. They have heard of the fertile soil of the Canadian west, where labour is generously rewarded, and many of them are anxious to settle there; unfortunately their financial means are not sufficient to realize the dreams of their ambitions, they are therefore forced to take the roads leading to the large American cities which seem to offer them an easy means of living. This emigration of our young people is a serious problem which gives food for reflection to all Canadians who have at heart the welfare of their country, and I have no doubt the government will give their kind and special consideration to this problem and that before long our young farmers will choose the road that leads to the beautiful western provinces in preference to that of large cities.

After taking every possible means to stem this emigration of our people we shall endeavour to bring back to this country those whom we have had the misfortune to lose; that will be repatriation. If we place at the disposal of Canadians abroad attractive financial advantages, we shall obtain very happy results and the return to the native land of these prodigal sons will be of great benefit to us.

I do not intend, sir, to praise up the riding of Russell; my feeble voice would not suffice to describe the beauties of this corner of Canada where I have lived for over 30 years, or to enumerate the real and stirling virtues of its people. It is an essentially Canadian population and they have at heart the expansion and progress of Canada first and all. The interests of my constituents are intimately linked with those of the citizens of the Capital. This means that what affects the government service affects them personally since a large number among them are members of the Civil Service, and I must frankly admit that many others would also wish to be included in this service. Unfortunately, they often find obstacles to their ambition, and these are legitimate for the most part. There is one obstacle, however, upon which I want to draw the attention of the house because it seems not to have been foreseen by the authors of the Civil Service Act, and to-day it creates a situation prejudicial to the interests of Canadians. The preference in appointments granted by the Civil Service Act to the veterans of the Great war has my hearty support in so far as it applies to our Canadians or veterans of the allied nations who resided in Canada when they joined the army. But this preference goes much further and in order to explain its effects, I cannot do better than to cite the following incident. The Civil Service Commission some time ago advertised an examination for a position then vacant. Two candidates applied for the post, one of them belonged to my constituency. The latter, had all the qualifications required but had only done military service in Canada. He had voluntarily offered his services in the first months of the war, however, for reasons of health, the military authorities would not send him overseas and employed him in Canada during the whole course of the war. According to the act, his services gave him no right to any preference. The other candidate had come from England three years previous and had, if my information is correct, been conscripted in 1918; his military service was limited to a few months passed in training camps in England immediately previous to the armistice. According to the act, England is considered as a seat of war, giving right to military preference; this gentleman was therefore given the position to the detriment of the Canadian whose qualifications were much superior to his. This case is probably not the only one. Other members no doubt could cite similar cases; it therefore seems to me that the time is ripe to remedy such a state of things. Canadians have a right to expect that they be placed at least on an equal footing with strangers. Our Canadian veterans find themselves displaced by people recently come to this country. Canada belongs to the Canadian, the latter is intelligent and industrious and must receive first consideration, especially when it is a matter of a position in the service of his country.

I am greatly interested in the Civil Service and I should have liked to discuss at length all questions connected with it. As I do not want to prolong this debate, I shall content myself with adding to what I have already said that I am entirely in favour of a reasonable minimum salary for all the employees of the Civil Service, in order that the most humble among them can live in a decent manner and provide for the needs of his family. This generous act of the government would be not only to the benefit of the employee himself, but in the interests of the country at large.

I have, sir, spoken longer than I intended to. It was not in vain that at the outset of my speech I begged the indulgence of hon. members; they have granted me a very kind hearing and very sincerely do I thank them.

On motion of Mr. Casgrain the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 9, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Seventh report of select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

CHANGES IN MEMBERSHIP

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move:

That the name of Mr. Gray be substituted for that of Mr. Rutherford on the select standing committee on public accounts, and the name of Mr. Gardiner be substituted for that of Mr. Hocken on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

SUBSIDY TO NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): An order of the house was issued yesterday for the tabling of all correspondence between Mr. Rhodes, the Premier of Nova Scotia, and myself concerning the payment of the annual federal subsidy and the special grant recommended by the Duncan commission, and I desire to lay this correspondence upon the table of the house.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES OF PROFESSIONAL AND TECHNICAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he is prepared to announce the membership of the special commission which is to inquire into and report on the salaries of the technical employees in the service, and also if his attention has been drawn to a statement in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning indicating that the report of the Civil Service Commission which was made last year regarding this subject was an unanimous report, and not a partial report as has been intimated by some press despatches.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I had not the time to read the papers this morning, but I find no fault with that report; my recollection of it is that it was unanimous. I am not in a position at the present time to announce the personnel of the proposed commission.

PRIVILEGE—MR. KENNEDY

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, April 6, entitled Regarding Misrepresentation. I will only read a few lines from the editorial which I think will be sufficient to indicate the point I intend to deal with. They are as follows:

Nor is the Peace River member any more fortunate in his denial of the statement that, from one of the divisions of the session of 1926, the government emerged with a majority of one, including his vote. "There never was such a division in that session," he says.

After omitting a few lines, the editorial continues:

Mr. Kennedy attempts to set up a case by referring to the votes cast by him in the "hectic divisions" immediately preceding the dissolution, but those were not the only divisions of the session, nor were they the only "hectic" ones. The government was on the edge of disaster from the very opening day of the session, and while nearly every division was critical, some were much more so than others. There was, for example, the vote on February 2, on Mr. Stansell's motion to adjourn the debate on the customs inquiry, a vital issue then, as later. Perhaps Mr. Kennedy will say that this was not a hectic vote; it is a matter which we will have to take up with the government which, at the time, regarded the Stansell motion as of such importance as to force a division. A vote was taken, and the Stansell motion was defeated by 119 to 118, and if Mr. Kennedy will look at the Hansard of that year and month and day he will find among the 119 nays the name "Kennedy (Peace River)."

The vote referred to took place on February 2, 1926, and my statement that there had not been such a division came immediately after quoting an article in the Montreal Gazette of March 5, 1928, which read as follows:

But he—

Referring to myself.

—occupied the seat, and when a petition was presented in behalf of the Conservative candidate, Mr. Collins, the government resisted its acceptance and it was not accepted. Mr. Kennedy stayed, justifying his action on the ground that he had, somewhere or other, lost more votes than had been taken from Mr. Collins. The importance of this episode was revealed in one of the hectic divisions of the session when the government was saved by one vote, including Mr. Kennedy's.

My interpretation of that reference to the resistance by the government, and of the comment that the importance of the episode was revealed in one of the hectic divisions, is that it can refer only to a division taken after the resistance of that petition. I cannot by any stretch of the imagination think that its writer could refer to anything else, and I so understood it in my statement the other day. With that in mind, and having that in mind at the time, I may say that the vote referred to is that of February 2, 1926. The Collins petition was dealt with or resisted in the House of Commons, according as we like to take the words of the Gazette, on May 4, 1926, three months and two days afterwards. Throughout that session there was not another division that the government lost by one vote or gained by one vote, except one on the 31st May, 1926. I find that I did not vote on that date. If I remember correctly, Liberals and Conservatives in the customs committee paired with each other and I did not vote at all. The only vote during the session after that date was that of June 25, 1926, on the Woodsworth subamendment to the customs committee report where the vote stood 115 to 117, and where I voted against the government. These are the facts in regard to my position and the statement I made the other day that—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. There is nothing in the statement made by the hon. gentleman that is in accordance with the rules of the house. It does not interest us to know what happened three or four years ago. My point of order is that my hon. friend, if he so desires, can read the whole Hansard for that date, but there is no privilege in that and it is against the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bourinot, fourth edition, says:

> Members sometimes correct reports of their speeches, or inaccurate statements in the press on the ground of privilege; but these are personal explanations, not matters of privilege, and are allowed only by the indulgence of the house. Sometimes a member raises as a question of privilege what is, at most, merely a question of order. If a member has a serious complaint to make of a newspaper, he should formally move to have it read at the table, and then make a motion in relation thereto, if he desires to have the matter dealt with by the house. If a member rise to make a personal explanation in the English Commons and proceed in the course of his remarks to complain of attacks in a newspaper, he is not allowed to proceed unless he is prepared to take the proper parliamentary course. And if a member brings forward a matter of privilege of this character, the motion with which he concludes should be relevant thereto.

This is the old British practice, but in this house generally when a member feels that he is the victim of an inaccurate statement made by the press, he may rise on the ground of privilege and by the indulgence of the house give a brief explanation of the matter.

Mr. KENNEDY: I have just this to say: that I had no knowledge of any Collins petition pending or otherwise, until it was presented to the house.

Mr. POULIOT: So the hon. member did not read the papers.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was in order.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Arising out of the question addressed to the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I should like to ask this question: It appears that the minister is not willing to accept the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission in regard to the salaries paid to certain people employed by the government. There is also a similar desire on the part of the government not to accept the viewpoint of the commission in regard to the salaries of the postal workers. If we accept the statement of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), he is at variance with the Civil Service Commission with regard to postal workers' salaries. Will the government appoint a committee to inquire into the question of salaries of postal employees as they have done in the case of the more highly paid technical officials of the government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I have an answer to my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the Minister of Finance gave an answer a moment ago.

Mr. HEAPS: This is another question dealing with postal employees. The matter referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre dealt with the technical civil servants.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will serve as a notice.

Mr. ROBB: I shall note the question of my hon. friend.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSAL TO REDUCE CAPITALIZATION OF SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the government propose to bring in any measures to give effect to the recommendation of Sir Henry Thornton with regard to reducing the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A few days ago I made a statement to the house as to the further legislation of the session and the particular matter to which my hon. friend has just referred was not mentioned in the list. It is not the intention at this session to introduce further legislation with respect to the Canadian National Railways.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was on the first of March that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) brought into the house the budget which we have now before us. It is just a month and two days since the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in his dual capacity at the time of acting leader and financial critic of the opposition, undertook to reply at some length and to deliver a speech on behalf of the opposition in reference to the several matters in the budget and referred to in the speech of the Minister of Finance. From that time to the present, with the exception of the recess which we had at Easter and two days when another matter was precipitated into the discussion here, the house has continuously debated the budget, and it might appear that at this late stage of the debate little is left which has not already been said. May I say at once that my purpose in participating at this time is not so much in the expectation of contributing any new arguments, but rather for the sake of emphasizing the truth of some of the representations which have been made on this side of the house, more particularly in reference to the speech by the hon. member for South Wellington.

It was perhaps natural that the speech of the hon. member for South Wellington should attract considerable attention at the time it was delivered, and also occasion much discussion in the course of the debate. My hon. friend took full advantage of his opportunity as acting leader of the opposition to speak at length, and to cover, in so far as they relate to the finances of the country, the many subjects which were likely to be of interest in political discussion during the next year or two. My hon. friend has already been congratulated upon his speech on that occasion. He is an old parliamentarian; with the exception of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), he is perhaps the oldest member in the house, certainly the oldest member sitting on the opposite side. He has had great experience as a parliamentarian, and also in his chosen profession, and he turned both to the best of advantage in the presentation of the statement which he made to parliament at that time. I should like to congratulate him on the manner of the presentation of his remarks on that occasion; I wish I could do likewise with respect to the substance of them. He congratulated the Minister of Finance on the lucidity of his speech, on its precision, on its conciseness, but I must say to my hon. friend that what his own address gained in lucidity it seemed to me to lack in accuracy. What it had of precision was in large part, to my mind, mere pretence, and if he was concise in many of his statements, he was, I regret to say, not wholly candid. That is the criticism which I have to bring against my hon. friend's remarks, a criticism which I shall endeavour to substantiate in what I have to say this afternoon.

There was, however, one remark made by my hon. friend to which I think no exception will be taken, certainly no exception on this side of the house, a remark which will be remembered long after much of the rest of his presentation will have been completely forgotten. He referred to the present as a time of prosperity, and he did not stop at the word prosperity, but he said, a time of unbounded prosperity. While my hon. friend has stated what I think the country as a whole recognizes to be the fact, he endeavoured strenuously to discover ways in which credit for this prosperity might be given in some quarter other than that of the present administration. He spoke naturally of Providence and of the energy and ingenuity of the people of our country. Of this the Minister of Finance himself had I think already made full acknowledgment. He went on to say that it would be interesting for those on his side to speculate how much more prosperous the country would have been, and how much more general the prosperity, had another government been seated on this side. May I say to my hon. friend that if he is free to speculate in that way, we are similarly free to speculate and I think we may fairly say that if hon. gentlemen opposite had been in office, there is no doubt that the prosperity of the country would not have been what it is at the present time.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that this prosperity, far from being, as my hon. friend sought to infer, restricted and not distributed as between the different classes of the country, has been very general and has been shared in some measure by all classes throughout the country. It is a prosperity discoverable, first of all, with respect to the great basic industries of the country, on which the rest of our industrial development so largely depends. It is a prosperity which has been apparent in the manufacturing industries of the country, a prosperity which has been great with respect to the trade of the country, a prosperity which has manifested itself in increase of employment and in diminution of unemployment, a prosperity that has shown itself in the activities of business and of banks and financial institutions, a prosperity which has also been disclosed in the savings of the people, and in their investments with respect to many matters which have to do with their standard of living.

It might be well, Mr. Speaker, in confirmation of what I have just said to give a few facts with respect to the present prosperity which will serve to indicate how general and how considerable that prosperity is. Before so doing, however, may I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the prosperity of the present year succeeds the prosperity of the year previous, which was noteworthy in the same particular; that, as a matter of fact, from the moment at which the government had found it possible to balance the public accounts there has been continual improvement in the public finances of the country, with which has come continuous prosperity until within the past year we have had a period of prosperity unmistakable in the history of Canada.

To begin with the basic industries, may I mention these facts with respect to agriculture, Canada's greatest basic industry?

The acreage under crop this past year, 1928, was 59,410,000 or 3,238,000 more than in 1927. The new land brought under crop this year represents an area half as large as the crop acreage of Manitoba—this on the top of continuous increases for many years past.

The wheat yield totalled over 533,000,000 bushels, or 53,000,000 greater than the previous high yield, or 145,000,000 greater than the average of the five years 1922-1926.

Exports of wheat reached the highest point ever recorded in a single month in November, 1928, namely, 75,416,000 bushels. The exports of 1928 were the highest ever recorded in a calendar year, namely, 365,428,561 bushels, valued at $433,767,578.

The previous largest twelve months was the year ending September, 1924, when the totals were only 294,000,000 bushels, valued at $302,000,000.

In mining we had the most active year in the history of Canada. The total value of production was $273,000,000, an increase of $24,000,000 over the total for 1927, the previous high year.

The chief activity was in copper, lead, zinc and nickel, but coal and gypsum made new high records, as did structural materials in general. Gold production was up, and cadmium, produced at Trail during 1928, was a newcomer among Canada's mineral products Employment was about 7 per cent more active than 1927.

In forest products, newsprint production reached 2,382,011 tons in 1928, the highest on record, the previous peak being 2,086,949 in 1927. Seven years ago, in 1921, the production was 805,000 tons.

Conditions in the fishing industry in 1928 were notably better than in 1927. With the possible exception of 1926, last year was the most successful experienced by Canadian fishermen since the Fordney tariff was made effective by the United States in 1922. The production had a marketed value of more than $54,000,000, or $11,500,000, in round figures, above the marketed value of the catch of 1923. The total catch of all fish was approximately 1,300,000,000 pounds.

One of the most significant features of 1928 was the fact that power installation work valued at over $300,000,000 was under way. When it is remembered that every dollar spent on primary power presupposes an expenditure of $5 or $6 on subsidiary industrial plant, it is apparent that we are in the midst of a process of adding something like $2,000,000,000 to the capital industrial plant of the Dominion.

With respect to manufactures, it is conservative to say that the gross value of manufactures in 1928 will exceed $3,500,000,000.

Employment was 7 per cent more active than in 1927, the significant indexes being:

Manufacturing	1926	1927	1928
November 1..	102.7	104.9	115.1
December 1..	101.5	104.3	113.4

The basic industries of iron and steel were operated on very high levels.

Pig iron production was 1,037,535 long tons, or 46 per cent more than in 1927.

Steel ingots and castings increased from a production of 907,638 tons in 1927 to 1,240,214 in 1928, or 37 per cent.

These are the highest figures since the record year of 1918.

Automobile production was 242,382 cars and trucks, an increase of 35 per cent over 1927.

Boots and shoes have shown increased production—probably 3 per cent.

All previous records for construction of new work have been exceeded. Contracts have been awarded totalling, according to MacLean's Building Reports, $472,000,000 in 1928, compared with $420,000,000 in 1927, the previous peak, a gain of 12.7 per cent.

Perhaps the best single figure to sum up productive activity is the index of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on the general volume of production. It stood at 168.7 for 1928, compared with 146.0 per cent in 1927—an increase of 15.5 per cent.

Coming next to trade, the figures show that with respect to foreign trade the exports of Canadian products for 1928 totalled $1,349,751,000, an increase of $131,414,000, or 10.7 per cent, over the preceding year, chiefly in wheat, newsprint, oats, nickel and automobiles.

Our imports for 1928 were $1,222,318,000, an increase of $135,200,000, or 12.4 per cent over the preceding year.

When allowance is made for exports of foreign products there was a favourable trade balance of $151,812,000, a slight increase over 1927. This is probably the highest favourable trade balance per capita in the world. This favourable trade balance was achieved in spite of falling prices of wheat and newsprint, Canada's two leading exports; it is accordingly indicative of "real" trading volume. The physical volume of Canada's trade in 1928 was undoubtedly the largest on record. Our total trade at 1918-20 prices would have run to at least 3½ billions of dollars.

With respect to domestic trade, the indexes of employment in wholesale and retail establishments showed a gain of 8.1 per cent over 1927, as follows:

Trade—	1926	1927	1928
October 1..	101.0	109.4	120.1
November 1..	103.9	111.9	121.3
December 1..	108.9	121.2	127.4
Average for year..	99.2	107.4	116.1

The huge proportions which the tourist trade has now attained is worthy of special mention under the heading of domestic trade. In 1927 it amounted to $242,754,000, and the estimate for the year just passed is substantially higher.

Coming now to transportation, carloadings totalled 3,697,106 cars in 1928, compared with 3,396,797 cars in 1927, an increase of 9 per cent, notwithstanding the diversion to motor trucking in progress.

The gross earnings of the Canadian National lines and of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1928 were approximately 507,400,000, as against 450,000,000 in 1927.

The Canadian National system (including lines in the United States) had gross revenues of approximately $276,600,000, and net revenues of $53,200,000—all new high records.

The St. Lawrence canal traffic was the heaviest on record—almost half a million tons higher than last year, the previous high record. The Welland also made a new record.

With regard to labour, the general index of all employment was 111.6 in 1928, as compared with 104.6 in 1927, or an increase of 6.7 per cent.

The year was comparatively free from serious industrial disturbances. The time loss through strikes during the past three years was lower than at any time since 1915.

Let me refer to public finances and private savings and investments. The total ordinary revenues of the Dominion including special receipts and credits on consolidated fund, have reached $439,413,000 in the calendar year 1928, an increase of $30,214,000 notwithstanding the substantial reductions in the tariff of the last budget. This has enabled $53,000,000 of the national debt to be paid off, representing a saving of $2,650,000 in annual interest charges.

In banking, the savings deposits of banks increased from $1,431,000,000 on November 30, 1927, to $1,523,500,000 on the same date of last year. Never before 1928 have saving deposits reached $1,500 millions.

Current loans, reflecting the strong demand for credit in connection with commercial and speculative transactions have shown an even greater increase than notice deposits. Such loans on November 30 last amounted to $1,238,000,000, an increase of $158,600,000 over the same date of 1927.

The sales of ordinary life insurance based on reports of fifteen companies having in force 84 per cent of the outstanding ordinary insurance in Canada, were $580,674,000 in 1928, compared with $502,000,000 in 1927, an increase of more than 15 per cent.

The year may be summed up as follows:—

Unprecedentedly heavy production, earnings and profits in agriculture and all the other basic industries and occupations of the people.

Based on this, a heavy investment of savings, not only in existing enterprises but in the launching of new enterprises on an unprecedented scale—a process which has attracted foreign as well as Canadian capital.

An especially gratifying feature as I have already said, is that the prevailing prosperity is well distributed over the various provinces; it is as general for the different economic areas as it is for the different economic classes represented in the Dominion.

I have taken the trouble, Mr. Speaker, to make these facts a matter of record in Hansard, first of all, because they reflect a condition in the country of which, I think, we have all great reason to be proud, but also because they will serve, as I speak a little later on, to answer some of the points which my hon. friend made in the course of his remarks, with respect to the burden of taxation and the ability to pay. Strive as my hon. friend and his associates may not to credit the government with aught on account of this prosperity, they will have difficulty in having the country believe that the policies which we have put in force during the last seven years have not been in large part responsible for the progress which I have just mentioned.

The existing prosperity is due in no small measure to the fact that we have restored confidence in the public finances of the country. When we came into office, for years preceding there had been deficits upon deficits in the public accounts. Those deficits have been changed into surpluses under the present administration. When we came into office, what are to-day the Canadian National railways, a splendidly organized system, were an aggregation of bankrupt roads in the nature of liabilities to the country; to-day they are looked upon as one of the country's greatest assets. The hon. Minister of Finance in his endeavour to encourage production and to bring relief to the farming community of this country, in one of his outstanding budgets introduced early after coming into office, reduced the duties on the implements of production in all the basic industries, mining, lumbering, fishing and agriculture, with a view to making the cost of production less in these great basic industries. The prosperity which we have to-day is in part a reflection of the budgets of my hon. friend in that particular. Similarly, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) has brought in measures in connection with the railways of this country, providing for increased branch lines, which have had the effect of opening up new districts and so helping to bring about the prosperity of which we are now justly proud. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) as the house well knows, has been energetic in expanding the trade facilities of his department, increasing the representation of his commercial agents abroad, and, along with the Minister of Finance, has helped to further treaties that have been of great service in the expansion of our trade. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has brought in many measures which have been of distinct advantage to the farming community and of advantage as well in the marketing abroad of the products of this country. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), has made a record for the country and for himself in the promotion and maintenance of industrial peace.

I might say also, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the government's policies in other directions, that we have through pursuing a policy of goodwill towards all parts of the British Empire and towards other countries, done much to further friendly relations between this country and the countries most closely associated with us, and in so doing have helped to forward the general prosperity of Canada. The establishment of legations in the United States, France and Japan, are a part of that policy of international goodwill. Despite, therefore what my hon. friend has said, the country, I feel sure, will conclude that a prosperity which is unsurpassed in the history of Canada owes not a little to an administration in which fortunately the country itself has confidence at the present time.

May I come now more particularly to some of the financial matters mentioned by my hon. friend from South Wellington. He first of all undertook to deal with the debt of the country. He well knows, the house knows and the country knows that under the present administration the public debt of Canada has been very considerably reduced; indeed, it is one of the great achievements of the administration that the reduction in the public debt has been what it is. My hon. friend could not deny the reduction in the public debt, but he sought to lead the country to believe that the reduction had been very much less than it actually has been. My hon. friend said that the only debt we should take any account of is the funded debt. In Great Britain, he said, they do not take account of anything else. There, according to him, they consider only the funded debt and he contended that here in Canada we too should take account only of that debt in estimating what the reduction has been. Now my hon. friend knows better than that. He knows that in Great Britain the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very much concerned about the floating as well as the funded debt. As a matter of fact the Chancellor of the Exchequer issues every week a statement as to the floating debt of England, and his first concern is to gather up outlying obligations of a temporary character.

My hon. friend took the public accounts and said that he would present only what appeared therein. He held up before the house a volume of the public accounts and spoke about the funded debt. At page 13 of the public accounts will be found a statement under schedule T with regard to the funded debt. To this my hon. friend referred, but he made no reference whatever to schedule S which immediately precedes it. Let me read that schedule:

Temporary Loans
Loan of 1917-19, New York
5 per cent, due Aug. 1, 1919..	$ 1,000
5 per cent debenture stock.. .	200,000
	$201,000

That is all there is outstanding at the present time of temporary loans or floating obligations. But, in making comparisons between 1922 and to-day, my hon. friend should have taken the public accounts ended March 31, 1922, and read what appears on the same page, 13, under schedule S with respect to temporary loans. What are the figures in that regard?

Temporary Loans
Loan of 1917-19, New York
5 per cent, due Aug. 1, 1919..	$15,000
Treasury Bills, Canada
6 per cent, due Oct. 1, 1922..	$24,605,000
Treasury Bills, Canada
6 per cent, due Oct. 15, 1922..	49,215,000
Treasury Bills, Canada
5¾ per cent, due Nov. 2, 1922..	35,000,000
Treasury Bills, Canada
5¾ per cent, due Nov. 15, 1922..	35,000,000	143,820,000
Debenture Stock
5 per cent, payable on demand..		700,000
		$144,535,000

In other words, when we came into office there was a funded debt of a certain amount and there was, in addition, this unfunded debt of $144,535,000. My hon. friend says that, according to the figures, we have reduced the funded debt by $90,000,000; but he says nothing whatever about the unfunded debt of $144,000,000 by which we have also reduced the debt of the country. Instead therefore of a reduction in the interest-bearing debt of the country of $90,000,000 the reduction is $90,000,000 plus this $144,000,000 to which I have referred.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow me to make my speech, I shall be obliged. However, he may ask the question.

Mr. STEVENS: One question in fairness. Should not my right hon. friend take schedule B showing $162,000,000 as owing by the British government and other foreign governments in 1922?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for South Wellington took full account of what was owing by the British government. But as regards schedule B, let me point out that while the British government owed us something we owed them something as well for advances they had made to us. When speaking to the house and to the country my hon. friend was speaking of the interest-bearing debt; he was dealing with the funded debt. He said that in England they paid no attention to the floating debt and he urged that in Canada we too should leave it out of account, that we should consider nothing except the funded debt. Yet he was aware all the time of the existence of that schedule showing over $144,000,000, every cent of which, except for a few dollars, has been paid by this government. May I add further that the interest on that sum at the time we came into office was something like $7,000,000 per annum, so that in addition to paying off the principal we have been freeing the country of that amount of annual interest. These obligations were paying the highest rate of interest of any form of our indebtedness, the rates being 6 per cent, and 5¾ per cent. For this reason they were among the first obligations we sought to pay off, and we have paid them off, with the result I have indicated. In other words, I repeat, instead of the reduction to the interest-bearing public debt amounting, as my hon. friend put it, to some $90,000,000, it is, as I have shown, that sum plus $144,000,000; the annual rate of reduction of the interest-bearing debt having been therefore between $33,000,000 and $34,000,000 since this administration came into office.

I come now to the next matter to which my hon. friend referred. He does not like to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) allude year after year to surpluses, and after the many deficits there were during the time he was in office we are able to appreciate his feelings in that regard. In view of that record, to have the Minister of Finance record a surplus each year must be irritating to hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly where the surpluses are of their present proportions. To disguise the real situation what does my hon. friend do? He says: I am going to take the public accounts and I am going to show that after all there is not very much difference in the surpluses as between the two administrations. As a matter of fact, he says, the surpluses while we were in office—and the hon. gentleman chose his own period of years—were very much the same as the surpluses at the present time. And my hon. friend then directs the attention of the house to the consolidated fund, surplus and deficit. With a wave of the hand, he dismisses altogether the national debt as it is generally understood—the net debt of the country. That, he says, is of no account whatever. Pay no attention to that; take only the consolidated fund and look at the surpluses and deficits, and what do you find? You find, he says, very little difference between the surpluses this administration is claiming and the surpluses we had when we were in office.

Now my hon. friend knows that while it is true that most moneys are paid into the consolidated fund, it is not equally true that all expenditures are made from that fund. He knows that very well. He deliberately left out of account for the period of which he spoke, all expenditures made by the previous administration, which were not of the consolidated account—and they were some of the heaviest expenditures at the time. Perhaps I had better take the exact words of my hon. friend and read them to the house. At page 741-2 of Hansard my hon. friend is reported as follows:

> But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the record of this government, starting with the year 1923 up to the present year inclusive, is scarcely one whit better than the record of its predecessor. The public accounts of this country disclose the fact, astonishing to some people, that the surpluses under the preceding government were but little below what they have been under the present government.

Then he says he will read the statement from the public accounts of Canada.

> I will start with the year 1917, when the Union government was formed, and give the surpluses which appear on page 45 of the public accounts:

Then he quotes from page 45 of the public accounts, giving the surpluses from the consolidated fund from 1917 to 1922, as follows:

1917	$84,101,950 77
1918	82,494,639 72
1919	80,215,464 20
1920	45,902,404 80
1921	73,268,391 39
1922	34,391,696 36

My hon. friend continued as follows:

> The aggregate of surpluses for the six years amounts to about $400,374,000, or an average surplus per year of $66,729,000. We will now give the record of the Liberal government, starting with the year 1923:

1923	$62,321,167 91
1924	72,024,492 47
1925	27,942,578 00
1926	60,085,026 44
1927	79,147,603 79
1928	86,550,021 70
1929	99,742,000 00

> The aggregate for these years amounts to about $487,812,000, or an average per year of $69,687,000, or just about $3,000,000 more per year of surplus under the Liberal government than was the case under the Conservative government which preceded it.

When my hon. friend was making that statement he had the public accounts before him, and he knows that the public accounts have been kept in the same way year after year since the days of confederation. If he had referred as he ought to have referred, to page 46, he would have found a statement of the total debt of the country. He would have found in the column next to it a statement of the total assets, which it is proper should be subtracted in arriving at the net debt of the country, and in the following column he would have found the net debt of Canada. Then in the last two columns appear the figures of the increase and decrease of debt, and I submit that in setting forth the net debt of this country he should have given those figures to the house, rather than the figures which he gave. These are the figures I intend to quote now in order to set forth the increase and decrease of the debt; these figures should be placed beside the columns quoted by my hon. friend in order that the two may be compared.

According to page 46 of the public accounts, the increase and decrease of debt is as follows:

	Increase	Decrease
1919	$382,646,969 94
1920	674,337,591 35
1921	92,010,359 90
1922	81,256,818 04
1923	31,641,067 01
1924		$ 35,993,593 86
1925		345,589 29
1926		27,706,586 17
1927		41,896,729 33
1928		50,984,137 17
		$226,708,635 82

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the proper figures to quote where comparisons are being made with respect to increases or decreases in the public debt. My hon. friend said that the only figures which should be taken into account in estimating the debt of the country are those which relate to the bonds issued by the government of the day, because those bonds have been solemnly sealed and delivered and carry with them an obligation for payment. May I say that what is true of the bonds of the funded debt is equally true with respect to the securities covering the funded debt, with respect to obligations in the nature of floating obligations, which my hon. friend should also have mentioned. In addition, there are all those amounts which have been paid on capital account. My hon. friend left them out entirely; he ignored the expenditures that have been made on that score.

May I now give the figures which accurately represent the national net debt and the per capita net debt based on the population as estimated from 1922 to 1929. Let us remember that it was my hon. friend who chose these particular years for purposes of comparison. These figures will serve to indicate how considerably the debt of the country has been reduced under the present administration as compared with the years immediately preceding. I shall give first a statement showing the net debt, and the net debt per capita as I have indicated, then a statement showing the total interest-bearing debt, the reductions in annual interest charges in average rate of interest and in per capita interest charges. They are as follows:

	Dominion net debt	Per capita net debt based on population as estimated
March 31, 1922..	$2,422,135,802	$271 89
1923..	2,453,776,869	271 79
1924..	2,417,783,275	264 21
1925..	2,417,437,686	260 82
1926..	2,389,731,099	254 51
1927..	2,347,834,370	246 64
1928..	2,296,850,233	237 82
1929.. estimated	2,227,068,233	227 25

	Total interest bearing debt	Annual interest charges thereon	Average rate of interest per cent	Per capita annual interest charges
March 31, 1922..	$2,669,967,110	$137,881,774	5.164	$15 48
1923..	2,653,869,212	136,007,667	5.125	15 06
1924..	2,614,147,586	133,198,052	5.092	14 56
1925..	2,617,706,451	130,686,851	4.992	14 10
1926..	2,603,615,729	130,086,627	4.996	13 85
1927..	2,565,651,263	128,674,340	5.015	13 52
1928..	2,514,066,568	125,200,730	4.980	12 96
1929.. .. .. estimated	2,478,000,000	123,300,000	4.976	12 58

May I say to my hon. friend that in making comparisons between the periods during which hon. gentlemen opposite were in office and the period during which the present administration has been in office we have no desire whatever to include in expenditures those outlays which were made during the period of the war, on war account. For the purposes of comparison we are quite prepared wholly to disregard every dollar that was spent by this country for the purposes of war and for demobilization during the two years following the war. Having written that off, however, we wish to make it clear to the house and to the country that even then, hon. gentlemen opposite did not raise sufficient amounts by way of taxation to balance the budget with regard to ordinary expenditures. In other words, it never must be forgotten that while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, while they were financing that war period, they sought only to meet any of the current expenses of the country and did not try to levy taxation in order to meet the expenses of the war; they left all that to succeeding governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every cent of it.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Sir Thomas White made that quite clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am prepared to stand by that statement, and I have here the figures from the public accounts, beginning with the fiscal year 1914-15 and ending with the fiscal year 1919-20, under the headings total revenue receipts; total disbursements; deficit; and spent on war and demobilization account. First I will give the total revenue receipts, as follows:

1914-15	$ 133,073,482
1915-16	172,149,393
1916-17	232,701,294
1917-18	260,778,953
1918-19	312,946,747
1919-20	349,746,335
Total	$1,461,396,204

The total disbursements were as follows:

1914-15	$ 248,098,526
1915-16	339,702,502
1916-17	498,203,118
1917-18	576,660,210
1918-19	697,042,212
1919-20	786,030,611
Total	$3,145,737,179

Mr. GEARY: Should that figure of $786,000,000 not be $740,000,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figure of $740,000,000 does not take into account $45,780,690 which was advanced to railways.

Mr. GEARY: I see what you mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no mistake on that score. The deficits, by fiscal years, were as follows:

1914-15	$ 115,025,044
1915-16	167,553,109
1916-17	265,501,824
1917-18	315,881,257
1918-19	384,095,465
1919-20	436,284,276
Total	$1,684,340,975

The expenditures for war and demobilization were as follows:

1914-15	$ 60,750,476
1915-16	166,197,755
1916-17	306,488,815
1917-18	343,836,802
1918-19	446,519,439
1919-20	346,612,955
Total	$1,670,406,242

The total expenditure for war and demobilization amounted to $1,670,406,242 and the total deficit amounted to $1,684,340,975, leaving an amount of $13,934,733 which was borrowed for carrying on the business of Canada during that period, over and above the expenditure for war and demobilization. That is a true statement of the finances of that period.

In making a comparison between the two periods, it should be borne in mind that in speaking of revenues and taxation the hon. gentleman opposite did not take into account any payments for war expenses, while we are obliged to take into account, and do take into account, in addition to present expenditures due to the war and which constitute 47 per cent of the whole, the amounts by which we are reducing the public debt, which reduction is really in the nature of making payment on the cost of the war. In other words, it has been left to the administrations which succeeded hon. gentlemen opposite not only to meet payments subsequently arising out of the war, but to meet the whole cost of the war, and in addition to meet the interest payments on the sums which were paid out during the period of the war. The expenses which have grown out of the war, such as pensions and the like, I think it is true to state that 42 cents out of every dollar spent by the present administration is in one way or another an expenditure on account of the war.

My hon. friend mentioned a sinking fund and said that he thought the Minister of Finance should establish such a fund. One of his reasons for advocating a sinking fund was that the temptation to spend too much money might be removed from the Minister of Finance. If the minister were not presenting to the house the surpluses which he has, were he not reducing the public debt at the rate he is reducing it—$69,000,000 this year—there might be something in the argument for the immediate institution of a sinking fund to ensure that a given amount would be paid every year. If the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office I should say it would be eminently desirable to have a sinking fund. They did the financing of this country during their term of office by borrowing while we are meeting our obligations out of taxation. We are meeting our obligations and at the same time reducing in a very substantial way the public debt. At the same time, I agree with my hon. friend as to the value ordinarily of a sinking fund. I believe it is a desirable institution and I hope that one of these days a sinking fund will be made a part of our scheme of finance.

The next subject to which my hon friend referred was the rate of taxation and the burden of taxation. In the course of his remarks the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said:

> But who cares about the rate of taxation? The rate does not count. The only thing that counts in this world in regard to taxes is the burden of taxation—the load which the people have to carry. If my hon. friend would read the speeches of the late William Ewart Gladstone, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, on this very point he would get some light. Gladstone pointed out very definitely that the rate of taxation means nothing; the burden of taxation means everything.

Who cares about the rate? Everyone cares, and no one more than my hon. friend himself. When he speaks about Mr. Gladstone's references to the rate and to the burden of taxation he overlooks the fact that Mr. Gladstone never spoke of the burden in contrast to the rate; he spoke of the burden in relation to the adjustment of burdens and in this regard he attached all importance to the rate. He said that the same rate meant an injustice so far as the different classes were concerned. He was continually emphasizing that fact, and especially so in his great speech on the income tax in 1850. At that time he stressed, above everything else, the injustice of an income tax which fixed one rate for all classes in the community, because all classes were not equally in a position to bear the burden.

My hon. friend knows that there is an all-important factor in considering the burden of taxation, and that is the ability to pay. That is an all-important consideration. A 10 per cent tax on a man who has an income of $1,000 would be a very considerable burden; it means $100 taken out of $1,000, $900 are left after the tax is paid. A 10 per cent tax on a man who has an income of $10,000 amounts to $1,000, and it is relatively not so hard a burden to bear, $9,000 are left after the tax is paid. When a man has to pay on an income of $100,000 it about reaches the point where he does not feel a 10 per cent tax as a burden at all. In the light of figures which I have already given to the house I think it must be fully apparent that the ability to pay has become increasingly greater so far as all classes of society in this country are concerned.

Mr. Gladstone's views with respect to the burden and the rate of taxation may be gauged from the following passage which appears on page 56, volume 2, of Morley's Life of Gladstone:

> It has often been said that he ignored the social question; did not even seem to know there was one. The truth is, that what marks him from other chancellors is exactly the dominating hold gained by the social question in all its depth and breadth upon his most susceptible imagination. Tariff reform, adjustment of burdens, invincible repugnance to waste or profusion, accurate keeping and continuous scrutiny of accounts, substitution of a few good taxes for many bad ones,—all these were not merely the love of a methodical and thrifty man for habits of business; they were directly associated in him with the amelioration of the hard lot of the toiling mass, and sprang from an ardent concern in improving human well-being, and raising the moral ideals of mankind.

Elsewhere, at page 471, volume 1, of his Life of Gladstone, referring to Gladstone's examination of the income tax, Morley says Gladstone spoke of "the sense in the public mind of its injustice in laying the same rate upon the holder of idle and secured public funds, upon the industrious trader, upon the precarious earnings of the professional man."

I would say to my hon. friend that the course pursued by Mr. Gladstone is exactly the line on which the present administration has been proceeding in the matter of its tax reforms; we have been seeking to ameliorate the lot of those who are less fortunate. We have followed this course with respect to our reductions in the tariff and in our treatment of the income tax, in the reduction of the sales tax, the rate of postage and other measures. We have attempted to follow precisely the line of policy which Mr. Gladstone, perhaps the greatest of all chancellors of the exchequer, laid down in his day as the best procedure. May I say to my hon. friend that the one real criticism I have to make of him is this: He seems to have forsaken too largely his old leaders and his old principles. He did not learn about Mr. Gladstone in the school in which he is at the present time, but long ago, and he would be much better employed to-day were he to follow his old convictions and apply the principles he knows to be the right ones in the way in which Mr. Gladstone, amongst others, would have sought to have had them applied.

I come to the next subject dealt with by my hon. friend. He treated next of the cost of government and undertook to say that the cost of government had been increased considerably since the present administration had taken office. He referred more particularly to the last four years. If my hon. friend looks over the figures for the last four years in connection with the increased cost of government as it is disclosed by the records, he will find that it comes to something like 10 per cent during this period of great prosperity. I will not trouble quoting the remarks of my hon. friend, but I make that general statement which, I think, he will admit is correct. The figures are as follows:

Year	Total cost of government
1929	385,000,000

Or an increase of about 10 per cent in that period. My hon. friend says that the business of the country has not increased in that ratio and that, the business of the country not having increased in that ratio, that the government has been extravagant in the extent to which it has been increasing the cost of government. I do not know what standard my hon. friend had before him in estimating the business of the country, but I have been trying to get together a few indices of the business of the country—it is not an easy thing to gauge, but one can gauge it in a general way—to see whether the business of the country has not increased much more rapidly than any cost of government has increased, also to show whether the burden of taxation is not more easily borne than it was a few years ago, and whether the ability to pay on the part of the taxpayers is not greater than it has been at any time hitherto. I give my hon. friend and the house the following figures which will help to illustrate something of the increased growth of business in Canada. These figures can, I believe, be substantiated.

It is estimated by statisticians pretty generally that the national wealth of Canada increased from $22,195,000,000 in 1922 to $26,691,000,000 in 1926, an increase in that period of 20 per cent. I admit it must take some collecting of data to reach the conclusion, but nevertheless that is what I believe those who speak with authority would quote.

The bank debits of chartered banks in 1924 totalled $27,157,000,000, while in 1928 they totalled $43,477,000,000, an increase of 60 per cent in these four years.

Life insurance in 1921 totalled $2,935,000,000, while in 1928 it is estimated that it totalled $5,609,000,000, an increase of 90 per cent.

As regards savings deposits in chartered banks, which are an indication of the position of individuals in the community, they increased from $1,197,000,000 in 1923, to $1,496,000,000 in 1928, an increase of 25 per cent.

Exports of Canadian products increased from $740,000,000 in 1922 to $1,356,000,000 in the last twelve months, or an increase of 80 per cent.

Gross revenue from all industries, according to the Financial Post of January 4, 1929, was in 1926, $6,188,000,000 and in 1928, $6,840,000,000, or an increase of 10 per cent in those two years.

The developed water-power of the country in 1921 was 2,700,000 horse-power and in 1928 it was 5,350,000 horse-power, or an increase of almost 100 per cent.

Motor vehicles increased from 465,000 in 1921, to 945,000 in 1927, or an increase of about 100 per cent.

The number of employees in the leading industrial establishments has increased by something like 20 per cent.

These are indices which, I think, should help anyone to arrive accurately at the improvement there has been in the business of the country in the last few years in comparison with the increase in the cost of government.

But if we wish to make a comparison of the cost of government that no one will question, let us make it between 1914 and the present time. This will help to disclose as between political parties how much the cost of government has increased, how much it has increased under the present Liberal administration in comparison with what it was before the war in the days of the Conservative administration. In that comparison I think the house will agree that it would be proper to exclude amounts which to-day we are paying on war account, such as pensions and the like, and which do not appear in the accounts of the year 1914. If we exclude these amounts, it will be found that the total expenditure of Canada to-day is very nearly the same as it was in 1914. If we go a step further and regard the receipts of the Post Office Department as payments for services rather than as a tax, and exclude, in addition to the expenses now being met on war account, the amounts of the Post Office department, a comparison of 1914 with the present day will show that the cost of government to-day is less than it was in 1914, and that, notwithstanding the great increase in the population of the country from 1914 to the present time, and notwithstanding the fact that the value of the dollar to-day is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914. I should like to place the exact figures on record because I think they are important for purposes of comparison.

In 1914, when the Conservatives were in office prior to the war, total expenditures were $186,241,048. In 1928, according to the reports before parliament, they were $362,827,742, or almost double the 1914 figures. Account, however, must be taken of the expenditures attributable to the war, and these, as furnished by the Minister of Finance, are as follows:

Year 1927-28

Increase of interest on public debt over 1914	$116,009,440
War pensions	38,592,493
Soldiers' civil re-establishment	6,958,611
Soldier land settlement	1,334,008
Memorial War Graves Commission.	573,419
Battlefield memorials	183,067
Adjustment of war claims	1,656,011
Total	$165,307,049

If we deduct the sum of $165,307,049 from the total expenditure of 1928 we have $197,520,693, or an increase over 1914 of $11,279,645. This represents an increase of 5·71 per cent in total expenditures, apart from war expenditure, between 1914 and 1928. As I have said, the purchasing power of the dollar is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914, and if this is taken into account, the showing of the present administration is even better than these figures represent it to be.

In addition, as already mentioned, it must be remembered that not all government expenditures are payable from tax revenues. For example, postal revenue could hardly be considered as ordinary revenue for the reason that here the public pay not so much a tax to the government as a price for the transmission of letters. It is submitted, therefore, that the revenues and expenditures of the Post Office Department might, in fairness, be deducted from both the 1914 and 1928 figures. If this be done, the comparison of expenditures between the Conservative administration of 1914 and the present administration of 1928 will be as follows:

Year	Total	For war	Post office	General expenditures leaving out war and post office
1914..	$186,241,048		$12,922,058	$173,418,900
1928..	362,827,742	$165,307,049	31,782,968	165,737,725

In other words, the actual cost of government to-day is less than it was in 1914 not taking into account the increase in population in the interval and the fact that $1.50 to-day will only go as far as $1 in 1914.

And now may I come to one other phase of my hon. friend's discussion, and this was perhaps the most ingenious of all, if it was not also the most deceptive. My hon. friend undertook to deal with taxation. I stress this because I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite following him have continued to do the same. My hon. friend said: I think it will be admitted that most of the taxes go into consolidated revenue. Let us compare, he said, the figures in consolidated revenue during the six years during which the Conservatives were in office, the period from 1918 to 1922, with the amount of total taxation during the period when the Liberal administration was in office. He then set out both sets of figures side by side and came to the conclusion that there was an annual increase in taxation under the present administration of $51,000,000. In other words, my hon. friend tried to have this house and the country believe that under the present administration taxation, and meaning by taxation, the amount necessary to carry on the government, is $51,000,000 a year greater than is was during the years hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and in presenting this plausible statement he produced government accounts to show the total amounts paid into the consolidated revenue. But my hon. friend never said one word in his statement about how much the government of his day was borrowing during the time they were in office, about how largely they were carrying on the business of this country, not out of taxation, but out of borrowed money, all of which has to be met by taxation at one time or another and which should be credited as taxation incurred at the time expenditures were being paid out of the moneys borrowed; not one word did he say about how this administration has to make good the borrowings for which my hon. friends opposite were responsible.

My hon. friend said: We taxed practically everything we could. May I say to him that he might much better have said: We borrowed practically everything that we could borrow. That is the truth. They did not tax everything they could tax. As my hon. friend knows, they never touched the income tax in the period of the war until about 1918, and then only a very small amount was raised from that source. When at last they did levy an income tax, they issued tax-exempt bonds, and yet my hon. friend says to this house that they taxed everything they could tax. They were very careful to see, while they were conscripting men for overseas service, that they did not conscript any of the wealth of the wealthy men of the country. They took good care to see that the bonds were issued at a very good price, that they carried a rate of interest of 5½ per cent for those in a position to invest their wealth and that these persons would be secured in their privileged position by the government undertaking that these bonds would not be taxed at any time in the future. They could be stowed away among the assets of the well-to-do of the country by those who were fortunate enough to be able to purchase them, and the government of to-day in its efforts to raise taxation is, as a consequence, prevented from getting a dollar of the income derived from those bonds at the present time. Not only are we expected to make good the borrowings of my hon. friends opposite, but in this effort we are deprived of the very source of revenue which ought to be the first source from which it should be possible for a government to collect.

398 millions of 5½ per cent tax-exempt bonds were sold to the public in November, 1918.

660 millions of 5½ per cent tax-exempt bonds were sold to the public in November, 1916.

What was the result of this policy of borrowing rather than taxing? The annual interest bills of the Dominion increased by leaps and bounds. Whereas in the fiscal year ended 1917 the total interest payments of the Dominion of Canada were $35,802,000, they rose in the fiscal year ended 1918 to $47,845,000; 1919 to $77,431,000; 1920 to $107,527,000; 1921 to $139,551,000; falling somewhat in 1922 to $135,247,849.

In these five years the previous administration increased the interest bills of the people of Canada by no less than 100 millions a year. Owing to the rapidly increasing interest burdens resulting from the policy of wholesale borrowing instead of taxing during the war period, additional taxation had to be imposed after the war to take care of the increased interest charges as well as pension obligations.

May I say that the only fair comparison between the two periods is to estimate how much in each case it would have taken to balance the budget. That is the only fair basis of comparison, and to see then what was left. If we take the period to which my hon. friend has referred, we will find that year after year, far from balancing the budget, there were these huge deficits, all of which at a later period had to be met by taxation. When you come to the present period, you find that, in addition to balancing the budget there is a surplus which goes to wipe off the public debt, to wipe out these borrowings of the previous period. I say that alongside the figures which my hon. friend has quoted the following figures should also be inserted, they represent the increase in the public debt through borrowing instead of taxation in the years which my hon. friend has chosen for purposes of comparison:

Conservative Debt Increase

1918	$312,697,764 70
1919	382,646,969 94
1920	674,337,591 35
1921	92,010,359 90
1922	81,256,818 04

What has been the comparison on the other side? The years during which the present administration was in office show the public debt, not increased, but, during the years which my hon. friend has taken for the purposes of comparison, decreased as follows:

Liberal Debt Decrease

1925	$ 345,589 29
1926	27,706,586 17
1927	41,896,729 33
1929	69,782,000 00

In other words, there has been a decrease in the public debt during this latest period of $190,000,000. Those are the figures which my hon. friend should have quoted, and what do they mean? They mean, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, that the large debt increase for which they were responsible is a tax which has been imposed upon the present and future generations. My hon. friend should have said: We raised a certain amount in taxation, but this additional amount running into many millions of dollars, which will have to be met by taxation, we left to someone else to meet.

So far as the period of the present government is concerned, the position has been exactly the reverse. We are able to say with regard to our accounts: We have raised every dollar of taxation that is required to meet current expenditure, and in addition we are relieving all future generations of taxation equivalent to amounts in the form of surpluses which we have from year to year.

I have here a statement of the taxation necessary to balance the budget, not in war years or the years of demobilization, but in the subsequent years—a statement of the actual taxation and of what would have been necessary to make an even balance up to 1924, then a statement of the amounts raised in excess. They are as follows:

	Taxation Necessary to Balance Budget	Actual Total Taxation	Addition to or subtraction from Debt
1921	460,780,858	368,770,498	92,010,360
1922	401,182,830	319,926,013	81,256,817
1923	367,094,408	335,453,341	31,641,067
1924	305,725,213	341,718,807	—35,993,594
1925	293,568,929	293,914,518	— 345,589
1926	299,868,426	327,575,012	—27,706,586
1927	304,752,543	346,649,272	—41,896,729
1928	313,721,665	364,705,802	—50,984,137*
1929 Estimated	321,268,000	391,050,000	—69,782,000

* After transferring $16,035,672, soldier land settlement and other advances from active to non-active assets.

1929 Expenditures include—

Maritime Freight Rates Act
Due to 20 per cent reduction in rates	$ 2,992,000
Deficit on eastern lines, C.N.R.	4,303,000
Special grant to maritime provinces	1,600,000
Federal District Commission	2,190,000
	$11,085,000

I would ask permission to insert as well a table showing the tax contribution per individual and the increase or decrease in the amount of the individual's share of the national obligation for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1921 to 1929, inclusive.

Fiscal years ended March 31	Per capita taxes	Per Capita Addition to or subtraction from obligations	Total per capita taxes required to balance budget
1921	41.96	+10.47	52.43
1922	35.91	+ 9.12	45.03
1923	37.16	+ 3.50	40.66
1924	37.34	— 3.93	33.41
1925	31.71	— .04	31.67
1926	34.89	— 2.95	31.94
1927	36.42	— 4.40	32.02
1928	37.76	— 5.28	32.48
1929 Estimated	39.91	— 7.12	32.79

Let me make further comparison between the years 1918-22 and the years 1925-29. Take the figures as they appear on page 786 of Hansard and recall that $190,000,000 of debt has been paid off in the last five years which left 1,809 millions of revenue to meet the current expenditure. What about the relative uncontrollable expenditures in the two periods, the relative interest charges, pensions, et cetera? In the first five-year period the increasing sums paid out in interest aggregated $507,603,475, as follows:

1918	$ 47,845,585
1919	77,431,432
1920	107,527,089
1921	139,551,520
1922	135,247,849
	$507,603,475

In the second five-year period the sums paid out in interest show a decreasing tendency, as follows:

1925	$134,789,604
1926	130,691,493
1927	129,675,347
1928	128,902,945
1929	125,000,000
	$649,059,409

The present administration has had to pay out in interest charges in the second five-year period 141 millions more than the previous administration had to pay out in its selected five-year period or at the average rate of 28 millions per annum—in itself sufficient to weight down the comparison against us.

Again, the pension payments in the first five-year period, aggregating $126,016,374, were as follows:

1919	18,282,440
1920	26,004,461
1921	37,420,751
1922	36,153,031
	$126,016,374

In the second five-year period there were pension payments aggregating $191,773,434, as follows:

1925	$ 34,888,665
1926	37,203,700
1927	37,902,939
1928	39,778,130
1929	42,000,000
	$191,773,434

Thus, on this account again, we had to pay out in the second five-year period over $65,000,000 more than the previous administration during the first five-year period. In a word, the present government paid off 190 millions of debt during the last five years, and had to pay out an extra 141 millions in interest and an extra 65 millions in pension charges, as compared with those paid in the previous five years. It will be readily seen that the ordinary administration of the country is being carried on vastly more economically in the second five-year period than in the first.

My hon. friend asks, where is the reduction in taxation under the present administration? He must have forgotten all the reductions that have taken place. May I refresh his memory with respect to some of them at least. Here are some: In regard to the income tax, the following exemptions and reductions have been made:

1922—Exemption for each child raised from $200 to $300;

1924—Additional exemption for each child raised from $300 to $500;

1926—Exemption limit raised from $2,000 to $3,000 in the case of married persons or those with dependents and from $1,000 to $1,500 in the case of other persons, in addition those with incomes of $5,000 or less to pay only 2 per cent of their taxable income instead of 4 per cent. Corporation income tax reduced from 10 per cent to 9 per cent;

1927—10 per cent cut off the 1926 rates;

1928—Additional 10 per cent cut off the 1926 rates.

Now I come to the tariff changes. These are as follows:

1922—Reductions on sugar, agricultural implements, textiles, boots and shoes, etc.;

1923—Tariff on goods imported under the British preferential tariff reduced by 10 per cent wherever regular rate of duty exceeds 15 per cent and where goods are imported directly to a sea or river port of Canada. Duty on sugar reduced;

1924—Duty on instruments of production used in agriculture, mining, forestry and fisheries reduced;

1925—Reductions on well-drilling machinery and engines for fishermen's boats;

1926—Duties on sugar, automobiles, tin plate, etc., reduced;

1928—Numerous changes contained in Chapter 17 of the statutes for 1928.

I put on Hansard last year at page 1301 of Volume II and page following, a more or less complete statement of the reductions in the tariff since the present government came into office up to 1928.

As to postage, we restored penny postage within Canada July 1, 1926, and in 1928 imperial penny postage was reestablished.

The following statement shows the reductions we have made in the cheque tax, the receipt tax and the sales tax:

Cheque Tax

1922—Imposed at 2c. on every $50 with a maximum of $2 on $5,000 or over;

1923—Reduced to $1;

1925—Tax on cheques not exceeding $5 remitted;

1927—Tax reduced to a flat 2c. on cheques of over $10;

Receipt Tax

1926—Imposed in 1922; abolished in 1926.

Sales Tax

1923—A flat 6 per cent;
1924—Reduced to 5 per cent;
1927—Reduced to 4 per cent;
1928—Reduced to 3 per cent;
1929—Reduced to 2 per cent.

A list of the earlier changes made by the government in customs duties will be found at pages 2137 to 2141 of revised Hansard of May 15, 1924.

This government, to state the fact, has been making a continuous reduction in taxation year by year. Statements have been made by the Minister of Finance in his different budgets indicative of the amounts of taxation that have been remitted. In 1926 the estimated reduction of taxation was $25,000,000; in 1927, $27,000,000; in 1928, $19,000,000; in 1929—the present year—$25,000,000. That is, within the last four years there has been an estimated reduction in taxation of almost $100,000,000. A reduction, be it remembered, which constitutes from now on an annual reduction as compared with 1926.

That is the record of the present administration with respect to taxation.

I come, Mr. Speaker, to another subject discussed by my hon. friend, and to a phase of that subject which has been taken up at some length in the course of the debate by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now that the Canadian National Railways have begun to pay, now that everyone recognizes that the Canadian National system is an asset to the country, and that the country is profiting by it in the eyes of the world, hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to claim the paternity of that institution. Hon. gentlemen opposite are desirous of having it appear that they are responsible for the Canadian National system being what it is to-day. My hon. friend used all the skill of which he was capable in seeking to make out a case to that end. He started out by saying that with respect to the national railways they on the opposite side were all optimists. Well, it is easy to be an optimist when anything is going well, and particularly where its success has been assured by someone else. But my hon. friends were not always optimists. They were not optimists even in 1921 in their last year of office and when appealing to the country. I recall very well the discussions that took place at that time. The most they said about the railways was that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was responsible for the condition they were then in. It was stated that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was responsible for having constructed the Grand Trunk Pacific, for having built the National Transcontinental, for having been a friend of Mackenzie and Mann; that was the kind of thing one heard throughout the country as late as 1921 when hon. gentlemen opposite were hoping they might be returned to power.

But, as I have said, my hon. friend, in the course of the present debate, sought to build up a case to have it appear that at the time these railway matters were up for consideration in parliament, the Liberals were doing their utmost to destroy the Canadian National system. He said he well remembered the time that parliament sat in the old Victoria museum, in the fall of 1919. He was kind enough to remind me that in that year I came back into the house as leader of the Liberal party. He went on to say my first act was an endeavour to destroy these very railways for the success of which the government is now claiming so much credit. He said he recalled the discussion very well, that Hon. D. D. Mackenzie, as leader of the Liberal party in the early part of the session, had first of all sought to postpone any consideration of the question of the consolidation of the national railways, any organization of the Canadian National Railway system; that he was followed later by Mr. Fielding, who suggested that a royal commission should be appointed to inquire into the matter, but that the real intention was to destroy the organization of the Canadian National system. Then he said that I had brought in a motion to refer the whole matter back to committee for the purpose of forcing a vote of want of confidence in the government and of destroying the bill. Finally he referred to the present Minister of Finance, and said that he had at the conclusion of the debate moved the six months' hoist. All of this is now on Hansard in the remarks of my hon. friend to show that those who to-day are members of the present administration were at that time seeking to destroy the organization of the Canadian National system.

Perhaps I had better read exactly what my hon. friend said, in order that there can be no misunderstanding. I quote from pages 743 and 744 of Hansard of March 7, 1929. He said:

In respect, however, to the national railway we on this side of the house are all optimists. We look upon that railway as practically our own infant and our own creature.

Then later on:

Moreover, across the ocean in France and Flanders we were carrying on Canada's part in the greatest war in history. There was serious financial calamity awaiting us at home unless speedy action was taken to relieve the railway situation and at the same time hundreds of millions of dollars had to be supplied to carry on the war. Such then was the critical situation in this country in the spring and summer of 1919.

Mr. DUNNING: In 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, in 1919. He goes on to say:

The leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) was not, I think, in the house until September of the year 1919, when he was returned for a constituency in Prince Edward Island and came back to the house as leader of the Liberal party. But he was present in the house during the session of 1919 and I recall with the greatest distinctness what transpired during that session. So will my right hon. friend; so will the Minister of Finance; so would the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he were in his place.

Well, he is here now.

A great fight was then waged by the Conservative party—

Remember, this all relates to the fall session of 1919 at which many members of this parliament were present.

A great fight was then waged by the Conservative party to take over these three railway systems that had gone into bankruptcy, reorganize them, consolidate them and make them into a Canadian National railway to be owned by the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Then later on:

Day in and day out in the old museum during the session of 1919 the railway bill was fought to a finish. Every kind and method of opposition was urged against it. Nothing was left undone or unsaid by our opponents.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I remember some of the amendments that were moved on that occasion and I will mention one or two of them. Under the guidance of Mr. Meighen that bill was fought through the house. Amendment after amendment was moved to defeat it. The late Mr. D. D. McKenzie moved that the matter be dropped and not considered for the present time. His motion was defeated. Then came a motion by Mr. Denis, at that time member for Joliette and until recently a member of the house. His motion was defeated. Then there was a motion by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the whole matter, his object being to defeat the bill and to destroy the government as well. His motion was defeated. After that followed a motion by my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister on the third reading of the bill, just before it was passed, a motion to recommit it to the committee of the whole house, which constituted a want of confidence motion in the government on the third reading. It was intended to defeat the government and to destroy the bill.

Then later:

When the Liberals had exhausted every effort to beat us, when they had tried everything in their power to destroy that measure and prevent the nationalization of these railways, the present Minister of Finance was put up to lead the final attack, and in the early hours of the morning he solemnly moved that the bill be given the six months' hoist. . . The Liberals tried by everything in their power to destroy that measure but they failed. . . No, Mr. Speaker, hon gentlemen opposite had no faith in a national railway system then, and they tried to kill it at its birth, and for two or three years afterwards they continued their efforts to destroy it.

Now what are the facts? In the first place, my hon. friend says that they were busy with the war; they were straining every nerve to get enough money to carry on the war. He says this of the latter part of the year 1919. I do not think I need to remind the house that the war ended on November 11, 1918. The war was over. In the second place, my hon. friend talked all the way through of what the Conservative party were doing at that time. If I am not mistaken the hon. gentleman at that time was boasting that he himself was a Liberal in a Unionist administration. There was no Conservative party in office at the time; the government led by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden at the time was a unionist government, and in that government, at the time of which my hon. friend speaks, were such gentlemen as himself, Hon. James A. Calder, Hon. Frank Carvell, the Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, the Hon. A. K. Maclean, all of whom professed at least to be Liberals and most of whom, I am happy to say, have remained Liberals since. It was not a Conservative government that was in office at that time; it was a unionist administration. Now what about the bill itself to which my hon. friend refers? I say to my hon. friend, and I challenge him to contradict me, that the measure to which he refers was not a Canadian National measure at all, not a measure to organize the Canadian National Railways. The measure with respect to which all these different amendments were made was a "bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company," a bill a copy of which I have in my hand at the moment. That was the bill which was introduced in that session. And to show how proud my hon. friends opposite were of the bill they were then introducing, no mention whatever was made of it in the speech from the throne. The session which was being held at that time, as I reminded my hon. friend when he was speaking, was a session called for the purpose of approving the treaty of peace which had been signed at Versailles. That was what the session was for; it was not for the purpose of dealing with a railway measure. And after discussion had taken place on the treaty, this bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway was introduced. All the amendments to which my hon. friend has referred, and the object of which he says was to destroy the Canadian National system as we know it to-day, were amendments not one of which was related to any bill respecting the Canadian National system but to the bill respecting the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway and were introduced by members of the Liberal party because of the terms of the measure as presented to the house and methods taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to achieve their ends. As a matter of fact, as the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) reminds me, there was no Canadian National Railway system at that time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This was the keystone of the arch.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The keystone of the arch? I am afraid my hon. friend will find that he is the keystone of a very much mistaken statement. My hon. friend makes light of it at the moment, but all his followers behind him, one after another, repeated the statement over and over again, and I presume we should have heard it repeated from now until after the next general election unless something in the interval had been said respecting the matter.

What was the exact position? Mr. D. D. McKenzie, who was leading the opposition at the time, moved that the bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway should not be proceeded with at that session inasmuch as the session had been called for the purpose of dealing with the treaty of peace and nothing else. That was the reason of his motion; it was not as my hon. friend has said, to destroy any railway system. And the motion moved by Mr. Fielding was a motion asking that the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act should be applied to the finances of this particular transaction. That was voted down. My hon. friend says that I sought to destroy the railway system by a motion I introduced. But what was that motion? It was that the agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the government, which hon. gentlemen opposite were proposing to make by order in council after the close of that session, and which involved more in the way of financial obligation upon this country than any other single transaction in its history, should be referred to parliament for approval before it was acquiesced in. That was the motion, and that was the motion hon. gentlemen opposite voted down. They would not allow the agreement between the company and the government to be submitted to parliament; it was to be put through by order in council, and this notwithstanding that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway in Great Britain were to have the right to approve it. Hon. gentlemen opposite were obliged later to come to parliament to have it approved, because in drafting the measure they had made some mistake and could not rectify it without bringing the whole measure to the house. To return to the bill and the session of 1919 after my motion was defeated, the present Minister of Finance at the end of that session, moved the six months' hoist, not at all in relation to the Canadian National measure but, as I have said, in regard to this particular transaction introduced at that particular time and in the arbitrary manner I have described.

When was the Canadian National measure introduced? At the previous session of that parliament a measure was brought in to enable the then Canadian Northern railway to be operated along with the Intercolonial railway under one management. That was by a bill entitled "to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company and respecting the Canadian National Railways." It was assented to in June, 1919, and the bill respecting the Canadian National Railways as passed at that period was, as I have said, nothing more than a bill to enable the Canadian Northern Railway system to be operated along with the Intercolonial. Now my hon. friends the year before had acquired the Canadian Northern system. But how did they acquire it ? They had a royal commission appointed to inquire into the conditions of the railways in this country. That commission made its report, and among other things it stated that the stock of the Canadian Northern system was not worth a single dollar. That was the report of a commission appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Yet, on the eve of the election of 1917, these same gentlemen gave to that stock a value of $10,000,000, and forced that transaction through the House of Commons under closure. They got the Canadian Northern into their hands and out of the hands of their friends in that way, and it was to enable them to operate the Canadian Northern along with the government railway that this act respecting the Canadian National Railways was then introduced.

But in speaking of the organization of the Canadian National system such as we have it to-day, may I direct the attention of the house to this further fact. In the bill with respect to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway there was not there one clause which related to bringing the Grand Trunk railway system under a Canadian National railway system such as exists to-day? Not a line. As a matter of fact the bill, of which I have a copy, provided that the management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company would remain in England, as had been the case in the past, with the president and the board of directors in that country, and it was not until 1921, when a crisis arose with respect to the arbitration of the Grand Trunk securities, that an agreement was arrived at whereby provision was made for a board of directors in Canada. This board remained a seperate board; it remained the Grand Trunk Railway board and was not brought in any way into association with the Canadian National system. That is what my hon. friend calls the keystone of the whole system, a keystone left absolutely by itself.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So it was, awaiting the judgment of the privy council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To go a step further, what was the position with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific company, which in March 1919 had been placed in the hands of the Minister of Railways and Canals as a receiver? When the Canadian National bill was passed, when the Grand Trunk bill was passed, no provision was made for ending that receivership and making the Grand Trunk Pacific a part of the system; it was left with the Minister of Railways.

But most significant of all, when the Canadian National bill was before the house and something was said about government ownership, the then Prime Minister, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was asked whether with respect to railways, the policy of the government was one of government ownership. My hon. friend, for reasons best known to himself, in the course of his remarks sought to bring forward Mr. Meighen as the personage above all others responsible for the present splendid organization of the Canadian National system, yet at the time the bill respecting the National Railways was introduced and Mr. Meighen was asked what he had to say about government ownership he absolutely refused to make any commitment. My hon. friend said he came forward with some carefully thought out scheme "a definite plan" he called it, as a matter of fact the whole policy was one of expediency, and there was no vision about it whatever. On April 11, 1919, during the course of the debate, Mr. McMaster put this pointed question to Mr. Meighen, who was then fathering the particular measure under discussion:

> I hope the minister will not think me unduly insistent when I ask for a declaration of the policy of the government. Public ownership, whether we wish it or not, has been imposed upon the people. If we were holding the railways only with the idea of disposing of them to private companies in, perhaps, as short a time as possible, one particular kind of organization might be better than another; but if we made up our minds to adopt the permanent policy of the public ownership of railways, some different system of organization would be necessary. The government therefore should state clearly whether they are for the principle of government ownership as a definite policy for Canada.

Then, after mentioning the fact that the responsibility for the principle rested with the government, Mr. McMaster continued:

> . . . . the port that they are steering for should be made known to the people before we are asked to vote for a resolution of this kind.

To this Mr. Meighen replied:

> I do not know just how many years ahead the hon. member thinks we should place ourselves in order to determine the port. I think the government is well advised to take its bearings by ports that are in sight, not to fix a policy with reference to yet unborn decades. So far as there is any necessity of stating policy, the government's policy as to railways has been stated and repeated over and over again. As to the roads that we now own, our policy is to continue to own them and to operate them; we have no intention of selling them to any private corporation. Certain roads we do not own.
> The Grand Trunk Pacific is one; our policy as to that has been brought down to the house, and we are engaged in the carrying out of that policy. The Grand Trunk is another; we have stated repeatedly our policy as to the Grand Trunk; we have stated what we are doing. The Canadian Pacific is another; the government has not intimated to parliament any intention of acquiring the Canadian Pacific Railway company. I do not know what more the hon. gentleman desires; I certainly do not know what more is necessary to the consideration of this resolution. Every time the subject of railways is mentioned in parliament, is the government, as to its policy, to see years or centuries ahead? All the government has to do is to adjust its course with reference to circumstances now known; we have stated our course with reference to all the railway circumstances now known. All that is necessary to a consideration of this bill is a determination of the question whether it is the part of wisdom to operate such roads as we now and may in the future own under the system set out and by the principle clearly defined in this bill, namely, by the establishment of a holding and operating company, the Canadian National Railways.

That is the extent to which Mr. Meighen, who was supposed to have had the far-sighted vision to bring into being the Canadian National system as we have it to-day, was at that time prepared to commit himself and his party.

May I say that if the government of that day had had the slightest intention of bringing about the organization of the Canadian National Railways as we now know it, that measure would most certainly have received mention in some speech from the throne, but neither in the special session during which the Grand Trunk was acquired nor during the previous session when provision was made for the Canadian Northern being administered along with the Intercolonial as part of a national system was there a single word in the speech from the throne in regard to such a measure. In each case the railway bills were introduced, one might almost say, more or less surreptitiously after the session had commenced. Indeed, the impression was general at the time that the government's object was to return the roads to private control at a convenient season, and under conditions more or less favourable to some of the government's own friends.

What was the position at the end of 1921? As I have said, if hon. gentlemen opposite were so sure of the future of the railways; if they were so proud of their alleged paternity of the railway system, why did they not make a little out of it during the elections in 1921? They did just the opposite; they disowned the whole business, they blamed previous Liberal governments for all the misfortunes of the roads, and the situation as the present government found it when it came into office was this: Instead of there being any Canadian National Railway system such as we have to-day there were three different railway organizations carrying on, separate and distinct, at that time; the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway was in the hands of the Minister of Railways and Canals as a receiver, and its affairs were being administered through the Department of Railways and Canals; the Canadian Northern Railway system, together with the Intercolonial Railway, was under the management of a Canadian Northern directorate, not a Canadian National management or directorate, but with a Canadian Northern board of directors appointed under orders in council in 1918. That railway was travelling under an alias; it was called Canadian National but it could not be known legitimately as the Canadian National system because up to that time it had not become a part of such. There was simply a Canadian Northern administration, and in addition there was the separate administration of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which had its own president and board of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: That was necessary until the decision of the privy council was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The decision of the privy council had been made. My hon. friend will find that it was made before the election. There may have been some appeal on a point of law, but apart from all that, the decision of the privy council had nothing to do with it. My hon. friends had it within their power, had they wished to do so, to pass such legislation as they deemed necessary to bring the Grand Trunk when it was acquired under Canadian National control and which would have relieved them from waiting for any decision of the privy council.

Mr. BENNETT: No, we had to wait.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong; he is mistaken.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the Prime Minister will agree with me that as appeal was taken from the arbitration, parliament could not act pending a decision. I happen to remember that the decision was made after the election, because I was in London when the decision was announced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did the decision of the privy council have anything to do with the forming of a Canadian National railway board to run the Canadian Northern?

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely, because if the decision went in accordance with the contentions of the Grand Trunk the matter had to be re-arbitrated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But that had nothing to do with the Canadian Northern.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly it had, because the two systems could not be combined until after the decision was rendered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely my hon. friend is not familiar with what took place.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes he is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then if he is familiar with it he does not like the whole business. I venture to say that even to-day my hon. friend would not support the action of the government of the day in giving $10,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann for the common stock of the Canadian Northern System. It was that $10,000,000 that brought the Canadian Northern under the control of the government, and it was to administer that particular road that the act to which I have referred was passed in the early part of 1919 or other roads which might be amalgamated. That act when it was passed had nothing to do with the Grand Trunk at all; it simply united the Canadian Northern with the government road for the purposes of administration.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely point out again that there could be no union between these two systems until after the decision of the privy council had been announced. With respect to the payment of $10,000,000, I declined to follow Mr. Pugsley and the Liberal party in giving them $40,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend speaks about there having been no unity between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern until a decision was given by the privy council. Whether that is or is not true does not affect in the least the fact that the Canadian National Act was passed in relation to the Canadian Northern railway and the Intercolonial railway, to bring the two under the one management. Even that much had not been done when the present government came into office in December, 1921, although the bill had passed during the early part of 1919. We found on coming into office two separate systems, and we also found the Grand Trunk Pacific being administered by a receiver. We realized that the first thing to be done was to end this duplication, this dual, if not triple control, to bring about a centralized control and to discover the right person to put in charge of the two systems when they were combined. In November, 1922, we succeeded in obtaining the services of Sir Henry Thornton, whose reputation at that time as a manager of railways in the old country was outstanding. If any one person above everyone else, is entitled to credit for the present success of the Canadian National system, I venture to say that that person is Sir Henry Thornton. But I think Sir Henry Thornton would be the first to admit that along with him should be associated the Minister of Railways and Canals who was in office at the time he came to this country, and the ministers who have been in office and have been associated with him in the work of administration. Too much credit cannot be given to the late Hon. William C. Kennedy, the first Minister of Railways and Canals in this administration; to the Right Hon. George P. Graham, and to Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the present Minister of Railways and Canals for the manner in which they have cooperated with Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors and dealt with the affairs of the National railways in this parliament. Great credit should also be given to the officials of the railway for the loyal manner in which they have cooperated with Sir Henry, and credit as well to every man employed upon the system. They are the persons to whom credit is due for the success of the Canadian National railways, and not the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen or the hon. gentlemen opposite. So far as any government is entitled to credit it is the present administration which brought about the complete unification of the lines, secured and appointed the president and board of directors, and which along with Sir Henry Thornton, has worked out the best type of organization best suited, and has kept the system from political interference.

My hon. friend spoke about extravagance, and he brought up a number of items which he claimed were in the nature of extravagances on the part of the administration. He mentioned the legations at Washington, Paris and Tokyo. With regard to the legation at Washington, he said that the government had spent $500,000 on a palace for the present minister, to be used as a place of residence, whereas the government should have allowed him to rent or buy a house for himself. My hon. friend knows that such is not a true statement. He knows that the building which has been purchased at Washington was not purchased as a residence, but for the purpose of a legation, including the offices of the legation as well as a residence for the minister. He knows that practically all the ministers or ambassadors at Washington live in buildings which are either embassies or legations. My hon. friend instead of being penurious in his criticism might have been generous enough to have said that the present minister the Hon. Vincent Massey, deserves the highest praise not only of all political parties in this house but of the nation as a whole for the manner in which he has represented the interests of this Canada at Washington. He should receive the highest praise not only for the manner in which he has represented the interests of this country, but for the very generous manner in which he has placed a considerable portion of his own private fortune at the service of the state. Anyone who knows anything about the manner in which Mr. Massey has been carrying on the representation of Canada at Washington knows that whatever he has received from the government is only a small portion of what he has spent. His private means have been given liberally towards helping to maintain the reputation of Canada at Washington on the high plane which it holds in the estimation of the people of this continent. Instead of misrepresenting the situation with respect to the legation building, my hon. friend might well have directed his talents to a better end.

Mr. BENNETT: He took the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) up to the White House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I have no doubt he would take my hon. friend there also.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he will not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think they would let my hon. friend in.

Mr. BENNETT: He will never do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not only is this building being used for office purposes, but in the purchase made the furnishings for residential purposes were acquired as well. The amount which my hon. friend mentioned was in excess of the cost of the building and site, including the cost of furnishings. The hon. member for South Wellington also said:

> Last year the vote to maintain our Washington embassy was $60,000; to-day it stands in the estimates at $100,000—an unwarrantable and extravagant increase of $40,000.

My hon. friend knows that that is not correct. The vote last year was not $60,000; the vote was for $100,000, and the vote the year before was for $130,000. I told the house in the session of 1927-28 that if it would sanction the purchase of a legation building at Washington we would cut that estimate from $130,000 to $100,000, and we have kept that promise. The estimates included an amount of $100,000 last year, and the amount being asked for this year is $100,000, and yet my hon. friend tells the house and the country that there has been unwarranted extravagance in an increase of the vote from $60,000 to $100,000.

In reference to Paris, my hon. friend mentioned an expenditure of $75,000, and then remarked on an additional sum of $40,000 which he said was being provided for another building. He should be careful before he makes such statements. He should look up the records and see what the expenditures are related to. The expenditure of $40,000 was not for another building in addition to and in connection with the present legation. My hon. friend knows that while Commissioner General, the present minister occupied premises in one part of Paris, which premises were entirely different from those of the legation which we now have in that city. The expenditure of $40,000 to which he referred and led the house to believe was an added extravagance was an amount expended upon premises occupied by the minister while he was the Commissioner General, and during which time no money was being spent upon a legation building. There was in his statement a complete misrepresentation of the facts. We come next to the building at London. My hon. friend considers the expenditure upon that building as an extravagance, but I wonder if the people of Canada are not proud of the Canadian building in London. Every dominion of the British Empire has a building in London: New Zealand has one, Australia has one and South Africa has one, and I know that some of the buildings which are occupied by other dominions in London are much more expensive than the offices which we have. We have been fortunate in securing for our offices the finest site in London; we have been fortunte in obtaining a very good building there, and I think this country has reason to be proud of the purchase which the government has made. My hon. friend referred to the cost of administration of the High Commissioner's office, and compared it to the cost during the time his government was in office; he said:

> When I was in the Meighen government the vote for the whole establishment in London was $69,000; this year the vote is $117,000.

He is again guilty of a very serious oversight, if not of a deliberate misrepresentation, because when he gave the figure as to what the London office cost when he was in the government he deliberately omitted the salaries paid, although, when giving the figures with reference to the present government, he included them. My hon. friend apparently took the figures as shown in the statement of 1920-21, which are as follows: Supply, government contingencies, $69,586. That is the $69,000 which he said was the cost of the whole establishment in London when he was in the government. But right alongside that figure in the public accounts of that year stand the following:

High Commissioner's publications.. ..	$ 1,000
Supplementary, civil government contingencies..	7,000
Civil government salaries..	25,950

These figures give a total of $103,536, and not the $69,000 as given by my hon. friend. At that time the High Commissioner's office did not include, as it does to-day, accommodation for some of the work of the immigration department, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Health, and the payment of pensions overseas. These are all additional branches of activities that have been gathered into the present office in London.

Now we come to Ottawa, and my hon. friend says: "Here again there has been an absolute waste. The destruction of property, destroyed for what? Merely to get a view." My hon. friend knows better than that. He knows first of all that the property in Ottawa that was demolished was for the most part in the nature of old buildings that were to have been taken down anyway. That is the reason why at the particular time the government took the step it did. We knew that these buildings were to be demolished. The old Russell House block had been for the most part disposed of; it was to be torn down, and it was a question of either acquiring the property for the state at that time or losing the opportunity of getting it later on because of the more expensive buildings that would certainly have been put up there. My hon. friend knows further that this House of Commons in general, if not in specific terms, approved of something being done to commemorate in the capital of the Dominion the diamond jubilee of confederation, and this particular commemoration was to take the form of a confederation park in the centre of the city, provided the civic authorities were prepared to cooperate with the government in the matter. He knows that an arrangement has been reached between the government and the city authorities for a very considerable improvement in the heart of the capital, a much needed improvement in the immediate vicinity of these houses of parliament which means much in the present but which will mean infinitely more in the future. He knows very well that what has been done in that regard has been done as part of a great scheme in the national interest and not, as he says, for the purpose of getting a view. I think hon. gentlemen opposite would be more public-spirited, more patriotic, to say the least, if instead of criticizing the government on every conceivable subject, they would recognize that there are some questions that might well be taken out of the realm of party discussion altogether. Improvement of the capital of this Dominion is one of those questions, and I say now to my hon. friend opposite I think the step he should take—and I am prepared to have him take it and to cooperate if he is agreeable so to do—would be to have a group of hon. gentlemen behind him or who are associated with him, meet with myself and a corresponding group of hon. members on this side together with representatives of the other group opposite, and discuss plans for the further improvement of the capital of this country. Let us then come to this parliament and say what we feel is owing alike to the present and the future generations and needed in order to make the capital of our country what we would like to have it and what we know future generations would wish it to be.

The talk about extravagance in the price of public buildings mentioned, reminds me of the discussion we had in this parliament with respect to the completion of the tower of these Houses of Parliament. Hon. gentlemen who were here then will remember that for two days the government, on an item which asked the house for enough money to complete the present tower, was held up on the score that the tower might well remain as it was and that we had better wait until the country was in a more favourable position. Notwithstanding the fact that the whole front of the parliament buildings was obscured by the equipment required in the reconstruction of the building, we were told that the completion of the tower might well wait; that we were too extravagant. This present opposition is pretty much on a par with that; only it is not a tower, it is the capital of the Dominion that is involved. We owe it to the country as a whole to make this capital worthly of this great Dominion and I may tell my hon. friends opposite that they will find in the hearts of the people in the back concessions much more pride in the capital of their country than they themselves have exhibited in the discussions in this house.

I might give the house a little information with respect to some of our expenditures. Consider the building at the corner of Sussex and Rideau streets, the so called Daly building, a hideous looking structure, an eyesore in the city, It was purchased by hon. gentlemen opposite, not for $500,000, as my hon. friend says the legation building at Washington, a very handsome building with furnishings complete was purchased for, but purchased for $1,000,000, and on what further terms? That $100,000 should be paid down on the eve of the election of 1921, and that from then on the sum of $100,000 should be paid each year with interest on the balance at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. Under that contract we have been obliged to pay $100,000 and to contribute 6 per cent on the balance each year from the time hon. gentlemen opposite went out of office until to-day, and the payments will not be completed until next year.

The payment when completed will amount to $1,270,000. These are the hon. gentlemen who talk about waste and extravagance.

May I refer again to what I have just said about the purchase of the Canadian Northern system? Hon. gentlemen opposite had a report from their own commission which said that the common stock of the Canadian Northern was not worth a single cent, but notwithstanding that they so engineered matters as to give to that stock a value of $10,000,000 and compelled the people of this country to meet that amount out of taxes by the use of closure in this House of Commons.

Mr. BENNETT: That was done by arbitration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What could we not do with $10,000,000 in the improvement of the capital of Canada? That money would be better in the treasury here for the improvement of Ottawa than in the pockets of friends of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman knows that was awarded by arbitration by Chief Justice Meredith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can make his statement later.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not there. It was by arbitration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I daresay my hon. friend thanks the Lord he was not there.

May I now conclude what I have to say? I had intended to say something about trade and the tariff, in regard to which my hon. friend spoke at some length, but I shall have to leave that for some later time. I should like however to say a few words in regard to the amendments to the motion that has been made by the Minister of Finance that the house go into committee of ways and means.

During the last few years on each occasion that the Minister of Finance has brought in his budget, we have been confronted, as regularly as by the years themselves, with amendments of hon. gentlemen opposite, amendments which were diametrically opposite in character. We have had one amendment which has asked us to increase taxation, to raise the tariff, to give more in the way of protection; and we have had from the other end of the chamber an amendment for less in the way of taxation, for reduction in customs duties, for less in the way of protection. On each occasion we have met those amendments by pointing out that it was the policy of the government to pursue a moderate course, avoiding an extreme in one direction as well as an extreme in the other, to take only that course which would help to bring prosperity to this country. Our course is vindicated by the position of the country at the present time. We have the prosperity at which we have aimed, and we intend to maintain it and, if possible, to increase it. We intend to maintain and increase it by exactly the same methods as those we have adopted in the past. To-day we are confronted with amendments similar to those of previous years. If we take the amendment of hon. gentlemen opposite and strip it of its verbiage, what does it mean? More in the way of taxation, higher tariffs, more in the way of protection. On the other hand, hon. gentlemen at the other end of the chamber ask us to go a little further in reducing taxation, in reducing duties and to do much less in the way of protection.

This year differs from other years in one essential particular. This year, when the government was preparing its budget, it had before it the knowledge which is common throughout the continent, that a neighbouring country was about to make certain changes in its tariff, changes which may materially affect trade between the two countries. Trade between this country and the United States is, I believe, the greatest trade that exists between any two countries in the world, and naturally we are interested in what the citizens of the republic do with respect to matters which may affect that trade. We are interested as well in all that affects the industrial conditions of that country because, as we know from experience, matters are so interrelated in economic affairs that it is seldom that one portion of this continent is appreciably affected by depression or the opposite without other parts being also affected. We have the word of those in authority in the neighbouring republic that there are certain measures to be introduced at a special session of congress now about to assemble. An important measure, we are led to believe, is a measure relating to farm relief. Another measure relates to "limited adjustments of the tariff"; that I think is the expression which has been officially used. Having that knowledge before us, I ask hon. gentlemen irrespective of party: In the condition of prosperity which Canada is to-day enjoying would it be desirable on the part of the administration to take any action with respect to the tariff in Canada at the present time which by those across the line who may be interested in seeking to raise the tariff in that country could be regarded as provocative? I say that with the knowledge which we have before us at the present time, were we to do what hon. gentlemen opposite by their amendment apparently wish us to do, namely raise the tariff, we would be creating in the minds of the American people the very sentiment which would cause them to raise their tariff higher perhaps than it was ever their intention to raise it. We do not intend to take any action of that provocative character.

May I say to my hon. friends opposite, in the other corner of the house, that were we to-day to take a step along the lines of increasing the British preference to a greater degree than exists at the present time that step also might be misconstrued, for we know that there are people on the other side of the line who are just as anxious to be trouble-makers as certain people on this side of the line, who are ready to misrepresent matters, and we have to take human nature as it is, and deal with it as it is. So facing the situation before us, we have followed the policy that we have followed in the past and that we shall follow at all times, of dealing with each situation as it arises in the light of the conditions as they exist at the time.

That is the position which this government took when we came into charge of the administration of the country's affairs. What did we find? We found the depressed condition that Canada was then in. We had before us the record of hon. gentlemen opposite, where year after year deficits were exhibited in the public accounts. We took the step that was necessary to deal with that situation. We put on some extra taxation so that we might be able to balance the budget and restore public confidence in the public finances of the country. The moment we had restored public confidence and balanced the budget we began to remove taxation, and to remove it steadily. We saw that if the country was to prosper, what was needed above all else was that the basic industries of the country should be made prosperous, that production should be increased. So we dealt next with the duties on the implements of production in the great basic industries. Later on there were other changes that we felt should be made, and all along, year after year, whilst moving steadily in the direction of lower tariffs and taxation, we have consistently followed a policy of dealing with each situation as it existed at the time in the light of all known circumstances, hoping always that by so doing we might further the prosperity which we enjoy at the present time. I say that that is exactly what we intend to do with respect to any situation that may arise in the future.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been very crafty in some of their methods in debate. This year they have been perhaps a little more subtle than before. They have not wished to refer to the past, and above all else they have sought to avoid the present, and so they have sought to create—and this is what we have had all through this debate—a discussion not with respect to an existing situation but with respect to something that may or may not happen next year. They have resorted to the device of shifting discussion from the present issue and fighting in advance an imaginary tariff war. They have told us that this and that should be done, not because something is being done at the moment, but because something may be done by the government of the United States next year or during the present year. They have conjured up and talked of tariff wars. They have suggested that special sessions of parliament should be called. They have urged that legislation on the tariff should be by orders in council; they have talked about a red-blooded attitude on the part of Canada. They have chosen their ground well, because if there is one thing above another that hon. gentlemen opposite are adepts at, it is jingoist pronouncements, more particularly when they relate to the United States. But may I say to my hon. friends opposite, it is not a red-blooded attitude that is needed at the present moment so much as a cool-headed attitude, and a cool-headed attitude is the attitude which this administration has taken with regard to all tariff matters from the time it came into office, and is the attitude which we intend to continue to take during the time we are serving the people in the position which we now occupy.

May I quote to the house the two amendments that are before us. First of all, may I make this clear, that each of them, though they differ so widely, as I have indicated, are alike at least in this particular, that each is in the nature of a want of confidence motion in the administration. The Minister of Finance has asked that the house should have leave to consider ways and means of raising the revenue necessary to carry on the government of the country. Hon. gentlemen immediately opposite say: No, we will not allow this motion to carry; we ask instead that there shall be increased protection. Hon. gentlemen at the other end of the house say: No, we will not permit the house to consider ways and means; we want the government to go back and consider the question of increasing the British preference. My hon. friends know, or they ought to know, that if their motions were to carry, the government would not be able to consider the very questions they put before us, for the simple reason that the government would no longer be in power, having been denied the right of providing the ways and means of carrying on the administration of the country's affairs. I think that should be understood by the country in viewing the action of my hon. friends when they come to vote on their amendments.

Mr. IRVINE: Why allow any amendment at all to this budget?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are times and places for amendments, but the time and place for an amendment of the kind before us is not on the budget. May I read, so that the record may be complete, the amendment which is proposed by hon. gentlemen of the official opposition? It is moved:

That all the words after the word "that" be stricken out and the following substituted therefor;

This house regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for reasonably safeguarding and protecting the interests of those "engaged in agricultural pursuits or in industrial" employment in Canada.

Then—hon. gentlemen representing an opposite extreme have the following as their amendment:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:

"urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

Returning now to the amendment of the Conservative party, as I have already said, that amendment means nothing other than increased protection. It is interesting to notice what has happened with respect to hon. gentlemen, opposite on the question of the tariff. During the election of 1921 and the election of 1925 and the election of 1926, we heard from hon. gentlemen opposite endless talk about the necessity for increased protection. That was openly and avowedly the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite—increased protection. Wherever they went they talked about the need of increased protection. If they went into a mining district, it was the mining industry that needed protection. If they went into a manufacturing centre, it was the manufacturing industries that needed protection. If they went into a farming district, it was some branch of agriculture or horticulture that needed protection. Wherever they went they always preached protection in relation to the industries of the particular locality. But they did not succeed in 1921; they did not succeed in 1925, and they got a knockout blow in 1926, with the result that immediately afterwards they dropped the word "protection" completely. They had their convention at Winnipeg and they drew up their tariff program, but you can search from one end to the other of that platform and you will not find the word protection" in the whole of it; there is no mention of it, they talk of the "historical fiscal policy of the Liberal-Conservative party." Then when in this house they moved their first amendment, declaratory of their fiscal policy as determined upon at the Winnipeg convention there was not the word "protection" to be found in the whole of it. The idea was there, to be sure, but it was disguised. The action of hon. gentlemen opposite reminds one of something that Lord Asquith said in the last speech which he made as leader of the Liberal party in England. In reviewing the work which the Liberal party had accomplished in the period of his leadership, he referred to an election that had taken place in Great Britain in 1905, I think it was, when the forces of protection were so completely routed that thereafter, protection on the part of its advocates never raised its head, but according to Lord Asquith, "went creeping about under modest and belittling pseudonyms"

They talked first of "tariff reform" then of "safeguarding," but studiously avoided the use of the word "protection." That is exactly what hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing here with respect to the word "protection". Their course has not even the merit of originality; it is a belated imitation of an old country pseudonym. Look at this resolution. They have got here the word "safeguarding", and they have been careful to place it in front of the word that relates more specifically to protection, to sort of shelter it; and they do not even use the word "protection", but the word "protecting", afraid to come out with a substantive but as a means of declaring their intention having resort to a participle. Let me read this resolution:

This house regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for reasonably safeguarding and protecting—

Safeguarding comes first and then this participle, protecting.

—the interests of those engaged in agricultural pursuits or in industrial employment.

Last session my hon. friend was careful to avoid any use even of the participle "protecting." He told all his followers not to use it, or the word "protection," and you can look through their speeches to see how they struggled against employing it, but, here and there, a few broke loose. But after the session was over my hon. friend found the forces around him had been too strong. So when he went down to the eastern townships and some of the counties along the American frontier where he had a chance to talk to the vegetable growers he himself began to use the word protection. He received some applause, and thought the whole community was behind it. He proceeded then much enheartened to the maritime provinces, and thinking to kill two birds with one stone, he decided to preach protection, and at the same time hy his eloquence help his friends in the provincial government at a pending election. From every parish pump, from every local wharf he preached protection. With what result? Why, the provincial government was nearly defeated. My hon. friend then went back to the west, where he was told he had been talking too much protection. Now, torn between two extremes, he puts forward this resolution, not employing the word protection, but the word "protecting," placing it after, and as it were, sheltering it with the word "safeguarding." That is the position my hon. friend is now compelled to take.

Mr. BENNETT: That is better than domination by Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the position to which hon. gentlemen immediately opposite have been reduced.

Now, may I say a word to my hon. friends at the far end of this chamber with respect to their particular amendment. As they well know, the British preference has been a part of the policy of the Liberal party from the days when Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced in the parliament of this country the first measure of British preference. This Dominion of Canada has led the empire in the matter of the British preference; and the Liberal party has led Canada. Year after year we have considered carefully wherein we could justifiably extend and increase the British preference. And may I say to my hon. friends, we intend to continue so to do from this time onward. I want no misunderstanding as to why we have to reject their resolution. It is not because we are not strongly in favour of the British preference. It is not because we have not considered it. We have made some increase in the British preference in the present budget. But I have to tell my hon. friends quite frankly, and I think they must in their hearts agree with me, that there are strong reasons why in this session above all sessions we should do as little as possible by way of change in the tariff. That we believe is the wisest course to pursue.

Next session we will, as I have already said, deal with the situation as we find it at that particular time. And we will deal with it in the interests of Canada. The Minister of Finance has, I think, in a few brief words, made very clear what the position of the government is in this matter. Let me read what he said, emphasizing that his words express the policy of the government as a whole:

> In so far as we have a fiscal problem, our task would appear to be that of readjusting, as necessity arises, our customs tariff schedules to meet new conditions, other things being equal, of favouring those countries which favour our products. It is our desire to trade freely with any and all who are willing to trade with us. What may, or may not, be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of this administration is not a high tariff policy; it is a low tariff policy. Its policy is to encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad. In applying this policy both domestic and international factors must of necessity be considered.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is that a policy or a chart?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is both. Then after reference to the tariff changes submitted to-day, the following statement is made in regard to the advisory board on tariff and taxation:

> The board is continuing its inquiries, on which substantial progress has already been made, into several larger problems which involve the consideration of whole tariff schedules and the interrelation of many important Canadian industries. While these inquiries are being pursued, opportunity will be afforded for considering the possible effect on trade of changes being proposed in the tariff schedules of other countries, should they be implemented by legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that nothing could be clearer, nothing could be more sensible, than the statement of policy as therein made by the Minister of Finance. We will be guided in the future as we have been in the past by expert advice. We will study carefully the situation as it is and proceed in the light of conditions as we find them. What we may do may not wholly please hon. gentlemen opposite, but I venture to say it will satisfy the country.

I want to make this further position clear. Of late there has been brought into the discussion of the possible adjustments of the tariff, references to the St. Lawrence waterway. Representations have been made to the effect that in some way or other these two questions were being discussed together, that the one question was being made to relate in some measure to the other. May I say that I can conceive of no greater misfortune than that the question of the St. Lawrence waterway should be mixed up in any way with the question of the tariff of this country or of the United States. Each question must be dealt with separately on its merits.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Prime Minister allow a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With pleasure.

Mr. CAHAN: Did he not himself suggest that in his correspondence with the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend would interrupt me at this stage, so I brought the correspondence with me. I think it illustrates exactly what I was about to say when my hon. friend interrupted.

When it comes to the working out of any international problem, the success or the failure of the negotiations will depend more than anything else on the atmosphere of trust and of confidence and of goodwill that exists between the peoples who are interested in the particular transaction. I submit that to that extent what may develop out of discussions on one subject or occasion may come to have a bearing on the solution of other questions. For this reason I think it all-important that with respect to the tariff as with respect to everything else we should at all times seek so to conduct our discussions as not to create an atmosphere that is hostile but so far as we can, strive to preserve an atmosphere of goodwill between this country and our neighbours to the south.

Now, as to my hon. friend's interjection. On January 31 1928, a communication was addressed to the United States government by our minister at Washington, which communication was based on a communication sent by the present government, and in that communication a reference was made to the tariff. But it was made in what way? In a way which illustrates the truth of what I have been saying—the wisdom of not having steps taken with respect to one policy or one question which possibly may come to prejudice the solution of some other question. Here is the statement to which my hon. friend refers. It is the only statement touching upon the tariff in all the correspondence between this government and the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: There was only one statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just one, that is right. Let me read it to my hon. friend. But before doing so, may I point this out so as to explain the context: The United States had intimated to us that they felt their western farmers were much interested in the St. Lawrence waterway and they were hoping that our people would be equally interested, as perhaps they are. And this was what was stated in reply—the reply is to the Secretary of State of the United States:

> It will therefore be observed that the transportation situation in the two countries is not identical as to available facilities, extent of use, or rates and that the economic handicaps to which you referred in your note of April 13 appear to have more application to United States than to Canadian conditions. In this connection, it may be said that Canadian agriculture is more directly affected by the restrictions on the importation of Canadian farm products which have been imposed by the United States in recent years, with the object, it is understood, of assisting agriculture in those western states which would share so largely in the benefits of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway. This situation, and the effects upon the maritime sections of Canada of United States duties on the products of the fisheries, are among the factors which have contributed to bringing it about that public opinion in Canada has not so clearly crystallized in favour of the waterway project as appears to be the case in the United States.

In other words, this observation simply emphasizes what I would seek to emphasize to-day. I think it is advisable, so far as our international relations are concerned, that those who are most concerned should have at heart at all times the possible effect of any action of one country upon the other with which it may have any dealings.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Prime Minister allow another question. Is not the quotation which the Prime Minister has just read and which has appeared in the press of the United States, the basis of their comments, to which my right hon. friend has referred, as to the mixing of the St. Lawrence waterway and tariff questions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, they have an explanation now, which perhaps will help to correct it.

I wish to repeat—and I do not think this can be made too clear—that so far as the United States tariff is concerned that is a matter which the government of that country must settle for itself in accordance with its own interest. And the United States will be the first to recognize, if in any action they take our trade with them is adversely affected, that it is our right and our duty, and should be and will be our policy to see to it that we make such arrangements with respect to our tariff as will further our interests in our own way. Having said this much may I again make clear, what I wish above all else to make clear, not only in this connection but in all others, living as we do beside the United States as near neighbours, it is in the interests alike of the United States and of this country, and in the larger interests of the British Empire, that so far as we can, with respect to all our relations, we each conduct our affairs in a spirit which will help to advance mutual interest, and which will help to avoid steps that may lead in the opposite direction.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, at greater length than I had intended. I shall conclude by saying, with respect to the amendments which are before the house at the present time, that I hope hon. members will feel that neither amendment is at the present time in the national interest, but that it is very much in the interests of the country to allow the government to continue to carry out the policies which in the past have made for the increased prosperity which we enjoy to-day. Let us get on with the business of this session so that when we come to parliament at another session we may again present a record of further prosperity and again bring in a budget which will disclose to the people of Canada a surplus instead of a deficit, a further reduction in the public debt, and a still further reduction in taxation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks may I congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who spoke so eloquently this afternoon, in what was without doubt a very masterful speech which did credit to him as the Prime Minister of this country and as the leader of one of the historic political parties of Canada. I shall not attempt to follow the argument of the right hon. gentleman; his speech was devoted to a comparison of a government, his own, exercising power in times of peace, with a government headed by a Conservative leader exercising power in time of war. I shall not attempt to follow him in his argument for the simple reason that I do not consider the Prime Minister a very good authority on the difficulties, financial and otherwise, which confront a government in this country in time of war. My reason for that statement is that during those fearful days when the people of Canada were concerned only with winning the war the right hon. gentleman who to-day criticized the war government was devoting his splendid talents to the work of ironing out difficulties for the Rockefeller Institute in the United States. Consequently I do not consider him a good authority on the difficulties confronting a government in time of war.

Since I am in a congratulatory mood, Mr. Speaker, and since I will not be in that mood long, I am reminded that it is an amenity of parliament to congratulate a minister of finance upon the presentation of his budget. Even at this late date I intend no violence to such an ancient and honourable custom, but when I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the present budget I must perforce explain that it is courtesy and not reason that motivates my action. In Canada we are accustomed to consider the budget from two distinct aspects: on the one hand as a tabulation of fiscal and trade figures, and on the other as an indication of public policy. Judged from the first viewpoint the present budget is in many respects satisfactory; it records a year of abounding revenues, something like $450,000,000 having been collected. But, Mr. Speaker, estimable gentleman though the Minister of Finance may be, he is not a wizard; he does not raise these revenues by waving some magic wand. There is only one source from which they come; there is only one way in which they are derived. That source is the people of Canada and that way is taxation, and when my hon. friends make the welkin ring with references to the fact that they have collected $450,000,000 in the form of revenue from the people of this country I point out to them that 90 per cent of that money was collected from the pockets of the taxpayers, either directly or indirectly, in the form of taxation. I also point out to them that this is the first occasion since Canadian confederation was consummated on which any government, Grit or Tory, has taken such an amount of money in one fiscal year from the people by way of taxation. My hon. friends may take what comfort they can from that declaration. I do not know whether they are entitled to bouquets because of that fact; if there are any bouquets to be handed out I will allow the taxpayers to give them to the Minister of Finance.

One would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that there would be a considerable reduction in taxes in view of the revenues which have been derived; one would have expected that these revenues would have been applied in order to reduce the taxes of the poor, common people of this country. But let us see what has happened. Whatever reductions have been made have been entirely in favour of the wealthy people of this country at the expense of the poorer people. There is a canon of taxation that has been recognized by every government in every part of the civilized world; economists term it the canon of human welfare. Briefly it means that the strongest backs shall bear the heaviest burdens, that those who can best afford to pay shall pay the most, and that where relief is to be given, it shall be given those who need it most. The Minister of Finance, in his present budget, has completely violated that ancient, honourable and most equitable canon of taxation, because whatever relief is accorded in this budget by way of reduced taxation goes to those who can best afford to pay taxes.

That has been his policy in previous years; during a former session in his budget he took off the duty on angostura bitters so that the rich men of this country might have their cocktails a little cheaper; now he has reduced the tax on pullman car tickets and on telegrams and cablegrams. All these reductions affect only the rich men who can well afford to pay and should pay these taxes, but of what assistance are they to the man on the farm, the man who works in the mine, the man who goes down to the sea in ships, the artisans and workingmen of Canada? Absolutely of no assistance whatever.

The Prime Minister has to-day repeated the claim which has been made by his supporters with regard to the prosperity of Canada. There is no doubt whatever that there is prosperity in Canada; there will be prosperity under any government, because the great natural resources with which we are endowed are of such a nature that even the government in office cannot prevent prosperity from coming to this country, much as they may try and they have been trying ever since they assumed office in 1921. We must not judge the prosperity of a country by the reported surpluses in national bookkeeping; we must not judge the prosperity of a country by the reports issued by the large financial institutions. If you desire to find out whether a country is really prosperous you must not go into the mart, to the financial institutions nor to the mansions of the rich; you must go to the homes of the common people and find out how much the sum total of the human value of happiness and contentment has been increased for them by the policies of the government in power. There is considerable philosophy in those lines of the poet Markham in which he says:

> We all are blind until we see
> That in the common plan,
> Nothing is worth the making
> That does not make the man.
> Why build these temples glorious
> If man unbuilded goes,
> We build a world in vain unless
> The builder also grows.

How have the builders of this country, our farmers, our fishermen, our miners and our labouring classes fared under the policy of this government? There are only two ways by which the policies of this government can assist the common people of Canada: one is by reducing the cost of living, and the other is by putting more money into their pay envelopes. What about the rate of wages since this government assumed office? I make the statement, and I challenge contradiction from any supporter of the government, that in every industry employing over two hundred men wages have been reduced since this government came into power in 1921. Not only have they been reduced, but in some cases the reduction has amounted to as much as fifty per cent. So far as the money which goes into their pay envelopes is concerned, the workmen are worse off under the policies of this government. But someone may reply, "They may have benefited in the matter of real wages; the money wage is not important, it is what you can buy with what you get." Well do I remember the right hon. the Prime Minister—and I do not think he mentioned it in his speech this afternoon—discussing the cost of living while he was in opposition in 1920. I heard him in one of the theatres in Halifax while he was discussing that issue with a sob in his voice and a tear in his eye. He told of how the people were being crushed by the high cost of living, and how he and his government would reduce it. He has been in power since 1921; he has been carrying on his policy of fiscal folly, and what is the result? The result is that ten years after the cessation of war the cost of living is just a little higher to-day than it was at the time he made his pathetic speech in Halifax.

Let us now consider the second phase of a budget, namely, the indication of public policy. There has been no indication of a policy of any kind so far as the fiscal condition of Canada is concerned. They do not preach free trade; they do not preach protection—they know not where they stand, but they occupy that invidious position which was so vigorously condemned by our divine Lord when he said, "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth."

of yesterday. At this point I might say, in common with all the members of the house, that I am glad to see him again in his place in the house. He brought out a new argument in favour of free trade, in which, by the way, he does not believe. He said that the imposition of customs duties would only mean war; that the nations which raised their tariff to protect their own people, to protect their own markets for their own products, to protect their own workmen in their jobs, were paving the way for a world war. He went further and said that the policy of high tariff was condemned at the economic conference at Geneva through a resolution which was passed there condemning the policy of tariff protection. Of course it was. Why? Because those who were assembled there knew that it was a pious resolution and one which would not amount to anything. The delegates knew that the tariff was a question of internal policy, and they knew that when they had subscribed to this pious free trade resolution they could go back, as was the case with the United States delegates, and put into effect a tariff policy which would suit the needs of their own people and protect their own markets. My hon. friend seemed to take some pride in the fact that Canada, through its delegates, had been able to announce at that Geneva conference that it was the only country in the world, with the possible exception of soviet Russia, which had reduced its tariff. Then he turned around and said in effect that because we had acted differently from every other country we must be right. He puts me in mind of the fond mother who was watching a battalion of soldiers marching by. She proudly said to one of her neighbours, "See, they are all out of step but my Johnny!" The Minister of Justice seems to think that all the other countries of the world have all been wrong, and that Canada alone has been right. I ask him to contemplate the other side of the question; perhaps the rest of the world is right and Canada is wrong.

I am one of those who believe that a country like Canada, with its great diversity of natural resources, is required to maintain definitely the protective principle in its fiscal policy. In Canada we have a country unsurpassed in natural wealth. We have the wealth of farm, forest, sea and mine. We have the potentialities of becoming a great economic and industrial people. We have the opportunities to develop a wealth sufficient to maintain a population of one hundred million people within the confines of our country. When we consider a fiscal question, we must not look through the eyes of days nor yet of years; when we are legislating in respect to a matter of policy of this kind, we must look through the eyes of centuries; we must realize that we have an obligation to those who come after us and thus be ever ready to make even a little sacrifice, if that be necessary, to apply the protective principle for the sake of developing our own industries and making us, as far as possible, independent economically of foreign powers. Hon. gentlemen may say that the application of the protective principle may raise the price. What happens, though, if you fail to protect as the government is doing in relation to the steel industry to-day? If you fail to protect, what will be the position of your industries in the future? If you allow your industries to be swamped by foreign competition, to languish and to die, what will be the position in the future? You will be handing over to a foreign power the right to fix monopolistic prices in the Dominion of Canada in regard to those commodities. Even if the application of the protective principle were to mean that we would have to make some little sacrifice in the matter of price, the result will be a continuity of employment, higher wages for Canadian workmen, and an increase in the purchasing power of the people of this country. In that way we shall have real prosperity, for increased purchasing power is the only true basis on which prosperity can be established.

I spoke of the need of protection for our basic industries. Protection may mean some sacrifice, but the principle of progress is the same principle that underlies protective philosophy. What is the principle of human progress in any form? It is merely the ability and willingness of a person, or a people, or a nation, to make present sacrifices for the purpose of securing a greater future economic good. That fact is recognized by all civilized people, and that is the principle which differentiates the civilized from the uncivilized man. We may have to make little sacrifices in order to maintain the protective principle at the present time, but we must look to the days when Canada shall be supporting 100,000,000 people. We must not sacrifice our industries now; we must be prepared to apply that principle of progress, postponing the gratification of present economic wants, and guarding against the day when Canada will become, in the matter of important industries, a vassal economic state.

The Prime Minister stated this afternoon that the trade between Canada and the United States was our greatest trade. That is quite true. It is our greatest trade, but it is greatest for the United States. Our imports from the United States are as follows:

Year	Value
1928..	$706,289,854
1929..	840,353,000

Or an increase of $134,000,000 in one year. At the same time our exports to the United States are as follows.

Year	Value
1928..	$474,000,000
1929..	497,000,000

Leaving for Canada an adverse balance of trade of $350,000,000. A large amount of that adverse balance is made up of steel and steel products, and I wish to speak about this particularly, because it is of special interest to my province. Our imports of steel and steel products from the United States are as follows:

Year	Value

Or an increase of about $80,000,000 in steel and steel products alone in one year. We are importing at present, under the tariff of my right hon. friend, almost $1,000,000 worth of steel and steel products a day from the United States. Yet, while that is going on, we could be producing at least 50 per cent of those commodities in Canadian mills, giving employment to Canadian workmen. But they say: This is the policy we on this side of the house intend to continue. My right hon. friend said that they were satisfied with it. For my part I will never be satisfied with a policy under any government, Grit or Tory, that allows foreigners to take our markets and drives our own men out of employment.

I wish to refer now to the steel industry in Nova Scotia. That industry, as a result of the tariff tinkering of this government for a number of years, and because we have been allowing Americans to supply markets which we should have for our own steel products, has gone into liquidation. Some time ago a commission was appointed by this government—and its appointment was due to the force of public opinion—to investigate the claims of the maritime provinces. That commission visited Nova Scotia and it made a finding. It reported that a bonus should be given on every ton of coal used in the manufacture of steel in that province. That recommendation of the Duncan report has not been implemented by this government. They put up the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) the other day to defend their action and I never before heard a more faltering more lame, more feeble, more disjointed or more illogical defence than that which the Minister of National Defence gave. It was merely the application of shrewd evasion. He was not big enough to stand up in his place and say: The government, controlled by free trade sentiment, will not do this. He was not big enough to say: The government has broken faith with the province of Nova Scotia because it has not done this. But, he said: No, the government does not implement this recommendation, the recommendation of a commission of its own creation, because there are abuses in the capitalization and there is not unification of those steel and coal industries. I want to point out to my hon. friend that if there are abuses in the capitalization of the British Empire Steel Corporation to-day, he is the last man in this parliament who should speak about them. Representatives of the British Empire Steel Corporation came to a Conservative government prior to 1921 looking for a charter of incorporation and they were refused. They went back to a Liberal government, of which the Minister of National Defence was a member, and enabling legislation was passed bringing that corporation, with whatever abuses it may have had in capitalization, into existence.

Mr. RALSTON: Just to keep the record straight, I might say that my hon. friend does me undue honour. I never was a member of that government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I should say that my hon. friend was a supporter of that government until he was defeated in 1920. We in the province of Nova Scotia claim that the recommendations of this report, made by a commission the creation of this government, should be fulfilled. When we claim that this measure of justice which has been recommended by a commission appointed by this government should be accorded us, we are told by the Minister of Finance that we are whiners. I do not care what they call me, for as long as I am in the parliament of Canada I am going to stand for justice for the province of Nova Scotia.

There is another very important industry in the economic life of the province of Nova Scotia. It is one of the oldest industries in the province. I watched my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) making his speech on the budget, and just when his time was about up I saw him look first at his wrist watch and then at the clock, and then he said, "I only wish I had time to devote to agriculture in Nova Scotia and to the fishing industry, which is going ahead by leaps and bounds." Let me tell the hon. minister and this house something about how the fishing industry in Nova Scotia is going ahead by leaps and bounds, in order that we may have a correct conception of the hon. gentleman's idea of progress, because it is perhaps this very thing that is keeping this country and keeping the government back.

In 1890 there were employed in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia 28,224 men; in 1927 there were employed 16,127. This is the industry which is going ahead, according to the Minister of National Defence, "by leaps and bounds," an industry which shows a 50 per cent reduction in employment in the period since 1890. If we take the county of Yarmouth, where my hon. friend found a political harbour of safety when all others had failed, we find that in 1890 the fishing industry in that county gave employment to 1,995 men, and in 1927 that volume of employment had shrunk to 1,076. This is the industry that is going ahead by leaps and bounds, according to the Minister of National Defence. That is what a fisherman would call lobster progress.

Conditions in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia last year were so deplorable that a meeting was held of clergymen of all denominations, and I suppose of all political affiliations, to discuss the exodus of people from the fishing villages of that province. It was pointed out in the public press, over the names of representative clergymen who lived in these fishing hamlets that the fishermen were not able to clothe their children properly, or to send them to school. As a result of the agitation conducted in the province of Nova Scotia by a number of clergymen, backed up by the shore fishermen, a recommendation was made to this government that a commission be appointed to investigate the grievances of the fishermen. That commission was appointed, and it cost the taxpayers of this country in the neighbourhood of $100,000. They made their findings to this government, but I did not hear the Minister of National Defence make one single reference to that commission or to its report, nor did I hear any reference to it by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), who last night regaled the house with forty minutes of verbal buffoonery.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you very much. I am not a statesman like you.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Neither did the Prime Minister make any reference to that report. As a Nova Scotian, realizing the seriousness of the present situation of the fishermen, with the fishing hamlets of Nova Scotia being depleted, and the report so states, I ask the Minister of National Defence to-night, what does the government intend to do about that report? I ask him if he will stand up in justice to Nova Scotia, because we in Nova Scotia look to him as our representative in the cabinet, and tell this house if the government is going to accept the minority or the majority report of that commission. I pause for an answer.

An hon. MEMBER: Go on.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Perhaps if my hon. friend will remain quiet, someone may say something which will give the minister an opportunity to get out of his difficulty in some way. I feel that the people of Nova Scotia are entitled to know what the government is going to do about that report. So far they have done nothing at all that amounts to anything. They have given us one bill that is wholly innocuous, that does nothing, that leaves the situation exactly where it was. What is the government going to do about a minister of fisheries?

Mr. STEVENS: Ask the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has devoted his whole life to the fishing industry in the province of Nova Scotia, and a great many of us down there, Liberals and Tories alike, consider that he would make a proper minister of fisheries. It is rumoured down there that the Minister of National Defence opposes his appointment. I hope that is not true. I would welcome the appointment of my hon. friend because I believe that he knows a great deal about the fishing industry, which he has been engaged in all his life. We need somebody at the head of that department at the present time who knows something about the fishing industry because we have before us to-day a proposal to amend the Fisheries Act, and one way in which they are going to amend it is by giving Nova Scotia a statutory lobster season. Those of you who know anything about fishing in the province of Nova Scotia know that the lobster season opens at different times in different counties on account of ice and weather conditions, and if a statutory lobster season is enacted the fishermen of my county or the county of Yarmouth or of some other county might be able to fish for only ten days while the fishermen of another county could fish for twenty-five or thirty days. I have read in ancient mythology how Ajax defied the lightning, and I have read in English history how an early English king, flattered by his followers into believing that he possessed the power to command the elements, allowed himself, in order to confound them, to be taken down to the seashore, where he commanded the incoming tide to recede, greatly to his own discomfiture. I have heard of those things, Mr. Speaker but in no other civilized country of the world have I heard of a department trying to legislate against wind and wave and drifting ice.

Another proposal in that fisheries report was for the extension of long term loans to fishermen. That has not been carried out; in fact, none of the recommendations of that report has been carried out, and the situation is very serious. For the information of the house let me read a few extracts from that report. The commission say:

> While the figures given to us in specific localities cannot always be accepted as accurate, there is abundant proof of decline in boats, small vessels, equipment and population. There is ample evidence too on every hand that young men are not entering the shore fishing industry in large numbers. This is doubtless because of its lack of promise of an adequate livelihood, rather than because of its lack of inducement as a calling; although hazardous, in itself it should be an attractive pursuit, which offers independence in labour, and which, under more favourable conditions, should yield a fairly large return for the labour and capital invested compared with other industries. A remedy—

So the commission says.

> —must therefore speedily be found, and the remedy should be prompt and drastic.

Well, it is not very prompt; but I hope it will be drastic when it comes, if it ever does.

> In default of a remedy, it is not improbable that the fishing villages of the maritime provinces may soon be even more seriously depopulated.

Those are words from the report of commissioners appointed by this government to investigate that industry, which according to the Minister of National Defence is going ahead by leaps and bounds. Now, these men either knew their business or they did not. If they did not know their business, they ought not to have been appointed as commissioners. If they did know their business, the situation they reveal is so serious that it calls for prompt action on the part of this government, and we on this side of the house demand that such prompt action be taken.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said, I am one of those who believe in the maintenance of the protective principle in the fiscal policy of our country. I believe that the Canadian market should be protected in so far as possible for Canadian producers; I believe that Canadian labour should be given a preference in Canada; I believe that Canadian products should be transported over Canadian railways and shipped through Canadian ports. That is the historic policy of the great party to which it is my privilege to belong, and because that is its policy I belong to it.

But there is something else needed, Mr. Speaker. We need in power to-day a government that will protect the interests of the common people and give them a chance to live; that will develop the great wealth of farm, forest, sea and mine; that will make available to our people the myriad opportunities which this great young country should present to them. We need a government that is able to take, and will take, courageous action in the defence of Canada and the Canadian people when it is needed in the matter of tariff application. But—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I thank you.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I hope my young and sympathetic friend from Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) will not think it discourteous on my part if I do not follow him in his remarks. My intention is to devote what I have to say mainly to the subamendment proposed by the member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer).

Last session, with the greatest of pleasure I supported my friends in their subamendment to the budget, but I am forced to say that on this occasion I am far away from the position they take. Let us look at their motion. It is short. It—

> —urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations.

Ever since this subamendment was moved I have studied it in an endeavour to find out what my friends are aiming at. Had they worded their motion in this form:

> —urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards closer trade relations between Canada and other British countries,

I could understand it. Or had they advocated a general policy of preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations, again I could have understood their purpose. But I think I demonstrated two years ago, and I will demonstrate this evening, that the most efficient manner in which this government can be helped or forced to adhere to a standpat attitude in tariff matters is precisely to be found in the policy advocated to-day by members in the opposite corner.

I wonder if they have ever gone over the history of the British preference policy as introduced and applied in Canada. The member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) made a very timely remark the other day when he said the first advocate of this policy was Sir Charles Tupper. Even before he became leader of the Tory party, when he was still High Commissioner in London, Sir Charles was actively engaged in furthering the policy launched by Joseph Chamberlain as a protective policy for the British Empire. As everybody knows, Chamberlain's dream was to organize the British Empire on the pattern of the German empire—not the liberal-minded German empire, but the Tory, Prussianized fabric which aimed at creating economic as well as military domination on the continent of Europe. Chamberlain, so aptly described by Gladstone as the first English politician of the Yankee type, wanted to induce the English people to imitate at once the Yankee policy and the Prussian policy. One of his main arguments was that the British Empire should be self-sustaining in matters economic just as was the German empire and the great American commonwealth. Sir Charles Tupper caught that idea with enthusiasm, and became an apostle of inter-imperial preferential trade as advocated by Chamberlain.

This was the position when the general election of 1896 took place. Three years before, the Liberal party, at their famous national convention held here in Ottawa, had pledged themselves to the wiping out of every vestige of protection. But when the general election came they accepted subscriptions from the manufacturers' association. Therefore once the election was over they had to make a composition between their pre-election pledges against protection and the pro-election assistance they had received from the people interested in maintaining protection. It was then that they caught up that cunning device of the British preference, which on the one hand they offered to the "free trade on principle" Liberals as a reduction of the tariff, and on the other hand to the protected manufacturers as an obstacle to any further reduction in the tariff. The difference between the preferential policy as advocated by Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper, and the British preference as adopted by the Liberal government of Canada in 1897 was this: The genuine article was to be a protective policy for the whole British Empire; as adopted by the Liberal government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier it was a protective policy for British capital, for British industry and for British labour, as against Canadian capital, Canadian labour and Canadian industry. As a matter of fact it worked out largely in that way, with the result that all or most of the complaints that arose from the industrial sections, at least in the province of Quebec, as against foreign competition, arose from the operation of the preferential tariff.

Mr. EVANS: Was protection in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's mind when he introduced the British preference in 1897?

Mr. BOURASSA: I cannot say. I never try to find out what is in people's minds. I simply try to put a reasonable construction upon their actions. The policy advocated by the fullfledged imperialist Tory protectionist was an all-round tariff for the whole British Empire. The policy as devised and applied by the Liberal government of 1897 was a combination of their pre-election free trade principles and of the Tory imperialist protective policy. It worked to this effect, that it not only enabled the British manufacturer to take advantage of it as against foreign competition in Canada, but also enabled some skilful English agents of continental manufacturers to have goods made in France, but more especially in Belgium, Holland and Germany, finished to about 85 or 90 per cent, brought into England, marked as British goods, and entered as such into Canada under the preferential tariff. That practice was inaugurated about 1899-1900, and it has continued ever since. So that this so-called policy tending towards freer trade resulted as a matter of fact in a measure of protection for the British manufacturer, for the British trades agent, for the Dutch manufacturer, for the Belgian manufacturer and for the French manufacturer. There is only one class of industrialists that has not benefited by it, and that is the Canadian industrialists. From the moment this was discovered there was a tendency on the part of the Liberal government of that day to revise their policy. As a matter of fact, at the imperial conference of 1902, Mr. Fielding served notice upon the British government that unless, by some measure of reciprocity, they implemented their recognition of the advances made by the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people, the Canadian government would revise their policy in favour of the Canadian producer. This was never done except in minor instances.

Then came in England the famous campaign to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made allusion this afternoon—the tariff revision campaign in which Mr. Joseph Chamberlain displayed, perhaps to the highest degree possible, all his political activities and, with qualification, his genius. In that campaign Mr. Asquith, later Lord Asquith, was the main political instrument which defeated Mr. Chamberlain's advocacy. But what really carried the day as against the Tory-Prussian-Yankee policy of Mr. Chamberlain was the common sense of the British people, who did not wish to have a new pattern imposed upon them, but preferred rather to stick to the policy which has made Great Britain what she is to-day, the mistress of industry and trade the world over. What I cannot understand is that good Canadians, whether they call themselves Liberals or Progressives, who appear to sympathize with either the fiscal or the general policy of the Liberals or the radicals of England, should cling to that so-called British preferential tariff, which is the one hope of the Tory imperialist protectionists to regain in the future what they lost in 1905.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is my hon. friend advocating the wiping out of the preference?

Mr. BOURASSA: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed I will make myself clear.

The Prime Minister, in his very clever speech this afternoon, quoted Mr. Asquith in reference to the devious way in which the English protectionists are endeavouring to bring back to life the corpse which was interred in 1905 under the name of tariff reform or protection for British industry. As he said, they call it the safeguarding of industries; but by whatever term they may describe it it is the same thing. But apparently the right hon. gentleman does not realize that the policy which my excellent friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) commended so highly yesterday, the policy which hon. gentlemen to the right here would like to see carried further, is precisely one of those devices invented by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and kept up by the English Tory imperialists, to disguise the real thing, protection, at which they have been aiming for the last twenty-five years. My position in that regard is curious. I voted in 1897 for the adoption of that British preference. I was then, as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was when he came into the house three years later, what might be called a moderate protectionist. I belonged to that young generation of Liberals of those days who had been more or less influenced by the appeals—the frantic appeals—of the Conservative party in favour of the national policy. I do not censure my hon. friend from South Wellington because he has gone to the logical extreme of his protectionist tendencies. I took the opposite road. Ever since the war especially, and the more I have studied the economics of all countries as connected with the general trend of policies, as connected with the great problem of international relations, the more I have become convinced that protection is a fallacy; the more convinced I am that the so-called system of preferences, whether they be between British countries or between foreign countries, is merely a disguised method of keeping up that false policy of protection. In other words, I have followed a different path, and like my friend from South Wellington I have reached its logical conclusion: And because I am opposed to protection I am opposed to the British preferential tariff.

The Minister of Justice quoted a part of the report of the Geneva conference, that part in which the reduction of tariffs is advocated and which the minister has opposed to the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Wellington. But the minister could have quoted another passage from the same report, appearing at page 22 of our reprint of it. Let me quote it:

> The experience of the years since the war proves that import and export prohibitions, and the arbitrary practices and disguised discriminations which result therefrom, together with the obstacles of all kinds placed on the circulation of goods and capital, have had deplorable results by hampering the normal play of competition, by imperilling both the essential supplies of some nations and the not less indispensable markets of others, and by bringing about an artificial organization of production, distribution and consumption.

For these reasons they have condemned all such disguised measures of discrimination which help to maintain high tariffs. But to understand the bearing of this paragraph one must know the origin of these resolutions, unanimously adopted in the month of May at Geneva. Everyone knows—that is, everyone who is sufficiently informed—that practically speaking the gist of that report was prepared six months in advance in London by that very able economist, perhaps the ablest economist to-day in the Anglo-Saxon world, Sir George Paish. He sent a precis of that report to the leading bankers and financial men of Europe, from all of whom he received replies. The report, together with the replies, was published in the Times issue of October 20, 1926. I happened to be in London at the time; it was a few days before my hon. friend arrived with the Prime Minister to take part in the imperial conference to be held very shortly. I was struck immediately with the answers of the French and the Italian bankers consulted by Sir George Paish. Here is the essential paragraph of the French answer:

> Ils pensent à cet égard, que l'élévation ou la rigidité excessives de certains systèmes tari-faires, les exagérations directes ou indirectes de protectionisme, de discrimination ou de préférence, les obstacles apportés aux transactions internationales par des réglementations abusives des transports, doivent être condamnés.

Ils se déclarent en conséquence favorables à toutes mesures qui tendraient à la suppression de telles barrières artificielles, qui s'opposent à la libre reprise des relations économiques d'avant-guerre entre les nations.

This answer was subscribed to by such men as Horace Finaly, Directeur général de la Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas, R. Laederich, Régent de la Banque de France, R. Masson, Directeur général du Crédit Lyonnais. The Italian answer was still more to the point; fortunately it was in English, so all the members of the house will be able to understand it.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the French?

Mr. BOURASSA: At least those members of this house whose education has been completed, as is the case with my hon. friend, will have the advantage of understanding both. The Italian reply was as follows:

The undersigned, whilst signifying their agreement with the spirit which has dictated the above manifesto, wish to place on record that had it been possible for them to cooperate in the framing of the document, they would have preferred to give a different and more precise form to some of its passages. Above all, they would have liked that criticism should have been exercised not only as regards the excessive height of customs tariffs and the rigidity of customs regulations in force in some countries, but also in respect of all the numerous forms of direct or indirect protection, discriminations or preferences, artificial subsidies and restrictions on emigration.

With such reservations they willingly subscribe to the manifesto.

As I have already said, I happened to be in London then and I had occasion to meet some of the men who were instrumental in preparing the program for the next Geneva economic conference. Naturally they were struck, as I was, with these replies, and saw the difficulty immediately; they realized that in order to obtain a unanimous vote at the economic conference to be held in Geneva six months later they at once had to satisfy the legitimate protests of the French and the Italians,—of the Germans also, who thought likewise but who did not care to express their views in writing,—and generally all other peoples, while at the same time avoiding the embarrassing position of antagonizing the Canadians and Australians present at that conference in order to please the foreigners. So this milder form which I read a moment ago was adopted unanimously by the conference, leaving out the word "preference" but keeping in the body of the report the protests of the French and Italians and leaving it to the intelligence of economists and statesmen to realize that by "discrimination," as a form of indirect protection, they meant such measures of preferential tariffs as we have in Canada and as they have adopted in Australia and South Africa. Once before, I compared this attitude with the truce offered by Mr. Winston Churchill, a few years before the war, when on the one hand he was proposing to the German government that Great Britain would curtail its program of shipbuilding to a certain number of ships if Germany would do likewise,—in the proportion of 16 to 10 if I remember correctly,—while at the same time he was encouraging Canada and Australia to build those ships which England would agree not to build, under the concealed condition that if war arose all the ships would be banded together and England thereby would maintain the same ratio of superiority which she agreed to reduce.

Naturally the foreigners were no more deceived in 1926 than the Germans had been in 1912; and one of the reasons why this report has not been followed up by practical action is simply because there stands to-day in the way of a general scaling down of tariffs the world over what remains of the Tory imperialistic policy fostered by Joseph Chamberlain and partly adopted by Canada and Australia. Because I have discarded all that I held in my young and crude days of faith in protection, for the last ten years I have never ceased to denounce this so-called British preference which, as I have explained, is just as much a preference in favour of the continental manufacturer and labourer as it is in favour of the British labourer and manufacturer. It is one of the obstacles to the adoption of a low tariff policy by Canada or Australia, and it is one of the foundations upon which British protectionists have laid and now maintain their hopes for the future. That is my first and main reason for not accepting the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has put to me a very pertinent question; he has asked me if I would advocate the immediate wiping out of the British preference. Of course I would not. I agree fully and unreservedly with the closing words of the Prime Minister this afternoon; and once more I find myself in a more British state of mind than many of my so-called Anglo-Saxon colleagues in this house. I do not believe in a precipitous policy. I think it was wrong to adopt the British preference in the first place; we did it in good faith, but I think we must prepare for a revision of that policy and of our whole fiscal policy as well by way of a scaling down of the tariff; but we cannot do it all at once. I think the Prime Minister struck the right note when he said that just at the time there may be a change for the better or for the worse—we do not know—in our neighbour to the south, is not the time for this government either to make or to announce any radical change in its fiscal policy. What is the use of boasting, like big children, that we can either play with the United States or quarrel with them? A tariff war as between Canada and the United States would be just as foolish, just as senseless and just as suicidal as a physical war against that great country.

We must face the facts as they are. Where can we find on the continent of America allies who will support us in either a fiscal or a physical war against the United States? Are we to apply to Senor Calles or his brigand successor to help us out against that country? Those Mexicans already are pawns in the hands of the American government. No, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is absolutely right when he says that we must frame and maintain a sensible, moderate policy according to circumstances, which will suit the requirements of the Canadian people from time to time. We need not frame our policy to suit or to antagonize the Americans or to suit or antagonize the British or any other people on earth. It was a foolish thing to introduce the factor of sentiment into our fiscal policy in 1897; it would be just as foolish to introduce another form of sentiment, wicked sentiment this time, against the United States, in any change we may make in that policy. Let us play our game according to our own situation and our own strength. If the American market is to be closed to us to a greater extent than is the case to-day, I suggest, not as a set policy but as one of the factors of our economic situation which always must be in the minds of the men who are responsible for our government, that they must prepare to find some other markets. The greater our production becomes the greater will be the necessity of going further away for markets, at least so long as that great consuming market of 120,000,000 people is closed to a large extent. Therefore again in that respect I approve of the policy generally pursued by this government in looking out for other markets for our export trade. But, just as the maintenance of the British preference is the main obstacle to the reduction of our tariff generally, as far as our internal fiscal policy is concerned, so the maintenance of that British preference is the main obstacle to our making trade relations easy with the other countries of the world. I stated a moment ago that I supported the policy thirty-two years ago; but at that time it differed very widely in principle from what it is to-day. The preferential policy adopted in 1897 was a standing offer by Canada of reciprocity with any country, British or foreign, which was prepared to trade with us on fair terms. It was first offered to Great Britain because of the trade relations with her, and there was no objection to that, although Great Britain did not give us anything in return in those days. The British treated us just as they treated the Americans or any other people, because they had the sense to frame their fiscal policies according to the needs of their economic life and not according to some foolish outburst of sentiment. Sentiment has its place, but common sense and business principles should apply where it it is a question of business. This is one of the many things we have to learn from the people on the other side.

Let us frame our policy for Canada as the British have framed their policy for Great Britain. I think that is the best tribute we can pay to British genius with regard to matters of policy or of economics, and it is a tribute they would appreciate. They do not appreciate that kind of soft water loyalty carried into the sphere of business; they simply laugh up their sleeves at us, and they are doing only what is right. They think we are still children, acting like children, shouting like children and singing like children, but not trading like men. The best manner in which to approach the British, or any other people on earth, is by taking business seriously and acting in a business-like manner when it is a question of business. When it is a question of sentiment or a display of friendship, talk and sing sentiment as much as you like, but when it is a question of business, deal with it from a business point of view. I always thought that that was the point of view of my friends from the west. I always thought that they desired a change from indirect to direct taxation; but their advocacy of the maintenance of and increase in the British preference is the most concrete obstacle they could put in the way of the carrying out of what I have always considered to be their main policy.

If we are to do something tangible towards carrying out the resolutions which were adopted at Geneva last year for the establishment of economic peace, for the elimination of obstacles to trade, the establishment of a liberty of trade which would permit a freer exchange between producers and consumers, then we should begin in the right way. We cannot frame the policy of the Americans, nor can we frame the policies of the French, Germans, Belgians or British, but we can frame our own policy. We can put into practice one of the measures which was unanimously advocated at Geneva. The word "preferences" was left aside, as the word "protection" has been left aside as far as the amendment—which will be presented to us after we have disposed of the subamendment—is concerned. But if we are to carry out the spirit which animated that conference at Geneva, then we have one thing to do first, and that is to do away with the obstacle which we have raised—of which we are the sole masters, upon which we do not need to consult the British, Australians, Americans, Germans or the French—that is, do away with our preferential tariff; and then we will be in a position to deal with the rest of the problem on a footing of equality. The French and the Italians saw that quite clearly. Say what you like of their general policy—as far as I am concerned, I am far from being an admirer of French or Italian policies generally—although they do not command the world as do the United States or Great Britain, in the science of economics and in the keen perception of economic laws, the French and Italians can teach many lessons to our leading business men. I will admit that they would have no lessons to give as far as the actual practice goes, but it is a different thing when it comes to theory. They understood that the maintenance of this preference would be the main obstacle to the establishment of economic peace the world over and to the removal of the artificial aids which were adopted during the war or the deflation of money, but they also saw that it was the main obstacle to the general scaling down of tariffs the world over.

I can understand that sincere protectionists like the Tory party—and most of them are sincere protectionists—would advocate the maintenance of the British preference, because they always hope that their protectionist friends in Great Britain might meet them with a similar policy. I think Sir Charles Tupper was right when he said that it was undignified, that it was contrary to the principles of the national policy, as advocated by Sir John Macdonald and himself twenty years previous, for Canada to maintain that preference in the face of the refusal by the British to reciprocate. However, there is a certain logic in the Tory protectionists refusing to wipe out the British preference, but I cannot understand the Liberals or Progressives, who I believe are sincere in their advocacy of freer trade, wanting to scale down the tariff and at the same time advocating the maintenance and the increase of the main obstacle to a reduction of the tariff.

Therefore, for those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River, because I believe in a real tendency towards freer trade, and I hope the time will come when it will be possible to adopt that policy.

As far as the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is concerned, I can only say that I haver heard this argument for the last fifty years. As the Prime Minister said, the only change is in the wording; it is the same old panacea of protection which is offered from time to time, from year to year, and from half century to half century. We have suffered from that delusion more than from anything else. The maintenance of this protective policy is one of the reasons why Canada has lost a large proportion of its people. But, at the same time, I do not think it would be wise to make the change all at once, to destroy all at once the evils which have grown upon us during the last fifty years and, therefore, I think the government has taken the wise position in refusing to make any substantial change in the tariff.

At the same time they must prepare for those two things: revision of the preferential tariff in order to remove that obstacle to economic progress the world over, and, second, revision of their tariff policy as soon as they can by a downward scaling of the tariff. I repeat to-night what I have said time and again, because it is very difficult to make people believe it, that in the province of Quebec, apart from a handful of men who control a few industries in Montreal and Quebec and two-thirds of the press of that province, the mass of the people, who are not impressed by the Bank of Montreal or its clients, or by the Montreal Gazette, or the Montreal Star, or L'Evénement, or La Patrie, believe to-day, as they did fifty years ago, that there may be some measure of protection to some national industries; but they have never been, never are and never will be the kind of protectionists they have been painted to be to the deluded people of the west. I repeat to my western friends: if they expect some sympathy in Quebec, they must not endeavour to undo with one hand what they are endeavouring to get with the other; and if they do not find sympathy in Quebec and in the maritime provinces for the further and serious revision of the fiscal policy of Canada, it will surely not be in protectionist Ontario they will get it. It is this friendly advice I wanted to give them, just as I desire to repeat to the government what I have said to them for the last ten years: if they really want to revise in the future the tariff policy, they must be prepared in due time, with prudence and patience, to revise also that preferential policy which they borrowed from the Tory party in England and the Tory party in Canada.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the amendment as moved by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), because there seems to have been some misunderstanding, intentional or otherwise, in connection with this amendment. Any person who understands English and who does not wish to misrepresent matters, will find that there is not a word in this amendment regarding higher protection. In fact, if there was a syllable in it recommending higher protection for this country, I would not support the resolution either by voice or vote. It reads:

That all the words after the word "that" be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for reasonably safeguarding and protecting—

Not industries, not the manufacturing concerns, not any great corporation, but safeguarding and protecting——the interests of those "engaged in agricultural pursuits—

—that means farmers—

—or in industrial" employment in Canada.

Those are the men who carry the dinner pail, who toil from early morning until late at night, and who are handed a lemon while the manufacturing corporation cuts the melon. Those who are referred to in the amendment are the agriculturists and the industrial workers. There is not in the amendment a word about high protection for any industry in the Dominion of Canada.

Since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to me last year as a Tory, I should like to make a little correction. This amendment is brought in by the Liberal-Conservative party. I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not in his seat. I suggested to him last year that I should prefer that he call me a Liberal-Conservative. We had in this country a government, the Baldwin-Lafontaine administration, which resigned in 1851, on account of the radical element in the Reform party in those days. Baldwin went into retirement; Lafontaine took a judicial position in Quebec, and they were succeeded by Morin and Hincks. After the election of 1854 that government found itself very much in the position in which the present administration found itself in 1925, in that they had not a majority in the house; that there were several groups. But unlike this administration they did not attempt to carry on. These were the groups that were elected, as laid down in history, and I am quoting from the high school history used in Ontario. It is corroborated by every other history that will be found in the public libraries of Canada:

(1) The Tories, the remnant of the Family Compact, led by Sir Allan MacNab.

(2) Moderate Tories, calling themselves Conservatives, under the rising star of Macdonald.

(3) The moderate Liberals under Hincks, who formed the largest single group.

(4) The "Clear Grits," whose early leaders had been William Lyon Mackenzie and Dr. John Rolph, two of the rebels of 1837, but who now acknowledged the leadership of Mr. George Brown, editor of the Toronto Globe. Brown (1818-1880) was a young Scotchman, who had come out in 1843, and who gave his tireless energy to fighting what he considered abuses. The Grits were the anti-privilege men; they saw that the Roman Catholic Church had certain privileges, and attacked them; they saw that the seigniors had certain privileges, and denounced them. For the same reason they denounced the clergy reserves and separate schools.

In Lower Canada (5) the so-called Liberals under Morin and (6) the "Parti Rouge", or "Reds".

(7) The English in Montreal and the eastern townships, led by Galt.

In Upper Canada, now that responsible government had become an established fact, the differences between moderate Liberals and moderate Conservatives had become very small. The way was thus cleared for the moderate men in both provinces to unite to form a new party. In 1854 Macdonald succeeded in uniting the moderate Conservatives and the moderate Liberals of both provinces under the title of Liberal-Conservatives, under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald, and he was joined by most of the Tories. This coalition was bitterly attacked by extreme men on both sides, but Robert Baldwin came out of his retirement for a moment to approve of it; it was surely time for a party which represented the views of the moderate men of both races. Of the new party the Upper Canadian leader was Sir Allan MacNab, but in the next year he was quietly shelved in favour of Macdonald.

I do not see how the Reform party can claim any connection with him: The moderate Liberals, who were the largest group, and the moderate Conservatives, who were the second largest, united under Sir John Macdonald and they were called the Liberal-Conservative party. Where the Reform party ever got a license to call themselves Liberals is more than I can find in the pages of history. I have in my library Hansard almost from the first time it was published, and looking over all the Hansards as I have done, it seems to have been the bounden duty of every government after they have been one year in office —and it takes them about a year to get things well oiled and greased and running smoothly —to claim in every speech from the throne that the country is prosperous. The next year it is more prosperous, the third year more prosperous still, and so on. This administration is something like Doctor Coué: every day, in every way, they are growing better and better. But this seems to be a duty which followers of an administration must perform. They will admit in private that things are not prosperous in the country, but, in their public speeches they must proclaim that Canada is prosperous. In past history, when any young country was prosperous it always increased in population, yet under this administration since 1921, notwithstanding the fact that they have spent $16,000,000 on immigration, to bring in 660,000 immigrants and drive out 700,000 people, we are not keeping even our natural increase. I wonder why so many are leaving for a foreign soil when this country is so prosperous. But I will come back to that in a moment.

I should like to use as my text to-night a statement of the Hon. Thomas A. Crerar, made in Winnipeg after he had attended a convention in Regina on August 6, 1925. He says:

> In the minds of many thoughtful people the course of the present government at Ottawa on domestic affairs has been marked by inefficiency and drift.

Inefficiency and drift. Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker. They are the considered opinion of the Hon. Thomas A. Crerar. He goes on to say:

> That the King administration had largely failed to implement its platform on tariff and had largely failed to introduce economies in public expenditures that would lead to reduced taxation, which was imperative; that the financial condition of the country was extremely serious, and that as Canada could not longer support a burden of taxation such as we have at present in the face of reductions of taxation in the United States alongside of us, this condition of affairs might have very serious consequences.

If the speech made by the Prime Minister this afternoon had been made on the hustings during an election campaign, I could have congratulated him upon his excellent stump speech, but in the parliament of Canada the Prime Minister is supposed to have vision, and to lead and point the way. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what high-sounding note of statesmanship fell from his lips to-day? We knew nothing more about his policy, if indeed he has one, when he sat down than when he rose. I heard the Prime Minister speak in my own county, in a grove at Exeter, when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) was with him. I heard him make just as good a stump speech there as he did this afternoon, but it did not mean a thing. He advocated some kind of reform of the senate, as he has done in this house, and he had an example before him—I think he must have been a teacher at one time, because he believes in teaching by example. He had on the platform with him a senator who has since gone to his reward, and after the Prime Minister had said, "I have appointed this man with strings to him, and I can pull them at any time. He must support any legislation that I may propose for the reform of the senate," this senator got up and said, "Yes, that is correct. I was appointed under those conditions." A fine way for the members of the other chamber, who are supposed to sit as judges in the land, to be appointed, that when "Bunty pulls the strings" they will obey his order. Right in this house in 1924 the Prime Minister made a characteristic grandstand gesture in regard to reforming the senate. He told the country prior to the opening of the session that the government were considering legislation looking to a curtailment of the powers of the senate, but that the government were anxious that the country should be convinced of the necessity before pressing it on the attention of parliament. He assured the House of Commons:

> I desire to assure the house that when parliament reassembles steps will be taken by the government to obtain, if possible, means whereby bills may be enacted by and with the advice and consent of the House of Commons under conditions similar in principle to those which have been sanctioned by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

He was asked by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen just what steps he proposed to take, and the Prime Minister declared that the government would consider the matter during the recess. Well, the recess passed, the house opened, and the Prime Minister informed the house that he proposed to call a conference with the provinces upon the question. Near the end of the session, on June 18, 1925, Mr. Meighen again asked whether the government had anything to lay before the proposed conference, and the Prime Minister replied that the government had considered no recommendations and had nothing to offer, but would take up the matter in the recess. Sir, there have been many recesses and many sessions since then, and I can only think that the gestures of the Prime Minister were made for vote-catching purposes. I take it, sir that when I heard the Prime Minister in that grove at Exeter declare that he would reform the senate, either he meant what he said or he did not. If he meant it, what does he propose to do to-day about it? If he did not mean it, then I ask this house and this country what construction can they put upon future pledges when a pledge like this one was so solemly given and so lightly broken?

Again, speaking at Richmond Hill, and I remember that he spoke in the same way at Exeter, the Prime Minister said that he had been handicapped by lack of a majority behind him in the house. He had in the back of his head some great beneficent and benign legislation for the good of the people of this country, but he did not have the necessary majority to crystallize his ideas into legislation, and he pleaded with the people all through that campaign to send him back with a stronger following in the house, or he would refuse to carry on. Well, Mr. Speaker, he went to the country with 117 members behind him and he came back with 101 members, and still he hung on, notwithstanding that he was defeated; he tried to direct the government of this Dominion from the galleries, and he thought that I should not enter the house because I did not have a permanent leader at the time of my election.

Those were two of the promises which the Prime Minister made. He also said that he would lower the cost of farm implements to the farmers of Canada. So far as Ontario is concerned, farm implements are no cheaper to-day than the day on which the Prime Minister made that statement. He also said that he would reduce the cost of living for the common people. Yet the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) tells us that the cost of living is higher to-day than it was then. But I am not going to take up further time to enumerate further promises which this government has broken. This administration is long on promises and short on performance.

The Prime Minister said this afternoon that the government had done a great deal for the farmers of Canada. I have prepared a little budget for a 100-acre farmer in my constituency. He does not agree with me politically, but he has a good 100 acres of land, and that land with the implements and the stock on it are valued at about $10,000. I submitted this little budget which I prepared and which was approved by some of my agricultural friends. This farmer has $10,000 invested in his plant. He has as good a right to have interest on his capital investment as any business man in this land, and 7 per cent on $10,000 is $700. I know there are men in this house who think that anybody can farm at a profit. There are men who have made a success in other lines of business who think that anybody can make a success in the science of agriculture, but I want to tell you Mr. Speaker, that it takes a man of special calibre, special fitness and special training to make any kind of success in agriculture at the present time. I am also allowing in this budget a salary of $1,200, or $100 a month, or $23 a week to the farmer. Surely the man who has the ability to manage a farm and toils from the rising to the setting of the sun should be allowed $23 a week, or as much as a mechanic in a factory; that is, $1,200 a year. His taxes and insurance cost him $100; depreciation on buildings and fences $200; depreciation on implements, work horses, harness, and so on, $100. His wife is more than a housekeeper; she spends at least half her time with the poultry and the dairy, and I am allowing her the magnificent salary of $12.50 a month; that would be $150 a year. He cannot run this farm alone, he usually has a son fifteen, sixteen or seventeen years of age, who, if he were in the city would be earning some money; I am allowing that boy $7 a week—$365 a year. Then, as governments always have a place for contingencies or incidentals, I am allowing the farmer incidentals of $185. This means that on his 100 acres of land he would have to make $3,000 in order to secure a bare living. According to the Minister of Labour that would leave nothing for clothing and many other articles; it would just be a bare living and interest on his investment. Now, to make him prosperous I think he should have $1,000 a year to the good if he wishes to send his children to high school and later to university. This would give him $4,000 a year, which I think a man ought to make on 100 acres of land in my county before you can say farming there is prosperous. I leave it to the judgment of this house and, as government members say, "to the country"—they are always particular about the country—whether or not 100 acres of land should return the farmer-owner this sum of money annually.

A farmer—not of my political persuasion—has given this definition of a farm: "It is a piece of land surrounded by prosperity." Well now, if it is bounded on the east by banks and trust companies, on the north by great manufacturing and industrial concerns, on the west by brokers and so on, and on the south by departmental stores and chain stores, then I think the definition is correct.

Now, this is how prosperous the farmers are in my county. I am borne out in this statement by my colleague from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), as appears from his speech in Hansard, where he states that his constituents call him in and discuss very seriously whether they should advise their sons to stay on or to leave the farm.

There has been a revaluation of soldier lands. A soldier in one of my good townships had a loan of $4,200. The government inspector came around and allowed him $1,000 off the loan. The man thought that was not sufficient and referred the inspector to the reeve of the township. The reeve said: In our township council we passed unanimously a resolution that the farm lands in the township of Morris are to-day worth only 60 per cent of what they were worth in 1920. The assessor came around and said to the soldier: "Your farmer would not sell for more than $2,800." As against this the government inspector would knock off $1,000. In the older settled parts of Ontario almost every farm is for sale, and there are very few buyers. There are lots of farms for sale in the county of Huron, one of the best agricultural counties in the Dominion, a county where we have as intelligent farmers and as industrious farmers as are to be found in the province. If that is the case there, I ask where is the prosperity that is supposed to be enjoyed by the farming community of Ontario?

The farmer used to be able to take down a carload of hogs to Toronto and have five packing houses competing for his stock. But under this government the accumulation of capital in the hands of the big interests has resulted in four of these packing houses amalgamating. Now there is practically no competition on the live stock market, and the farmer has to sell his hogs and cattle to this combine at their own price. I saw an article the other day in the Globe stating that all the vinegar factories of Canada are uniting, and that it would place them in "an enviable position." To-day the farmer has to sell to combines and buy from combines.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to be compelled to pursue this line, and I do it with no pleasure at all. We have had hon. members on the other side of the house read financial statement after financial statement to show that the country is prosperous. Why, certainly it is, and where you find these companies is the only place where there is any prosperity. Take The Robert Simpson Company in Toronto, one of the best departmental stores in the Dominion. After paying interest on their investment and putting money away to meet depreciation and contingencies, they show a profit of about two million dollars. That company may have twenty thousand employees, but they are not getting a dollar more than they did in 1921, and to-day the dollar is not going quite so far as it did then. Stockholders prosperous! Yes, one hundred stockholders probably; but the twenty thousand employees, the people who live in the cottages, the bulwark of the nation, are not as prosperous as they were. Recently a millionaire in the city of Toronto gave a million dollars to a charitable institution. God bless him. But right in his own company there are single men earning only from $12 to $16 a week, and married men earning only from $18 to $20 a week. The millionaire is more prosperous; but what about these men who are working in his institution?

A few years ago a widow showed me a letter she had received from the Toronto General Trusts Corporation, one of the best trust companies in the land—they always do what they say they will do, and do it on the minute. I am simply using this as an illustration. They told her: Money is not worth as much as it was, and we cannot pay you 5¾ per cent. If you care to leave it with us we will pay you 5½ per cent. Periodically she received similar letters until her interest had dwindled down to 5 per cent. In contrast to this, out comes a financial statement that the Toronto General Trusts Corporation have had the best year in their history. The hundred men or so who control the company are prosperous; but the fifty thousand men and women who have their money invested with the corporation have less to live on, and their dollar does not go as far as it used to. I ask you, sir, where is the much-vaunted prosperity? But I must not dwell further along this line.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the township councils, the women's institutes, the churches, the United Farmers' clubs of my constituency have been urging upon me to ask this government to get out of the rum-running business. I trust I shall be understood. They plead with the government of Canada to get out of the rum-running business. Either we are in it or we are not. For the sake of a few millions of ill-gotten dollars it is painful to read the incidents of the rum-running business which recently have appeared in the press. Only to-day I noticed in a newspaper that fourteen rum-runners from Canada landed a cargo at Atlantic City worth a quarter of a million dollars. We in the riding of North Huron, sir, wish to dissociate ourselves from such a business, and we call upon the government to implement the recommendations which were made by the royal commission that investigated the customs. In my county we are prepared to go further, and at any time vote for the prohibition of the importation or manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors. In this, sir, I am speaking for my county and myself but particularly I am speaking for myself.

I wish to address a few remarks to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) whom I am glad to see in his seat. The other night when the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Plunkett) was speaking about the promises which members of this cabinet made during that by-election it sounded so much like "Home Sweet Home" to me that I guess I looked pleased. And that displeased the Minister of Public Works, so that in his mind I have been guilty of a great indiscretion. When the hon. member for Victoria told how the Minister of Trade and Commerce was going to subsidize shipping, and what trade he was going to establish, the Minister of Finance said he was returning convinced that Victoria needed special consideration. And this is what the people of Victoria were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> In succeeding Dr. Tolmie as your representative at Ottawa, Dr. MacLean will possess the added advantage of supporting the government in power, an advantage so obvious that I do not need to labour it to an intelligent audience.

Let me assure hon. gentlemen opposite that they mistake the intelligence of any audience when cabinet ministers go about in by-elections promising the people everything and think they can bribe people with their own money. Sir, they were up around our harbour, and the moment the Minister of Finance landed somewhere in Quebec they rushed him on the first train just to prove that what the rest were saying was all right. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), the Minister of Labour—I will not take the time to mention the rest—were all there, and along came the Minister of Finance. I think I see him on the platform in his surplice, with his supliced ministerial choir, Leading the choir, with the treasury of Canada in one hand and the credit of Canada in the other, he led in the song.

> Were the whole realm of Nature mine,
> That were an offering far too small.
> Take my silver and my gold,
> Not a mite will I withhold.

The Minister of Finance last year, pointing his finger over this way, said that we were asking for everything and at the same time were demanding that expenditures be kept down. I wish to ask him to-night to leave me out of that, because the whole bunch of them came over to our part of the country, offering the people everything they had. But when they came back here they placed just $75,000 in the estimates for a matter of such importance as Goderich harbour, and later on they added $100,000 in the supplementary estimates. That made $175,000. But they only spent $85,000. When the hon. member for Victoria was speaking the other night he said he had expected to go back with $546,000, according to the promises that had been made to the people of his constituency, but he was afraid that he would have to accept $46,000. Then Hansard reports:

> Mr. Spotton: And see that it is expended.
> Mr. Plunkett: Surely they always spend it.
> Mr. Spotton: No, they do not.
> Mr. Elliott: That is a suggestion for the riding of North Huron.

I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works to explain to the house some time just what was in the back of his head when he made that remark. I thought that perhaps he was joking, but after he had had a night's sleep he was still in an ugly frame of mind. I will not go into details, Mr. Speaker, but at any rate I left the city for a couple of days. But I would ask the minister to explain what he meant by that statement. Is this the type of government we have to-day in Canada, that no member shall dare to suggest that the government spend the whole of an estimate without having the threat thrown out that the expenditure will be reduced, with the result that particular public works in his constituency shall suffer? Let me say that in this house, speaking in 1896, the late M. C. Cameron made the statement, as recorded in Hansard—I have not the time to read it—that in 1872 he, a Liberal member, had persuaded Sir John Macdonald to appoint a commission to go up and down that 160 miles of coast line, taking evidence and looking into the whole situation. The result was that they decided that Goderich was the only harbour of refuge from Sarnia to Tobermory. With a conservative government in power, and a Liberal —a Liberal mark you, Mr. Minister of Public Works—continuously representing from Confederation to that date, 1896, the riding in which Goderich is situated, an expenditure had been undertaken of $600,000 on that harbour. It was and is a national port. They handled 20,000,000 bushels of grain this year and, as I say, it is the only harbour of refuge on the great lakes. But because I committed the indiscretion of advising the member for Victoria to see that the government should expend the money voted, then a threat is made. I should be pleased if the minister would assure me that he was only joking. I shall have another occasion to do justice to this great harbour, which this winter accommodated twenty-two vessels carrying five and three quarter million bushels of grain.

I should like to have said something in regard to the mail service but the minister is not in his seat. I shall leave it for another occasion. However, let me give one illustration of economy on the part of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). The Postmaster General has shown considerable human sympathy in my constituency and has done several things for me for which I am grateful. But consider this incident, of a rural mail carrier in the village of Auburn. Let us say the post office was where the Minister of Finance sits; they moved it down to where the Minister of Public Works sits. A distance of thirty-nine rods and a fraction was involved, and the department sent a highly paid inspector there to measure that distance. He found it to be thirty-nine rods and so they docked the man $10.48 a year. Yet this government is the friend of the working man.

This friend of the farmer has also shown its interest in agriculture. In 1912 the late government put aside $10,000,000 for agricultural instruction in the different provinces. My province was to receive $336,303.26 per annum, and with the grant they got they built the Kemptville agrricultural college, and undertook to secure agricultural representatives in the various counties. In this regard I have a statement which I will ask the privilege of putting on Hansard. It shows how the grant was apportioned in Ontario:

Ontario Agricultural College—
Salaries and expenses		$ 9,000 00
Agricultural School and Farm—
(a) Capital expenditure	$ 3,000
(b) Administrative and teaching staff, and maintenance and equipment	49,000
		52,000 00
Instruction and Demonstration—
Agricultural representatives		136,000 00
Extension work in household science		1,500 00
Demonstrations in vegetable growing		4,000 00
Cooperation and markets		6,000 00
Short courses for winners of field crop and live stock competitions including travelling and living expenses		1,000 00
Lectures on horticulture		750 00
Demonstration work on soils		9,500 00
Drainage work		4,751 57
Fall fair and field crop judges		2,000 00
Demonstrations in live stock and poultry		3,500 00
Elementary Agricultural Education—
To provide for and encourage the teaching of agriculture in high and public schools		24,000 00
		$254,001 57

But when this government came into power they did not know what to do. Their love for the farmer was great, but it is great only during election; and this money which was intended to assist in agricultural education they could not continue granting. They put up the sum of $200,000 for one year, and the minister said that they were going to bring in a resolution at the next session either to improve or to extend the system, or just to leave it as it was. However, the upshot of the matter was that the vote was cut off entirely, as were federal aid to the farmers for good roads and federal aid to the farmers' sons for technical education in my province of Ontario. The former administration had granted over $1,000,000 a year to my province to assist in agricultural education, to encourage good roads and to assist in technical education. They continued it during the war, but this government rudely cut it off.

Now I should like to devote a few moments to the sales tax. I think a mistake was made when the title of "doctor" was conferred upon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) instead of the Minister of Finance. When this government came into office they found the sales tax at 3 per cent; they forthwith raised it to 5 per cent and then to 6 per cent. The consumer was carrying a bag on his back with three stones in it; this government placed three more stones in the bag and then each year took out one stone and said "What good fellows we are." They got into the elevator at the third floor; they went up to the sixth floor and then returned to the third, but in the meantime they extracted hundreds of millions of dollars from the buying public, the poorer class of people in this province. Time and again the party on this side of the house pleaded with the government to abolish that tax. They have more than abolished that tax now; when the Minister of Finance made the reduction from 6 per cent to 5 per cent he said it was a reduction of 16⅔ per cent; when he reduced it from 5 per cent to 4 per cent it was a reduction of 20 per cent; when he reduced it from 4 per cent to 3 per cent it was a reduction of 25 per cent and now that it has been reduced from 3 per cent to 2 per cent there is a further reduction of 33 per cent. If we add those together we find that already the sales tax has already been reduced by 115 per cent. If next year it is reduced one per cent more that will be another reduction of 50 per cent, giving a total of 165 per cent, and a further one per cent reduction in another session will enable the minister to reduce the sales tax another 100 per cent making it in all 265 per cent; but the chances are that he will take it all off in one swoop before the next election. I commend him to the public; figures cannot lie.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is usually in order to congratulate the preceding speaker, and I desire to take this opportunity to pay tribute to my good friend from North Huron (Mr. Spotton). I am always interested in his speeches and particularly in the dramatic manner of his delivery. If one did not know the other side he probably would take a literal interpretation of his whole speech.

My hon. friend made an accusation against the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), claiming that the minister was unfair to the constituency represented by my hon. friend. On behalf of the Minister of Public Works I want to say he is not that type of man; I think our Conservative friends are in a position to know that full well, because within one year they tried on three occasions to defeat him in his own riding. At each election he increased his majority; the last election gave him a majority of 2,660, and I think any candidate who opposes him at the next election will probably lose his deposit. I want to say that we new and inexperienced members from southern Ontario owe a great deal to the Minister of Public Works; any one of us would rise to his defence on an occasion of this kind.

The hon. member for North Huron went further and made some caustic references to the Prime Minister of this country. This afternoon we heard the Prime Minister deliver an address which in my opinion was a masterpiece; I do not think any man could add to or take away from that speech. Today, despite all the unfair criticism of the Tory press in years past, the Prime Minister stands high in the estimation of the people of Canada, and after he appeals to the country at the next general election I think our Conservative friends will be found still gazing with longing eyes at the treasury benches across the floor of the house. I think the Prime Minister has demonstrated in no uncertain way that he is well able to emulate our grand old chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, especially in the way he picks his cabinet, because we feel that the men who grace the treasury benches at present are the ablest and best body ever to hold office in the history of this country.

I say this government need have no fear with regard to what may happen at another general election, because they are carrying out a policy applicable to the needs of this growing young country. During the last three general elections our Conservative friends appealed on the old protectionist platform, but on each occasion they came back in the minority. The policy applicable to the needs of Canada certainly is one of trade expansion, and I want to say that that policy is being well carried out by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm). That fact is demonstrated by his successful negotiation of trade treaties with many countries throughout the world, so that now our goods are moving freely into the world markets. We do not need to go back very far in history to ascertain how the restricted trade policy brought grief to this country; each time our Conservative friends were in office they created such hard times that we had economic revolts, especially in the rural sections, as witness the formation of the Grange Patrons of Industry and the United Farmers of Ontario. In order to ascertain the effects of such a policy we need only point to the sad plight of the American farmers, due to the fact that they subscribed to the very doctrine expounded by our Conservative friends here. Because of the trade policy of this government I think we are probably the most prosperous country in the world.

But of course our Conservative friends shout hard times when in opposition; then they create hard times when they are in power. During last session I was very much interested in listening to the various members from the city of Toronto get up in this house and tell us of the terrible conditions existing in that city. I do not doubt but that some of them were wise enough to realize that such conditions did not exist, but like the little birds in the nest they all held together for fear they would all fall out. When it comes to calamity howling, however, they have to yield the laurels to the hon. member for Hamilton, because I think he may be well dubbed the "Calamity Ann" of this house. However, after listening to all this talk of the terrible conditions in Toronto I had occasion to attend a banquet in that city, at which the mayor of Toronto said that his city was the most prosperous city not only in Canada but on the North American continent. That was enough to make me gasp with amazement, but the mayor elaborated the point, quoting all the building figures and telling of the preparations they were making to provide for a population of 1,000,000 happy people.

Mr. RENNIE: There are two members from Hamilton in this house; to which one did my hon. friend refer?

Mr. HEPBURN: They are both pretty good calamity howlers but I meant the other hon. member, the one who specializes in it.

Mr. RENNIE: I am asking a question; which member did my hon. friend mean?

Mr. HEPBURN: I said I meant the other member, the one who spoke of people of Hamilton going out on the Hamilton mountain and living on the grass that grew thereon. Now that my hon. friend has brought the matter back to my mind I remember reading in the press that during the last municipal election in Hamilton there were so few unemployed that they could not find enough men to man the polling booths. I say all this talk is made for a purpose; there is no substance to it; it is just political talk, and it recalls to my mind a quotation from Shakespeare:

> All the world's a stage
> And all the men and women merely players:
> They have their exits and their entrances;
> And each man in his time plays many parts,—

It seems to me that the last part of that quotation may well apply to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the genial doctor from Fort William (Mr. Manion), because I recall that at one time they were pretty good Laurier Liberals, although now they are gracing the front benches of the Conservative party. I recall the first political meeting I attended, at the age of five, when I heard the then brilliant orator from South Wellington expound true Liberal doctrines. Since then he has changed, but he has joined a group which also changes; in 1911 hon. gentlemen opposite told us that the American market was of no value to us at all, that we wanted no truck or trade with the Yankees. They had their poor, deluded followers throughout the country; I remember one man who got up publicly and exclaimed dramatically that he would rather have his right hand cut off than have reciprocity with United States. He happened to be a cattle drover; a little later the price of cattle rose on the Buffalo market, and he was scurrying around trying to buy up cattle to sell on that high priced market. Now, however, the situation is so serious that the red-blooded gentleman from Fort William is advocating red-blooded Canadianism—I think he got the expression from reading Andy Gump—is advocating a special session of parliament to deal with this question of retaliation. The American congress is going to be called together to enact legislation which will make the American people pay more for their necessities of life. They are going to make the consumer pay more for the bread he eats and the butter he uses; they are even going to make the baby pay more for his milk. And our Conservative friends, headed by the genial member for Fort William, wants us to call a special session of the Canadian parliament to enact similar legislation.

I am sorry the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) is not in his seat, because I wanted to take his remarks as an example of the gross exaggeration which has taken place in many instances with regard to the trade of these two countries. The hon. member, speaking in this house on March 1 of last year, said that in 1924 alone $494,349,000 of farm produce and foodstuffs were imported from the United States. He said that these importations consisted of produce and foodstuffs which could and would have been produced in Canada had the proper protective policy for the farmer been in operation. Apparently he had unbounded confidence in the protective tariff, but, unfortunately, he was away out in his figures. I do not desire to blame him because I think there might be extenuating circumstances. When he came down to this house first I recall that he talked of nothing but a tariff for onions; the next year he had it as a tariff for tobacco; and the third year it was a tariff on fruits and vegetables, but I think, through his early association with onions, that he must have got some onion juice in his eye and it has prevented his having the right perspective ever since. I desire to deal with that remark of his which appears in the revised Hansard, because I believe it to be absolutely untrue. I went to the trouble of obtaining figures from the Bureau of Statistics and the Department of National Revenue, and I find that we made the following importations in that year:

Agricultural and vegetable products	$125,671,000
Animals and animal products	45,026,000
Total	$170,697,000

That figure is considerably short of the figure quoted by the hon. member in Hansard. But he also said that there were importations which could and would have been produced in Canada under a protective system. Among the many articles coming in we find the following:

Citrus fruits	$11,500,000
Currants, raisins, etc	11,500,000
Sugar	49,000,000
Tea, coffee, spices and cocoa	18,000,000

According to the statement of the hon. member, all of this stuff could and would have been produced in Canada under a protective tariff. I think the hon. member for South Essex would be quite safe in guaranteeing to eat all the agricultural food products of a competitive nature coming into this country that year in excess of $30,000,000.

This gross exaggeration of facts is one of the difficult things we have to contend with. These statements are published throughout the country, and it is very difficult for us to get the truth before the people.

We have heard considerable about the policy of retaliation. The only products with which we are concerned are the competitive products such as dairy products, live stock, meats, potatoes, grain, vegetables and fruit. I have analyzed the trade figures and I find that we imported $28,385,000 worth of competitive products during 1928, while we exported $62,174,000 worth. These figures would show that we are not losing very much in that trade. But our Conservative friends say that we should retaliate if the Americans go on with the proposed plan and enact higher tariff legislation during the coming session of their congress. How is this going to work out in a practical way? In dairy products we imported $242,000 and exported $10,385,000. A policy of retaliation would not be very effective there. In live stock and meats we imported $5,837,000 while we exported $28,733,000. Again a policy of retaliation would not be very effective there.

I desire to call the attention of the house to another gross exaggeration which was placed on Hansard the other day by the hon. member for South Essex. During the course of his remarks he quoted a telegram which he had sent to the Prime Minister last July, wherein he stated that American potatoes were coming into Canada at the rate of 300 cars daily. I looked up the trade figures as they referred to the United States, and I find that we imported last year $798,000 worth of potatoes, while the value of the exports of potatoes was $4,593,000. The total weight of the potatoes imported into this country amounted to 300,647 hundredweight. A produce merchant has informed me that about 400 hundredweight could be placed in one car, and upon dividing that total amount it will be found that the total importation into Canada amounted to only 751 cars. If they were coming in at the rate of 300 cars per day it is certainly fortunate that the member for South Essex sent a telegram to the Prime Minister because the total importations could have come into Canada at the rate of 300 cars per day while a letter was on its way to Ottawa. Figuring it out on the basis of value quoted by him in Hansard, at $3 per bushel there were 266,000 bushels imported. At 650 bushels to the car, this would mean that only 409 cars of potatoes came in. According to the figures given by the hon. member, the total importation would have been completed in a day and a half. It is quite true that a tariff on potatoes might hold back the early importation of American potatoes, and while the farmer might expect a slight seasonal advantage in price for a week or two, that advantage would cease when the main Canadian production came on the market. What would be the inevitable result? If the farmer subscribed to this policy he could only expect to be retaliated against, and he would then lose a potential market for his entire surplus in the United States. I do not think the farmers in southern Ontario are very seriously considering increased tariff on potatoes.

I will take one concrete example to show what this retaliation would mean to the farmer. The trade figures show that we imported last year $6,425,000 worth of feed corn. This was imported very largely into southern Ontario because of our proximity to the American cornfields, the low freight rates, and our proximity to the high-priced American market for our finished products. We buy the corn, we feed it at a profit, and we sell our goods on the American market.

If the American congress should enact this legislation, which might mean that we would receive about $4,000,000 less for the $39,000,000 worth of dairy and meat products exported to that country, our Conservative friends are going to adjust this matter for us by making us pay another million dollars for the corn we have to import. I cannot see the sensible farmers of southern Ontario seriously considering a project of that kind either. Instead of turning the other cheek, as far as tariff legislation is concerned, it would be a case of going over and battering our heads against the first wall we could find, provided we could find one hard enough.

A great deal has been said about the dairy industry by men who, from their arguments, I do not believe know very much about this particular industry. I have been interested in the dairy industry for many years: I have operated a cheese factory and I have made a study of this question. I admit frankly that it is somewhat of an anomaly for a dairy country like Canada to be importing butter; but what is the cause? The cause is this that many farmers in southern Ontario and Quebec are taking full advantage of their geographical position and are shipping a perishable commodity in the form of sweet milk and cream to the United States market. Our exports of sweet milk and cream to the United States increased as follow:

Year	Value
1927	8,739,000

Or an increase of nearly 300 per cent. While we are diverting our milk in that way, we must of necessity import for our home consumption and so we are buying butter from our New Zealand cousin who is not so favourably situated that he can take advantage of this special market which we now enjoy in the United States. Our Conservative friends tell us that this is wrong. Here is the transaction exactly. We are selling at a high price in the United States market, and I am going to give the price because the other day I telegraphed to the manager of one of the big dairy plants in southern Ontario which is dealing particularly in this kind of business. He informed me that in the last four months they have been paying the southern Ontario farmer about 64 cents per pound of butter fat for his milk. Worked out in terms of butter that means about 75 cents per pound for butter. We are bringing in our necessary supplies for home consumption at 45 cents a pound as a maximum price. As we are selling our butter at 75 cents, on the transaction we are making a profit of 30 cents a pound. On the 16,000,000 pounds we are bringing in from Australia we are making, looking at the matter from a national standpoint, approximately $4,800,000 a year, figure it as you may. But of the brains of the Conservative party, as represented on the front benches by the very able leader (Mr. Bennett), by his first lieutenant (Mr. Guthrie) and by the distinguished accountant, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) of customs probe fame, who certainly has a nose for investigation, not one as yet has caught on to the fact that we are making a profit on the transaction. I should like to include another hon. member across the floor from Vancouver—I forget his constituency—but I am afraid he is more or less in the position of a doubting Thomas. When he is in Vancouver he supports the Australian treaty, but when he comes down to Ottawa and his mind becomes permeated with the talk of his Conservative friends, he is somewhat against it. Our Conservative friends advocate a tariff to keep out this Australian butter, but if we place a tariff on this butter, one of two things will happen: we shall have to divert milk from those high priced markets to other sources or the people of Canada will have to go back to conditions which prevailed when our Conservative friends were in power, when they had to eat oleomargarine, a mixture of intestinal fats and southern oils imported largely from the United States. It is only going to have the effect of diverting milk from high priced markets into butter production. There is no such thing as the saturation point of consumption, and when we go back into the export market with butter we shall be right where we started; the farmer will be getting the world price for butter the same as he always has, but he will be wiser in that he will have had the fallacy of protection demonstrated to him.

[Mr. Hepburn.]

On account of the grading of cheese which was brought into force by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), Canadian cheese manufacturers are getting from one and a half to five cents a pound above the world standard market price for cheese. The whole situation is summed up in this way: the Canadian cream producer who sells his product to the United States market is able to enjoy that higher price. He is in a very favourable position and if our friends across the way were to go down into the county of Elgin and visit the farms of the men who are enjoying that high priced market, they would be impressed by the fine accredited herds, the fine farms, the improved roads, the splendid schools and everything else that goes along with prosperous agricultural conditions.

My time is slipping along and I shall have to digress a little. I was very much amused —and I use the word advisedly when I received to-day a copy of the Border City Star. It tells about the very eloquent address made by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) which in some way established a precedent in the house. It said:

> The South Essex member was heard with marked attention throughout, and when his forty minutes had expired, he appealed to the Speaker to be allowed a couple of minutes to submit some suggestions for the relief of the tobacco growers. Although earlier in the day members had protested against this privilege being extended to another member of the opposition and it had been refused, Mr. Gott was allowed to continue.

In this way the hon. member for South Essex was given a special privilege, and worse than that, the article goes on to say:

> When Mr. Gott sat down amidst the applause of his party and other members, Mr. Speaker Lemieux left his place and went over and congratulated him on making one of the best speeches of the session.

I do not know to whom to give credit for this publicity, whether to the hon. member for South Essex or to the reporter who signs himself E. C. Buchanan. If Ananias and Sapphira were to return from the grave I am sure they would rush up to a reporter with such a vivid imagination and grasping him by the hand would say, "Shake brother, shake!"

I find that at the time this eloquent address was delivered there were barely enough members in the house to form a quorum, and I can hardly imagine this thunderous applause described in a manner that would lead us to believe that it jarred the rafters and even shook this building to the point that the peace tower might have taken on the aspect of the leaning tower of Pisa. But as regards the Speaker leaving the chair, I know the Speaker has never left the chair to congratulate any member, much less the hon. member for South Essex.

The article goes on to tell how the hon. member made an eloquent plea for the tobacco growers. The hon. member certainly believes in a protective tariff. It reminds me of the quack doctor who stood on a soap box selling his wares to the public. He was trying to tell them that the particular pills he had would cure indigestion, and when the crowd protested that they did not have indigestion, he said: "Well, take them anyway; these pills will prevent indigestion." The hon. member goes on that principle that the tariff will prevent any ailments and cure all ailments. If an industry is prosperous and making money, then it should have more tariff; and if it is being managed in an inefficient manner and has obsolete machinery, the same principle should apply—increase the tariff and everything will be all right. The hon. member advocated an increase in the tariff on tobacco; in fact he charged that this government is not friendly to the tobacco industry in southern Ontario. As a matter of fact, that industry in southern Ontario owes its very existence to the British preference which was brought in as a policy by a Liberal government, a policy which has been maintained and strengthened by this government.

The hon. member informed us that we needed a marketing system. That is quite true, because the tobacco producer in southern Ontario is, I believe, very much in the hands of a monopoly. That is, the tobacco buyers have the situation so much in hand that there is very little competition. A sincere effort was made a year ago to form a tobacco pool, but what happened? Despite the fact that we tried to impress upon the farmer that he must show his faith in the proposed organization; that he must take the initiative; that he must organize and then come to the government with his problems; despite all the careful plans laid by officials of the Department of Agriculture, Conservative members from southern Ontario felt that there might be some political gain if this pool were made a success, and so what did they do? From every platform they told the farmers that all they needed was protection. Many farmers believed them, with the result that the pool movement was a loss and one of the contributing factors to that loss was the argument advanced by my Conservative friends that a tariff was the only thing that would help those farmers.

I want to deal with the tariff on tobacco because the hon. member for South Essex stated that an increased tariff would mean an increased price to the grower in southern Ontario. A short time ago there was a hearing before the tariff board and experts in the tobacco industry gave evidence. This very question came up as to whether or not a tariff would be of any value to the tobacco grower in southern Ontario, and Mr. Richardson, speaking on behalf of the cigar manufacturers of Canada, said:

> The issue having been raised that restoration of the 1913 28 cent leaf duties would seriously affect domestic production, we are prepared to prove that, on the contrary, it would actually benefit the grower of cigar leaf in Canada.

These men are all experts in their particular line; this question was carefully studied from all angles, and this is what they find: under the 28 cent tariff in 1919 the farmer was getting 25 cents a pound for his tobacco. The Conservatives increased the tariff to 40 cents a pound, and would you believe it, the price actually dropped to 10½ cents a pound to the farmer the following year, showing that the tobaccos that came into Canada at that time were not competitive tobaccos any more than they are to-day. The manufacturer has to import a certain amount of American tobacco, for he puts out a standardized product and he must maintain it. If a tariff did not help the farmers then, it could not help them now, and in my opinion it would injure them. I can understand the position of the manufacturer. If we further tax his raw material entering Canada that goes into the finished product, which sells at a price which does not vary, either he has to increase the price to the consumer or lower the price to the producer, and he is in a much better position to lower the price to the producer than to increase the price to the consumer.

In regard to the price of the finished product, I have a word of criticism against my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. There is only one way in which the government can help the tobacco industry in southern Ontario other than by following the trade policies now pursued, and that is to lower the excise tax on manufactured tobacco. This particular industry seems to be the subject of a very high tax. The excise tax in Canada is such that it just about equals the wholesale price in the United States, and when a Canadian visitor in the city of Detroit for example sees there two packages of tobacco selling for 25 cents while one package of the same brand sells for 25 cents in Canada, the temptation to smuggle is almost irresistible, and under the conditions I do not blame particularly the man who smuggles. I say that this extreme tax should not be maintained. In the hearing held before the tariff board I was pleased to see that Mr. Darby of the Canadian Council of Agriculture in making his comments said:

Thanks to the returning prosperity and the general improvement of economic conditions, the national revenues are showing considerable buoyancy and several successive reductions of taxation have been possible. The prospect is that still further reductions in taxation will shortly be possible. In these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, the claims of the consumers of cigars and cigarettes to some alleviation of the taxes falling upon these commodities may properly be given careful consideration.

Another gentleman, Mr. Deachman, the Secretary of the Consumers League, had this to say before the tariff board:

I support the application on the ground of its obvious reasonableness. There appears to be every evidence in what has been submitted that the taxation is now so high as to curtail the revenue, both by restricting consumption and by encouraging smuggling. I can see no reason why a tax which is so high as to defeat its purpose should be longer retained, and it seems to me this case is so palpable as not to need further argument.

I have confidence enough in the Minister of Finance to feel that when he brings down his next budget, which I hope will be another tax reducing budget, cognizance will be taken of this inequality and that equity will be done to all parts of Canada.

There is another matter which I want to bring to the attention of the house. Our friend from South Essex referred to the fact that he did not think there was unanimity of opinion on the government benches. I would like to counter by asking how much unanimity there is on the Conservative benches with regard to a speech made a few days ago by my good friend the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith). Speaking on behalf of the province he represents, he was advocating an increased tariff on coal, and he said:

I know there are many difficulties in the way of the application of the tariff in its relation to the coal industry, but I am not by any means abandoning what I have always maintained to be one of the things necessary to help the industry, namely, a higher tariff on coal. I have heard the slur cast across the floor of the house many times, but I do not think there is any disagreement, so far as the members on this side of the house are concerned, with respect to properly and adequately protecting every legitimate industry in this Dominion. That has always been the stand of the Conservative party, and that policy has never been abandoned by that party so far as I am able to ascertain.

That is a very broad statement, and I watched with considerable interest to see how it would be received by members on the opposition benches. The applause was most enthusiastic. One would judge that they were sincere in leading the house and the country to believe that there was unanimity of opinion with regard to increasing the tariff on coal. Coming from the province of Ontario, where we have to import our coal and use 13,000,000 tons per year, I would like to have something more definite in the way of a policy with regard to coal from the opposition members. I would like to ask if the policy enunciated by the hon. member for Cumberland is the policy of the great Conservative party, because we who have to import coal want to know it before the next general election. In the railway committee a year ago I opposed the idea of subsidizing Alberta coal. I said that the thing was not feasible, and that has since been proved to be the case. A tariff on coal would not have the effect of making the consumer in southern Ontario use a single ton more of Alberta or Nova Scotia coal. The only effect it would have would be to increase the cost to the consumer. I would like to ask the leader of the opposition what is his policy in that regard. I do not hope to get a definite answer because I recall an answer that he made some time ago. He had been complaining loud and long about the amount of farm implements coming into this country. He did not believe in allowing farmers to buy their implements as cheaply as they could, and he said that the government had the tools in its hands to stop this importation. But when the Finance minister got up and asked him if he would stop it if he were in office by the application of a higher tariff, I was amazed at the dexterity by which the leader of the opposition evaded that question. He said that he was too old a politician to be caught by such a question. I want to tell him that he is going to be caught by these two questions when he comes to southern Ontario, because we are going to know whether he is fooling us or whether he is fooling the people of Nova Scotia in regard to coal, and we are going to know as farmers what he is going to do about the tariff on agricultural implements.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Revenue will answer that.

Mr. HEPBURN: In the few moments I have left, let me say that I am going to vote against the amendment of our Conservative friends with considerable gusto. It is just a foolish gesture intended to lead the farmers up a blind alley. I am happy to say that the Canadian farmer is the only farmer the world over who has not succumbed to the high tariff policies enunciated by so many Conservatives all over the world, policies which are restricting world trade. If any country in the world to-day needs wider markets, it is Canada, and if there is any country in the world where the policy of higher tariffs is not applicable to-day it is this Dominion.

With regard to the subamendment of the Progressives, I would like very much to support it because I believe in the principle of the British preference. I believe, further, that if by the proposed legislation of congress they make it harder for us to sell the products of this country to the United States, we shall have to market our goods in other countries, and the great field ahead of us in that respect, I believe, is in developing further the British preference. But that is the policy of this government, and I cannot for one moment see the wisdom of nullifying all the good that has been done in bringing down this budget by voting for the subamendment, although I believe in it in principle. So I shall have to vote against it and support this government, believing that in doing so I am representing the sentiments of the people of the county of Elgin, which county has returned to the Liberal fold after being for thirty years under Conservative domination.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a very few minutes of the time of the house to reply to the argument which was put forward to-night and especially directed against the amendment to the amendment by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I do not know whether we should take the arguments on the budget, the amendment, and so forth, as seriously as some of us do, particularly after what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said to-day, that this is no place for an amendment, that the only thing an amendment can possibly mean is a vote of censure on the government. Then in reply to my question, what was the use of moving an amendment, the Prime Minister informed us that there was a place for such things. I have been a member of the house for five or six years, but I have never yet discovered that place. I suppose if we were to move an amendment to any single item of the budget when it reaches committee of the whole we would be met by precisely the same argument.

However, I wish to address myself in particular to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle. The hon. gentleman is always interesting; at times he is refreshing. His erudition is unquestioned. I always admire his wide knowledge of affairs and his great ability in presenting his views to the house. However, the interpretation which he at times put upon certain facts of history might be very sharply questioned even by gentlemen who may be equally well informed. He attacks the amendment to the amendment on the ground that it favours a protective policy, and he proceeds to prove his case on this assumption. I must say that, considering all the speeches I have listened to from the hon. gentleman, he has made a poorer job at proving his case to-night than on any other occasion that I can recall. So far as I am aware, there is only one way in which an increase of the British preference can possibly be interpreted as protection, and to that way the hon. member did not direct his argument. If in our amendment to the amendment we were to ask that the tariff be increased against all other countries in order that the British preference might be correspondingly increased, then there would be grounds for the argument that it was a method of protection. But no such thing is advocated. Our amendment to the amendment suggests a reduction of the tariff against Great Britain in order that we may increase the preference. By what manner of means the hon. member for Labelle was able to satisfy himself that this meant increased protection, I cannot understand.

The hon. gentleman proceeded to tell us that he agreed with the policy as announced by the Prime Minister this afternoon. That policy, in a word, was that Canada was from now on to adjust her fiscal policy according to circumstances. That is a new policy for the Liberal party. I have no criticism of the policy; in fact I endorse it. It is the utterance of statesmanship. It makes due allowance for that great invisible government—circumstances—which more or less controls the activities of all governments. But I do want to say that the Liberal party never won an election on a platform of that kind, and I venture to say that they never will. But that was not the only policy announced to-day by the Prime Minister. In the platform of the Liberal party I find this policy:

> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff, and that the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

We have heard those things somewhere before. But the point is, if the hon. member for Labelle regards the preference amendment which we have moved as equivalent to protection, and for that reason cannot support it, I am at a loss to understand how he can support the policy of the Prime Minister when to increase the British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff is the policy of the Liberal party, and was specifically referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) as being the keystone. It is moved from 50 per cent of the general tariff to be the keystone; next they will have a chart, and after that a star. You know all great mariners guide their vessels by the stars of the heavens, but they never expect to lassoo those stars and pull them down to the deck where they can look at them. So the policy of the Liberal party is very much like the star that guides the mariner; they always leave it in the heavens to guide them because next year they might need it to bring them into the port of power.

But to return to the argument of the hon. member for Labelle. He was not at all convincing in stating that the increasing of the British preference by reduction of the British tariff could by any possible means be construed as a high tariff policy. In fact he said himself that such a policy would result in bringing into this country German goods, French goods, Belgian goods and goods from every European country, which would be shipped over here from Britain with the British stamp on them. That was his argument. Well, if the policy of preference is going to result in greater importations, is that the usual result of a protective policy? Surely he is lacking in logic there. The logic of the increase of the British preference would be this, that those countries outside the preference, if they desired to trade with Canada, would have to lower their tariffs; and in such circumstances I presume we would be prepared to lower our tariffs in so far as they are concerned, and thus make a step towards the great star which guides the Liberal party.

But the platform of the Liberal party as announced to-day by the Prime Minister is not only a new policy of shaping legislation according to circumstances, but it includes also, as I have pointed out, the preference policy of increasing the British preference to 50 per cent of the general tariff. The Liberal party has been elected on that platform on three successive occasions. Now it appears that the Prime Minister is afraid to implement it for fear of what the United States may think or may do. But in any case I would defy the hon. member for Labelle to vote against our amendment to the amendment on the basis of the argument which he advances, and at the same time still hold to his view to vote for the policy of the present government.

Now, of course, I welcome the new policy of the Liberal party—if they will only adhere to it during the next election. But let them go to the west, for instance, and say: Now, Mr. Farmer, we don't know really what we will do if we are elected. We are going to fix up our next budget according to circumstances, and all the budgets of the next parliament will be so fixed. We don't know what the United States is going to do, we don't know what anybody is going to do; therefore we don't know what we are going to do. So if you elect us, what will happen? Why, we might have to raise our tariff in order to meet circumstances, or we might have to lower it, or leave it as it is, according as circumstances might dictate. That would be precisely what the government would do in so far as their action might be concerned. But would they go to the people on that policy? I venture to say they would not. But to me the policy means to-day either that the carefully worded clauses in the budget—worded I presume by the Minister of Finance—are intended as a veiled threat of retaliation to the United States, or else that the government will wait until the American fiddle plays and then dance to its tune. It means one of these two things so far as I am able to interpret the Prime Minister's speech and the budget itself.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me ask the hon. member for Labelle—I hope he will read my speech to-morrow in Hansard, because I have no doubt he will make another speech on the amendment—let me ask him, I say, to tell me what he advises under the circumstances. He makes the charge that such a policy as we advocate in the amendment to the amendment involves certain sentiment, that it is not business, that it was fathered by sentiment; and he suggests that we throw all sentiment overboard so far as policy is concerned. I agree with him in that regard. But I was wondering whether there was not a considerable amount of sentiment in his opposition to that subamendment. Are we the only people who are swayed by sentiment? Is the hon. member for Labelle absolutely void of it when he makes such a speech as he has made to-night against the amendment to the amendment? I do not wish to impute that to him, but at least it is suspicious; and if he is suspicious of our policy as being sentimental, we can at least return the possible suggestion of the same being the case with respect to himself. But let me assure the hon. gentleman that it is a matter of business with the western agriculturists; it is not a matter of sentiment. The western farmers have said again and again that they are not interested in the colour of the whiskers of any man with whom they do business; they do not care what part of the country he comes from or what country he lives in. They want to trade with him. That is not sentiment but business. But I want the hon. member for Labelle to tell us what we are going to do. The United States has shut us out of its market for farm produce. We do not wish to retaliate by asking this government to raise tariffs against that country. But at the same time we must find a market for our goods, and so we suggest that we lower the tariff to Great Britain, increasing their preference, and thereby probably finding a larger market for our produce. And it might be that such an action would have an effect upon the United States, in that if it desires to trade with Canada it might see fit not only to refrain from raising its tariff against us but to reduce it very materially. I hope therefore that if the hon. member for Labelle favours us to-morrow with another portion of his wisdom he will kindly go a little more into detail and prove not only to his own satisfaction but to the satisfaction of reasonable members of this house—and they would not be very many—that a reduction in the tariff to give a greater preference to Great Britain need not be construed as having no other meaning than an increase in tariffs.

On motion of Mr. Bock the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED BY MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to lay on the table copies in English and French of the annual report of the Canadian National railway system for the last calendar year. Copies of the report are being placed in the post office box of every member of the house.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURES

Mr. SPENCER:

What has been spent in the aggregate, by the immigration department from 1881 to 1928, inclusive?

Mr. FORKE: $51,618,024.96.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR—LAND BRANCHES

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. How many branches of the Department of the Interior deal with land, with the specific function in each case?

2. What is the total cost of each of these branches for the fiscal year 1927-28: (a) Ottawa service; (b) outside service?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. The different branches of the department handling the various phases of Dominion lands administration were consolidated in the Norlite building in March, 1928. Reorganization has progressed steadily and the Civil Service Commission recently concurred in the completed departmental reorganization.

Dominion lands administration, Ottawa service—Division—Functions—Commissioner's office—Dominion lands—Deals with all matters relating to land settlement.

Mining lands—Deals with matters relating to mining, petroleum and natural gas operations.

Timber and grazing—Deals with cutting of timber and grazing leases.

Land patents—Registrations and titles.

Ordnance, admirality and public lands—Deals with ordnance, admirality, railway and escheat lands, fur farming, fractional areas and townsites.

OTTAWA PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. What are the names of the persons or firms who acted for the government in the acquisition of the following properties: (a) Wellington street south and Sparks street north; (b) Elgin street east; (c) Sparks street south and Queen street north (Russell House block); (d) Bate building, Canal street; (e) Birkett building, Canal street; (f) Ottawa Transportation building, Canal street; (g) International Paper Company, Sussex street?

2. What commissions were paid in each case?

3. What price was paid by the government for each of the above properties?

4. What amount was paid by the government in connection with the adjustment of leases, rentals or other claims in respect of the above properties?

Mr. RINFRET:

1 and 2. (a) and (b) Messrs. T. Foley and C. W. Ross were appointed as agents to value and negotiate with the owners, adjustment of leases with the tenants and to act as witnesses in Exchequer court, and for these services they were paid the sum of $4,000 each. Services in connection with expropriation were paid as follows: F. B. Poucher, National Trust Company, $1,026.55; H. A. Richards, $650; Farley & Cassels, $190.75; H. L. Maley, $200. The following services were engaged by the Justice department and the following payments made: Raoul Mercier, legal services, $843.55; Tilley, Johnston, Thompson & Parmenter, legal services, $2,000; Green, Johnston & Strike, legal services, $1,512.98; W. Johnstone, legal services, no payment made to date; E. J. Daly, legal services, no payment made to date; Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth, Guilfoyle & Nash, accountants, $890.40.

(c) J. J. Leddy, A. B. McRostie, A. H. Fitzsimmons, W. E. Noffke, T. Foley and C. W. Ross were employed as real estate valuators and Harold Fisher, K.C., as counsel and legal adviser.

(d) In the case of the Bate building the lease expired on November 1, 1927, and was not renewed.

(e) The wharf lots leased to the Birkett company were cancellable on six months' notice; this notice was given by the department, effective from August 25, 1926. The Birkett warehouse lease had until 1942 to run, and contained no provision as to cancellation, as to which proceedings were taken by the Federal District Commission.

(f) The Ottawa Transportation Company held two "during pleasure" leases of property on Canal street. These were cancelled by notices, effective February 20, 1926.

(g) Engaged by Justice department: Greene, Johnston & Strike, legal services, no payment made to date; N. B. MacRostie, C.E., surveyor, $394.50.

3. (a) and (b) Ottawa Electric Company, $214,463.70; W. J. Irvine, $68,835.62; Bangs estate, no payment made to date, amount fixed by Exchequer court, $290,000 plus interest; Matthewman estate, no payment made to date, amount fixed by Exchequer court, $188,500 plus interest; (c) $1,270,831.01; (d) nil; (e) no payment yet; (f) nil; (g) Gatineau Company Limited, $525,000.

4. (a) and (b) $37,916.91; (c) $220; (d) nil; (e) nil to date; (f) nil; (g) nil.

HOUSE OF COMMONS EMPLOYEES

Mr. GEARY:

1. What number of men are employed on: (a) the elevator staff of the House of Commons; (b) the messenger staff of the House of Commons?

2. By whom are they appointed?

3. How many of these are returned soldiers?

4. What are the names of the returned soldiers?

5. How many men are temporarily employed in the House of Commons?

6. By whom are they appointed?

7. How many of them are returned soldiers?

8. What are the names of the returned soldiers?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. (a) 11; (b) 40.

2. Permanent employees appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Temporary employees appointed by His Honour the Speaker.

3. 10.

4. E. Carriere, O. Carriere, M. Sabourin, I. Trepannier, F. Fraser, E. Wittenberg, H. A. Charbonneau, A. Fairnie, W. H. Jones, L. Merriam.

5. 200—31st March, 1929.

6. By His Honour the Speaker.

7. 65.

8. C. L. Beck, G. H. Campbell, R. de la Durantaye, J. W. Gibson, W. H. Grant, H. R. Hamilton, H. A. Jarvis; R. W. Porteous, F. Aldridge, R. Alexander, E. C. Andrews, P. Banning, J. J. Barber, A. E. Hughes, J. Heaton, R. Hewitt, P. Janvenne, W. H. Jones, W. R. Little, J. Laundy, D. Madere, P. McDonald, J. McKenzie, J. McQuattie, A. L. Merriam, A. Nichol, D. O'Rourke, H. Rastrick, W. Rowley, W. Savage, J. E. Seabrook, G. St. Amand, H. Terry, R. Usher, D. Walker, H. J. Wells, A. Wheeler, J. C. Wilson, H. Gravel; J. L. Branback, H. Deledique, J. Emslie, A. Fairnie, J. Giroux, H. Levesque, L. H. Meade, A. McCracken, H. Rutledge, A. Reynolds, E. Tabor.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE—EMPLOYEES

Mr. SPENCER:

1. How many labourers are employed at Rideau Hall by the Public Works department?
2. What is the rate of pay per month?
3. How many have families dependent upon them?
4. How many years are they engaged temporarily before they are put on the permanent staff?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Twelve.
2. $84.44 a month.
3. No information.
4. These workmen are prevailing rate employees and as such are not permanent.

NATIONAL DEFENCE STATISTICS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What number of: (a) officers; (b) non-commissioned officers; (c) other ranks; of the Department of National Defence were employed at Ottawa for the years 1912-1913 and 1927-1928?
2. What number of officers of all ranks were in civil employment in said department at Ottawa for the same periods?
3. What was the total number of all ranks in the permanent force in the years 1912-13 and 1927-1928?
4. What was the extent of military units in the years 1912-1913 and 1927-1928, as to: (a) number of units; (b) total personnel of all ranks in said units; (c) any other duties devolving upon the military and civil staffs at Ottawa?

Mr. RALSTON: I would like to direct the attention of the hon. member for Bow River to question No. 4 (c). Either there is a misprint or something has gone wrong in transcribing the question, because it is difficult to understand. Question No. 4 asks the extent of military units in two periods, the number of units and the total personnel. Then paragraph (c) reads:

Any other duties devolving upon the military and civil staffs at Ottawa.

I would ask my hon. friend if he would drop paragraph (c) and put another question on the order paper.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As amended it carries.

Mr. RALSTON: It is a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Question stands.

IMMIGRATION EXPENDITURE

Mr. MANION:

1. How much was expended by the Department of Immigration in the British Isles in 1928 annual year?
2. How much was expended by the same department on the continent of Europe in the same year?

Mr. FORKE:

1. $1,016,202.99.
2. $ 75,796.67.

Mr. MANION:

How much money was spent by the Department of Immigration and Colonization for the obtaining of immigrants during 1928, in the following:

(a) United States; (b) Great Britain and Ireland; (c) on the continent of Europe?

Mr. FORKE:

(a) United States, $392,157.96; (b) Great Britain and Ireland, $1,016,202.99; (c) Continent of Europe, $13,557.62.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—OFFICES OF MEMBERS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. How many rooms are there in the House of Commons used as offices by members of parliament?
2. What are the names of members and the number of the rooms in each case?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CIVIL SERVICE—PREMIUMS ON EMPLOYEE'S SECURITY BONDS

Mr. FRASER:

1. How much of the consolidated revenue has been paid by each of the departments of the government as premiums on security bonds of its employees, in contravention of the Public Officers' Act (R.S., chap. 164, sec. 5)?

2. Does the government propose at the present session of parliament to amend chapter 164, section 5, of the revised statutes, as indicated by the Auditor General in his 1927-8 report, vol. 1, on page XIV?

CIVIL SERVICE—PROMOTION WITHIN DEPARTMENTS

Mr. POWER:

1. In cases of promotion within the departments, is it customary for the Civil Service Commission to hold examinations when a candidate has: received from the department the highest rating; (b) has had the longest term of service; (c) has been recommended for promotion by the commission's own board of examiners?

2. If such is the case, what period of time elapses between notice thereof to the applicants and the holding of such examination?

3. Since June, 1925, in how many cases, when all the elements favourable to an applicant as outlined in question No. 1 appear on the record, has the ordinary procedure been disregarded and examinations ordered?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all permits, correspondence, letters, telegrams, orders in council, and all other documents in relation to the issue of a permit to develop 50,000 horse-power at "Chat Falls" under the Navigable Waters Protection Act and a copy of the evidence on said hearing before the Minister of Public Works.

LOCH LOMOND POST OFFICE

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers and other documents with reference to the closing of the post office at Loch Lomond, Richmond county.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) has just tabled the report of the Canadian National railways. May I inquire whether the report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine will also be tabled at an early date?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yes.

WATER-POWERS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): On the 6th of March the house unanimously adopted a resolution regarding the administration of the water-powers in the three prairie provinces, which resolution calls for certain legislation. I wonder if the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) can inform the house whether such legislation is in process of preparation, and when we may expect it to be introduced.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Yes, it is in process of preparation, but we are finding it somewhat difficult to make it conform. We expect to bring it down within a few daws.

MONTREAL RAILWAY TERMINALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): May I ask when the report with regard to the Montreal terminals which has been laid upon the table of the house will be available in English and French for distribution?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I presume my hon. friend refers to the report of Mr. Palmer which was tabled a few weeks ago?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I just received the printed copies this morning, and they are available now.

Mr. CAHAN: Will they be distributed to members of the house?

Mr. DUNNING: I had not considered the question of general distribution. Perhaps it would be desirable to give them a general distribution. My hon. friends and any member who is interested can secure a copy now, at all events.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust I may secure several copies because Montreal is very much interested.

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to say that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), speaking last night in a very hysterical manner—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GOTT: Perhaps I had better quote his words.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot quote his manner.

Mr. GOTT: Speaking, shall I say, in a schoolboy and dramatic manner, made several references to some quotations that I had made, and used the words "gross exaggeration." I want to say to the hon. member for West Elgin—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GOTT: After quoting from the Border Cities Star—I hesitate to mention this, but nevertheless it concerns the honour of a member of the press gallery—the hon. member for West Elgin said that the Speaker did not congratulate me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. GOTT: Not a question of privilege when it concerns the honour of a member of the press gallery?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GOTT: I desire to read what the hon. member for West Elgin said:

> I do not know to whom to give credit for this publicity, whether to the hon. member for South Essex or to the reporter who signs himself E. C. Buchanan. If Ananias and Sapphira were to return from the grave I am sure they would rush up to a reporter with such a vivid imagination and grasping him by the hand would say, "Shake brother, shake!"

I had nothing to do with that newspaper report; I had nothing to do with the words of the speaker. But may I say that the Speaker not only congratulated but commended me.

Mr. SPEAKER: As Speaker of the house I must say that I know of no Ananias amongst my friends.

[Mr. Dunning.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEPBURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): Speaking to a question of privilege, I want to call the attention of the house to the fact that two very definite statements appeared in the Border Cities Star. One was to the effect that a special privilege was granted by you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott), in extending his time limit for speaking, a privilege previously refused to another hon. member who had asked for it. I maintain that that statement is unfair to you, sir, because I do not believe that you have ever shown favouritism to any member of this house. Following that up—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: I am simply claiming the same privilege that was exercised by the hon. member for South Essex. I want to read this very definite statement appearing in the Border Cities Star:

> When Mr. Gott sat down amidst the applause of his party and other members, Mr. Speaker Lemieux left his place and went over and congratulated him on making one of the best speeches of the session.

I do not think that ever in the history of this parliament has any Speaker left the chair to congratulate a member of the house, much less the hon. member for South Essex.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. W. G. BOCK (Maple Creek): In rising, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks in this debate I feel that the preceding speakers have so thoroughly covered and re-covered the most outstanding topics of general interest that it may be somewhat difficult for me to enlarge on many of them without being obliged to thresh considerable old straw. However, we have threshing machines out west —and I presume they may also be found in the east—which at times "throw over" a certain amount of grain when crowded, and occasionally it is possible to find a fair amount of grain in the straw stacks, especially if too much wind is used. I am in hopes, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be able to find among the many gigantic straw stacks which have been thrown up—I had almost said blown up—in the course of the threshing of the various problems in this debate, a few kernels of some value.

I wish in the first place to offer my congratulations to the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the splendid efforts they made. I was very much impressed by the graceful and assured manner of the member for Joliette, (Mr. Ferland) who made his maiden speech on that occasion. I mention this because I have not previously had an opportunity of voicing my sentiments.

Let me also congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The house is in such a happy mood that I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOCK: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington, who made so fine an effort in criticizing the budget. I am sure he must have raised the spirits of the opposition members several feet. No doubt they began to think that the policies of the Conservative party if implemented would further accelerate the steadily increasing prosperity; for even the most pessimistic members opposite must admit that the financial condition of the country is in a much stronger position than when the present administration took office in 1921. Calamity howling and blue ruin rumours are not so prevalent this year as in the past, because even the most rabid disciples of high tariff must realize how ridiculous their gospel would seem, when under this administration we find reductions in taxation and in tariff and a substantial increase in the surplus, all contained in the same budget.

Now, according to the philosophy of some very prominent members opposite, a condition of this kind should be an impossibility. For here we have a very remarkable performance by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). The other night the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) referred to him as a financial wizard, and quite rightly too, for it was a remarkable performance. He puts his tax and tariff reductions in a hat, makes a few passes with his financial wand, reaches in and pulls out a $69,000,000 net surplus, without damaging the old hat in the slightest, and on every hand we see evidences of prosperity. On a former occasion this financial wizard also performed a remarkable miracle. It will be remembered that he mixed some automobile industries with a reduction in tariff, at a time of unemployment, and in spite of the chorus of blue ruin which was hurled at him by our friends opposite, who cried "you'll ruin the hat" he "stood by his guns" and produced the finest specimen of industrial expansion; and incidentally the old hat was better than ever.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to grasp the alleged logic of tariffs, whether they went by the name of protection or were disguised sufficiently to be called industrial "safeguards", of which, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as geographical conditions warrant can so tactfully take advantage; for while in the eastern industrial centres he runs with his tariff cut-out wide open and talks of protection through a megaphone, when he returns to the wide open spaces west of the Great lakes he uses his muffler, retards his spark and in the cool shades of the evening he may be heard to murmur gently something about the safeguarding of our Canadian industries.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot permit the hon. gentleman, although it is his first speech in this house, to make such a misstatement. I made exactly the same observations in western Canada as I did in the east and I propose to do so in the future.

Mr. BOCK: Possibly the hon. leader of the opposition will forgive me for making a mistake, as I can forgive him his error in stating that this is my first speech in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The first time I have heard the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOCK: Speaking of prosperity, Mr. Speaker, we have the best country in the world—it is full of opportunities for those who will take advantage of them. To enumerate a few of the activities in which we are second to none, I might mention wheat exports, newsprint production and pulpwood resources, nickel and asbestos mines. Per capita we have the greatest hydro-power development of any country in the world; the greatest railroad mileage, most life insurance, largest cooperative societies and largest grain handling system. After listening to the inspiring and masterly address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, I am more than ever of the opinion that the prosperous condition of Canada to-day is largely due to the clear vision and outstanding statesmanship of the present great leader of the Liberal party. Why, a reverend gentleman, in this city in the course of his remarks last Sunday, touching on the prosperity of our country, stated that in his opinion in many cases to-day blue ruin propaganda is only the reflex of a bad digestion.

The speech of the hon. member for South Wellington was I presume the most outstanding speech that has emanated from the opposition benches for some time. Many of the hon. gentlemen opposite must have been speculating on what a bear of a speech a man of his ability might have made, had he been defending the budget rather than criticizing it. Of course it is plain to anyone who has read Hansard of March 7 that his chief concern was criticism of the government whether there was any justification for it or not. He made a great fuss about a so-called unfavourable trade balance between Canada and the United States; he neglected, however, to emphasize the fact that our total foreign trade shows a balance in our favour of $154,000,000.

This so-called unfavourable trade balance is stated by the hon. member for South Wellington to be around $333,000,000 which is a large sum indeed, and he submitted that something was seriously wrong in regard to our relations with the United States and stated that he believed we were buying too much from that country year in and year out. His statement that goods purchased must be paid for is correct, but he neglected to mention that to offset this adverse balance of $333,000,000 Canada carried on a trade with the United States which, although invisible in so far as government reports were concerned, should easily wipe out this unfavourable balance about which we have heard so much. I refer to the tourist traffic, which not only consists of the money spent in Canada by tourists for the necessities of life, such as board, lodging and so forth, but includes a large amount of exports to the United States which are not found in any customs record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOCK: I am not referring to what hon. gentlemen have in mind. I say that these particular exports I mention are not found in any customs record, for it is well known that the majority of American tourists returning carry with them at least a fair proportion of the amount of goods, to the value of $100, which each is allowed to take into the United States free. The Department of Railways and Canals, in bulletin No. 19 I believe, refers to this matter and estimates the amount of money spent in Canada by tourists in the year 1927 at approximately $300,000,000. Taking this one item from the speech of perhaps the most outstanding critic of the government, and showing both sides of the case, it is very apparent that conditions are not nearly so bad as the hon. gentleman tried to paint them.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) last Thursday night referred to the results of the tariff adjustments, implemented by the United States government in the year 1921-22, and which were supposed to be of great benefit to the American farmer. With the result of those adjustments we are all familiar, and I doubt very much whether the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) will be able to fool very many of the western Canadian farmers when he baits his hook with promises of safeguarding and protecting the agricultural interests. The Canadian farmer is not going to buy flowers for his own funeral, nor is he going to make dynamite with which to blow himself off the map; and if hon. gentlemen opposite have been franking a few tons of the March 7th Hansard to the prairies it is to be hoped that they started them west on the 1st of April, because in that case the farmers out there will realize that at least they have a sense of humour. Let me tell you that the farmers of western Canada have not forgotten the Crowsnest pass agreement, the Hudson Bay railway, second homesteads or reductions in duty on over 275 items which have been made since 1921, and which I think may be found in Hansard of 1928, pages 1360 to 1373.

With regard to the tariff, there is one little matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and that is with reference to the classification of harvester combines, which was mentioned recently by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher). This combine is a very expensive machine and it is becoming increasingly popular in western Canada. Of course, as many hon. gentlemen know, it is a combination of harvester and thresher, and a great many of these machines were in operation last fall in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. At present this machine comes into Canada under tariff item 447b, subject to a duty of 10 per cent. As harvesting machinery is subject to a duty of only 6 per cent under item 445, I think that in view of the fact that the life of this machine is very short, and that the price is quite high, the machine should be reclassified so as to come in under item 445, carrying a 6 per cent duty instead of 10 per cent. In view of the concern which my hon. friends opposite have expressed on behalf of the agricultural interests, I do not anticipate that they would raise serious objections to such action on the part of the government.

In referring to constructive legislation, I prefer to deal with a subject, outside the tariff, which I am better qualified to discuss, a subject of vital importance to the people of my constituency, the people of western Canada, and the people of the Dominion as a whole; because we are all component parts of one great whole, and anything that tends to injure one part must reflect to the detriment of all, and vice versa. The question of grain grading is and has been the main topic of conversation in the prairies since October last. When reports on car shipments of wheat came in from inspection points, in many cases it was found that the wheat was one to two grades lower than anticipated by the producers. In spite of the fact that the bulk of last year's crop was to a considerable extent injured by frost, it was nevertheless very apparent that there had been a tightening of grades by the inspectors, which resulted in widespread dissatisfaction and a feeling on the part of the producer that something was wrong with our system of inspection of grain. In consequence of this discontent, which had assumed alarming proportions, the Saskatchewan government appointed a commission to inquire into the whole matter and to endeavour to discover some means whereby this condition might be remedied. This commission has been devoting its best efforts to the study of the problem, and I am satisfied that it will be in a position to supply us with an interim report of its findings before this house prorogues, so that legislation may be framed to remedy some of the evils which at present exist. Many farm organizations have been giving considerable study to the problem and many resolutions have been passed by these bodies and referred to hon. members representing western constituencies.

Three remedies in particular have been suggested by various local lodges of the Saskatchewan section of the United Farmers of Canada, which asks that the Canada Grain Act be so amended as to prohibit the mixing of grain in all private as well as at present in public terminal elevators, and to establish the protein content as one of the basic factors to be given consideration in the grading of wheat. Other resolutions have come to hand from similar bodies asking that the Canada Grain Act be administered by the Department of Agriculture, rather than by the Department of Trade and Commerce, in view of the mass of evidence that has been made available both by the Saskatchewan commission and the committee on agriculture, I am inclined to think that this practice of mixing is more or less responsible for a great deal of the dissatisfaction at present existing.

The constituency of Maple Creek, which I have the honour to represent, comprises a large area which produces wheat of high protein content and naturally the producers are keenly interested in securing legislation which would recognize this quality as a factor in grading. Located as we are, immediately north of the Montana line, where the farmers of that state are able to secure premiums of 30 to 40 cents per bushel at times on the Minneapolis market for wheat showing a high percentage of protein, our farmers are naturally bound to be dissatisfied, as the Saskatchewan farmer in the southwest part of the province is growing exactly the same quality and variety of wheat, under the same climatic conditions as they are in Montana, and it is very hard to understand why the 49th parallel, which is only an imaginary line, should account for this disparity in values. These men are neighbours though living in different countries, and visit back and forward and discuss these matters.

I think it is generally conceded that the value of our wheat on both the domestic and foreign markets is determined largely by its baking strength, and baking strength is easily determined by checking up the quantity and quality of its protein. It should follow, then, that protein, gluten, or baking strength, which mean practically the same thing, should be given consideration in the fixing of grade standards so that the producer would be paid on the same basis as that which determines its value from the buyer's viewpoint.

In connection with the strength of wheat, or wheat with strong protein or gluten content, in the Financial Post of Toronto under date of March 1, I notice a reference by Professor James E. Boyle, who is professor of agricultural economics at Cornell university. This gentleman is considered a world authority on grain marketing problems, and in referring to the strength of wheat he says:

> . . . . to get both strength and colour in the flours in Europe, blending of wheats is required. The strong wheat, wheat with the strong gluten, makes flour, the dough of which will absorb much water. When the dough is baked much of this water remains in it. The baker finds it to his advantage to sell as much water in this way as he can, as long as the quality of his bread remains uniformly good and satisfactory to his customers. He aims to produce 380 pounds of bread from 280 pounds of flour, after adding the water, salt, yeast and so on. He can do this if he has strong gluten—otherwise he cannot.

I think it is a well known fact that Canadian and American millers take advantage of the fact that the protein content of wheat can be easily determined by chemical analysis; the millers continually make tests at inspection points and divert cars showing a high protein content to their own mills. This practice has been referred to by the trade as skimming, but from the standpoint of the farmers it might be classified as "skinning", since only on rare occasions is a premium received by the producer. This skimming or skinning might be compared to a man selling milk; in the process of delivery of the milk a third party takes the cream. So the consumer receives only skim milk, the man who takes the cream gets it at the price of skim milk and the producer receives only the skim milk price for both milk and cream. In other words the man who gets the skim milk is the man who sets the price, just as the old country buyer sets the price of wheat. Therefore it will be seen that this skimming is an expensive process from the farmer's view point.

The committee on agriculture devoted considerable time and study last session to this question of protein content and from the evidence submitted it was shown that the costs of making protein tests or the time required would not be serious obstacles in the way of giving protein a place as one of the factors in our grading regulations as far as carload lots were concerned. Street wheat, however, which probably constitutes 50 per cent of the volume handled, would involve difficulties which, however, I think, might be overcome. While the committee looked with favour on this matter, they deemed it advisable to secure more information and recommended that the national council on industrial and scientific research make further inquiries into the matter. I trust that when these requests are dealt with in committee there will be sufficient evidence submitted to warrant their adoption, and I hope this house may see fit so to amend the grain act as to give protein content the recognition it deserves.

In connection with the question of protein content, Mr. Speaker, I feel that a great deal of credit is due the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) for the time and energy he has devoted to the study of this important matter, and I sincerely trust that his efforts will bear fruit in the near future.

The question of mixing has been discussed at considerable length, but since the committee on agriculture no doubt will make an intensive study of this matter before the House adjourns and will hear considerable evidence both for and against this practice, I have no desire to enlarge on it at the present time. However, as I see it at present, I am strongly of the opinion that mixing is a practice which is of no benefit to the producer, more particularly when it makes possible the mixture of American soft wheats with our better varieties and permits them to go to the old country markets under Canadian Government certificates of grade.

In this connection I would refer to an editorial published in the Ottawa Journal of April 3, 1929. It comments on evidence taken before the royal commisison at Winnipeg, and reads as follows:

> The marketing of Canada's wheat crop, one of our greatest sources of wealth, is a matter so vital to the country's prosperity that it cannot be left to incompetent or haphazard methods. Yet, unless a great deal of evidence recently taken before a number of commissions is untrustworthy, that is the condition that exists. Take, as an illustration, this despatch that came over the wires the other day from Winnipeg:—
> "Canadian wheat, mixed with soft grain from the United States at Montreal, is being shipped out to world markets as Canadian government-inspected wheat, it was declared at to-day's session of the Royal Grain Commision here by James D. Fraser, chief government grain inspector. Mixing of western hard wheat with low-grade American grain is a common practice of the transfer houses in Montreal, the commissioners were informed, and Mr. Fraser thought this practice had been going on for a number of years, certainly since he was made department head in 1925.
> "That no authority for a mixture of Canadian and United States grain exists was admitted by the chief inspector, who added that there is nothing on the inspection certificate to show that the grain is a mixture.
> "Canadian grain passing through the United States to American ports also was being mixed with American, the witness thought. He contended these facts were the real reason why foreign millers had expressed dissatisfaction with the Canadian grain they had been receiving.
> "Nor was that all. A few days later a number of technical witnesses, testifying before this same commission, admitted that they did not know just upon what basis Canadian wheat was graded. They were the people supposed to be charged with that very important duty, yet they were unable to explain to the commission just how grading was arrived at."

The fact that such practice prevails is sufficient to give Canadian wheat a bad name in foreign markets, and now that the condition is known suitable steps must be taken not only to see that the practice of mixing shall not only be discontinued but that it shall be made impossible for such a condition of affairs to exist in future.

With regard to the hybrid ticket, which occasioned some controversy in this house, to my mind this question, while important, is not so vital as the question of mixing and grading. While I do not uphold the board in allowing this ticket to be used, we should not lose sight of the fact that the last threshing season was probably the most outstanding one in years with regard to uninterrupted fine weather, and grain was rushed to the railroads faster than ever before, owing to the more general use of the motor truck. Possibly the board had visions of the pool terminals blocked up and the private houses not operating up to capacity, and no doubt the question of congested terminals may have been a factor considered when allowing this innovation. I trust, Mr. Speaker, when the Hudson Bay railway is in operation we may provide that only public terminal elevators will be used at Fort Churchill, and that no mixing of grades will be allowed therein. This should give us a splendid opportunity of ascertaining the real value of our grain, as the attitude of old country buyers would be reflected in prices offered.

And speaking of Churchill I feel proud to associate myself with a government which has brought to realization a dream nurtured by the pioneers of Canada's great west for forty years. During the Easter recess I read with pleasure press despatches to the effect that the steel had entered Fort Churchill. Until the recent advent of the aeroplane, few Canadians or as a matter of fact few citizens of the world realized the untapped resources of mineral wealth which are now known to exist within reach of the Hudson Bay railway. With the enormous mining development which is taking place in Canada and the interest this development has awakened, it is realized now that instead of merely being an artery for the transportation of grain and other commodities to Europe by the northern route, the railway taps the vast precambrian shield, which is the repository of untold mineral wealth, and in addition opens up to commercial development large areas of pulpwood. Now that this road is nearing completion the insistence of its promoters is seen to be justified, and I look back with wonder at the sarcastic remarks of certain hon. members of this house who referred to the whole venture as a fantastic and impossible dream which could only end in adding to the country another burden of debt, and who damned this enterprise from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Speaking in all seriousness, it looks as if these disciples of despair—I almost said disciples of "damnation"—will be confounded, and the so-called gold brick, represented by the railway, will turn out to be twenty-four carat throughout.

On the way east recently I fell in with a young man who has been working for the Department of Railways during the past five years in the vicinity of Nelson and Churchill, and who had spent last winter at Churchill. What impressed me most, Mr. Speaker, was his great enthusiasm over the possibilities of that northern route, and it was very evident that his whole heart was bound up in the project. He seemed very anxious to hustle back with his steel workers and get on the job again. I have often heard it said that the government employees are inclined to loaf on the job, but it is evident that condition is not prevalent at Churchill. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) is to be congratulated not only on the aggressive manner in which he has been rushing this project through, but on his ability to select men of the proper calibre and who are able to measure up to jobs of those dimensions.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to refer to briefly, in connection with a request from Mr. Jack Miner of Kingsville, Ontario, for an annual contribution of $5,000 from the federal government to help him in providing feed for the birds taking refuge at his sanctuary. It appears to me that this matter should be considered from a national viewpoint, as the migratory bird life from all over the continent receives protection there. Provincial or boundary lines have no meaning to our wild fowl, and I am sure that Mr. Miner and his sanctuary at Kingsville have become national in prominence. It is not necessary for me to attempt to enlarge on the benefits that we as Canadians derive from an establishment of that kind, for while its value may not be estimated in dollars and cents, yet true lovers of nature realize the importance of protecting our bird life, and its educational and scientific value should be readily apparent. In view of the fact that the United States government in the Norbeck bill, which was passed last February, has set aside $8,000,000 for the establishment of similar sanctuaries over a ten-year period, I do not think that the Canadian government should hesitate over the comparatively small annual grant of $5,000 to provide food for our feathered friends. Of course there is the possibility that some hon. members opposite will take advantage of an opportunity to justify their accusation that this government is throwing money to the birds, because we have frequently heard that statement from across the floor of the house. Possibly the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) could support this expenditure. He so frequently talks about the government spending money like water or like drunken sailors when he is not eulogizing the late Sir Adam Beck and the Ontario Hydro-Electric, or worrying about some marine garage down at Halifax. He would be able honestly to add another phrase to his repertoire of critical expressions when referring to expenditures and conscientiously accuse this government of "throwing money to the birds."

Speaking of extravagance, Mr. Speaker, the members opposite criticize right and left the expenditures of the government. Many of them referred to the embassy at Washington and deplored the fact that this government had supplied our ambassador with a residence and offices in keeping with our national needs and dignity. One would almost have inferred from their remarks that our ambassador should have hired a room at the Y.M.C.A. or built a shack outside the city limits and used a second hand Ford by which to travel to and from his office.

As my time is rapidly slipping by, Mr. Speaker, I must hurry to a conclusion. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in his amendment regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for safeguarding and protecting the interests of those engaged in agricultural or industrial pursuits, but I am satisfied that the farmers of western Canada at least will have little faith in a policy which involves a protective tariff. While I cannot support his amendment, I must say that he has made it abundantly clear that, should the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) step into higher and wider fields of political activities, or should he be prematurely harvested by the grim reaper which we sincerely trust will not occur, hon. members opposite would not have far to seek for another Moses to lead them through the wilderness. I am sure that he could even outclass that famous leader of the children of Israel when it came to making bricks without straw.

With the subamendment of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) I have no quarrel, for I have always been in favour of greater freedom of trade within the British Empire and of further increasing the British preference. But as the policy of the government has been to develop and foster inter-imperial trade, and in view of the fact that consideration is being given to this matter at the present time, I consider these sufficient reasons for my not registering my vote for what is really a want of confidence motion.

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been a very interesting and instructive one. We have had the pleasure of hearing many excellent speakers, including the hon. acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), who delivered an address which brought forth eulogies from friend and foe alike. I do not intend to detain the house in repeating what has been said many times with regard to the items in the budget. The budget speaks for itself, and I am at a loss to understand just what benefit my province is to receive therefrom.

I would like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), delivered during the evening of April 8. I am sure the house has by this time digested the supposed facts which the hon. gentleman presented. I think it would be interesting to know just what his colleagues from Nova Scotia, the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), think of the statements made by the hon. member. My opinion is that this house has never before had placed before it such a large number of statements, all of which were alleged to be in accordance with the facts but none of which indicated the true state of affairs as shown by the records of the house. It would take quite a long time to deal with the various topics which he discussed, and I will refer only to one of them, the port of Halifax. The hon. member's words are:

> Let us compare the record of the Liberal party with regard to the port of Halifax with the record of the Conservative party. We do not hear anything about what was done for the port of Halifax between the years 1911 and 1921, the ten years during which our Conservative friends were in power. But what did they really do for that port? Practically nothing.

There is a supposed statement of fact, but what does Hansard show? It shows that during 1912, 1913 and 1914 the Conservative government spent $6,760,000 in the development of the port of Halifax. Why was that expenditure made? It was made to carry out, not only the terms of the British North America Act, but more particularly the conditions upon which the Transcontinental railway was built. Why was that railway built? To carry the traffic of Canada through Canadian ports.

That could not be done until the terminals were provided whereby the ships would find accommodation and the traffic could be handled. That was carrying out by the Liberal-Conservative government the terms upon which the Transcontinental railway was built. Had the Conservatives remained in power, the development would have been completed by this time and we would have had, instead of, I shall not say a paltry amount of business, many, many times the present business in the port of Halifax during the winter season and perhaps during the summer. This government has been in power since 1922; this is 1929, but it is only this year that they are beginning to handle any traffic through that port, and the amount is very small.

Mr. DUFF: Did my hon. friend say that $6,000,000 was spent by the Conservative government between 1911 and 1914?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I gave the amount as $6,760,000, as shown by the records.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend is mistaken. The amount was $16,000,000, which was wasted on the terminals, and not $6,000,000.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I will add that during the Liberal-Conservative regime there was in all $17,000,000 spent on facilities for handling Canadian traffic through Canadian ports.

Mr. DUFF: Money which was wasted. It will ruin the whole city.

Mr. QUINN: That will sound good down there.

Mr. DUFF: It cuts the whole city in two.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): My hon. friend says that it will ruin the whole city. Sir Robert Borden's government sent engineers to Halifax to report on the best location for terminals for the great Transcontinental railway. Those men visited Halifax and brought back their report. The terminals were located in accordance with their report, and on looking over the harbour, studying the depth of water and so on, although I was a sufferer personally because my property alongside those terminals is not as valuable as it would have been had the terminals not been put there, I believe the choice was the proper one and never before in the history of a government were plans made and carried out so advantageously as were the plans on which work was commenced in connection with those terminals. The plans were comprehensive and so laid out that as pier after pier was required because of the development of the traffic through that port, they could be added without any disturbance of traffic, buying of additional property, removal of buildings or anything of that kind. It was the most comprehensive and businesslike proposition that was ever put on paper by any government. It may be said; why were the terminals not put further north? I will not waste time going into that. Had the terminals, at the time that those plans were ready, been extended as some people contended they should have been, there would not have been a private wharf left in Halifax harbour. We have facilities for eight big wharves capable of accommodating twenty to thirty steamers at a time, and not a piece of private business property is interfered with. I might have added that in 1914 the work was considerably curtailed because of the war. But for the war I believe, as I said before, Halifax to-day would be enjoying a vast traffic which at the present time she is not receiving.

This free trade government, as is well known, is crippling the industries of the country. Many, perhaps all of the members are aware of interference with, crippling and closing up of industries in their constituencies or near thereto. In Halifax, having lost many industries because of the tariff policy of this government, we are now threatened with, I might almost say the destruction of another very important industry. I refer to the Acadia sugar refinery, located in Dartmouth, and I do not omit the Atlantic sugar refinery in St. John. These institutions employ many people, and the closing of them, if it takes place, will be a serious matter. For some time refined Cuban sugar has been entering the Dominion of Canada on favoured terms, greatly of course to the injury of those refineries which, under existing conditions, are not able to earn dividends for their shareholders. What will be the probable result if such conditions continue? In my judgment those industries will close because people do not as a rule employ their capital in industries which make no return to them. With the closing of those industries, what happens? Not only is a large body of our people thrown out of employment, but we lose the money that would be distributed in connection with the industries in handling the sugar and other materials that are brought in, storing them, and so on. Where will those people seek employment? Across the border in a foreign country. May I make a suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) that he soften his heart; that he confer with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), urging that some consideration be given to his fellow manufacturers, permitting them to enjoy some of the advantages of the protective tariff which he so extensively enjoys. What has built up the great nation to the south of us? It is the protection necessary to industries that keeps their people at home—the policy of America for the Americans, not America for the Canadians. The French do not leave their homes. Why? Because they find employment at home. Their industries, being protected, are in a position to thrive and grow and employ the people.

Our people have been hearing a great deal for some time past of the trade treaty made by this government with the West Indies. It would appear to me that the more treaties these gentlemen make, the deeper they get into the mire. Probably hon. gentlemen of this house, especially those from the prairie provinces, are not aware of the contribution which they make to the West Indies through this much discussed treaty. Take sugar, for instance. The quantity of sugar imported into the country is about 800,000,000 pounds, half of which comes from the British West Indies. On that 400,000,000 pounds coming from the West Indies the duty would be $4,000,000, but under the treaty a return of ninety per cent, or $3,600,000, is made to the West Indies interests. In other words, out of that $4,000,000 which is supposed to be collected on the importation of sugar from the West Indies, we return to the West Indies planters and growers $3,600,000, and yet nobody in this country is buying sugar any cheaper than had that sugar come from a foreign country. That $3,600,000 which is returned to the growers and planters of sugar in the West Indies represents, on a basis of 9,000,000 people in Canada, about 40 cents per head that we are contributing to the sugar producers in the West Indies. If Canada is willing to contribute the large sum of $3,600,000 to the British West Indies sugar industry, surely she has similar obligations to the home industries which are now suffering.

A great deal has also been said about butter. I wish to endorse what has been said as to the harmful effects on our farmers of the New Zealand treaty, and I would like to give the house a few figures on the importation of New Zealand butter. There has been landed during the three months of this year at one port alone in Canada, Halifax, 16,000,000 pounds of New Zealand butter, and in addition 100,000 carcasses of lamb and mutton and about 6,000 carcasses of beef. It is for the government to decide what effect their policy is having upon the struggling farmers of Canada. May we not ask, is Canada an agricultural country, and is this government striving to make it such?

[Mr. W. A. Black.]

We have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite of the prosperity throughout Canada. I am free to admit that Canada has been prosperous and is prosperous to-day in spots, but prosperity is not general. Whilst the banks and the large corporations no doubt show satisfactory returns and profits to their shareholders, prosperity is not general throughout this country. It is difficult to find a farmer who can show a profit, who can perhaps do more than enough to keep himself and his family alive and clothed.

The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) referred to the prosperity in Halifax and the money that is being spent there. I admit that Halifax is prosperous, although not wholly so. The waterfront of Halifax is very busy at the present time, and there is a large amount of money circulating from week to week amongst the labourers and longshoremen and those who work on the steamers entering the port. But on the other hand, if you talk with the workers of the welfare bureau, as I have done, you will find, and I have been told by these workers, that this winter is the worst that they have had for years. These welfare workers are not working among the labourers and longshoremen who are earning money on the waterfront, but in other sections of the city, and they say this is the worst year that they have had for many years past. One reason for the prosperity amongst the labourers on the waterfront is this: I admit at the outset that the British preference has had something to do with it, inasmuch as there is a certain amount of cargo being landed in the port of Halifax from Great Britain; but the tonnage which is entering the port of Halifax from week to week is coming there not because of any action on the part of this government, but because of the position Halifax occupies, a position not occupied by any other port on this side of the Atlantic. We have a magnificent harbour, and we are on the trade route between the American ports and the ports of Great Britain and Europe. What brings the ships there? Some are coming with the mails, as they always have done, and with passengers. The others come simply because these steamship lines are in competition, and when one line makes Halifax or any other port a port of call, its competitors do the same. The foreign boats entering the port—and we have some of the finest vessels of the Scandinavian Baltic-American, Hamburg-American and other lines calling—do not bring British goods; they come to land passengers and to continue in their business. So it is not due to any of the policies of this government that Halifax is so prosperous along the waterfront and has so much shipping coming and going. We have as a rule as many as seven large ships entering the port between Saturday night and Monday noon during the winter months, and, as I say, I believe one-half of the tonnage is foreign tonnage—not brought into Halifax because of any British preference or any action of the government, but by reason of the competition among the shipping companies.

The Liberal-Conservative party is charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with continually preaching blue ruin, depression, unemployment, and always singing "hard times." Let me say to these hon. gentlemen that had the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party been followed by them Canada to-day would be enjoying far greater general prosperity than now prevails. It is not the Liberal-Conservative party alone which is said to be "whining," and in confirmation of this let me quote what leaders of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia are saying. In the Nova Scotia Legislature which is at present in session, and in which the Liberals are on the left of the Speaker, there has been on their part a good deal of wailing over bad business conditions in the province. They have been demanding what they describe as "an economic commission" to ascertain, as they say, "what is wrong with Nova Scotia and its business affairs."

One of the Liberal members, Mr. Wishart Robertson, who represents Shelburne county —and Shelburne county is a part of the federal district represented by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston)—drew a very dark picture of the financial and economic conditions as between the central provinces and Nova Scotia. Here is what he said, among other things, and it is taken from a verbatim report which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle of March 2, 1929:

> Duties and taxes paid to the Dominion are entirely out of proportion with what we receive in any form of benefits, and we must find out more details before finding a suitable end to our problems.

Again, referring to the number of new automobiles and trucks in Nova Scotia and their cost, Mr. Robertson claimed that on an average these were costing the people of the province more than the same article cost in the United States, and then he concluded with this assertion, which I am also quoting from the Halifax Chronicle, the leading Liberal paper in the province. He said:

> We in Nova Scotia in that one item alone contributed $1,926,000 in excess of what we should have paid as our contribution to the maintenance and success of the industrial structure of central Canada.

Mr. Robertson went on to refer to the refusal of the Dominion government to provide protection for the steel industry of Nova Scotia, and said:

> When the Dominion Iron and Steel Company sought protection at Ottawa, its opposition, in part, consisted of an argument that such protection would increase the cost of producing automobiles to the extent of $1.45 each.

These gentlemen, I repeat, are demanding what they describe as an "economic commission" to ascertain, as they say, "what is wrong with Nova Scotia and its business." Mr. Robertson continued:

> We are asked to contribute from our meagre resources towards the maintenance of the financial and industrial structure of central Canada, yet so soon as they are asked to contribute to assist our industry, we are told it is not sound business, that we should go to the markets of the world.
> We are contributing from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 each year as a constant stream because of our economic handicap, and now is the time to take some action to inquire into the causes and remedies.

Another of the Liberal members of the legislature, who spent over three hours in an attempt to show that Nova Scotia is going to the dogs, is Mr. A. S. MacMillan, who was a member of the Armstrong government which was defeated in 1925, and who is not bashful in stating that he expects to be a member of any future Liberal government in the province. He represents Digby county. He takes a very gloomy view of two of the fundamental industries of the province, namely, agriculture and lumbering.

Mr. BENNETT: But contracting is bright with him.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Robertson was in a very despairing mood in regard to the great steel industry of the province, and when he and his colleague, Mr. MacMillan, unite in describing the steel industry, the farming industry and the mining industry as not making any progress, their views are in striking contrast with those of hon. gentlemen in the federal government who declare that Nova Scotia is humming with prosperity. This is what Mr. MacMillan said:

> The farmers of Nova Scotia were not prospering. Fifty per cent were sliding back each year, twenty-five per cent were holding their ground, and twenty-five per cent, favourably situated were making a little progress.

Those are the words of Mr. MacMillan, a member of the legislature of Nova Scotia, and an aspirant to the provincial leadership of the Liberal party. There seems to be keen rivalry as to who should be the leader. This gentleman was a member of the late Armstrong government, whose financial characteristics were a surprise to the whole province, in fact to the Dominion, falsified accounts having been presented showing a shortage of a few thousand dollars when in fact there was a deficit of several millions. Then in regard to the lumbering industry what does Mr. MacMillan say? He dismisses it with a few words, as follows:

The lumbering industry is suffering from heavy depression and the people of the province did not know the policy of the present government with regard to the forest wealth. It was time for a show-down on this matter.

The Halifax Chronicle, for many years the leading Liberal newspaper of Nova Scotia, vigorously backs up the Liberal members in the legislature in their determination to show that Nova Scotia is staggering along under almost desperate industrial and economic conditions. It has been commending, I say, the stand taken by those Liberal members. Another text has been supplied by the report of the commissioner on old age pensions, whom the Rhodes government appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the probable cost to the province, if adopted, of the Dominion government system of old age pensions. We find the Chronicle making this startling remark:

The result of the investigation shows the prevailing economic condition to be immeasurably worse than even the best informed had ever dreamed.

In another place, following the lead of Mr. Robertson, the Chronicle has a slap at the central provinces in this language:

She—

Meaning Nova Scotia.

—is contributing annually vast sums for the upbuilding of the economic fabric of central Canada, without any commensurate return to herself. It leaves her yearly more impoverished than she was before.

Further on the Chronicle emphasizes Mr. Robertson's complaint about the steel industry and the argument with which the Dominion government met the request for protection of the steel industry of Nova Scotia, and the Chronicle remarks that when demand was made for aid to the steel industry:

It was met with the argument that it would increase the price of the automobile by $1.45 each. Just imagine it.

And still further on the Chronicle speaks about the need for action on behalf of Nova Scotia to—remedy the disastrous economic condition into which it has fallen.

On another day during the present month the same leading newspaper refers to a report of the Halifax county council to the effect that it has discovered reasons for believing that Nova Scotia is in a terribly bad way. This is the blue ruin statement which the Chronicle makes on the subject.

The reports just made to the county council do not tell a happy story so far as the county is concerned. Instead of an increase in assessment values, there is an actual decrease, and a decrease in a single year amounting to $61,000. This is anything but reassuring. It indicates that the country section of the metropolitan county of Halifax is sliding backward. The reasons given in the council for the fall in assessment values were mainly that people had moved away and the assessment values of the property had dropped.

The Chronicle moralizes in this language:

With people moving away and with idle property the state of Halifax county conjures up the pension commissioner's report on Hants, where he found things going to the dogs.

This leading Nova Scotia Liberal paper finds further reason, as late as the 9th of March of this year, to add to its lamentations in regard to the desperate condition of the province. It would appear that the commissioner who was sent out by the Rhodes government to examine into the possible cost of old age pensions in Nova Scotia, found, as might be expected, that a great many of the younger people had left the province, and that in large part the country districts were inhabited by older people. This is how the Chronicle viewed the situation:

He did not know that economic conditions were bad. He had not the remotest idea that they had reached such an intolerable situation as this. If only one out of every five have any assurance of being able to provide for old age, then it is little wonder that the boys and girls are leaving this province in their earning years.

In another place on the same day the Chronicle emphasizes its despair on the subject in these words:

There are not many factories in the east. There are a few in Nova Scotia. Factories want young men in them. When a man begins to go over 40, hard sledding starts for many of them. If for the next thirty years of his life he has trouble to get work and pay and save, what is he to do when he gets to 70? The commissioner's report goes to show that in our basic industries—agriculture, lumbering, fishing, etc.,—something is fundamentally out of joint, because it is in these occupations where our poor people must be largely found.

If these, and such other lamentations, are really true, and the representatives of Liberalism in the Nova Scotia legislature and this leading Liberal newspaper in the province aver that they are true, what are we to think and say when we find members of the federal cabinet, even from the province of Nova Scotia, declaring that the whole of the province of Nova Scotia was never before in such a period of widespread prosperity?

Still further, I picked up another Liberal paper, the oldest in Halifax, the Acadian Recorder, and this is what I find. An advertisement of the city collector's office, dated Halifax, March 1, 1929, stating that fourteen properties would be offered for sale at auction on April 2 for unpaid taxes. No work, no money to pay taxes.

My time is about up, although I should like to say a word or two further with regard to the province. There is one matter that vitally interests Nova Scotia, and I will say this, that the people of that province will never be satisfied until their demand is granted. I refer to the entry of the Canadian Pacific Railway into the province. Every province of the Dominion enjoys the advantages of that company's enterprise; why should Nova Scotia stand alone, deprived of that which all other provinces enjoy? At this date not a yard of transcontinental railway has been constructed in Nova Scotia. Surely, in view of our large contributions to railways and canals all over Canada, we are entitled to consideration.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Up to two or three hours ago it had not been my intention to take part in this debate, but a very recent resolution passed in the legislature of Quebec has been brought to my attention, and it is in that connection that I should like to engage the attention of the house for just a few moments. I wish at once to allay the fears of hon. members if they have any idea that I intend to try to interfere with the vote which we are all contemplating this afternoon.

I am glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in his place, and I should like to prelude my remarks by a reference to his speech on April 8, quoting from Hansard at page 1335, where he referred to the economic conference which sat in Geneva on May 4, 1927. He referred to the fact that certain representatives from the United States had taken part in that conference, and also certain representatives from Canada. He pointed out that the conference had divided itself into committees, the three main committees being on agriculture, commerce and industry; and it is in connection with agriculture that I wish to engage the attention of the house. At page 1335-6 of Hansard we find the following paragraphs quoted from the report:

> In view of the fact that harmful effects upon production and trade result from the high and constantly changing tariffs which are applied in many countries;
> And in view of the fact that some of the causes which have resulted in the increase of tariffs and in other trade barriers since the war have largely disappeared and others are diminishing;
> The conference declares that the time has come to put an end to the increase in tariffs and to move in the opposite direction.

Lower down on the same page we find this paragraph:

> It is desirable that all hindrances to the free circulation of and trade in agricultural products should be removed, in so far as their removal does not endanger the vital interests of the different countries and their workers.
> In those states in which customs protection is maintained, it should be reduced, both for industry and agriculture, to the lowest possible point indispensable to production.

The final recommendation is:

> That the governments and peoples of the countries here represented should together give continuous attention to this aspect of the economic problem, and looks forward to the establishment of recognized principles designed to eliminate those economic difficulties which cause friction and misunderstanding in a world which has everything to gain from peaceful and harmonious progress.

I take it for granted that the Minister of Justice, in giving these quotations, approved of them himself. While he was speaking he did not venture to suggest that any country in the world had implemented these suggestions by legislation, with the exception of Canada, and Canada's part in implementing them is so infinitesimal that I should think it would afford vain glory to the Minister of Justice, because we have been told during this debate that from 1921 to the present time the Liberal government has not reduced the tariff by even one per cent. Now we are awaiting the action of congress which is to meet on the 15th of this month; we all know perfectly well that during this session the United States tariff dealing with agricultural products will certainly be raised, so we see that there is not the slightest tendency on the part of the nations of the world to implement the recommendations quoted by the Minister of Justice.

Before coming to the resolution to which I have referred it might not be amiss to place on Hansard some of the recommendations made by the National Dairy Council of Canada to the Prime Minister and five or six other members of the cabinet on November 29, 1927. These recommendations were presented by Mr. Alex. Smith, solicitor for the council, and in part were as follows:

> To the Right Honourable the President and other members of the Privy Council.
> The National Dairy Council of Canada desires respectfully to present some observations and requests on the Australian trade agreement.
> 1. That on the 27th day of June, 1925, the Australian trade agreement act received Royal

Assent and by order in council was made applicable on and after the first day of October, 1925;

2. That the said trade agreement is subject to the Canadian Customs Tariff 1907;

3. That the producers of butter in Australia have what is known as the Paterson scheme, whereby they pool all their product and pay three cents to the pool on each pound of butter produced. The pool paying to the exporter six cents a pound on all butter exported. This common fund is to encourage and enlarge the export trade;

4. That the effect of the Paterson scheme is to render Australian butter subject to dumping duty. This duty is in the first clause of section 6 of the Customs Tariff 1907, defined as follows:—

I need not trouble the house with the next part, but the recommendations proceed:

6. That previous to October 1, 1925, the duty on Australian butter was four cents per pound;

7. That the order in council applying schedule 2 of the Australian trade agreement to New Zealand enables New Zealand to export butter into Canada on payment of customs in Canada of one cent a pound, instead of the British preference rate of three cents a pound;

8. That the Canadian customs tariff 1907, at present provides duties on butter as follows: British preferential 3 cents per pound, Intermediate tariff 4 cents, general tariff 4 cents, and (as per treaty) Australian and New Zealand, one cent;

12. That in consequence of the Australian trade agreement the dairy industry of Canada suffers.

13. At the annual meeting of the National Dairy Council of Canada, held in the city of Toronto the 21st and 22nd of November, 1927, the effect of the Australian treaty agreement and its extension to New Zealand was fully discussed by the members of the said council.

The result of these deliberations was that the executive committee was unanimously instructed to make representations to the government along certain lines.

The executive therefore respectfully requests as follows:—

1. That the order in council applying schedule 2 of the Australian trade agreement to New Zealand be rescinded at once;

2. That the dumping clause be immediately applied on all butter sent from Australia to Canada on consignment as well as on direct sale;

3. That the Australian trade agreement be terminated as provided in the Australian Trade Agreement Act 1925.

The concluding recommendation is as follows:

We trust that our petition, which is backed by every important dairy producing organization in Canada, will be given early and sympathetic consideration by the government, so that our own dairying industry may flourish and be able to participate in the profits that will accrue from the splendid industrial development that seems to be ahead of us.

We have the government faced with this recommendation and with the contemplated action of the United States, yet the Minister of Justice suggests to the house that we should have lower duties. I would like to find out whether or not he is familiar with what the legislature of his own province has been doing. I hold in my hand a copy of the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec dated Wednesday, March 27, 1929, in which I find the following:

Mr. Sauvé moved:

That in view of the fact that it is necessary (a) to take all reasonable means to protect agriculture; (b) to secure for farmers markets where they can obtain better prices and prices more in proportion with the cost of production; (c) to encourage inasmuch as possible the best methods of cultivation, particularly market gardening and the canning industry, as well as the best methods of classification; (d) to make the subsidies granted to agricultural enterprises more profitable and to secure for our province greater prosperity in general;

This house invites the government to use its influence so that our produce may be sufficiently protected against competition coming from countries having a better climate than ours.

Before that resolution was put, the Premier of Quebec had something to say upon it. I took the trouble to secure a Quebec paper, the Chronicle-Telegraph of March 25, in which the Premier of Quebec is quoted as follows:

Premier Taschereau admitted this would be a very good motion but it was not the time to bring it forward because if adopted it would cancel the motion to go into supply. However he would withdraw his motion to go into supply if the leader of the opposition would make a regular motion of his amendment. The premier expressed the opinion that it was the best proposal the leader had ever introduced in the house.

With that the motion was put; I understand that the Quebec legislature is composed of eighty-five members, and with about fifty members present this resolution was carried unanimously. Not only was that the case, but the premier himself was so anxious to have it dealt with that he withdrew his motion to go into supply in order to permit this resolution to be proceeded with, and as I have said it was carried unanimously. This action was taken by the legislature of the province of Quebec, yet we find the Minister of Justice, coming from that province, advocating in this house a proposal absolutely in opposition to the unanimous proposition of his own province.

I am glad to see that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are in their seats, and I would like to ask them three questions. First, is the government aware of this resolution; second, have appropriate representations been made to them by the government of Quebec; third, what, if anything, does the government intend to do to give effect to the unanimous request of the legislature of Quebec? I would be only too glad now to yield the floor to either of the hon. gentlemen if they see fit to answer these questions or any one of them, and I wonder if the Minister of Justice would accommodate me to the extent of answering this question: Have representations been made to the government by the province of Quebec?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know of any, but if my hon. friend wants me to finish my speech, which I could not conclude the other day because of the forty-minute rule, I am quite willing to do so, but I will make my speech in my own way.

Mr. BOYS: I do not suppose the Minister of Justice could conclude in another forty minutes, so it would not do much good to give him thirty minutes now. I take it for granted, since the Minister of Justice says he knows of no such representations from the government of Quebec, that these representations have not been made, because I am quite confident the minister would have heard of them otherwise. Let us hope that they will be made, but whether or not that is done there is the resolution; we find the great province of Quebec, which undoubtedly is a protective province, agreeing with the Conservative party and with the Dairy Council of Canada in this connection.

While I am on my feet I want to make an observation with regard to our farming communities. I have listened to a good many speeches with regard to farmers and to labour generally and I have also listened to a good many speeches with regard to prosperity in Canada. By nature I do not think I am pessimistic; I think I am inclined to be optimistic and I do not want to preach blue ruin. At the same time, however, I do not want to be optimistic without reason. Having practised law in my county for over thirty-five years, I speak with some knowledge when I say that I have never known the farming community in my county to be as hard up as they have been during this last season, and I doubt very much if the conditions which prevail there, are any different from those prevailing in other counties in Ontario. There has been great difficulty in the payment of principal and interest upon farm mortgages, and the farmers of Ontario have had a very hard time during the last two years. In many cases they have not been able to make both ends meet, and in other cases they have been unable to pay their obligations. I do not believe there is a member of the house representing a rural riding in the province of Ontario who will contradict my statements. I do not attempt to speak for the west or for Quebec, because I do not know of the conditions prevailing there. The county of Simcoe is one of the best counties in Ontario, but the conditions there, so far as prosperity is concerned, are no different from the conditions which prevail in other counties. We all know how important the farming industry is to the country, and I regret to say that from their standpoint there is no prosperity at the present time.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has taken his seat in the house. No doubt he has heard of the resolution which has been passed by the legislature of Quebec, but if not I ask that he do me the honour of reading it in Hansard to-morrow. I am curious to see how he can maintain the position which he proclaims in the house, and at the same time keep in harmony with the views of the members of the legislature of his own province.

Mr. LESLIE G. BELL (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add a great deal to the remarks of the many speakers who have preceded me, but to put hon. gentlemen opposite in good humour, I take this occasion to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the very able address which he presented to this house yesterday afternoon. I do not know that I have ever seen the Prime Minister in better fettle, and I am sure that all of us who sit on this side of the house appreciated the fact that he handled his subject matter in a very admirable way. I only wish that he could in a like manner be congratulated by us upon the principles underlying the subject matter of his speech.

The most notable feature of this budget debate, as pointed out by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), is that we find our hon. friends opposite strong in their advocacy of a low tariff policy. We on this side of the house have listened to them in previous years when the policy of the Liberal party was that of free trade, tariff for revenue and freer trade, but to-day we find that the flag under which they are sailing is the flag of a low tariff. It is rather strange to find hon. gentlemen opposite criticizing the members on this side of the house flying a flag other than that of protection. They may find it a hard problem to solve, but it is much more difficult for us on this side of the house to discover which flag they are flying, especially with regard to their tariff policy. It has always been a question of expediency with them, and particularly so at this session.

I think they must admit that the articles covered in the proposed tariff changes are very minor ones. I am sure the Conservative party would be just as willing as they to give encouragement to the mining industry by means of a reduction of the tariff as it applies to mining machinery.

But they seem unable to formulate a tariff policy for the Dominion of Canada. Why? Because they are waiting to see just what action will be taken by our neighbours to the south. That is not the policy of the Conservative party. We do not wait to see what foreigners will do with regard to their tariff policies; we do not legislate against foreigners or their tariff policies, but we do endeavour to formulate policies for the people of our own country. Speaking for myself, and I am sure for other Conservative members, I can only say that we intend always to have our tariff formulated under the word "protection." The protectionist policy of the United States has stood them in good stead. The United States is a very prosperous country and has grown steadily under the protectionist flag. The latest general election in the United States resulted in the president being endorsed by the people in all sections of that country, and he preached but one policy, the policy of protection. The candidate of the Democratic party came out openly for the first time in the history of the United States and stated that protection was going to be the policy of his party. Our hon. friends come to us to tell us that the word "protection" forms no part of their political creed, and they chide us for trying to get away from the protective principle. I am a protectionist, but I am not a "spotty" protectionist. I do not stand for protection in one section of the country and then advocate free trade in another. I believe in protection for western Canada as well as protection for eastern Canada. The policy of the Conservative party has always been, despite what the hon. members opposite may say, a policy of protection throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

The protectionist policy is not a hard one to understand. Our hon. friends believe in the principle of importing into Canada goods which have been made by foreign manufacturers. They believe in taking goods, whether they are manufactured in Germany, or in free trade England, or in the United States, or in whatever country they may choose, and as long as they can get those goods delivered in Canada and given to the consumer, as they state, cheap, then they believe in that policy. We on this side of the house do not believe in such a policy. No matter how cheaply goods made by foreign manufacturers and workmen can be sold in Canada, I believe the Canadian workman, although he is able to secure those goods at one cent or two or five cents cheaper, is the person who loses in the long run, and I make no exception with respect to the machinery referred to in the budget, because I have enough faith in Canadian workmen and Canadian manufacturers to believe Canada can make just as good mining machinery in this country as can be made in the United States.

Let us take a concrete example: Suppose a man working in a furniture factory buys a chair made in the United States and delivered in Canada for fifty cents less than one made in Canada, who suffers? The workman is the man who suffers. Why? If he is unemployed for a day, even if he can walk into a store and buy a chair made by foreign labour fifty cents cheaper than one made in Canada, how much does he lose on account of that one day's unemployment? How much does his family lose? The question is only a simple one of economics. Not only does it involve the larger question of opening factories in the United States or in any other country, or the question of giving employment to the people in that foreign country, but it comes right back to our own homes, our own firesides, our own unemployment situation. When the government has faith enough in Canada to realize that we can establish factories in Canada to manufacture our own goods with Canadian workmen; when, instead of sending to the United States for safety lanterns made by a foreign workmen—as they propose to do under the present budget—it finds that we can manufacture those same miners' safety lanterns by Canadian labour, thus giving employment to our own people, and that it is better for our own mining concerns to use our own safety lanterns, it will be coming into line with what is known as the Conservative doctrine of protection.

The great republic to the south of us is accustomed to ascribe its liberties and economic development to their Declaration of Independence. That is only partly true. It is true that under the declaration of independence the people of the United States, achieved liberty, but one thing which I think established more than anything else the greatness of the United States of America was when Madison, a young man, was appointed secretary of that country at thirty-two years of age and drafted the first protective tariff law. We talk about national status and last year we had a division on the question of national status. Is Canada a nation to-day? Have we the fundamentals which make for national life? If we have, times have changed. In the war of 1812 the United States learned for the first time that they were not a nation. Why? Because they could not make up their national life within their own borders; they were dependent upon England and other foreign countries. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day quoted some prominent English free traders, what they believed in and their policy regarding England. Let me for a minute quote what Lord Lyndhurst said in 1838 regarding the United States of America:

> The United States of America was always considered our own special market. "The extent and swift, regular progress of the American market for English goods," said Henry (afterward Lord Brougham) in 1813, "we can easily account for . . . . America is an immense agricultural country, where land is plentiful and cheap; men and labour, though quickly increasing, are yet still scarce and dear when compared with the boundless regions which they occupy and cultivate. In such a country manufactures do not naturally thrive; every exertion, if matters be left to themselves, goes into other channels. This people is connected with England by origin, language, manners, and institutions; their tastes go along with their convenience, and they come to us, as a matter of course, for the articles they do not make themselves."

What do we find? We find the United States of America with their ports blockaded first by England during the war with France, and then by France. Where could they get their merchandise? They discovered that they were solely dependent upon other foreign nations. To explain that, I will read another short section:

> What did we discover in our war of 1812 but that we had nothing to equip the war? Having no woollen manufacture, we could not clothe our soldiers: we could not even make a blanket. We had been free traders, buying all such things because we could buy them cheaper; but we now discovered that we might better have been making blankets at double the cost for the last fifty years. The same was true of saltpetre for gunpowder, of guns and canon and swords, and iron and steel out of which to make them. . . . We also began to discover that the very insignificant article of salt, coming short in the supply, was nearly a dead necessity, one of the munitions of war, and that manufacturing it for ourselves at double the cost would have been a true advantage. . . . We very soon discovered in the facts referred to the lowness of our organization, and the very incomplete scope of our industrial equipments. Our products were not various enough to make a complete nation.

This is what one Englishman said regarding the crop of the United States at this very period:

> On the breaking out of the war the crops of the United States would be devoured by vermin because there was not enough skill in America to make a mousetrap.

One of the fundamental things which we have to bear in mind when we are endeavouring to make a nation is to take account of Canadian workmanship. Are we building up our factories? Are we making the necessary strides in manufacturing so that when we get into trouble with any foreign nation our workmen will be so well equipped that they will have at hand the articles we require and we may not be dependent upon foreign nations? I would stress that point to hon. members opposite. When you have cheap goods, which my hon. friends opposite are always talking about, you have cheap labour and a cheap policy. What we want to have in Canada is a policy whereby the Canadian workman will be supported just as much as the foreign workman—in fact, the Canadian workman first, the foreigner comes next. Like the Americans discovered they must become more Americanized, we must discover, sooner or later, we have to become more Canadianized. Would any man with common sense argue in this house that Canadians can compete with the cheap labour of China or Japan, or of England and other countries where labourers are paid only from one-half to one-third the wages that Canadian labour receives? Are we going to bring Canadian labour down to the standards of living in the Orient? The United States of America year by year are enlarging their factories, increasing their production, equipping their shops with more efficient machinery, and engaging in mass production to a greater extent than ever before. How can we expect that Canada, which comparatively speaking is only a young country, can compete with the manufacturing industry in the United States, a country sixteen times as large? Is there any common sense in expecting us to be able to do it? Yet the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to put Canadian industry on an equal basis with that of the United States, to allow our smaller factories to be subject to competition with the huge factories across the line, and to expect them to pay the same wages that are paid to American workmen and to produce goods at the same cost.

I do not wish in any way to belittle the great industry of agriculture, because it is one of our basic industries. But surely the farmer must realize that when he buys machinery or farm implements made in other countries he is buying articles of foreign manufacture, and that that is an unpatriotic move so far as Canada is concerned. When will he come to realize that the cheapness he demands is not calculated to build up the factories of the east and provide for the population that is coming in? When will he realize that in this country we are crying for immigrants? We are having immigration committees inquire into the question why immigrants are not coming into Canada in greater numbers. If we feel that something is wrong we have only to turn our eyes southwards, where under protection the factories of the neighbouring republic are booming, and thousands of Canadians are going thence to seek work. Our hon. friends opposite accuse us of always talking blue ruin and of decrying the principles which make for the upbuilding of a country. I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that we are far from being blue ruinists. We believe in a policy which has built up another nation, and into whose markets we are now clamoring for admission. We believe in looking into the past and learning from it, and following those same principles which have built up the neighbouring republic. We are not blind to what is going on round about us. It is only a matter of common sense to determine what the future policy of this country should be.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are now waiting to find out what the United States are going to do at the next session of congress. Why wait to see what they are going to do? Why not put into force in this country now a tariff which will provide work for Canadian workmen, build up our own factories, and make this young country a prosperous nation? When hon. gentlemen opposite have waited and have seen what the United States is going to do, are they going to come back to the House of Commons next session and say: We cannot do anything with regard to the tariff this year because we are waiting to see what Germany is going to do? And the following year they may be waiting to see what France is going to do. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the tariff policy of the Liberal party is to make a tariff against a foreign country, while the policy of the Conservative party is to make a tariff, not against any foreign country, but for the benefit of Canada.

The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) emphasized the word "retaliation" in connection with the tariff. He said: Our friends opposite are urging that we retaliate. Where in the world did he ever hear us use that word? The word "retaliation" has nothing whatever to do with the policy of the Conservative party. It is quite unnecessary; our tariff policy is not one which calls for retaliation against any foreign country. We make our tariff policy on the same principle on which the United States make theirs, and retaliation does not enter into it at all. It is my hon. friend himself who has interjected that word into the discussion. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke of what the United States had agreed to at Geneva. But congress says, No, the protective principle is good enough for us; it has stood us in good stead and we will stick to it. Is there anything wrong in that? A protective policy which has been good enough for the United States in all these years of prosperity which it has enjoyed should certainly be good enough for a few more years to come. When congress meets and decides upon its tariff policy—and their ways and means committee is meeting to-day and discussing means of building up their own manufacturing, agricultural and mining industries —is there any reason why we, who are a foreign country to them, should exercise the threat of retaliation? The idea is ridiculous. These retaliatory measures which our friends opposite apparently intend to follow are the very measures which lead to international complications. Retaliation is a policy which should form no part of our national life, living as we do side by side with a friendly nation. We are supposed to be the binding link between the English-speaking nations of the world. We are a small nation with a great responsibility when we assume that role but I hope that we shall always be capable of that responsibility. We shall never maintain it, however, if my hon. friends opposite have nothing to offer to this country but a policy which calls for retaliation, and which seems a direct threat against the United States. My hon. friend from West Elgin mentioned nothing which would justify his charging hon. gentlemen on this side with being advocates of retaliation, because there is nothing in our policy, and especially in our tariff policy to suggest it.

What have we been buying from the United States? What have been our trade relations with them? Why are we on this side of the house objecting to the so-called tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? I am afraid the Minister of Finance, who comes from the good old province of Quebec, must have found some difficulty in sliding over to the low tariff policy, because that is not the policy of the province of Quebec. The words "low tariff" are something new, I think, in the annals of the Liberal party from that province, and I for one am interested in finding out just how low they will go in their tariff policy. They are preaching low tariff this year, but next year, when they find they have to protect Canadian industry and Canadian goods, they will be the very ones to use the word "protection." They will not come to the house then with a low tariff policy, but they will say: "We will have to build up our tariff to protect Canadian industry." In other words, there will be a change of front on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, what have been our imports from the United States? These are startling figures, Mr.

Speaker, and show the value of our imports from the United States in excess of the value of our exports to that country.

1921	$217,568,000
1922	158,338,000
1923	177,484,000
1924	101,519,000
1925	97,430,000
1926	190,855,000
1927	215,719,000
1928	312,049,000

Or a grand total in nine years of $1,470,960,000. Now, sir, in nine years this nation of 9,000,000 people bought from the neighbouring republic of 120,000,000 people $1,470,960,000 worth of goods in excess of the value of the goods we exported to them. Apparently we believe in supporting the American working man, we believe in supporting the American factory, we believe in our people going to the United States to build up that country. And yet my hon. friends opposite say that theirs is the right policy. How long are they going to persist in this disastrous policy? How long have we to stand idly by, with our population fixed at 9,000,000, losing hundreds of thousands of our best citizens, our artisans, to the United States every year? How long are we to continue educating our boys and girls to equip them to build up a foreign country? Yet this is the policy of our friends opposite. Would that policy be continued if we had the Conservative party in power? Certainly not. Under a Conservative administration would our young people be seeking work in a foreign country? Undoubtedly not. Is Canada such a poor place to live in that they would leave their native land to make their home in the United States? Not at all. And my hon. friends opposite know it.

Now let me take a few of our imports. We buy from the United States canned soups to a value that I am sure would surprise the house. I suppose hon. members opposite will say that Canadians are not capable of making good soups, that we cannot grow vegetables of a sufficiently high quality for the production of good soups. What is the value of our soup imports from the United States? These are the figures:

1923	$ 923,973
1924	1,122,079

And this under the Liberal policy which is supposed to bring about such great prosperity at home.

1925	$1,141,271
1926	1,236,793
1927	1,400,264

Of course, we collected a little duty on these soup imports. Now, what were our exports of soups to the United States? This is very interesting because it shows the commercial ingenuity of the Americans engaged in the soup industry. In 1923 we did not export one tin of soup; in 1924, likewise; in 1925, likewise; in 1926, $64 worth. In 1927 we did a big soup business, we shipped $6 to the United States and $10 worth to Alaska. That is one of the results of the policy of my hon. friends opposite. We buy American soups, made by American workmen, paid for in the United States, and—

Mr. STEVENS: Give them free advertising.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Yes. Meanwhile our farmers complain that they cannot sell their vegetables. Under the policy of this administration there is no place in Canada for a soup factory and our farmers suffer; on the contrary the United States government protect their soup manufacturers and their farmers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I hope my hon. friends get a lot of satisfaction from their merriment, but it is ill timed. We as the representatives of the people of the Dominion are supposed to be legislating for their benefit, we are supposed to be building up the industries of Canada, we are supposed to be looking after the workingmen of Canada, and yet we enact legislation that tends to build up industry in the United States, apparently oblivious of the fact that the time will come when we shall be called to account for our failure to discharge our responsibilities and do something for the benefit of Canadians.

Now, sir, let me turn to a different subject. This government is always telling us about the wonderful trade treaties it has negotiated with other countries. We have trade treaties with France and a dozen other nations. About the last to be negotiated was the treaty known as the West Indies Trade Agreement Act, dated July 6, 1925. Under this treaty we have entered into an agreement which will benefit the West Indies as well as Canada. We have a merchant marine with a deficit last year of about $6,000,000. One of the principle clauses of this agreement provides for the importation of bananas from the West Indies. Where are we getting our banana supplies to-day? We are giving Jamaica, Trinidad and the other West Indian islands a steamship service for which we have built several 6,000-ton ocean liners, which are provided with special refrigerator accommodation to bring bananas to our doors at a cheaper rate. But bananas are still coming into Canada duty free. No preference has been given the West Indies under this trade arrangement, and will not be given until, as the Liberal government says, " the service is completed." When will that service be complete? In the meantime where are we buying our bananas? We are buying them from the United States. And they do not grow bananas in the United States because that country imports them. We poor Canadians will allow American ships to bring in bananas from the very people with whom we have a trade agreement, delivering those bananas at New York or in some other American port, shipping them over American railroads to Buffalo or some other American port, and then into Canada. And we purchase them. This is taking place under the trade arrangement which this government made with the British West Indies. How do hon. gentlemen opposite explain it. Where is the benefit to Canadians? Have the Canadians paid less for bananas since the treaty went into force? Not at all. We are still buying bananas shipped from America and I presume we shall continue to buy them for several years. I cannot understand the principles underlying trade treaties that operate in this way. I should think that the Canadian government merchant marine ought to get the advantage of the freight in connection with bananas coming from Trinidad and Jamaica. As a matter of fact, this was understood when the treaty was under discussion in this house; the house understood that the treaty was being made including other things for the benefit of the banana trade in the West Indies. Read the trade agreement and you will find that accommodation is made for 70,000 bunches of bananas on every ship. But if you look at our imports from the West Indies you will find only a few dozen bunches of bananas coming up the Atlantic in some ocean greyhound bound for Canada.

As I stated in the beginning, I am a protectionist. As for the Conservative party, at the masthead of its ship of state flies the protectionist flag. It has in the past and it may again go down into the surging waters of defeat. But the ship will be raised by the wise foresight of a great people, having faith in their principles. And, sir, as the protectionist flag was the last thing to go under, it also will be the first thing to come up, flying more boldly than ever at the masthead, because of the renewed confidence of a common sense electorate believing in Canada first, last and always.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I wish to say a few words regarding the subamendment moved on March 14 by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer). That subamendment reads:

[Mr. L. G. Bell.]

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:

"urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

This subamendment brings up the whole question of the British preference. The government have done nothing definite with regard to British preference, for they have on the tariff been everything by fits and starts and nothing for long and have no economic principles.

It was proposed two or three years ago to adopt a national coal policy so that every pound of coal would be mined and coked under the British flag, whether from Wales, Nova Scotia or Alberta. Such a policy would in the coal industry establish a real British preference. That was intended to implement the British preference policy and the government after a great many days adopted the resolution and then refused to carry it out. At the same time the question was discussed of affording protection to the coal and steel industries of the maritime provinces, and for three or four years this was delayed also pending the completion of the Duncan report.

That policy was one of protection namely a system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies for the maritimes with respect to coal and steel.

But the government pooh-poohed the idea, declaring that it was not a suitable policy for this country. No; they were content to have this country send $56,000,000 a year over to Pennsylvania to help the mining industry there at the expense of the Welsh miners. The government have simply dilly-dallied with the whole problem from 1922 to the present time, and they have failed to put into effect the report of the Duncan commission, or adopt a national coal supply which would be equivalent to a British preference.

We are willing to consider what should be done to assist the motherland in a large way in order to encourage trade and industry within the empire, because trade should follow the flag; it should follow lines of national defence. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking a good deal about the British preference, quoting Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding as pioneers in this regard. But Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding were not the pioneers of the British preference movement; Hon. Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper and the late Colonel George T. Denison were the pioneers or authors of the whole movement. England to-day finds herself, a free trade country, shut out of the markets of the world. She has lost her shipbuilding orders to the Hamburg yards and she is losing her supremacy in coal, as the result of the failure of the colonies to come to her support in her hour of economic trial. After all, it is just as necesary in time of peace as it is in time of war for the country to mobilize all its resources, to keep its workmen employed, to preserve its own markets and to repel the foreign invader. It is just as necessary for Canada to mobilize in time of peace, to resist the economic invader at her door as it is for her in war to repel that invader. In war we mobilize our transportation facilities and all the natural and other resources of the country for the purposes of defence, and the same thing should apply in time of peace. What do we find in the mother country to-day? Thousands of men are starving in Wales and while this government can send millions to Japan and other countries to relieve distress from floods and famine, when they are asked to do something to bring relief to the Welsh miners they refuse to take action or to vote a copper. They simply make a football of the whole question; they say that they can do nothing because they have not been asked by the British government. Had this government been sincere they would have done something, sitting at the round table of the colonial conference and planning for a real British preference and cooperating with the overseas dominions, Australia and New Zealand, to work out a solution of the three major problems of the British empire defence, trade and immigration. The keynote of the empire trade problem is the extension of the British preference doctrine, bringing it up to date, and not relying upon the principle as it stood twenty or twenty-five years ago, when we had a lop-sided preference which was not a real preference at all. The British preference has been meddled with by the government, who have tried to introduce free trade piecemeal with the world at large.

We have entered into free trade arrangements with every country under the sun except such regions as Patagonia, to which the government have not as yet extended their free trade principles. Small "five, ten and fifteen cent" countries have been given preferences in our market and our tariff has been amended to give them free trade piecemeal, at the expense of the Canadian working man and in discrimination against the working man of the old land. There are over a million and a half men out of work in England now, which shows that this present so-called British preference is of very little practical value in providing work there for our own kith and kin. If the government meant business at all, instead of saying at the last colonial conference that they were quite satisfied and had nothing at all to propose for the relief of unemployment in the old land or anything else, they would have sat around a table and done something to relieve the coal industry in Wales, for example, where there are millions of tons of coal which could be utilized in Canada to-day. The government have a merchant marine, although they sold some of the ships without public tender for $50,000; these ships could have been utilized to put the British preference into effect in a proper way in respect to coal and other products. Are we to continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of the United States while hundreds of thousands of our young people go to that country to live? Are we to be forever an adjunct to the United States in a trade sense? We buy from the United States every year $900,000,000 worth of high priced manufactured goods. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) said last night that 50 per cent of those goods could be manufactured in Canada, but in my opinion almost 70 per cent of the manufactured goods we import from the United States could be produced in this country. So I say the time has gone when the government can fool the people with their lopsided British preference and their pro-American tariff which operates against the unemployed in the old country. When we buy goods from the United States we pay for them with our raw materials, and we cannot continue to do that much longer under such an absurd system of reciprocity. A special session of the United States congress has been called to meet this month to consider farm relief; I think a special session of this house should be called before the general election in England in order to see what we can do to relieve the unemployment in the old country and to adopt a real British preference. England is paying millions of dollars a day to the United States on account of the war debt, but England did the bulk of the fighting during the war and carried the financial burdens of most of the European countries as well. No one knows what England is going through to-day in an industrial way, but a rich dominion like Canada does nothing to assist the mother country. A proper British preference which would protect British goods would do much in this direction.

Conditions have changed greatly in the old country during the past years. At one time England was a free trade country, the United States was a free trade country and so was Germany. The great German economist List has given a magnificent description of these countries years ago, when they all supported the free trade policy. The United States was invaded every year by an army of English commercial travellers until the great work of Horace Greeley, the founder of the New York Tribune, converted the people of the United States to protection, and to-day it is the highest protected country in the world. In 1849 the Germans were so poor that they had to wear wooden shoes; that was under free trade, but later Germany adopted the principle of protection and became prosperous. The result was that in 1914 England had to ask the help of the United States to save her from the invader. We have a free trade government in Canada now; they are talking of low tariffs. At the special session of the United States congress to be held this month the question of farm relief is to be taken up, but on that question this government is a ship without a rudder; they have no farm relief policy at all. It is all very well to talk farm relief when the election is coming on, but with the Liberal party, platforms are made to get in on and not to stand on. They have no proper or adequate policy with regard to British preference and they will do nothing to help the Welsh miners. They even say that they have nothing to do with unemployment in Canada, that it is a matter for the provinces and the municipalities. The government have charge of the tariff, of trade and commerce and of the banking and immigration laws; they could make that British preference effective in two or three days if they wished to do so, but they refuse to take any action.

This is also the case in connection with empire marketing. At the Toronto exhibition the empire marketing board had a large exhibit which included some of the articles mentioned in the budget. The British preference on those articles amounts to only five cents or one cent, and a lopsided preference such as that is no good at all; it is less than we are giving small European and South American countries. That is not the kind of British preference we want here. Welsh coal has been tried out in Canada and has been proved a superior brand of fuel, but nothing is done to further its sale in this country on a preferential basis.

[Mr. Church.]

In my opinion the overseas dominions are partly to blame for the condition of British industry to-day; as far as Canada is concerned, we are buying too much from the people of the United States. Loyalty in Canada seems to be largely lip loyalty, when you get down to brass tacks. We bought more goods from the United States than England bought, with four times our population; we bought twice as much as Germany, with six times our population, and we bought twice as much as France, which has five times our population. In 1928 Canada spent $3,000,000 per day across the line, largely for clothing, boots, shoes and many other articles on this list of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), when a large part of this trade could have been carried on with the motherland. Are you content to continue this policy? If you are, then the British Empire must fail because trade follows the flag. Are you content to spend $400,000,000 to-day, when in 1896, with a population of only a few million less, we were spending only $36,000,000? We should give the motherland preference in our market by a real reciprocal preference tariff and not a lopsided one.

The government is doing very little for the people of the old land with its immigration policy. Immigration is related to the tariff; the two are interlocked and correlated; one cannot exist without the other and the immigration question is also related to that of the British preference. There can be no immigration as long as the present free trade pan-American tariff policy is in force. What is the use of putting 10,000 more immigrants into the west, when there is no work for them and when you cannot market your crops properly. The grain growers of the west are suffering untold hardships, not only with regard to transportation facilities, but in an economic way. These hardships are brought about by the competition they have to meet from across the border. I might quote the great German economist List, who described England about 1840 as:

> Supreme in every branch of manufacture, as a world's metropolis which supplies all nations with manufactured goods, a treasure house of all great capital, a banking establishment for all nations, which controls the circulating medium of the whole world, and by loans and the receipt of interest on them makes all the peoples of the earth her tributaries. In vain did the Germans humble themselves to the position of hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Britons; the latter treated them worse than a subject people.

Then we should see the United States at that same time, in 1840, invaded every year by an army of British commercial travellers. We should then have a picture of a comparative situation of the three countries at the outbreak of the war, Germany producing twice as much steel and iron as England, the United States with an even vaster production, the two countries towering in their industrial strength above the nation which had once supplied both with everything they required except food and timber. These comparative diagrams might be accompanied by others to show how national power was a reflection of industrial power, and how free trade England which, as a protected country, had once ruled the world, was compelled to invoke the aid of one great protected country, the United States, to assist her in repelling the attack of another.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 11, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) presented the third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, as follows:

Your committee recommend that it be given leave to sit while the house is sitting; and also that its quorum be twelve members instead of fifteen, and that subsection (c) of section 1 of standing order 63 be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED BY MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to table the tenth annual report, in English and French, of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Copies are being distributed to all members this afternoon through the post office.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—UNFORESEEN EXPENSES

Mr. FRASER:

What are the details of the vote "Unforeseen expenses" found on page 36, Vol I, of the Auditor General's report for 1927-8, under the headings: (a) External Affairs, $20,297.60; (b) National Defence, $84,959.96; (c) Privy Council, $9,675.99; (d) Public Works, $7,325.62?

Mr. RINFRET: All details of this vote are printed in the Auditor General's report, Voll II: (a) Part E-8; (b) Part Q-73; (c) Part U-3; and (d) Part V-30.

NATIONAL REVENUE—APPRAISAL SERVICE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the number of appointments made by the Minister of National Revenue (formerly Minister of Customs) to the appraiser service from April 1, 1927, under authority of the exemption from the provisions of the Civil Service Act as provided in the estimates and in chapter 37 (18-19) George V?

2. What are the names of those who were subsequently dismissed and the reasons for dismissal in each case?

3. What are the names of those appointed during the said periods, and who are still in the employ of the Department of National Revenue?

4. What is the nature of the inquiry or extent of the test applied in the selection of the appraisers above mentioned, as to physical fitness, intelligence and integrity?

5. In the case of dismissals for cause, what are the names of the person or persons recommending such persons for employment in the government service?

Mr. EULER:

1. 17.

2. None of the persons appointed as appraisers were dismissed.

3. 16: Thomas Costello, H. F. W. Funston, Sidney Jones, S. J. Kelly, E. A. Cook, Chow T. Tong, Gaston Pelletier, C. H. Richardson, F. A. McCann, F. T. Curley, T. C. Rubbra, W. G. Stamp, George Chapman, William Patterson, L. M. Major, Thomas Smith.

4. All applicants were personally interviewed by a board and in each case the report of the board was accepted.

5. Answered by No. 2.

DISMISSAL OF PREVENTIVE OFFICERS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

In regard to sessional papers No. 307 (Return to an order of the House of Commons, dated April 25, 1928), setting forth that 114 persons were employed as preventive officers under authority for exemption from the Civil Service Act, of whom 46 were dismissed for cause:—

1. What was the nature of the offence or cause of dissatisfaction in the case of 33 of the said employees who were dismissed; "service terminated, recommended by chief, preventive service"?

2. What was the nature of the inquiry or extent of the test applied in the selection of the 114 members of this staff as to physical, mental and moral capacities?

3. From whom were recommendations received for the employment of the 46 members of the staff who were dismissed for irregularities or on recommendation of the chief preventive officer?

Mr. EULER:

1. 24 positions abolished.
.5 Unsatisfactory—poor results.
1 Did not devote full time to service.
1 Charter of vessel, commanded by officer, expired.
2 Accepted appointment by the Civil Service Commission to port staff.

33

2 and 3. No information.

IMPORTATIONS OF MOTOR CARS

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. What was the number of motor cars imported into Canada during the calendar year 1928?

2. What was the invoice value of such cars?

3. What was the total amount paid by way of duty and sales tax on such motor cars during the year 1928?

Mr. EULER:

1, 2, 3. Statement of imports of automobiles entered for consumption in Canada during the calendar year 1928, showing number and value of cars and the amount of import duties collected:

Item	No.	Value	Duty collected
Automobiles, freight..	7,182	$ 8,305,235	$1,644,166 95
Automobiles for conveying passengers only, valued at retail, when new, with standard equipment complete at not more than $1,200 each..	27,957	15,998,828	3,365,800 88
Automobiles, passenger, n.o.p..	12,269	16,528,813	4,365,421 76

3. Sales tax collections are not recorded as applied to separate commodities and figures are not available therefore, of sales taxes collected on imports of automobiles.

DEPUTY MINISTERS—SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): May I refer the government to questions Nos. 7 and 8 on to-day's order paper? They were placed on the order paper on March 21, and it is now the 11th of April. The questions are very simple, and I do not think it should take very long to answer them.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): These two questions relate to all departments, and the various answers are assembled by my department. The replies, however, were not all made in the same spirit. In certain cases the salaries of the deputy ministers were given as they existed last year, and in other cases the increases in the main estimates for the current year were taken into account. I am endeavouring to have the replies coordinated, and the answers to the questions should be available very soon.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. MAYBEE (Northumberland, Ont.): On March 13th last a question which I had on the order paper concerning the Customs department was passed as an order for a return. I should like to know when I may expect the return to be brought down.

[M. E. J. Garland.]

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): I shall make inquiries and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

Mr. E. A. PECK (Peterborough): I would like to remind the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) of an order of the house which was passed on March 11th last for the return of correspondence relating to repairs to the Lindsay arsenal. The return has not yet been brought down.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I shall make inquiries. I feel sure that the return will be brought down immediately.

VESSELS CARRYING LIQUOR TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister a question which I intimated I would ask him to-day, namely, whether any correspondence has taken place between the United States and Canada with respect to the clearance of vessels laden wholly or partly with alcoholic liquors for transport to the ports of the United States of America.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There has been correspondence with reference to the clearance of vessels. It would be proper, I think, that any correspondence brought down should be brought down simultaneously here and in the United States. I will take steps to arrange to try and have the correspondence brought down at an early date.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): The subamendment which has been moved to the budget brings up the whole question of better trade relations between this country and the motherland, and concerns both British preferential trade and inter-imperial trade. With all due respect to the government, I would ask if they think the people of this country are satisfied to allow the present condition of affairs to continue and for us to go on importing from the United States every year $900,000,000 worth of high-priced manufactured goods, while our own sons and daughters have to leave our shores in large numbers to seek employment in the United States. Conditions in the old land are very similar.

The subamendment urges upon the consideration of the government an immediate and substantial increase in the British preference. The subamendment reads:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:
> "urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

In other words, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), who has moved this amendment, is following the line which was suggested by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), that when we are shut out from the United States market we should look elsewhere. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) referred to Russia as a country to which we might look for increased trade when we are virtually kicked out of the United States by the new tariff changes and he also spoke about Great Britain. The tariff policy of the United States is based on the principle that charity begins at home. That principle in fiscal matters has been enunciated by all the great presidents of the United States from Lincoln down to Roosevelt and Hoover. They have always taken the stand that in matters of tariff charity begins at home, that the home market belongs to their own manufacturers and working men. But unfortunately for this country the government at Ottawa seems to be asleep. It has given preferential treatment to twenty-eight countries bordering on the seven seas; but when it comes to the motherland, oh, what a difference. If Canada is to be a self-respecting country the government should write an economic note instead of a peace note to the government of the United States to the effect that we can no longer continue—the present one-sided reciprocity under which we buy nine hundred million dollars' worth of high-priced manufactured goods from our neighbours and pay for them with our raw materials; that we can no longer squander the capital and labour of future generations in this manner; that if the United States government desires to enter into an equitable reciprocity arrangement with us, it must do so with all convenient speed, otherwise we shall take immediate steps to put in operation such a national policy as will conserve our raw materials for our own manufacturers and our own workmen and to deal with the United States as they deal with us by making our duties the equal of theirs and intimating to them that we will have a proper reciprocity or none.

A few days ago the Prime Minister said that in dealing with the United States we must keep cool heads. Well, it seems to me that the government has not only a cool head, it has got cold feet too. No self-respecting country in the world would tolerate what Canada has had to put up with in the past in the shape of the various tariff barriers which have been erected by our neighbours. The government of the United States is well able to take care of the economic and other interests of its own people. Would that we had a government as fully alive to the interests, economic and otherwise, of the Canadian people; then our working men would be more fairly dealt with. This government turns a deaf ear to any proposal to give really preferential treatment to Great Britain. Within the confines of the British Empire there are several hundred millions of people, and we should put into force a system of inter-imperial trade. That day cannot come too soon. The Prime Minister may know Ottawa, he may know the White House; but the leader of the opposition knows all Canada and all England, he knows what Canada and the empire need—an economic tariff. He knows that in an imperial fiscal sense charity begins at home. Instead of the Prime Minister talking about our keeping cool heads and giving the United States a chance, why does he not take steps to give Canada a chance, the British Empire a chance, inter-imperial trade a chance? We have had too much government from Washington and altogether too little from Ottawa in a fiscal sense.

This government has established a Canadian embassy at Washington. It would seem to me, judging from the speeches delivered in the United States by our splendid minister extraordinary—and I say he is extraordinary—that our embassy is just an agency for boosting pan-American trade at the expense of the British Empire. Only the other day this extraordinary plenipotentiary took the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) in hand—a minister who is the "glass of fashion"—and walked him up to the White House to see President Hoover. It was also announced that our minister plenipotentiary down there would be happy to introduce any other member of the House of Commons to Washington and to the present occupant of the White House. I do not know if I am likely to be in Washington any time this year, but if I am our minister extraordinary will not have an opportunity of walking me up to the White House. Of course, I may not be the "glass of fashion" like some hon. gentlemen who are driven around in ten-thousand-dollar high-powered cars. In 1925 I accompanied Mr. Hoover and his friends over the Welland canal and St. Lawrence waterway for two days and gave a banquet in Toronto to him and about two hundred other people in connection with the harbour development there.

From my contact with him then I became convinced that he is a man of exceptional ability, and I am sure he will prove himself to be one of the greatest presidents that the United States has ever had. But besides his intimate knowledge of his own country he knows the British Empire as no other American knows it. He lived for 23 years in the British Empire. Of course, he recognizes the right of every country to shape its own fiscal policy so as to ensure markets for its own people and work for its own working men. I know he is very friendly in his attitude towards the British Empire and wishes to see it become even more abundantly prosperous.

Last year we were visited by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Baldwin, by Mr. Amery, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and last but not least, by Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and by Sir William Clark. Each of them urged Canada to stay within the British Empire to foster inter-imperial trade, and to buy in other parts of the empire such products as she did not produce herself. No one can take exception to their advice. It is good Conservative doctrine. But what can we expect from this government? In reply to the kid-glove platitudes of the hon. Minister of Justice, I submit that we are not retaliating against the United States if we keep on buying nine hundred million dollars' worth of goods, notwithstanding the avowed purpose of the United States government still further to raise its tariff barriers against Canada. The policy of this government seems to be, if they smite you on the left cheek, turn to them your right. Talk about keeping cool heads! Every member of the government from the Prime Minister downwards seems to have cold feet. They refuse to do anything for the motherland in the way of an adequate British preference that would expand our trade with the British people and would mean diverting to them the thirty or forty per cent of trade and of money that is now going to the United States for high-priced goods. The policy of the government has made us hewers of wood and drawers of water for the United States. What does this government care about a proper British preference which will assist the motherland? Hon. gentlemen opposite care nothing about it. They are indifferent to farm relief and rural depopulation in this country, indifferent to unemployment so long as they can continue their policy of semi-free trade with the United States. They have simply pursued a policy of laissez faire towards the British Empire and the motherland and the British preference. The next general election cannot come too soon in the interests of this country; it will, I believe, put an end to this policy on the part of the government. Tens of thousands of tons of Welsh coal could be brought to this country, providing employment for the miners in the old country, and thus implementing the British preference; but instead of that the government are content to have this country send millions of dollars over to the United States to provide employment for the miners of Pennsylvania. It was not free trade and Cobdenism that made England the great country she became; it was the union of coal and steel one hundred and fifty years ago. That was what made England great, and if the government in office here have the interests of the Canadian people at heart they will inaugurate a policy which will have for its object the development of the coal and steel industry of this Dominion and the encouragement of preferential inter-imperial trade. The government do not seem to realize that this country is a heritage which must be safeguarded for those who are to follow. Mussolini, the great leader of Italy, speaking of a country, says: A country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day; it is an inheritance from the past, a possession for the present, and a trust for the future. The same thing applies to Canada. But what do hon. gentlemen opposite care about the future prosperity of Canada or the trust they hold to-day to foster inter-imperial trade and advance our empire.

The policy of this government, in their attitude towards Canadian development and Canada's relations with the motherland and with the British Empire generally, seems to be twofold: First, that nothing that can be bought in the United States should be made in Canada, especially in eastern Canada; and, secondly, that everything that cannot be bought in the United States shall be imported from continental Europe, preferably Germany and not from England. That is the preferential policy of the present government. The Conservative party on the other hand believes in a tariff which will, in the first place, develop the industries of this country and, after that, promote trade within the empire. The government are wasting a lot of money on research. The first thing is to search and research for a proper tariff policy and dig up a policy that will help the British Empire, preserve our markets and our work for our own people, and encourage the manufacturing industries of Canada. So far as encouraging trade within the empire is concerned, and particularly assisting the mother country, this government's policy may be called "I'm alone." The Prime Minister talks about keeping a cool head; he says we must have a cool-headed policy with the United States. That is a favourite expression of the Prime Minister's. His policy is full of doubts and fears and "ifs" and "buts," provisos and whereases and wherefores, and that he calls keeping a cool head. Well, the government's policy towards the mother country has been very cool; the mother country has always got a very cool reception from this government.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was paired with the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. MacNutt). Had I voted I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the amendment.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the amendment, which reads as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—
> "this house regrets that the financial proposals of the government make no provision for reasonably safeguarding and protecting the interests of those engaged in agricultural pursuits or in industrial employment in Canada."

One of the difficulties in connection with an amendment of this kind, in common with all amendments proposed in this house, is that everyone uses his own method of interpreting it. The other day the Prime Minister referred to this amendment rather extensively, and I think he told the house that it meant more protection, which I understand to mean increases in the tariff. He went on to say that in 1921 the Conservatives appealed to the country on protection and were defeated; that they appealed again in 1925 and in 1926 and got what he said was a knock-out blow somewhat similar to the blow that was given protection in Great Britain about 1905.

The Prime Minister then went on to say that since 1926 protection had been creeping about in Canada under "modest and belittling pseudonyms," and he instanced this amendment which used the participle "protecting" instead of the substantive word "protection". However, I think the Prime Minister forgot one or two other pseudonyms such as "freer trade" and "lower tariff" which have been applied by himself and his own party to what we have in Canada to-day, which without question is a protective policy. If protection received a knock-out blow in the election of 1926, in my judgment there has been no evidence of it in the three budgets which have been presented in this house since that election.

Does the Conservative policy mean, or has it always meant, increasing the tariff? I know it is possible to quote some Conservatives in the affirmative on that question. The Prime Minister referred the other day to the great increase in agricultural production in Canada during the past few years, the increase in acreage and the increase in yield. I believe that the Conservative government, or the Union government, was responsible to a large extent for encouraging that increase in production when some years ago it took the duty of small farm tractors. I do not believe any one reduction in the duty on agricultural machinery has done more to increase production in western Canada than the removal of the duty on small tractors.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house by quoting the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), who placed on Hansard at page 955 a list of some reductions brought into effect by the Conservatives. While I am not willing to accept the statement of the Prime Minister the other day as being the correct interpretation of this policy, or the extreme statements made on the other side as to what the Liberal policy means, I think we should remember that the policy of the Conservatives has been followed very closely by the Liberals during the last seven years. I think that is a safer guide than the interpretation given by some Liberals and even by some Conservatives as to the meaning of this amendment. After all, is there any harm in a party which says "if we must protect certain individuals in Canada we must protect everyone"? Surely that is the only logical position for any party to take that adopts protection as a policy if they undertake to protect some people they should go the whole way and protect everyone, as far as that can be done. That is much more logical than promising to abolish protection while giving protection to some and not giving it to others.

The farmers of Canada has not been greatly benefited either by increases or reductions in the tariff. To-day in Canada there are some farmers who believe that the tariff should be increased; they want it increased on their goods because they believe it will mean increased prices to them. On the other hand there are some farmers who have taken the other view; they want to reduce the tariff. They take that position because they think protection cannot be applied to their industry and they say if that is so it should not be applied to any other industry. However, both groups realize the inequality of the present situation; they desire equality whether it is brought about by increases or decreases in the tariff. In Canada the low, or lower, tariff party, the free traders, or whatever you wish to call them, have been in the ascendancy so far as organized agriculture is concerned, and across the line the farm bloc has been and is protectionist. I want to remind hon. members on both sides of the house that increases in the tariff on agricultural products either in the United States or in Canada do not mean real protection to agriculture. The reason for that, of course, is the impossibility of organized agriculture, to-day taking advantage of a protective tariff. At one time I believe we had a situation in Canada under which a protective tariff on wheat could be taken advantage of; that was when the wheat board was organized in 1919 and if I remember correctly the government of the day passed an order in council compelling the board to sell wheat to the Canadian miller at a price equivalent to that obtained elsewhere less transportation costs. The farm bloc in the United States were successful in 1922 in getting the Fordney-McCumber tariff passed. In the main, this was a farmers' tariff, and as I do not wish to delay the house longer than necessary, I will not discuss that tariff in detail. I think all the members of the house are sufficiently familiar with the details of that tariff to know that it was chiefly a farmers' tariff. Before it was passed, wheat, cattle and a few other commodities were on the free list, but a duty of 1½ to 2 cents per pound was placed against cattle, and a duty of 30 cents per bushel was placed against wheat; by a proclamation of the president, the duty on wheat has since been raised to 42 cents per bushel.

What has been the result in the United States of the application of this increase in duty? I have in my hand a volume entitled Farm Relief, the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, which summarizes the conditions existing in U.S. agriculture between the years 1920 and 1925, and refers in a general way to the conditions prevailing in later years. I would like to quote a few passages from this volume, beginning with a passage entitled "Farm Prices," which is as follows:

When price data are used, we find an appearance of a depressed condition to-day in the business of farming, as compared with pre-war years. The index number of the price of farm products averaged 131 in 1927 and varied from 134 to 148 during 1928 on a basis of the pre-war half decade as 100. On the same basis the prices paid by farmers varied from 154 to 157. Thus the purchasing power of farm products, at the farm has recently varied from 85 to 95, using the pre-war half decade as a basis of 100.

Another article dealing with mortgage indebtedness, reads as follows:

The total amount of mortgage indebtedness for the country as a whole increased about 13 per cent in the five years ending in 1925. This increase is significant when it is considered that the percentage of the total number of owner-operated farms mortgaged decreased slightly, that a certain amount of indebtedness was wiped out by foreclosure, and that the value of farm real estate decreased nearly 25 per cent.

Naturally, there was a large increase in per cent of mortgage debt to value of farm real estate reporting mortgage, for the United States as a whole from 29.1 per cent in 1920 to 41.9 per cent in 1925. This is indeed a startling change. Moreover, it was marked in every geographic section, even in New England and the middle Atlantic states. In the northwest central group the percentage increased from 26.5 to 44.9; in the single state of Iowa, from 27 per cent to 49.2 per cent.

Thus, while the percentage of farms operated by owners decreased considerably in the major farming areas, the decrease in the percentage of equity owned by the farmers was very much more significant.

The farmers in the United States have an organization known as the American Farm Bureau Federation, and I would like to quote a few remarks by Mr. Thompson, the president, as follows:

An analysis of the present situation shows that not more than eight hundred thousand farms in this country are being operated to-day at a profit; eight hundred thousand out of six and a half million.

Full realization of the program of the farm bureau will mean that four and a half million or 80 per cent will be operating at a profit;

That is based on the assumption that the program of the bureau is adopted. In the November Current History is an article entitled "The Farm Problem Made Clear," and I would like to read one or two paragraphs, as follows:

Prices for Farm Products—Taking as a basis of 100 all prices averaged for the five years, 1909-14, the prices for agricultural commodities at the farms which reached a peak of 209 in 1919, dropped to 116 in 1921, and since then have averaged around 130. But prices are relative. The wholesale prices of non-agricultural commodities, on the same basis, reached their peak in 1920 at 241, and since then have been in the neighbourhood of 160 until 1927. For the past year and a half they have been about 152. Thus, the purchasing power of farm products, 100 in 1909-14, reached 107 in 1918, went to 69 in 1921, and has since ranged around 75 to 85, being now about 92. If the comparison is made for a period of nearly thirty years, with the prices of 1913 as the basis, it is found that prices for farm products have been lower than those for non-agricultural products for most of the years during the entire period.

The article goes on to deal with the costs of production, which have been increased on the farm, and also deals with the increase in the prices for farm requirements. Another paragraph entitled "Taxes" reads:

Taxes on farm property increased in the ratio of 100 in 1914 to 250 in 1927, while farm prices increased only to 130. The total amount of the taxes paid on farm property increased during this period from $340,000,000 to $870,000,000. In recent years taxes have taken one-third of the net property income of farmers, and in some areas one-half.

Another paragraph entitled "Debt" reads:

Between 1910 and 1925 the amount of mortgage debt on owner-operated farms increased from $1,726,000,000 to $4,517,000,000; and the ration of debt to value, from 27.3 per cent to 41.9 per cent.

The last paragraph I desire to quote, entitled "Share of National wealth" reads as follows:

The wealth of the nation was perhaps $175,000,000,000 in 1910 and is now possibly $400,000,000,000; farm wealth was $40,000,000,000 in 1910 and is now $60,000,000,000, a drop from nearly $80,000,000,000 in 1920. Twenty years ago our farmers possessed nearly one-fourth of the national wealth, whereas to-day they have less than one-sixth of it. Moreover, the purchasing power of the farm wealth of the United States is 15 per cent less than it was fifteen years ago.

The United States has evidently gone considerably farther than we have in Canada in the tabulating of the relation between the prices at which the farmer sells his produce and the prices which he has to pay for the different articles he requires. I hope we will have in Canada some day as complete a knowledge of the conditions which prevail here. All the indications we have, however, show that the conditions prevailing in Canada with respect to the relation between the agricultural industries and the other industries are similar to what they are in the United States, and these conditions have not been altered in any substantial degree by any changes which have been made during the last few years in the tariff.

This is a problem for both Canada and the United States and it cannot be solved merely by raising or lowering the tariff one per cent. I think the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in her speech the other day, showed pretty conclusively that, so far as we have information, conditions in Canada are very similar and anybody who has lived for a while in a city and for a while amongst the farmers and new settlers in the west, knows that living conditions amongst the farmers are very far from what they ought to be, judged by the standard of even the common people in the towns and cities.

The United States farmers have been attempting to solve the problem of making protection apply to United States agriculture. A great deal of the talk in this house regarding the possible action of the United States at the special session of congress called to deal with farm relief does not, in my judgment, mean very much. I do not believe there is in Canada anyone who is going to criticize seriously the president of the United States for calling a session of congress to deal with the pressing problems confronting that country, or congress for doing anything it feels it must do in order to put the farmers of that country on a parity with the manufacturers and other classes who are getting the benefit of a protective policy. How can we criticize them? They know they have a problem to deal with and surely their responsibility is to their own people, just as ours is to our people in this country. If they feel that is what they must do, we cannot criticize them. If the United States people, by experiment, can find a method of farm relief that will solve the problem over there and will demonstrate that the protective policy can apply to the farmers as well as to the rest, any temporary disadvantage the farmers of Canada might suffer might well be borne if a real solution of the problem could be found. But I doubt it. The people of the United States are carrying on their experiment apparently in a sincere and determined manner, and we will watch the result with much interest.

But what are they asking? Just a few increases in the tariff? Oh, no. The McNary-Haugen bill, as I understand it, is a bill to give the farmers a board and government money to enable them to sell the produce that will be absorbed by the home market in the United States, and to prevent the surplus that they might sell abroad from depressing the price, thus enabling the board which is selling that produce in the United States, to take advantage of any tariff protection or increase in the tariff that is granted. The Conservative party has stated on various occasions that its policy is to prevent people who are getting protection from taking advantage of the consumer, and this is one way whereby we might get equality or something nearer equality than we have to-day. The farmers in the United States and those who are supporting them in congress and elsewhere, are taking the view that the manufacturers take advantage of the tariff, and while they are not trying to stop them, they simply say that the government, having done that for the manufacturers, is in duty bound to turn around and give the farmers an organization which will enable them to do the same thing in the sale of their products.

In regard to the problem of the export surplus, they are asking for export debentures which amount to a bonus. They are asking also for a readjustment of the taxation burden as between the rural districts and the cities, reducing the farmers' taxes. They are asking for lower interest rates. They are also asking for very much reduced freight rates, and I am sure the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will be interested in that.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will permit me to say that they can stand a great deal of reduction before they are down to our level.

Mr. KENNEDY: About ten cents on a bushel of wheat. They are also asking for control of production and that no more land be brought under cultivation by irrigation or drainage or any other method until such time as they have this problem solved. They are asking for increases in the tariff. These are the things which the farmers in the United States have laid down as being the protective policy that, in their judgment, is necessary to put agriculture on a par with the other organizations that have been enjoying protection in that country.

They are also taking the view—and they have expressed it—that unless they can get protection for all, so far as they are concerned there must be protection for none. I think I can submit this to both parties; certainly the budget we have to-day is a protective budget. Our policy has been protection for our manufacturers, and if hon. members will examine closely the schedule in the present budget there are no substantial changes downward at all. Of course if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) shows us afterwards that there are, and that it means anything to the ultimate consumer, I shall be only too pleased.

The farmers in the United States are also asking for tremendous assistance to their cooperative organizations. This has to do with the organization for the marketing of their produce. While it has been stated time and again that the policy of the government across the way is to help farmers in connection with marketing their crops, there is in the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) one statement which I cannot quite understand. He said, as reported in Hansard of March 14, 1929, at page 948 near the top of the second column:

The Department of Trade and Commerce is not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat, because those commodities find their own markets; but we are interested in assisting the sale of manufactured products.

The farmers in Canada will have to raise their voice still louder in order that both the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce may grasp more thoroughly the fact that while the problems of production are great, a solution of them will not mean very much to our farmers unless along with it we have a real solution of the problem of marketing. While I do not believe the pool or cooperative marketing is going to solve all our problems, it is possibly the biggest thing we can do in the near future to help agriculture in the Dominion of Canada. The wheat pools are well organized, but I think it is generally recognized that the marketing organizations in connection with cattle, which may be affected by an increase in the United States tariff, are in a very poor condition as compared with the wheat organizations. We certainly need to pay a great deal of attention to marketing, and I hope that as a result of the investigation made by the agriculture and colonization committee some arrangement will be come to that will impress upon the government and the department the need for greater marketing opportunities, and that it will never be possible again for a minister to stand up in the House of Commons and make such a statement.

I shall refer to the main motion before I conclude, because I do not wish to make another speech. I for one cannot vote for the budget. If I voted for it I feel that I would be declaring that my votes on the budgets of the last two years were wrong. If I felt that I was wrong in 1927 and 1928, I would get up here and frankly say so, but I still feel that I was right, because we were working on a policy of lowering the tariffs, and we were advocating at least the collection of our revenue by direct rather than indirect taxation, and in that respect the budgets of 1927 and 1928 both moved in the wrong direction. An amendment was moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) to the budget of 1927 to this effect:

Whilst recognizing the advisability of certain minor changes proposed, this house regrets that the budget as presented by the hon. minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reducing of the high cost of living, in so far as it is due to the protective tariff;

[Mr. Kennedy.]

That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on ability to pay;

And further, that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

Then last year I supported an amendment to the budget moved by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), reading as follows:

That all the words after the word "regrets" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor;

That the government proposes further reductions in the income tax, this making a serious departure from the principle of direct taxation;

That the proposed revision of the customs tariff is inadequate to bring effective relief to the consuming public, and that the sales tax on the necessaries of life has not been eliminated.

I still believe, Mr. Speaker, that we were right in advocating that the income tax should not have been reduced, and right also in the position we took on the tariff. Therefore I intend to cast a vote along the same lines this year, and it must be against the budget.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I would not get up at this time, Mr. Speaker, but for the fact that I would like to clarify somewhat the statement that has been made and reiterated so often in this debate regarding prosperity, which has been so vulgarly flaunted in the face of our farmers and agriculturists both in the speech from the throne and the budget debate.

The amendment which we are considering is a camouflaged pronouncement on the principle of protection and is meant to catch the unwary agriculturist. I do not think that any debate in any session of parliament since confederation has been equalled by this one for dissimulation or duplicity in argument. From the time the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) spoke, every member on the Tory side of this house has advocated protection as the one thing needful, and has also in argument spoken of the Liberals as a free trade party and treated the government as though it had presented a free trade budget this year. They say that this budget is going to bring ruin to the industries of Canada. The truth is that both Liberal and Conservative parties in this house are high protectionists, and while both parties express concern for the agriculturists and for the industry of agriculture, not one of them cares one iota for the welfare of the farmer to-day, further than to trap him into asking for protection so that a valid excuse may be found, if possible, to increase the tariff on manufactured goods. Both parties know that agriculture in the United States to-day has been reduced to a state of penury through protection, which is the ideal to be attained here—a state in which those in control of manufacturing, distribution, and the credit of the nation will have the rest of the population at their mercy.

The Prime Minister declared that there was truth in the statement of the hon. member for South Wellington when he said that there was unbounded prosperity in this country. I want to say that both hon. gentlemen were wrong. Either they made the statement in complete ignorance or with a desire to create a wrong impression. I received a letter from an old friend in Saskatchewan the other day, from the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), which well clarifies the situation so far as prosperity for the working farmer in western Canada to-day is concerned. He says:

> During the twenty-five years I have lived here, I do not think I have seen so many foreclosures and hardships. The oldtimers are nearly all losing their land. If I were to draw a plan of my township, I believe seventy-five per cent of the land has changed hands in the last year or so. In some cases the wife acquired the property from the mortgage company, and now it is the wife's turn to move. Yet we have never had a crop failure in the district. This year, of course, frost hit most pretty hard. How it is in some districts where they are subject to hail, drought, and so forth, it is hard to imagine.

Saskatchewan to-day, Mr. Speaker, is in just the same position that compelled the government to appoint the Duncan commission to inquire into conditions in the maritime provinces. We need a Duncan commission to-day to inquire into conditions in agriculture in the west just as much as a commission was needed to inquire into conditions in the maritime provinces. The one concern of the government and of all protectionist interests throughout the country is to bring in from Europe and other parts of the world those who will take the place of the old settlers in this country, knowing that they can be more easily brought to accept a lower standard of living than is possible on the farms of Canada to-day. The statement that there is unbounded prosperity is reiterated for the purpose of trying to hide the iniquitous system of the concentrating of the earnings of the nation in the pockets of those who profit by acts of legislation giving a privilege to filch the earnings of the workers and agriculturists from their very pockets. Prosperity as boasted of in the budget is the result of the legalized brigandism for which both the government and the opposition are noted.

I was much struck with the speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). He struck a high note in the debate. He showed that wars were due to false trade policies. I am sure we are all glad to know of the nations' outlawing war by any and all means whatsoever. The hon. gentleman said that world peace will now depend on the subsequent actions of those nations who have put their names to the Kellogg treaty. He believed that trade restrictions and tariffs were the greatest cause of enmity between nations. Now, to hear a member of the government give utterance to such sentiments is in itself very gratifying. But at the time I could not help wondering how soon we could bring about world peace at the rate the Liberal government is moving towards free trade to-day.

The hon. gentleman said that Canada is competing and can compete with the world. The facts do not bear out his statement as far as urban industry goes. Not one industry in Canada to-day outside of agriculture has been able to stand on its own feet. Because of this system of protection the manufacturing industry and exchange of Canada are centred in the hands of a ring, and no business man who may be willing to come here and establish business on his own account, depending on his own industry and ability, has the slightest prospect of success unless he first of all links up with the politicians, or what may be termed the legislative faculty of the ring. If he does not do so, sooner or later he is put out of business. I can refer to several incidents to show that this is the case, and I do not need to tax my memory very far back. I have only to recall some incidents in our distributing system and our co-operative efforts and enterprises in western Canada to confirm my statement. I can remember when we intended opening a big wholesale house in Regina to supply our own needs; but we found out there and then that through the protectionist system of Canada we could not buy one dollar's worth of the commodities we needed, we could not under any circumstances enter the wholesale business in the city of Regina.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. gentleman able to point to any legislation by the federal parliament which would prevent a man starting up a wholesale business anywhere in the Dominion? I think he has made an incorrect statement.

Mr. EVANS: When we failed in Regina we thought we could open up a wholesale establishment in the great distributing centre of Winnipeg. We did so. How? We had to get another concern to buy for us. Both that concern and our own have been out of business for some years. This happened to Saskatchewan Grain Growers in their cooperative work.

Then what happened to the farmers of Ontario in their efforts along the same lines when they did not take care first of all to link up with the politicians in this house? When they could save two or three cents a pound on binder twine by getting it from Belfast they sent an order there. The shipment was held up in Montreal, and $30,000 was seized—all done with the idea of reducing the agriculturists of this country to a dependent state. That twine was afterwards released by the customs on payment of $6,000 in cash—stolen from the farmers of Ontario. Twine is on the free list. I want to show how free it is. Last year the consumers of Canada paid at least $555,000,000 because of this tariff system to put $185,000,000 into the Dominion treasury.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) says that by half a dozen strokes of the pen the Minister of Finance can cure the problem of unemployment. Like the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), he would stop the export of raw material. I am sure he would not dare to put such a policy into force were he in power. But he made the statement, forgetting that the class for whom last year this nation sweated to the extent of $555,000,000 because of the tariff do not even believe in their own policy of protection. I know what would cure unemployment in this country—the investment of capital for the exploitation of our natural resources. I obtained from the Bureau of Statistics figures showing that in 1927 our Canadian capitalists invested in foreign countries $1,330,586,000. This large sum of the people's earnings was invested abroad by a class who claim to have a monopoly of Canadian patriotism. Well, the hon. gentleman said nothing about patriotism. I find from the magazine published by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that those foreign investments increased during 1928 by over $330,000,000. The investment of this huge sum in the development of our resources would cure unemployment. But I say again, as I have said before when speaking for the farmers of Canada, the Canadian capitalists care nothing for the working men of their native country as long as they have a hungry crowd around the factory doors each morning seeking jobs. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) declared that our workers are living better than are the workers of any other country. This is not true. The average wage paid to our workers last year was $920—a wage far below the living line to-day.

[Mr. Evans.]

The conditions of life on our Canadian farms are also of a very low standard, with heavy mortgages on the self-imposed slaves, and the landlord and tenant system with all its evils increasing each year. During the war the farmer's produce was commandeered at a price representing about 50 per cent of its value—less than 50 per cent compared with the sky-rocketed prices of those for whom our war debt was borrowed. Yet the government can relieve that class from payment of their just share of the national debt by making two successive reductions in the income tax in 1927 and 1928. If this boasted prosperity is so prevalent throughout the country, why does not the government now increase the income tax by making a sharper graduation in the scale?

The 1929 budget to my mind is simply a call for tenders in preparation for the next election. The slogan of the whole fiscal horoscope appears to be "For manufacturers' use only." The consumer is not relieved of any corresponding amount of the penalty he has to pay if he imports any goods made from the articles now placed on the free list or on the drawback list, which is increased again this year. No; this vulgar boast of prosperity, flaunted in the speech from the throne and now again in the budget speech, has reference only to the tariff filching propensities of this government, who are directing things at present. The government may well feel satisfied with its tariff filching propensities, but I would issue the warning: Don't call it prosperity. Surely there are means of finding revenue without putting the burden on the worker and his family—and the bigger the family the heavier the tariff penalty imposed is felt.

I would suggest to the government to-day to consider a sharp graduation in the income tax, and particularly should this be done to meet our war debt by the class for whom the war debt was incurred. We could meet our war debt to-day in an easy manner if all classes were taxed equitably, if an equitable method of taxation were found as between one class and another. Those who are making excess profits should pay a greater share than they are paying. We are allowing watered stock to be added to the capitalization of our concerns on which interest is expected to be paid, and a greater burden than ever is placed on the worker. Again, all unearned increment belongs to the community. I think a more sharply graduated inheritance tax would also furnish a good part of the revenue. While this is used to some extent by the provinces it is not used in Canada as it should be. The most prolific means of taxation in Canada today is practically untouched, and that is land values, which would beyond any doubt furnish a large portion of our revenue. But as yet we prefer to follow the uncivilized method of taxing the food and clothing of the worker instead of the land of the rich which the worker has made valuable. Some reforms are needed along these lines, and I could not let this opportunity go without showing some of the abuses laid upon certain classes by other classes in the country, with the consent of this government.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Guthrie), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion.

[Mr. Evans.]

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate I regret that I should be compelled to take a further part in it than I have taken already.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I am very much pleased to be able to say something which draws applause from my hon. friends; I hope they may applaud me when I sit down.

My reason for presuming upon the indulgence of the house for a very few minutes, Mr. Speaker, is because I feel that there were many questions dealt with in this debate and many attitudes taken, particularly by the members of the government, which should be drawn to the attention of the people of this country. I think it is time the people of Canada should learn the policy of this government, or the lack of policy of this government, however we may put it, because at times it is difficult to know just for what policy this government stands.

I listened with a great deal of attention to previous speakers in this debate and particularly to the speeches of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister; I hoped that perhaps they might give us something constructive and might offer something in the shape of a real Canadian policy which would be of benefit to this country in the days to come. But, Sir, I listened in vain; I heard nothing from any of the speakers on the other side of the house but vain boastings of a prosperity which is at least doubtful and certainly spotty. Certainly for such prosperity as does exist this government is no more responsible than I am responsible for the revolution of the planets.

Of course, at this late hour I do not intend to take very much time to deal with the remarks of the other speakers in this debate, but just for a few moments I wish to deal with one or two parts of the speech of the Prime Minister which illustrate the difficulty of depending very much upon that speech. My right hon. friend started off by pointing out that this country was very prosperous and he gave many figures to support that statement. Among the first figures he gave was the acreage under field crops in Canada; he said that in 1928 the acreage amounted to 59,351,000, or 3,000,000 acres more than in 1927. With that statement I shall not quarrel, but I would like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that if the acreage in field crops is a typical criterion of the prosperity of our country, then our country has not been prosperous since this government came into power. The Canada Year Book shows that the acreage in field crops in 1921 amounted to 59,635,000 or 300,000 acres, in round figures, more than the total acreage of last year, 1928. The figures in the Canada Year Book show that there have never since been as many acres in field crops as there were in 1921.

The right hon. gentleman used the word "deception" a number of times. He is usually very courteous, but I must confess that I thought he would be called to order by Your Honour. He used that word in referring to a number of speeches on this side of the house, and I think he came pretty close to political juggling if not deception when he gave the figures which he gave.

He also mentioned that this side of the house had thrown overboard the word "protection," but in the amendment upon which we voted a few moments ago there appear the words "safeguard and protect." It is quite true that the word "safeguard" is not used very much in Canada, but I would like to know just when it has become a crime to use a good British word here in Canada. While we may have neglected on some occasions to put in the word "protection" we have always advocated protection and, when we were in power we always lived up to the principle of protection; but what must we think of a party which when in or out of office have preached a policy of free trade and ever afterwards practise protection?

The right hon. gentleman said, as he has said before, that we should have conscripted the wealth of the country. That may be a little touch of demagogism, but he pointed out in his speech, as he has in many others, that we did not put on sufficient taxes during the war. I would like to quote three or four lines from a little book I have in my hand entitled English Public Finances. This was published in 1920 by the Bankers Trust Company of New York City, so I hardly think the right hon. gentleman can object to it. This book deals with the public finances of Britain from the early days of the Norman conquest right up to the present time. In dealing with Great Britain in particular, the article says:

> For the active war period covering the five fiscal years ending March 31, 1919, from 22½ per cent to 34½ per cent of the expenditure was raised from taxation, other revenue collections, and war contributions.

In referring to the dominions, it says:

> The dominions have made an equally good or even better showing. Canada has taxed herself for nearly fifty per cent (48.10) of her total war time expenditure; Australia raised 40 per cent from taxation and New Zealand appears to have raised 57 per cent from taxation.

In view of those figures I hope the right hon. gentleman will hesitate about making similar statements in the future.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who is the author of that?

Mr. MANION: The Bankers Trust Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would like to know the author of that publication, not the publishing company.

Mr. MANION: Harvey E. Fisk, of the Bankers Trust Company, New York.

The right hon. gentleman regretted that there was a tendency in some parts of this country to mix up the tariff with the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. That was a most extraordinary statement for him to make, because, in replying to a question by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), he turned right around and mixed up the two things himself, proving that he was the first one in this country to mix them. He quoted from a letter which had been sent to the Secretary of State of the United States, and I would like to quote from that letter which is a part of the official correspondence tabled in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends seem to be cheering me as easily as they cheered some of their own speakers. The right hon. gentleman said in his speech:

> May I say that I can conceive of no greater misfortune than that the question of the St. Lawrence waterway should be mixed up in any way with the question of the tariff of this country or of the United States. Each question must be dealt with separately on its merits.

In replying to a question of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) he proceeded to read the letter which had been forwarded to the government of the United States. In part, this letter reads:

> In this connection, it may be said that Canadian agriculture is more directly affected by the restrictions on the importation of Canadian farm products, which have been imposed by the United States in recent years, with the object, it is understood, of assisting agriculture in those western states which would share so largely in the benefits of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway. This situation, and the effects upon the maritime sections of Canada of United States duties on the products of the fisheries, are among the factors which have contributed to bringing it about that public opinion in Canada has not so clearly crystallized in favour of the waterway project as appears to be the case in the United States.

I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if that is a species of self-hypnotism.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not mixing them up; that was keeping them separate.

Mr. MANION: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that if the Prime Minister was in a hypnotic trance when he quoted that letter, he certainly has not come out of that trance yet. If that was not self-hypnotism, then it was self-deception; it was sophistry of the worst kind, if it was not just ordinary political humbug. What attention will the people of this country pay to the words of the right hon. gentleman when he contradicts himself like that?

Then he said that we should conscript the wealth of this country in the next war, not only conscript the wealth but conscript all other things.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He did not say that.

Mr. MANION: I have not the time to look it up, but I remember the expression very well. I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has a policy for the next war, because he did not have very much of a policy for the last one. The trouble with the Prime Minister is that he becomes too enthusiastic after an event, rather than before. I do not like that expression of conscripting the wealth, and I do not think it would be feasible, but so far as the conscripting of the services of all our people is concerned, if another war should unhappily come upon us, I am just as strong for that as is the right hon. the Prime Minister. I feel that all people should serve, but when the Prime Minister sets a course like that I am afraid he is likely to steer away from that chart when the time comes.

Mr. VALLANCE: What about the conscripting of wheat in the last war?

Mr. MANION: I will let my hon. friend deal with that next year. I have enough points against the government; in fact, I have so many I cannot begin to exhaust them all in fifteen or twenty minutes and I do not intend to speak any longer.

A couple of words which I used in my speech seem to have caused a good deal of antagonism on the part of my hon. friends. I do not know why they should have taken umbrage as they did, but I used the words "red-blooded Canadian policy." I did not assail the United States, and I do not assail the United States now. I like the United States, but I love Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in dealing with that—and I found myself laughing a little when he came to the words "red-blooded," because I thought he would not conclude his speech without referring to them—said that it was not "red blood" we needed but "cool heads". The difficulty with the Prime Minister is that he has his extremities mixed. It is not a cool head that is troubling this government; it is cold feet that is troubling them, and if he had studied physiology in his youth as I did, he would realize that in both matters, not only to warm up the feet, but to cool down the head, you need red blood anyhow, and they need it on both counts.

My hon. friends from the prairies will remember there are trains out there that go out empty in order to come back full. They are what we call deadhead trains. I would like to remind the Prime Minister that the coolest kind of a head is a deadhead, and the trouble with the government is that it is a deadhead government—nothing but platitudes and no policies.

I listened with great attention to both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who usually make interesting speeches. I have heard the Minister of Justice making what I consider witty and brilliant speeches in the house, but his last speech was not up to the mark. Yesterday in reply to one of my friends, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys), the Minister of Justice suggested that he would like to have finished his speech. We all realize that he had not finished it, because when he was talking, he did not get anywhere; he did not have any terminal facilities. The hon. gentleman, in coming to a lot of theoretical conclusions and getting nowhere practically, made me think of a remark of the Hon. Mr. Harcourt who, speaking of one of his colleagues, said that the trouble was he was a brilliant enough fellow but he lacked that vulgar quality of common sense. I am afraid that is what the speech of the Minister of Justice lacked the other day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: I do not say that with any disrespect. What was the gist of the speech of the Minister of Justice? The entire speech was that an abstract resolution carried by a group of men at Geneva a couple of years ago, should be the whole basis of policy in the Dominion of Canada. He forgot, for example, that the whole United States press—and I read much of it at the time—criticized their representatives for having put their names to such a resolution. He also forgot, when he read the names of the five members who represented Canada, that not one of those members had ever been, so far as I know, elected to a representative body in this country. I am not saying this in disrespect of their capabilities; but they had not been up against practical problems; they had been dealing with theoretical questions all their lives. They agreed to a theoretical proposition, and now the Minister of Justice says that his complaint against us is that we do not agree with this resolution; that we have not put this into force to a greater extent. As a matter of fact, he pointed out himself that the only country in the world that had put this into force was Canada. Even free trade England never put it into force. Since the war, free-trade England, the only country that for a hundred years has practised free trade, has been putting up tariff barriers under the term of safeguarding industries. We have been the only country who have dared to reduce our tariffs to any extent at all, thereby killing our own trade and increasing that of the United States. This reminds me of the story of the old mother who was watching a regiment passing and who said: "They are all out of step but our Jimmy."

An hon. MEMBER: That is not new.

Mr. MANION: I know, but I want to use it with relation to the members of the Liberal party. They think all the ministers of finance throughout the world are out of step except their Jim. They forget that the tariff is a weapon by which we can negotiate with other countries for trade favours, and we alone have thrown away our weapons. It is a weapon which has been used by all countries in the world. But it has not been used by this country because in practically every trade treaty we have made with other countries, we have suffered. The strange thing of it all is that the Minister of Justice, who is a pet son of the province of Quebec—and I have no complaint in that regard—who has always been a favourite son of Quebec, is so indifferent to that province that loves him so much that he prefers Geneva to Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: Why, the hon. member for North Simcoe yesterday in the house, in a very able speech, read a resolution which was passed unanimously on March 27 in the provincial legislature of Quebec, after Mr. Taschereau agreed to withdraw his motion to go into committee of supply. That resolution which they agreed to unanimously was entirely a protective resolution; every word of it was protective.

And, how did the Prime Minister deal with the speech of the Minister of Justice? How did he take this attitude on trade policies? He left Geneva and, by the way, this was a great government to travel. If they cannot travel in private cars or trains, they travel in automobiles all over Europe, and when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is taunted with it, he says: "What have you got to say about it?" That is his attitude. But the Prime Minister left Geneva and went across to Washington for his policy. He says: "We have to be very careful in regard to our whole policy at the present time or we will provoke Washington." That is a sort of policy whereby we must not do anything; we must take an attitude whereby by no word of ours should we seem to have any opinions of our own at all. I have heard a great deal of abuse of the word "retaliation," I do not know why; it seems a good enough word, but I am not using it because some hon. members do not seem to like it. But the Prime Minister seemed to think that if anybody used the word "retaliation," it was almost a crime, rendering one liable to go to gaol; that if anybody talked about British preference, there was a danger of provoking Washington; that we should have a sort of "sit quiet, hush-hush" policy. The trouble with this government has been that it has been a "hush-hush" government with regard to any policy that would build up Canada. Since 1925 there have been travelling throughout the country the leader of the opposition—

An hon. MEMBER: The leader of the government.

Mr. MANION: The leader of the government. It is only a little time until the leader of the opposition will be leader of the government, so my mistake is one only of time and not of intent. The leader of the government and the Minister of Justice have been travelling from end to end of Canada, talking about this magnificent status to which we have attained, this wonderful status of Canada. They say that they have broadened out our whole status; that we have become a real nation. What kind of a status is it when we do not even dare to call our souls our own? What kind of status have we attained when we do not dare to do anything but practise a "hush-hush" policy, no matter what the United States says or does. We are a proud nation, it seems to me, but under the leadership of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice we have attained to that great position where it is advocated by the Minister of Justice that we take our policies from Geneva and by the Prime Minister that we take our policies from Washington. Mr. Speaker, the members on this side of the house believe in taking their policies from Ottawa. Canada.

I would like to quote to the Prime Minister a statement which he has no doubt read that appeared in this morning's Ottawa Journal, a statement by Senator Borah, one of the outstanding men of the United States:

Washington, D.C., April 10. Replying to an inquiry from the Canadian chamber of commerce in the United States, Senator Borah, Republican, Idaho, declared to-day he would support "reasonable" tariff increases on agricultural products—"not that I love Canada less, but that I love the United States more."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend used the same expression as his own a moment ago.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I do love Canada more and the United States less. Do I take it from the Prime Minister that he loves the United States more and Canada less?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend took his words from Senator Borah.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what the right hon. gentleman is referring to. Senator Borah may come out and give an interview saying that he is going to look after the interests of the United States, and that is all right, but if we dare to pass any opinion like that about Canada we are provoking Washington, the Prime Minister says. We should not dare to take any attitude at all with regard to Canada's policies. I wonder if that is why in the Easter recess the Prime Minister and so many of his cabinet spent the recess down in the United States. The Prime Minister himself was down there, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) was down there, and so was the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning), with the emphasis on the canals because we are going to deal with a canal question shortly with the United States. Were they down there learning the attitude that we should take on such a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They accompanied my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley).

Mr. MANION: Then I would say they were in good company, but the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), let me point out, is not handling the affairs of this country at the present time, unfortunately for the country.

The trouble at the present time is that we have no leadership of any kind in this country, and that at the very time when we need leadership as we never needed it before. What kind of leadership is it, I would ask this house, that brings in old age pensions one day, and brands it as a vicious principle the next?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I take direct issue with my hon. friend on the statement which he has just made. I let it pass when made by some of the back-benchers, but he is a front-bencher, and I do not propose to let him get away with it.

Mr. MANION: My leader made the same statement, and he is no back-bencher, and the Prime Minister stood for that. Not only that, but I heard the right hon. gentleman himself make the statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I say that I never made a statement of the kind, and I ask my hon. friend to give the house his authority now.

Mr. MANION: Of course, the right hon. gentleman is very clever in getting up and asking me to give the authority just when I do not happen to have it. I did not think his politics would make him deny such a statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is your authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Give the authority.

Mr. MANION: I will read it.

Mr. DUNNING: Read it all.

Mr. MANION: I will read it all. The statement of the Prime Minister has just been handed to me, and I am handing it to the Prime Minister now. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) was speaking, and he said:

But something still more significant was the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a few days ago when we were discussing the question of federal grants to the provinces for highway construction. Referring to that system of federal assistance to the provincial governments, the Prime Minister stated:

It is a bad system, a thoroughly vicious system, and that is the reason why the present administration has been seeking to put an end to a system that grew up at a time when the country was in the throes of war or had to meet a post war situation.

I asked the Prime Minister:

What about old age pensions?

He replied:

I am glad my hon. friend speaks of that. There is another case where we are giving to the provinces a lot of money in addition to what they are raising.

Mr. Ladner: Is that vicious?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I think it is, yes;

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Let me finish the quotation:

Mr. Mackenzie King: I think it is, yes; I have come to the conclusion that it is a thoroughly vicious principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MANION: I have the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MANION: I have the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot allow any interruptions unless the hon. gentleman who has the floor is willing to be interrupted, but I understand that the right hon. gentleman is rising to a question of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To a question of privilege. I say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend entirely misinterprets the words he has read.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a question of privilege. I have a right to say that the words my hon. friend has quoted have reference to a system of taking money from the federal treasury and giving it to the provinces, and no reference whatever to old age pensions or highways or anything else, and my hon. friend knows it and the house knows it.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I will let the right hon. gentleman wriggle out of that as he has wriggled out of so many other things. What kind of leadership are we getting in this country from a government that talks of free trade, in theory, on the hustings throughout the country, but, in practice, in the house puts into force a protective policy? What kind of leadership is it which advocates senate reform when it is on the hustings and out of power, but stands for senate stability when it is seated in this house? What kind of leadership is it that spends millions on the decoration and beautification of the city of Ottawa, but has not one dollar for technical education or national highways? What kind of leadership is it that permits for lack of a proper immigration policy thousands of Europeans to come into our country and drives out, by lack of a Canadian policy, the same number of Canadians to the United States? What kind of leadership is it that builds up United States industries and destroys Canadian industries? What kind of leadership is it that has no word of support or protection for the dairy and fruit industries of this country, but builds up the dairy and fruit industries of other lands? What kind of leadership is it that says we must not mix up the tariff and the St. Lawrence questions, and then proceeds to make a salad of the two? What kind of leadership is it that permits our purchasing nine hundred million dollars' worth of goods from the United States, and when members on this side of the house urge that the Canadian attitude should be to refuse to continue that condition of affairs and offer a remedy, resents our advice and says that its adoption would provoke Washington.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend say what is the remedy?

Mr. MANION: Yes. The remedy is a proper Canadian policy. And until my hon. friend became Minister of Finance nobody knew that better than he. I have sat in this house for twelve sessions and have listened to him on many occasions when he made as good protective speeches as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), and he is one of the best protectionists in the cabinet. I have heard the Minister of Finance make as good a speech for protection as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) made for free trade when he announced the death knell of protection. If it was not for love of power at any price the Minister of Finance would put in force a good Canadian policy. Nobody knows better than he what kind of policy we need. I am tired—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Apparently some of my hon. friends opposite are tired too. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am tired of this hush, hush! policy; I am tired of this pernicious anaemia that the government is suffering from. I believe it is time we brought in a policy of Canada first, decided here in Ottawa without any fear of provoking Washington, without any reference to a theoretical resolution passed in Geneva. I think that our interests, and ours alone, should be considered in shaping a policy to give that prosperity to the farmers of this country which every farmer representative in this house denies they are enjoying to-day, a policy that will build up this country industrially and economically so that our boys and girls will have an opportunity of remaining in their native land instead of being forced by the tens of thousands, yes, by the hundreds of thousands, to go to the United States to earn the living that they are denied here.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have ever seen such a performance. It is like the effect of a cerebral seidlitz powder. I have the highest regard personally for the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Manion), but I think that his speech, judging from the applause with which his colleagues greeted it, must have been sorely needed to revive their drooping spirits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I have as many friends on the other side of the house as I have on this side, and I am very much surprised that my friends opposite are so noisy. Who is the greatest man of the Conservative party to-day?

An hon. MEMBER: What about Taschereau?

Mr. POULIOT: I enjoy a point of humour, but not a pointless interruption. May I say with all respect to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who is a personal friend of mine, that he is not the greatest man of his party? May I say also that the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was not the greatest leader of the Conservative party, because he never won an election? The greatest leader of the Conservative party was the man who has retired from politics and is now living in Ottawa—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Taschereau!

Mr. POULIOT: —a man who has more brains than several members of the Conservative party put together, I mean the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry that his name should be jeered at by my friends opposite. Now that he has retired from politics and has given himself to the study of constitutional questions, they never speak of him with pride, in fact they seem to forget all his accomplishments. But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the greatest man of the Conservative party is he who led the party to victory in 1911—Sir Robert Borden.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Taschereau!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to read the following extract from the Ottawa Journal of August 15, 1928? It is headed:

Ottawa branch League of Nations passes resolution of congratulation on trip.

The article proceeds:

At a special meeting of the executive committee of the League of Nations Society of Canada held in Ottawa yesterday, the following resolution was moved by Sir Robert L. Borden, seconded by Tom Moore and passed unanimously:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am going to speak about Geneva.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps my hon. friends opposite will allow me to proceed. This is the resolution:

Resolved that the League of Nations Society in Canada congratulate right hon. Prime Minister on his decision to represent Canada at the ninth session of the assembly and the fifty-first meeting of the council of the League of Nations—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends opposite ought to find this resolution very interesting. Perhaps they will allow me to proceed. It continues:

—and also on his decision to attend at Paris for the purpose of signing the treaty for the renunciation of war.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Since the hon. member for Témiscouata rose to speak he has not touched the subject matter that is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, Sir John Macdonald is dead, Cartier is dead, Lafontaine is dead, but the member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) is alive.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And the Liberal party is dead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: But to continue with my quotation:

In representing Canada for these purposes the Prime Minister, we believe, is expressing the unanimous desire of the Canadian people to seek by all possible means the establishment of an ordered and peaceful world society and the substitution for war of arbitration, conciliation and conference.

This is what the most eminent man in the Conservative party, the only living man in that party who has won general elections, declares. This is what Sir Robert Borden says, now that he has left active politics and is enjoying the quiet of private life in Ottawa, in a position to study the great problems that affect our country. He has no prejudices; he has no longer any interest in the welfare of his party but is concerned about the future of this country which we all cherish. And if he were in the house now he would be silent instead of being noisy, like hon. gentlemen who prefer noise to argument. He stands out as the great figure of the Conservative party, a man personally above all reproach. And what does he say? He says that the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) is doing his best for Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Fort William spoke of political juggling, and I noticed when he spoke that he was doing his daily dozen before dinner. He spoke of the many attitudes taken by the members of the government and said, "I am not responsible for the revolution of the planets." I do not say that he is a wandering star in the Tory constellation, but he is responsible for his own evolutions, because he had two distinct policies in 1917. He was then a Laurier Liberal and afterwards a Unionist. He spoke of the lack of leadership and qualified this as a deadhead government. The Tory party is a hydra, a seven-headed monster; there are nearly as many leaders in that party as there are front seats on that side of the house.

Then my hon. friend referred to the fact that many members of the cabinet went to the United States during the Easter recess, and at the same time he spoke of cold feet. Yet he says he likes the United States; ignoti mulla cupido, he could not like that country without knowing it. Although he reproached the members of the government for going to the United States he went there himself during the Easter recess in order to get his cold feet sunburned. He was surprised that the Prime Minister was not called to order for using the word "deception" while referring to speeches made by Tory members. If the word "deception," like truth, hurts so much, does my hon. friend think the Prime Minister should have used instead the expression "sour grapes"?

There are two kinds of governments; there is the government of the people, by the people and for the people, which is the Liberal government, and there is the government for the few privileged classes, which is the Tory government. On this side of the house the Liberal party has a red-blooded Canadian policy; on the other side of the house the Tory party has a blue-blooded class policy. My hon. friend said he did not like the expression "conscription of wealth" but he is willing to conscript the services of the people.

Mr. QUINN: Conscript them all, Frenchmen and everyone.

Mr. POULIOT: Hon. gentleman opposite do not like the conscription of wealth because they are a capitalistic party looking after capitalistic interests and hoping for a capitalistic future. The hon. member for Fort William approved the issue by the Tory government of victory bonds free from income tax. This was not conscription of wealth but far from it; it gave an opportunity to people who were well off to buy large quantities of victory bonds of that kind and escape the payment of income tax. In that way the rich Tory lords evaded taxation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask one question? Is it not a fact that the issuance of tax-free victory bonds was approved unanimously by the house?

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps I might ask my hon. friend a question also: Is he one of the wealthy Tory lords who enjoyed that benefit?

An hon. MEMBER: Answer the question.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will answer my hon. friend at once; I am not a wealthy Tory lord. Now will he answer my question?

Mr. POULIOT: Then I do not understand how my hon. friend can be a Conservative; he should be a Liberal. It is not a fact that the bankers' trust had for sale an issue of Canadian tax-free victory bonds and that they stated Canada was heavily taxed in order to have a better opportunity to sell those bonds?

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if my hon. friend knows that all the municipal bond issues in the United States are exempt from income tax?

Mr. POULIOT: This is just another instance where hon. gentlemen opposite, who complain very much because we are friendly with the United States instead of being at war with them, quote the United States as an example for Canada.

My hon. friend from Fort William said that the Minister of Justice did not finish his speech. He did not do so because of the interruptions of a member on the other side of the house, so why should he be reproached because he was unable to conclude his remarks? Then my hon. friend said the Minister of Justice was disloyal to his own province, but that assertion does not stand for a moment. The Minister of Justice stands very high in Quebec; I am proud of his accomplishments, and moreover I used his name in my county when Mr. Patenaude was bringing in his policy of nothing.

We all heard the Prime Minister say that the tariff policy of this country has been and always will be decided in Ottawa, and that is the course which will be pursued by the Liberal party. This afternoon the hon. member for Fort William was quoting Senator Borah and a banker named Fiske in the United States, and to-night his leader quotes the municipalities of that country as an example for us. This is the dessert after dinner.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us about Taschereau.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends opposite tell me to speak about the Premier of Quebec, but I will not do so to-night because I have no orders to take from hon. gentlemen opposite. To use the expression of the hon. member for Fort William it would be a kind of disappointment.

May I say this about the resolution which has been passed by the Quebec assembly; there are three kinds of protection, high protection, moderate protection and low protection.

An hon. MEMBER: And Liberal protection.

Mr. POULIOT: When our friends speak of protection they do not say whether they mean high protection, moderate protection or low protection. High protection protects the capitalists only, the money lords of this country, while moderate protection is of benefit to the manufacturer as well as to the consumer. That is the policy which has always been advocated by this party, but our friends do not say just what kind of protection they want to have; they do not say whether they want protection for the rich or for the poor.

The acreage in field crops is not the only criterion of prosperity. The banks are boasting of the prosperity in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: And Premier Taschereau.

An hon. MEMBER: And the Seven Sisters.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: Premier Taschereau can boast of prosperity because he is a financier himself. He is a director of the Sun Life Assurance Company, the Metropolitan Life, Barclay's bank, and a savings bank in Quebec. He is very well acquainted with business conditions, and when he says the country is prosperous, at least he must be prosperous himself. The banks are boasting of the prosperity of this country, and so are the financiers. Even the member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is boasting of prosperity; he said that his business is prosperous. The heads of the great railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway, are also boasting of prosperity. When this government boasts of prosperity it is only repeating what is said by the men who know the true state of affairs. When any member says that the government is killing our trade he only shows that he is, not a disappointed, but a "sour grapes" politician.

Low prices are sometimes caused through there being a better harvest than in previous years, but the policy of this government has always been the policy of government of the people, by the people and for the people. Before recess, and with regard to Geneva, I mentioned what Sir Robert Borden had said. An article appears in to-day's five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Journal, which gives an interview with Sir Robert Borden who had just returned from a two months' visit to the United States. He stayed there longer than the hon. member for Fort William, so he should know of the conditions prevailing there. Sir Robert Borden has had more experience in the government of this country than any hon. member on the other side, and the article, which appears on the front page of this newspaper, reads:

A few days were spent in New York, where Sir Robert had the privilege of meeting at dinner a gathering comprising many men very prominent in finance, industry and transportation. He was particularly impressed with their friendly attitude and with their warm appreciation of Canadian development, progress and institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. POULIOT: The article continues:

"Without exception," said Sir Robert, "they evinced the utmost faith in the future of our Dominion, and emphasized its abundant resources. A leading New York banker spoke with great admiration of our banking system and of its remarkable success.

The vice-president of a very important railway commented on the fact that in Canada we had practically only two railway systems while in the United States there are more than one hundred, and he expressed the opinion that Canada in this respect occupied a more advantageous position than the United States. He spoke also of the excellent organization and service of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways. Keen interest was evinced in the remarkable development of electrical energy in Canada and the mineral development in the northern portions of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba."

As my hon. friends have asked me to talk about matters pertaining to Quebec, I will read from a Tory paper of Quebec, the Chronicle-Telegraph of April 8, which has the following to say about the Conservative party:

Campaign Afoot to Split up Federal Conservative Party and divide the Leadership

Cahan is Named as the Sectional Leader

That a subtle campaign is now on foot to split the federal Conservative party, and create in the province of Quebec what may be descibed as a Nationalist-Conservative wing, with Mr. C. H. Cahan, member for St. Lawrence, in the saddle—

I suppose that refers to the dark horse. The article continues:

—to divide control with the Hon. R. B. Bennett, appears to be substantiated following the discovery of an underground movement, engineered within the province, and sponsored delicately by some sections of the so-called provincial Conservative press.

Already the movement has gone so far as to nominate delegates, agreeable to the proposal, to attend a convention to be held in Montreal in the near future, at which it is presumed tangible shape will be given to the scheme. Absolutely no authority for any such convention has been given by the federal Conservative organization, it is claimed, and if this is the case, there is no alternative but to believe that the project is a deliberate attempt to split the party on racial lines, with the province of Quebec playing an isolated and it is hoped dominant role, in the prospective destiny of the Conservative party at Ottawa.

I do not know on which side they will be when they are called upon to give their opinion. The article concludes:

The genesis of the trouble in the Conservative party goes back to the Winnipeg convention when the leadership of the party went to Mr. Bennett in preference to Mr. Cahan. Mr. Cahan no doubt believed he had a legitimate title to leadership and a change came over his attitude in the federal house which the French press or sections of it were not slow to note. From the "Mail and Empire", Toronto, came the news that the member for St. Lawrence was in actual revolt against his party. If his activity in fighting the federal Liberal party was unabated, it was felt that it was out of no love for his chief Mr. R. B. Bennett.

I think I like his chief more than he does.

It is no secret that the Conservatives of the province have for some time been dissatisfied with the treatment the party headquarters meted out to them and the stage seemed all set for a split.

A curious procedure then followed. Reorganization of the party in the province has long been necessary. But the means adopted are, to say the least of it, distinctly odd.

It is understood that Mr. J. L. Gauthier, an ex-candidate for Dorchester, has been busying himself in the matter. It is known that he has gone through the province arranging meetings of Conservatives and Quebec was one of the places visited. His business, it is understood, was to have delegates appointed from the various constituencies in the province who would attend a convention in Montreal in the near future, and the question is being asked what the business of this gathering will be.

To Create Schisms

At any rate other leaders of the party are apparently convinced that he has no good intention in the matter and have circularized the delegates thus appointed with various pointed questions. "Did Mr. Gauthrier say who gave him the mandate for acting so and what is the aim of this convention?" they are asked.

Continuing the circular letter points out that its writers are convinced that Mr. Gauthier had no mandate from Mr. Bennett nor from General McRae—

In a local theatre there is a play called Mother Machree where Belle Bennett plays a leading role. Mother Machree is a hen which has been breeding ducks.

—chief organizer for the Dominion, and that this so-called convention has in reality a hostile object to Mr. Bennett. They believe the aim is to appoint a Conservative chief in the province who will be in a position to dictate to the leader or create a schism in the Conservative ranks which would do irreparable damage to the party.

The damage is already done.

The pro-Bennett Conservatives apparently believe that the provincial leader is to play something of the role of a king-maker—

We have our own King and we made him what he is. We are proud of his accomplishments.

—or at least dictate to the legitimate chief just how he must act.

In view of the existing situation it is believed that General McRae will shortly visit Quebec to conduct an elaborate investigation of the whole matter—

Hear, hear.

—ascertain just how far the movement has gone and naturally attempt at all cost to preserve the integrity of his party and prevent the formation of anything in the nature of an independent provincial Nationalist-Conservative party.

Cryptic Editorials

Cryptic editorials have recently appeared in the local press which readers have been at some difficulty to understand. For example a recent editorial—

It must be an editorial in L'Evenement, a Tory French paper published in Quebec.

—points out that while the Conservatives in this province do not disown Mr. Meighen's successor (Mr. Bennett) they have a tendency to follow the leadership of the member for St. Lawrence who is characterized as the possessor of a legitimate ambition with important financial backing.

Important financial backing.

The editorial continues that to assure the success of this manifestation a provincial convention will be held in Montreal in April.

It will be called the Montreal convention.

The convention is to be a replica of the Winnipeg convention, only on a provincial scale and Mr. Cahan is to be rewarded for the goodwill he showed in vindicating the rights of the French minority.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, is to be rewarded, like old man Simeon, before his death.

Continuing, it is pointed out that the aim of the convention is to invest Mr. Cahan with the high command of the Conservative forces in the province of Quebec so that Mr. Cahan can in future speak to Mr. Bennett—

Apparently he does not speak to him now.

—and dictate to him the conditions of a Tory alliance. Mr. Cahan has given no indication of his position in the matter but these chiefs of the Conservative party are apparently apprehensive of a schism in the party—

What is the matter with these chiefs of the the Conservative party?

—and wish to nip the project in the bud.

I am proud to be on friendly terms with the leader of the opposition; I respect him very much as an individual; I think he is well fitted for the position, and I believe he will be leader of the opposition in this house as long as he wishes to be here, provided that he is elected in his constituency.

May I recall to you, Mr. Speaker, the fact that for four generations members of my family have been in this house. My great granfather stood for responsible government and against the family compact. My grandfather supported Blake, Mackenzie, Dorion; my father recommended you, sir, to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as member for Gaspé, and it was a very happy selection. They have all done their duty. I consider that I am the servant of the people; I do not care for the wealthy; I am the representative of the people who are the majority; they are the people who suffer and who struggle when the Tories are in power. When this party is in power it is a government of the people, for the people and by the people, and they are glad to support it.

There is another difference between the Liberal party and the Conservative party. The Conservative party is the party of the few, where everyone expects to be a chieftain; but in the Liberal party we do not try to favour this one or that one; we try to do justice to all, and this is what has been done by the government since it has come into power. We are very proud of our Prime Minister and of his distinguished colleagues in the cabinet.

My hon. friend's speech will not help the Conservative party in any way; the Conservative party does not know how much damage it will suffer from such a speech, because the people outside of this house are not fools. They grasp the arguments and if they will read the resumé of a speech like that of my hon. friend, they will find only words and not a single argument except two ridiculous quotations from Senator Borah of Idaho and a Mr. Fiske, of New York City.

Mr. Speaker, my last word is this: the Liberal party is strong in the province of Quebec to-day and it will come out stronger and stronger after the general election takes place—I do not know when. I shall not be sorry for them then, but those on the other side of the house who scream to-day will no longer retain their seats. There will be fewer Conservatives returned. The people of this country do not appreciate those appeals to prejudice. They do not appreciate the appeals of the hon. gentleman from Fort William who goes to New York and dares to complain because other hon. gentlemen go there. This is a very trifling matter, and I never thought that a man of high culture like my hon. friend would use such matter in his speech. It is the Conservatives that will be the losers on account of such appeals. The people in the country will realize as we realize in this house that there is nothing in their speeches but gross insult.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement.

Mr. POULIOT: I will say then, Mr. Speaker, that they will lose their deposits.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression "gross insult."

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw it with pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I have no intention of hurting the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite at all. I like them enough to tell them the truth, and that is why I am speaking in this way. I can tell them that the people of Quebec remember the past, and they know that their real friends, the friends of the people in this country, are the Liberal party, and the Liberal party is sure of even greater attainments in the future than in the past.

The house divided on the main motion (Mr. Robb), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. ODETTE: I was paired with the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The first resolution is:

Resolved. that it is expedient to amend schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter 17 of the Acts of 1928, by striking thereout tariff items 113, 215, 363, 369, 437, 438b, 442, 448, 453c, 453e, 453g, 460, 460e, 478a, 696, 777, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations, and rates of duty in schedule A:—

Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the Minister of Finance would have the resolutions printed in the votes and proceedings for use by the members. At present they have no knowledge of each particular item.

Mr. ROBB: May I direct my hon. friend's attention to the votes and proceedings of March 1, where he will find all these items set out? Before proceeding further with these resolutions to-night, as there are some matters which we desire to advance with the Speaker in the chair, I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

ESTIMATES

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND MERCHANT MARINE

A message from the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1930, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

GRAND MERE—EAST BURRILLS
PILKINGTON—NIAGARA JUNCTION
ROSEDALE SOUTHEASTERLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in measures to provide:—

1. That the time for completion of the Canadian National railway line between Grand Mere and East Burrills, in the province of Quebec (1927, c. 13), be extended from 31st August, 1930, to 31st August, 1931, with the same location and mileage, an increased estimate of average expenditure per mile from $213,038 to $294.430, and an increase in the estimated cost of from $1,683,000 to $2,326,000.

2. That the time for the construction or completion of the Canadian National railway line between Pilkington and Niagara Junction, in the province of Ontario (1927, c. 14), be extended from the 31st August, 1930, to the 31st August, 1932, with a change of location to a point near Montrose Junction, at a decreased mileage of from 16.7 to 7.0, an increased average expenditure per mile of from $69,700 to $107,143, and at a decreased estimated cost of from $1,164,000 to $750,000.

3. That the estimated mileage for the construction of a Canadian National railway line, being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly in the province of Alberta (1924, c 30), be decreased from 39 to 26.19; the average expenditure per mile (one-half) be increased from $23,642 to $34,936; the estimated cost (one-half of total by company) to remain at $915,000, and the location changed to run from Rosedale to a point in section 4, township 26, range 16.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway, at a price of approximately $3,500,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Saint

John and Quebec Railway Company, and the interest of His Majesty in the right of the province of New Brunswick in such undertakings and railways, for a total price of $6,000,000, inclusive of certain outstanding debenture stock secured by mortgage, and the payment at maturity of certain debentures issued by the province; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, since you took the chair we have been unable to hear a single word.

Mr. DUNNING: I stated that the Governor General had given his approval.

Motion agreed to.

KENT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Kent Northern Railway Company, in the province of New Brunswick, at a price of $60,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INVERNESS RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Inverness railway in the province of Nova Scotia, at a price of $375,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Before this motion is carried I desire to point out that there are some documents that should be forthcoming with respect to the recommendations and reports of the engineers made at various times upon the value of these different undertakings. When they are before us in committee I shall expect that these reports will be available for the benefit of the house; indeed, they should be produced before we are in committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite prepared to produce documentary evidence of value of any kind which exists; but the procedure I was proposing to adopt, subject of course to the approval of the house, was to have the bills introduced so that the whole matter might be before the house, and the bills could then be referred to the committee on railways and canals in order that the officers of the railway—the railway having conducted negotiations—might produce all documents. However, if it is desired, every document can be produced before the whole house. I have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolutions must go to the committee of the whole, and when in committee of the whole we desire to discuss them in the light of the reports. There are, for instance, two separate reports I know of with respect to one of these matters—reports made some years ago fixing a value wholly at variance with the value now fixed. We desire to have these reports so that we may discuss the resolutions intelligently in committee of the whole.

Mr. DUNNING: I will undertake to see that everything is here, if it does not require a truck to bring it in.

Mr. BENNETT: Just the reports.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND REEMPLOYED

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently re-employed, to give them the benefit of salary they would have received had they re-entered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed, and of subsequent salary revisions, and to make provision whereby certain former employees not now in the said service shall be eligible for reappointment as vacancies occur.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this a notice, or is it a motion to go into committee?

Mr. VENIOT: It is a notice.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not put as a notice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He notifies the house that to-morrow, and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. I did not hear any motion made, and I assumed that His Excellency had approved of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that I have the approval of His Excellency for these several motions.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—112. Cocoanut, desiccated, n.o.p., per pound: British preferential tariff, 5 cents; intermediate tariff, 6 cents; general tariff, 6 cents.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the present rate?

Mr. ROBB: It is the same rate. It is proposed to classify sweetened desiccated cocoanut and unsweetened desiccated cocoanut into separate items. It is estimated that one-half the product will be affected by the change in the rates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are you changing the rate on the sweetened or the unsweetened?

Mr. ROBB: Cocoanut meat or copra in its crude form enters Canada duty free under item 113a. whereas desiccated cocoanut sweetened or unsweetened enters under 113 at 5, 6 and 6, chiefly from the island of Ceylon. Application was made for a reduction on the unsweetened in order to leave a spread between it and the highly processed form, it having been represented at public sittings that, in the case of the unsweetened, the specific duty at present operative had an ad valorem effect of about 60 per cent. It is proposed by means of 112 and 113 to reduce the duty on the unsweetened and less highly processed cocoanut. leaving unchanged the duty on the crude. The imports in 1928 of desiccated cocoanut sweetened or unsweetened were valued at $193,000, of which $180,000 came from Ceylon.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The matter has been under discussion before the board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And they made a report?

Mr. ROBB: Yes; this is their memorandum.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The amazing thing about this item would appear to be that, in accordance with some extraordinary fiscal sleight of hand on the part of the minister, he is able to undertake that the consumer of sweetened cocoanut—and after all it is in the sweetened state that it is consumed—is going to have to pay the sweeteners of it a duty over the unsweetened amounting to just about twice as much. It is an amazing form of fiscal policy for a low tariff government to persist in. The consumer is the only one who suffers under it. The manufacturer of desiccated sweetened cocoanut introduces his raw product, sweetens it, and sells it at a high rate. It is ridiculous.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in the rate on the sweetened cocoanut, and it may interest my hon. friend to know that the application for this change was made by Dodwell and Company of Vancouver and was supported by the consumers' league. There was no opposition before the tariff board.

Mr. ADSHEAD: According to my information the agent of the league was very much opposed to this change on the ground that it was a straight present to the manufacturers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid the minister's information is inaccurate.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not know whether or not the minister is aware that this change probably will close up a little industry in Montreal which brings in cocoanut in this form. They have written me that they are afraid they will have to close up their industry in Montreal.

Mr. ROBB: I know of an industry in Montreal which has represented to me for three years that they were going to close up unless this particular tariff was increased.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are these decreases?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in the rates on sweetened cocoanut; it is a reclassification. The present specific duty on unsweetened cocoanut was stated in evidence to have an ad valorem effect of 60 per cent.

Mr. SHORT: What is this consumers' league, about which we have heard a great deal and which was referred to by the minister? Of whom do they consist?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows as much about the consumers' league as I know. I have noticed in the press and in the minutes of the tariff board that there is a consumers' league which from time to time appears before that board. The statement just made by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) is rather interesting, and in view of that statement I would like this item to stand, because I have a memorandum from the department saying that the consumers' league consented to this change.

Mr. SHORT: Does the tariff board take advice from an unknown association? The minister says he does not know these people but that they recommended this change. I would like to know who compose the consumers' league; I notice from the reports in the press that they have a man appearing before the tariff board all the time, and I think the minister knows who they are. Who is this man Deachman who appears before that board and makes all these recommendations? I think the house is entitled to know who he is, where he comes from, what is his business and who pays him.

Mr. ROBB: I said that this was a recommendation coming to me from the tariff board. The board sends me a memorandum that the application for this change was made by Dodwell and Company of Vancouver and that it was supported by the consumers' league. I do not know who are the consumers' league any more than I know who are Dodwell and Company.

M. GUTHRIE: Did the tariff board recommend the change in the rate of duty on unsweetened cocoanut?

Mr. ROBB: The tariff board recommended all the changes I am submitting to the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then they are more than a fact-finding board?

Mr. ROBB: They are a consulting board, and are consulted by the minister just as I consult the officers of the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am asking for information, because from statements made by the minister previously I understood that they were a fact-finding board. Now I understand that they have recommended these changes in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has been a minister and he knows the minister does not read all the evidence which comes before his department. When we proceed to make changes in the tariff schedules the members of the tariff board are called into consultation together with the officers of the department. When they are called into consultation after having heard the evidence on both sides, they suggest so and so and the minister may accept that recommendation and pass it on to his colleagues, or he may reject it. As I said before, they are a fact-finding board, and at the request of hon. members last year we ordered that the evidence be printed, so that now it is available to any person who wishes to read it.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister accept the recommendations without investigation and without checking the conclusions?

Mr. ROBB: I may or I may not do so.

Mr. CLARK: It would appear in this case that the minister had not done so; he has simply accepted the recommendation without investigation.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say so.

Mr. CLARK: The minister gives the house two reasons why this recommendation should be accepted, one being that it was made by a certain firm and the other that it was approved by a certain league, and he does not know who constitutes either the firm or the league. Those are pretty poor reasons to give the house.

Mr. MALONEY: Is the consumers' league represented before the tariff board by any individual and if so, who is that individual?

Mr. ROBB: From my reading of the press and of the evidence taken by the board, occasionally the consumers' league appear before the board, and sometimes other organizations appear.

Mr. MALONEY: There is an impression abroad in this country that a certain gentleman by the name of Deachman is the representative of this so-called, ephemeral consumers' league, but the main purpose of Mr Deachman's existence seems to be to spread propaganda throughout the country, in every weekly newspaper, in favour of this government.

Mr. ROBB: That is very laudable.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like the minister to explain who compose this league. It seems to be a one-man league, like the League of Nations, and apparently this man has been appointed by some outside agency to act as its paid representative before the minstrel show known as the tariff board. His purpose seems to be to bring out facts which will sound the death knell of protection. We have all heard of the consumers' league; what do they consume? Apparently they only consume tens of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money. It seems that this person who appears before the board on behalf of the consumers' league is connected with a number of Liberal newspapers for which he writes many articles, many of them scurrilous, having to do with the business of this house, and the chairman of the tariff board seems to be in league with this gentleman. Apparently the head of that league and the chief consumer are the same person, who appears before the board, takes up the time of the lawyers and causes a great deal of expense. The tariff board seems to be a sort of Alphonse and Gaston affair, with Mr. Moore at one end of the table and Mr. Deachman at the other. The quicker the tariff board is abolished altogether and the consumers' league disbanded and put out of business the better for everyone. I protest against this league, which is just wasting the time of the country when we should be looking after more important things; I think the time has come when we should instruct the chairman of the tariff board that it is not necessary to listen to the league any more. We should find out all about the league and all about Mr. Deachman, whom he represents, his superior officers and so on.

Mr. SHORT: Can the minister tell us just who Mr. Deachman represents?

An hon. MEMBER: Wait a minute, we will tell you.

Mr. SHORT: You sit right down, and I will stand up just as long as I please. I do not take my orders from the members on the other side of the house. Do not give me any orders as to what I have to do, whoever you are.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Now you have been told.

[Mr. Maloney.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bothwell) has the floor.

Mr. SHORT: You are not going to put one over on me, because he did not get up until after I had risen. I am going to appeal to the house to say whether I did not have the floor before the hon. gentleman got up.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course he had the floor.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I rose immediately the hon. member for Toronto Northwest sat down.

Mr. SHORT: You rose after I did.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I did not.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman on this side had the floor; he rose immediately after the previous speaker took his seat, and I pointed to him. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) rightly and properly has the floor, even though the other hon. member spoke first.

Mr. SHORT: I beg to take issue with you, Mr. Chairman; he rose after I did. However, I am gentleman enough to sit down and give him an opportunity to speak.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member will not think there is any injustice being done.

Mr. SHORT: You are showing partiality.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. When the hon. member saw the hon. member for Swift Current rise, it was the second time he had risen.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we could obtain a compromise between the two hon. members by giving certain information which they seem to be seeking.

Mr. SHORT: I have not finished my question.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps I can anticipate the question.

Mr. SHORT: I do not want you to anticipate anything.

Mr. ROBB: I heard the hon. member asking who the Consumers' League of Canada is.

Mr. SHORT: I rise to a point of order; the minister is going to answer a question before I have asked it. The Chairman has ruled that the hon. member for Swift Current has the floor and I am submitting to that ruling. The minister cannot answer my question until I ask it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Some of the hon. members opposite seem to be very much concerned about the Consumers' League of Canada. This league is an incorporated body made up of people from all parts of Canada, and Mr. Deachman appeared before the tariff board in the same capacity as Mr. Darby did for the Canadian Council of Agriculture. Mr. Deachman appears before that board to meet some of the foolish applications which, in our opinion, are being made.

Mr. SHORT: I have seen a great deal in the papers about this man appearing before the tariff board, and I ask the minister if he is in the pay of the government.

Mr. THORSON: You have had your answer already.

Mr. SHORT: I did not ask you.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member (Mr. Thorson) need not be so smart; the minister is here for that purpose.

Mr. THORSON: The minister is not running the consumers' league.

Mr. ROBB: As to whether or not the government is paying Mr. Deachman, the answer is no. If the league is looking after the interests of the consumer, I am rather surprised at the statement made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that Mr. Deachman has said that he is opposed to this change, because the change involves a reduction in the duty.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. minister will probably give the credit to the person to whom it is due; I think it was the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) who made that statement. However, that is also my opinion.

Mr. ROBB: Both items were previously classified at 5 cents, 6 cents and 6 cents, and under the new classification, cocoanut, desiccated, unsweetened, will be reduced to 2 cents, 3 cents and 3 cents.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would ask the hon. minister if he is not departing from the recognized principles of responsible government. He has introduced a resolution and he admits that he has no reason to offer why this change should be made, except that it was asked for and recommended by the tariff board. Surely a responsible minister, sitting in his place in the house, should be able to give some reason for the action which he asks this house to take. Surely we are not delegating the duty of the Finance minister to the consumers' league or to the tariff board or to anyone else. They may be an investigating body, but I think their duty should be to place the facts before the minister and let him deduce his conclusions and give those conclusions to the house with his reasons therefor.

Mr. ROBB: After consultation with the officers of the department, I reached the conclusion that there should be this reduction from 5 cents, 6 cents and 6 cents to 2 cents, 3 cents and 3 cents. This will involve an estimated reduction in revenue of some $39,657.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister does not see the crux of my question. What were the reasons upon which he based his decision to reduce the tariff?

Mr. ROBB: There will be a reduction in price to the consumer.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am afraid I am not making myself clear. The minister has surely some reason for the change outside of the reduction in revenue. What were the principles involved which led the minister to recommend the change?

Mr. ROBB: To give the consumer a reduction in price.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the consumer use this article sweetened or unsweetened?

Mr. ROBB: Both.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the minister speaking from experience? Is not the object of this reduction to allow people to bring the unsweetened article into the country and then sweeten it and sell it?

Mr. ROBB: I think that is a fair statement, but we are only proceeding along the lines which have been advocated by our hon. friends during the course of this debate; that this work should be done in Canada instead of being done outside of the country.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not finding fault with the item at all, I am only asking for information. I was told at first that the article was used unsweetened, but it is now admitted that it comes in unsweetened, is sweetened and then sold. This extra protection must be given for the purpose of protecting an industry, and I think the minister should give us all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. FRASER: Is not the effect of this amendment to give protection to the sweeteners of desiccated cocoanut?

Mr. ROBB: It is to take protection away from some who already have it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Answer the question.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. member argue that it is an increase?

Mr. FRASER: It is a decrease upon the raw article, but you put it on the manufactured article.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. FRASER: There is no question about that.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in that at all.

Mr. FRASER: It is a straight raise in protection from a low tariff government.

Mr. ROBB: It is a reduction.

Mr. GEARY: The Minister of Finance said that the basis for these changes is the finding made by a fact-finding body. We are told that there are not many results of investigations before the minister. I think he said in his budget speech that important investigations were still proceeding and the information from the tariff board, that is the finding of fact in regard thereto, is not yet before him. There is apparently a finding of fact in regard to this tariff item. Does the tariff board submit its findings of fact in writing? Does it follow up its findings of fact with recommendations, and if so, are the recommendations and the reasons for them also in writing? It would be very convenient for the house, which is called upon to discuss each and every one of these items, if it had before it the findings of fact of the tariff board and the reasons for its recommendation. That would be only fair to enable us to discuss these matters intelligently. On the other hand, am I to understand from the minister that, after going to all the trouble of printing the record of evidence, these gentlemen come in a most informal manner to sit about the minister's office and have a general discussion from which the minister ultimately takes something which he can recommend to his colleagues? If so, I submit that the tariff board is working on no principle. There is no way in which the house can check up its work or findings. If we are not to be made aware of the recommendations or findings of the board, what is the use of it? It is simply a sort of confidential ally of the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: Buffer.

Mr. GEARY: It has been described as a buffer; but there is nothing by which this house can check up the reliability of the findings of the board or the recommendation which, the minister says, is the basis for his changes. The tariff board is stopping short in its duty and it can be of no use at all to us, because what the house is asked to do is to take the transcript of evidence, draw its own conclusions and then discuss what facts the house would have found and what recommendations the house would have made from the facts so found. It would be better if the minister and the cabinet, in making a change on the findings of the tariff board, were to have those findings in writing, together with the reasons for the recommendations which the tariff board makes to the minister. In that way we would have something to go on, and there would be none of this cross-firing as to whether or not the change was justified.

Mr. ROBB: I think it was made abundantly clear last session that the tariff board is in the same position as the officers of the department were before the board was created. There is this difference now that the tariff board has been created: before we had a tariff board, those seeking increases in tariff—and from my experience in the department people of that type are rather persistent; I am not saying whether they are right or wrong—would come into the office of the Minister of Finance and present their own side of the story without the other fellow being there to check them up. The minister had then to use his own judgment as to what was in the general interest of the country.

Mr. GEARY: The minister would find the fact.

Mr. ROBB: The tariff board is an open forum, a court, if you will, because the hearings are conducted along that line. Each hearing is advertised and all parties, those who are in favour and those who are opposed, may go before the tariff board and present their case in the open, with the newspapers representing all sides of public opinion present to advise their readers in regard to the evidence brought out before the board. In order to meet the wishes of hon. members we decided last session to print the evidence of the tariff board and that evidence is available for every hon. member who desires to study it. Hon. members must assume the responsibility in reaching their own conclusions just as they do in reaching their own conclusions as to whether the public debt has been reduced or increased, or whether we have a surplus or not. I think that is a fair answer to the question of my hon. friend.

Mr. GEARY: Why in the world does the minister call it a fact-finding board if the facts are not submitted formally to somebody? It is not a fact-finding body at all; it is simply, as the minister said, another officer of the department and a tremendously expensive one at that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: To come back to the item of the tariff under discussion, I find that item 113 in the tariff reads:

Cocoanut, desiccated, sweetened or not: British preference, 5 cents; intermediate, 6 cents; general, 6 cents.

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has split the item into sweetened and unsweetened. I assume that the article will come in now "unsweetened" at the lower rate of duty and "sweetened" at still the higher rate of duty.

Mr. ROBB: It remains where it is.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Where is there any reduction in the tariff in this case?

Mr. ROBB: When we made a similar change in regard to automobiles in 1926, my hon. friend argued there was a reduction.

Mr. CHAPLIN: No; I argued that my hon. friend fooled the people. There was not any reduction at all, and I contend that is true. It never reduced the price of automobiles in Canada one cent except in the matter of the excise taxes that my hon. friend had on them. My hon. friend fooled nobody except a few voters.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to ask the minister a question with respect to this matter. On page 5 of the report dated January 5, 1928, of Mr. Moore, Chairman of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, I find these words:

As was perhaps to be expected from a comparatively new departure in government, some question has been raised as to the boards' functions. As set forth by order in council, April 7, 1926, (P.C. 530).

"The duties of the board are to inquire into and hear representations on all matters pertaining to the tariff and other forms of taxation, as may be directed by the Minister of Finance, and to advise the minister in regard thereto."

Little difficulty has been experienced as to the duty of inquiry. Possibly we might have succeeded better proceeding under a set of questions stated by you, outlining the scope of the investigation, but we believe that on the whole our duty of inquiry has been discharged with reasonable satisfaction. Difficulty, however, exists as to determining the nature of the advice we are presumed by order in council to tender to the minister.

Applications in regard to customs invariably contain submission of evidence with the object of obtaining relief, whether by upward or downward revision of the tariff.

Parliament alone can grant that relief.

What then becomes the nature of the advice expected from the board? Is it for the board to express an opinion that the relief in question should or should not be given? If this be not its function, then is it possible for the board to report its opinion as to the extent to which the reasons urged for relief have been established, without reference or inference bearing upon the justification for relief.

The board has no desire to avoid responsibility. The board has a sincere desire to make its work helpful through you to parliament.

How best, then, may the board convey to you the information which it has received as a result of its investigations? As has been stated, verbatim reports are taken of the proceedings at public hearings. The transcripts will generally be found to contain much evidence helpful in the construction of tariff items in respect to their subject-matter. Reports of the inquiry into the major references, and some of the minor as well, are lengthy, and at times somewhat involved, usually containing valuable statistical matter. To present the evidence in precise form, possesses the advantage of brevity—and the disadvantage of incompleteness.

Then he proceeds about the arguments. The relevancy of the question put to the minister by the hon. member for Muskoka must be apparent in view of the observations of the chairman of the board, which observations I have just read to the house from his report. I ask the minister whether or not the report, upon which he arrived, with the aid of his officials, at the conclusions now embodied in this tariff item, is available? Was the advice tendered in writing?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: If not, there has been a disregard of the duty which I conceive to be that of the board, because we should have before us in writing the advice tendered to the minister in order that we may study not only the evidence given but the advice tendered. I do submit that the purpose of the tariff board as indicated was to enable that to be done, and unless the minister provides us with something on which he grounds his recommendation with respect to this item, the tariff board is a perfect farce. All that the tariff board did was to hear people make statements which the minister was capable of receiving himself in written form from the gentlemen who made the application. Somebody else appears, but in the end what is done is that two or three gentlemen are invited into the ministry and become part of the cabinet. They tender secret advice. They are officers of the department—employees, the minister says. I ask the minister if that is what is intended, that there should be secret advice tendered to the minister, without any written recommendation which the house may be able to consider or criticize, and upon which it may arrive at a conclusion. Certain action is to be taken with respect to every item contained in these changes. Only this evening the minister stated that every change he proposed was based upon a recommendation made by the tariff board. That recommendation should be in writing. That recommendation should be before this parliament. That recommendation should be available to every member of this house. Otherwise, we have substituted for governmental responsibility two or three gentlemen—it was three at first; then one ran off to Manitoba to run an election for hon. gentlemen opposite and he has become a part of the administration in that province, leaving the chairman, who, with one other, considered some of the most important matters affecting western Canada without western Canada having any representative on the board. And now secret advice is to be tendered—nothing open—nothing written. All we have is the word of the minister, which is always beyond question, but his word is based solely on his memory as to the advice tendered him by this board. In the light of the statement made by the chairman of the board himself, that is not the function of the board.

Have we a report from the tariff board this year? I have not seen it yet. The last report I have seen was dated January, 1928. We have no report before the house for the calendar year 1928, and yet we are asked to proceed to a discussion of these tariff items and arrive at conclusions with respect to them, not having before us any report made by that body which cost this country so much money last year. I ask the minister if that is his idea. Does he want us to think that? I am sure he does not. I am sure that he intends that we should have before us the report of the tariff board in writing. I have seen no report brought down this year, and I do submit that it is time we had it. I would ask the minister when we may expect it. I had made a note to ask him that question on the orders of the day some days ago, but I failed to ask him. The report for 1928 has not been tabled, I think. The only one tabled, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is the one which I have in my hand, which is for a period of time ending January, 1928. Is it proposed that we shall have the report from the chairman of the tariff board, and that the report shall be printed and made available to the members of the house before we consider the tariff changes that the minister proposes? If that report is not available to us, I ask the minister why he talks about this board at all. It becomes then, I will not say a secret tribunal, but a public tribunal that is tendering secret advice. That is not what the Canadian people expect from a tariff board. This is not a hole-in-the-corner business of which the minister used to talk. He used to complain of people affected coming to Ottawa and meeting the minister and making representations with regard to their particular industries, but is that any worse than the farce and hypocrisy of a tribunal that hears evidence publicly and tenders advice secretly?

The minister says that the members of the board are his servants. That is not the idea of the Canadian people. That was not in the mind of Sir Thomas White when he introduced his bill providing for the appointment of a tariff board, the bill that was killed in the senate. The purpose was to have a tribunal clothed with powerful functions, that the Canadian people should have a tribunal beyond suspicion, not men looking for office, looking to their own election in Manitoba or Ontario, not men who were concerned about their own political fortunes, but men who would sit in a judicial capacity and adjudicate and determine and make written recommendations in which the Canadian people would have some confidence and upon which the minister might act with confidence. The minister has before him nothing more than a limited knowledge of this whole transaction, and he hopes to get all his proposals through simply by saying: "All these changes are made on the recommendations of the tariff board. I do not know who Dodwell and Company are, or who Mr. Deachman is, or the consumers' league, but I called them in, and they sat in my office. I heard their recommendations, and I ask you to accept these changes." That is not discharging the functions of the minister; that is not discharging the functions of the tariff board.

Mr. ROBB: I am sure that my hon. friend did not mean to leave the impression that I had called in the consumers' league and Dodwell and Company.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the tariff board.

Mr. ROBB: I consulted with them along with the permanent officers of the department, and the evidence taken by the board is printed and available to every member of the house. Perhaps I was remiss in not tabling and having printed the report of the board. I have the report here, and I shall be glad to send it over to my hon. friend, and if the house desires, I shall be glad to have it printed.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it apply to all these items?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think it does. It is a report generally. I can read part of it now.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to tire the hon. gentleman by asking him to read it all, but perhaps he would read part of it.

Mr. ROBB: This is the annual report of the advisory board on tariff and taxation, for 1928-29:

Since the date of its last annual report, the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation has received for investigation twenty-seven references, being numbers ninety-eight to one hundred and twenty-four inclusive. This brings the total number of references to this board to date, to one hundred and twenty-four, as listed in detail in the accompanying memorandum.

During the fiscal year now ending, the board has spent thirty days in public sittings, devoted to the initiation or furtherance of inquiry in forty-one references. In the period under report, hearings of references were as follows:

First hearings..	26
Second hearings..	17
Third, or further hearings.. ..	4
Total..	47

Major subjects of investigation during the past year were: Cement, paints and varnishes, aluminum and aluminum products, copper rods, sewing machines, coal and coke, printed matter and iron and steel.

Inspections

The board has continued during the past twelve months, its policy of visiting plants, and meeting at the scene of their labours many of those whose problems have been brought, directly or indirectly, to its notice. These visits have been of the greatest value, not alone in adding to the store of information available to the board and its investigators, but in establishing between the board and scores of industries an intimate understanding that has been mutually beneficial. Farming areas also were visited in connection with references arising from or bearing specifically upon the industry of agriculture, notably in western Canada.

Printing

A new departure since last March is that of printing the records of public sittings. Printing of the verbatim records was begun in June, and to date complete records have been issued, or are now on the press, for the following:

Paints and varnishes
Cement
Coal and Coke
Iron and steel
Stoves and parts
Sewing machines
Celotex
Sardines and herring
Copper rods
Aluminum and its products
Enamel ware
Ethylene glycol
Thin plate glass
Cigars

Personnel

Changes in the personnel of the board were necessitated during the year by the resignation in June of Mr. Alfred Lambert, Montreal, and, in October, of Mr. D. G. McKenzie of Brandon. Mr. Lambert's place was taken by Mr. Hector H. Racine, wholesale dry goods merchant, of Montreal, while the appointment of Mr. McKenzie's successor is still pending.

(Signed) W. H. Moore, Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole report? What is the date of it?

Mr. ROBB: February 22, 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will agree that he should have laid that on the table.

Mr. ROBB: I do. I will table it now.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In view of the fact that the splitting of this tariff item—it was one item before—means a gift to the manufacturers of sweetened cocoanut of $66,000, I would ask that this item stand in order that I may be able to produce certain information.

Mr. SPOTTON: I also was going to suggest that the item should stand. As the chairman of the tariff board is campaigning in his own constituency to-night, giving table talks on tariff, and the minister is confused, it might be well if the item were left over until the chairman is back from his constituency and is able to tender the minister a little advice in the matter.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—172a. Directories for free reference directory libraries when imported by publishers of directories for use only in such free reference directory libraries: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the old rate?

Mr. BENNETT: What is this?

Mr. ROBB: Directories for free reference directory libraries when imported by publishers of directories for use only in such free reference directory libraries enter under the present tariff at rates of five, ten and ten per cent. It is proposed to allow them to enter duty free. This request was made by Might Directories Limited, Toronto. The imports are not traceable.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208f. Fused borax, commercially or generally known as borax glass: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. STEVENS: On reference to the tariff schedule I find that borax comes in free under item 208. Now we have this particular class of borax, known as fused borax, put on the free list. What is the object of segregating it in this way?

Mr. ROBB: The present rates on fused borax are 15, 17½ and 17½ per cent under item 711.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ROBB: At present borax comes in free of duty under tariff item 208. The proposed new item will permit the free entry of fused borax. It is not made in Canada. It is merely borax with the water element driven off. The imports are not ascertainable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is it used for?

Mr. ROBB: In enamelling iron ware, forming glazes on earthenware, and in medicine.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this the item wanted by William J. Michaud & Company, Montreal?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it borax glass dealt with at the hearing on November 15, 1927?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: What is the significance of the minister's statement that this is not made in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I was giving that as information to the committee.

Mr. GEARY: What has it to do with the question, whether fused borax is made in Canada or not?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends complain when I give them information, and they also complain when they do not get any.

Mr. GEARY: I think the minister has admitted that we should have information so that we may be able to consider the item and discuss it intelligently. Now the minister tells us that this commodity is not made in Canada. Apparently that is the fact-finding upon which is based the change in the tariff. I want to know from the minister of what significance is it to him that fused borax is not made in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I have given the information to the house that I think it is not made in Canada. My hon. friend can draw his own conclusions.

Mr. GEARY: Facts are nothing unless they lead somewhere. The minister is not finding facts in his tariff schedule; he is applying conclusions to the schedule drawn from facts. One of the facts, we are told, is that fused borax is not made in Canada. I desire to know how far that has influenced the minister in his action.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the question of the hon. gentleman is too difficult, because after all this government states at election times that it proposes to introduce a tariff for revenue, and then it takes the duty off those things not made in Canada in order to render it impossible to have a revenue tariff. You see the illogical character of the change makes it impossible for the minister to answer the question.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister whether the tariff board find as a fact that fused borax is made from borax?

Mr. ROBB: I have given my hon. friend the information handed to me. The evidence is available to him; he might read it.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is scarcely fair. I am aware there is a great mass of evidence given before the board, but surely the minister will agree with me that members of the house cannot possibly read, and study, and weigh all that evidence, especially with Mr. Deachman in attendance, because from what I have seen there are reams, not of evidence, but of the most reckless form of propaganda. We have to wade through thousands of pages of that sort of stuff to pick out here and there a few facts. Here are the facts as I see them. At the present time borax, so described in the Customs Tariff, 1917, with amendments, is scheduled under item 208. Item 208 is free. Now, item 711, to which the minister refers, and under which he says fused borax has been coming in, provides a duty of 15, 17½ and 17½ per cent. I have no means of determining whether my reasoning is sound, but as near as I can see it the point at issue is this: Is fused borax made from borax, which is free of duty? Obviously it has been enjoying a protection of 17½. By the reduction from 17½ to free, is the minister doing an injustice to any existing industry in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I hope not.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says he hopes not; but he is unable to give me the information I am asking for which will enable me to judge whether fused borax is made from borax, and if it is made in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I have just told my hon. friend that the proposed new item will permit the free entry of borax glass, which, according to the evidence at the public sitting of the tariff board, is not made in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that the finding of Mr. Moore as chairman of the board?

Mr. ROBB: That is the statement that comes over to me as a memorandum from the tariff board.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it on the authority of Mr. Moore?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot tell my hon. friend. It is taken from the evidence.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the point I am getting at,—is it simply an observation that has been made before the board, or a finding by Mr. Moore after hearing evidence? If Mr. Moore, on his responsibility as chairman of the board, says that this article is not produced in Canada, of course we will accept his findings; but if that is simply a part of the evidence given, we will say, by some person asking for the reduction or opposing it, then such a statement would not be of much value to the house.

Mr. ROBB: May I clear this up at once? A moment ago my hon. friend paid me a very great compliment. He says he has no time to read this evidence, but he thinks I have so little to do that I can read it.

Mr. STEVENS I did not make that statement.

Mr. ROBB That was the implication.

Mr. STEVENS: No. I read a great deal of it. I receive it, as other members do, and spend hours reading it, but I do say that I find, looking through the evidence, that there are hundreds and, I venture to say, during the past year, thousands of pages containing merely prejudiced utterances and not evidence at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Just yapping.

Mr. STEVENS: And I guarantee that the minister does not read it. I will venture the statement that 90 per cent of the material in the evidence, under the name of Mr. Deachman, is not read by the minister.

Mr. ROBB: Make it 95 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Ninety-five per cent, then. And the reason the minister will not read it is the reason I won't read it. I have known Mr. Deachman for twenty-five years and he is an estimable gentleman in many respects.

Mr. ROBB: Why pick him out?

Mr. BENNETT: Because he takes up most of the time of the board.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, because he takes up the major portion of the board's time, not in presenting evidence but in making reckless statements.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Bringing out the evidence.

Mr. STEVENS: There is one of the gentlemen who are supposed to pay for it.

Mr. SPOTTON: Supposed.

Mr. STEVENS: And they are now trying to induce an unsuspecting public to help to pay for the retention of Mr. Deachman before the board, giving him a cheap living, a good living. I have known him for probably twenty-five years, and in many respects he is an estimable gentleman. But he is an avowed free trader who positively will not allow to enter his mind any evidence that would go to interfere with his fixed ideas on free trade. He is an absolutely prejudiced witness of the most pronounced type.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He is not a witness.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly, that is the point. Material by thousands of pages is now published and presented on the public platform by the hon. member for Weyburn as evidence given before a responsible tariff board, deluding the public. My hon. friend and others who sit near him go before audiences in this country, presenting to them printed statements under the aegis of this government, under orders in council of this government, and say, "This is evidence before the tariff commission of Canada." And it is nothing more or less than the vaporings of Mr. Deachman given forth as evidence. Then the minister comes in and says to me, with a smile on his face and a wink in his eye—

Mr. ROBB: Not the wink.

Mr. STEVENS: He says, "Surely hon. gentlemen can read the evidence." And, as I say, about 60 per cent of it consists of the vaporings of Mr. Deachman. I refuse to waste my time reading it.

Mr. BENNETT: And the country's money.

Mr. STEVENS: And the country's money as well.

Mr. ROBB: It is not fair to pick out only Mr. Deachman's and say that I did not read 95 per cent of it. I did not read 95 per cent of all the material.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is what we thought.

Mr. ROBB: But this is the point before the committee, namely, that the present rates on this product are 15 per cent, 17½ per cent and 17½ per cent. This borax is used in the enamelling of ironware, forming glaze on earthenware, and also in medicine; and after the hearing before the tariff board, where there was no opposition, and in consultation with the officers of the department and the members of the tariff board who had heard the evidence, we decided to put it on the free list. The question now is to decide whether or not the committee wants to put it on the free list or to leave it where it is with the rates of duty I have mentioned.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister told us that raw borax was used as flux. I would ask him this question: Is borax glass a waste product?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend probably knows more about it than I do.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is information of this kind that should come before the house. I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. ROBB: I say I am not so well posted as my hon. friend.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Then we had better pass this item along because I shall have something further to say when I have the information.

Mr. ROBB: No; this is a fair item and we will test the committee on it.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that this evidence had been printed, but the hearing took place six months before any evidence was printed, and there is no record of it for members of this house. The hearing took place in November, 1927, and Mr. Moore in his report says that he began to print the evidence in June. But, as I say, there is no record before the members of this committee. Is that fair? Is it fair to say now that the members of this committee had as good an opportunity to read the evidence as had the minister, who asks us to come to a conclusion with respect to the matter.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right; the evidence was not printed.

Mr. WHITE (London): The minister has not told the committee how much difference it will make to the revenues of the country if this item goes through. He has said that this article is to be brought in free. He has given us the information with regard to the free entry of borax, but he has not yet stated the policy of the government in the matter. He has not told us whether they have changed their policy and decided to bring in free everything which is not produced in Canada. If so, have they abandoned the old idea of a tariff for revenue?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: I am unable to give the evidence as to the reduction in revenue because, as I have said, the commodity comes under another item and is not traceable.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I know what ordinary ground borax is used for; as the minister has told the house, it is used as flux. The people who work in iron and steel know also what it is used for. I am asking the minister now for information as to what borax glass is, whether it is a waste product and what it is used for. We have no information about that, and the minister does not tell us. No one in his department seems to know. The gentleman who is advising him on the subject cannot tell him. Why does he not let us know what the facts are?

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to the reduction?

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is the same old story again. The minister asked me the same thing about automobiles a few minutes ago and I gave the answer. I can answer him about this too if he wants the answer.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to have the answer.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But the minister is there to give us information.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Give us the answer.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You can wait too.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough to say whether this reduction is in the interests of the manufacturers?

Mr. ROBB: I have said that this product is used in enamelling ironware, in glazing earthenware, and also in medicine, and the rates of duty are 15, 17½, and 17½. It is proposed to make it free.

Mr. COOTE: Then that is an affirmative answer to the question I asked.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Absolutely.

Mr. COOTE: In view of that answer will my hon. friends to my right allow the item to pass?

Mr. CHAPLIN: My hon. friend knows very well that we have nothing to do with allowing the item to pass. We are asking for fair information which is not forthcoming from the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: And the record is not before the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: I have sent for the evidence and I should like to see it.

Mr. ROBB: It is not printed.

Mr. STEVENS: That is hardly fair on the part of the minister. He said I might have read it for myself and now he says it is not printed. There is a distinct question at issue on that point. The point is that fused borax is made from borax; fused borax is undoubtedly an article made from borax. I have asked for some information regarding this material so that we may estimate whether or not it is good business for this country to change from the classification of 711. Let me point out that the government have been classifying this article under item 711, which reads as follows:

All goods not enumerated in this schedule as subject to any other rate of duty, and not otherwise declared free of duty, and not being goods the importation whereof is by law prohibited—15 per cent, 17½ per cent, 17½ per cent.

That does not mention fused borax at all; it is simply an omnibus item into which classification the customs department can put a lot of miscellaneous articles and impose duty upon them. Borax is classified under item 208, and this has been the case right along.

Mr. ROBB: Not fused borax.

Mr. STEVENS: All borax.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does not the minister think he had better let this item stand until to-morrow in order to obtain further information? We do not know how much was imported; we do not know what the duty was; we do not know what the article is used for or what purpose is to be served by this proposed change. I think it would be well to let it stand until we get further information on the subject; we cannot legislate in the dark like this.

Mr. ROBB: I do not mind telling the committee again that it is not possible to trace the importations because, as my hon. friend has said, this article came in under an omnibus item because there was no special classification for it. I have told my hon. friends what it is used for. The duty now is 15 per cent, 17½ per cent and 17½ per cent, and after inquiry we propose to make it free. There was a public sitting of the board, at which evidence was given that this article is not made in Canada, and there was no opposition to the application.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does not the minister think the tariff board should have found out how much of this article is imported into Canada?

Mr. ROBB: How could they?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the trouble? Would not the people appearing before the board know something of it and what use is made of it? Surely the board have not exhausted their investigation if they have not found out those relevant facts.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to ask the minister a question in order to assist him in giving us the information. Will he tell us who are William J. Michaud and Company of Montreal? In order to show on what I base my question I may say that I give this name from page 10 of the report, item 78. That is all the printed evidence before the committee with regard to this item.

Mr. ROBB: I understand they are wholesale importers and jobbers. I do not know their rating, but if my hon. friends so desire I might look up Dun or Bradstreet and secure that information.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the first light we have had on the matter. These people are not manufacturers and they are not competent to say whether or not an industry is being affected. They made an application to the board, presumably in good faith, in their personal interests. On their evidence, apparently, we are told that this article is not manufactured in Canada, and I submit that is pretty flimsy evidence. I think the minister should let this item stand until we have further information.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to ask the minister a question. Would he tell the committee whether Mr. Deachman has absolutely sanctioned the free importation of this article?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister said a few moments ago that there was a duty on fused borax and that it was under a separate item. Would he tell us what were the importations of fused borax last year on which duty was paid? There was no duty on ordinary borax, which comes into Canada free.

Mr. ROBB: I have told the committee already that it came in under a blanket item and that we were not able to trace the imports.

Mr. RYCKMAN: At this late hour I dislike to ask the minister to favour me, but I am engaged in the business of enamelling ironware and I have not heard what effect this change may have on that business. Frankly, I would like to make some inquiries.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to the item?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not know; I may not object at all, but I could find out by a telegram what influence this change would have upon a business which is well established in Canada and in which many people are interested. If the minister has made exhaustive inquiries these people may be quite well satisfied, but this is an important business and if it is not interfered with I shall be only too glad to make no objection to the item. I ask this purely on personal grounds and in absolutely good faith.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend make fused borax or does he use it?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister has said that this article is used in enamelling ironware. I am a director of a company which is engaged in enamelling ironware as part of its business, and I have not heard anything about this change. I really would like to know whether I am attacked, boosted or thrown down.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is the first member of the house to acknowledge that he uses this product.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I acknowledge that I am interested in a company which enamels ironware.

Mr. ROBB: Before the hearing was held a full month's notice was given the trade and no person appeared in opposition. If my hon. friend is interested in it we will let the item stand for the present.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—215. Stearic acid, n.o.p., 12½ per cent, British preferential tariff; 17½ per cent, intermediate tariff; 20 per cent, general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: The only change in this item is to add "n.o.p.".

Mr. STEVENS: What is the reason for merely adding those words? It is in the schedule now at the proposed rates, so why add the words "not otherwise provided". There must be some reason.

Mr. ROBB: It is proposed to widen item 215a, formerly item 777, to make it cover stearic acid for manufacturers of crayons as well as for makers of candles. The main raw materials of the crayon industry are paraffin, wax and stearic acid. The latter is not made in Canada, so the loss of duty would be negligible. Stearic acid for other purposes is dutiable.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Why should an ordinary person who wants to use this article be discriminated against to the extent of 20 per cent while the manufacturer imports that article free of duty? I heard the minister say his was a low tariff policy; I supported the budget this year, but here we have an item which is free to the manufacturers but which costs anyone else 20 per cent. Is that fair?

Mr. ROBB: The manufacturers of crayons were asking for an increase in duty, and the decision arrived at was that we were not disposed to give them that increase, but we thought we could help them by giving them this reduction in the raw material.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): For what purpose is stearic acid used, outside of the manufacture of candles and crayons?

Mr. BENNETT: Was that under reference number 96? Was that the application of the crayon company at Peterborough, heard on May 16, 1928 and November 30, 1928?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that is the one.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the rates of duty on candles and crayons?

Mr. ROBB: Seventeen and a half per cent on crayons and 25 per cent on candles.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, the policy of this government is to give the manufacturer his raw material at a cheaper rate in order to enable him to exact the full tariff from the consumer. I find item after item in the schedule containing the words "for manufacturers' use only," or their equivalent. No less than three items on the first page, three on the second and one on the last, contain this proviso.

Mr. IRVINE: Is that expression used in the budget?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is all in the budget. It only shows the utter hypocrisy of the low tariff policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member probably has lost sight of the fact that before the change was made the manufacturer of crayons was paying 20 per cent on part of his raw material, while he had only 17½ per cent protection on his manufactured article.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the situation now?

Mr. ROBB: He will obtain his stearic acid free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What will be the situation of the consumer with regard to that product?

Mr. BENNETT: The price will be lower.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the duty be increased to the consumer?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the duty on the finished product any lower? The minister is telling us that he is lowering the duty on the raw material, which will benefit the manufacturer, but he is not touching the duty on the fininshed product.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Did the minister say that these applicants were asking for an increased duty?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And instead of increasing the duty, he gave them some help by reducing the duty on their raw material?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is an indirect way of giving them more protection.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is a very direct way.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And means a loss of revenue.

Mr. ROBB: That is not quite the fair way to put it. We must keep in mind the fact that he was paying more on the raw material than the protection he had on the finished material.

Mr. COOTE: Would that statement apply to candles as well as to crayons?

Mr. ROBB: The candle men have this privilege now.

Mr. COOTE: Were the candle men paying a higher rate of duty than the rate of protection on candles?

Mr. ROBB: The candle men were receiving their stearic acid free of duty.

Mr. BENNETT: And candles were free.

Mr. EVANS: This incident may seem insignificant but it is serious as showing the policy of the government in putting raw material on the free list but leaving the duty intact on the finished article. We find the same situation throughout the whole schedule; every change that is made is made in the manufacturers' interest. Is there nothing for the consumer at all? Is that the policy of the Liberal party? I would like to know if the tariff advisory board recommended that alteration, and I would like to know also if that board is simply to be a link between the manufacturers and the politicians.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does it not look as though the representative of the consumers' league was asleep at the switch?

Mr. SHORT: What will the loss of revenue be in connection with this item?

Mr. ROBB: The imports are not traceable as they are mixed up with other items. It might interest the hon. gentlemen to know of some of the troubles we have in the department. These manufacturers of crayons made a very strong appeal for an increase in the duty on crayons; they wanted it increased to 40 per cent general, and 30 per cent British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that evidence printed?

Mr. SHORT: It seems as though we cannot get very much information from the minister on these items. A few minutes ago I understood him to say that the loss in revenue would not amount to anything, that it was immaterial; if that is the case, it would appear that these items are being changed in order to deceive the public into thinking they are getting something for nothing; trying to make them think that some item is coming in free when they are actually getting no benefit whatever.

Mr. ROBB: We are putting it into a separate class so that we will be able to trace it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River). If there is to be very little loss in revenue, I fail to see how the minister has met the wishes of the manufacturers in giving them the advantage they asked for.

Mr. ROBB: I have not.

Mr. SHORT: They are fooling the public, that is the idea.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid the minister cannot get away with that. Either he does not know what he is doing or he is doing something for the manufacturers.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was the same thing in the case of automobiles.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The unfortunate minister does not really know. I do not know whether Mr. Deachman has had anything to do with this, but someone has made the recommendation to the minister. I am inclined to discount much of Mr. Deachman's material, but he appears to have stirred up the protectionists and in that way I am almost convinced that he must be of some value to the low tariff element in this country.

Mr. STEVENS: As a propagandist he is quite good.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not sure whether the tirade against Mr. Deachman was not the result of one or two little articles which he wrote against the hon. gentlemen on the front benches of the Conservative party. But apart from the value of his material—and after all, one has to study it a good deal to make sure that it contains any value at all—there is a great deal of entertainment in it, and I am sure the members of the house would not miss it for anything.

Mr. STEVENS: It is good fiction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the minister should be prepared at all times to give the committee the fullest possible information on these matters, particularly with respect to the possibilities of a loss in revenue. He should be able to tell us what benefit will accrue according to his own opinion or the report he receives from the tariff board. If he would give us that information there would be much less difficulty in getting these items through, or at least in getting some of them through. If he would state at the outset that it was for the manufacturers' benefit, I do not think my friends in the Conservative party would raise much objection to the item.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the evidence in this particular case been printed?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Could we get even a typewritten copy of it for our information? We are anxious to obtain some information in order that we may deal intelligently with these matters. Some resolution or order in council was passed last session providing that all this evidence should be available to the members of the house.

Mr. ROBB: I shall be very glad to table the typewritten evidence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There must be some information regarding this particular item, and I would ask that this item stand until we obtain that information.

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the evidence, but after having listened to what the members of the tariff board had to say, I know that the application was for an increased duty on crayons. I think that is what the evidence will show. We were not disposed to grant the application.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no evidence on this point at all, then.

Mr. ROBB: There is evidence that it is used as one of their raw materials.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think the minister is quite fair. He says that this was an application made to the tariff board for an increase in duty on crayons, and that he was not disposed to grant that. Did he say he was not disposed to grant the increase?

Mr. ROBB: Yes; I was not disposed to give them the increase they asked for.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The application was made to him as Minister of Finance. He was not disposed to grant the increase and he transferred the application to the tariff board. Is that the procedure?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The tariff board considered the matter. Did the board, on its own initiative and its own ability to determine policy, actually decide: Well, we cannot give these fellows this increase in protection; but we are going to do just as much for them; we are going to do the same thing as giving them protection; we are going to reduce the duty on the raw product, the material entering into their manufacture. They come to the minister and they say: These poor manufacturers came to us and asked for an increase; you told us to consider their case; we have considered it and we think they are deserving; but we know it would not do for the minister of a low tariff government to bring in an increase in protection, and so we have made a recommendation that the duty be reduced on the raw product. The minister comes into the house and says that the whole policy of the government is to lower tariffs; that its policy is tariff for revenue. Then he turns around and gives the manufacturers the only relief that is given on the items I have read so far in the schedule. The situation is amazing. I would like the minister to tell the committee just on what argument he was convinced that he should provide this changed item in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: On the argument of enabling this industry to get its raw material at a lower rate of duty than it was paying on the finished product.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But why?

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend argue that we should help industries in this country by charging them a higher rate of duty on their raw materials than on their finished product? A previous government at one time thought they could help the manufacturers of tractors in Canada by putting tractors on the free list and leaving the raw material with a higher rate of duty. The result was that they closed up all the tractor business throughout Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister mean that seriously?

Mr. ROBB: I do mean it seriously.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, those are not the facts.

Mr. ROBB: I have applications before the Department of Finance now for rebates of losses that were made by certain industries that were closed up.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the minister said.

Mr. ROBB: This is not a new policy of attempting to make the duty on the raw material a little less than that on the finished product. That was the policy when the duties on agricultural implements were changed in 1924. That was the policy when the duty on automobiles was changed in 1926. That was the policy last year when the duty on textiles was changed. Each year, according to hon. gentlemen opposite—and they managed to get together on it, and sometimes, but not always, they managed to vote with the government—we have been ruining industry. Now the argument is that we are helping industry. It is pretty hard to satisfy the house when it is in that frame of mind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister through with his sophistry? because it is nothing else. The first of all raises the argument that hon. members to my right, to the left of the Speaker, did irreparable damage to the tractor industry of Canada by allowing tractors to come in free while leaving a high rate of duty on the raw materials, and then he proceeds to relate that to this item. The situation is as hypocritical as is the policy of the government. There is no relation at all between the two cases. In this particular case the minister is making the raw product free and leaving the duty on the finished product, which the customer uses, as high as it ever was. I believe it is high—17½ per cent and 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is 20 per cent under the general tariff.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): After all, the question is not: what is good for the manufacturers? I think the government is looking after them well enough. I am thinking of the consumer; I am more concerned with the consumer than with the manufacturer. If the minister could only find some means of inducing the protectionists within his party to consent to some reductions of duty that would be of direct advantage to the consumer instead of always to the manufacturer, not only would he be more in keeping with the policy of his party, but he would receive more support from this party.

Mr. ROBB: The duties on crayons are 15 and 17½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is very substantial considering the fact that the raw material comes in free of duty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I confess I am a little mixed up in connection with the nature of this application. I understood the minister to say that the application by the Crayon Company of Peterborough was for an increase. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I can hardly understand the minister in connection with that observation. I hold in my hand the printed report of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, and on page 11 I find reference number 96:

Subject—Crayons and chalk.
Upward or downward revision—Decrease.
Applicant—Canada Crayon Company Limited.

Mr. ROBB: That is a decrease in the duty on the raw material.

Mr. BENNETT: I now turn to the manuscript dated 1928-1929, which the minister should have presented to the house and which, instead, he kept in his cabinet. And I find again on page 11:

Article—Crayons.
Applicant—Canada Crayon Company Limited, Peterborough.
Up or Down—Upward.
Dates of Hearing—First hearing, May 16, 1928.
Second hearing, November 30, 1928.

The evidence certainly was not printed, because Mr. Moore says in his report that he did not commence to print until June. He says:

Printing of the verbatim records was begun in June, and to date complete records have been issued, or are now on the press, for the following.

And in the list I do not see any mention of crayons. But the last answer of the hon. gentleman and the observations he has made make very clear these words of Mr. Moore:

The board has continued, during the past twelve months, its policy of visiting plants, and meeting at the scene of their labours many of those whose problems have been brought, directly or indirectly, to its notice. These visits have been of the greatest value, not alone in adding to the store of information available to the board and its investigators, but in establishing between the board and scores of industries an intimate understanding that has been mutually beneficial.

I put it to the house; I put it to the country, whether or not Mr. W. H. Moore, who is holding tariff talks to-night in his constituency, as the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) says, is not visiting these plants for the purpose of fixing these people up in a way that they do not ask in order to secure their support in the next election. This is the record of Mr. Moore himself:

In establishing between the board and scores of industries an intimate understanding—

Between the manufacturers and themselves. That is what this country has come to under the tariff board which the Minister of Finance has established. Where is the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) with his "intimate understanding?" Is that his idea of a tariff board: then when an application is made one year for a decrease and the next year for an increase, the minister, not being able, because it would offend these very gentlemen for whom he speaks, now changes his mind and says: We will put your raw material on the free list, but we will not reduce the duty on the finished article, so you will get that much protection, and in that way an "intimate understanding" is established between the manufacturers and the government?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps now that we have heard from hon. gentlemen who are interested in this, it might be a good idea to hear what the crayon company themselves have to say.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we have been trying to get.

Mr. ROBB: I had a memorandum given to me one day this week by representatives of the company. It is unsigned. It is on their own letterhead.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the government first decides, and then this evidence is produced by these gentlemen, and it is unsigned. Is this an "intimate understanding"?

Mr. ROBB: I should have said, it is undated. It is on the letterhead of the Canada Crayon Company, Limited, manufacturers of crayons, carpenters' and railroad chalks, Peterborough, Ontario. The letter is signed by the Canada Crayon Company, Limited, per J. W. Gravestock, Managing Director. It says that this company, located in Peterborough, were told to state their case to the tariff board, and on doing so they met no opposition, but considerable and unnecessary delay. They say:

We went ahead with the company on the basis of the government doing the correct thing with the tariff, but the only help they gave us was a total of about $40 a year by allowing stearic acid to come in free.

We have installed the most modern equipment and have adequate finances. It was our intention to add many more lines providing we got protection on the present ones, which are what would be described as our "bread and butter" lines. We intended to turn out various grades of water colour paints as soon as our crayon business had been protected, but now that we have been given no protection, not only can we not go ahead with the paint end of the business, but it is more than doubtful if we can even continue to manufacture anything here at all. We have been operating at a substantial loss ever since we started and obviously cannot continue. Unless help is forthcoming before our present raw materials are consumed, we shall have to go out of business and have arranged that our machinery and equipment can be readmitted to the United States.

That sounds like an old story. We heard it in 1924 and again in 1926. We hear it every time.

Mr. SHORT: The letter may have been written in 1924. It is undated, the minister said.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Judging from the paper, it looks as if it had been written ten years ago.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the point before the committee is of considerable importance and I want to make sure that I have got correctly the steps of the reasoning which the questions to the minister have disclosed. First of all, I understand that there is in Canada a consumers' league. I understand that manufacturers are very large consumers, and therefore they belong to the league.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): You are dreaming.

Mr. IRVINE: It sounds like a nightmare. I understand, further that this consumers' league, acting for some of the greatest consumers in Canada, has undertaken to give them relief through the reduction of customs duties upon the raw materials they use. These reductions in some cases have been material; in other cases the duties have been entirely wiped out and the goods put on the free list. This must, of course, reduce the amount of money coming into the treasury by the amount of the tariff reduction, and where the goods are put on the free list there would be no tariff revenue derived from that article at all. Meanwhile other consumers of Canada who do not belong to the consumers' league must still pay the 20 per cent on the finished product of the consumer of the first part, and not only that, but the consumers of the second part must also pay the deficit to the treasury which has been brought about by putting the articles on the free list in the interests of the consumers of the first part. Is that the position?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a scientific tariff.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would ask if this is what the minister calls scientific tariff making.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to it?

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the minister is going to give us that evidence. I would remind the minister of what he said to me earlier in this discussion on another item. He rather threw across to me the evidence as if to say, let the hon. member read that. Now on all these previous items and on this item we have not the evidence printed, and we have not had an opportunity of reading it. It is not fair to come before the committee without something at least that would give us the information upon which to base an opinion. The only thing we have in this case is the undated memorandum which the minister read from the company.

Mr. ROBB: That is a criticism of the budget.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a criticism of the budget; it is not evidence upon which the minister bases his position at all. The facts are these, as far as I can judge from Mr. Moore's report. The company made an application for a decrease in the tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on their finished product.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Moore says it was an application for a decrease; the minister says an increase.

Mr. EULER: That is wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: Has my hon. friend not heard of a manufacturer asking for a decrease on the raw materials entering into his finished products?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quoting from the report which Mr. W. H. Moore made to Hon. J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Customs questions my statement. The point is this. We are asked to place implicit trust in this tariff board headed by Mr. Moore. We are asked to accept everything they present through the mouth of the minister at one hundred per cent of its face value. I have shown the minister that inadvertently, because I am sure he would not do it intentionally, he has misinformed the house on this matter. He has been led astray by verbal reports, I suppose, from the tariff board, which are not in harmony with their written report. I submit that we should not be asked to pass tariff items on such a flimsy basis as this.

Mr. BENNETT: However insignificant the amount involved might be.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. The minister a moment ago said that it was only $40, but it was $40 to one company that was just commencing operations. How many other companies are affected? There was a pencil company in the constituency of North York, formerly represented by the Prime Minister, a company which enlisted his great support on one occasion. What would be the effect on them?

Mr. RYCKMAN: They went broke.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister at one time was quite interested in their welfare—as a public man, I mean. The Minister of Customs expresses doubt as to the accuracy of my statement. He is very clear and logical when he deals with the tariff, and he knows a great deal about it. I am sure if he would give his attention to some of these items, this one relating to stearic acid, and one or two others that we have touched upon, he could contribute something that would be valuable to the committee. Of course, he has been wholly unable to read the evidence; we could not expect him to read it. None of the ministers has had the time to read the evidence. The minister says that the board does not make a finding. He tells the house that the board is a fact-finding body, but yet he bases his position on some verbal discussions he has had with the board, after consultation with two or three of the officers in his department, and upon this general information that he has received from his officers and Mr. Moore and probably one of his colleagues, these items are framed and brought before us, and possibly the most influential voice is supposed to be that of the consumers' league. But as my hon. friends to the left are now finding out, there is a nigger in the woodpile so far as the consumers' league is concerned.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, when I stated to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that he must be mistaken, I based that statement on the knowledge that I have. I could not understand for a moment the consistency of a firm asking for a decrease in the tariff at one time, and then for an increase at another. Such a contradictory attitude is not reasonable. But I do happen to know that in both instances they did ask for an increase in the tariff, because members of the firm in question came to my office and spoke to me with regard to the necessity of an increase in the tariff if their business was to be saved.

Mr. STEVENS: On the finished product?

Mr. EULER: Certainly. If in the report which has been read by my hon. friend they are shown as asking for a decrease, I am very certain there must be an error. If they asked for a decrease, most assuredly it must be on the raw material which it is now proposed to make free.

I must say that I fail entirely to understand the position of my hon. friends opposite or that of my hon. friends in the corner to the right. The difference between them, as I take it, is to be found in the history of the two parties—one party being in favour of protection, the other being opposed to protection as a low-tariff or free trade party.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister combines them both.

Mr. EULER: Just two days ago the representatives of this company came to my office and stated their difficulty. At the time I suppose they had no knowledge of the reduction in the tariff on their raw material.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it was in the budget.

Mr. EULER: Well, they stated to me at that time that unless they received an increase in the tariff on the finished product they could not survive. I do not know whether that is true or not, but that is the situation as they represented it to me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Should not the tariff board have found that out at the investigation?

Mr. EULER: I am just stating what is within my knowledge because of what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre said a few minutes ago. I may go a little further. Speaking for myself alone—and I think what I am going to say will meet with the approval of everybody, my hon. friends directly opposite as well as my hon. friends to the right—I submit that if the government can assist any industry—and after all a manufacturer is a citizen of this country and deserving of consideration as well as any other citizen, and the mere fact that he is a manufacturer should not prejudice him—if the government can help any manufacturer without injuring the consumer, I think my hon. friends to the right will have no objection to such action. That, it seems to me, is exactly what was being done in this case. By giving a reduction on the raw material the manufacturer will be enabled to produce his product a little more cheaply, and, whether he does or not, he ought to pass on to the consumer some of the advantage,—

An hon. MEMBER: That is the problem.

Mr. EULER: —if he can stand it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. EULER: That is a perfectly fair argument. If he has been able at all to survive with the duty on his raw material in the past, assuredly he should not increase the price to the consumer now that he is able to buy his raw material a little cheaper. Therefore by this act of legislation the consumer is not going to be injured, but the manufacturer may legitimately receive a little assistance. That seems to me to be the position.

For the life of me I cannot see why my hon. friends on the other side should object if the manufacturer is assisted, unless they accuse us of inconsistency in so assisting the manufacturer; but I see no inconsistency at all in our attitude. The consumer himself is not injured because the manufacturer can produce more cheaply than he did before, and at the very worst he should not charge any higher price to the consumer, and perhaps he will charge a lower price by reason of the fact that he can manufacture more cheaply.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I have just found my portfolio, and before the house adjourns I should like to put the following on Hansard:

Examination of the records in the possession of the tariff board indicates:

1. This company was established in Peterborough only in 1927, in the knowledge that the general tariff on wax crayons was 17½ per cent.

2. That in that same year (December 6, 1927) it applied to the Minister of Finance to have the general tariff on crayons elevated to 40 per cent and the British preferential to 30 per cent.

3. That the first hearing of the application was held on May 16, 1928, and the second hearing on November 30, 1928.

4. That in its first year of activity, namely, 1928, this company's sales were stated to be about $12,000 or, roughly, 40 per cent of the total Canadian market for the commodity.

5. That the chief competing country of which the company complains is the United States.

Evidence at the hearing brought out the fact that the stock in the applicant company is owned in part by the American Crayon Company of the United States and the complaint that the Canadian concern was at a disadvantage with its larger American competitors in respect of purchases of raw material and labour and distribution of costs. Evidence showed that there were in the United States nearly one hundred crayon companies and, therefore, the industry in that country was highly competitive. It was shown by the applicant company, that three of its major raw materials were paraffin wax, colours and stearic acid. It is proposed under the present budget that stearic acid for the manufacture of crayons be admitted free of duty; the duty on colours and pigments is still under review in connection with the reference re paints; there is before the board an application for the reduction of duty on paraffin wax. It is the case, therefore, that the application of the Canada Crayon Company Limited cannot be said to have been fully dealt with until the applications involving colours and paraffin wax have been disposed of.

That is part of the raw material.

So far as the board is concerned, there has been no delay in the investigation of this case; indeed, a measure of relief is proposed in the present budget, although two major factors of the cost of production of crayons are still under review.

At the second hearing of the application, Mr. R. P. Sparks,—

We have heard of him before.

An hon. MEMBER: And you will hear from him again too.

Mr. ROBB: Probably.

—representing the Garment Manufacturers Association of Canada, objected to any increase in tariff that might involve chalks used in the clothing industry; these chalks, the applicants state, were not included in their application.

There are two ways to help the industry:

1. Reduction of duty on raw materials;
2. Increase of duty on crayons.

It has been decided to recommend some change of the duty on the raw materials.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is that from?

Mr. ROBB: An officer in the department.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 12, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The Ottawa Journal of this morning under the caption of "Joint Debates," contains an editorial, the first two or three lines of which are as follows:

Mr. Gott, Liberal member for South Essex, and Mr. Hepburn, Conservative member for West Elgin, are going to meet in joint debate at St. Thomas a week from Saturday.

I do not propose to read the remainder of the editorial, but I do want to say that under present conditions there can be no Liberal representative to the House of Commons from the good old riding of South Essex. The hon. member for West Elgin has been unduly complimented.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GOTT: The Journal has referred to me on another occasion as a Liberal member. I resent the imputation, despite the fact that hundreds of Liberal farmers are to-day supporting our policy of protection for the farmers.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEPBURN

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): On the question of privilege, the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) appears to have been signally honoured. If press reports are authentic, he was on Friday last granted by the Speaker a special extension of time for his speech after a similar request had been denied to another member. This in my opinion violated not only the rules of the house but the neutrality of the Speaker. This latter honour, however, of being named as a Liberal member is the greatest of all. With regard to my name appearing as a Conservative member, I want to deny the allegation most emphatically.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suppose the house will accept the word of both gentlemen.

Agreed to on division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REGULATIONS AND INTERNAL ECONOMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the local papers last night and this morning there is an account of the Liberal caucus, in which to my mind the honour of the house and of the Speaker is brought into question —at least the Speaker is severely criticized for certain restrictions he has placed on the activities of the messengers and for other reasons. This tends to hold His Honour up to the country as a man who needs discipline by a party caucus. As a member of this house I protest most emphatically against any caucus, whether Liberal, Tory or U.F.A., attempting to discipline His Honour the Speaker, and so holding him up to contumely. The reports to which I have alluded in both local papers appear under the heading, "Members kicked against the Speaker's ruling and the Speaker's action." Such accounts tend to undermine the prestige of His Honour the Speaker and to create an impression that he may be subject to influence in regard to his decisions, the value of which as a consequence may be very seriously impaired. I want to say, sir, that you were elected Speaker by all the members of the house, and that you are the servant, not of the Liberal party but of the whole house. One of the matters brought into question was the fact that you, sir, had given orders to the messengers of this house that they should not supply liquor to members of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That, I understand, was one of the orders. I wish to say, sir, if that is true, that I support such action on your part. But I have full confidence in the impartiality of Mr. Speaker, and I resent the impression that has been created.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I ask where the question of privilege comes in? An unconfirmed report in the press is cited by the hon. gentleman, and I fail to see the question of privilege. A few days ago a very serious accusation appeared in the press against some hon. members of this house and the matter was not allowed to be discussed. I fail to see where the hon. member who is protesting has been injured in any way.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I was present at the caucus to which he has just referred, and the one comment of caucus was upon the publicity that had been given to certain instructions issued by Mr. Speaker, which caucus felt had created a wrong impression abroad with respect to certain matters alleged to be transpiring in these houses of parliament. As a matter of fact there was not criticism of Mr. Speaker's instructions; there was no reflection upon Mr. Speaker. The one criticism that was made—and it was made with respect to this House of Commons and this parliament—was that the public would get an entirely wrong impression as to what is transpiring in these buildings, from the publicity that had been given certain instructions upon which the newspapers have put their own interpretation. The thought of caucus was that the committee on internal economy might very well take up that matter with Mr. Speaker, but I find that that committee has no authority whatever in this respect. I would take advantage of the present discussion to suggest that Mr. Speaker might meet with a committee of this house to discuss certain matters that relate to the House of Commons—not to the government but to this house which manages its own affairs. May I say this with respect to any report that has appeared in the press. Caucuses, as every hon. member knows, are private and secret meetings, and there was a most implicit understanding at this caucus, as there has been at every caucus, that members of caucus were to give no statement whatever to the press as to what might transpire there. Anything, therefore, that appears in the press with respect to yesterday's caucus is without any authority, and what I have read of its proceedings in the press cannot be said to be a correct account.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The fact that the Liberal party itself in the Liberal caucus reprimanded the Speaker for his regulations—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): With many of the observations made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) every member of this House of Commons must be in accord. But I think it is also apparent that a matter of this kind should be discussed behind closed doors; and if it is agreeable to you, Mr. Speaker, I think that before we open the doors to the public at the next sitting we might discuss the subject that has now been brought to the attention of the house. That would be the more proper course to follow in dealing with the situation that has arisen.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I was not present at the caucus, but I entirely disagree with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bennett). There is nothing transpiring in this house or in the building, of which any of us are aware, that would necessitate secret discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the practice of the house.

Mr. CAHILL: If there is to be discussion let us have it in open house. My only experience of a secret meeting of the House of Commons was some years ago when we held such a session to learn of certain things that were taking place in the war.

Mr. BENNETT: We have twice had such a meeting in the last few years.

Mr. CAHILL: The questions discussed on that occasion were published in the morning papers before this secret meeting took place, and the subject matter of any secret meeting we might hold here would be public property not many minutes after the opening of the house. I do not think, from my short experience in this house, that anything transpires here which cannot be dealt with openly by the members of the house, with Hansard and the galleries present. I entirely object to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. I repeat, if we have anything to say, let us say it in public.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I am inclined to agree to a great extent with my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). Anything that has transpired within the walls of parliament has been broadcast to the four corners of this country. The orders given by His Honour the Speaker, and the manner in which they were executed, are familiar to all who pay any attention whatsoever to the political situation in this Dominion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What were the orders?

Mr. POWER: The orders were published in the newspapers, to the effect that certain messengers should not do certain work, and that certain policemen should patrol corridors on such and such floors of this building. I believe therefore that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Pontiac is quite sound, that no good purpose can be served by having a secret session. On the contrary, too much importance will be attached to what after all are mere incidents, if we take the extraordinary view that a secret session is necessary. Secret sessions are held, as a rule, only when matters of great importance to the nation are to be discussed, and I submit—

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman in order that he may not misunderstand me. We are speaking merely of the internal economy of the House of Commons, and the secret session proposed is just such a session as those that have been held twice during the past two years in connection with the approaches to this building. It is not well that matters of internal economy should engage the attention of the public; such matters should be discussed by us before the doors are opened.

Mr. POWER: I accept my hon. friend's correction and I will go further and say that, if the matter is not important enough to warrant a special session behind closed doors, the house to-day should select from amongst its members a committee to wait upon Mr. Speaker to discuss the whole question with him and to report its findings to the House of Commons as soon as possible. In my humble opinion, the matter can be settled in fifteen or twenty minutes by means of a free, frank and open discussion with His Honour, and the report having been made to the house publicly we shall no longer have such a situation as has arisen, of reports in the press giving rise to rumours which are utterly unfounded and which seriously reflect upon the honour of all members of this house.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the hon. gentleman, before he takes his seat, what there is to be settled? I am not clear as to what the question is about.

Mr. POWER: I will briefly explain it, although it must be quite clear to everyone. Undoubtedly the hon. member must have heard about the matter from conversation with other members. The question has reference to certain orders which have been issued, and to the publicity which has been given to those orders, and I think that question can be settled by discussion with the Speaker.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): After a fairly long experience in this house, I believe that in every instance I can recall where a matter of internal economy has been mentioned it has always been mentioned behind closed doors before the opening of the house. The very first day I sat in the House of Commons the late Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper mentioned the question of the allocation of rooms as between the two parties in the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker Brodeur immediately said the point should be discussed behind closed doors on the following day. On at least half a dozen occasions during the last thirty years a similar course has been followed, and I think that is the course which should be pursued now. That is parliamentary practice, and I see no reason for departing from it.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to say that I agree with the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for South Wellington as to that having been the usual practice in matters of this kind, and after all I think it is a good practice. A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, I heard you say with regard to a certain matter that this House of Commons was a gentlemen's club, the best club in the land.

Miss MACPHAIL: A gentlemen's club?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I suppose that will have to be modified now. However, that is an additional reason why this should be discussed in the usual way by the members of parliament themselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the pleasure of the house that this matter be discussed at a later sitting behind closed doors, I am the servant of the house.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think that is altogether the opinion of the house, and I should like to protest against this closed door policy. Certain charges, whether founded or unfounded, have been broadcast by the press. These charges are not made against particular individuals but are made in a vague sort of way which leaves any member of the house liable to suspicion. I do not think that is fair to hon. members. Further, the very appointment of a committee such as has been suggested, under these circumstances would be more or less of a reflection upon the decision of the Speaker, and some of us do not want to see anything of that kind take place. Whatever the opinions of the members of the house may be with regard to certain practices, I submit that no one member can act along the lines which have been followed in the past without involving the standing of all the members in this house, against this any member has a right to protest.

I suggest that perhaps we might find a way out of the difficulty by appointing a sort of house committee such as exists in a good many clubs, not to deal with this particular matter at this time but rather as a support to the Speaker. I quite understand that there are certain difficulties which have made it very hard for the Speaker to act and take the entire responsibility for his actions without at least consulting some of the members in order to obtain their views as to what is proper in the circumstances. I do not think such a committee would discipline the Speaker at all. It would be a means by which various members of the house could make their complaints known to the Speaker in order to obtain that free discussion which is necessary.

With regard to the particular matter now under consideration I would protest against it being decided behind closed doors. If liquor has been carried by messengers, as I understand to be the case, I for one would like to see that practice cease; I do not think that is the work of a messenger of this house.

Mr. POWER: In view of the knowledge which I have just gained that the rules do not provide for such a committee as I have suggested, I beg to withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. COOTE: It is with a good deal of hesitation that I rise to take part in this discussion, because it seems to me entirely out of order. However, I am not going to miss this opportunity of pressing for the appointment of what I would call a house committee. For years I have thought such a committee should be appointed.

An hon. MEMBER: There is a standing committee.

Mr. COOTE: Then if we have a house committee I would like to know what it is doing. I want a house committee representative of all parties and groups in this house, similar to the other parliamentary committees which now exist. That committee should have duties with respect to the house similar to the duties of the restaurant committee with respect to the restaurant. It does not matter very much to me whether this matter is dealt with in camera or at a public session of this house, but I do want to press for the appointment of a house committee which will include representatives of all groups in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just told that you, Mr. Speaker, would be ready to clear the galleries and have the matter discussed now if it is the wish of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. members of the house will feel that Your Honour is the presiding officer of the house and that we should be quite prepared, after what has been said, to leave it to your own judgment, Mr. Speaker, to decide what further step it may be advisable to take. I think we might proceed now with the business of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no objection to discussing this matter right now, but in deference to the opinions which have been expressed I shall wait, not until Monday, because, Monday morning I must attend the funeral service of a dear friend of mine in Montreal, but until Tuesday next when, behind closed doors, I will be ready to explain these two orders which were given ir good faith for the protection of the dignity and the privileges of the house.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I do not want to prolong the debate, but I would like to remind hon. members that it always has been the custom of this house that before the doors are opened any member may bring up any question concerning the internal economy of the house before the ordinary business is taken up. That has been the custom for many years; I could cite many instances where that has been done before the doors were declared open.

Mr. BENNETT: Before this question is left perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, might ask the clerk of the house to give the names of the members of the Internal Economy Commission already appointed, for the benefit of those hon. members who apparently are of the opinion that such a committee does not exist.

Mr. SPEAKER: Early in the session a message was read to the house from His Excellency the Governor General appointing four ministers of the crown as members of the Internal Economy Commission, but that commission deals only with the financial matters of this department. It must be remembered that this is a department, and I want the house to understand that as Speaker of the house I am head of a department which employes about 500 people. Under the Civil Service Act the Speaker is, just as much as any minister of the crown, the head of his department. Therefore, when the Speaker gives orders, they must be obeyed. On Tuesday next I will ask hon. members to stand by their Speaker if his instructions are in conformity with the privileges, the honour and the dignity of the house.

SPEECH OF MR. W. H. MOORE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to direct the attention of the government to a press report of a meeting held last night, which was addressed by Mr. W. H. Moore, chairman of the tariff board. In that speech Mr. Moore uses language which I regard as strictly political and which would result in any civil servant being dismissed under the provisions of the order in council which was approved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and adopted during the regime of Sir Robert Borden. Mr. Moore said:

"We, as the tariff board, should not be left with this tariff problem, nor should those on parliament hill be asked to saddle the whole burden." Mr. Moore observed. "One thing the tariff board has done and that is that it has brought out from day to day the different situations which you people have to face on election day for whatever interpretation you place on them, that is your responsibility."

"There is a conflict of tariff opinion in the United States," Mr. Moore said. "We have a clearer vision of what is going on in the states to-day than we have perhaps of what is taking place at home. But American standards of living cannot be increased by making food dearer. The farmers there have come out boldly with their demand, 'We want dearer food,' but in no case was the demand stated more boldly nor baldly than by the sugar beet farmers, who are asking $6 for sugar, when it is now $4.70."

In reference to the dairy industry, he said:

We hear a lot that our imports of New Zealand butter are increasing and our exports of butter are decreasing. That does not necessarily mean, however, that our dairy is dying; only that it is taking another form in the export of milk and milk products.

I ask the government what is to be done with a civil servant, a servant of the Department of Finance, as the minister said last night, who goes out and carries on political propaganda within sight of the walls of parliament.

Mr. ROBB: At what gathering was this?

Mr. BENNETT: The heading of the article reads:

W. H. Moore, of Tariff Board, gives entertaining address to Men's Association of Glebe United Church.

This article appears in the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, April 12.

Mr. ROBB: Some days ago the chairman of the tariff board told me that he had received an invitation from some church to give an address at their annual men's meeting. He wanted to know if there was any objection to his giving this address, and I told him I could see none. He is a citizen of this country and has the same rights as any other citizen. I read this report very carefully, but I am bound to say that I cannot place the same construction upon it as does the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). They had asked Mr. Moore to explain the workings of the tariff board, and he was making that explanation as interesting as he could.

Mr. BENNETT: It is purely a political speech.

Mr. ROBB: If that is a political speech, then the Deputy Minister of the Ontario Department of Agriculture made the same type of speech in London not very long ago, as did Mr. Ruddick, the dairy and cold storage commissioner. These men who are conversant with what is going on in the country should be allowed to present a statement of facts to the people.

Mr. STEVENS: It was not a statement of facts, but absolutely the contrary.

Mr. ROBB: Surely Mr. Moore, the chairman of the tariff board, has equal rights with an employee of the government of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: What have we to do with the Ontario government?

Mr. BENNETT: We are talking about the parliament of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: This gentleman has the same rights as an employee of the Ontario government speaking in the province of Ontario. I am bound to say that I cannot find a statement made by Mr. Moore which is not a statement of facts.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a statement of facts.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word of praise for the reporters of Hansard. They deserve a lot of credit because when I was speaking last night there was considerable noise from the opposite benches, but to my great astonishment I found my speech complete in Hansard, with the possible exception of one or two phrases. I think a great deal of praise should be given to these reporters.

Mr. BENNETT: Write them a letter.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—215. Stearic acid, n.o.p.; British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Customs tariff—215a. Stearic acid, when imported by manufacturers of candles or crayons for use only in their own factories in the manufacture of candles or crayons: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: When we rose last night the minister (Mr. Robb) was reading from a document which had been prepared by one of the officials of his department. He had not completed reading that document, and I would like to know by whom it was signed.

Mr. ROBB: I thought I read it all.

Mr. BENNETT: You said you would make it available to us.

Mr. ROBB: I gave it to Hansard and I am not sure whether they have returned it.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was also to produce the typewritten evidence taken at the hearings of these applications.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask what item we are discussing?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 215.

Mr. ROBB: I was reading from a memorandum which had been given to me by an officer of the department; it is not signed.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it prepared by Mr. Moore?

Mr. ROBB: It was prepared by Mr. McKinnon.

Mr. BENNETT: He is the secretary of the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister intimated last night that he would let us have the typewritten copy of the evidence which was taken at the hearings of these applications; has the minister obtained that evidence?

Mr. ROBB: I have two copies and I will send them over to my hon. friend.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to ask the minister if it will be possible to obtain any information before we pass these items.

Mr. ROBB: I will give the hon. member all the information I can.

Mr. McGIBBON: We have not been able to get very much as yet. Last night we had one of the strangest spectacles I have ever seen in this house. We received information that the tariff board had been holding secret conferences with the manufacturers, coming to secret agreements, and holding secret conferences with the ministers, and yet none of that information was available to this house. We are being asked to make changes in the tariff which may be of far-reaching importance, and I think this whole matter of the relation of the tariff board to the government should be cleared up. That board is costing this country about $120,000 a year and, so far as we can ascertain, its usefulness is practically nil. More than that, we have the spectacle to-day of the chairman going out and making political speeches containing statements contrary to facts. I think it is time that this parliament should object to the servants of this government carrying on political propaganda in favour of one party. It is time we got rid of them and I think we should get rid of them now.

Mr. BENNETT: I have in my hand the report of the second hearing of this item. This evidence shows that the application was opposed, although last night the minister was of the opinion that it had not been opposed. At page 2 of the evidence in connection with the hearing of reference No. 96, this is what is said:

The Chairman: Who appears on reference No. 96, application by the Canada Crayon Co., Ltd., for upward revision of the tariff on chalks and crayons?

Mr. Wilson: I do.

The Chairman: Who is appearing in opposition?

Mr. Darby: We shall certainly oppose the application. . . There are good reasons for opposing this particular application.

Then the chairman proceeds to ask what it is about, and the brief, consisting of a letter written to the minister in December of last year—part of which the hon. gentleman read last evening—was presented. Then there was a question as to the capital involved in the enterprise and the hon. gentleman cannot be expected to remember all the facts. This is the record as it appears at page 5 of the report:

The Chairman: Is the applicant company connected in the States?—A. Indirectly.

Q. Has it a factory there?—A. No, the applicant company has not.

Q. What company is it connected with or related to?—A. It is related in this way; the stock in this applicant company is partially owned by Canadian people, partially owned by British people, and partially owned by American people, but the bulk of the stock is owned by British or Canadian capital.

Q. When yau say American people, does that mean people in the crayon industry?—A. Yes, the American Crayon Company.

Q. Have you a wage comparison between the wages paid by them in the states and by you in Canada?—A. If you are talking of hourly wages we could give you that.

I do not think the minister last evening had that clearly in mind. Then Mr. Wilson related the facts and Mr. Gravestock made some observations, he being the managing director of the company. At the end the chairman said:

> How can we make further progress when you submit a seven page statement, which is apparently somewhat technical, it contains several figures, how can you have an examination without notice?
>
> Mr. Wilson: I did not expect that. I figured that when we sent this information here a few days ago Mr. Deachman and Mr. Darby would have opportunity to look it over.
>
> Well, we are quite willing to adjourn.
> The Chairman: All right: it stands adjourned.

That apparently was on May 16, 1928. The question I should like to ask the minister is this: There appear to be no recommendations made by this political tribunal to which he has referred the matter; there appear to be no findings of fact, the work which, he stated last year, this body was created to do, and there is nothing to indicate upon what principle the minister now proceeds to place upon the free list a material used in the production of crayons while not dealing with the application at all. That is the question we want to have some light upon. It is idle to say that we should have two or three gentlemen meet together in secret session with the Minister of Finance and then, instead of meeting the application as agreed and dealing with it on its merits, the minister to say: We will not do what they ask, but we will put some raw material on the free list. The house is entitled to some definite information in a matter of this kind which appears in the report of the hearing before the tariff commission, more especially in view of the fact that this appears to be an enterprise owned by Canadians which is giving employment to Canadians in a Canadian town or city and which had recited the circumstances under which it sought to avail itself of a tariff to enable it, not to exploit an industry but to place it on an equal basis with competition from across the border, asking no favours, but merely to be placed on even terms of competition. I remind the minister that his political chairman of his political board, in the blister copper inquiry where it appeared that raw copper left Canada, went to the United States to be refined and then had to be bought by Canadians at an excess over the price at which United States could buy the same copper for, was good enough to say that Canadians should be placed on terms of equality with respect to competition under such conditions. Mr. Gravestock in his memorandum asks only that his company should be placed on terms of equality with respect to competition: that they should be given an even chance in competition. The minister says: Look what I am doing for you: I am putting stearic acid on the free list. This is not mentioned in the hearing. Is this the method of compromise to be adopted? The amount involved is small, but the method is one of far-reaching consequence. It represents the difference between the Liberal party and the party with which I am associated. In one instance the government are willing to make a compromise for power, for the purpose of retaining their seats on the treasury benches, without regard to the welfare of Canadian industry. The minister thinks he is going to serve the public by sitting down secretly without Mr. Gravestock, without Mr. Wilson, without any representative of this industry being present, and saying: I will put stearic acid on the free list and not place the manufacturers of crayon upon such terms as, it is claimed in the brief that was submitted to the minister, will enable it to compete successfully with the United States industry. In other words, Canadian industry is to be destroyed in order that more employment may be given to people of the United States and Canadians may be put out of a job. That is the policy the minister has enunciated in his budget if it means anything, and if it does not mean that, it means nothing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see from the other brief which the minister has submitted, reference No. 96—and I fancy this is the first application—the application was for an increase in the duty. There is in the brief one rather significant statement which seems to have been accepted as a statement of fact as it existed: that is, that in the United States the selling price of a certain line of crayons was $7.20, while the selling price of the same article in Canada made by the same United States firms was $6.50. It was asked that a dumping duty be applied and it is stated by Mr. Darby that the dumping duty on that particular lot of crayons would be 16 cents, making the Canadian price $6.66, duty added, while at the same time the price maintained by these United States manufacturers in their own market was $7.20. This clearly indicates the effort, and the successful effort, on the part of United States manufacturers to dump their products in Canada and to destroy competition on the part of any industry in this country. The cost of production in Canada for the same article is pointed out in this brief to be $6.20, allowing them only 46 cents as a margin for selling over the cost of production if they meet the United States price. It strikes me that there is a condition of facts which should call for some action upon the part of the government.

If a 16 cent dumping duty is not sufficient to enable the Canadian manufacturer to have at least fair terms, then impose a dumping duty that is sufficient, because it is clear that in this instance the United States manufacturer is using Canada as a dumping ground. He will not cut the price in his own country, though there is evidently competition there, because there are ninety-five concerns engaged in this line of manufacture; but he will cut the price in the Dominion of Canada where it is sought to establish another independent industry. It is to the interest of the United States manufacturer to say: No, we will dump our goods and cut the price to such a point that you cannot manufacture, but the moment you cease manufacturing in Canada, then you will pay the higher price. Surely that is a situation that calls for some action. Has the minister had any report upon that phase of the case? Did the official of his department, in the memorandum he has submitted, draw that to the minister's attention? Because it is very clearly set out in his brief. Moreover, these statements seem to be accepted as facts by the board, as well as by Mr. Deachman, Mr. Darby and the applicants, so I assume they are thoroughly substantiated.

Mr. EVANS: While this incident may seem trivial in itself, it becomes very important because of the policy of the government which is here displayed. Here is a company that is given a concession by the government, and neither the tariff board nor the minister himself has yet shown that the company needs any concession. Not a single thing has been placed before the house to show the need of any concession or to show that this industry needs protection. There is another thing, and that is that the government, by this proposal, is impairing the revenues without in any way aiding the industry from the point of view of the workman, or from any other point of view. I cannot help looking at this incident from no other standpoint than this, that the tariff on this item is used as a bargaining point between the politicians and the manufacturer; it absolutely comes down to that. This company enjoys a monopoly, and nothing has been presented to show that the industry needs help, and so I say it comes down simply to a bargaining point for some reason or other. This is what I protest against, and it is what this budget in particular shows all the way through. It puts the burden on the shoulders of the people, and the government for that very reason is willing to impair the revenues of the country so long as the whole burden goes on the consumer. I protest against this whole thing.

Mr. STEVENS: We are able to get a little light from time to time by getting these typewritten reports. Last night the minister in reading a memorandum, rather needlessly I think, emphasized one portion of it which read as follows:

> At the second hearing of the application, Mr. R. P. Sparks, representing the Garment Manufacturers' Association of Canada, objected to any increase in tariff that might involve chalks used in the clothing industry.

I have here the evidence that was taken before the board, and so far as Mr. Sparks is concerned, it is as follows—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Who is he?

Mr. STEVENS: He was representing the Garment Manufacturers' Association of Canada.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Has he ever been heard of before?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Sparks in his evidence before the board said:

> We have no opinion to express on the merits of this particular case because it does not touch chalks in which the clothing industry is interested.
>
> Mr. Darby: Would you not like it to affect the chalks in which you are interested?
> Mr. Sparks: No, in view of the fact that they tell me the quantities used in Canada would not be large enough to justify them or anyone else manufacturing them.

Why does the memorandum of Mr. Moore single out Mr. Sparks and say that he appeared on behalf of the Garment Manufacturers' Association objecting to this application? Mr. Sparks himself clearly says:

> We have no opinion to express on the merits of this particular case because it does not touch chalks in which the clothing industry is interested.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Sparks appeared before that. I would ask my hon. friend to bear in mind that the application originally was for an increase of 40 per cent, and Mr. Sparks decidedly objected to that increase until he was told that it did not affect chalks, and then he withdrew his objection.

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I can see from glancing hurriedly over the report, there is no reference to Mr. Sparks at any point preceding the evidence I have just quoted, he appears before the board at that point only. Of course I may have overlooked his name, but I have not noticed it in the evidence prior to the quotation I made. In justice to Mr. Sparks it should be stated that he was not there opposing this application. I think it is only fair to say that when a man's name is brought into a discussion on the floor of this house and he is unable to be present. The application in its original form was for an increase in the tariff on the finished article. My hon. friend from Rosetown, of course, is very emphatic in his objection to an increase in the tariff. I would invite his attention briefly to the facts in connection with this case. He very properly said: There is a principle involved. That is true; there is a principle involved. It is one of the main principles that we in the Conservative party contend for in our attitude towards the tariff.

Let me say, first, that our attitude towards the tariff, is that it is an instrument in the hands of parliament that may and should be so used as to build up and assist in the establishment and upbuilding of Canadian industry. It may be said that this is a small industry, but the industrial life of a nation is made up of its aggregate industries, small and large. There is a considerable quantity of crayons and such like used in Canada. There are some twenty or thirty or more establishments in the United States manufacturing them. I will read a couple of paragraphs from page 17 of this tariff advisory board report, and then I want to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen and of the minister to one or two observations that I wish to make in regard to it. It is headed, "Retention of the Present Selling Price," and reads:

> In view of the fact that school crayons, which are the largest line of production, have to be sold retail at 10 cents per package for high grade crayons and 5 cents per package for low grade crayons, in order to allow the retailer and wholesaler the necessary margin of profit, prices cannot be raised except to such an extent that the packages would have to be retailed for 10 cents and 15 cents respectively. This raise would then put the Canadian prices considerably above the American prices even with an adequate protection.

He goes on to say:

> The company is prepared to undertake that selling prices will not be advanced under a higher rate of protection. If an adequate tariff rate is applied to these products, we would suggest a reinvestigation of such selling prices by the advisory tariff board in two years time to prove that this tariff has not affected prices to the consumer. The beneficial result of such a tariff would harm no one and result in the establishment of a new Canadian industry which most certainly needs assistance.

The point is this: There are certain articles, and this is a typical one, where a package must be sold for a round figure like five or ten cents. No doubt many hon. members will remember doing as I have often done at Christmas and other times, buying a little package of crayons in a carton for five or ten cents. If there was an increase in the tariff this company would have a larger share of the Canadian market. It would extend its operations, increase its output and lower its cost of production. It would thus secure a larger share of the Canadian trade without raising the price to the consumer one iota. My hon. friend from Rosetown shakes his head. Undoubtedly he is under the impression that the manufacturer would increase his price because of the advance in the tariff. That is not necessarily the case at all. We have contended, and I would urge on the minister now that the suggestion contained in the paragraph which I have just read is a good one, namely, that the tariff advisory board not only should consider these cases and make findings, but should observe the effect of any changes that are made, and if an industry is found to be abusing any added protection that is given to it, then the remedy is in the hands of parliament and of the government This concern undoubtedly asked for an increase of protection to give it a larger share of the Canadian market. The minister replies by giving them a reduction on one article, stearic acid, which is only a small portion of the raw materials that enter into the manufacture; for instance, there are also colours, pigments, refined paraffin wax, paper cartons, chalk, and so on. I understand they say that this reduction will make a difference of only $40 a year. Indeed it is so small that it does not amount to anything. On the other hand, if the minister and the tariff board had responded favourably to the application for an increased tariff on the finished article, and safeguarded themselves by this pledge, they might have given some stimulus to a Canadian industry and at the same time there would have been no increase in price to the consumer.

Now the minister has returned to me this marked brief. It is in connection with the point of controversy regarding Mr. Sparks appearing before the board. It will be remembered that last night the minister read a memorandum in which it was indicated that Mr. Sparks was opposing the application. Really it is a small matter, but I do not think it is fair continually to single out Mr. Sparks for attack in this house in the way it has been done. Mr. Wilson is giving evidence before the board, and Mr. Sparks says:

> Before the board adjourns, may I suggest that after hearing the application it appears that the applicants do not ask for protection on all classes of chalk. I am further informed by Mr. Wilson that certain classes of chalk used in the clothing trade are not made by them, are not made in Canada, and that they have no immediate intention of making them. In the tariff item which you suggested to them, and they may suggest to you, we would ask that these classes of goods which they are not interested in should be left as they are. We have no opinion to express on the merits of this particular case, because it does not touch chalks in which the clothing industry is interested.

Mr. Darby: Would it not affect the chalks in which you are interested?

Mr. Sparks: No, in view of the fact that they tell me the quantities used in Canada would not be large enough to justify them or anyone else manufacturing them.

Mr. Darby proceeds:

Surely it would be assisting an infant industry.

Apparently he is a bit sarcastic.

Mr. Sparks: They say not.

Mr. Darby: It would be a very small infant then.

Mr. Sparks: I do not want to enter into any general argument on the question now. I was here at one time and was willing to enter into a general argument.

Mr. Darby: I am not making any general argument at all. I am referring to these specific articles.

Mr. Sparks: All I suggest is this: that in any change that the board might contemplate they might provide that tailors' chalks should be in a separate item. I think that is in agreement with the views of the applicant.

Mr. Racine: That no changes be made if they are not producing tailors' chalks and have no intention of doing so in the immediate future?

Mr. Sparks: That is my understanding.

I think that is all there is to say about it.

Now I come back, Mr. Chairman, to what I said a moment ago. I invite the minister to give us his opinion on the concluding paragraph which I have read and in which it appears that this industry is asking for an increase in order that it might get a larger share of the Canadian market, and giving an undertaking that the consumer will not be called upon to pay any higher price for the product.

Mr. ROBB: I hope, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will agree that there was no thought of doing any injustice to Mr. Sparks. His name appeared on the memorandum that came up. The evidence clearly goes to show that Mr. Sparks, who has been urging increased protection in other lines, went before the tariff board to make sure there was no increased protection on material which the clothing trade required.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And which material could not economically be made in Canada. That is the answer.

Mr. ROBB: We will admit that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Very well.

Mr. ROBB: As soon as Mr. Sparks discovered that their application for an increase of the duty to 40 per cent did not cover these chalks, very naturally he withdrew. Now, this particular industry was established in Peterborough in 1927. Its promoters knew at the time that the duty on their finished product was 17½ per cent. Before they had been going one year they applied to the Minister of Finance for an increase of the tariff to 40 per cent, and their application was referred to the tariff board. The tariff board instituted an inquiry. That inquiry is involved in some other inquiries which have not yet been concluded. But we did give them this concession on stearic acid. They say they cannot carry on, and they hold out the threat that they are going to pack up their machinery and leave Canada. Yet on their own statement, after operating only one year they had 40 per cent of the business. They came to Canada knowing their protection was 17½ per cent. They have had a fair hearing before the tariff board, and I may say that there are other people interested. There were two ways of helping this concern: Either to increase the duty or to give them relief in their raw materials. We are attempting here to give them relief on certain of their raw materials. As to the balance, the inquiry has not yet been completed by the tariff board.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much will this relief amount to?

Mr. ROBB: They say it will not be sufficient.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is it not true that the basis upon which they asked for an increased tariff was the alleged fact that Americans were dumping their product into the Canadian market at a lower price than they were charging for it in the United States?

Mr. ROBB: There is nothing original in that allegation; we have heard it for many years.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is 215a a new item?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY: I notice in the Trade of Canada at page 437 two items: acids, stearic, n.o.p.—which appears to be 215—and acids, stearic, when employed by manufacturers of candles for use in their own factories, free. Under what authority was this stearic acid, amounting in value to $19,000, allowed to enter free in 1927?

Mr. ROBB: Under item 777. I gave that information to my hon. friend last night.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—246a. Zirconium oxide: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: I desire to repeat to the Minister of Finance the suggestion that I made to him last session. At the time he said he would be glad to pass it on to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I suggest that we put the numbers of the tariff items opposite the imports in this Trade of Canada. We have the description of the classes, but I think we ought to have also the numbers of the tariff items, so that if anyone wants to study these figures he will be able to find the relation between the imports and the tariff items. Otherwise this Trade of Canada has practically no meaning at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How does this compare with the previous duty, and what is this acid used for?

Mr. ROBB: Zirconium oxide is an opaquing agent in the enamelling and ceramic industries, being a substitute in certain concerns for tin oxide, a much more expensive ingredient which enters free. According to the evidence presented to the tariff board, it is not made in Canada, and it enters under item 246 at 15, 20 and 22½, the imports not being separately classified. The application for free entry was made by the Amherst Foundry Company of Amherst, Nova Scotia, and was unopposed. The representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association appeared in support of the application. No other users were present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where is it imported from?

Mr. ROBB: From the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: What is it made from?

Mr. ROBB: Zirconium ore.

Mr. GARDINER: And the Canadian Manufacturers' Association supported the applications?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: This is only a step anticipating a reduction in the duty on emanel ware, which will follow at the next session?

Mr. ROBB: I will not make any promise.

Mr. COOTE: The minister will not make any promise in that regard?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

Customs tariff—363. Platinum wire and platinum bars, strips, sheets or plates; platinum, palladium, iridium, osmium, ruthenium and rhodium, in lumps, ingots, powder, sponge or scrap: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the object in changing the old item, which was pretty clear —platinum wire, platinum in bars, strips, sheets or plates?

Mr. ROBB: The classification is for administrative purposes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do any goods in this line come under other items?

Mr. ROBB: Under the existing tariff platinum wire, bars, sheets and so forth enter Canada duty free, whereas crude platinum metals, from which these are made, are dutiable. When the present item, 363, was framed, various platinum metals were unknown to commerce and therefore these articles entered in the unenumerated class. An application was made by Goldsmith Brothers Smelting & Refining Company of Toronto, who, according to their representative, employ about thirty persons. The metals which comprise platinum crude are platinum, palladium, iridium and rhodium. Crude platinum contains from 70 to 90 per cent of metal, and the product is an alloy of platinum and one or more allied metals containing impurities.

Mr. STEVENS: Has consideration been given to the fact that platinum is produced in Canada in larger quantities than in former years and, I believe, in a rapidly increasing ratio in British Columbia and also in the International Nickel mines of northern Ontario? Has the minister considered the question in relation to the admission free of manufactures of platinum like platinum bars, strips, wire and so forth? I may point out that most of these commodities enter into a fairly luxurious line of goods where perhaps the tariff would be justified more than in any other branch of industry. Has consideration been given to that fact with a view to encouraging manufacture in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Platinum wire and bars, strips, sheets or plates enter free now. It is the raw material we are dealing with.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not make myself clear. Ever since November 30, 1906, platinum wire, bars, strips, sheets and so forth have been admitted free, largely for the reason that in those days and for years subsequently very little platinum was produced in Canada. But in recent years—I will limit myself to the last four or five years—there has been a quite marked increase in the production of platinum in Canada—that is, the production of the raw material itself. Would it not therefore be reasonable to expect that when this item was being considered the possibility of establishing new industries thereunder might have influenced the board in their report and the government in their decision with respect to the matter?

Mr. ROBB: The hearing was advertised and there was no opposition to the application.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But why should an article like platinum, which is used by people who can well afford to pay for it, be allowed in free? Why should not the government obtain some revenue from an article of this kind which is used in the manufacture of a luxury? Where is your revenue tariff?

Mr. ROBB: Is the hon. member asking for an increase on the finished product?

Mr. CHAPLIN: That does not make any difference to me. This article is used in connection with the manufacture of a luxury and by people who can well afford to pay for it. The government therefore should obtain some revenue from it.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell me under what item in this report this particular matter can be found?

Mr. ROBB: It is not here.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not here; nor is the evidence published.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think it is published, but I will send the hon. member a copy of the typewritten evidence.

Mr. STEVENS: This touches a matter of principle. Here we have a raw material which is being produced in Canada, and I think we ought to take some pride in the fact that Canada is so rapidly increasing its production of this, one of the most valuable of minerals, which is used very largely in the manufacture of jewelry and very expensive dental work.

Mr. BENNETT: Watches and jewelry.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, watches, jewelry and so forth; yet we have no tariff on it at all. Here is a government that declares itself in favour of a tariff for revenue, and if ever there was a case, so far as I can judge, where the tariff ought to be applied for revenue purposes it is in connection with this item. Nor would it necessarily conflict with the interests of Messrs. Goldsmith Brothers, of Toronto, who were the applicants in the case before the board, because if the tariff were imposed on both the raw material and the finished product they would not be injured a particle. But we are pointing out that here there is an opportunity for us to develop in Canada an industry in the manufacturing of platinum products, based upon the splendid production of Canadian raw material. I should think the minister ought to be in a position to tell us what are the importations of platinum manufactures and platinum raw material, and to say whether or not the government have considered this phase of the subject, namely, the opportunity to establish and to stimulate a new industry in Canada based upon this raw material.

Mr. ROBB: I did not want to detain the house by reading the whole memorandum. Now my hon. friend is talking of only one particular ore, and I repeat that the finished product comes in free and has been coming in free for many years. The memorandum goes on to say that platinum ore is obtainable in considerable quantities in the Ural mountains of Russia and in the rivers of Colombia, South America. Doctor Wilson of the Department of Mines reported that there are probably not more than five firms in the world recovering the metal from this rich ore. Pure platinum, to which my hon. friend is probably referring now, is usually too soft for commercial use, so iridium, palladium or the other metals of the group are added in suitable proportions and then melted and rolled into plate or drawn into wire, in which latter forms they are used by the jewellery trade and by the dental and chemical professions. The items we are reducing are the raw material of what now comes in free.

Mr. STEVENS: I gather from what the minister has said, and from a very brief and cursory glance at this evidence, that Goldsmith Brothers, being a smelting and refining company, desire to have these other ores such as palladium, iridium, osmium and rhodium to mix with the native soft platinum in order to produce a harder metal product. That would lead to the conclusion, I think, that you might admit these ores or the metal from these ores free, but platinum itself could be taxed and the finished article could be be taxed, first in the interests of establishing the industry, and secondly in the interests of revenue; or you could reverse it if you wished, first in the interests of the revenues of the country and at the same time giving protection to this industry. I particularly direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to my left to the fact that if ever there was an opportunity of establishing some sound basis for our revenue you have it here, leaving aside the question of protection for the industry.

We feel that this is an opportunity of building up an industry, even though it may be small. We were considering the matter of crayons previously, another small industry, but when you take the entire schedule, with over 1,100 items, almost each of which affects a great variety of industries, we see that out of these industries we must build our Canadian industrial life. If we let these small things pass one after the other without carefully analysing and scrutinizing them there is not much hope for the establishment of industry in Canada. I think this is an item which warrants a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection as well.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give us any reason why this particular item should not pay something to the revenue of Canada? In order to obtain revenue we are continuing the sales tax on clothing and boots and shoes, so why should not this valuable product, which is used by the jewellers and sold to the rich people of Canada, pay a tax as well? Upon what principle does the minister propose to make this item free and maintain the tax on the clothing and boots and shoes used by the people?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister says this always has been free.

Mr. ROBB: No. We desire to enable this industry in Canada to bring in ores which they may use together with certain Canadian ores in order to bring them up to a standard at which they can be sold. The hon. member for South Wellington asked under what principle we were keeping this item on the free list. It is the same principle that he and I supported in the Liberal party in 1908, the principle which he supported in the Union government and afterwards in the Conservative government. This article has been free since 1906.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is wrongly on the free list why retain it there? The mere fact that the minister and I supported it twenty-five years ago does not improve the situation to-day; if we were wrong then for goodness' sake let us get right now. I ask him again if there is any principle under which he can say that this product, which goes only to the rich people of Canada, should be exempt from duty while he deliberately taxes the clothing and the boots and shoes of the poor people of Canada. There is no principle except a wrong one, so why not make it right now?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If I understand the situation, certain ores are mined in Canada and other ores must be imported to blend with the Canadian ores in order to make a salable product.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BENNETT: They already mine those ores in Canada, in smaller quantities.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Hon. gentlemen opposite propose to put a duty on imported ores which we require to blend with our own. If we do that what assurance have we that this action will not make it impossible to continue to mine our Canadian ores?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not what we propose at all. We said there was a growing production of platinum, which is a soft metal requiring certain other ingredients such as palladium and so on to harden it in order to make it commercially workable. We say that if these other ores are not produced in Canada and it is thought desirable to bring them in free, we are not particularly quarrelling with that, but we have a large production of platinum which is increasing year by year, and this gives us an opportunity to build up a Canadian industry. Therefore we believe it to be the duty of the government and of parliament to consider seriously whether or not, by our action, we cannot stimulate the establishment of such an industry. Then, having in mind what hon. gentlemen to my left and what my hon. friend himself is always advocating, namely, that the tariff should be exclusively for revenue if it is applied at all, we say that this is an article upon which a tariff for revenue properly should be imposed, because of the general class of consumer affected. There is no question in my mind, either from our standpoint or from that of my hon. friend, that this is an item which should not be placed on the free list. I am referring particularly to the old item of platinum wire and platinum in bars, strips, sheets and plates; and as my hon. friend from South Wellington pointed out, what occurred twenty-five years ago does not apply to-day for two reasons. The whole industrial life of the country has changed so that the use of platinum to-day is much wider than was the case then, and the production of platinum in Canada has increased enormously. I cannot give the figures from memory, but I venture to say that the production of platinum in Canada during the last four or five years as compared with the production twenty years ago has increased at least 1,000 per cent. At any rate the increase is enormous, and I point out to the ministry as a whole that I am informed by those well posted in the mining business that there is a likelihood that Canada will becme one of the greatest producers of platinum in the world. Estimates of the quantity of platinum in use in the world have been widely divergent, varying from 4,000,000 to 8,000,000 ounces troy; at all events there is a large quantity of platinum used in the world. In former years platinum was so valuable that it was only used in the most expensive trades, such as the jewellery trade; now it is used in the electrical business, for contact points and so on. With the increased production of platinum there will come an increase in its use, and Canada has an opportunity of becoming the producer of a large part of the world supply of platinum and of building up industries based upon the ownership and control of that valuable resource. We are asking the government to consider that phase of it, and not these few additional alloys which are mixed with the platinum.

Mr. ROBB: You must have them first.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not quarrelling so much with that. It may be desirable to bring in palladium, iridium and these other metals to mix with the platinum.

Mr. FRASER: Do I understand the minister to say that these metals are imported into Canada to mix with the platinum ores?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he said.

Mr. FRASER: My understanding of the matter is that these ores are derivatives of platinum. The report of the mines branch for last year has the following to say in regard to these metals:

The metals of the platinum group produced from Canadian ores in 1928 were valued at $1,309,923 and consisted of:—platinum, 10,452 ounces valued at $704,330, and palladium, rhodium, etc., 13,087 ounces valued at $605,563.

The exports in 1928 were:—platinum contained in concentrates 1,212 ounces valued at $77,908, and platinum, old and scrap, 421 ounces valued at $27,463. These figures do not include the precious metals contained in the copper-nickel matte exported.

I would ask the minister to pay attention to the portion of this report which deals with imports. This reads as follows:

The imports in 1928 were valued at $150,616 and consisted of platinum retorts, crucibles, wire, etc.

The same thing is happening all over the Dominion of Canada; we are exporting our raw material and importing the highly fabricated material. There is some further information in this report with regard to the localities from which these metals are derived, as follows:

With the exception of a very few ounces of platinum obtained from the black sands of British Columbia, all the Canadian platinum and allied metals are obtained from the treatment of the Sudbury nickel-copper matte. The precious metal residues are allowed to accumulate over irregular periods before being treated, so that recoveries do not bear any definite relation to the quantity of matte treated in any particular year.

The minister will notice that the platinum group of metals is produced principally from the mines in the Sudbury district. As we have an ever-increasing production in that area it is only fair to conclude that we will always have an ever-increasing quantity of these metals produced. Some measure of protection should be given to the manufacturers of these metals in the Dominion of Canada. If we continue to export our raw material and import the manufactured article without any duty or restriction, we will never build up any manufacturing of these metals. The same principle would apply to a great many other metals as well as the metals in the platinum group.

Mr. ROBB: Doctor Wilson, of the Department of Mines appeared before the board and reported that there were probably not more than five firms in the world which were recovering this metal from the original ore.

Mr. FRASER: Why could not we have one of the five?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we will when we can give them the same basis of treatment as they receive in other countries.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not producing the ore.

Mr. ROBB: That is their statement and they probably know something about this business.

Mr. BENNETT: Who are "they"?

Mr. ROBB: Goldsmith Brothers Smelting & Refining Company, Limited, 21 Wilton square, Toronto. The following letter, dated March 7, 1927, is addressed to the Minister of Finance:

Permit me to call your attention to tariff item number 363, which lists platinum wire, sheets, bars, etc., as free. It has also been ruled that iridium platinum is free.

Iridium powder and platinum sponge are used in the manufacture of a free article. Iridium power and platinum sponge are the forms in which these metals are usually traded in between European and American refiners. These metals, in the form of powder or sponge, or precipitates, enter the United States of American and all other countries duty free. A Canadian refiner is at a distinct disadvantage. One who wishes to cater to Canadian manufacturers of platinum articles is in a better position to handle this business if located in the United States rather than in Canada. The United States refiner imports, free, from Europe iridium powder and platinum sponge, and then puts them in the form of bars and sheets, which enter Canada duty free. As these metals, as precipitates, are unenumerated, they are ruled 17½ per cent. I would request application be considered that they be ruled free of duty, either without restriction, or for the manufacture of platinum sheets, bars, wire, etc.

If no changes in tariff are contemplated by parliament this year, I would request that change be made under provision permitted by number 286 of Customs Act. If an order in council is passed, I request that same be effective from February 1, 1927.

There are other metals in the platinum group, all of which are used as alloys, as follows: palladium, rhodium, ruthenium, osmium. These metals, in the form of precipitates or powders, when used for the manufacture of platinum (a free item) should enter duty free.

If I can furnish you any further information, please command me.

Probably when these people get going and are making this material in Canada they will come along and ask the government for protection.

Mr. BENNETT: They will never get going unless they get some encouragement.

Mr. ROBB: They are proposing to make it.

Mr. BENNETT: They ship this stuff out in the raw form and bring it back as a manufactured article.

Mr. ROBB: They say they require these other metals.

Mr. BENNETT: The copper situation would probably explain that as clearly as it could be explained. We are shipping blister copper and copper matte out of this country, and when our people want to buy copper rods they are forced to purchase from the Copper Export Company of the United States which sets a rate of a quarter-cent per pound higher to foreigners than to their own people. The rseult is that the Canadian people have to buy refined copper made from their own blister copper at a quarter-cent per pound increase in domestic price. This means they have to pay $5 per ton more than their competitors in the United States. The government is encouraging the shipment of blister copper out of this country and the importing of the fabricated article. The same thing applies to asbestos. I wonder if the minister realizes that there are 250,000 men, women and children employed in the fabrication of raw asbestos in the United States exported from Canada. We sell our raw material at between $50 and $70 per ton and purchase the fabricated material at between $900 and $1,000 per ton. As the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) has pointed out, there is an increasing and improving mineral production, and it is the duty of the government to encourage and not to discourage that condition. The people are complaining that they are being deprived of employment in this country. We are simply digging in the rock and getting out these minerals, putting them in a smelter and getting the blister and matte, and then shipping it out in carload lots, and the people are forced to follow the raw material in order to obtain employment.

If I am permitted to anticipate the next item, I would ask the minister to tell us what is going to happen when we develop our aircraft industry and then have no chronometers and compasses made in this country.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): You will never learn to make them by increasing the production cost.

Mr. BENNETT: We will learn to make them the same as they learned to make them in Germany. There was once a day in Germany and the United States when they imported all these things from England and the same specious argument the hon. gentleman now makes was made when industries were established in these countries. We will never encourage industry by increasing the cost of production. The cost of steel rails in the United States was at one time higher than in England, Germany or Belgium; but the United States and Germany said: We are going to promote industry at home to give employment to our own people. They did so, and the result was that thousands of men, who were formerly denied employment, were employed in fabricating thousands of articles, and encouragement was given to their own industry. We do not ask protection; we ask equality of opportunity: we want an equal chance. I cannot understand Canadians; I cannot understand the hon. member for Weyburn; I cannot understand those who appear before the board and take the attitude they do, and I cannot understand the minister when he permits himself to become a party to a transaction which denies to Canadians the right to fabricate their own raw material into the finished article and to give employment to our own people. Are we to be economic slaves or not?—that is the question. If my hon. friend has his way, we will continue to be economic slaves, because every day that passes under present conditions makes us so more and more. We are importing $1,000,000 a day in iron and steel products; we are the greatest customer of the United States Steel Corporation to-day, and this country with a little intelligence, a little determination and a little less fear on the part of those occupying the treasury benches, of the hon. member for Weyburn and those he represents, would be able to stop this at once. What is happening is that we are shipping out our raw material in continually increasing quantities just as we are doing now in regard to this item of platinum. Then we are buying back the fabricated, highly refined article the manufacture of which gives employment to thousands of people, and we use it and think we are prosperous. That is what is going on in Canada and the hon. gentleman knows it. Will he read the economic history of Germany or the United States or any other country? What about the industrial life of England to-day?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): A country that under free trade was able to finance the greater part of the war.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman knows what it is costing the poor English taxpayer to-day to pay interest on the money which England borrowed from the United States. Surely he knows the burden on them is so great they are staggering under it; that their industrial life has been threatened at every point, and that the only hope they have is by safeguarding it. I crossed over there only a few years ago and there were no customs men such as we see now at Dover. They are there now gathering up the Swiss watches, automobiles, chronometres, everything else for duty purposes, to endeavour to safeguard industry for one purpose and one only, namely, that the English workman shall have an equal chance with the continental workman to live. When we ask that Canadians shall have a chance to live, we want them to live in Canada and not in the United States. We want them to live here, eat our wheat, our vegetables, pay taxes in Canada and become part of the life of this country. That is what we are trying to do, and the hon. gentleman knows it. If we continue to do as we are doing, we shall be merely hewers of wood and drawers of water, shipping out the raw material, matte, blister copper, raw material, whether it be pulpwood or cordwood or whatever it may be, and bringing back the highly finished product. Look at the importations of paper. Look at the future. Before this budget ends, the minister will find before him a record of material we are buying which should be made at home and because we are doing this we have lost 600,000 Canadians in the last five years. That is the condition with which we are confronted, and that is the reason for it. This is the principle once more, and the minister has the hardihood to put into tariff items the words "not made in Canada." Is it always to be "not made in Canada"? Is that condition always to continue? That is the problem which confronts the country. It requires courage; it requires more than that; it requires an appreciation of a problem that is not to be dealt with by temporizing expedients to maintain power. The government must be prepared, if need be, to sacrifice power for Canada and Canadians, and as long as they talk platitudes about the cost of production and free trade, we know quite well what will happen—the same temporizing tariff measures, the same effort to do what has been done in days gone by. Not made in Canada! Of course they were not; there were no steel rails made in Canada once. There were no steel rails made in the United States once. In Lincoln's time every steel rail in the United States came from some other country. But they encouraged their workmen so as to put the development of their country on an equality with that of Germany, and now they can meet the world in producing steel rails. The same is true in regard to other matters.

The position is this: Shall we continue as we are doing? That is the real issue before the Canadian people. The minister is here continuing to aid and persistently abet the export of raw material, and then he slips over it by adding the words "not made in Canada." Does he remember that there were times in Canada when we did not grind flour except between two stones in the little grist mills? We had no roller patents, but we got them. Are we to continue in the old way? When the hon. member for Cariboo put before us the conditions with respect to the black sand in British Columbia, with respect to nickel in the Sudbury district, with respect to development now going on in Quebec, he harks back to a time when none of this development had taken place, the time when twenty-one years ago the hon. member for South Wellington and he supported the same policies, and he says: Let us continue. That is conservatism gone mad; that is Toryism. But the conservatism, the Toryism you find on this side is reflected in that single verse of Tennyson:

> That man's a true conservative
> That lops the mouldered branch away.

The mouldered branch is this played-out idea that when this country reaches a certain stage of development, we shall cling to old conditions and not encourage new production, new manufactures. That is the situation to which we are directing the attention of the minister this afternoon, not because this particular item is important, but because the principle makes for the very economic life of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It seems to me that the mouldered branch is protection. If we lop that away, we shall overcome our difficulties. The trouble with my hon. friend is that he fixes his eye on a single point and he watches it so intently that he fails to see what is going on around him. He is like the man who stands on the river bank and judges the force of the stream, not by the sweep of the current, but by the eddies along the shore.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In regard to the particular item we are discussing, I do not ask for any protection, but I have asked the minister two or three times: Why does he not put into force in regard to this particular item his own principle, the principle he is always talking about, namely, tariff for revenue? Is there in the whole tariff schedule any other item that can better afford to pay a revenue into the public treasury? Is there in the whole category of the tariff schedule another article that is being used by the richest people in the country and that can stand a tariff better than this one?

Mr. ROBB: Of course my hon. friend knows that the protection on platinum runs up to 35 per cent on the finished jewellery.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, but not on platinum wire or any part made of platinum. That is free.

Mr. ROBB: The leader of the opposition and I are not so very far apart. All he is arguing for, he says, is equality of opportunity. That is what we are proposing to do: we are proposing to place these refiners in a position where they can make this product in Canada. That is what they ask in their application.

Mr. BENNETT: We are shipping out raw material.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all. May I repeat that Doctor Wilson, of the Department of Mines, who should know something about this, reported that there are probably not more than five firms in the world which are recovering the metal from the original ore, and we want to get Canada in the position of being one of them. As I pointed out once before, some of these products are not produced in Canada, and we are proposing that these metals, palladium, iridium, ruthenium and rhodium come in free, because they are required to mix with the Canadian product. Before we start increasing the duty we must at least put these people in the position where they can manufacture these goods in Canada. Surely my hon. friends can see that.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has two or three times stated that Doctor Wilson, of the Mines department, says that there are only five firms in the world which are recovering these metals. It may interest the house to know that according to the evidence upon which this finding of the tariff board is based, two of these firms are Canadian firms. Their names are not given, but I judge that they are International Nickel and Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation. I will read a sentence or two of the evidence, which is rather interesting, and which bears out exactly what I and my associates have been contending. There is a long story here, and I shall read only a part of it:

> Offhand I cannot give the exact amount, but at one time they were producing over a thousand ounces of mixed precious metals per month.

That is, platinum, palladium and these other metals:

> Of that, roughly thirty-five per cent was platinum and sixty-five per cent were metals of the platinum groups.

Those are the other metals we were speaking of:

> The names have been given you, and it is not necessary to repeat them.

I venture the guess that it is International Nickel and Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation. I happen to know something about it, and I think that is correct. He goes on:

> One of these firms, which produces about one-quarter of the total output, exports the raw material to Great Britain and it is refined in Wales (at Clydach). The metals of the group are separated there and that is the sponge which goes on the market, most of it being sold in London. The output from the other plant is treated in the United States.

That is, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation ship their products to Wales for refining and separating purposes. International Nickel have been shipping theirs to the United States. The evidence continues:

> I am not aware whether any of it goes to the European market or not. You would have to go into detail to trace that out. However, that second firm has already installed one electrolytic refinery at Port Colborne and is planning within the next four or five years to install another refinery for the production of copper and nickel near Sudbury.

Which metals contain the precious metals of platinum and palladium.

I pause here to direct the attention of the government to the fact that the recent marvellous developments in the International Nickel Corporation and its amalgamation with the Mond interests indicate a development in the smelting and refining industry in Canada which undoubtedly is world-wide in its importance. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation in its recent amalgamation with the Lindsley interests in the Manitoba field purposes to establish another smelter in the neighbourhood of Winnipeg and a refinery in Ontario to take care of the mineral development in northern Manitoba, and to establish another smelter on the coast. This company, after a period of about five years of steady development and blocking out of areas through the coast copper country and the Portland canal district and other parts of British Columbia has created a reserve of ores that will enable them to establish and keep operating a big smelter on the Pacific coast. These three new huge smelters, together with a couple of refineries, will be the medium of producing a tremendously increasing quantity of these precious metals.

Mr. ROBB: I understand that there is another one to go in near Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: That is another one, the Noranda outfit. It also has platinum, I presume. A large development is going to take place through the enterprise of these big corporations and the investment of public moneys in the production of the ores in question. It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that these facts, which are well known to the minister, ought to have focused the attention of the government on this great principle of building up Canadian industry. I wish to quote a little further from the evidence, and then I want to point out another matter to the minister. Doctor Wilson, of the Mines Department, goes on to say in his evidence:

> They will collect these metals as sludge or residues. These residues may be refined in Canada or shipped to the United States; that will be a question of the tariff at the time, and also a question of markets.

What I have been urging on the minister is that these tariff schedules should be so framed that Goldsmith Brothers who are secondary, not primary, handlers of these metals, should be placed in a position where they will not have to compete, as they say they have to now, against an unfair advantage which the United States refineries have over them.

Mr. ROBB: That is what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the minister is putting the cart before the horse, or rather he is putting the horse behind the cart. There are some of these minerals perhaps that are not produced in Canada. My hon. friend from Cariboo who has a very intimate knowledge, much greater than I have, of these matters, says that most if not all of these metals are produced in Canada. Certainly platinum and palladium are produced here in large quantities, and those are the two main items. What we are arguing is that instead of reducing the tariff still further, the whole schedules dealing with these metals should be so revised as to encourage the establishment in Canada of manufacturing industries based on these metals.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend himself just said that there were four or five new industries starting in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: No. The minister is taking an unfair advantage of my frankness. Here is the situation. These smelters that I spoke of are not being established on platinum at all, but on the discovery of copper, nickel, lead, zinc and silver; but in the process of developing the base metals they have found these precious metals. According to the evidence on which the minister bases his new item, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation shipped from their Trail smelter —which by the way is recognized as one of the finest and best in the world—lead, silver and zinc to the refineries in Wales, where the precious metals are extracted. What I am contending is that these metals, precious and base, should be smelted and refined, and refined so as to take the precious metals out, here in Canada. Canada, being the producer, as this evidence shows, of something like one-quarter or more of the platinum of the world, ought to develop the finer arts, because they are not an industry so much as an art, of making jewelry and fine electrical equipment. By electrical equipment I do not mean the larger pieces of electrical machinery, but the very fine electrical instruments in which a certain quantity of platinum is used. Canada ought to be in a position superior to that of any other country in the world in the production of these metals from the very fact that she possesses such a great proportion of them.

I find also in this evidence reference is made to the Marking Act. There is no question that Canada is behind the times in her Marking Act dealing with precious metals. As to platinum—again I am speaking without opportunity of careful research and subject to correction—I understand that under the platinum group Canada is not properly equipped in regard to markings so as to safeguard the public interest in the purchase of this metal. I am advised that the United States government is considering the revision of its Precious Metals Marking Act, and has already established some standards for platinum similar to those established for gold. As is well known, gold at 24 carats is considered pure, and there are various gradations down to 14, 12 or 10, as the case may be, for different uses. So with platinum. But we have no similar protection of the interests and the rights of the purchasers of articles into which this metal enters. This is a serious matter, it is fundamental. I believe, as my leader intimated a moment ago, that we owe it to Canada as a parliament to study these things and to face them. I have some respect for the sincerity of my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young). I was going to say that I had more respect for his sincerity seven or eight years ago than I have to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I say that quite frankly.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He should have been educated in the meantime.

Mr. STEVENS: He has been. Since a member of this house he has received information that his intelligence indicates to him should cause him to change from the position that he persists in taking. It is not a theoretical argument between the old Adam Smith free trade theory and the theory of protection. These things will never be faced and will never be worked out on that basis. Here we have a certain set of facts. Surely as intelligent men we can face those facts and discuss them on their merits.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): And follow them all the way through to their conclusions.

Mr. STEVENS: I have tried to do that, but my hon. friend got up and quoted an observation, hoary with age, about standing on the bank of a stream and instead of judging the course of events by the general current looking at the eddies at one's feet. Why does not he contribute something of interest and value to the solution of this problem? We are offering this solution. Parliament—I am not going to tie it to this ministry—parliament should face the fact that Canada by nature is blessed with large quantities of this rare and precious metal—limiting ourselves to this item for the moment—to the extent that we believe in a very few years will put us in possession of the major portion of the world's production, we at the present time having two of the three concerns producing it. That is fact No. 1. That puts us in a unique position in the world—not on this continent, but in the world.

What does it mean? It means that we have the major portion of the platinum used chiefly in expensive instruments and luxurious articles like jewellery; platinum which will be required in all the countries of the world, the refining and manufacture of which would not affect the living of people elsewhere, and would offer to us a chance of applying to the industry the skill and the artistry of Canadians. But if we ship that platinum to Wales to be refined there, it passes out of our control, and we cannot get it back into our control again for the purpose of developing this industry. Who is hurt by encouraging the refining of it here? Let me turn to the illustration used by my hon. leader a moment ago in connection with asbestos. It is perhaps a little less complicated, but exactly the same principle is involved. Canada possesses 85 per cent of the asbestos resources of the world. Why should not Canada as a part of her duty to this great estate be giving to the world manufactured asbestos?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What do you propose, an export duty?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to digress too far, but I will not hesitate to answer my hon. friend. Yes, certainly, I would put export duties on the raw material.

Mr. EVANS: Why should it be needed?

Mr. STEVENS: Let me give a personal experience for the benefit of my hon. friends. While in New York I was discussing various matters with a gentleman, an intimate associate of the late President Roosevelt and closely identified with the operations of some of the big financial concerns over there. He made a strong argument to me as a basis for bringing Canada and the United States closer together. He proposed that Canada should adopt the policy of exporting her raw materials and purchasing the finished products from the United States, and he used this expression. He said, "Mr. Stevens, if we would join with you—speaking of Canada—with your raw materials and with our great industrial establishments, we could beat the world." I said, "Hold on a minute, Mr. So-and-so." Then I expounded to him the views which I have tried to place before the house this afternoon and on other occasions regarding the destiny of Canada. My argument to him, and my argument to my hon. friends from Weyburn and Rosetown, is that instead of Canada simply sending her asbestos, 82 per cent of her copper, and her platinum to the United States and to Wales—and this applies also to other of our raw materials—instead of continuing to do that I argued with him that Canada should build up industrial and manufacturing concerns based upon these raw resources, and I carried my argument through as well as I could to its conclusion. When I ended, that gentleman said to me, "If I were a Canadian I would take exactly the same position. But I want to tell you that the chief concern of the American financial interests to-day is to secure a larger and still larger control of Canadian raw resources to replace the exhaustion of our own resources." That was his attitude, and that is why our asbestos is going to the United States. The Americans come up and seize control—legally of course—of that great raw resource, and it is being sent down to the United States. As I intimated to-day, 250,000 people, if I am not mistaken, directly and indirectly are being sustained out of raw material for which we get the comparatively paltry sum of seven million dollars a year.

The same principle precisely applies to this platinum. We have the material, we have the opportunity of developing the manufacture of the class of articles in which this is used, and we are not taking advantage of that opportunity. The minister knows, as well as he knows he is in his seat, that I am enunciating sound economics for Canada, but he does not turn a hand or move a finger to give effect to such a policy in this regard. I plead with him to-day. If he eschews the word "protection," if he does not want to taint his political vocabulary with that term, then use "tariff for revenue" for the purpose, let him employ any terminology he likes, so long as he accomplishes something in that regard.

Mr. ROBB: Or "safeguarding industry."

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly. I give him liberty to use any pseudonym, as the Prime Minister referred to our own, that he likes. He may invite the member for Weyburn to collaborate with him and call it free trade. But in heaven's name let us have some appreciation of our heritage and make use of the raw materials that a kind and benevolent Providence has given to us.

Mr. EVANS: I have been trying to follow this discussion and to deduce some line of policy both from the opposition and from the government; but neither the opposition nor the government can outline any policy of protection which would build up industry in this country. I know that a great deal of eloquence has been directed from this side to the Minister of Finance this afternoon, and he is probably laughing up his sleeve at us, thinking that we have been impressed by the argument on this side. That is far from being true.

Mr. ROBB: I am thinking of the vote of yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS: He means the vote of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young).

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member (Mr. Stevens) says that we must build up industries here even if we go so far as to put an export embargo on our raw material. But what is wrong is that we cannot build up industry in Canada when, as the Minister of Finance says, we are given an equal chance with the rest of the world? What further advantage do the manufacturers want when they have their raw material right here? Surely it must be cheaper at the mine than anywhere else in the world since Canada controls the output. Let me say this. Protection in this country has passed on from being a method of establishing industry to the stage where it has become a class advantage, used entirely by one class for one purpose only. If a proper policy were followed for the building up of industry in Canada both the opposition and the government would be anxious to keep down the cost of production here so that Canadian industry might compete with others and fall into line with world prices the world over. Last year when these schedules were under consideration even the opposition did not want protection in regard to several articles. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) himself asked for free trade in certain articles. I would refer the committee to page 1666 of Hansard of last year. The hon. member quarrels with the Minister of Finance for altering the schedule without proper consideration, and he says:

> I think this is done just by the whim and fancy of the minister or his assistants. The whole schedule is got up without any principle.

Well, there is no principle in protection anyway; it is the most unprincipled thing ever devised as a matter of trade. He goes on:

> It is purely haphazard guesswork. Any communication that has come to me on the subject from manufacturers—and I have quite a large hat factory in my riding—has been merely to leave these matters as they were, free, free, free, from all countries.

And the Minister of Finance had evidently to make a bid for the support of the same manufacturer, so he acceded to the request of the hon. member for South Wellington and placed the articles on the free list. It is indeed pathetic, in this Hansard, to see the gratitude with which the hon. member for South Wellington accepted the concession. He said:

> I must thank the minister for his consideration in regard to this item. If he will do the same thing in regard to worsted yarns, I will not have very much to complain of.

Then the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) spoke; he was just as grateful as the hon. member for South Wellington. But what does it all go to show? It shows an utter want of policy and a callous disregard of the consumers of this nation, to put the price-fixing power in the hands of certain classes to fleece the consumers all the time. There is no other purpose in the tariff to-day. They care not for industry any more than anyone else. The fact is that free trade is the only logical way of building up industry, because it puts all on the same plane, and it will enable Canada to come down in the cost of production and so be in line with world's prices. No; I cannot but classify this whole discussion and the whole policy of protection as two-faced. Protection is a two-faced policy in which there is no sincerity in relation to the building-up of industry; because if you put a tariff on an item you increase its cost. There is no other purpose in protection than to give the price-fixing power to those engaged in certain industries.

Mr. FRASER: I am interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown. There is no one who does not admire the persistence with which he advocates his free trade principles. But we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. I referred a moment ago to a million dollars' worth of exports of ore of the platinum group, shipped out of Canada to be conditioned and refined in foreign countries. We are exporting at the present time at the rate of $50,000,000 worth of minerals—

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend give the source of that quotation in regard to the million dollars.

Mr. FRASER: I take it from the report of the Minister of Mines for the calendar year 1928.

Mr. ROBB: I have the report here; let us correct the statement now.

Mr. FRASER: No; that is not at all the report from which I quoted. The report from which I quote the figure is for the calendar year just ended, issued by the Deputy Minister of Mines a few days ago.

Mr. KENNEDY: In British Columbia or Ottawa?

Mr. FRASER: In Ottawa. I am speaking of the annual report. It has not yet been printed but, I understand, it was distributed in typewritten form. Now, I have quoted the amount of platinum ore exported.

Mr. ROBB: The export records show $83,000,000.

[Mr. Evans.]

Mr. FRASER: Export of platinum ores?

Mr. ROBB: I am looking at the item in the report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, giving the total exports of platinum contained in concentrates or other forms, and the amount is some $84,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the date?

Mr. STEVENS: There would be platinum contained in other metals, unrefined, such as lead, zinc, silver and so forth.

Mr. ROBB: Maybe.

Mr. STEVENS: It takes a special process to separate it from the other metals.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps.

Mr. FRASER: If I am wrong in the figure I gave I shall be glad to be corrected. But I am not wrong—because I have made the calculation from the last report issued by the Minister of Mines—when I say that we are exporting at the present time $50,000,000 worth of minerals in the raw form, of which 75 or 80 per cent is not processed but is raw ore as it is extracted from the mines. That is all I have to say in that connection.

Let me refer for a moment to something the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said in regard to the copper situation, which he discussed a moment ago. In my opinion he did not show the worst side of that situation. He showed how the copper was exported from Canada and was under the control of the copper export people of the United States, so that our manufacturers had to buy back the manufactured or partly manufactured article—wire and rods, or the material to make into wire and rods. They have to apply to the export company for their raw material. This Canadian manufacturing company actually makes an application to the American exporting company for 1,000 tons of copper, and for that copper the Canadian company must pay $5 per ton more than is paid by an American company. That is not the worst feature of it, however; they go further than that. When the Canadian company makes application for 1,000 tons of raw copper the American export company says, "We cannot give you 1,000 tons to-day; we can only give you 250 tons and you will have to come back in two weeks, when we will tell you what we can do about the balance." The Canadian company goes back in two weeks and the American company says, "We can give you another 250 tons but we will have to charge you an additional $5 per ton." That is what happens every time the Canadian company goes back for the balance of their order, and I submit that it is about time we found some solution for a condition of this kind. We produce the raw material and send it to the United States to be refined, but when we want to buy it back we are dictated to with regard to the price. How long are we to continue to be treated in this way not only by the United States but by any foreign country? This does not seem to me a reasonable business basis, and I think it is about time the government woke up and applied some remedy to a condition of this kind.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Ever since I came to this house I have been pleading with the present Minister of Finance and with other ministers to take some interest in the ore industry and the mineral production of Canada. I pointed out what Canada was deriving from her one smelter, located at Trail, even though that smelter was operated on a small scale and only taking care of the one mine, and I drew attention to the fact that under present conditions we were losing millions of dollars a year in this way. In the case of nickel in northern Ontario we were simply producing the ore and sending it to the United States; in the case of the other ores, they were sent to Deloro where concentrates were formed, which concentrates were shipped to the United States for further refining and smelting. The minister says there are only small quantities of platinum or other metals shipped out of Canada, but we have no idea what is in these concentrates. However, now we know that we are obtaining platinum and several of these other minerals right in Ontario and the northern part of Quebec, and if we do not institute a policy of completing the refining of our metals in our own country we will continue to lose millions of dollars annually.

After all, platinum is only a small matter; for seven years I have pleaded with the minister to consider the question of the treatment of feldspar, which is obtained in Ontario in its finest form. To-day we ship practically all the ore to the United States to be ground, after which it is returned to Canada free of duty, while great quantities are retained in the United States for the development of their great industries. The minister has thrown out a gesture to-day, and I am hoping that it is a promise that he is preparing for the further manufacture of platinum in this country. I hope it is a a promise, because to-day feldspar is being ground by two concerns in Canada, and we have the whole production in our own hands if we wish to make use of it. These two industries, one in Toronto, and one in Kingston, are now prepared to grind our own feldspar in sufficient quantities to supply the manufacturers of Canada, but the minister has turned them down repeatedly when they have asked for a little protection. I believe he has done so innocently, however, without having been given the information. These firms have assured him that if he will grant them some small protection in order to give them the Canadian market, they are willing to employ twice the number of people they are employing at present. In other words, if he will see that United States manufacturers do not have an opportunity of sending this product to Canada under conditions equal to those which must be met by the Canadian companies, they will carry on the manufacture of feldspar in our own country and will not increase the price of any article into the production of which it enters. I hope the gesture of the minister indicates a determination that he will deal with the further manufacture of these ores in Canada and that next year he will take cognizance of the question of feldspar in order that the manufacture of this product may be carried on in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—369. Chronometers and compasses, and parts thereof, including cards therefor, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for ships or aircraft: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the duty on these articles previously?

Mr. ROBB: They were free, but the parts came in under item 453, with a duty of 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent; under item 657, with a duty of 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent and item 590a, with a duty of 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent. There is no change in the rate on compasses and chronometers except those for aircraft, which at present enter under item 590a with a duty of 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent. This item is intended to cover parts for chronometers and compasses for ships and aircraft; the typical part is the compass card, which cannot enter under either item 369 or item 470. Such cards consist of a steel magnet and metal float for the liquid compass or a pivot for the dry compass, and a paper card showing the points of the compass. These are not manufactured in Canada, as they require to be manufactured by the actual compass makers. The amended item is to obviate this difficulty. The item is further amended to provide for compasses and parts. These are not made in Canada and enter now under item number 590a.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What would be the loss in revenue?

Mr. ROBB: The imports are not ascertainable.

Mr. STEVENS: At the present time this item is limited to chronometers and compasses for ships?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The item will now include chronometers and compasses, and parts thereof, including cards therefor. Do I understand that the minister is limiting that item to ships or aircraft?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and the item specifies "of a class or kind not made in Canada."

Mr. FRASER: Is that an amendment?

Mr. ROBB: No, that is the same as it was before.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—437. Safes, doors for safes and vaults; scales, balances, weighing beams, and strength testing machines of all kinds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: We are just adding the words "n.o.p." which are made necessary by an amendment in item number 448.

Mr. STEVENS: There is practically no change.

Mr. KENNEDY: How is it we have luxuries and articles entering into the manufacture of luxuries on the free list, while articles of this kind carry 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent?

Mr. CHAPLIN: You must have a safe to keep the platinum in.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell us at whose request this change was made? Was there a tariff board hearing; is there any report, and is it printed?

Mr. ROBB: I have already explained that the "n.o.p." is added because it comes under another item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438b. Automobiles for conveying passengers only, n.o.p., valued at retail at place of production, when new, with standard equipment complete, at not more than twelve hundred dollars each; motor cars or motor trucks (not for railways or tramways) for carrying goods only; motor cycles or sidecars therefor; chassis for motor vehicles specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. STEVENS: What is the basis for that change?

Mr. ROBB: We are adding the words "or sidecars therefor."

Mr. STEVENS: It is a new item.

Mr. ROBB: Here is the explanation:

The Canadian Wheelmen's Association, in presenting to the board an application for reduction of duty on motorcycles, stressed the fact that under the existing tariff, sidecars for such motorcycles pay rates of 22½, 30 and 35 per cent under item 359, whereas motorcycles themselves enter at 12½, 17½ and 20 per cent under item 438b. On giving evidence on behalf of the Wheelmen's Association, Mr. W. M. Gladish of the Ottawa Journal stated that the high duty on sidecars was an obvious anomaly and caused considerable objection among distributors as well as among users of motorcycles who regarded sidecars as an essential part of motorcycle equipment. It is proposed, therefore, to amend item 438b by the insertion of the words "or sidecars therefor" which will permit entry of both under the one item. Motorcycles are not made in Canada. Imports of sidecars are not separately classified, whereas imports of motorcycles in the fiscal year 1927-28 were valued at $257,000.

Two public hearings were held of the application, that portion of it relating to motorcycles being withdrawn by the applicant at the opening of the second hearing.

Mr. COOTE: In 1926 this government removed the 5 per cent excise tax from motor cars valued at less than $1,200, and at that time some of the members of the Conservative party pointed out to the minister that this was really giving another 5 per cent protection. I would like to quote from Hansard of 1926, page 4133, as follows:

Mr. Robb: It does not make any difference where they pay it. My hon. friend from West Calgary and my hon. friend from West York have forgotten that I hold in my hand a letter from the automobile manufacturers of Canada guaranteeing that they will pass this on to the Canadian people, and that the purchaser of a Canadian car will have all this reduction in the excise tax.

The minister continued:

I repeat that we have the promise of the associated automobile manufacturers of Canada, of all the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada—it will be found on Hansard to-morrow morning—that they will pass this excise reduction on to the Canadian purchaser, and I serve notice on them now, in the presence of my friends, that if they do not live up to that agreement we will find means of placing them in a position where they will have to do so, or meet competition of the world.

The minister made a very positive statement that he would see that the automobile manufacturers would live up to these terms. Last year I brought to the attention of the minister what seemed to be very good proof that some of these automobile manufacturers were not living up to the promise which they had made. In Hansard of March 30, 1928, at page 1820, I pointed out to the minister that at that time a Ford coupe was advertised in Canada at a price of 29.1 per cent over the United States price; that a Whippet coach, which was made, I think, by the Overland people, sold at 29.9 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States, and that a Chrysler coupe was 29.8 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States. The firms manufacturing these cars all signed a letter which the Minister of Finance referred to in his statement of 1926. The percentages which I quoted a year ago were the prices as advertised in Canada at the factory and, of course, without any sales or excise tax being included. When this was brought to the attention of the minister last year, he said in reply to me:

Mr. Robb: I have no information other than what my hon. friend has said, nor have I any complaints that the reduction has not been passed on to the purchasers. But after the session, when I have more time, I will look more carefully into the matter. My hon. friend will agree with me that, just on a bare statement, we cannot adopt legislation affecting all the different firms throughout Canada.

And a little further on he says:

I shall this afternoon direct the attention of the Department of National Revenue to the observations of my hon. friend and ask them to check the matter up. It may take some time to do so.

I am taking advantage of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue is in the house as well as the Minister of Finance, and I should like to ask either of these ministers what investigation has taken place into this matter and whether the government can now inform us whether the automobile manufacturers are living up to the promise which was contained in that letter, that is, that they would pass this reduction on to the consumer. I understood the minister at that time to assure us that they would not take advantage of the elimination of the excise tax.

May I, before I sit down, point out to the house that the tariff on automobiles valued at less than $1,200 is only 20 per cent. I have not been able to get prices for comparison this year, but according to figures I gave last year based on prices published by these different automobile concerns, the prices were in nearly every case more than 29 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States. It seems evident on the face of it that these firms are taking advantage of the remission of the excise tax. Again I should like to ask either of these ministers what the result of that investigation was.

Mr. ROBB: Carrying out my promise to my hon. friend, I have had letters written to the manufacturers, directing their attention to his observations. I do not recall at the moment, because I have not the correspondence before me, whether I said who had made the complaint; in any case I asked them for an explanation. My recollection is that I had satisfactory replies from some of the firms, but I will admit frankly that the replies of one or two of them were not very satisfactory. I recall some time ago having looked over this correspondence, and my recollection is that I wrote them again. I shall have the matter checked up and find out whether I got a reply, and I shall be able to give my hon. friend some information about it after eight o'clock or let him know about it confidentially. I do not object to his bringing the matter up now. It affords an opportunity of directing the attention of the automobile people to the promise then made.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I suggest that this item stand until the information is brought down?

Mr. ROBB: That is not necesary, because it does not affect this at all.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the only opportunity we have of discussing it.

Mr. ROBB: I will not object to my hon. friend discussing it on any other item.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Is my hon. friend sure that the benefit of the excise tax elimination was passed on to the consumer at the time the tax was taken off?

Mr. ROBB: I have the assurance of some of the automobile people.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): It is my firm conviction that, in reality, it was not passed on at that time. I know this would call for a 15 per cent reduction, because the duty was lowered from 35 to 20 per cent. Not long before that time I had been selling cars of a certain make, and I know one firm made a reduction of 10 per cent, leaving 5 per cent of the reduction yet to be made. In the meantime application was made to the Minister of Finance that the excise tax be removed, with the promise that if it were removed, the benefit would be passed on to the purchaser. The excise tax was removed, and shortly afterwards another 5 per cent reduction in the price was made, but to my mind this was virtually the remaining 5 per cent of the 15 per cent reduction, and the benefit of the excise tax has never been passed on to the consumer, at least by some firms. I am of the firm conviction that is what was done at the time.

Mr. KENNEDY: I think the minister's statement with regard to the matter leaves on the committee the impression that he was not very enthusiastic about it.

Mr. ROBB: Enthusiastic about what?

Mr. KENNEDY: About carrying out the promise that was made in 1926.

Mr. ROBB: We might as well settle the matter now. Perhaps my hon. friend will check up with the hon. member (Mr. Coote) who sits in front of him when I show him the correspondence.

Mr. COOTE: It is true that the minister—

Mr. KENNEDY: Just a minute. This is a question that was very important in the session of 1926, and on which, I may say, the government ran its election in parts of this country. Yet the minister, after two years and after the matter was called to his attention a year ago, can only say: "My recollection is that certain things happened and certain representations were made to me." Surely the matter is one of great importance. I remember something of the lobby that was carried on in this building by the manufacturers and the definite promise that was made to the house. But in a matter that has been so prominently before the house and that has meant so much to the government and to the manufacturers themselves, the members have not a clear explanation to-day as to what was done between the government and the manufacturers, or as to whether the minister's department really carried the thing through to a conclusion or not. This simply illustrates how easily the government has been making promises in regard to the tariff and everything else, and how it has failed to carry them out in any effective degree. It is just another instance of the same thing.

Mr. COOTE: I think the best way for the minister to convince the house of the efforts he has made to see that this promise is carried out would be to give us very frankly all the correspondence which he has had with the automobile manufacturers since the passage of this legislation, and particularly since I brought this matter to his attention a year ago. I first made a statement in regard to the matter when I spoke on the budget last year, on the 6th of March, and I thought that I had made a good case, that I had established at least what the lawyers call a prima facie case. I thought it was then the duty of the minister or of his department, a member of parliament having claimed that the automobile manufacturers had not lived up to the agreement, to look into the matter; but when the budget resolution was being discussed on March 30, over three weeks later, the minister did not seem aware at all that I had made my complaint in that connection, and was not able at the time to give me any reply. He had no information as to whether or not the automobile manufacturers had really been taking advantage of the reduction. He did not know whether the prices I had quoted were correct, and if they were, he did not know if that was proof that the manufacturers had not been living up to the agreement. Now a whole year has passed, and when the correspondence is brought down I think it will be found that the minister has not made any serious effort to find out whether or not the automobile manufacturers were taking any advantage of the elimination of the excise tax. It will be found that the Fort Motor Company, for instance, just to mention one of the companies concerned—and it is the largest manufacturer in Canada of automobiles affected by this change, valued at less than $1,200—has not even replied to the department; there is on file in the department no reply from that company in regard to this matter.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 39, respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Mr. Odette.

Bill No. 61, respecting the Lacombe and Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. Blatchford.

Bill No. 83, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Vallance.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 438b, automobiles for conveying passengers only.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon hon. gentlemen opposite asked for certain correspondence between the Minister of Finance and the Automobile Association. I now lay the correspondence on the table.

Mr. COOTE: I think, Mr. Chairman, it would facilitate the work of the committee if the minister would tell us what is in that correspondence.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend can look at my copy.

Mr. COOTE: I am only anxious that the committee should be made aware of what is in the correspondence. I do not think the item under consideration should be disposed of until the committee are advised by the minister just what action has been taken, and until the committee know whether or not he is aware if the Automobile Association has taken advantage of the reduction of the excise tax or not.

Mr. ROBB: I have their statement. If my hon. friend will send me back the correspondence I will read it into Hansard.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does the correspondence demonstrate whether they did or did not take advantage?

Mr. ROBB: Last session, Mr. Chairman, as correctly stated by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), he brought to the attention of the house the question of the reduction of the excise tax on automobiles. On April 10, 1928, I wrote to T. A. Russell, president of the Automotive Industries of Canada, the following letter:

My Dear Russell:

I am not sure whether you are president this year of the Automotive Industries of Canada, but as you signed the letter which was given to me on June 5, 1926, and read into Hansard on June 7, on behalf of the industry I am writing you to-day with the request that you bring it to the attention of the proper officers of the association.

With this letter I am enclosing a copy of the Hansard of March 30, and would in particular draw your attention to the debate which started on page 1948 in connection with the Special War Revenue Act.

You will notice that Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Coote and Mr. Fansher took exception to the prices of automobiles in Canada and expressed the opinion that the consumers did not receive the full benefit of the tariff reduction of 1926,

I promised to have the matter looked into, therefore this letter is written.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) James A. Robb.

President,
Automotive Industries of Canada,

On the 12th the following letter was received:

Willys-Overland Limited,
Toronto, April 12th, 1928.

Hon. James A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Robb:

I have your letter of 10th regarding automobile prices. It came during my absence from the city, hence the delay in acknowledging.

I am taking up the question as you suggest with the officers of Automotive Manufacturers and Exporters Association. Neither our company nor the Ford Motor Company are members, but it is the only organization representative in any way of the manufacturers, and I have asked their secretary to bring the question before their committee. You will also hear from me further with regard to it.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) T. A. Russell,
President.

On the 14th, in reply to that letter I wrote:

Ottawa, April 14th, 1928.

My dear Russell,

I have your letter of the 12th instant and note that you are referring my letter to the officers of the Automotive Manufacturers and Exporters Association. I also note that your company is no longer a member of that association, but as you signed the original letter sent to me in 1926 and as you can undoubtedly speak for your company, I would appreciate if you would let me know, not later than Saturday the 21st of April, what your reply is to the statement made in the House on the 30th of March.

I need not point out to you that it is important that I have this information immediately.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) James A. Robb.

On April 18, this letter was written from Walkerville:

The Studebaker Corporation of Canada,
Limited,
Walkerville, Ont., April 18th, 1928.

Hon. James A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

We have noted your letter to Mr. T. A. Russell with reference to the discussion in the House of Commons regarding the prices of automobiles in Canada.

We would call your attention to the fact that the comparison of Canadian and American prices on the Erskine car as written in Hansard March 6th is erroneous. The American price list of the Erskine six is $795.00. The increase of Canadian list over American list is approximately 25 per cent instead of 35 per cent as shown in the record.

We have not qualified for the omission of excise tax on the Erskine car in Canada and we therefore collect from our dealers the amount of excise tax which we pay to the government.

Yours very truly,
The Studebaker Corporation of Canada, Ltd.

Hon. James A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

We have before us copy of your letter of April 10th to Mr. T. A. Russell.

In this connection will say when the government discontinued excise tax on cars built in Canada, under $1,200, June 8, 1926, we immediately discontinued collecting from dealers excise tax on such cars in our line as qualified, in accordance with this government regulation, and have not, since that time, collected excise tax on such cars.

It is the policy of our corporation to base our sale price on the cost of production, plus a reasonable percentage of profit, and it will be our policy to continue to do this in the future.

I assure you our records are open for the inspection of your department any time you might wish to check the manner in which we are handling our business; the returns we are getting on capital invested, etc. We would welcome going over these matters in detail at any time with anyone from your department whom you might wish to delegate.

Very truly yours,
(Sgd.) Jno. D. Mansfield,
President—General Manager.

On April 27, I acknowledged that letter.

My Dear Mr. Mansfield:

I have your letter of the 24th instant in connection with the price of automobiles in Canada.

On April 24, I received the following letter:

General Motors of Canada Limited
Oshawa, Ont.
April 24, 1928.

Honourable J. A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Honourable Sir:

We have been requested by the Canadian Automobile Manufacturers and Exporters Association to give you a statement relative to the accusation recently made on the floor of the house, to the effect that the automobile manufacturers in Canada were not acting in accordance with Mr. T. A. Russell's letter to you of June 5, 1926.

I wish to positively state that General Motors of Canada, Limited has not only lived up to this agreement, but has gone further than was agreed, and the records of our company which are open for inspection, will substantiate this statement.

Taking the Chevrolet line for example, I would point out to you that prior to June 8, 1926, our mark-up over the United States was as follows:

Roadster	1.30
Coupe	1.30
Landau sedan	1.31
Commercial chassis	1.30
Utility express chassis	1.39
Touring	1.30
Coach	1.30
Sedan	1.29

making an average of 1.31 with the excise tax added with the exception of the commercial and utility express chassis.

Immediately after June 8th, the excise tax was removed and the Canadian mark-up over the United States list remained the same.

At the present time, I would point out to you that the following mark-up over the United States list is in effect.

Mr. BENNETT: What do they mean by "mark-up"?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine it is 1 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be; it must be the scale.

Mr. ROBB:

Roadster	1.26
Coupe	1.24
Sedan	1.23
Imperial Sedan	1.24
Roadster Delivery	1.26
Commercial Chassis	1.26
Utility Express Chassis	1.28
Touring	1.26
Coach	1.26
Cabriolet	1.24

or an average mark-up on the whole list of 1.25 which is just 6 per cent less than the average mark-up used immediately following the removal of the excise tax, so that we have not only kept faith with the government with regard to the use of the excise tax as a protective item, but have reduced our mark-up in addition thereto an average of 6 per cent.

I wish further to call your attention to the fact that the Chevrolet car as produced in Canada, is not identical with that as produced in the United States, due to many necessary Canadian refinements which increase the value of the Canadian-made article.

Any further details that you may wish in this connection, we will be only too pleased to submit.

Yours very truly,

The following letter was received on May 11, from Dodge Brothers:

Dodge Brothers (Canada) Limited
Toronto

May 11th, 1928.

To the Honourable James A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Sir:—Your letter of April 10th, addressed to Mr. T. A. Russell, late president of the "Automotive Industries of Canada" of which we were members, has been forwarded to the writer through the Automotive Manufacturers and Exporters Association, "Automotive Industries" having ceased to function as representative of the associated automotive manufacturers of the Dominion of Canada approximately eighteen months ago.

Apropos of your letter to Mr. Russell, and enclosures therewith and in answer to the query as to whether upon the excise tax being discontinued on cars built in Canada at a price under $1,200, upon June 8, 1926, the purchasers of our product received the benefit of the same, please be advised this company promptly discontinued the collection of excise tax from our selling organization upon such models and types as reached, Canadian content qualification, nor have we since that time collected excise tax upon any vehicle so qualifying. Upon the other hand, it is obviously necessary, in the proper conduct of our business, for us, through the computation of actual manufacturing cost, to arrive at a selling price, plus a reasonable profit, and, upon such a computation the prices of our product are set.

As the writer had the privilege of stating to you personally some little time ago, our records are constantly being reviewed by the officers of, and under the authority of the Department of Customs and Excise, and we are of course prepared to submit at any time to any investigation or review that in your good judgment may be deemed proper.

Yours very truly,

Mr. COOTE: It will be noticed from this corespondence which has been read by the minister that no reply has been received from the company of which Mr. Russell was president. Apparently Mr. Russell was the prime mover in this matter in 1926. As the leader of the opposition said at that time, he was very importunate and he finally persuaded the minister to put through this elimination of excise tax for the benefit of the Canadian Automobile Manufacturers' Association. To say the least, I think Mr. Russell's company certainly showed ingratitude towards the minister in not replying to his letter.

With reference to the statement of the Studebaker people I wish to state that the price of an Erskine coach, which was quoted by me in 1928, was an error, and later on in the session on a question of privilege I corrected that statement. I was quoting in good faith from a motor magazine published in the United States, but evidently it was a misprint. With reference to the General Motors Corporation, last year I am reported in Hansard of March 6, as saying:

> I think the prices which I have quoted are ample proof that our automobile manufacturers, with the exception of the Chevrolet people—

That is the General Motors Corporation.

> —are taking advantage of this removal of the excise tax.

In that sentence I intended to exempt General Motors from any charge of taking advantage of this removal. I point out to the minister and to the committee that no reply has been received from the Ford Company of Canada as to this charge. Last year I showed that the price of the Canadian car was 29 per cent in excess of the price of the American car on every model placed on the market by the Ford Company of Canada. There is a reply from the Chrysler people, and certainly anyone who heard the letter read would see that it contains no proof that they are not taking advantage of this remission of the excise tax. They did not give the price of any car they are making, and if they had done so it would have required quite an explanation to show why their car in Canada should be 29.8 per cent higher in price than the car in the United States.

I have already said that no reply was received from the company of which Mr. Russell is president. Last year I showed that the price of a Whippet coach manufactured by his company was 29.9 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States. As far as this correspondence is concerned I think we may take it that in the cases of the Ford Company of Canada, the Willys-Overland Company and the Chrysler people no proof has been offered that they are not taking advantage of this remission of the excise tax, and it seems to me only fair to ask the minister that he make good the statement which he made in 1926, as follows:

> I serve notice on them now, in the presence of my friends, that if they do not live up to that agreement we will find means of placing them in a position where they will have to do so, or meet competition of the world.

My suggestion to the minister is that he take off the excise tax on cars valued at $1,200 or less, no matter where they are made. That is the only way of assuring the people of Canada that these companies will live up to the promise they made in 1926.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did my hon. friend see the statement by Mr. Campbell of the Ford company a few months ago, in which he said his company lost over $60 on every car they turned out last year?

Mr. COOTE: I did not see that statement, but here I have a statement made to the house by the minister three years ago, when he said these people would have to live up to this promise or he would place them in a position where they would have to meet the competition of the world. I charge that they have not lived up to that promise, and I ask the minister now to tell the house whether he is not convinced that he should remove this excise tax from American-made cars in order to keep the promise he made the house in 1926.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend forgets that according to the statement the majority of these people have lived up to that promise. There is also a question of revenue involved, which has to be looked into carefully. These other companies which he alleged are not living up to the promise are in competition with the companies which have lived up to it, and I am sure the people will not buy these cars if prices are too high.

Mr. COOTE: The minister should not attempt to get out of his promise in that way.

He did not say that if certain of the manufacturers lived up to the agreement it would be all right, even though other manufacturers did not do so; he said if they did not all live up to it he would do a certain thing, and I think the house took it for granted that that was what he was going to do.

Mr. STEVENS: That is out of date; that was last year.

Mr. COOTE: No, that was three years ago. Perhaps the Minister of Finance is like some people who, when they get on in years, find their memory of what happened long ago better than their recollection of what happened in the immediate past. I am trying to find in Hansard a statement made by the minister in 1926, when it was suggested to him that if he were going to put this into force he should place in the act a stipulation that if the companies did not live up to the agreement the government would reintroduce the excise tax on Canadian-made cars. At page 4136 of Hansard for 1926 I find that the hon. member for Rosetown asked the following question:

> If we are going to pass this amendment to-night I would like to know if it contains a provision that if at any time it is proved to the satisfaction of the government that this rebate of excise tax is not passed on to the consumer, the tax will at once again be imposed.

The minister's reply was as follows:

> To do that it would be necessary to give the governor in council the right to increase taxation, and that is not good legislation.

It seems to me now that it would have been good legislation.

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.
>
> Mr. Evans: Will that be inserted in the bill?
> Mr. Robb: It is not necessary.

I am rather convinced from the answer given a moment ago by the minister that it really was necessary, and perhaps the house was derelict in its duty in not insisting that that be done. I have a high personal regard for the minister, as I had at that time, and from the statement he made that night I believed him to be in earnest in this regard; I thought if these men did not live up to the agreement, as soon as the matter was brought to his attention he would remove the excise tax on imported cars as well. Is not that the impression which anyone would gather from reading the remarks which I have quoted from Hansard? I do not wish unduly to delay the committee on this matter but I think the minister owes it to the committee to state that unless these automobile companies can absolutely prove, by a comparison of the prices of the different models of their cars in Canada with the prices in the United States, that they are not taking advantage of this excise tax, collecting that tax in actual practice and putting it in their own pockets, the minister should at once remove the excise tax on all cars. The minister stated:

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.

I asked the minister to take this tax off and have the reduction applied to all cars.

Mr. ROBB: I can answer that quickly by saying, no. Cars coming from countries with whom we have no preferential trade agreement pay the excise tax when they are valued under $1,200.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that tax five per cent?

Mr. ROBB: Five per cent where the value is under $1,200 and ten per cent where the value is over $1,200. Any person who buys a high-priced car, one costing five or six thousand dollars, is able to pay the government a little revenue. If the hon. member were to argue that we should consider raising the limit next year, I might consider that, but it is too late to do anything this year. My hon. friend says that a few companies have not lived up to this agreement, and I will tell him that to-morrow morning I am going to send them a letter enclosing a copy of Hansard and demanding an answer. But why should we lose revenue when the great bulk of the trade is living up to the agreement?

Mr. GARDNER: How do you know they are doing that?

Mr. ROBB: They say so, and it has not been contradicted to-night. I am not here in the interests of the countries who do not give Canada any trade concessions; this legislation is very fair and the government of Canada is obtaining a certain revenue from the high-priced cars, and it all goes towards the liquidation of the national debt.

Mr. COOTE: All I am asking the minister to do is to take the excise tax off all cars under $1,200 regardless of whether or not they are made in Canada. My reason for asking that is the statement made by the minister in 1926, when he persuaded the house to pass this amendment which removed the excise tax on cars valued at less than $1,200, and the realization that certain manufacturers have not lived up to that agreement.

Mr. ROBB: A very limited number.

Mr. COOTE: If the cars valued at $1,200 or under which are produced in Canada are not being sold under the proper terms and at the proper price, I would like the minister to explain to the house just what he meant when he said in 1926:

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.
>
> Mr. Evans: Will that be inserted in the bill?
> Mr. Robb: It is not necessary.

The house did not consider it was necessary after the Finance minister made that statement. They took it for granted that if the companies mentioned in that letter, and who had given their word to Mr. Russell, authorizing him to write the letter, did not live up to the agreement the minister would place all automobiles valued at less than $1,200 on the same basis. That is the impression which he gave the house. Now he says that as some of the automobile manufacturers have lived up to this agreement, and as he needs this revenue, he is not going to do anything. I suggest that he put them all on the same basis, or that he reinstate the excise tax on Canadian-made as well as on imported cars. If he will not take the tax off all cars valued at less than $1,200, then I suggest that he do that. I now ask the minister if he is willing to put this tax on all cars, whether or not they are made in Canada? That would be an attempt to make good his word given in 1926.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member is asking me to break faith with that part of the automobile industry which is living up to this agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: What proof have you of that?

Mr. ROBB: No one has contradicted that statement.

Mr. GARDINER: You have not given any proof of it.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member must remember that we require revenue.

Mr. GARDINER: Never mind the question of revenue; let us take up the other matter.

Mr. ROBB: When a company is manufacturing, in Oshawa, Ford City, Windsor, Toronto or Regina, cars which come within this regulation, we obtain a certain revenue from the excise tax. If we removed that excise tax we would be placing the manufacturer in the foreign country who might not be giving us any concession on our products, on the same basis as those in countries which were. We would be losing that revenue, and we need the revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. minister is becoming more and more Conservative.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I think it has been demonstrated that there has been a certain amount of discourtesy shown to the minister by certain automobile people who did not reply to his letter.

Mr. ROBB: I agree with that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not want to appear as a defender of any automobile manufacturer, but I would like to put a certain phase of this question before the house. Last year or the year before the Ford company put out a new car. It took them a long time to get this car on the market and they introduced it without knowing just what the car was going to cost them. The Ford company in the United States put a price on the car without knowing what it was going to cost them, and they lost $100,000,000 before they could get into production. For the same reason, the Canadian company lost $5,000,000. Is it any wonder that they did not reply to the letter of the minister? If I had been in their place I would have replied by telling the minister that we had lost money on our product and we were only beginning to make money. They are just getting into production, and it seems to me that that is a valid reason why the Ford company did not reply.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Wellington): I would like to know the price of a Ford coupe in the United States and in Canada. I believe in protecting the Canadian manufacturer, but when I pay $740 for a Ford coupe in Canada and I can go across to a town in the United States, which is three times as far from Detroit as my home town is from Ford, Ontario, and find that the same car is sold for $200 less, I begin to wonder what the tariff board are doing. If I were on the tariff board I would want to see that the Canadian purchaser was able to buy that car just as cheaply as the American purchaser. This talk about extra freight is a thing of the past as far as Canada is concerned. We have the right kind of buyers in Canada, because they pay for the articles they purchase. I have worked for different companies long enough to know that they do not lose much money in that way. I would like to know how it is we have to pay $200 more for a Ford car in Canada. What are the tariff board doing about it? If it is not there for the purpose of giving direct information to the Minister of Finance, I think it is an unnecessary expense. The Minister of Finance of this country is to my mind, bigger than any manufacturing institution either in Canada or the United States, and he is here to protect the Canadian purchaser. I am a Canadian purchaser, and I know I have been paying $200 more for a Ford coupe in Canada than the same car could have been purchased for in the United States. What is the reason?

Mr. GARDINER: As regards the information the Minister of Finance is giving to the committee to-night, it would appear from correspondence I have before me that only two of the automobile firms manufacturing cars in Canada have demonstrated that they have lived up to the understanding of 1926. I am very much surprised at the statement of the minister to-night. Let me say frankly, that prior to to-night I had a very high respect for the word of the minister; but after hearing his explanation respecting this matter, I am coming to doubt whether I was justified in having that high regard for him. Would the Minister of Finance, for instance, wish those of us who met him first when this particular question was brought to the committee who were cooperating with the government at that time, to give to the house all the information that was brought out at that meeting and all the promises he then made to see to it that, if this were granted, the companies would live up to their agreement? So far as I am concerned the statement which the minister has made to-night is actually rubbish in comparison with the statement he then made that he would see that those companies did live up to their agreements. At that time we knew, of course, the government needed support, and we were willing to support them on a policy agreed upon between ourselves. A good deal has been said in different parts of the country as to that agreement between the government and ourselves, but I am free to say that with the exception of this one proposition, the government have lived up to each and every item we agreed to. But the minister to-night has not given the committee one iota of information that would give us even the suggestion of an idea that he had tried to see to it that these companies lived up to their agreement as outlined in a letter by Russell. Is this all the minister has done in the matter—merely write to Russell: when he receives a reply, let it go at that, and, when the committee asks for information, blandly say: "The government needs revenue"? The minister's word is of more importance to the house than the revenue is to the country. I do not want to see this item pass until we get some definite promise from the minister that he will keep his word, will keep the promise he gave and which we honestly believed he would live up to when he first brought that proposal before the committee which was working with the government in that cooperative arrangement.

Mr. ROBB: I can only repeat to my hon. friend that the evidence goes to show that I have kept my word. I have written to them all.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that all the minister has done?

Mr. ROBB: That is all.

Mr. GARDINER: That is nothing.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for North Wellington has made a statement. I have heard it many times around the country, and perhaps there is something in it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister not think he ought to find out?

Mr. ROBB: Well, we have a statement of a man who knows something about the business. He has not indicated that the charges are wrong. I repeat, that generally speaking, it goes to show that the prices have been fair; that the manufacturers have not been taking advantage of the 5 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: I think the evidence is almost beyond dispute. I have not been able to get the prices of Ford cars this year. I have not seen the Canadian price of a Ford car at the factory in any advertisement this year. It almost seems as if the Ford Company were very careful now not to advertise the factory price of their car, that is, without the sales and excise taxes added. But these are the prices of a year ago, and they have not been disputed. I gave them on March 6, 1928. The United States price which I shall quote, was taken from a motor magazine published in the United States, giving the factory price of every model of every make of car in the United States. There is no similar magazine in Canada that I have been able to find, and the Canadian prices were all taken from advertisements in Canadian publications. They are the prices without any taxes added in either case so that the prices in the two countries are comparable.

	Canadian price	United States price	Increase	Percentage of increase
Ford roadster .	$495	$385	$110	28.6

The tariff on these cars is 20 per cent. If it were not for the fact that there is no excise payable on the Canadian-made car, the Ford company would not think of having their price more than 25 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States, because if they did, people living near the border would go to the United States, drive the car across and bring it in cheaper. But as the minister remitted the excise tax on the Canadian-made car and did not remit it on the United States-made car, the Ford company have in effect a protection of 25 per cent. In addition to that there used to be in the United States an excise tax of 3 per cent which, when there was added the cost of securing a license in the United States in order that the car could be driven out, gave them really a protection close to 30 per cent. I have already quoted the increase in the Canadian price over the United States price of a Ford roadster. The other prices are as follows:

	Canadian price	United States price	Increase	Percentage of increase
Ford coupe . .	$510	$395	$115	29.1
Ford tudor . .	640	495	145	29.3
Ford fordor . .	740	570	170	29.8
Sport coupe . .	710	550	160	29.

If they were not taking advantage of the remission of the excise tax, how could the price of these cars in Canada in every case but one be more than 29 per cent higher? Neither the Ford company nor the Minister of Finance can convince this committee that there is any practical difference between a Ford car manufactured in Detroit, Michigan, and one manufactured in Ford, Ontario. They are practically the same car. How can the minister have the nerve to tell the committee that the largest manufacturer of low-priced cars in Canada has not been taking advantage of this? If he has to admit that they have been taking advantage—and I do not know how he can deny it—how can he square himself with this house? Here is his statement in 1926; I will read it again:

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.
>
> Mr. Evans: Will that be inserted in the bill?
> Mr. Robb: It is not necessary.

May I say that I regret very deeply that at that time I as one member of this house did not insist that that should be put in the bill. I did not think it was necessary because I had a very high regard for the Minister of Finance and thought that his word,

"It is not necessary," could be taken in effect as a promise to this house that he would reduce the tax on the other cars if they did not keep their agreement. I am not asking him to take the excise tax off all cars. I have never suggested that, never even thought of suggesting it. All I want him to to do is to place cars valued at less than $1,200 coming from any country whatever on the same basis as cars made in Canada. The reason I am asking for it is because these manufacturers have shown that they are not entitled to the consideration they got in 1926. The man who was chiefly instrumental in persuading the minister to bring in this reduction is or was the president of one of the companies concerned, and he had not the courtesy to see that his company replied to the query of the Minister of Finance as to whether they were living up to this agreement.

I have often heard since I have been in this house the statement made from the government benches: This government has too much dignity to do this or to do that. But how much dignity has the government, I would ask, in a case like this, where the Ford Motor Company and the company of which Mr. Russell is president have not the courtesy to reply to the query addressed to them by the minister?

The Finance minister a year ago promised to take note of all the remarks that we made then regarding this tax, and to take the matter up with the companies concerned and see if they were living up to their agreement. He has brought down the correspondence to-night, but he has given absolutely no proof that the majority of the companies are living up to the agreement. It seems to me that the weight of proof is all against the companies except in the case of General Motors and the Studebaker company. A year ago I exempted General Motors from this charge, and later on, when I had secured correct information, I withdrew my statement so far as the Studebaker people were concerned. But not one of these other companies, even those that replied to the minister's query has offered any proof that it is not taking full advantage of the remission of the excise tax on their cars.

Again I ask the minister, what is he going to do about it? Is he going to make good his word given to the house in 1926? That is really more important to this house, as the hon. member for Acadia said, than the amount of money that is collected on these cars valued at less than $1,200 coming from other countries. So far as the loss of revenue is concerned, I think perhaps it would be good policy to take off this excise tax anyway. Cars to-day, especially the cheap cars, are a necessity, and I do not see any reason why they should be singled out for an excise tax. What other necessity that is in daily use in Canada is placed under the burden of an excise tax? Nothing that I know of. I do not think the minister has any justification for keeping that excise tax on, and if we ever had a good demonstration that the Minister of Finance is at heart just as good a protectionist as there is in the house it seems to me that we have had it to-night.

Mr. EVANS: I can well remember the promise which the minister gave in reply to a question I asked him when this matter was under consideration three years ago. To-night we are face to face with another instance such as I described yesterday where the manufacturer gets all the benefit of a tax reduction and the burden is put on the consumer. I do not know why public men at the head of affairs here should practically prostitute their reputations in making promises like this which are never meant to be kept. It is rather hard to say these things, but we are simply bringing the public life of this country down to a system of bargaining, and something worse, sometimes. It has been plainly shown that the manufacturers have not lived up to the promise given to the minister when this tax was taken off, and I think it is up to the minister himself and his colleagues either to replace the tax or see that the benefit is passed on to the consumer.

As to the statement made here to-night that certain companies are not making profits, I have in my hand the Financial Times for April 5 last, and I find that for the first quarter of 1929 up to March 31, the Canadian Ford Company made profits amounting to $2,954,000, made up as follows: January, $810,000; February, $944,000; March $1,200,000. That undoubtedly goes to show that undue profits are being made by these companies. Surely now we can expect either that this excise tax will be replaced for the sake of getting more revenue, and the necessaries of life relieved of some of the taxation placed on them, or that the government will see to it that these manufacturers live up to the promise they made.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, we have an extraordinary situation here. In 1926 certain taxes were remitted or cancelled with regard to automobiles. Some members of this house were afraid at the time that the manufacturers would take advantage of that remission and not give the consumer the benefit. The Minister of Finance promised this house that if they did not give the consumer the benefit, he would see that they were put up against the competition of the world. A year afterwards the matter was again brought up in this house, and an hon. member drew the attention of the Minister of Finance to his promise. The result was that the minister got into communication with the automobile manufacturers and asked them if they had failed to carry out their promise to him. Some of the manufacturers have replied, but in most cases they have given no proof that they have not charged the consumer to the hilt, or that they have passed on to the consumer the benefit of the reduction. Some manufacturers have not even had the decency to reply. The Finance minister to-night says that most of them have replied, but some have not, he admits. The Minister of Finance is the last person in this country who ought to be ignored in the matter of correspondence, and I cannot understand why he and the officials of his department did not go after representatives of these companies who had neglected to reply. It seems extraordinary to me. Again, the Finance minister says: "Oh, well, some of these companies, according to their own statements, have come across and given the consumer the benefit, but I admit that a percentage have not." He might just as well say: Ninety per cent of the people of this country are perfectly honest and not ten per cent are rogues, but let them go anyway because ninety per cent are all right. I cannot understand the attitude of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McGIBBON: If I understand the position correctly, all export trade is exempt from this tax, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Also exports from countries with which we have trade agreements?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then how can the minister arrive at the Canadian content of a car?

Mr. ROBB: That is administered through the Department of National Revenue. Their auditors go to the companies and audit their books and accounts. That system is required to establish not only the basis of the Canadian content, but also for export purposes.

Mr. McGIBBON: How does the minister arrive at the content of the domestic car in Canada, when the export and the domestic trade must be considered as one?

Mr. ROBB: It is done through the Department of National Revenue, who have officers making an audit from time to time. Let me say to my hon. friend that some of these companies are not qualifying for export business, because they do not come up to the requirements. Most countries now require that there should be a certain percentage of content of the country of origin in all imported cars.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister does not answer my question. I do not want to know the channel through which the work is done, I want to know what those officers of the Department of National Revenue do.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot tell my hon. friend that. I will have to ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, when he is in his seat.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister be good enough to give us that information before the item is passed?

Mr. ROBB: What has that to do with the passing of this item?

Mr. McGIBBON: I think it has a lot to do with it. How do you strike the average of the different cars? For instance, take General Motors; they have a number of low-priced cars under $1,200. Does the surplus Canadian content of one type of car go to reduce what I might call the lack of surplus Canadian content in the other?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will have to get that information from the Minister of National Revenue, who administers the act.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot agree with the hon. minister. He has told the house that this is a matter of revenue. I have listened with great attention to what he has been saying this evening, and while he has been treated with great disrespect and discourtesy by the failure of some of the motor companies to answer his letters, when he was making that statement I could not but recall the dramatic stand he took, how he "stood by his guns" down in the theatre before those thousands of Oshawa working men who descended on Ottawa and told them what he was not going to do. Now the hon. member for Macleod has exploded the whole affair by showing that the protection is really 25 per cent. My hon. friends to my left rather belittled us when we endeavoured to make that clear at the time, but I felt perfectly certain that in the end they would realize that what we had said was sound.

But there is another matter of importance The minister said that these machines were not subject to excise tax if valued at less than $1,200, and imported from Britain or from other countries and containing fifty per cent of the labour of those countries. My hon. friend from Muskoka asked how that content was arrived at. I think we should know. I am satisfied that if the Minister of Finance will look up his portfolio he will find the information, briefed as he is by the officers of his department, having in fact sitting by him the most distinguished and the most experienced tariff officer in the government service, and so essential to the life of the ministry itself that it cannot get along without him. I am sure if the minister will ask that officer he will tell him whether the content is computed on each car, on an average, or how. We want to know in order to determine how the revenues of this country are arrived at.

Mr. ROBB: That is a reasonable request, but the information must come from my colleague who administers the act, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. ROBB: I will let the item stand until he is in his seat to give the information. Incidentally I may point out that we have received on cars that have come in under this provision excise taxes amounting to $862,241.90.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the drawback? That would interest me greatly.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 438b stands.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister when this item is likely to come up again, and if in the meantime he will get some real proof for the house that the manufacturers have not been taking advantage of this reduction? If he cannot do that I think it would be only fair to suggest to him that we expect him to take the tax off these cars.

Mr. ROBB: I submit to my hon. friend that it is up to him to prove the manufacturers have been taking advantage of the reduction.

Mr. GARDINER: No. The minister is the person who made the suggestion to this house, and it is up to him to prove that the manufacturers are carrying out their agreement. There is no question about that.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend made the same speech last session or the sesion before, I do not recall which, when he paid me a similar compliment.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not call them "compliments" to-night.

Mr. ROBB: We both come from the same part of the country and I do not suppose these little brushes will hurt us. I am prepared to do my part. As I said a few moments ago, I shall write these companies to-morrow, with copies of Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Telegraph them to-night.

Mr. ROBB: But I submit my hon. friends have not submitted proof that the companies are not living up to their agreement.

Mr. COOTE: Then I should like to know what kind of proof the minister would like me to bring forward. If I bring proof that cars are sold in Canada at a price 29 per cent higher than similar cars are sold for in the United States, what more proof does he want?

Mr. ROBB: I will have that submitted to the officers to check up, because last session my hon. friend gave figures which he had to correct some weeks afterwards.

Mr. COOTE: On one car only, and as soon as I found that figure was incorrect, on a question of privilege I promptly put the matter right. But the minister has admitted that two of these companies have not even had the courtesy to reply to his letter, and the other companies, outside of General Motors—and they were not accused of breaking the agreement—have not offered any proof at all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I think Studebaker does.

Mr. COOTE: Here is a letter from the Chrysler Corporation of Canada. A year ago I showed that the Chrysler two-door sedan sold at 31.3 per cent higher in Canada than in the States, and the Chrysler coupe at 29.8 per cent higher. When the Hansard containing that statement was sent to the Chrysler Corporation they replied:

> In this connection will say when the government discontinued excise tax on cars built in Canada under $1,200 June 8, 1926, we immediately discontinued collecting from dealers the excise tax on such cars in our line as qualified, in accordance with this government regulation, and have not since that time collected excise tax on such cars.

Of course, we do not suppose they would collect that tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: No one accuses them of doing it.

It is the policy of our corporation to base our sale price on the cost of production, plus a reasonable percentage of profit, and it will be our policy to continue to do this in future.

There is no proof there that they have lived up to the agreement.

I assure you our records are open for the inspection of your department any time you might wish to check the manner in which we are handling our business; the returns we are getting on capital invested, etc. We would welcome going over these matters in detail at any time with anyone from your department whom you might wish to delegate.

The minister got this letter on April 24, 1928, almost a year ago. The question which naturally arises in my mind is, when did he go to this company and discuss these matters with them, or did he send someone up there to look into the records? The company suggest it in this letter. The minister says it is up to us to bring proof that the companies are not living up to this agreement. Will he delegate to those of us, who are complaining about this, authority to go into the books of the motor corporations and receive proof that they are living up to this agreement that they made three years ago? The minister is surely going too far when he suggests that it is up to us to bring proof that the companies are not living up to the agreement. The suggestion is made in the letter of the corporation that some of the officers of his department should go there and prove it, and if that is not done the representatives of this company should be compelled to come to Ottawa and submit proof to the minister that they are not taking advantage of the removal of this tax; in other words, that they are living up to the agreement which the minister himself assured the house they would be compelled to observe. I suggest that before the minister comes back and asks us to pass this item, under which it seems we have the only chance to discuss the matter, he should offer us more proof than has been produced to-night.

Mr. ROBB: Let the item stand.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—442. Printing presses, lithographic presses, and type making accessories therefor, also machines specially designed for ruling, folding, binding, embossing, creasing or cutting paper or cardboard, sheet feeding machines, extension deliveries, when for use exclusively by printers, by bookbinders and by manufacturers of articles made from paper or cardboard—including parts thereof composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, brass or wood; machinery and complete parts thereof for printing by photographic methods on plates for use on lithographic and offset presses; stereotypers' and typesetters' blankets or blanketing and press blankets or blanketing used on printing presses, of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: In the budget of 1928 a reduction in duty was made on stereotypes, type casting blankets and press blankets used on rotary printing presses, not made in Canada. It has been pointed out by the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association that the reduction thus afforded is not applicable to those publishers who continue to use the so-called flat bed press. The proposed amendment will make the reduction of last year apply to press blankets used on any printing press; and it goes further, in that it permits the importation of such press blanketing in roll or pieces. The imports for six months, 1928-29, amount to $32,000. Extension sets being an essential part of the press, they have been included in the item.

Mr. FRASER: I have picked up the information that this change has already gone into effect through a departmental ruling. Is that the practice of the department, and is this only to confirm such ruling?

Mr. ROBB: I suppose it might have been done the day after the budget was delivered.

Mr. FRASER: I am not talking about the day after the budget was delivered, but before. Is this a departmental ruling that has been in force for some time and which it is now being sought to make statutory?

Mr. ROBB: I had not heard of that. This was really the intention last year when the amendments were made, but I understand that it was ruled that under the act it would not be quite right, and this amendment was asked for.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the department been levying duty on the item in the meantime?

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell you.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Cannot the minister find out?

Mr. ROBB: The information given by my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) is new to me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We all know. Is there any way of finding out? The hon. member for Cariboo says that he is informed that there was a departmental ruling allowing these items to come in free. It was not of statutory right; nor, I assume, was there any right to make the departmental ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: Was there not an order in council reducing the taxation?

Mr. ROBB: No. The commissioner tells me that the customs advise that they have been charging duty, and the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association have asked for this, alleging that they were being charged.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—448. Spraying machines, fruit or vegetable grading machines, apparatus specially designed for sterilizing bulbs, pressure testing apparatus for determining maturity of fruit; incubators for hatching eggs, brooders for rearing young fowl, pruning hooks, pruning shears, hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, post hole diggers, snaths, milking machines, milking machine attachments; centrifugal machines for testing butter fat, milk or cream; pasteurizers for dairying purposes; equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz: engine, generator, storage battery and switchboard; stumping machines, and other agricultural implements, n.o.p.; and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): In the latter part of this item reference is made to "other agricultural implements, n.o.p.; and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item." What agricultural implements come under this particular head?

Mr. ROBB: I suppose, any others not mentioned; there may be a number. The memorandum I have on this item indicates that it is proposed to amend the present schedule to cover apparatus for sterilizing bulbs, and apparatus for determining the maturity of fruit, in accordance with applications made by the Canadian Horticultural Council. The sterilizing of bulbs consists in the removal of fungus diseases from bulbs and this apparatus is used by bulb growers on the Pacific coast. It is not made in Canada, being imported chiefly from the United Kingdom. The imports are not ascertainable. Fruit pressure testing apparatus is a device used by fruit inspectors. It is imported from the United States and, according to the evidence given at the public hearing, it is not manufactured in Canada. It enters under item 437. The imports are not ascertainable. The inclusion of fruit pressure testing apparatus in 448 necessitates the addition of an n.o.p. clause in the item under which it has been entering, namely, 437. This latter item is otherwise unchanged.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is this the machine the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is going to use to spray his motor with?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): The minister has not answered my question. I want to know what agricultural implements come in under the latter provision of this item, "and other agricultural implements, n.o.p.; and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item." The machine which is called the harvester and which is now known as the combine is being extensively used in western Canada, and comes in at 10 per cent. That is my information from the department.

Mr. ROBB: This n.o.p. provision is the only item it can come under. My hon. friend has discussed the matter with me and, frankly, I am in sympathy with his point of view. But in the first discussion he did not give me to understand that he also included the motor. But the motor being included, as well as the thresher and the reaper, the matter becomes rather complicated. I have therefore asked the tariff board to investigate my hon. friend's inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a good way to put it off.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Probably I have received a little more information since the interview I had with the minister. I would ask him to turn to item 445, which relates to mowing machines and harvesters, self-binding or without binders. It is not necessary to read the item at length. It is free under the British preferential tariff, while under the intermediate and the general it is 6 per cent. This whole item was changed in 1924 to cover all harvesting machinery used in Canada. Going into the records with the Commissioner of Customs, I find that this word "harvester" was introduced back in 1897, when some American farmers who were operating in the southern part of the prairies near the Montana border brought over a harvester which was manufactured in California and which at that time was called the harvester. These are not new machines. They have been operating for forty-two years in some sections of the United States, and recently we have found that we can operate them successfully in western Canada. The designation "harvester, without binder" no doubt means the harvester without binding attachment. When this change was made in 1897 it referred to what we now nickname the "combine." There is no doubt that this machine has been wrongly classified; it should come in under item 445. There should be no difficulty in classifying it under that item just because some new implement company calls it a reaper-thresher in order to have something a little different from other companies; that is no reason why this machine should be penalized 4 per cent as compared with other harvesting machinery. Item 447b relates to threshing machines, and the ordinary threshing separator has no motor attached to it. In western Canada to-day we can buy a motor which will operate any threshing machine with a cylinder up to 36 inches for less than $1,200, and that motor enters duty free. Here is the motor in a tractor coming in duty free, while a motor of the same horse-power attached to this particular machine pays a duty of 10 per cent. Right now, while this is before the committee, I think the minister should take steps to have any misconception cleared up with regard to the interpretation of this section. It is true that representations have been made that this machine should enter under the 10 per cent rate because it is partly a thresher, but if I took the necessary time I could show that part of the threshing machine is a fanning mill, some of the wheels belong to some other machine, and so on. This classification is not in keeping with the revision of the tariff in 1924, and I hope the minister will take this into consideration.

I might quote a few figures to show what this will mean to us in the west. As farmers in western Canada we must keep 100 per cent efficient or we cannot make a profit, and this is one of the machines we are compelled to use for economic reasons. In recent years our help has not been up to the standard of previous years; to-day we cannot get a threshing crew as competent as the crews we had ten years ago; they are also more expensive, so we are compelled to use this machine. Last year the use of these machines increased 611 per cent as compared with 1927; 3,657 of them entered Canada, some of them costing as much as $4,000. If we calculate from the increase in these machines in the last two years, a duty of 4 per cent means a tax of about $1,000,000 on the farmers of the prairie provinces for 1929, and possibly that will amount to $1,500,000. Of course that adds to the revenue of the country but it comes out of the pockets of the producers, who can least afford to pay it. I would like the minister to tell us to-night that from now on this machine, which is not specifically classified as a combine, will be classified as a harvester, which fully describes it.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has pointed out the difficulty that it is also classified as a thresher. I asked the Department of National Revenue why this higher rate of duty was imposed, and they referred me to the Customs Act which says that when two rates of duty are applicable the higher rate must prevail. I can only repeat that I have already referred this matter to the tariff board for inquiry and I think they understand that I want to be able to make representations to the government in time to have the matter considered next session. My hon. friend knows that we cannot make these changes rapidly, and he has also said that the motor comes in free already.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it pays 10 per cent.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): The motor pays 10 per cent, but that is not the point. The thresher-separator, which comes in under a duty of 10 per cent under section 60 of the Customs Act, is a unit by itself, with no motor attached. The motor which operates that separator, which motor may be in a tractor, comes in free. If we took the motor out of the tractor and attached it to the harvester it would pay a duty of 10 per cent, and that is a wide discrepancy. When the word "harvester" was put in the act in 1897 it covered this particular machine, although of course it has been improved since that time. In the olden days the machine derived its power from a ground wheel, or what we call a bull wheel; there was no motor attached to the machine. However, the machine has been improved; a motor has been attached to it and that motor enters under a duty of 10 per cent, although when the same motor is built into a tractor it comes in duty free.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the Minister of National Revenue is in his seat. My friend the Minister of Finance is always asserting to hon. gentlemen to my left his desire to reduce the tariff. Rightly or wrongly a Conservative administration took off the duty on tractors and in 1924, as has been pointed out, the government reduced the duty on farm implements. This particular machine now known as a combine is more accurately described as a harvester; that describes it better than any other word in the English language, because it is a harvester in the true sense of the word. Not only does it cut the grain; it threshes the grain and finishes the job. With this machine you cut the stalks, thresh the heads and as a result of that operation you have the kernels of wheat clean and finished. I first saw one of these machines in Oregon some thirty-one years ago this fall; it was then being pulled by twelve horses, I think.

Mr. STEVENS: Was it not twenty horses?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend thinks it was twenty horses, but my memory is that it was pulled by about twelve. Great improvements have been made since that time. I asked what the machine was and I was told that it was a harvester which cut the heads, leaving quite a stand of straw, threshed them, bagged the grain and finished the operation completely.

So I put it to the minister if this is not what he is trying to do: He is trying to get protection by a classification which is at variance with the English language; he is trying to protect his friends by not classifying this machine as a harvester. He is simply using a classification which avoids a word he knows would give offence to his friends behind him—"protection". He says, "We are going to charge 10 per cent on this harvester because it is a combination of many machines, which makes it in every sense a harvester."

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I was not here at the commencement of this discussion, but I would like to know what the Minister of National Revenue is being accused of.

Mr. BENNETT: According to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, this machine is not classified as a harvester, because as a harvester it would come in under a 6 per cent duty under item 445. In order to afford protection they classify it under another item because there is a motor and something else connected with it. It has to pay 10 per cent because they say it is a threshing machine.

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it a threshing machine?

Mr. EULER: It is a part of a threshing machine.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it a reaper? It is a combination of both, and therefore a complete harvester. In order to afford protection to their friends, and not having the courage to do it by means of a statute, they apply this classification, and do this violence to the English language. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) smiling.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us do away with all that protection.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us all go to Geneva; here are no threshing machines there.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. leader of the opposition recommend a lower rate?

Mr. BENNETT: I expected that question, but you are a little late. Why does not the hon. minister say, "Will you reduce it or increase it?" It is the old story; neither the Minister of Finance nor his government has the courage to face the situation, and they dodge behind every available excuse in order to make these gentlemen believe it is not a harvester because it has a motor in it. They say it has a threshing machine in it, and also a reaper in it. Of course, it is the combination of all those things which makes it a harvester. If the Minister of Finance looked at one how would he describe it? He would say, "That is a harvester." Would he say it is a thresher? He would not. Would he say it is a reaper? He would not. Would he say it is a motor car? He would not. He would say, "It is a harvester," and so would the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. EULER: I would say nothing of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Because he had ruled the other way, but if he let his intelligence guide him, he would say, "It is a harvester." If he looked at a printing press in his office, which folded the paper, where an older press did not fold the paper, would he call it a printing press or a folder? Of course he would not call it a folder, nor would he call it a dynamo if it were run by electrictiy. I cannot imagine more violence being done to one's sense of what you might call consistency in the use of the English language. Suppose you go downstairs and look at the dynamo there; you would see there is a belt, brushes and various other things on it. But you would not describe it as a brush, as a turbine or as a belt; you would describe it as a dynamo. My hon. friends get up here and say, "This is not a harvester; this has a motor in it." If the Minister of Justice were not involved in this matter as a colleague of the minister I would leave it to him to say whether a combination of a thresher, a reaper and a motor would not make a complete harvester.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think I will find that out.

Mr. BENNETT: I think he would find with me.

Mr. ROBB: For the first time this week the House of Commons appears to be unanimous. Practically ever since the budget was brought down I have been urged by my friends around me to have this item reclassified so that these new machines could come in under the lower rate of duty. I have been urged by the hon. gentlemen opposite to do the same thing. We have taken it up with the Department of National Revenue, and although that department was willing to meet the wishes of all concerned, they were confronted by a section which has been in the act since 1907. Section 59 of the act reads as follows:

If any non-enumerated article equally resembles two or more enumerated articles on which different rates of duty are chargeable, the duty on such non-enumerated article shall be the same as that on the enumerated article which it resembles, paying the highest duty.

They claimed that under that section they were compelled to charge the highest duty.

Mr. STEVENS: It is enumerated under 445.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends are all in favour of having the duty reduced, so I will ask that the item stand and I will give the officers instructions to amend this act. It cannot be done just by putting in the word "combine"; we must take it out of the classification it is in.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Is there any machine coming in under item 445 which is designated as a harvester, or is there any machine which more clearly fills the bill than that which has the nickname of "combine"?

Mr. ROBB: I will have to direct that question to the Department of National Revenue, and they probably will be in a position to answer it to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps this hybrid machine was mixed up with the hybrid ticket.

Mr. EULER: I regret that I was not present during the discussion, but I heard enough from the hon. leader of the opposition to be rather surprised at the language he used in attributing certain things to me, and even presuming to read my thoughts.

Mr. BENNETT: Impossible.

Mr. EULER: I will agree with him there. I do not pretend to be an expert in interpreting the word "harvester". During the course of the investigation into the Customs department, held some time ago, the minister was criticized for taking upon himself the powers which should be exercised by the heads of the departments. This matter came up through the representations of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher). I am in sympathy with what he would like to have done, and I do not see any reason why a combine should be treated any differently from any other piece of agricultural machinery. The matter was presented to the Commissioner of Customs, who pointed out that it was not a harvester in the strict sense of the interpretation of that word, because it was a combination of two different machines. In that case, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, you must take the higher rate as applying.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell us what is meant in item 445 by these words:

Mowing machines, harvesters, self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers, and complete parts thereof.

What is meant by the word "harvesters"? It certainly is not a self-binding reaper.

Mr. EULER: For example, the old reaper was called a harvester.

Mr. STEVENS: The word "reapers" is here.

Mr. EULER: I do not pretend to be an expert on the nomenclature of agricultural machinery, but there are machines which are used in the business of agriculture and known as harvesters, and that description does not necessarily apply to a machine which is a combination of two other machines.

Mr. STEVENS: What are they?

Mr. EULER: A binder is a harvester.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is quibbling, absolutely. The word "reaper" is mentioned: the self-binder harvester is mentioned, but still the word "harvester" stands alone.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It is a harvester without a self-binder.

Mr. STEVENS: What is a harvester without a self-binder?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): A reaper.

Mr. STEVENS: The reaper is mentioned. The harvester is a machine that, to my knowledge, has been used in Oregon, Washington, California, for twenty-five years.

Mr. EULER: I think I have the floor.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but I asked the minister if he would interpret that word, and he cannot.

Mr. EULER: If there is a difference of opinion in this committee in regard to agricultural machinery, we are not experts with the exception of my hon. friends across the floor to the right, and some on this side; but I will concede that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the leader of the opposition and myself are not experts in naming agricultural machinery. I admit I am not. When the question is one of the interpretation of a tariff item, I am quite willing to leave the interpretation pretty much to those who are particularly charged with that duty.

Mr. STEVENS: And they say that it comes under that item. My hon. friend is arguing about that and pleading with the minister.

Mr. EULER: I am referring to the officers of the department. They are tariff experts, and they make a pretty close examination of everything they propose to do. To make a long story short, I took the matter up with Mr. Breadner and he made exactly the same explanation as that given by the Minister of Finance. It is the combination of two machines, and in that case you have to take the higher rate of duty on threshing machines which is 10 per cent. I see no reason in the world why the tariff should not be altered so that that will come under the same rate of tariff as that on all other agricultural machinery. I do not wish to make any suggestion that might not meet with the approval of the Minister of Finance, as this is particularly within his province, but in order to prevent any danger of misinterpretation, any misunderstanding, if in the opinion of some of the hon. members this is a harvester—and the Commissioner of Customs says it is not a harvester, that it is a combine, that there is a thresher included with it—I make this suggestion: why cannot we describe it as a combine and put it in that item?

Mr. STEVENS: Why not?

Mr. EULER: The house seems to be agreeable to doing that.

Mr. FRASER: Why was that not done when the tariff was being arranged?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): These machines were not being imported then.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): If the minister is going on the assumption that it is part of two machines, I will tell him that it is part of more than two machines: it is part of four machines and one of the parts enters free.

Mr. EULER: That simply accentuates what I have already said. It makes it all the more doubtful what this hybrid machine is, and it may be more properly described by an amendment to the tariff. If I may say this without offence, I resent suggestions made by the leader of the opposition that there is some ulterior motive. The question is merely one of the interpretation of these words by officers of the department, and the Minister of National Revenue did not dictate in any way nor have any ulterior motive in the matter. I think the hon. member is doing me an injustice when he says that it was purely a bit of politics.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the hon. member that I had no desire to arouse the latent ire of the Minister of National Revenue. I merely suggested that the government was responsible for accepting this form of classification, and I would not have been so insistent upon that, had it not been for the explanations given by his colleague the Minister of Finance. If any injury has been done to the feelings of the Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. EULER: I did not take it very seriously.

Mr. BENNETT:—I assure him that it is entirely attributable to what his colleague said in explanation, because if the government so classifies it, then obviously the tax is one imposed by the government on that classification and the authority for the tax is based upon that classification. I sent for Murray's dictionary to find out what was meant by the word "harvester" and he says that the word "harvester" means:

> A reaping machine; especially one which also binds up the sheaves. Also, a machine for gathering in any particular crop, as a cane harvester. Harvester cutter, one of the section knives of a harvester.

And so on.

An hon. MEMBER: Does the dictionary mention in any place that it is also a thresher?

Mr. BENNETT: A machine that gathers in the crop.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Into the mill.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Weyburn has the brilliant idea that the harvester is a wagon. That adds greatly to the gaiety of nations. I am sure the minister will say the Commissioner of Customs has not had any more experience in dealing with classifications of this kind than anyone else, and we all know that if there is any doubt, the revenue is to be favoured; that is, the higher rate of duty shall prevail. But in this case no one has yet answered the question if it is not a harvester, what is it?

Mr. EULER: It is a combine.

Mr. BENNETT: A combine of what?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Many combines include swathers that leave the heads on the ground. Then the thresher comes along with a pick-up attachment, picks it up off the ground, puts it into the threshing machine and turns it out on the other side.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid the hon. member is not correct. The combine in the proper sense of the word does not leave the heads scattered on the ground. The swather does it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is exactly what I said.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But the swather is not a part of the combine. A swather is a different development which I have seen running separately with a tractor. The swather used in the west in many parts runs altogether independently of the combine.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The combine comes along and picks the swathe up and threshes it.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is a pick-up.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would suggest, if there is any complaint about the name, it be called a combine-harvester, and you have the whole thing.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I think the machine is advertised as a combine-harvester and thresher.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Many different names have been used in the last four years. The word "harvester", when it was first put into the schedule in 1897, was to cover exactly the same machine that is now designated.

Mr. EULER: How does the hon. member know that?

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I got that information in the department. We went back into the records to find out when this was designated and for what purpose. There was no such machine as this.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Certainly there was.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): When this item is up again, will the hon. member be good enough to let us know the number of machines that are being imported or being designated under item 445 as harvesters? They are especially mentioned. I do not want to argue this again, but I want to draw the matter to his attention in order to clear it up. Mowing machines are specially mentioned and also harvesters, self-binding or without binders. It does not make any difference whether it has a binder attachment or not. Someone said it was a reaper. Reapers and complete parts thereof are specified. The question I ask is this: Will the minister be good enough, when the item is brought up again, to tell us how many classes of machines were imported under this item in the last three years?

Mr. EULER: I have no objection, but I think we are wasting time, because everybody is agreed that this machine should be brought in under the lower rate.

Mr. ROBB: I am just wondering whether hon. gentlemen want this to come in at the lower rate or want a grievance.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Wellington): I am not quite prepared to let the machine come in at the lower rate. Are any of these machines manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Wellington): Where?

Mr. ROBB: I understand the Massey-Harris people are making them.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Wellington): Where?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know, but I recall that a couple of years ago Mr. Bradshaw of the Massey-Harris Company told me that he was manufacturing these combines and was going to test them out in Kansas.

Mr. BENNETT: They were not made in Kansas.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Wellington): We have two of the largest firms in the world, with factories in Canada, manufacturing these machines. We have been told by the hon. member for Last Mountain that 3,600 of them valued at $4,000 came into Canada, or $14,000,000 worth. What is the tariff board doing? Do they know anything about this machine? They can be made in Toronto and Hamilton just as well as in the United States. Why does not the tariff board give the Finance minister some information? Why does not the minister get experts on the tariff board? This is not a political speech; I am interested in this business, because I have visited in the west during the last three of four years and I have seen the number of American machines shipped into Canada and sold to the western farmers, machines that could have been made just as well in Canadian factories. It is a shame and a disgrace to Canada, and we are paying a big price for it. I have sometimes seen whole trainloads of these American machines passing through the prairies.

I wish to bring this to the attention of the Finance minister. This is a very simple machine; I leave that to any man from the west

It is not more complicated than a seven-foot binder, and you can draw them with a tractor or with twelve horses if you wish. They can be made in Hamilton, Toronto and Brantford just as well as they can be made in Chicago and Batavia, and so I say to the minister, when his board of strategy or his tariff board gives him an interview on the question, just let him make them come across and have those machines made in Canada. Those American manufacturers would be delighted to come over here because they do not want to lose this trade, which is the best trade they have got.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. Minister of Finance has endeavoured to do the same thing in connection with this as he did last year in connection with Wabasso Cottons. He is not going to get away with it this time; he did then. Last year he endeavoured to blame me and those associated with me because he dropped the duty he was going to put on yarns for the Wabasso Cotton Company. He dropped it, he said, because hon. gentlemen want the duty reduced. The real fact is that between the time the house rose at six o'clock and when it met at eight, hon. gentlemen on his own side, headed by one who is not in his seat, saw to it that the minister was properly approached and told him that they would not stand for it, so the item was dropped. The president of the company came up to blame me and those associated with me for preventing his obtaining that duty. To-night the minister has sought to give the impression that we have favoured a reduction in the duty on combines, so-called. Did he hear anyone on this side say it? We said: We do object to an endeavour being made to afford protection to an industry by wrong classifications. If you are going to protect it, protect it honestly, fairly and frankly and make it clear that the industry requires protection, and it may. My hon. friend from North Wellington says that it does, and I am prepared to accept his view. All I know is this, that solid trainloads of agricultural implements from the United States pass through the Calgary yards—Calgary, mark you,—bound for points north and the outlying sections. I have passed solid trainloads on my way east, solid trainloads of agricultural implements from the United States, implements made in the factories owned by the Massey-Harris Company in the United States in some cases, and in other factories. Last year we bought $40,000,000 worth of these implements from the United States. A tariff would not have increased the price one cent, but it would have given work to thousands of Canadian workmen, and the internal competition would have been ample for the purpose of regulating the price, the same as it is in the United States. The greatest agricultural implements company in this country has two factories in the United States, one at Batavia, and then they bought the Case Company. They have one also in France, one in Germany, one in Canada, and one now in Australia, and that is in operation because of the Australian tariff. The Australians say: We are going to have labour at home for our own people and not give the labour to Canadians. But the minister is content to watch Australia, Germany and France build these factories and have Canada import $40,000,000 worth of these implements from the United States, as we did last year.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): And we are more prosperous than any of them.

Mr. BENNETT: That is delightful, and I do congratulate the hon. member for Weyburn upon being so prosperous. I am glad that he is reaping the reward of his very hard labours, and that his income tax contribution will be so large—

Mr. CLARK: His idea of prosperity is sending Canadians to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I want the minister to understand clearly that he is not going to do with this as he did last year with Wabasso Cottons, whose dividend has been passed and the price of whose shares has been cut in two on the stock exchanges. He is not going to get away this time by blaming the opposition for what it cannot do, for what can be done only by the government. None of us said to-night—nor do we propose to say, because that is not our business, without the opportunity to examine into the question—that this industry is or is not receiving the protection it is entitled to receive in order that it may be able to supply work to Canadians, rather than to workmen of the United States at Batavia and elsewhere. We have not said it, and we do not propose to say it. But if it is proposed to change that tariff item, it should not be done merely because of a discussion that takes place in this house as to the proper classification and designation of an article. That sort of thing should be played out. The minister has put that over this house before and he is trying to put it over the country. He tried it in Keith's theatre a few years ago, and then rushed up to the house and put on the record a letter that enabled him to give the automobile companies a larger protection. They said so themselves, with their tongue in their cheek. They said: We are getting a larger protection, but we will not say anything about it, and the minister accepted the promise which they gave in regard to passing on the tax reduction and he cannot even get a reply to his queries. The minister tried this same thing with Wabasso Cottons last year, and he is trying it again this year, but he cannot do it. If this industry requires protection, the Conservative party would give it protection. Do you know what a manufacturer told me the other day, one of the largest manufacturers in this country? he said, "You can state in the House of Commons if you so desire, but I do not want my name mentioned, that if they will give me a tariff that is ten per cent higher than the present tariff, so that I am sure we will have the trade, I will reduce my prices ten per cent."

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question? I gather from what the leader of the opposition said in the last few moments that he was not sure but what he did want higher protection for this machine, yet when I entered the chamber he was interpreting the word "harvester" to mean this very machine, and it would necessarily follow that it would get a lower rate of duty under his interpretation. Does he want the duty higher or lower?

Mr. BENNETT: I was saying that the department, instead of facing the issue, whether it had protection or not said: It does not come within a specified classification. I say that it does come within the classification of "harvester," and therefore should be entitled to a lower rate of duty unless the minister with the knowledge he should have from his tariff board had the courage to put it where it belonged and dealt with it as a tariff item, not as a question of classification.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend used the word "department." Does he mean the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. BENNETT: Both of them. They are so mixed up that I desire to ask the minister another question. He should have been here earlier in the evening.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps so. The hon. gentleman intimates that the Department of National Revenue in its interpretation of the tariff has an eye to whether they want to protect an industry or not. I want to say to him that the Department of National Revenue, whatever opinions the minister may have, deals with the tariff exactly as it stands and as it reads, whether it protects or does not protect. I should like my hon. friend to understand that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad to hear it. Perhaps I may ask him one question. Under the tariff provision cars costing less than $1,200 are free from excise tax when they come either from Britain or from other countries and contain 50 per cent content of the labour of those countries. Now, how is that content computed—on the average, or by the car, or by the price, or by what method? The Minister of Finance says, "I know nothing about it; ask the Minister of National Revenue." He was not in his seat then; he is now.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I know exactly what information the hon. gentleman requires. Does he mean with regard to the drawback?

Mr. BENNETT: No, we know about the drawback.

Mr. EULER: I do not understand what my hon. friend is driving at.

Mr. BENNETT: I am asking as to the excise tax on motor cars. The value of the car must be under $1,200; that is point No. 1 Point No. 2: It must come from countries with which we have favoured tariff treaties, or from Great Britain, and must contain 50 per cent of the labour of the country of origin. Now, how is that content arrived at for the purpose of fixing the value? That is the question.

Mr. GOTT: Refer it to the tariff board.

Mr. LUCAS: During the war, in order to increase production, tractors up to a value of $1,400 were placed on the free list. I find that a number of municipalities desire to secure heavy tractors on which the duty is 27½ per cent, these being used for grading and other road work, but this duty very materially increases their cost. Could not the Minister of Finance do something to reduce the duty on these heavy tractors?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend spoke to me about the matter earlier in the session, and I have referred it to the tariff board for inquiry.

Mr. BENNETT: That settles it; he has "passed the buck."

Mr. LUCAS: Might we not expect a reduction this year?

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid I would be severely chastised if I attempted to make any tariff changes without having full information before me.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this item stands. As the Minister of Railways wants to proceed with some legislation, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Revenue will, I hope, supply the information we require.

Mr. EULER: I will read Hansard.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, to facilitate proceedings, would it not be possible to go into committee on all of these bills, all of which are Canadian National branch line bills? If we could do this instead of reporting each bill separately it would save time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Dunning moves, seconded by Mr. Veniot, that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on bills Nos. 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58 and 59. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

MURRAY HARBOUR—GEORGETOWN

The house in commitee on Bill No. 43, respecting the construction of a Canadian National line from a point on the Murray Harbour branch to a point on the Georgetown subdivision of the Canadian government railways in the province of Prince Edward Island —Hon. Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill, I understand, has been before the railway committee and approved. Has any effort been made to provide for the uniform gauge of all the lines in Prince Edward Island? To extend this line and leave a part of it so that the farmers have to unload their cars and reload the contents into other cars is practically prohibitive in connection with potatoes, as I learned when I was on the island last year. It impressed me that before anything more was done the uniform gauging of the lines on the island should be completed, otherwise great inconvenience and expense will result to the farmers.

Mr. DUNNING: The Murray Harbour branch is the last of the Prince Edward Island lines to be standardized, and this very proposal is for the purpose of facilitating the standardization of the branch. This proposed new line will obviate the immediate necessity of building a somewhat expensive standard gauge heavy traffic bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: Over the Hillsborough river?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The existing bridge will still remain in duty and will be standardized, but for light traffic only. The use of the branch line proposed in this bill will enable the standardization of the whole of the remaining Prince Edward Island lines for heavy traffic.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there will be no narrow gauge left?

Mr. DUNNING: Not when this work and terminal work at Charlottetown are completed.

The CHAIRMAN: Will it serve the purpose of the committee if I give the number and title of each bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The bills are all identical, with the exception of the respective schedules, as hon. members will notice.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Is it the intention of the department to build to Hillsborough bridge?

Mr. DUNNING: I have just answered the leader of the opposition in that regard. I think I also communicated particulars to my hon. friend some time ago. At present the management does not propose to build the Hillsborough bridge, but to standardize the whole Murray Harbour branch, using the Hillsborough bridge for light traffic and the line provided for in this bill for heavy traffic.

Mr. FRASER: Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to construct the proposed line from Swift Creek to Tete Jaune this year?

Mr. DUNNING: We are not yet on that bill.

Mr. FRASER: I thought the minister said we would consider all the bills together.

Mr. DUNNING: Each one will be called.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): One of the reasons for my asking a question in this connection is the fact that an article appeared a day or two ago on the subject in the Island Patriot, the organ of the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island. The statement is made among others that it has been definitely decided to rebuild the Hillsborough bridge. The article reads:

Railway Improvements

There has been considerable discussion in the press with regard to standardization of the Murray Harbour railway and the building of the proposed railway link connecting the Murray Harbour subdivision with the Georgetown branch. It must be borne in mind that the proposed link if placed between Lake Verde and Pisquid, is with the intention not of serving any particular persons but with the sole object of getting freight out so that it will not tie up the traffic when the bridge is rebuilt.

We have taken the trouble to communicate with the authorities at Ottawa upon this particular work, and we are now in a position to state the facts.

The delay in standardizing this branch of the line is caused by the uncertainty of what was required to strengthen and reinforce Hillsborough bridge, and to make it safe for standard freight and passenger equipment.

The Engineers branch of the railways have been convinced for some time that the superstructure or steel portion of the bridge would have to be rebuilt, and investigations carried on during the past two seasons have revealed the fact that the piers would have to be extended to make them suitable to carry a standard truss bridge.

To carry on such extensive rebuilding operations would necessitate the closing of the bridge to traffic for several months and possibly for a whole season. This would shut off rail communication on that branch of the line for that period, which is something that neither the railway nor the people served by it could consider. This made it necessary to find some way of keeping the line open, and after careful investigation and survey by railway engineers, the present proposal to build a connecting line between Murray Harbour subdivision and the Georgetown branch was decided on.

The location of this proposed connecting link was very carefully gone into by the engineers, and reconnaissance was made for the different routes that were proposed or thought to be feasible, namely:—

1. From a point at or slightly east of Mount Herbert to Burtt's Crossing.
2. From Kinross to Montague.
3. From Lake Verde to Pisquid.
4. From Hermitage to at or near Peakes' Station.

After a careful consideration of the reconnaissance of these various routes, a location survey was made on the latter two, as well as a short third line between them, and when the full result of the survey was considered by the railway management, they recommended that the line be built through Lake Verde to Pisquid.

Representations were made by our representatives, Messrs. Sinclair and Jenkins and others as well, to the engineers and to the railway, suggesting other locations, all of which were thoroughly examined and reported on by the railway, and when all was considered, the minister decided to accept the recommendation made by the railway management, regarding the location of the road, and a bill has been introduced into parliament authorizing the railway management to proceed with building the line.

It is the intention of the management to build this line during this coming summer and also to carry on all the preparatory work possible on the Murray Harbour branch, to prepare it for standardization.

It is not considered possible to complete the standardization of the road this season, but it is the aim of the management to complete it early in the season of 1930. This will include the standardization of the track across the Hillsborough bridge to Charlottetown.

A powerful Diesel electric car with a trailer will be operated daily to accommodate passengers, mails express and baggage from Charlottetown, over the Hillsborough bridge to Murray Harbour.

The freight service on the Murray Harbour line will be carried on by a special freight train connecting with the main line at Pisquid or Mt. Stewart. A "Y" will be built at the east side of the Hillsborough bridge. where the engines handling the freight traffic can be turned around.

This system will operate until the Hillsborough bridge is rebuilt.

I asked the minister the question in view of the positive statement here, in the official organ of the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island, that this bridge is to be rebuilt. There is a further statement made by the representative of Queens county at a meeting of the board of trade held in Charlottetown a few days ago. In large headlines the report of this meeting is thus introduced:

Will standardize southern railway and rebuild bridge. This announcement made at board of trade meeting on Thursday by Hon. J. E. Sinclair and Mr. R. H. Jenkins, M.P.

The report describes what took place at the meeting, and this statement appears.

It was announced among other things:

(1) That Messrs. Sinclair and Jenkins would press hard to get an amount in the supplementary estimates for the hotel this year, if not, next year.

(2) That the Hillsborough bridge is to be rebuilt.

This information, conveyed to us through the Patriot, purports to come from the authorities in Ottawa as well as from the representatives of Queens county and is at very considerable variance with the statement of the minister. Not only does it vary from the minister's statement, but it is also at variance with the outline of plan as proposed in the railway committee. It is very important in connection with a large section of country in Prince Edward Island that this bridge should be rebuilt, and naturally the whole province is looking forward to the undertaking. I hope that the statements of the representatives of Queens county and in the Patriot are correct, that these hon.

gentlemen have been informed, after consultation with the authorities, that the bridge is to be rebuilt. I shall be glad to learn that the minister is mistaken in the matter

Mr. DUNNING: I regret I cannot trace the degree of divergence which my hon. friend appears to detect between my statement and the articles he has read. As to the use of the term rebuilding, of course the Hillsborough bridge will require a certain amount of reconstruction to accomplish the end I indicated in my first remarks, namely, the provision of such accommodation as will allow the use of standard gauge equipment over the bridge. I pointed out what the railway officials had indicated before the committee—that it is not at the present time contemplated so to fit the Hillsborough bridge as to enable it to carry heavy traffic. It is a matter of safety. A degree of rebuilding will be required to enable standard equipment to be used on the bridge, but it is not the present intention to rebuild the whole bridge. I am sorry I cannot go further than that.

Mr. BENNETT: Without any necessity for retranshipment.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be no necessity for that. A certain degree of rebuilding will be required to enable Diesel equipment to use the bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: To haul a carload of potatoes for instance.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. There is still some uncertainty in the minds of the engineers as to the ability of the sub-structure of the bridge ever to carry heavy traffic. I do not want to be too positive on that point and I hope my hon. friend will bear with me in that connection, because the engineers are not quite certain about it. However, the intention is to supply the people of Prince Edward Island served by that branch with standard gauge accommodation over the bridge so far as passenger traffic and other light traffic are concerned, having available at all times the branch proposed in this bill in order to enable heavy traffic to be moved in case anything happens which renders it undesirable to use the bridge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I think the minister is confused about the situation. I understand what he means by standardizing the bridge. That was explained in the railway committee and we understand it; one of the Diesel equipped cars with a trailer will be enabled to cross the bridge after the rails are standardized. But that does not mean rebuilding the bridge; it has nothing to do with rebuilding the bridge. All the engineers' reports with which I am familiar have stated that the bridge is not suitable for standard equipment, and at Charlottetown about a year and a half ago Sir Henry Thornton made the positive statement that standard equipment would never cross that bridge. I think that clears up the situation very well, but it does not account for the statement made by the Patriot and purporting to come from Hon. John E. Sinclair and Mr. Jenkins, M.P., that the bridge is to be rebuilt, followed by the statement made by the newspaper on its own authority that they took up the matter with the authorities at Ottawa and were assured that the bridge would be rebuilt. I want the minister to remember that rebuilding the bridge is quite different from standardizing it, and certainly there is a very wide divergence of opinion between the statements which I have read and the opinions held by the Department of Railways, the railway engineers, Sir Henry Thornton and the minister himself.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): There is not much reason for prolonging this discussion, but if my hon. friend looks at the article from which he quoted he will find nothing in the text to support the headlines he has read. However, the manner in which newspapers may wish to headline articles is their own business, and I do not think any government or any individual can be held responsible. If my hon. friend will go carefully over that article he will not find anything to substantiate his statement.

The minister has explained the matter carefully; the main object of this branch is to complete the standardization of the Murray Harbour branch of the Prince Edward Island division of the Canadian National railways, in order to make it possible to give standard service to that part of the system. The present service is entirely inadequate for the needs of that part of the country, which is one of the most productive districts of Canada. During the last few years a great development has taken place along that line in the growing of potatoes, and in shipping those potatoes it has been necessary to transfer them from the narrow gauge cars at Charlottetown to cars of standard gauge. That has hampered the proper development of that kind of farming, as well as the production of other perishable goods, which were damaged and delayed because of this transfer. These facts have made it necessary that the railway undertake at once the standardization of this branch; the present line is proposed in order to carry out that work in such a way that it will not interfere with traffic for a season or part of a season, and the heavy traffic can be carried on until this bridge is rebuilt. I do not want my statement to be taken as meaning that the bridge is not to be rebuilt, because that is a different thing. The standardization of the bridge is necessary in order to enable the railway to carry on the lighter traffic of mails, passengers, baggage and express by a Diesel electric service from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour; at the same time the heavy traffic, for which the engineers say the bridge is not safe, can be taken over the spur line which it is proposed to build to the main line, and thence to any part of Canada.

My hon. friend raised the question of rebuilding the bridge, and he asked about certain statements. We cannot say now what the future may hold in store, but we know that it is not the intention of the railway to begin the work by rebuilding the bridge, as many of us thought was the proper way. When it was found that it would be necessary to close the road in order to rebuild the lower part of the bridge so that it might be strengthened and extended, which at first was not thought necessary, it was recommended by the railway engineers that this connecting link be constructed in order that the immediate benefits of the broad gauge service could be extended to that part of the road. If that is done the third rail system now in operation at the terminal will be done away with, and the completion of the terminal can be carried on so that the general running repairs which it is necessary to make at Charlottetown can be looked after more efficiently than is the case at present because of both narrow gauge and broad gauge rolling stock coming into the terminal. The building of the terminals necessitates quite an expenditure for a new roundhouse and machine shops, and that work is partly in hand at present.

There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of the railway management, that when this stage of the standardization program is completed we will have to face the question of rebuilding the bridge so that it will carry standard rolling stock both for the movement of freight and the movement of other commodities which it will be necessary to carry over it. The importation of coal to Prince Edward Island is increasing from year to year in a way that demands the very best service to all parts of the island and that, together with the increasing exportation of potatoes, makes it necessary that standard gauge service be given to this portion of the line as soon as possible. I think the minister is well advised in meeting the recommendations of the railway management and making provision at this time to carry on that important work.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I quite understand the statement of the hon. member for Queens; it is quite in order and quite correct, but it does not clear up this situation as we have it. I understand that the hon. member repudiates the big headlines appearing in his own newspaper in Charlottetown, which states:

> Will Standardize Southern Railway and Rebuild Bridge. This Announcement Made at Board of Trade Meeting Thursday by Hon. John E. Sinclair and Mr. R. H. Jenkins, M.P.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): What newspaper is that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): That is the Patriot of March 30, 1929, and Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Jenkins were both in Charlottetown at that time. They did not repudiate this statement then, by which people all over the country were led to believe they had said that the Hillsborough bridge will be rebuilt. While of course I am prepared to accept his word that the report appearing in the Patriot may be garbled or may not represent his statements accurately, at the same time he left Prince Edward Island with that statement before the people and did not make any effort to clear it up. Then there is the further statement made by the Patriot on its own authority, as follows:

> We have taken the trouble to communicate with the authorities at Ottawa upon this particular work, and we are now in a position to state the facts.

Then they say that one of the facts is that the Hillsborough bridge is to be rebuilt.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Would my hon. friend just read that portion of the editorial to which he refers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I have already read the article; I do not want to read it again.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I do not want my hon. friend to read the whole article, but he said it stated the bridge was to be rebuilt.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Yes. I will give my hon. friend the article. I do not want to read it again; it will appear in Hansard. The statement is there positively made that they have taken the matter up with the authorities at Ottawa and have been so advised.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not recall having had any communication with any newspaper on the subject.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): One article reports the statements made by the hon. members for Queens; the other is apparently prepared by the newspaper on the strength of information which they claim they received from Ottawa. I am prepared to accept the minister's statement that he never gave any authority for this article.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that; I said that I did not recall having received any communication from any newspaper on the subject. I am neither repudiating nor endorsing the article, for I can find little fault with it.

Mr. BENNETT: One article says that the bridge is going to be rebuilt; is that the case?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not understand the article to say that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It states that in specific terms.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt the bridge will have to be rebuilt.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): If it will have to be rebuilt I do not see any reason why the minister should not say so. The report we had before the railway committee stated that the cost of this ten-mile branch would be $370,000. The member for Queens has stated already that the proposed branch is to make a connection for the carrying of freight from one line to the other. But the article goes further, and says that this is to be an alternative for the rebuilding of the Hillsborough bridge.

Mr. DUNNING: It is an alternative to the present rebuilding of the Hillsborough bridge. The proposal deals only with the three-year program presented, and I think the hon. member will be fair enough to the railway authorities to admit that. But for anyone to say that we cannot at any time in the future abandon the Hillsborough bridge, on account of any structural defect which may develop, and carry the traffic by a roundabout route, which would be necessary if all the traffic followed the route which the new branch will follow, is I think going farther than the railway authorities are prepared to go at the present time. I merely wish to point out that the proposal before the railway committee covered the three-year period.

Mr. BENNETT: And which does not contemplate the rebuilding of the bridge within three years?

[Mr. J. A. Macdonald.]

Mr. DUNNING: It does not contemplate the rebuilding in the three-year program, but it does include the equipping of the bridge with sufficient strength to carry standard gauge light equipment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It does not require any further equipping or strengthening to carry that equipment; it is merely a matter of spreading the rails to the standard width. The statement of the minister clears this up as well as we can get it cleared up at the present time, but it shows very clearly that an attempt has been made by the Patriot—I would not like to say, to fool the public, but it looks very much like it. Although I hesitate to blame my friends from Queens county when such positive statements are made in their own organ, I think they should give the public the truth with regard to the matter. Any person reading these articles would infer that it is a part of the program at the present time; those of us who are here and see what is going on know differently, yet the hon. members for Queens allow these statements to be broadcast all over the country. For what purpose? I do not know. The statement of the minister is quite satisfactory, and I brought this matter up only for the purpose of having the whole situation clarified so that the people of Prince Edward Island who are particularly interested in this branch line will know where they stand.

There are other points in connection with this matter which might be referred to. There are a great many people who are of the opinion that the present route of this line is a mistake. There are two other points between which a six-mile connection could be made, either of which would serve the public equally well, if not better. One of the lines suggested would run from Uigg to Montague. This line would be only six miles in length and would give the connection which the railway authorities require. There is another connection which could be made from Hermitage to Peake Station, which would give the same connection over a six-mile route. The construction difficulties are no greater than, if as great as would apply on the line proposed from Pisquid to Lake Verde, and this branch will entail a route ten miles long. The public is interested in knowing just why the longer route is proposed, especially as it will cost $150,000 more. I have been wondering whether the reason is not to keep the whole of the line within Queens county. If either of the other routes were taken at a saving of $150,000 or more, part of the line would have to go through Kings county. Again I hesitate to impute any such motive to the hon. members from Queens county, but there is a natural inference you cannot get away from in connection with these matters. I think it is up to the minister to let the public know why a longer route is being taken.

Mr. DUNNING: In all matters bearing upon the question whether a particular line shall or shall not be built, I do not rely upon my hon. friends' statements, or upon the statements of my hon. friends on this side of the house; I rely upon the technical officers and the management of the Canadian National Railways. This bill came before the railway committee, and if the hon. member had had any suggestion to offer whereby the Canadian National Railways would save $150,000, that was the place, I submit, to make it. The management were present in the committee and they could have given the hon. member their reasons for proposing this line. I am sure the hon. member knows that the Canadian National Railways are not deliberately wasting $150,000, either to please me, my hon. friend, or the members on this side of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know about that.

Mr. DUNNING: In fairness to the hon. leader of the opposition I would suggest that any time he feels that that is being done in a particular case he have the railway committee examine into the circumstances. The officers of the company could be present and could give their reasons for any proposals they were making for the expenditure of money. It is only in that way, so far as parliament and the country are concerned, that we can ensure that the officers of the railway are doing as they should do. There will always be differences of opinion as to matters of engineering and railway economics, but I do not think we should adopt the view that there is any other than the best motives in the minds of those who are responsible, unless we are prepared to come forward and discuss the matter quite frankly with those who are placed in charge. I do not attempt to go behind the recommendations of the officers with respect to any ordinary piece of work such as the construction of a small branch line.

Mr. CLARK: What will be the cost of this line?

Mr. DUNNING: $375,000.

Mr. CLARK: Is that amount included in the estimates which were tabled yesterday?

Mr. DUNNING: No. We take a three-year program, and the proportion proposed to be expended in any particular year is taken into the budget for that year.

Mr. CLARK: The cost of all the branch lines which we were considering is not included in the $53,000,000 of estimates tabled yesterday?

Mr. DUNNING: The proportion to be expended within the period of the estimates would be included.

Mr. CLARK: The proportion to be spent within the next twelve months on this line is included in the $53,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Is the cost of the Montreal terminals included in the $53,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. CLARK: Or this year's proportion?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member should not ask me to anticipate the introduction of a bill which is not even on the order paper.

Mr. CLARK: I just wanted to get some idea of next year's expenditure by the Canadian National Railways, and I think we are entitled to know that when we are considering these bills. I should like to know the total amount. What are we facing next year in the way of capital expenditure?

Mr. DUNNING: What the country is facing next year is included in the budget of the Canadian National Railways; they cannot go beyond the budget.

Mr. CLARK: That is the $53,000,000?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Many of these details can be thoroughly brought out in committee in regard to surveys and location of the line, particularly the one under discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me: If there is to be further discussion on this bill, I wonder whether those who desire to engage in it will allow me to report progress on this bill in order that we can report out a number of others in regard to which there will not likely be any discussion, to enable them to go over to the senate and be proceeded with there.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): There was a motive imputed to me in regard to a report which was in the press, and I think I have a right to clear that up, although I have every regard for the wishes of the Minister of Railways. Just a moment ago the hon. member for Kings quoted a newspaper despatch and he came to the conclusion and so stated, that he did not know what the motives were for that report.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It was not my conclusion. It was the conclusion of his own newspaper.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I beg to differ. Hansard will show, and my hon. friend stated clearly that he did not know what the motives were for a statement like that. Does he deny that? If he does, the matter is cleared up.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): The statement was by the newspaper purporting to report my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): My hon. friend said that he wondered what the motives were for such a statement. I want to tell him plainly in the house that, as regards reports in the press, we are not bound to accept them or to stand by them. If what he read was correct, it was not said to the board of trade by me, and I did not hear my colleague say it. What I said to the board of trade, I said in this house and I would say it in any other part of the country just the same. If it is a matter between my hon. friend and the Patriot, he can clear it up with that newspaper. He is quite at liberty to do that. But as regards imputing motives in connection with reports which in many cases have not been read by me before being printed, I want to say to him directly and plainly that my statement is as I made it here a few moments ago, and the same as I made to the board of trade. I think it is quite in keeping with the news item which he read. His preparatory statements to that item were not borne out by the lines he read as being the item in question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): They are fully borne out.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I asked my hon. friend, when he was speaking, to read the paragraph in the news item stating that the bridge was to be rebuilt. He did not do that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): The hon. member can see it in Hansard.

Mr. JENKINS: I would like to ask a question of the minister. When I was in Charlottetown a short time ago, it was currently reported that when the traffic was diverted by this new route, the bridge would be abandoned. Is there any truth in that report?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no intention of abandoning the bridge.

[Mr. J. E. Sinclair.]

Mr. JENKINS: If there is no intention of abandoning the bridge, it certainly must be rebuilt, just at what particular time, of course, it is not now necessary to mention; it is self-evident.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Railways to-night made an observation which I regard as one of very great importance as affecting not only the railroad but all the branch lines of the Canadian National system. An impression is getting abroad in this country—and I encounter it from many sources, including correspondence addressed to myself as well as to other members of the house—that these railroads are political railroads. That is detrimental to the interest of the system. Not that I am charging the Minister of Railways with any offence, but supporters of the administration seem to be able to get branch lines in localities they desire in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and other sections of Canada, and then they go to their electors and say: "Look what we have been able to do for you!" The very article read from the newspaper dealing with the observations made to the board of trade—and I notice the hon. member for Queens was very careful and modest in what he said, because he had to justify what he said to the board—that the bridge was to be rebuilt—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I did not make that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: It was his colleague to whom I referred.

Mr. JENKINS: I said that it was self-evident.

Mr. BENNETT: What he said to the board of trade is quite evident too. He said to the board of trade that he had provided them with a new bridge over the Hillsborough river. The hon. member for Kings is endeavouring to point out that that is hardly what we expect in connection with a national system. Nothing could be more fatal to this system than that the impression should get abroad in the constituencies that log-rolling will secure branch lines or any other expenditures not warranted by economic conditions. It is all very well for the minister to say that he takes the word of officials; but he has had some experience in connection with the politics on that system, especially in the lower provinces, and he knows exactly what has been done in relation not only to that railway but to other portions of the system. We know the Postmaster General sent a telegram to a section foreman to have two section men dismissed, and they were dismissed. It is true they were later put back on their job. The Minister of Railways had nothing to do with their dismissal; he would be beyond that sort of thing; he would not be capable of doing it; but we all know that happened. There are other matters that we shall have to discuss in connection with the neighbouring province of Nova Scotia and political patronage in connection with the national system. As to the observation of the Minister of Railways in that regard, I have no doubt he made it in all good faith, but he must know there are other methods of accomplishing the end desired without having any reference to him at all. That is, while he is Minister of Railways, there are ministers for the province and the Prime Minister, I think, made it abundantly clear on one occasion that he took the recommendation of the minister for the province wtih respect to matters pertaining to that province. Probably any prime minister would do the same thing with respect to the appointment of judges and matters of that kind. Now we have the national system which we are dealing with in much the same way, and therefore great care must be exercised in connection with the administration of the road under present conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: I presume the remarks of my hon. friend relate almost entirely to that part of the country served by what was formerly known as the Intercolonial?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I would like to go a step further. In regard to the section terminating at Riviere du Loup I happen to know one of the members of this house issues instructions to the assistant superintendent and superintendent. I hesitate to mention his name as he is not present. I refer to the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. DUNNING: When a piece of railway which for years was operated by the government, whichever party was in power, somewhat on a patronage basis—I am speaking now of the portion which was part of the former government railways—is transferred to the operation of the nationally-owned system—and I say that the management of the Canadian National is entirely free from political interference—it is bound to take some time to convince the people of the area concerned that conditions to-day are different from those which formerly obtained. My hon. friend's remarks would lead one to believe that such interference as he refers to comes wholly from members presently supporting the government but I can assure him from my personal experience that that is not the case, that there are men sitting on his own side of the house who do exactly the same thing. I am speaking now of the problem generally, something that is outside the range of ordinary political patronage as we understand it. There remains in the minds of the people of the maritime provinces the idea that they can go to their member, no matter on which side of the house he sits, with respect to ordinary matters of business and employment particularly on the Canadian National railways. I ask my hon. friend to accept my assurance that I have learned of at least as much of that sort of thing from that side of the house as from this. And that is intensified, of course, by the fact that at the time the Intercolonial railway was taken over as part of the national system a government other than the Liberal government had been in power following 1911 and administering that property, and that being the case, under the conditions which formerly prevailed, one can appreciate what the system was at that time.

I am not making any statements calculated to arouse the political ire of my hon. friends opposite. I am simply speaking of a condition, and I am appealing for the sympathy of the house for the Canadian National railway management in their endeavour to show the people of the maritime provinces that they are better off by having this part of the system an integral part of the national system administered in the same manner as the rest of the government-owned property, with the same freedom from political interference that we are proud of in connection with the national system as a whole. I make that kind of answer to my hon. friend, not for the purpose of creating any political argument or to cause recriminations, but simply in the interest of this asset of Canada which is so important to all of us.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think I should let the reference to the Postmaster General in connection with the old Intercolonial railway pass without notice. My hon. friend says that I sent a telegram demanding the dismissal of two section men.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: That was hardly correct. I did send a telegram in connection with two temporary employees.

Mr. BENNETT: Working on the section.

Mr. VENIOT: They were not working on the section; they were working over the whole line. My reason for that was this. Having been home one week-end, I was called upon by the temporary foreman in question, who showed me a list of names and asked me if I had any objection to these men being employed. Among the names was that of his own son. I said no, I had none. He asked me if taking these men on the work on Monday would be all right. I looked over the list, and he went away assuring me that these men would be taken on. I left home on Sunday, and on the following Wednesday I received a telegram that two men on that list had not been taken on, but that two others had been put on in their places. These two who had been employed in place of two of the names the foreman showed me on that list had got the train at Caraquet and went to the hotel, each with a bottle of whiskey, and they held the whiskey up telling the people congregated around the hotel that this was the way Veniot paid them for going on the road, by sending them two bottles of whiskey from Ottawa. I received word of that from very reliable people, and I wired back asking them to confirm their information in another telegram. They did so, and I then wired the foreman asking for his reasons for taking on men who would act in that way, and asking him to dismiss them. Those are the circumstances. That is the truth of the whole situation, and I think it is about time the matter was explained.

Mr. CLARK: What did you have to do with Canadian National Railway employment?

Mr. VENIOT: Nothing more than you and your friends in New Brunswick would have when your party was in power.

Mr. CLARK: I would not do what you have done. I never had anything to do with employment on the railways.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I am glad this subject has been brought up, because there are cases of this sort of thing right in my own constituency. The Intercolonial touches at Point Tupper, and we have a boat called the Scotia which refits every year and goes to Prince Edward Island. That boat carries a large crew of men, and every man going on that boat for the last three years has had to have a document from the defeated Liberal candidate in that constituency before he can receive employment. Another heeler who has been on that boat for some years goes out and visits everyone seeking employment and sends him to Liberal headquarters, and he has to have his document before he can receive employment. Not a man gets on that boat unless he bears the stamp of Liberal.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. DUNNING: I really do not want to follow this kind of discussion. I could bring statements of an exactly similar character relating to the Conservative party, but I deprecate following this discussion further for that very reason. What I plead for is the elimination of this kind of discussion all round, and so far as my influence goes it will be eliminated all round.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): There are a couple of other cases at Point Tupper, in fact, a dozen such cases, and if the minister intends to follow that line, I would say that it is immediately up to him to notify the captain and mate of the Scotia.

Mr. DUNNING: No. My hon. friend is just now expressing what I call the maritime point of view, which I am not complaining of, but which does exist. The minister cannot and should not communicate with the captain of that ship. The minister communicates with one man in the system, and one man only, and that is the president, except that certain officials are sometimes sent to the minister to give him technical information or to place before him plans of one kind or another.

Mr. BENNETT: Executive officers.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 15, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE— MR. POULIOT

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege with reference to an article published in the "Evénement," on April 12, last.

With large headlines this newspaper publishes what follows: Mr. J. F. Pouliot interrupted by cries of "Taschereau, Taschereau" and "who placed the bomb."

The question of privilege refers to the following extract:

An incident

An ever youthful member from our province distinguishes himself at Ottawa by wild sallies against the Prime Minister of Quebec. Last night, the House of Commons clearly manifested that he would be the gainer by becoming somewhat more discreet. His speech interrupted by a devil of a noise, became almost as unintelligible as unintelligent. The opposition having taken up the cry of Taschereau, the Government side replied by applauses. While our fiery member once more sat down, happy of having created a storm. But it was a storm of laughter.

The "Evénement" passes for a business newspaper.

Has it not an upward scale of rates for costly publicity?

Is it true that the first come, in that newspaper, may be bombarded. Your Honour, for one dollar; Your Lordship, for two dollars; Your Excellency, for three dollars; Your Highness, for four dollars, and Your Imperial Highness, for five dollars.

The downward scale for cheap and popular publicity is in that newspaper very amusing.

Is it true that one may be called a Governor for half a dollar; Colonel for a quarter; that for ten cents they shine your boots, and for five cents they lick them?

From July 1, last, the Quebec government has paid for printing and publicity $9,961.38 to this newspaper, whose president, Mr. J. H. Fortier, the directing soul of the P. T. Légaré establishment, loudly clamours for protection so as to sell agricultural implements dearer to farmers.

If this is a business paper it is a slot machine paper.

Mr. BENNETT: A what?

Mr. POULIOT: A slot machine paper. It insinuates that on Thursday last I attacked the Premier of Quebec in the house. In fact I did not. When I asked—referring to Sir Robert Borden—"Who was the greatest man in the Tory party?"—the gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, answered, "Taschereau, Taschereau". I said nothing unpleasant in reference to him that evening because one of his children was married in the morning of the same day, and it is on account of that social function that I observed that truce which L'Evenement has not seen fit to respect.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved:

That standing order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to appointment of the select standing committees of the house, be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the house for the present session, a select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and for report to the house, provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply; and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Bell (St. Antoine), Cantley, Chaplin, Duff, Dunning, Fiset, Geary, Gray, Hanson, Jelliff, Jenkins, McLean (Melfort), Milne, Power and Stevens.

I may say that the motion is in exactly the same terms as similar motions adopted in previous sessions.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is put, I wish to observe that, looking through the proceedings in past years, it occurs to me that as this house represents the shareholders of the Canadian National system and sets up this committee as a committee of those shareholders to deal with the accounts and the transaction of the business of the system, no limitation should be placed upon the right of the committee to deal with the whole of what I might call the operations of the system during the year, which would arise out of the discussion of the accounts, if construed in a large way, with respect to employment and many other matters which it is unecessary for me at the moment to mention, but which any shareholder would have the right to discuss in the case of a private company. I take it that this committee should have all the powers which the shareholders of a private company would have in discussing the business of such an enterprise in which they were interested; for the real weakness of our system of government ownership lies in the difficulty of the shareholders in making themselves articulate so far as the transaction of their business is concerned. In other words, this parliament is the nearest approach we have to the shareholders in a private enterprise, and this committee should be regarded as a committee of shareholders to discuss the accounts, the estimates and the transaction of the business of the enterprise during the twelve months for which those accounts are placed before the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the description which my hon. friend has just given of what the activities of the committee should be is a correct description of what the activities of the committee have been in fact in the past—

Mr. BENNETT: With some limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: —with one qualification which arises from the peculiar condition to which my hon. friend has just referred. The shareholders of a private company would of course be free at all times to discuss any matter affecting the business of the company, but they would also be free to determine that it was not wise for publicity to be given to any particular item of that discussion. More or less frequently in connection with the proceedings of the special committee during my experience of it—and I presume prior to that time also—there have arisen for discussion matters respecting which the management desired that the committee should have full information but which the management did not desire to become public property. In all such cases the committee has, I think, agreed to have the information given to the committee itself but not made a matter of record. That has very frequently happened. Perhaps I am exaggerating when I say "very frequently," but at any rate it has happened on numerous occasions, and I do not think there will be any disposition on the part of the management to adopt any other attitude in the future. It is of course a little embarrassing, as my hon. friend will see, because of the broad right of inquiry which parliament undoubtedly has. Parliament could publish from the housetops any and every detail of the Canadian National's business if it so desired; but this is not considered desirable for the same reason that it is not considered desirable in connection with some aspects and details of an ordinary private corporation's business.

Mr. BENNETT: While it is improper under the rules for me to make further observations, I desire to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I entirely agree with what the minister has said. So far as the shareholders of a private company are concerned they do not keep records of their speeches to be transmitted to the public; it is merely a shareholders' record. As regards the record, therefore, I am not so much concerned about that as about the powers of the committee to represent the shareholders in their entirety in dealing with the business of the system.

Mr. DUNNING: Undoubtedly.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to move that the estimates relating to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, previously tabled, be referred to the select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Dunning.]

BRANCH LINES—METHOD OF PROVIDING FOR COST

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to make a statement, which I suppose is a question of privilege. I find that the other day I gave a wrong answer to my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) with respect to an important matter, and I should like to make the correction now. The discussion appears at page 1557 of Hansard. The hon. member asked me whether the cost of all branch lines we were considering was not included in the $53,000,000 of estimates "tabled yesterday." I answered that the proportion for the current year would be so included. I find that answer to be an error. The estimates, which are the authority from this parliament for the expenditure of money, do not contain provision for matters which have been provided for elsewhere by this parliament. I want the error noted so that my hon. friend and others will not be under a misapprehension.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 130, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill is designed to make a number of minor amendments to the Canadian National Railways Act, most of which were brought about as a result of the revision of the statutes. Changes must be made in the references; I think there is only one change which would not fall within that classification, a change relating to the method of expropriation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 131, respecting the administration of justice in the Yukon territory.

He said: On account of its geographical location the northern part of the Yukon territory is difficult to control from Dawson; in certain cases it is almost impossible for the mounted police to take prisoners to Dawson or for a judge to proceed to that part of the territory. The object of this bill is to authorize the Minister of Justice to issue an order that trials for offences committed in a certain part of the Yukon territory may be proceeded with before a court of the Northwest Territories when it is more convenient to do so.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. FRASER:

1. Has the government received the final report of the Auditor General mentioned on page X of his report for 1927-8, vol. I, commencing at "page 216" near middle of page?
2. If so, will the government table the report?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes.
2. Yes. I wish to table the report accompanying the answer.

Mr. FRASER:

When will a copy of the order in council, mentioned on page XI, second paragraph, of the Auditor General's report for 1927-8, vol. I, commencing at "payment of grant of $5,000 from vote 294, page 228," be laid upon the table of parliament?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Answered by tabling a copy of the order.

PAYMENTS WITHOUT PRE-AUDIT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

What is the amount each year in each department that is paid out of the treasury without pre-audit by the Auditor General?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This question may be dropped, as I intend placing an amended question on the order paper.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

IMMIGRATION—MEDICAL EXAMINERS

Mr. MANION:

1. What are the names of the medical examiners retained in England by the immigration department?
2. How many of them are Canadian and how many British practitioners?
3. Have any changes been made since 1927, and if so, what changes?

Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. (a) The following medical officers have been appointed to the immigration medical inspection service of the Department of Pensions and National Health and are stationed in England: Dr. H. B. Jeffs, Dr. W. Egan, Dr. W. B. MacDermott, Dr. C. H. Archibald, Dr. Margaret Parks, Dr. C. MacLeod, Dr. R. S. Henderson, Dr. J. S. Douglas, D. J. E. Grant, Dr. H. A. Chisholm, Dr. A. Turnbull, Dr. W. J. Boyd.

(b) 284 roster doctors.

2. (a) 12 Canadian; (b) 284 British.

3. 1928—Dr. C. MacLeod, new appointment; Dr. R. S. Henderson, new appointment; Dr. G. J. Boyce, new appointment; Dr. W. J. Boyd, new appointment; Dr. F. S. Parney, temporarily transferred to Canada.

255 roster doctors appointed to conduct medical examinations on a fee basis.

1929—Dr. G. J. Boyce, resigned; Dr. H. A. Chisholm, employed temporarily.

29 additional roster doctors appointed.

RESTRICTED AREA PLAN—SLAUGHTER OF CATTLE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. From February 1, 1928, to February 1, 1929, how many cattle have been slaughtered under the restricted area plan in each of the provinces of Canada?
2. During the same period what was the total amount of money paid to owners of slaughtered cattle in each province?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1 and 2.

Province	Cattle Slaughtered	Compensation
Prince Edward Island	1	$ 38 00
Nova Scotia..	3,589	124,427 10
New Brunswick... ..	—	—
Quebec..	20,434	691,396 12
Ontario..	14	500 00
Manitoba..	5	222 00
Saskatchewan..	26	620 00
Alberta..	—	—
British Columbia. ..	206	8,254 00
	24,275	$825,457 22

Note:—The amount of compensation shown above is the amount awarded on account of the animals slaughtered during the period indicated. A certain proportion of this amount has not yet, however, actually been paid owing to the one-twelfth of the estimates recently voted not being sufficient to take care of all such accounts.

BURNS GRAZING LEASE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Was a grazing lease granted for territory in township 18, range 21-20-19, west of the 4th meridian, commonly known as Burns lease?
2. If so, when, and to what date does the lease run?
3. Is this land fit for growing grain?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes.

2. A renewal lease covering approximately 30,880 acres in this area was issued for a term of twenty-one years from the 1st April, 1926. A similar lease for approximately 20,640 acres was issued for a term of twenty-one years from the 1st February, 1929.

3. Upon inspection none of the lands leased were found to be suitable for agricultural purposes with the possible exception of 640 acres which was considered essential to the leasehold for growing winter feed.

HIS MAJESTY'S MAIL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was the cost of redecorating post boxes, mail wagons and other post office equipment in the city of Toronto with the words "Canada's Mail" substituted for "His Majesty's Mail"?

2. Was this work done by contract or otherwise, and at what cost to the government?

3. What was the cost of replacing the words, "His Majesty's Mail", on the aforesaid post office equipment, in Toronto?

4. What official or other officer ordered such changes on aforesaid, at Toronto, and by what authority or on whose authority?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. (a) Post boxes—

No record of the words "His Majesty's Mail" being used on post boxes.

(b) Mail wagons or other equipment—

No record of words "His Majesty's Mail" being used. The words "Royal Mail" have been used and are still being used on some post office trucks. The words "Canada Post Office" have been used and are still being used on other post office trucks.

There is no case on record where the words "His Majesty's Mail" or the words "Royal Mail" have been removed from any equipment and replaced by the words "Canada Post Office" or any other designation.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

CALL LOANS

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. What amount of money was loaned by the Canadian banks in call loans on the different United States stock exchanges for the year 1928, and for the months of January, February, and March, 1929?

2. What rate of interest was received by the banks on the amounts so loaned?

3. What is the total amount of money received by the banks on the money so loaned?

4. How much of the amount so loaned was the property of the depositors?

5. What rate of interest was received by the depositors on their money so loaned by the banks?

Mr. ROBB:

1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. This information is not reported under the Bank Act. Call and short loans are shown under two headings only (a) in Canada; (b) elsewhere than in Canada.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

WATERPOWERS—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. What amounts have been paid to each of the various counsel who represented the Dominion government before the Supreme court in 1928 regarding the reference concerning ownership of water-powers and other matters?

2. What amounts are still to be paid each of these gentlemen?

3. What will be the total cost of the reference to the Dominion?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Hon. N. W. Rowell, K.C., $2,500; H. J. Symington, K.C., $3,925.54; Chas. Laurendeau, K.C., $3,931.62; Vincent MacDonald, $9,221.

2. Mr. Rowell, $12,002.74; Mr. Symington, $9,071.21; Mr. Laurendeau, $7,145.55; Mr. MacDonald, nil.

3. $60,719.50 according to present estimate.

DRUMHELLER, ALTA., CUSTOMS PORT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What amount of business has been done at the customs port of Drumheller, Alberta, in each of the years 1927 and 1928?

2. How many persons are employed?

3. What are the total salaries and wages of the said persons?

4. What amount of rent was paid each year, 1926, 1927, and 1928, for the accommodation of the Drumheller port of customs?

Mr. EULER:

1.

	1927-28	1928-29

1927-28

Arrears November 1/26 to November 30/27, 13 months at $50=$650; December 1/27 to March 31/28, 4 months at $50=$200.. $ 850 00

1928-29

Unexpired lease on old quarters, 1-20 April, 1928, at $50=$33.33.
New quarters, April 1/28 to March 31/28, 12 months at $40=$480. $ 513 33

$1,713 33

DRUMHELLER, ALTA., MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What amount was paid for the accommodation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the town of Drumheller, Alberta, in each of the years 1926, 1927 and 1928?
2. How many persons are employed?
3. What is the total of wages and/or salaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 1926, $540; 1927, $540; 1928, $540.
2. One.
3. 1926, $882; 1927, $821.25; 1928, $821.25.

DRUMHELLER, ALTA., SOLDIER SETTLEMENT OFFICE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What amount of rent was paid for the accommodation of the soldier settlement office in the town of Drumheller, Alberta, in each of the years 1926, 1927 and 1928?
2. How many persons were employed?
3. What were the total salaries of same?

Mr. FORKE:

1. Nil.
2. One supervisor.
3. Salary for 1926, $1,815; 1927, $1,770; 1928, $1,890.

DRUMHELLER, ALTA., POST OFFICE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What business has been done by the Post Office Department in the town of Drumheller, Alberta, in each of the years 1927 and 1928?
2. How many persons were employed?
3. What was the total of salaries and/or wages?
4. What was the total amount of rent paid in 1926, 1927 and 1928, for the post office buildings or any buildings used for post office purposes?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. 1927, $16,541.79; 1928, $18,121.13.
2. Four in both years—in addition to postmaster.
3. Salaries and allowances: 1927, $5,768.13; 1928, $5,876.21.
4. For the fiscal years ended 31st March, 1926, 1927 and 1928, $1,030 was paid each year for rent, light and heat for the post office.

DISTILLERY PRODUCTS

Mr. STEVENS:

1. What is the gross value of the products of all distilleries of Canada during the years 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928?
2. What is the amount of revenue paid by the distilleries of Canada in regard to the said products for the said years: (a) excise duties; (b) sales tax and (c) other fees or charges?

Mr. EULER:

1. No record kept in the department of values of Canadian distillery products.
2. Amount of revenue paid by the distilleries of Canada during the fiscal years ending 31st March, 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928:—

(a) Excise Duties:

1925	$ 3,974,076 18
1926	5,274,993 59
1927	7,096,107 24
1928	11,635,649 64

(b) Sales tax figures not available, as no records are kept of sales tax by commodities.

(c) License Fees:

1925	$4,125
1926	4,500
1927	5,000
1928	6,125

PETERBOROUGH COUNTY—RURAL MAIL ROUTES

Mr. PECK:

1. What are the contract prices paid to the rural mail carriers, respectively, for carriage of mails; (a) from Indian river; (b) from Keene; (c) from Norwood; (d) from Lakefield all in the county of Peterborough?
2. What is the length of each route?

Mr. VENIOT:

1 and 2 (a) Name of route	Per annum rate	Distance Miles
Indian river No. 1 R.R.	$552.63	21
Indian river No. 2 R.R.	$720.00	20¾
Indian river No. 3 R.R.	$815.00	21

Norwood No. 3 R.R.	$800.00	20
Norwood No. 4 R.R.	$900.00	12
(d) Lakefield No. 1 R.R.	$1,200.00	38
Lakefield No. 2 R.R.	$1,400.00	45
Lakefield No. 3 R.R.	$860.00	24½
Lakefield No. 4 R.R.	$856.64	21⅞

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What number of, (a) officers; (b) non-commissioned officers; (c) other ranks; of the Department of National Defence were employed at Ottawa for the years 1912-1913 and 1927-1928?

2. What number of officers of all ranks were in civil employment in said department at Ottawa for the same periods?

3. What was the total number of all ranks in the permanent force in the years 1912-13 and 1927-1928?

4. What was the extent of military units in the years 1912-1913 and 1927-1928, as to, (a) number of units; (b) total personnel of all ranks in said units?

CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION

Mr. PETTIT:

What are the number and names of persons on the old superannuation list numbers 1 and 2?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CALGARY POWER COMPANY

Mr. ADSHEAD:

For a copy of the interim license granted to Calgary Power Company for the development of hydro-electric power on the Ghost river, province of Alberta.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—PURCHASE OF COAL

Mr. QUINN:

For a copy of all letters, contracts and all other documents, relating to purchases of coal made by the Department of National Defence required in Halifax and the surrounding district during the season of 1927-1928.

PORT HOWE, N.S., POST OFFICE

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents relating to the removal of the post office at Port Howe, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia.

COLLINGWOOD CORNER, N.S., POSTMASTER

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, including the evidence taken and report submitted by J. Frank Outhit, barrister, relating to the dismissal of Neil Mooring as postmaster at Collingwood Corner, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia.

CUMBERLAND COUNTY, N.S., CUSTOMS OFFICES

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents in connection with, or relating to the closing of the following customs offices in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia: the port of Oxford; the port of Pugwash; the port of Wallace; the port of Advocate; the port of Apple River; the port of Tidnish.

[Mr. Veniot.]

BRITISH PREFERENCE—FIFTY PER CENT REQUIREMENT

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and any other documents in connection with protests made by importers, consumers or any other parties in Canada to the government against its application of the regulation effective February first last, and which regulation calls for fifty per cent empire labour and material in goods entitled to the British preferential rates.

Mr. ROBB: I believe that all available information has been tabled already, but I have no objection to this motion passing if it is passed with the reservation that permission be received before we table any confidential correspondence between the British government and this government, or between any of the self-governing dominions.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If the minister will read the motion he will find that it contains no such request. I am asking for the production of correspondence between the government and certain parties in Canada. Sessional paper No. 172, which I received some time ago, covers the correspondence between the government and the British High Commissioner and also between the government and the British Federation of Industries. I am only asking for the protests registered by the consumers.

Mr. ROBB: With the reservations I have made, there is no objection to this motion.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MARCIL

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, an article appears on page 14 of the Montreal Star of Saturday in which a question put by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) appears under my name. That is an error and I wish to correct it.

Mr. BENNETT: I would think the hon. member would be delighted to have a matter of such public interest attributed to him.

PRIVATE BILLS

PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, for the relief of Effie Margaret Hill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On several occasions last year I objected to divorce bills being passed in this manner. I know nothing whatever with regard to the bill now before the house—and that indeed is one reason why I think I should oppose its passing the house. The member who moved this bill may have some information with regard to it, and if so I think he should give it in detail to this house. Later on I shall insist upon such a statement being made and until that information is forthcoming and the house is fully apprised of the details, I do not think we should be asked to pass the bill.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. member must have the evidence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have in my desk the evidence relating to some sixty divorce cases, and I venture to say that no member of the house has read every bit of that evidence. If he has, I would suggest that he is very much in the position of a garbage can and would hardly be fit to participate in the discussions of the house. I frankly confess that I have not read the particulars relating to any one of these bills, and I know nothing whatever about the particular bill now before the house. I venture to say that nine-tenths of the members are in precisely the same position.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Ninety-nine hundredths.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And yet we are asked to vote in favour of the bill. I am rather sorry for the parties concerned in this bill, because it may be inferred by the general public that there is some outstanding reason for the challenging of this particular case. I assure them that I select this bill simply because it is the first one on the order paper. I desire to test the house on a question of principle rather than on the merits of this particular case.

A few weeks ago the house rejected a bill which provided for a divorce court for the province of Ontario. Under the rules of the house I am precluded from discussing that bill, but I would point out that the rejection by the house of that bill puts us in a different position from that in which we were last year. In the debate on the Senate bill the majority of the members of the house took a very high moral stand with regard to divorce when they rejected that bill on the ground that it was improper that any divorce should be granted. All I can say is that if it is wrong on principle to grant divorces we should reject this bill and the many others which follow it. On that occasion members on both sides of the house took the high ground of maintaining the sanctity of the family. Their argument places some of us in the rather awkward position of seeming to condone the evils of divorce and thus assisting in loosening the family ties. I think I could make out a very good case if I should attempt to prove that those who opposed that bill are the people whose action is tending to loosen the family ties and further increase the evils of divorce.

I am opposed to divorces as granted by this parliament. There has been a greater increase in the number of divorces in the province of Ontario, where there is no divorce court, than in the other provinces of Canada which have such courts. That is one ground for asserting that those who opposed the establishment of a divorce court could easily be accused of increasing the number of divorces. In making that statement I do not consider the number of divorces which have been granted in Detroit and other American cities to residents of the province of Ontario. I will be very frank and say that I am not opposed to divorce under certain circumstances, but I know there are friends of mine here in the house who are opposed to the granting of divorces under any circumstance. We talk about the evils of divorce, but I think we ought rather to talk about the evils of marriage, because, after all, it is the failure of marriage that makes the appeal for divorce necessary. In my view, to force people to live together where there is infidelity, and I would go further and say, where all affection has ceased to exist, is very little less than to force them to live in what I might term a state of legalized prostitution. I do not want to be guilty of forcing anyone to continue to live such a life, and hence, under certain circumstances, I am in favour of divorce. It is an intolerable situation that a woman should be compelled to continue to be the wife of a man whom she must despise and where her private life must be simply an inferno on earth. If the opportunity occurred in a properly constituted court, I should be glad to do anything I could to relieve the condition of women or of men so placed.

I should like, as briefly as I can, to enumerate some of my objections to the passing of this bill and of other bills of a similiar character which are before us. In the first place, I object to being a mere rubber stamp, and under the circumstances which now exist, that is the position in which all the members of the House of Commons are placed. Let us examine the procedure for a moment. In Ontario and Quebec and, until further action is taken by Prince Edward Island, also in that province, the only way in which a divorce can be obtained is by coming to parliament and presenting a bill which must be passed through the regular stages, the three readings in this house and the three readings in the senate. As we all know, these bills in practice go first to the senate and are examined by the Senate committee. I believe this year two senate committees are running concurrently and if space were available, there would be three committees, so great is the pressure of these bills. These are reported by the senate committee to the senate and afterwards in due course they come to the House of Commons. At the present time I am not a member of the private bills committee, but for some years I was, and I know that when these bills came before the private bills committee of this house, they passed in batches just as they are passing their first and second readings in this house. Except on very rare occasions there was no examination whatever of the merits of the bills. In fact often, we even had to go to considerable trouble to secure a sufficient number of the members of the private bills committee to constitute a quorum in order that in five minutes we might pass twenty, thirty or forty private bills. As every hon. member knows, we have never had a discussion in the house as to the merits of a particular divorce bill; a few days ago there was placed in our mail boxes the evidence in the case of forty-five bills, and this morning I received something like twenty additional bills. This would indicate that sixty-five divorce bills are now before us, and I understand that in the course of the session we shall have over two hnudred more than that. This procedure is becoming a veritable farce. We simply go through the motions and it seems that that is inimical to the best interests of the country as well as demoralizing to the house itself.

In the second place, the laws of evidence are not very closely adhered to in the senate committee. In so saying, I am not casting any reflection upon the senate committee. I have heard the members of that committee freely discuss the matter. In a properly constituted court the judges have had a good deal of experience in sizing up evidence. On the senate committee there are members who have not been judges, some who have not been lawyers, and who are not accustomed to the careful weighing of evidence. I do not pretend to be a legal expert, but on one occasion when I sat for a short time in that committee, I think the procedure would have been considered in any court to be very lax. I would hate to be tried for my life or to have my liberty at stake and to be tried under the laws of evidence which often prevail in the divorce committee of the senate.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. member would not have a chance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be. I think the hon. member for South Toronto is quite right. I would have no chance at all. Further than that, the evidence so-called is all printed and is circulated among the members of both houses. This involves a very heavy expenditure which would not be involved in the ordinary courts where, as I understand the matter, the evidence is frequently taken down in shorthand but is not extended, unless there is some special reason for doing so. Not only is there a greatly added expense, but the evidence so published consists really of obscene literature. I ventured to say last year and I repeat to-day that those reports could not go through His Majesty's mails if what they contained were known. We could not discuss the details of that evidence on the floor of the house without ordering that the galleries be cleared, and it may be necessary before we are through with this matter to ask that we have a private session in order to discuss some of these cases. That evidence is circulated among the members and is generally thrown into the waste paper baskets. I confess I have some qualms of conscience in doing that because members of the cleaning staff, pages and others, may pick it out of the waste paper baskets and get free obscene literature such as could not be offered for sale in the bookstores in any city of Canada.

Mr. RENNIE: The hon. member said he had not read the evidence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not read it this year. I have looked into it in other years. Last year I read several cases with very great care. I have heard members remarking jocosely that this was very spicy literature. I think, on the other hand, it is revoltingly, disgustingly—

An hon. MEMBER: Rotten.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —yes, rotten. That is a very good word which an hon. member has suggested. The evidence consists of sordid details, stripped of all romance of every kind and presented with a stark reality that is absolutely repellent to any except the most morbid minds.

I object to the present procedure because poor people cannot come to Ottawa to avail themselves of the divorce court here. It remains a privilege of the better-to-do, unless people happen to be located close to Ottawa.

Supposing somebody resides in Windsor: it means a very heavy expenditure to travel and to bring witnesses all the way from Windsor to Ottawa. It means the employment of a lawyer in Windsor and, under present practice, the employment of a local lawyer in Ottawa. In this way the drain upon the purse of the poor individual seeking divorce is very heavy.

Further, the poor man who is charged with being guilty of a crime that calls for divorce has no opportunity of defending himself. The other day a man wrote me from a town in western Ontario alleging that he had been framed by his wife, who sought a divorce. He said, "I am a poor man. I cannot afford to leave my job and travel to Ottawa. The only evidence against me is that submitted by professional spies, professional detectives," and so on the evidence of two professional detectives the wife was granted a divorce, the husband having no opportunity whatever of appearing in his own behalf. I do not think that is fair. The senate committee may be all right in the case of the wealthy, but it is not fair for the poor people in this country.

I am told that in some of the provinces such as Nova Scotia there is an official connected with the divorce court known as the king's proctor, who represents the public. He is there to draw out any evidence that he sees fit, to see that fair play is being accorded. We have no official of that kind whatever, and it seems to me that here again our procedure facilitates divorce much more than is the case under the ordinary procedure of the courts where certain safeguards are provided. Again, in some of the provincial courts—I do not know whether this is true of all the provinces—there is a period of delay after the case has been tried and before the decree is granted. It is sometimes found that when people have got to the point where a divorce is imminent, the trial brings them to their senses as they realize the alternative, and it is possible to effect a reconciliation. But in the case of divorces by this parliament, once the evidence is heard, the decree immediately goes into force and a divorce from that time is inevitable. I would say that the practice of the provincial courts is highly preferable to the practice we have in this parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would my hon. friend permit me? I have been away a long time this session, but if I am not wrong this question has been settled by parliament at this very session, and therefore it is hardly in order for my hon. friend to plead for the establishment of divorce courts when parliament has already declared against them at this very session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know that I am pleading for the establishment of such a court, but I am pointing out the weaknesses that inhere in our present practice and that pertain to the very case upon which we are asked to decide to-day. I will, however, try to confine myself as closely as possible to the matters that are before the house at this time. I would say that in this case, and in all these cases, we are making no provision whatever for alimony. In the case of the wife being granted the divorce, she goes out without having any claim whatever on the man who was formerly her husband.

Mr. FORKE: How about the man?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The man is in the same position, but he is supposed to be able to support himself, and perhaps under our existing social conditions he can support himself a little more easily because he has no longer a wife who is dependent upon him.

Mr. FORKE: Sometimes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was given an instance the other day by one of the members of the senate divorce committee. A poor little woman was granted a divorce from her husband. It came out in the evidence, which is locked up in our desks now, I presume, that her husband had communicated to her a venereal disease. The woman is to be granted a divorce under the recommendations of the senate divorce committee, but she goes out without having any redress whatever, without having any provision for alimony, and I presume that if she is to secure anything she will have to take a civil action in the regular way in the provincial courts. It is not right that that should be the case, and I intend to do this year as I did last year in regard to some of these cases, and that is to offer amendments making some provision for alimony. I know that hon. members may rise and object that that is ultra vires of the Dominion parliament. Someone asks me why. Because it would trench upon civil rights, but it appears that we ought to do what was done in at least one case in the earlier history of this house and make some provision for alimony.

More serious still, there is no provision whatever in these cases—and we have forty-five of them before us in this list—for the maintenance of the children.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is it beyond our powers to do so?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is a matter for constitutional lawyers. It is a question whether or not if we pass a measure of this kind it would be an infringment upon civil rights, which under the British North America Act is a matter of provincial concern. That is another of the anomalies under the British North America Act.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Is it beyond the powers of the senate committee?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that in the very early days of divorce legislation by this parliament there was at least one case in which alimony and maintenance for the children was granted, but I think there were only one or possibly two such cases.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But they have the power.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not clear. That power has been challenged by constitutional lawyers. I do not know that any test case has been before the courts.

Again, I pointed out in at least one case last year that the man, according to the evidence, was nothing less than a brute, and had committed a crime that made him liable to a penitentiary life sentence. That man was allowed to go free, but as a matter of fact I understand he skipped out to the United States, but he was allowed to go there with, inferentially, the right to marry again and repeat his crime and ruin another life. The senate committee took no action in that respect, and we took no action. There is no provision that action could be taken in those circumstances.

It has been stated by the newspapers that I intended to talk out these divorce bills. That is not the case, but this is what I do propose to do. I intend to ask that a roll call vote be taken. The many members of this house who on conscientious grounds are opposed to the granting of divorce salve their consciences by having the Speaker repeat, when the motion is carried, "On division." I intend to make that a reality and to insist on a division being called, and then those members who are opposed to divorce, if they are in earnest, will get up and say so and take the responsibility of that divorce not being granted. As things now stand, upon some of us who are in favour of granting divorce under certain circumstances is thrown the responsibility of divorce not being granted. I do not think that is fair. I would say, let that responsibility be assumed by those who on conscienticus grounds say that under no circumstances should divorce be granted.

I admit that I am somewhat at a loss to know whether to vote in favour of or against these divorces. I would say that I could justify my action in either case because I am opposed to this manner of granting divorces by this parliament, but I am not opposed under certain circumstances to the granting of divorces. I think on the whole that probably the way in which I can best express my own position in this matter will be for me to vote against the granting of these divorces, and that for two reasons. I want this to be clearly understood: First, that I know nothing whatever about the merits of the individual cases; and knowing nothing of those merits, in voting for them I am as I have said, simply a sort of rubber stamp. Secondly, I vote against them mainly on the ground that I want this to be a protest against this manner of granting divorce. It may be that if I knew the merits of this particular case under discussion I would vote in favour of the bill; but I do not know the merits, and therefore I am quite clear that I ought to vote against it.

However, I would say there may be exceptions to that course of action, and I want to leave myself free as to this. One day, desirous of observing personally the procedure in the senate divorce committee, I sat through the hearing of one entire case. If I can locate that case in the mass of these divorce bills I intend to vote in its favour, because I think the poor woman who sought divorce absolutely deserves it. Having a knowledge of that particular case I would make an exception of it, just as I might have to make an exception of other cases, if in committee their merits are demonstrated. This may not appear entirely consistent: I admit it. But on the whole in taking this attitude of opposition, I want it to be clearly understood that I do so, not because in my judgment there is necessarily anything wrong about granting a divorce in the particular case that comes before us, but primarily because I want to protest against this procedure.

I feel very sorry indeed that in some of these cases to which we are objecting the parties may be put to unnecessary expense and hardship and delay; I feel very sorry for the individuals. On the other hand, I would say that those responsible for this condition of affairs are the people who year after year and year after year refuse to provide proper courts where these matters can be dealt with.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I shall be very sorry unnecessarily to delay the house. I do not think any of us want to prolong the session. But in my view the responsibility for such delay does not rest on those who insist upon giving reality to the proceedings of this house; it rests rather upon those who, ever since I have been a member of parliament, have refused frankly to face the issues involved in these cases that come to us in such large numbers.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, last year this same question was before parliament, and was discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) pretty much as he has discussed it to-day. On that occasion I was in entire agreement with him, as I am to-day. I think he has admirably covered the whole situation, and there is very little to be added; but I wish to make clear, as he has done, that while I am glad to have the opportunity to vote against every divorce bill which comes before this house, I do so exactly for the reason that he has pointed out, not that I am opposed under certain circumstances to the granting of divorce, but that I am opposed to this house doing so.

That is, I am opposed to the absurd procedure which year after year is followed in this house. The absurdity cannot be made any more evident than it is at this time. If we were actually to take a vote on the approximately three hundred divorce bills which will be presented to the house this session, provided that the senate committee can hear that many cases, it would hold us here for several months. In order to dispose of them we put them through their various stages like frozen corn is put through a chopping mill—we do not even take time to read the bills, we call them by number; and we do not even stand up to record our votes—we vote in silence. This procedure appears to me to be absurd. In this house we have no facilities for discovering the true facts in respect to any one of these bills.

Mr. SANDERSON: What about the senate committee?

Mr. IRVINE: I was going to mention that. I have a great deal of respect for the divorce committee of the senate. I believe it works very hard and very conscientiously, but that does not relieve this house of its responsibilities. How does my hon. friend know that the senate committee has done justice, for instance, in this particular case? I have as much faith in that committee as he has, but I am not going to have its members think for me; he can have them do that for him if he wishes. No senate committee is going to think for me, even if it can do it better than I can myself. If I am to vote on these bills I want to know what led to the conclusions drawn by the senate committee; like my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, I want to know what is going to become of the children; like him, I want to know what is going to become of those people who are given the right to marry again, which in some cases may mean our permitting the commission of a social crime. I refuse to be a party to that sort of thing.

And I am opposed to this procedure because it has become a real problem for the senate. The senate divorce committee is overworked. In fact, I understand that a second committee has had to be appointed to deal with these cases. The senate has protested against this condition of affairs, and it gave point to its protest by sending to this house a bill to establish a divorce court in Ontario. This house refused to endorse the bill, which would have provided a properly constituted court to deal with these cases the majority of which come from this province. So while the senate divorce committee may be perfectly efficient in dealing with these cases, in the first place, it is overworked; in the second place, even although it were all the time efficient in its work, it cannot take the place of this house; we have no right to rely on it to do our business for us.

I think it is only fair to point out Mr. Speaker, that there are but two provinces from which petitions for divorce come to parliament, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. BOURASSA: Practically one.

Mr. IRVINE: I am corrected by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa): he says "Practically one." Perhaps the Minister of Justice will permit me to refer to the bill which was discussed in this house merely to point out that some of the leading members from both these provinces were most active in its defeat. I think the hon. member for Labelle pointed out that to pass the bill would be to press upon the people of Ontario something that they did not want; and I think his point was well taken. But are we not pressing upon the people of this province something that they do not want when we continue granting divorces that hon. members from that province protest they do not want? So I for one am not going to embarrass those hon. Canutes who strove to stem the tide of divorce by opposing the bill to which I have referred, and by refusing to vote bills of divorce for their constituents. I want them to-day to take the responsibility which they did not take the other day. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to sit mum and be counted as voting for divorce bills that I do not know anything about, and that I do not want or care to know anything about. On the other hand, hon. members whose constituents want divorce, and who make long platitudinous speeches about the honour and sanctity of the home, which they say I want to destroy by establishing a divorce court for Ontario, will not now be able to sit silent while their bills are going through this house.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat what I said at the beginning, that I am not unfavourable to granting divorce under certain circumstances. I deeply deplore the principle on which divorces are granted, even in our courts to-day, and as they are granted in this parliament. I hope if we are going to continue to grant divorce, the evidence will have to be based on the unhappiness of the people concerned, and not on the filth which fills these reports to-day. That is the ground upon which I should like to see divorce granted, if it is granted at all. I am opposed to any single case that is before parliament. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, I do not know what are the merits of any individual case, and therefore I am not in a position to vote for any particular bill. I can only vote against these divorce bills in the hope that ultimately these cases will be dealt with by a properly constituted court. I am glad to have this opportunity of voting against every divorce bill that comes before this house.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): In the long period during which I have been a member of this house I have consistently opposed the granting of divorce, and in those thirty years no application has come from my constituency for a dissolution of marriage. I am not objecting to this bill in particular; I am objecting to the principle of the bill. We spend days and nights, weeks and months, years and decades in discussing the material interests of the people, discussing our railway situation, our tariff, our finances, everything that concerns the wealth and prosperity of the country. But how much time do we devote to protecting the home and the generation that is to come afterwards? Grave mistakes have been committed on this question of divorce, and to begin the argument I wish to lay before the house I shall cite the opinion of the outstanding statesman whom Canada had produced up to confederation, the father of confederation—Sir John A. Macdonald—who declared that in 1857, when the British parliament enacted the divorce law there, it committed a serious blunder. I wish to read these words from Sir John because I know they will have some weight in this house and in this country. This is what he said:

> I am convinced that the establishment of a divorce court in England has been productive of much mischief. In former times, the procedure with respect to divorce was the same as in force in Canada to-day—that is, it could only be obtained from the upper house of parliament. In those days divorces were rare, expensive and hard to get, and the morals of the community were spared the columns of scandal with which the English papers are occasionally filled. The establishment of the divorce court in Canada would mean cheap and easy divorces, which would lead to great laxity in the marriage relations. They are beginning to see that in the old country. I hope it may be long before we have anything of the kind in Canada.

Mr. BOURASSA: What year was that?

Mr. MARCIL: I have not the exact year in which these words were uttered, but evidently it was after confederation. The British parliament has enacted within the last two or three years a measure to prohibit the publication in English papers of columns upon columns of scandal which were perverting and demoralizing the youth of that country. We publish such matter now in the evidence which is taken in such cases and circulated through these corridors, and which finds its way among young people who should never read it. Unfortunately the thing is going from bad to worse.

I have given the opinion of Sir John Macdonald with reference to a previous generation; let me now give the opinion of another outstanding Canadian, one of the sons of Ontario, who commands the respect of this house and is now Chief Justice of that province. Sir William Mulock has said:

> I think the facility with which divorces are granted in England and in other countries does go a long way to interfere with the sacredness of the marriage tie. There is no reason that justifies, in my opinion, the establishment of a divorce court for the province of Ontario.

Such were the opinions expressed by men who command the respect of the Canadian people, and I have no hesitation in saying that, no matter to what religion people may belong, the immense majority of the Canadian people, 95 per cent of them, still want the home preserved and the marriage tie respected. We are a Christian country, thank God. Canada is surely not going to follow in the footsteps of our neighbours to the south, where the marriage relation has fallen so low—the lowest in the scale of all great nations. Statistics speak. Let us look back and see what happened when divorce was imposed upon us. We know how it came about; after the adoption of the divorce law in England in 1857 Nova Scotia and New Brunswick established divorce courts. Prince Edward Island never took advantage of that law; and let it be said to the honour of that province that to-day it is the only province in the Dominion in which but one divorce has been granted since 1867. What has been the result of the institution of divorce in Canada? When the question of divorce came before the fathers of confederation, Sir Hector Langevin, speaking for the government of that day, said:

> Let us now examine the question of divorce. We do not intend either to establish or to recognize a new right, we do not mean to admit a thing to which we have constantly refused to assent. But at the conference the question arose which legislature should exercise the different powers which already exist in the constitutions of the different provinces. Now, among those powers which have been already and frequently exercised de facto, is that of divorce. As a member of the conference, without admitting or creating any new right in this behalf and while declaring, as I now do, that as Catholics we acknowledge no power of divorce, I found that we were to decide in what legislative body the authority should be lodged which we found in our constitutions. After mature consideration, we resolved to leave it to the central legislature, thinking thereby to increase the difficulties of procedure which is at present so easy.
> We found this power existing in the constitutions of the different provinces and not being able to get rid of it, we wished to banish it as far from us as possible.

What has been the record since confederation? In the first decade, from 1867 to 1877, 7 divorces were granted. From 1877-87, there were 16; 1887-97, 36; 1897-1907, 53; 1907-17, over 200; 1917-27, 1,070; and in 1928 alone parliament granted 238. So that the total number of divorces granted by parliament in that period was 1,620, for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. And the total for the whole of Canada from 1913 to 1928 was 6,052.

There are in this house fathers of families, men who will be responsible to another generation for what we do here; and our records will stand up against them. Are we doing what we should do now to safeguard the sanctity of the home and to render marriage indestructible, or are we not rather going about it in a slipshod manner, allowing divorces to be granted automatically by a few senators on the other side? Indeed, we go so far as to lump them together and pass them en bloc. Surely that is not the sort of legislation which this parliament should give to the Canadian people. This is a serious, a grave question; it is not a party question. The responsibility lies on all sides and on all members of the house. I know the present government will have to consider the question because we cannot allow the present state of things to continue. Some means will have to be found to change the present situation.

I want to give another illustration of what has taken place as a result of the legislation passed in this house whereby the provinces in the west were allowed to introduce—into Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba—the English law in respect to this matter. What has been the result? How have divorces increased since 1913? By years, the total figures for Canada are:

1913	60
1914	70
1915	53
1916	67
1917	54
1918	114
1919	376
1920	429
1921	548
1922	544
1923	505
1924	543
1925	551
1926	608
1927	748
1928	785

This makes a total in fifteen years of 6,055. Homes are broken up, children are thrown out on the street, and that responsibility weighs upon us and will weigh upon us until other methods are found to bring about the indissolubility of the marriage tie.

In the short time at my disposal I have no opportunity to discuss the attitude of the Roman Catholic church in this regard. That church is the mother church of all christianity; it was the church of all Christians for fifteen hundred years and it always stood for the teachings of Christ as it understood them. Since then there have been changes; Christians do not agree upon the interpretation of certain passages in St. Matthew, but surely no man in this house to-day would pretend for one moment that our Lord and Master declared that a divorced person could marry again within the lifetime of the other party.

I hold in my hand a book entitled Divorce in America, which contains an introduction by the Right Reverend William T. Manning, Bishop of New York, in which he describes in a few words the horrible condition now prevailing in the United States. Are we to follow in the footsteps of that country, where the people themselves are trying to have the marriage tie respected and the homes saved? After referring to the enormous increase in the divorces granted in the United States, where the average is one divorce in five marriages; after calling attention to the fact that fifty-two different reasons are given for the granting of divorce, and after stating that divorces granted in one state are not recognized in another, this Episcopalian bishop says:

> It is our duty to face this situation, to consider its causes and its consequences, and to ask ourselves how it can best be remedied.
> The separation of man and wife, and their living apart, for grave cause, is not forbidden by the church. The church allows, and in extreme cases even advises this. It is the use of divorce as a doorway to remarriage which the church opposes, and which is bringing such disastrous consequences upon us.

There are only two alternatives possible. Marriage must be held to be a permanent relation, or it must be held to be not necessarily permanent, and if we choose the latter its sacredness and meaning disappear. If marriage may be ended by any passing quarrel, if the man and woman are united by nothing more fundamental than mutual consent and agreement to continue together while things go happily, if the principle of monogamy is abandoned.

And yet this is the position to which, as a nation, we stand committed by our present laws, and which some who call themselves reformers, are seeking to carry still further. What can we do to meet the present situation?

We must arouse public sentiment, and we can all help to do this by our own personal stand in the matter. We must acquaint ourselves with the facts and call upon others to realize them. We must appeal to all Americans who love their country and care for the future of their race to take their stand against this great peril to our life as a nation. The life of America depends upon the stability and integrity of our homes. It is there that the character of our boys and girls is formed and moulded. What is the situation of the children of our multitude of homes broken by divorce?

Every word of this introduction applies to Canada with even more force than to the United States. Bishop Manning proceeds:

The church must give far more careful and faithful teaching as to what marriage means and involves. We must show more care and consideration for our young people by helping them to understand the sanctity and the significance of marriage before they enter upon its responsibilities.

The next paragraph, while it refers to creeds with which I am not connected, contains some good advice:

It is time for all churches of every name to act together in this matter. At present the influence of religion against divorce and remarriage is weakened immeasurably by the varying standards of different churches and even in different ministers of the same church. Those whom one church refuses to marry go immediately to another and are married without question. In a matter of such vital importance to society, this ought not so to be. In these days when so many are working and praying for Christian unity, it should certainly be possible for us to cooperate in upholding the sacredness of marriage. All religious organizations—Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish—might well agree upon common action for the preservation of the home. Think what the effect would be if the whole united influence of religion should be exerted in this great cause.

The concluding paragraph, which I wish to impress upon the house with all the force at my command, is as follows:

We must all of us do our part for a revival of religion in our land. I believe that this revival is now taking place among us. There is among people of every sort, and especially among the younger people, a deep stirring of faith, and of desire for closer touch with God.

It is this above all else that is needed to check the evil of divorce. It is religion that is the bulwark of the home. If Jesus Christ had the place that belongs to Him in our homes, there would be fewer homes in our land without children, and the present crisis in regard to marriage and the home among us would not exist. For our own sakes, and for the sake of our country, we must bring Jesus Christ back into His true place in our own lives, and in our homes.

That, Mr. Speaker, is an appeal as strong as could be made to any right thinking man no matter what his faith might be. Whether he be Catholic, Jew or Protestant, this is a question of saving the nation, saving the homes of our people and saving our young men and women. Is there anything more pathetic than the situation pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the breaking of the marriage tie, casting the children out on the street without any profession, with no responsibility and without any of the precautions which would be observed by the most elementary court of justice? We, the parliament of Canada, acting on behalf of the Canadian people and for this great Canadian nation, have a grave responsibility. Canada sends missionaries to every part of the world; Canada is doing its share in the great moral uplifting of the world; Canada is sharing in the work of the League of Nations and in all philanthropic and social work looking to the peace and contentment of the nations of the world. Is it possible that this parliament of Canada is reflecting the opinion of the Canadian people when it allows divorces to be granted in this shameful manner under our present system?

I will say no more, Mr. Speaker; I will leave it to others more competent to discuss the question from a legal standpoint, but I have sought to give expression, as strongly as possible, to my opinions in this regard, knowing that in speaking as I do I represent the views of a very large section of the Canadian people.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I do not apprehend that this is the time or place to discuss the principle underlying divorce; the fact of the matter is that we have divorce in Canada and that this parliament has been charged under the British North America Act with the responsibility of granting divorce. That is the situation prevailing to-day, whether we like it or not.

I am quite well aware that it is not in order to reflect upon a bill which has been presented to the house already during this session or upon a vote which has been taken here, but

I will say that I believe those who have brought this matter before the house have done a service in that they have shown the absurdity of the position taken by the house on a former occasion this session. We are not discussing the theory of divorce; we are face to face with certain conditions, and I think it was because the house failed to realize that fact that we acted as we did a few weeks ago. That is all I wish to say upon that point because, as I have stated, I am well aware that it is not in order to discuss a question which has been before the house already or a vote which was taken on a previous occasion. The question which confronts us now is this: a large number of divorce bills have come before this chamber during a long period of years; how we shall conduct ourselves with regard to that condition? The hon. member who introduced this matter has rendered a service to the house, in that he has placed before us the condition which exists. I cannot follow him, or the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who supported him, to the extent of going as far as they have gone. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) stated that he proposed to vote against this bill because he did not know anything about it; the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said that he would vote against these bills because he did not know the particulars and did not wish to know them. I would say to the hon. members that they are negligent in their duty in that regard. I am not saying that I am better informed than they are with regard to this particular bill, but when they advance that as the reason for their action, then I say to that extent they are negligent in their duty. They say that they do not propose to discharge their duty as members of parliament because they have not informed themselves on the question before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the hon. member read the evidence relating to this case?

Mr. BROWN: I have already confessed that I have not read the evidence, but I do not propose to make that an excuse for not doing my duty.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On what ground does the hon. member propose to support the bill?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member will have heard me when I have finished; I propose to give very good reasons for the course of action I propose to take.

As I have said on former occasions, I do not think the present system is the best possible system we could have. However, it is the system in existence at the present time, and I intend to act in harmony with it. I have said that the senate committee deal with these questions, within the limits which are imposed upon them, in manner which commands the approval of those who have seen them taking evidence. I know that they are handicapped; I know that they cannot go as far in the way of granting redress to injured parties as we would like to have them go, and as we believe a properly established court could go, but, at the same time, I think it is a mistake to give the public the impression that these questions are not being dealt with seriously by a body of men competent to deal with them. Whether or not I read the evidence taken in connection with these cases, I have confidence in the senate committee before whom that evidence is adduced, and when they submit these questions to us I believe we are justified in assuming that they have reached the proper conclusion. I shall not vote against these bills because I have not read the evidence, but will assume that the senate committee has properly discharged its duty; that these bills come to us after being properly considered, and, therefore, should be endorsed by the house.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Brown) when he says that this is not the proper time to discuss the broad issue of the principle of divorce. I also agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he says that it is not in order to discuss the question of the establishment of divorce courts because, as he says, that question has been decided, for this year at least, by a vote of the house. At the same time, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has justified the course he has taken when he points out, by way of exemplification, the consequence of the attitude taken by the house on a previous occasion. I think we are all agreed that the hon. member for Lisgar is a very sensible man. He said that he did not want to discuss the theory; he admitted that the system was bad, but he wanted to deal with the system as it is. Carried to its logical conclusion, the position taken by the hon. gentleman would only mean that every time the house found that something was wrong, it could do nothing to remedy the condition complained of because of its being the system then in effect.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. BOURASSA: Fortunately, parliaments very seldom act logically.

Mr. FORKE: He wanted to point out that a mistake had been made on a previous vote.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would advise the hon. minister, who is a canny Scotchman, not to come to the rescue of the hon. member for Lisgar, who is just as canny a Scotchman as he is.

In connecting the words of the hon. member for Lisgar with those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, my construction is that this parliament is not empowered to deal with the civil rights when it grants a divorce; that it is not empowered to deal with property belonging to the divorced parties or to the children; that it is not empowered to decide what shall be granted to the divorced party who may be in the right in asking for the divorce, or to his or her children. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in connection with this bill, and all similar ones, is very well taken. The point raised that under subsection 26 of clause 91 of the British North America Act we are dealing with questions upon which we have no power to pass final judgment and do justice to all parties, is a very grave constitutional point.

Mr. ADSHEAD: No power to grant money or alimony.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course not. It may have been done in one case or another, but many things are done occasionally by parliament or occasionally by a provincial legislature which are against the letter of the constitution. Such a thing stands so long as it is not challenged, but look at what it means. It means that things are done haphazardly which may be challenged ten or fifteen years later in a court of justice and upon which the Supreme Court of Canada or the Privy Council will pass final judgment, doing away with the whole of our jurisprudence. I do not want to go too much outside this debate, but this has happened with regard to mariage jurisprudence in Quebec. Year after year the superior court, the court of review and the court of appeal of Quebec rendered judgments in a certain sense, when all of a sudden, in the year of grace 1921, the Privy Council gave what some consider as a judgment but what others merely call an opinion, which has practically upset the whole of our jurisprudence in Quebec since confederation. The more I have studied the question—and I have given a good deal of time to it—the more I have become convinced that that judgment of the Privy Council is, legally speaking, the right one. But what does it mean? That for years and years the legislature of Quebec and the tribunals of that province acted upon a delusion which that final judgment of the Privy Council simply dispelled. So much for the constitutional issue.

Are we going to take the position that, because certain things have been done for ten, twenty-five or thirty years, we are to go on doing the same? Let us carry that also to its logical conclusion. Let us apply it to any principle or practice of policy in connection with public affairs or private interest. Are we going to consider ourselves bound by what has been done from year to year or from decade to decade by the house or by the senate? Is so, why have a parliament? Why not adopt a final act of parliament in the form and terms of the laws of the Medes and Persians and say that what is law shall be law for all time to come?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have that under the British North America Act.

Mr. BOURASSA: That some old-time Tories who no longer exist even in this house, should have upheld the principle that certain laws or practices should always remain unaltered, I can understand; but that any man, calling himself Liberal, Progressive or Liberal-Conservative, should stand up in the house and say: I will not consider the merits of a concrete issue, or I will not consider the principle of a certain form of legislation, because it depends upon a system which has been practised for fifty years, is something I cannot understand. For my part I do not think I was elected in the year of grace 1926 by a portion of the Canadian electorate to come here and do something because it had been done from session to session for the last fifty years.

To apply those considerations to the question at issue, I said before, and I repeat now—

Mr. CLARK: I rise to a point of order. This is a bill before the house and the hon. member is not discussing the merits or demerits of it. He is discussing the principle whether parliament should deal with such bills or not. That matter has been dealt with already by the house at this session, and I submit that the whole discussion is out of order. The only matter which the house can discuss is whether this particular bill is one which should be passed by the house.

Mr. BOURASSA: Speaking on the point of order, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman: I think the whole discussion is out of order. But why should the point be raised when I am endeavouring to clear up the issue brought before the house by three hon. members who preceded me?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is now applying the principle he has just condemned.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. I prefaced it by saying that logic had nothing to do with our procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the house is the second reading of a particular bill in regard to divorce. It is very hard to make a distinction between the principle contained in that bill and the general principle of divorce; but as the hon. member for Labelle admits that he is out of order, I hope he will confine his remarks to the particular subject before the house. I repeat, however, it is very difficult to establish a distinction between the principle of divorce that obtains in this particular bill and the general principle itself.

Mr. BOURASSA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, because that will cut short the discussion, and I hope the decision will stand against further speeches.

With regard to this particular bill, it is a divorce bill. It is a divorce bill framed in the same language as that in which all divorce bills are framed, adopted by the senate and brought before the house. If you go through the statutes of the last fifty years or about so, you find that every divorce granted by parliament, for whatever reasons or causes, is granted in the same form. There is a printed formula in both languages, French and English, and there are blank spaces for the name, the date, the date of the marriage, the date, I think, at which the case has been brought before the senate, or something to that effect. A few words are filled in and the form is adopted by a committee of the senate, sent to this house and passed upon by us without our reading the evidence. I think that will be admitted by every fair-minded man. At least nineteen out of twenty members do not read the evidence; at any rate they do not read the evidence of all those bills, so that, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, we act as rubber stamps in order to ratify what has been done by the senate committee under those conditions. I claim that is a bad system of legislation.

With regard to this particular bill we have to look first to the principle upon which it is based. We have to consider the principle upon which we act upon this bill or any other similar piece of legislation. Are we acting as a sovereign parliament, as a branch of this sovereign parliament equal in power to and exercising the same responsibilities as the other branch, or are we acting as a court of justice? It is one or the other, or both, perhaps. Under subsection 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act, parliament has the sole and exclusive power to deal with marriage and divorce, either from a legislative or from a legal point of view. In other words, no divorce can be granted except by leave of this parliament, directly through private bills as is the case now, or indirectly through the decisions of courts of justice empowered by parliament to act in this regard, with the exception of those courts of divorce which existed in the maritime provinces prior to confederation. Let there be no mistake: the divorce courts that have been established and are working now in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have been established and are adjudicating under the authority of parliament, under the authority of law passed by parliament.

With regard to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which had no divorce courts prior to Confederation, and in which this parliament has not thought proper to establish divorce courts, this parliament acts directly upon every divorce bill, first as a legislative power, and second as a court of justice. It is a great axiom of British jurisprudence that where a right is created by parliament, rightly or wrongly, some court of justice must exist to adjudicate upon the concrete issues which are raised in connection with that right. I think that has been an uncontradicted principle of British government, British legislation and British jurisprudence for centuries past. Therefore, this parliament having received from the British parliament, at its own request, the exclusive power to legislate on marriage and divorce, it has taken a moral or an immoral pledge towards people who believe in divorce to give them a means to exercise that right, which I consider a contradiction of social right and social duty, but of which nevertheless this parliament has accepted the responsibility.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the hon. member mean to say that under subsection 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act this parliament is bound to act on matters of divorce when it is applied to?

Mr. BOURASSA: That is the construction I put upon that principle of British jurisprudence, that where there is a right there must be an adjudication upon issues in connection with that right by some form of tribunal. I think that is contained in our code of civil procedure in the province of Quebec as one of its first principles. I am not a lawyer—

Mr. CAHAN: It is elementary law anyway.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course. How can a parliament which in the name of the sovereign exercises all powers of legislation without limitation, including the creation of courts of adjudication, claim to itself and have put into its national charter the exclusive power to deal on certain subjects unless it is prepared to grant to every citizen of the country a recourse to see whether or not he has the right to invoke that principle of law? It is for that reason that I repeat to-day what I have always said that the one great moral and social crime of the fathers of confederation was to introduce the principle of divorce into the constitution.

I come back to this bill, and my remarks will apply to the next bill and to all these other bills. I cannot understand how anyone who is opposed to divorce on principle, who believes that divorce is wrong morally and socially, can vote for any one of these divorce bills that are brought before parliament. You may say that I have done it. Yes, in a way. We all well know that all of us have done things that had better not have been done. Let us have a little humility. All of us in the course of our political lives have done things which we would like not to have done; but am I to be told in this year 1929, when age is coming upon me, that because I have been wrong or unthoughtful for many years, I am now precluded from being a little more thoughtful and thinking more of my responsibilities to my God, to my country, to my own children and to the children of others? If I have been lightheaded and unreflective in letting pass for years bills of divorce, "carried on division," I am not going to do so in the future. I said last year and I repeat it now—not in any spirit of enmity to this house, to any party in this house or to any individual—the more I grow in age, the more I reflect upon the evolutions of human society, and the more I am convinced that the cankerworm which is eating into the entrails of modern nations is, as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has said, the destruction of the sanctity of the home.

Reference has been made to individual sufferings, to the men and women who occasionally are victims of a bad marriage. But can you point to one single law which does not carry with it some individual suffering? Can you point to one single law upon which society rests, and upon which rests the magnificent political fabric of which we are so proud, which has not multiplied martyrs all through the centuries of the glorious history of the British Empire, and of the world at large? No. When it comes to the foundations of society you have to choose between social principles upon which no concessions should be made, in regard to which no transactions should be consented to, and the suffering of some few individuals.

As to those who do not agree with me on this point, I respect their views. But if they think as does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and apparently the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) although he was not as clear, if they admit that on certain occasions and for certain causes divorce ought to be granted, then I come back to the other point, that such action should be taken in a judicial manner, and divorce should never be granted unless all the rules of equity and justice and evidence are applied to each case.

Mr. BROWN: Why did you not vote that way when the bill was before the house?

Mr. BOURASSA: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The hon. gentleman does not have to, of course, but if he had listened to me or had read my speech, I am sure that with his keen mind he would see that I am taking now exactly the same position that I took last year, and this year again.

Mr. BROWN: There is the record of your vote.

Mr. BOURASSA: I voted against the establishment of divorce courts by this parliament, after I had put to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the question, "Are you prepared to amend your bill by introducing into it a clause saying that any divorce court established in any province of Canada shall not come into existence before the people of that particular community shall have expressed their will in favour of it?" That is exactly my stand to-day.

When my hon. friend interrupted I was going on to make this point. As regards those members of this house who are opposed to divorce on principle, whether you call it religious principle, social principle or political principle, I do not see how they can go on voting for all these divorce bills, and for my part I propose to vote against every one of them every time it is possible to get a division in the house. As to those who think it is their right and their duty to look into the merits of each case, then it comes to a question of their exercising judicial duties. It is admitted that divorce cases are coming to this parliament only from those provinces in which there are no divorce courts. As a matter of fact, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), they are practically all coming from Ontario. This parliament, therefore, having taken upon itself the responsibility of acting as a divorce court for the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, I claim that those hon. members who are of the opinion that each case should be decided on its merits must hold the view that both branches of this parliament should make full use of all their powers of inquiry before any divorce bill is granted, just as a court of justice would do before giving the decision of the court in favour of this, that or the other party. You must apply all the rules of evidence that are in force in all these courts which this parliament has created, whether it be the supreme court, the exchequer court or any other court which has been created either by this parliament or by the legislatures of the various provinces, some under their own authority, and others, such as the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba divorce courts, under the authority of this parliament. You must see that the truth is vindicated as far as you can vindicate it. You must see that the principles of equity and social justice are applied to all parties.

One hon. gentleman, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, told of a correspondence he had last year with regard to one of those divorce cases. I also had letters from one of the leading legal offices in Toronto pointing out to me the abominable injustice that was done in a certain case. Whether it was true or not, I do not know, I had no power to inquire into the matter. But it turned out that the senate committee ruled that it had no power either, or did not choose to exercise such power if it had any. Thereupon the woman protested that being too poor to come here to vindicate her honour, a gross injustice had been done to her, that her life had been broken by a decision of parliament which precluded her from being heard. The senate committee passed judgment upon the case; this house passed, not judgment, but ratified the decision of the divorce committee of the senate apparently for the reason—surprising to me—that we have such confidence in one committee of one branch of this parliament that we renounce our responsibilities, we put our conscience, our intelligence and our will into the hands of the eight or ten gentlemen composing that committee. Capable as they may be, learned as they may be, I am not prepared to say, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think I could justify myself before the people who have sent me here by saying: I may have done wrong, I may have been a party to a mistaken decision by the senate committee, but the case was in the hands of that committee, and although the bill could not pass without my vote, I gave my vote without inquiry, blindly, and without knowing anything of the circumstances, because I had confidence in those gentlemen. I cannot agree to do any such thing.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, opposed as I am to divorce in principle, whatever reasons may be advanced in favour of it, believing that marriage is essentially a social principle before it is a question of contract or civil rights, believing, apart from the individual suffering that may arise from the maintenance of any particular marriage, that the great interests of society at large require the maintenance of the natural law and of the evangelical doctrine based upon it and sanctified by the word of Christ, that a marriage once contracted is contracted for life, I propose to vote against every divorce bill. In the next place, not believing that under the present system I can properly exercise those powers of judicial inquiry and judgment which we are called upon to exercise in these matters, I do not propose to sit as one of the judges on any divorce case; consequently I rule the case out of court by the only means I have at my command, and that is by voting against this bill, against the next bill, and against every other divorce bill that may come before this parliament.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I am as desirous of preserving the sanctity of marriage and of married life as any member of this house could be. I was born and bred and I practised in the early years of my profession in the province of Nova Scotia, where we had a divorce court prior to confederation, a court which still continues to function. On that court sit judges appointed from time to time, both of Roman Catholic and the Anglican faith, who in their inmost hearts are opposed to the principle of divorce. And I presume that every judge finds the duty imposed upon him from time to time of administering laws to which he may be in principle opposed, and, if he were a member of the legislative assembly or parliament upon whom the responsibility is placed of enacting those laws, he would have voted on principle against their enactment. But the judges of that court find themselves in this judicial position, that they are bound by the solemn oath of office to administer the law which comes before them, although they are not morally or personally responsible for enactment of the law. Their sole duty is to pronounce a decision in accordance with the law which is then being administered by the court. It is in a similar position that I sit here as one of the members of the high court of parliament of Canada.

The constitution of this country has placed the duty and the responsibility upon the members of this house of administering and carrying out the purpose and intent of that constitution as expressed in the British North America Act. Section 91 declares:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

And number 26 is:

> Marriage and divorce.

In respect of marriage and divorce parliament sits as a high court, both the commons and the senate. In times past it has been the custom for these divorce bills to be introduced in the senate and thoroughly investigated by a committee of the senate—I presume because that chamber has more time at its disposal—and the pronouncement of the senate committee has generally been accepted by this house. So long as that judicial function is imposed upon parliament, I regard it as my bounden duty to vote on the merits of each divorce bill that is brought before this house. I confess, as hon. members have stated this afternoon, that it is impossible for me to give adequate consideration to the evidence in each case which is printed by the senate committee and sent to every member of this house. I feel reluctant, really, to devote the time necessary to reading that evidence. Occasionally I have taken up at random the evidence in connection with some divorce bill and in the majority of cases, under the law which prevails in this country, I consider the applicants entitled to divorce. In other cases, not having heard the evidence, and perhaps construing it differently from those who heard it orally —because there is a great difference in my experience between reading the printed report of evidence and hearing the witnesses as they give that evidence before the committee—I should be doubtful whether I, sitting as a member of the committee in such cases, looking at the evidence as it is printed and not having heard it, would have rendered the same decision as that rendered by the senate committee. Therefore I have felt that it would be far better for parliament, and far better for the country, to impose on one of the courts of justice of the land the consideration of these petitions for divorce; because I believe that the judges of this country are far better qualified to render decisions in such cases than are we as members of the high court of parliament. But parliament in its wisdom has decided against relegating this judicial duty to the courts of the province of Ontario, and therefore so long as these bills from Ontario, relating to that province particularly, come before this parliament I feel in duty bound, under my responsibility as a member of this parliament, which is the high court of justice in Canada, to determine according to my conscience and according to the evidence given as to whether I will vote in favour of or oppose each particular bill which is brought before the house. It is very difficult, I repeat, for one to perform in this house that conscientious duty; but under the constitution of the country I think the duty is imposed upon us until such time as parliament decides in its wisdom to relegate that duty to the courts of justice. The divorce court—in the English-speaking provinces which have such courts—not only grants divorces on certain grounds of which we are all aware, but also nullifies marriages which have not been contracted according to the law. In the province of Quebec our courts exercise that jurisdiction of nullifying marriage contracts under certain circumstances, and that to a certain extent relieves those who are domiciled in Quebec from making application for divorce to the parliament of Canada. In the province of Ontario, so far, it appears that there is no consensus of opinion on the part of members representing that province as to whether divorce proceedings are better administered by this high court of parliament or would be better administered by the courts of Ontario. I have no doubt as to that; I think divorce should be relegated to those courts. And as regards the province of Quebec, with all due consideration for the views of my hon. colleagues from that province, whose religious convictions I understand and appreciate, and whose conscientious objections to divorce I also thoroughly understand and appreciate, I say that my own personal opinion is that it would be far better that the duty should be relegated to the courts of justice in that province, and that fewer mistakes would be made in administering the law if its administration were within the jurisdiction of its provincial courts.

Mr. MARCIL: Knowing the sentiment of Quebec as he knows it, and knowing that the immense majority of the people inhabiting that province are opposed to divorce, would my hon. friend undertake to impose it on the province?

Mr. CAHAN: No, I certainly would not; because many policies which, in principle both my hon. friend and I might advocate, are nevertheless inexpedient, if it is suggested that we apply them to the whole Dominion generally. Therefore I should be opposed to imposing the administration of divorce upon the province of Quebec so long as it objected to divorce. And in the same way I would oppose—at least I would not favour —the imposition of the administration of divorce upon the courts of Ontario so long as there is any strong public opinion against it in that province. That is my position.

I think that we are above ordinary sectarian prejudices in this high court; and as, one who has a sincere respect for the religious convictions of his fellow men, I therefore, would not impose upon any province the administration of a law, which was not acceptable to that province, either in respect of marriage or in respect of divorce. But, so long as the constitution of this country remains as it is, I feel it is my duty to give a judicial decision in respect of every petition for divorce that comes properly before this house and this parliament. So that irrespective of my own personal views with regard to divorce—and, I repeat, I believe in the sanctity of the marriage relation as deeply and sincerely as my hon. colleagues from the province of Quebec—I say that so long as the duty is imposed upon me by the constitution of this country, I feel I must administer the law, whatever my personal predelictions may be. It may be very distasteful to me, and in many cases it may not be in accordance with what I think should be accepted as the better way of administering the law. Therefore, so far as this bill is concerned, on which apparently the evidence is conclusive, holding these opinions, I regard myself as in just the same position as a judge of the court of Nova Scotia, of the Catholic faith, who would feel, when the evidence was brought before him, that it was his duty and responsibility to administer the law in accordance with that evidence, although the principle of granting divorces might be utterly distasteful to him. That is the position which I intend to take in this house. So far as the province of Ontario is concerned I see no hope of relegating the duty of administering the law of divorce to the judiciary of that province, until the province actually requests it so clearly as to persuade us to legislate accordingly. At the same time I may add that so long as we sit as a high court of parliament, exercising judicial functions, I hope I may have sufficient moral strength and personal courage to administer the law, even though sometimes I would not favour the enactment of the law under which that administration takes place.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the House of Commons for a good many years and I have heard the question of divorce discussed on many occasions. I venture to say that no member of this house is more opposed to divorce on conscientious grounds than I am, because I believe a man and wife contracted to live together and that no legislative body has the right to dissolve that contract.

I have attended only one divorce court in my life, and to me it was a pathetic scene. The husband, a young man of fine appearance, brought charges against his wife, who was present in the court, and during the progress of the case the husband brought out what his six year old boy had said with regard to what he had seen his mother do. This young man seemed quite prosperous and had given his wife valuable rings and other jewellery; in fact he was so devoted that he deeded his home and made over stocks to her. During the progress of the case the husband charged that the wife drank champagne, scotch and other liquors and went about the country with other men; later I heard the wife say that her husband was a drunken creature, and so on. Each had had an illness, and each claimed that during those illnesses the other had been untrue. It was very pathetic to think that the husband would not attend to his sick wife or that the wife, while her husband was ill, went around the country with other men drinking intoxicating liquor. If I had been given an opportunity to speak to those people I believe I could have brought about a reconciliation, because in the United States I have known of people being separated and then remarrying after having been brought together again by their children or by friends.

I can remember when, so far as I knew, there was not a divorce court in the United States. Now they are located everywhere, and some of the wealthiest women take their children to those nasty places to listen to this terrible evidence. In the United States there are over fifty grounds for divorce; they even grant divorce in some states for incompatibility of temperament. In my opinion divorce is a cancer which eventually will destroy any country; many of the best thinking people of the United States say that divorce will bring about the downfall of that great country. In Canada we can boast of a virile people; we are a great nation, recognizing all the moral laws and the laws of God, but as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has stated, divorces have increased in Canada from only seven in one year to about two thousand, and every divorce means broken hearts. If the parties to the divorce do not suffer so much their relatives and their children are disgraced and shamed. Our homes are the bulwarks of our nation, and when we destroy the homes we weaken the moral fibre of our Canadian people. So when we grant divorces we take a tremendous responsibility upon our shoulders.

As a member of parliament I have been accused of assisting to procure divorces. No member of this house assists in that way; divorces are railroaded through the house and we must accept the responsibility. I want it distinctly understood that I will oppose in every way any divorce law or measure which may be brought up in this house at any time. What an example we are setting the rising generation, the children who are the hope of the world for the future. We should picture the broken homes, the broken hearts, the disappointed fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers when we consider the question of divorce.

I am not speaking from the constitutional standpoint, which was dealt with by the speaker who preceded me; I believe divorce is destroying our nation, and if this parliament accepts responsibility for aiding and abetting such conditions, I propose to make my stand known. I have not read the evidence in a divorce case for over five years; when these reports come to me I tear them up, and I tried to burn them but I could not do so.

There was one case of divorce in my county and not more than a dozen words appeared in the reports in relation to this case. The man had deserted his wife when the children were quite small. When the children were about twenty-one years of age, the wife finally located him. She, with her sister, discovered him living with another woman in the state of Vermont. There were four children and the wife was told that her husband was the father of those children, which he acknowledged in the presence of his wife and her sister. That is all that would be required to be proved in order to obtain a divorce. The granting of divorces will increase in number because a contaminated thing grows fast, and it would be a terrible misfortune for the youth of this country should they come to realize that members of parliament would support legislation that would destroy the sanctity of the home.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything on this question, but I would like to call the attention of the house to the matter under consideration. This is the second reading of Bill No. 85, letter E of the senate. By saying yes or no with regard to the second reading of this bill, we either register our opinion in favour of advancing the bill one stage, or register our opinion against such advancement. In order to give my own personal opinion, I might say that I am not opposed to the entire bill. I might go further and say that I am not absolutely opposed to the granting of divorces, but I am opposed to certain portions of the bill now before us. We find the bill divided into three parts, the first of which is the preamble. The preamble reads:

Whereas Effie Margaret Hill, residing at the city of Chatham, in the province of Ontario, factory worker, wife of Charles Henry Hill, clock repairer, who is domiciled in Canada and residing at the city of London, in the said province, has by her petition alleged that they were married on the first day of September, A.D. 1920, at the said city of Chatham, she then being Effie Margaret Borland, a spinster; and whereas by her petition she has prayed that, because of his adultery since then, their marriage be dissolved; and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced and it is expedient that the prayer of her petition be granted: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

There is nothing in the preamble which should meet with opposition. We take it for granted that the senate committee has thoroughly considered the evidence adduced, and has come to the conclusion that the adultery has been proven. Relying on the thorough investigation which has been made, I am prepared to agree to the preamble. If adultery has been committed, it is possible that these two parties are not living together, and, therefore, I am quite willing that this part of the bill should pass. Clause 1 of the bill reads as follows:

The said marriage between Effie Margaret Borland and Charles Henry Hill, her husband, is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void.

Up to that point I am in favour of that clause, but I would think that the next clause, "to all intents and purposes whatsoever" might be omitted. If something has come between two parties who have been legally married and which prevents them living together, then I have no objection to legislation being passed which will permit them to live apart. I do not claim that it is necessary that they come here to obtain that right, they could go before a court and get a judicial separation. Of course, it is not always possible to arrive at an amicable settlement in a court, which I think is necessary in order to have a satisfactory judicial separation. We might have parties coming here and asking for a bill of divorce whereby they could be eternally separated, as the saying goes. The next clause in this bill reads as follows:

2. The said Effie Margaret Borland may at any time hereafter marry any man whom she might lawfully marry if the said marriage with the said Charles Henry Hill had not been solemnized.

I am not prepared to sanction that part of this bill. In giving my reason for arriving at this conclusion I need only say that we have a Book which is used in this so-called Christian land, a Book which is an authority prior to any statute which might be passed by this parliament. In the twentieth chapter of Exodus there are certain commands given to us to obey. One of those commands is, "Thou shalt not steal," and we take it for granted that when people do steal they commit a wrong and we pass laws to bring them to task.

Mr. BOURASSA: It depends upon the amount of money they steal.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Without a doubt, the punishment is according to the offence. Another command in that same chapter is, "Thou shalt not kill." When people go out and violate that command they are punishable by either imprisonment for a term of years, or possibly by death.

Mr. BOURASSA: Again it depends.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Another command is, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The one Person who is partly responsible for that written message in the twentieth chapter of Exodus was here upon earth, and he told us in very plain language—language which I cannot discard or get around in order to explain away—"Whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery." How can these injunctions be reconciled with what is proposed here? I cannot reconcile them myself, and, therefore, I refuse to sanction the second clause of this bill. I feel that if we as a parliament sanction such a bill we, in effect, legalize adultery. We override what, to my mind, is a greater authority than any law that we could pass in parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest, though, that we have never considered the possibility of bringing in a law against adultery?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Well, that is the opinion of the hon. member, but—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I say that as a matter of fact, parliament has no law against adultery.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Quite true. We have laws against stealing; we have laws against killing, and it is quite possible we may advocate a law against adultery. Somebody may be prepared to say that the Founder of the Christian religion more or less sanctioned divorce when He was asked the question in regard to the practice of Moses. I do not believe He did. He was asked: Why did Moses allow divorces in his time? And his answer was that Moses, because of the hardness of their hearts suffered them to give writings of divorcement and to put away their wives, but from the beginning it was not so. That is the attitude I prefer to take, namely, that from the beginning such was not so and was not intended to be so, and I feel that we, in this year of Our Lord, 1929, instead of getting further away from the beginning, should make some attempt to get back to what was the intention in the beginning. Therefore I am going to vote against this bill for the reason that I think the right to marry again should not be included in any of these bills.

Some hon. members have advocated that this matter should come before a court; that the courts are more capable of inquiring into the details and adjudicating upon such matters than we in this house are. I gather that parliament is a court above every other court in the land and we should give the lead as to what course we would expect our courts to follow in similar cases. Our lead should be against passing any bill that gives the right to marry again.

The question was raised whether or not adultery could be made a punishable offence. Why could it not be made an offence? Adultery is taken as the absolute ground for divorce in Canada. If adultery were made a punishable, a statutory offence—and I am not going to suggest to what extent the punishment should be made effective—I am not so sure but that we would curb our divorce evil much more readily than we are doing even by opposing divorce bills. If adultery were made a punishable offence on the part of the person who was the cause of the divorce proceedings, and then if we followed that a little further and classified any person who married after being granted a divorce, as being guilty of adultery and liable to such punishable offence, I am rather of opinion that we would curb our divorce evil to a greater extent. For these various reasons I am going to vote against Bill No. 85, and every other divorce bill that comes before the house.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member desire to speak?

Mr. CLARK: The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) has given some very good reasons for the establishment of a divorce court, but he has given no reasons for a change in a principle recognized by law. If an applicant such as the one involved in this case, were to come before a court and the evidence which is before parliament were given, any court in the land would give that woman the right to remarry. Therefore I suggest that while the member has given a very good reason for the establishment of a divorce court, he has given no good reason why we should change the principle of the granting of divorce by parliament.

At confederation the principle upon which we act was decided by the constitution; the principle upon which we act was reaffirmed a few months ago during this session, and that principle was accepted by the house. Every member of the house, by deciding that there would be no divorce court established for the province of Ontario, assumed the responsibility of sitting in his seat here as he would if he sat upon the bench as a judge. When a lawyer accepts a judicial office in Canada, he assumes the responsibilities that go with that office, and one of the responsibilities of that office is hearing petitions for divorce. Regardless of his religion, regardless of his convictions, he is bound to administer the law as it stands. That is the exact position of every member of the house. He has been elected by the electors of his constituency to come here and do his duty. One of the duties of the individual member is to act in a judicial capacity and in every case that comes before the house he is obliged to give his decision in accordance with the facts of the particular case, not in acordance with his belief upon a principle, because that principle has been established for us. During this session we attempted to rid ourselves of that particular principle, and we failed. I for one was quite willing that another body should deal with applications for divorce, but the house decided otherwise. Therefore it is my responsibility now to look into this case and into all other divorce cases, and to give my decision just as I would give it were I sitting upon the bench of the country. My obligation is just as strong as that of any judge, regardless of my personal convictions.

It only remains for us to consider whether the facts of this particular case merit the granting of a dissolution of marriage. I have read the evidence in this case and it is very simple. I do not think it would be out of place to cite the facts. The applicant was married in 1920 and she fell ill very shortly after her marriage. Her husband deserted her. He has lived for some years with another woman by whom he has had three children. The applicant has been forced to earn her living during these years and she is now applying for dissolution of marriage. The evidence is simple and clear and any court in the land would grant the divorce. Personally I do not know the parties in the case and I do not even know the lawyer. It happens that my name is there as the sponsor of the bill. I have looked into the facts of the case and I believe it is a meritorious one. I believe that we are bound to adjudicate upon it just as though we were sitting as a court of law.

Mr. ADSHEAD: From what the hon. member has said, is it not a question whether this lady ought not to be awarded alimony or some compensation for the conduct of her husband in deserting her when she was sick? This parliament has no power to do that.

Mr. CLARK: As far as the petition is concerned, I did not observe whether the wife is asking for alimony. In any case, as I understand it, she could not get it from this court, though she might from a provincial court. But that does not alter the situation. We are a court, and we are governed by the principles of law as they now exist. We are bound to administer the law as we find it. We cannot at this sitting make a new law. We are confronted with a situation, and we are bound in honour and conscience and in justice and in every other way to administer the law as we find it at this moment. We may, it is true, change the law. I have no objection to the law being changed, but as long as the law stands as it is we are bound to consider the merits of this particular case, and give our decision upon it, regardless of our religious faith or personal convictions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask my hon. friend as a lawyer whether he would expect any jury to decide upon a case in which they had not even heard the evidence?

Mr. CLARK: I do not think the question has any point. We are merely a confirming court. There is a committee which has heard the evidence and we are now, as I understand it, merely determining whether or not we will send this case to a committee of the house for further consideration. I will go this far and say that if a jury heard the evidence as the evidence is printed, I have no doubt in the world that any jury sitting in any part of this country would grant the divorce.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Clark) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: Moved by Mr. Clark, seconded by Mr. Hanson, that the said bill be referred to the select standing committee on private bills.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, at this stage I desire to oppose such a reference to the private bills committee. It does not seem to me that the principle has been clearly decided, and I have—

Mr. BENNETT: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was about to call attention to the fact that whereas we have heard a great deal about the high court of parliament, the vote after all would show to anyone who knew the position of this parliament, that it was not based on the evidence in the particular case—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member allow me. The principle of the bill was carried on the second reading. The present motion is that the bill be committed to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. Under standing order 50 it is provided:

> A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committees of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

And under the same rule the following appears:

> To "commit" a bill means to refer it to a committee, to be considered and reported.
>
> A bill may be committed either to a standing committee, a select committee, a committee of the whole house or a joint committee of the house and senate.

I would particularly direct the hon. member's attention to the next paragraph, 427:

> This motion is not debatable under standing order 38 unless it be an order of the day; but, upon the motion for the third reading of the bill, an amendment for the recommittal of the bill may be debated.

The motion now before the house is one of a purely formal character, following as a logical consequence from the adoption of the principle of the bill. I may observe to the hon. member that he will have many opportunities to discuss the present bill and even to propose thereto any amendment he sees fit when the bill is reported from the committee. Under the circumstances I must rule the motion not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

FRANCES GWENDOLYN SNOW LOTT

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton) moved the second reading of bill No. 91, for the relief of Frances Gwendolyn Snow Lott.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In the discussion of the last bill the mover, the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), was good enough to give us an outline of the evidence in the case. It seems to me that in the course of the debate we are now to have we ought to get from the hon. member for Carleton the main facts of the evidence in the case now before us. Only as we have such facts can we approach even to a semblance of doing things in a judicial manner. We have been told by those who represent the law to-day that we are a high court of parliament and as such, I take it, we ought not to act without sufficient evidence having been presented. In connection with the last bill we had some second-hand evidence as given out from the senate; we had no original evidence presented to us. However, we did have some statements made by the promoter of the bill, and I think at this stage we should at least have that much before us.

Then it was suggested that we were acting in the capacity of jurymen. I would say that when jurymen are present in a court they are required to be present at the time the decision is made, but half of our jurymen ran behind the curtains. So I am inclined to think it was a political rather than a judicial decision which was given. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to give a judicial decision on the bill before us all the members of the jury should remain in the room and vote on the merits of the case and on the evidence as it is presented by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Garland). Further than that, suggestions were made during the course of the debate which I think influenced the vote of some of the members of the house; some thought they should have the authority of some church for acting as they did.

Mr. DUNNING: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is not discussing the bill before the house but is discussing the manner in which members voted on a previous bill. I was one of those who remained here, so his remarks do not affect me, but if this sort of thing is to be continued I think the discussion should be kept strictly in order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am happy indeed that my remarks have not affected the

[Mr. Speaker.]

Minister of Railways, since he was in his place. I am referring, and I think I am quite in order, to the fact that it was stated that we dealt with these matters as a sort of jury, and I directed attention to the fact that a number of hon. members retired at the time the vote was taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the bill now before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In dealing with this matter, Mr. Speaker, I think we cannot come to any decision without involving the principle of divorce. Again and again hon. members have stated in this house that they are definitely opposed to granting any divorces; that means that they are definitely opposed to granting these divorces, and I submit that any bill coming before us involves the principle of divorce and that we have a right to speak on that principle.

In the discussion which took place certain members felt that it was against their conscientious beliefs to vote for any divorce bill; some felt that their church authorities were opposed to it, and to support that view certain authorities were quoted. One of the bodies mentioned was the Anglican church, but I hold in my hand a copy of a resolution which was sent not long ago to the Minister of Justice by the Toronto Anglican Diocesan Council for Social Service, and which is as follows:

> This council, being ever anxious to uphold the sanctify of marriage, and deploring the increase of divorce, is of opinion after careful consideration that, there being no extension of the existing ground of divorce, the establishment of a divorce court for Ontario (in lieu of the present divorce proceedings before parliament) dealing with the subject according to the recognized procedure of the courts and including the question of the custody of the children and provision of alimony for a deserving wife (and mother), would make for the better administration of the existing law of divorce.

That resolution clearly shows that one of the leading churches, which was quoted during this discussion, is not fundamentally opposed to the principle of divorce but would urge that provision be made, as some of us have suggested, for the custody of the children and for alimony.

Let me repeat what I said this afternoon: I am opposed to these particular bills as they come along simply because no provision whatever is made for the care and custody of children or for alimony for the wife. Later on, if these bills are returned to committee of the whole, I may propose certain amendments similar to those which I proposed last year, in order to provide for alimony. Those amendments may be turned down by this house, but on the other hand they will serve to direct the attention of the public at large to the gross injustice which we are perpetuating by this manner of dealing with these bills.

Mr. GEARY: Why provide for alimony?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Because I think it is cruel to grant a divorce to a woman while making no provision for her sustenance afterwards. Under present conditions she must take action in the civil courts, and I would take it that the general principle should be that the court granting the divorce should be the court which could grant alimony.

Mr. GEARY: I quite agree with the latter statement, that the same court should make provision for alimony if alimony is thought desirable, but the law in regard to alimony is that it does not necessarily follow separation in any form. Alimony is intended to put a wife into the same position of life she would have occupied if she had not married.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; that is one of the points I tried to bring out last year, that we have absolutely no way of ascertaining whether or not alimony should be granted.

Mr. CAHAN: You cannot have any means of ascertaining that so long as alimony is not claimed by the petitioner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know that, and the claim is not made simply because it has not been the practice. It is doubtful if we could grant such a claim, but if there were a regular court that could be done.

Mr. GEARY: The woman might be much better off without alimony.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly so, but in other cases she might be better off with it and those are the cases I have in view. I would like to make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that those of us who are opposing these bills are not in any way anxious to break down home life. I do not think that inference would be willingly placed upon our action by any hon. members who are opposed to divorce, but nevertheless again and again it has been put in that way. One would think that by proposing divorce or, as some of us did a while ago, suggesting the establishment of a divorce court, we are necessarily breaking down the homes of Canada. I believe that in many cases the present system is breaking down the sanctity of the home, and the present insistence on adultery as the sole ground for divorce is lowering our moral life. I have the testimony of such an eminent jurist as Lord Birkenhead, in his treatment of the whole question of divorce, in support of that latter statement. By concentrating attention on the physical act of adultery we lower the whole conception of marriage.

In addition to that, there is one province of Canada from which applications for divorce rarely come; that is the province of Quebec, and there are people from that province who seem to think that they are particularly virtuous because so few applications for divorce come from Quebec, while we are less virtuous who reside in other provinces where there are divorce courts or from which come many more applications for divorce. I do not believe that for one moment; I think in my own province of Manitoba we have a regard for the sanctity of the home as great as that held by the people who reside in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Does not my hon. friend realize that the citizens of Quebec believe in our Canadian courts and are bound by their judgments?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so, but that does not enter into the question at all. During the discussion the implication came from some quarters that we are less earnest in our desire to maintain the sanctity of the home because in other provinces we have divorce courts, and I state emphatically that I would resent any inference of that kind. If we are to discuss the purity of the home and the general morality of the population we must take into account general illegitimacy, which is very prevalent in some provinces which boast of their higher state of morality. I do not want to enter into any discussion as to the relative morality of the different provinces; I do not think that would get us anywhere, but I do resent the suggestion that merely because I live in a province which has divorce courts we in that province are less moral than the people who live in other provinces where there are no divorce courts. Further, I resent the suggestion that because there are more applications for divorce from the province of Ontario it necessarily follows that the people of Ontario are less moral than the people from the provinces from which fewer applications for divorce arise. I do not think that follows at all, and I do not think we should have these implications put upon the arguments of the members who are speaking on this question.

I yield to no one in my desire to maintain the sanctity of the home. I believe that marriage should be sacramental in character. Whether it be in a Catholic or Protestant community, or a community where the people do not adhere to any faith, marriage is sacramental in character where there is true affection between husband and wife. Certain particular religious beliefs should not be brought in to decide this great question of divorce. It is for this reason that some of us feel that divorce cases should be decided entirely aside from such political considerations as have obtained in the past and which were very largely responsible for the rejection of the bill to grant the province of Ontario a divorce court.

I merely reiterate my former position that I shall have to show my protest in what seems to be the only way open, by voting against this bill unless specific evidence is brought forward to show that it is desirable that such a bill should be passed. I would ask that the promoter of this bill, the hon. member for Carleton inform the house of the reasons for the granting of this particular divorce.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound) moved:

That the question be now put.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might explain to the house the effect of this motion. Standing order No. 55 reads as follows:

The previous question, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question, and shall be in the following words, "That this question be now put." If the previous question be resolved in the affirmative, the original question is to be put forthwith without any amendment or debate.

In other words, it is the parliamentary closure to reach a decision on the main motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Arthurs) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I can understand how many hon. members will feel impatient at having to discuss these things which hitherto have passed en bloc without any discussion at all; but I think on more mature consideration they may even thank the left wing in this section for bringing these matters to their attention, if for no other reason than for the dignity of the house itself. I cannot understand how we can allow these things to go on without making a protest. The bill now before the house is just a bill. Nobody knows anything about it. Nobody has risen to explain it. For all we know, it may be to hang this woman and this man. We do not know anything about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the motion that the question be now put, that is, the previous question, had carried, the house would immediately, without debate, have considered the main motion for the second reading of the bill in the name of the hon. member for Carleton. But the house has just decided that the question be not now put. Therefore the question is superseded and cannot be put now. It is superseded and it will come up another day so that we shall have to pass to another bill. This is from Bourinot, page 326:

If the previous question be carried, the Speaker will immediately put the question, without further debate. But if the previous question be resolved in the negative—

Which is the case here.

—then the Speaker cannot put the main motion which is consequently superseded, but which, however, may be revived on a future day as the negative of the previous question merely binds the Speaker not to put the main question at that time.

So I may console the hon. member for Carleton by informing him that he may come back another day and put the motion.

Main motion (Mr. Garland) stands.

EDWARD GEORGE CROUCHER

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound) (for Mr. Casselman) moved the second reading of Bill No. 92, for the relief of Edward George Croucher.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the sponsor present?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion can be moved by another member.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member explain it.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that case we will say: Stand.

Mr. ARTHURS: Many bills have been sponsored by members for other members who are absent, and no objection has been taken I would ask the Speaker to note the objection in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would allow the motion to be put, but the hon. member for Bonaventure is justified in saying that he has some questions to ask.

Motion stands.

ELSIE ALICE HERVEY

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of bill No. 93, for the relief of Elsie Alice Hervey.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I voted against the last motion before the house, and I intend to vote against all like motions when an attempt is made to force legislation through the house without discussion. The hon. member who introduced the bill, although invited by another hon. member to explain it, refused to do so. I am sorry that I do not know anything about the bill that is now before the house, owing to the fact that on Saturday morning only I received from the senate copies of the evidence in regard to some forty bills, and I have had no time to peruse them. I am certainly not going to vote for this bill until I know something about it. If the hon. member who is fathering this divorce bill will give an explanation which will in my opinion justify the motion for its second reading, I shall be glad to support it. But unless he can, I shall be obliged to vote against it for lack of knowledge, and also because I object to the principle of bringing these divorce bills before the house. This is not the proper quarter. I am not against the principle of divorce. Under certain circumstances I think divorce is the proper thing, and that in certain cases a couple is far better divorced than held together legally. At the same time so far as I personally am concerned, before I can agree to the passing of this bill, I want to know what are the reasons why this divorce should be granted.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Just before the sponsor of this bill rises, I would point out that this house by its vote decided that in three of the provinces of Canada divorce could only be obtained through the parliament of Canada, and regardless how any of us may have voted on that motion, the decision of the House of Commons is that there shall be no divorce court for Ontario, Quebec or Prince Edward Island at the present time.

Mr. CLARK: With regard to this bill—

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Is the hon. gentleman closing the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, if he speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. IRVINE: It seems strange, Mr. Speaker, that we do not have the explanation of the bill until the hon. gentleman promoting it closes the debate. Is it presupposed that if there is an argument against the passing of this bill we shall not be allowed to put it forward? This is indeed more strange than the procedure which we have hitherto followed.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Arthurs) has advanced as a reason why we should vote for this bill that the House of Commons has decided that for the present there shall be no other way of securing divorce except through the parliament of Canada, and therefore we must continue to grant it. If that be a good reason, then this house had better decide to investigate what it is granting, and if it will do that, I shall be partially satisfied at least. I think that any hon. member in whose name a bill stands ought to be in a position to tell the house what it is about. I am not clear whether the relief this woman wants is to hang the man or to put him in prison, or if it is a divorce that she is seeking, I do not know whether she should be freed from her present marriage and no explanation has been forthcoming so far.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to deal with these matters in a way that will be creditable to this house and do justice to the intelligence of hon. members, we shall have to find a better way than this. I hope that in the division on this bill, hon. gentlemen in this house, who are the judges of judges, sitting in the highest court of the land, will actually stay in and vote. If I were assured that the majority of the members of this house wished to accept the responsibility for granting these divorces, even wrongly, it would not be so bad as it is, but when those who wish to do these things stay out of the chamber when the vote is on and leave other members to take the responsibility, I do not like that way of doing things.

We on this side of the house have been charged to-day, and presumably we shall be charged also in connection with this bill, that we have been remiss in our duty as parliamentarians as we have confessed that we did not understand what the case was about. Hon. gentlemen have made that charge to-day. Now I want to put this to the thought of the house: If all the divorce applications now before this parliament are to be considered this year, approximately three hundred cases, what would my constituents say if I told them that instead of reading the Bank Act, the Railway Act, the budget and all the other important business that is to come before parliament, I had spent my time reading the evidence in three hundred divorce cases?

An hon. MEMBER: Dirty dog.

Mr. IRVINE: I think they would probably say that, and yet I am told by reputable hon. gentlemen opposite that unless I sit down and read the evidence in three hundred divorce cases I am remiss in my parliamentary duty. That one thing in itself is a sufficient reason why these bills should not be considered by this parliament and why this bill should be killed.

[Mr. Irvine.]

For fear that you should call me to order, Mr. Speaker, I must say that it appears that the only way in which we can get any constructive action with respect to this matter is to force a discussion on every one of these bills and get a proper explanation of them, and then when they get into the committee stage, to ask for an investigation. But we shall be told that the senate committee has already investigated these cases. Very well. But do we take the same attitude with respect to all other legislation? Legislation comes from the upper house after passing through their committees, and then when it gets into committee in the House of Commons the matter is again investigated if it is thought necessary. After we pass these motions with respect to divorce bills, it is true that the bills go to a committee, but the members of that committee simply go in there, say good morning, and go out again, and nobody asks any questions about these divorce bills and no consideration is given to them. I give credit to the senate divorce committee. I think the senate committee does its business well, and if we did our business in this regard as well as the senate committee we would not have to make such speeches as I am now making. As it is now, we are simply taking it for granted that the senate has done its duty and that we can afford to be remiss in ours. I hope that the hon. gentleman in whose name this bill stands will give a clear statement of the case to parliament, and if that involves the discussion of matters which should not be made public for moral reasons, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, in that case to clear the galleries and let us enter into this discussion and face the issue like men. If I am to judge of the merits of this case I insist upon hearing the evidence, and I hope that every other member will take the same stand.

Mr. GEORGE H. PETTIT (Welland): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this house sits in judgment upon these divorce cases in the capacity of a court of appeal, and unless some hon. member can convince this house that the judgment of the senate committee is contrary to the evidence, I submit that we should confirm the judgment of the senate committee. The law is there, and these petitioners for divorce have a right to come before the senate committee. They have gone there and have produced their evidence, and the senate committee have rendered their judgment, and this house, I submit, is bound to confirm that judgment unless it can be convinced that the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Just from the point of view of the dignity of this house and of the necessary requirement that its business be conducted with order and despatch, I desire to say a word or two.

I listened very carefully to the indictment of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who has just sat down, with respect to the manner in which the house should discharge its duty. If his argument means anything, it means that with respect to every individual matter which comes before this house each member should carefully study it and form his own individual judgment upon it. That I gather to be his argument and his reason for opposing the acceptance by this house of evidence taken in another chamber as a means for forming a judgment upon these cases. I would respectfully point out to him and to hon. members that part of the machinery of this parliament and of every parliament is committees, which are appointed for the very purpose of going into matters in greater detail and hearing evidence from people outside of this house which it would be impossible for us to hear in this house of commons chamber. We are going a little further in connection with divorce. Why? Because this house determined, rightly or wrongly, that there should not be other means of obtaining divorce in three of the provinces of Canada save through the parliament of Canada. For many years one chamber of this parliament, the senate, has been the court of inquiry with respect to divorce matters, and it has been the custom in this house to accept the evidence there given, the reason for that being partly the knowledge on the part of all members of the care with which the senate divorce committee goes into these matters,—partly that, I say, and partly also the fact that it would be inconvenient and cumbersome and equivalent to denying divorce altogether, even in necessitous cases, to have a similar inquiry with all the attendant expense to the applicant conducted also by this house in its turn. I submit to the judgment of hon. members that in accepting the evidence, which is printed and can be obtained by any member who cares to ask for it—

An hon. MEMBER: It is sent to all members.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not sure of that.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: But in any case the evidence is available, evidence taken by a body against which no one has cast any reflections; there is no question from any quarter that the senate committee either this year or in years past has not functioned laboriously and efficiently in dealing with the work assigned to it as a result of the method determined by this parliament for securing divorce.

I submit, sir, that this is not the time or the place to discuss whether or not we believe in divorce. This house determined on another occasion that there should be no method of securing divorce in three of the provinces other than by act of parliament. If hon. members desire that this chamber should set up duplicate machinery to that now existing in the senate, I submit that the proper place to argue that point is in the private bills committee to which these bills are referred. It is possible for any member to move in the private bills committee that witnesses be called the same as in connection with any other private bill. But I think such a proceeding would be absurd because of the care with which the matter has been dealt with in the other chamber.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this house is attaching proper importance to the work which we are here to do by spending what appears likely to be days, if not weeks, debating these matters, which after all are merely matters of procedure. It is quite within the discretion of this house to determine what procedure shall be adopted in inquiring into the bills referred to it by the senate, whether or not it shall set up duplicate machinery, as in relation to a number of other matters the senate sometimes does set up duplicate machinery when it is not able to accept the conclusions reached by this house. I submit the question is a very simple one. It is whether we should or should not set up duplicate machinery to hear again evidence which has already been adduced before the senate committee. There is no need to take up the time of this house with lengthy discussions on the principle of divorce, because already in so far as it relates to the setting up of divorce courts, this house has determined the question this session and said that the only means of securing a divorce is through the medium of the Senate and House of Commons assembled. That being the case, the decision is really whether we should or should not set up duplicate machinery.

Mr. IRVINE: Before the minister takes his seat may I ask him this question: Is it not so that we already have duplicate machinery in respect to all other legislation? That being so, why not in respect to this matter?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in respect to all other legislation. In connection with very much of the legislation the senate does not undertake an exhaustive inquiry to supplement that which has been undertaken by committees of this house. The record of the proceedings of the senate is sufficient evidence of that. My hon. friend will see I am careful not to state that the senate has not that power just as we have in this chamber in relation to anything submitted to us from the senate. I think, Mr. Speaker, we could shorten these discussions by agreeing, if possible, that the question is really one whether we shall or shall not set up duplicate machinery to deal with divorce.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) on having done what I consider it was the duty of the government to have done early this afternoon—declare its attitude upon this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will pardon me. I was speaking purely as a member of the house. This is not a government matter at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if my hon. friend realizes that the government has control of this house and is responsible for the conduct of the business. It is because of that fact that we on this side declined this afternoon to discuss what we conceived to be a great loss of time and a great injury to the dignity of parliament as a result of the discussions and votes that have engaged our attention. I think my friends to the left have failed, and I am sure my friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has failed, to appreciate just what this house is now being asked to do. It is being asked to give second reading to a bill, a private bill, for the purpose of divorcing two people. Antecedently to that motion being made in this house, a bill was introduced into the senate, a committee having taken evidence on a petition praying for divorce and having determined on that evidence that a case had been made out for the relief sought. It is hardly necessary for me to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is only one ground upon which this parliament acts in granting divorce, that ground being unfaithfulness on the part of one or other of the spouses; and when the evidence was heard it established to the satisfaction of the senate committee the guilt of the offending party. On the bill coming into this house, as the Minister of Railways has said, if we give it second reading it is referred to the committee on private bills—a committee of which my friend the member for Wetaskiwin is a member, and I think my friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer).

Mr. SPENCER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend is not a member?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he is.

Mr. BENNETT: The course pursued before the private bills committee is very simple. The committee can do one of two things: they can call witnesses, hear evidence and determine the action to be taken; or they can do what the probate division does in England, take the depositions already made under oath, read them and determine whether or not the bill shall be accepted.

Now, I wonder if my friend from Wetaskiwin realizes that this parliament consists of two houses, the senate and the commons. A divorce bill is not an act of parliament until it has been approved by both houses. The commons, giving the bill its second reading and referring it to a committee, the committee takes the sworn depositions that were made before the senate committee, and upon reading those depositions it dispenses with the calling of the witnesses. The probate division in England in a very important case involving a question of very serious consequences to the parties engaged, one of whom lived in Alberta, recently took evidence by affidavit and heard it before Lord Merrivale, president of the court, rather than take the witnesses across the Atlantic ocean to testify. And this house in sending a divorce bill to a committee does not ask that committee to deal with it in any particular way; it leaves it open for the committee to take its own course. For instance, if the member for Wetaskiwin so desires, he may say: We will put these people to all the expense and trouble of calling witnesses before our committee. Or committee may proceed as the British courts of justice have proceeded for many years in admiralty cases, in divorce cases, and in cases in the chancery and king's bench divisions, read, if it is thought desirable, evidence already taken before a committee of another house under oath—upon which perjury might be charged—for the purpose of satisfying itself—the committee——that the case alleged against the defendant has been made out. Now, is it possible that this House of Commons desires so to hold up to the world—shall I say?—our inability to grapple with a simple problem by making it appear, as my friend from Winnipeg North

Centre has done this afternoon, that there is a great principle involved, when the house has already decided to establish no divorce courts in the other provinces? I wonder if my friends realize, first, that this is the only court to which they can go; secondly, that that court consists of two branches of our parliament; thirdly, that one branch of that parliament, through a committee, determines for or against the relief that is asked; and lastly that this house is now merely sending a bill to a committee, which committee may itself determine whether it will utilize the evidence that was given before the senate committee or hear the evidence on its own behalf. And then the bill comes back to the committee of the whole house, which treats it as any other legislation is treated, whether it be legislation relating to patents, to the incorporation of a railway company, or any other question. And that is the reason that the senate committee reduces the evidence to writing, because otherwise there would be no record of it; they might be satisfied with the evidence but there would be nothing in writing upon which to proceed. For that reason they reduce the evidence to writing, submitting it to this house in printed form in order that our committee, following a long established practice extending over twenty-five, thirty, forty and fifty years, may have the evidence before it. It was the same in England. I wonder if my hon. friends realize that before the act of 1857 all divorces considered in Great Britain from any part of the British Isles—from Ireland, from Scotland, from England itself—were by way of private bill which was first heard by a committee of the House of Lords. It was from that practice that we adopted our procedure in this country, of having the evidence heard in a committee of the senate in the first place. That committee of the House of Lords heard the evidence and the appropriate committee in the commons could do what they pleased with it; they could consider the evidence as presented to them, if it were printed, or could themselves hear the witnesses, have the evidence taken down, and arrive at their own conclusion.

I do submit that the observations of the Minister of Railways with respect to the dignity—and shall I say the usefulness—of this parliament were very relevant and most pertinent. Many hon. gentlemen in this house, on conscientious grounds, not believing in divorce and desiring, as they always have desired in days gone by, to maintain their opposition, allow the passage of these bills with the qualification, "carried on division," thereby indicating that they do not become a party to the action of this house in granting any divorce; and I am satisfied that these hon. gentlemen have no wish to see the institutions of this country waste time, involving thousands of dollars, in dealing with a question which after all, if it is carefully analyzed, will be seen to be a problem in respect to which we are following not only practice and custom but a rule which, I think it will be admitted, common sense dictates—namely, that where evidence is given under oath before a committee of the senate it is desirable that we dispense, so far as this house is concerned, with the calling of witnesses and the duplicating of evidence received under cross-examination in another branch of parliament.

There is another phase of the question which I desire to put to the house in all seriousness. This is the only court through which relief can be obtained; and as suggested to me this afternoon by my legal friend from Toronto, an English court has no option but to decide. When the witnesses have been heard, the judge upon the bench must decide the case submitted to him; and a committee of this parliament having been convened in due form, and having before it these cases to deal with, must consider and dispose of them. The paltry excuses which have been put forward against dealing with the matter might be worthy of a debating class in a small academy, but they are unworthy of the parliament of Canada, and to that extent I agree with what has been said by the Minister of Railways. Indeed, I have been waiting all afternoon and evening for some hon. member representing the government to discuss the subject; for the government must assume responsibility for the conduct of public business in this parliament. I therefore congratulate the minister upon what he has said and upon the stand he has taken, and I trust that hon. gentlemen who have used these methods, from a conscientious desire to hold up to the country the lack of facilities which they say are afforded people to obtain divorces to which they are entitled, will now realize that, this house having deprived such people of these facilities by its deliberate action in declining to create a court, and there being no other method by which redress may be obtained, it is therefore important that a reasonable course be pursued such as will enable that redress to be given without further delay on the part of parliament.

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I think there is a good deal in what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has said as well as in the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett); but I do not know that they have said it all. I had a rather unique honour thrust upon me a few days ago when I was selected, as one of the members of the private bills committee, to be a representative of that committee, with the pleasure of attending the committee in the senate to hear these divorce cases. There used to be but one committee in the senate, and apparently it could handle all cases that came before it. Now business has grown so great over there that the senate has felt it necessary to have three committees on divorce. And we used to have two representatives from the private bills committee whose duty it was to hear such cases; now we have six. I assume the object was to have on each of the three committees in the senate two representatives from the commons committee.

I confess that up to the present time I have not had the time to go to the senate to hear these investigations in respect to this very important matter. In the province of Saskatchewan, from which I have the honour to come, we have a divorce court, and on many occasions my constituents have consulted me with regard to this question, asking me why it was necessary for us to spend our time—or, as they put it, waste our time—hearing divorce cases from one or two provinces in Canada. My constituents feel that I am wasting time when I listen to this sort of thing. I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that there is waste of time; but in my judgment we are wasting time when we proceed in this particular way. This is a matter of great importance and I should like to see every case dealt with fairly and squarely on its merits and a proper decision arrived at. When we dissolve a marriage we dispose of but one phase of the whole question. I have some interest in the women—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon):—whose marriage ties are dissolved. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. Apparently they have no interest in women; I am different. Let me go one step further and invite them to laugh at this: I have an interest in the children of every marriage which is dissolved. Now I understand that the senate committee has no power, no right, either to deal with alimony for the unfortunate woman or to make a disposition with regard to the children. With all the good intentions in the world, I am bound to say I have not the time seriously to attend the divorce committee in the senate, nor even to report to the private bills committee of the House of Commons. There is not an hon. member who does not know that this is not possible. Every hon. member in this house spends, I believe, from twelve to fifteen hours every day around these buildings during the time this house is in session; and if I attended to the duty which has been thrust upon me and were present at all these meetings of the senate committee on divorce I should be unable to attend to the business for which I was really sent to this house.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not resign in favour of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke)?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Perhaps the hon. member would like to take the position I now have on the divorce committee. I would resign in favour of the hon. member, and I am sure he would do as badly as I do by force of circumstance. At least I will do this much: whenever I have a little spare time and the senate committee meets for the consideration of divorce cases I will spend that time over there and do what I can. At the same time I am opposed to the method we are adopting; I do not think it is a good practice. But I know of no other way of bringing to the attention of the country the fact that this House of Commons is not doing full justice to the question in failing to place within the grasp of certain provinces—and I agree with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that we have not done as we should in this respect—the opportunity of establishing for themselves divorce courts if they so desire. If Ontario and Quebec say that they do not desire divorce courts, at least this house, if this were done, would have gone to the extent of placing them in a position to take advantage of this course as they might see fit. I have given this matter some attention and I think I can stand in this house and say conscientiously and honestly that in the courts of the province of Saskatchewan much more attention is given to these questions than possibly can be given by any committee of this house or of the senate. We are charged by some people with obstructing these bills; some of them get rather warm under the collar because of our actions, but no man can charge any one of us with being less sincere in this matter than he is himself. We are not taking this stand with the idea of obstruction; we are simply drawing to the attention of this country the fact that the present practice is not the proper manner in which marriages should be dissolved, which in my judgment is a very serious business.

While it is not proper for me as a member of this house to review the action taken in connection with another bill or another motion which came before the house, perhaps I may be permitted to say that members on all sides should seriously consider this whole question if ever it comes before the house again. If it seems better to grant divorce courts to those provinces which do not now have them we should seriously consider that situation, and then we would not be confronted with the situation with which we have been faced this afternoon and this evening. Personally I regret on this or on any other occasion to appear to be delaying the business of this chamber; I have not spent much time talking in this house and I do not propose on any occasion to waste time. However, I do not think we have been wasting time this afternoon or this evening; we are simply using this method of directing the attention of the house to a very undesirable state of affairs in certain provinces of Canada, and I want to place myself on record with regard to the action I have taken.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (Toronto-High Park): Mr. Speaker, last year a situation similar to that with which we have been faced to-day arose in connection with a petition for divorce of which I was the sponsor. That was an attempt on the part of those interested to use obstruction in order to force the hands of the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the use of the word "obstruction" is not permitted.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I was merely referring to what happened last year and is happening again this year. Obstruction was resorted to last year in an attempt to force the government to establish such a court as has been suggested, and that is what is being done now. Personally I voted for the establishment of such a court in Ontario, and I would like to see that action taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is charging obstruction, and the use of that word is not permitted.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I will withdraw the word; this may be a constructive action on their part, since they want to improve the conditions of affairs, and I think it would be an improvement if this court were established.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has made himself quite clear; he does not object to these divorce bills being advanced but he would like to see a divorce court established in Ontario. It has been clearly shown to-night and at other times when this subject has been discussed that the province of Ontario has no court to come to other than the parliament of Canada, and that is a discrimination against the province of Ontario. Some time ago there was a vote on the establishment of divorce courts in Ontario; ninety-nine hon. members voted against such action and sixty-nine voted in favour of it. There was a division among the members who come from Ontario, but another vote took place to-day in which seventy-seven hon. members voted for the advancement of a divorce bill, and there was no division among the Ontario members. So I think the members representing Ontario have shown that this province is desirous of having such a court; that is a reasonable conclusion. But, Mr. Speaker, when I look at the ninety-nine votes cast against the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario I am rather sorry to find that forty-two of those votes were cast by members from the province of Quebec, while not one hon. member from Quebec voted in favour of that measure. I am sure the Quebec members do not wish to be unfair. Ontario has no divorce court and therefore is not on a par with the other provinces of Canada, so it is only fair that Quebec should lend its support to the establishment of these courts. In doing so members from Quebec would not be taking any action which might shake their convictions as to the principle of divorce, because the question of divorce in Quebec is also a local matter. Under our constitution divorce is permissible, and it will remain so until our constitution is amended; such an amendment, which would be a very serious matter, cannot be made except by a bill of this house approved by the various provinces of Canada, since the constitution is founded upon the agreement which was arrived at between the original provinces.

All this would seem to lead to the conclusion that we will continue to have divorce in this country. We have divorce courts in six provinces, and divorce is permissible in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island upon application to this parliament. Some hon. members have stated that they are entirely opposed to the granting of divorces, and the only way to get over that objection is to amend the constitution. It is quite unfair to bring in that argument on these individual applications; the constitution cannot be amended in that way. The constitution is here; it clearly defines our jurisdiction; it is clearly shown and well understood that divorce is here and will be granted no matter what we may do in this house. If divorces cannot be secured properly they will be granted in some roundabout way. Why should we force the people of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island to go to the United States or some other place in order to obtain a divorce? I submit that it is very improper for us to force them to take this action by refusing to give Ontario divorce courts and by refusing to grant divorces here at Ottawa.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask a question? Has the legislature of Ontario, the legislature of Quebec or the legislature of Prince Edward Island ever petitioned to obtain these divorce courts?

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I am very glad my hon. friend has brought up that point. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), with whose views I am not always in accord but with whom I agree on this point, stated in his address that the bill providing for the establishing of divorce courts in Ontario should have been amended in order to make it optional with the province of Ontario as to whether or not they should accept those courts. If the province of Ontario has not asked specifically for the establishment of that court, this parliament can create it anyway; we can appoint the judge and it is up to the province to provide the court house and the other officials. The greatest expense is the salary of the judge, which is paid by the Dominion government, and if this jurisdiction is given the supreme court judges there will be no extra expense. Other legislation has been imposed upon the province of Ontario and other provinces without their consent; as examples we have old age pensions and rural credits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): Ontario is contributing to the cost of the rural credit scheme and it has not accepted the principle. If a divorce court is good for the whole Dominion why would it not be good for one, two or three provinces? I am satisfied that Ontario will not refuse the court if we create it. The cost to the province will be so small that they can readily fall into line. If the Dominion government is prepared to pay the salary of the justice who will administer the divorce law, I am quite sure the province will provide the court houses and pay the salaries of the minor officers.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is discussing a matter which has been determined already by the house.

Mr. STEVENS: We have been out of order all day.

[Mr. A. J. Anderson.]

Mr. SPEAKER: We are discussing one particular bill of a long list of private bills. The members who discuss this bill are supposed to be familiar with the particulars of it, and they should confine their remarks to the bill. However, as I remarked this afternoon, it is a moot question as to how to distinguish between the general principle of divorce and the particular bill for the granting of a divorce which is now before the house. I would ask hon. gentlemen to confine their remarks as nearly as possible to the present bill.

Mr. ANDERSON (High Park): I accept Your Honour's ruling although I think there is great justification for my dwelling upon the features of this question. There is no doubt that the action which has been taken with regard to this bill is brought about by the action taken by the house on a former occasion. There is no doubt that the senate committee have arrived at a proper conclusion with regard to this bill. The argument put forth that there is not time to peruse the evidence in connection with these cases is an absolute fallacy, because in most of these cases the evidence is very short. The average case could be read over in about fifteen minutes; for I do not think it takes over twenty-five minutes for the senate committee to hear every word uttered by the members of that committee, the counsel and the witnesses connected with the average case. Copies of evidence are sent to every member of the house, and they can read them if they so desire. I had not seen this particular application until this evening, but I got it from my file and read it in a few minutes while sitting here in the house. There is no doubt that this divorce should be granted. These people are put to very great expense, many of them coming from outside of the country; they are taking the law as they find it and as it is administered, and why should we take the position of preventing them from obtaining their divorces?

I am in sympathy with those who are opposing this bill, because I believe their motive is the establishment of a divorce court in Ontario. At the same time, I think the same result could be obtained by proceeding along a different line, and I believe if the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) were accepted it would overcome all our difficulties. I do not desire to say that the hon. member has been using obstructive methods, because that is unparliamentary language, and I believe he desires to bring about a result which would be beneficial to the people. I might refer to another matter which was obstructed last year, and the principle was accepted this year and went through the house without any objection.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has convinced me that I should uphold this corner of the house in opposing the passing of these divorce bills. He said that there was no other court to which these people could apply, but that court is only half a court.

Mr. BENNETT: The court I mentioned was the high court of parliament consisting of both houses.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is only half a court because it cannot grant what a proper divorce court could grant. This court of parliament can only grant divorces; it cannot grant alimony or give justice and equity.

Mr. BENNETT: I would point out to the hon. member that such relief has been asked for, only in one instance, and parliament dealt with that case.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is not asked for because it is not within the power of this parliament to grant it, owing to the fact it interferes with provincial matters. That question has never come up.

Mr. BENNETT: It has come up.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Only in one instance, and that was occasioned by an oversight. The hon. member said that there was no other court to which they could apply, and because this court is only half a court and cannot give equity and justice, there is one of two things which we should do. We should grant the divorce court of parliament power to enable them to allow alimony and deal with these people on a basis of justice and equity. If we cannot do that, we should send these people to a court where they can get full justice. As things exist at the present time, when they go through this court they are forced to apply to the civil courts in Ontario to obtain alimony. As the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) said, this is the only method we can employ to draw the attention of the public and of this parliament to the necessity of doing one of the two things I mentioned.

As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, it is quite true that it would take only about fifteen minutes for a member to read this evidence. There are about 300 cases, and 300 times fifteen minutes equals seventy-five hours. I for one am not going to spend seventy-five hours in reading this evidence. I went up to my room to-night with the idea of obtaining some information with regard to these bills, and I spent five or ten minutes trying to find the particular bill. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has said, my constituents do not send me to parliament to spend seventy-five hours of my time in reading divorce evidence. I do not like obstructive tactics, but I see no other way by which the attention of the house and of the country can be drawn to the fact that we should either reform our present methods or provide a separate court to pass upon these applications for divorce.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I sometimes find great difficulty in understanding how men reach certain conclusions, and the speech which has been delivered by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) is an excellent illustration of that difficulty. When the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) spoke, following as he did the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), I felt that he had made such a conclusive and absolutely clear statement that the opposition from the corner of the house would have seen the light. But it would seem that while the speeches made by the two hon. members I have mentioned made one impression upon my mind, they made an entirely different impression upon the mind of the hon. member for East Calgary. The house is to be congratulated that the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Railways stated the matter as clearly as they did. I felt very keenly this afternoon that the actions of the house were not in harmony with the best traditions of parliament, or consonant with the dignity of the house.

Mr. SPENCER: Was the hon. member in the house when the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) was speaking?

Mr. BROWN: I was. Since the hon. member for Battle River has asked how I regard the speech of the hon. member for Saskatoon, I may say that I agree with him up to a certain point, just as I said, when I spoke first this afternoon, that I agreed with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) up to a certain point. We may candidly admit that they did a service in bringing to the attention of the house the absolutely absurd situation that exists in parliament with regard to the question of divorce, but I cannot follow them to the extreme to which they have gone. They having made their protest, I think, we should proceed to deal with the business of the house in somewhat the same manner as we have been accustomed to dealing with it in the past and not change the rules of the game after the game has started.

There was one point I wanted to mention this afternoon but to which I omitted any reference, that is, the obligation of this house toward the people who have brought these bills before parliament. That is something we should consider very seriously. These are private bills. Any private individual in Canada has a right to come to parliament and ask for any legislation he sees fit. It rests with parliament to decide the merits of the case and to determine whether or not the legislation sought shall be granted. A large number of people, how many I do not yet know, have come to parliament in all good faith, and they have a right to assume that parliament will deal with these matters in somewhat the same way as we have dealt with them in the past. The question of establishing a divorce court in Ontario has been injected into this debate. Unfortunately hon. members in that corner of the house, the hon. member for Saskatoon and one or two more, assume that that question is an issue before the house. It is not, and it cannot be made an issue before the house at this session if I understand parliamentary procedure aright, because the house has already decided it. It may be made an issue next session, and from the discussion that has taken place this afternoon I am quite sure that the question will be before the house next session when I fully anticipate that a different decision will be reached. But I should like to remind those hon. members that it is not and cannot be made an issue before us at the present time. We can take whatever position we please on these particular bills, but if I am correct in my interpretation, we cannot establish that court this session. Perhaps better parliamentary authorities than I am will confirm or question my statement as they see fit. That, however, is my understanding of the situation. We have to deal with the facts as we find them and the fact is that a large number of people in all good faith have come before parliament and sought relief, as it is called, from the particular disabilities under which they labour. Hon. members assume that they have a right to vote against these bills because they have not the evidence before them. I take the other ground. As I stated this afternoon, evidence has been given before a committee of another house, and I take the position that unless it can be clearly shown, or unless there is some reason to believe, that a proper decision has not been rendered, we have a right to accept the judgment of that committee.

[Mr. Brown.]

On two or three occasions since I have been in the house and also a member of the private bills committee, there have come before that committee cases where there was some disagreement with the judgment rendered by the senate committee. Those questions were dealt with on their merits. It might be that the judgment of the senate committee was upheld, or the reverse. That is the course open to us now. Let us remember that this is a private bill. The principle was laid down two years ago, when we discussed the Georgian bay canal bill, that the second reading of a private bill was always granted unless there was opposition to the principle of the bill. That is a statement which is in harmony with the best parliamentary authorities. Hon. members opposing these particular bills are not opposed to the principle of the bill, that is, the principle of divorce. It is true that some members are. My controversy at the moment is not with them, but rather with those who are following the leadership of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The principle of the bill is not questioned by them. Therefore, in the very nature of the case these bills should receive their second reading and should go to the private bills committee where, if there is any particular bill to which any hon. member objects or if he thinks in regard to any particular bill the senate committee has not rendered the best judgment according to the evidence, he can bring the matter up and have it dealt with. Otherwise I think we are warranted in accepting the position that the senate committee in making its recommendation has dealt fairly, justly, and according to the evidence.

I want to fall back again upon my other statement. A number of people have come before parliament in good faith, feeling they have a right to expect we will deal with them in much the same way as we have dealt with others in the past. It is quite evident that the course that is proposed by certain hon. members is to institute a blockade by which these people will be deprived of their rights or of the relief which they have a right to expect.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Lisgar has suggested certain motives on our part, namely, that we are trying to create a blockade in order to prevent the passage of these bills. I object decidedly to that. That is not my purpose, and I do not think it is right that an hon. member should impute motives of that kind to another hon. member. I ask that the expression be withdrawn.

Mr. BROWN: I am not charging the hon. member with instituting a blockade, but I am stating what the inevitable result of this particular course of conduct will be, if they insist on calling a vote and discussing every one of these bills as he has indicated he intends doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: The expressions "blockade" and "obstruction" are not parliamentary, and whatever may be the result of opposition, as long as the opposition is legitimate it cannot be qualified as a blockade or obstruction.

Mr. BROWN: I certainly do not wish to use any terms that are unparliamentary, but I am pointing out that that is the inevitable result of the course outlined by these hon. members.

Mr. IRVINE: Withdraw.

Mr. BROWN: I have withdrawn to the best of my ability. I say that I do not wish to use an unparliamentary term, and if the term "deliberate blockade" is unparliamentary, I withdraw it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They are very sensitive when we tell them the truth.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, they do not like the truth.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like the hon. member not to charge other hon. members as not liking the truth. If they do not like the truth, what do they like?

Mr. BROWN: I withdraw that. They do not always like to have the clear consequences of their conduct pointed out to them.

Mr. STEVENS: They prefer darkness to light.

Mr. BROWN: The inevitable result of the course outlined by themselves will be that many of these bills cannot be passed through this house, because it is physically impossible for us to deal with so many in such a manner. We cannot take a vote on every one of them on the second reading, then have them go to the private bills committee and be discussed there and come back to the house for their third reading. As I say, the inevitable result will be that they cannot be passed through the house, and consequently the people who have come here in good faith, incurred the expense involved in the house and in connection with lawyers' fees, which in most cases are by no means small, will be treated in a manner that is grossly unfair. Unless there is reason to believe that the evidence taken before the senate committee is faulty, I think we are quite justified in accepting it and granting these people relief.

These are the reasons why I shall give my support to the passage of these divorce bills through the house. While I would strongly support, and did when the other bill was before the house, the establishment of a divorce court to deal with these cases—undoubtedly a court could deal with them better, could go into the question of alimony, for instance —we cannot get these courts at this time, and therefore I say let us, in a manner becoming to the dignity of this honourable house, deal with the situation that confronts us.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the argument of the hon. member that if we consider these bills properly they will not get through this session, and therefore we should put them through without proper consideration?

Mr. BROWN: That is not my argument. From the very beginning I have said that these cases are dealt with properly before the senate committee, where the evidence is taken, and if any hon. member feels that in any particular case the judgment of the senate committee is not in harmony with the evidence, he can bring that case before the private bills committee, and it will be dealt with there.

Mr. IRVINE: Have I to spend seventy-five hours going into the details of all these cases?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) does me rather an unmerited honour when he suggests—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member not already spoken on this bill?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, your honour. I think I have a right to speak on this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And on all the others.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And on all the others.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And he probably will.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I was saying, the hon. member for Lisgar has done me a somewhat unmerited honour in suggesting that the members of the house who have spoken against this method of granting divorces are following the leadership of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am only an individual member, but I venture to suggest that others who have spoken along the same lines, have done so simply because the merits of the case appeal to them—for that and for no other reason.

The hon. member for Lisgar suggests that bills should be dealt with this year in the same way that they have been dealt with in previous years. I am at a loss to know why he should make a statement of that kind. I can think of the Sun Life bill and the Bell Telephone bill which during the past two or three years were dealt with in a very, very different way from that in which bills of that kind were dealt with for a great many years in this house. I can think of railway bills which during the last two or three years have been dealt with in a very different way from the way in which they were dealt with for many years in this house when we were so lavish in granting railway charters. So there have been changes, and I think we are quite within our rights in insisting that these divorce bills should receive fair attention.

Mr. BROWN: These bills were not before the house last year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Other bills of this character were. The hon. member for Lisgar says that people have come here in good faith. That may be so. But so have members of parliament. They have come here, and they have certain responsibilities. The hon. member for Lisgar corrected his first statement by saying that if we asked for a vote on all these bills the inevitable result would be that the bills could not pass this house.

Mr. BROWN: I did not say that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made a note of his remark at the time, and I think I am correct. I understood him to say that the inevitable result would be that if we discussed each of these bills, then the bulk of the bills could not be passed. Is not that correct?

Mr. BROWN: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No statement could better bear out my contention than that, that if we go into a discussion of these bills and hear the evidence, if we actually try to consider each bill on its merits, it will be simply impossible for these three hundred bills to pass this house.

Mr. STEVENS: Will not the hon. member admit that precisely the same thing applies to legislation of a different character, leaving these bills out of consideration—that if we treated other legislation in the way he wishes these bills to be treated, we could not pass one-tenth of the legislation that comes before parliament?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not admit that at all. I think with every other class of legislation we insist that the mover or promoter tell the house in at least a few words the purpose of the legislation and indicate the main points at issue, and the Speaker in connection with every other piece of legislation reads the bill from the chair. But as the Speaker knows perfectly well in the last few years it has become the practice in many cases, with the consent of the house, that the Speaker simply calls the divorce bills by number, without even calling the title of the bill; and he has gone further even than that, because bills have been called in batches and passed in bulk, from one to forty at a time. The forty-five divorce bills now before the house were given their first reading in that way. I would submit to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that no other class of legislation is dealt with in that way.

Mr. STEVENS: We dealt with all the national railway bills, involving an expenditure of over fifty million dollars, in exactly the same way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The national railway bills, if I remember correctly, first came before the house by way of resolution, and later the bills go before a special committee, where they are very carefully considered.

Mr. DUNNING: No, my hon. friend is wrong. They go before one of the standing committees of this house, exactly as these divorce bills do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, not exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly. The railway bills go before the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and the divorce bills go before the select standing committee on private bills. That is the only difference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I venture to suggest that there is a still more fundamental difference. The railway bills are government bills, and the government stakes its very existence upon them.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And these railway bills are very carefully considered first by the experts of the railway, and they are supposed to be very carefully considered also by the railway department before they come before the house.

Mr. DUNNING: And they are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear it; but that is the difference between the railway bills mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and these divorce bills.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is surely begging the question. He knows that the same difference exists between any government measure, on the one hand, and any private bill, on the other. That is not meeting the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The instance given by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was the railway bills, and in answer to that I am pointing out that there is a great difference between the way the two classes of legislation are considered.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was citing the fact that we passed certain bills by number, en bloc, and I intimated that we followed precisely the same procedure with regard to the railway bills involving an expenditure of $54,000,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Those bills had all been considered before. I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will admit that.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They had been considered by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And these divorce bills have been considered by the senate.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who in order to determine how he should vote on the second reading of this bill has no doubt studied the evidence in the case very carefully, to be good enough to state in what particulars he considers the evidence weak. He is not speaking about the bill at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Frontenac was present this afternoon, but I do not think it is necessary to review all I said on that occasion. However, I then stated that one of my reasons for opposing the second reading was that I knew nothing whatever regarding the evidence, and that therefore I did not think I was called upon to give my vote in favour of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Why did not the hon. member read the evidence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why did I not read the evidence? It has already been pointed out that if a member conscientiously read the evidence in these divorce cases, even putting it at the figure stated by my friend from Toronto-High Park (Mr. Anderson), and if only fifteen minutes were devoted to each case—I submit that that is altogether too short a time for me to decide whether a man should be separated from his wife, or a wife from her husband, this being a rather momentous question—if fifteen minutes were devoted to reading the evidence in each case—and I do not know that I could do so in that time—with three hundred cases to deal with it would take something like seventy-five days;—

Mr. DUNNING: Hours.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Seventy-five hours; and at three hours a day it would mean twenty-five days. Now, I do not think any member should be called upon to spend three hours a day for twenty-five days in considering these Ontario divorce bills.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): He could have read quite a number of them in the time he has spent to-day saying nothing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be the opinion of the hon. member for Frontenac, but I do not consider I am talking about nothing; I am talking about matters of very great interest to many people in this country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman himself said he was talking about nothing when he acknowledged that he did not know anything about the case, that he had not studied the evidence at all. I am simply using his own words. He admits it himself. I suggest that he go out and read the evidence,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): —and then come back and talk of what he knows something about.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Frontenac is somewhat facetious. It is very easy for him to give gratuitous advice. I have the evidence—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member does not want to make use of it does he?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If the hon. gentleman wants it all to himself, the rest of us will keep quiet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hesitate to read the evidence in this case, Mr. Speaker, with the galleries crowded as they are. In fact I think the house would not tolerate the reading of it.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask the hon. member why he could not have read that evidence during the last vote? I read it and had plenty of time to do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member may be a faster reader than I am. As a matter of fact I have been trying to follow the speeches, and if my friends will give me a chance I propose to deal with some of the remarks that have been made.

Mr. CLARK: No speeches were made during the vote.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have been accused of holding up the house. I do not think that is a fair accusation.

Mr. BROWN: It was withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear it. Nevertheless it was made. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before taking action on these bills we should be given a brief explanation of each individual case, and that we be accorded the right of voting on each case yes or no. I do not think that is too much to ask. More time has been spent in discussing a few dollars for a post office estimate than we have yet spent in discussing this great principle of divorce; and the hon. member for Frontenac has been one of the sinners in that regard. I have never yet discussed a post office estimate, so perhaps I may be pardoned if I take my innings in discussing a matter of this kind.

The hon. leader of the opposition referred to the work done in the private bills committee, and he drew a very fine picture of its proceedings. He said that actually it did the work that is done in courts of justice. Well, as I have sat on that committee for some years, I hope that courts of justice carry on their work more effectively than I have seen the private bills committee function. Any man who has been a member of that committee knows perfectly well that we deal with divorce bills there as we deal with them here—in a most perfunctory way, simply taking them by numbers and adopting them en bloc. As a matter of fact there is absolutely no safeguard or check in the way in which the ordinary divorce bill is there dealt with. So that a great deal of what the hon. leader of the opposition said, however fine it sounded, really did not amount to a great deal. He was very impressive, as was the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), with regard to maintaining the dignity of the house. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive of anything less dignified than the manner of passing these bills—forty-five of them given first reading Friday after being called by number and dealt with en bloc. Do you call that maintaining the dignity of the house? When a resolution was introduced this evening, supported I think by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), that would prevent discussion of a divorce bill—I refer to the "previous question"—I wonder if that was maintaining the dignity of the house. All we are asking is that the promoters of these bills give an outline of their measures.

The Minister of Railways said it was merely a matter of procedure. On the other hand, the leader of the opposition spoke in very high-sounding terms of the parliament of Canada being a high court. In one sense it may be a court, but primarily it is a legislative body, and I do not see that we have any right to transform ourselves into an ordinary court of this character. But there is a very great discrepancy between this being a mere matter of procedure, the bills to be passed over as rapidly as their numbers can be read, and the picture drawn by the leader of the opposition that we sit here, the highest court of the land, giving judicial consideration to these bills as one by one they are presented to the house.

The leader of the opposition also referred to the practice of Great Britain before 1857. Well, that is characteristic. Does he really mean that we should continue what was the practice in Great Britain in 1857? Great Britain, conservative old country that it is, has nevertheless moved forward a great deal since 1857. Some of us would like at least to keep in sight of Great Britain. Some of us are afraid that if we even suggested doing the things they are doing in Great Britain we would be called radicals and bolsheviks. But the leader of the opposition tells us we ought to continue to follow the British practice of 1857.

Mr. STEVENS: He did not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: In fairness to the leader of the opposition, I would point out that he did not say that at all, nor did he seek to convey that impression. He is not in the house now or I would not interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to be unfair to the leader of the opposition, but at least he did tell us of the practice in Great Britain in 1857, and he proceeded to say that in our practice we were simply following that practice as it obtained in 1857. My inference was that he expected us to be satisfied with that procedure. If he did not mean that I do not know why he took the trouble to go back to 1857. There would be no point to his remarks.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is the hon. member's great trouble, he gets his wires crossed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to see the leader of the opposition has come in. If I have made any statement that is not correct I shall be glad to have his correction.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the hon. gentleman is good enough to offer me the opportunity, I desire to point out that I made no such observation except to say that this was a high court in this matter, as the parliament of England had been, and that divorce applications, before 1857, did originate in and were heard by a committee of the House of Lords, as they have been here. I pointed out that this parliament had been asked and had refused to take the forward step of creating a court such as the hon. gentleman would support, and therefore we were thrown back upon the practice which existed prior to 1857. I am sure that the hon. gentleman, in his love of dialectics, will try to be more fair as to what was said than to make such observations as he has made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad the leader of the opposition came in to make that statement again. But may I emphasize this: We ought not to go back to 1857 for our procedure. It is high time we were passing on to the reforms that came in that period in Great Britain, but we in this country have remained stationary.

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. gentleman a clear plan to outline whereby we may get these reforms this session?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is attributing to me a far larger program than I had in mind. All I am asking is simply that as these bills come up one by one we give them sufficient consideration to know what we are voting on, and that we have a roll call in order to let the country know where we stand. A great many members have been quite satisfied to have the statement made, "carried on division." As I said this afternoon, all I want to do is to give meaning and reality to these words and to have a division; that is all. What will happen if that procedure is carried out it is not for me to say; it is for the government to say. It is for the government, whom the hon. member for Lisgar supports, to decide a way out of the dilemma, and not for me. All I can do is to ask that each bill shall receive a fair hearing. May I say in conclusion that what my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) asks of the promoter of the bill in this case is that he do in this instance as he did in regard to the previous bill which he sponsored, that is, that he give us some idea of the merits of the case. So far he has declined to give us any information respecting it.

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. gentleman put his mathematics to work to find out how long it would take to have a recorded vote on every one of these bills? We have heard about the length of time it would take to read the evidence. There are 300 bills. It would take, in my opinion, 150 hours to dispose of them in the way the hon. member suggests, and that would be 25 parliamentary days.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Lisgar is better at mathematics than I am. I have not figured it out, but I was taught long ago that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof; and if we deal with this bill and the next and the next we shall undoubtedly find some way out of the dilemma before many days have passed. All I do now is to ask once more that with regard to this bill the hon. member who sponsors it should give us an outline such as he gave in regard to the merits of the previous case.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I wonder if it has occurred to some of the hon. gentleman to our left, Mr. Speaker, that this particular case has now cost the country, so far as I have figured it out, $2,000. It costs $1,000 an hour to run this institution, and if we deal with three or four hundred cases in this same way the country will have to put up some $2,000,000 to see the show through.

This case has given rise to the question of a divorce court for the province of Ontario. When that question was before the house I was paired with another hon. gentleman who was going to vote against the bill, inasmuch as I intended to vote for it, and I want to put myself on record as being in favour of the principle of establishing a divorce court for Ontario. I was not able on that occasion to follow the matter to a conclusion, because the discussion was closed off by you, Mr. Speaker, a little too quickly from my point of view. I should like to see embodied in legislation creating a divorce court for the province of Ontario, two conditions, whether appearing in the original bill as passed by this house, or incorporated in the provisions enacted by the province. In the first place, I do not believe that any divorce case should be tried in the county in which the applicant resides; it should be tried in an adjoining county. In the second place, if a court be established in Ontario, I do not wish to see the gruesome details of the whole story published in the newspapers. In my opinion, any information which is to be published should first be submitted to the judge who tries the case, and he should determine the desirability or otherwise of its publication. These are the only two points I wish to mention and I stand firmly by them: Cases should not be tried in the county in which the applicant resides, and the literature which is spread throughout the country in regard to such cases should be censored by the judge who tries the case.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): The question has come up as to whether or not we should have a divorce court in Ontario or Quebec or Prince Edward Island. As stated by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) that is outside the discussion. We could not introduce legislation this session in that regard if we were unanimously in favour of it. On this point, however, I would simply say this: It should be within the genius of this parliament, it seems to me, to devise some kind of law which would give the three provinces that have not now divorce courts an opportunity of establishing such courts if they so desired. But that is apart altogether from the question before us. We are asked to vote on the second reading of Bill No. 93, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) calls upon the member whose name appears after the motion as sponsor to give him the reasons why the bill should be proceeded with. When the hon. member puts that question he knows perfectly well that the reason for this, as for every other bill of a similar nature, is defined by law; and there is only one reason. What is our duty in determining whether the bill shall receive the second reading? We have to determine whether or not the evidence on which the senate committee formed its conclusions is right and proper. I cannot shift my responsibility in that regard on to the shoulders of the member whose name happens to be associated with the bill. It is incumbent upon me as it is upon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and every other hon. member, if we are not satisfied that the senate committee, taking evidence under oath, has come to a correct conclusion, or if we are satisfied that there is some weakness in the evidence, to get up and say so, to say what that weakness is, and to oppose the bill on that ground; not merely to get up and talk in generalities about the advisability or inadvisability of conducting matters in these divorce cases as we are now doing. That does not determine how we are to vote.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spent the better part of an hour on what? Presumably he was speaking on the second reading of this bill, but he did not offer or even hint at a single reason or suggestion, why this bill should not receive its second reading. His only comment in that regard, after giving expression is a lot of generalities more or less irrelevant—rather more irrelevant than relevant—was that, the member sponsoring the bill should tell us why he was asking that the bill be read a second time. The hon. member knows very well that under our law there is only one reason back of all these bills; if he or any other member is not satisfied with the evidence adduced under oath before the senate committee, it is up to that member to take exception on that ground. I think the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Pettit) put the matter very well; the court—because it is a court—hears the evidence in a proper way, cross-examines the witnesses and comes to a certain conclusion. That conclusion is passed on to this house and we are asked to concur or otherwise in the decision of that court. If I am not prepared to concur in that decision I should give my reason for that attitude and I should be able to say that I cannot concur in the judgment because I think there is a weakness in the evidence, pointing out that weakness to the house. Otherwise I should vote for the second reading of the bill and pass it on to the committee, which has all the privileges outlined by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) in regard to going further into the matter if that is thought desirable. I cannot use the word "blockade"; that is unparliamentary, but I can have my own opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that to me it does not seem fair that we should ask members from the other provinces to spend at least some time in listening to the reading of divorce bills based on applications coming from the province of Ontario. It is not fair to the members to expect them to vote upon bills of which they know nothing, bills which are called by number and which are not discussed, nor is it fair to ask them to spend hours of their time finding out what these bills actually are about. I think we are all coming to realize that very soon we must establish a divorce court in Ontario; this is no place to deal with the divorce applications coming from this province. The establishment of a divorce court in this province will neither increase nor decrease the number of divorces; surely anyone who can understand fundamentals must know that. The causes of divorce lie very much deeper, and I am quite free to say that in my opinion one of the causes is the greater freedom of women. Formerly women had no choice; they had to bear all sorts of indignities because they had no economic existence apart from their husbands. That is not true to-day; women are demanding freedom to live their own lives and I would be the last to deny them that right if they wish it.

Many times during the last seven years I have thought it a complete farce that we should sit here and listen to bills being read over about which we knew absolutely nothing. There is no use in the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) or the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) getting up to lecture the house; I know they are both learned gentlemen, but they do not need to tell us that we could know all about the cases which come before us. We cannot do so, and what is more we do not particularly want to know about them; I do not think that is the work which should be done by this house. I do not know what is in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) but to me it is quite clear that this house must be made so sick of this thing that they will have a sensible point of view when a divorce court for Ontario is next proposed.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): The strict rules of order have been transgressed so frequently during the course of the day, Mr. Speaker, that I beg your indulgence if I appear to transgress them for one moment now. During the course of the remarks of the hon. member for Toronto-High Park (Mr. Anderson) I gathered that he wished in some way to blame members from Quebec for not having assisted in the passage of a certain bill which came before this house on a previous occasion. Since that time I have looked up the votes and proceedings in order to inquire into the vote cast on February 26 with regard to an act to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage. I find that amongst the yeas, or those who supported this measure, there were fifteen members from Ontario while amongst the nays there were thirty-three members from Ontario.

Mr. CLARK: Thirty-one.

Mr. POWER: So far as I can ascertain, of that thirty-three only seven were of the Roman Catholic faith. I simply wish to place these facts before the house in order that the house and the country may understand that if this divorce court legislation was blocked, certainly it was not entirely due to the members from Quebec; in a large measure it was due to the attitude of members from the province of Ontario, who spoke and voted in this house against the establishment of such a court.

Mr. ARTHURS: And is it not a fact that the figures with regard to the members from Quebec were forty-two against the bill and none for it?

Mr. POWER: I am not discussing the members from Quebec; I am pointing out to hon. gentlemen, who in some way have been blaming the province of Quebec, that before casting stones over here they should look after themselves.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: This will close the debate.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): If this means that the hon. member will block the debate—

Mr. CLARK: I do not intend to block the debate.

Mr. BOURASSA: According to the usages of the house when the hon. member speaks he will close the debate, and there is one point upon which I would like to express myself; I refer to the lectures which were given the house by my excellent friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I suppose they meant well, but as far as I am concerned I am not prepared to admit that we are lowering the dignity of this house because we propose to see clearly through one of the most important problems with which this parliament can deal. I quite admit that the manner in which the discussion arose, the occasion for this debate, is rather extraordinary; but since the leader of the opposition has referred to the traditions of the English parliament he should know that many of the greatest questions of government, of legislation and of public liberty dealt with by that parliament arose from the most trivial questions. Just by way of example I might remind hon. gentlemen that one of the basic principles of ministerial responsibility was decided by the English House of Commons, under the leadership of Mr. Gladstone, on the mere appointment of chambermaids to the Queen in Buckingham Palace. Another great principle of public administration and the responsibility of various heads of departments was decided under the same leader, one of the greatest statesmen not only of the British Empire but of the world at large, on a paltry question of the purchase of pencils, pen handles and a few sheets of paper in each department. Gladstone was derided by some of the microscopic members of the House of Commons, but he successfully demonstrated to the British people that when a great principle was at issue, whatever the legislative or administrative occasion, it is the right and the duty of each member of the house to discuss that principle, whatever the other consequences may be.

The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser), one of the most sympathetic and genial members of this house—everyone loves him, of course,—has raised the argument that this discussion is costing the country so much per minute. The hon. member is somewhat older than I am, but I well remember in the days of the old parliament when we used to say to the opposition members, during the discussion of some trivial estimate, that they were costing the country so much. The answer would always come back, and it was the proper answer, that, whatever the amount of money at issue, there was some principle of administration or legislation at stake. That is the position which we take to-night.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has spoken of those who are opposing this bill as being under the leadership of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). As far as I am concerned, I would have no more objection to following the lead of that hon. gentleman, when that lead is well inspired, than to following that of any other member of this house. The hon. member for Lisgar has followed various leads in this house—of course that is his business—and he should not attribute small motives to any hon. member when he happens to agree with some other hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. BROWN: I did not desire to cast any reflection upon the hon. member.

Mr. BOURASSA: What I want to make clear to the house is this: Some of us are opposed on principle to all these bills, while others are opposed on principle also, but a different principle. It is our right and duty to discuss every one of these bills in order to make our position clear to the country as well as to parliament. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I think I have given fair warning to this house as well as to the country—if the country cares for what I do or say here—as early as last year as to the action I would take. I admit that it was towards the end of the session, after we had passed a certain number of similar bills, when I expressed some of the ideas I have expressed here as to the growing hesitancy I had in allowing such bills to pass, and as to the growing conviction there was in my mind; firstly, that there was something wrong with the law, and, secondly, that there was something wrong with the practice.

Without going over the work which is being performed by the senate committee, or repeating the declarations made by representatives of that committee when they asked for the concurrence of this branch of parliament in relieving them from their burden, I find further evidence that the practice—leaving the principle aside for the moment—of granting divorces has become an impediment to the free exercise of parliamentary judgment in both branches of the house, as well as a threat to the social fabric which is affected by the increase in the number of these bills.

Mr. DUNNING: This session the house determined in the negative with regard to the stand it desired to take in the granting of a divorce court to Ontario. What course does the hon. member suggest the house should follow in dealing with these particular bills?

Mr. BOURASSA: If the hon. minister will permit me to finish the point I was discussing, I will give him an answer. However, I thank him for the interruption.

I was pointing out that the practice which has grown upon us is becoming a nuisance to parliament and a danger to the country. As has been mentioned by many hon. members, it is practically impossible to read all this evidence. I received these records in two bundles; and in the interval between six and eight o'clock I endeavoured to classify them. There is no classification other than by name. What did I do? I am a quick worker at that kind of thing, and I classified them in alphabetical order. I then referred to the order paper to discover the number of each particular bill, and I marked that number on two or three records of evidence. I spent an hour and a half in doing work that should have been done by the servants of this parliament. When the house met at eight o'clock two or three of these bills were allowed to stand, but during the debate which followed I had an opportunity of going through this bunch of papers and managed to find the evidence connected with the particular bill under consideration. Without insisting further that this manner of offering the evidence to the members is very clumsy and almost unworkable, I can only repeat that it is a parliamentary system which has grown upon us during the last few years. The people who established that practice probably had no idea of the manner in which it would grow.

What do I find in this particular case? The divorce is asked for by a woman who married a certain man a few years ago. Although she does not say in her testimony that there was anything wrong, they seem to have disagreed. She left him and went back to England. According to her uncontradicted evidence, upon her return a reconciliation took place, but she found that during her absence the husband had developed certain habits of which she complained, and she had a special investigator make up a case. Here is the testimony, all contained in three or four pages. That investigator took a friend of his; they went on a certain night to a certain house, and they found the husband walking in a certain room while a woman was in the bed. The whole evidence rests upon these two things. The policeman hired to make up the case says: "The woman in the bed is not the woman here"—meaning not the wife. The other, the second witness necessary to make up a case before a tribunal, says: "I did not see the woman. I only found that she had fair hair." It is upon those two testimonies that a judgment has been granted breaking a marriage tie, without the husband being heard and without its being known whether the man had any previous complaint. Yet we are told that we are a court of appeal and that, in the exercise of that majestic dignity, we have nothing to do but to confirm this judgment rendered by a committee of the other house. I dare say that if the same work was performed in connection with all these three hundred cases, a good many would be corresponding with this. Therefore I quite understand why an hon. member belonging to the province of New Brunswick, who allowed me to make use of his name, a Roman Catholic, voted for the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), some days ago, because, he said: "Comparing the manner in which divorces are granted or refused in my province with the manner in which they are granted in parliament, I, as a Catholic and the father of a family, cannot vote any longer for this system."

Is all this lowering the dignity of parliament? I can assure the Minister of Railways and the leader of the opposition that the people who have sent me here, humble settlers who can hardly read nor write, but who for many years have carried on a Christian life in the midst of the hills and continued the devoted work of the pioneers in enlarging the moral as well as the material wealth of the country, have placed their confidence in me, not only to vote money for the railway department or any other department of the state, but to do my level best to preserve some of the moral foundations upon which this little country of ours has grown up. Whether it pleases or not members of the government or members of the opposition; whether it is on the occasion of a private bill, or of two bills, or of ten bills, or of fifty bills, I will lose no opportunity to assert before parliament and before the country that we have a duty to perform, not only in the building of railways and the digging of canals, but in the preservation of the morality of Canada.

There is one point which my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought up during the discussion of this bill and which I want to answer right away. He stated, quite properly, that he resented, not the imputation but the deduction that could be drawn from the attitude taken by the representatives of Quebec on a question like this, because it might be said by some narrow-minded or ill-willed people that, in opposing the principle of divorce, we pose as representing a more virtuous population than those of the English-speaking provinces. That is not our way. We have our defects and our drawbacks in Quebec as elsewhere; but if we can claim some credit, it is this: that we have never acted in a pharisaical manner in teaching lessons of morality to other parts of the country. All that we have done and that we are doing is this: the Catholic and French province of Quebec has made to the Dominion of Canada, its population and its institutions, a contribution of its own which I do not claim to be superior to that of the other provinces, but which I claim to be valuable in the manner and to the degree in which we preserve within ourselves those elements of social organization which are our own. Let us admit that there are differences in temperament, habit and tradition. Perhaps among the English-speaking people, especially among those of Scottish and English descent, you can play a little more fast and loose with the laws relating to the organization of families or of society. But when you come to the Latin races, with their more radical temperament and their more logical turn of mind, beware of any attempt made to loosen the ties which preserve the family and the social organization. This is one of the reasons why, while not teaching any lesson to any other element of the population, while not posing as Pharisees, we say: Understand our point of view as we endeavour to understand yours. That is why, since the matter has been referred to, I may be permitted to employ two or three minutes of my time in regard to it.

When the question of a divorce court for Ontario came up, I made it quite clear that I was opposed on principle to divorce; that I was opposed to the establishment of divorce courts everywhere. But since divorce courts have been established in seven out of the nine provinces of Canada in esse or in posse,—because in Prince Edward Island they voted long before confederation for the establishment of a divorce court and they have it in posse if not in esse—I stated and I repeat to-night, and the sense of the house and the sense of the country will have to come to it: the only real remedy for this situation, which has grown upon us and which will be far worse next year, and the year after, than it is this year, is to come back to the true moral and social basis of confederation: wipe off from clause 91 the subsection enabling or, rather, forcing—because in that respect I agree with the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—forcing this parliament to deal with divorce. Let us go back to the principle, the spirit of confederation, and let us wipe off those three words: "Marriage and divorce" from clause 91.

It has been said by the hon. member for Toronto High Park (Mr. Anderson): "But you cannot do it unless the provinces agree to it." Why? We can not take away any of the rights of the provinces without their consent, but we can always renounce some of our own rights; and after that, the provinces can, under another disposition of the British North America Act, amend their own constitution according to their needs. Once this parliament, by a joint address of both houses, decides that it will have no more to do with divorce, either in a legislative capacity or in its capacity of creating courts of justice to adjudicate upon divorce, then the provinces are free, each of them according to its views, according to what it considers to be in the best interest of the local community for which its government is responsible, to decide whether or not they will maintain the divorce courts they have or, if they do not have them, create them. This is a practical remedy. I mentioned it during the first debate. I mention it again to-night, not with the hope, of course, that it will be voted upon right away. Perhaps some hon. members who would be disposed to agree to it would not like to receive it from such unholy hands as those of the man who is speaking now. But the time will surely come, and let it come as soon as possible, when individuals and groups and parties being forgotten, some sensible individual, no eccentric or crank of my nature, but some sensible individual accepted as a wise man by everybody, will stand up and propose this remedy; and then it will be jumped at by all the wiseacres of the land; because, I repeat, this is the only manner in which you can at once simplify the operations of this house and return the two branches of this parliament to their proper functions, and at the same time strike off from the constitution that anomaly which leaves a portion of our matrimonial law in the hands of the provinces while keeping another portion here. It was a nonsensical disposition adopted in the last hours of the discussion on the confederation bill. As a matter of fact, it was not in the resolutions of Quebec; it was not in the decisisons taken by the parliament of United Canada. It was grafted upon the constitution, like that absurd clause 93 with regard to schools, in London, in order to conciliate the views of this church and that church, of this group and that; and like all that kind of patchwork it could not work. So long as the population was limited the number of people seeking divorce was not numerous, therefore we did not feel the absurdity or the pinch of the system; but now it is upon us.

I cannot agree with my good friend from Lisgar, who proposes that we let the present system go on for this year. No, sir. If we do not bring it home to every member of this house and to the people whom we represent, the same thing will go on year after year. It will never be remedied until parliament realizes that we are in an impossible situation and that we must treat it in a radical manner from a double point of view—one of principle and one of practice equally.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr.

Power) I think presented the best reasons why this house should give due and proper consideration to divorce bills. He stated that there was a large number of members in the house who had voted against the granting of a divorce court to Ontario, and he gave the vote. I have looked at that vote, and I find that there were seventy per cent of members from provinces other than Ontario who voted against the establishment of a divorce court in that province—seventy per cent of the vote. In other words, this house has elected to stand by the constitution. The constitution has been the same since confederation. This is the court which adjudicates upon divorce petitions. This house once more elected this year that it would not delegate that duty to any other court, and every member of this house is faced with the duty of adjudicating from a judicial point of view on the facts of this case. No member of this house can shirk the vote on the merits of this case, any more than you, Mr. Speaker, can refuse to put the question on this petition. That is the issue before the house.

So far as the facts of the case are concerned, I submit that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) did not correctly represent them. Any member of this house could have read the evidence in this case in five minutes. I read it while the vote on the last bill was being taken. The facts are simple. I do not intend to repeat them because it is the duty of every member of this court to read them and to express his judgment upon them.

There is just one other point. I submit that it is not the duty of the sponsor of the bill to place the facts of the case before the house at all. Someone has to sponsor these bills. It is a mere formality. I have consented in this case to do so. It is not my duty necessarily to put the facts of the case before the house on the second reading. All that is necessary here is to establish the principle: Is this a bill which comes within the law relating to divorce? If it is, then it is the duty of the house to send it to the committee, which will look into the facts of the case, and if necessary call witnesses and check evidence that has been taken before the senate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: To what law does the hon. member refer when he says "the law relating to divorce?"

Mr. CLARK: The common law of England which is in force in this country; the common law of England which has been adopted by certain of the provinces and upon which divorce courts are based.

Mr. SPENCER: I asked the hon. member earlier in the evening if he would give us some reasons why we should support this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate is closed. Is it a question the hon. member wishes to ask?

Mr. SPENCER: The only information in reference to the case that is before us has been given by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). If the hon. gentleman would give some reasons why we should support this bill, we should be glad to do so. Otherwise I shall have to vote against it.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Clark) which was agreed to on the following division:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Fourth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—OFFICERS' PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): In regard to a return moved for by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Hubbs) as reported in votes and proceedings, No. 1, page (i):

For a return showing the names and present addresses of all officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have had their pensions reduced under section 14, subsection 1 of the Pensions Act, which reads:

Pensions shall be paid to, and in respect of a member of the forces in accordance with the rank or acting rank, for which he was being paid pay and allowances at the time of the appearance of the injury or disease for which he is pensioned.

The chairman of the pension board has supplied the following answer which I desire to read:

Between 200 and 300 cases were adjusted to the correct rate under section 14, subsection (1) of the Pension Act. To publish the names and addresses of those comprising any class of pensioner is considered by the Board of Pension Commissioners to be detrimental to the interests of returned men generally, such information being regarded as confidential between pensioners and the commission. This is also the policy of the British Ministry of Pensions. It is therefore considered contrary to public policy to publish the names and addresses asked for.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL RAILWAY TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may construct and complete terminal stations and facilities and other railway works and improvements at or in the vicinity of the city of Montreal, and the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for these purposes by the company to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, and the proceeds of any sale, pledge or disposition of the securities shall be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance in trust for the company, and released from time to time to the comapny by the said minister to be applied to expenditures made or indebtedness incurred in connection with the said works.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARIES OF PROFESSIONAL AND TECHNICAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Might I ask the Minister of Finance whether the government are yet ready to announce the names of certain distinguished gentlemen who, they indicated a few days ago, would be asked to counsel with them regarding the duties, rates of salaries and so forth in connection with technical employees in the service?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I anticipated that this question might be asked, because my hon. friend had asked it before. As hon. members know, it has been represented that the remuneration provided in the government service is no longer attractive to persons of superior technical and professional training. The report made last year by the Civil Service Commission recommends a graduated flat increase of from $240 to $420 per annum. This would apply to 1,936 persons, and involves $690,000 to one class and $60,000 to another, or a total of $750,000.

While there may be those who feel that, generally speaking, the civil servants of Canada are as well provided for in the way of salaries as are their fellow citizens who furnish the revenues to pay for the services, it is felt that in the public interest a fair comparison of salaries within and without the service should be available. The government, therefore, invited Mr. E. W. Beatty, president and chairman of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Sir George Garneau, of Garneau Limitee, Quebec city, and Doctor Murray, president of the university of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, to inquire into and report on these phases, thereby providing the government with information permitting a readjustment fair to all interested.

May I add that the government feel that this house will agree the country is fortunate in being able to secure the services of men of such wide experience.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY

CLAIMS OF HOLDERS OF FIRST AND SECOND PREFERENCE SHARES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask the Minister of Justice whether or not the reports appearing in the public press as to the granting of a fiat to the first and second preference shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company empowering them to enter an action with respect to their claims, has been granted by the minister.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I saw that report in the press. It is wholly erroneous. The matter is still engaging the consideration of the Department of Justice.

CANADIAN REPARATIONS ASSOCIATION OF TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Can the Secretary of State give the house any information regarding an organization known as the Canadian Reparations Association of Toronto, which is writing to different claimants telling them that if they turn over their claims to this association, it will see that they are adjusted, and that five per cent commission will be charged for the work.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Although I have no specific knowledge of that association, its existence has been brought to my attention, as well as similar proposals made to the claimants for a certain consideration to further their claims. I would not like to appear to be denying to any claimants any means of making their claims good, nor would I like to impute any motive to any association, but I do desire to say very clearly that I fail to see the least usefulness on the part of any of these claimants in going on with their claims after their claims have been investigated by Commissioner Friel and a report has been made by the commissioner in regard to every one of them. It is now a question not of dealing with individual claims, but rather as to what policy shall be adopted as regards the claimants as a whole. That question is now before the house, and the government has a resolution covering the matter. Further, it wishes to take parliament into its confidence in order that a definite solution might be found for this rather involved problem. I do think, however, that claimants should guard well against entering into any such agreement with any outside association, and rely rather on the sense of justice of the government and of parliament in this matter.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) to the fact that early in the session two bills, Nos. 25 and 26, relating to the fisheries of the Dominion, received a second reading in this house and were referred to the committee on marine and fisheries. They have been considered indirectly at one meeting of that committee which was held a considerable time before the Easter recess, but nothing has been done with respect to them since, nor has the committee since been convened. I should like to ask what is the intention of the department and of the government with respect to them.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): My hon. friend certainly understands that I am not the master of the committee of marine and fisheries. These two bills were referred to that committee with a view to giving all parties interested the opportunity to make their representations before the committee. I am sure that the committee will devote the proper amount of time to a consideration of the proposals contained in these bills, and I have no doubt that it will be in a position to report to the house before very long so that we shall have an opportunity of proceeding to adopt these bills.

PROPOSED CHIGNECTO CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) when his department will commence their investigation and surveys in connection with the proposed canal across the isthmus of Chignecto.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his question. I have to make the very frank confession that I have not had time to go further into the matter since it was the subject of discussion in this house. My hon. friend will remember that I have rather a large volume of work before the house which occupies a great deal of my time, but I can assure him that this matter is not being lost sight of.

SUPPLY—RURAL MAIL CONTRACTS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, as I understand that it is the intention of the government when the house goes into supply to enter upon a discussion of the estimates of the post office department, I thought that this might be an appropriate time to enter upon a brief discussion of the question of rural mail contracts as they now exist in the Dominion of Canada. When I heard at noon to-day that this matter was coming up, I notified the secretary of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) that I proposed to discuss this matter, and I intend before I resume my seat to move an amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is rather late, without notice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I gave notice. The amendment which I propose to move is one which I believe will bring on a general discussion of the matter and in the end lead to action by the government. It is not a subject which is in any way new to the House of Commons or to the present Postmaster General or to the government, because on three or four occasions in the past five or six years this matter has been fairly well discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not a copy of the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will give my right hon. friend a copy. So the matter which I intend to lay before the house on this occasion cannot in any way be considered as a new one. The truth is that a condition exists in regard to rural mail couriers in Canada to-day which is nothing less than a public scandal. It was about twenty years ago when we in Canada decided to establish a system of rural mail delivery throughout all the better settled portions of rural Canada. A system had been established prior to that time in the United States, and the experience in that country in regard to the delivery of rural mails throughout a very extended territory had been pretty satisfactory. We launched the experiment in Canada with some trepidation, I remember, but gradually we have extended the system through the better settled portions of rural Canada until to-day we have in operation, as I understand, some 4,007 rural mail routes which are of great benefit and convenience to our rural population.

The system which was adopted in the first instance in regard to these rural mail routes was one based on tender and contract. Certain routes were publicly advertised, tenders were called, and as a rule a fairly large number of tenderers responded to the advertisement in the hope of securing occupation as mail carriers in the rural parts of Canada. I suppose that lack of experience had something to do with the unsatisfactory conditions which attended the first tenders and the first contracts, but as time has gone on, conditions instead of improving have gradually become worse until to-day we find a system established throughout practically the whole length and breadth of this country under which certain men who are practically employees of this government and of this country, for the purpose of carrying His Majesty's mails, are not receiving an adequate return for the services they perform. Indeed, so inadequate is the return to our rural mail couriers that the matter has become nothing less than a public scandal. Year after year this matter has been brought to the attention of this government and of the present Postmaster General during the discussion of the Post Office estimates. Year after year the rural letter carriers have requested that their claims be considered and that they be treated on some fairer basis and on some higher standard than anything they have enjoyed hitherto.

Now, the situation I will briefly describe as follows. The figures which I give, it must be understood, will be only average figures; I cannot go into particular cases; but I find that in the report of the Postmaster General for the year ending March 31, 1928, the total cost to the Dominion for the "conveyance of mails by ordinary land" is $6,291,180.52. I have been informed by officials in the Post Office department that this item includes the cost of all the rural mail routes, of all the stage routes, and all the routes known as station-to-post office routes; these are all referred to under one item as "conveyance of mails by ordinary land." Just what part of that single item is devoted to the delivery of rural mail I am unable to say with precision; I can only form an estimate, but information has been given to me that the number of established routes to-day is 4,007, and it has been represented that the average route in Canada at the present time is one of twenty miles. Some routes are a little more than this, some a little less, but as an average twenty miles is supposed to be about right. The average pay for a courier who travels that route of twenty miles is, according to my informant in the department, about $800, although according to a statement which I have received from the Letter Carriers' Association the average amount which each carrier receives is only $720. I am taking the higher figure of $800 for a twenty-mile route, which would be payment to the courier at the rate of $40 per mile over a period of a year.

Now, what is he supposed to do for that money? In the first place, he has to maintain the service and in most, if not all, cases the service has to be daily; he has to perform his trip in all kinds and conditions of weather, winter and summer, with few, if any, holidays—I believe there are one or two holidays specified now; he has to maintain a sufficient horse and conveyance to cover his route, and he has to maintain himself and his family, all out of that average sum of $800 which he receives as a total annual remuneration.

One has only to state these facts to demonstrate that a service based upon such unfair conditions can only result in one thing—a public scandal. No man can perform the service satisfactorily under such conditions. The maintenance of the horse and equipment takes more than half of the remuneration which he receives. Officials in the Post Office department tell me that in order to ensure proper service on a twenty-mile route, two horses are necessary. I know of routes upon which only one horse is maintained. But take it, if you will, at only one horse, the first question is: what does it cost to keep a horse in Canada to-day? I have made inquiries from men who ought to know—some men in this house, some outside—and I find that for the maintenance of one horse there is annually required:

140 bushels of oats at 70 cents	$ 98
3 tons of hay at $13	39
Bran	25
Horshoeing	20
Depreciation and repairs—horse and conveyance	40
A total of	$222

Or $440 on any route that requires two horses—and the majority of them do. I submit these figures to the house as the minimum figures which I have been able to obtain. The figures supplied by the Letter Carriers' Association are far in advance of these figures. They tell me that three tons of hay is far too little to maintain a horse for a year, and that $13 a ton is too low a price; that $20 is too little for horseshoeing, and that $40 is too little for depreciation and repairs of the equipment. But I am taking these as minimum figures which show that a mail carrier will have an actual outlay, if he employs two horses, of $440 for maintenance. This will leave him only $360 for the support of himself, and of his family.

There is no man in this country who can support himself and his family on $360; it cannot be done. Is not that a very strong reason why there is such vigorous and persistent complaint in regard to this matter? These men are underpaid while performing a very important service. Their net remuneration is but $360. Why, the figures supplied to this house by the Department of Labour show that the minimum requirement for a family of five in January of the present year was $1,122.60, for the mere necessaries of life. And yet under present conditions as operating throughout this Dominion the Post Office department we are asking these couriers of His Majesty's mail in the rural districts to do their work for $360 a year. Mr. Speaker, I repeat it cannot be done. The men are losing money. They are suffering grave hardship. Surely it is beneath the dignity of such a country as Canada, it is beneath the dignity of any government, to allow a system of that kind to continue.

Now, what will the result be? Loss to the contractors? Certainly. Inefficiency in the service? Certainly. Dishonesty will probably follow. Indeed there are some parts of Ontario where the matter has become a real scandal. There have been prosecutions before magistrates by humane societies at various points because these contractors for the conveyance of His Majesty's mails have not had money enough to feed their horses. The magistrates have taken a lenient view of these cases and have dismissed them, but the matter has become an outstanding scandal.

What is the real difficulty? The tender system, I submit, is a wrong system in regard to this matter. When it was first introduced some twenty years ago it was experimental. We had had no experience at that time. But why continue it when we know year in and year out that the system is not satisfactory and is causing grave hardship? Why allow the matter to remain as it is year after year when it has been pointed out in this house, on every occasion on which post office estimates are discussed, that the system is unfair, that it is a gross hardship, and that it must be altered and improved? Why does the government delay action in this matter?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

What is the system which has been adopted in the United States, for instance? There they began with a system of tender and contract for specified routes. They found it unworkable, just as we have found it unworkable and unsatisfactory in Canada. But in the United States they promptly changed it; they put it on the mileage basis. There they have established certain definite routes, the mileage is calculated, and a man is appointed as letter carrier on a route with the definite understanding that he shall receive so much per mile. I believe there is some variation allowed in prices by reason of physical difficulties which may arise in the country over which the courier has to travel. In the United States at the present time the courier receives in the majority of cases $75 per mile travelled. This is not an unreasonable amount; it is, I submit, fair and reasonable. It may be that the United States rate at the present time would be too high in a country such as Canada where distances may be greater and population sparser. But $40 a mile which is the average they are receiving now, is absurd. Something must be done to increase the amount, and steps must be taken to make these men permanent. Forty dollars a mile is the average in Canada and $75 in the United States. Moreover, our system lacks the permanence which attaches to the system in the United States. When a mail contract is let, and when the local community start tendering one against another, they cut the figure down and down to rock bottom, and the contract is given for four years to the lowest man provided the contractor can furnish the necessary security for the carrying out of the contract. But at the end of the four years he finds that he cannot make money. Indeed, a good many of them are willing to give it up, but unfortunately they have their horses and their equipment and do not know what to do in the matter. If they do not renew the contract at practically the same amount there is another advertisement for tenders, with another group of tenderers. Other people know what the former contractor got and they try to cut a little bit under him. And they do so. The result is that the figures have been going down and down and down, while the cost of living has been going up or has been maintained at a very high standard; and so the system has been positively disastrous to many men.

Now what we ask by this motion and what we have asked for the last three or four sessions in this house, is that a new system be adopted forthwith. The mileage system should be adopted in place of the tender system and the positions should be made permanent, just as permanent as are letter carriers in the city districts. An amount should be fixed as remuneration having regard to the cost of living in this country and the duties and responsibilities of the courier. I do not suggest the rate which they now pay in the United States, but I do suggest $70 or at any rate $60 a mile as a reasonable sum in this country. Now, assuming that the present contractors do average $800 a year each, and assuming that there are 4,000 rural mail routes, this involves an annual expenditure to-day of $3,200,000 or thereabouts of the $6,000,000 item which is in the Postmaster General's report. That is on the basis of $40 a mile. What would be the effect of increasing the rate to $60 a mile—a 50 per cent increase? You would raise the total amount by $1,600,000. Would not that be fair? Instead of $3,200,000, which I assume it is now approximately—I cannot give the figures definitely—it would increase to $4,800,000 a year; and if you deemed proper to make it $70 a mile, which I submit would be reasonable, you would need to add another 25 per cent to the last figure I have given.

I submit that under present conditions in Canada it is not beyond this Dominion to grant $70 a mile, and I also submit that the tender system should be abolished at once. In my opinion the position of rural mail courier should be made permanent immediately, and a definite satisfactory amount should be fixed as remuneration upon the mileage basis. This is not a new proposal in this house, nor is it in the country. The public conscience has been aroused throughout the Dominion in regard to this matter. The press of the country, without distinction politically, has discussed the matter editorially, and as briefly as possible I am going to put on Hansard with my remarks some press comments to show that there is no political bias in the matter to it, to show also that the men now engaged as rural mail carriers in Canada have a real and substantial grievance. And I ask again why this government has not remedied this grievance before now. Listen to what the Toronto Globe says. I read from a Globe editorial of September 10, 1928:

> The annual meeting of the Canadian Mail Contractors' Association, held in Toronto the other day, brought once more to the attention of the public the unfortunate conditions under which the rural mail contractor carries on his work. Chief among the resolutions passed by the carriers was that requesting the government to abolish the present contract plan under which mail is delivered in the country, and to bring about the introduction of the salary system on the basis of $70 per mile per year for rural contractors. The request made by these men is reasonable. What they are asking from the government is simply a living wage and to be placed on a similar footing to the postal carriers in the cities of the Dominion.
> The contract system has outlived its usefulness, and should be discarded without delay. It was given up long ago by the United States government, and the rural mail men placed on the same basis as other employees of the postal department. The contract system in vogue in Canada has little to commend it, except that it is cheap. The man who submits the lowest tender may get the job. Too often it may happen that he will also perform the worst service. The rural mail carriers have protested for long against the present plan, and have petitioned the government repeatedly to have it changed. Surely the time has come when their plea should be heeded.

That from the Toronto Globe. The Ottawa Citizen has also spoken editorially, and its views are as follows:

> A convincing case has been made out for better treatment at the hands of the Department at Ottawa by the Rural Mail Contractors' Association in the memorandum they recently sent to members of both houses of parliament. As most persons are aware, rural mail deliveries are carried out under a contract system whereby the contractor undertakes to deliver mail along a given route for four years. The average length of a mail contract route is 20 miles and the average yearly contract price paid by the government is $732. Besides furnishing wholly inadequate remuneration for the character of the work and duties entailed, this system possesses inherent defects which only its abolition can remove. The rural mail men point out that the average upkeep of a contractor's horses and rigs during the last five years has been $1,058.

That is more than twice the figure I gave.

> This means an average loss of $326 yearly, in addition to which the mail contractor has given his time and assumed responsibilities free of charge.

The London Advertiser has a long article very much to the same effect which I need not quote. The Toronto Star contains a very strong article against the present system, calling on the government to change it at once. The Montreal Herald too carries a strong article, and comments appear in the Telegraph-Journal of St. John, the Hamilton Herald, the Canadian Countryman, the St. Thomas Times and Journal, the Farmers' Sun, the Hamilton Spectator, the Stratford Beacon-Herald—in fact one may say all the leading newspapers of Canada have brought this matter to the attention of the Postmaster General and the government, yet year after year nothing has been done. There is a way, however, by which I hope to bring the question pointedly to the notice of the Postmaster General and by which I propose to ask the house to deal with it. I am moving a motion on going into supply this afternoon which, as the house knows, is always in the nature of a motion of want of confidence. I have taken that course in order to test out this matter in this House of Commons. In years past many hon. members in various quarters of the house have discussed this matter very forcibly; they have laid before us the case of the rural mail couriers with great effect, and I sincerely hope that upon this occasion they will implement the speeches they made in this house in previous years. I hope that as a result of this vote these rural mail couriers who have been complaining for years and who have been suffering gross injustice for years, will have their injuries remedied as they should have been remedied by this government long ago.

This afternoon I have briefly stated the case to the house as I believe it to exist, and I have drawn up a resolution expressing as well as I can what is in my mind. I may say in connection with this resolution, however—and I say this in the presence of my leader—that it embodies the policy of the Conservative party on this question, and if the Conservative party is returned to power this policy as outlined in this amendment will be carried out without further delay.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens):

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house the present system of awarding contracts for the delivery of rural mail by tender has proved unfair, burdensome and unsatisfactory, and that such rural mail carriers should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission upon a permanent basis with a definite rate of pay, based upon mileage and the physical conditions of the territory involved, having regard to the amount paid to the other servants of the government for similar employment."

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the question of the better treatment of the rural mail carriers of Canada has been brought to the attention of the house in this way, because I feel very strongly upon this question. In one respect, however, I regret that the matter has been brought before the house by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), because when he introduces a question and speaks upon it very little remains for anyone else to say. He has covered the ground thoroughly, and I can add but very little to his remarks.

One reason why I feel very strongly on this question is because right opposite my home is located the post office serving the entire district which I represent, and every morning throughout the year I see some nineteen or twenty rural mail carriers start from that point. I am personally acquainted with each of these men and I know the difficulties they must meet; I know what they do and how they work; I understand the obstacles which they must overcome and I sympathize with them very deeply in the effort they are putting forth for their country. They are unfairly treated; their job is very precarious, since they may be removed from it at any time, and their remuneration is absolutely inadequate for the work they are doing. As my hon. friend has said, our method of handling this work has been to call upon each individual to apply for the job, and naturally the government have endeavoured to get this work done as cheaply as possible. Unfortunately, in order to secure the contracts, men have put in very low tenders and as a result have undertaken the work with very unreasonable remuneration. The lack of system is not creditable to this country, and the lack of method is a common topic of conversation. This work should be systematized and placed under the Civil Service Commission, or handled in some way other than the very disagreeable and disjointed procedure that now prevails.

Reference has been made to what has been done in the United States. I have in my hand a statement issued by the government of the United States showing the different salaries paid to rural mail carriers. They have daily, tri-weekly and weekly mail routes, but I think the figures given with reference to the daily routes would be the most interesting to this house. I will not read the whole list, but in part it is as follows:

Length miles—	Miles	Annual salary
6 and less than..	8	$ 792
8 and less than..	10	864
10 and less than..	12	936
12 and less than..	14	1,008
14 and less than..	16	1,080
16 and less than..	18	1,260
18 and less than..	20	1,440
20 and less than..	22	1,620
22 and less than..	24	1,728
24 and not over..	24.5	1,800
Over 24.5 and not over..	25.5	1,830

The table continues down to final figure of:

Over 54.5 and not over..	55.5	$2,730

It would be very simple for any member to take the routes in his own constituency and work out the cost on a basis of the rates paid in the United States. Other countries have advanced to the point where a fair price is fixed, and in addition superannuation is provided for. Two and one half per cent of the salaries paid in the United States is deducted and merged into a superannuation fund.

I have worked out this comparison as it applies to my own constituency. I will not read the complete list, but a few of the examples are as follows:

Route mileage	Canadian salary	American salary
19⅜	$ 849 82	$1,440
23⅜	1,033 66	1,728
18⅝	1,050 00	1,440
19½	800 00	1,440
13½	400 40	1,008
26½	1,300 00	1,860
25½	1,300 00	1,830

The total cost of rural mail delivery in my constituency amounts to $17,008.83, which, figured on the American basis, would amount to $28,818, or an increase of 59 per cent.

I would not advise adopting the American rates immediately, but I think the whole thing should be reduced to a system. It could be started with a raise of 30 per cent, and then a further increase as time and conditions justified. It is not correct to say that the systemizing of this work and the placing of these men upon an equitable basis would multiply our cost. The American mail carrier is contented and satisfied with his conditions, and I think a fair increase would satisfy our own men. The people of the province of Ontario sympathize with these letter-carriers. As a rule, they are kindly disposed and as they pass through the country, they do hundreds of kindly acts which are entirely outside of the actual delivery of mail. It is certainly not creditable to this country when we consider the way these rural mail carriers are treated.

If the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) would be big enough to lay aside for a few weeks the question of further employment and the dismissing of postmasters, and devote his attention to the rural mail carriers and see that they are given a reasonable allowance for doing their work, he would be much better employed.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member suggest that the present rural mail carriers should be brought into the civil service without further examination?

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. POWER: That is the question I am asking the hon. member.

Mr. KAISER: I suggest that you ask the Postmaster General.

Mr. POWER: I am asking the hon. member for his suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion speaks for itself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is obstructive, not constructive.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has drawn the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) and of this house to a long standing grievance on the part of a large body of faithful and efficient public servants against whom there has been what might well be termed an unfair discrimination, in that, although discharging duties which are as important to the public as those performed by other servants who are on the permanent list and receive regular salaries, they are not similarly treated. Representations have been made from year to year on behalf of these mail carriers and facts have been cited which should long ago have brought about a remedy of this grievance. In fact, one wonders why there has been this continued neglect, this refusal on the part of the Postmaster General to consider the requests of this large body of public servants and to find a remedy. He has shown in some instances activity and keen interest on behalf of other employees of the department. In fact, he has taken pains to point out to the house that in some cases the Civil Service Commission have not met his views with respect to increases of salaries.

We all know the character of the duties of a rural mail carrier. They are exacting; they demand punctuality. He must be faithful; he must be on the job every day of the year, Sundays excepted, rain or shine, no matter whether the travelling is good or bad. He must furnish ample security for the discharge of his duties. He is under supervision, and in every respect his position is a difficult and an exacting one. I am sure the Postmaster General must recall the fact that from time to time members of parliament have to interview his deputy and those in charge of this service on behalf of unfortunates who have tendered for it only to find out that they have signed a contract binding them for a period of years, and that the proposition has been a losing one for them. In some cases they have had to ask to be relieved and have been replaced by others. Sometimes persons are found without knowledge of the situation who are willing to take over the contracts, but these unfortunate individuals soon find themselves in trouble. I know personally of contracts that have had to be transferred three or four times, in each case to the disadvantage and loss of the party who took it over.

We do not ask for tenders for similar services on the part of mail clerks or those in the postal service, and I think the time is long past when we should continue this method. These ought to be considered permanent employees and there ought to be a reasonable, fixed compensation for them. Not knowing that the matter was going to come up in the house, I took the liberty some time ago to write to the postal department in Washington to find out how they dealt with the matter there, and under date of March 29, 1929, I received from the fourth assistant postmaster general a letter which I desire to put on Hansard. The letter reads:

My Dear Mr. Stewart:

Reference is made to your letter of March 23, requesting information as to the rate of pay of rural mail carriers in the United States, and as to particulars of the equipment and vehicles which they or the department provide for the service.

The salaries which rural carriers shall receive are fixed by law, being based on the length of the route served and the frequency of the deliveries, routes being served either daily except Sunday or three times a week. For serving a rural route of twenty-four miles six days in the week, the salary is $1,800 per annum; on routes twenty-two miles and less than twenty-four miles, $1,728; on routes twenty miles and less than twenty-two miles, $1,620; on routes eighteen miles, and less than twenty miles, $1,440; on routes sixteen miles and less than eighteen miles, $1,260; on routes fourteen miles and less than sixteen miles, $1,080; on routes twelve miles and less than fourteen miles, $1,008; on routes ten miles and less than twelve miles, $936; on routes eight miles and less than ten miles, $864; on routes six miles and less than eight miles, $792; on routes four miles and less than six miles, $720. Each rural carrier assigned to a route on which daily service is performed receives $30 per mile per annum for each mile of his route in excess of twenty-four miles or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, and each rural carrier assigned to a route on which tri-weekly service is performed receives $15 per mile for each mile of said route in excess of forty-eight miles or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage.

A rural carrier who serves one tri-weekly route is paid a salary and equipment maintenance allowance on the basis of a route one-half of the length of the route served by him. A rural carrier serving two tri-weekly routes is paid a salary and equipment maintenance allowance on the basis of a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes.

In addition to the salary each carrier is paid an equipment maintenance in the sum of 4 cents per mile per day for each mile or major fraction of a mile scheduled.

Rural carriers are required to provide and to maintain suitable vehicles with which to perform the service.

It will be seen that this is a very much more generous compensation than we allow for this service. I do not suggest that the situation requires that we should pay as much as they are paying in the United States, and it has occurred to me that I might make these suggestions which might be helpful to the Postmaster General: That there should be a survey of all these routes, and they should be divided into perhaps three or four classes: A, B, C and D, the classification being made on the length of the route, the time required for the service, the hours of the day at which the service has to be carried out, the physical conditions and any other consideration that might properly be taken into account in the classification of these routes. Then a mileage rate should be fixed for each of these different classes. A similar classification is made of post offices, and I can see no reason why the principle should not be applied to rural mail routes.

The mover of the resolution has so fully dealt with it that I cannot add much to what he has said, but I want to impress upon the Postmaster General that this class of public servant is suffering; that they need relief; that they have from time to time made representations that are sound and sane, and that are based on fact. Their representations are not imaginary, unreasonable or unjust. The Dominion of Canada cannot afford to have in its service any considerable body of faithful servants such as these who are underpaid, who are carrying on under a sense of discrimination and a feeling they are being unjustly dealt with.

I wish also to call to the minister's attention the compensation that is in some cases paid to the collector of mail from city or town boxes. This also is done by tender. I have in mind the case of an unfortunate man who is travelling around ten or twelve miles a day seven days in the week, and receiving the handsome sum of about $520 per annum.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Who set the price?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He set it himself, but surely that is no answer. If you were to apply that all round you might easily get some person to act as Postmaster General—

Mr. ROBB: Or member of parliament.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Or prime minister.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Would the hon. member have all the members appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. POWER: Most of them would not get the job in that case.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am discussing the question of compensation.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Do you object as a general rule to the principle of tendering, or only in the case of this particular service?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I object to any public servant being asked to tender for services of this kind. I think it is a vicious principle—

Mr. STEVENS: "A thoroughly vicious principle."

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think it is unsound, and I can see no reason why it should be applied to this particular class of public servants. I hope that the Postmaster General will give consideration to the representations of the rural mail couriers. I think he feels himself that an injustice is being done to them, and I hope he will find some way of giving them redress.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): I wish to make a few remarks in support of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). This question has been before the house on many occasions; it has come up almost every session for a great many years. In anything I have to say I am in no way criticising the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) because the system that prevails has been in existence for a number of years. We know that the rural mail delivery service is very efficient, and that the farmers of this country would not wish to do without it. It is a great improvement over the system prevailing before, when the people in the country had to drive many miles into the nearest village or town to get their mail. The rural mail couriers to-day not only carry the ordinary mail and registered mail, but also deliver small supplies to the farmers, and collect their mail for delivery to the post office.

I wish to direct the attention of the Postmaster General to a comparison between the remuneration paid to the rural mail couriers and that of the mail carriers in the cities. In my county there is a rural mail route of fifteen miles, for which the courier is paid $750 a year. That amounts to about $2.40 per trip. This man is compelled to keep two horses and a vehicle. He has to provide equipment throughout the year, meet the cost of all repairs and maintenance, and keep his family, all on $750 a year. His work on the route occupies the whole of his time, because the roads are bad and it takes him almost a whole day to make the trip. It costs him more than half of that $750 to maintain his horses and rig. He is on the road every day, six days in the week, and has only six holidays throughout the year. In the performance of his duties he is out in all kinds of weather, rain or shine, cold or hot, and over all kinds of roads. I think the minister was not listening when I said that all this man received for his services on this route of fifteen miles was $750 a year, or about $2.40 a trip, and he has to supply the whole equipment. The government supplies nothing. His brother delivering mail in the city receives a minimum of about $1,080 a year, with the chance of advancing each year until he reaches a maximum of $1,500. In addition, he is provided with at least one suit of clothes, if not two, per year, and I think also his boots, and he has no equipment expenses of any kind. Of course he has his family to keep, but the man in the country has his family as well. There is no comparison between the amounts paid by way of remuneration for these two services, and I do not see how the Postmaster General can refuse to take into consideration the conditions under which the rural mail couriers work. Of course we know that they tender for the route and that generally the price is set by the man himself—but not always, because the system of tender is such that the tenderer is compelled to put in the lowest figure at which he thinks he can get the work. I know of cases where the inspector who opens the tenders has peddled them around amongst the different tenderers to see if he could not get a lower bid. That has been done more than once in the section from which I come.

Mr. VENIOT: That has been changed. All the tenders are now sent to my department.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I am glad that change has been made, because I know that the practice prevailed some years ago. I hope the minister will take into consideration the comparison I have made between the remuneration of the mail carrier in the city and that of rural mail courier, and that the latter will receive better remuneration for the work they perform.

There is another point. At the end of four years, if these rural mail couriers wish to retain the route, they have to put in a new tender. If they do not carry on with the work they have their team and rig on their hands, and frequently they have no further use for them; consequently in many cases they put in a lower bid than they otherwise would have done. The average equipment, if it is anything like decent equipment, costs between two and four hundred dollars; in fact it is only very poor equipment that you can get for $200. If they lose the contract at the end of the term they are left with that equipment on their hands; consequently they will sometimes tender at a lower rate for the second contract if they think there is any possibility of another man getting the route. These things should be taken into consideration by the minister, and I hope he will lend a sympathetic ear to the representations that are being made on behalf of these rural mail couriers. I hope the discussion to-day will assist the minister in doing justice to these men.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I think, Mr. Speaker, in the ten minutes that are left before six o'clock I can conclude the few remarks I have to make. I must congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) on bringing this matter before the house. I have a keen appreciation of any political manœuvre, and I think the motion of the hon. member for South Wellington is good political manœuvring. He and his party wish to be able to say to the rural mail carriers throughout the country: We have been endeavouring to give you greater remuneration, but the government, which spends thousands of dollars elsewhere, won't give it to you. I would have been more pleased with my hon. friend had he told us how he proposes to go about this thing, whether he intends to include other classes with the rural mail carriers. I have no rural mail carriers in my constituency, but I have a man who drives the mails from the railway station to the post office, and another man who furnishes the horses and equipment for collecting the mail from the city mail boxes. Now, if it is an utterly vicious system, as has been remarked by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart)—

An hon. MEMBER: Principle.

Mr. POWER: If it is an utterly vicious principle to call for tenders for the delivery of the rural mails, it is an equally vicious principle to call for tenders for the collection of mail from the city mail boxes. So we would be handing somebody in the city $30,000 or $40,000 annually, absolutely without tender. The principle involved is exactly the same. I know of some cases where men have actually lost money on the contract for collecting mail from the city mail boxes. The same principle would apply no doubt to the men who collect the mail at the railway stations and deliver it to the post offices—a matter of probably five, six or ten thousand dollars in some of the large cities. That is one fault which I wish to point out in the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington, and which I think if he is sincere he will find means of correcting.

There is this other fault. When the hon. member goes before these rural mail carriers and tells them that he wished to increase the pay that they are getting, I wonder if he will tell them that under his proposal perhaps 75 to 80 per cent, possibly 90 per cent of them would be under the jurisdiction of the commission, unless they are blanketed in at so much a month, something which I think we are not permitted to do under the present regulations, and something which I am sure would meet with serious opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite. I am quite sure that if the Postmaster General were to propose that all the rural mail carriers be blanketed in at so much a month there would be a howl from the other side of the house. Then if those men are to comply with the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that applications will be called for, notices will be put up in the post offices that on a certain date candidates for the position of rural mail carrier from such a point to such a point must appear before the commissioner's examiner. If in our district they would have to present themselves at McGill university, because on the last occasion when the commission wanted cleaners for the public buildings in Montreal they called for an examination at that university. In any case the rural mail carriers would have to be between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five, and many an old, respectable and honest mail carrier has been carrying on his work for forty or fifty years, loyally to the department and to the country; such a man would not be allowed to sit for examination. Then they would be questioned on all subjects under the sun, such as, What is the capital of Patagonia? Who was the last king before Herod built the pyramids? What is the depth of water at Anticosti island? And so on and so forth, in short, whatever ingenious questions any intelligent gentleman in the Civil Service Commission may conceive of. That is what would be involved by this proposition if it goes through.

Then it has been suggested to me that there is something else. Altogether apart from the qualifications of the man who drives the mail conveyance, will we not have to set up—taking him probably from the department of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)—an examiner of horses? A civil service commission which examines into the qualifications of charwomen and labourers surely can give some decision on horses.

Mr. BENNETT: That would mean another trip to Europe to inspect.

Mr. POWER: I have no doubt the hon. member might have to go to Europe if this thing passed. We will have all these factors, which must be considered before giving a vote on the proposition before the house. I submit, sir, that in view of the fact that my hon. friend from South Wellington has not explained just how he expects to enforce the scheme which he asks the Postmaster General to accept, and as it is purely a political manœuvre in that it is a vote of want of confidence in the government, he himself can hardly expect it to be accepted by this side of the house. I submit, further, when those whom he pretends to benefit by this suggestion realize what it does mean, that in 75 to 80 per cent of the cases the present incumbents will not be benefited, he will lose a great deal of the sympathy with which this proposition must have been received in the country.

There is one other point I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that if these men work hard all the year, if they are obliged to carry on their duties in all weathers, they do it by choice. They tender to do the work at a certain price. They know just what the distance of the route is, generally they live in the locality, and in a large number of cases the same men carry on the work year after year. Having entered into a contract with the department it is their duty to abide by it. I have every sympathy for them; I think possibly they should ask for higher rates, but if in their own interests they do not feel justified in doing so, I see no reason why we should increase the expense of this service.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Chairman, had it not been for the speech of my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Power) I should not attempt to discuss the motion of my hon. friend from South Wellington.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York) moved the second reading of Bill No. 89, for the relief of Naomi Pauline Wilson.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, after the discussion which took place yesterday there is perhaps not much to be added to the comments upon this or any other bill for divorce, but I feel it is only fair that we should dignify the bill with a vote of the house to see how hon. members regard it.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): There is precisely here a point which exemplifies the system. As I told the house last night, in the recess between six and eight o'clock I had to go through some sixty records of evidence, classifying them in alphabetical order, then taking the list of bills before the house and trying to ascertain which of the records of evidence corresponded with each bill. There is no indication whatever. These records are sent to us in groups without any indication of their relation each to the particular bill called when such legislation is before the house. This evening I happened to have an advantage over most other members in that I took a little time between six and eight to look into the records and I succeeded in marking about one half of them with letters corresponding to the bills to which they relate. Then, in the expectation that these bills would be called in their order, I began reading the evidence respecting the first bills likely to be taken up.

We were told last evening, and I think quite properly, by such hon. gentlemen—to mention only two—as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—two hon. gentlemen who, I think I may say without exaggeration, are shining lights in parliament and in Canada with regard to judicial and legal matters—that in respect of the question now before us we in this house are acting as the highest court of justice in the land. These hon. gentlemen have told us that, parliament having seen fit to establish no jurisdiction respecting divorce in either the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec, parliament itself acts as the highest court of justice in Canada, and that therefore it is the duty of every hon. member of this house to take with respect to these bills the attitude of a judge or of a juror. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, whose personal views I well know and to whose sense of duty as well as his dignity I can testify, regarding him both as a public man and as a friend, compared our position to that of judges in his own native province of Nova Scotia, where courts of divorce have been established and have exercised jurisdiction for many years. As he said, there are in these courts Roman Catholic or perhaps Anglican judges whose religious beliefs are entirely antagonistic to the principle and practice of divorce, but who nevertheless consider that, having to exercise their jurisdiction, they must take cognizance of every case which is brought before them in order to apply the law according to the facts, and irrespective of their personal views; they must invoke the principle of law applicable to such cases. If such is our position it seems to me impossible for us to pass any judgment, or rather to adjudicate upon any of these cases, conscientiously and intelligently without knowing all the circumstances of each case as it comes before us.

It has been said that in this matter we act as a court of appeal; that by common consent and usage a committee of parliament performs—rather, I should say, now, committees perform—the duty of a court of inquiry; they find the facts and, it is said, all that we have to do is to ratify, so to speak, their judgment. But I do not think it has been suggested by anyone, either by the leader of the opposition or by any of the other legal members of this house, that we can pass final judgment in the matter, conscientiously and with intelligence, without at least knowing the evidence. One hon. member on the other side of the house has made the statement that it takes a very short time to read the evidence, that in about fifteen minutes any one of these records can be read. He went further and said that in the committee of the senate it took about twenty-five minutes for that court of inquiry to hear the witnesses, to hear the pleas of lawyers and to render their judgment. In other words, in twenty-five minutes a committee of one of the branches of this highest court of justice in the land declares that a marriage is null. That is the position and we as a court of review, a court of appeal or, if you prefer it, as a ratifying body passing final judgment upon the findings of a committee of the senate, come here to decide upon these cases. A bill is called and it stands; another bill is called and it stands, a third bill is called and stands and so we come to the fifth or the sixth on the list. Who has the time to read the records and the evidence in the six bills which may be called within two minutes? We are told that it is our duty to place our stamp of ratification on the findings of the court of inquiry, the divorce committee of the other branch of parliament. I appeal seriously to the other members of this house; whatever title we give ourselves, whether we call ourselves a parliament, whether we call ourselves one-half of that so-called high tribunal, or whether we style ourselves a court of review which revises and passes final judgment upon the findings of the other branch, can we do so without knowing upon what we must adjudicate? Here is a bill called; I have not read the evidence, although I read the records of the three previous bills. By the way what bill has been called, may I ask?

An hon. MEMBER: Bill No. 89.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have not read the evidence in that case and I am not prepared to adjudicate upon this bill, leaving aside entirely the question of principle which was discussed at length, and not without benefit, last night. I cannot say whether or not this bill is proper; I know from what little time I was able to give to these records yesterday and to-day that in many instances cases have been made by the evidence of the party asking for the divorce, the evidence of one policeman especially hired to make the case, and by the lawyer acting for the appellant, who sometimes turns himself into a witness to complete the evidence. I found two such cases this evening in the eight or ten records through which I glanced; the lawyer requested permission to take off his gown in order to turn himself into a witness. I ask the shining legal lights of this house whether there is any court of justice in this country which would admit such evidence upon which to render judgment even in the most trivial case, civil or criminal. In these cases we have the testimony of one party, who of course is interested in getting judgment; we have the evidence of a policeman or detective hired to make the case for that party, and we have the evidence of the lawyer hired to win the case. In all fairness and coolness I ask, and I appeal to the sense of justice and social order of every member of the house: Is this the way in which justice is to be dispensed by the highest court of the land? I think that aspect is worthy of consideration before we proceed.

I did not want to refer to this particular bill at any greater length, but once more I enter my protest against this system and I am prepared to vote against the second reading of this and all similar bills.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): Although I do not desire to close the debate perhaps I might be permitted a word of explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman speaks now he will preclude any other member from speaking. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman have leave to speak?

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it not possible for us to have an explanation from the promoter of the bill without necessarily closing the debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken, but by leave of the house he may proceed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it might help a great deal if the sponsor of the bill could give us an explanation, however short.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it would help if we could have some explanation from the hon. member, even though it be short.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman should make an explanation, notwithstanding the rule? By unanimous consent the hon. member may speak on the bill without closing the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LAWSON: In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I deem it advisable to offer a word of explanation with respect to this bill. The committee duly constituted under the rules of parliament has passed upon the evidence brought before it; in this case it has recommended a bill of divorce upon the only ground on which such a bill will be recommended by that committee.

Without going into details of the evidence, may I say for the information of hon. gentlemen that from fifteen years' experience in practising before the courts I look upon this as a case in which it has been most conclusively proven, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the respondent to this petition has been guilty of the act of adultery. That has been proven by calling the female party to the act; it has been proven by the evidence of a witness who happened into the place where the act was committed. Any reasonable man reading the evidence in this case must perforce come to the conclusion that an act of adultery was committed.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): If it is in order I would like to suggest that a committee of this House of Commons meet with the senate committee on these divorce bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: The private bills committee of the House of Commons considers these divorce cases; it is a custom of the house to refer divorce bills to that committee. In addition, some of the members of that committee are appointed to attend the meetings of the senate divorce committee, and I understand that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is one of the members appointed for that purpose.

Mr. TUMMON: If my memory serves me aright, six members of the private bills committee were appointed for that service this year, in view of the fact that two senate committees were sitting.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Once more I have been fortunate enough to listen to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and while listening to it I was struck with the lack of point in it; I could not make out to what the hon. member addressed his remarks. I suppose he intends the house to gather from his words that we must stop considering all divorce petitions; otherwise his remarks lead us nowhere. To some extent he finds fault with the deliberations of the senate committee, and he says one case took up only about twenty-five minutes. I can quite understand a case in which there is no contradictory evidence being conclusively proved in twenty-five minutes or even less. As mentioned by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson), I can well imagine a case being called where there was no argument or presentation by counsel, only two witnesses being heard, and the whole case being closed up in fifteen minutes. But hon. members must not think that the hearing of every petition takes only twenty-five minutes. I have heard of contested cases which have lasted the better part of a week.

I do not agree that this is a court of appeal, or a court which is to judge whether or not a petition is well founded. This function has been delegated to a committee, which committee is chosen from the senate because of some supposed judicial capacity. The Hon. Senator Willoughby, who was the chairman of that committee last year, is a lawyer of very wide experience and is well qualified to sift out the evidence. The proceedings are carried on in a very formal manner, much more formally than in many courts of higher jurisdiction. The lawyers must gown and the rules of evidence are strictly enforced That committee has the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses. When you to go to a court to appeal from the findings of a trial judge without a jury, you find that that court will almost invariably accept the findings of fact which have been made by the trial judge. Why? Because he has had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and judging from their demeanor and the manner in which they presented their evidence whether or not this or that side is to be believed. His function is to sift the evidence where there is contradiction, and to frame his judgment accordingly.

If the hon. member finds himself in difficulty, I would suggest that he read the evidence as it comes to him. A good deal of the evidence is quite formal and can be skimmed over quickly in order to obtain a knowledge of the facts. If he finds a case in respect to which he considers insufficient proof has been offered, let him make a note of that case and bring it up here for discussion. I do not think the hon. gentleman will find very many cases in which he feels that he, as a member of parliament, should intervene and cast doubt upon the finding of the trial court —the senate committee—which has been set up. If the hon. gentleman would adopt some such plan I believe he would find that the few cases in which he desired to intervene would not ocupy much of his time in the house. He can attend the committee to which this bill will be sent if it is passed on, and have witnesses called and the whole case reviewed.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member wish to convey to the house his belief that the present method of dealing with divorce bills is adequate, or does he suggest that it is practical for every member to give that attention to these bills which might be expected of one who was going to sit in judgment upon the case?

Mr. GEARY: I certainly do. That is part of the business of the houses of parliament; that is part of the duties which we have sworn to perform. If it takes a long time, so much the worse. Who is to say that a divorce petition, any more than a petition for the incorporation of a company, is beneath the attention of this house? It is the duty of the members to acquaint themselves with the facts, and if it takes a long time, that cannot be helped. We have been vested with this jurisdiction, and we should not shirk our responsibility.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With reference to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), does the hon. member consider it proper that the barrister who appeared as counsel for the petitioner, and who afterwards disclosed himself to be a brother-in-law of one of the parties involved, should appear as a witness in the case?

Mr. GEARY: I see no reason for saying that he is not competent; whether or not his evidence would carry any weight is a question for the court.

Mr. BOURASSA: We are the court.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In this instance there were apparently only two witnesses, the brother-in-law who was acting as counsel, and the lady in the case who was accused of having improper relations.

Mr. GEARY: She admitted that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but that is only one case.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I venture to intrude in this debate merely to remind the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the evidence in the case is not before the House of Commons on the second reading of this bill. We have been discussing this case as though the evidence were involved in the discussion. In fact it has nothing to do with the second reading of this bill. That evidence is available when the bill goes to the committee, and if the committee does not desire to utilize that evidence it may call witnesses and have the case proven there. We have been treating this matter as though the evidence had something to do with it. This senate record really should not be in our hands until after the bill goes to the committee, and the real difficulty has arisen because we have taken the evidence and attempted to deal with it before that time. On the second reading of this bill all we do is refer the bill to the committee which is to decide whether or not the petitioner is entitled to a divorce. As the law now stands that is a constitutional principle. There being no delegation of the powers of parliament to a court, therefore this parliament considers the matter. I urge my hon. friend to reconsider his position in the light of what I am sure anyone will tell him is correct; that the second reading of this bill merely affirms that constitutional principle, and that only, and it is wholly out of order to discuss the evidence which was given before the senate committee. That evidence can be discussed when the bill has been given its second reading and sent to the committee. Some member of our committee will move that the senate committee shall be taken as the evidence in the case, because it is given under oath. If a sufficient number of the members of the committee desire that the case should be proved again, witnesses may be called.

With all due deference, it does seem to me that this discussion as to what the evidence discloses is wholly out of order until such time as the bill has gone to the committee. The evidence taken before the senate committee is not properly before the commons until the bill has been referred to a committee of the commons, and that committee may take its own action to determine what shall be done with respect to the bill, either by approving the evidence taken before the senate committee or by asking that evidence be taken de novo.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), he is arguing that we should not discuss the merits of this particular bill at this stage; that that should be done when the report comes from the private bills committee. What we are discussing now is the principle of divorce. I attempted to convey to the house yesterday the terrible extent to which the evil of divorce had been scattered throughout the Dominion, not only by the action of the provincial legislatures which created divorce courts, but by the actions of this parliament as well. But that is only a part of the harm which is being done. There are a number of people who do not dare to face public opinion in Canada by coming to parliament or to the provincial courts in order to obtain divorce, but who go beyond our borders and secure divorce elsewhere. I have under my hand the official statistics furnished by the Department of Trade and Commerce, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and I wish to read the following paragraph showing the extent to which divorce has spread in Canada. Last year 785 divorces were granted in Canada by the courts and the Dominion parliament. This is what the Dominion Bureau of Statistics says:

Divorces granted in the United States to persons married in Canada.

A fact which throws considerable new light on the divorce situation in Canada is found in the Marriage and Divorce Bulletin of the United States Bureau of the Census. The statistics of this publication indicate the surprisingly large extent to which divorces are granted in that country to persons married in Canada. Thus, in 1922, no fewer than 1,368 divorce decrees were granted to couples married in Canada, a number more than two and one-half times as large as the total number granted in Canada in the same year. This number also formed 36.2 per cent of the number of divorces granted in United States during the year to couples married in foreign countries, while, at the same time the percentage of the Canadian-born population to the total foreign-born amounted to only 8.1 per cent. The Bulletin goes on to say; "It is possible that many Canadians acquire a residence in the United States for the sole purpose of obtaining divorce because, in general, divorce laws are more liberal in the United States than in Canada." Of the 1,368 divorces granted in 1922 to couples who had been married in Canada, no fewer than 462 were granted by the courts of the state of Michigan, while 135 were granted by the courts of the state of Washington and 128 in California. No later figures than the above have been published in connection with the dissolution of marriages contracted outside the United States.

Those who read the Montreal papers may have noticed last week or the week before that a judge held that Canadians married in Canada cannot obtain a divorce in the United States and then come back to this country and imagine that their divorce is valid here. According to the findings of that judge people who are married in Canada can have their marriage annulled only in Canada if they intend to remain citizens of this country. We find ourselves in the position of having hundreds and, perhaps before long, thousands of Canadians who, not wishing to go through the very unpleasant ordeal of bringing up their cases before the senate or the provincial courts, go into a foreign country, secure a divorce there and return to Canada. The number of marriages being dissolved is such a serious matter that, to use a French expression, malgré nous, in spite of ourselves, we are obliged to deal with the problem of divorce. I hope the time will come when the public in Canada will realize the deplorable state of affairs and take some action in the matter. I have conscientious objections to divorce, but I hope the day is fast coming when members elected by the public will realize that the present state of affairs is beyond common sense and that means must be found to end it.

It has been said that the fathers of confederation did not impose divorce either on Ontario or on Quebec. There were originally four provinces in the confederation. Divorce existed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick prior to confederation and, that being the case, they had to provide in the constitution for that condition. They put it under federal jurisdiction on the ground that the federal parliament would be more difficult of access and the procedure more costly, the result being that divorce would be discouraged. They were right at the time, because in the first ten years after confederation only seven divorces were granted, whereas we have reached 293 during the present session. Of course public opinion in Canada has somewhat changed in regard to this question. The official bulletin ascribes that to the war and the consequences of the war. That may be true, or it may not; but what is happening in Canada is happening unfortunately in all countries, and, while not wanting to make any criticism, I can only repeat and urge that the position we now occupy is a false one, because the hearing of these witnesses occurs in the senate, whereas the House of Commons as represented by its private bills committee does not see the witnesses or hear the evidence. There are now on the order paper forty-one divorce bills which stand for second reading and seventeen that have been read the first time at this sitting. Is this the way the parliament of Canada is going to act—to dissolve seventy or seventy-five marriages in perhaps a few minutes, throw the children out on the street and give to the guilty party the same privilege that we give to the innocent party? Our sympathies naturally go with the innocent party, but by the second clause which we insert in the divorce bill we give the guilty party the right to marry again; the result of our judgment is inevitable.

Nobody objects to a judicial separation provided that it is properly carried out. That is the law we have in the province of Quebec under clause 185 of the code, and separations take place daily. Alimony is provided for the wife and proper care is taken of the children. But in this case nothing of the kind happens; we simply break the marriage tie and put the guilty party on the same footing as the innocent party. If we were to remove the second clause from these bills, that is the clause authorizing the people to re-marry, I do not think you would have ten per cent of the applications you have at the present time.

Therefore I can only repeat what I said yesterday, namely, that I am conscientiously opposed to divorce; I am opposed to it for the stronger reason now that it has become the greatest problem we have to deal with in this country. What will it be in five or ten years from now unless some means are devised to stop it? The only way we can stop it is to make it as difficult as possible to obtain divorce and, when it is granted, it should be granted in an equitable manner so that the innocent party will be treated differently from the guilty.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I will take up only a moment of the time of the house in order to correct a statement made yesterday during a similar debate. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) was referring to the time of the house being taken up on these matters and stated that two members in this corner of the house, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), and myself, were members of the private bills committee. I denied the statement at the time, as I am not a member of that committee; but the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), seeing my name on the votes and proceedings, said that I was. The Hansard reporter did not catch my second denial, and so I take this opportunity of saying that, although my name appears in the votes and proceedings through a clerical error, it was intended to be that of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence). I am not a member of the private bills committee and therefore I have a perfect right to raise my voice in protest against or in support of any of these bills that come up in the house. I draw the attention of the house to that fact because, according to Hansard, page 1592, it looks very much as if I were a member of that committee.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Lawson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. BALDWIN: I voted for the bill in error, Mr. Speaker. I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: A vote once given cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York) moved that the bill be referred to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—RURAL MAIL CONTRACTS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the house go into committee of supply and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker, I doubt if there is any more exacting responsibility in the public service of this Dominion than is involved in the carrying of His Majesty's mail, and I also doubt whether that responsibility is discharged under any greater handicap than obtains in the rural districts. As the mover of the amendment (Mr. Guthrie) has stated, the change proposed has to do not with a theory but with a recognized condition. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has suggested that the amendment is prompted merely by political expediency. I submit, sir, it is quite apparent that the government of the day, while opposing the change now, will as a matter of political opportunism incorporate it in their preelection budget next session.

It does seem to me that throughout the various provinces it is recognized that this change should be made. It has been sponsored by those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, and it should be adopted by those who sit to your right. Everyone familiar with rural conditions realizes the handicap under which the rural mail carriers serve the department. Those of us who travel the highways and byways of the Dominion recognize that the average rural mail carrier is not a very good advertisement for the Postmaster General's department. The rattle of his dilapidated buggy and the stagger of his poor lame and blind horse are familiar intimations that approaching you is the rural mail carrier, one of the servants of the Postmaster General.

I have had some experience in feeding cheap horses and also in feeding horses cheaply, and I am in a position to state that even for the figures quoted by the hon. member for South Wellington a horse cannot be maintained in reasonably fit condition for the mail carrying service. To show that the figures I am about to give the house are reasonable, I ask the indulgence of hon. members while I go into details. It has been admitted that a mail carrier needs two horses. I submit that $100 is a reasonable price per horse. That represents $200, the interest on which would be $12, at 6 per cent. The cost of feed, hay and oats at present prices, at the country point, would be $150 each, or $300 per annum. And then there is the depreciation in regard to each horse, because I submit that no horse can stand a rural mail service on rough country roads for a longer period than five years, so that depreciation can safely and sanely be estimated at $20 per horse, or $40 per annum for the two. As regards horse shoeing—and many times the horse would have to go unshod—I would estimate $25 each, or $50 per annum for the pair. Then interest, depreciation and repairs in connection with the vehicle, together with blankets and general equipment, would represent another $30. This brings the total to $432, as the minimum expenditure which the rural mail carrier in Canada must incur. Now if the first estimate which has been given of the amount the mail carrier receives—$720—is correct, it would leave him $290 or less than a dollar a day; while if the second estimate is correct—$800—he is left with $370 per annum or $1.25 per day. Perhaps those with large families receive the second rate, $800. I wish to point out that this is a ridiculous state of affairs in the public service of this Dominion. We have been told that the messengers in this house, who merely stand at attention and wait for someone to tell them what to do, receive $4 a day. Yet here are men who are obliged to drive up and down this country in all sorts of weather, on stormy days, every day of the week but Sunday, travelling frequently through blizzards, over snowdrifts and through muddy roads. And this is the remuneration they get for loyal service to an important branch of the public service.

Not only are the rural mail carriers expecting relief in this matter, but they are entitled to it, and it seems to me that the people of Canada would approve of this increased expenditure especially in view of the fact that this government, though it preaches economy, is spending money to beautify this city and at the same time is increasing the salaries of deputy ministers, securing new automobiles—some members of the government take their cars with them wherever they go—and expending money in other directions. These are the apostles of economy, the friends of the poor man; yet they cannot pay a reasonable remuneration to men who are engaged in this important work and who are rendering just as loyal service as any other employees in the government. Surely it is high time that these rural mail carriers were given some consideration. It is not a joke or a gesture, as the hon. member for Quebec South has suggested. We are faced here with a very real problem. These men find themselves in a situation where it is impossible for them to keep their wives and families on the wages paid by the Postmaster General's department. For these reasons I submit that the motion proposed by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is fully warranted, and I appeal to the government to consider the matter favourably and to give to the rural carriers their just recompense for the splendid service they are rendering the whole Dominion.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): In rising to speak to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) I wish to refer to the first remark he made. He said that I had been notified of his intention to move this amendment. I received word of his intention at a quarter to three this afternoon, and in conversation with my assistant secretary, who got the word, I was told—I think that this perhaps was a misunderstanding—that the hon. member would deal with the question of railway mail clerks. Receiving that word at a quarter to three I immediately undertook to obtain all the information possible touching the situation and the salaries of railway mail clerks. I do not wish to offer as an excuse the short notice given with respect to this amendment; but I think that when an amendment of this importance is to come up, an amendment which involves if adopted an additional expenditure from the treasury of this Dominion of some $7,000,000 a year, a little more time by way of notice should be given to the person who has charge of the department which has to make the expenditure.

However, I have had an opportunity of listening to the speeches which have been made here this afternoon and evening, and while I am not going to say that our rural mail carriers are paid sufficient and might not be paid more, at the same time I wish to point out that the hon. member in proposing the amendment chose to deal only with rural mail deliverers, so to speak, because he directed his argument entirely to the 4,007 rural mail routes in Canada. He forgot altogether to deal with the six or seven thousand other mail carriers who do not deliver mail at rural boxes. If my hon. friend wanted to be fair—or whoever coached him and gave him the information on which he based his argument—he would not have overlooked that other class of hard working mail deliverers in Canada amounting to some 6,000.

Mr. ROWE: Who are they?

Mr. VENIOT: Exactly; I thought the question would be asked, and it shows that my hon. friend opposite does not know what he is talking about. There are 4,007 persons employed delivering mail on rural mail routes where there are boxes in which they can place the mail addressed to residents of those districts; and there are about 6,000 other mail contractors who use what we call the stage coach for delivery from post office to post office.

An hon. MEMBER: Who told you that?

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friends opposite have not posted themselves on the subject, and undoubtedly they have ignored these people. Let me point out that these people draw from the treasury of the Dominion the nice little sum of $1,550,000 for that service. They are pretty well paid, and if the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment had added that sum to the amount that we paid to those who deliver mail in the boxes on the rural routes he would not have arrived at the average he gave in making his comparison with the amount paid by the United States government. He would have obtained a much higher average; he would have found that with this addition we are not so far behind the United States in this regard.

Let me give some figures in this connection. Rural mail delivery is the delivery of mail to boxes along the mail routes established throughout the Dominion of Canada. Of these there are now 4,007, which number is increasing every year; I think 182 routes were added during the past year, and this service costs $2,825,317. If we were to pay a rate of $70 per mile, which hon. gentlemen say is the average paid under the monthly or yearly salaries in the United States, that would cost us $4,977,905. Stage services cost $1,550,000; under this new system which has been advocated they would cost $3,153,430. City services are on the same basis and include the delivery of mails from stations to post offices.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is done by your own department.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not done by the department; it is done under contract. That shows that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. We ask for tenders and contracts are given under those tenders. That service costs us $720,000; if it were carried on under the monthly salary advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite the cost would jump to $2,160,000. Then we have our side services from the railway stations to the post offices throughout the entire Dominion of Canada, and those services cost $1,050,000. If they were placed on the basis of a monthly or yearly salary that cost would increase to $3,150,000. In other words, under the basis advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite the cost for the services rendered in Canada would be $13,441,335 as against the present cost of $6,145,317, or a total increase of $7,296,018. These figures cannot be contradicted; they have been worked out to a nicety. Last year I made a similar statement with regard to the difference in cost, but at that time I did not give these details.

Then there is another feature in connection with this agitation; I think that word correctly describes it, although I do not wish to apply it to hon. gentlemen opposite. This agitation was started by a certain person in Canada who is making a living by going around and advocating the adoption in this country of the United States system. Now he is advocating that if this system be adopted it be made retroactive to 1917, and to show the folly of that argument let me point out that such action would mean an expenditure of $87,522,216. That is all that gentleman wants. This man is not even a mail carrier; he calls himself secretary of the mail contractors' or mail carriers' association of Canada. Everyone has heard him plead his case and everyone knows he is urging the mail carriers throughout Canada to carry on this agitation.

Let me point out that I have been considering this question since it was first brought to my attention, which I think was in the winter of 1928. Looking over the whole system as it exists in Canada to-day, Mr. Speaker, I believe hon. gentlemen will believe me when I say that this system cannot be reviewed in one or even two years. It will take time to attempt to work out something which will better these conditions, if they can be bettered, but let me say that Canada never can adopt the system in force in the United States, because of our sparsely settled districts. The United States, with the population much more concentrated, can do that which we could not undertake in Canada on the same basis. Let me go further: In attempting to make that review, at one time I did think it might be a good thing to try to arrange what might be called a minimum tender, after looking over the whole situation and getting all the information required. That would not do away with the tender system but it would provide that no tender below the minimum would be considered by the department. It may be said that now we can refuse a tender if we consider it to be too low, but that is not the case under the postal act, which provides that we must accept the lowest tender offered. Therefore, after reviewing the whole situation in order to see if a better system might be evolved, it may become necessary to ask for an amendment to the postal act, but I fear that if I should ask for that amendment immediately hon. gentlemen opposite would say that I wanted to play politics and handle the contracts for mail service as I saw fit. However, let me say to hon. gentlemen that if I am convinced that that is the proper method, no criticism from the opposition will deter me from doing what I think is right.

An hon. MEMBER: Whether right or wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly I would have very poor judgment if I could not distinguish right from wrong as well as my hon. friend. We are told that these men are not receiving an adequate return for their services, and we have been asked to compare what it costs these men to provide these services. A twenty-mile route has been taken as an example, with an average rate of $700. There are some routes in Canada twenty miles in length for which we pay as much as $1,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER: Surely not.

Mr. VENIOT: There are several of those routes.

Mr. SPENCER: For how many deliveries each week?

Mr. VENIOT: Six times a week.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are those routes?

Mr. VENIOT: I could not give them from memory, but if the hon. gentleman would like the information I will secure it. There are other routes forty-five miles one way and forty-five miles the other, for which we pay as much as $5,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER: Too much money.

Mr. VENIOT: Now we are coming down to what we might call brass tacks. These contracts are let under tender; and in addition there are rural routes which are only travelled three times a week. There are mail routes which handle the mail between railway stations and post offices two, three or four miles distant. Those are daily routes, and the carrier receives as high as $400 to $450 for the service. There are other routes of ten or fifteen miles, for which the carrier receives from $350 to $500. It takes only from three to four hours to cover that route, and the remainder of the time can be used as the carrier sees fit. The hon. gentleman should not forget that the mail contractors have the right to carry passengers and be paid for that transportation. This is the one fault I find with the system; many tenderers will tender low because they feel that they will be able to obtain a certain number of passengers during the year, and in that way they sometimes shut out what may be a more legitimate tender. The mail carriers are also permitted to carry parcels the same as an express company, and they are paid for that service. Provided they carry packages weighing more than fifteen pounds they do not infringe upon the regulations of the post office department, and they make considerable money from that service.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not a lot.

Mr. GRIMMER: Does that apply to the province of New Brunswick too?

Mr. VENIOT: It does.

Mr. GRIMMER: Can you give me an instance?

Mr. VENIOT: It is general all over Canada. The bus lines tender for the carriage of mail from post office to post office along their routes, and some of them carry from sixteen to eighteen passengers on the same trip with the mail.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: This motion does not involve that class of people; it is only the 4,007 rural mail carriers.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did you not include them? According to you, those poor fellows are receiving only starvation wages.

Mr. STEVENS: We will deal with them later.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman had thought of it he certainly would have included that class.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no.

Mr. VENIOT: I have enlightened the hon. member and he is going to go one step farther. I welcome that other step. At least I have opened the eyes of our friends of the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. VENIOT: When the hon. gentleman compared the remuneration here with what is paid in the United States he forgot to deduct from the American figures the cost of the rigs and uniforms which those men must have according to the regulations. He forgot to deduct the amount of money which has to be paid each year into the insurance fund, and he forgot to say that the maintenance of the vehicles is much higher in the districts where the population is concentrated than it is in the country districts of the Dominion of Canada. We have heard a lot about the cost and upkeep of the horses and rigs, and the fact that the outfit is of no use when the contract is not renewed, but I would tell the hon. gentleman that ninety per cent of the rural mail contractors are farmers. The rigs that they use are farm rigs, and if they lose their contract at the end of four years those rigs go back to the farm and do the work they are ordinarily called upon to do in that connection.

The hon. gentleman says that there is general dissatisfaction among the mail contractors of the Dominion. Last year out of 494 mail contracts renewed without calling for tenders, only 4 per cent advised that they did not wish to continue with the contract because they considered the price was too low.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They are living in hope.

Mr. VENIOT: It seems very significant to me that our friends opposite have awakened all at once to the duty they owe the mail contractors of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: We have been pleading with you for three years.

Mr. VENIOT: They were in power from 1912 to 1921 but they did not discover that the contractors for the mail routes in the Dominion of Canada were being so poorly paid. Now that they are in opposition, now that they feel it necessary to cater to this element, they are prepared to lay down a policy. That policy was not laid down at Winnipeg; I do not find it in the Winnipeg platform, and I am not as yet satisfied that the hon. leader of the opposition has consented to the statement made by his deskmate the hon. member for South Wellington.

Mr. BENNETT: You need have no doubt about that.

Mr. VENIOT: The policy of a party is generally laid down by the leader of the party and not by one of his lieutenants.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman need not have any doubt about that.

Mr. VENIOT: I see the hon. leader of the opposition is awakening now to the necessity of a new plank in the platform, and is supporting the policy put forth this afternoon by his first lieutenant.

I do not intend to devote any more time to this question, beyong stating—

An hon. MEMBER: It is not worth it.

Mr. VENIOT: It may not be worth it from the standpoint of the hon. member, but apparently it is worth it from the standpoint of the hon. leader of the opposition, in order that there may be a new plank in the platform.

An hon. MEMBER: There is going to be an election.

Mr. VENIOT: That is why you are putting in this plank, so you may be able to use it at the next election.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. minister stating that there are 4,007 rural mail contractors receiving $2,825,317?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give the mileage covered by those contractors in the course of a year?

Mr. VENIOT: Surely the hon. member would not expect me to have that now.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume that is in the contract.

Mr. VENIOT: I could get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The average is 20 miles.

Mr. VENIOT: There is nothing in the department pertaining to post office matters which cannot be obtained.

Mr. ERNST: By a friend.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member desires me to do so, I will have the contracts gone over and I will produce the information this week.

I do not intend to deal with this matter at any greater length, beyond repeating what I said at the beginning. My attention was called to it in a casual way in 1928, and later on my attention was more closely drawn to it, I think towards the end of 1928. But from the spring of 1928 to the present time, some attention has been paid to the existing system, and we are reviewing the situation to see whether or not a more equitable system can be put into practice.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member means 1927, because he will remember that in 1928 we discussed the matter.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; it was in 1927 that my attention was first drawn to it. I thank the hon. member for the correction. I feel that I have enough information now to warrant my saying that the application of the United States system in Canada is an impossibility. But I do not say that a better system than the one we have cannot be put into practice and it is with that end in view we are at present reviewing the situation.

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew): In addition to the matter covered by the amendment of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), which points out that the policy of the Post Office department under the present government is to grind down the contractors who are the mail carriers on the rural mail delivery routes, there is the question of the present uncertainty of the length of their service. I have good reasons for repeating a statement I made a year ago in connection with this matter. We had in the county of Renfrew a mail contractor who, prior to the election of 1926, had a contract with three and a half years to run. That contractor happened to be wise enough to support me in the election, and what was the result? Immediately afterwards a few of the Liberal supporters in that county brought the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) and the result was that a questionnaire was sent out to every house on the route asking if they had any complaints to make with regard to the contractor. The answers came back without one objection; they were entirely satisfied with the contractor; they said that he was giving excellent service, and they hoped that he might be permitted to continue in his contract. But within two weeks of the report going in, the contract was cancelled and the service was again put up for tender. This is the case of a solemn contract entered into between a responsible minister of this government and a citizen of the land being openly violated, for what reason? Because the man happened to vote for a Conservative candidate in the election. Has it come to this in Canada, that in addition to these mail contractors being ground down as regards the rate of pay they receive, they are obliged to vote Liberal if they are to be allowed to continue in the service of the country? That is hardly fair to the mail carrier. I do not blame the Postmaster General for all this; there are others who are responsible in addition to him. He is not a bad man in many ways; but when he starts to explain to the house the tremendous expense involved in increasing the salaries of the rural mail carriers to the extent proposed by the hon. member for South Wellington, let me point this out to him: In the first place he advertises the Post Office department from one end of the country to the other as "service, not cost." This is a department looking for service, not for profit. When he tells us that at the present time the rural mail carriers are drawing from the government $2,800,000 odd and that an increase in accordance with the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Wellington would mean $4,977,000 odd; if he is anxious to make up the difference, let him not be afraid. All he has to do is to intercede with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to abandon his foolish project of pulling down the best part of the city of Ottawa and, instead, to hand the money over to the rural mail contractors.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. member give me the name of the contractor?

Mr. MALONEY: Does the minister want it now?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, or at any other time.

Mr. MALONEY: The man's name is Bernard Hartney and the rural route is No. 4, Eganville.

Mr. VENIOT: There are always two sides to a story and I will endeavour to tell the other one.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): No doubt the question before the house is quite an important one, and no doubt also it is quite ingenious on the part of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to make this motion at the present time. We cannot, however, help noticing that the amendment he has moved is rather contradictory, because in one breath he moves to cut out all further proposals in the estimates and to do away with all appropriations, and in the next he calls for an additional expenditure by the government of some one or two million dollars. No one knows better than the hon. member himself that this cannot be done. No one knows better than the hon. member that by moving his resolution, he cannot bring any relief to the rural mail carriers of Canada. I will deal with his resolution later.

There is a great deal of merit in what he has stated regarding the pay that the rural mail carriers are receiving, and I do not think he has overstated the case. In many cases the rural mail carriers are underpaid, and I am glad to hear from the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) that he has been giving the matter consideration and that he intends to endeavour to arrive at some rate or some minimum salary that will meet the situation in some way. But at the present time he is prevented under the act from doing so, and as we all know, the contracts can be renewed to the present carriers only at the existing rate of pay. It is also quite true that when tenders are invited, a large number of tenders are sent in and in many cases the present carriers ask that their contracts be renewed at the same rate and that the route be not put up for tender. I cannot quite agree with the argument that is sometimes advanced that this shows that the men are satisfied. On the contrary, I think it is quite true they are afraid that if they do not accept the contract at existing rates, they will lose the contract and that it will go to someone else. Therefore, rather than lose it, they are willing to enter into a new one at the same rate of pay. In the notice that is sent out there is a provision which reads:

> In this connection, I might remind you that while the Post Office Act empowers the Postmaster General to renew existing contracts for further terms, such renewals can be executed only on existing terms and conditions.

Until the act is amended it is impossible for the Postmaster General to enter into any sort of arrangement other than is provided for in the act.

The hon. member for South Wellington said this afternoon that the amounts of the tenders are gradually going down, that the rate of pay to the mail couriers is constantly decreasing. I do not know whether or not the facts bear out that statement. My own information is that in a great many cases, and I think this is generally true, the drivers on these routes are receiving a higher rate of pay at the present time than formerly, and that so far from the average rate of pay getting lower, it is yearly becoming a little better.

The hon. member for South Wellington also said that the whole tender system is wrong, and he advocated that we adopt a new system and put the whole rural mail service under the Civil Service Commission. As has been pointed out by some other speakers, this would not do away altogether with competition. Under the Civil Service Commission at the present time there is competition, not in respect of price but in respect of qualifications. I think the point brought out by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) this afternoon in that connection is very important. He pointed out that if this proposed change was adopted it would not mean that all the present couriers throughout the Dominion would be blanketed into the service under the Civil Service Commission and retain their positions. I know that our friends opposite would be only too glad to demand that every mail courier throughout this Dominion immediately throw up his job, and that all these positions be advertised by the Civil Service Commission. We know what the result would be. We know that competitive examinations would be held and a great many of the present couriers would lose their jobs, which would go to people now outside the service, and so the relief which my hon. friend seeks to bring to the mail couriers could not be given under the change he proposes.

I would point out that the mail couriers are not the only ones in the government employ who, to my mind, are not receiving adequate pay. We have lighthouse keepers throughout this Dominion. Their positions are under the Civil Service Commission. Now if there is any class of people in the government service throughout this Dominion who serve long hours in very lonely out-of-the-way parts of the country, it is the lighthouse keepers, but in a great many cases they receive very small remuneration. I have a letter here which I would like to put on Hansard with reference to the salary of a lighthouse keeper, and I am quoting this to make a comparison with the remuneration of the mail couriers. The letter is as follows::

> I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo with respect to the salary paid for the keepership of the North Point light, Tignish.

Mr. SHORT: I object to the hon. gentleman bringing the lighthouse service into this discussion on the rural mail delivery service. He can bring up the lighthouse service when the estimates of the Marine and Fisheries department are under consideration. What has the lighthouse service to do with the rural mail service?

Mr. McLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend is not living up to his name. His name is Short, but on interruptions he is long. I am speaking to the amendment which has been moved to the motion to go into supply, and it is quite relevant to the question before the house to make a comparison of the salaries paid in different branches of the public service. But if my hon. friend wants to make another speech, I will give him the floor.

Mr. SHORT: I have not spoken on this matter as yet. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order for the hon. member to bring in the lighthouse service when the question before us is the rural mail delivery service.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's remarks should be relevant to the subject matter of the motion before the house.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I think a comparison of salaries is quite relevant to the motion before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: But not the letter.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I can state the case without reading the letter, if the hon. leader of the opposition objects to that. The salary this lighthouse keeper receives is $480, for a yearly service. There are a great many cases where these positions are advertised, and when a vacancy is advertised there is always a large number of applications. I have in mind a case where a position was advertised at Summerside in my province. The man was acting as temporary lightkeeper and was giving splendid service; he was quite able to carry out his duties. But the position was advertised by the Civil Service Commission, and he had to step out and someone else came in. A returned soldier got the preference. We have no objection to that, of course. I am simply pointing out what would happen if all the positions in the rural mail delivery service were advertised by the Civil Service Commission.

I know our friends opposite wish to make some political capital out of this question. I do not blame them for that because that is their privilege. But the hon. member who moved the amendment knows perfectly well that he can bring no relief to the mail couriers under his motion. He knows that the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for the house to go into committee of supply was made in order that we might discuss and vote on the appropriations of moneys that are required for carrying on the public service of the country, and he knows perfectly well that his amendment to that motion is simply holding up the house from going into supply and voting the money that is required to carry on the country's business. It is a want of confidence motion, and I do not propose to be put in the position of not explaining my position clearly on this matter.

In our province we have in our rural service as fine a class of drivers as can be found anywhere in this Dominion, and they give us splendid service. It may be a surprise to my hon. friends to know that right in my home district where I have lived the best part of my life one of the first rural mail routes in the whole Dominion was established, and now the system has spread throughout the whole province so that to-day there is not one part of the province that is not served by rural mail delivery. We have a splendid service and as fine a class of men as can be found anywhere, and we would be only too glad to see them get an increase in salary if that is possible. But I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment—for what reason? Because it is a want of confidence motion, and it cannot bring the relief which my hon. friend from South Wellington would like to lead the country to believe he desires to bring to the mail couriers under his motion. I therefore propose to vote against his amendment and to support the motion of the Minister of Finance that the house go into committee of supply and vote the money to carry on the public services of this country.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): I was not in the house when the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made his address this afternoon, but after listening to the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) I have sent over for the amendment, and I think the Postmaster General has not stuck to the text. The amendment reads:

> In the opinion of this house the present system of awarding contracts for the delivery of rural mail by tender has proved unfair, burdensome and unsatisfactory, and that such rural mail carriers should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission upon a permanent basis with a definite rate of pay, based upon mileage and the physical conditions of the territory involved, having regard to the amount paid to the other servants of the government for similar employment.

Now, I can scarcely be accused of being a recent convert to this proposed change, because the first time that I addressed this house I did what I could to bring to the attention of hon. members the unfair condition under which the rural mail carriers were working and the inadequate remuneration they were receiving. I think the Postmaster General is evading the question in asking why did not the previous government take care of this matter between 1911 and 1921. The Postmaster General was no doubt in this country during that time, and he must not forget that the war was followed by a very trying period of reorganization and rehabilitation. I do not think any unfair advantage was taken of him, because he had been having interviews from time to time with the Rural Mail Carriers Association. And, Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why the rural mail carriers of this country should not be free to band together in an association as well as any other class of people in this Dominion. I know not why the Postmaster General spoke so unkindly of this association last session. It is a real association; it is not like the Consumers League in which the word "consumer's" should be spelled with possessive singular. Simply because the preceding government did not remedy this unsatisfactory condition of affairs is no reason why we on this side of the house should not advocate remedial action on the part of the government. The preceding government was tried by the electorate and in their opinion, found wanting, and discarded. In the very near future this government is going to be tried by the electorate, and already we can hear a "sound of going" in the tops of the mulberry trees. I suppose the Postmaster General might have his chauffeur drive him out into the country in his $8,000 Stutz car to meet the mail carriers and tell them they are prosperous.

I was very much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I am a little hard of hearing, but as I drive about the country I can always distinguish the rattle of the mail carrier's buggy. I see no reason why the rural mail carriers should be the only men in the service of the Post Office department to be stood up every four years and shot at. I believe the Deputy Postmaster General has had his salary raised by two thousand dollars during the past year. and yet when we ask for a modest increase and a permanency of employment with a few holidays for these men who go over the country roads in all weathers the Postmaster General turns a deaf ear to our request. But I am glad to see he is in a little more conciliatory mood this year than last. Perhaps he has been advised that the time is coming when the Prime Minister will be again reforming the senate and lowering the cost of living and the price of farm implements, and on that occasion no doubt the Postmaster General will be holding out to these mail carriers the bait of fair remuneration.

I should like the Postmaster General to make this clear. I understood him to say that at the expiration of their contract letters are sent to all rural mail carriers asking if they are prepared to carry on for another four years at the same rate. If that is not correct will he kindly state with what particular ones does he communicate?

An hon. MEMBER: The favoured few.

Mr. SPOTTON: Are letters written to all of them or only to certain ones?

Mr. VENIOT: We generally like to renew the contracts of those against whom there are no complaints and whose official records show they are giving good service.

Mr. BENNETT: Political considerations govern.

Mr. VENIOT: No. If political considerations governed I would have had to deal with Conservatives, because until the last four or five years nearly every mail contractor was a Conservative.

Mr. BENNETT: That was before 1921.

Mr. SPOTTON: I am not yet clear as to the number and type of rural mail carriers to whom the Postmaster General writes asking if they are prepared to carry on.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot help you then.

Mr. SPOTTON: I accept the Postmaster General's word for the moment that only those against whom there has been no complaint as to their service—not their politics—are asked if they wish to carry on. I can name him a mail carrier in my riding with fifteen years' public service, against whom there was not a breath of complaint, but who was put up, his route advertised, and when the old and faithful servant and a new man tendered at the same figure, the Postmaster General's department wrote the defeated Liberal candidate asking who should get this contract, the old faithful servant or the new man. I think the Postmaster General has in mind the route in question.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I know the circumstances and will deal with the case when the time comes.

Mr. SPOTTON: Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to labour this question, having dealt with it rather fully last session. I feel that the rural mail carrier is entitled to a fair wage, to some guarantee of permanency of position, to holidays like any other civil servant, and to be treated as a human being. It seems to me that this is the only branch of his department where the Postmaster General can take a good fling at political patronage and declare "to the victor belongs the spoils." It has become an obsession with him, a plaything, and it would be unkind to deny him the little pleasure that this activity affords him.

As a basis of comparison let me take the letter carriers of the city of Toronto—and they are not overpaid. They get $1,440, or thereabouts, a year delivering mail from house to house; their position is permanent; they are cared for if they lose their health in the service, and presumably they are entitled to a retiring allowance. At any rate, these men, with no more intelligence, no more capability and no better type of citizens than the rural mail carriers, get $1,440 a year to walk for a few hours twice a day over their routes, and then they are free to go back home; whereas the poor rural mail carrier has to cover up to 32 miles over the snow banks in the winter and through the mud roads in the spring and fall, keep up two horses—all for $590 a year on an average. Taking the Postmaster General's own figures, the average is even lower—only $500 a year.

I fail to understand why he should attempt to draw a red herring across the track by talking about bus and stage coach service. This amendment has to do definitely and clearly with the rural mail carrier. It may be, as the Postmaster General would say if he were speaking in another province, that this is another of "those fanatics from Ontario" who object to "G.R." being taken off the mail wagons. It is most unfair to say that the rural mail carrier makes any money carrying passengers. In my constituency I do not think there is a single rural mail carrier who makes $5 a year in this way. The average rural mail carrier goes down the concession and back, and he will give any man a free ride, even though this government has him working at a starvation wage. Let me give the Postmaster General an instance. And remember I have a great deal of appreciation for the Postmaster General in many respects. He has shown a broad sympathy and human kindness in many little matters in my constituency which I have brought to his notice. But I think he can hardly be cognizant of this. In the village of Auburn the post office was moved down the street 39 rods, which shortened the mail carrier's route by twice 39 rods, and the Postmaster General sent down a high paid inspector, getting perhaps $10 a day with travelling expenses, to measure that distance of 39 rods, and he docked that rural mail carrier $10.48 per annum for the rest of his term. That surely is proving that he is a friend of the working man in this country.

To give consideration to this question at this late date is not offering much consolation to those men who are doing the hardest work in the Postmaster General's department and getting the least pay. The Postmaster General will say, "Why, it is let by contract". Well, you know, a man gets settled down in one walk of life and he is afraid to get out of that groove lest he may not make a success of anything else; and if the Postmaster General's position were advertised to-night he would take a few thousands less in order to retain it.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it is worth a great deal more when I have to listen to such criticism as that.

Mr. SPOTTON: Perhaps the truth hurts But let me tell the Postmaster General that he will continue to hear about it until this wrong is righted. So long as the poorest paid men do the hardest work in his department, receiving the least consideration, he is going to hear about the matter, and we are going to try to have him place the situation fairly before the house and not sidestep it by quoting bus line and stage coaches when he should be sticking to the plain rural mail carriers. The Postmaster General has not said that he would not accept his position at a few thousands less. Now a man has a rural mail contract and he is growing old He gave up his farm—and there are very few farmers in my constituency, not one out of ten, who carry mail. These rural mail carriers work steadily day by day. There is little else they can turn their hands to. And when their four years are up they may not be the ones to whom a letter is written—they may be of the wrong political stripe—asking them if they will carry on. The complaint has been registered that they voted U.F.O. in the last election and therefore they are put up at auction. The mail carrier is afraid he will lose his job. He has his horses and his rig and therefore he says, "I will tender a little less". If he is still able to exist, when the next four years expire he will tender again a little less. So that, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) said last year, the Postmaster General will soon be getting this work done for practically nothing.

I would ask the Postmaster General to give one sane reason why these men in his service should be the only men who are made political toys of. Is there any reason? I have heard the Postmaster General say that Canada has not lost one dollar through rural mail carriers, that they are honest, that they are efficient. And it is the only branch of his department of which he can so speak. Yet this is the way he proposes to reward honesty and efficiency. I know he has a particular grudge against a gentleman who went about striving to organize the rural mail carriers, a gentleman named McKinnon. The Postmaster General did not like it. He apparently thinks that the rural mail carriers did not know they were working too cheaply until Mr. McKinnon got a soap box and started a riot.

I wish once more to appeal to the Postmaster General to consider sane legislation in this matter, and to have the thoughts which he has in mind crystallized into legislation at least by next session so that these gentlemen can receive a fair wage according to the work that they are doing, instead of having ignominy cast upon them. Do not let the Postmaster General say to them, "You are the only gentlemen in my service who are not to receive the same treatment as others." I invite the Postmaster General now to come up to my constituency in his private car and send ahead his eight thousand dollar Stutz car, with chauffeur, and tell the people of that constituency that rural mail carriers or anybody else there are prosperous.

In closing I wish to say this. I feel that it is a blot on the fair name of Canada that we should meet many of the men carrying His Majesty's mail with the outfit they have. Last year I read in this house an account of a case in the city of Stratford where a rural mail carrier was taken before the court by the humane society for driving a horse which should not be driven. When Magistrate Makins learned that the Postmaster General was giving this man $1.75 a day to support that horse and rig and to maintain a family of five he dismissed the action. The same thing has occurred also in the vicinity of London.

Mr. VENIOT: Was not the party brought before the court, Fred Sitwell?

Mr. SPOTTON: I do not know the name of the mail contractor. I read about the case in the Daily Beacon and I wrote to the magistrate to find out whether the newspaper clipping was correct and he sent me a letter enclosing the clipping and saying, "yes, it was absolutely correct."

Mr. VENIOT: The man brought before the court was not the mail contractor but the brother of the mail contractor who sold the contract to him at $100 less than what he was getting from the government.

Mr. SPOTTON: Does the Postmaster General mean to tell this house that these contracts are sold from one man to another?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, we discovered that this man was doing it.

Mr. SPOTTON: And the Postmaster General is telling the house that he permits a mail contractor—

Mr. VENIOT: No, I did not say that.

Mr. SPOTTON: —to sell a contract—

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all. When we discovered it we cancelled the contract.

Mr. SPOTTON: And I suppose the Postmaster General discovered it when it was brought to his attention in this house; therefore that is one reason he does not like to listen to matters of this kind. Now I am not suggesting that the Postmaster General should put into effect what the mail carriers' association ask; I am not suggesting that he could put into legislation that which obtains on the other side. The rural mail carriers' association may be asking too much. But I want the rural mail carriers in my riding to know that the Postmaster General treats this matter in a very light vein—and it is no joke to those who are not properly provided for.

Mr. VENIOT: I am amused at the statement you made.

Mr. SPOTTON: I am not suggesting that he can put into effect what is now the law in the United States; I am not suggesting that he can give at once what the rural mail carriers' association are asking. It may be too much for the present. But I plead with him to grant some relief, to give some financial assistance to these men, and to make their positions secure. Their positions then will become permanent, and they will be able to give better service to the country. I wish the Postmaster General would take a look at the little covered wagon used by a rural mail carrier and then tell me what use could be made of it on a farm, unless the farmer has a milk route of about fifteen or twenty customers.

Mr. R. H. JENKINS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a few words to this discussion. In the first place let me say that I am entirely in sympathy with the great majority of the rural mail carriers throughout Canada who are asking for an improvement in their conditions, but I do not intend to be led astray by this plan of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), which is designed to embarrass me as well as many other supporters of the government.

If, as the hon. member suggests, these appointments should be under the Civil Service Commission, I must remember that a large number of the men at present employed in this work in my constituency would be out of a job. I understand that the age limit for applicants for civil service positions is thirty-five years, and this would shut out many of my friends.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why could we not change that section of the Civil Service Act? That could be done in five minutes.

Mr. JENKINS: It would be some job. Then, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has so well stated in his inimitable way, perhaps many of them would not be able to answer satisfactorily the exacting questions which might be put by the examiners. A number of men possibly not so well qualified as others in an educational way would be quite capable of giving good service in this particular work. Other qualifications also are taken into account, and some older men who perhaps were not physically fit to serve in the war would be shut out.

No well-defined plan has been outlined by hon. gentlemen opposite for looking after the present incumbents of these positions, and therefore I think this proposed amendment is only an effort to embarrass the government. As I have already stated, these rural mail carriers give excellent service for small remuneration. Not long ago a large number of these men and women, because in our province I think some women carry on this work, met at Charlottetown and placed their case before me. I promised to lay their representations before the government, and my colleague (Mr. Sinclair, Queens), the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) and myself have stated the case to the Postmaster General. It deserves serious consideration, and I am of the opinion that the government will be well advised to endeavour in some way to alleviate the difficulties under which many of these men labour. But, Mr. Speaker, to vote this government out of office and replace it with another in order to attain this end is, in my opinion, no solution of the difficulty.

I will tell my hon. friends and my supporters in the constituency which I have the honour to represent that I will support any reasonable measure intended to better the conditions of the rural mail carriers in Canada, but I prefer to have that matter attended to by the party to which I belong rather than by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the post office is a public utility, and no public utility in Canada should use its employees in the way the government uses these rural mail carriers. Where is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan); what has he to say about this? According to a table appearing on page 12 of the report of the Post Office department this service was operated at a loss from 1868 to 1901; from then on, with the exception of a few years, it has shown a surplus. Last year the net revenue amounted to $30,529,-154.76; the expenditure was $32,379,195.65, leaving a deficit of $1,850,040.89. Let us see how the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) uses some of the big fellows in this country; the present government hand the newspaper industry of this country a straight cash subsidy of about $8,000,000 a year. That is computed as the difference between the actual cost to the Post Office department of carrying the newspapers and what they receive for this work.
