Not receiving any reply to my letter addressed to the chief accountant of July 5, in which a copy of a letter from Raymond F. Hebert, father of the postmaster, was quoted, which was to the effect that Mr. Hebert had been in conversation with the hon. Postmaster General with a view of having the time of the settlement of his son's case extended, I made a visit to Dupey's Corners on the evening of the 15th inst., and saw the postmaster, who advised me that he did not have any money, but he thought that his father had come for me. I then called upon Mr. Hebert, Senior, who lives about ten miles distant from Dupey's Corners, and received from him the $75 mentioned above. Mr. Hebert advised me that it would be impossible for him to make any further payment on this account before spring.

In my conversation with him he stated that his son had told him that he was of the opinion there was $80 more that should have been placed to his credit than what has been. He was told that he must be mistaken in this, as the postmaster had not told me anything about it, but was advised that if the postmaster had any evidence that would show he had paid more than what was put to his credit to let me know at once.

Then followed a communication from the chief accountant to the district superintendent, merely acknowledging the receipt of the money and dealing with what was proposed to be done with respect to verifying the alleged facts touching the $80. I shall not take up the time of the house reading that. On October 6th, 1927, a letter was written to the financial superintendent by the district superintendent at St. John in the following words:

In reply to departmental memo of September 23, AB/JMH, relative to the shortage of the Dupey's Corner post office, and suggesting that an inspecting officer interview Mr. Hebert, sr., and have full investigation made of the claim that another $80 had been paid in for which credit had not been given, the financial superintendent is advised that Inspector Peck visited Dupey's Corner on the 4th inst. and interviewed Mr. Hebert, sr., as well as the postmaster, Edouard Hebert.

Upon questioning Mr. Hebert, sr., it was found that the extra amount which he thought had been paid was $50 instead of $80. He obtained this information from his son, as the son had informed him that he had made a payment of that amount at the time the office was inspected and the shortage discovered. He was shown that credit for this amount had been duly given opposite item 30 on the inspection report, and investigation shows that the amounts paid by him correspond in total with the credits given him up to the present time. The correct balance now due from him is $375.93, as per statement attached to the above-mentioned memo.

The inspector pointed out to both Mr. Hebert, sr., and the postmaster, the great leniency that had been shown them by the department, and pressed them very hard for another payment at this time. This they both stated was absolutely out of the question, and from observation made by the inspector, he is convinced that such is the case.

Mr. Hebert, sr., is undoubtedly doing his best to pay off the shortage, although he cannot promise to pay anything before spring, and it is thought that this duty will devolve entirely upon him, as the son has all he can do to make a living. The latter has a family of six in very poor circumstances, and great hardship would be entailed upon them if he were arrested, and nothing would be gained towards a speedier payment, as there is no security to offer for a loan, and the promises made by Mr. Hebert, which are thought to be sincere, offer the only means for the department to recuperate its loss.

I fancy the word was not "recuperate" in the original but that is the way the copy reads. On the 22nd day of November, 1927, a letter was written by the district superintendent of St. John directed to the Postmaster General.

Dear Mr. Minister,—

I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Raymond F. Hebert, Shediac, N.B., in regard to the misappropriation of post office funds by his son, Mr. E. R. Hebert, postmaster of Dupey's Corner, N.B., in which he expresses a willingness to make good the amount of the balance of the misappropriation, but says that he cannot pay the amount all at once. He states that his son has a large family of small children and his wife is delicate, and that it takes all he can earn to support his wife and family. He further states that he will pay $75 this coming winter and at the rate of $150 per year until the amount is paid up.

Mr. Hebert enclosed with his letter a letter that he received from you dated 31st October, which would indicate that you are satisfied to leave the settlement of this case to the district superintendent at Saint John.

As this case has some complications I hesitate to take the responsibility of making a settlement without first receiving direct instructions from you as to the department's wishes in the matter with authority to act.

Yours very truly,

H. W. Woods,
District Superintendent.

The letter referred to as being directed by the minister to Mr. Hebert was not attached to the file; it is not on the file. Now, the reply to that letter is found in a communication directed to the district superintendent,

Mr. Woods, by the acting financial superintendent, Mr. Atwater, under date December 1, 1927:

Referring to your communication addressed to the Postmaster General under date of the 22nd instant, you are authorized to make a settlement with the postmaster at Dupeys Corners for the payment of balance of the amount due the department on account of shortage in post office cash.

If the settlement suggested in your letter is the best that can be obtained in the circumstances, this may be allowed, but in permitting the postmaster to make good the amount in this way, the department must obtain adequate security that the amount will be paid.

Will you be good enough to immediately take up with the postmaster the question of security that is to be furnished by him, or by his father, who is making good the amount, to guarantee payment.

No promise of settlement can be made until the department is satisfied in regard to the security given.

To that letter Mr. Woods, the district superintendent, wrote a communication under date December 14, 1927, addressed to the financial superintendent, and although marked confidential it appears on the file. As it deals with purely public business, I assume it was put on the file for the purpose of being read. It reads:

Pursuant to directions contained in departmental memorandum of December 1st, authorizing a settlement with the late postmaster of the above office in accordance with suggestions made from this office under date of November 22nd, the superintendent is advised as follows:

On the 12th instant Inspector H. B. Peck interviewed Mr. Raymond Hebert, (father of the late postmaster) at Shediac who made the offer referred to in above-mentioned letter. Mr. Hebert stated that his property which he valued at $1,800 had a mortgage against it of $1,400. This the inspector verified by consulting with the attorney who transacts Mr. Hebert's business and he also stated that there was no one at Shediac who would join Mr. Hebert in becoming responsible for the amount in question. All the security Mr. Herbert could offer was his own notes. When informed that this was not sufficient and being asked if he had not some relative to assist him he replied that he had a brother who was a priest at Buctouche and to whom he did not wish to apply for assistance and who knew nothing of the matter.

The inspector suggested that he be given a letter of introduction to Rev. Phil. Hebert, the brother above referred to, notifying him that the matter would be laid before him with the intention of obtaining his signature to joint notes covering the amount due. This Mr. Hebert finally assented to and the inspector first obtaining the signature of Raymond Hebert to the notes covering the amount proceeded to Buctouche and after explaining the whole matter to the Rev. Phil. Hebert, the latter also signed the notes which are herewith enclosed.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The superintendent is assured that the above is the best settlement that could be effected and is undoubtedly considered adequate security for payment of the shortage.

The several parties were given to understand that the settlement as made was contingent upon its acceptance by the department and in no case was it to be binding nor did the department relinquish its right to take such further action as might be deemed advisable in the event of any or all of the notes not being met at maturity.

That closes the incident, except for a letter written by Mr. Atwater, the acting financial superintendent, under date December 19, 1927, in which he says:

Please find enclosed five notes in favour of the Postmaster General, to cover balance of shortage, not yet made good, by the postmaster, Dupey's Corner.

These notes have been signed by the postmaster's father, who is making good the amount, and Mr. Hebert's brother, who is parish priest at Buctouche, and who has consented to jointly sign the notes, as security for the department.

It is requested that steps be taken to have these notes brought forward at proper intervals, for settlement.

Steps should also be taken to withdraw the total amount from guarantee fund, to recoup revenue, and as each note is settled, the amount can be returned to guarantee fund.

That closes the incident so far as the records before us indicate. We now come to what may be described as the Shediac incident in connection with the administration of the office by Mr. Griffith. The record of that incident is not lengthy but it must be dealt with frankly. Before I deal with that however it may be convenient to deal with the case connected with the reports made by the district superintendent, Mr. Woods, to the chief inspector regarding the administration of the office by Inspector Griffith. As the committee is no doubt aware, it is the custom of the department to submit to the district superintendent annually an efficiency report, and on that efficiency report the ratings are made in relation to increases in salaries. In this instance we have before us two documents with the relevant exhibits dealing with the increase in salary to Mr. Inspector Griffith. I think perhaps it is well, without taking up too much time, to direct attention to the application made for the 1927 revision. The 1927 revision was for an increase in salary of $180 to take place April 1, 1927. District Superintendent Woods reported for instance a 90 per cent rating in regard to the quantity of Mr. Griffith's work; as to quality of work and industry, he gave a rating of 80 per cent; he rated at 90 per cent his intelligence, resourcefulness, initiative and ability to carry on work without supervision, his ability to carry out instructions, and his knowledge of the work of the branch. He placed at 80 his tact in meeting the public and in dealing with other employees, and at 80 his willingness to cooperate; his fairness toward assistants and his conduct in his relations with superiors was placed at 70; his physical fitness was placed at 90, punctuality at 80, ability to plan and supervise work and to instruct and direct others at 90; his judgment and ability to accept and carry responsibility at 80, and his success in charge of staff is placed at 90.

On the reverse of the sheet, however, the district superintendent was asked whether or not he could recommend that the inspector be given his salary increase, in these words:

26. In case the employee is not at his maximum, do you recommend him for increase in salary? No.

If not, state why. In view of the irregularities of Inspector Griffith as per report from this office of June 20th, 1927, regarding shortage in the accounts of the P.M. Dupey's Corner; also report of the 13th July, 1927, dealing with claim of Mr. Edwad T. Leger of Shediac that he had paid the inspector money which was not placed to his credit, the district superintendent cannot recommend Mr. Griffith for increased salary.

That was the recommendation made by the superintendent of the New Brunswick division in 1927. He made the same report in 1928, but then we find a most amazing letter on this file. This letter is signed by P. T. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General; it is dated August 27, 1927, and headed "Memorandum for Inspection Service." The letter proceeds:

The Postmaster General instructs that Mr. Griffith's annual increase be proceeded with, notwithstanding the report by District Superintendent Woods.

The Postmaster General advises that he knows all the details of the case—hence, the above instructions.

As I have said, that memorandum was signed by the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, and when the matter came up for further consideration in 1928 Mr. Woods, the district superintendent, then referred to the instances which I have mentioned with the result that he did not recommend the increase. It is not until September of 1928, when Mr. Woods wrote Mr. Fortier, that we have a further memorandum in the following words:

Referring to your communication of the 17th instant, enclosing form 24 G, in connection with the annual increase of salary of Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, St. John district, and particularly to your remarks as regards cases reported on June 20th and July 13th, 1927, on acount of which you say you cannot recommend Mr. Griffith for an increase in salary, I desire to inform you that these cases have been inquired into personally, by the Postmaster General and the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General when the matter was brought to their attention last year, and the explanations given by Inspector Griffith have been considered satisfactory, so under the circumstances, these cases are considered closed, and further mention of them need not be made in any further reports of the conduct or efficiency of Inspector Griffith.

I trust that this committee will realize just what those words mean, Mr. Chairman. At this moment I do not propose to comment upon them; I merely direct the attention of this house and the country to what has been done in this matter; I leave hon. members to be the judges. Personally I am drawing no inferences from these facts; I am leaving them as they appear.

With respect to the Shediac matter, which perhaps might have been taken sooner, but which I can deal with chiefly without encumbering Hansard with the complete record, the fact is that there was a shortage of $334 in the Shediac post office and it was contended by the Legers, who had to pay that amount, that they had not received credit for all the money they had given Mr. Griffith. That is the instance referred to by District Superintendent Woods and by the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General who, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, treated the matter as one not to be mentioned or heard of again. On July 13, 1927, the district superintendent placed the Shediac matter fully before the acting chief inspector in these words:

In compliance with the acting chief inspector's memorandum Insp. 68413 of June 22nd, which enclosed official cheque No. 879 for $29 representing the balance of the sum of $334 collected from J. Leger, sr., Shediac, N.B., to make good the losses of registered mail matter due to the depredations of his son.

A cheque for $29 payable to J. Leger, sr., was forwarded to the postmaster at Shediac, with a request that it be handed to Mr. Leger taking from him receipt for the same.

This cheque was duly received by the postmaster, and when he presented it to Mr. Leger it was not accepted by him because it should have been made payable to Edouard T. Leger instead of J. Leger, sr., and also that it was for an amount less than the difference between the amount that Mr. Leger paid and that for which he was given credit.

By referring to report from this office WFG/E. of June 22nd, 1925, it will be noted on page 2, paragraph 2, that postal inspector Mr. W. F. Griffith stated that he had received from Mr. Edward Leger a total amount of $300, and in a memorandum from the district office dated September 1st, 1925, there was enclosed duplicate and triplicate receipts from the Bank of Montreal for $334, which showed that $34 had reached this office besides the $300 above referred to.

In a statement furnished by Mr. Leger to the postmaster at Shediac on the 9th inst. he claimed to have paid the following amounts to Inspector Griffith:—

A total of..	$349 00

As this showed that there was $15 missing a visit was made to Shediac by the district superintendent on the 12th inst., and a declaration was received from Edouard T. Leger, which reads as follows:—

"I, Edouard T. Leger, of Shediac, in the county of Westmorland, do solemnly declare that due to certain losses from registered mail matter on account of depredations committed by my son, Alban Leger, I paid the Post Office Department indemnity to the amount of three hundred and forty-nine dollars ($349) as follows, that is to say, on or about June 19th, 1925, I paid to W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, one hundred dollars ($100); on or about June 22nd, I paid to Mr. J. V. Bourque, postmaster, Shediac, N.B. two hundred dollars ($200); on or about August 20th, 1925, I paid to Mr. W. F. Griffith on the train between Moncton and Shediac thirty-four dollars ($34), and some time in the month of October, 1925, Mr. W. F. Griffith called at my home and told me it would be necessary for me to pay fifteen dollars ($15) more, and this amount was given him in my presence by my wife, Delphine Leger."

Besides this, the following declaration was made by Mde. Delphine Leger:—

"I am the wife of Edouard T. Leger, and that some time in the month of October, 1925, I, on request of my husband, and in his presence paid to Mr. W. F. Griffith fifteen dollars ($15):"

In the conversation held with Mr. Leger he stated that he received no receipts from the inspector for any of the money that he had paid.

On this date Inspector Griffith was questioned as to the amount of money that he received from Mr. Leger, and he stated that as this case dated back to two years ago he couldn't remember exactly what amounts he did receive. He was shown his report of June 22nd, 1925, and also a list that had been made out of the abstractions against the Shediac post office, which totalled $334, and besides this the original receipt for the deposit of that amount made on Sept. 1st. As this covered the only record that is on the file of money received Mr. Griffith said he presumed that the $334 is all that he had received. The only moneys, however, that he was positive in receiving was the $300 that is mentioned in his report of June 22nd, 1925.

He was asked if he had met Mr. Leger on the train or at his own home, and he stated that he had remembered seeing him at Moncton station, but could not remember whether he got money from him there or not, but was quite positive, however, that he did not receive any money from Leger at Leger's home, with the exception of the $100 that was paid on June 19th.

At this juncture the inspector was told that as there appeared to be a discrepancy between his statement and that of Mr. Leger's, it would be necessary for him to give a written statement of his knowledge of the matter. To this he objected and refused to give any statement until he saw Mr. Leger. This did not meet with approval, and he was told that it was absolutely necessary for him to give a written statement, and after some more conversation the stenographer was called and the following is a statement signed by him:—

"I cannot say positively what moneys I collected from Mr. Leger.

I have positive recollection of receiving $300 in three amounts of $100 each; $100 cash and $200 money orders issued at Shediac post office payable to me at Saint John."

I do remember going to Moncton, I think on two different occasions."

"I went once to the C.N.R. shops, Moncton. The second time I went to Moncton I saw him at the station, shook hands with him, and saw him get on board the train for Shediac, but I do not remember whether I got money from him or not at that time."

"The time that I met Mr. Leger at the station is the last time that I saw him."

"The first payment that I received from Leger was paid me in his own home, and this is the only money that he paid me in his own house to my recollection."

"I have never received any money from Mr. Leger's wife, to my recollection."

"(sgd.) Wm. F. Griffith."

It was not until after the inspector gave his written statement that he was told that the district superintendent had seen and gotten declarations from Mr. Leger and his wife, and he showed much annoyance and accused the district superintendent of playing a mean and underhanded trick.

As to this the district superintendent has no comments and he refrains from making any recommendation in this case, but is of the opinion that the total amount that the inspector received from Mr. Leger is $349 instead of $334, leaving a balance due from Mr. Griffith of $15.

That is the communication which Mr. Woods sent the department at Ottawa. On July 18, 1927, and this date is rather important in view of the memorandum signed by the hon. Postmaster General himself, the following letter was written by Mr. Griffith to H. Fortier, the acting chief inspector:

On Wednesday of last week just before I was leaving the office the district superintendent called me and asked me to make a statement immediately about a case that I was dealing with during the summer of 1925, that is, the stealing of letters at Shediac post office by a young man by the name of Leger.

Naturally it is pretty hard for a person to remember everything that happened within two years and not having the file to refresh one's memory. However, I made a statement as near as possible from memory and after doing so the district superintendent produced a lot of papers from his desk and started to read affidavits fom different people. I then took a tumble that he had evidently been down to Shediac, and I asked him what he was driving at or what he meant. He informed me that in the settlement of the case the department had returned some money to Mr. Leger, and he, Leger, took exception to the amount.

It seems there is a difference of $15 between what I have on record and what Leger claims he paid.

All I know about the matter is that when I was there I was paid $100, and within a day or two I received two money orders for $100 each, making $300 in all. This covered the total amount of losses at that time reported.

Some time afterwards other cases cropped up and instructions were received in each case to have the money collected from Mr. Leger. On receipt of those cases from the enquiry section I have a distinct recollection of going to Moncton twice and I know I collected $34 from him but cannot give the exact date.

It seems that some time later there was another case of $15 turned up and I went to Moncton to see Mr. Leger. I remember meeting him just as the train was pulling out for Shediac. It is most probable from what Leger and his wife say that he did not have the money on him at the time and that I did go into Shediac later and received the $15 from him, but I certainly have no recollection of same at present. But there is one thing certain—Leger and his wife are honest people and if they are positive they paid this additional $15 I certainly would not dispute their statement, but I would be surprised if I received any money and I did not give them a receipt for same.

Now I have had no opportunity to see Mr. Leger since, in fact from the actions of the district superintendent I thought perhaps it would be better not to go near him.

With reference to this matter I may say I will make no move until I receive orders from the department.

As before stated, if Mr. and Mrs. Leger have any proof of paying me the above amount I will be only too pleased to either return it to them or forward it to the department, as directed.

The next communication is a letter dated July 20, 1927, from the district superintendent, Mr. Woods, to Mr. Fortier, in which he says:

Referring further to the acting chief inspector's memorandum of June 22nd, insp. 68413, authorizing a refund of $29 to be paid J. Leger, senior, Shediac, N.B., to make good the losses from registered mail matter due to the depredations of his son.

The district superintendent begs to call attention to his report of July 13, in which it was pointed out that the refund is due Edouard T. Leger instead of J. Leger, senior.

Will the acting chief inspector please authorize the paying of this amount to Edouard T. Leger, and also give instructions as to whether the claim of Mr. Leger for a further amount of $15 which he says that he paid to Inspector Mr. W. F. Griffith, shall be entertained or not.

On July 22, two days later, the letter was acknowledged in the following language:

Mr. Leger's claim for a further amount of $15 is receiving attention and the district superintendent will be further advised.

This $29 was paid to Edouard T. Leger, who acknowledged by receipt which is upon the file. On July 30, the following letter was sent by the district superintendent:

With further reference to the matter of refund to Mr. Edouard T. Leger, Shediac, N.B., in connection with losses from registered mail matter due to the depredations of his son.

Enclosed herewith please find receipts from Mr. Leger for $29, authorized to be paid him, as per the acting chief inspector's memorandum 68413 dated July 22nd.

The next letter, dated August 1, certainly throws a rather lurid light upon the administration of the department, and I use that language without being in any sense offensive. It reads:

Memorandum for the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

This file has reference to the collection of $334 from Edouard Leger, sr., Shediac, N.B., to make good the losses of registered mail matter, due to the depredations of his son.

In a statement furnished by Mr. Leger to the postmaster at Shediac on July 9, he claims to have paid the following amounts to Inspector Griffith:

$200
$ 34

Inspector Griffith has not accounted for $15 of this amount, and, as a refund has to be made to Mr. Leger, there is a shortage of $15, which must be made good.

Mr. Griffith, in dealing with this matter in a memorandum dated July 18, claims that he has no recollection of having received a payment of $15 from Mr. Leger, and he states that, if Leger and his wife are positive they paid him (Griffith) $15, he will not dispute their statement. He concludes his communication, however, by saying if Mr. and Mrs. Leger have any proof of paying him the amount in question he will be only too pleased to return it to them, or forward it to the department.

It is desired to point out that, in the Dupey's Corner case, various sums were paid to Mr. Griffith, which were not immediately accounted for.

It would seem that Inspector Griffith should be instructed to forward immediately the sum of $15 to the department so that same may be paid over to Mr. Leger, and the matter adjusted.

(Sgd.) Cantwell
H. Fortier, for Acting Chief Inspector.

Observe these words:

The P.M.G. mentioned this case to me before his departure for the east. Return this memo to me on P.M.G.'s return.

Initialled P.T.C.,
August 9, 1927.

We assume those to be the initials of Mr. P. T. Coolican.

Then the following memorandum, dated September 16, 1927, is placed upon the file:

This case was discussed with the general superintendent a few days ago who intimated that action in so far as the inspection service is concerned might be allowed to stand as this matter was receiving the personal attention of the Postmaster General.

(Sgd.) Cantwell.

Let us now proceed to the next count to which I referred the other day, the insubordination in the administration of the office at St. John, N.B. This is a matter which vitally affects the public service and the seriousness of it arises from what took place prior to this year. I am going to read from the files and not make a precis of the case lest there be trouble hereafter as to the correctness and fullness of these statements.

Early this year it became apparent that it was necessary to look into the mail service in connection with the new Canadian National ships sailing to and from the West Indies. The Postmaster General said the other day that as Mr. Woods had not been feeling very well he thought that he would be a desirable person to look into the administration in connection with the mail service between the West Indies and St. John and Halifax. On January 2, 1929, District Superintendent Woods addressed the following note to Mr. Coolican, the general superintendent of postal service:

No doubt you are already aware a trip has been arranged for me to the West Indies, and I expect to leave Halifax on the ss. Lady Drake on January 11th, returning to St. John on February 24th.

During my absence it is my intention to leave Inspector, Mr. John Emerson, in charge of the office.

Trusting that this may meet with your approval and with very best wishes for the new year, I remain.

Yours very truly,
H. W. Woods,
District Superintendent.

About the same day there is a direction from P. T. Coolican, addressed to Miss Theriault, as follows:

Please show to P.M.G. The usual thing is to have the senior inspector take charge during the absence of the district superintendent. In St. John this would be Emerson but the minister may have some views on the matter.

These views are expressed in a memorandum dated January 9, 1929, signed by P. T. Coolican, as follows:

Memorandum for the Chief Inspector

With reference to the attached application from the district superintendent, St. John, for leave of absence starting on January 11th, the Postmaster General instructs that Inspector Griffith be placed in charge during the district superintendent's absence.

As Mr. Woods leaves on the 11th, it will be necessary to wire him.

I will not go one step farther than I would if I were a crown prosecutor opening a case to a jury. Without making any comments which in any sense are inferences, I would point out to the house and to the country that the man the Postmaster General instructed should be placed in charge was the junior inspector when his deputy points out that it was usual for the senior to be placed in charge. And he also does it with the knowledge that Griffith had embezzled $150 which was an offence under section 98 of the Post Office Act, which section has been read into this record. That is the position and that cannot be controverted. All I have to do at this time is simply to ask this question: Why? Why is a man who is admittedly an embezzler placed over men during the absence of his chief when the ordinary rule is that the senior inspector should be placed in charge, against whom, as I am reminded by an hon. member, there is not a single black mark. Under date of January 9, I find the following instructions given by wire directed to Mr. Griffith at his residence, 115 Lansdowne avenue, St. John, New Brunswick, and signed Fortier, chief inspector:

Instructions putting you in charge during Woods' absence going forward to-day.

Then follows the letter dated 9th January:

Dear Mr. Griffith,

I have to inform you that during the absence of Mr. H. W. Woods, from the 11th instant to the 24th February, next, you are to be in charge of the St. John district office. The district superintendent has been advised accordingly.

On the same date Mr. Coolican, general superintendent of postal service, directed to Mr. Woods, district superintendent, a notice intimating that the same appointment had been made. Thereupon, on the 10th January, 1929, that is the day following, Mr. John Emerson, senior inspector of postal service of New Brunswick, against whom there is not a single black mark, wrote this letter to Mr. Griffith:

I beg to advise you that a letter has been received from the department addressed to H. W. Woods, district superintendent of postal service, advising that during his absence the office is to be left in your charge.

That is, the senior inspector does his duty by thus advising the junior inspector of his appointment over his head. Mr. Griffith writes to Mr. Coolican on the 11th January in these words:

Dear Mr. Coolican,

I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 9th inst. with the information that I was to be placed in charge of the Saint John district office during the absence of Mr. H. W. Woods, district superintendent, and stating that the district superintendent had also been notified.

Herewith for your information please find copy of notification received by me signed by Mr. John Emerson, inspector postal service, although Mr. Woods was in his office yesterday afternoon.

According to instructions I assumed charge of the office this a.m., and enquired of Inspector Emerson and principal clerk of the office service section, Miss Howard, asking for the official letter regarding my being placed in charge. Miss Howard stated she had never seen it, and Inspector Emerson stated that Mr. Woods must have taken it with him. I would respectfully suggest that you forward another letter, so that the copy may be placed in the order books for the information of those concerned.

In other words, it will be observed that the junior inspector, thus placed in charge, was not willing to accept the intimation from his senior that the superintendent had sent the letter because the original was not in his hands. Thereupon Mr. Coolican, the general superintendent, sent a copy of this letter to Mr. Griffith on the 14th January, 1929. It was two days before that when Mr. John Emerson, senior inspector of postal service at New Brunswick, wrote to Mr. Coolican a letter which, although it is marked "personal" but dealing with public business, is on the files that have been produced. That letter reads:

Dear Sir,

Referring to the absence of District Superintendent H. W. Woods for a period of six or seven weeks on a trip to the West Indies, and to your letter of the 9th instant instructing that the Saint John postal district was to be under the supervision of Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, I beg to draw your attention to the following facts:

As you are aware, I am the senior inspector of the Saint John postal district, having been appointed to that position on July 1, 1917. W. F. Griffith was appointed an inspector on the first of October, 1925.

During former absences of Mr. Woods, I have always been in charge of this district, and I would especially draw your attention to the fact that during the strike in June 1924, I was in charge for a period of 10 or 11 weeks; also during Mr. Woods' illness in the spring of 1928, I was in charge from February until May.

In view of the fact that the district superintendent notified you by letter on the 2nd inst., that he was leaving me, the senior inspector, in charge, I would respectfully ask on what grounds I have been passed over and one who is my junior in the service given charge of the district.

I may say that I deeply resent the action of the department and intend to see that my rights are recognized.

Trusting to hear from you at the earliest possible date, I remain,

Yours respectfully.

Then the assistant deputy on the 14th January wrote to Mr. Emerson as follows:

Replying to yours of January 12 I beg to say that you will receive a further reply to your letter as soon as I have taken the matter up with the Deputy Postmaster General.

In the meantime the matter was further considered by Mr. Emerson, and on the 2nd February, 1929, he wrote this formal letter which, though long, I feel I am bound in justice to the postal service, one of the most important branches of the public service in Canada, to read to the committee.

St. John, N.B. February 2, 1929.

L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Referring to the absence of District Superintendent H. W. Woods, during his trip to the West Indies, and the authority contained in a letter to Mr. Woods, dated 9th January from the general superintendent of postal service, advising that during his absence the office was to be in charge of Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service.—In connection with this ruling of the department, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that on the 2nd of January the district superintendent, H. W. Woods, notified Mr. Coolican that during his absence it was his intention to leave Inspector John Emerson in charge of the office.

On the 12th ult. I wrote a personal letter to Mr. P. T. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, protesting against the action of the department in passing me over and placing W. F. Griffith, my junior, in the service in charge of the Saint John postal district and I have patiently waited for an official reply to this letter, from the department, but up to the present have not received same.

In connection with this action of the department I wish to refer for your attention a letter which I received from you bearing date of the 18th July, 1924, bearing your personal signature and reading as follows:

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, in regard to the circumstance under which you assumed charge of the district since the absence of the district superintendent on account of illness.

I have made a note of your remarks in regard to the telegrams exchanged with the department, and, in reply I beg to reiterate the statements already made as to the procedure to be followed in selecting an officer in charge during the absence of the district superintendent from duty. When a district superintendent is absent for any reason, the senior inspector of postal service is to take charge automatically. If the senior inspector is absent for any reason, instructions as to the officer who is to assume charge of the district are to be obtained from the department, and no official is to assume charge until departmental instructions are received."

You will note from that, that according to your ruling on the date mentioned that when a district superintendent is absent for any reason the senior inspector of postal service is to take charge automatically and I, therefore claim it was my right to assume charge of the Saint John district in the absence of the district superintendent, even without being especially designated by the district superintendent that I was to do so.

As the records of the department will show I have been in the service since the first of July, 1890. I was appointed an inspector on the first of July, 1917.

W. F. Griffith, entered the Saint John postal district as a transfer helper about 1908 and his appointment as an inspector dates from the first October, 1925.

On the morning of the 10th January, previous to Mr. Woods leaving the office he gave me the following list of cases which had been given to Inspector Griffith and which will be found on their respective files not attended to.

Letter dated December 5, 1928, re report of R. M. Clark, E. W. Hammond as to unsuitability of mail car 3427.

Memoranda of August 13 and 30 re proposed Milledgeville R.R. No. 1.

Letter dated December 5, 1928, re frequent supervision and handling of mails at the Saint John station, not replied to.

Chief superintendent railway mail service, file No. 22490, re increase of rates for conveyance of mails, June 22.

Chief superintendent railway mail service, file No. 26845—15′ apartment postal car.

Chief superintendent railway mail service memorandum June 29, classifying R.P.O's into two grades, viz: "A" and "B".

Complaint of Mr. J. M. Woodman, general superintendent C.P.R. re transferring mails at McAdam, letter to inspector, December 14.

Complaint made by Doctor Violette relative to the mail service, St. Bazil.

Re postmastership of Norton station, request of deputy dated November 22, that inspector interview applicants. Reminder sent January 4, 1929.

Re loss of parcels posted by the T. Eaton Company, at Toronto addressed for delivery in the maritime provinces. File No. 69928.

Re memoramdum of mail service branch, referring to report 79B asking for an extension of Anagance, R.R. No. 1, August 14 and August 24.

Re petition regarding proposed Hampton station R.R. No. 1 dated August 25.

Re designation head-end of full postal car.

Re memorandum mail service branch, Peel R.R. No. 1 of November 27.

The district superintendent also left me a note, showing that W. F. Griffith had not been in the office between the 6th and 22nd day of December inclusive, neither had he made any report in connection with his doings, to the district superintendent during that time.

The district superintendent went to Fredericton on the 23rd of December and did not return until the 2nd January. During this period I was in charge of the office and W. F. Griffith was in the office on the 26th December from 1 p.m. to 4.30 p.m.

December 27—all day.
December 28—from 1 p.m. to 4.30.
December 29—not in the office.
December 31—not in the office.
January 2—not in the office.
January 3—not in the office.
January 4—not in the office.
January 5—not in the office.

It will be seen from the list left by the district superintendent that inspector Griffith has not been in the habit of making prompt reports in regard to any matter that has been handed over to him for attention. As a sample I would draw your attention to the fact that on the 11th May, 1927, an application was made for the establishment of a rural route at Petitcodiac to supersede the present Dobsons Corner and Petitcodiac mail service and notwithstanding the fact that the district superintendent and the department at Ottawa made many efforts to have Inspector Griffith complete a report on the matter, the said report was not sent to the department until August 7, 1928, viz:—a period of fifteen months from the time of the receipt of the request from the department until same had been attended to by the inspector in whose hands the matter had been placed.

It will be noted in the list left with me that it refers to a letter from yourself, dated November 22nd, that Inspector Griffith interview applicants for the office of postmastership of Norton Station. This was handed over to Mr. Griffith and a reminder sent to him on January 4, 1929, but up to the present no report has been made to the department.

I would draw your attention to the fact that upon W. F. Griffith's apointment to that of inspector his duties were assigned by the department to the inspectorship in charge of the railway mail service of the Saint John postal district. These duties included inspection of all baggage car services of the province and also all water services.

This man has been in charge of the railway mail service for a period of three years and one-half and during that time he has made no reports to the department as far as I know, on—

Baggage car on trains 251, 252, 37, 38, C.N.R., between Campbellton and St. Leonard.

C.P.R. trains Nos. 373, 171, 172, 174 between Debec and Houlton, Maine.

C.P.R. trains Nos. 185, 186, between Fort Fairfield and Aroostock Junction.

Trains 47, 48, Fredericton and Centreville.

Trains 191, 192, Fredericton and Woodstock, Gibson branch.

Trains 27, 237, 28, 238, Newcastle and Fredericton, C.N.R.

Fredericton Junction and Fredericton, baggage car service, Nos. 119, 105, 111, 109, 107, 106, 108, 110, 112.

New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company, Fredericton and Grand Lake, Norton and Fredericton.

C.P.R. Pinder and Southampton, Nos. 195, 194.

C.P.R. trains Nos. 162, 164, St. Andrews and Watt Junction.

N.B.S. Saint John and St. Stephen Nos. 115, 116.

Water service, between Grand Manan Island and the mainland.

Between Chatham-Hardwicke.

Between Saint John and Black's Harbour.

This statement can be easily verified by looking up the records in the office of the chief superintendent of railway mail service, Ottawa.

I would, therefore, respectfully ask whether in view of the facts that the department has been fully advised by the district superintendent of postal service as to the lack of official attention to duty of the inspector now in charge of the office, and also that the said district superintendent has refused to recommend his increases at least on two occasions, you, as Deputy Postmaster General and active head of the post office department, consider that the record of this man, W. F. Griffith, justifies the placing of him in charge of the Saint John postal district over the head of a senior inspector, who has on numerous occasions carried on the work of the office to the best of his ability, during the illness and absences of the said district superintendent.

I believe I am within my rights in asking at least, a departmental acknowledgment of this letter, and also information on what grounds I have been passed over and a junior given charge.

I may say that I am sending a copy of this letter to P. T. Coolican, Esq., Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

Trusting to hear from you at as early a date as possible, I am, sir,

Yours respectfully,

That was signed by John Emerson, the senior inspector at St. John.

Mr. POULIOT: He was not complaining of not being in charge of the office.

Mr. BENNETT: He was reciting the circumstances under which the former order was no longer being made effective and a junior placed in charge.

Mr. POULIOT: He was not complaining of an injustice.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly was.

Mr. POULIOT: A supposed injustice.

Mr. BENNETT: We next find this memorandum dated February 4, 1929, and I ask that this house carefully consider this memorandum:

J. Emerson,
St. John

Assistant Deputy,
February 4, 1929
Postmaster General

That is the head of it. It goes on:

P.M.G. says O.K. He will not alter his instructions.

(Signed) Gaboury.

I wonder if the full significance of that is understood. There is a man who is admittedly an embezzler—under the statutes, a thief.

Mr. POULIOT: For fifteen dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: No, $180 in the one case and $15 in the other. The section of the statute has already been read. He converted this money to his own use, and the Post Office Act says that this is theft. The Postmaster General admits that he knew of it, and in face of that knowledge and the complaint made by the senior inspector Emerson of the treatment he received, Mr. Gaboury makes this notation:

P.M.G. says O.K. He will not alter his instructions.

I will not make any comments on that now.

Mr. POULIOT: The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Res ipsa loquitur. In face of the fact that on the 4th of February the minister had put his imprimatur on Mr. Griffith's position, on the 26th day of February, twenty-two days later, Mr. Griffith writes Mr. Coolican as follows:

With further reference to my temporary appointment in charge of the district office from January 11 until February 24 during absence of the district superintendent as per your memo of January 9, I beg to inform you that the district superintendent, Mr. H. W. Woods, arrived in Saint John yesterday morning from his trip to the West Indies about 8.30 a.m. I have been unofficially informed that he was in communication with the principal clerk of the office service section, Miss Howard, but on being asked if she had any information regarding him, she stated she did not know anything about him. On making inquiry at Fredericton this a.m. I learned that the district superintendent is now at home there. Officially I have no information of any kind, and in lieu of other instructions from you I will remain in charge of the district office until the district superintendent returns to duty.

Mr. Griffith on the 1st day of March wrote to Mr. Coolican as follows:

For your information I may say that the district superintendent, Mr. H. W. Woods, returned to duty this morning, and from this date I will be performing the duties of inspector of postal service.

The last letter is from Mr. Woods when he returned to duty. On the 4th day of March, Mr. Woods, the district superinendent, who had been absent for his health, wrote to Mr. Coolican, the general superintendent, in these words:

Sir:

Once again I find it necessary to advise the department of the insubordination of Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, connected with the district office at Saint John.

It will be remembered that authority dated January 9 was issued by the department to place Inspector Griffith in charge of the district office during my absence on a trip to the West Indies. This authority was received on the afternoon of January 10 by Mr. John Emerson, senior inspector, who had taken charge of the office from noon that day.

I observe that it was from noon that day, although Mr. Griffith had complained that Mr. Woods had not communicated to him the instructions that he was to take charge, being in the office that afternoon, and would not accept the intimation from Mr. Emerson who sent him a copy of the notice that he was put in charge, but asked for another copy because he had not received one from Mr. Woods himself. Passing that by, the letter continues:

Mr. Emerson reached me by telephone as soon as possible after the authority was received, advising me of its contents.

Arrangements were made for the carrying out of the order and I left for Halifax that evening.

On my return to Saint John on Monday, February 25, I proceeded to Fredericton without calling at the office. From there I notified Mr. Griffith that I would be on hand to take charge on the morning of March first and asking him to let me have a memo of any changes of importance that had taken place during my absence.

I reached the post office building about 8.30 a.m. Friday. Not having keys with me that would open the door of the private office, I was obliged to wait in the other rooms until Mr. Griffith arrived.

At about 8.50 he reached the office and came into the inspector's room where I was. I asked him to open the door leading from the inspector's room into the private office and he told me he had no key. I said he must have a key to the private office as he had been using it for the past six weeks and he cried out in a loud voice that I was a "liar," and in the short conversation that took place in this room, he not only called me a "liar" but a "dirty cur" and a "quibbler."

Knowing from past experience how prone he is of making protest of what he said and did not say, I invited him to step out into the staff office in order that those who were there might be witnesses to the choice language he was using, and in a most defiant and bold-faced manner he followed me out, and in the presence and hearing of a number of the staff he used language to me that is rarely heard outside of a drunken brawl.

His attention was called to the strong language he was using and in a loud voice he declared he was making it strong so that I could understand it.

There was no provocation for his outburst of temper, but he has once more proved that he is unfit for any position of trust where honesty and restraint are required.

Shortly after he became attached to the district office and for some length of time he occasionally used to bluster and show signs of insubordination, but after I found it necessary to question him one day in June, 1927, in regard to funds paid him by a postmaster which had not been accounted for, he ceased to exhibit these signs openly. His flagrant disregard of the regulations of the department has been quite generally known, with the result that it has had an influence on some of the other members of the staff.

Had this influence not been so strong, it is believed that principal clerk J. V. Shea of the inquiry section, would have hesitated to withdraw charges in the police court of Saint John in connection with the Wm. A. McIllwraith case, as per report of November 14, 1928.

I refrained from suspending Mr. Griffith at the time as I wished to do nothing in a hasty manner, and I felt that the punishment he so richly deserves would come to him sufficiently early, by leaving the case in the hands of the department.

I wish, however, to say that in so far as my personal honour is concerned it makes no difference to me what name this man calls me, and I do not ask for any apology from him, but if my opinion were asked as to what disciplinary action should be taken because of the effect of his disgraceful actions, I would hesitate between two opinions—suspension or dismissal, but one or the other should be administered.

This, as I say, was written by Mr. Woods to Mr. Coolican at Ottawa, and a copy was sent to Mr. Gaboury, the Deputy Postmaster General. A letter of March 9, 1929, now appears on the file. It is marked, "personal and confidential," and is from Mr. Coolican to Mr. Woods. It reads as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your report of March 4, re insubordination of Inspector Griffith.

I will take the matter up with the Deputy Postmaster General and advise you of the decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Gaboury wrote to Mr. Woods on March 5 in these terms—

Mr. HANSON: He telephoned him first.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. This is the letter:

Confirming telephone conversation at 9.50 this morning, I beg to advise you that the Postmaster General has instructed that when you are absent from office, even temporarily, the office must be left in charge of Mr. Griffith. The Postmaster General issued these instructions during your recent absence, and they must be lived up to.

I did not want to wire you for reasons which you will readily understand, and I wish you would please acknowledge this letter as well as the telephone conversation.

I am glad to hear that you are well again and that your trip was beneficial. I am sending your account through to-day and same will be attended to in due course.

That, as I say, was written by Mr. Gaboury. It will thus be observed that on March 5, on the instructions of the Postmaster General, Mr. Woods, the district superintendent, was notified that the man who had admitted that he had violated the provisions of the Post Office Act and had converted money to his own use by retaining $180 in his own hands for several months was to be placed in charge of the district office at St. John and the postal service of New Brunswick during the temporary absence of Mr. Woods on any account. Then follows this memorandum:

Memorandum, March 5, 1929.

At 9.50 this morning the undersigned telephoned to Mr. H. W. Woods, district superintendent of postal service at St. John, N.B., that under no circumstances when he absented himself from the office, even temporarily, was the office to be left in charge of any person but Mr. Griffith. He was informed that these are the instructions of the Postmaster General and that they must be adhered to.

Mr. Woods stated he thoroughly understood the above, and the undersigned is confirming these instructions by letter, copy of which is herewith attached.

Then follows a letter from Mr. Woods, the district superintendent who, remembering that discipline is so necessary for the proper administration of the public service, wrote Mr. Gaboury:

Dear Mr. Gaboury,—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th inst., confirming telephone conversation at 9.50 (eastern time) of that morning advising me that it was the wish of the Postmster General when I am absent from the office even temporarily that the office must be left in charge of Mr. Griffith.

The conversation was a little indistinct at first, but eventually I understood it clearly, and until further advised will act accordingly.

It is noted that the Postmaster General issued these instructions during my recent absence, but I may say that they do not appear on any files of the office.

On March 9 we have written by Mr. Emerson, the senior inspector, a further letter to the Deputy Postmaster General. He now realizes that he is to be replaced by Mr. Griffith on all occasions, and he writes as follows:

Referring further to my letter of January 12 to P. T. Coolican, Esq., Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, and registered letter forwarded to you and copy forwarded to the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General on the 2nd ultimo protesting against the action of the department in placing Mr. W. F. Griffith, junior inspector of postal service in charge of the St. John postal district during the absence of the district superintendent on his trip to the West Indies when I was a senior inspector of the St. John postal district, and on all former occasions had acted in charge during sicknesses and absences of the district superintendent, I again draw your attention to the fact that I have never received a reply to either of these letters.

I strongly feel that this is not the proper treatment to accord one who has been in the service as long as I have. I, however, take it for granted that you have received letter in question and have informed the Postmaster General as to the contents of letters abovementioned.

In my communication of the 2nd ultimo I drew your attention in a very plain manner to the fact that Inspector Griffith has not been carrying on the duties of his office in a proper manner, and I have no hesitation in stating that this man has deliberately broken all rules and regulations governing the Post Office department and civil service of Canada.

During the year 1928 the said W. F. Griffith practically made no attempt to be present at his seat in the St. John office, and it is a well-known fact that he made his home his headquarters. In this connection, if his journals of proceedings for the above-mentioned period are examined, it will be seen that he claims to have spent a great deal of the time absent from the office supervising the handling of mails at the St. John railway station.

This practice of his became so common that on the 5th December last the district superintendent forwarded a letter to him asking for an explanation as to the necessity of the frequent supervision of the handling of mails at the St. John station, to which, however, it may be said there has been no reply.

It is well-known to the travelling staff of the St. John postal district that in the latter part of 1926 there was a shortage found at the Dupey's Corners post office in the electoral district of Westmorland, N.B.; also that Inspector W. F. Griffith was allotted this case. The result of his efforts are also well known, and it is my belief that the details available in June, 1927, were forwarded to the department.

I may say that if this case is reopened at any time I am in a position to give some evidence, which probably is not known to the department.

For your information I may say that the disgraceful way which W. F. Griffith treated the district superintendent, Mr. H. W. Woods, by calling him a liar, cur and quibbler, on his arrival at the St. John district office on the morning of March 1, concerning which you have no doubt been informed as Mr. H. E. Atwater was in St. John at the time, has become street talk in the city of St. John, and I may say that several citizens have expressed to me their contempt for one who would so far forget himself as to treat his superior officer as he, the said W. F. Griffith, did, especially when he knew that the district superintendent was not a well man. The general expression of opinion is that an employee who would so far forget himself is not fit to occupy any position of trust and should be dismissed from the public service.

In connection with the placing of this man over me, I would ask you to advise me as to whether it is to be understood that in future on all occasions when the district superintendent is absent that the said W. F. Griffith is to be in charge of the district office. If this is the intention, I hereby notify the department that I reserve the right to take whatever action I deem fit and proper to see that my rights as senior inspector of the St. John postal district are recognized.

I am forwarding a copy of this communication under registered cover to Mr. P. T. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

In closing I may say that I very much regret the necessity for writing letters to the department, but you can readily understand that in this matter I have no other means of stating my views.

Trusting that you will advise me as to the receipt of this letter, I remain,

Yours respectfully,

On the 12th Mr. Gaboury, the Deputy Postmaster General, replied to Mr. Emerson as follows:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., received under registered cover No. 132, in regard to Mr. Griffith being put in charge of the office during the temporary absence of Mr. Woods, the district superintendent.

I did not reply to your letter of the 2nd ultimo, but acting on the instructions of the Postmaster General, notified Mr. Woods that in future during any absence from the office Mr. Griffith was to be put in charge. I am transferring your letter to the Postmaster General for whatever action he may see fit to take. As you are aware, I could not under any circumstances take the lead in this question, as it is a matter which rests entirely with the honourable the Postmaster General. When I notified Mr. Woods by telephone, and confirmed the conversation by an official letter on the same day, I thought this would cover your letter of the 2nd ultimo. I regret not having replied to your letter, and wish to say that so far as the Deputy Postmaster General is concerned there is no other course to follow, and therefore I am handing your letter over to the Postmaster General.

Mr. POULIOT: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? As a member of the jury, I have listened with care and attention to my hon. friend. May I ask if there is on the file a letter from Mr. Woods complaining of his treatment by Mr. Griffith?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I was reading rather rapidly and the hon. gentleman did not follow me. I read Mr. Woods' complaint, which was prior in point of time to the action taken. Then there is a letter from Mr. Coolican in which he encloses a copy of the letter I have read, followed by a further statement dated April 6, from District Superintendent Woods to the Deputy Postmaster General:

Referring to your telephone conversation of March 5 and letter of that date confirming the same, which gave instructions that when I was absent from the office even temporarily I was to leave in charge Mr. Griffith.

I beg to say that on the 5th instant I was absent attending the funeral of a very old friend, and during my absence Inspector Emerson was in charge, due to Inspector Griffith's absence in Montreal.

Trusting that this may meet with approval, I remain,

Then follows this letter, which I feel I must read, even though I have trespassed upon the time of the committee, but I can regard few matters as being of greater importance to the public interest than the communications I have just read. This letter is dated April 8, 1929—this present month—and is addressed to the Postmaster General himself:

Dear Mr. Minister,—

Since becoming a member of the Post Office Department—

Mr. SPENCER: Who is the writer?

Mr. BENNETT: It is written by District Superintendent Woods to the minister himself, and is dated April 8, 1929:

Dear Mr. Minister:

Since becoming a member of the Post Office Department I have avoided addressing communications directly to the ministers, believing that the proper course was to carry on correspondence pertaining to the work of the office with and through the regularly appointed officials.

On account, however, of the apparent misconception of a serious breach of discipline, reported to the general superintendent on March 4th last, which has not been investigated, I am taking the liberty of calling your personal attention to this and other matters of irregularity committed by Inspector W. F. Griffith of this office.

From the time that Mr. Griffith came directly under the supervision of the district office he has shown signs of insubordination, so much so that on occasions he used to me insulting language and while I admit that I should have reported him for this in the early days, I refrained from doing so hoping that he would eventually cease his bluster, bluff and loud talking.

May I in this regard call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the reports made by Mr. Woods with reference to Mr. Griffith. Let hon. members read them; they will now appear on the record. He gives him ratings of 90 per cent, 80 per cent, and 70 per cent, and I venture to think that no one who had not the fairest mind could give such an estimate of another in the light of the treatment he had received at that man's hands. It shows at least that he had no animus so far as the public service rendered by Mr. Griffith was concerned.

In the year 1926 the postmaster of Dupey's Corner, Westmorland county, was short in his accounts, and Mr. Griffith was sent to investigate. This investigation showed that the total shortage amounted to $845.61, and the postmaster made an offer to clear up the deficit by instalments, which the department accepted, but according to our files the only amount received from the postmaster up to June, 1927, was $150, which was placed in the Bank of Montreal, Saint John, to the credit of the Receiver General, on December first, 1926. From this on the postmaster appeared delinquent, and reminders received from the department were referred to Mr. Griffith; and on different occasions a memo was sent to the department giving some reason or other as to why more payments were not received from the postmaster.

Not being satisfied with the course the inspector had been pursuing in the case, I made a trip to Dupey's Corner on the 13th of June, 1927, and on interviewing the postmaster he gave me information that a much larger amount was paid by him than that placed to his credit, and showed me a record in his registration book of having sent to Mr. Griffith at his home address two registered letters, one of November 8th, 1926, and the other of December 2nd, 1926, containing $200 and $40 respectively. Verification that the registered letters were duly received and delivered was received at Shediac and Saint John. Postmaster also produced receipts from Mr. Griffith for the following amounts: of which no record could be found at this office. These amounts, together with the $240 stated to have been sent by registered mail to the inspector, made an amount of $330 which the postmaster claimed to have paid, but as there was only the sum of $150 standing to his credit, there was a discrepancy of $180.

August 23rd, 1926..	$40 00
September 30th, 1926..	50 00

On interviewing Mr. Griffith in regard to this, he was asked how much money the postmaster paid him, and he replied that all he received was the amount that the file stated, but said that the last time he was in Ottawa they (meaning the financial branch) had talked with him regarding the postmaster's shortage and from the conversation that took place it would appear that there was a slight difference in the amount due—a difference of one or two dollars. After some more conversation with the inspector he admitted that he had received the two registered letters referred to, that he had not reported the receipt of the money, and that in doing so he had violated the regulations. It was pointed out that, according to the postmaster's statement and our records, he (Griffith) had collected $180 which he had not accounted for, and he was asked where this money was. He stated that he had it at home, but this was a deliberate falsehood, as I have proof that the $180 he gave me that day was borrowed from a gentleman in this city.

In the year 1925 there was a number of abstraction cases reported that had as a common point Shediac, and Mr. Griffith was assigned the duty of investigating same, with the result that the son of the mail contractor between the post office and railway station at Shediac, was charged with the crime and acknowledged same.

The father agreed to make good the amount chargeable to his son's defalcations, and Mr. Griffith collected an amount sufficient to cover all the abstractions that had been reported which could reasonably be charged to this case. After the department had made final settlement there was an amount of $29 to be refunded to the contractor. On this amount being tendered to him he gave information that it was $15 short, and he made a statement under oath that some time in the month of October, 1925, Mr. Griffith called at his home and told him that it would be necessary for him to pay $15 more, and that this amount was handed to Mr. Griffith in the presence of his wife. This statement was verified under oath by the contractor's wife.

As this amount had not been accounted for by Mr. Griffith, he was questioned in regard to it, and while he did not deny that he received the money, he did not admit it, and up to the present this office does not know whether the $15 has been paid back to the contractor or not, but there is no doubt that the sworn statement of the contractor is correct.

The regulations require inspectors to keep the district superintendent advised as to their whereabouts, but for at least the last two years Inspector Griffith has practically ignored this duty, although his and the department's attention has been called to it frequently.

He has on many occasions failed to pay prompt attention to work assigned to him, some of which had been specially requested by the department.

The last glaring exhibition of his insubordination occurred on the first of March last—the day I returned to the office after my trip to the West Indies. On this date he called me a "liar", "dirty cur", and a "damned quibbler", and this in the presence of a number of the staff. This incivility was reported on March 4th and the only notice that has been taken of it as far as I know is an acknowledgment of its receipt from the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, with the exception of a visit the chief inspector made to this office which lasted from noon of March 25th until the afternoon of March 28th.

The chief inspector brought with him an order from the Deputy Postmaster General placing the chief inspector in charge of the office for an indefinite period, and naturally I assumed that the object of his visit was to investigate the charges I made against Inspector Griffith, but to my surprise I was told by Mr. Fortier that he was not here for that purpose, but for the purpose of getting the office to function in a correct manner. He was asked in what particular this was not being done, and he told me that I was not speaking to Mr. Griffith and was giving him orders in writing. It was explained that I had adopted the plan of giving this inspector written orders for the reason that he was rarely in the office, and the only sure way to catch him was by written memorandum, as well as being the only safe way to deal with him.

By issuing written instructions there could be no chance of his stating that the orders were never given, or that what I said to him yesterday was different from what I said to him to-day.

I perhaps have said enough to show you that I certainly have much reason to complain because of the discourteous conduct of Mr. Griffith to me personally, and surely I have made my charges against him of insubordination and dishonesty sufficiently strong to have some action taken by the department, besides that of putting an officer from the department in charge of the district office for an indefinite period.

Permit me to call your attention to Section 98 of the Post Office Act, which distinctly states that any official connected with the post office, who deals with funds as Mr. Griffith did with money that was paid to him by the Postmaster of Dupey's Corner, is guilty of an indictable offence. He can also be charged with obtaining money under false pretences, in regard to the Shediac case. This, together with his disregard of the regulations of the department and the exhibition he made of himself before a number of the staff, is certainly worthy of greater chastisement than the promotion to the charge of the district office during my absence.

While civil servants guilty of indictable offences are sometimes saved from the full penalty of the law, this is the first case I know where an officer has been permitted to hold his position, and I have reason to believe that flagrant insubordination, such as this man has been guilty of, to go unpunished, is not conducive to the betterment of the service; and knowing you as well as I do, I am convinced that with these facts before you, you will arrange to have the order, issued by the deputy on March 5th, making it necessary to place Mr. Griffith in charge during my absence, rescinded; and the order of March 22nd, placing the district office in charge of Mr. Fortier of Ottawa, recalled.

If this is done, and proper punishment administered to Mr. Griffith, I can assure you that there will be no question as to the correct functioning of the district office at Saint John.

I remain,
Your obedient servant,

H. W. Woods, District Superintendent.

A letter was written apparently on April 15, 1929, a week later by Mr. John Emerson to the Postmaster General. This letter I shall have to read inasmuch as it is directed to the chief of the department:

Honourable P. J. Veniot, Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Referring to the absence of District Superintendent H. W. Woods during his trip to the West Indies, and authority contained in letter to Mr. Woods dated the 9th of January from P. T. Coolican, Esq., Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, advising that during his absence the office was to be left in charge of Mr. W. F. Griffith, inspector of postal service, I beg to draw your attention to the fact that on the 12th of January I wrote a personal letter to the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, protesting against the action of the department in view of the fact that I am the senior inspector of the Saint John postal district, and as such have always been in charge of the district during the absence of the district superintendent.

Receiving no reply in connection with this protest, I wrote a letter on the 2nd of February to L. J. Gaboury, Esq., Deputy Postmaster General, quoting a letter to me over his personal signature, dated the 18th of July, 1924, in which he ruled that in the absence of the district superintendent from duty for any reason, the senior inspector of postal service is to take charge automatically. I further drew his attention to the fact that I have been in the service since July first, 1890, and was promoted to an inspectorship on July first, 1917, whereas W. F. Griffith entered the service as a transfer helper in 1908 and was appointed an inspector on October first, 1925. From this it will be seen that I was appointed an inspector more than eight years previous to the appointment of Mr. Griffith, and have been in the service eighteen years longer than he.

I wrote very fully, showing that Mr. Griffith has not been performing his duties in a proper manner, and denoting particulars in this regard. I also drew his attention to the fact that the district superintendent had refused to recommend increases of pay for him on at least two occasions, and further asked the Deputy to advise me on what grounds I was passed over and a junior given charge of the district.

Not receiving any reply to this letter, I again wrote the Deputy Postmaster General on the 9th of March, giving more data in connection with this question, and asked for a reply. I may say that I received a reply dated the 12th of March, in which he stated that acting on your instructions he had notified Mr. Woods that in future during any absence from the office Mr. Griffith was to be in charge. He further stated that my letter of the 9th of March was handed over to you, and I have been patiently waiting for a reply in connection with same.

I also take it for granted that my letter of the 2nd February to the Deputy Postmaster General has been placed in your hands.

I may advise you that I was very much surprised at your action in practically demoting me and placing a junior inspector over me in the Saint John postal district. Surely, after reading the information contained in my letters of the 2nd February and 9th of March to the deputy, the fact should be apparent to you that

Mr. Griffith is not a fit and proper person to be in charge of the postal service even for one day.

As you must be aware, he has been charged in reports to the department from the district office for not making a return of a sum of money in the neighborhood of $200, which he collected on post office account from the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, Westmorland county in the latter part of the year 1926, and when on June 20th, 1927, the district superintendent brought the matter to a head and demanded an accounting of the moneys collected, he was unable to produce same, which is evidence that he converted same to his own use. In this regard I would inform you that on the afternoon of the above-mentioned date Mr. Griffith borrowed $200 and the cancelled cheque can be produced at any time when an investigation is held.

According to the Post Office Act, section 98, this man was guilty of an indictable offence in this matter.

There is also one other charge which I am prepared to prove, and that is, that W. F. Griffith has been practically commercialising his position as an inspector by borrowing money and accepting gifts from some of those over whom he has had supervision, and also those who have been looking for advancement in the service. You will remember that there were two civil service commissioners relieved of their offices by the honourable Premier of Canada for an offence such as this.

For your information I may say that the present trouble in the Saint John postal district is due practically to the actions of this man, and I cannot see how, in view of the different charges that have been made against him, you, as the honourable head of the postal service in Canada, can come to any other conclusion than that he is not a fit and proper person to occupy any position of trust in the Post Office Department. In my humble opinion, the regulations in this case should be administered and this man dismissed from the service.

I would therefore respectfully ask that previous to your leaving Canada you instruct the Deputy Postmaster General to countermand the order issued at your behest to the effect that W. F. Griffith is to rank over me in the postal service.

I may say that in addition to the letters to the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General and Deputy Postmaster General, I stated my case to H. Fortier, chief inspector of the Post Office Department, when he was in St. John a few weeks ago.

Trusting that you will reply to this letter at as early a date as possible, I remain,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) John Emerson,
Inspector of Postal Service.

There is no reply to that communication upon the file, and I am not in a position to say whether or not a reply was sent. Neither am I in a position to state from the file itself whether or not Mr. Griffith is still the ranking officer in the St. John post office, but I can say that I am not relying upon rumour when I make the assertion that Mr. Griffith has openly boasted that he is practically the Postmaster General in the province of New Brunswick.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee, having read the correspondence, which I have endeavoured to present as far as possible without unreasonable or unfair comment, that it indicates a condition in the public service which one would not believe possible if one did not read it with his own eyes or hear it with his own ears. It is almost incredible that a postmaster general should direct officials of his department to take the actions which have been taken in these cases in the light of the knowledge he possessed as to the conditions under which this office was administered. We do say that under the circumstances disclosed by this file, read without comment and without inferences being drawn, a situation has been disclosed which is an open disgrace to this Dominion of Canada. Worse than that, it reflects not only upon the Post Office Department but upon every department of the government. With the knowledge now possessed by the Prime Minister; in view of the position he has taken in connection with the public service on many occasions, of which the address he made over the radio the other evening is an example; with his earnest desire to maintain the integrity of the civil service, here is an opportunity for him to give concrete expression to that desire. The Postmaster General of Canada should no longer be in a position which will enable him to wreck the careers and ruin the futures of men who are his subordinates.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, in rising to reply to some of the remarks of the leader of the opposition I must first admit that his attitude this afternoon, although I am not complaining about it, has taken me rather by surprise. If I had known that my hon. friend intended to discuss this question in all its details I too could have reviewed the files and put myself in a position to meet his every argument.

At the outset let me point out that my hon. friend, in opening his remarks, said there were only two inspectors in the St. John district. There are four inspectors there. While that mis-statement of fact does not detract at all from the argument he attempted to advance, still it is well to keep the record clear. There are four inspectors in the St. John postal district, three at St. John and one at Moncton.

It is not my intention to discuss all the charges made by my hon. friend during the reading of these files, because an investigation into these questions has been begun and is proceeding along proper departmental lines; a thorough investigation will be made. However, I would like to point out that if District Superintendent Woods had been carrying on the work of the district office as it should be carried on, why should he give Inspector Griffith the rating he did give him, on which I, as Postmaster General, would have to base my opinion of Griffith's work? No better rating, unless he was rated perfect, could have been given to Griffith than was given by District Superintendent Woods in 1927, and that report contained not one word of complaint against Inspector Griffith as to his absence from duty, as to his refusing duty, as to his non-attendance to duty or anything of that kind. Nothing along this line was received until Inspector Emerson, Superintendent Woods and Inspector Griffith got into a row; then the whole story came out. Until that time, so far as the reports show there was nothing against Griffith. I am not now dealing with the Dupey's Corner case, which I will take up in a few moments, nor am I dealing with the Shediac case; leaving those two cases aside no one could have obtained a better rating than District Superintendent Woods gave Griffith. With that rating before me, and Mr. Woods having refused to recommend the yearly increase in salary to Inspector Griffith in spite of that rating, I believe I was quite justified in overruling that decision, acting upon the rating he had given this man. At that time I was not aware—

Mr. STEVENS: Isn't that awful?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, it is very awful to have that happen, and it is very awful that hon. gentlemen never revealed it but kept it strictly to themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: I read the rating which was given the gentleman.

Mr. VENIOT: And it was an excellent rating.

Mr. BENNETT: Except that it said he was a thief.

Mr. VENIOT: I want to say that neither Superintendent Woods, Inspector Emerson nor my friend the leader of the opposition can make the people of St. John believe that W. F. Griffith is a thief.

Mr. HANSON: Put him on trial and see.

Mr. VENIOT: That is what I am doing.

Mr. POULIOT: We listened to you; now listen to us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: It was understood that this matter would not be discussed in the house while the investigation was under way. That is why I am merely bringing out one or two important facts, because I do not wish to do anything which might prejudice the investigation which is now proceeding.

Let us first consider the Shediac affair. This took place in 1925 and I was in no way responsible for it nor connected with it as Postmaster General. I knew nothing about the affair until 1927 when this matter was brought up regarding the payment of $15 to Mr. W. F. Griffith. The parties interested had paid to Griffith other items amounting to $334, and he held receipts for same and showed them to Inspector Woods. When the claim was made that there was a shortage of $15, Mr. Griffith made the statement that if these people would say they had paid him $15 he would accept their word because they were honest people, but they could not show any receipt or any voucher for that payment. I would direct the attention of the house to this fact; the $15 paid to Griffith was not money due to the Post Office department, and the discrepancy would be as between Griffith and the person who had paid the $15.

Now we come to the matter of Dupey's Corner post office. That defalcation took place before I was Postmaster General, and the first trouble arose during the time our friends were in power for a short period in July, 1926.

Mr. MANION: May I ask the hon. minister a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends asked questions pretty often, and I have a right to ask one of the minister. Does the name of any minister of our government appear in this affair at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was no minister.

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, there was.

Mr. VENIOT: I say that it took place in July, 1926, during the time that the so-called —I do not mean that in an offensive way— shadow government was in power; that was before I took charge of the department. Reference to the records will show that any arrangements or negotiations which took place with Griffith as to his becoming personally responsible to the department or to the financial branch of the department for any part of the defalcation took place long before I had anything to do with the department at all.

Mr. HANSON: It took place in December, 1926.

Mr. VENIOT: It started long before that. He had visited this office and had made reports. He had said that this man was a poor man but expected to be able to get someone to go guarantee for him by the endorsing or signing of a joint note, and he mentions the Hon. Fred McGee. Mr. McGee's name is dragged into this case because the postmaster expected that he would have Mr. McGee endorse a note for him so that he could make good.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister realizes that the Hon. Fred McGee's name is not mentioned. I said "Mr." McGee, and also said that I did not know who he was.

Mr. VENIOT: I know who he is, because I made inquiries and found out.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not know.

Mr. VENIOT: It is the Hon. Fred McGee who is mentioned there. He had no connection with the post office at all and I desire to clear his name after it has been dragged into this case.

Mr. HANSON: There is not the slightest reflection on Mr. McGee.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a reflection, it is just a remark.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. leader of the opposition states that Griffith is a thief, that Griffith embezzled and used for his own purposes public moneys which he had acquired and for which he had made no returns to the department until after he had held it for a certain period. If the record is correct—I believe it is as the hon. gentleman has read it—rightly or wrongly Griffith was allowed by the financial department, then in charge of Mr. Glover, to become guarantor for the full amount of the defalcations, which amounted to over $900. During a period of months he collected certain amounts and every cent of the money collected by him was paid into the Post Office Department and the department has received full credit for it.

Mr. STEVENS: Not until after he was charged with defalcation.

Mr. VENIOT: He was never charged with stealing.

Mr. STEVENS: Charged with defalcation.

Mr. VENIOT: He was never charged with defalcation.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes he was.

Mr. VENIOT: Nor did the superintendent ever report him for defalcation, and the records will bear out that statement. When Mr. Woods drew his attention to the fact that he had collected certain moneys which he had not reimbursed to the Post Office Department, Mr. Griffith came back with the statement that Mr. Woods must have known of the arrangement made between him and Mr. Glover, that he was guarantor for the amount of money. I do not say that he was right in doing that, but he did collect certain amounts and placed them to his own credit, and when that reached a certain amount he would pay it over to the Post Office Department.

Mr. HANSON: When he was caught he had to borrow the money to pay it.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no evidence of that.

Mr. HANSON: There is evidence.

Mr. VENIOT: There is not.

Mr. HANSON: There is a letter on the file.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no evidence on the file except a letter which states, "I can prove that he borrowed the money." I think I am right there.

Mr. ERNST: And the cheque.

Mr. HANSON: And an offer was made to produce the cheque which supplied the money.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish the hon. member would take his seat. The hon. gentleman should not get so excited as to have his pipe in his mouth and be trying to smoke during this discussion.

There is no evidence except the statement by John Emerson, the inspector, to the effect that he could prove that Griffith had to borrow the money to return it. That is the very matter we are looking into now. I want to say to the house that the investigation at St. John will be as thorough as any investigation ever held in the province of New Brunswick, and there have been a good many held in that province investigating the embezzlement of public funds.

I said I was not going to discuss the details of this matter, and it is not my intention to do so. While reading the file the hon. leader of the opposition said that he did not intend to draw any inferences, but it would have been far better, and perhaps more satisfactory to the house, had he dealt with these matters in an inferential way rather than the way in which he did deal with them. So far as I am concerned, as head of the department, with the defalcation by the postmaster at Dupey's Corner post office, let me say this to the house. My attention was first drawn to the matter, at least a year and a half after arrangements had been made for the collection of the money from Hebert, postmaster at Dupey's Corner, by the father of Hebert, who came to my home. I knew there was trouble at Dupey's Corner, but I did not know any of the details at the time he came to me and told me of the trouble into which his son had fallen and his heartburnings on account of the conduct of his son. He wanted me to give an extension of two years in which to pay up the defalcation. I refused that, but I said to the old gentleman in my own home at Bathurst—I think it was around the Christmas holidays—"An extension of four months is as much as you can get for the payment of this amount." The old gentleman went away after promising me that they would make every effort possible to arrange to pay the amount so that his son would not be punished, and that after the amount had been paid, his son would hand in his resignation as postmaster.

The matter ran along for some time and the following summer Mr. Hebert again appealed to me, this time, I think, in writing. I replied that I refused to consent to a further extension, and that is the time I wrote to the Deputy Postmaster General the letter in regard to which he says: "The Postmaster General instructs me to close this matter." Yes, I wanted to close the matter, to see that proper steps were taken to protect the department, and to get the money that we were entitled to receive on account of this defalcation. That is the meaning of that notation that was read by the leader of the opposition. My instructions were to see that as much as possible of the money was obtained; after that the matter would be closed and we would dismiss the postmaster.

Mr. McGIBBON: And it would not be referred to again.

Mr. VENIOT: I wanted it wiped out entirely. The only time it would be referred to would be when that same postmaster's name appeared as one of those dismissed from the service, and our hon. friends opposite would say that the political axe had fallen once more when a man of this kind was dismissed.

I have stated to the committee my connection with the Dupey's Corner matter. Let me now come to the matter of placing William Griffith as a junior inspector in charge of the St. John office in the absence of Mr. W. H. Woods, the district superintendent. I believed in Mr. Griffith. I knew the bad blood that had been created within the last two years in the office between Griffith, Woods and Emerson. I knew Emerson was playing both ends against the middle, because, as a senior, he believed that Mr. Woods, who was supposed to be exceedingly ill, would soon have to retire and that by playing both ends against the middle, setting Griffith against Woods and Woods against Griffith, he would have a better opportunity of being promoted to district superintendent.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman at all and I am not going to allow him to interrupt me. I kept perfectly quiet while all this was going on, and I do not intend to allow hon. gentlemen opposite to take up my time by asking questions.

There was also a vacancy for a postmaster in the city of St. John. Again jealousies crept in and it looked at one time, from the inside workings and special information that we were able to obtain, that this row between the two inspectors and the superintendent was spreading to the main office. We had to undertake to check this. Knowing all this; knowing the differences between these men; knowing that, according to the records of the Post Office Department, Griffith was an expert in postal administration; knowing that Mr. Emerson was playing the game that he was playing; knowing that Mr. Woods had no confidence in Griffith—owing to the row between them and not because of lack of ability, because as regards administrative ability Woods gave Griffith one of the best records that can be given to an inspector—and knowing further that there was special work to be done in the postal district, which work, owing to Mr. Woods' ill health, could not be done by him, I placed in charge the man that I considered the best fitted, from an administrative standpoint, to carry on. The record of his administration will show that there was more reorganization, more activity and more useful work done during the period of the few weeks he was in office than has been the case in regard to any other inspector during the last twelve months in the city of St. John. The men in charge of the records can show that when an investigation takes place. As I say, knowing all that, I placed Griffith in charge.

Not a soul in New Brunswick will believe that W. F. Griffith, who was born in the city of St. John of honest parents and who is well known in that city and all over the province, would take to his own use for the purpose of stealing or embezzlement one dollar that did not belong to him; and no man will dare say in public what he says in the house, when he calls Griffith a thief. If W. F. Griffith held over $180, or $150, as the case may be, I know that he conscientiously believed he was justified in doing so under the guarantee he had given to the department to make good the amount of the defalcation of this postmaster at Dupey's Corner, and only in that regard might he be considered to have acted irregularly. I take back water to nobody in my endeavours to instil honesty and discipline in the service over which I have control. Knowing that Griffith was an honest man; knowing that there were things that had to be done that I knew could not be done by Mr. Emerson; knowing that Mr. Woods could not do them on account of his bad health; and having myself suggested to Mr. Woods that owing to the condition of his health, he should take a trip to the West Indies and look after certain interests we have there in connection with the new line of steamboats that were about to carry our mails, I gave an order to install Griffith in that office, and I do not regret doing so. I felt I was doing my duty; indeed, I was convinced I was doing my duty. I was convinced that I was doing no injustice to Mr. Emerson because there is not a rule or regulation of the Post Office Department requiring that the senior officer shall always take charge. I am informed by my head officials that, not very long ago the same thing took place in Toronto and in other large offices. The senior officer, it is true, provided that no orders to the contrary are issued from the department, automatically falls into the position left by the superintendent. In the present case I was doing nothing else than following the precedent that had been established for years under all governments. I issued an order naming the inspector, whether junior or senior, who was to be in charge of that office during the absence of his superior officer, the superintendent.

I am not going to speak about the row that took place on the return from Cuba of Mr. Woods, the superintendent. I know that a row did take place, but there are always two sides to a story. My information—we have nothing definite yet until we get through what we are doing now in connection with the matter—is that there was provocation and encouragement to a volation of discipline. I do not wish to excuse this man Griffith for what he may have said or done to his superior officer, and if it is proven on investigation that Griffith did treat his superior officer in the way stated in the charges made by the superior officer, I shall know what punishment to meet out to a man who is guilty of such a breach of discipline towards his superior officer.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister—perhaps I should address this question to the Secretary of State—if he will lay on the table at eight o'clock the civil service files regarding Griffith from the time of his appointment to date. I may say that I rang up the Civil Service Commission this morning and asked if the civil service files could be produced, and they intimated that usually they were produced through the Secretary of State, which I admit is the correct procedure; but they are ready, I understand, and can be produced.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

JOLIETTE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. C. E. FERLAND (Joliette) moved the third reading of Bill No. 70, respecting Joliette and Northern Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MYRTLE VIRGINIA MAULSON

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale) moved the second reading of Bill No. 132, for the relief of Myrtle Virginia Maulson.

Mr. SPENCER: I would ask the hon. member if there are any children in this case, and if so, what arrangement is being made to take care of them?

Mr. SPENCE: I will not attempt to explain this case at all. While I have heard many cases in the divorce courts, I am not going to start to explain this case here. Anway, I don't think the hon. member is putting the question seriously.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up very much of the time of the committee, but I would like to touch upon a point or two brought up in the discussion this afternoon.

When, as Postmaster General, I first received an intimation of discrepancy or irregularity in connection with the Dupey's Corner post office transaction, I had it looked into. It was shown that there was an irregularity, so to speak, in money being collected and not being returned immediately to the department or to the financial branch of the department. I happened to be in New Brunswick, at St. John, and I called in Inspector Griffith. His explanation to me was somewhat along the lines of that which he gave in a letter to the head of the financial branch of the Post Office Department at Ottawa. Knowing Mr. Griffith as I did and knowing his reputation, I could not for a moment believe that there was dishonesty in the transaction and I let the matter go at that in the meantime.

Later on difficulties developed in the St. John postal district between the superintendent and the inspector, and, I might say, the inspectors, at least two out of the four, and the matter came to a climax on the return of District Superintendent Woods from his trip to the West Indies. At that time there was no charge, but having received the information simply that there had been trouble between Inspector Griffith, acting district superintendent, and the regular superintendent on the latter's return from his West Indies trip, I obtained details. It was immediately decided that two men would be sent from the office at Ottawa to the office at St. John; that as Mr. Griffith and Mr. Woods were implicated in this quarrel, they would be set aside for a short period, and that these two men should take charge, one of the operating end and the other of the financial end, in order to see what could be done to restore discipline and a better system than had been in vogue for some years in the inspectoral part of the office as well as in the main post office itself. These men remained there, I think, the better part of three days. I happened to arrive in St. John I believe the day after they arrived.

Mr. STEVENS: What date was that?

Mr. VENIOT: Around Easter.

Mr. STEVENS: This year?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. I was home for the Easter holidays.

Mr. STEVENS: That is close enough.

Mr. VENIOT: I met both those officials at the hotel. They reported to me that they had gone into the matter; that they had brought Inspector Griffith and District Superintendent Woods together, and that they discovered that there was a great lack of discipline and of proper system in the work of the inspectoral district as well as of the post office itself. The postmaster was a new one; he had been for years an assistant, and on the retirement on superannuation of the former postmaster, he became postmaster. The system that was in vogue in the main office was due not to the gentleman who was postmaster at that moment, but rather to a sort of routine way of carrying on that had been in vogue for years. I discussed the matter with the two officials, Mr. Fortier and Mr. Underwood. Their report was made to me verbally. They said that they had established a system that would bring about the necessary improvements in the district superintendent's office as well as in the post office itself, and they wished to see it in operation before they continued their investigation any further. They referred to the question of lack of discipline on the part of Inspector Griffith, stating that they wanted to find out exactly what caused this and what, if necessary, should be done to remedy matters. At the same meeting they informed me that it would take them about another day to complete their work; that they would go back to Ottawa, and that at a future date they would return to St. John to investigate the whole workings of the district office as well as of the post office.

At that meeting they were instructed verbally by me that in view of this quarrel, if I may use the term, between the district superintendent and Inspector Griffith, a thorough investigation should be held not only into the method of carrying on and the lack of discipline, but also into the matter of the amount of money collected from the Dupey's Corner post office, going back to 1927. I never mentioned the Leger matter of $15 because, to my mind, it was so trivial. If it had been paid, it was not really money belonging to the department and I had on file in the department Griffith's word that he had no recollection of ever receiving the money, but that if they could show a voucher, which, of course, they could not show, he would hold himself responsible; that knowing these people to be honest, if they said he had received the $15 from them he would have to take their word for it. I did not think it necessary that I should issue instructions to go into a thorough investigation of that matter of $15; but my instructions were that when these men returned to St. John they were to go thoroughly into the matter of the Dupey's Corner defalcation and that was the intention of those men when they returned to St. John. After their return to Ottawa and after making their report to the Deputy Postmaster General as it appears on the file, they went further into the Dupey's Corner matter. There was a dispute about an item of $50 which appeared to be short of the amount supposed to have been received by Griffith from the Dupey's Corner postmaster's father. That matter was cleared up on investigation here. It was distinctly shown that the $50 was duly paid and that the trouble was due rather to a mistake on the part of Hebert than to any fault or discrepancy on the part of Inspector Griffith. The intention is that these officials shall continue this investigation to the end. It is my intention to investigate not only these two matters, but every part of the operation of the office at St. John.

I do not desire to reflect upon the administration of any of the officials in my department, but I wish to say now that in the Dominion of Canada there are three offices which require thorough investigation, on the question not of honesty or efficiency, but of the lack or otherwise of a systematic method of carrying on. According to the reports that have been made to me by the head officials at Ottawa within the last year, or possibly a little longer, those three offices are not measuring up to the proper standard. I am firmly of the opinion that a thorough investigation will disclose that the want of proper administration is the reason for these offices costing more to administer than they should. I am going to name the offices to which I refer, so that the people will be prepared for this investigation and will know that at least I am doing all that is within my power to see that these offices are properly manned and properly administered. One is St. John, another is Halifax, and the third is the city of Quebec. These investigations must be held because I have to get better results than I am getting to-day from St. John, Halifax and Quebec. I have named three; there may be others, but I have determined that these three offices must undergo a thorough investigation by the experts in the department here at Ottawa with a view to getting matters straightened out so that better results may be obtained. That is all I wish to say at the present time touching the investigation. I want to assure the committee that I am sincere in carrying on these investigations. They will not be carried on by myself personally. I do not intend myself to sit on such a board of inquiry, because, in the first place, it would not be my duty as Postmaster General to do so, and in the second place I would not know enough of the working details of offices such as St. John, Halifax or Quebec to bring out all that should be brought out in such an investigation. These investigations will be held by men of experience, experts in their respective branches in the head office at Ottawa, and the results will be made known to parliament when it meets again or perhaps to the public before parliament meets.

Just one other point and I am through. I have been "pulled over the coals," if I may use that expression, somewhat severely because I promoted, as it were, a junior over the head of a senior inspector to act as acting district superintendent in the absence of the district superintendent on his voyage to the West Indies. Before six o'clock I gave my reasons for taking that action. I pointed out then that it was nothing new for juniors at times to be placed in important positions of that kind over the heads of seniors, and I gave instances of it. It may be said: While that may be correct, you placed over the head of a senior a man who, according to the leader of the opposition, was a thief. I think he used that word; if not, I stand corrected.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that section 98 of the Post Office Act declares than one who takes money as Griffith admits he did is guilty of theft,. and he, I say, is a self-confessed thief on that record. Let there be no misunderstanding.

Mr. VENIOT: I contend, of course, that he did not take this money and did not keep it.

Mr. BENNETT: He says he did.

Mr. VENIOT: They did not lose one single cent.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. BENNETT: No, because he paid it back.

Mr. VENIOT: Where the whole mistake was made so far as Griffith is concerned was in the person at the head of the financial branch of the department in any degree encouraging Griffith to become the guarantor of the amount of the defalcation. That is where the fault came in. So far as I personally am concerned I was not mixed up in it. I am not one at any time to attempt to shirk responsibility for my actions. I have always taken responsibility for my actions, and I am always prepared to do so, but I want to say now that if there was any fault in the administration of the head office it was in encouraging Griffith at any time to become a guarantor to the Post Office department of the amount of the defalcation, which he undertook to collect and reimburse to the government so that the country would lose nothing. That is where the weakness was. Griffith himself states in his letter that he did what he thought was right in trying to collect as much money as he could to hand in to the department. There were irregularities, I must admit, on his part in becoming guarantor for this amount of money.

But leaving that aside, I have been censured, I say, for the passing of a junior over the head of a senior in the administration of an important branch of the postal service, not as a permanent appointment, but as a temporary one. Now, if it is wrong for me to do that—leaving out altogether for the moment the question of money and any irregularities—if I am to be condemned for passing this junior over the head of a senior, what must be said of the appointment of Mr. Woods to district superintendent over the heads of two inspectors who were eight and nine years senior in that office? Mr. Woods was appointed in 1917, and at that date, Mr. Alex. Thomson, later on postmaster of the city of St. John, and retired a year ago under the Superannuation Act, was nine years assistant inspector to Doctor Coulter. Doctor Coulter was retired in 1917, and Mr. Woods was taken on. I am not finding any fault with Mr. Woods. I say he would have been foolish had he not accepted that position when it was offered to him. I mention it simply to show that what is criminal for me is a virtue for my hon. friends on the other side. Mr. Woods was taken clear from the political field, without one minute's post office experience, an honest man, if you like, and with ability perhaps—no doubt he had ability in the lumber business which he was carrying on, a man perhaps of ability in the sphere of life in which he was brought up. I do not question that at all, but he had absolutely no post office experience, and he was placed in there over the head of men who were his seniors and who had been inspectors for nine and ten years. Is it any wonder then, with the chief of the postal district of the province of New Brunswick without one minute's experience in and without any knowledge of the postal service, without ever having entered for a moment a post office of the class we have in the city of St. John—is it any wonder that there arose a lack of discipline and a lack of system in the administration of the office at St. John? That is what we are up against to-day in the post office in St. John, and that is one of the matters which along with others I intend to have investigated.

As I said when I rose, I do not want to take up much more of the time of the committee, but I did want to place these facts on record.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to ask the minister a single question. Has Mr. Griffith been suspended?

Mr. VENIOT: No, sir.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he is still acting in that office?

Mr. VENIOT: He is still inspector.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is the section of the Post Office Act to which I referred. Section 98 reads:

> Every officer of or connected with the post office who converts to his own use in any way whatsoever, or uses by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or lends, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safe keeping, transfer, disbursement, or for any other purpose, shall be deemed to have stolen so much of the said moneys as is so taken, converted, invested, used or lent, and is guilty of an indictable offence.
> 2. Every person who advises or knowingly and willingly participates in such theft is guilty of an indictable offence, and shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay to His Majesty a fine equal to the amount of the money stolen, and shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than three months.
> 3. The neglect or refusal by any such officer to pay over any public moneys in his hands, or to transfer or disburse any such moneys promptly, on the requirement of the Postmaster General, shall be prima facie evidence of such conversion to his own use of so much of the public moneys as is in the hands of such officer.

And here we have read into the records this day letters from Griffith stating he could not collect the money. But he had used it himself, and when he was called upon to pay it he had to borrow from a man who gave him a cheque for $200, and that man offers to produce the cancelled cheque.

Mr. VENIOT: That is why an investigation should be held. What the hon. gentleman now advances is no evidence of the borrowing of the money.

Mr. BENNETT: It is evidence that from June to November he had that money converted to his own use, and in the meantime sent letters to the office at Ottawa and to other places that he could not collect from the Heberts.

Mr. VENIOT: And the department is holding him responsible under that arrangement for the full amount of Leger's defalcation.

Mr. BENNETT: He was asked to pay and could not. That is the answer, Mr. Chairman. It is incredible that any attorney general or minister of justice of Canada would permit a colleague to make a statement like that. There are men to-day doing time in the penitentiaries of this country who were connected with the post office, and they are there for just the very offence that Mr. Griffiths admits he committed, men without any responsibility, young fellows who took the money and then said, "Oh, well, we will pay when the time comes." And when the time came they could not borrow the money and were found guilty of appropriating the funds of the post office. Yet we have a minister of the crown, not somebody on the hustings, not a politician, but a responsible minister of the crown telling the people of Canada that it was the proper thing for the man to steal this money under this section, and he justifies the man's action by saying he guaranteed to repay it.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. I never used the words that he has just put into my mouth. I said I was not satisfied, and I am not satisfied to-night, that Mr. Griffith is guilty of this offence; and the investigation was begun before this matter was brought up in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Griffith says he took the money.

Mr. VENIOT: Not in the sense the hon. gentleman wishes to impress upon this house and upon the country. The hon. gentleman is qualifying the statement of Griffith in that letter. If he joined the letter that

Griffith wrote to the Finance department with the admission of Griffith, then the public would fully understand that Griffith was not guilty of what my hon. friend now says he is.

Mr. BENNETT: I read both letters.

Mr. VENIOT: But you read them far apart.

Mr. BENNETT: I read them one right after the other, in the sequences in which they were taken from the files. I am in the judgment of this house and of the country in declaring that no postmaster general can stand up and say that because a responsible official who received money, mark you, from a defaulting postmaster, put it in his pocket and lied about it for six months, and then, because his superior went down to the Dupey's Corners post office and found out the situation, came through with the money by borrowing it from someone else—I say no postmaster can justify such conduct. And yet behind Griffith to-night stands this minister of the crown. Let the people of Canada know that behind him stands the government of the country.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman is hardly fair.

An hon. MEMBER: Very fair.

Mr. VENIOT: I am forced to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman does not wish to be fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot but express that opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: I never quarrel with your opinion after what I hear.

Mr. VENIOT: Nor will I quarrel with yours, because your opinion changes so often that it is hardly worth while quarrelling with.

Mr. BENNETT: All right.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not behind Griffith an the ground of appropriating to himself funds, or stealing, as my hon. friend would interpret the law to be, but because the very moment my attention was drawn to what might appear to be something as laid down by the hon. gentleman I ordered an investigation, and not as a result of anything that has taken place in this house this session.

Mr. DUNNING: Long before.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: I started to look into the matter and finally came to the conclusion that I would investigate thoroughly the disciplinary system they have there, as well as this matter of supposed retention of funds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And you promoted him in the meantime.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the British law he is innocent until he is proven guilty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And subject to promotion.

Mr. POULIOT: As we are all gentlemen of the jury in this case, I desire to give my impressions of it. The hon. leader of the opposition stated that he was acting, as crown attorney at the preliminary inquiry, where the doubt is against the accused; at the trial the doubt is in his favour. That is a great difference. I believe the hon. leader of the opposition read too much and thought too little. I have followed this debate very closely. We must remember who are the actors in this melodrama. First of all, there is Mr. Woods. Mr. Woods is a saint, because he was appointed from the Tory ranks to his position in the civil service. He was a lumberman who had had no experience in postal work. He asked for a little holiday to visit, not the southern states, but the enchanted island of Cuba. Someone had to act for him during his absence. There were four assistants, two of whom have been mentioned in this discussion, Mr. Emerson and Mr. Griffith. Mr. Emerson had been the senior to Mr. Griffith in the office, just as another gentleman had been senior to Mr. Woods when he was appointed by the Tory party in 1917. A bad example was set by the Tory party in the first instance, and the trouble of the Liberal party is that they followed that bad example. In other words, what was right when our friends were on this side of the house is wrong when we are here. But anyhow, what happened even before that? There was a postmaster named Leger at Shediac. He seems to have been an honest citizen; but he had a crooked son who was a thief, and several times that crooked son stole money from the drawer in the Shediac post office. Then what happened? Griffith—that bad Griffith—went there as a good Samaritan and said: I will try to help you; I will be your guarantor, I will take full responsibility for the whole thing towards the department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh!

Mr. POULIOT: Yet, this is the fact according to what my hon. friend read from the file. Griffith said to Leger senior: If you are not able to pay right away what your son owes to the post office, well, I will pay it myself. And so they became joint debtors to the department. Leger senior, the father, and Griffith, the inspector, became responsible to the department for the debt of the son, and if Leger had not paid a cent to Griffith, Griffith would have had to pay the whole amount. Whether it is right or wrong according to the formality usually followed in the department, I cannot say, but I think that morally no one can object to it, and it shows a good spirit on the part of Mr. Griffith towards Mr. Leger. At that time Mr. Leger was still holding this post office as postmaster. Afterwards, what happened. Perhaps the son stole some more; I do not know. But for some reason or other Leger had to quit the office, and then the trouble started. And what evidence have we? There is no receipt on the files showing that Griffith had received a certain amount of money from Leger. There is no receipt for the amount which my hon. friend said this afternoon had been embezzled. There is no proof of that. The only proof, so-called, which would not be admitted in a court, is a simple affirmation on the part of a man who is not under oath, and who, because he is not under oath, may lie. And nothing shows us that he is not a liar. That affirmation is to the effect that he gave a certain amount of money at several intervals to Griffith. But is there a sworn statement to that effect? There is none. Does Griffith admit that he had received money from that man?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: No; he says, "It might be, but I don't remember it". It shows his honesty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends laugh, but if they had the right idea of what honesty is in politics they would not laugh. They have the wrong idea. What about the carloads of mail bag padlocks which were bought by the Hon. Mr. Pelletier when he was Postmaster General? It was before my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) entered politics. There were so many padlocks, I am told, that there are still several carloads of them in the department. They are all rusted; they are of no use. I will not dwell to any greater extent on a matter of that kind. I simply want to show that there is no evidence to the effect that Griffith had embezzled a cent of the money handed in by Leger. And not only that; he was generous enough to assume himself the full responsibility for the debt in order to help that man. Can we blame him for that? I believe that there are very few people who would not have done the same thing under similar circumstances, and no one will really blame the man for having done what he did. It seems to me that the matter has been satisfactorily explained by the Postmaster General and I am sure the mind of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is entirely satisfied in that respect.

May I tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I would say in regard to that post office affair if I were a Tory member in this house? First of all I should have a great respect for my leader and would try to be an example to my colleagues; I should say that what my leader said was all right and that I believed in him. And the other day, sitting in this house, I heard the leader of the opposition say that in itself there was nothing wrong about a dismissal for political partisanship. He was generous enough and broadminded enough to make that admission, and as it was not wrong he admitted that he had done so himself when his party was in power. He did it four or five times. Now we have two hundred and forty-five counties in Canada, and if every member requested four or five dismissals in his own county for reasons of political partisanship we should have over twelve hundred dismissals. Dismissals were made on a large scale when the Hon. Mr. Pelletier was in office in 1911, because inside of six months, I believe, there were at least twelve or fifteen hundred dismissals. Apparently and according to the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition there was nothing wrong about that, and my hon. friends opposite would say that these dismissals took place in the natural course of events. As a matter of fact, even persons who were dead were dismissed; this happened in several cases. As an hon. member remarks, there were post mortem dismissals. This year, on the other hand, the Postmaster General has been very severely criticized for having dismissed since he has been acting as such about one hundred and fifty persons for reasons of political partisanship, although that does not represent one dismissal per county. Surely, in the light of the figures which the files disclose for previous years, especially 1911-1912, this is a very reasonable record. But this is what I would say if I were a Tory member: I would say that the present Postmaster General, in this respect only, is not effective enough; if he were a good. a strong Postmaster General, such as the Hon. Mr. Pelletier was, he would at least dismiss the Tories who have replaced Liberals in that time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have just a word to say in regard to Mr. Woods. I should like to have some more information regarding him; I should like to know whether he is an angel.

An hon. MEMBER: Just like Taschereau.

Mr. POULIOT: Well Taschereau is a name I heard on a broken record in the cabinet of the gramaphone of Mackenzie and Mann. I repeat, I should like to hear something more about Mr. Woods if the Postmaster General can tell us.

Mr. BENNETT: I regret that I cannot look upon this matter in the frivolous light in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pouliot) sees it. It may well be that, to some, this is an occasion for levity; to me it is not. I did not for two hours this afternoon read correspondence, without making any comments to speak of, merely for enjoyment. I did it out of a sense of the duty that devolves upon me in the position I occupy at the moment, and I believe it is the duty of this House of Commons to examine into the administration of this department.

The Postmaster General, I sometimes think, has a faulty memory because his statements are so entirely beside the facts. I find it so difficult to understand how any hon. gentleman who is at all jealous of his reputation for the statements he makes could have made such statements as we have heard from the Postmaster General to-night. For example, here is the fact as reported. Mr. Griffith received money as follows: August 23, $40; September 30, $50; November 8, $200; December 2, $40, or a total of $330. And he paid $150 of that into the department. Thus it will be noted that having received, on November 8, $200, he took $150 out of the $330 and put it to the Postmaster General's credit on December 1, and on the 20th day of June of the next year he paid $180 to the government of Canada. Surely the members of this house realize what that means. The letter of Mr. Woods reads:

> Mr. Griffith has just called upon me and has delivered to me, on account of the shortage of the postmaster at Dupey's Corner, $180, and the same will be deposited in the Bank of Montreal, Saint John, this date.

The receipt follows. How would it be possible for the minister to make the statements he has made to-night in face of these facts, bearing in mind that when the question of Griffith's annual increase came up on August 27, 1927, only two months later, Mr. Coolican puts this note down for the guidance of the inspection service:

> The Postmaster General instructs that Mr. Griffith's annual increase be proceeded with, notwithstanding the report by District Superintendent Woods.
> The Postmaster General advises that he knows all the details of the case—hence, the above instructions.

Mr. VENIOT: That was in 1927?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: What case was that?

Mr. BENNETT: The case from which I have just read is the case referred to by District Superintendent Woods when he declined to make the recommendation for Griffith's annual increase because of the Dupey's Corner and Shediac cases. On June 20, 1927, Griffith admitted that he had the money, and he paid it over. There is upon record, unverified it is true, the statement of a gentleman who says he will produce the cancelled cheque whenever it is required. I appeal to the members of this committee: Have you ever heard of a man who, being guilty of such an offence, has not been suspended? To-day that man is down there fraternizing with the officers of the department, and the public service is expected to be carried on while he is the chief rating officer under the directions of the Postmaster General. Is it any wonder that some of us regard a matter of this kind as serious and decline to treat it with levity as it is treated by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)?

It has been pointed out by the Toronto Globe, by the Regina Leader, by the Winnipeg Free Press and by the Moncton Transcript, certainly not supporters of the opposition, that we have a Civil Service Act. Here is the Civil Service Act; here we have this responsible official, the rating officer in the St. John district office, and we have the undeniable fact that on June 20, 1927, he paid $180 to the government of this country which he had converted to his own use for over six months. If he had been a poor, unfortunate letter carrier he would have been sent to the penitentiary, and at that he paid over the money only when his superior officer caught him, as the hon. member for Fort William points out. I do not think for one moment that the Prime Minister can look with approval upon this sort of thing, and I do suggest in good part that this man should be suspended. I ask hon. members of this committee if they could expect any sort of public service to be maintained when knowledge of these conditions has gone all over the city of St. John? When I heard the rumours I could not believe them to be true, but apparently the Postmaster General expects the public service to be carried on in St. John with that man, admittedly an embezzler of $180 for six months, in charge. Is it any wonder that we take a rather serious view of this situation?

The reason I endeavoured, difficult though it was, to dissociate myself from inferences and attacks directed against the Postmaster General in reading these documents this afternoon was because I hoped the house might, if I left the matter free from embittered comments or endeavours to draw inferences, be able to realize the seriousness of this matter. There is not one of us who is not affected, and there is not one of us who does not realize the difficulties and temptations in the paths of poor, underpaid officials in different sections of the country. The Postmaster General said the other day that in some instances he had extended clemency, but here he rewards embezzlement with promotion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no question of saying "hear, hear"; it is not a question of applause but a matter which strikes at the very vitals of the life of this country. Are we to continue in this way or are we not? I think I can say with a clear conscience that I have endeavoured to do my duty by bringing this matter to the attention of this committee, but the Postmaster General brazenly says, "He is not suspended; he is down there bossing the job; I always stand up and take the responsibility." There is the record, and it shows the admitted embezzlement of this amount of money for six months.

What does the Minister of Justice say? Is it his opinion that a minister of the crown should stand up and attempt to justify himself in this way? I put it to the Minister of Justice: Here we have an official who admits that he received $330 over a period of time extending, as he says, from August to December in 1926. He paid over $150 of that total in December, 1926, and retained the balance until his superior officer found out about it, when he rushed in and paid the belance of $180 with, it is alleged, money he had borrowed. Is it just that that man should be permitted to lord it over those who were once his senior officers? Should he be permitted to insult them, to call them liars and scoundrels and all that sort of thing and then have the chief officer of his department, a member of His Majesty's Privy Council, the head of the great Post Office Department of Canada, stand in his place in this house and justify conduct of that kind? I leave that with the Minister of Justice, confident that when he realizes the seriousness of the situation and when he applies the principles of law to the given facts he cannot possibly and would not, as Minister of Justice of Canada, endeavour to justify that conduct.

It is for that reason that we have endeavoured to place this matter fairly before this committee. The Postmaster General says he has not suspended the man; in other words he is defying parliament. Public opinion in Canada is defied; the opinion of this house is defied by the Postmaster General who says, within a month or two after the $180 was paid, that he was thoroughly familiar with all the circumstances, and who instructed that the salary of this man be increased contrary to the report of the district superintendent. We have not the civil service report to which the minister referred this afternoon with respect to this man's rating, so I make no observation with respect to it.

Mr. VENIOT: I referred only to the rating given Griffith by his own district superintendent.

Mr. BENNETT: This afternoon I read that rating from the record, and it will be observed that that rating was not quite so high as the minister would have us believe. The record of Griffith with regard to punctuality, attendance, his attitude towards his subordinates and so on was rated sometimes at 70 per cent and sometimes at 80 per cent, while with respect to his capacity, ability and so on he was rated at 90 per cent. I do submit that this is not a case in which we should be content to merely make the statement; I believe this is a case which calls for action.

Let me put this to the members of the committee: Is there any one of us with a business of his own who would hesitate, having that set of facts before him, in suspending such an employee? Would any bank or any other branch of the public service hesitate for a moment? I can easily recall reasons which have resulted in men being dismissed from much less important positions than this; I can think of cases which I have observed personally of young men, sometimes pleading guilty, being sent to penitentiaries and penal institutions for just such offences as embezzlement. We must remember that, as the statute says, embezzlement consists of the conversion to your own use of money which you have received in your public capacity. Mr. Griffith received that money as the investigating inspector, and having received it as such he declined to pay it over on the excuse, mind you, that he personally guaranteed it. But he failed to keep his guarantee. Hon. gentlemen must remember the letters I read this afternoon; letter after letter was sent to him during this six months asking for the money. He replied once that the man was sick, once that something else had happened, and the record now shows that the excuses given were untrue, because we have his proceedings register, his record, showing all these details. Still to-day that man is in charge of that office, superior to everyone except the district superintendent, and if the superintendent goes away for a day this man is in complete control of the business of that office. He has to deal with the rural postmaster who is short in his funds; he has to deal with problems of setting in motion the law having to do with those guilty of theft; he has to do all that. The member for Temiscouata thinks it is a joke, but I cannot see it from that point of view. If I could look thus lightly upon what I see to be the responsibility of this house I would be much happier, but I confess that when I read that record I was amazed and astounded; I confess at this moment that I am both amazed and astounded and my amazement is the greater when I find the minister still leaves that man unsuspended in that office and justifies in this house the conduct to which I have alluded. This action would have been unbelievable had it happened in any country other than this. I do submit that some action should be taken by the administration before supply is further granted to enable the minister—to do what? He says, "I am going to conduct an investigation," but there is such a thing as prima facie evidence. The minister knows that the man brought in the $180 six months after he had obtained it. Is there any hon. gentleman in the house who would keep on one of his employees under circumstances of that kind? I think not.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not laugh at what my hon. friend said, but I was smiling at seeing so many of his supporters sleeping while he spoke.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. VENIOT: To enlighten the house further I would draw their attention to the report and ratings given by District Superintendent Woods to Inspector Griffith. In 1927 he examined him and give him good ratings all down the line.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be easy to read it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. VENIOT: The inspector gives the following ratings in his report:

Quantity of work	90
Quality of work, carefulness and steadiness	80
Industry and willingness	80
Intelligence, resourcefulness and initiative	90
Ability to carry on work without supervision	90
Ability to carry out instructions	90
Knowledge of work of office or branch.	90
Tact in meeting public or in dealing with other employees	80
Willingness to cooperate	80
Fairness towards assistants or conduct in relations with superiors	70
Physical fitness and regularity in attendance	90
Punctuality	80
Ability to plan and supervise work and to instruct and direct others	90
Judgment. Ability to accept and carry responsibility	80
If in charge of staff, indicate with what success	90

Mr. BENNETT: Read the rest of it.

Mr. VENIOT: It is pretty hard to understand, after seeing a rating of that kind, why the following should appear in the report:

Service rendered by Mr. Griffith has been fairly satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: You might read question No. 25.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the superintendent goes on to give his reasons for being unable to recommend an increase in salary, as follows:

—regarding shortage in the accounts of the P.M. Dupey's Corner; also report of the 13th July/27 dealing with the claim of Mr. Edward T. Leger—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman might read the rest of it.

Mr. VENIOT: I was going to point out that in 1927 he was not dealing with the Dupey's Corner matter, but merely with the Leger matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The report says:

—also report of the 13th July/27.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister is not to be permitted to read incorrectly.

Mr. VENIOT: The report reads:

—also report of the 13th July/27 dealing with the claim of Mr. Edward T. Leger of Shediac that he had paid the inspector money which was not placed to his credit,—

That is the $15 matter. The report continues:

—the district superintendent cannot recommend Mr. Griffith for increased salary.

That is in 1927, but in 1928 they combine the Leger and Dupey's Corner matter. In 1927, on account of the $15 discrepancy in the Leger case—the other case was not then being considered against Mr. Griffith—he gives him a good rating with the exception of one item. There is certainly a discrepancy of some considerable degree between the rating given the inspector and the final conclusion arrived at by the superintendent.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot understand the hon. minister. I hold in my hand a copy of the document, certified to as having been compared, and I find that the minister left out the reference to the Dupey's Corner matter. Let me read it.

Mr. VENIOT: I did no such thing; I read the whole of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have the floor at the moment. This report is headed:

District Superintendent of Postal Service
O. S. S.
Aug. 11, 1927
Saint John, N.B.
Annual Efficiency Report

Question No. 26 and the answer thereto read as follows:

26. In case the employee is not at his maximum, do you recommend him for increase in salary? No. If not, state why: In view of the irregularities of Inspector Griffith as per report from this office of June 20th/27, regarding shortage in the accounts of the P.M. Dupey's Corner; also report of the 13th July/27 dealing with the claim of Mr. Edward T. Leger, Shediac, that he had paid the inspector money which was not placed to his credit, the district superintendent cannot recommend Mr. Griffith for increased salary.

I am going to read the other one.

Mr. VENIOT: I read both of them.

Mr. BENNETT: Question 25 and the answer thereto read:

25. Has employee rendered meritorious service and increased in usefulness in the service? Inspector Griffith has shown a disposition to disregard instructions and in the opinion of the district superintendent has not rendered meritorious service.

Question 26 follows:

26. In case the employee is not at his maximum, do you recommend him for increase in salary? If not, state why: In view of the irregularities as per reports from this office of June 20th and July 13th, 1927,—

That is the one about the Dupey's Corner matter which was read. The answer continues:

—and for the reason expressed above at item 25 the district superintendent cannot recommend Mr. Griffith for an increase of salary.

The minister omitted the Leger matter and referred only to the Dupey's Corner matter, which is the exact opposite to what the minister has said.

Mr. VENIOT: I read both of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say about this matter. I would not have spoken at all had I not heard what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said this afternoon.

It seems to me that there is one element in this case which the hon. leader of the opposition has more or less left out of account, and which I think has considerable bearing on the matter—criminal intention. I have heard the leader of the opposition say that this man is an admitted embezzler, that he is guilty of theft under the section which he has read, but I must say that as a professional man I would think there might be considerable difficulty in convicting Griffith. One of the elements to be considered in proving the crime of embezzlement is that of criminal intention.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not read the section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know there are a great many cases under sections like that, but I am not familiar with the cases on this particular section.

Mr. BENNETT: This is under the Post Office Act, not the criminal code.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are a great many cases under sections just like that. It has been held very often by the courts of the country that the element of criminal intent must be established even though we have sections of that sort. I submit that is the case in reference to this. My hon. friend says that there are many instances of young men who have been sent to penitentiary for embezzlement, for theft, under circumstances precisely similar to this; but if any of those men had been able to establish that, owing to the fact that they had given a personal guarantee for the amount that was due to the department, they considered the matter as being one between themselves and the department and that they were entitled to collect the money and remit later, they would not have been convicted. That throws a very different light upon the whole situation. Mr. Griffith might very well have believed that he had the right to defer those remittances in view of the fact that he had given to His Majesty the King a guarantee that the money would be remitted.

Mr. BENNETT: He had not done that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No question has been raised in the debate so far as to Mr. Griffith's financial ability to meet the demands that might and would eventually be made upon him by His Majesty the King, and under those circumstances the situation is quite different.

Mr. STEVENS: Would my hon. friend permit me a question? Apropos of his argument, is he aware that in the file which has been read from to-day very freely, there is statement after statement, including letters written by Mr. Griffith between the period when the money was collected in November and when he remitted it in June, in which he declares that he has been trying to collect it; that the postmaster on one occasion was ill and could not pay it; although Mr. Griffith already had the money in his possession for a month or two before he made those statements? Does that not alter the question of the trusteeship which is my hon. friend's argument?

Mr. ILSLEY: Only partly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not familiar with the file. If my hon. friends will permit me, I am attempting just as sincerely as they are to get to the bottom of this affair, and I deplore extreme language in regard to a matter of this sort. I do not know that the leader of the opposition is quite justified in denouncing this man as an embezzler and a thief in the way he did. I would not like to come to that conclusion without knowing more about the matter than I do at present. My hon. friend says that there are on the file statements in which he denies that he received anything. I did not take that from the letters that were read this afternoon. I am not, however, in a position to speak about that until I go more fully into the file; but before we come to the conclusion that this man would be convicted in any court of theft or embezzlement, we should take into account that element of criminal intent, the mens rea, the animus furandi.

Mr. CLARK: Would the hon. member increase his salary?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not addressing my attention to that feature of the case; I am referring simply to the statement made by my hon. friend that this man was a thief and an embezzler. I say: Let us not come to that conclusion too quickly. I understand he had been in the service for many years. I did not hear that he had been found guilty of anything of this sort before. The Postmaster General says that he was an efficient man and that he proved his efficiency during the period that he was in charge of the office recently. Those are the only considerations that I have to place before the committee.

Mr. GEARY: Will the hon. member say, having heard what he has, that a prima facie case of theft under the section has not been made out? I would also ask him from the depth of his experience to tell the committee whether he can say that a grand jury would not bring in a true bill on the evidence as read?

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat a question?

Mr. GEARY: I am waiting for an answer to my question.

Mr. ERNST: Postpone the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. THORSON: I may deal with that later. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would be willing to charge openly outside of this house, where he is protected, that this man is an embezzler and a thief?

Mr. GEARY: If it were at all necessary and if I were the member of the government who has charge of the matter, I believe I would be justified in doing so.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member has not answered my question.

Mr. GEARY: That is precisely an answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not think I can be accused of taking up much of the time of the house; but knowing Mr. Griffith as I do and knowing a great deal about his family and all his connections, I cannot let this pass without my voice being heard. I have known this man Griffith since he was a boy, and I know his parents and his whole family. No more upright and honest people live in New Brunswick than the Griffith family. An hon. member said that he would like to know a little more about District Superintendent Woods. I have known Mr. Woods too, all my life. I know nothing against him except that when he was appointed inspector he was appointed not because of his qualifications but because he was a political organizer of the Conservative party. As a reward he was appointed post office inspector. He was a good organizer. I do not think I am going too far when I say that he is still a pretty good organizer. That is where the trouble has arisen in the Post Office Department. As regards Mr. Griffith, I should like to know if any hon. member on that side of the house would be prepared to go out in the street and make the statement that Griffith is a thief, an emblezzler? When one comes to consider the matter, that is not a fair remark for any hon. member to make. I have travelled through the country with Griffith looking after mail routes, and I know him to be a gentleman and an honest man.

Mr. SPENCE: Is Mr. Griffith a good organizer, too?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, a good post office organizer. I know he helped me to get rural mail routes in many places where we were never able to get them before.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to bring before the committee a matter relating to the post office at Sutton, Quebec. The postmaster there, Mr. Olmstead, was dismissed by the Postmaster General of whom I should like to ask one or two questions before making a statement to the committee in regard to the matter. It appears from the file which has been produced that the Postmaster General ordered an investigation in connection with that post office. He personally wrote a letter to Mr. Gaboury, the Deputy Postmaster General, dated April 4, 1927, reading as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of numerous complaints about the way the post office is being run at Sutton, Quebec. I would like to have this matter investigated. I would suggest that you instruct the inspector that in this case especially I want no haphazard investigation. I am enclosing an extract from a letter which will indicate what the people think of the way things are being run at this post office.

There is an extract, Mr. Chairman, an unsigned extract from a letter; it does not state by whom it was written, and I would therefore ask the Postmaster General if he will produce the letter from which this extract which appears on the file was taken.

Mr. VENIOT: The extract was not signed. It was handed to me during a sitting of the house by the member for that county. He said: "Here is an extract from a letter which I got touching the administration of the post office at Sutton." I took that extract and inserted it in my file. My hon. friend has just read from a copy of it.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask the minister whether the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi endorsed the sentiments expressed in the extract?

Mr. VENIOT: He did, verbally.

Mr. CLARK: And did he request the dismissal of the postmaster at Sutton?

Mr. VENIOT: In discussing the matter with me, after giving me the extract, he said he thought an investigation should be held, and I acted upon that extract.

Mr. CLARK: What I wanted to ascertain was whether the hon. member recommended the dismissal.

Mr. VENIOT: He recommended an investigation into the conduct of the postmaster based on that extract.

Mr. CLARK: But he never recommended dismissal?

Mr. VENIOT: I have no record of his recommending dismissal, but he did recommend, I am sure, an investigation.

Mr. CLARK: Then will the Postmaster General advise the committee what were the numerous complaints he had received and which are referred to in this letter?

Mr. VENIOT: I had received these complaints. There was the extract, and also in conversation with me the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi informed me that numerous complaints were being made to him touching the administration of that office, and he cited to me some of the complaints.

Mr. CLARK: Was political partisanship ever mentioned?

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister state the revenue of that post office in 1924, 1928 and 1929?

Mr. VENIOT: In 1924, $5,562.49; 1925, $5,347.49; 1926, $5,806.98; 1927, $5,810.04; 1928, $5,160.01; 1929, returns not in for the fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK: And the salaries?

Mr. VENIOT: The deputy tells me that he could not get the salaries and allowances after six o'clock as the office was closed, but I will get that information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CLARK: I wonder if the minister will admit that the salary has been increased since the dismissal of Postmaster Olmstead.

Mr. VENIOT: The salary is based on revenue in an office of that kind.

Mr. CLARK: I think the Postmaster General is incorrect in that, because I am advised that the salary paid to Olmstead was $1,869 or thereabouts, based on a revenue of $5,562, and that the salary now paid is over $2,000.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman must remember that the commission paid on stamp sales has been increased from 50 to 70 per cent on the first $1,000, also 30 per cent, I believe, from that up to $5,000. That may account for an increase in the salary, although the revenue may be smaller.

Mr. CLARK: Does that apply throughout the country?

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, yes, that is general.

Mr. CLARK: The minister will admit that this particular post office is a Civil Service Commission appointment.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK: This case, Mr. Chairman, divides itself into several parts. There is first of all, the dismissal of the postmaster without cause, without an investigation—

Mr. VENIOT: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CLARK: I will come to that and show what investigation there was. There is next the appointment of a postmaster by the Postmaster General, temporarily, it is true, without any lawful authority for such appointment. There is next a very long delay in reporting the vacancy to the Civil Service Commission. Then there is a deliberate delay in sending to the Civil Service Commission the report of the superintendent upon the applicants, and after that a delay by the Post Office Department in furnishing further particulars requested by the Civil Service Commission. Lastly, there is the withholding in the office of the Civil Service Commission of the file for some months until a request arrived from the Post Office Department for a delay in the appointment, and then the admission on the file of one who I believe is a civil service commissioner that he had held the file in his office.

I would first review, Mr. Chairman, the facts that led up to the dismissal of this postmaster at Sutton. In 1924 the then sitting member, Mr. Andrew McMaster, made representations to the Department of Public Works that a building was required at Sutton for the use of the Post Office, Immigration and Customs departments. The Deputy Minister of Immigration stated that such a building was not required because one of the railway companies at that place was furnishing both the Department of Immigration and the Department of Customs with plenty of accommodation. However, some time later, in January, 1925, Mr. McMaster represented that one R. G. Crowell of Sutton had a building which would be an excellent location for a post office as well as for the immigration and customs services. This representation was investigated, and it turned out that the Crowell building was a brick building some twenty odd years old which had been burned down, but the brick walls remained, and the building had been rebuilt with wood and iron, and painted red. About the same time a petition was forwarded to the Postmaster General signed by some eighty-five per cent of the patrons of the post office at Sutton, expressing satisfaction with both the service and the location as it then existed.

Mr. VENIOT: May I interrupt my hon. friend? You are not connecting the present Postmaster General with that phase?

Mr. CLARK: No; but there were investigations during that time, all of which were before the present Postmaster General assumed office. All those investigations indicated that the service and location of the office and the character of the postmaster were absolutely satisfactory.

Now, pressure was brought to bear on the Post Office Department by the then sitting member, and on March 11, 1925, the department wrote the superintendent at Montreal stating:

> This is a special case as Mr. McMaster is personally interested in either the purchase or rental of this building.

On March 21, 1925, the district superintendent at Montreal made a very elaborate report on this building, in which he stated incidentally that there were no complaints whatever in the town of Sutton against the management of the post office by Mr. Olmstead, the then postmaster. But in April, 1925, Mr. McMaster became insistent, and Mr. Dastous, post office inspector at Sherbrooke, went to Sutton to make a further investigation. Mr. Crowell expressed his disappointment at Mr. Dastous being selected to make the investigation. Mr. Dastous made another attempt to interview Mr. Crowell, at a later date and Mr. Crowell stated:

> Tell the Post Office Department that I absolutely refuse to make complaints to you.

Despite these efforts no change was made under the administration of the Hon. Charles Murphy. Every investigation indicated that the administration of the post office was entirely satisfactory. Incidentally it might be stated that the postmaster had been honoured by the citizens of Sutton on several occasions with the office of mayor.

Shortly after the accession to office of the present Postmaster General instructions were given by him, as already stated, on April 4, 1927, to have this post office investigated. I might repeat the Postmaster General's own words:

> I would like to have this matter investigated. I would suggest that you instruct the inspector that in this case especially I want no haphazard investigation.

He refers to numerous complaints, also. There are no numerous complaints in this file. There is what appears to be an anonymous letter complaining about the postmaster at Sutton. As a result of that letter an investigation was carried out by the inspector at Sherbrooke, Quebec. That inspector once more went to Sutton and interviewed twenty-four prominent citizens. Seventeen of these stated that they were absolutely satisfied, and spoke in the highest terms of the management of the post office. Two stated that they had heard a complaint, but had none to make themselves. One stated that he thought there should be someone in the office who could speak French. It might be observed here that the postmaster himself spoke French. While he was not in the office all the time he was in the adjoining room and was there on call whenever required. One stated that there had been delay in the delivery of some mail, but he had no evidence to produce in that regard. There were two, however, who did complain. One was R. G. Crowell, who has since been appointed to succeed Mr. Olmstead. He referred the investigator to one Mr. O'Brien, who also had complaints to make, particularly in regard to the young lady assistant. Mr. O'Brien referred the inspector to certain others who, he said, had complained.

I should like to observe here that these two gentlemen are reputed, on very good authority, to be the leading Liberals in Sutton. One has been appointed postmaster, and the son of the other has been appointed his assistant. So I do not think we need consider very seriously their complaints, more particularly as they referred the investigator to one Mrs. Bates, who, they both stated, had a very serious complaint to make. The investigator went to the lady who stated she did not wish to make any complaint, and before the investigator left she said:

> Mr. Olmstead is a good citizen, don't you think so? I have nothing to say against him.

One of the other complainants was Henry Chatfield, whose chief cause of complaint seemed to be that the girl assistant must be in love. He noted on one occasion, while she was making distribution of the mail, she stopped to read a letter, and only resumed her work after she had read the whole letter. He stated, however:

> The postmaster is a good fellow, and his boy is very nice.

Meaning the postmaster's son, who was his assistant. That is the report. There is a supplementary report emphasizing the statements made in the earlier report and concluding in these words:

> As already stated, the postmaster is willing to comply with any instructions given, and any requirements advanced by the department in regard to ventilation, accommodation and adequate uninterrupted service if he is reasonably sure of keeping the office.

Every charge contained in the anonymous letter is in one place or another fully and completely answered in these reports, which I regret to say there is not time to put on Hansard in detail.

Now, with these reports before him, the Postmaster General issued a memorandum dated July 29, 1927, some months later, directed to L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, in which he states:

> I have had before me the inspector's report on the administration of the Sutton post office, dated April 16, and followed by supplementary report dated April 25. After carefully considering all the circumstances reported therein, I am convinced that in the interest of the public service there should be a change made at this office. You will therefore make arrangements for the dismissal of the postmaster, but in the meantime hold back the order of dismissal until I am in a position to give you the name of a man to be appointed temporarily in his place. This office comes under the Civil Service Commission.
> P. J. Veniot.

Then on August 10, 1927, there is a memorandum to Mr. Gaboury as follows:

> With further reference to the Sutton post office, please appoint Mr. R. G. Crowell as temporary postmaster at that place, pending the permanent appointment by the Civil Service Commission.
> P. J. Veniot.

At this stage I think it is well to mention that under the old Post Office Act, section 92, it was provided that the governor in council might appoint all postmasters having fixed salaries in cities and towns, and all other postmasters might be appointed by the Postmaster General. That section has been repealed, and the section which now is in force is section 19 of the Civil Service Act, which reads as follows:

> Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown, board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any employee to a position in the civil service.

Section 21 reads:

Every deputy head shall notify the commission of every vacancy in any position in his department immediately after the vacancy occurs, and whenever such vacancy is to be filled, the deputy head shall request the commission to make an appointment.

The vacancy was created by dismissal on July 29, 1927. The Postmaster General stated that it came under the Civil Service Commission and expressly requested that the dismissal should not go into effect until he was in a position to give his deputy the name of the successor. Now, he did not report that as required by law; nor did his deputy, as required by law, report it to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: When it has to do with a temporary appointment?

Mr. CLARK: The act is perfectly clear. Whether it be temporary or otherwise, there is no power under the Civil Service Act, nor is there any power under the Post Office Act for the minister to make such an appointment. There are some sections under which the minister may argue that he has the right to make temporary appointments, but I shall be quite prepared to reply to him when he so contends. In the meantime I state emphatically that he has no such power; the act expressly requires him, in words which are not at all uncertain, to report to the Civil Service Commission immediately any vacancy occurs. And he did not do so.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: No, he did not do so. He presumes to make the appointment himself, and it is not until October 5 that the Acting Deputy Postmaster General notifies the secretary of the Civil Service Commission of this vacancy, over two months after the vacancy has occurred. In October of 1927 this position is advertised, and there are two applicants recorded on October 14, 1927; one is R. J. Crowell and the other Robert Hill. On November 9 there appears on the file a memorandum wherein the officials are instructed to allow the appointment to stand. No reason is given why this appointment should stand; there is no supporting authority, nor is there any law. It is in absolute controversion of the sections of the Civil Service Act which require an appointment to be made. Following that, on November 19, 1927; on December 27, 1927; on January 18, 1928; on February 9, 1928; on March 12, 1928; on April 10, 1928, and on June 21, 1928, the Civil Service Commission request the Post Office Department to furnish them with the report of the district superintendent at Montreal upon the relative merits of the two applicants for this position—Robert Hill and R. J. Crowell. These requests are ignored, and it is not until a motion comes before this house for the production of papers relating to this post office that any steps are taken by the Post Office Department relative to obtaining the report of the district superintendent upon these two applicants. When that motion is launched a hasty wire is sent, which wire might well be read into the record. The wire is dated Ottawa, May 15, 1928, and reads:

J. Taylor, Esq.,
District Superintendent,
Postal Service,
Montreal, P.Q.

Forward report re Sutton postmastership at once.

P. T. Coolican.

This shows full well that the superintendent at Montreal had been doing his duty and had only been waiting for instructions from the department here to carry out that duty fully. On that very day, May 15, he forwarded his report in reply to the wire.

I have not looked up the records of the house for 1928, but I think that it is pretty safe to assume that when the Postmaster General received this his estimates had fairly well passed the house, or there was no chance of getting this file before the house that year. And no action was taken. That report was not sent to the Civil Service Commission although they had requested it monthly over a period of nine months. It was not sent to the Civil Service Commission until June 29, 1928, when the Deputy Postmaster General forwarded it under a covering letter to the Civil Service Commission. On July 9, following that, the examining board of the Civil Service Commission makes a report upon the applicants in this case, which report concludes:

Under the circumstances the examination branch recommends the appointment of Mr. Hill, who is entitled to the OAS preference.

This is dated July 9, 1928. No action is taken. There is some correspondence. Mr. Coolican writes on August 29, 1928 to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission drawing his attention to the fact that no report has been made by the commission. Nothing further happens until October 10, 1928, when the Deputy Postmaster General writes to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission requesting the Civil Service Commission to——kindly suspend action towards the selection of a new postmaster pending the receipt of further information from this department.

This matter has been brought to the personal attention of the Postmaster General.

Now that request of the Post Office department is taken before the chairman of the Civil Service Commission on October 25, in a memorandum as follows:

Attention is drawn to examination branch memorandum of July 9 last, wherein the appointment of Mr. Robert Hill, OAS, to the above position was recommended. A communication is now at hand from the Acting Deputy Postmaster General requesting that action towards the selection of the new postmaster in this case be suspended pending the receipt of further information from the Post Office Department.

Respectfully submitted for the information of the commissioners.

Doctor Roche, the chairman of the commission, has endorsed upon this file—I assume, in his own handwriting—the following:

I do not know why this file has been held for the last three months without being passed on by the commissioners. It has only been placed before me this morning, October 25, and in the meantime the department has placed the office in charge of the least competent applicant of the two.

Following that appears this memorandum dated November 8, 1928:

Memo. to Mr. Bland.

I think, in view of the chairman's memo, you should attach a memorandum to this file showng where and why it was held.

This is signed "W. F." I presume that means William Foran, secretary of the Civil Service Commission. A further memorandum, addressed to Mr. Bouchard, is as follows:

For report, please, as above, for the period June 30th (when D. S. report was received)—October 12 (when file was forwarded to me).

Then there is a memorandum to Mr. Bland, which I assume is the memorandum of Mr. Bouchard, dealing with the delay in submitting to the commissioners the report on the postmastership at Sutton. This is a detailed report in regard to the manner in which the files are held in the Civil Service Commission office. I presume that this officer is in charge of those files, and he very conclusively clears himself of any suggestion that he might have had the file in his office. He concludes with these words:

I can only, therefore, conclude that whoever had the file held it until the looked-for communication of the department to suspend action arrived.

(Sgd.) J.L.B.

That looked-for communication from the department was dated October 10, 1928; the details have been placed on Hansard already. In that communication the Post Office department request that the selection of a new postmaster be deferred pending further information. Endorsed on the margin of this same investigation these words appear under date of November 16, 1928:

I accept responsibility for holding this file in my office.

J.E.T.

I can only conclude that those are the initials of Mr. J. E. Tremblay, one of the three civil service commissioners. Thus we have a delay from July 29, 1927, to June, 1928, by the Postmaster General in giving the required information to the Civil Service Commission, and following that we have a file not lost and not missing but taken by one of the commissioners.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not the fault of the Postmaster General.

Mr. CLARK: I do not know; I shall be much interested to hear the explanation of the Postmaster General as to the relationship between himself and this civil service commissioner.

Mr. VENIOT: I have no explanation to make, because I have no relationship with him.

Mr. CLARK: I will leave it to the house to determine whether or not such relationship exists; to me the inference is pretty plain.

Mr. VENIOT: Always suspicious.

Mr. CLARK: No, I hope not, but so much has occurred in this chamber in the last few weeks with regard to this department that the suspicions of any man are easily aroused, regardless of whether or not he is naturally suspicious.

Mr. POWER: Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks there was anything improper in the conduct of Commissioner Tremblay?

Mr. CLARK: Decidedly yes; Commissioner Tremblay should be brought before the bar of this house to explain his conduct. In this case we not only have the provisions of the Civil Service Act disregarded and defied by the Postmaster General, but it seems that we have collusion on the part of one of the Civil Service Commissioners to defeat the terms of the very act which he is sworn to administer. I certainly think he should be brought before the bar of this house to answer for his conduct. The charges which were made against the two commissioners who were dismissed a year or two ago were serious, but in my opinion the charge against this commissioner, contained in his own writing in which he accepted the responsibility for retaining in his office for a period of months, a file which he was bound by oath to deliver, is far more reprehensible than the conduct of the commissioners who were dismissed by the Prime Minister some time ago.

Mr. POWER: May I just interject that I am very glad someone on the other side of the house has come to the conclusion that all commissioners are not infallible. I arrived at that conclusion long ago.

Mr. CLARK: I am very glad my hon. friend agrees with me.

Mr. VENIOT: If I made that statement it would be a crime.

Mr. CLARK: Personally there is one feature of this case which affects me, in a sentimental way at least, more than any other which has been brought out by the documents contained in this file. That feature has to do with the records of the two applicants. Mr. Crowell, the gentleman chosen by the Postmaster General, according to this court document which I have in my hand, apparently is in the same position as an undischarged bankrupt. I have here a certificate signed by the deputy prothonotary of the superior court of the province of Quebec in and for the district of Bedford, in which he certifies that on October 15, 1914, Robert G. Crowell did make an abandonment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. This document is dated at Sweetsburg, April 26, 1929, and is signed by J. A. Perras, D.P.S.C.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the date of that abandonment?

Mr. CLARK: October 15, 1914. Since that time this gentleman has carried on business in the name of his wife, and was carrying on business in her name at the time negotiations were entered into for the leasing of his building. At the time the Postmaster General's appointee abandoned all his property for the benefit of his creditors in an action brought against him by George E. Chart, the other applicant, Robert Hill, attempted to enlist. He was turned down because of physical unfitness, and a little later he underwent an operation in order to fit himself for service. He was then accepted and served in France from June, 1916, until after the armistice, with very great credit to himself and to his country. He was awarded the meritorious service medal for his services while in the field.

These gentlemen made their applications and were reported upon by the superintendent at Montreal, and nothing appears in the report as to the past business record of Mr. Crowell. However, I would draw the attention of the committtee to the following remarks from the report of the superintendent:

Robert G. Crowell: Educational qualifications: fair.
Robert Hill: Educational qualifications: good.

The residential qualifications are practically the same in each case. The report continues:

Robert G. Crowell: Integrity: good.
Robert Hill: Integrity: very good.

The only difference is that Robert Hill has had no post office experience. He is yard manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Sutton and assistant secretary of the Butter and Cheese Manufacturing Association of Sutton. Robert G. Crowell was postmaster at Dunkin for nine years, and acting postmaster at Sutton for the last seven months—illegally appointed, as I said before. I charge the Postmaster General with being personally responsible for the delay in this appointment. I must accept the statement which has been made by the hon. Postmaster General, but I would ask him to search his records and search his mind because I believe when he has done so he will find that he personally is the man who is responsible for this file having been lost in Mr. Tremblay's office for several months. I base that thought upon a memorandum which appears in the file, signed P. J. Veniot, and dated January 17, 1929, long after this file is discovered in the office of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission. This memorandum reads as follows:

Have inspector report on whether applicant Hill, returned soldier, is reestablished. It would appear he is, as he is stated as being yard manager of Canadian Pacific Railway at Sutton since 1919 and has been in their employ for twenty years with exception of years at war.

I wonder why the Postmaster General is so much interested in hounding this poor returned soldier by asking whether he is reestablished. Why does he suggest to the investigator that it appears that he is? Why is that investigation requested unless it is for the purpose of establishing that this gentleman is not eligible? I would draw to the attention of the Postmaster General the fact that it does not matter whether or not he is re-established; he is entitled by law to the position even if he is. Did the Postmaster General say no? May I ask the Postmaster General what his interjection was?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interject.

Mr. CLARK: You did, and I would like to know what it was.

Mr. VENIOT: I think there is a misunderstanding somewhere.

Mr. CLARK: I think there is some confusion in the minds of members of the house with regard to the preference afforded retured soldiers by the Civil Service Act. Subsection 4 of section 29 of the act states quite clearly and concisely that returned soldiers regardless of disability and regardless of whether they are re-established have preference over all civilians. I suggest that the Postmaster General was labouring under a misapprehension when he requested this last investigation. I further suggest that it is not at all consistent with his declaration made a few days ago that he is favourable to the employment of returned soldiers. In this case he has preferred a man who does not pay his debts to one who has fought for his country. He deliberately defies the act in order to see that the man is appointed, even temporarily.

In this case, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we have a dismissal contrary to every principle of justice and one which ignores even the indifferent standards laid down by the Postmaster General in regard to dismissals. He stated the other evening that no postmaster had ever been dismissed without an investigation under oath. There has been no such investigation in this case, and there have been no charges made. However, there was a request by the late postmaster, Mr. Olmstead, for an investigation, but his request was not even acknowledged by the Postmaster General and the letter does not appear on the file. We have the appointment of R. G. Crowell, for which there is no lawful authority, an appointment which defies the provisions of the Civil Service Act and defies the will of parliament. For nine months the Postmaster General has deliberately ignored the express requests of the Civil Service Commission for information which they were entitled by law to have. We have a deliberate attempt by a civil service commissioner to thwart the provisions of the act he has sworn to administer, in an effort to further the sinister ends of the Postmaster General. We have a deliberate and determineted effort by the Postmaster General illegally to maintain a political friend in an office to which he has no legal claim, and to defeat the right of a returned soldier with a distinguished record, who has qualified for the post and who under a statute of this parliament is entitled to the appointment.

Mr. VENIOT: The Minister of Finance informs me that it is necessary that he should put in a supply bill, and as it is now approaching eleven o'clock, I suggest that he have an opportunity to do that.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND STEAMSHIPS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $15,825,161.25, being one-fourth of the total amount to be voted by vote No. 336 for loans to the Canadian National Railway Company, vote No. 337 for a loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, vote No. 338 for a loan to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, and votes 339 and 340 for amounts required under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1930, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1930.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1930, the sum of $15,825,161.25 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 172, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1930.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ROBB moved the second reading of the bill.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): We who sit to the left of the Speaker believe that this form of legislation is bad. We do not believe that money for the railway services of the country should be voted through a supply bill, because taxation is not resorted to, so far as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is concerned, to raise the money, and the money is not granted to His Majesty in the narrow and technical sense of that term. I am making this observation so that when the matter is before the house for discussion, the granting of this supply, which, as I undestand it, is necessary in the public interest, shall not prejudice our right to object to the principle of the supply bill or the details of the measure itself.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BRANCH LINES

QUEBEC ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAYS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway, at a price of approximately $3,500,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

He said: Perhaps I might make a brief general statement as to the method of dealing with all these financial resolutions which appear in my name.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman has three of them and desires to advance them a stage to-night, if he intends to have the house go into committee of the whole on the bills—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, after they come back from the railway committee. I intend to ask the house to submit all these bills to the railway committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The special committee or the general committee?

Mr. DUNNING: The general committee. The special committee is not enpowered to deal with such matters as these.

Mr. BENNETT: I should be glad to assist the hon. gentleman in advancing his legislation to that point, provided that when the bills are before the committee of the whole, we have the fullest opportunity of discussing them on their merits, which discussion, strictly speaking should take place before. I understand it will be advancing the business of the house if the hon. member proceeds in the way he suggests.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite willing to accede to the suggestion of the hon. member.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: I have a brief statement covering the two railways which serve the Gaspe peninsula, and it is my intention to ask that these bills be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to the end that officers of the company may give full information regarding the negotiations. The negotiations in all of the cases at present under discussion were undertaken as a result of what transpired at the last Dominion-provincial conference with reference to the acquisition of various lines of railway in different parts of Canada. The whole of the negotiations have been undertaken with the respective parties, in some cases the provinces themselves, by the management of the Canadian National Railways, who, after reaching tentative agreements with the owners, have in every case convinced the government of the merit of the proposals having regard to all the circumstances. These matters can be gone into very thoroughly before the committee on railways and canals, and in addition I shall be pleased to encourage the fullest discussion when the bills come back from that committee to the house.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask a question in regard to this particular resolution, No. 20, dealing with the Quebec Oriental and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railways? Was a report made previously, about 1923, 1924 or 1925, I am not sure just when, by the management of the Canadian National Railways in regard to the purchase of this line, which report was adverse to the purchase? If so, will that report be laid before the house or before the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Numerous reports in connection with the Gaspe railways were made by the former management of the Intercolonial, and one, I believe, by the Board of Railway Commissioners, who at one stage investigated the whole matter. There is a report, not going so far back I think as my hon. friend mentions, which was adverse to the purchase of the road by the Canadian National Railway, while setting upon the road a higher value than that for which it is now proposed to acquire it. There was no question of the road not being physically worth the amount here provided, but the report was adverse viewed purely from the Canadian National traffic standpoint, and having regard to the traffic which the Canadian National was then receiving from the road.

Mr. STEVENS: May we have that report laid on the table?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly. The report will be made available to the railway committee, and if necessary I will table it also.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not a member of that committee, so I would like the report made available here.

Mr. DUNNING: I will see that my hon. friend sees the report.

Mr. GEARY: I would like to support the suggestion made by my hon. friend that the statement which the minister proposes to make should be placed on Hansard so that the members of the committee may be able to acquaint themselves with the information before they go into committee. I would also ask the minister to try to arrange that the sittings of the two railway committees will not clash.

Mr. DUNNING: I certainly will. The Quebec Oriental extends from Matapedia to West Paspebiac, a distance of 100 miles, and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western extends from West Paspebiac to Gaspe, a distance of 102.5 miles. These lines traverse the north coast of the bay of Chaleur and pass through a country whose chief activities consist of farming, fishing and lumbering. Latterly some activity has been shown in the development of lead, zinc and copper mining on the height of land of the Gaspe peninsula and about forty miles from these railroads.

The population served is 50,000 and the chief centres through which the railway passes are as follows:

Escuminac	Gascons
Carleton	Newport
Cascapedia	Chandler
New Richmond	Perce
New Carlisle	Douglastown
Port Daniel	Gaspe

The tonnage handled by the Quebec Oriental last year was 175,000 tons, and by the Atlantic, Quebec and Western 140,000 tons. The principal commodities were forest products, manufactured and miscellaneous products, coal, and products of agriculture. This territory has substantial possibilities from a tourist point of view.

The purchase price is $3,500,000, which was arrived at after negotiation with the trustees, and represents the cost of reproduction new less depreciation less subsidies paid. The Gaspe railways were exploited by Alfred M. Carpenter, at one time proprietor of the Charing Cross bank which became bankrupt a great many years ago, and the property has since been operated by trustees for the bond holders. The mortgage position may be briefly outlined with respect to the Quebec Oriental railway as follows:

Matapedia section prior lien 5 per cent bonds due January 1st, 1933, for an authorized amount of $487,000, of which $178,242 has been issued, $60,388 being pledged with the bankers to secure an overdraft. These bonds are a first lien on the line from Matapedia to New Carlisle.

Matapedia section first mortgage 5 per cent bonds, dated July 26th, 1910, due January 1st, 1935, for an authorized amount of $974,000, all of which have been issued. These bonds are secured by a mortgage on the railway from Matapedia to New Carlisle, ranking next after the prior lien bonds.

Matapedia section second mortgage 5 per cent bonds dated June 25th, 1910, due January 1st, 1935, for an amount of $974,000, all of which have been issued. These bonds are secured by a mortgage on the same section as the two above-mentioned issues and rank after them.

With regard to the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway, there is an issue of first mortgage 5 per cent debenture bonds due July 1st, 1935, amounting to $2,548,675. This issue is secured by a first mortgage on the whole property of the railway. Cash (received as subsidy) was deposited with the trustee sufficient to meet the interest until June 30th, 1916. This issue is also secured by the deposit with the trustee of securities acquired by $994,893 of the proceeds of the sale of subsidy lands.

There is an issue of second mortgage 5 per cent debentures amounting to $2,050,000 issued at par in settlement of balances of construction account. This issue is a floating charge on all the property of the railway.

Briefly summarized, the capital structure of the two companies is as follows:—

Quebec Oriental

	Authorized	Issued
Capital stock	$ 500,000	$ 120,776
Prior lien bonds	487,000	178,242
1st mortgage bonds	974,000	974,000
2nd mortgage bonds	974,000	974,000
	$2,935,000	$2,247,018

Atlantic Quebec & Western

Capital stock	$ 5,000,000	$2,000,000
1st mortgage debentures	4,590,000	2,548,675
2nd mortgage debentures	2,050,000	2,050,000
Total	$11,640,000	$6,598,675
Capital stock	5,500,000	2,120,776
Bonds	9,075,000	6,724,917
Total	$14,575,000	$8,845,693

Interest on the bonds of both the Quebec Oriental and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western has been in arrears for a number of years. In the case of the Quebec Oriental, the amount of interest accrued and unpaid at December 31st, 1927, was $876,600 of interest on first mortgage bonds and $759,720 on second mortgage bonds, or a total of $1,636,320.

In the case of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western all money received as subsidy from the Dominion government was deposited with the trustee and used to pay bond interest. This was sufficient to meet full interest until June 30th, 1916. The proceeds of the sale of lands granted as a bonus by the Quebec government amounting to £205,132 were likewise handed over to the trustee and invested for the benefit of the first mortgage bondholders. Interest at 2½ per cent on the first mortgage bonds was paid January 1st, 1917, from the proceeds of these investments, since which date no interest has been paid. A supplemental mortgage was executed on June 30th, 1917, modifying the original trust deed of 1906, by which the bondholders agreed as follows:

(1) Income from investments was to be used primarily to aid working expense of the line, the surplus (if any) to be applicable towards payment of bond interest at the end of the year.
(2) All bond interest not earned or available from income from investments to be foregone.
(3) Capital of the investments might be applied from time to time at the discretion of the trustee for the purchase of rolling stock and equipment and for other capital purposes including the provision of working capital.

This supplemental trust deed was to become void if a receiver were appointed or if a general meeting of bondholders passed an extraordinary resolution declaring it void. This supplemental trust deed expired June, 14th, 1920, at which time the bondholders agreed to the sale of the investments from time to time at the discretion of the trustee, the proceeds to be applied:—

(a) To enable the company to operate the line.

(b) To provide capital requirements.

Interest accrued unpaid on first mortgage bonds of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western at December 31st, 1927, was $1,832,578. Interest on the second mortgage bonds was to be paid out of income, if earned, so that there is no unpaid interest accrued on this issue.

The following is a summary of unpaid interest of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway at December 31, 1927—

Quebec Oriental 5 per cent 1st mortgage bonds	$ 876,600
Quebec Oriental 5 per cent 2nd mortgage bonds	759,720
Atlantic, Quebec & Western 5 per cent 1st mortgage bonds	1,832,578
	$3,468,898

[Mr. Dunning.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 173, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Quebec Oriental Railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Saint John and Quebec Railway Company, and the interest of His Majesty in the right of the province of New Brunswick in such undertakings and railways, for a total price of $6,000,000, inclusive of certain outstanding debenture stock secured by mortgage, and the payment at maturity of certain debentures issued by the province; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: We are agreeable to this passing on the same general conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The St. John and Quebec Railway Company was incorporated by New Brunswick statute in 1910 for the purpose of constructing a railway from the city of St. John to a junction with the National Transcontinental railway at Grand Falls, a distance of 225 miles, but there has actually been constructed only the portion of the line between Westfield Beach and Centreville, a distance of 157.8 miles. Access to the city of St. John is obtained through running rights over the Canadian Pacific railway from Westfield Beach, a distance of 15 miles.

The railway received a guarantee from the province of New Brunswick of an issue of 4 per cent first mortgage bonds, and also received a subsidy of $1,000,592 from the Dominion government.

An agreement was entered into between the company and the Dominion government whereby the railway, when completed, was to be leased to the Dominion government at a rental equivalent to 40 per cent of the gross receipts. Financial difficulties arose in connection with the construction of the line and eventually the province of New Brunswick took over the property and completed the construction as far as Centreville. The railway passes through Gagetown, Oromocto, Fredericton, and Woodstock. The population of the country served is 27,000. The territory traversed by the railway is for the most part very well adapted to agriculture, the upper portion being exceptionally well adapted to potato growing and large crops are raised annually. Other sections are especially adapted to the raising of sheep. There are distinct possibilities of mining developments about twenty miles west of Fredericton and in the vicinity of Woodstock. The valley of the St. John is very beautiful, and presents an excellent opportunity for development as a tourist resort.

The traffic handled by the railway consists of about 140,000 tons, products of agriculture, especially potatoes, predominating.

The purchase price agreed on is $6,000,000, based upon the cost of reproduction less depreciation of the property, and less the amount of the subsidy paid by the Dominion government. The arrangement does not involve any immediate cash payment on the part of the Canadian National Railways, but involves the assumption by the company of a portion of the first mortgage 4 per cent debenture stock guaranteed by the province in the hands of the public, which amounts to $2,727,977.40, and the payment to the province of the balance of the purchase price in amounts as set out in the bill for the purpose of retiring bonds issued by the province to raise moneys in connection with this railway, and the payment by the Canadian National Railways of 5 per cent interest upon the balance outstanding from time to time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 174, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the St. John and Quebec Railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

KENT NORTHERN RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Kent Northern Railway Company, in the province of New Brunswick, at a price of $60,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: On the same general conditions?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The Kent Northern railway is twenty-eight miles in length, and extends from Kent Junction, New Brunswick, on the Canadian National Railway, easterly to Richibucto on the straits of Northumberland. The road is at present controlled by the Walmsley estate and administered by the National Trust Company of Toronto.

The population tributary to the Kent Northern railway is estimated as 8,000. The settlement is confined to the shores of Northumberland straits and of the estuary of the Richibucto river. The principal point touched is Richibucto which has a population of 1,158.

Considerable timber resources are tributary to the railway and a number of small mills are established along the line. The principal forest products consist of pulpwood, lumber and laths. The tonnage handled is 10,500 tons.

It is proposed to purchase the undertaking for the sum of $60,000. This is in accordance with the arrangement proposed under appropriation act No. 2, chapter 52, statutes of Canada 1918, which was not accepted by the owners at that time, and is about equivalent to the scrap value of the material embraced in the railway property.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Kent Northern Railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

INVERNESS RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may purchase the undertakings and railways of the Inverness Railway in the province of Nova Scotia, at a price of $375,000; and that the governor in council may guarantee the principal and interest of securities to be issued for this purpose by the Canadian National Railway Company, not exceeding in aggregate face value such amount as the governor in council may consider sufficient to raise the said sum.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: On the same general conditions?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The Inverness railway extends from a junction with the Intercolonial Railway at Inverness Junction and runs through Port Hood, Mabou and Inverness on the west shore of Cape Breton island. The length of the line is sixty miles.

The company was reorganized in 1902 under the present corporate title with an authorized capital of $7,500,000. It absorbed the Inverness and Richmond Collieries and Railway Company of Canada, Limited, the properties of the latter company consisting of coal mines at Inverness, Chimney Corner and Port Hood in Cape Breton, covering an area of 55,000 acres. On May 1, 1915, the company defaulted on payment due of the semi-annual interest on its first mortgage 5 per cent bonds. On July 6, 1915, the exchequer court of Nova Scotia appointed J. M. McGillivray, Inverness, N.S., receiver of the property on application of the mortgage trustees (The National Trust Company). On July 23, 1919, Mr. McGillivray resigned as receiver and the Eastern Trust Company of Halifax was apointed his successor. The railway properties were operated under receivership until February 1, 1924, when they were leased to the Canadian National Railways for a term of three years at a rental of $25,000 per annum, with an option to purchase for $500,000. Since the expiration of the lease, January 31, 1927, the railway properties have been operated by the Canadian National Railways on a monthly rental basis.

The total estimated population tributary to the Inverness railway is 16,000.

The chief natural resources of the tributary area consist of coal. The coalfields of Inverness county include a series of narrow, low, carboniferous areas extending for over fifty miles along the western shore. The estimated probable coal reserves, to a depth of 4,000 feet, of the known deposits in Inverness County, are as follows:

	Metric tons
Land area..	22,000,000
Submarine area..	73,000,000
Total..	95,000,000

The known fields are as follows:—
Port Hood
Mabou
Broad Cove (Inverness)
Chimney Corner

[Mr. Dunning.]

Development has taken place in these fields at Port Hood, Mabou, and Broad Cove, all of which are adjacent to the Inverness railway. The Chimney Corner field is located some 12.6 miles beyond the present terminus of the railway.

The tonnage handled by the railway is 115,000 tons.

The purchase price is $375,000, which is about $6,250 per mile, and was a compromise made with the Eastern Trust Company who had bought the railway under foreclosure proceedings to protect advances made of $475,000.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, respecting Canadian National Railways and to authorize the acquisition of the Inverness Railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 1, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) presented the second report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations as follows:

Wednesday, May 1st, 1929.

The select standing committee on industrial and international relations beg leave to present the following as their second report:

Your committee has had under consideration a resolution adopted by the house on February 14th, 1929, as follows:

That the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

The following witnesses appeared before your committee to give evidence on the subject matter of investigation:

A. Grant Fleming, M.D., Professor of Public Health and Preventive Medicine, Montreal; J. G. Fitzgerald, Professor of Hygiene and Preventive Medicine, University of Toronto; Gerald H. Brown, Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour, Ottawa; R. A. Rigg, Director of Employment Service of Canada, Ottawa; Andrew D. Watson, Dominion Department of Insurance, Ottawa; W. Stewart Edwards, Deputy Minister of Justice, Ottawa; Robert H. Coats, Dominion Statistician, Ottawa.

Dr. Grant Fleming and Dr. Fitzgerald gave evidence dealing specially with sickness insurance.

1. Your committee would reaffirm the position taken in the final report adopted on June 6th of last session, namely:

That your committee accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, employer and employees.

2. Your committee recognizes that, while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces, and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

3. Your committee finds that the provinces, on being consulted by the Department of Labour with regard to their attitude towards the establishment of a general scheme, do not appear to be prepared to take immediate action.

4. Under these circumstances, your committee submits the following recommendations:

(a) That with regard to sickness insurance, the Department of Pensions and National Health be requested to initiate a comprehensive survey of the field of public health, with special reference to a national health program. In this, it is believed that it would be possible to secure the cooperation of the provincial and municipal health departments, as well as the organized medical profession.

(b) That in the forthcoming census, provision should be made for the securing of the fullest possible data regarding the extent of unemployment and sickness, and that this should be compiled and published at as early a date as possible.

(c) That the federal government be requested to bring the subject matter of this reference before the next federal-provincial conference; and your committee suggests, when the agenda for such a conference is being arranged that the provincial governments be invited to send representatives of the employer and employee to discuss the subject matter of this report.

Your committee further recommends that 750 copies in English and 200 copies in French of this report, and the evidence upon which it is based, be printed in blue book form, and that standing order No. 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

(Sgd.) Cameron R. McIntosh,
Chairman.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask a question arising out of the report? When will the chairman of the committee move its adoption?

Mr. McINTOSH: I intend to ask the house on Friday to adopt the report. Notice of motion will be given to-morrow.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, May 1, 1929.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Duff, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the senate chamber this day at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAPERS TABLED RESPECTING VARIOUS POSTMASTERSHIPS

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I beg to lay on the table the reports asked for by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones) with reference to postmasterships at Shanklin, Forks, Jemseg, and Jordan Mountain, N.B.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I wish to table copies of documents in possession of the Civil Service Commission relating to the postmastership at Hawkesbury, Ontario. Concerning this report I may say that it is the last of the files requested by hon. members on the other side to complete the files already tabled by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) with reference to certain postmasterships. In certain cases the Civil Service Commission have pointed out that the files tabled were already complete and that they had no documents to add thereto.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Parent for concurrence in the second report of the select standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): On Thursday last a report was presented to this house by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) from the public accounts committee, in which it was asked that the powers of the committee be enlarged in order to include certain items which are not contained in the Auditor General's report for the year 1928. I may say that the only matter before the public accounts committee at the present moment is the Auditor General's report which was referred to it on motion of the Minister of Finance in February of this year.

In the course of the discussion in the public accounts committee it was found desirable to investigate certain items, not in the current Auditor's General's report, and inasmuch as we felt that we did not have the power to grant this request it was thought advisable to refer the matter to this house, which is the creator of the public accounts committee, in order that the house might give us the necessary instructions. There seems to have been a protracted debate on this question, as I note by Hansard, all parties agreeing that these items should be investigated, with some thinking it was unnecessary and others believing it advisable to obtain authority from this house in view of the fact that a precedent was being created. There seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that if an item appearing in the report of this year which related to previous years could be traced back, it could be investigated and discussed, and that being the case we agreed to accept this suggestion of the house, which was very helpful to us and which put an end to our difficulty. However, there appear to be certain items in the Auditor General's report for the year 1927 which I understand are not related to anything in the report of this year; consequently we thought it would be advisable to obtain authority to investigate these particular items. Although only certain items were asked for, the committee, in its desire to give the inquisitors, if I may use the term, the fullest latitude, thought it well to request that the entire report of the Auditor General for last year too be brought down in order that we might have it before us. Hon. gentlemen opposite asked for only two or three items, but we felt that it would not be fair to those who are conducting the inquisition to limit them to those items; we felt that that would not be enough. They asked for one little loaf and one little fish but we are willing to multiply that by the five thousand items in the report so that every hungry member on the other side may be satisfied.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report presented on March 24 by the hon. member for Quebec South be adopted.

Motion (Mr. Parent), agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) for Mr. Morin (Saint Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved:

That the third and fourth reports of the select standing committee on standing orders, which were presented to the house on the 23rd of April, as set forth at page 290 of the votes and proceedings, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS SUPERVISION COMMITTEE

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. In reference to the government contracts supervision committee, in what years were reports issued to the government or to parliament since this committee was set up with a staff under Colonel L. R. LaFleche?

2. If no reports have been issued by the staff responsible for the work of the government contracts supervision committee, why has this not been done?

Mr. ROBB: Regular month to month reports of all purchases, sales and transfers are made to the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

SWAN LAKE RESERVE

Mr. LOVIE:

1. Who was medical inspector of Indians on the Swan lake, Manitoba, reserve from 1917 to 1922?

2. Who was medical inspector on said reserve from 1922 to 1926?

3. Who has been medical inspector from 1926 to the present date?

4. When changes of medical inspector of Indians on the Swan lake, Manitoba, reserve took place, what were the reasons for the changes, and upon whose recommendation were they made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Dr. G. Pennefather, Holland, Man., 1917-Sept. 1922.

2. Dr. G. H. Johnston, Swan Lake, Man., Sept. 1922-Aug. 17, 1926.

3. August 17th, 1926, to July 12, 1927, Dr. G. Pennefather, Holland, Man., July 12th, 1927, to date Dr. G. H. Johnston, Swan Lake, Man.

4. In 1926 it was decided to change from the call system to salaried medical attendant for the Swan Lake Indians. The position was advertised by the Civil Service Commission and Dr. Pennefather of Holland was appointed. It was found that the Indians could not receive as good service from Holland, a distance of 14 miles from the reserve, as from Swan lake, a distance of 4 miles from the reserve where Dr. Johnston was located, and the call system was reverted to in July, 1927, and Dr. Johnston appointed by the Department of Indian Affairs.

RUSSELL K. ODELL

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton):

1. What is the position and salary of Russell K. Odell in the Department of the Interior?

2. Did he have any technical or professional training before appointment to this position, other than mere office work?

3. Does he hold any degree from a university or school of science?

4. What is the justification for paying this man such a large salary and placing him over the head of technical and professional men in the same department?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Assistant Director, Natural Resources Intelligence Service, $4,620 per annum.

2. Yes.

3. Equivalent qualifications satisfactory to the department and Civil Service Commission.

4. His ability to perform the duties of the position to the complete satisfaction of the department.

GEORGE P. MACKENZIE

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond-West Cape Breton):

1. What is the position and salary of George P. Mackenzie in the Department of the Interior?

2. Did he have any technical or professional training before being appointed to this position, other than mere office work?

3. Does he hold any degree from a university or school of science?

4. Has he a seaman's certificate?

5. What is the justification for paying this man such a large salary and placing him over the head of technical and professional men in the same department?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Exploration and development officer, Canadian Arctic, $5,120, and $3,000 living allowance per annum.

2. Equivalent qualifications satisfactory to department and Civil Service Commission.

3. No.

4. No.

5. His ability to perform the duties of the position to the complete satisfaction of the department.

ALFRED PEAT PLANT

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. Has the Department of the Interior finished its experimental work at the Alfred peat bogs, and, if so, what conclusion has the department arrived at with regard to the feasibility of producing and marketing peat fuel upon a commercial basis?

2. Is the plant which has been assembled at Alfred now completely efficient for the recovery of peat fuel and is it an adequate commercial unit for economical operation? If not, what remains to be done, and what alterations or additions does it require, and what will be the cost of necessary additions?

3. Will the government operate the Alfred peat plant this year?

4. If so, what tonnage of commercial fuel is expected to be recovered from the seasons's operations?

5. Has the peat bog plant at Alfred been transferred by the Department to Peat Fuels Limited? If so, at what date and under what terms and conditions of lease, sale, operation or otherwise?

6. Is it the intention of the government to merchandise and market the production of said plant or will the same be handled as prior to 1927 or by Peat Fuels Limited?

7. Has the government considered the policy of paying a bounty based upon tonnage to be payable to producers who might embark in the industry?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1 and 2. The Department of Mines, and not the Department of the Interior, is responsible for the experimental work done at the Alfred peat bog.

The operations in 1928 indicated that additional power was necessary for operation of the plant at full capacity. A complete commercial demonstration is contingent upon the installation of this power.

The marketing problem has not been specially investigated by the Department of Mines, but is believed to be mainly a question of advertising and salesmanship.

3 and 4. The government considers it inadvisable to answer these questions at present.

5. No.

6. The government considers it inadvisable to answer this question at present.

7. Consideration has not been given.

4. How long were they in use before being taken to this branch, and in what departments?
5. How many new machines, if any, were bought in each of the last ten years?
6. What is the longest time any of the machines in this branch have been in use?
7. Were any of the machines now in use salvaged from the fire?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. 80.
2. Underwood, Remington, L. C. Smith, Monarch and Royal.
3. From 1 to 16 years.
4. No information.
5. 2.
6. 16 years.
7. Yes.

INVERNESS COUNTY PREVENTIVE OFFICERS

Mr. MACDOUGALL:

1. How many preventive officers are there in the county of Inverness?
2. Who are they?
3. What is the salary of each?
4. How much did each receive for wages and for expenses during the year 1928?
5. How many seizures were made by each during 1926, 1927 and 1928?

Mr. EULER:

1. The preventive service is a mobile force and officers are appointed for the whole province and not for any particular county or district.

There are four officers with headquarters at Cheticamp, Inverness, Mabou and Port Hood.

TRIPS ABROAD OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. How many civil servants in the past year were deputed by the government to represent it in various foreign countries at conventions or for other purposes, or were sent abroad by the government for research work of a scientific character?

2. What are the names of the said civil servants, in what department are they employed, and were their expenses paid by the government?
3. If the government paid all expenses, what was the total of said same?
4. What was the specific purpose of such visits to said foreign countries, and did each civil servant make a report to the government?
5. Is it the intention of the government to discontinue the practice of giving members of the civil service a trip abroad as mentioned above, at the public expense?

Mr. RINFRET: In connection with this question I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that the government should not be asked to reply to the fifth paragraph, which concerns the intentions of the government. It is not customary to disclose the intentions of the government in advance, and further I submit that the question is more in the nature of a demand rather than a request for information. With that reservation this might stand as an order for return.

BRITISH PREFERENCE

Mr. ADSHEAD:

1. Items in the customs tariff which are free under British preference?
2. Items which have British preferential duties.
3. How many of these have been put on since 1921.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

C. H. COUTURE

Mr. BLACK (Halifax, for Mr. Cahan):

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to the dismissal of C. H. Couture of St. Bernard, county of Dorchester, province of Quebec, from his office as inspector of weights and measures, in or about February, 1927, and the appointment of a successor to that office.

MAHONE BAY, CUSTOMS OFFICER

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and documents, of whatsoever kind, including therein correspondence of and with the Civil Service Commission, relating to applications for the position of customs officer at Mahone bay, in the county of Lunenburg, and the appointment of Francis Hollaway to that office.

DUNCAN RIVER TRAIL OR ROAD

Mr. ESLING:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams as between the members of the provincial government of British Columbia, or any resident of that province, and the Department of Public Works, concerning the construction of a trail or road along the Duncan river, as provided for in a vote of $7,500 at the last session of this parliament.

RENATA, B.C. POSTMASTER

Mr. ESLING:

For a copy of all correspondence and documents necessary to complete the file as contained in return No. 163 tabled by order of the house at the last session of this parliament, and relating to the appointment and dismissal of the postmaster at Renata, British Columbia.

BRAZIL LAKE, N.S., POSTMISTRESS

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all papers, letters, correspondence and other documents relating to the dismissal of Mrs. Tupper as postmistress at Brazil Lake, in the County of Yarmouth, in or about the year 1927.

DISTRIBUTION OF HANSARD

Mr. J. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Three weeks ago, I requested that the French speaking members be placed on the same footing as their English speaking colleagues in regard to the distribution of Hansard, I mean that Hansard should be delivered to us at 11 a.m.

Notwithstanding the assurance given to us, Sir, we do not yet receive it at that hour. I again request that we be placed on the same footing as the English speaking members, and, if nothing further is done, I shall be forced to demand the dismissal of the official in charge of the distribution of Hansard.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The French and English versions?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Both.

Mr. SPEAKER (Translation): Instructions will be given to that effect.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would like to ask the right hon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if the government is willing that trade delegations from Russia should be established in Canada along similar lines to those already established in England, Australia, South Africa and the United States, and whether the government is willing to vise the passports of the trade delegates?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry that I am not wholly familiar with the manner in which Russian trade delegations are established in the United States, Great Britain and other parts of the empire, but possibly I can give the hon. member the information which he desires.

When the trade agreement between Canada and Russia was terminated it was made plain that the government had no desire to discourage trade between Russia and Canada and that we did not intend to embarrass bona fide trading between the two countries. The agreement terminated certain quasi-diplomatic privileges which the Russian agency in Montreal possessed at the time. I understand that it is customary for buying and selling commissions from Russia, to visit the United States, Great Britain and other parts of the empire and that they have been permitted to come into these different countries freely for the purpose of trading transactions. This country has always been prepared to grant similar privileges to these trading commissions.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And to vise the passports?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order to get into the country the passports may have to be vised.

CIVIL SERVICE

PROMOTION WITHIN DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I desire to call the attention of the house to a return tabled on April 26 by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) on behalf of the Civil Service Commission. The return had reference to a question which I placed on the order paper early in the month of April and which was passed as an order for return on April 10. The first part of my question read as follows:

In cases of promotion within the departments, is it customary for the Civil Service Commission to hold examinations when a candidate has: (a) received from the department the highest rating; (b) has had the longest term of service; (c) has been recommended for promotion by the commission's own board of examiners?

The answer received from the commission was as follows:

The commission holds written examinations in connection with cases of promotion only when there is sufficient closeness between the rating of the leading candidates to justify such a course being taken, or when it appears necessary to obtain further evidence of the qualifications of the candidates by means of a written test.

The second question is not material. The third question was as follows:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Since June, 1925, in how many cases, when all the elements favourable to an applicant as outlined in question No. 1 appear on the record, has the ordinary procedure been disregarded and examinations ordered?

That appears to me to be a pretty plain question, but it is answered by the Civil Service Commission as follows:

Answered by question No. 1.

I would ask the Secretary of State to instruct the commission that when questions are asked and passed by this house to the commission, proper answers should be given. I would ask the Secretary of State so to instruct the Civil Service Commission in order that I may obtain a proper answer to my question.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I will bring the matter to the attention of the commission. In submitting replies from the commission, which is an independent body, I do not, of course, accept responsibility for the replies.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Would the right hon. the Prime Minister advise whether a new gentleman's agreement has been entered into with Japan regarding the entry of Japanese into Canada, as was suggested by his remarks of last session, and if so, will he give the house the particulars regarding same?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I gave the house last session particulars of the revision of the agreement which we had restricting and limiting the number of Japanese immigrants entering Canada. The new arrangement contemplates the admission of not more than 150 per year, which includes women and children as well as men. It was contended by Japan that the old agreement contained no limitation with respect to women and children, but the new provision limits the total immigration to 150 per year.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understood that there were to be further negotiations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The arrangement was fully consummated at the time. Advantage was taken of the arrangement whereby each country was to appoint a minister to the country of the other, by providing that the passports of Japanese immigrants coming to Canada would be vised by the Canadian minister residing in Tokyo, or by some member of his staff, and that the provisions would go into full effect as soon as the Canadian legation was opened in Japan.

SUPPLY—ADMINISTRATION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, some days ago, on a similar motion, I moved an amendment which was in the nature of a vote of censure upon the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). It was based upon his action in connection with the appointment by the Civil Service Commission of a postmaster at the town of Simcoe and the rejection of that appointment by the Postmaster General. That amendment was defeated. In the debate however many facts which were not known to me when the motion was launched, were brought out, and in the discussion that has taken place during the last few days in committee of the whole on the estimates of the Postmaster General, further information has come to the attention of the house. Had that information been available when I moved the first motion, I would have made it more general in character, and I propose to-day to move another motion. The facts that have been disclosed during the past few days must, I feel sure, have startled the house, the press and the people of Canada. The discussion has not at all been completed; only a comparatively small number of the files that have been brought down have been examined, but sufficient has been disclosed, as I have said, to startle the people of Canada. The background, of course, of all this discussion, is the Civil Service Commission and the attitude of the Postmaster General toward that commission. I do not propose to take up very much time in reviewing the result of the discussion of the past few days, and, indeed, I do not think it is necessary to do so, because the house is thoroughly familiar with what has occurred. As the Postmaster General desires to go to Great Britain as Canada's representative at the postal congress—

Mr. VENIOT: Please do not let that interfere with the accomplishment of your duties.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —and as under the rules of the house there would be no other opportunity of making a motion such as I have been proposing to make for several days, it appears desirable that the opinion of the house should be at this time crystallized. Therefore, I propose to move an amendment. As I have said, the background of all this is the Civil Service Commission and the attitude of the Postmaster General toward it.

Let me review some of the facts that have been disclosed in the last few days. In thirty-two instances the Postmaster General rejected the appointments of the Civil Service Commission. Some of the files have been examined, but the examination is not completed. I am told by some hon. gentlemen, who are particularly interested in these files and who have examined them, that in some cases returned soldiers have been rejected in favour of civilians. In at least one case, that of Spruce Lake, there were two rejections in succession. In the case of Picton, the Postmaster General rejected the appointment of the Civil Service Commission although that appointment followed the recommendation of his own inspector. A gentleman who had been assistant postmaster for many years was passed over, and another gentleman who had been instrumental in formulating charges against the postmaster, who was dismissed really on a suspicion, was appointed to the office. We have therefore the example of one man being dismissed for partisanship and another appointed for the same reason. I asked for some information regarding the number of appointments made by the Civil Service Commission where dismissals of postmasters had been made, and I refer to sessional paper No. 211, brought down by the Postmaster General. It reads:

Memorandum

On Friday the nineteenth instant Mr. Stewart (Leeds) referring to the number of postmasters dismissed from the 1st October, 1926, to the 1st February, 1928 (421), asked how many of these were appointees of the Civil Service Commission.

The answer is 98.

The answer is 98 up to 1st February, 1928, date mentioned by the hon. member for Leeds, but since February, 1928, to April, 1929, there were eight more—making 106 in all to date.

Sixty-three of these were appointed previously to 1922, but these officers were made departmental appointments on recommendation of the commission which exempted all offices below $400 annual revenue. This leaves 43 dismissals in offices under Civil Service Commission at time of dismissals.

So we have this record of rejections and dismissals which is without a parallel, I think, in the history of Canada—

Mr. DUNNING: Nonsense.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —under similar circumstances. Since the establishment of the Civil Service Commission with authority over these offices, I challenge the Minister of Railways, who seems to say, "Oh, no," or any other hon. gentleman to point to anything approaching it.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend did not introduce his qualification until I called attention to the nonsensical nature of his statement.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I said: Under similar circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member did not say it until after I made my interjection.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I want to pass on to the action of the Postmaster General in endeavouring to justify the dismissals and in quoting the opinion of the Department of Justice. Let me point out that he quoted only a portion of that opinion, and that when he was asked to lay it upon the table, it was found that it was only a partial opinion. Later on, when the full opinion was brought down, it was perfectly clear that a very relevant and important part had been left out. I wish to point out that in many instances files laid on the table in answer to orders of the house, were found, upon examination to be incomplete, although we had the assurance of the Postmaster General that they were complete, and he has had on different occasions to supplement these files. In some instances the Postmaster General justified the dismissals of postmasters on the ground that there were shortages, and I think he referred to the shortages in those cases as instances of stealing. In some of these cases the amount was very trifling, but notwithstanding that, the unfortunate postmaster or postmistress was dismissed. We had disclosed to us yesterday in connection with the St. John post office an instance in which an inspector had appropriated to his own use moneys that had been paid to him, and had made inaccurate and misleading statements in connection with the receipt of those moneys, all of which came to the knowledge of the Postmaster General, but notwithstanding that knowledge, and against the recommendation of the inspector, he ordered the salary of this man to be increased and appointed him to a position of superior responsibility. Apparently it is a crime for a postmaster in a small office to be a little short in his accounts when an inspector calls, but it is a matter of merit for an inspector himself to withhold and misappropriate public moneys. The one case calls for condemnation, the other calls for commendation.

The Civil Service Commission was established in an honest and serious attempt by the Canadian people to get rid of the undoubted evils of patronage that existed, and it has in a large measure accomplished the desired result. The action of the Postmaster General and his record in reference to the Civil Service Commission is one of utter disregard, one of defiance, and I would say one of contempt. He has done a great deal to impair the efficiency of the Civil Service Commission and to render its work impossible. I may say to him that if you leave out the patronage-mongers and the camp-followers, the Civil Service Commission occupies a very high place in the esteem of the Canadian people, and they are determined, Mr. Speaker, that that commission shall have the chance to function. They are determined on that course in the interests of the people at large, for the security of the public service and for the permanence and efficiency of the service as a whole. The Postmaster General is the champion political executioner of Canada, and I want to tell him that the people of Canada are not yet ready to accept the decision of a dictator in any department of the government of Canada. We do not want a Mussolini in this country, and we expect that the Postmaster General shall follow and have regard for the statutes.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, the serious nature of the amendment which I am about to move because under our rules it may be, and I believe is, treated as a motion of want of confidence in the government; but results more serious than the defeat of this government or the defeat of any government may happen in Canada, and I cannot think of anything that could be more detrimental than that ministers of the crown should openly defy and disregard the statutes of this country. I am reminded of the old maxim, fiat justitia, ruat coelum—let justice be done though the heavens fall. The Postmaster General has brought upon himself any criticism that may have been offered in this house. He has brought that criticism upon himself by his own action and by his attitude in this house and in relation to the criticisms that have been offered. I therefore submit for the approval of this house an amendment which I think will commend itself to the judgment of hon. members, and I hope that notwithstanding political exigencies many of the members on the other side may feel justified in supporting it because it is based upon the facts that have been disclosed here, and it is mild and moderate in its terms. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that if this amendment is rejected here, we must carry it in appeal to the great jury of the people of this country. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this house, after consideration in the committee of supply of the estimates of the Post Office Department, it is apparent the administration of that department by the present Postmaster General has been characterized by inefficiency, disregard of the provisions of the Civil Service Act, the Post Office Act and other statutory authority, and merits the disapproval of this house.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), may I be allowed to point out to the house that while in his amendment he has contented himself with certain general statements with regard to the Postmaster General, his inefficiency, his disregard of the provisions of the Civil Service Act, the Post Office Act and other statutory authority—I wonder if there is any other statute he could have quoted—he states that for the reasons thus given my administration merits the disapproval of the house.

The hon. gentleman has not undertaken to enlighten this house as to the way in which my administration of the department has been inefficient. He has taken very good care not to point out in what particular I have violated the provisions of the Civil Service Act or of the Post Office Act. During the debate that took place while my estimates were before the committee of the whole house, we dealt with certain phases of the amendment which has just been moved, and it is not my intention to repeat or to deal at all with the arguments I then advanced on the points at issue in an attempt to defend my course as Postmaster General.

But there are one or two points which I think I should bring out. I have been told, and it has often been repeated here—in fact, the hon. member for Leeds referred to it in passing this afternoon—that in many cases I disregarded the certificates issued by the Civil Service Commission. I have rejected, Mr. Speaker, for very valid reasons thirty-two certificates issued by the Civil Service Commission since I have been at the head of the Post Office Department of Canada. Being at the head of the department I found that, owing to the unworkable system under which the qualification of applicants was attempted to be ascertained, persons were being appointed to the department over which I had the control and administration who, I became convinced, were not able efficiently to carry on the duties of the positions to which they had been appointed. Being in possession of that knowledge it was, and is, my duty not only to myself, not only to the department for the administration of which I am responsible to the people of Canada, but also to the mail service throughout the Dominion that I should reject such appointments. I am not disregarding the Civil Service Act when I do that because the government in 1919 when they amended the old Civil Service Act provided distinctly—placing the authority, it is true, in the hands of the deputy minister—that for sufficient reasons the deputy could reject any appointment made by the commission. It goes as a matter of course that the deputy will not reject unless he has consultation with his minister, and it goes also as a matter of course that the minister is not going to take upon himself the responsibility of rejection unless he is in a position to know what he is doing, so that the responsibility can be accepted and the action defended by him on the floor of parliament. I have authority therefore under the act to exercise the power that was conferred on the Post Office Department—or any other department of the government—to reject a certificate of the Civil Service Commission if I am satisfied, and my deputy is satisfied, that the acceptance of such certificate would not inure to the efficiency of the postal service of the Dominion.

Now, among those thirty-two rejections there were sixteen returned soldiers. And because I had to reject sixteen returned soldiers' certificates I have been accused of being uncharitable. Some of the newspapers said I had a hard heart, others attempted to show that by my actions towards the returned soldiers I have displayed a certain amount of disloyalty to Canada. Mr. Speaker, I need not repeat it, because the other day when I attempted to show what sympathy was in my heart for our returned soldiers, the retort was hurled across the floor of the house that I had spoken only of myself and my family. I considered that retort from the leader of the opposition unworthy of a gentleman occupying the high position that he occupies in this house. I did not refer to personal matters on that occasion for the purpose of lauding my family before the Dominion. There was no need of doing it, Mr. Speaker. The record stands out there before the people of Canada, and they know it, and they know that the Veniot family takes second place to none in its loyalty to British institutions and to the Canadian constitution. Let me say right here to our friends that the loyalty that is in the breasts of the Acadians is firmer and more firmly grounded than the loyalty that is to-day to be found in and is expounded by our English-speaking people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Why do I make that statement? It is this.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap.

Mr. VENIOT: No, there is no shame in this.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is not cheap. You English-speaking people of British descent—

An hon. MEMBER: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman please keep silence. I did not interrupt anybody on the opposite side when he was speaking. But a reflection has been cast on my loyalty in connection with the administration of the Post Office Department, and I have a perfect right to defend my record.

Mr. ERNST: There is no reflection on any Acadian.

Mr. VENIOT: I am an Acadian—

Mr. ERNST: That is only a coincidence.

Mr. VENIOT: —and I am proud of it. The loyalty—I was going on to say, sir,—which I claim is in the heart of the Acadian must be stronger than that in the heart of the British-born because of the following fact. You of British descent, you who came from the shadows of the old flag to Canada to make your home, are descended from British people, and are loyal by nature. But we Acadians who had to suffer as history shows were a conquered people. After the years rolled by we found that under the British flag we were given rights and privileges, and we became loyal by gratitude; we became loyal because we were grateful to the British crown for the way they treated a conquered people; and I say that a man who becomes loyal through gratitude is firmer in his loyalty than a man who by descent is a British subject.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the hon. minister permit me?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it a question of order or of privilege?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: A question of privilege?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Yes. The question of privilege is this. The interpretation placed on the words of the Postmaster General now will be that members of the opposition accuse the Acadian race in this country of dislcyalty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I object to that.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to see that the hon. gentleman has put a misinterpretation upon my language.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I have put no misinterpretation on the hon. minister's language.

Mr. VENIOT: I certainly did not intend for a moment to show that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, or the Tory party, were attempting anything of the kind. I was merely defending my own course, and dealing with certain statements made—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That is not called in question at all.

Mr. VENIOT: —that because of my conduct toward the returned soldiers I was not as loyal as I should be to the empire. Why, what does the statement of the Toronto Globe mean? It threw out this taunt: "What has this man Veniot or his family ever done for the British Empire?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming down to the cases of the returned soldiers, let me go over a few of them. First, I will take the Hawkesbury case. When I reached Ottawa at the call of the Prime Minister, he conferred upon me the honour of a seat in his cabinet, that of Postmaster General. After being in office a very few months I was informed by my officials that there were several cases left undecided in connection with post office appointments. One of the first brought to my attention was the Hawkesbury case. That is one of the sixteen cases relating to returned soldiers. I found the Hawkesbury post office had become vacant in 1922 or 1923, that advertisements had been circulated to fill the vacancy, and that the matter had been left in abeyance from 1923 until I took charge in September, 1926. It was really later than that, for it was not until some time in January, 1927, that my attention was drawn to this case. A returned soldier by the name of McAllister and another one by the name of Berthiaume had applied for this position, and McAllister had received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission. I did not think it was incumbent upon me at once to handle a case that had been standing over for five or six years, that former Postmaster Generals had refused to deal with. I wrote to the commission pointing this out and they informed me—I was not then very well acquainted with the act—that under the act before they could proceed to a new advertisement I should have to refuse the certificate that had already been issued by them. I did so and asked that the office be opened anew. The vacancy was again advertised and in reply to the last advertisement there was only one applicant, a man named Berthiaume. He got the position, and he was a returned soldier. That was the case of Hawkesbury.

Now let us take the case of Alexandria. I found when I took charge of this case that it had been standing for two years. Certain applications had been submitted and certain representations made to the Civil Service Commission, and there was on the files of the department an opinion or interpretation asked for of the Justice department as to the reestablishment of a certain one of the candidates in the case. The Department of Justice gave an interpretataion that did not agree with the interpretation laid down by the commission and again there was turmoil. I again cancelled the whole thing and asked for new advertisements. I was not going to mix into this trouble, coming new into the department; I was not going to take upon myself anything left undone by former ministers, things that were not settled in a proper way, especially in this case where there was a dispute touching the interpretation of the act as between the Civil Service Commission, the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice. That place was re-advertised, and it is not yet filled. Other troubles arose in my time—difficulties of bilingualism, difficulties of people demanding that this place, Alexandria, with a large French population, comprising almost if not quite the majority—I am told that the majority of the people are French—should have a bilingual postmaster. During my absence the place was advertised; and from correspondence coming in from different sources in the county wherein Alexandria is situated, as well as from Alexandria itself, the advertisement was issued for bilingual applications. The bilingual advertisement did not run its full course and it was withdrawn, under some protest, during my absence from Ottawa. That case stands today unsettled. And there is the history of the turning-down of a certificate issued in behalf of another returned soldier.

Now let us take New Glasgow, P.Q. It became vacant. A returned soldier named Grattan applied for the position. Grattan was reestablished as a returned soldier, and the widow of the postmaster was also an applicant. She had children to bring up, left in poor circumstances. When the whole situation was reviewed, when I received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission on behalf of Grattan, knowing as I did all the circumstances connected with the case, knowing as was stated in the report that Grattan was reestablished, knowing all this, I refused his certificate. The only other applicant was the widow of the late postmaster and I let the position go to her on choice from the Civil Service Commission, so that she might earn a living for her little family. I felt I was justified, and I feel to-day that I am speaking on behalf of the large body of returned soldiers in Canada when I say that no returned soldier who had gone over to France and fought for liberty and freedom, who had gone and fought for the supremacy of justice, would ever consent, if he were a real returned soldier, to accept the bread from the mouth of that widow and those little children.

Let us come to Enterprise. I am not going to take up much of the time of the house on this case because it was fully discussed on the floor of the house in 1928 while the late lamented member for the county then occupied a seat; I name Dr. Edwards. I went into that case fully. I did refuse a certificate on behalf of Cooper. I pointed out that he had been turned down by the Civil Service Commission in 1921 or 1922 because, on the report of the inspector, he was not considered properly qualified; and the position was given by the commission to a civilian at that time. When this came up again in 1926 and the same Mr. Cooper was an applicant, the report of the inspector in his favour was no better, if not worse, than what it was in 1921 and I felt I was justified under such circumstances in refusing that certificate.

Let us take Brigden. This is a case where a man by the name of Such applied for the position. Mr. Such had come to this country a few years previously with money in his possession. I find no fault with this; I am proud to know that he had it. He came to this country and located at Brigden and he had sufficient money to buy a one-third interest in a large butter or cheese making factory. He became not only its manager but the operator; and under the operations of the factory, with the assistance of two young boys, he was drawing a salary or fee or revenue of $3,800 a year. Brigden becomes vacant. The salary attached to the office was $960 a year. Mr. Such applied for it and I, having some hesitation about accepting the certificate issued in his favour, looked into the matter. I could not understand how a man drawing a revenue of $3,800 and paying $700 of that for assistance, leaving him a net revenue of $3,100, with one-third of the profit or dividends added to that, should apply for an office that brought in a revenue of only $960. After I had looked into the matter carefully Mr. Such came to my office and interviewed me. It is true he told me that he wanted to give up his position and take this office. I asked him how he expected to make a living out of it. He told me he did not; he could not give all his time to it; and in the report of the inspector he said so at first. But afterwards, when he saw how things were going, he said he would give his time to the office. He intended to engage a young lady by the name of Smith to do the work for him and he would supervise it, paying her $500 a year and putting the balance of $460 in his pocket. Notwithstanding what statements Mr. Such might make to me, I refused to believe that he had any other intention with respect to the office. And the proof of that has lately come out. I was attacked in the press in London—the Free Press especially—in connection with the Brigden case. What did I find? I found, after that attack had appeared, that a reporter of the London Advertiser went down to Brigden and got an interview touching the whole situation. He meets this Miss Smith, who was then married, and she gives a statement over her own signature and published in the London Advertiser, that Mr. Such had made a bargain with her to run the office for him at $500 a year and to take absolute control of it. I refused that certificate and I feel justified in having done so; I have no regret for my action.

Now let me come to the case of St. Boniface; here again we had a mixup. St. Boniface was growing and becoming an important centre and was served directly from the office of Winnipeg; the street distribution of mail in St. Boniface was carried on directly from Winnipeg. The people of St. Boniface were loudly proclaiming their rights; they claimed that their street distribution should be carried on from their own office and that they should not be connected at all with Winnipeg. The gentleman who then was postmaster of that place was dismissed for certain irregularities, and he was incompetent to carry on an office like the St. Boniface office if it were to be separated from the Winnipeg office. It became necessary to appoint a man; advertisements were published and applications received from two men, one named Pelletier and the other named Vermander, the first a returned soldier and the second a civilian. Vermander had six or seven years experience as an assistant postmaster, and at that time was employed in one of the banking institutions in St. Boniface. Pelletier had no post office experience whatever and was not sufficiently qualified with regard to education to undertake the administration of such an important office as St. Boniface.

On my own initiative I collected all the available information in order to satisfy myself that I would be doing no injustice to this man Pelletier, and I found that Vermander could speak four different languages, English, French, German and Swiss, all of which were in use in that district. Knowing that St. Boniface would become a very important office and that it would be necessary to have in charge a man of the highest ability and with the greatest possible experience I refused the certificate which had been issued in favour of Pelletier, the returned soldier. Before doing so, however, and after consultation with the postmaster at Winnipeg, I offered Mr. Pelletier a position in the Winnipeg office which he could fill, to which was attached a good salary, and which carried with it a chance of promotion. Mr. Pelletier refused to accept that position, so I felt that I had no alternative but to ask the Civil Service Commission to make another choice, and their second choice was Mr. Vermander.

Now let us take the case of Brussels, in the province of Ontario. When I assumed control of the Post Office Department I found that Brussels was in an even worse turmoil than Hawkesbury or Alexandria; I found that the office had been vacant for a number of years, with a temporary postmaster in charge, and I found that an investigation had been held by the Post Office Department on the complaint of a good many of the residents of that place, in which they stated that the inspector who had been sent to examine the applicants had not done justice in that he had discriminated against certain applicants. This investigation was carried on before I took charge of the department but no decision was reached; the matter was left in abeyance with the result that late in 1927 I discovered the embroglio, if I might use the term, and undertook to straighten it out. I found that a Mr. Scott, the son of the late postmaster, was in charge of the office, and I found that a returned soldier with a disability, named Kuntz, had received a certificate from the Civil Service Commision. That certificate never had been acted upon, so I communicated with the Civil Service Commission and as a result decided that the certificate should be refused, advertisements issued, and returned soldiers and civilians given an opportunity to apply for the position.

The office was advertised vacant some four or five months ago, and several applications were received, among them one from a man named Bell, a returned soldier. Strenuous efforts were made, letters were written to me, and influence was used to have me advise the Civil Service Commission to appoint Scott, the assistant postmaster and son of the late postmaster, over the head of a returned soldier. The file will show that I wrote to the different parties who communicated with me stating that if a returned soldier who was physically fit and able to carry on the duties of the office applied for the position he would get the appointment if he obtained the certificate of the Civil Service Commisison. The examinations were held, and the Civil Service Commissison issued a certificate in favour of Bell, the returned soldier. That certificate was accepted and Bell is now the postmaster at Brussels.

Now let us come to East St. John, in my own province; this is another case which occurred in my own time. There was no mixup at this place; everything was plain sailing; the vacancy was created when the postmaster East St. John was found dead. I will say no more about that at the moment. The vacancy was created and a man by the name of Macdonald was appointed temporary postmaster. The vacancy was advertised and two applications were received, one from Macdonald and one from a man named John W. Mackenzie, a returned soldier. After examination and report by the Civil Service Commision Mackenzie was given the certificate. I knew the record of this man, who was connected with the Canadian National Railways, and knowing that record I felt that I should ask for a further report before accepting the certificate. So the inspector was asked for a further report and it was pointed out to him by myself why that report was requested. I felt that with the record on the files of the Canadian National Railways, and from my personal knowledge of the record of this man, he would not be a fit and proper person to meet the public as a postmaster. The files of the Canadian National Railways were produced and forwarded to Ottawa, and Mr. Mackenzie took up the matter with Canadian Legion headquarters at Ottawa, through the St. John branch of that organization. Mr. Herwig, secretary of the Canadian Legion, came to see me about the matter and I showed him the file and asked him to examine it. I showed him also a letter which bore out what was contained in the file with reference to this man's qualifications for meeting the public. He had written me a letter in which he stated that Inspector Peck had discriminated against him on behalf of Macdonald and he said he had no faith in our inspector. Here is a man, an applicant for a position, writing me a letter in which he says that he has no faith in the very man under whom he has to work and under whom he had to administer that office. I placed this matter before Mr. Herwig and he made the following suggestion: Will you agree to name a man from your own department, have the Civil Service Commission name a man and the legion at East St. John name a third man; let them take the file, let them go to St. John and bring Mackenzie before them and if they decide, after going into this matter, that he is a fit and proper person to administer that important office, will you appoint him? I said: Yes, I will accept the certificate. Mr. Herwig informed me that the Civil Service Commission had told him that having given their verdict they would not interfere any further in the case. When Mr. Herwig had given me the result of his communication with the commission he made the following suggestion: that I name a man and he would pick a man from the legion in St. John. I agreed to that, and he brought me two names which were recommended by the legion in St. John, one a returned soldier, a colonel in the army, and the other a civilian. I then appointed Mr. Green, superintendent of the Quebec district, to go to St. John and meet this returned soldier chosen by the legion and have Mr. Mackenzie appear before them when they could go into the case and make a report. They made the following unanimous report: After having interviewed Mr. Mackenzie and having gone into the case fully, they were of the opinion that Mr. Mackenzie was not a fit and proper person, owing to his temperamental conditions, to meet the public in the capacity of postmaster at East St. John. I, therefore, refused the certificate.

The next case is that of Oliver, B.C. This is another certificate which I refused. The certificate had been issued to a returned soldier, but the one who got it was also a returned soldier. A vacancy occurred at Oliver, B.C., and James K. Anderson applied for the position. Anderson and another returned soldier both got equal ratings, but information reached my department that Mr. Anderson had since been employed by the telephone company as local manager. I thought that there being another returned soldier in the field who was free and his own master I should not have as postmaster at Oliver a man who would be subject to two masters, and I refused Mr. Anderson's certificate and the other returned soldier got the position.

I know I am taking up a good deal of the time of the house, but I think it is worth while. The next case is that of Norton in the province of New Brunswick. This position was declared vacant before by time and after an investigation as to political partisanship against the postmaster name Price. When I entered office I found that a returned soldier by the name of Ward had received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission. Considerable turmoil had been created before I took charge. I intended to start with a clean sheet and I declared that this vacancy still existed and asked for new advertisements. Some time elapsed before this was done because the case at Norton was not called to my attention until some time in 1928. In the meantime Mr. Price, who was a very old man, was left in charge of the office although he had been found guilty of political partisanship. I understand that Mr. Ward was the victim of a very serious automobile accident.

Mr. JONES: It was another returned soldier by the name of Harmer.

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to that case. I declared the office vacant and called for new advertisements. The Civil Service Commission advised me that if I wanted to do that I would have to dispose of the certificate already issued in favour of Ward. I did so, and the vacancy was advertised and I believe Ward is an applicant as well as Harmer. At the present time a civilian is temporarily in charge of the office with the distinct understanding that it is only temporary and that returned soldiers with qualifications are to have preference. That is the Norton case as it now stands and no decision has been reached as yet in that case.

The next case is Wabamun in Alberta. A certificate was issued in favour of R. W. Thursfield, which certificate has been refused by me. The report of the inspector shows that this man had only lately arrived in the town and was very little known. The other applicant was a returned soldier by the name of E. B. Howley who was an eighty per cent disability case. The inspector reported that Howley's personality and mentality were such that he would not be suitable for such a position. A man by the name of White was acting postmaster and was rated very high for efficiency.

The next case is that of Macoun, Saskatchewan. The inspector's report in this case shows that Harry Huntley, a returned soldier, had rather a bad character before enlistment and apparently had not mended his ways since his return. I hate to say this, but the report shows that he had a bad character before enlisting. He was the only returned soldier and I did not feel like going to the extent of accepting a returned soldier for the position in the face of a report of that kind.

The next case is that of Woodbridge, Ont. The certificate of James Morgan, soldier, was rejected. The certificate was issued in 1922, four years and some months before I took charge of the department. I found another mix-up here and I refused the certificate so that the case would be reopened to the public. When I came into office in 1926 I found this: There was another man who had been acting since the first vacancy. J. J. Dean was a temporary employee in the office at Toronto, and when the vacancy occurred he, having experience, was brought from Toronto to his home town and placed in temporary charge in the office at Woodbridge. He was a man with a year or two of experience, a returned soldier who had done his bit at the front and had come back with a good character. My attention was drawn to the matter, and this certificate was refused. I may say that in the Woodbridge case as in the case of Alexandria, a dispute arose between the Civil Service Commission, the Post Office Department—this was before my time—and the Justice department. The Justice department gave a ruling and an interpretation that in their opinion Morgan was properly reestablished and had no preference under the law. I found further that the Civil Service Commission had named Morgan and that one of the reasons they gave before the Justice department for issuing the certificate to Morgan was, as I discovered later, that the building in which Morgan was to have the office was better located. The Justice department rightly pointed out to the Civil Service Commission that they had no right whatever under the act to base the issue of the certificate upon post office location in any section; that belonged to the department. On those grounds I refused to accept Morgan and a returned soldier named J. J. Dean is the one who has the position. He is a 30 per cent disability man. The certificate was issued to Dean in May, 1928.

I think I have taken up sufficient of the time of the house. I have reviewed fourteen, fifteen or sixteen of these cases to show that I have not disregarded the Civil Service Commission in my conduct of the department; that I was perfectly justified in every case where I refused a certificate appointing a returned soldier, and that in many of those cases where a certificate was refused in favour of one returned soldier, it was always another returned soldier who got the position.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the minister kindly deal with the Spruce Lake case?

Mr. VENIOT: The Spruce Lake case does not come under the returned soldier class.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is one of the rejections.

Mr. VENIOT: I know it is. It involves one of the sixteen civilians and I feel I should have no qualms of conscience when I reject a civilian in favour of another civilian, especially when I am satisfied that I am doing right. I have dealt only with the cases of returned soldiers so as to prove to the house and the country that the devil is not as black as he is painted.

While I am on the question of returned soldiers, let me say that since I have been at the head of this department, fourteen returned soldiers have been appointed to the head office staff, and I have given positions to 996 returned soldiers in post offices as mail carriers, letter distributors and temporary employees. My hon. friends opposite cannot show any such record, although they have accused me of being unfriendly to the returned soldiers.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How many of those were appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. VENIOT: There were 164 appointed by the commission in the case of straight post office appointments, and 82 by your humble servant. It is not reasonable to suppose that there is a returned soldier for every post office vacancy throughout the Dominion. Many post office vacancies occur in outlying and country districts where the salary is so small that a returned soldier would not be looking for a position of that kind. Consequently, those offices would have to go to civilians. Let me say further, as regards the dismissals to which my hon. friends refer, and this terrible wielder of the political axe: in 1928 I discussed the question of 421 dismissals and I think clearly proved to the house that not one-half, not one-quarter were dismissals along political lines; that there were grave and proper reasons for many of them. Since that time there have been 84 dismissals. I have the record under my hand showing 473 previously and 84 since, making 557 changes and dismissals in post offices throughout Canada since I have had the honour to be appointed to the head of the Post Office Department. In regard to the last 84 who were dismissed, what do I find? I find that 40 were dismissed for irregularities, shortages and incompetence, the list being as follows:

Causes	Number of dismissals
Irregularities and mismanagement	14
Shortages	13
Arrested violation of civic laws	5
Advanced age	1
Office closed	2
Non-performance of duty	1
Unsuitability of postmaster	1
Political interference under investigation	3
Total	40

That is 40 out of the 84. The balance were dismissed for departmental reasons, in some cases on account of unsuitability of site; in others, in order to give, in the opinion of the department, a better service to the public. Who is best able to judge whether a postmaster is giving to the public the service that he should give, if it is not the officials of the department and the Postmaster General guided by them? Am I as Postmaster General to be guided by the advise of my hon. friends on the other side and to decide according to their dictum what a postmaster should be and how he should administer the office over which he is placed in charge? This country would be in a pretty mess if the government had to depend upon the advice and reasoning of our hon. friends opposite in order to carry on the administration of affairs. What would become of responsible government? I have taken some of their advice, and I am sorry to-day because I did so. I foolishly listened to the advice of some of our hon. friends opposite and there are some of them who will say: Yes, when we went to see Veniot, he treated us right. There are many over there who are honest and I think they will say this when the time comes. That being the case, how can it be expected that we on this side of the house are going to be guided always by what our hon. friends opposite advance when we know it is certainly advanced not in the interest of this party but rather for their own political aggrandizement? There is one thing that seems very singular to me in connection with the attacks that have been made upon my department and myself, because evidently the department of the Postmaster General has been singled out as that department which they can perhaps attack to the best advantage to themselves. Why? Because there are 38,750 employees in the Dominion of Canada under the Postmaster General. The Post Office Department handles resources of revenue, including savings bank deposits and so on, ranging from $41,000,000 or $42,000,000 to $50,000,000 and more. We have from 12,000 to 13,000 postmasters distributed throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Our communications are with the entire world. No department of the government comes more directly under the public eye, and in the case of no department is there closer intimacy with the public. And, sir, it is significant, in view of the attacks that have been made in this house upon the Postmaster General and upon the administration of his department, and in view also of the attempt to create a scandal in connection with the post office of the city of St. John, that our friends opposite have been unable to find anything that resembles even the shadow of a scandal, except some irregularity in connection with the St. John post office. Having had three years of experience in this department, I am in a position to appreciate to the very fullest degree the responsibilities which weigh upon my shoulders. Although I have been accused of inefficiency, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the house in an attempt to outline the great improvements that have taken place in the department since your humble servant has been at the head of it. I am going to let the public judge of that, because they are the best judges.

Remember, I want it distinctly understood that I do not attribute to myself the whole credit for the reorganization and the immense improvements that have taken place in the department—for the extension of the rural mail routes, the extension of the railway mail service, the inauguration of the air mail service, the delivery of mail in winter time to those isolated spots which had never before received mail during that season, thus bringing comfort to the people of the Magdalen islands, the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence, the northern sections throughout the Mackenzie river district, Cold lake, Flin-Flon and away up to the Yukon—all during the administration of your humble servant.

An hon. MEMBER: And penny postage.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to touch on that because penny postage speaks for itself. It is a means of binding closer together the bonds of empire throughout the whole British realm. While I do not desire to claim any great credit for the improvements that have taken place, I do wish to pay a tribute to the able and conscientious and devoted men who work under the present Postmaster General. I wish to pay a tribute to their honesty, and when hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to reflect upon the honesty of the administration of the department, they are reflecting more upon these faithful servants than upon the Postmaster General. I think it is my duty to stand in my place in this house and point this out, that there could be no more faithful servants in any department of this or any government than those who are to-day working under the control of the Postmaster General. At every turn, at every opportunity and on every occasion, when a policy is laid down by the government and they are requested to carry it out, they devote themselves night and day to seeing that those policies are put into effect, and they spare neither time nor labour to ensuring that under those policies the best possible service shall be given to the people of Canada by the postal department of this country.

In my closing remarks I wish to refer to something that was stated by the hon. member for Leeds. He made a reference to the difficulties at the St. John post office, which were discussed on the floor of this house last night in committee of supply. It will be remembered that I stated that long before any mention was made in this house of any difficulties at St. John, I had taken up the task of having that office thoroughly investigated. When first the rumour even of irregularities reached my ears, I endeavoured to get all the information possible so that I could see exactly how matters stood, and, if it became necessary because of contradictory statements and contradictory evidence, institute an investigation that would bring matters to a proper head. That investigation has been going on, started in part in St. John through disciplinary measures, and laying the foundation here in the office at Ottawa, getting the proper evidence and information along the line of reported irregularities.

The other day when the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) brought the question up on the floor of this house he stated, as it was his right to do, that he had received information which pointed to very grave irregularities in the postal district of the province of New Brunswick at St. John.

and I was asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) if I would bring down the correspondence in connection with the matter. At the time we were in a heated discussion on some other subject, and I did say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury that I would bring down the correspondence, but the next day, when the orders of the day were called, I stated to the house that while I had made that promise the day before, in view of the fact that an investigation was being carried on by the officials of my department in connection with the alleged irregularities and in connection with the disciplinary measures to be taken, I did not feel justified in placing these papers on the table of the house, and I was borne out in that attitude by the leader of the opposition and by both sides of the house, as can be seen from their statements. I was then requested to have the original files placed in the custody of some of my officials so that a committee of our friends on the other side of the house— I do not know whether the word "committee" was used—could get together and examine the original files in the custody of my officials. I said yes, and that evening at eight o'clock I produced all those files in my own room in the charge of three officials from the different branches of the department connected with this matter. The gentlemen of the opposition, some six or seven in number, assembled in that room, and I left my officials with them. I told the officials to produce absolutely everything, give them everything, show everything on those files, and I left them in the hands of that committee. I went further even than that. When I saw that they wanted to go into those files minutely and believed that they did not have time to do it with only the originals in their possession, I had copies made of the originals. Those copies were handed to these six or seven gentlemen in that room that night, and the promise was given there that those copies would not be used publicly but only for their own personal information. Yet when the matter was brought up yesterday, without any notice to me on the part of our friends opposite, it came like a bolt from the blue to hear those files quoted from in the house. I thought that that was a bargain that would be adhered to, and I consented to give those official files—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite certain that the Postmaster General has no desire to do an injustice to the leader of the opposition or to members on this side of the house.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I think he will recall that the point in the whole request for these files was this: There are a great many files, and the Postmaster General intimated that it would take some time and a good deal of labour to copy them. My leader said that in order to avoid the necessity of copying files which might not be required, members from this side of the house would examine the original files and request such files as were needed in dealing with this question. It was with that distinct understanding that these files were so examined.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman tells me he is speaking on behalf of his leader I will accept his word, but I understood it differently.

Mr. STEVENS: May I add one further word. I direct this more to the government as a whole. The opposition, or any member of the house, is entitled to the examination of the files of any of the various departments of the government.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to raise any point of order on that, because I have my opinion. I think to a great extent I am right when I say that confidential files between officials of a department are not open to the public.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: But there are none of these confidential.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to raise any discussion on it. That is the position I take. I make reference to the point because it shows that I have nothing to fear, nothing to hide; no matter who is guilty of irregularities, I produce everything and hide nothing.

Let me go on. Yesterday in the discussion the hon. leader of the opposition read from the files and placed them on Hansard. I have no fault to find with him, absolutely none, except this, that confidential reports between officials never should have been placed on Hansard, because the very moment you do that you violate the confidence within that department where officials have to make secret reports, and you are breaking down the discipline that should exist there. But those confidential reports are on Hansard now, and the leader of the opposition has taken the responsibility of placing them there.

He has assumed another responsibility. From the files as he found them he felt that he was justified last night on the floor of this house in charging Mr. Griffith, the inspector in question, with being an embezzler and a thief. That is a serious charge to make. Up to that moment, not having completed the investigation, not having sufficient evidence to prove to me that there was even anything approaching such delinquency, I felt justified in keeping Mr. Griffith in the position that he occupied until the completion of the investigation that I am carrying on. But the leader of the opposition, occupying the responsible position that he occupies in this house, and before the country, having stood in his place and made a charge of that kind, claiming it is based upon the papers found in those files, I considered that the case had reached the stage where on that charge there must be action taken, and this morning after reviewing the whole situation, after weighing carefully the charges made upon the floor of this house, after considering from whose lips those charges had fallen, and bearing in mind the responsible position of the gentleman who made them, I authorized my deputy to wire the suspension from duty of Mr. Griffith. To-day he awaits the result of the investigation of the charges made by the hon. leader of the opposition. Let me repeat, the investigation was going on just the same. It had been started long before the case was brought up in the house. I had felt right along that I should not suspend this man, but once a responsible member of this house had stood in his place and accused this man of being a thief and an embezzler, then upon the strength of that statement I suspended Mr. Griffith. To-day he is in the service, if you will, but not performing any duties until the result of the investigation which the department is now carrying on is known.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been accused of being the champion political executioner of the Dominion. Well, I have only this to say, that if, because of some political dismissals which it is claimed I have made I am to be styled the political executioner of the Dominion, I should like to find a name applicable to our friends opposite. I do not think any suitable word has yet been discovered in the English language that would adequately describe the executionary methods of hon gentlemen opposite. I will not attempt to go over their record, I have gone over it before. But their record of dismissals between 1912 and 1917 is such that when it is held up to the public gaze there is no wind strong enough to prevent it from stinking in the nostrils of the Canadian public. That record stands out conspicuously, and you can read it, I would not say in golden letters, but in large letters. The Tories of Canada were from 1912 to 1917 the political executioners par excellence. Even when they were in power during the short three months from July 1 to September 14 they were active in nearly every county in the Dominion. In the county of Northumberland every fish warden was dismissed by telegraph. Throughout the whole province of New Brunswick every returning officer was dismissed by one fell swoop of the pen. The only one who was left in office was the hon. gentleman who now represents the riding of Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Foster). He was then sheriff of the county, and our Tory friends offered him the position, but he refused to act under the "shadow government," and to-day, as I have said, he is the member for that county in this house. Our friends opposite tried to buy him over by offering him the position, but he was too manly to accept it. He preferred to go down fighting rather than accept a position under our Tory friends. Let me go further. Every returning officer in the Dominion was dismissed by one fell swoop of the pen by our Tory friends. They were not satisfied with playing the political game along the line of dismissal of officials, they were not satisfied with the dismissal of every returning officer so that they could have the whole election machinery in their hands, but they undertook to influence the returning officers and forced them in many cases to divide up the polls in certain sections in order to segregate the Liberals and get a majority for the Tories. That is what our hon. friends opposite did, the hon. gentlemen who to-day call the Postmaster General the political executioner of Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, having exposed my friends opposite to that extent, I will close my remarks with the following statement. I have been Postmaster General of Canada since September 23, 1926. If I am to judge, and I do not say this in any laudatory mood at all, or in any boasting mood—no, I leave the boasting to our Tory friends; they are used to it—I am not saying it in any boasting mood at all, but if I am to judge by such newspapers as the Montreal Standard, the Montreal Star, and the French organ of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, L'Evénement, Veniot is a pretty good postmaster general. You will not see the Montreal Star denouncing Veniot for inefficiency in his department. On the contrary, Tory as it is, dyed-in-the-wool as it is, it is fair enough to recognize the ability and efficiency of a man when they see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Our friends will not accept the Montreal Star. Then I must take it they are repudiating the Star. They are repudiating it because of its editorial utterances, pointing out the efficiency of the Post Office Department under the Postmaster General.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, I am glad my hon. friends have taken that stand, and no doubt the Montreal Star will take notice of it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the house for the kind attention given me. There are a great many more things I could deal with, and I know I have some staunch and true friends; if not many on the other side, I know I have quite a few on this side, and I think I can leave any further defence of the department in the hands of those who will follow me.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY: (Peace River): Some days ago I called the attention of the house to a case in which I thought the Postmaster General had violated the spirit of the Civil Service Act, and I wish to refer now to another case, one which the minister has mentioned to-day, namely, the Wabamun post office in Alberta. The Postmaster General stated that he rejected the appointee of the Civil Service Commission because he had "only lately" come into the district, and I take it that in his opinion the man was not a bona fide resident of the district. I think I can state in ten or fifteen minutes the facts in connection with this case, and in any event I shall do so as briefly as I can.

The post office at Wabamun is of course an office to which appointments must be made by the Civil Service Commission. In 1927 the then postmaster, Mr. McCusker, was dismissed from the office. He was a returned soldier, but he got into trouble with Mr. Henry White, from whom he rented the post office. He wanted leave to move to another building and this was granted him, but it was afterwards refused. He moved anyway and was dismissed. With that phase of the matter I will not deal this afternoon. The Civil Service Commission was of course notified of the fact that a new postmaster was required at Wabamun. They advertised for applicants and received half a dozen applications. The applicants were as follows—and they are placed here in order of merit so far as their qualifications for the position were concerned:

1. Henry White.
2. Sidney Robert Walley Thursfield.
3. Charles McCusker.
4. Edward Beaufoy Hawley.
5. Mrs. Louisa McCusker.
6. Arthur Sunley.

The following were eliminated: Mr. Henry White, because he was not a returned soldier; Charles McCusker, a returned soldier, rejected because he was a recently dismissed postmaster; Edward B. Hawley, "O.A.S.," in regard to whom the inspector who conducted the personal investigation states:

His personality and mentality are such that he would not be suitable.

Henry White, owing to the regulations giving preference to qualified "O.A.S." applicants, was rejected. And Mrs. Louisa McCusker and Arthur Sunley were rejected for the same reason. The only remaining candidate was Mr. Thursfield. The record states:

Mr. Thursfield, forty-two years of age, married and father of two children, is a British subject, born in England, and has been in Canada twenty-two years, nineteen months of which have been spent at Wabamun.

I wish the house to pay particular attention to the fact that he was a resident of Wabamun, receiving his mail through the Wabamun post office for nineteen months; yet he was rejected as having only recently arrived in Wabamun. For nineteen months he had been established in a business way, and I cannot see why he can be excluded from the list of bona fide residents of the post office district of Wabamun, entitling him to his status as an applicant under subsection 3 of section 21 of the act. The record goes on:

Education: High school, three years; Brandon college; one year.

Experience: Stenographer, two years; farmer.

O.A.S.: England and France; gassed and trench fever, for which he is in receipt of a 10 per cent pension; farming previous to enlistment and states he is unable to pursue efficiently this calling.

Remarks of inspector: Applicant is a newcomer to the district and practically unknown.

In the event of his appointment, Mr. Thursfield would provide suitable accommodation and location for the post office. He is well recommended.

This is signed "C.H.B., Assistant Secretary and Chief Examiner." Mr. Thursfield was appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I do not think it is necessary to cite again the fact that he was in receipt of a pension, but I want to read the report of the oral interview of Mr. Thursfield by the Civil Service Commission, appearing on page 15 of this file:

Postmastership of Wabumun, Alberta

1. Name of Applicant: Sidney Robert Walley Thursfield.
2. Address of Applicant: Wabamun, Alberta.
3. Age: 42.
4. Length of residence in the district served by the office in question: 19 months.
5. Is applicant a patron of the P.O. in question? Yes. If so, since what date? For 19 months.

6. What seems to be the educational qualifications of the applicant? Good.

7. Have you any information as to the character and habits of the applicant? Any information obtainable good.

8. Do you know anything in the life of the applicant which in your opinion would render him ineligible for the postmastership? No.

9. Along what lines has been the past experience of the applicant? Stenography and farming.

10. The various characteristics of the applicant impress me as being Very Good, Above Average, Average or Poor, as rated hereunder:

Characteristics—	Rating
Appearance..	Average
Bearing..	Average
Physique..	Above average
Tact..	Average
Conversation..	Average
Mentality..	Average
Personality..	Average

12. How does the accommodation and location offered by this applicant compare with that of the other candidates? Location about 100 yards from present site.

13. Do you consider this candidate sufficiently qualified as to education, experience, personality, character and integrity, accommodation and locality, to meet the needs of the office in question? (Yes or No.) If No, specify your reasons: Yes, applicant is, however, a newcomer to the district and is practically unknown.

The other day the Minister of National Defence and several other members of the house quoted the opinion given in 1919 by the Deputy Minister of Justice, and I wish to read just one section of it:

The fact that the man selected is not as good as his predecessor; or, in your words, not a man of reputation or outstanding ability, would not, I should think, in the absence of other objections, justify the deputy to reject him, provided we have passable qualifications.

I leave it to any member of the house, after what I have read as to the qualifications of this man Thursfield, who was appointed by the Civil Service Commission to the postmastership at Wabamun, to say whether or not he had passible qualifications. The only thing which might be at all questionable is the fact that he was unknown. But an examination of the file shows that two factions were fighting bitterly for the post office at Wabamun, and I submit that a man who was not connected with either of these factions, but was carrying on a business in the district really possessed an additional qualification for the position. No one with any intelligence would have any trouble in mastering the details of the office and becoming known to the patrons in a very short time. Notwithstanding this fact, the Postmaster General arrogated to himself—that is the only word that I can think of—the right to reject this applicant under section 24 of the Civil Service Act, a right which in my judgment he was not justified in exercising in view of the fact that he had in his possession the opinion of that section given by the Deputy Minister of Justice in 1919.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the ground of rejection?

Mr. KENNEDY: I will read it; it is marked No. 50 in sessional paper No. 235 of this year:

Ottawa, February 18, 1928.

P. T. Coolican, Esq.,
Acting Deputy Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

With further reference to the question of the vacancy in the Wabamun post office, I beg to say that in looking over the report of the inspector and finding that he states that Mr. Thursfield has only lately arrived in Wabamun and is not very well known, I have decided not to accept the certificate issued in his favour. There seems to be another returned soldier by the name of Ed. B. Hawley, who has a disability of 80 per cent. In this case the report of the inspector is not at all favourable, because he states as follows: "His personality and mentality are such that he would not be suitable," and he further states that his physical condition is rated as poor.

I further find that Mr. White, the present acting postmaster is rated as first in post office experience and efficiency and in my opinion this is the person who should get the nomination if we are to keep up the efficiency of our service.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) P. J. Veniot.

If it is open to the Postmaster General or anyone else to say that a person with nineteen months' residence in a district must be regarded as only lately arriving there; if it is open to the Postmaster General to say that this man is not qualified—I suppose under subsection 3 of section 21 of the Civil Service Act, which confines applicants to bona fide residents—you can make any section of the act mean whatever you like. I submit that it is absolutely impossible to say that this man was only recently arrived in the sense that would exclude him from being acceptable as the postmaster of the village of Wabamun.

Further, in this letter the Postmaster General practically rules out everyone with the exception of Mr. White, and makes it plain to the commission that as far as he is concerned Henry White is the only acceptable applicant.

Mr. THORSON: What did the commission do?

Mr. KENNEDY: The commission appointed Henry White. I am told that Henry

White was the Liberal candidate in the constituency of Lac Ste. Anne in the last provincial election in Alberta. I have here the Canadian Parliamentary Guide for 1928, where I find that the candidates in that constituency were M. C. McKeen, E. R. Barker and Henry White. So I submit that as far as I can see, and as this file reveals, this is purely a case of exercising political patronage, ruling out the commission and ruling out the applicants who were returned soldiers. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, serious as this amendment is, I feel that I must support it. In this corner of the house we have taken the stand that all appointments should be made by the Civil Service Commission and that all or practically all those civil servants who are now appointed by other means than the Civil Service Commission should be brought under the scope and operation of the act. As far as this motion is concerned, I must support it because of the experiences I have had in cases with which I have been familiar and which I have personally investigated and followed up. If these facts do not reveal a case of political patronage in the appointment of a postmaster in the village of Wabamun I do not think it is possible to establish such a case anywhere.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Stewart (Leeds), which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Care of patients and medical examination of pensioners, $2,600,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Pensions and National Health): It was not intended that we should discuss this item this afternoon. The purpose is simply to bring the item up and then proceed with the Post Office Department item.

Mr. McGIBBON: When will we take up this item again?

Mr. ROBB: As soon as we get through with the Post Office Department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be either to-morrow or Friday.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $16,305,000.

Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,176,175.

Yukon territory, $150,000–Total, $34,926,639.40.

The CHAIRMAN: The first item is salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the record of this department as I find it on page 12 of the report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1928. The record shows that from the establishment of the Post Office Department in 1868 down to 1901 there was a deficit each year; that in the year 1902 we began a series of surpluses, and that these surpluses continued down to the year 1915 when there was a deficit. In the year 1916 and each year following down to the year 1922 there were very substantial surpluses, the amounts being as follows:

Year	Surplus
1916	$2,849,271 16
1917	4,601,805 81
1918	3,298,836 58
1919	2,329,128 71
1920	3,675,531 77
1921	1,669,856 71

Then, from 1922 on, the deficits or surpluse are as follows:

Year	Surplus	Deficit
1922	.....	$1,566,886 53
1923	$1,467,730 89	.....
1924	794,555 35	.....
1925	.....	1,291,809 53
1926	524,778 48	.....
1928	.....	1,850,040 89

The Postmaster General has brought down a statement covering the actual figures to the 1st January, 1929, and an estimate since then. According to that statement he estimates that the deficit for the year which expired on the 31st March last, will amount to $2,363,588. That seems rather a serious situation. This department, which was on a surplus-producing basis, now seems to have gone into the period of deficits. I should like the Postmaster General to explain to the committee the details of how this deficit arises.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The hon. gentleman is taking the year 1926, and he has shown there was a surplus of $524,778.48, and that during the years following, 1927 and 1928, there were deficits ranging from $1,629,000 to $1,850,000. He should have remembered that in 1926 the reduction from three cents to two cents was made in postage; that with one stroke of the pen the receipts of the Post Office Department, had there been no increase in volume of business, would have been reduced by $6,000,000, but the volume of business has so increased since 1926 that we have almost brought that deficit down to a negligible amount. As to the estimated deficit reported for the fiscal year ended March 31 1929, it is true that deficit is estimated at approximately $2,500,000. I am dealing now with round figures. That is not surprising when it is considered that we have opened many new rural routes during last year and the year before; that we have extended the air mail service; that it cost last year somewhere in the vicinity of $400,000 or $500,000 more than we expended in the past; that under the Civil Service Act there have been statutory increases in the salaries of the employees of the postal department, and many more increases which I can explan as each item is taken up. For instance, in the item under discussion, there is an increase in salaries and allowances of $339,530. The total estimate for salaries and allowances for the fiscal year 1929-1930 is the amount provided for the fiscal year 1928-1929, plus $339,530, which is made up as follows: 1878 statutory increases which could not be avoided, and which are granted after the approval of the Civil Service Commission, amounting to $206,202; 235 additional positions required, owing to the increased volume of mail and to provide for the new and improved postal facilities afforded the public, $132,310—

Progress reported.

Mr. BARBER:

1. How many cattle were slaughtered as reactors in the Fraser valley, British Columbia area, during the twelve months ending January 31, 1929?
2. What are the names and addresses of the owners of the cattle slaughtered in this area during the said period?
3. How many did each owner lose?
4. What compensation was awarded in each case?
5. What amount of compensation was actually paid in each case previous to April 30, 1929?

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

OPTIONAL CLAUSE—PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a despatch appearing in the press this morning with reference to a debate in the English House of Lords with regard to Canada's attitude toward the signing of the optional clause. The Lord Chancellor is reported to have stated that he could not give the correspondence to the press without Canada's consent, and the question I wish to ask the Prime Minister is whether Canada has given her consent to the publication of the correspondence and if, when this consent is given, the Prime Minister will lay on the table the correspondence between Canada and Great Britain in this regard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not recall having received any communication asking Canada's consent to the publication of this correspondence, but so far as our own correspondence is concerned if it were requested by Great Britain there is no reason why it should not be brought down. With regard to any correspondence the British government may have had with us, I would have to obtain the consent of the British government before laying that correspondence on the table.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Prime Minister make it clear that there is no difficulty so far as this government is concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made a statement in the house in this connection some time ago, and since the morning papers have a reference to what was then said it might be well for me to read my remarks on that occasion. On February 19 I made a short statement which is all I have said in this connection and which covers the position of the Canadian government with respect to the optional clause. That statement is found at page 248 of Hansard and was made in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) as follows:

> My hon. friend will recall that during the last imperial conference a desire was expressed on the part of the governments assembled there that no one part of the British Empire should formally accept the optional clause without giving to the other parts of the empire an opportunity of discussing that particular subject. We have advised the other parts of the empire that in our opinion Canada should sign the optional clause, and we are at present receiving communications from other parts of the empire in reference thereto. We are carrying out our undertaking at the conference not to sign formally until there has been an opportunity for discussion, but we have made known that it is our desire to sign the optional clause.

I noticed that in the press report there seemed to be an impression that I had expressed some view as to what other parts of the empire were to do with respect to the optional clause. I expressed no such view either at that time or at any other time; I spoke in reference to Canada only. So far as we are concerned our correspondence could be brought down at any time, with the consent of the governments with which we have been corresponding.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JACOBS

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): On the first page of the Ottawa Journal of May 1 appears the following statement:

> Charges That Liberals Block Public Accounts Inquiry.

As chairman of the committee I wish to say that the statement is a malicious falsehood.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland): I would like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) if he will supplement reference No. 107 with the information relating to the Senate and House of Commons Library.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.
Mail service, including mail service by air, $16,305,000.
Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,176,175.
Yukon territory, $150,000—Total, $34,926,639.40.

Mr. JONES: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I would be doing my duty if I allowed this vote to pass without commenting on many of the statements which were made yesterday by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in defence of his department. It would take at least two hours to make out the full case and spread it on Hansard. The Postmaster General said that he would deal with a certain number of postmasterships as they came under the Civil Service Act. He dealt with Hawkesbury, Alexandria, New Glasgow, Brigden, St. Boniface, Brussels, East St. John, Oliver, Norton, and one or two others. If the Postmaster General made similar misrepresentations with reference to all the other post offices as he did concerning Norton then his argument falls very flat and there is not one word of truth in the utterances of the hon. gentleman with regard to Norton.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. JONES: This is what the Postmaster General stated yesterday.

I know that I am taking up a good deal of the time of the house, but I think it is worth while. The next case is that of Norton in the province of New Brunswick. This position was declared vacant before my time and after an investigation as to political partisanship against the postmaster named Price. When I entered office I found that a returned soldier by the name of Ward had received a certificate from the Civil Service Commission. Considerable turmoil had been created before I took charge. I intended to start with a clean sheet and I declared that this vacancy still existed and asked for new advertisements. Some time elapsed before this was done, because the case at Norton was not called to my attention until some time in 1927.

The Postmaster General as a responsible member of the cabinet and the present administration says that this matter was not called to his attention until 1928, but before I am through I intend to prove to the satisfaction of any reasonable person in this country that the Postmaster General did know all about the Norton case as far back as 1924—when he was the premier of the province of New Brunswick. The Postmaster General's statement continues:

In the meantime Mr. Price, who was a very old man—

I might state that he is not as old as the Postmaster General.

—was left in charge of the office although he had been found guilty of political partizanship. I understand that Mr. Ward was the victim of a very serious automobile accident.

I interjected at this point and said:

It was another returned soldier by the name of Harmer.

Then the Postmaster General continued:

I am coming to that case. I declared the office vacant and called for new advertisements.

Mr. VENIOT: I was referring to Mr. Price.

Mr. JONES: No, you referred to Mr. Ward and I corrected you. Mr. Harmer was in an automobile accident as well.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not know that.

Mr. JONES: Oh yes, you knew Mr. Harmer. The statement continues:

The Civil Service Commission advised me that if I wanted to do that I would have to dispose of the certificate already issued in favour of Ward. I did so, and the vacancy was advertised and I believe Ward is an applicant as well as Harmer. At the present time a civilian is temporarily in charge of the office with the distinct understanding that it is only temporary and that returned soldiers with qualifications are to have preference. That is the Norton case as it now stands and no decision has been reached as yet in that case.

I intend to deal with the case from March, 1924. Order in Council, P.C. 326, dated March 7, 1924, was passed for the dismissal of Allan Price. A letter was written by Hon. Charles Murphy, the then Postmaster General, to Doctor McAllister, the defeated Liberal candidate in 1921, informing him that Mr. Price had been dismissed by order in council and that he had better send in an applicant for the position. Dr. McAllister replied to the then Postmaster General stating that as this was a very important office he wanted to see a good man appointed. This occurred on March 11.

A letter dated March 17, 1924, was written by Dr. McAllister to Hon. Charles Murphy recommending William A. Reynolds, which stated that reasons would be given later on. This Norton file which appears to be stripped of a good deal of the correspondence does not contain any letter setting forth the further reasons why Mr. Reynolds should be appointed. In his letter of March 7 to Dr. McAllister, Mr. Murphy referred to the fact that Mr. Reynolds had been recommended by Hon. P. J. Veniot, premier of the province of New Brunswick. The Postmaster General now comes forward and states that he knew nothing about this case until he assumed office.

On March 21 a letter was written by Mr. Coolican to the district superintendent at St. John with reference to advertising the position. I have all the papers under my hand, but as I said before, it would be impossible to read all the correspondence.

On May 29 notice of the advertisement was posted, signed by W. Foran, Secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

On May 28 there is a letter from W. H. Heine, enclosing a petition signed by ninety-two residents of Norton in favour of the retention of Mr. Price.

On April 15, 1924, there is a letter from Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, to the district superintendent at St. John re Fred E. Sharp, an applicant for the position. I may say that Mr. Fred E. Sharp was the defeated Liberal candidate in the 1917 federal election, and he was also on a previous occasion a defeated candidate for the New Brunswick legislature. This letter called the attention of the district superintendent to the fact that Mr. Sharp was an applicant and asked him to put Mr. Sharp's name on the list of applicants for the postmastership at Norton.

On April 15 there is a telegram from Doctor McAllister to the Hon. Charles Murphy, then Postmaster General, asking him to carry out his recommendation regarding Mr. Reynolds, but giving no further information as to his qualifications or why the position should be given to him over the heads of a large number of returned soldiers.

On April 17 there is another letter from Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, to Doctor McAllister, pointing out that the Norton post office was under the Civil Service Commission.

On May 8, 1924, there is a report from the district superintendent to the Postmaster General, stating that ten applications had been received for the Norton post office. I wish to pause at this point for a moment or two in order to give the ratings of the different applicants for that office. The report from the district superintendent is dated St. John, New Brunswick, May 8, 1924, and it contains nine pages. I will just give a list of the applicants:

George Ward, a returned solder.
Ivan William Reid, a returned soldier.
Fred E. Sharp.
Miss Lucy Jane Campbell.
William A. Reynolds.
Ernest Nelson Myers.
William E. Harmer, a returned soldier.

This man enlisted in the 104 battalion. After he had enlisted he was taken with appendicitis. He was operated on and could not go to the front, but later on he went to work in a munitions plant and did everything he could to help win the war.

Miss Mary E. Saunders, Bloomfield Station.
Preston Douglas Price, a returned soldier formerly of Norton, but now of Concord, New Hampshire.
Charles Thomas Homer, Southfield, N.B.

That is five miles from Norton. It would take up too much time to read the whole report and I do not wish to dwell on the matter any longer than necessary. I will now give the report of the district superintendent in regard to George Ward, as follows:

Educational qualification: Good common school education in England.
Accommodation offered: Suitable.
Location offered: Present site.
Residential qualifications: Has been living in the vicinity of Norton since April, 1921.
Experience: A little post office experience and has had experience in meeting the public.
Character and integrity: Good.
Time willing to give to post office: Full time.
Whether returned soldier: Yes.
Whether disability case: No,—but is in receipt of a small pension.

That was the report on Mr. Ward, No. 1 on the whole list. There were practically as good reports on Ivan William Reid, another returned soldier; William Elias Harmer, a returned soldier; Preston Douglas Price, another returned soldier who saw service in France; and Charles Thomas Homer, another returned soldier who saw service at the front, and who, by the way, was a school teacher before he went to the war.

I wish to give a further report regarding George Ward, the man who received the certificate from the Civil Service Commission:

Mr. George Ward; twenty-eight years of age; unmarried; is a returned soldier who enlisted in 1915; went overseas in 1916 and saw service at Vimy Ridge, Hill 70 and Passchendaele; was wounded in November, 1917, and lost two fingers of his left hand; was discharged January, 1919, and is in receipt of a small pension per month. After his return from the war he took a course through the vocational department of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and has been employed as a telegraph operator on and off at intervals since March 6, 1920. For the past three months has been a clerk in the store of W. A. Saunders, at Bloomfield station in the parish of Norton six miles distant from Norton. He has had a little post office experience, having assisted the postmaster at Bloomfield station during the period the office was in Mr. Saunders' store (about one year). He is a man of good appearance, and comes well recommended by the members of the Empire Soldiers Club at Norton; by the secretary-treasurer of the G.W.V.A., and by King and McDonald, wholesale grocers of St. John; by the chief train dispatcher of the Canadian National Railways, Moncton, N.B., and by the Anglican Bishop of Fredericton, as per letters herewith enclosed.

There are no recommendations on the file. The file has been stripped of all those.

After his return from the war Mr. Ward met with an accident in a saw-mill which crippled his right hand slightly but his war and other injuries would not in any way interfere with his carrying on post office work. If appointed, Mr. Ward would provide a suitable location for the post office.

I do not intend to take up any more time. As I stated, this report of the district superintendent is nine pages long. I wish to lay this case before the committee in order that it may be judged on its merits.

On May 14, 1924, there is a letter and a petition from William E. Harmer, returned soldier, who had enlisted in the 104th battalion. This was sent to the Hon. Charles Stewart, at that time Acting Postmaster General.

On May 20 there is a letter from the Deputy Postmaster General to Doctor McAllister informing him again—there is no reference on the file to any letter from the doctor—that returned soldiers would have the preference under the Civil Service Act, as it is the law of the country. The Deputy Postmaster General who wrote that letter is the same deputy who is in charge to-day.

Next is a letter, dated May 27th, from William E. Harmer to the Hon. Charles Murphy, the then Postmaster General, informing him of Ward's record and of his joining the 104th battalion, and so on. It is a very long letter.

Then appears the certificate of the Civil Service Commission, dated July 30, 1924, of the apointment of George Ward as postmaster at Norton. I might point out that there were no strings attached to this certificate, as was the case, I understand, with some others.

[Mr. Jones.]

This was a straight certificate appointing Mr. George Ward, postmaster at Norton.

About a week later, Mr. E. J. Underwood, chief superintendent of post office service, writes to Mr. W. A. Reynolds, one of the applicants, informing him of the appointment of Mr. George Ward as postmaster at Norton.

Then on August 8, 1924, Doctor McAllister writes to the Hon. A. B. Copp, Secretary of State, as follows:

I am writing you again re Norton P.O. affair Little did I expect the Civil Service would choose Geo. Ward, not only for his being an emigrant to this country but for his incapabilities. It is true that he was overseas but he has been fully compensated since his return. The federal government gave him a course in telegraphy and the local government has compensated him to the extent of five hundred dollars, and I have learned to-day that his employer who runs a general store and had him as a clerk, discharged him for cause. His employer was F. Saunders, Bloomfield, lumber man and merchant. I think this matter should be looked into. Please call the attention of this to the Postmaster General and by so doing you will greatly oblige.

Mr. McAllister was the defeated Liberal candidate in 1921, again in 1925, and again in 1926, and this is the kind of stuff that the local Liberal organization in the constituency of Royal kept putting up to the Postmaster General.

There is a lot of correspondence following the charge that Ward was a defaulter, and finally the matter came into the court at St. John, and after being considered by the grand jury it was thrown out. The correspondence which was furnished to the Civil Service Commission is here, and it shows that there was absolutely nothing in the charge and that it could not be proven.

On August 12, 1924, Hon. Charles Murphy writes to Mr. Copp acknowledging receipt of this letter from Doctor McAllister, saying that Ward had been appointed according to the law and under the Civil Service Commission. I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that this was on August 12, 1924. For nearly two years from that time, until November 17, 1926, there was not much activity in this matter. During all this time the old postmaster was in charge, the man who had been dismissed by order in council. The former Postmaster General, the Hon. Charles Murphy, did not make any move to override the Civil Service Commission, but just as soon as the present Postmaster General assumed office on August 17, 1926, action took place. I will read this letter in full. It is written by the present Postmaster General to the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and is dated Ottawa, November 17, 1926:

Chairman,
Civil Service Commission,
Ottawa, Ont.

Gentlemen:

I understand that the vacancy for the Norton post office, Queens county, N.B.—

By the way, it is Kings, not Queens county; it is in the constituency of Royal:

—has been standing for a considerable time. It appears that serious objections have been raised to the appointment of one Ward, who, I understand, ranks first in the qualification examination for that position, followed by one Reynolds.

I further understand that your board issued a certificate of appointment in favour of Mr. Ward, but that he was not installed in office, and the former postmaster who was found guilty of political partisanship still remaining in charge of the office.

The hon. Postmaster General knew that this man was in office all the time, and preferred to keep Mr. Price there rather than appoint Mr. Ward, a returned soldier, to the office, as recommended by the Civil Service Commission. The letter continues:

With the knowledge that he had obtained this appointment, Mr. Ward, in the last election took a very active part. My information is that he was even obnoxious in his conduct to those who did not agree with him in politics. In view of this, I feel that Mr. Ward should not now be allowed to take advantage of the certificate that has been issued in his favour.

I would ask that your board give this matter very serious consideration.

The chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Doctor Roche, replied as follows, under date of November 20, 1926:

Dear Mr. Veniot:

I desire to acknowledge yours of the 17th, in which you refer to the fact that Mr. Ward (for whose appointment as postmaster at Norton, Queens county, N.B. a certificate was issued by the commission some two years ago) took an active part in the recent general election, and expressing your view that Mr. Ward should not now be allowed to take advantage of the certificate issued in his favour.

Unfortunately, however, once a certificate of appointment has been issued by the commission the matter passes beyond the jurisdiction of this body, but I have placed your letter before the full board of the commission, and as the commission is awaiting the decision of the Department of Justice on a point in connection with another case that has a bearing on this case, you will be further advised after the commission has received the opinion of the Department of Justice on the point referred to.

Following the receipt of that letter, the Postmaster General did not lose very much time, for on November 24 he writes from his office at Ottawa to the Hon. W. J. Roche, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, as follows:

My dear Sir:

I am in receipt of yours of the 20th in reply to mine of the 17th in which I called your attention to the fact that Mr. Ward (for whose appointment as postmaster at Norton, Queens County, N.B., a certificate was issued by the commission some two years ago) had taken an active part in the last federal election and for that reason I did not think that he should finally receive the appointment of postmaster at Norton. I note what you say about a certificate being once issued that the matter passes beyond the jurisdiction of your commission, but that you have placed my letter before the full board of the commission, and as the commission is awaiting the decision from the Department of Justice on a point in connection with another case that has a bearing on this case, I will be further advised in the matter after you receive the opinion of the Justice department.

A few days after that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Doctor Roche, wrote the following letter:

December 2, 1926.

Dear Mr. Veniot,

In further reference to the postmastership at Norton, Queens County, N.B., in mine of the 20th ultimo I pointed out that the commission's jurisdiction in regard to this appointment ceased after issuing the certificate in favour of Mr. Ward. But owing to another case having been referred to the Department of Justice for decision which might have a bearing upon this case I promised to let you know when such opinion was received.

The opinion referred to was in connection with the Hawkesbury postmastership, as to whether a department could legally reject a candidate for whom a certificate had been issued by the commission when more than one year had elapsed since the issue of such certificate.

The opinion just received from the Department of Justice is to the effect that section 13 may be invoked in rejecting a candidate after twelve months had elapsed from the date of certificate unless the person sought to be rejected has served in the position for a probationary period for six or twelve months, as the case may be. In the Hawkesbury case, however, I understand that your point is that the candidate for whom the commission issued its certificate of appointment is not sufficiently qualified bilingually, notwithstanding both the departmental officers and the commission decided otherwise, and if you feel justified in rejecting this candidate under section 13, apparently you can legally do so according to the decision of the Department of Justice. But in the case of the Norton postmastership you object to Mr. Ward being allowed to take advantage of the certificate issued in his favor by the reason of his activities in connection with the recent Dominion elections. I do not think this would be sufficient ground for the department to refuse to instal Mr. Ward in office, as he is not civil servant until he has been placed in a position to discharge the duties of same. Otherwise if he did not have the office tranferred to him for the next ten or fifteen years he might have his hands tied politically notwithstanding he was earning his livelihood entirely outside the service, and this does not seem at all reasonable.

It would appear to me therefore that if it is your intention to reject Mr. Ward under section 13 some more substantial reason should be assigned than the one to which you refer. I think if you will discuss this point with the Deputy Minister of Justice he will agree with me.

You see by this correspondence between the Postmaster General and the Civil Service Commission that there was a desperate effort made to get rid of Mr. Ward, who had been appointed postmaster at Norton. On August 28, 1928, after an interval of almost two years from the date of the letter I have just read, there was a lot of correspondence between the department and the Postmaster General. I wish to refer to a letter of August 28, 1928, written by the Hon. P. J. Veniot, Postmaster General, to Mr. Gaboury:

Dismiss Allan Price and appoint William A. Reynolds acting postmaster at Norton.

This was done in face of the letter from the Civil Service Commission setting out the law in regard to this case.

On August 31 there is a letter from E. J. Underwood to the district superintendent at St. John, instructing him to put into the office Mr. W. A. Reynolds as acting postmaster.

On September 7, 1928, I find a letter from H. W. Woods to the superintendent of postal service saying that Mr. Reynolds had been installed on September 15.

On September 14 there is a letter from Mr. B. E. Thomas, Service Bureau of the Canadian Legion of British Empire Service League, to the Hon. Mr. Veniot, asking him why Mr. Ward had not been called upon to fill the post office at Norton. I desire to read the letter in reply from the Postmaster General. It is dated September 19, 1928:

Dear Sir,—

I am in receipt of yours of the 14th instant in connection with the postmastership at Norton, N.B., and in reply beg to give you the following information:

It appears that in 1924, two years before I assumed the position of Postmaster General, an investigation was held into the conduct of the postmaster at Norton, N.B., and the charges made against him were investigated and proven. The office was declared vacant, but he was allowed to remain in temporary charge until the Civil Service Commission had made a permanent appointment. George Ward, a returned soldier, was one of the applicants, and he received the certificate of the Civil Service Commission for the permanent appointment. This certificate, it appears, was never accepted by the Postmaster General. The matter was left in abeyance with the old postmaster still acting when I took charge of this department.

[Mr. Jones.]

Now, I desire hon. members to listen to this. The letter continues:

I knew nothing about this matter. About a year ago my attention was called to the situation at Norton, and after making inquiries touching the details I decided that in view of the length of time that had expired between the date of advertising the vacancy in 1924, and the time that the matter had been drawn to my attention, and in view of the fact that I learned that Ward had left Norton and was engaged in a position at St. John, and that there were other returned soldiers who had applied and who were still residing in Norton, it would be better under all the circumstances to have the vacancy advertised anew. In the meantime, so as to give no undue advantage to one returned soldier as against another, I issued instructions to have this vacancy advertised and to appoint a Mr. Reynolds in temporary charge. I had to appoint a person in temporary charge because conditions were such as Norton that it was impossible to put up any longer with the old gentleman in charge.

You will notice that in this letter the Postmaster General states that the matter has only just been drawn to his attention, whereas two years previously he had taken the matter up himself with the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: As Postmaster General?

Mr. JONES: Yes, as Postmaster General, in 1926. And this letter is 1928. In November and December, 1926, he had taken the matter up, and here he says he knew nothing about it. Perhaps I have taken up more time on this matter than I should otherwise have done, but it is one of the most important questions that can be directed to the attention of the house. On October 4, 1928, there was addressed, from J. G. Herwig, of the British Empire Service League, a letter to the Hon. Mr. Veniot, calling his attention again to the matter of Mr. Ward's not receiving the appointment. And then we have another letter, October 5, 1928, from L. D. Theriault, secretary, to Mr. Herwig.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. CLARK: I want to ask the Postmaster General for the section of the Civil Service Act or of the Post Office Act which enables him to appoint a postmaster either permanently or temporarily.

Mr. VENIOT: Where the salary does not exceed $200, based upon a revenue of $400, the Postmaster General has the right to make a temporary appointment.

Mr. CLARK: I am referring to those post offices which—

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will possess his soul in patience.

Mr. CLARK: I thought the minister had misunderstood my question. It is not a question of preserving my patience; I want the Postmaster General to be clear.

Mr. VENIOT: I will be clear. When a vacancy occurs we consider that under the act we have the right to make a temporary appointment, and that continues until the Civil Service Commission makes it permanent.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister refer to the section of any statute in existence which authorizes him or his deputy or anyone else to make such appointments?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not in a position now to refer to such a statute.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has his deputy before him and his deputy knows that in dozens of cases this assumed power has been exercised by the minister. The Post Office Department must know offhand whether or not such a statutory power exists, and I ask for an answer. If the Postmaster General does not know then the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is in his place, the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is in his place, and there is no question in the world but an answer can be given at a moment's notice.

Mr. VENIOT: I will not undertake to satisfy the hon. gentleman by discussing legal issues, because I am not qualified to do so; I am not a lawyer. I did not take the trouble to inquire whether legally it can be done. I certainly followed the practice that has obtained since 1919 under the Civil Service Act where temporary appointments have been made right along to fill vacancies until such time as the appointments are made permanent. I do know that under the decision of the Civil Service Commission, in the case of several appointments in the department, it has been the practice since 1919 to make temporary appointments; where there is not a waiting list we are authorized or we do make such appointments. When the Civil Service Commission advertise for applications they obtain what is called a waiting list, comprising the applicants who have successfully passed, and so long as that waiting list is in existence no temporary appointment can be made, but appointments must be made from that waiting list, according to merit. They are made from the list provided the department by the commission. This has been the practice since 1919. Otherwise how could you get along? You must have authority to make temporary appointments when vacancies occur in the post offices; otherwise how could you carry on the business?

Mr. CLARK: According to the act.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I have followed it as closely as anyone.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has made no attempt to answer a very plain question. He asserted the other evening, when I was speaking, that there was lawful authority in the minister to make appointments—I will assume he meant temporary appointments. Now once more I appeal to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, if such power does exist, to point out to the committee the nature of that power on the part of the minister to make temporary appointments to post offices when post offices come under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not considered the question but I am quite willing to do so. I must however point out that under the law the Department of Justice is adviser to the departments of government; it acts for the departments of government and gives rulings asked for by those departments and even by parliament. But it has never been the practice of the Minister of Justice or of the Solicitor General to give to members of the house legal advice such as my hon. friend would like to obtain while the committee is sitting this afternoon. However, just to please my hon. friend I am willing to give consideration to his question.

Mr. CLARK: I think this is a new principle.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not; ask the hon. gentleman just in front of you.

Mr. CLARK: In any case the Minister of Justice has undertaken to consider this question and I trust he will give parliament a statement. I submit that it has been the duty of the Minister of Justice, of the Solicitor General and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to take notice of such a situation as has been brought before parliament during the last few weeks. This side of the house has repeatedly challenged the legal right of the Postmaster General to make appointments to post offices which come under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, and the Postmaster General has often asserted his right to make such appointments.

Mr. VENIOT: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. CLARK: If it is a statement, no; if it is a question, yes.

Mr. VENIOT: It is a question.

Mr. CLARK: Certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: Does that law you are now quoting—

Mr. CLARK: I have not quoted it yet.

Mr. VENIOT: Does it apply to all departments—all appointments?

Mr. CLARK: I will quote the law and the minister can study it.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not answering my question.

Mr. CLARK: I will answer the question after I have quoted the law.

Mr. VENIOT: You are attacking the Post Office Department.

Mr. CLARK: Yes; the post office estimates are before the house at the moment. But as I have pointed out, I am not attacking the Postmaster General at this moment any more than I am attacking the Prime Minister and his government. I am attacking the Prime Minister and his government at this moment for permitting any department to defy the law as it is laid down in the statute books, which is the will of this parliament.

Now I wish to draw to the attention of the committee certain sections of the Civil Service Act. I refer first to section 19, which is as follows:

> Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown, board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any employee to a position in the civil service.

That certainly excludes the right of any minister of any department in this regard. Does that answer the Postmaster General?

Mr. THORSON: That does not apply to temporary positions.

Mr. CLARK: I will come to that.

Mr. ROBB: If that is true what is the use of electing members of parliament? Why not let the Civil Service Commission run the country?

Mr. CLARK: I am surprised to hear the Minister of Finance assert to this committee and suggest to parliament that the chief duty of the government is the appointment of employees. That is a delightful doctrine. Now let us go on to section 21:

> Every deputy head shall notify the commission of every vacancy in any position in his department immediately after the vacancy occurs, and whenever such vacancy is to be filled, the deputy head shall request the commission to make an appointment.

We have had brought before us in the last few weeks many instances where the Postmaster General has delayed for months in notifying the Civil Service Commission and where he has made temporary appointments on his own responsibility without notifying the commission at all. I think it is time the government took some action instead of stand-up almost daily and by their votes endorsing the actions of the Postmaster General. Subsection 2 of section 21 deals with temporary appointments, as follows:

> The commission shall thereupon appoint the person whose name stands highest upon the commission's list of eligible persons for the class in which the position is found and who is willing to accept the appointment; in case there is no such list for the class, the commission shall forthwith hold an examination and, if necessary to prevent any serious interference with the public business, but not otherwise, may fill the position at once by making a temporary appointment as prescribed herein.

That is the Civil Service Commission, not the Postmaster General, or any other minister of the crown.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to direct his attention to one point? Does not that section refer only to what is known as the temporary waiting list?

Mr. CLARK: Most decidedly not, or it would say so.

Mr. VENIOT: They have to establish a temporary waiting list.

Mr. CLARK: This is the statute dealing with the question of appointments. There is only one section of the act which gives any power to any department to take on temporary employees, and I particularly direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to this section. I refer to section 39; while section 38 also refers to temporary appointments it only covers the case of a temporary pressure of work requiring extra employees. Section 39 states:

> When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa, the responsible agent or officer of the department requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employees, and the said agent or officer in each case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed.

2. No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission. . .

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any time specified within which the commission must make an appointment or selection?

Mr. CLARK: No, I cannot find any such provision except that the commissioners are charged by oath to deal with such cases forthwith. There is no specified time, but they are charged to deal with the matter immediately they are notified of the vacancy. Certain steps are prescribed and they are bound by their oaths to make the appointment forthwith.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the hon. gentleman aware that in making appointments to the outside service in the Post Office Department the Civil Service Commission must depend upon the officials of the department, the postal inspectors and so on, to secure the necessary information, and sometimes two or three months elapse before appointments are made? Who is to act in the meantime?

Mr. CLARK: The thing is perfectly simple; in practically all these dismissals the postmaster who was carrying on could have continued in office until the advertisement was issued and the district superintendent reported to the Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: What would you suggest where a postmaster died?

Mr. CLARK: That is also quite simple; the district superintendent is the man who must deal with the situation. I have read the section of the act which provides for cases where employees are required on short notice, and I should think that would take care of vacancies occurring through death:

When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa, the responsible agent or officer of the department requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employees, and the said agent or officer in each case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed.

2. No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission. . . .

That is perfectly clear; whoever is in charge of the district makes the appointment immediately and reports to his chief. If it is not possible to have the appointment confirmed within thirty days the chief, in this case the Postmaster General or his deputy, will simply write a letter to the Civil Service Commission explaining the circumstances and request the approval of the commission in the meantime until the office can be advertised and the vacancy filled in accordance with the Civil Service Act.

Mr. VENIOT: That refers only to waiting lists.

Mr. CLARK: Waiting lists nothing; there is nothing here about waiting lists.

Mr. POULIOT: So the minister will be the subordinate of his officer.

Mr. VENIOT: Let the hon. gentleman consult the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CLARK: I do not need to consult them, I am consulting the will of parliament. At the moment I am not concerned with how the Civil Service Commission administers the act; as a matter of fact I am going to ask this government to investigate how the commission is administering this act, because I believe a file which I brought to the attention of the house the other evening clearly indicates that a civil service commissioner has disregarded his oath of office and, to speak quite frankly, I believe he has conspired with the Post Office Department to hold up these appointments.

Mr. ROBB: If the minister is wrong and the Civil Service Commission is wrong, who is to carry on the business of the country?

Mr. CLARK: Follow the statute. If this government continues this policy of ignoring this act, which is the will of parliament; if it continues to back these illegal appointments and this defiance of the act by a minister of the crown the people of this country will deal with this government and will put in office a government which will administer the act. If the act is deficient in any way it can be changed. The Minister of Finance may laugh; he apparently considers it a great joke when he thinks of the way the Postmaster General has been carrying on, but I should have thought that the Minister would have voted yesterday with a shamed face—if the shame was not in his face, it must have been in his heart—when condoning the offences of the Postmaster General. I would also direct the attention of the house to the fact that the Postmaster General came in and cast a vote as a juryman in his own favour—most remarkable conduct.

There are two other features in connection with this matter. The postmasters who have been illegally appointed by the Postmaster General are being illegally paid by this country. I would draw the attention of the government, and particularly the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the Auditor General is passing payments to these employees who are unlawfully employed and who are retaining their positions contrary to the express provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. ROBB: Then the Auditor General is wrong also?

Mr. CLARK: Certainly he is wrong, absolutely. I suggest right now to the Minister of Finance that he bring the Auditor General before the public accounts committee and sak him to explain why he is doing this.

An hon. MEMBER: Another man gone wrong.

Mr. CLARK: I am going to give the various ministers who treat this matter with such levity one more test and see if their levity will extend that far.

The file in a particular case was sent to the Civil Service Commission on June 29, 1928, for action by that body. The appointment in question happened to be the post office at Sutton, but I am not going to deal with that particular office but endeavour to make my remarks general because there are many other similar cases. I venture to say that if an investigation were carried out it would be found that there are many other cases in which the Civil Service Commission is involved in the same way as one commissioner is involved in this case. On June 29 the appointment was referred to the Civil Service Commission. On July 9 the examination branch of the commission certified that a returned soldier was entitled to the appointment over the appointee of the Postmaster General who held office contrary to the provisions of subsection 4 of section 29 of the Civil Service Act, and despite the fact that the superintendent in Montreal had certified as to the fitness of the returned soldier. The examination was completed and the appointment could have been made but for some reason or other the file remained dormant in the office of the Civil Service Commission until October 25, when it was brought before Doctor Roche with a request from the Postmaster General that this appointment be allowed to stand still further. It had already been standing much longer than there was any legal right for it to stand, but Doctor Roche made an endorsement on the file—I wonder if the Minister of Finance will consider this as big a joke as he has considered the other breaches of the law?—as follows:

> I do not know why this file has been held for the last three months without being passed on by the commissioners. It has only been placed before me this morning, October 25, and in the meantime the department has placed the office in charge of the least competent applicant of the two.

That is signed "W. J. R." and is initialled by the other commissioners. As I stated a careful investigation took place to ascertain why that file had been held in the office for three months without being brought to the attention of the chief commissioner. The report of J. L. Bouchard established beyond peradventure that no employee of the Civil Service Commission had had the file. It is on this report that I base my assertion of conspiracy and collusion between the Civil Service Commissioner and the minister. The following statement appears in the report:

> I can only, therefore, conclude that whoever had the file held it until the looked for communication of the department to suspend action arrived.

On October 10, 1928, a request came to suspend action still further. Apparently this file had been held for the express purpose of making it impossible for the commission to function and administer the act which they were sworn to administer, and yet one of the commissioners endorses on the file:

> I accept responsibility for holding this file in my office.
> J.E.T.

Mr. POULIOT: Was the post office closed in the meantime?

Mr. CLARK: If the hon. member would exercise just a little discretion—

Mr. POULIOT: It is just for my information.

Mr. QUINN: Read the statute.

Mr. CLARK: I do not mind for one moment any member of this house asking me a question, and I would be the first speaker to sit down, but I do protest against such asinine interruptions.

I assume the "J. E. T." is J. E. Tremblay. As I pointed out the other night, that breach of duty is not consistent with the oath of office which appears in schedule A of the act. This oath is as follows:—

> I,..... solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfill the duties which devolve upon me as..... So help me God.

I assume the word to be added there would be "Commissioner".

These matters have been brought to the attention of the government repeatedly during the last few weeks. I no longer appeal to the Postmaster General because not only has he flaunted the provisions of these statutes but he has laughed at the breaches of the statutes and has proceeded to make further breaches, and the government has stood calmly by and endorsed his actions by voting with him. I understand that they are going to send him to France, I believe—

Mr. MANION: To England.

Mr. CLARK: —to England to represent this country. They intend to send as our representative a man who deliberately breaks the statutes and laughs at it as he is doing right now.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not laughing at that.

Mr. CLARK: A representative endorsed by the members of this government. I would plead with the Minister of Finance under whose supervision there comes at least one official, the Auditor General; I would plead with the Prime Minister under whom possibly the Civil Service Commission would come in a case like this: I would plead with the Minister of Justice to take these serious matters under consideration, advise the ministers of the various departments as to their lawful powers under the act and have it made clear to the house what those powers are. If that is done and if the ministers of the crown will take these matters seriously under consideration, it will do a great deal towards satisfying the members of the house and the country at large.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know that one need apalogize for taking part in this discussion. It involves a very important act and one that has been under consideration for some time in the house. If I wanted any further excuse for rising to say a few words, it would be the attitude of the Postmaster General when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) put a perfectly clear question to him, asking him to quote from the statute the section which gave him authority to make the appointment in the Sutton case, namely, that of Crowell. The Postmaster General excuses himself, stating that he is not a lawyer.

Mr. VENIOT: Did he not give another reason also?

Mr. BOYS: If he did, I missed it.

Mr. VENIOT: I said that I was following the practice since 1919 under all governments.

Mr. BOYS: With due respect to the minister, I do not think he has any excuse and I will pass on to discuss that matter in a moment or two. I am a lawyer and I have been a lawyer for a few years.

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad I am not.

Mr. BOYS: I have been a lawyer long enough to learn that the lawyer who always thinks he knows the law, is more or less of a fool. I admit at once I am anything but infallible, but I will go so far as to say that I have endeavoured to understand the provisions of this act by carefully reading the sections, not once but twice or three times, and to ascertain, if I can the authority that is given to ministers of the crown in connection with the act. Having done so, I make this statement with great confidence. When the Postmaster General said that he is not a lawyer and he dose not know where he gets his authority, one would imagine that before he presumed to make an appointment of a temporary character, or any other appointment, he would satisfy himself from the officers in his department that he had that authority and, if he or they were doubtful, he would, as the Minister of Justice suggests, take advice from the Justice department. I agree with the Minister of Justice that I do not think it would be fair to expect him to stand up in the house and, speaking for the government, give an opinion on the spur of the moment, without having an opportunity to consider the matter. I do not know that it has ever been expected of him, but I think it is the duty of a minister in charge of a department to acquaint himself with the provisions of the act and to see where or not the act gives him authority. Having read the act carefully, I state now in my opinion the minister had no authority of any kind, sort or description, to appoint Crowell to the temporary postmastership at Sutton. The sections of the act are quite clear. The Minister of Finance has come to the rescue and I would like to remind him that he was in the house with the Minister of Justice when the Civil Service Act was passed and he supported its provisions. The Minister of Finance rises and says: If a man dies, who is to carry on the business of the office? Is everything to be at a standstill? I can only say to the minister that before he makes such a proposition, he should read the provisions of the act. Let me say to the Minister of Finance and to the Postmaster General that the act provides most amply for the situation that is mentioned. As the Minister of Justice has been kind enough to say that he will take this matter under consideration, and let the house have his opinion, it is just as well that we should spend a few minutes in looking into the features of the act so that not only the ministers, but we members of parliament will know where we stand. We are sometimes asked by returned soldiers as to their rights under the act. Apparently the Postmaster General has one view of their rights under the act, while others have a different view. At the moment I am not going to raise any question as to dismissals; I am not going to suggest that the Postmaster General is doing anything for ulterior purposes. I am going to deal with the provisions of the act, and I think it is high time that members of parliament as well as departmental officials should understand what the act means. If my interpretation of it is wrong, I shall be only too glad to have any sections I have overlooked pointed out to me, and to be put right in the matter, so that in future I shall be able to give advice to anyone who may desire it of me.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I think I should point out that a discussion on the interpretation of certain sections of the Civil Service Act cannot properly come on the item which is now before the committee.

Mr. BOYS: I am quite sure that when I point out the purpose of my observations, the Chairman will no longer suggest that I am out of order. I am endeavouring to discuss the provisions of the act as applicable to the action of the Postmaster General in making an appointment which he had no right to make. Let us take these sections up one by one. I think the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) was a member of the committee when the act was revised; I know I was, and I think I had the pleasure of sitting with him under the chairmanship of the Hon. A. K. Maclean when the act was passed. Section 19, to which the Minister of Finance pledged his assent as a member of the house when the act was passed, reads as follows:

> Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown, board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any employee to a position in the civil service.

Does the Minister of Finance say that that does not cover all positions?

Mr. ROBB: Read the exceptions.

Mr. BOYS: I am going to do so. That is one section he supported and I think that covers all appointments to post offices with the exception of post offices with a revenue under $400. I have in mind the Sutton case where the officer enjoys a salary of over $2,000. But apart from that the act applies to every department of government. That provision states that neither a minister nor the governor in council may make the appointment. Section 20 reads:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided, all appointments to the civil service shall be upon competitive examination under and pursuant to the provisions of this act, and shall be during pleasure.

Is it suggested that that section does not apply to every solitary civil servant to be appointed to any department of government with the exception of some of the cases the Postmaster General has excepted where in his department the offices are under $400? What happens when there is a vacancy? I particularly direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to section 21 and I was surprised to find him, with his experience, and as a supporter of the act, rise and say: What is to happen to the country if a man dies? Is the business of the country to be at a standstill? Does he think his colleague, the Hon. A. K. Maclean, chairman of the committee, was so remiss, careless and inefficient in his work that he never thought out the situation or that the members of the committee did not? Section 21 reads:

> Every deputy head—

My hon. friend, the Postmaster General's deputy head.

> —shall notify the commission of every vacancy in any position in his department immediately after the vacancy occurs, and whenever such vacancy is to be filled, the deputy head shall request the commission to make an appointment.

Does any member suggest that that is not definite? I do not care what the vacancy is for, whether it is on account of death or promotion or resignation or dismissal; that is the section which governs. The deputy makes the request. Then subsection 2 reads:

> The commission shall thereupon appoint the person whose name stands highest upon the commission's list of eligible persons.

The Postmaster General wants to make a distinction. He spoke, I am sure, without consideration and without reading the provisions of the act which govern. Does he suggest there is not a list for every position? I have already eliminated the offices under $400.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not catch the hon. member's point.

Mr. BOYS: Whenever there is a vacancy, it is the deputy head who notifies the commission. Why did my hon. friend say, when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was discussing this, that that applied only to eligible lists? There is an eligible list for every single appointment if there is a veteran who applied and asked to be on that list. If my hon. friend the Postmaster General wants to ask me a question, I shall be delighted. It is information I want.

Mr. VENIOT: I merely wish to say this. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Mr. BOYS: I do not mind in the least.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend has asked me a question. In reply I say that there are not always eligible lists in existence.

Mr. BOYS: I did not say there were.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman said that there was an eligible list for every appointment.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend did not listen to what I said. I said that providing there was a qualified person who wanted to be on that list, and I say it again.

Mr. VENIOT: There may be many qualified people wanting to be on an eligible list, but they are not on because the eligible lists are cancelled every twelve months.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that if a man has a right to be on an eligible list and applies to be put on, he is put on, and that eligible list has to be considered by the commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Only for one year.

Mr. BOYS: It is renewed.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is not renewed except by examination.

Mr. BOYS: There is one sure thing, and that is that there was an eligible list in the Sutton case, which my hon. friend knew all about and disregarded. In case there is no such list for the class, what is to happen under the act? It states:

> The commission shall forthwith hold an examination and, if necessary to prevent any serious interference with the public business—

I would like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to get this:

> —and, if necessary to prevent any serious interference with the public business, but not otherwise, may fill the position at once by making a temporary appointment as prescribed herein.

The minister would suggest: Who is to carry on the business of the country? The act provides for that very case and states that if there is any urgency, not the Postmaster General, not his deputy head, but the Civil Service Commission, and the Civil Service Commission alone, shall make the appointment, and the business of the country goes on.

Subsection 3 of section 21 reads:

> Except as to appointments to positions in the head-quarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

I almost think my friend the Postmaster General would agree with that provision. I took the view when acting as a member of the committee which considered the act in 1919 that in the event of a vacancy occurring let us say in the county of Simcoe, in a post office, in any of the towns or villages, a man should not be brought in from Toronto or Ottawa or some other place and take that position, and I had the honour of moving that subsection myself, and since then the appointments have been given to residents of the locality.

I pass on to the lists of applicants. I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) cannot follow all this at the moment, but when he comes to consider it, I trust he will do me the honour to think over what I am about to say. I again say that I may be wrong, but I have made an honest effort to get at the actual effect of these provisions and the conclusion that I have reached is this:

In connection with these appointments, there are three lists. They are provided for by section 29 of the Civil Service Act. I had better read subsection 2, so that there may be no room for doubt:

> The commission shall prepare and maintain a special list of persons in receipt of pensions by reason of their services in the war who
> (a) have from causes attributable to such service lost capacity for physical exertion to an extent which makes them unfit efficiently to pursue the avocations which they were pursuing before the war;
> (b) have not been successfully reestablished in some other avocation; and
> (c) desire to be placed on such list.

That is what I was referring to when I addressed myself to the Postmaster General, that they would be put on if they had expressed the desire to be placed on such list.

Mr. VENIOT: That applies to returned soldiers.

Mr. BOYS: I quite agree that it does.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman was talking a little while ago about applicants generally.

Mr. BOYS: No, I am talking about these special lists. Whether you call them two lists, or whether you want to regard the first two lists as really one list, and put them in a special class, I care not. Then there is another list, and rightly or wrongly the commission have adopted this construction of the act, and if they are wrong it is high time they were put right. If my hon. friend the Postmaster General or any other member of the house does not agree with the provisions of this act, the proper course to pursue is to amend the portions which are objectionable, and make them conform to what we want but so long as those provisions are in the act, they are the law of the land and they must be obeyed.

I come to the next class, and this is perhaps where the Postmaster General and some of us may be at issue in connection with the Sutton case and other cases.

The next is a list of returned men who have served and have the qualifications mentioned in the act, regardless of disability and regardless of reestablishment; in other words, if they have no disability and regardless of the fact that they have been fully reestablished, so long as they come within the class mentioned in the act namely, veterans, they are put on the third list, which has precedence over all civilians. I do not know whether the Postmaster General agrees with that, but I make that assertion. The Postmaster General shakes his head.

Mr. VENIOT: I say we do not disagree.

Mr. BOYS: We do not disagree. If my hon. friend says that seriously, then how in the name of goodness he failed to appoint Hill, a returned man, to the Sutton post office, and a man from that locality, I cannot understand. A letter of the Postmaster General was read in this house asking whether this man Hill had been fully reestablished. The Postmaster General now agrees with me, that whether or not he had been reestablished it does not make a bit of difference.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say that as regards reestablishment.

Mr. BOYS: Let us understand each other.

Mr. VENIOT: I still hold to the reestablishment.

Mr. BOYS: I have made it plain that the first list, or a double list if you choose to call it that, comprises the two classes, the disabled class and the class that are not fully reestablished. I have then said, and to this the minister gives his assent—if this is a misunderstanding, let us put it right—that there was another eligible list of veterans who were fully reestablished and who had no disability, and who were given preference over any civilians if they were qualified. I have quoted the sections of the act on that point. I do not want to be rude at all, but I would ask the Postmaster General now that I have re-stated my position whether he agrees with that position or not.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the best answer I can give would be to allow the hon. gentleman to go on and make his statement, because when he asks a question and I answer it, he turns my answer the other way. I am satisfied to allow him to go on.

Mr. BOYS: If I wanted to discuss the turning question, I would know where to go for instruction.

Mr. VENIOT: And you would be an apt scholar.

Mr. BOYS: We will leave that sort of thing out of this discussion. I want to say to my hon. friend that I am not doing this vindictively at all. I wish to know for my own information, and further I think it is desirable that the house should know just what the effect of these provisions is.

I say that that is the third list. Then comes the fourth list, which is a list of civilians, or returned men, if you will, who have no special qualifications and are not on any special list. Appointment from that list goes by merit, the one with the highest marks being selected. That being so, let me apply it to the Sutton case, because I have had the opportunity of reading that case and I know a little about it —many of the other files I have not read and I do not wish to discuss cases that I have no knowledge of. In the Sutton case you had two applicants. You had Crowell, who was not a returned man. I am not going to discuss whether his qualifications were as good as Hill's or not, because that might be a controversial question. I will admit for the purpose of this argument that he had the qualifications. I am sure that the Postmaster General will admit from the evidence on the file that the returned man, Hill, had the necessary qualifications. The only point which he raised in his correspondence was whether Hill was fully reestablished. I say now that that had nothing whatever to do with it. It did not make any difference whether he was reestablished or not, because he belonged to the third class, and being a returned man he was entitled under the act to the appointment over any civilian. I say to the Postmaster General, if my construction is right—and until we get an opinion from the Minister of Justice, I will certainly assert my opinion against that of the Postmaster General, who says that he does not know where he gets his authority; I have quoted the sections to substantiate my contention—and with that law on the statute book the Postmaster General has put Crowell in that office and has left him there two years, though Hill had a certificate from the Civil Service Commission, they being the only ones who could make the recommendation and issue the certificate. The Postmaster General has utterly disregarded that certificate and the provisions of the act, and has left Crowell in that office now for two years without any authority whatever.

Now, that raises a further point. Where does he get the right to pay him? In the first place, if he is a temporary employee, there is not a scratch of the pen in this act from beginning to end which gives the Postmaster General or any officer of his authority to make temporary appointments. I use the word "temporary" technically. There is a difference between a temporary appointment, and an appointment to fill a vacancy. It is only right that emergency cases should be dealt with. There might be in St. John, if you will, or in Barrie, if you will, a vacancy which requires to be filled immediately, and there is no doubt that under the act—it only shows how thoroughly the matter was considered—the superintendent or inspector in charge has the power to appoint under section 39, subsection 1. It reads:

> When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa, the responsible agent or officer of the department—

Does my hon. friend suggest that that is his deputy or anyone else in his department at Ottawa? Does he not admit at once that that has relation to the officer in charge of the department in the locality in question?

> —requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employees, and the said agent or officer in each case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed.

That is for a period of only thirty days. Let us read subsection 2:

> No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission.

Not the Postmaster General, not his deputy either.

Mr. VENIOT: For the sake of information—

Mr. BOYS: I am glad I am interesting the Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: You are wrong; that is why I am interested. Do you apply that to the Sutton post office?

Mr. BOYS: I certainly would apply it to the Sutton post office.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me continue. Do you apply that to the general run of employment at the Sutton post office?

Mr. BOYS: What is the sense of talking about the general run of employment in the Sutton post office. We are discussing not some person that sweeps the office; we are discussing the postmaster of that office, nobody else.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. BOYS: In the capacity of a juryman or a member of this house?

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to know from my hon. friend if he submits that the Postmaster General is governed by the Civil Service Act or by the Post Office Act.

Mr. BOYS: Both of course where the provisions are applicable. But I am sure my hon. friend, as an experienced lawyer and counsel, knows that the provisions dealing with this matter in the Post Office Act, under which act we used to operate, have all been repealed and the only law now which deals with these matters is the Civil Service Act. Prior to 1919 the Post Office Act governed. I say there is no power, and I want to distinguish between temporary employees and extra assistance. There is the authority to appoint contained in the section I have quoted. I trust the officer of the Postmaster General who sits beside him to assist in the passage of his estimates will pay attention to this and perhaps before the discussion is over he will be able to show the minister where his authority is to be found. I am open to conviction, I am anxious to get from him what he considers to be the law in this regard and if he can refer me to anything to contradict what I have stated, by all means let him do so and I shall be glad to read the sections and revise my view, if necessary. We have a vacancy which requires emergency treatment. There is authority, not for the Postmaster General, not for any officer in Ottawa, but for the responsible officer in charge of the locality to appoint to the vacancy a person for a period of thirty days, and no longer.

Dealing specifically with Sutton—not because that is the only case, there are many others, but there is nothing like taking a concrete case on which to base one's argument—a man has been appointed there as temporary postmaster; that appointment has been made by the Postmaster General without any authority whatever under this act and without authority to pay him. Under section 42:

> Temporary employees shall be paid only out of moneys specially voted by parliament for the purpose.

I ask the Postmaster General—if he does not want to answer now he may do so later on—whether or not Mr. Crowell's salary appeared in the estimates last year, and whether the payment of his salary was authorized.

Mr. VENIOT: It is authorized under the general vote.

Mr. BOYS: I think of $240,000. This is a matter the public accounts committee might well be asked to deal with and have the Auditor General come before them to show how in the world, with these provisions before him, he ever passed that payment. I am most emphatic in my contention that the Postmaster General had no right to make that appointment under this act.

There is the situation. Without prolonging the matter, having dealt with these clauses, I should like before I sit down to ask the Postmaster General to kindly come to-morrow prepared to answer what I have said. If he is not a lawyer as he states and cannot tell us at once, and if he admits that although he is Postmaster General he does not understand the provisions of the act which govern him, I ask that he come to-morrow fully advised upon the matter, either by his own officers or by the Department of Justice, and tell the house where he got the authority to make the appointment he made in the Sutton case—and in many others like it—even for thirty days. He has not the right to do it for thirty days, to say nothing of two years. From my knowledge of the Postmaster General I do not think he wishes to fly in the teeth of the statute. Possibly he thinks he has this right. But if he finds he has not, let him admit it, and in future carry on the work of the department having regard to the provisions of the act under discussion.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in an attempt to interpret the act as my hon. friend has been doing. He is a lawyer I know—

Mr. BOYS: Not infallible.

Mr. VENIOT: —of good standing in his profession. I have often listened to lawyers interpreting statutes to suit their case, and I fear that is what the hon. gentleman has been trying to do. I say that notwithstanding all the confidence I have in him.

Mr. BOYS: Kindly answer the argument; that is the point.

Mr. VENIOT: I say that because if the act is applied in the way the hon. gentleman says it should be, then the whole of the public business would be held up.

Mr. BOYS: Not at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. VENIOT: I make the statement. It is for you to reason why.

Mr. HANSON: It is for you to prove it.

Mr. BOYS: I say this to my hon. friend. Business certainly will be held up by pursuing the course which is now being followed. If the Civil Service Commission make appointments to various offices, and the Postmaster General will not allow the appointees to take office, undoubtedly the business of this country will be held up.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope the two hon. gentlemen who have been discussing this act and interpreting it will let their memory go back to 1919.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman just be courteous enough to hold his speech. Let me go back to 1919 and follow up what has been done since that time, I can show that all those whom I came after in the Post Office Department pursued the very same practice that I am following. If the law was wrong—

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Murphy did not. In the Norton case he did not.

Mr. VENIOT: If the law as interpreted by my hon. friend was in existence at that time then all these appointments have been illegal. I am not the only one who has made illegal appointments, if such be the case. The point I wish to make is this. When I came into office, and I found it being operated as it was in 1919, I never thought for a moment that it was necessary for me to undertake to give an interpretation of the Civil Service Act in making temporary appointments, when everyone who had preceded me in the office had been carrying on in the same manner in regard to such appointments. That is why I continued as I did in regard to temporary appointments. And I still maintain that, that practice having been observed since 1919, blame should not be heaped entirely upon my shoulders for having followed it. If, however, the practice is wrong, then both hon. gentlemen have done their duty in bringing the matter to the attention of the house so that, if wrong, it can be righted.

Mr. BOYS: Will not my friend admit that the construction I place on the right of veterans who are not disabled, and so forth, is the construction placed upon the act by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. VENIOT: I will not admit that.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend will not say it is not?

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman will ask the Civil Service Commission they will tell him that they have rulings on the point from the Department of Justice with reference to reestablishment.

Mr. CLARK: That is only with regard to disabled men.

Mr. BOYS: I would ask the Postmaster General to be good enough to produce those rulings for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: Let the commission produce them.

Mr. BOYS: You can easily get them.

Mr. VENIOT: No. I do not think it is fair that I should be asked to obtain information which should be produced by another department. Let the heads of the departments concerned produce the information.

Mr. BOYS: Does not the Postmaster General himself wish to know what the ruling is with respect to the act that guides him?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may say that I propose to find out all the rulings that have been given in connection with this matter, and I shall be glad to see that my hon. friend gets them.

Mr. CLARK: I think they are already tabled.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There may have been others.

Mr. BOYS: This is another ruling.

Mr. CLARK: What is the Postmaster General's interpretation as to the right of a returned soldier, not disabled, and possibly fully reestablished, as compared with that of the civilian?

Mr. VENIOT: I will not give any interpretation of that since the Minister of Justice has undertaken to obtain all the rulings and interpretations issued in the past by his department. When they are produced we shall get it right.

Mr. CLARK: Has the minister, in connection with some of the appointments which have been made by him, refused to give a preference to a fully reestablished soldier, not disabled over a civilian.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot answer that offhand; I shall have to go to the record.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister admit that he did it in the Sutton case?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no appointment yet in the Sutton case.

Mr. BOYS: Temporary?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, temporary.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has given a preference there, in his own personal appointment, over a reestablished soldier.

Mr. VENIOT: There was no returned soldier applying at the time the temporary apppointment was made.

Mr. CLARK: That is because the minister made the appointment before the applications were called for.

Mr. VENIOT: Someone had to take charge of the place and run it; it could not run itself.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a few words to say on this matter. I heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) say this afternoon that he wished to have the will of parliament expressed; I think it is rather the wish of the opposition that he wants to see fulfilled. I do not understand how it can be said that persons who have been appointed temporarily by the Postmaster General, pending permanent appointment by the Civil Service Commission, should not be paid. In my opinion the most important thing is to have the office running continuously. Suppose a postmaster dies or is unable to fulfil his duties; surely it is the duty of the Postmaster General to prevent what I may call a break in the service rendered by that particular post office; and to this end he must appoint someone temporarily to carry out the duties of the office pending appointment by the Civil Service Commission, and the person in charge shall be paid for performing such service.

We have heard a lot this afternoon about the Civil Service Act. I have here the French text of the act, chapter 22 of the revised statutes of 1927; and there is another act also which is of utmost importance in this connection, and which has been overlooked by all hon. gentlemen on the other side ever since they began discussing the estimates of the Post Office Department. I refer to the Post Office Act. If I understood what my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard said this afternoon, the minister has nothing to do in his department. For example, according to the hon. gentleman, in the event of a vacancy occurring it should be filled temporarily by a district superintendent, who would report to the Postmaster General advising him accordingly, and if that temporary appointment were not satisfactory, then the Postmaster General would advise his officer of his dissatisfaction and would cancel the appointment and make another. This, it seems to me, is the very reverse of what should be done. Under the statute the power is not given primarily to the subordinate, the employee, the officer of the department; it is vested in the minister who is at the head of all authority in the department. This is how I understand the law in this matter and I think it is but fair; it is common sense; otherwise we should have a state of insubordination.

There is another point to be considered: When there are two acts dealing with the same subject we must take those acts jointly in order to understand the intent of parliament. This is a principle which is understood not only by lawyers but even by ordinary business men in the country. Now here is a point of considerable importance in relation to this question. According to sections 19, 20 and 21 of chapter 22, the Civil Service Act, who is supposed to instruct the Civil Service Commission as to whom they are to appoint in case a vacancy occurs? Let us take the case of a postmaster in some village or town: he dies; suppose it is deemed urgent to appoint a successor immediately so that there may be no break in the continuity of the service. The question is, who will tell the Civil Service Commission what man is to replace temporarily the late postmaster?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond West-Cape Breton): Taschereau.

Mr. POULIOT: St. Peter of Cape Breton. My hon. friend usually has very much brains in his hand.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond West-Cape Breton): I carry as much in my hands as my hon. friend does in his head.

Mr. POULIOT: If I were a teacher and the hon. member my pupil I would send him to the tail of the class. But to resume my point. Suppose the postmaster dies in such a case as I have suggested. I ask, who will give an eligible list to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond West-Cape Breton): Taschereau.

Mr. POULIOT: I see my hon. friend wants to change his leader.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond West-Cape Breton): No; we will accept Taschereau as a subordinate.

Mr. POULIOT: If I may be allowed to proceed, I will repeat the question: Who will instruct the the Civil Service Commission as to the person temporarily to replace the deceased or retired postmaster? That is a problem. I think the Postmaster General has been within his rights in making temporary appointments even in cases coming under the Civil Service Act for permanent appointment. In section 7 of chapter 161 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, I find the following:

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of the act,

(a) establish and close post offices and post routes. . . . .

He has that power.

(b) remove or suspend any postmaster or other officer or servant of the post office;

(c) enter into and enforce all contracts relating to the conveyance of the mails, or other business of the post office;

There are several sections relating to postage, money orders and so on and then follows a very important section which has been overlooked by hon. gentlemen opposite:

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act,

(x) make such regulations as he deems necessary for the due and effective working of the post office and postal business and arrangements, and for carrying this act fully into effect.

2. Every such regulation shall have force and effect as if it formed part of the provisions of this act.

That is the law. The Postmaster General is given power to do certain things according to the act and where the act is not complete, where something is missing from the act, he is empowered to make regulations to provide for such special cases. That has been done by the ministers of several governments, Tory as well as Liberal. I heard my hon. friend opposite say that the present Postmaster General is taking his lead from the Tory party; that is easy to understand, because that act was adopted under the Tory government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends should not laugh; I am very serious. The actions of the various ministers under this law show how they all have interpreted it, and it seems very clear to me.

I will not delay the committee longer; I simply wanted to draw attention to the fact that the Postmaster General has been following the law, and no one can blame him for having done so.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend has the statute there; can he point to any section in the act which gives the right of appointment to the Postmaster General or his deputy? Can my hon. friend read any section of the act which is in conflict with the sections I quoted, which were very distinct?

Mr. POULIOT: I quoted the subsection which empowers the minister to make regulations.

Mr. BOYS: Does my hon. friend suggest that the act which gives the minister power to make regulations gives him power to make such regulations in violation of the provisions of the act? As a lawyer he would never say anything like that.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not in violation of the act. The minister is head of the department. . . . .

Mr. BOYS: He can make regulations for the enforcement of the act, but not in disregard of it. Read the act and see what it says.

Mr. POULIOT: I will read it again for the benefit of my hon. friend:

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act,

(x) make such regulations as he deems necessary for the due and effective working of the post office and postal business and arrangements, and for carrying this act fully into effect.

The second subsection is very important also:

2. Every such regulation shall have force and effect as if it formed part of the provisions of this act.

Mr. BOYS: Then may I just crystallize it in this way: Supposing under that section the Postmaster General or any other minister made a regulation which is in conflict with the act itself; which would govern, the regulation or the act?

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend has not proved that the minister made a regulation of that kind.

Mr. BOYS: I am quite confident he did not do so; if he did so I say he had not the power.

Mr. POULIOT: My point is that in the Civil Service Act there is no specific provision for post offices, but such provision is contained in the Post Office Act—

Mr. BOYS: Does my hon. friend say that the appointment of a postmaster is not an appointment under the Civil Service Act, and provided for by that act? Does my hon. friend suggest that the minister can make a regulation in conflict with the provisions of the act? Knowing my hon. friend as I do I venture to say that he will not make such a statement on the floor of this house as a lawyer and on his responsibility as a member.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend knows very well that the Civil Service Act applies to all the departments in certain matters, but in the Civil Service Act there is no mention of postmasters.

Mr. BOYS: The act says "appointments"; the filling of a vacancy in a post office is an appointment and therefore comes under the act.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but there is a great distinction to make between permanent and temporary appointments; they are not the same at all. If the minister takes it upon himself to appoint a man to a permanent position which is not under his jurisdiction I believe that is contrary to the provisions of the act; but he has the right to appoint acting postmasters—

Mr. BOYS: Who?

Mr. POULIOT: The Postmaster General.

Mr. BOYS: Will my hon. friend read any section of the act to support that statement? I have read the sections which show that the Civil Service Commission must make such an appointment. I ask my hon. friend to help me and to help the house by reading any section of that act which says the Postmaster General or any minister can make such an appointment.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will ask my hon. friend to read the section forbidding the minister to do so.

Mr. BOYS: I have read the section, which says that all these appointments whether temporary or otherwise must be made by the Civil Service Commission. My hon. friend has asked me to read it again, and I will do so. My hon. friend has the statute there, and he might follow me to make sure I do not leave out any words, as has happened before:

19. Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown, board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any employee to a position in the civil service.

Does my hon. friend think there is any doubt about that?

Mr. POULIOT: My contention is that it is the spirit and the letter of the law that no "permanent" appointment under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission may be made by the minister.

Mr. BOYS: While the hon. member admits that a permanent appointment cannot be made, does he suggest that a temporary appointment can be made by the minister or his deputy?

Mr. POULIOT: Surely.

Mr. BOYS: Where is the section?

Mr. POULIOT: I have read it twice but I will read it again so that the hon. member for North Simcoe can go to school with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Section 7 of the Postal Service Act reads as follows:

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act,

(x) make such regulations as he deems necessary for the due and effective working of the post office and postal business and arrangements, and for carrying this act fully into effect.

Mr. CLARK: Where does that say anything about making appointments?

Mr. POULIOT: I will illustrate my viewpoint for the children. Suppose a postmaster dies, who is notified?

An hon. MEMBER: The undertaker.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, it is not in the act; it is perhaps an appendix to the act. When a postmaster dies the assistant is supposed at once to notify the superintendent of the postal district—I think that is the way it goes—and then the district superintendent writes to the department and the minister is notified. In some cases the assistant may act as the acting postmaster or postmistress, but sometimes the assistant has no knowledge of the post office. In other cases the assistant has carried on the work of the post office while the postmaster did nothing. The department is the first to be notified of the vacancy. There is no provision in the act which says that the district superintendent should notify the Civil Service Commission of the death of a person in charge of a post office. In these cases the minister has to exercise a certain amount of discretion to see that the work of the post office is not disturbed through the death of the person in charge, and that is why the Postmaster General has to appoint someone as acting postmaster before the Civil Service Commission makes the final appointment. This may take some time and my friends on the other side of the house seemed to be very much surprised and scandalized because a file was left for some time in a drawer of the desk of one of the civil service commissioners. I have a letter which I keep as a curiosity writen to me by a gentleman, whom I shall not name, in answer to a letter of mine written ten years before. It is possible for a file to be left in a drawer without any intention of causing trouble to anyone, and I think it is unfair to use such strong language against the Civil Service Commission for a mere trifle.

Personally I am not in favour of the Civil Service Commission appointing public servants, but I do think that they will always be very helpful in holding examinations to see that people are qualified for certain positions. I believe the commissioners are competent men and are doing as well as could be expected when we consider the large amount of work which has to be done by them. The only reflection which has been cast upon the present commissioners is in respect to the Sutton case, and this matter has been fully discussed in the house.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to refer my hon. friend to a certain section of the act. I did not read this section myself, because I did not think that anyone would take the position that while the Civil Service Commission had the sole right to make permanent appointments the minister or his deputy might make temporary appointments. I gather that my hon. friend takes that position, and I think that it would be advisable to have the record complete by including this section. Section 38 of the Civil Service Act reads as follows:—

When, from a temporary pressure of work, extra assistance is required in any branch of the civil service, the commission may, on the written report of the deputy head that such extra assistance is required, authorize the employment of such number of temporary employees as are required to carry on the work.

2. The commission shall establish lists of persons eligible for such temporary employment.

3. Temporary employment in the civil service shall be authorized only for such time, not exceeding six months, as the commission deems necessary.

There is the law. Does the hon. member suggest that the minister can take any action which would be in conflict with the provisions of the statute?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That does not apply to the position of postmaster.

Mr. VENIOT: That applies to assistance required in large offices.

Mr. BOYS: That is not the point which has been raised. If my hon. friend had been listening he would have heard me deal with that section. I was dealing with the argument of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), that there was authority vested in the minister to make temporary appointments. There is not one word in this act from beginning to end which says that the minister has the right to make an appointment of any kind, nor has he the right to employ extra assistance. The officers of his department in the locality may do that, but the minister has not that right.

Mr. POULIOT: I would like to ask my hon. friend another question, because I am very much interested in discussing this matter. The people who are appointed as acting postmasters do not come under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BOYS: They are temporary employees.

Mr. POULIOT: When a man asks for an appointment to a position which comes under the provisions of the Civil Service Act he does so at his own risk. When the decision of the minister—

Mr. BOYS: They cannot appoint him.

Mr. POULIOT: —is confirmed by the Civil Service Commission then he comes within the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BOYS: Under the act he can neither appoint him nor pay him.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the contention of my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: It is not simply my opinion; it is so provided by the act, the terms of which are very plain; and I know when my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, reads them, he will agree with me. Is there any doubt about this?—

Temporary employees shall be paid only out of moneys specially voted by parliament for the purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not the English text of the statute. I have the French text.

Mr. BOYS: I would take a chance of my hon. friend's knowledge of English.

Mr. POULIOT: The word "auxiliaire," meaning extra assistance, is used. It does not mean in the sense of acting in another man's place because an acting officer is one who replaces temporarily the person for whom he is acting. When we speak of "auxiliaires" we speak of people who come to assist in his work the officer in charge. That makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. BOYS: Section 39 governs that. Let my hon. friend read it and take whichever view he likes. We should both content our souls for the present and wait for the pronouncement of the Minister of Justice. When we were promised that, I made up my mind that I would say no more at present, but I like a little dialogue with my hon. friend and I was tempted to continue.

Mr. POULIOT: I like it myself, but I stick to my contention. To sum up, the last sections referred to by my hon. friend from Simcoe apply to extra assistance, auxiliairies, people who come to assist the man who is in charge and not to acting officers. When a man is appointed temporarily as acting postmaster, he does not come under the Civil Service Act, but is appointed by the minister for a special purpose and for a particular length of time, and when he is so appointed by the minister he cannot say he is there for good, because another appointment can be made by the Civil Service Commission. I have endeavoured to make myself as clear as possible, and while our views may differ, I like to discuss matters on such a high plane with my hon. friend from Simcoe.

Mr. BOYS: It is entirely mutual.

Mr. JONES: When my time expired earlier this afternoon, I was discussing a letter from Mr. Herwig to the Postmaster General, dated October 4, 1928. It reads:

We appreciate the fact that this case has been pending a very long time. We are convinced, however, that he should be regarded as eligible and given the appointment in accordance with the spirit of the Civil Service Act.

That is the opinion of Mr. Herwig, of the Service Bureau, Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

In reply to this the secretary—and I presume it must be the secretary of the Postmaster General as the letter is from his office—writes as follows:

Mr. J. C. G. Herwig,
Service Bureau, Canadian Legion of the B.E.S.L.,
P.O. Box No. 384, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

Your favour of the 4th instant re the Norton postmastership, reached here during the absence of the Postmaster General.

Same will be submitted to him immediately on his return to the office and will receive the most serious consideration.

L. D. Theriault,
Secretary.

Then we have a memorandum dated October 20, 1928, from the Postmaster General to his deputy, as follows:

If not already rejected, notify commission of rejection of certificate in favour of Ward.

That is the whole of that memorandum. The next letter following this is dated October 25, 1928, to the Secreraty of the Civil Service Commission, Ottawa, as follows:

Re Norton:

Dear Sir:

The Postmaster General has given attention to the above-mentioned postmastership, in regard to which a certificate was issued by the Civil Service Commission on the 30th July, 1924, on behalf of Mr. George Ward, returned soldier.

In this connection, I beg to inform you that Mr. Ward is hereby rejected as unsuitable under section 24 of the Civil Service Act, and to state that with a view to making another selection, the vacancy will be advertised in the very near future.

This is as far as I intend to carry this case along at the present time. The vacancy was again advertised, and Mr. Ward, the same returned soldier, and Mr. William E. Harmer, another returned soldier, made application, but still the office at Norton is being occupied by acting postmaster W. E. Reynolds. I wish to close this matter of the Norton post office by saying that the Postmaster General has disregarded the provisions of the law of this country and, in particular, the Civil Service Act.

The minister stated earlier this afternoon that he has carried on in the same way as his predecessors. The Hon. Charles Murphy, who was Postmaster General for Canada in a former Liberal government, let this matter stand, and recognized the application of Mr. Ward from 1922 to 1925. The present Postmaster General is always making statements of this kind. There are in the file statements and letters under his own signature which are absolutely untrue and the Postmaster General knows that himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. JONES: Yesterday the Postmaster General made a statement in regard to the returning officers. I did not intend to mention this, but it does not do to let the hon. gentleman away with all these wild statements. One would think he was in some back district in the province of New Brunswick addressing an audience when he spoke in the House of Commons yesterday afternoon. He said that the Tory party had dismissed every returning officer in the last election. I want to point out to the Postmaster General that that statement is absolutely false, because three, if not four or five in the province from which he comes, New Brunswick, were returning officers under his own government in the previous election. I leave the matter as it is at present before the committee, and I think it has been proven absolutely by many cases that the Postmaster General is not fitted for the position he occupies at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: I want to direct the attention of the committee to the incidents connected with the appointment of the postmaster at Oliver, British Columbia, to which passing allusion was made by the Postmaster General yesterday afternoon. The late postmaster at that place desired to resign last fall, on being appointed customs officer at the neighbouring port of Osoyoos. The vacancy was therefore advertised by the Civil Service Commission and there were three applicants, all of them being returned soldiers. The post office inspector at Vancouver interviewed these three applicants and reported on them to the Postmaster General. He placed them in a certain order of merit. The first name that appears we can set aside, because, as the inspector points out, his military discharge papers were not in order. The second applicant is a man called Anderson, a Conservative, a storekeeper in Oliver since its inception and a responsible man. He intimated to the inspector that if appointed it was his intention to dispose of his stock, and alter his premises to make them more suitable for a post office. From 1912 to 1915 he had been postmaster at a place called Tow Hill, Graham Island, in British Columbia. The third name on the list was that of a man called Ede, a Liberal, a carpenter who had worked in Oliver in its early days, had moved away, and had recently returned to live in Oliver. In due course, in fact on the 8th of January of this year, the Civil Service Commission issued a certificate of appointment to Anderson. The form has frenquently been referred to here. It refers to Anderson as the appointee and draws his attention to section 13 of the Civil Service Act, but like others which have been drawn to the attention of the committee, it does not draw Anderson's attention to the ruling of the Department of Justice.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the hon. member reading from the certificate that was found on the file?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: The certificate found on the file is not the same class of certificate that is sent to the appointee. All the certificates sent to the appointees have that ruling printed on them and do not go to the Department.

Mr. STIRLING: So that the file which has been brought down is not an actual copy of the original papers?

Mr. VENIOT: What you are reading is only notice to the department of his appointment, not a notice to the appointee. The latter is different.

Mr. STIRLING: But surely these papers that are brought down for the use of the house purport to be exact copies of the original papers.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but there is an error there.

Mr. STIRLING: Does my hon. friend say there is an error here?

Mr. VENIOT: No, no. The hon. gentleman is reading from a certificate which he says went to the appointee. That certificate never went to the appointee. The Civil Service Commission sends to the appointee a certificate which is somewhat different from the one which it sends to us notifying us that an appointment has been made. On the certificate sent by the Civil Service Commission to the appointee is printed the ruling of the Justice department, but it is not on the one sent to us.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, in this file which was brought down with reference to the Oliver matter, this certificate appears which purports to be a copy of what was sent to Anderson.

Mr. VENIOT: It does not. The hon. gentleman is wrong. He is making an unfair statement; he is not stating the case right.

Mr. STIRLING: Then I would ask the Postmaster General to state it. Where is the mistake?

Mr. VENIOT: There are two forms of certificate. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) has a copy of the certificate which is sent to the appointee, I believe, judging by the colour; it is a purple certificate. I think that is the one that is sent to the appointee.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is a notice of appointment to the postmaster. It is not a certificate.

Mr. VENIOT: It contains the ruling of the Justice department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It does not contain it all, but only part of it as has been pointed out several times.

Mr. VENIOT: It contains what the commission thought was sufficient to guide the appointee.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know about that.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the use of making statements that are not according to the facts?

Mr. STIRLING: I received these papers which set out what has happened with regard to this matter, and I certainly took it that this paper, which is called a certificate of appointment, was a copy of what was sent to the man.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not.

Mr. STIRLING: If the Postmaster General says that that is not the case, we will drop that point and pass on, but it seems a most extraordinary thing to hand us a file which purports to be the file connected with the case, but which does not contain the papers which were used in this matter.

Mr. VENIOT: You have everything from the department there.

Mr. STIRLING: Anderson, at all events, receives notice of his selection: I suppose the Postmaster General will agree to that. It is intimated to him that he has been selected. There is a suggestion at least that he will be appointed on probation, and he is told that he will receive instructions as to the date upon which he shall begin his work. I maintain that when a man receives a statement to that effect, his reaction to it is that he has been successful in the examination held by the Civil Service Commission, that he will be appointed on probation and will have to start work on a certain day. That at any rate is what entered Anderson's head. He disposed of his stock, altered his premises, bought certain fixtures, and retained the services of an assistant.

Just a month later, early in February, there is a letter from the Postmaster General to his deputy which refers to the fact that the Postmaster General is in receipt of certain information which shows that Anderson has become the agent or local manager of a telephone company in that place. There is nothing on this file to show what is the source of the Postmaster General's information. It is scarcely likely that the details of the postmastership in a little place like Oliver, three thousand miles from here, would have been told by word of mouth to the Postmaster General, and I cannot help thinking that some communication must have been received by the Postmaster General which does not appear on this file. The deputy head accordingly writes to the superintendent of the postal service at Vancouver, and suggests that some guarded inquiries should be made to ascertain when Anderson took charge of the telephone company. Eventually the Postmaster General receives that information in the form of a communication signed by Mr. Murray of the superintendent's department in Vancouver, confirming the fact that Mr. Anderson has been made agent for the local telephone company, and that he started operations on the 1st of February. I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that ever since Oliver has had a post office the holder of that postmastership has also been agent of the local telephone company. To urge that connection as a good reason for rejecting the selection of the Civil Service Commission is not a reason but a flimsy excuse. It takes six days for a letter to pass betwen Oliver and Ottawa, and a little more than a week after the Postmaster General communicated with his deputy asking him to ascertain details with regard to this telephone position, two letters are written from Oliver to the Postmaster General, which I shall put on record as they are very short. The first one is dated Oliver, February 18, and reads:

The Hon. the Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Honourable Sir:

In behalf of myself and others doing business at Oliver I take the liberty of respectfully requesting you that the post office be not put in with the telephone service, and also desiring that you would favourably consider the application for the postmastership sent in by Mr. H. A. Ede as we believe he is a suitable and competent person for the position.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) A. L. Rhynd.

Then follows a letter dated at Oliver, dated February 19, 1929, to the hon. Postmaster General:

Dear Sir,—

It has always been a bone of contention here, the post office and telephone office in together, the service has been very poor. They are unable to give good service in either line. We understand Mr. Anderson, who has the telephone office, has an application for the post office as well, to which 90 per cent of the pepole here object, I am sure. There is another qualified applicant who we are sure would give good service, a Mr. Ede, who is qualified in every respect. I am sure this will voice the sentiment of a very large majority of the people of this district.

Thanking you for any consideration of this letter, I am,

Yours very truly,
William Foster,
Oliver Confectionery and Tonsorial.

There is no evidence whatever, Mr. Chairman, that the Postmaster General made any attempt to get confirmation of these statements. It would appear therefore that all that is necessary, when the desire for the rejection of a Civil Service Commission appointee is in the mind of the Postmaster General is that he should receive a letter, or perhaps his limit is two, containing any statement the author cares to make, and then the Postmaster General will accept those statements as a reason for the action he takes. Had he taken the trouble to get confirmation of the statements to which I have referred, I think these facts would have been revealed to him: that William Foster is the man who sold a vacant lot next his barber shop to Mr. Ede, and that the writer of the other letter has leased his ten-foot frontage to Mr. Ede, to be used for the new post office. Both of them, one would consider, rather biased witnesses, and I think further inquiry in the locality would have proved to him that these two men, Foster and Rhynd, were about the only two supporters in the whole district that Mr. Ede had.

[Mr. Stirling.]

I suggest that the Postmaster General has set at naught the appointment of Anderson, who was acceptable in the eyes of the minister's own superintendent, and who has appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I do not understand why the Postmaster General should adopt this course. I do not understand why the government should set at naught the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I will say this much for the government, speaking as I do of four or five years' representation of that piece of southern British Columbia: I should be inclined to state that in the matter of these appointments the various departments of this government have been reasonnably fair, have reasonably left partisanship out of their appointments until now, and it has remained for the Postmaster General to spray this poison into that district of British Columbia. I do not know what effect the Postmaster General desires to obtain, but I think I know what the effect of his action will be. He has certainly made it far more difficult for the next Liberal candidate in the riding of Yale to get elected. He has certainly made it more difficult in the whole of souther British Columbia to instil into the minds of the people that this government is desirous of upholding the Civil Service Act. And I can assure him that the people of British Columbia desire to uphold it; they do not wish to see it flouted. And he has set this government at variance with the Canadian Legion. I would draw the attention of the committee to the two closing paragraphs of a letter adressed to the Postmaster General by J. C. G. Herwig, Service Bureau, Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. The letter is dated April 5, 1929. These are the paragraphs to which I refer:

May we ask whether favourable consideration can be given to a claim by Mr. Anderson for reimbursement of expenses? We are sure that anyone applying for a position in the federal service should not suffer loss on that account, particularly after obtaining success in an open competition.

The views of the Canadian Legion in regard to the spirit in which rejections are carried out has already been made known to you. We regret that another case should have arisen where an ex-service man, after considerable delay, has been rejected on the grounds of "unsuitability" without a trial in the position.

That, I think, fairly reflects the opinion of the returned men in Canada, and also I think of the great body of civil servants from the Atlantic to the Pacific; they feel rather more nervous than they did as to the retention of their positions because of the conduct of the Postmaster General.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, I desire to get some more information from the Postmaster General regarding the deficit about which he spoke last night.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps the best way to furnish this information will be for me to read this prepared memorandum which I have received from the office:

Reference by Mr. Stewart (Leeds) on the 1st instant, to the statement contained in the Postmaster General's report of revenue and expenditure and deficit or surplus as the case may be in post office revenue from the year 1868 down to the present, particularly recent years.

Re fiscal year 1921-22

The operations for that year showed a deficit of over $1,500,000 following a surplus of over $1,600,000 the preceding year. This deficit is due entirely to the greatly increased rates of payment to railways for the conveyance of mails which added to the expenditure of that year by over $3,700,000. Had it not been for this extra outlay the operations of the department for the year would have shown a very material surplus.

Those rates were fixed by the railway commission as the result of an application by the railways for increased rates at so much per foot for the use of mail cars.

1922-23

The revenue for this year showed an increase of $2,700,000 over the preceding year. At the same time there was a decrease in expenditure of over $325,000 due largely to downward revisions in rates of payment to railways for conveyance of mails,—

That is in some cases where those downward revisions took place.

—the estimated savings on this account being at the rate of $400,000 per annum.

1923-24

The discontinuance of the use of postage stamps in the payment of war tax on cheques, etc., effective from 1st October, 1923, resulted in a decrease in revenue while the expenditure on account of salaries of postal employees and supplies generally accounted for the reduction in surplus of approximately $600,000.

For the years 1916 to 1924 the figures giving the revenue of the department, included postage stamps used in payment of war tax. Had it not been for this source of income the operations of the department during those years would have shown a decided deficit each year.

1924-25

The revenue during this year was adversely affected by the disruptions of business through the postal strike while the expenditure was correspondingly increased through the employment of additional temporary assistance. During the same year the expenditure was increased on account of payments consequent upon salary revision amounting to over $1,700,000. The surplus in the preceding year of approximately $800,000 being thereby changed to a deficit of over $1,200,000.

1925-26

There was an increase in revenue over the preceding year of more than $2,400,000 due to increases in practically all phases of postal business including adjustments in favour of Canada of postage on parcels from other countries amounting to approximately $300,000 more than in the preceding year. Against this however, must be placed, under the head of salaries and allowances, an item of nearly $500,000 through the post office vote being charged with the expenditure for flat increase which superseded cost of living bonus following salary revision. The bonus had formerly been paid out of a general vote. The salary vote was also augmented by statutory increases of nearly $125,000. Increases in certain other items are practically offset by decreases in the remaining items. The items above enumerated, however, account for the spread of approximately $1,800,000 between the deficit for 1924-25 and the surplus of nearly $525,000 for the fiscal year 1925-26.

1926-27

As stated by the Postmaster General in the house on the 1st instant the letter rate to all places in the North American continent was reduced from three to two cents effective 1st July, 1926, and consequently affected the revenue for nine months of the fiscal year the actual net decrease being about $1,645,000. The decrease would have been much greater had it not been for increased returns from other classes of mail matter and from other postal facilities. On the other hand expenditure was $500,000 higher than the preceding year, consisting largely of statutory increases and additional positions totalling nearly $400,000, also of added expense for mail service and equipment. These items account for the spread of approximately $2,150,000 between the surplus of the preceding year and the deficit in 1926-27.

Compared with the preceding year the increase in revenue was slightly more than offset by the additional expenditure. The increase in expenditure was due mainly to the following items—$600,000 through the flat increase in salary of $120 granted by parliament effective 1st April, 1927; $200,000 for statutory increases, and $109,000 for rural mail boxes (which are paid for as purchased by patrons of rural mail delivery) the balance being due to cost of handling the increased volume of mail and of improved postal facilities generally.

The introduction of two cent postage would have affected the remuneration of postmasters who are paid by a percentage on revenue had it not been for the decision of the government that the salaries of these officers should not be reduced. Otherwise the net revenue would have been improved to the extent of approximately $500,000.

That is to say, an order in council was passed providing that the salaries should remain the same after as before the reduction from three to two cents.

In addition to the information given by the Postmaster General in the house relative to increased expenditures during the fiscal year which ended on the 31st March last, it might be stated that increases in expenditure have occurred under practically every heading due to the general expansion of the service. It is to be understood, of course, that final figures for the year are not yet available and that any amounts quoted are more or less approximate until the accounts can be finally balanced.

That is all the information I have.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose we were considering the first item in vote 314. Shall the item carry? Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The item was called and no one rose to speak, so I declared it carried.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We were only half through the explanation I was asking from the Postmaster General with regard to the financial end of his department. I was referring to the revenues of the department, and the Postmaster General laid a statement on the table. I observe that during recent years the revenue has been steadily increasing, but the Postmaster General spoke about the reduction in postage rates and gave that as a reason for the falling off in the revenue. However, in his report for the year 1928 I find the following statement:

> The net revenue for the year amounted to $30,529,154.76 and the expenditure to $32,379,195.65. This is an increase in the net revenue of $1,150,458.21, instead of the expected decrease due to two cent postage having been in operation for twelve months as compared with nine months of the previous year; and it indicates a marked increase in the volume of all classes of mail matter.

So I take it that after all there was no loss in net revenue through the reduction in the postage rate. As I have said, the statement shows an increase in revenue so I submit that the decrease in postage rate cannot account for the deficit; the larger volume of business seems to have made up for the reduction in rates. Now I would like to ask the Postmaster General in what year the reduction became effective.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it was October 1, 1926.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yet we find the revenue for 1926 $31,024,464.22, as compared with $28,581,992.87 in 1925, so that no loss was sustained through the lowering of the postage rate.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: It became effective only on October 1, 1926. Let me correct that statement; it came into effect on July 1, 1926.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then we find that in 1927 there was a loss in revenue of only $2,000,000 instead of the $6,000,000 stated by the Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say there was a loss of revenue of $6,000,000; I said if there had been no increase in the volume of business, by one fell stroke of the pen the reduction would have been $6,000,000, but there was a large increase in the volume of business.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): So it is quite clear there was no loss of $6,000,000 in revenue.

Mr. VENIOT: No one said there was.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I want that clear, because that was my understanding. Then in 1928 the net revenue was up to $30,529,154.76 and it is estimated that the revenue for the current year will be higher still, so that I submit there has been no loss in revenue sustained through the reduction in the postage rate. What items other than the revenue from the sale of postage stamps produced that total? Is there any revenue from money orders and postal notes?

Mr. VENIOT: There is just the revenue from that source and from the stamps.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Perhaps the Postmaster General can tell us under what headings the net revenue is made up?

Mr. VENIOT: I have here a statement which shows the revenue and expenditure in recent years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am asking for the different sources of revenue; it is all bulked here.

Mr. VENIOT: Our revenue is derived from the sale of stamps, from the commission on post office orders and postal notes, the postage on newspapers, the parcel post, the postage on circular advertising matter and so on and the sale of postal cards. I think that is about all.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All these items, except the commission on postal notes and money orders, would come under the heading of postage, I suppose?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then I suppose there would be really only two headings?

Mr. VENIOT: On page 11 of the report the revenue is given in greater detail:

Postage stamps, postcards, etc., sold	$ 26,200,775	97
Postage paid in cash on newspapers	1,483,317	75
Postage paid in cash on third class (printed) matter	1,158,518	59

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to refer to the matter of salaries paid in the postal department. Could the Postmaster General give the committee the amount of increase he recommended to the Civil Service Commission should be granted to the postal workers?

Mr. VENIOT: Last year I recommended that the minimum and maximum salary should be increased. Speaking from memory, I recommended this year an increase without fixing the amount; I requested the commission to readjust the salaries of the postal workers, postal clerks, and postal porters. I read the reply from the commission the other day in which they said that they did not consider an increase justifiable. I replied to that letter in March, and so far as I know nothing has been done since.

Mr. HEAPS: The increase recommended last year was only $60 per year.

Mr. VENIOT: If my memory serves me rightly I think the amount we recommended would have meant a vote in the estimates amounting to about $260,000.

Mr. HEAPS: But the individual increase would not have been more than $60 per year?

Mr. VENIOT: It would likely be around that figure.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe there was some correspondence tabled this year in relation to that particular question, but I have not had the time to look it up. The minister was good enough to inform the house the other night that he has exerted his very best efforts to obtain an increase for these postal employees, and he also went so far as to say that he had persuaded the government to side with his particular view. When I spoke on this question the other night I expressed some astonishment that the Civil Service Commission had not taken the proper action when the government were so unanimous in their views. It is quite possible that the Civil Service Commission turned it down because the recommendation of the Postmaster General would have meant so little to the men employed in the postal service. I am a very firm believer in the Civil Service Commission, and I would not like to see anything done which would impair the usefulness of that organization. However, the men in the postal department are becoming so disgusted with the actions of the government that they are beginning to ask that the question of salaries be taken out of the jurisdiction of the commission. But we should realize that once we begin to tamper with one of the main functions of that organization it will not be long before the commission will be wiped out of existence.

The Postmaster General has offered these men an increase of $5 per month. Had his recommendation been carried out it would mean they would receive a minimum of $90 per month. I do not think the Postmaster General or any member of this house will say that $90 per month is a decent living wage. Yesterday the Postmaster General, when making a defence of his department, paid a very eloquent tribute to the men and women employed in the department. He said that they were mostly responsible for the efficiency of the department, and I think the men who give such good service to the government and to the people of this country are deserving of at least a decent living wage. The government has not as yet recognized that fact, except for the recommendation of a $5 per month increase.

I would like to read a letter which is characteristic of a number I have received from different parts of this country. This is a letter from an ex-service man in the city of Toronto:

I receive as salary $85 per month. Started to work on the city staff in September 1928; received my appointment latter part of February 1929,—

He then goes on to say that out of the salary of $85 per month a deduction of $8.50 is made, leaving a salary of $76.50, which he receives for his services.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the deduction for?

Mr. HEAPS: He does not say, but I imagine that part of it is for superannuation. The letter continues:

I have a wife and eight children to support on my salary, which as you will see is really only $76.50 per month. Would be indebted to you if you would place these facts before the house as I feel sure that were they aware of the small pittance paid to postal helpers, and the hardships caused through same, a large number of whom are returned men like myself, I have confidence to believe that there is not a member in the house who would not be in favour of granting us a living wage.

Mr. MANION: What is his occupation?

Mr. HEAPS: He is a postal helper.

Mr. ROBB: What is his name?

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think it would be fair to the man to give his name; I will let my hon. friend see the letter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They would dismiss him.

Mr. HEAPS: This man, the father of eight children, has served overseas and a grateful country now rewards him with wages of less than $85 per month. I want to read from another communication which deals more particularly with the Civil Service Commission and its attitude toward the postal employees. This comes from a very high official of the organization and in his communication to me he represents what I believe to be the overwhelming sentiment of those employed in the Post Office Department. He writes:

We despair of ever getting any measure of justice or equity at the hands of the Civil Service Commission. Letter carriers and other postal employees are becoming disgusted waiting for something that does not materialize, and as nothing has been received under the Civil Service Commission since the act was amended in 1919, but a reduction of $156 in their salaries.

Then he goes on:

When we go to the commission with our grievances they never tell us the same story twice. Four years ago they told us if any increase was given us it would have to be given to all the civil service; that the amount would be so large the House of Commons would not vote it. The following year they told us if the government would give them the money they would try and distribute it. What they told us in 1928 you will find on page 2 of our circular letter to members of parliament, dated February 18, 1929. This year they advised our committee not to expect any increase as there were lots of men to be got for what they were receiving now.

In other words, when these men went to the Civil Service Commission this year to ask for an adjustment of their salaries, the reply they received was: "If you are not satisfied with your present condition, there are plenty of men to be obtained for the salaries that you are working for." If that is the way in which the Civil Service Commission handles the employees of the government, it seems to me a change should be made in the personnel of the commission.

The Postmaster General, as I said a moment ago, spoke yesterday in the house of the efficiency of the staff under his control. Nothing is more likely to impair the efficiency of that department than underpaying the men. I do not think any hon. member can expect a man who is working for $85, $90 or even $100 a month to be able to continue to give efficient service. We expect a great deal from those in the employ of the Post Office department. We expect the postmen to be courteous, honest, able to meet the public; we require that they shall be men of good character and physique. They have to go out in all sorts and conditions of weather; yet when the postman comes to our house we can almost tell the time by his knock. It is a sign of ingratitude that in the face of all this talk in parliament of our prosperity and our huge surpluses of revenue over expenditure, we refuse to increase the salaries of hundreds and possibly thousands of men in our employ who find it impossible to live on the wages they receive. I believe I am not doing the Postmaster General an injustice when I say that he recommended an increase of $5 per month to these men, but I want to see him and the government go a little further than that. The least the government can do is to pay to its able-bodied employees a minimum salary of $100 per month as requested by the postal workers in a memorandum to members of the house. I feel rather disappointed at the action of the government and even of parliament, that we can find no means of overcoming the obstacle of the Civil Service Commission to giving the postal workers what they are entitled to. If the government were to insert in the estimates a sum that would allow these men an increase of approximately $120 to $150 a year, parliament, I feel satisfied, would vote it without a dissenting vote. It appears to me that on the present occasion the reason these men are not getting the increase is that parliament is unanimous in its view. When we all agree on a thing, the men apparently cannot get it. If there were a little disagreement on the question, it is possible that the postal employees would get the increase. Will the Postmaster General hold out any hope whatever to the lower paid men in the postal service of receiving a proper reward for the services they render to the people of the Dominion?

Mr. MANION: I wish to say just a few words along the same lines as the observations of my hon. friend. The hon. member for South Wellington in a few very eloquent remarks dealt with this question. He took up the matter with the minister and, after asking certain questions, found out that there were some 10,000 of the lower paid employees. The wages of many of those men would be under $100 a month. One's sympathy goes out to men of that type, who are trying to play the game, trying to be honest and to be worthy of the confidence of the people of the country in classes of service which demand the greatest amount of confidence and honesty. In my own city, for instance, there is no finer group of men than those employed in the Post Office Department, the letter carriers and other postal employees are a very high type of men. Many of them are, of course, reasonably well paid, but the postal helpers and letter carriers certainly deserve the sympathy of the house. I submit to the minister, in view of what has been pointed out by the last speaker as to the unanimous support which this question usually gets in the house—at least the unanimity of views which prevails with respect to it on this side, whether on the part of the group in the other corner or this group here—that the government will have no difficulty in passing such a resolution. They will receive no opposition from our side, and I am sure, if they bring in any such resolution, they will get no opposition over there. Parliament is the high court of the land. The Civil Service Commission, with all due respect—and I am one of those who support it—is not in control of a question like this. This question can be decided by the high court of parliament, by hon. members sitting in this house, and without taking up further time, I think the minister might well consider carrying out the suggestions of the hon. member for South Wellington and the hon. member for North Winnipeg in regard to increasing the salaries of the lower paid men. It might be said to me—and I will say it so that somebody else will not—that I was at one time in a position to have dealt with the matter. I doubt if the minister would have said this, but he knows I was not in office long enough to deal with a question of this sort. I could not have dealt with it during an election without being accused of having ulterior motives and he knows what it is to be accused of that. I appeal to the minister's sense of generosity, and to the government generally, to deal with this question from a generous standpoint. I can bespeak the support of all the members on this side, and I know the minister need not worry about his own.

Mr. VENIOT: It must not be understood that the salary of a postal helper who is receiving $1,020 a year is fixed at that; it ranges from that figure to the maximum, which is $1,440.

Mr. MANION: It takes some years to attain the maximum.

Mr. VENIOT: It increases at the rate of $60 a year. That is the way the Civil Service Commission regulates the matter The salary of a letter carrier begins at a minimum of $1,080 and increases to $1,440, and the salary of a postal clerk goes from $1,080 to $1,740. When they enter the service they enter at a minimum and after a number of years they reach a maximum which is a fairly good wage. My endeavour at the beginning was to increase the minimum and also to increase the maximum. I am not quite sure, but speaking from memory I think I asked that the minimum salary of the postal helper, which is $1,020, be increased by $100, and of course the maximum would also receive that $100 increase. I am speaking from memory, but I think that is about right. I give that information so that the committee will see how the thing works out. The other evening I think I gave the number of employees, namely, letter carriers, 2,710; postal clerks, 3,009; postal helpers, 2,922.

Mr. MANION: Is it not a fact that if the minister or the government brought in an estimate to increase these salaries, irrespective of anything in the Civil Service Act, parliament is supreme and could carry the matter through?

Mr. VENIOT: I think that parliament could, but I cannot lay down a policy for the government in this matter. I would have to have the government state its policy before I could commit myself.

Mr. STEVENS: While on this point, may I draw the minister's attention to the fact that in 1919 parliament voted a bonus for the letter carriers of $480, which, with the standard salary of $720, gave them a total of $1,200 as a minimum. Later on there was supposed to be a stabilization of salary to do away with the bonus, and it was understood that this stabilization would not lower the minimum to this class of workers, as to others, but when parliament did stabilize salaries, the result was that instead of receiving a bonus and salary which amounted to $1,200, the letter carriers received a salary of only $1,020.

Mr. VENIOT: Going back to the old minimum.

Mr. STEVENS: The old minimum was $720.

Mr. VENIOT: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: The government did away with the $480 bonus and fixed the minimum salary at $1,020, with no bonus, making a loss of $180 per annum. The point I am making is that the letter carriers actually suffered a loss of $180 a year in the so-called stabilization.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Only as respects the minimum.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the minimum we are speaking of, and this is the class that is suffering. It is all very well to say that there has been an increase of $60 a year, but with that increase it would take the letter carrier three years before he would reach the $1,200 which he was receiving before the stabilization.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It affected very few in the service.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not think so; there is quite a number. The suggestion has been made to fix the minimum at $1,200 a year, it strikes me as a reasonable request.

Mr. McMILLAN: I am sure that the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Fort William a few months ago, that he had every sympathy with the employees of the Post Office Department and stood solidly behind the Civil Service Commission at all times, except when he was a member of the shadow government—

Mr. MANION: I deny absolutely that I ever interfered at any time with the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McMILLAN: You deny it absolutely?

Mr. MANION: Absolutely.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. McMILLAN: You deny that you ever sent telegrams which secured the dismissal of post office officials in any part of Canada?

Mr. MANION: I deny absolutely that I ever interfered with anybody who was under the Civil Service Commission and that I ever appointed anybody who should have been appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McMILLAN: So far as the expressions of sympathy which we have just heard for the poorly paid class of public officials are concerned, more particularly postal-workers, I have every sympathy with the condition of those who are receiving salaries which do not enable them to sustain themselves and their families in that degree of comfort which we as citizens of this country would all like to see. But, sir, it has been a surprise to me during the four sessions I have sat in this house to observe the silence which has been kept respecting the returns of those who are the real wealth producers of this country. What is the situation? The real wealth producers of this country, in the first place, are the agriculturists, the artisans, mechanics, those who are engaged in the leading industries of this country, and the workingmen of Canada. If you take the year of our highest agricultural production—

Mr. GOTT: Order. The hon. gentleman is getting away from the question.

Mr. McMILLAN: Am I to be called to order, when these post office estimates are up for discussion and hon. members time after time talk about the poorly paid employees in this and other departments, if I endeavour to make a comparison with other poorly paid workers in this country? I was going to say that in the year 1927, which is the last year for which we have the full figures, and the year of our greatest agricultural production, the total agricultural production in this country amounted to $1,780,000,000. In that estimate is counted twice all the agricultural products which are consumed upon the farm in the production of our live stock and live stock products of every kind. When you subtract that amount from the sum total and divide the remainder among 711,090 farmers, which is the number in this country according to the last census—and that does not take in all the small farmers owning one acre or less—you will find that the gross earnings of each individual farmer and his family were less than $2,200 per annum. When you take into account the annual requirements, the necessary farm expenses, interest on investment, et cetera, I invite anyone in this house or out of it to show where the average farmer in Canada is earning to-day over $1,100. When we come to the forty leading industries of this country and divide the total wage and salary bill of their employees amongst their number, according to the returns of 1924, we find that the average wage for the individual worker—not for himself, his wife and family—is $1,104.41. The earnings of the hired male servant and the maid servant on the farm together total $1,103 per annum, so that the average farmer of Canada with his wife and family are only able to earn to-day what his man servant and maid servant are receiving on the average throughout Canada. So when we consider the question of the salaries of our public officials, should not the whole economic system in this country be taken into consideration? Because after all is said and done, the real wealth producers of this country constitute the class upon whom the whole burden in the end must fall. If those who do produce the wealth of the country, are able to retain such a small portion to themselves how under heaven can they afford to pay other people any more?

Mr. VENIOT: I think in reading from my notes I made a mistake, in fact I am sure I did in giving the figures for the postal helpers. I gave the maximum as $1,440; it should be $1,320. For letter carriers I gave the maximum as $1,440; it should be $1,500. The other figures are correct.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Are not those figures even in revised form subject to a diminution of so much per cent by way of compulsory contribution to a superannuation fund?

Mr. VENIOT: All employees of the government who come under the Pension Act contribute 5 per cent.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): So the net is not the figure the Postmaster General has given.

Mr. VENIOT: I have given the minimum and the maximum. Of course it is understood that 5 per cent is deducted for superannuation.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The minimum is that much less.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I think some of us will agree that there is altogether too much truth in what the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has stated. The agricultural people are receiving far less than they should receive, and the employees in industry are also receiving far less than they should receive. I am one of those who believe that we are not going to get very much improvement until we have a pretty complete reformation of the system. I would go further than I fancy my hon. friend from South Huron would go, though I do not think this is the time to discuss these other questions. I would rather emphasize the relation between the low paid employees of the government and the higher paid. We very easily secure additions in salary, for instance, in the case of the deputy ministers—perhaps their salaries are not too great; I am not discussing that, but I do say there is a very wide discrepancy between the higher paid and the lower paid officials. Whatever may be true of agriculturists or those engaged in industry generally, we are dealing now with one particular class of government employees and I think we would do well to consider, not this class in relation to some other group outside, but rather the actual requirements of this class having regard to living conditions as they are to-day.

In that connection I would refer to a document which I think has been quoted before in this discussion. It is a memorandum issued by the Amalgamated Civil Servants. I will quote two or three brief paragraphs.

First of all the question is put as to the cost of living to-day, and some figures are cited that were given before the industrial relations committee of this house. The memorandum then proceeds:

> For our purpose we have taken the figures from The Labour Gazette, which supplies the cost of a weekly budget of staple foods, fuel, light and rent only. It is stated in the Gazette that to estimate the cost of other necessities it is necessary to increase the cost of this budget by 50 per cent. We do not even go as high as this, merely adding 33-1/3 per cent.

Surely, that is a very, very moderate basis on which to go. The argument is concise:

> In 1919 the average cost of living was $22.18 per week, which, plus one-third, amounted to $1,557.81 for the year. Compare this with the $1,312.05 actually received by thousands of civil servants considered to be in the $1,500 maximum class of to-day. Again, in 1920, living costs for the year were $1,794.50, whilst these civil servants received only $1,593.

That is, taking the very lowest minimum figures as put forth in our own Labour Gazette we find that the maximum figure of the postal workers falls far short of the minimum requirement for decent living.

Now, if we in Canada were living in a period of trade depression there might possibly be some reason for this state of affairs, but we are assured by the Minister of Finance that we are living in a period of very great prosperity, and his budget shows a surplus. I would say that under these conditions there is no excuse for permitting such a situation to continue. Let me read another paragraph from this memorandum:

> The average weekly budget over the period 1918-1927 was $21.79, amounting, plus one-third, to $1,510.77, while the average amount actually received by the class of civil servants mentioned was $1,396.11. Thus, these employees have, for ten years, been receiving an average salary less by $114.66, than the average cost of a budget, much less than the cost of a minimum health and decency budget.

So much for the higher paid of the postal helpers. Then comes a very strong plea for the lowest paid employees in the service.

> The main point, however, which we desire to stress most strongly is, that there are many civil servants in receipt of an average salary far below even $1,200 per annum.
> With an average cost of living existing over a period of ten years amounting to $1,510.77 per annum, surely our request for a $1,200 minimum salary errs only on the side of modesty, and justifies us in once again appealing for and urging your support.

I repeat, this seems to be an eminently modest and reasonable request. Our own statistics show that the very minimum required is over $1,500; all that the civil servants here ask is that no one should be paid less than $1,200.

According to some statistics recently brought down at the request of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), there are at the present time civil servants of the male sex getting less than $100 per month, full time, 2,089, and temporary, 1,672. To bring all these people up to the $1,200 a year minimum it would take $64,629. Surely not a tremendous amount when we consider the alleged prosperity of this country and the manner in which we can throw away money for certain purposes. In this same return I find that in the post office there are 624 full time employees, and 686 temporary employees receiving less than $100 a month. It would require only $18,534 to bring these people up to the $1,200 class. This is such a small amount I hardly like to put it forward as a reform in government policy, and yet the government seems determined to refuse to take any action about it.

As I said the other day, it seems to me that the Postmaster General is simply hiding behind the Civil Service Commission. He has asked them for very little—some $5 a month—hardly enough to justify the commission in considering seriously any change. If he had asked for $100 or $200 or $300 a year extra he might be justified and the house would be justified in insisting upon its being granted. But the Postmaster General's request is so small that one hardly can blame the Civil Service Commission for not acceding to it.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

An hon. gentleman behind me laughs; apparently he is astonished at this argument. But I repeat that the amount asked for is so very small that it seems to me the Postmaster General is merely seeking an excuse and is not very serious about the matter. If he were at all serious he would force it to an issue.

Again, as I said, it seems to me that the Postmaster General is hiding behind the government; for again to-night he says, "I am not the government, I cannot take action". The other night he refused to come out definitely and say that he would recommend such action to the government. Until we have a statement from the Postmaster General that he is prepared to recommend substantial increases to the government and that the government is prepared to stand by such recommendation, then we shall have to throw the blame for the lack of these increases upon the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I had not intended taking part in this debate, but I have had correspondence with letter carriers and have asked them confidentially to state their opinion on the matter. I asked them plainly: "Do you think the Postmaster General is making a screen of the Civil Service Commission? Do you think that the Civil Service Commission ought to be disbanded, and would you rather go back to the patronage system? If not, what is your opinion regarding this question?" The answer I got was this: We do not know and we are not prepared to say that the Postmaster General is hiding behind the Civil Service Commission, making a smoke screen of it. Nor am I prepared to make that charge either, because I have no evidence touching the matter. The Postmaster General on April 5 did make a statement at the instance of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) and we all agreed with the conclusions of hon. gentlemen who had spoken before him. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and members of the opposition agreed with the Postmaster General that there should be a substantial increase in the salaries of these employees. The Postmaster General himself said so. Now the question that presents itself to me is this: Can we formulate some sort of proposal which will solve the problem for this year? It seems to me that the Civil Service Commission themselves cannot be such iron clad people as to be impervious to public opinion and to the opinion expressed on either side of this house. They cannot be individuals of that description unless there is something behind it of which we do not know. Well, I put this proposition to the Postmaster General—and I am not throwing any insinuations at him. We have all expressed the view that these men deserve an increase in salary, and they themselves have stated their position. They say, "The Postmaster General has admitted that we deserve an increase, but what with the commission not taking action and the Postmaster General, although recommending it not being able to enforce it, we are the sufferers". This is the proposition I put to the Postmaster General: Supposing that he himself nominated a committee from both sides of the house and waited upon the Civil Service Commission and asked for a conference, placing the matter before them in a reasonable light. If they were reasonable men they would comply with the request.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let us go down on our knees when we do it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: No; we do not need to go down on our knees. If they have the power which it is said they have, and if the Postmaster General, as he says, cannot help himself, it is not an unreasonable proposal that such a committee as I suggest should meet with the Civil Service Commission and talk the matter over. Then, if they remained unreasonable, further action could be taken. Let me make another suggestion to the Postmaster General: If the Civil Service Commission do accede to the request—or if they do not—will the Postmaster General, shall I say, show his sincerity in this matter by calculating what the total increase would amount to and including it in the supplementary estimates, so that it may be available when the Civil Service Commission do comply with the request of the house?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am glad to be able to say a few words on behalf of the postal workers of the Dominion. I wish to say frankly that I am in favour of an increase to the lower paid postal workers in Canada. I do not think there is any room for argument in that regard. I am very much pleased also to observe to-night such unanimity of opinion in the house touching the question. During the last few days we have listened to a very lengthy discussion from the other side of the house with referrence to the action of the Postmaster General. And what has been the whole weight of the argument, if you can call it an argument, emanating from that side? It has been this: that if, for example, a postmaster died in this country it would be a crime for the Postmaster General to endeavour in any way to keep the service going by appointing a man temporarily. That is about the substance of the argument we have had from the other side. And what do we find to-night? We have heard the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), an hon. gentleman for whom I have the highest regard. I am always sorry to see him on the other side because he never looks at home; still, I have a very high regard for him. I was therefore glad to hear him; and I was glad to hear the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) also making a plea. But what did it indicate? The Civil Service Commission, which we have been led to believe was a paragon of perfection, for some unaccountable reason now comprises such scoundrels that they will not do full justice to the postal employees. In other words, when hon. gentlemen opposite for their own purpose wish to use the Civil Service Commission, the commission are the finest type of people in the country; but when it does not suit the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite to represent the commission in this light then they ignore them. Now I want to ask this question: Who at the present time is running the affairs of this country?

Mr. GOTT: No one.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Is it the Civil Service Commission or the government? When I find the Postmaster General saying that there was a wish to pay the lower paid postal workers more money but that the commission refused to meet this wish, then I ask myself and this house seriously the question I have just put: Who is running this country at the present time?

An hon. MEMBER: Veniot.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Well, let me say to my hon. friends opposite that if they could show anyone as capable of administration as the Postmaster General they would be very well off. What position do we find ourselves in when, all parties being unanimous in the desire to pay more money to the lower salaried employees, we discover that we are impotent in the matter?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BOYS: Let the government introduce legislation; that is all that is necessary.

Mr. ROBB: You would block it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): But what I want to bring out is this: How is it that so suddenly hon. gentlemen opposite change their opinion regarding the Civil Service Commission? At one time they wish the Civil Service Commission to be in absolute control—

Mr. ERNST: Not the Civil Service Commission, but the law.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): My hon. friend is talking too fast; he will learn more when he is here longer. At another time hon. gentlemen opposite, when it suits their purpose, desire to override the authority given that same Civil Service Commission under the law. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite they cannot have it both ways; either they must stick to the law at all times or they must not do so, and if they are going to stick to it in one case why not stick to it all the time? I want to say emphatically that so far as I am personally concerned, if this government wishes to pay these postal workers or the employees of any other department larger salaries but cannot do so under the existing law, that law should be changed immediately.

Mr. GEARY: That is what has been suggested.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): No, hon. gentlemen opposite are not saying that; at one time they say the Civil Service Commission are paragons of perfection and the next moment they say the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission is not worth considering. I have never heard greater inconsistencies in argument in my life, and I am sure the people of this great country will be thoroughly disgusted with such arguments coming from hon. gentlemen opposite.

About ten years ago I remember when certain postal employees in my city were on strike. We had a public meeting, which I attended and where I did a little speaking, and I said very boldly that I condemned the action of postal workers in going on strike. I also said, however, that since they were paid such very small salaries, and since they were striking for larger salaries, I was with them 100 per cent. I took that position ten years ago and I am of the same opinion to-night.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I must thank my hon. friend from Saskatoon for the compliments he has just paid me; I regret that at the outset I must say I am afraid I cannot congratulate him on his understanding of the situation which confronts us at this moment. He does not really understand the situation.

My hon. friend asserts that we on this side of the house have been charging the Postmaster General with breaking the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act. That is so; we have done so for several days, and we have brought up many glaring examples. As I tried to tell the house about a week ago in discussing this very question, we expect the Postmaster General to be absolutely bound by the letter and the spirit of that act, just as we expect the government to be bound by it. However, that does not bind this parliament, which is above the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission, and if in this house we have the unanimity of opinion which my hon. friend says exists with regard to increased wages for the lower paid officials of the Post Office Department, parliament can meet that situation in five minutes. We passed through this House of Commons yesterday in five minutes, by unanimous consent a supply bill which involved millions of dollars. All that is necessary is for the Postmaster General to secure the support of his own government to a proposal to pay these men what is fair and reasonable, and to do it now.

It is idle for hon. members opposite to get up and say how greatly they sympathize with these postal workers if they do not carry their sympathy into practice. I will congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon on being the only member on the Liberal side of the house who has said a word in favour of these men. A week ago to-night I urged that some hon. members opposite should support this proposal, but up to the present time my hon. friend from Saskatoon is the only member on that side who has done so. The Postmaster General says he is in favour of the proposal and has recommended it; can he not convince the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that it is right? If it is right, with the government in command of the house as it undoubtedly is at present, why not bring in the necessary measure and pass it?

I was criticized when I made that proposal a week ago; I think it was the Postmaster General or the Minister of Finance who interjected that it could not be done, that the Auditor General would not pay these amounts. My friend the Minister of Finance knows better than that. We will have supplementary estimates this session; put in an item fixing the amount to be paid the postal workers of Canada notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, with the names and amounts set out. That could be done on one sheet of paper, and if the house is unanimous in the view that such action should be taken, the bill could be passed in five minutes. Then it could be sent to the senate as part of the supply bill and the senate could not change it. The whole matter is in our hands; are we willing to take this action?

I submit that the present salaries paid the lower grade officials in the postal service is a disgrace to Canada and to the public service, and should not be tolerated in this great country. My hon. friend the Postmaster General will agree with me; he says these officials are underpaid. Why continue this disgraceful situation; why not change it now? We have considerable time remaining in this session during which we might consider the matter. I ask the Minister of Finance to take it up with his colleagues; I ask the Postmaster General earnestly to press it upon the Minister of Finance; I ask the government to bring in a supplementary estimate fixing the amount involved. I presume that all the 10,500 postal workers will not be affected; I do not know the percentage, but we might assume that those concerned will comprise perhaps 25 or 30 per cent of the total. I would not suggest giving them a niggardly $60 increase as recommended by the Postmaster General; I would give them something more substantial than that. I would see that a minimum was established of at least $100 a month. Surely that is necessary when our own Department of Labour informs us that a family of five cannot live in this country and supply itself with the necessities of life on $1,200 a year. That amount is sufficient to provide only for food, fuel and rent; people must be clothed, and a family of that size cannot live decently on $1,200 a year. Surely we can establish that as a minimum and agree to it this session.

I believe there is an inclination on the part of the Postmaster General, and perhaps on the part of the government, to postpone this matter, I suspect until next session, but I urge the Postmaster General to have it attended to this year; the government will get all the credit. If there is a wrong under the present system there must be a remedy; there is no wrong in this country which parliament cannot right. Are we agreed that it is wrong to pay these men at the present scale? If so, let us right that wrong now. There is nothing in the law to stop us; we can override the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission. I will grant you that the Postmaster General should not override the law, but he does so.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Has the Civil Service Commission, under the present Civil Service Act, the power to increase these salaries?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, in my judgment it has the power to do so, but I understood the minister to say the commission will not grant his recommendation.

Mr. VENIOT: The commission say it is not justified.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If they are wrong in that opinion are they to bind this parliament? The idea is absurd. That commission is our creature, and we cannot permit to exist a wrong which has been brought to our attention. If there is no division of opinion on the question I should like a good many more hon. members on the other side of the house to get up and support this request for action, then I think we might get somewhere; they would force the government to do what is right by these employees and do it this session. Let it not be postponed any longer; let it be done now.

Mr. ROBB: The debate this week has been as varied as the weather.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The weather has been pretty steady—rain.

Mr. ROBB: During the early part of the week we had hon. gentlemen opposite attacking my colleague the Postmaster General; they alleged that he had not always acted as the Civil Service Commission had recommended. Now we have them urging that the government—

Mr. GUTHRIE: That parliament, not the government.

Mr. ROBB: —override the decision of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Parliament can do it

Mr. ROBB: It is only fair to say of the Civil Service Commission that in their report they claim that the salaries paid in the postal service are comparable with the salaries paid in other departments of the government service. I submit to the hon. gentlemen that if they are going to consider an increase in the salaries of the civil service of Canada they should not pick out only the postal workers. I venture to say that if the postal employees of Canada or the civil service of Canada were asked how they were being treated to-day as compared with the salaries and retirement allowances they received under the administration of which my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) was a minister, that they would reply that they are being fairly well treated. This government has improved to a marked degree the position of the civil service of Canada; not only have salaries been increased but we have provided retirement allowances for members of the service, and in many cases for their families.

As pointed out a moment ago by an hon. gentleman who represents a rural constituency, in considering the salaries of the civil service it is only fair to take into consideration the salaries of those who provide the revenue for the carrying on of the affairs of this country. I think every member in the house will admit that our primary industries, those of the farm, forest, mine and fisheries, provide the traffic for the railways.

Miss MACPHAIL: And the tariff too.

Mr. ROBB: They provide a great part of the revenue of the railway workers, and, with the railway workers and those who are employed in industry, provide the revenue to carry on the affairs of the government.

I am one of those who have great respect for the Civil Service Commission as a means of determining the qualifications for entering the service. I do not say that they are always right but I think they do fairly well under the act parliament has given them to administer. In some places that act limits the scope of the commission in determining who shall get the position, but until parliament has the courage to amend the act—bring it a little nearer if you wish to the British act, and I think that would be much better for Canada—we must put up with the act as it is. The Civil Service Commission in considering the salaries to be paid in one department of the service must take into consideration the salaries paid in other government services.

Mr. HEAPS: If the minister has so much confidence in the commission why does he appoint another commission to investigate them?

Mr. ROBB: In the particular service which the hon. gentleman have been discussing there is a surplus of applications for the positions, notwithstanding the salaries paid. The people who accept those positions know before they enter the service what the salary is going to be; they know what the minimum and the maximum are; they know of the pensions provided for their families. In this particular service there is a large waiting list all the time, but in the technical classes the experience has been that men are being drawn away from the service. Industry is offering them more than the government offers, and that is why this commission of advisers was appointed. I am glad to say that the personnel of the commission has been well received by the country as a whole. Their duty is to look into the relativity of certain salaries paid in the public service of Canada to the remuneration for similar services in the different industries of the country.

It is all very well for my hon. friend, the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) to say that we can put an amount in the estimates to take care of the postal workers, but how is that to be allocated?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: According to the lowest paid.

Mr. ROBB: Are we to override the Civil Service Commission, which has been formed purposely to determine how much is to be given to each class in the service? These questions must all be worked out. If we put in an amount for the postal workers what will my hon. friend say about the other workers employed in the public service? Are we to throw them to the wolves? Have they not some right to consideration as to the salary they should get?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If they are down as low as the others.

Mr. ROBB: Take the rural postmaster who has to wait up late at nights for the different trains; has he no rights?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The rural mail carrier too?

Mr. ROBB: If there is any class that is not properly treated it is the rural postmaster.

Mr. COOTE: You should treat them better.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has referred to the rural mail carrier. That position is advertised and any person can tender for the work; that business is carried on the same as the other business of Canada. If we are going to establish a fixed remuneration for the rural mail carriers—

Mr. GUTHRIE: On a mileage basis.

Mr. ROBB: —then we must be prepared to go a step further and give all contracts on that basis and abandon the tender system.

When you take into consideration the salaries paid to the civil service as compared with those paid on the farm, in the mines, in the forests; as compared with those paid to teachers in the public schools, to professors in the colleges, to those working in the department stores and different commercial houses throughout the country; as compared with the salaries paid in the services of the different provincial governments, it will be found that the employees of the Dominion of Canada are much better off to-day than they were when this government assumed the responsibilities of office in 1922.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I assume from what the minister says that it would be inadvisable to bring up the question of postal workers' salaries without considering the salaries paid in the rest of the service.

Mr. ROBB: I think it would be fairer.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does my hon. friend condemn the Postmaster General for making his recommendation on April 5 that the salaries of postal workers should be increased?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MALONEY: The minister has mentioned the superannuation scheme under which the civil servants come. Does he contend that that is a gift from the government to the civil service? Is it not a fact that the civil service, because of their monthly contributions, are entitled to that superannuation?

Mr. ROBB: Yes; the government pays part and they pay part.

Mr. MALONEY: But the government is making money on the superannuation scheme every day. The government is making more out of the superannuation scheme than any insurance company in the country is making out of insurance, because many civil servants may die before they retire and all that money remains with the government. The superannuation is certainly no gift. I am not finding fault with the minister for stating he believes many civil servants are well paid. I believe that to be the fact, but on the other hand there are innumerable civil servants who are much underpaid and as soon as the government realizes that fact the better it will be for the public service of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am rather interested in this discussion for two or three reasons, the first being that on several occasions when ministers found it necessary to ask parliament to increase salaries notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, they got very little support from hon. gentlemen opposite. I have vivid recollections of several such occasions. Another objection I take to the suggestions of some hon. gentlemen opposite is this: they suggest that because the postal workers are now under review, they should be given an increase, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny that they have all, in season and out of season, been the advocates of control by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANION: Control of appointments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Control of appointments and control of salaries.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If we think they do wrong, we can correct them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. gentlemen opposite have argued that the Civil Service Commission should rule over the civil service of this country. Notwithstanding any opinion we may have had about the matter, the act has remained without change. Along with all the other members of the government who were present when the proposition of the Postmaster General was made to increase these salaries, I was agreeable to it, and we asked the Civil Service Commission to consider such an increase. But hon. gentlemen opposite will bear in mind that since this government came into office there have been one or two increases granted to the civil service. In what manner were the Civil Service Commission asked to revise the salaries of the civil service? They were asked to ascertain the wages paid in similar vocations in industrial and commercial life in this country and to fix the salaries of the civil servants on that basis. I am not going to argue that that was done in its entirety, but I do say that those were the instructions given to the Civil Service Commission when the increases were proposed. The commission did their work and parliament accepted that. The salaries were fixed on that basis and it is assumed, rightly or wrongly, that the civil service are on a parity with similar services in other lines of endeavour throughout the country. That is the basis on which we presume those conclusions were reached.

I for one am in favour of an increase to the postal workers. But this is the surprising thing to me: the acting leader of the opposition stands up in his place to-night and states that all the government has to do is to insert an item in the estimates to provide for this increase. That would be absolutely unfair. As a reason for not recommending an increase at this time, the Civil Service Commission say that it would make the salaries of the postal employees out of line with those of other classes of civil servants. Every individual employed in the civil service who is drawing a salary similar to that of the postal worker has a right to be considered. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen opposite will ignore all these considerations. It seems to me that if the Civil Service Commission are instructed that the minimum salaries paid in those classes are too low, and to readjust them, that is their business; but in all sincerity I do not think parliament is equipped on every occasion to do work of this character at the request of someone in some particular line. I am not quarrelling with the suggestion of the acting leader of the opposition that perhaps the rural mail carriers or the rural postmasters do not receive enough money. But, parliament in its wisdom having set up a civil service commission for this purpose, having given it all the equipment for making investigation, ascertaining wherein there is inequality, and trying to place the civil service upon a parity from one end of the country to the other, that commission is the proper body to arrive at a conclusion whether or not an increase should be granted. If the salaries are not in line with what people in similar occupations in commercial and industrial life are receiving, then let the commission recommend that increase, and let us pay it. When the Postmaster General suggested to the government that the postal employees were underpaid, I believed him; but I realized that if they were to receive an increase, then a very large body of the civil service was also entitled to an increase. I am not opposing that, but it seems rather a strange procedure to ask parliament to deal with a single case without taking into consideration the whole service. I will agree with my hon. friend if he will ask the Civil Service Commission to consider the salaries of all those in similar classes and vocations, but I am not prepared to consider one class only.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let us take all the lower grades.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but let the Civil Service Commission handle the question. I think they are the body best equipped to do it, and not the House of Commons.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has no other member of the government made a similar request or recommendation in connection with his department?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are making requests repeatedly. In my department I have as many requests for increase turned down as are granted. The Civil Service Commission have a man who goes through the Department of the Interior making reports whether the recommendations made by the minister—because they have to be signed by him—are to be granted or not, and the Civil Service Commission take action on those reports.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Finance and the Minister of the Interior have both laid emphasis upon the fact that we have criticized the Postmaster General for departing from the terms of the Civil Service Act in connection with certain features of his department, and on the other hand they claim that we are now—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not suggest anything of the kind.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend did.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; I confined my remarks to the particular question at issue. I was not in the chamber when the other question was under discussion.

Mr. STEVENS: We are told that we are now advocating a violation of the Civil Service Act. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon was the one who said this.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I did not say you were advocating a violation of the act.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, an overriding of the commission. We will put it in that way.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What I was pointing out was that for the last few days this commission was being held up as one which was doing no wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Now my hon. friends want parliament to act in place of the commission.

Mr. STEVENS: We have not held up the commission as doing no wrong. We have stood behind the Civil Service Act as the governing act over the civil service of this country, and we still stand behind it.

Here is the situation that has arisen in regard to the rate of salary paid to the lower paid classes of the service. The Postmaster General told us last year, and I think he told us again this year, that he had made a recommendation to the Civil Service Commission and that the Civil Service Commission—he will correct me if I am wrong—turned down his request on the ground, at least this was one of the grounds, that if they increased the salaries of the lower paid members of the Post Office Department it would necessarily follow that they would have to increase the salaries paid in connection with similar lines of work in other departments.

Mr. VENIOT: That would rather be the inference.

Mr. STEVENS: Frankly, that has no terrors for me. The point at issue is this: Are these men whose position we are now discussing—I would remind the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that we are now discussing the post office estimates, by the way—paid a sufficient salary? There is unanimity of opinion, or there was until the Minister of Finance spoke, that they are not paid a sufficient salary. If there are other civil servants doing a similar class of work in other departments the same reasoning naturally will apply to their case. We have said—my hon. friend from South Wellington so stated a moment ago—that it was within the power of parliament to adjust this matter, and I suggest to the minister and to the government a way in which it could be done, supplementing what my hon. friend from South Wellington said a moment ago. We could take into consideration the question of a minimum salary—a minimum wage, we will put it that way. The suggestion has been made—I made it myself a few weeks ago—that we should fix $100 a month as the minimum wage for an adult civil servant; that, of course, would not apply to youngsters just entering the service as messengers or something of that sort. Let adult civil servants, doing the normal work of an adult, be paid a minimum salary of $100 per month. Some classes might properly be exempted; there would not be very many, and they could be specified. That is a reasonable proposition, and if parliament would so declare the Civil Service Commission would undoubtedly immediately comply. It is within the competence of parliament so to declare.

I pointed out to the minister a few moments ago—I did it a week ago, and I am going to do it now, and draw it to the attention of the Minister of the Interior as well—that as a matter of fact certain members of the Post Office Department are to-day receiving less salary than they were in 1919. The facts are clear; there is no escape from them. In 1919 there was a minimum wage to a letter carrier of $720, and there was a bonus paid of $480, making a total of $1,200. The civil service properly asked that the salary be stabilized at that rate as a minimum, and that certain increases then be given. Parliament accordingly fixed the minimum salary for a letter carrier at $1,200, overriding, if you please, the Civil Service Commission, or disregarding it, in so far as the Civil Service Act is concerned. Parliament did that as a matter of fairness to the underpaid civil servants. They had asked that that rate be stabilized as a minimum salary, and it was virtually agreed that it should be so stabilized. But when action had been taken, this is what resulted: The minimum salary was fixed at $1,020, with no bonus, so that the letter carrier who in 1919 was drawing $720 in salary and $480 as a bonus, or a total of $1,200, finds himself $180 a year or $15 a month, poorer, because he is receiving $1,020 instead of $1,200. There is no excuse for that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will my hon. friend explain how that comes about? He says that some of these men are drawing less money than they did in 1919, although it was stipulated that no man should draw less than his salary and bonus after the stabilization.

Mr. STEVENS: The action of parliament had, as a matter of fact, that result. I am not at the moment criticizing the action of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What I am asking my hon. friend is, how does it come about that any individual in the service at that time could now be drawing less money? I could understand it as applying to those entering the service since then.

Mr. STEVENS: I can tell my hon. friend that it is a fact, nevertheless. I will give another case. The maximum salary of a post office letter carrier in 1919 was $1,260, plus $396 bonus, or a total of $1,656. He now receives a maximum salary of $1,500, or a reduction of $156. There is a legitimate grievance which these men have. They find themselves poorer owing to the action of this house in 1924 than they were in 1919. The Postmaster General disclaims responsibility because he says that he cannot act in this matter alone. Very good; then I submit to the government that the situation is such that it ought to engage their attention and be righted this session; it should not be allowed to continue as at present. I brought this matter to the attention of the house last year, as did my hon. friends from Winnipeg; we have it up again this year; there is a general feeling in the house that some action should be taken, yet we simply drift along. It will not do for the government to answer that the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. VENIOT: Does my hon. friend suggest that the minimum salary on entrance to the service be $100 per month?

Mr. STEVENS: I suggest a minimum salary of $100 to an adult for the normal work of an adult.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That means young stenographers.

Mr. STEVENS: No, youngsters of that character might be termed apprentices and should be exempted.

Mr. VENIOT: None under eighteen receive the minimum for an adult.

Mr. STEVENS: That virtually would do away with the objection. In some cases the objection might hold; I think there are a few messengers, for instance, who carry special delivery letters and so forth. No one is suggesting that they should be included.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A number of married men act in the same capacity as messengers. We have all those difficulties.

Mr. STEVENS: A man doing a man's job is entitled to a minimum wage of $100 a month, and I think that ought to be accepted and established by parliament. I suggest to the government that they take this question into consideration and let us this session declare such a principle, fixing the minimum salary, and then the commission with all their machinery could very readily adjust the various salaries.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask my hon. friend when that minimum to which he referred was fixed?

Mr. STEVENS: In 1924.

Mr. VENIOT: By law?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, by the action of parliament, and it was intended—there is no question of this—to stabilize the rate at the original figure of $720 per year plus the bonus of $480, as the minimum salary.

Mr. VENIOT: But it did not work out that way.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it did not. I frankly confess that I do not understand what peculiar twist of phraseology in the law brought about that result, but that is the result.

Mr. VENIOT: I see that that is the result but I cannot understand how it could be brought about.

Mr. STEVENS: No, and that is why I invite the government to reconsider this whole question. I have under my hand a reference to the report of a committee of parliament which recommended what I am now suggesting. A committee of parliament sat in 1924, and if I recollect rightly, they made a unanimous report in regard to the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite right; the bonus was to be added in every case.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the bonus was to be added in every case and stabilized at that rate. I think the committee will take my word for it—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite correct.

Mr. STEVENS: —that the parliamentary committee—it was under Mr. Raymond as chairman, if I recall rightly—recommended unanimously that this should be done. The grievance of some of these employees is that they not only failed to get that accomplished, but they are actually under a lower rate today than they were at that time. So there is a very strong case for these workers. And when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance brings forward the suggestion that the increase would run into other departments, the answer is a simple one: If in other departments employees doing a similar class of work are receiving these lower rates of pay, then by all means bring them up to the level we are now advocating for the letter carriers and postal workers.

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on behalf of the rural counties. We, who represent the farming classes, have broad enough views to understand that letter-carriers are entitled to a reasonable remuneration, in order that they may give to their children a decent education. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre stated that he was in favour of a minimum salary of $100 per month for civil servants. If he is sincere, he also desires that this minimum salary be applicable not only to civil servants but also to those employed in basic industries. Evidently, being the champion of large interests, he did not wish to mention this minimum salary for those employed in industries which help in the development of our natural resources.

I recall reading in newspapers that when the house is in session, it entails an expenditure of $30,000 per day to the country. Well, sir, it is unfortunate to note that during the present week we have already spent $200,000. Why? To find out what everybody knows, that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) is the best Postmaster General that we have had for many years past. His dealings were thoroughly investigated and absolutely nothing illegal was found.

Sir, as a representative of a rural riding, I must point out that a great deal of time is devoted, in this House, to the cause of civil servants and very little thought is given to the farming classes. We have farmers who own lands worth seven or eight thousand dollars and are far from earning the minimum salary the hon. member for Vancouver Centre mentioned a short while ago.

If we, on this side of the House, representatives of rural ridings, are in favour of an equitable salary for the civil servants; if we want them to live decently and give a good education to their families, we equally want the hon. members of the opposition to cast their eyes now and then on the farming classes. When we lowered the duties on farm implements, a few years ago, that was rendering a minimum service to the farmers, yet we met opposition which was not to the credit of these same gentlemen who sit opposite to us.

Once more, I do not wish to further waste the time of the House, however, I want to ask the hon. members sitting on your left, sir, to take a greater interest in the farming classes of this country.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think sometimes, Mr. Chairman, we speak rather prematurely in regard to these matters; the unanimity which was apparent earlier in the evening does not now exist. We understood at the outset that every member was agreed on this subject, and that the government were absolutely behind the proposal to increase the rate of pay and bring it up to a fair standard. To-night we find that one or two members on the government side are in favour of this increase, "but"—and there they pause and begin to give some reason why the proposal should not be adopted. Finally the Minister of Finance, upon whom will depend in the main the settlement of this question, tells us that the civil service is well paid. Consequently I do not believe that any suggestions we may offer or any pressure we can put upon the Postmaster General will avail in bringing about a settlement of this question.

An hon. MEMBER: Until the next general election.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Perhaps. The Minister of Finance said that the civil servants have a splendid system of superannuation. But as the member for South Renfrew pointed out, that is not at all to the credit of the government. We have heard of cases of civil servants paying into the superannuation fund without receiving a cent in return. It is the best kind of industrial insurance that I know of for the benefit of the company—in this case the government. The Minister of Finance also said that in the end the public pays for these increases. Well, I would point out that the postal helpers are employed in distributing the mail in our cities, and it is from these urban centres that most of the profit from the postal service is derived. Therefore if the public pays for increases of this kind I think the request of the postal helpers should receive special consideration at the hands of the government. Besides, the government has not sought to reduce the war tax collected in the cities. Therefore the cities may rightly claim that the postal service should receive fair consideration from the Postmaster General.

It has been said that the government increased the salaries of these men. This is disputed, and it has been pointed out by one member that some of the salaries instead of being increased have been reduced under the settlement which the government claim benefited the postal workers. If this contention of these men as would appear, is well-founded, then I think the government should reconsider the case and see to it that they are given the substantial increase which we all understood they were to receive. I do not think the Postmaster General will deny after what has been pointed out by several hon. members to-night that some of these postal workers are not as well off to-day as they were in 1919. In my opinion this has been demonstrated in the course of the discussion, but it appears as if the Postmaster General now perceives it for the first time. Undoubtedly a grievance exists among the lower paid members of the postal service, and the Postmaster General should accede to our request that these men be placed on an equality with the other postal helpers in regard to increased pay. I have pleasure in supporting the proposal, but after listening to the Minister of Finance I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that our efforts will fail unless they are more strongly supported on the other side of the house than they have been up to the present time.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to add my voice to the demand that has been made for a living wage for the postal workers of this country. It has been a surprise to me for many years now that somehow or other the government expects certain civil servants to exist on a wage which must be far below the living line, while the men who get seven, eight and nine thousand dollars are continually being further considered. This is not as it should be. We like to think that we are living under a democratic form of government. Regarding the words of the Minister of Finance that many of the primary producers are not in any better position, after all, the rate of remuneration at which a man's services may be obtained does not matter; the government should not expect him to work for a wage on which he cannot live decently. Regarding those whom the Minister of Finance also mentioned, those who furnish the revenue of the nation, the new wealth which is added each year, it is quite true that we are guaranteeing the profits of all other classes except those who really create this new wealth. One way in which the government can help those who are getting only a poor living wage is for them to lower the cost of living. While we are guaranteeing the profits of one class, we are making it impossible for the wages that are paid to meet the cost of living which every other class has to face. Some means must be found to give these people a living wage. Lately I was told that some of the temporary workers in Ottawa are receiving as low as $68 a month. This is far below what a family can live on these days.

The Minister of Finance also mentioned the rural mail carriers as perhaps the most poorly paid in the whole service, and he said the government do not fix the salaries of these carriers. I think they do worse than fix the salaries; they grind them down to the very lowest cent they can do the work for. There is one rural mail route established in my constituency and the tenders have been twice issued for rural mail carriers; but the price has been too high in each case; yet in each case only a very moderate wage is asked for the day's work. Moreover, we expect in the rural mail service men who will comply with all the regulations, men who have to be out in all sorts of weather, travelling over all kinds of roads. And we also exact from the rural mail carrier a bond which is not asked for in the case of the city worker. A good deal of consideration is therefore due the rural mail carrier and I should like to see him receive better treatment than he has been getting in the past. Very few of these people get anything like a wage commensurate with the expenses involved in their calling.

Mr. HEAPS: I feel constrained to say a word or two in reply to the remarks made this evening by the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman asked why we were discussing only postal employees. I am quite prepared to deal with the whole question of wages of all civil servants when the proper time comes; but we are now dealing with post office estimates, hence the discussion of the salaries of postal employees.

As has been already pointed out, in previous years there has been a fairly unanimous feeling in this house in favour of an increase in salary for these men, but so far it has been denied them, let us say, by the Civil Service Commission. Another reason why we should deal with the postal department is that it is one of the revenue producing branches of government; it is the service for which the people pay. I am satisfied, therefore, that the majority of the people do not want to see the postal employees poorly paid; I believe that the people who come into contact with the postal service are anxious to see that these employees get a reasonably fair wage for the services they perform.

When the Minister of Finance discussed the question of technical employees and the salaries paid them, he came out with what is to me a most remarkable statement. He said that as there was a shortage of technical employees it was necessary to consider the question of giving to these people an increase in salary. But what did the Minister of Finance actually do? When the Civil Service Commission recomended a fairly large increase in the salaries of these technical employees the minister evidently was dissatisfied with that recomendation and therefore appointed a commission to look into the matter. There is the anomaly, I might say the absurdity of the position in which the Minister of Finance finds himself. He went further and made the statement that, so far as these other workers are concerned, these lower paid men, there are too many of this class and consequently we can keep wages down to the absolute minimum. As a labour representative in this house I strongly resent, and I wish to say that the labour movement throughout the Dominion will equally resent the idea that because there is a waiting list, a large number of men out of work, that is any excuse for the government to reduce wages. And that is the only conclusion one can come to from the remarks of the Minister of Finance to-night. He also asked with what particular class of employees the postal workers could be classified. Well, suppose we classify postal employees with the labourers, let us say, of Toronto. The labourers there are paid by the municipal council, I believe, 60 cents per hour, which is probably more than is paid to the postal workers of Toronto. If I were asked with what class of workers I should classify postal employees I should say that the postal worker, in view of the many qualifications which a man must possess in order to become a postman in Canada, and in view of the strict examination he must passs before he enters the public service, ought to be classified at least with policemen and firemen. I have seen the examination test which postal workers are expected to pass before they are accepted, and I venture to say that if the same examination were submitted to members of parliament more than one half of them would not be able to pass it.

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking for myself. I could not answer half the questions which these people are asked by the Civil Service Commission to answer. As I say, I would classify the postal workers with at least policemen and firemen, who are receiving more than $85 a month to begin with. I do not know what the salaries of these employees are in different parts of the Dominion, but I know that in Winnipeg they start with $120 a month. The minimum of that class in Winnipeg to-day is equal to if not greater than the maximum of the postal employees. And, as I have pointed out, the postal employee is expected to pass a very difficult examination.

I resent the implication of the Minister of Finance that wages are to be determined by this government on the principle of supply and demand, that is, that if there are a great number of applicants for positions as postal workers, the salaries of these men must be kept down to the utmost minimum. The minister will not contend that the salary of $85 a month being paid to-day is anything like a reasonable salary for the services these men perform; all he can say is that the salary is commensurate with that paid other workers, and because there are large numbers on the waiting list he says these men are not entitled to any increases. That is something we strongly resent, and personally I think that in his more calm and reflective moments the Minister of Finance would not have made such an assertion.

Mr. FORKE: I had no intention of taking part in this discussion, but I do not think the hon. member is drawing a fair conclusion from the remarks of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance compared these wages with the amounts paid in other lines of work, and said that apparently people were more anxious to enter the employment of the government than to work for private firms. He did not say that because of the large number on the waiting list the wages were being kept down.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the acting leader of the opposition to-night, and I quite agree that in the lower classes of the government services the salaries are too small. If a general increase for the lower classes of employees were suggested I should be only too glad to support such a measure. I know of one woman who is attempting to support her mother and keep a small apartment on $60 a month, and I know she has a very hard time of it. I should like to see the salaries of the lower classes in all departments increased.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no doubt that the postal workers of Canada will be very glad and thankful for the sympathy of the minister, but they would be more thankful if he would carry his sympathy to a practical point and induce his colleagues in the government to do something this session. I think my friend the minister will realize what I mean if, when he goes home to-night, he will read the second chapter of the Epistle of St. James.

Now I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has anything been done recently in connection with an examination called a sortation test in city post offices. Information has come to me in the shape of a telegram to the effect that men who have reached their maximum in the postal service, who have been in the department a long time and who are entitled to full pay, are now being subjected to an annual sortation test under the threat made by public notice, I understand given by the postmaster of Montreal, that unless these men are able to pass this sortation test their salaries will be decreased and they will be degraded in rank. Perhaps I had better read the notice, which was posted in the Montreal office and which is contained in a telegram sent me by the United Postal Workers of Canada, Montreal branch:

Sortation Test

The department has called our attention to the fact that a number of postal clerks at Montreal who have reached the maximum rate of pay failed in their case examinations. We are in consequence directed to remind all concerned that clerks must take the test successfully every year, firstly to qualify for the annual increase up to a maximum and then to retain this maximum rate after they have reached it. The official communication adds that unless all these who are drawing maximum pay take the tests successfully in the near future and continue to do so from year to year thereafter the question of reducing their salaries to the next lower grade will be seriously considered. It is up to these concerned to take the warning and to make a serious effort to pass the case examinations successfully if they would save themselves the serious consequences of a reduction of salary.

V. Gaudet,
Postmaster.

I want to ask the Postmaster General if there is any authority for posting a notice of that kind in the Montreal office.

Mr. VENIOT: I think that was done all over Canada. When these men reach their maximum they continue to take their case examination, which is a major examination, and if they fail they are given another year in which to study and practise in order to bring themselves to the point of efficiency required of an official or mail sorter who has reached his maximum and wishes to retain his position. This is done more as a disciplinary measure than anything else, in order to try to maintain the efficiency of the service; because if sortation efficiency is allowed to go down the whole organization in that branch is disrupted. I think that practice has been followed in the larger offices all over Canada for years; it is nothing new.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am glad to have this explanation from the minister. Perhaps he will explain another matter which I desire to bring to his attention. This question is contained in a letter from a prominent citizen of Montreal, written on April 19:

> We certainly have a grievance here in Montreal, as I am sure no city in the world of its size and importance has such poor service. Some time ago an English merchant who had spent twenty years in China said of the post office service here that no city in China of half the size would stand it. I spent the month of July last year in Lee, which is a suburb of London, England, twelve miles from Charing Cross but in London. There we had four deliveries in the day, at 7 a.m., 11 a.m., 4 p.m., and 9 p.m. Here in Montreal, just west of Westmount, we have two, one at from 10.30 to 12 a.m. and another between 4 and 5, one delivery on Saturday and none on holidays. If a letter is mailed in any part of Montreal to any other part, no matter how early in the day it is mailed, it will be cause for rejoicing if it gets to its destination the next day, but the chances will be against it. I mailed a letter in London at ten o'clock at night and the recipient called me on the 'phone before 8 a.m. the next morning.

Mr. POWER: You can do that in Montreal also.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am bringing this matter to the attention not of the hon. member for Quebec South but of the Postmaster General, in the hope that in some way he may be able to remedy conditions, because from this letter it is evident that a grievance exists in that city.

Mr. GEARY: The question has been raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as to the effect of the stabilization act of 1924. What happened in that connection was that the $480 cost of living bonus had been gradually in part absorbed in increases in salary, and the complaint of the postal men is that when salaries were finally stabilized at least one class was left worse off to the extent of $156 per annum as compared with what they received before the stabilization took place.

Mr. VENIOT: Would that be the class going in?

Mr. GEARY: That may not have been the class going in, although they undoubtedly suffer to the extent of at least $180, the difference between the old total of $1,200 and the amount of $1,020 received after stabilization. If I might make a suggestion to the Postmaster General, he might acquaint the house with the particulars of the distribution of that bonus and the result in the end. I am sure he can readily find that information in his office and I believe the house would like to obtain it. The complaint seems thoroughly justified. I have had the opportunity of going into the figures and I find that men are receiving $156 a year less than they received before the stabilization took place. It may be said that the cost of living bonus was not required in 1924 so much as in 1919, but I am not at all sure of that. I do not think the budgets issued by the Minister of Labour will show that the cost of living has decreased to such an extent as to justify the lower pay which the postal men now receive. They require very special qualifications. As the hon. member for North Winnipeg has just said, their duties are extremely onerous; they carry registered mail, collect money, sell stamps, and have other responsibilities which the postal carrier of old did not have to assume. The ordinary labourer working for the corporation of the city of Toronto—I hope the committee will forgive me for referring to this, but it is something I happen to know something about—the man who works in the ditches for the city of Toronto gets $1,497 per year for a forty-eight hour week, and he also gets a fortnight's annual holidays.

An hon. MEMBER: How much per hour?

Mr. GEARY: He gets $28.80 per week.

Mr. POWER: Is he a permanent employee?

Mr. GEARY: He is a permanent employee. Every employee who is taken on by the city of Toronto receives sixty cents for every hour he works, and is generally taken on for two, three or four months. His pay for a week amounts to $28.80, or $1,497 per year, with Saturday afternons off and a holiday of two weeks in each year. The men in the postal service deserve at least equal treatment.

As I ventured to say the other night, the government of Canada should make of itself a model employer. I do not mean to say that it should pay exorbitant wages, but it should see that any adult in its employ, possibly a married man with a family, should not be paid less than is required to keep himself and his family. Hon. members on the opposite side of the house must realize that the present minimum rate will not keep a man, let alone a man with a family.

I understand that the Minister of Finance agreed with the Postmaster General in forwarding the recommendation of the government to the Civil Service Commission for an increase in the salary of the postal workers. I can hardly understand the minister's action after hearing him speak to-night, because one can only gather from his remarks that he is opposed to this increase. The Minister of the Interior is also opposed to the increase and takes refuge behind the Civil Service Act. As the hon. member for North Winnipeg has said, the Civil Service Commission recommended an increase in technical salaries which was much higher than the government wished to pay. The Minister of Finance then instituted a commission to inquire into and report on the matter. What is to become of that commission's report if it is to the effect that the government is right in refusing the scale of wages adopted by the Civil Service Commission? I suppose nothing will be done. What is the government going to do if the report is that the scale suggested by the Civil Service Commission is right? After appointing a commission at considerable expense and wasting a lot of time, is the government simply going to treat the report as waste paper unless it happens to meet with its own view? No government should send a commission out on an inquiry having determined ahead of time that if its report be at variance with the government's wishes it will be treated as a nullity. The result logically will be the overriding of the Civil Service Commission, should the report agree with the government's views, and there is no difference in principle between overriding it in that way and increasing the salaries or providing the money with which the increases could be paid.

From the statements of the Postmaster General, the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Finance it is hard to tell just what is the government's position. Does it intend to and does it wish to increase the wages of these men, or does it intend to leave them as they are? After listening to the hon. member for South Wellington the Postmaster General will surely regard him as an ally. I believe the Postmaster General wants to take this action, and the hon. member for South Wellington has pointed out a way in which it can be done. Parliament stands supreme over any creature of its own, and it can bring legislation down during this session to enable a higher salary to be paid to these employees. If that legislation includes an increase of salary to employees in other departments who are underpaid, then I say that this house will welcome the opportunity to remedy any injustice which may exist in other departments as well as that which does exist in this particular branch of the service.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have been rather surprised to-night at the remarks of the various ministers who have spoken upon this question. I think we must all agree that there is something behind this thing which does not appear on the surface. If we trace the whole matter back to the beginning we will find that the government has not been at all fair with the civil servants of Canada. As far as I can see they have been put off from time to time with promises made at election times, and have been more or less deceived by promises made after elections which have not been carried out. The Minister of the Interior said to-night that recommendations had been made for increases in other departments. That statement was made in reply to a question which I asked him. My question was: Did any of the other ministers of the government make similar recommendations to that made by the Postmaster General? I gathered from what he said that such had been the case, that other ministers had made similar recommendations. The Minister of the Interior spoke for all the ministers who were present at the time he was speaking, and he said that they had all been in favour of the increases recommended by the Postmaster General. I think I am safe in saying that would mean that the majority of the council were in favour of that recommendation. Following up the line taken by the Minister of the Interior, I presume the whole council were in favour of the recommendations which had been made by other ministers of the crown for increases in their departments.

I have been brought into fairly close touch with employees of the government through the New Westminster branch of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, and I have met a great many of the employees of the various departments. So far as I can see these men are very reasonable in their demands. From time to time they have placed their case before the government, and I think they have done it in an intelligent and reasonable manner, but their representations have not received proper consideration. I agree with the Minister of Finance when he says that there are other departments in which the employees are not being paid enough. I have been informed of complaints of employees of the Public Works department, of penitentiary guards, who are connected with the department of the Minister of Justice; of employees of the departments of National Revenue and Marine and Fisheries, of employees of other departments of the government. I think I could easily demonstrate to-night that in all those departments there are employees who are much underpaid. I do not think it is fair to say to them, as has been said by the government in many cases: If you do not like the job, then you can resign and let somebody else have it; there are many men looking for your jobs. I do not think that is a fair way of looking at the matter, more particularly in view of the provisions of the Superannuation Act and the conditions attached to the retirement allowance of which the Minister of Finance seems to be so proud. As a matter of fact, under the law as it now stands, if a civil servant who has not been in the employ of the government for at least ten years retires, he gets back none of the money that has been taken monthly from his wages during the time of his employment. I understand that 5 per cent is taken off their wages, and if they leave voluntarily before the ten years expire, they get back not one cent of that money. That is nothing short of brigandage, because it is their money which has been retained, and when they leave the service they are entitled to receive it. The government says: Yes, you can quit. But what will the government do? It will confiscate the money of those employees and add it to the enormous balance, running into millions of dollars, which stands to the credit of the government in the retirement fund. That is certainly not fair, reasonable or just. The hon. member for Saskatoon will, I think, agree with me in regard to that. He knows something of the Saskatchewan act, and I think if the government compares the Saskatchewan act with the Dominion act, it will find that the Dominion act is not as fair to employees as the Saskatchewan act. Under the latter act a man has to pay in 4 per cent, not 5 per cent, of his wages, and he can get back the amount standing to his credit whether he retires within ten years or after a longer period. Moreover, he is allowed a better rate of interest than is allowed under the Dominion act.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Saskatchewan is a model for most of the other provinces.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In this connection I would hold it out to the government as an example which might be followed, and I am sure the civil servants in my constituency would be very much pleased if the Saskatchewan act were adopted by the Dominion government. What I am contending is that it is very unfair to say to these men: If you are not satisfied with the wages you are receiving, then you can retire. They are entitled to more reasonable treatment than that. It is very strange and unfair for the Postmaster General and the other ministers to try to put the blame on the Civil Service Commission, because they know perfectly well that the blame should not be attached to the commission at all. The government is responsible. If the government carried out one-half of the promises which were made by the ministers during the election, then the civil servants would have no cause to complain.

I have spoken about the penitentiaries, and I would point out in that connection that the employees in the penitentiaries are under another disadvantage; that is that they are not allowed to organize. They do not now belong to the amalgamated civil servants' association, and they are not permitted to belong to it, because a ruling has been handed down by the Minister of Justice to the effect that they must not join such an organization. As a matter of fact they did at one time belong to it, but later on they were compelled to withdraw and now they are kept out of the organization notwithstanding the statement which has been made recently by the Minister of Labour that the government allows all civil servants to belong to associations and to organize if they so desire.

I believe, as I have stated before, that the civil servants have been unfairly treated by the government. I have seen the requests made by the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, and I say without hesitation that I would support those requests almost in their entirety. The government must be either deceptive or very weak-kneed. There is something wrong somewhere, and I do not believe this matter will ever be remedied until we get into office a government which will take hold of the matter in a fair and reasonable way, and settle it to the satisfaction not only of the employees themselves, but of the country at large; because I do not believe that the people are anxious that their employees should be asked to work for anything less than a reasonable living wage.

In reference to the particular department which is under review at the present time, it is admitted by the Postmaster General that certain employees are not getting enough and he has recommended an increase. What defence can there be for this flimsy excuse which has been put up by various ministers that under the Civil Service Act it is not within the power of the government to take action? We have seen it demonstrated time after time that the Postmaster General or some other minister could and did override the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Does the hon. member approve that?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I can prove it in many cases.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I thought the hon. member asked if I could prove it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): No, I asked whether the hon. member approved it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I say that the government is playing with the Civil Service Commission. There is not one minister who will from his place in the house say honestly and sincerely that he believes in the Civil Service Commission, and there are very few members on that side of the house who will support it. They want to get back to the old patronage system. I have no doubt they will tell you that privately; indeed, they will say it publicly, and they have declared so publicly many times in the house. Why has the government not the courage of its convictions? Why does it not attempt to do away with the Civil Service Commission? The answer is obvious: It is afraid to do so. It is afraid of what the people of the country will say to it at the next election if it adopts a course of that kind. If the hon. member for Saskatoon wants to know, I am and always have been in favour of the Civil Service Commission. I never had patronage and I do not want it. I think that the patronage can be and is much better administered by the Civil Service Commission than it would be if members on the other side of the house were administering it themselves. I do not believe in this policy of blaming the Civil Service Commission. If the Postmaster General is actually in favour of increasing the wages of these employees, let him stand up and say: I ask for no quarter and I give no quarter to my colleagues in the cabinet. That is what he should do. He is a man of great courage; he has shown that here, and I think it is really disgraceful for him to remain a minister of the crown when his recommendations are not accepted by the government. He can never make me believe, no minister of the crown can make me believe, that the cabinet as a whole is desirous of increasing the wages of these men at this time. I never will believe it, because if they felt that way about it they would see that the wages were raised in very short order. I suggest to the Postmaster General that he show in the cabinet some of that courage which he has displayed throughout the course of this debate and that he insist on his recommendations being carried out so that these men may be given a fair deal; and I suggest also that his colleagues take up the question of wages in their respective departments and see that their recommendations for increases are carried out.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General regarding the design of the new postage stamp. We have often commemorated certain events by a new stamp. Lately I see that the Canadian emblem, the maple leaf, and the crown, are missing from the new design. There did not seem to be any reason for a change of that kind just now. Perhaps the minister would explain it.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not catch all that the hon. gentleman said, but if I understood him aright, he wished to know why the crown was left off the postage stamp.

Mr. EVANS: Yes, and the maple leaf, the Canadian emblem.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know that I can explain it. Our experts have advised us, perhaps not in connection with this particular matter, but in connection with other matters, that under the system of heraldry the head of the reigning sovereign was a sufficient indication of our connection with the British crown. That is the only reason I can see at the moment. I know that the stamp used to contain a portrait of the sovereign, with the crown.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not the crown on the head to which my hon. friend refers, but the two small crowns in the upper corner of the stamp.

Mr. VENIOT: I could not say positively, but I do not remember any change in that respect having been made since my time.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if the Postmaster General will tell the house what the position of the postal workers is at the present time, and if there is any hope of their getting any increase in salary.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman is certainly putting a difficult question to me, asking me to reply on behalf of the whole house. Surely he is not sincere when he asks me to state what this house is going to do or what it might do. I have stated my own position in connection with this matter. I have made an honest statement, and I have been sincere in what I have done. The government was also sincere in accepting my recommendation. I sent it on to the Civil Service Commission, but the commission refused to consider it, and their reply has been placed before the house. They stated that it was unjustifiable. That is the only definite reason they gave in their reply. I know that suggestions have been made on the floor of this house as to how that situation might be met. I am not going into the details of the argument, because I think we have argued it long enough, but I say that it becomes now a matter of policy as to what shall be done and, of course, it is for the government to decide what that policy shall be. It is not my place to speak on behalf of the government until they have decided upon a policy.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask when we may expect the government to give to the house the method by which they are going to meet the situation?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not supposed to expect anything. I am only supposed to work on definite propositions.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the minister does not correctly interpret his duties and his responsibilities. We are bound to put our questions to the minister who is in charge of the estimates for a given department.

Mr. VENIOT: I do the best I can, but there are questions that I cannot answer—such as new policies.

Mr. STEVENS: We do not expect an answer to any unreasonable question, but what we do expect is this. After accepting the minister's statement of last year as a truthful statement, as he says, of his position, and we give him credit for that, the house at large has discussed this question very fully since, and has indicated to the minister, and through him to his colleagues in the government, that the house is not satisfied with that position. We say that the finding of the commission—which, by the way, is not precisely what it is represented to be by the government, but we will wave aside technicalities—is not satisfactory. We still believe that there is a justifiable grievance on the part of a large body of the civil servants in this country, and we feel that it is our duty to bring this question to the attention of the government. I think the minister himself will admit that the facts which I brought to his attention half an hour or so ago indicate that there is an obvious difficulty or grievance or injustice which ought to be remedied. The minister can scarcely claim to have discharged his duty fully by simply saying: I am only one minister; I cannot do this thing. The attitude of the Minister of Finance was not by any means what the Postmaster General suggests. The Postmaster General says: I put my case before my colleagues, my colleagues endorsed it, and we sent our united recommendation to the Civil Service Commission, and they rejected it. The Minister of Finance, however, speaking from his place to-night, spoke rather strongly against this matter.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the hon. member is misinterpreting his statement.

Mr. STEVENS: I give the Minister of Finance credit that he spoke very frankly. He made a rather elaborate argument that this particular class of civil servants were paid more than persons engaged in private work of a similar character. That was his position, in a few words. We are not satisfied with that position. We think the government ought to give some attention to the representations made by parliament. I am a little disappointed by the attitude taken by two or three hon. gentlemen to-night, but in the main the expressions of view have been entirely in support of what the minister says his own position is. It ought to be a more comfortable position than he has been occupying during the last week or two, because he has been subject to rather bitter criticism.

Mr. VENIOT: I am always comfortable.

Mr. STEVENS: We are now saying to the minister: we are behind you, we want to help you give expression to your view in this particular case.

Mr. VENIOT: Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I am bringing no gifts. If I could I would bring this little gift of justice to these workers. I would give back to them at least what was taken away from them when the salary was stabilized. I think it is a horrible injustice to these people. The suggestion is that they were "gold-bricked"—a little bit unparliamentary, perhaps, but it is very expressive of what took place. These workers trusted the government, they thought they were going to get an adjustment that was favourable, and they now find in one case they are getting $180 a year less, in another case $156 a year less, and so on in varying amounts. It is not fair, it is not just. They have placed their case before us repeatedly. I myself and others brought it here last year; nothing was done and it went over to this year; we are coming towards the end of the session again, and nothing has been done. We can get nothing from the minister. My hon. friend's question was a fair one. What can the government do? Will the Minister of Finance, will the Minister of Justice, will some other minister tell us? The Minister of Finance is leading the house; will he say this much, that the ministers will collectively consider this whole question and make some statement to the house next week or within a few days? Surely we might have that assurance. I think parliament is entitled, after going into this question so earnestly as we have, to have these views reconsidered by the minister. I can assure the minister—and I think I am speaking for everybody on this side of the house—that we will give the government loyal support in every reasonable effort they may make to remedy these grievances. In the light of that, surely the minister will say that the government will review the question and vouchsafe an answer, say, next Monday or Tuesday. That is a reasonable question, and I am sorry the Postmaster General—whose attitude on this one thing has been fair, according to his own statement—I am sorry to-night that he sort of throws up the sponge.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: My friend is rather fond of posing as a man of ultra courage. As was suggested to me a moment ago, if he would just pour out in the council chamber in the east block some of the vim and energy he has exemplified here in one or two of his speeches recently, I rather think his colleagues would be quickly scurrying for cover. Let him crack that whip of his around them and waken them up. My genial friend the Minister of Finance could not possibly resist his overwhelming eloquence and his dominating personality. I am certain the Prime Minister could not.

Mr. VENIOT: You must have kissed the Blarney stone recently.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. I have a great admiration for courage, but I do like to see that courage directed in a useful cause. Now, here is a chance for the Postmaster General to do something of a very useful character. Let the Minister of Finance vouchsafe to this house, after all the pleading and urging of this case, an assurance that the government will in the sacred precincts of the east block, between now, we will say, and Monday or Tuesday, spend an hour considering the welfare of these people. I ask him at least to give us that assurance to-night, and then we will wait with patience and gratitude and hope for what we trust will be a favourable answer. I make that appeal to the Minister of Finance now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. STEVENS: Not a move! I am surprised. I really thought the Minister of Finance could not resist an appeal of that character. I turn in sorrow to the Minister of Justice, who has not been very much occupied this session. We were sorry at the early part of the session that he was away; we are glad he is back.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You will be surprised at the amount of work I have had to do.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure. Will he now with his splendid record of interest in the welfare of the poor—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Do not laugh, please.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: This is not a laughing matter. Will the Minister of Justice say that he will support the Postmaster General in council and see that half an hour's consideration is given to this question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: When it comes to the expenditure of money I am no good at all; I leave it to others.

Mr. STEVENS: I see very little comfort for some thousands of civil servants in that quarter.

Mr. POWER: What about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Agriculture a moment ago said: come to Saskatchewan and we will show you a model for action throughout this country. Will the Minister of Agriculture go to the council chamber with his colleague the Postmaster General who is anxious to have a little support?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I do well if I look after my own staff.

Mr. STEVENS: There you are! What about the Minister of Health?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am always interested in the people.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Health, whose gentleness and kindness of heart are noted, will he undertake this task? He is silent. What about the Solicitor General? The Minister of Marine? The Secretary of State? I think I have called them all. Not one of them answered.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The Minister of Immigration is up at the back.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Immigration exhausted himself a moment ago when he expressed his sympathy. His heart bled with sympathy. I am sorry it has bled so much that he has had to go and sit away at the back.

Mr. POWER: Do you expect anything more from the Scotch?

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Immigration will have a leaky heart; his sympathy has oozed out so vigorously. What about the Secretary of State? Let me appeal to the Secretary of State to bring this to the attention of the cabinet.

Mr. RINFRET: Does my hon. friend require the help of the Secretary of State against a finding of the commission?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RINFRET: That would be a great change in my hon. friend's mind.

Mr. STEVENS: We have stimulated the interest of one of the ministers, the Secretary of State, who by virtue of his custody of the great seal, and so on, perhaps is the right minister to bring this forward. We ask him if he will support the Postmaster General in seeing that the salaries of the underpaid civil servants of the Postmaster General's department and other departments shall be brought up to the level of a living wage. That is all we are asking. Will he see that that is taken into consideration by the cabinet and an answer given us next week?

Now, we have failed, I am sorry to say, in getting answers from the ministers. But we have placed the case, I think, fairly before the house. We have urged the government to take action; we have assured the government of our support; but we have failed up to the present to get any encouragement from them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, I think this would be a very appropriate stage of the discussion—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is early in the proceedings.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —to refer to paragraph nine of the Postmaster General's report and to read this paragraph. It says:

> The expenditure shows an increase of $1,371,497.61. Of this increase, about $600,000 is due to the general flat increase in salary of $120 granted by parliament from April 1, 1927; another $200,000 is due to statutory increases approved by the Civil Service Commission; $109,000 is due to the purchase of rural mail boxes; and the remainder is due to the increase in volume of mail handled and to improved postal facilities, including air mail service, given the public.

Will the Postmaster General give us a statement of the total salaries for the year preceding the one covered by this report, and the salaries to which he refers in this paragraph for this year covered by this report. Then we shall see where the difference comes in.

Mr. VENIOT: It states there, if I mistake not, that of the increase about $600,000 is due to the general flat increase in salaries of $120 per annum granted by parliament.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): But I am asking for the total salaries—the total amount paid in each year.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot give that offhand. It will take some time to get the information but I shall endeavour to get it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That information ought to be available; will the minister have it for us to-morrow?

Mr. VENIOT: We will get it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then we will pass that item and go on to rural mail boxes. How are they purchased—by tender?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. I think it was in 1927 that we called for tenders for rural mail boxes and the contract was awarded that year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How many boxes were purchased on that occasion?

Mr. VENIOT: I am speaking from memory, but I think it was in the vicinity of 45,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How many tenders were put in for them?

Mr. VENIOT: Fifty-two models were submitted and there were fifteen or twenty tenders.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can you give us the particulars of those tenders?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot right off the bat; I do not carry that in my mind. I did submit the whole thing to the house in 1928 and it was discussed.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not recall it; it was not discussed by myself, I know that. Was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And where were the boxes made?

Mr. VENIOT: Montreal.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Made in Canada?

Mr. VENIOT: Of course, Montreal.

Mr. POULIOT: How many mail boxes have been bought by the department since confederation?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): On what terms are these boxes supplied?

Mr. VENIOT: They are delivered at $4.25 each. That is the actual cost, including manufacture, freight and so forth. We have distributing points in Winnipeg, Montreal, and Moncton.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the Postmaster General care to discuss for a few minutes the statutory increases and tell us how they work out? Every year, as I understand it, there are certain statutory increases, but is it not a fact that in other directions there are decreases due to the fact that juniors come in and take the places of others? There must be some change therefore in the total of the salaries.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not catch the purport of the question.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are there not some employees coming in at minimum salaries and replacing higher salaried employees?

Mr. VENIOT: There are always employees coming in at minimum salaries and taking the places of others who are promoted.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Or who drop out.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, that is the case every year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then the total amount paid for salaries is not automatically increased by the total amount of the statutory increases?

Mr. VENIOT: The difference in the other direction would be so small as to be hardly worth talking about. It will be found in the estimates that we allow so much one way or the other to meet these conditions, but the amount is not large.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Could we not have the particulars of that?

Mr. VENIOT: I am afraid I have nothing further at the moment.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Postmaster General seems to have much less information than other ministers who are able to answer similar questions very fully. In the typewritten statement which the minister has furnised for the year ended March 31, 1929, I find the following:

> Deductions from net revenue are mostly made up by payments of salary to revenue postmasters. The increase of $566,700 is due to increase of salaries to these postmasters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I will continue to-morrow.

Progress reported.

IMPERIAL CABLE MERGER

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I beg to lay on the table the report asked for by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) with regard to the Pacific cable transaction. I am laying on the table such correspondence as we are permitted to bring down, and which is not of a secret character, between the contracting parties, the British government, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. The Under Secretary of State informs me that this is the only information which we are at liberty at the present time to lay on the table.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 3, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Eleventh report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. —Mr. Cahill.

NOVA SCOTIA FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I would like to ask the government if they have any idea when I shall receive an answer to the questions that I asked on the orders of the day last Monday?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will call the attention of the minister of the department concerned to the question.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Salaries and allowances, $17,295,464.40.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $16,305,000.

Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,176,175.

Yukon territory, $150,000—Total, $34,926,639.40.

Mr. CLARK: On the evening of April 30, I made some remarks in regard to the post office at Sutton, Quebec, and a member of the Civil Service Commission. Yesterday evening I received from the secretary of the commission a letter which I should like to read to the committee as it involves a certain correction. It reads:

In the course of your remarks in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening on the appointment of a postmaster at Sutton, P.Q., you stated that the file had been held in the office of the Civil Service Commission by Commissioner Tremblay for a period of seven months. Your statement reads as follows:

"I must accept the statement which has been made by the hon. Postmaster General, but I would ask him to search his records and search his mind because I believe when he has done so he will find that he personally is the man who is responsible for this file having been lost in Mr. Tremblay's office for seven months." Commissioner Tremblay has asked me to point out to you that while the file was held for a little over two months in his office, a delay for which he assumes full responsibility, it was not held for seven months, as stated in your remarks, and he would be glad if you could see your way to taking an early opportunity of making this correction in Hansard.

What I did say was "for several months," and I had actually made the correction in the unrevised Hansard when this letter arrived. Furthermore, I gave the exact dates on two or three occasions, both on May 1 and yesterday, fixing the time during which this file was held in Mr. Tremblay's office, and those dates show that it was a little over two months, as he states. I am therefore very glad to make the correction in the house.

I am also glad to note that Commissioner Tremblay agrees with me that the file was held in his office for several months, and I would like very much to know why that or any other file was held in Commissioner Tremblay's office for several months, when it was the duty of the commission to deal with it and to make the appointment under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the letter mentioned the name of the Postmaster General, that he might give some information.

Mr. CLARK: The letter is simply confirming what I said on the evening of the first, and I simply read what already appears in Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: While I may be responsible for the file having been held in the department, I certainly am in no way responsible for the delay in holding the file in the office of the Civil Service Commission. It was sent to the Civil Service Commission, and after that I had absolutely no connection with it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Postmaster General made considerable progress in the consideration of his estimates yesterday, but there are two or three other matters which I think we ought to get cleared up at this stage. According to report, there has been a number of extensions of rural mail routes in the past year, many applications for extensions or new routes, and many refusals of these applications. Could the Postmaster General inform the committee as to the number of extensions or new routes established in each province, with the mileage involved, and the cost of these extensions or new routes as the case may be?

Mr. VENIOT: I have here a very long list which includes all the applications, I think, from every constituency in Canada for rural mail delivery routes, giving the mileage, the time tenders were invited, the number of routes authorized, and the number now in operation. I have not got the cost of each route, but I would have been glad to supply that information if I had known that it would be requested. This list comprises about twenty-five or thirty sheets, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will be satisfied if I lay it on the table instead of taking up the time of the house by reading it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It will be quite satisfactory if the minister lays it on the table.

Mr. VENIOT: I will do so. For the benefit of the committee I might state that the number of routes in operation at the present time throughout Canada, in the different provinces, is as follows:

Prince Edward Island	177
Nova Scotia	172
New Brunswick	305
Quebec	922
Ontario	2,006
Manitoba	112
Saskatchewan	91
Alberta	151
British Columbia	79
Total	4,015

I will also lay that on the table.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Has the minister the cost in each case?

Mr. VENIOT: Not the cost of each one.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The total cost?

Mr. VENIOT: I think I can get the total cost.

Mr. BRADY: I would ask the Postmaster General from what source he receives these applications for rural mail routes.

Mr. VENIOT: Generally we get them in the form of a petition from the people of the district; at other times through letters addressed to the department. We send the petition or a synopsis of it to the district superintendent with a request that he send an inspector to examine the proposed route and report on its feasibility. Generally, when he reports favourably, the route is opened. If there is any difficulty while he is making the inspection or any doubt as to the feasibility of the route, the matter is held over for further investigation. When it is decided to open the route we call for tenders, giving a description of the route.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is one other matter which I wish to bring up in the absence owing to illness of the hon. member who first brought it up some time ago, and that is with respect to the change in the name or monogram on the mail wagons and carts.

An hon. MEMBER: Rotten!

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought the matter up.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am bringing it up because the hon. gentleman who asked about it originally is not here, and I think there ought to be an explanation whether the change was made by order in council or upon what authority.

Mr. VENIOT: I am only too pleased to give the information and I want to thank the hon. member for bringing the matter up. This matter has been standing for some time, and it had been my intention to give an explanation to the house at an early date. Hon. gentlemen may remember that some four weeks ago I attempted to do so on the orders of the day, but the Speaker decided that I was out of order in doing so at that stage without the unanimous consent of the house. Unanimous consent was not given, and the matter was therefore held over until my estimates came up for discussion.

The first time that my attention was drawn to the dropping of the monogram or the letters G.R. from some of the mail trucks and mail appliances used in our departmental service was when I read an article in a Toronto paper, the Toronto Telegram, I believe. When the Toronto Telegram called the attention of the public to what is supposed to be the elimination of the monogram or letters G.R., it made this comment at the foot of the article: We are informed that this did not take place during the regime of the present Postmaster General. I wish to express my appreciation of the fairness of the Telegram on that occasion, but some other newspapers—I am not saying this in any critical spirit—disregarding the fairness of the telegram, gave me a roasting, so to speak. My attention having been called to this matter, I made inquiries and I found that there never had been any order in council or any departmental order isssued in regard to the so-called monogram or the letters G.R. When this matter first came up I did discover that, three or four years ago last January, the letters "G.R." on each side of the Canadian coat of arms had been left off most of the new trucks obtained for the postal service—there were not many. Investigation showed that this had happened in the cities and larger towns where the service is carried on in that way. Apparently no orders to do this had been issued, and I could only surmise that the omission had been due to neglect on the part of somebody. I immediately issued an order that the royal monogram should be placed on all trucks and other vehicles from which they had been omitted.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

This is the form of contract for the carrying of the mails entered into with individuals who are not employees of the department. It will be seen that at the top appears the royal arms and on one side the letter "G" and on the other side the letter "R" and underneath the words "Royal Mail Canada." Those words, "Royal Mail Canada" are to be found on all vehicles used in the transporting of mail from post offices to trains and from trains to trains. The traps we are using to-day for transporting mail from the post offices to the trains, or in the gathering of mail by post office officials bear the words "Canadian Mail." It has been that way for years. That is the only explanation I can give. I discovered that on some of those traps the monogram was lacking. I do not think it was a case of general elimination of the monogram; but it was left off some of the vehicles used for the transportation of the mails. As I said before, the moment I got through the investigation, having received reports from Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, St. John, Halifax and other large centres, I issued an order that wherever those letters "G.R." were absent they should be placed on the vehicles. That is the fullest explanation I can give of the matter.

Mr. CLARK: I wonder if the minister would explain why the communication from the Post Office Department in this connection dated February 20, 1929, was not included in the return which was tabled on the motion of the member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). I have before me the original return, and endorsed on it is the report of the Post Office Department on the date I have mentioned, addressed to the Under Secretary of State: "Enclosed is answer in so far as the Post Office Department is concerned. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General." But there is no answer.

Mr. VENIOT: I think that was intended for "nil." There were no orders or correspondence so far as I could find.

Mr. CLARK: The answers of all the other departments are in this return and in each case they make the definite statement that they have nothing. The Post Office Department says: "Enclosed is answer in so far as the Post Office Department is concerned." Would the minister ask his deputy, who signed this, to furnish him with the reply which was enclosed?

Mr. VENIOT: It was the one word "nil." I saw it on the report submitted to me. I do not know whether it was taken off or not, but that would have been our reply; it could not have been anything else.

Mr. CLARK: It could not have been taken off this return; all the replies are numbered.

Mr. VENIOT: I know our reply would be nil.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the explanation of the Postmaster General in regard to the disappearance of the royal monogram from certain mail carts, which has been discussed more or less in the newspapers, is quite satisfactory. It is a matter of satisfaction to know that as soon as the minister's attention was drawn to the matter he ordered the royal monogram to be replaced on the trucks from which they had been omitted or removed, and I gather from the statement made to-day that the royal monogram will continue to appear—

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, certainly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —as heretofore upon all such trucks. There is no doubt that, while the words "Canadian mail" are now used, from time immemorial, both here and in the motherland, the mails have been referred to as "His Majesty's Mails", and the contract which the Postmaster General produced as a sample of what is in use in the Post Office Department is a contract for conveying His Majesty's Mails, not Canadian mail; and the contract is made between the contractor and His Majesty, his successors and assigns—the Postmaster General is not even represented. There seems to be a very ancient usage in this respect. What reason can there be for suggesting any change? I certainly should like to see the well-known terms "His Majesty's Mails" continued. The form of contract which I hold in my hand was printed as recently as June 1927, and having been produced here to-day by the Postmaster General I presume it is the form of contract used to-day. Under this form of contract when contractors agree with the government to carry or deliver mail it is His Majesty's mails that they agree to carry, and the contract is made directly with His Majesty the King in this respect.

I understand that in the revised statutes for some reason or other the term "Canadian Mail" has crept in. What authority there was for the change nobody seems to know. It was not in the old Post Office Act. There the term used was "His Majesty's Mail". But in the revised statutes the term "Canadian Mail" has been used. I do not suppose this house knew anything about it when the revised statutes came here to be confirmed. We passed them; nobody's attention was drawn to the change. These words appear in the revised statutes in respect of the post office to-day. But I hope the Postmaster General will not only continue the term "Royal Mail" as a matter of course, but will also continue the term as heretofore of "His Majesty's Mails".

Mr. VENIOT: Section 11 of this contract provides:

> The said contractor agrees to provide the necessary approved vehicles painted red "English vermilion" with "Royal Arms" and "G.R." and "Parcel Post", "Royal Mail", "Canada", in gold letters thereon.

That is part of the contract. It has been in that form for I don't know how long before I took charge of the department.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With regard to the the change in the revised statutes, I made some inquiries. It appears that the commissioners of the revised statutes, as was their right, and even their duty, when different expressions are used in the same act, to try to make them harmonize and use the same phraseology, communicated with the officers of the Post Office Department. In some sections of that act the words used are "Canada Mail" and in a couple of other places it is "His Majesty's Mail." The officers of the department thought that perhaps it would be better to use "Canada Mail" especially for the reason that there are mails carried in Canada which are His Majesty's Mails with out being Canadian mail. For instance, the British mails which are circulated in Canada are His Majesty's mails as well as our own, and that term really does not describe exclusively Canadian mail. The officers there fore thought fit to use the words "Canada Mail". Perhaps, if it is agreeable to all, we might compromise by saying, "His Majesty's Canadian Mail" or "His Majesty's Mails in Canada". However, I am considering this matter as to this change so that no one could take exception to what was done. The change was certainly made in good faith.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Last night I asked the Postmaster General a question in connection with the wages of letter carriers and I wish to ask now, before the item passes: Is the Postmaster General considering, or doing anything further to put into effect, the recommendations as put on Hansard on April 5?

Mr. VENIOT: The only thing I can say is that I am considering the matter, but I am not in a position now to say what other steps I shall take. I am giving the question serious consideration.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the Postmaster General's attention been drawn to the careless manner in which mail matter is handled in the city of Ottawa, and, it may be, in other places? I do not know what the provisions of the contract are, but I do know that during the present session I saw an open wagon or truck carying big sacks of mail, piled high, and these sacks apparently had come from the direction of these buildings. One of them dropped and fell on the street. The driver kept on going, and had it not been for someone else calling his attention to the fact that he had lost the sack it might have been missing altogether. It seems to me there should be some restrictive requirements regarding the manner in which mail matter is handled. The present mode, if what I saw was a sample of it, certainly does not tend to safety.

Mr. VENIOT: I can assure the hon. gentleman that in the last two and a half years, since I have been Postmaster General, I have spent considerable time—probably eight months of the year—in Ottawa in departmental work. I live at the Chateau and am very closely in touch with the post office, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that an instance of the kind he has cited is certainly not typical; it is not frequent. However, now that this statement has been made, I feel called upon to compliment the contractors who are handling mail in Ottawa on the efficient way in which they are doing so. The mail bags which the hon. gentleman sees piled up in these wagons are what we call tie bags and do not contain first class matter; they contain printed matter, newspapers, reports and things of that kind. While an instance of the kind my hon. friend has mentioned may occur, it should not be accepted as proof that there is any neglect in the handling of mails by the contractors in the city.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is one item in the Postmaster General's report that calls for a word of explanation. I refer to the item on page 11 with regard to indemnity paid to owners of lost insured parcels amounting to $34,123. In other words, insured parcels were lost last year for which the government paid an indemnity amounting to $34,000 odd. That seems an enormous amount and must represent the loss of a considerable number of insured parcels.

[Mr. Adshead.]

Mr. VENIOT: The amount given by the hon. member is correct—$34,123.53. We insure valuable parcels, and this is to make up the losses on such parcels.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Lost by what—theft?

Mr. VENIOT: By theft—

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the Post Office Department?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, by theft, fire or otherwise. For instance, we had a fire last year or the year before in a railway accident and considerable mail was lost. A mail car was burned and a good many packages were lost in consequence. We indemnified the owners of the parcels. The indemnity is paid after a thorough investigation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the requirement in regard to the carriage of these mails from or to the post office? What kind of vehicles must the contractors have? The Postmaster General has said that the contractors here have a remarkable record. If that is so, it is only a matter of luck, because there is nothing in the world to prevent mail bags from falling off these vehicles. I want to know why Canada should be so far behind other countries in this connection. I do not think there is another country in the world where mail matter is handled as carelessly as it is here. If the Postmaster General will look up his records he will find that insurance has been paid several times on parcels sent from the parliament buildings. If the parcels are transported in these open wagons and in sacks piled so high and carelessly as the sacks I have seen, then, as I say, it is only a matter of luck if some of them are not lost. The Postmaster General has not yet answered my question: What are the provisions in the contract with respect to this matter, and how is the carriage of mail rendered safe?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to take up the time of the house reading the contract, which is very lengthy.

Mr. STEVENS: Read sections 11 and 12. I will read them for the minister. Section 11 provides that the vehicles, state of repair, cleanliness and painting shall be approved by the Postmaster General; and then section 12:

> Approved vehicles with closed locked covers as per specifications, photographs, etc. to be seen at the office of the postmaster—

And so forth. In other words, the mails are supposed to be carried in locked and closed vehicles like express wagons and, I presume, with a steel screen covering that locked door.

Mr. VENIOT: That refers particularly, I am told, to first class matter and not so much to newsprint, newspapers, circulars and things of that kind which are very bulky and which would not require closed cars for their transportation. The hon. gentleman was reading paragraphs 11 and 12, which I am informed apply particularly to first class matter.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Then does the Postmaster General say that all first class matter is carried in vehicles such as those described in the contract? Will he make that statement?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, in large cities.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What do you mean by large cities?

Mr. VENIOT: In cities and towns where we have such contracts.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If this is the proper time I would like an explanation from the minister with regard to the transactions which have taken place in respect of the Pacific cable.

Mr. MacLAREN: Coming back to the question of the designation of mails, the Minister of Justice made a suggestion in this regard, but I do not understand that his suggestion is in any definite form. I would just like to assure myself that this matter will receive the attention of the Minister of Justice, and perhaps he may give his decision to the house later on.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the minister say that all first class matter which is sent from these buildings is carried in closed and locked vehicles? I do not think that is the case at all.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot answer that question offhand, but I will make inquiries and if that is not the case I will see that it is done. That is the best I can do.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I would like to join with other hon. members who have spoken in urging the Postmaster General seriously to consider this question of increased salaries for postal workers. I happen to know all the men employed in this work in my own city and I know they are underpaid. They are entrusted with very important work, and I think we are simply putting a premium on dishonesty when we pay such people very small salaries and trust them with the handling of very large sums of money. I hope the Postmaster General will be firm in his demand that the Civil Service Commission revise these salaries upward.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the question with regard to the Pacific cable is answered I might point out that it would come more properly under the third item of this vote. The item we are now considering covers salaries and allowances.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I believe the minister would like to dispose of this question in a general way now.

Mr. VENIOT: Yesterday I laid on the table all the files we thought it proper to bring down. There are some secret communications between Great Britain and the other contracting parties concerned with this Pacific cable, including Canada, New Zealand and Australia, which it would not be in the public interest or in the interest of these contracting parties to make public to-day, because all negotiations have not been completed as yet.

Just here let me say that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asked for these files some time ago, but it was impossible for me to bring them down until yesterday. In a conversation which I had this morning with the hon. member he stated that he would have preferred to have this matter left over for another day, but while I thought at that time I might be able to do so I would like to go on with it now if possible, if I can do so without seriously inconveniencing the hon. member for North Winnipeg. If, when we have disposed of the question, the hon. member desires any further information I will be only too glad to bring it down.

In the meantime let me present a synopsis of what has taken place. The duplicate Pacific cable between Canada and Australia was placed in operation in November, 1926, and it was expected by the Pacific cable board that owing to the improved facilities there would be an immediate increase in the volume of business and a corresponding increase in the revenue. However, in April, 1927, a beam wireless system was placed in operation between Great Britain and Australia, the rates charged being approximately one-third less than the cable rates. As a result of the successful operation of the beam wireless about 50 per cent of the Pacific cable traffic between Great Britain and Australia has been taken away from the cable and its revenues have been reduced by approximately half a million dollars a year. Moreover, a beam wireless service has been recently inaugurated between Canada and Australia and it is expected this will substantially reduce the volume of United States traffic which is now passing over the Pacific cable and in this way still further reduce the revenue of the cable which it is anticipated will be then operating at a deficit.

This seems to vindicate Canada's attitude in opposing the duplication of the cable. Just here, in further explanation I might say that when the contracting parties undertook to duplicate this cable Canada was either not consulted or, if she was consulted, protested. The cable was duplicated in spite of Canada's protest, which was entered at that time by the then Postmaster General, Hon. Charles Murphy. Canada especially urged that the duplication be at least deferred until the beam wireless was given a trial, but to no avail.

In the circumstances all that remained to be done was to arrive if possible at a working arrangement between the wireless and cable interests. Accordingly in November, 1927, Canada made representations to the partner governments of Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, urging the immediate appointment of a special committee to consider the commercial policy of the cable, including its relation to the wireless system. Such a committee was endorsed by all contracting parties, but the inquiry was extended by the British government to include the eastward cable route from Great Britain to Australia and the competing wireless, so that it has not been limited to the Pacific cable and competing wireless alone. A special conference was therefore held at London composed of representatives of the governments concerned, namely Great Britain, Canada, the Irish Free State, the Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and India, and also a representative of the non-self-governing colonies and protectorates with terms of reference empowering them to examine the situation which has arisen as a result of the competition of the beam wireless with cable service, to report thereon and to make recommendations with a view to a common policy being adopted by the various governments concerned.

Canada nominated Sir Campbell Stuart as its representative at the conference and sent Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General and Mr. C. P. Edwards, director of radio telegraphs, Department of Marine and Fisheries, as advisors. One result of the conference was a merger which was affected between the Eastern and associated telegraph companies and the Marconi Wireless Company of Great Britain. Under the proposed settlement there will be returned to Canada in cash an amount substantially equivalent to her outlay on the Pacific cable during the twenty-five years of government control. No future payments on Canada's part will be necessary as would certainly have been the case had a settlement not been reached. Control over the rates will be retained in the interests of the public, this feature having been specially safeguarded during the negotiations. A trans-Canada or all red cable route will be continued with provision for its being taken over by the government in the case of emergency.

That is a short outline of what has taken place. The correspondence which has been tabled includes some further telegrams and the complete report of that conference. The British government has passed an enabling law which has attached to it, perhaps as a schedule, a tentative agreement. I understand that that agreement has not as yet been concurred in but it will be shortly. The question now arises whether it will be necessary for Canada to pass enabling legislation as was passed in Great Britain. I am not quite definite on that point but the matter is now receiving the attention which its importance deserves.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister mean that he is making inquiry of the Department of Justice as to what the position is in that respect?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, the Department of Justice has the matter in hand.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the minister be good enough to tell us who first suggested that this conference should be held in regard to the cable service?

Mr. VENIOT: I think the first suggestion came from Canada, when it was seen that this competition was beginning to get keen

Mr. LAPOINTE: Only in regard to the Pacific cable.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope I am not being misunderstood; I am only referring to the Pacific cable. I think it was in 1926 when Sir Campbell Stuart was over here that my attention was first drawn to this matter. I think that was the year of the imperial conference and I was in constant communication with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) while he was in England. It was impossible for me to go over at that time, in fact I preferred to stay here because I did not know very much about the matter having only been in office a couple of months. I preferred that it be handled directly by our representative over there, Sir Campbell Stuart, in consultation with the right hon. the Prime Minister, and by means of cable consultation with the officials over here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who controlled the beam system at that time?

Mr. VENIOT: The beam system was just coming in at that time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the hon. minister is correct in that.

Mr. HEAPS: It was long before that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the minister tell us who controlled it?

Mr. VENIOT: I had nothing to do with that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister mentioned that one of the reasons for this conference was the competition from the beam system.

Mr. VENIOT: That is correct.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I see by the report that the total amount which is to be paid for the Pacific cable, over and above the liabilities, is £517,000; how much does Canada get out of that?

Mr. VENIOT: We are trying to reach an agreement, but I am informed that it will be somewhere in the vicinity of $700,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That will be Canada's share?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Fault cannot be found with the present Postmaster General because he was not in office at the time, but it seems to me very extraordinary that the Pacific cable should have been duplicated all the way to Bamfield just at the time the beam system was coming into use. I have seen the report made by the former Postmaster General in regard to this, but I am not prepared to admit that that duplication could have been proceeded with against the wishes of Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Murphy claimed that he was never consulted.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand Mr. Murphy claims that and the attitude he took with regard to the wisdom or otherwise of duplicating the cable was quite satisfactory, but as a matter of fact the Pacific cable board had no power of itself. Is that board still in existence?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be until the new law comes into effect.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Pacific cable board never had any real power in itself. That board represented four different governments and there were directors appointed by the four governments; I think three were appointed by Great Britain, two by Canada, two by Australia and one by New Zealand.

Mr. VENIOT: With the treasury board in Great Britain handling the whole thing.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I was a member of the board for a long time and I know something about their ways at that time.

Mr. VENIOT: I am prepared to accept the hon. member's version of it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not prepared to admit that the cable board could have duplicated this cable against the wishes of the Canadian government. The British representatives on the board were appointed by and were subject to the authority of the British government. The fault I have to find in connection with this matter is that at the time it came up the Canadian government did not take it up with the British government in order to stop the duplication of the cable. I have read the papers prepared and the report made by the former Postmaster General and in the main I agree with his attitude, but I consider that this government slipped in that they attempted to deal entirely with the Pacific cable board instead of going over the head of the board to the real authority. I submit to the Postmaster General and to the members of the government who had to deal with the question, that if a representative of the Canadian government was doing something which was objectionable to the British government that government would appeal to the Canadian government and the government here would promptly hold an investigation to ascertain the facts and if the complaint were well founded they would apply the remedy. If the Canadian government had appealed to the British government, as I feel they should have done, this extraordinary thing would not have happened and we would not have had the Pacific cable duplicated in its entirety just a few months before the competition of the beam system reduced its traffic by one-half. That is where I find fault with the government. The present Postmaster General has nothing to do with this, but I say that, in effect, the government did not understand the situation and they appealed to the Pacific cable board instead of appealing to the British government when they found they could not get any satisfaction. If they had taken the matter up properly, this would not.

have happened. In effect, this large sum of money that was spent on the last long duplication of the Pacific cable was practically wasted.

There is one feature with regard to the sale of the cable that, I presume, has been given consideration by everybody, and that is the fact that this link of communication within the empire is now out of the hands of the government; it is no longer under their control. It is quite true there are in the act certain provisions whereby the different governments can bring influence to bear upon the Communications Company, but previously in the war this was a government owned cable and well I remember many meetings of the Pacific cable board during the war and particularly during the early part of it when it was demonstrated what a great asset this cable was to the British commonwealth and the allies in general. This was a cable completely controlled by the allied governments which were at war, and whatever they chose to do they could do in the way of confining the messages to those connected with the war or to those that they considered were the most important. Under the present arrangement the government are losing that control. I suppose they have considered that fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They saw to it that British control would be assured.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is British private control, which is very good, I admit, but it is not government control.

Mr. VENIOT: There are two government directors on the board.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How many directors are there altogether?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Canada had two directors on the Pacific cable board and that did not prevent this extraordinary duplication of the cable. I suppose that feature of the case has been very carefully considered. The trouble was largely accentuated by the action of the Pacific cable board in duplicating this long cable and the inaction of the Canadian government in not preventing the duplication. I find that there is a great deal of difference of opinion in Great Britain in regard to this subject. I have under my hand the report of the proceedings in the British House of Commons of Thursday, November 22 last, when Mr. Ramsay MacDonald took strong exception to the report of the commission and to the action that the British government is taking in regard to it. He moved this motion in the British house:

> That this house declines to assent to the second reading of a bill which sacrifices public utility to private gain by disposing of valuable state undertakings to private interests, and is of opinion that the introduction by the government of such a measure in the last days of a dying parliament violates sound constitutional practice.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is a very important man in the old country and he may be even more important yet; one does not know. But it is a pretty serious amendment for him to move on a matter of this kind which is not a public question except in regard to the use of the cable in case of necessity.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was he not an active leader of a strong opposition when he moved that amendment?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is perfectly true.

Mr. STEVENS: Have oppositions no rights?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He thought he would oppose.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Oppositions are often right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sometimes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I will not go further into the debate in the British house except to say that there was a speech made by Sir Hamar Greenwood and according to the report in The Times, which is usually very accurate, he said, referring to the conference:

> It owed its existence to the competition of the post office beam system with the Pacific cable board, which was subsidized by Canada, Australia, and other parts of the empire.
> The post office was undercutting the imperial cable, and the position became so acute and ridiculous that the prime ministers in Canada and New Zealand insisted upon this conference being convened.

I would like to ask the minister whether Sir Hamar Greenwood spoke in any sense officially for the Canadian government?

Mr. VENIOT: My recollection is that Canada asked for the conference.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Did Sir Hamar Greenwood speak in any way officially for the Post Office Department?

Mr. VENIOT: He had no authority from me. He may have been stating what he thought was a fact or something like that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am quite sure he said what he thought was a fact, but I was wondering whether it had any foundation. I asked some questions about this matter and on February 20, this reply was made by the Postmaster General:

Negotiations are in progress.

That means, as I understand it, that they had not been completed, but in the file which the minister laid on the table yesterday, I find that there was a cable last summer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps the Postmaster General has it under his hand.

Mr. VENIOT: I have one dated July 19, 1928. Would that be the one?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It said that the proposal was acceptable to the Canadian government. I have not the wording.

Mr. VENIOT: I will read it for the information of my hon. friend. It reads:

Canadian government have given careful consideration to the report of July 6 of Imperial Wireless and Cable conference. The recommendations made by the conference, which include assumption by the Communications Company of the annual service of the outstanding debt on the Pacific cable board as on the 1st April, 1928, and payment in addition of a capital sum of £517,000 for the Pacific cables, together with interest at 5 per cent as from April 1, 1928, are approved generally by us.

And then it goes on: I will try to get the conclusion.

In assuming all the liabilities of the Pacific cable board it is clearly understood that the Communications Company take over the land line leases between the board and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company together with such obligations as they entail throughout Canada. His Majesty's government in Canada assume that the Communications Company will continue to own and operate the two imperial Atlantic cables between Canada and Great Britain. The government of Canada further note that the West Indian cables are to be sold for £300,000, which relieves the Canadian government in this connection of any further liability.

That cannot be the one?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think so. It says earlier in the cable the terms were acceptable.

Mr. VENIOT: I will read that part again:

The recommendations made by the conference which include assumption by the Communications Company of the annual service of the outstanding debt on the Pacific cable board as on the 1st April, 1928, and payment in addition of a capital sum of £517,000 for the Pacific cables, together with interest at 5 per cent as from April 1, 1928, are approved generally by us.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but may I say that whoever prepared this answer to me which was given on the 20th of February was not very frank, because this was not information which needed to be held back at all.

Mr. VENIOT: What does the answer say?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: After explaining about the Imperial Telegraphs Act, which received the royal assent on February 5, 1929, providing for so and so, it says, "Negotiations are in progress." That is not a frank answer.

Mr. VENIOT: We have not accepted it yet.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the date of the agreement which the minister is reading?

Mr. VENIOT: July 19, 1928. There is no hard and fast agreement, if I may use that term, which has been signed as yet.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Whoever prepared this answer that was given to me was not very frank, because there was no necessity for withholding that information. I would suggest that they might have said: The terms have been accepted by the government. The government had accepted the terms months ago.

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Your government accepted them in July of last year.

Mr. VENIOT: They were acceptable but the whole thing is not concluded yet. We do not know what the other contracting parties may do. This thing may have to be gone over somewhat further yet.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In other words, the government is bound, but the Postmaster General does not think it is bound. The government has agreed to accept it, but the Postmaster General thinks there must be something more to be done about it.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh no, nothing of the kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Postmaster General is right. The bill which has passed the British house to give effect to this agreement says that the agreement will have to receive the assent of the various government-partners. so consent either by the government or by parliament is necessary on our part.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Your government gave consent last summer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, not to the agreement.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; your government accepted the agreement. The Postmaster General has just read the despatch of last summer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was in the course of negotiation. My hon. friend surely knows that when the bill sets forth that there must be formal assent by Canada and all the other governments, that assent must be given after an agreement is finally reached.

Mr. VENIOT: The words are "approved generally by us."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly. That was during the negotiations.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is one of the points I am trying to get at. I asked last session whether it was the intention of the government to introduce into parliament any legislation in connection with this matter, and the reply was, "The necessity for concurring legislation is under consideration." I take it that the despatch of the 19th of July last definitely commits this government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It states the amount that is to be paid, and the terms, and it says that the recommendations are approved generally by us. In business that would be something that would have to be lived up to. Has this government the power to sell this cable without reference to parliament? I would like to know what the exact position is in that regard. This is a great public undertaking, and without criticizing the arrangement, which I am not doing at the moment at all, it is quite evident that everybody on the other side of the Atlantic does not agree that it is a wise thing to part with this government-owned property, which in the late war was of inestimable value to Great Britain and all the dominions, as well as to our allies. Everybody in Great Britain does not think it is wise that this government-owned cable should be operated by a private company.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The government there is a pretty safe government so far as loyalty to the empire is concerned.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Absolutely; there is no doubt about that, and I do not think that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is disloyal to the empire either.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But there is a difference of opinion about this matter. Now has this government the power to agree to part with that cable without coming to parliament? I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that it has not. It does not seem right that this great public asset could be disposed of by the government without special legislation. That is the point I want to be enlightened on to-day. It does not seem like a simple, ordinary executive act which is all that a government, I take it, is empowered to do, unless they have special authority under some statute. This is not a simple executive act at all, and I question very much whether it was fair of the government to go as far as they have done without having some discussion in the house and letting us hear something about the matter. I take it that the government is now committed, and if they bring down legislation their supporters could not oppose it without expressing non-confidence in the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure my hon. friend will support it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would first like to get a little more explanation than I have received to-day. I would ask the Minister of Justice, does he consider that the government has any power to part with this cable without the authority of parliament, and does he not think that the government has gone too far already in that direction in agreeing to the terms of this arrangement? What does the government intend to do about it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: With regard to the first part of the remarks of my hon. friend in which he stated that the government of Canada should have opposed the duplication of that part of the cable from Fiji to British Columbia a few years ago—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: They should have prevented it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may say to my hon. friend that the Postmaster General at that time took not only a firm stand but what I heard described as a very aggressive stand against that duplication of the cable. He pointed out—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: To whom?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To whoever was concerned in the old country. There were communications—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but may I put it this way? He pointed out to the Pacific cable board and to the chairman of that board—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know he did.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But I say that there was an authority higher than the chairman of the Pacific cable board, and that is the place where he should have made his protest.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Speaking from memory, he spoke to a higher authority than the Pacific cable board, but they claimed that they had authority to use the profits—there were profits at the time—for the purpose of improving the property. I have here the statute of 1899, setting out the powers of the board. It says:

> The commissioners shall have full power to administer the affairs of the board and to carry on the undertaking in trust for the benefit of the said governments.

I suppose they assumed that that gave them sufficient power. I was present myself at some of the meetings which took place during the imperial conference of 1926, and I know that that was their stand, and not only that of the members of the board, because at the time we were dealing with governments; we were meeting the representatives of the British government and the representatives of the other partner governments, namely, Australia and New Zealand. The stand taken there was that the act of 1899 fully empowered them to use those profits to improve the property. We did not agree with them, and we made it certain that in the act to be introduced at the following session to embody the new arrangement it would be provided that they could have no power in future to duplicate the cable or to use the profits otherwise than with the consent of all the partner governments, and not merely at the will of a majority of the board. That was embodied in the following statute.

But events have proved that the stand taken by the Canadian Postmaster General at the time was right. The establishment of the beam wireless station had the effect of cutting down considerably the profits of the Pacific cable board. So much so that while in 1926-27 the profits were £100,000, the following year, 1927-28, they came down to £42,000, and for the current year, 1928-29, it is anticipated there will be no profit at all. I may say that from the inception of the cable board until 1916 deficits were accumulated, and Canada had to pay her share of those deficits. The profits came from 1916 until a couple of years ago, and it is those profits which were used for the purpose of duplicating the cable. We thought also at the time that part of these profits should have been used for the purpose of reimbursing what the partner governments had paid as their share of the loss. However, it is true, as my friend suggested, that Canada asked that there should be some conference for the purpose of meeting that new situation, because we were faced with other deficits and heavy losses. I believe that as a result of this conference a satisfactory arrangement has been made. My friend says that the cable will be no longer under the governments' control. That is true. But the arrangement has been made in such a way that British control will always be retained. Then there is the imperial advisory committee, which will have supervision not only of the rates but of the various matters of administration on which the governments participating are represented.

Now, as far as the financial arrangements are concerned, this new company is going to assume all the capital obligations of the Pacific cable board, and I may say that the capital had really been provided by the British government. We merely had our share, and we were paying our share of the deficits.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Loaned by the British government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, loaned by the British government. The merger is going to assume all those capital obligations and pay a sum of £717,000, which will be divided among the partners proportionately, Canada receiving $700,000. Canada has paid during the period of the deficits, namely, between 1903 and 1916, about $900,000. So we will practically get back all our losses and be relieved of future deficits.

As to the necessity of an act of this parliament, my friend may be right. The imperial act which embodies this new agreement says that it shall come into force after the consent of the partner governments shall have been given. My friend may be right that in a question of this importance it would be better to have an act of parliament rather than a mere executive act by way of order in council. However, the question has just been submitted to the Department of Justice, and it is being given consideration at this time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Postmaster General was not in a position to give us information as to who controls the beam system.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Post Office Department in Great Britain, and the Amalgamated Wireless—I think that is the name—in Australia, the Australian government owning half of the property.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is, the competitor in this case was the government-owned and controlled system, the beam system.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who controls the beam system now under the new arrangement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This company.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then we have deliberately given away a publicly-owned beam system of a very superior nature to a private company, and this government has lent itself to one of the grossest scandals that has ever been before the British public.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know where the Minister of Justice gets his figures. I have been looking up the British Hansard to find out about the question, and I hoped when the papers were tabled in connection with the merger we might have had some information avaialble for the house. These papers were not tabled until eleven o'clock last night, and except for two or three minutes this afternoon I have not had an opportunity to study their contents. It is rather unfair, Mr. Chairman, to ask the house to discuss a question of this importance when we have so little information before us. It was at the end of February when I asked for the tabling of these papers, but not until eleven o'clock last night were they available. I asked the question be laid over until Monday for discussion, but the Postmaster General preferred to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will admit that we are discussing the question simply because it has been raised. We could wait until the bill has been presented.

Mr. HEAPS: I asked the Postmaster General to-day to allow the matter to stand over until Monday, but he said he preferred to go on this afternoon.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman will have plenty of time to discuss it again when the bill comes up.

Mr. HEAPS: But it is only a few moments since we were told that the bill was to come before us. We should have had that bill in the house months ago, not towards the end of the session. If the matter had not been raised perhaps no bill would have been introduced at all.

Now, let me go into the figures presented by the Minister of Justice. He has told us what Canada will receive. I am trying to compare his figures with those presented to the British House of Commons, which are as follows: the first Pacific cable in 1902 cost $10,000,000; the duplicate cable of 1926 cost $13,600,000. According to the arrangement made with this new merger, the price to be paid for these two cables is $2,885,000, plus the deficit of $6,165,000, which is outstanding. Or, to put it in other words, for these two Pacific cables there is going to be paid the sum of $8,750,000—that is to say, $8,750,000 for something which cost $23,600,000. I have to reconcile the figures of the Minister of Justice with the figures given in the British House of Commons. It appears to me that the new company is paying approximately one-third of the cost of the two Pacific cables.

Another very important factor is that since 1924, when the post office in Canada protested against the duplication of the Pacific cable service, and after the other cable had been put down and was found not to be paying, the Post Office Department here gave, I understand, a license to a private company to operate a beam system between Canada and Australia, which is in direct competition with these two Pacific cables. If that is so, is there any wonder that there will be an added deficit in respect to these two Pacific cables? I cannot understand the logic of this government giving to a private utility so valuable an asset as the right of beam communication between Canada and Australia to compete with our own cables in which we are so vitally interested.

I have been trying, from the files that have been submitted, to get at the reason for the calling of this conference but I find there very little which affords me any satisfaction in regard to that particular question. What has the beam system done? When it came into operation in 1924 it completely revolutionized the whole system of communication. Just exactly in the same way as the automobile revolutionized transportation, so is the beam wireless system to-day revolutionizing the whole problem of communication. Under the old cable system, I believe, they were able to transmit messages at the rate of approximately twenty-five to forty words per minute; under this new beam wireless system they are able to transmit at the rate of 200 words per minute. And not only that; it does it at a much lower cost than under the ordinary cable system. The new system has reached such a state of perfection that it is possible to send messages with a considerable degree of secrecy.

But Canada in her communication with other parts of the world has as yet derived no advantage from this invention. As between England and Australia there has been a reduction in the cost of messages; there has been a similar reduction in practically all parts of the world except to and from Canada. I cannot understand why every other country can get the advantage of an invention of this character except this Dominion, and I am inclined to think that one of the reasons why Canada has not had the advantage of this beam system is the fact that on the eastern coast we have the Canadian Marconi system in control, while on the western coast we have given in the past few years a license to a private concern to operate a beam system between this country and other parts of the world. I believe the beam system has cut down the cost by about one-third.

It appears further that this matter of inter-imperial communication has gone into the hands of a private corporation which is of an international character. It may be all very well for the minister or anyone else in this house to say that the matter is going to be under British control, but I venture to assert that right at this very moment, while the question is under discussion in this house, a very large percentage of the ownership and possibly the control of this communication is in the hands of interests with headquarters in the United States, possibly in France and possibly in Belgium. According to statements made in the British House of Commons, the fountainhead of this new trust that has been formed is the firm of Lazard Brothers, international bankers, with headquarters in London and Paris. They control not merely international communication, but also large hydro-electric enterprises, and they are also interested in the firm, in Quebec and other parts of Canada, which is involved in the Canadian Marconi system.

It can be shown—and when the time comes it will be shown in this house—that this huge trustification is part of a tremendous organization which has to do with the control of communication, industry, finance and commerce; and it will be shown moreover that the same organization is interested in radio, in newspapers and in various other forms of communication. I cannot for the life of me understand why Sir Campbell Stuart was appointed by the Canadian government to represent Canada at the conference held in London. I do not know what his special qualifications were except that he might have been a director of The Times newspaper, which I understand is in some way connected with some of these international organizations which are interested in intercommunication within the empire and between other countries. These things have all come out in the discussions that have taken place in Great Britain, but in this country so far nothing has been said about the matter. In Great Britain the Labour party have looked upon this as a question of supreme importance; of so serious a nature do they consider it that when the matter came up for discussion in the House of Commons they declared that, should they come into power, they would at the first opportunity repudiate the contract which had been entered into between the British government and the new company which had been formed. It seems to me that when a party which is likely to come into power in Great Britain in the very near future makes a statement of that kind that statement should be heeded by the government of this Dominion. The Canadian government should have been careful before entering into such a scheme as I have indicated. But what did they do? According to the submission which I find in the report tabled, the Canadian representative was given certain instructions dated from Ottawa the 22nd day of December, 1927. Therein there appears this rather significant paragraph:

> Owing to the inquiry having been extended to include the eastward cable route from Great Britain to Australia and the competing wireless, so that it will not be limited to the Pacific cable and competing wireless, the whole cable and wireless question will be in the melting pot. If a consolidation under either public or private auspices, of Eastern Extension, Pacific Cable and Marconi (Canadian, Australian, etc.),—in other words, a common purse on a wide scale, is proposed, this aspect of the question will require further consideration.

It is evident to me, according to the statement made in this report tabled last night, that the government at the close of 1927 had some idea that the whole question of imperial intercommunication was going to go into the melting pot and that probably out of that there would emerge something of a new character.

The minister has stated that there will be a certain amount of control on the part of the government, but he has not told us what the nature of that control will be. And that is an important question. As I understand it—and I believe I am correct in the statement—there is to be a board of thirteen persons and on this board there are to be two representatives of this government. On a board consisting of thirteen members two representatives of the government cannot exercise very much control.

It appears to me that this question became acute when the British government owned the beam system, which became perfected about 1924, and which was responsible for such competition that the privately owned cable services found it impossible to continue. Then what happened? The logical thing was for the government to take over the weaker system, but instead of that the weaker system took over the government system and unfortunately Canada became a party to that transaction. I am very sorry the government have taken that stand; I think they should have insisted that the various governments own and control this beam system together with the cable services, so that the profits which will be made by the private company would have been obtained by the governments.

Just to illustrate how this works out I would like to quote one or two instances. Before the beam system was perfected Marconi shares in Great Britain slumped to about 13 shillings each. Immediately it became known that these systems were about to be transferred to private ownership, with the Marconi Company having a large interest in that ownership, these shares jumped from about 13 shillings to 72 shillings per share. Those are the figures according to the London stock exchange. That was not a bad bargain for the private company; the government practically gave away one of their greatest assets to a private corporation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is my hon. friend saying that the Pacific cable was at that time an asset to Canada?

Mr. HEAPS: With the beam system it would have been an asset; I do not think the contrary can be proved. This act of giving away the property of the people of this country for one-third its cost is a serious matter, involving both the question of the bargain made by the government and a question of principle. I claim that the government made a poor bargain, and I further claim that on principle the ownership of communications such as these should not have been relinquished in favour of a private corporation.

I am very glad to have the assurance of the Minister of Justice that a bill in connection with this matter will be introduced in this house; I hope when it comes before us it will be sent to one of the standing committees of the house in order that we may have an opportunity of discussing the contract entered into by this government with this private corporation which in future, if the bill goes through, will own and control these assets. I hope the minister will assure the house that when the bill is brought in it will go to one of the standing committees, where the matter may be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. GEARY: There is one matter to which I would like to direct the attention of the Postmaster General; I refer to the case of a man named Kirk, who was a letter carrier in Toronto. Some little time ago Kirk was arrested and charged with theft; he was tried and acquitted. However, the department dismissed this man, and in this connection I would like to read a paragraph from a letter dated July 27, 1928, written by the Postmaster General to Kirk's father:

> This case has been discussed by the officials of the department, and while your son was acquitted by the jury of the offences with which he was charged, there is no doubt whatever that he mistreated mail entrusted to him for delivery. In the interests of the public service, therefore, the department cannot do otherwise than remove his name from the list of employees.

There is just one other letter which I would like to read, dated March 2 of this year, also written by the Postmaster General to Kirk's father after Mr. Kirk apparently had written the Prime Minister:

> In reply I beg to say that I have gone carefully into the matter and while it is true that your son was not convicted by the court of the charge of stealing letters which was made against him, he was only discharged on a legal technicality.

I do not quite see how the Postmaster General could make that statement; after all, the man was found not guilty by the jury, and it was not a technicality in the sense of the man being charged under a wrong name or something of that sort. I gather that what the Postmaster General meant was that it was a question of the balance of doubt, or something of that kind.

I am not suggesting that the minister may not have had cause for dismissing this man; apparently Kirk had taken some letters on his second delivery in the morning and, finding himself unable to deliver them on that round, put them in another pocket on the bag he carried intending to deliver them in the afternoon. I do not know anything of the circumstances of the case; I do not know whether this man gave satisfactory or unsatisfactory service. Nothing of that kind appears in the correspondence, but the unfortunate result is that while the Postmaster General no doubt was within his rights in dismissing the man, Kirk contributed to the superannuation fund, from which he will not derive any benefit, and he is out of pocket to the extent of such contribution. The case seems a little hard; this man actually stood trial after the department elected to settle the case in court. This man was brought before a jury; no doubt he was properly prosecuted and properly defended and the jury found him not guilty. So I would submit that as far as one can see from the file, that should have been the end of the matter.

Kirk might have been kept under surveillance for a time, or something of that sort; at all events a jury of his peers said he was not guilty, and unfortunately he has lost his position, which naturally carries with it a certain amount of odium, even after his acquittal. He is out of pocket not only to the extent of his salary but also to the amount of something like $250 which he contributed to the superannuation fund. From what fund that amount could be returned to him I do not know, but his father is pressing the matter very strongly. I do not happen to know these people personally; they are at least close to my constituency, if not actually within it; perhaps I should know them but I am quite content to take the correspondence as it is without pursuing the matter further personally. However, I would suggest to the Postmaster General that on paper the rights in this case seem to be with the man, who now finds himself in a most unfortunate position. I would like to feel that the Postmaster General could make the matter right in one way or the other.

Mr. VENIOT: I remember that case quite well; I went into it quite thoroughly on the report of the superintendent at Toronto. When I stated in my letter that Kirk was not found guilty owing to a technicality I may not have used the proper term, but these are the circumstances: It was proved before the court that this man did have letters in his possession which he had no right to have.

Mr. GEARY: We admitted that.

Mr. VENIOT: He had mail matter in his possession which he had no right to have. We had been conducting a survey of certain routes in that vicinity and it was discovered that this man was not delivering his mail matter as he should have. He was taking the mail matter to his home or to some other place and not delivering it and we felt that we had a case against him and he was arrested.

Mr. GEARY: He did not take it to his home; he had it with him in another pocket of his bag.

Mr. VENIOT: He had no right to do that.

Mr. GEARY: That is quite right.

Mr. VENIOT: The officials had him arrested and he was tried. I understand that there was not sufficient evidence to prove intent and he was dismissed. There was sufficient evidence in the possession of our officials at Toronto to convince them that this man should not be continued in the service; that decision was reported to me and I approved of it. So far as the retention of the retirement fund payments is concerned, I did endeavour to see if it would be possible to have returned to him the amount which he had contributed to the fund. However, I have been advised that where an individual is dismissed from the service for cause, the payments cannot be returned. That seems to me to be rather harsh and severe but I cannot do anything else than abide by the law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there any discretion on the part of the treasury board?

Mr. VENIOT: I think there may be some way of doing it and I intend to see if it cannot be done. There are four or five similar cases and I intend to see if it cannot be done by way of a compassionate allowance approved by the treasury board. I think they have that power and an order in council could be passed.

Mr. GEARY: Do I understand the minister to say that he will use his efforts to obtain that?

Mr. VENIOT: I am looking into these cases to see if there is any way of doing that.

Mr. GEARY: I trust the Postmaster General will bear in mind that there was some suspicion against the man and he could have been dismissed after the investigation by the department. You elected to charge him before the court; you took the course which seemed to you to be the right one; it was not successful, but you dismissed him notwithstanding the decision of the court. The grounds for dismissal had not been proved at his trial and you did not choose to dismiss him before you had him charged with theft. It seems to me that there is very little against him in the department.

Mr. VENIOT: It was in the hands of the law before I knew of it and I could not interfere.

Mr. GEARY: I think it can be arranged in some such way as the minister suggests and I assume I may say that the minister is taking it up with a view to obtaining reimbursement in the amount of the contribution?

Mr. LADNER: I presume we are still under the heading of salaries and allowances. The other day I rose to make some observations with respect to the mail service by air and I would ask if such discussion is now in order?

The CHAIRMAN: Strictly speaking, I do not think it is in order. When this resolution was first moved in the committee it was decided by the committee that we should take it item by item. The discussion got along this afternoon to the third item and I suggest that we consider and pass the first item.

Mr. LADNER: I desire strongly to support the stand taken by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) with respect to the minimum wage for civil service employees now receiving under $100 per month. The merit of the claim and the justice of the case has been thoroughly discussed in the house and I cannot add anything further to the discussion, it speaks so plainly for itself, but I desire to support the plea which has been made here.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Last session I drew the attention of the house to the dismissal of some nine or ten postmasters in the vicinity of where I live. I have no intention of opening up these cases again, but I was not able to place all the facts before the house during the forty minutes allowed me and I desire to ask the Postmaster General a question or two.

I made a motion for the production of the files regarding the various dismissals but I find that they contain nothing whatever to indicate the reason for the dismissals. The Postmaster General told me at the time that he had the letters indicating the reasons in a private file, but there was nothing in the papers produced and the postmasters do not know why they were dismissed. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if the letters which he received in connection with certain post offices and making recommendations for changes are considered private or if they should not be public letters and become part of the file which could be produced in response to a motion carried by this house.

Mr. VENIOT: Up till about two months ago I did consider that that type of letter was private and could not be produced, but from discussion in the house and from the consensus of opinion expressed and the interpretation of the rules given I must acknowledge that perhaps I was wrong. From that time on I feel certain that that class of letter was placed on the file but last year I was not treating such correspondence in that way.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think the minister will recognize that if that is the rule to-day it was the rule last year, and I would like to know if he would produce the letters now to complete the files which were laid on the table last year.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. member state just what files he has reference to? I do not think this is the proper way of putting the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the minister say that he will deliver the letters?

Mr. VENIOT: You name the files and I will see what I can do.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I will do that. In at least one of the cases I had reference to the postmaster asked for a hearing. Certain charges were made against this man and he demanded a hearing which was refused him; in fact, his letters were never replied to. I would like to ask the Postmaster General what his policy is in a case like that. Is he prepared to give the man a hearing before some official?

Mr. VENIOT: That depends entirely upon whether or not it is an official report upon which I am acting. If it is not an official report, I would certainly feel disposed to grant a hearing. If it is an official report from one of our superintendents, I do not consider I have any right to grant an investigation after one of our sworn officials has inspected an office, gone into all the circumstances and made a report thereon.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In this particular case no inspection of the office was made, and the file that has been produced shows no report from an official upon the conduct of the postmaster or the operation of the office.

Mr. VENIOT: Why does the hon. gentleman not give the name of the post office so that the Postmaster General may have an opportunity of dealing with the matter? He has been talking about several post offices and he has not named any.

Mr. CAMPBELL: This particular one is Nut Mountain, Saskatchewan; but I just wanted the minister's ruling so as to know where he stands in regard to similar cases in the future. Do I understand that the Postmaster General will give a hearing in a case of that kind?

Mr. VENIOT: I will deal with every case on its merits and if I feel that any particular case should have a hearing, I will grant it. I think I ought to be left to be the judge on a report that comes from an inspector. If I cannot trust my inspectors, I can trust nobody

Mr. CAMPBELL: In this particular case there is no report from the inspector at all.

Mr. VENIOT: Why does the hon. member not name the post office?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I did name it. It is Nut Mountain, Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to get some information from the Postmaster General not in regard to dismissals this time, but in regard to appointments. I understand that all positions that receive a payment of less than $200 per annum do not come under the Civil Service Commission. We have heard a good deal during the past week in regard to the fact that appointments made by the Civil Service Commission are sometimes accepted and sometimes not, but with regard to those positions for which the payment is less than $200, what is the usual practice in the matter of finding out who are the proper people to fill such positions? Is this done either directly by the minister or indirectly through his officials? Does he usually apply to the members representing the particular constituency, or what is the practice?

Mr. VENIOT: There are several ways of finding out who is the proper person to fill a position. I do not think I should be called upon to reveal my ways of finding out whom I should appoint to a small office of that kind. Sometimes we do it through a report of the inspector. For instance, I will cite a case in point that has just reached me. I will not give any names, but it is in connection with a post office in the western country. The postmaster makes up his mind all at once to resign and he notifies the superintendent. The superintendent gets in touch with the department by wire stating that a vacancy is going to occur at that place. He notifies us that he is going there to see how he can straighten things out. He gets there and he places a man temporarily in charge until the appointment is made, even though the position is not under the Civil Service Commission. That temporary appointment is made because the retiring postmaster wishes to get away. That temporary appointee is left in charge until a decision is reached to make a permanent appointment. There are cases where I might consult individuals whom I know in the district. I do not know whether I should really have to call upon and consult members representing constituencies who are not favourably disposed toward the administration of which I am a member. I do not think our hon. friends opposite would do that. I do not say that I would not do it, but I do not think that I should be called upon to say whether I would or would not do it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is unnecessary to say so, is it not?

Mr. SPENCER: Although the Postmaster General did not deliberately tell the committee that he preferred to fill those small positions through political appointments, at the same time he went pretty nearly that far. I am not interested from a patronage point of view; that is the last thing I want to have anything to do with. What I am interested in is in seeing that service is given in the rural districts, especially where postmasters are appointed to those small positions. I have in mind a position that was to be filled by such a man who was to give service to a rural community. This position was held open for a considerable time and no service was given to that community because the officials of the Postmaster General, no doubt under authority from him, did not allow anybody to fill that particular position, and instead of getting in touch with the local member, myself in this case, who might have been in a position to give the Postmaster General some information and who would not be interested in filling the position from a partisan point of view—

Mr. VENIOT: No; my hon. friend would not!

Mr. SPENCER: I would like to remind the minister that not only did he not consult the sitting member, but he went back, not to the last election but to the one prior to that, in order to consult the defeated Liberal candidate. That defeated Liberal candidate happened to live eighty or ninety miles away from the place; he knew nothing about the district; he happened to be busy with his own affairs and he did not reply. The result was that the position was left vacant week after week until the people at last became desperate and wrote to me, their member, to find out what was wrong with the department. I am not interested in filling this position from a political point of view, but I am interested in seeing that service is given to that community, and if the Postmaster General, through his officials, wants to fill a position where they know of nobody in particular and have no reason to ask for any special candidate, they should find ways and means of filling it quickly to the best of their ability instead of going to a candidate in an election of three or four years ago, a man who lives ninety miles away, does not know the district, and cannot give advice.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the name of the post office to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. SPENCER: Morecambe. I have the file of correspondence on my desk and I know all about the matter.

Mr. VENIOT: I will look into it.

Mr. SPENCER: I might say that the position is now filled, but it was held up for a considerable time before it was filled.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under this item there has been a good deal of discussion with regard to the Pacific cable board. That discussion was interrupted by some of these other cases. There are certain facts that I should like to bring out in connection with the matter, but I shall not insist on doing it now if it is understood that the action of the government will come under review in connection with the presentation of a bill and that we shall have an opportunity, by reference of the bill to a committee, of going into the details of the case.

The CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend will have another opportunity, on the third item in this very resolution, to discuss the Pacific cable.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The discussion has been started.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say this to my hon. friend; no formal decision has been reached. I am inclined to think that a bill is necessary, but in any case my hon. friend will certainly be given the opportunity he desires. I think I may safely say that it will be by way of a bill.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister tell the committee how long the vacancy in the postmastership at Summerland, British Columbia, will continue? The answer to the inquiry that I made to the Post Office Department is that, although the Civil Service Commission has selected an appointee, the appointment is held up on the instructions of the Postmaster General. Could he tell the committee why it is being held up and when the appointment will be made?

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. VENIOT: I have not the file here and I could not say offhand because, of course, I cannot carry all these details in my head, but I assure the hon. gentleman that I will go right into the question of the Summerland postmastership and see that there is no further time lost.

Mr. STIRLING: And will the minister be good enough to communicate with me?

Mr. VENIOT: I will let the hon. gentleman know when there is a decision taken in the matter.

Item agreed to.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $16,305,000.

Mr. LADNER: May I inquire whether any portion of this $16,305,000 is to be expended in British Columbia in connection with the mail service by air?

Mr. VENIOT: Not this year. At the present time we are having surveys made by the Department of National Defence to see the best way of reaching Vancouver or some part of British Columbia from Winnipeg.

Mr. LADNER: Has a survey not been made?

Mr. VENIOT: It is not yet completed. They have to get over those mountains and through the passes. Our intention is to extend the air service to within twenty miles of Banff, and connect up there with the train service, rushing the mail across the continent to the coast, but it will be impossible for us to connect up this year with Vancouver or any part of British Columbia beyond the mountains.

Mr. LADNER: Will the minister be able to connect up next year?

Mr. VENIOT: That is the intention; that is part of our program.

Mr. LADNER: How much of this $16,305,000 is to be expended on mail service by air?

Mr. VENIOT: $800,000.

Mr. LADNER: According to Mr. Yarrow, who is engaged in the aircraft business and apparently understands it, 458 air passenger miles were travelled in Canada in 1925 and 3,000,000 miles in 1928. That indicates the great increase there has been in aeroplane transport. In British Columbia, and on Vancouver Island in particular, a number of companies have undertaken aeroplane transportation. The service is established there, and although the minister may require a survey so far as crossing the mountains is concerned,

I submit that an air mail service can be carried on over the existing aeroplane routes because the system is already established. Have any inquiries been made along the line of taking advantage of the existing aeroplane service which operates between Vancouver, Victoria and Seattle? Why could not an air mail service be put on the system already in operation and in connection with which no survey would be required?

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is a little mistaken when he says that no survey would be required, because we never start an air mail service in any part of Canada until we have first had a survey made by the Department of National Defence as to its feasibility, and we are thoroughly informed as to the conditions to be met in regard to landings, and so forth. The only air mail service that we have pertaining to British Columbia is the one we had with the British Columbia Airways Limited, to whom we gave what is known as the sticker privilege, allowing them to carry mail for people who desired to send their mail by the company's aeroplanes, and allowing the company to charge at the rate of five cents.

Mr. LADNER: Does that still exist?

Mr. VENIOT: That privilege still exists.

Mr. LADNER: And will continue?

Mr. VENIOT: Oh yes, we will not take away that privilege.

Mr. LADNER: Between the cities of Vancouver and Victoria, for example, where there is an aeroplane service in actual operation carrying passengers, and with the capacity for carrying mail bags, how would a survey be required in connection with that service?

Mr. VENIOT: It would not be required there because the company is giving that service on its own initiative. They have no contract with us, but only the privilege of carrying mail for people who desire to use that service.

Mr. LADNER: Is any portion of the $800,000 which is to be expended on air mail service to be used by way of subsidy or aid to airports?

Mr. VENIOT: No. We have nothing at all to do with that.

Mr. LADNER: In Vancouver, the city council has submitted a by-law to the people, which we believe will pass, to provide $300,000 for the purchase of a property in or near Sea island, which has been found to be suitable by some of the officers of the Department of National Defence for an aeroplane field. The city itself has submitted that by-law to the people, and if it is passed the field will be acquired. I believe that the Minister of National Defence has announced that as a matter of policy the government is willing to provide a sum up to $10,000 for beacon lights. Can the Postmaster General through his department take any action in aiding in the establishment of airports?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no amount in our estimates for that.

Mr. LADNER: I wish to place on Hansard for the consideration of the minister a few paragraphs from the editorial columns of the Vancouver Sun, dated the 18th of April last. I might say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the Vancouver Sun, generally a champion of the interests of the city of Vancouver in preference to its party affiliations, nevertheless always supports the government in an agressive and vigorous manner at election time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Noble conduct.

Mr. LADNER: The conduct has noble aspects, but it does not always result so nobly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Unforunately.

Mr. LADNER: For the Liberal party, but not for the country.

Mr. McPHEE: Was there not a reduction from 2,000 to 80 in a by-election?

Mr. STEVENS: You are ninety miles out.

Mr. LADNER: The cause of justice and righteousness did prevail in Victoria notwithstanding the visit of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and some of his supporters. The editor of the Vancouver Sun describes the attitude of the government in these words:

The federal government, according to the estimates of Postmaster General Veniot, will spend $34,926,639 on air mail services in the Dominion.

That is an error; the amount is $16,305,000.

Toronto will be connected with Buffalo and Windsor, and nearly all sections of the east will be linked together by air mail routes.

This is a fine progressive program worthy of a progressive government.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LADNER: It falls upon sympathetic ears.

But why is there nothing in it for British Columbia?

That is what I am inquiring of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Veniot says that air mail service to the Pacific coast ports cannot be considered this year because surveys of mail routes have not yet been made.

Why should Mr. Veniot not spend part of his appropriation making those surveys at once?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot.

Mr. LADNER: Why not ?

Mr. VENIOT: Because my department has nothing at all to do with the surveying.

Mr. LADNER: He can call on other departments to do it.

Mr. VENIOT: Let the department of militia speak for itself. I have enough to do to defend my own.

Mr. LADNER: I presume the hon. minister has fully realized that he has a job defending his own department. This article continues:

> The primary purpose of this appropriation is to improve Canada's mail service. The secondary purpose is to aid and encourage commercial aviation.
> Why should the encouragement of commercial aviation be confined solely to the east of the rockies?

Will the Postmaster General answer that question?

Mr. VENIOT: I think I have already answered it, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman's opinion. I stated the reasons why we cannot go to the Pacific coast this year. In the program I brought before this house some time ago I went fully into all the contemplated routes. I went from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and I gave reasons for every one of those routes. I cannot go any further than that. All I can say is, it is impossible for us to get to the Pacific coast this year. The Pacific coast will be in our program just as soon as we can get from the department that is looking after the surveys word that they have discovered a suitable route over the mountains or through the passes, I do not know which; but whenever that is decided upon we will undertake to carry out our program in British Columbia so that we shall have a complete service from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. LADNER: I have one more question. What is the $1,200,000 to be expended on which is now provided in the estimates?

Mr. VENIOT: It will be expended on all the contracts for routes: Halifax to Montreal; Montreal to Rimouski, meeting the ocean liners and taking the transatlantic mail to Montreal, and then despatching it from Montreal to Toronto. After we get the Winnipeg route working we will continue on to Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg to Banff, or to a district within twenty miles of Banff—Canmore, I think.

Mr. STEVENS: Canmore.

Mr. VENIOT: So as to catch the fast transcontinental trains at that point. There is now a contract for air mail between Montreal and Toronto, and we are considering a contract for a similar service between Toronto and Windsor. After the Toronto-Windsor route has been in operation we expect to link up with the American net work of air mail service by means of the connecting link that the American government is undertaking from Fargo to the border of Manitoba; this will give us a direct connecting link with Winnipeg. We have routes laid out from Winnipeg to Regina as a junction point, and from there to Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, Calgary and Canmore. From Regina on the other leg of the course there will be routes to Saskatoon, North Battleford and Edmonton. Those routes are now being considered for the contracts that I have just spoken of. Those contracts will be let within the next three or four weeks. A good deal of night flying will have to be done on the route I have just named, but in the beginning we will have to use day flying until the lighting towers are placed. It takes about one month of day flying for the aviators to become acquainted with the territory. Night flying is dangerous until the aviators are thoroughly familiar with the route, and we do not want to take any risks.

Mr. LADNER: Are those government or private planes?

Mr. VENIOT: All contract.

Mr. LADNER: This money actually goes to the contractor for the service of carrying the mails?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: Not for the purchase of planes or anything of a capital nature?

Mr. VENIOT: No. The Post Office Department have two or three planes of their own, but we are not using them for those long distances. We pass them over to the department of militia at times, and they use them in the surveys.

Mr. LADNER: But if there is a service established as between Victoria and Vancouver, then arrangements can be made with the department for the carrying of mail if such arrangements do not already exist?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; that system could be put in practice at any time.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the daily cost of carrying the mail from Toronto to Montreal, each way?

Mr. VENIOT: It is on a mileage basis at the present time. I think it is a dollar a mile.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be about six hundred dollars a day?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I think the distance is about 310 miles.

Mr. STEVENS: How much mail was carried by air from Montreal to Toronto this year?

Mr. VENIOT: I have the figures here. Perhaps I may be permitted to read the full list. This is a statement showing the weight of mail carried over the various air mail routes up to April 30, 1929. For the 1928-29 season we carried 62,830 pounds of mail from Montreal to Rimouski.

Mr. STEVENS: Can you give the number of trips?

Mr. VENIOT: That is three trips a week there. It is only for the transatlantic mail. Then we have the Montreal-Ottawa route and the Montreal-Toronto route, showing the amount of mail carried for 1928-29.

Mr. STEVENS: That is for the year, is it?

Mr. VENIOT: No, that is not the complete year. I forget when we started the Toronto-Montreal service.

Mr. STEVENS: Can you give me the date approximately?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not the date.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the minister put the whole list on Hansard?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, how would it be if I handed it to Hansard now?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister says that when he proposes to initiate a new service he asks for a survey by the Department of National Defence. In determining whether or not that service will be granted do military considerations prevail or is the matter decided purely on the ground of commercial needs?

Mr. VENIOT: No military consideration whatever; so far as my department is concerned the matter is decided purely from the standpoint of commercial service.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not catch what the minister said, but I am anxious to know what routes have been decided upon between the prairie provinces and the coast. I have a telegram from Calgary in regard to the matter, and I may say that the mayor of Calgary is anxious to know. An item appeared in one of the papers to the effect that it had already been decided to go by a particular route.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not yet know what route they will go by.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister could not give the exact number of days on the Montreal-Toronto route, but taking a full year of 365 days it would represent a cost of about $5 a pound to carry the mail; and as I presume they do not run more than half the time it would mean $10 a pound. That is an enormous price.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman may have heard me make the statement on a previous occasion that we are not receiving the encouragement we should from commercial and industrial concerns so far as the Montreal-Toronto route is concerned. I think it is now improving considerably since I made that statement about three months ago and repeated it about a month since. It is not to be expected that our air mail service will give us any revenue that will meet expenses in certain sections of Canada until it has operated for a year or two. I may say however that with the average rate of 5 cents, and figuring on so many letters to the pound, it gives us around $3.60.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, very often a letter would not be of maximum weight. But what I am pointing out is this. There are three mails a day between Toronto and Montreal by fast rail and consequently there is little inducement for the merchants and others to use the more expensive mail. I am not objecting to the air mail service, but I think that before paying the subsidy of $600 a day, which is a pretty heavy one, there ought to be some ground for the establishment of the service. Rather, in my opinion, an effort should be made to stimulate the carrying of mail by air over long distances so as to provide a service which will be of value. There is no advantage in a short service.

Mr. VENIOT: That is why the Toronto-Montreal link was established, in order to have it connect up with the further long distance route to the prairie provinces. I believe it has been carried on daily since November last.

Mr. SPENCE: I was going to ask the minister how the air routes were paying, but now I understand they are not paying. Let me ask the minister this question: Deep down in his own heart does he think there is necessity for the air routes operated at the present time?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I do.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the minister think there is real necessity for the one between Toronto and Montreal considering that there are three trains a day on this route? The fact is that letters written between five and six at night in Toronto will be delivered in Montreal as soon as they can be received by air.

Mr. VENIOT: Toronto is not the only place in Canada.

Mr. SPENCE: It may be a connecting link, I admit. I do not want to deprive Toronto of an air service but we should carry on these services to pay; everything should stand on its own feet. The air service is for the accommodation of the jazz element of the country who turn night into day.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can the minister give us a list of the contracts, together with the names of the contractors, for these different routes, the prices they are receiving, and the services that each of these contractors is rendering?

Mr. VENIOT: These are the services:

Present Services

Rimouski—Montreal	2 trips per week, each way, 330 miles—$1.25 per mile. Contractors—Canadian Transcontinental Airways, Limited, Quebec City.
Montreal—Ottawa	1 trip per week each way, 110 miles—$1.25 per mile. Contractors—Canadian Transcontinental Airways Limited, Quebec City.
Montreal—Toronto	6 trips per week each way, 330 miles—$1.00 per mile. Contractors—Canadian Airways Limited, Montreal, Que.
Montreal—Albany	6 trips per week one way, 200 miles—$1.25 per mile. Contractors—Canadian Colonial Airways Limited, Montreal, Que.

Present Services—Concluded

Sioux Lookout, Gold Pines, Red Lake, Narrow Lake and Jackson Manion..	Weekly—320 miles per round trip, $160 per trip of 400 pounds and 12 cents per pound for next 350 pounds and 19 cents per pound for all in excess of 750 pounds. Contractors—Western Canada Airways Limited, Winnipeg, Man.
Lac du Bonnet to Bissett and Wadhope..	Semi-weekly—82 miles. $6,000 per annum and 10 cents per pound for all mail over 400 pounds. Contractors—Western Canada Airways Limited, Winnipeg, Man.
Kississing and The Pas..	Weeky—100 miles. $50 per trip, limit of weight 100 pounds. Contractors—Western Canada Airways Limited, Winnipeg, Man.
Leamington—Pelee Island..	6 trips per week, 22 miles, $32.00 per trip. Contractors—London Air Transport Limited, London, Ont.
La Malbaie—Seven Islands—Anticosti..	La Malbaie—Seven Islands—weekly, 260 miles, limit of weight 1,500 pounds per week.
Moncton—Magdalen Islands..	An extension of 120 miles to Anticosti four times per season, with a limit of weight of 1,500 pounds per trip. Moncton—Magdalen Islands—weekly, 200 miles, limit of weight per trip 700 pounds. Contractors—Canadian Transcontinental Airways Limited, Quebec City.
Moncton—Charlottetown..	Weekly, 110 miles, limit of weight 300 pounds per trip. Contractors—Canadian Transcontinental Airways Limited, Quebec City.

The Moncton-Charlottetown service was instituted in an emergency as a result of an accident to the ferry boat and it was kept on for six or seven weeks until the mails got regularly going again.

Proposed Services

Toronto—Windsor.
Toronto—Buffalo.
Calgary—Winnipeg.
Edmonton, North Battleford, Saskatoon—Regina.
Winnipeg—Fargo, U.S.A.
Mackenzie River.

For the information of the committee I may say that last winter we sent mail from the head of steel, nearly 400 miles from Edmonton, 775 miles into that frozen Mackenzie river region I think once a fortnight, where previously they never had received mail except once each winter.

Halifax, Saint John, Megantic, Montreal.
Special exhibition or experimental flights.

We made a special exhibition flight from Montreal to Toronto last year and did not lose any money by it; we also established a special western provinces service during the holiday season and came out very well. That is about all the information.

Mr. SPENCE: About what is the flying time between Montreal and Toronto and between Ottawa and Toronto, and what time do the planes leave?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not that information, but I know that under the contract they travel at a cruising speed of 110 miles per hour.

Mr. SPENCE: And at what time of the day do they leave Montreal and Toronto? I do not think the public know very much about this air mail service, and this is the way to give them the information.

Mr. VENIOT: I am told they leave about 1.30 in the afternoon, in order to make the last delivery.

Mr. SPENCE: That mail would arrive too late to be delivered to business offices either in Montreal or in Toronto. Should they not leave at 11 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. VENIOT: You cannot very well do that; you must make connection with trains coming from other directions. We are not carrying on this service for the benefit of Toronto alone.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Were these contracts let after tenders had been invited?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In each case?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): To the lowest tenderer in each case?

Mr. VENIOT: I think the only case in which there was not a competition was at Leamington. A company was doing business there and the people of the island, the company and the department made a three-cornered arrangement, so no tenders were invited.

Mr. ERNST: Are these tenders advertised publicly, or are tenders requested privately?

Mr. VENIOT: They were not public tenders.

Mr. ERNST: I think the minister should put on record the names of those who were asked to tender in each case and the amounts of the tenders.

Mr. VENIOT: That can be done.

Mr. ERNST: I will ask the minister to do it.

Mr. VENIOT: I will not be able to do it to-day; I could not secure the information so soon.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CALVERT MITCHELL CARRUTHERS

The house in committee on Bill No. 96, for the relief of Calvert Mitchell Carruthers—Mr. Sanderson—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are two questions of procedure in these cases to which I desire to call attention. When this question was up before, the Chairman declared out of order an amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). On May 1 of last year when the Deputy Speaker was in the chair I moved an amendment in precisely the same form, but which was voted down by the house. I must confess that the house is left in a very awkward position when an amendment regarded a year ago as being in accordance with the rules is now declared out of order. If I should introduce an amendment to-night I should like to know whether it will be in order; whether the precedent of Monday night or of May 1, 1928, is to rule.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will have to move his amendment and send it in writing to the Chair to be passed upon.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The other day the Chairman ruled the amendment of the member for Rosetown out of order on the ground that it was not in harmony with the British North America Act, and we tried at the time to get from the Minister of Justice some statement with regard to this whole situation which might possibly clear the air. Is the Minister of Justice prepared to-night to make a statement in regard to this very important question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Since the question was raised last week I made it a point to look into this matter and I have come to the conclusion that provisions for alimony or for the maintenance of the wife and children are matters concerning property and civil rights and should be left to the provinces. The power to legislate concerning marriage does not mean the power to legislate concerning the consequences flowing from marriage. Marriage and divorce come within the federal jurisdiction by virtue of section 91 of the British North America Act. Had these matters not been covered by that section of the act they would have certainly remained within the jurisdiction of the provinces under the classification of civil rights. Being an exception I think they should be construed strictly, and that is the view which has been accepted by parliament since confederation. I can find only one case in which a different view was held; it was back in 1879 in what was called the Campbell case. The husband had applied for a divorce the previous year and his application had been refused. In 1879 the wife applied for a divorce. She was not applying for what is known as a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, she did not desire the marriage to be annulled altogether but simply that a separation be granted so that she could live apart from her husband and be granted alimony for the support of herself and the children. There was a very long and strenuous debate in both houses of parliament, but the bill went through by a majority in both the Senate and the House of Commons. Still, I find in the reports that it was opposed by such constitutional authorities as Mr. Mills, who afterwards became Minister of Justice, and Sir John A. Macdonald. I will read just a few words from the remarks of each of these gentlemen. Mr. Mills, as reported in Hansard of 1879, at page 1878, says:

> When the act of confederation was passed, it provided that the subject of marriage and divorce should be reserved to the government of Canada. Now, it was clear that expression must be understood with reference to the past policy of the mother country. They knew it was a rule of legal construction that, whenever general power was conferred, and express exception made to that power, the exception was to be strictly construed. In the British North America Act the subject of property and civil rights was conferred on the local legislature, and if there had been no exception made, that term was broad enough to include the marital relations. Not only so, but they found that, in the same act, the power to deal with the subject of marriage and divorce was expressly carved out of this general power; these terms, therefore, must be strictly construed.

Sir John A. Macdonald says, as reported on page 2004 of the same Hansard:

He thought that his bill was ultra vires, that they had no right to pass such a bill, and that it would be of no value as a statute. The line between the powers of the local and general legislatures was easily marked. The division was so clear that there could be little or no hesitation as to deciding where the power to deal with the subject rested. If it rested anywhere, it was with the provincial legislatures, and not with the Dominion parliament. It was true, they were told that the statute providing for all matters relating to marriage and divorce, was to be reserved exclusively for the Dominion parliament. Obviously it meant it had the sole control of the legislation respecting the formation and dissolution of the marriage tie, and there was no other power given it by the statute.

I see that this opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald was held by at least one of the judges of the Queen's bench court of Ontario. It came before the appeal court of Ontario in this way. The husband was sued by his solicitor or counsel for costs, including the costs for having prosecuted the petition for divorce, and Mr. Justice Wilson, in the course of his remarks delivering judgment, says:

It would be necessary, I think, on this count to ascertain how much, if any, of the charge made was for the claim for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and how much for the claim for alimony and the custody of the children; because I am strongly impressed with the opinion that the senate has no more claim to award alimony and to decide upon the custody of the children than it would have to devise a scheme for the education of the children, or to fix the times and places the father should have access to them, or to appoint the form of religion in which they should be brought up. These are matters with which our tribunals are better calculated to deal, and which I say without any reserve they understand better than the senate possibly can do.

Such an enactment would, if my view of the powers of the Senate be correct, be disregarded by the courts here. It would not be allowed to overrule the decision of our own court, which has deliberately pronounced against this claim for alimony, which the senate seemed ready to grant.

The plaintiff cannot therefore recover for a proceeding which was not only unconstitutional but in disregard of the authority of our courts.

I find that writers have expressed their opinion on the matter and on the Campbell case. Evans on the Law and Practice of Divorce, 1923, at page 405, deals with the matter, as follows:

The insertion in a bill of provisions as to the custody and maintenance of children and as to the maintenance of the wife created in various cases considerable discussion which showed a wide divergence of opinion and it has been urged that questions relating to such matters could under the provisions of the British North America Act only be dealt with by the provincial courts and under provincial laws since questions of that kind fall within the term "property and civil rights". In the Campbell case, supra, however, this view was not upheld and provisions as to custody and maintenance were incorporated in the bill. Despite this case it should be remembered that parliament has made it a practice not to grant any relief which might be obtained through the courts, and since these matters can in all the provinces be adjudicated upon and determined by the provincial courts a continuation or extension of the precedent set by the Campbell case, supra, and a few other cases can scarcely be expected. It is more than probable that parliament will, except in exceptional cases, relegate petitioners to the provincial courts for the determination of questions relating to the maintenance and custody of the children or the maintenance of the wife or to other matters over which the provincial courts exercise jurisdiction.

Sinclair in his work on Parliamentary Divorce, 1915, at page 59, referring to the Campbell case, states as follows:

The view at present held is that the question of custody of children is one falling within the competence of the courts of the provinces, and that the making of such a provision would be an interference with civil rights which, under the constitution, are under the sole control of the provincial legislatures.

So I desire to lay down as the principles which I think are sound:

(1) Power to legislate regarding marriage does not include power to legislate regarding the consequences flowing from marriage. It is for parliament to say who may properly marry, but it is for the provincial legislature to declare what shall be the property rights and the respective duties and liabilities and privileges as between married persons. I submit that parliament would have no power under the word "marriage" to enact the Ontario Married Women's Separate Property Act.

(2) Similarly, the power to legislate regarding divorce gives power to bring about a dissolution of a marriage, but it does not include power to deal with property rights and obligations as between the divorced persons this being a matter of property and civil rights in the province.

(3) If parliament were to enact legislation conferring jurisdiction in divorce upon the Ontario courts that is all the legislation need provide. All questions of property and civil rights following on divorce can be dealt with by the provincial legislature.

I will add that even if this parliament had the legislative power to deal with alimony and provision for the children and the wife, there is no doubt the provinces have also that right and it is certainly better to leave the field clear for the provinces in this matter.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister allow me to ask him another question? I should like to have this cleared up. In authorizing the remarriage of the petitioner, are we obliged by law to give the guilty party, so declared, the same right of remarriage?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; I think that is different.

Mr. MARCIL: The other point is this: once the divorce is granted by parliament, have the divorced parties any standing before the courts if they apply to them for alimony or for care of the children?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no doubt that they have in both Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister be prepared to say whether the guilty party could remarry?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think parliament could declare one way or the other because there it is a question as to marriage itself.

FLORENCE JANE SHEPPARD

The house in committee on Bill No. 165, for the relief of Florence Jane Sheppard—Mr. Sanderson—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. EVANS: I think there are two children in this case, and I wonder whether we have the right to grant divorce without providing for the children of the marriage. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill will explain the circumstances.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend is quite correct; there are two children in this case, one twelve and the other nine years old. The evidence in the case is not very long, and I presume that most hon. members have already gone through it. Briefly, the petitioner in this case is the wife. She was married on the 9th day of November, 1915, in a village in the county of York, in the province of Ontario. The evidence can be read in five minutes, and any hon. member who will take the trouble to read it will agree that the case is not complicated in any way. The senate committee after careful consideration have recommended that this divorce be granted. I would therefore ask the house to agree to the passing of this bill.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 86, for the relief of Frederick Rutherfoord Zoppi.—Mr. Kay.

Motion for second reading agreed to on division.

AGNES VICTORIA LEADER

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (South Waterloo) moved the second reading of Bill No. 154, for the relief of Agnes Victoria Leader.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we ought to have some explanation of this bill because the case is of quite a different order from those hitherto presented.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): The petition is from Agnes Victoria Leader, praying for the passing of an act to annul her marriage with Robert Elmer Leader, the claim being that the marriage has not been consummated. Evidence was given before the senate committee by Mrs. Leader, by her mother, Mrs. Watson, and by Doctor Buchanan, physician and surgeon.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to point out that this illustrates another of the anomalies of our present practice of granting divorce. We are asked to grant a divorce in this case simply because of a physical defect. Were this man hopelessly insane, a divorce would be refused. If he were a criminal, absolutely immoral in every conceivable way, a divorce would be refused. But simply because there is a certain physical defect, we are proceeding to grant this divorce. I call attention to it on this occasion simply because there has been an impression prevalent that divorce was granted in this country solely for moral delinquency, that always adultery was the ground. That is not true, as this case goes to prove, and I think we ought to consider the bill very carefully. In fact, as the Minister of Justice was enumerating the matters connected with marriage that came within the jurisdiction of this house, it struck me that it is quite doubtful whether, if he is correct in his statement, parliament is competent to deal with this case. The Minister of Justice says that "the respective duties, liabilities and privileges as between married persons" is entirely a provincial matter. If that is so, there being no charge here of adultery, the petition is based on certain privileges as between these two married persons. I should like to have a statement from the Minister of Justice as to whether or not parliament is competent to deal with a case of this character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must admit that I have not read either the bill or the evidence. I could hardly be expected to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would request that this bill stand until we can have some statement from the Minister of Justice as to the power of this house in regard to this bill.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, from a purely legal standpoint I can see some merit in the argument of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The parliament of Canada has jurisdiction in questions of marriage and divorce. If I understand the statement made by my hon. friend from South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) there has never been a marriage in this case. There has been a solemnization of marriage, that being, as I understand, within the jurisdiction of the provincial authority; but there has never been a de facto marriage. Therefore it is not within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada to act. If there has been no marriage the parties need no divorce. They have absolutely no standing before this parliament. We may dissolve a marriage, but we cannot deal with something that is not a marriage. I think that is the argument set forth by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, and I am under the impression there may be considerable legal merit in it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the second reading will kindly say "aye".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will kindly say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: The ayes have it. I declare the motion carried on division.

Bill read the second time on division and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

RIGHT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO ESTABLISH DOMICILE

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved that Bill No. 75, respecting the domicile of married women in proceedings for divorce, be committed to committee of the whole.

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill was given second reading on April 23. The motion now is to commit the bill. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have some remarks to make, but probably it would be just as well that I should do so in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to standing order 38 no debate is permissible on a motion to commit a bill unless it be an order of the day.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this bill was given second reading on division, and that there was opposition to the principle when it was so passed. I was absent at the time, but now I want to register a strong protest against the bill and to dissent from its provisions. I believe that it seeks to enact a principle which is absolutely contrary to British law and British doctrine, and that if enacted into law it will create difficulties and complications, which perhaps have not been foreseen.

When I saw that the bill was being introduced I went to the library to peruse a judgment of the privy council in the case of Cook v. Cook and Attorney General for Alberta, which is referred to in the explanatory notes accompanying the bill. In that case it was decided that the domicile of the husband was the only place of jurisdiction for divorce proceedings. The case will be found at page 751 of the Western Weekly Reports, 1926, and there will be found the following views by two or three eminent judges of the British Privy Council. Lord Haldane said in Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey:

> Since Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier . . . nothing short of a full juridical domicil within its jurisdiction can justify a British court in pronouncng a decree of divorce.

And then:

> There can be only one real domicil.

And further:

> There is no authority for the proposition that the husband and wife can have, while they continue married, distinct domicils . . . . If it were otherwise . . . . proceedings for dissolving the status of marriage might be carried through in two jurisdictions, possibly with different results.

Lord Cave said:

> I doubt whether the rule as to a wife's domicil following that of her husband is founded only upon her obligation to live with him. It appears to me to be more correct to say that it is a consequence of the union between husband and wife brought about by the marriage tie. . . . The rule is no doubt abrogated by a divorce a vinculo and possibly (although this has not yet been finally decided) by a divorce a mensa et thoro or a judicial separation. . . . (As to a possible exception in a) case where a husband who, having been guilty of desertion or some other matrimonial offence in this country, endeavours to deprive his wife of her remedy by changing his domicil; and there is no doubt authority (which it is not now necessary to examine) for the proposition that in such a case the husband will not be allowed to set up his own wrong as an argument for prejudicing his wife's rights.

And Lord Shaw said this:

> I must not myself be held as assenting to the view that it has ever yet been decided by law that even a judicial separation properly and formally obtained would operate as a change in the so-called, and, in my opinion, very doubtfully named domicilium matrimonii. I see the greatest difficulty in any invasion of the principle which appears to me to be fundamental—namely, that that unity which the marriage signifies is regulated by one domicil and one domicil only—i.e., that of the husband. I am quite sure that Lord Watson in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier treated the matrimonial domicil as the real domicil and nothing but the real domicil, but considered that as the real domicil of one person—namely, the husband. Much confusion may be caused by the introduction of the idea of there being two domicils of the marriage or two domicils of succession while the marriage tie continues.

In a later pasage Lord Shaw adds:

> In the great fundamental issues of status and succession the domicil of the wife is the domicil of the husband until divorce a vinculo matrimonii has been obtained.

If this bill becomes law there will be two domiciles, even before the divorce is granted and while the marriage bond between the two parties still exists. As I have said, even in England and in other British countries where the principle of divorce is recognized and where divorce courts function they have never so far accepted the principle which this bill seeks to translate into law.

If we adopt the principle of this bill I see certain difficulties. The effect of the bill on persons residing in Quebec and Ontario, for instance, would be peculiar. Any husband residing in either of these provinces could obtain a divorce only by application to parliament, but the bill would enable his wife, in the cases mentioned, to acquire domicile in any of the provinces where there are divorce courts and to obtain a divorce from him, which divorce would be effective in Ontario and Quebec just as though it had been granted by this parliament. Indeed, as I read the bill, I think it is even wider than that so far as its language goes. It sets no limitation, and it would enable the wife to acquire domicile in any part of the world and to obtain a divorce from her husband which would be recognized as valid in Canada.

I may say that I have no experience in this matter inasmuch as I have not practised law in other provinces where there are divorce courts; but I am told that under the present practice the courts go a long way towards trying to ascertain the facts in any given case, and in cases of desertion the matrimonial domicile has not been changed. It is only in a clear case that they will hold the husband to have changed his domicile so effectively as to defeat the wife's action.

The question of domicile as well as that of nationality and naturalization is one which is very difficult of solution, and there has been no practical scheme to meet all the difficulties which are presented. If the provisions of the present bill were given their full effect the result would be that in some cases two actions for divorce might be pending in relation to the same parties and at the same time, one in one province at the suit of the husband and one in another province at the suit of the wife; and there is the possibility that there would be a race to see which would be tried first. And the same thing would happen before the appeal court if the first judgment were appealed from.

I think we ought to adhere to the old British doctrine, which is also the doctrine of natural law, that there should be only one matrimonial domicile for all purposes. It is not a question, as one hon. member suggested when the bill was before the house for second reading, that now that women have equal rights with men we should pass this legislation. It is not a question of equality or rights; it is a question of one marital tie, of one matrimonial domicile. Whether it be the domicile of the husband or of the wife, I care not; but I contend that so long as the marriage continues, so long as that marriage has not been dissolved, there is but one domicile and there should remain but one domicile for all purposes.

Those who believe in divorce may consider that there are at times deserving cases which at present cannot be relieved by reason of certain difficulties. But to redress possible grievances in a few cases you are apt to create troubles and difficulties in a large number of others; and apart from the principle of divorce itself, to which I am opposed, I am for these reasons opposed to the present bill.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to quote from the civil code of Quebec the law regarding this matter, seeing that divorce, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, is a matter of special legislation in each individual case. The civil code of Quebec, article 52, provides:

> A married woman not separated from bed and board has no other domicile than that of her husband.

Clearly, therefore, the passage of the present bill would be a contravention of provincial rights.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If a wife has been deserted by her husband, who has gone to live in a foreign country, has she no domicile?

Mr. MARCIL: It makes no difference in the eyes of the law if she has not obtained a judicial separation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Then her domicile might be in any part of the world—in Peru or Chile. If she is deserted by her husband and he is a foreign country, what is her position? Is her domicile then in the foreign country?

Mr. MARCIL: According to the code, when judicial separation has taken place then the wife has a domicile of her own; but until that occurs her domicile is the domicile of the husband.

Mr. LAPOINTE: She has a domicile of her own when the husband has really established a new domicile. If he is going around the world, not being settled anywhere, the last matrimonial domicile still exists.

Mr. BOTHWELL: There is a great deal of force in the remarks of the Minister of Justice in regard to this bill, and it does appear that the bill possibly goes too far in the endeavour to provide a remedy for the married woman. The first subsection of section 2 relates to any woman who is judicially or otherwise separate, and living separate and apart from her husband. That makes the bill very broad indeed.

Mr. WARD: I had intended moving that those words "or otherwise" be deleted.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Even with that change there is still possibly an objection to that clause. Where a judicial separation has been granted, the parties have chosen the remedy which they desire. They make application to the courts for a judicial separation and when that is granted—or if you go further in the paragraph and take the case of those who have entered into a separation agreement, which would be included within that section as I read it—the parties have agreed between themselves upon the nature of the remedy. So far as I can see, that first paragraph goes too far; I should like to see it eliminated altogether. As to the second section of it, regarding the case of desertion, I believe there is much merit in the language of the bill in this respect.

The Minister of Justice says that as he understands the situation in the courts the judges are always very careful to bring out all the facts regarding any offence by reason of which divorce is sought and that if possible, presuming the facts warrant it, they will endeavour to find that the matrimonial domicile is the domicile of the parties for the purposes of divorce. I want to give just one illustration of what might happen even if the judges were favourable to accepting the matrimonial domicile. A short time ago my attention was drawn to the case of a couple who were married in Ontario twenty years ago. At the time they were married they intended going to the west; immediately after the wedding they did go west, where they homesteaded and preempted land. Their family of four were born and raised on that farm. Through some misfortune the husband lost part of his land and subsequently rented land and continued farming for a few more years. One fall he thought he would come back to Ontario to work in the bush during the winter months, which he did, leaving his wife and four children on the farm of a neighbour, where his wife kept house and the children were cared for by the neighbour. The husband did not return in the spring, although during the winter he sent her a very little money from time to time. Later on she found he was living in Ontario with another woman, and the evidence disclosed that children were born to that second union in Ontario. Notwithstanding the fact that these people married with the intention of going west, and in fact did go west where they took up land and brought up their family, that woman's domicile was in Ontario. The husband deserted her; she was left with these four children to support, and in order to get a divorce it would be necessary for her to come to Ontario and follow the husband in that domicile. Ontario is not so very far away, but supposing her husband had gone to Florida or some place in South America. The situation would be exactly the same; she would have to follow him and would have no right to take action in the west or in Ontario after he left Canada. It is to provide for cases of that kind that the sponsor of this bill has been endeavouring to secure legislation which will do justice to all, and in a case such as I have mentioned I see no danger in changing the law in order to permit a woman to acquire a domicile. In that particular case there would be no more danger than in allowing her to acquire a domicile under a judicial separation or under a separation agreement, which is not legal now. With the elimination of that first subsection I think the bill should go through in order to do justice to people who are placed in the position I have mentioned.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As the bill is drafted I find myself altogether in support of the position taken by the Minister of Justice; I believe some of us do not know just to what extent this legislation may go. The Minister of Justice instanced a case involving the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and then he went on to state a case which I believe to be equally appropriate. He pointed cut that if this legislation were adopted by this house a married woman could go to Nevada, take up her residence and obtain a divorce upon grounds which are not recognized in any part of Canada; then she could say that she was entitled to choose her domicile and entitled to a divorce on the basis of that domicile under a statute of the Dominion of Canada. A woman could go to Peru or Chile, she could go to Paris, as has been done quite often recently. As this bill is drawn now it does not limit the woman's domicile to Canada and does not provide that she may acquire a domicile for herself within Canada; it allows her to acquire a domicile in any part of the wide world. Those who support this bill should at least provide that after the first line of section 2 should be added the words "living within Canada" and that the words "within Canada" should be added after the word "herself." That would make the bill read as follows:

[Mr. Bothwell.]

> For the purposes of this act a married woman living within Canada . . . . may acquire a domicile for herself within Canada. . . .

I have no sympathy with the man who disregards the obligations he took upon himself in contracting marriage, obligations which I am glad to say most Canadians are proud to observe; I do not believe he should be allowed to treat his wife inhumanly, contrary to the law, and then move away and so prevent an action being brought against him. I am in favour of divorce on the statutory ground; when that ground exists I believe divorce is a duty. I know there are others who take a different view, but I do not think divorce should be granted on other than the recognized statutory grounds which obtain in this country at present, so I am not prepared to support anything which will permit a woman to go away and obtain a divorce on other grounds. I believe these people should remain within Canada and have their cases disposed of by a competent court or by the senate.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It seems to me that a great many of the objections which have been raised to this bill are made on the presumption that the sponsor of the bill intends to try to put it through the house in its present form.

The CHAIRMAN: Nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mail service, including mail service by air. $16,305,000.

Mr. BRADY: As this estimate greatly concerns the constituency which I represent as well as the larger part of northern and central British Columbia, even at the cost of detaining the committee for a short time I feel that the matter is of sufficient importance to justify my speaking on it in the hope of enlisting the sympathy of the Postmaster General and also in order to bring before this house the importance of a good mail service in the isolated parts of Canada. As we all know, efficient mail and telephone service is very important to the settled parts of our country, but it is particularly important to the sparsely settled portions of this Dominion. I do not believe there are two other factors which tend so much to solidify the rural population and to give courage and confidence to the people who are filling up the big spaces which need population as good mail and telephone services. The greatest handicap that people in the rural districts have to overcome to-day is the lack of an efficient mail and telephone service. As the Postmaster General knows, various requests have been sent to his department, not merely by representatives but by every board of trade sitting individually as a board and by the associated boards of trade from Prince George on the east to Vancouver on the west, a distance of over five hundred miles. After looking through the estimates it seems to me that those that have get more and those that have not get nothing. I notice that in the big centres, where there is undoubtedly and necessarily a good service, there is a duplication with an air mail service, but in the places where the greatest need exists we find very often that only a partial or an irregular and uncertain service exists.

I do not intend to offer any criticism which might be considered as adverse to the Postmaster General's department, but I desire to show a picture of the actual conditions which prevail throughout the northern and central parts of British Columbia. There are four methods of handling mail in Canada. The first and latest is the air mail service. I am sure that every member of the house who has listened to the story of the development of the air mail service in Canada during the last few years must look forward with great optimism to the future of this service. The report of the Deputy Postmaster General shows that there is air mail service now to the Magdalen islands and to the island of Anticosti. These places have had a very infrequent mail service in the past but they are now being brought in touch with the outside world. I regretted very much to hear the Postmaster General say that he did not intend to inaugurate any air mail service this year in British Columbia. I regretted that still more when I read the following words in the report of the Deputy Postmaster General with respect to the air mail service to the Magdalen islands and Anticosti:

> Both from a mail service and a humanitarian point of view, the successful operation of such a service it was thought would do much to ameliorate the conditions under which these islanders existed during the winter months.

This service was inaugurated not merely to give them mail communication but also from a humanitarian point of view. I wonder if the Postmaster General's humanitarian point of view could extend at this moment across the prairie provinces, through the rockies and dip over into British Columbia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To Prince Rupert?

Mr. BRADY: The hon. Minister of Justice is quite right, yes, and I will refer to that in a moment. I intend to give the house two or three striking instances by mentioning some districts which have practically no mail service. When I asked a question this afternoon as to the sources of information which the Postmaster General had as to the need for rural mail services, I was pleased indeed to find out how the Postmaster General was notified of the districts where mail service was required. I spent the four and one-half months between the closing of the house last year and the month of November in travelling through my constituency but even though I spent that length of time in practically continuous travelling I was not able to complete the circuit of three-fourths of the country. When I went up the Naas river I found a large settlement of people there and they complained that the mail service had been so infrequent that parcels mailed before Christmas had not reached them until the month of April. I do not directly blame the Postmaster General for that but I do say that as long as the district postal supervisor is living in Vancouver and is not in touch with the conditions which prevail in the northern part of the country, it is hopeless for me to come here and try to give an accurate description of the conditions which prevail there. When I went to Mill Bay to start up the Naas valley, I hoped to be able to get the little mail boat going from Mill Bay to Aiyansh. If that little boat, which was supposed to take the mail up the river fifty-two miles—and it was a mail day when I reached there—had been in operation and at my disposal, I could have gone up that river for $7.50. The boat was lying at the wharf, but the man who was taking the mail was drunk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. BRADY: He was not a white man; he was an Indian. I went up that river, but in order to do so I had to pay $60 out of my own pocket. No hon. member here representing a city like Ottawa, or Montreal, or Toronto, or Vancouver, can realize what it means for a member of parliament to have to travel over practically half an empire in extent and under very difficult conditions in order to come into contact with the people who are working against difficulties. Ontario and Quebec for hundreds of years back were known as Canada; indeed, it is not many years ago when the word "Canada" meant Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. In British Columbia we find a young country and we shall find one day that Canada will be proud of the great wealth of that province and particularly the northern part of it. I believe nothing can stop the development of British Columbia, but to-day what we need to give the people there is good mail service and telephone communication wherever we can possibly do so.

I have on my desk resolutions from the associated boards of trade of British Columbia assembled. They travelled hundreds of miles in order to formulate these resolutions for presentation to the department. I will not read them because I think the Postmaster General knows what they are. What are they asking? They ask, first; that better mail service be inaugurated in the rural districts, and, second, that Prince Rupert east to Edmonton be given a daily mail service.

What has been done by the Post Office Department this year? I find that a daily mail service has been introduced between Quebec city and Cochrane, and the explanation is that on account of the great lumber and mineral resources through which that line passed, it was necessary to put on a daily mail service. There is also a daily mail service into Rouyn. I do not object to these; I think they are essential; but let me direct the attention of the Postmaster General to this: if a daily mail service is essential between Cochrane and Quebec, and into the mineral fields of Rouyn, it is equally important that a daily mail service be inaugurated between Edmonton and the port of Prince Rupert. From Prince George to Prince Rupert the Canadian National travels through, I think, one of the largest mineral, lumbering and agricultural areas in northern British Columbia. Rather than trouble the house with a lengthy description of that section of the country, I will simply read the resolution of the associated boards of trade. This was the result of a long study and visits along the Canadian National line from Prince George west to Prince Rupert. This resolution, which was sent to the Postmaster General and also to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), reads:

> I beg to inform you the following resolution was duly passed at the last regular meeting of this board of trade:
> "Whereas, owing to the inadequacy of the present mail service between Prince Rupert and Edmonton, great inconvenience is caused to merchants, farmers and those engaged in mining and other industries;
> and whereas, this inadequate mail service is the cause of serious loss of business and time to all those enumerated above; > and whereas, recent inquiry by a special committee of the Prince Rupert Board of Trade into the whole situation revealed the inadequacy of the present mail service west to and east from Prince Rupert;
> and whereas the Prince Rupert Board of Trade has been petitioned by the various boards of trade in northern British Columbia to lend their full support to their demand for a daily mail service; > and whereas the Prince Rupert Board of Trade fully realize that the development and best interests of this district urgently demand a daily mail service to and from Prince Rupert east;
> Therefore, be it resolved, that the Prince Rupert Board of Trade urge that the Hon. P. J. Veniot, Postmaster General, take immediate action whereby a daily mail service will be established between Prince Rupert and Edmonton."
> As this is a matter of the most vital importance to the welfare of Prince Rupert and the country lying to the east of it, we sincerely trust that you will give the matter your very earnest and immediate consideration, in order that the daily service might be inaugurated upon the resumption of the daily passenger train service.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the date of that?

Mr. BRADY: January 15, 1929. The last time that we took this matter up with the Deputy Postmaster General and we asked that he should, at least on alternate days, put on a baggage service, the reply, after some weeks, was that the cost would be prohibitive. I went to some trouble in order to find out what it would cost to put on a baggage car service three days a week during the summer schedule, and I believe the cost would be nothing like what the deputy minister said it would be. Furthermore, I think there is a daily mail service from Vancouver down through the Okanagan to Calgary. If any part of British Columbia deserves consideration in the matter of a daily mail service it is the port of Prince Rupert, and the country lying contiguous to it east to Prince George. Why the department has refused to grant that legitimate demand is beyond me. I feel assured that if the Postmaster General realized the great need of this country for a daily mail service he would not fail to see that it was inaugurated this very year. A great number of the people in the east are ignorant of the west. Very few people that I meet, I am referring particularly to people in the eastern provinces, are aware of the great future and of the splendid strategic position which the port of Prince Rupert occupies on the Pacific coast. I am not speaking to-night in a way that can be construed as having the slightest political tinge, but I do want to bring home to the Postmaster General and his department the fact that outside of Canada the port of Prince Rupert has received very high recognition indeed. Just as in the east we find in Montreal the great powerful and central lever which dictates and guides to a great extent the movement of commerce, so in the west I say, even though there may be Vancouver members present here, that Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast has not had a square deal. An elevator was built there, and left lying idle. Vancouver got over eighty million bushels of wheat, and the wheat is going there still, while Prince Rupert got only two million bushels, and then the elevator was closed down.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who was to blame for that?

Mr. BRADY: Never mind about the blame just now.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who can remedy it?

Mr. BRADY: That situation can be remedied easily, and I may have a few words to say on this subject when the elevator items are up for discussion. I was saying that Prince Rupert is recognized by outsiders as occupying a strategic position on the Pacific coast as a base for an aeroplane service. In that connection I would like to quote just a few words from Captain McCarthy, the cousin of Captain Kingsford Smith, of the Southern Cross, the famous hero whose deeds in the air have won for him immortal fame. Captain McCarthy, representing the International Airways Company of Seattle, in his biplane made a survey flight from Seattle to Alaska prior to an ambitious air service being inaugurated between Seattle and Alaska. He landed in Prince Rupert on March 18th of this year on his way to Nome, and it is very interesting to note what he had to say of the port of Prince Rupert. Here are his exact words:

> In any event air service between Seattle and Alaska or to the Orient, Prince Rupert will through its location have to be a base of call or departure. This port is in a strategic position and will eventually have to be equipped with a radio beacon and other aids to aerial navigation.

He went on to say that Prince Rupert today was fully ripe for an air mail service between Prince Rupert, Telegraph Creek, Atlin, Dawson and Mayo, and every bit of that line would be within Canada. I do not expect after what the Postmaster General has said that we can have that air mail service inaugurated at this time, but the hour will come, and come soon, when such a service must be established. What I am asking the Postmaster General to do is to have a survey made of the conditions that prevail in the great constituency of Skeena, and find out the actual needs for rural mail delivery. I noticed in looking over the returns that have been laid before the house of applications for rural mail routes, that there has been no demand from the constituency of Skeena. The Postmaster General admits that that is correct? Very good. I went through the whole Skeena country last year, travelling through it for four and a half months, and I want to assure the Postmaster General that the time is ripe in all sections of the Ominica and Skeena country for the inauguration of rural mail delivery. Here is what I saw. I saw farmers come in to Smithers, a distance of sixteen miles—sixteen miles, mark you—to get their mail at the Smithers post office, and when they reached there, owing to some difficulties with which they met on the way, the post office was closed. They had to wait over the whole of that night or else go home without their mail till the following morning when the post office opened. I am not going to blame the Postmaster General for that because it is quite evident from this report that has been tabled that no recommendations have been made to him for the establishment of rural mail delivery in that country. At Telegraph Creek to-day the mail service is very inadequate. It is very difficult to get a decent mail service in winter. The mail is brought in by dog sled, and from October until June, the people are supposed to get ten deliveries and the maximum that the dogs can haul is 125 pounds weight. What happens very often is that the people do not get anything like that number of deliveries, and what I want to drive home to the Postmaster General to-night is that the time has come when these needs for rural mail delivery in very difficult country must be met in some way. We should at least do for these people what has been done so well for the inhabitants of Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands. To my mind it is much better to be able to guarantee seven deliveries of mail to these people living in these outlying places, seven mails that they are sure of getting, than offering them fifteen deliveries and actually giving them only two or three. The people in the rural districts of Ontario know nothing of the difficulties that beset the people in northern British Columbia. It would be impossible for them to know what the conditions there are like. It is a young country among the mining camps, the great lumbering camps and fishing places, and the big need of these people is a mail service. I ask the government and the department of the Postmaster General to attack honestly and courageously that problem of giving an efficient mail service wherever the needs of the people demand it. I do not agree with those who say that the Post Office department should always show a credit balance. Of all the departments of government the Post Office department most intimately affects the well-being and happiness of the people by providing a proper mail service. Whenever we are considering the installation of a mail service we should not say: that is going to cost too much. I think the federal government should follow where the provincial government leads, where the latter constructs roads, opens up land and brings in the people. In such cases I contend that the federal government should follow close behind the provincial government in the matters of mail service and telephone communication.

As regards the geography of Ontario and Quebec, and the maritime provinces, I would not take second place to any man in knowledge of the climate, the conditions, the people, and the resources of those provinces. I should like the same thing to be said regarding the country whence I come. Sir, to reach the Naas valley I had to navigate a river where you took your life in your hands. That river is the only way in and the only way out. Now, sometimes in this house we have a rather poor sense of humour. I used to be very humorous but I have lost all sense of humour since I entered this house. When I am outside in the broad fields, where I can talk to men who are willing to understand, I have no difficulty in telling them a good story; but in the House of Commons it seems to be really futile, and for this reason—oh, I sense it from the psychological standpoint—I know that anything I say by way of pleading is given by hon. members opposite, the political tinge. That is the sad part about our proceedings here. Now, I do not think that of all hon. gentlemen across the way, but I believe there is in this house to-day a spirit broad enough to interpret the wishes of the people. Up in that valley a mother broke her leg in the fields where she was working. The only one who could succour her was her husband. He set her leg. There was no medical aid. She had to endure the agony. Now, I wonder how many hon. members here could do that? What I want to drive home is this: It is all very well for us to be sitting in comfort here; we do not realize what pain is.

An hon. MEMBER: We only think we are sitting in comfort. We are not so comfortable.

Mr. BRADY: Oh yes, you are. For two months or more this woman suffered intense pain, for it was impossible to give her medical attention; the nearest doctor would be a little over 150 miles away. She would have had to go down to Prince Rupert, and in her condition the journey was out of the question.

[Mr. Brady.]

Mr. HEPBURN: You do not blame that on the Postmaster General do you?

Mr. BRADY: No, I am not referring to the Postmaster General. I am just giving the conditions that prevail, to show the necessity of a sympathetic understanding on the part of the government. To the people in these isolated places the government should give a mail service—not a daily service, they do not ask for it, but a good weekly service. I do think that the two most important requirements in western Canada to-day are proper mail service and proper telephone communication.

Now, sir, I am going to ask the Postmaster General one or two questions before taking my seat. First, is there any chance that the wishes of all the people at Skeena as well as of the Cariboo, in which district Prince George is situated, will be met, and that a daily mail service will be inaugurated between Edmonton and Prince Rupert?

Mr VENIOT: The only answer I can give the hon. gentleman now is that this is the first time the case has been placed before me so clearly, and I will certainly go into it in a serious way.

Mr. BRADY: Thank you, sir. Would the Postmaster General give me the cost of the baggage mail service between Quebec and Cochrane that was introduced last year?

Mr. VENIOT: I could not tell the hon. member offhand, but I could give him the rates we have to pay.

Mr. BRADY: Has not the deputy minister the information?

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps he has the details. We have to pay for baggage car service the following rates: three-feet unit space, four cents per mile; seven-feet unit space, 6.5 cents per mile; fifteen-feet unit space, thirteen cents per mile; thirty-feet unit space, twenty cents per mile. Those rates are regulated by the railway commission.

Mr. BRADY: I have some figures on the subject. I found that we could get a baggage car service three times a week during the summer months at the following rate: seven-feet space from Edmonton to Prince George, serving points en route, would cost $45.50 a trip; a fifty-feet space from Prince George to Prince Rupert, $18 a trip. Multiplying the whole thing it would give us a summer schedule of twenty weeks for about $6,109.

Mr. VENIOT: I will go into the matter. I should not like to take the hon. gentleman's figures.

Mr. BRADY: I would not expect the minister to do that. I mentioned them just to give him an idea.

Mr. VENIOT: I shall go into it.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, there are two or three small items I should like to clear up.

Some hon MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am serious about it—if you do not get too gay.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): Order.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): At six o'clock the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, who is not here now, asked for certain information in connection with the tenders for air mail services. On his behalf I want to request that the Postmaster General lay on the table a list of the parties who were asked to tender for these various services, the amounts of their tenders, the names of the successful tenderers, and copies of the contracts. I do not expect that this information can be given to-day, but perhaps it can be brought down soon.

Mr. VENIOT: It will take at least three or four days to get that information together, but we will get it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): With reference to the Mackenzie river mail service, what was the volume of mail carried over that route?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know whether I can give that information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It could be obtained?

Mr. VENIOT: I have not the information; I did not expect it would be asked for, but I will get it. I think we can get the poundage. One thing I do know is that considerable mail gathers there, and I know we had to make several trips with 750 to 1,000 pounds of accumulated mail. That gives some idea of what was carried, but we will get that information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That will be satisfactory later on. When did that service up the Mackenzie river begin?

Mr. VENIOT: During the winter; I think it was around January or December.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is it still being carried on?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I think it has been discontinued now; it was only a trial.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Who had the contract for it?

Mr. VENIOT: I gave the name this afternoon; I think it was Western Canada Airways.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the Department of National Defence provide airplanes in connection with these mails?

Mr. VENIOT: No. The Department of National Defence did provide some of their planes in emergencies for eastern services this winter, but only for a short time.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is one other matter to which the Postmaster General referred upon the request of my leader, who is not here to-night. He requested some information in connection with the complaint of the Commercial Airways Limited and the Great West Airways Limited, that when tenders were asked for the transportation of mail between Winnipeg and Calgary these companies were given no opportunity to submit tenders. The Postmaster General promised he would look into the matter and give the information.

Mr. VENIOT: I did give some information and I said I thought Captain McCall was on the way; he had been wired to and had replied he was coming to town to discuss matters with us. He has been here with Mr. Sick and has been in conference with myself for a short time and with the superintendent of air mail services for a considerable time. He was given further specifications required for such services and has left his memo. I did not have an opportunity of discussing it further with him and I understand that both Captain McCall and Mr. Sick have gone home.

Mr. KENNEDY: Give us the figures showing the amounts paid the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the carriage of mails.

Mr. VENIOT: The Canadian National Railways received $3,133,767.67; the Canadian Pacific Railway, $3,822,983.94, and other railway lines $481,140.52, making a total of $7,437,892.13 for rail service for mail.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is there not a discrepancy between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway figures when one considers the mileage of the two systems?

Mr. VENIOT: What was that?

Mr. KENNEDY: If I have the figures correctly the Canadian Pacific Railway, with 16,000 miles, gets about $3,800,000, while the Canadian National Railway, with about 20,000 miles, gets about $3,100,000.

Mr. VENIOT: $3,133,767.67.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the reason for that discrepancy?

Mr. VENIOT: The only reason I can see for it is that the Canadian National Railways do not give the same mail accommodation.

Mr. KENNEDY: And is it not clear that the Canadian Pacific Railway territory has more frequent mail service?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I do not think so.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is one of the cases of which we had an illustration to-night in connection with this service between Edmonton and Prince Rupert, as against the service further south on the Canadian Pacific Railway line west of Calgary.

Mr. VENIOT: They may have more frequent train connections between those places than on the Canadian National between certain other places; I do not know.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is preference shown to railway mail clerks in the appointment of district superintendents?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no preference shown.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is it not a fact that more railway mail clerks than others are selected as district superintendents?

Mr. VENIOT: I would not say that. Whenever there is a vacancy it is advertised and railway mail clerks as well as other permanent employees have a right to contest for the vacancy. Their applications are received, and they go before the rating board, which judges as to their ability, capacity and seniority. They are given examinations each year during a period of years; the results of those examinations are placed before the Civil Service Commission, and their rating decides who gets the position. There is no other preference at all.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Who compose the rating board?

Mr. VENIOT: The district superintendent is a member of the rating board, and in other cases we take members of the board from the head office of the department.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It may be that the district superintendent, in most cases being a former railway mail clerk, does show a preference in the rating.

Mr. VENIOT: I would not want to say that; it would be expressing want of faith in the honesty of the officials.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): But there is criticism among inside men that they are not getting a show in the matter of these positions.

Mr. VENIOT: I have heard the criticism and I have had one or two cases pointed out to me, but I found no ground for such criticism.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It does seem that a post office clerk would have more experience than a railway mail clerk for such a position.

Mr. VENIOT: Not always.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I would like to ask what is included in the item of $150,000 for the Yukon Territory. What service does the government get for that amount?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no increase over last year; that amount covers mail service in the Yukon Territory and the salaries of postmasters and staffs of Dawson and White Horse, also telephones, rentals, telegrams and so on. The staff of the Dawson post office consists of one postmaster with a salary of $5,000, plus $900 rent allowance, and three postal clerks. The staff at White Horse consists of one postmaster with a salary of $3,120 and two postal clerks, one of whom is temporary. The salary range for postal clerks at Dawson is from $2,520 to $2,640. Owing to the unusual conditions existing in the Yukon Territory salary ranges are higher than those in other parts of Canada, and that salary range is approved by the Civil Service Commission. The balance of that amount provides for the transportation of mails.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Does that include the amount paid the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways for hauling mail up the west coast of British Columbia and Alaska and into the Yukon. They carry the Canadian mails north as well as the Alaskan mail, a large quantity of which goes north through Yukon.

Mr. VENIOT: I will secure that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Under this item I would like to direct the attention of the Postmaster General to a matter of local service within my own district, at a point with which I am very familiar. As some of the members of this committee may know, the little city of Red Deer lies midway between Calgary and Edmonton on the C. & E. branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and acts as a distribution centre for the settlements in that locality. The service on the Canadian Pacific Railway is excellent; and I have no complaint to make upon that point. Their service with regard to passengers, freight and mail is as good as it possibly could be, but Red Deer is also situated on the Brazeau branch of the Canadian National Railways, the branch running out to Brazeau and terminating at Nordegg. On the west side of Red Deer and on that branch of the Canadian National there are a number of small towns and villages, situated between Red Deer and Nordegg. These villages are provided with a baggage car service from Red Deer west. The small villages east of Red Deer are without that service at the present time; the two villages are Joffre and Haynes. Baggage car service is carried on between Red Deer and Nordegg and that provides for the small towns west of Red Deer, but the towns east of Red Deer situated on the Canadian National Railways are served by rural mail routes running from points on the Canadian Pacific Railway and providing the farmers and the residents of these small towns with mail service. The service is bi-weekly, and it has been felt for some time by the business men and residents of that locality that the service is hardly sufficient to meet the needs of that productive, well settled territory.

I stated that Red Deer formed a distributing point for most of these small villages, and as a matter of fact these places east of Red Deer on the Canadian National railway get most of their supplies from Red Deer. They have found it extremely difficult to carry on business and are greatly handicapped by the fact that any business correspondence coming to them from Red Deer or other points must travel north to Lacombe by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in one case must be transferred to the Stettler line, and from a point on that line the mail is hauled to the villages. The result is that while they can order their goods from Red Deer easily enough the business correspondence in connection with these supplies arrives two and sometimes four days later than the supplies themselves. That situation affects not only the business men in these places where a good deal of business is done, but also a large number of farmers and settlers who are not upon the present routes, but who get their mail at the post offices in these villages.

Mr. VENIOT: They are back from the railway?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes. These people request that a baggage car service be given them on the same terms as it is now given to the towns lying west from Red Deer. The Postmaster General is somewhat familiar with the situation, although I do not expect him to carry all the details in his head. However, he has had some correspondence with me in this regard and apparently the difficulty is the additional cost involved, because it is fairly well understood that it would be impossible to discontinue the rural mail routes in favour of the baggage car service. Once you have the rural mail route established it is a difficult thing to take away that service, to which the farmers have become accustomed. So I am not suggesting that that be done, but I do suggest that it would be worth while to give the additional service by rail. I have here an estimate as to the additional cost, provided by the Post Office department. As a result of the proposed change the estimated additional cost would be something like $725 a year, which is considerably more than the revenue derived from these two points at present. However, there is a fact which never had been considered by the department, namely, that we will not get revenue until service is provided, and it is impossible to compute the loss involved or the revenue involved unless the additional business that will be done through the establishment of better service at these points is considered. I have asked the Postmaster General to give this service; I have gone into the matter carefully and my estimate is that the additional revenue which will be produced through the sale of stamps, money orders and so on, which cannot now be carried on at these two points, will go a long way towards meeting that suggested deficit. I am not asking the Postmaster General to give me an immediate promise in this connection; I do not think that would be fair to him, because he should have an opportunity of again considering the matter before making any definite announcement. However, I do ask that he again consider establishing this service, taking into account the fact that the districts are old and well settled, and already provide quite a good deal of business and quite a heavy freight tonnage.

Mr. VENIOT: I will go into the matter fully.

Mr. BELL (St. John): I would like to ask the Postmaster General to give me some particulars in connection with the St. John post office. In the list of post offices I notice there is a decrease in the estimate for St. John amounting to $11,640. I would like to ask the Postmaster General why this estimate has been reduced.

Mr. VENIOT: The decrease of $11,640 is made up as follows:

Difference between salaries of employees promoted or who have left the service and the salaries of persons appointed or promoted to replace them.		$ 4,200
Eight positions not required.. .		11,400
		$15,600
Less:
Twenty-nine statutory increases of $120 each..	$3,480
Eight statutory increases of $60 each..	480	3,960
		$11,640

The following are the positions which have been vacant for some time and are no longer required:

One senior postal clerk..	$ 1,980
Seven postal clerks:
One at $1,740
Four at $1,320
Two at $1,200	9,420
	$11,400

Mr. BELL (St. John): If there is a reduction in the staff is it on account of decreased business?

Mr. VENIOT: No, reorganization and superannuation; new persons coming in from lower positions and receiving the minimum salary. There has been no great decrease in staff.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Would the Postmaster General be good enough to inform the house if the total vote of $150,000 for the Yukon territory is required for mail service?

Mr. VENIOT: Just a portion of that vote is required for mail service. The main service in the Yukon is the winter service from White Horse to Dawson which is arranged for by the tender and contract system. The summer service is a monopoly, the British Yukon Navigation Company being the only company operating boats. The other services are quite small and are arranged for from year to year.

[Mr. Speakman.]

I know of no transportation costs which are paid to the Canadian National or to the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with that service.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I notice that the Postmaster General is now calling for tenders for the winter mail contract, the present contract expiring at the beginning of navigation this year. It is rather disappointing to see that a better service is not being contemplated. I think we should get a better service for the money which is paid, a rather generous amount for this winter mail service. The route covers about four hundred miles, with a branch line of eighty miles, and the contract provides for a weekly delivery of mail each way between railhead at White Horse and Dawson, the northern extremity of the route. During the broken period between the closing of navigation and the opening up of winter travel the contractor is only required to haul 1,200 pounds per week. During the winter period he is obliged to haul 2,500 pounds per week and under the regulations the contractor is obliged to haul merchandise paying first class mail rates in preference to newspapers and reading matter. The consequence is that the mails are cluttered up with tons of merchandise and the newspapers and periodicals are left at railhead and accumulate there all winter until there is almost a boatload of them in the spring, when they are not worth moving. I think that should be remedied by allowing merchandise to go forward to railhead at parcel post rates and it could be hauled into the interior at freight rates that would cost the consignees less than the present rates and would not congest the mails. I think the contract for the future should require that more tonnage be hauled per week.

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad the hon. member has drawn my attention to that; I will go into the matter immediately.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I believe you should ask for more than 2,500 pounds per week. I notice that the specifications permit the contractor to haul the mail by aeroplane. The present contractors have been enterprising enough to install an aeroplane service and they are hauling the mail by that means without any extra cost to the government. I do not think that has occurred anywhere else in Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: They asked for that permission some four months ago and we granted it to them, saying that it did not make any difference to us how they got the mail in.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I believe the Postmaster General could get that extra tonnage hauled at the same contract price, as there will probably be a number of bidders for the contract. The present specifications cover only the same tonnage as the old contract, that is, the 1,200 pounds during the broken period and 2,500 pounds during the winter period. That is not enough.

Mr. VENIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for calling that to my attention.

Mr. SPOTTON: I intend to take up only a few moments of the time of the house, but I have been asked by friends or by people who were friends of the government for particulars regarding the Walton post office. I gave the Postmaster General notice that I would be asking for these particulars, and I desire to know why a returned soldier was passed over and the post office given to a civilian who had just moved into the riding a few months before and had purchased a store there. This is not a case where the Postmaster General disapproved of the action of the Civil Service Commission—I am not laying that charge at all—but if the Postmaster General's sympathy is as great as he says it is for the returned soldier, this is a case which he might have held up until he went into the matter. Let me quote—I will be very brief—from a letter of the district superintendent dated November 23, 1928, as follows:

> The applicants given in order of merit from a postal service standpoint, irrespective of military or residential qualifications, are as follows:
> William Clarence Bennett
> John McLeod
> Richard Wright Hoy
> Carl William Oakley

John McLeod had just moved into the riding and purchased a store there. He seemed to have the good offices of the member for North Perth (Mr. Hay) and consequently received the appointment. It may be said that Mr. Bennett was not residing within the village, but I find a letter on the file from W. J. May, the district superintendent, dated December 1, as follows:

> Having reference to his report of the 23rd ultimo, on the applicants for the position of postmaster at the above mentioned office, the district superintendent now begs to advise that he has been informed by Mr. W. C. Bennett one of the applicants for the position that he has now purchased the Cooperative store in Walton in which the Walton post office would be conducted were he to receive the appointment. In this event Mr. Bennett should now be placed in class B.

I may say that while the post office is in South Huron, it is just on the boundary line. In the riding of South Huron there is just this store in which the post office has been located for many years, and three or four houses. The village consisting of a few hundred people is entirely in my constituency of North Huron as is all the rest of the business section, and the United Farmers' co-operative store would be very central. I am making no attack on the Postmaster General; I have no knowledge that he has in any way interfered with the Civil Service Commission, but this seems to be a case where for some reason or another a returned soldier was passed over who, ninety-nine per cent of the people of the district believe, should not have been passed over. If he was not a resident there for the full length of time, he was a resident there on December 1 and had a store and this matter could very well have been left in abeyance for a while until he had the necessary length of residence. I have been asked to bring this matter to the attention of the Postmaster General. I am making no attack upon his administration in the matter, but it seems to be a case where the Civil Service Commission has passed over a returned soldier and where the Postmaster General might very well have used his influence.

I should be glad if at some time the Postmaster General would give the house a concise statement of what the air mail service has cost the Dominion of Canada to the present date, and what revenue we are deriving from it. This matter of "keeping up with the Joneses" and trying to have an air mail service equal to that of a country with a population of 120,000,000, is very fine, but I have to struggle to get mail boxes for a few farmers and I cannot get them on account of the cost, while at the same time we are placing an item of $800,000 additional in the estimates for a play-toy running between Toronto and Montreal which the Postmaster General says very few appreciate and very few are patronizing. I would plead with the Postmaster General to get away from the big interests and the moneyed classes and get his ear to the ground. Let him listen to the hon. member for Skeena and other members and grant some of the requests of those who are rolling back the map of this Dominion. Let him listen to those in the far-flung parts of Canada and to bona fide farmers who have to go a mile or a mile and a tenth for their mail. Let him get down and serve the masses before he spends millions more each year in the interests of the classes, and in trying to "keep up with the Joneses" with this play-toy, the air-mail service. As regards the air mail service between Montreal and Toronto, I really think it is a joke where there are three fast trains a day each way with an excellent mail service. Canada has prospered wonderfully under the old system and I am sure, if the question is one of an order coming in, it does not take long when you have three fast trains a day, and if it is a dunner that is coming in, the slower it is the better.

I would ask the Postmaster General, since I have brought the matter to his deputy's attention, to give me some little explanation for our people in the village of Walton, if he has it at hand.

Mr. VENIOT: I have no explanation at all to give if the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. SPOTTON: Some future time will be all right.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous, including Lucien Pacaud, secretary of the High Commissioner's office, as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable Board, at $1,500; and $5,000 for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to dependents of employees killed while on duty, such payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,176,175.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This afternoon my colleague from North Winnipeg introduced the question of the beam system and we were interrupted by some other matters relative to local post offices. Since the Minister of Justice has intimated that a bill will be introduced giving confirmation to the action of the government along this line, I do not want to spend any length of time in discussing this question to-night, but I should like to call attention to some of the outstanding facts in the case. I note, according to a resumé which I find in the New Leader of November 23, 1928, that the beam system was in reality owned and operated by the post office in Great Britain. The beam system, as I understand it, is a very great advantage over the ordinary cable means of transmission. It possesses both secrecy and economy and it is hoped that with these advantages it will mark a great advance in communication. The beam system was instituted as a state service by the Labour government and it compelled the cable companies to reduce their rates by an average of fourpence a word. Then the various cable companies began to protest that their business was being undermined and the Daily Mail, for example, stated:

The fall in the revenue of the cable companies due to the growing use of wireless telegraphy—more particularly the government-controlled wireless beam service linking Great Britain with the dominions—is reaching a crisis.

There followed a great financial merger, together with a threat to the government that unless it agreed to surrender the beam service to the companies, they would cease operations and let their cables go derelict. To quote:

The government promptly surrendered. Up soared the market. Marconi shares, which had fallen as low as 13 shillings, rose to 71 shillings. "Buy Marconis" was the tip. "The government is going to sell out, competition will be squashed, and we have a world to conquer".

There was in connection with that transaction a very considerable scandal: in fact, there was in certain quarters more criticism of the Postmaster General in Great Britain and of the Post Office Department generally than there has been of the Canadian Postmaster General in the last few days.

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad to hear that somebody else is getting it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For example, it is stated in connection with these cable companies:

The undertaking was burdened with £59,000 for directors' fees, plus £8,000 for their expenses, while Mr. F. G. Kellaway, Postmaster General in the coalition government, was receiving a salary of £10,000 a year as managing director. Senator Marconi received from the funds of the company £8,000 a year for his yacht.

And so on. As I say, there was a decided ground for criticism in connection with the matter. I cannot do better than to quote a very brief summary of the situation as contained in an article by Walter J. Baker, M.P. A great deal of this material is contained in the English Hansard, and in fact a certain amount of it is referred to in the correspondence which has recently been laid on the table, but which I have not had the time to read carefully. Mr. Baker states:

When it was decided in 1924, to utilize the newly perfected beam system, four government stations were established for communication with Canada, South Africa, India and Australia. All of them were under post office control.

Again:

On December 19, 1927, the Postmaster General announced that an imperial conference had been called to consider the position created by the successful government competition.

To prepare the way for this conference and to meet the new situation, the Eastern and Associated Cable companies and the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company agreed to form a merger. But they made it a condition that the government should transfer the beam installation to them!

The upshot was that the imperial conference recommended that the Pacific cables, the West Indian cable and wireless system and the Imperial Atlantic cables be sold, and the post office beam services should be leased to private cable and wireless interests for twenty-five years.

Here we have a curious situation. The beam system operating under the post office, publicly owned and controlled, was able to do the work at so much cheaper a rate that it was practically putting the private companies out of business. Something must be done. It possibly may be that if this had gone on, we as having some share in the private companies might have experienced some loss. It might have been necessary for us to insist that if this beam service was to prevail we should have some share in its benefits, but in consenting to the amalgamation it seems to me that this government has played into the hands of those who set the interests of the private companies ahead of the interests of the public system of Great Britain.

Mr. VENIOT: We are in pretty good company when we are in the company of Great Britain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may be, but it seems to me rather curious that the Postmaster General, representing a Liberal government, should be so anxious to be found in the company of Mr. Baldwin in the Conservative government in Great Britain.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is because it is a British government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Another British government just a short time before had instituted the beam system as a public service, and it had been hoped by those who had been interested in the MacDonald government that this would be continued as a public service, but when Mr. Baldwin came into power the policy was completely reversed, and if I understand the situation aright I say that this government played into the hands of the opponents of the publicly-owned system. I know—and it is stated in the correspondence—that various proposals were brought forward at that conference to provide some way out of the difficulties that had been experienced, but Mr. Baker points out that every one of the eleven witnesses examined by the imperial conference represented one or other of the interests which stood to lose by the post office wireless competition, and although the conference discussed five possible methods of dealing with imperial communications, the possibility of developing the imperial service under the joint control of the home and dominion governments was not debated. That you will find is corroborated by the correspondence as laid upon the table. I want to read a few more words from this summary of Mr. Baker's:

> In other words, the companies demanded a complete monopoly within the empire for their own financial benefit, with the result that the conference reported that if the threat were carried out, it would enable foreign interests to strengthen their position.

Again:

> The cables owned by the British government and the dominion governments jointly, which cost £7,134,797, are to be transferred for a sum of £2,500,000, without information as to the basis of valuation.

Now when we ask for some further information with regard to this transaction we are told that a good deal of it is confidential, and we in this house are at a loss to know how to form a judgment on a matter of this kind. We have here and there letters which refer to the deal, but there are evidently great gaps, and when we come to these gaps the Postmaster General tells us that the information is confidential and cannot be given to this house. Mr. Baker, speaking from the British end, says:

> It is also clear that the beam wireless is to be leased for twenty-five years at an immediate annual rental of £250,000, plus a lump sum payment of £60,000.
> And yet, while the publicly-owned cables are being taken over at a greatly depreciated figure and the beam wireless is being leased for a long period at an initial rent which is little more than the profit for the first complete year, the plant of the private companies is, apparently, being taken into the new concern on the basis of their share value.
> In November, 1927, for instance, the Marconi Company stated before Mr. Justice Eve, that the book value of its assets was £3,177,433, but these same assets are to be sold to the new concern for £17,350,000 in shares.

Mr. Baker sums up thus:

> It is said that a complicated and powerful network of financial, banking, insurance, electrical and newspaper interests stands behind the cable companies; that by a process of linked directorships these forces can be effectively mobilized, and that the existence of this combination compelled the government—

That is the British government:

—to yield.

I may say in passing—I do not care to develop this at this particular point—that certain great Canadian corporations are involved in this matter. Under those circumstances I do not think we have any right to pass this item so readily. It is true that we are dealing simply with one particular item that does not involve the whole transaction. It may very well be that on account of our connection with the cable companies we have a right to demand better terms of the British government. But I would repeat that our action has apparently assisted the reactionary forces in Great Britain to gain a very decided victory, and we find ourselves, as a part of the British Empire, giving over very largely the control, and certainly surrendering the profits, of this wonderful beam wireless system. I would ask the minister to give us even at this stage a little further information concerning Canada's part in this transaction.

Mr. VENIOT: I gave all the information this afternoon that I could possibly give, and so did the Minister of Justice. The agreement, while generally accepted by Canada has not yet been entered into, nor has it been entered into by the other contracting parties. When we have word from the home government that there is certain information that should not be given out to the public because it is still confidential, I do not think it is fair for the hon. gentleman to press the Postmaster General to give any further information than he has been able to give under the circumstances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it possible, then, that this whole matter could be deferred until the Postmaster General is in a position to give the information to this house?

Mr. VENIOT: What does the hon. gentleman mean? Under this heading of "miscellaneous" is an item of $1,500 for somebody who is looking after certain interests that Canada may have in connection with the old cable service, which will be done away with after this year. Does the hon. member mean that until a full explanation is given in connection with this transaction, which to a considerable extent is still confidential, my estimates should be held up because there is a $1,500 item for one of the officials of the old cable service? I do not think it is reasonable.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I frankly admit, Mr. Chairman, that the practice which has prevailed for a long time of discussing general policy in connection with particular items is an absolutely absurd one. But on the other hand here is a very large matter involved.

Mr. VENIOT: $1,500.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, not the $1,500. But there is a very large transaction involved, that of the transfer of our interest in this cable company.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. VENIOT: What has that got to do with this item? Nothing at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: So far as the cable company transaction is concerned this is the very first opportunity this house has had for discussing the matter. The matter has not in any way come before the house, notwithstanding that questions have been asked and we have tried to get at some of the facts of the case. Early in the session we asked that the correspondence be placed on the table, and, as my colleague said, some six weeks have passed by and at last, on the eve of the discussion on the estimates, the correspondence is tabled—and very little of it at that.

Mr. VENIOT: Simply because we have been in communication with the British government, the Australian government and the government of New Zealand, and just lately we got the information we required, that is, that they were not in a position to permit us at the present time to place certain correspondence on the table. The hon. gentleman is not fair to throw the blame on the Postmaster General for holding back that record. It is not fair criticism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are facing a still bigger question than that if indeed business transactions of this kind are secret in their nature—business transactions that have involved a very heavy expenditure on the part of the Canadian government, and in which national policies are involved. Surely before such transactions are finally completed there should be the very fullest discussion in this house.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman will have every opportunity for such discussion. The Minister of Justice guaranteed that this afternoon. He gave his word of honour that even if it was decided that a bill was not necessary, the hon. gentleman would on another occasion have ample opportunity of discussing the whole situation. I am sorry he did not hear the Minister of Justice.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Postmaster General understood that the Minister of Justice gave a definite undertaking that if a bill were not presented, there would be ample opportunity for discussion?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, and I repeat it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under those circumstances I am quite satisfied to let this item pass.

Item agreed to.

Post Office

Salaries, including amount required to pay allowance to office appliance operators, grade 2, operating mechanical audit card punching machines in accordance with provisions to be approved by order in council, $1,375,039.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I want to bring to the notice of the Postmaster General the discrepancy existing between the position of the superintendent or post office inspector in Prince Edward Island and that in other districts in Canada, and to ask why the classification for one district should be different from that of others.

Mr. VENIOT: That matter has been up for consideration by the department for some time, on the application of the inspector himself. Mr. Whear, I think, cannot expect to have the same salary classification as inspectors in the larger districts. The district of Prince Edward Island is a limited district in comparison with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and he has been notified that he cannot expect to have the same salary rating as the district superintendents of those two provinces. Further than that, the matter has been laid before the Civil Service Commission, and their decision is that they will not consent to an increased salary at the present time, based on the reasons I have given.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I quite understand the reasons as given by the Postmaster General, but there are other considerations that I should like to bring to his notice. The post office inspector in that district has probably more work to do, involving greater responsibility than have inspectors in the other districts, for the reason that he alone of the inspectors has no assistants.

Mr. VENIOT: I will go into it further with the commission, but that was their decision.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): For a great many years that district was recognized as being on the same footing as the other districts. It is true that when the classification came into effect in 1921 the district was abolished altogether and attached to New Brunswick for a short period. However, during the fall of that same year the arrangement was found to be so very unsatisfactory to the island people that the district was reinstated, but left in a different classification. I am not particularly interested in the official at all, but I do feel that as a matter of provincial rights the province should at least be on the same footing in this regard as the other provinces. I feel that further consideration ought to be given to this matter. We are recognized in other respects. For instance, until this year the same discrimination existed with regard to taxation, but the Island has now been established as a separate district with an inspector of taxation. I think the Post Office department in conjunction with the Civil Service Commission should find some means of establishing a similar condition in regard to our post office inspector. Our supreme court judges and others in the provincial service are on the same footing as similar officials in other parts of Canada. Is there not some means whereby this district may be dealt with similarly as a matter of provincial rights?

Mr. VENIOT: I will give it my attention.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is one item I think we should call attention to,—

Mr. VENIOT: Which one?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: —and that is regarding the increase to the deputy. The policy has been adopted by the government of increasing the salaries of some of the deputies and not of others. Some have been increased $2,000, others $1,000, while others again have not been increased at all. This is the first department of civil government that has come up for discussion, and that is why I am mentioning the matter here, not with the intention of objecting to this vote, but in order to reserve our right to discuss the whole question at some suitable time.

Mr. VENIOT: That will be all right.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not understand how the government can justify the line they have taken. There are some deputies for whom no salary increase has been provided. I think they should be given an increase. I want to reserve the right to us on this side of the house to discuss the general question, which I think we ought to be given an opportunity of doing at some suitable time.

Mr. VENIOT: I think there will be no objection to that.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

South Bay, Ingonish—purchase, reconstruction and extension of Corson's wharf, $6,000.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): No. 131.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have done enough work for the day. The Minister of Public Works will make better headway if he takes up this item next week.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps we might go this far. I know that one hon. member on the other side of the house has something to say in regard to this vote. It will not be convenient for him to be here on Monday. I suggest that we hear him and so make a little headway.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All right.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I desire to bring to the attention of the minister some very important harbour and river improvements in the public service in the county of Cumberland. Last session I mentioned to the minister that at Port Greville, on the bay of Fundy, a good deal of money a few years years ago was spent in improving the breakwater. The information that has come to me—and I am sure it must be in the possession of the department—is that the breakwater does not extend far enough out to prove of sufficient advantage to the shipping interests at that point. In addition to that, during a very severe storm last fall the beach protection, which joins the breakwater at a certain point, was completely washed out, making harbour conditions at this point very hazardous. I appeal to the minister again to give immediate consideration to this matter, because Port Greville is not served by a railway. A great deal of shipping is carried on at this point, particulars of which I gave the house last year, and this port is in the centre of a lumbering district. I think the conditions there should be brought up to a standard which will enable people using that accommodation to carry on their regular businesss with efficiency.

There is another point along the shore of the bay of Fundy where improvements are also necessary in connection with a wharf; I refer to Spencer's Island. I am not going into particulars to-night but merely mention this case in order that the minister might make a note of it and possibly include an item in the supplementary estimates to take care of this work.

Another matter to which I will direct attention is a wharf which has been requested by the citizens of Northport. This village is on the Northumberland straits, and I believe a petition was forwarded to the minister within the last few months urging that a wharf be built. This is a very important fishing district and there is no accommodation at this point of any kind. The people there feel themselves justified in requesting that some assistance be granted them by way of a wharf; it need not be an expensive affair, but a small wharf will enable them to carry on their regular business much more efficiently.

I also spoke to the minister in connection with the wharf at Pugwash, which is also on the Northumberland straits. That wharf is in a very dilapidated condition. As a matter of fact there are two wharves at this point, one owned by the railway company and the other by the government, and my information is that both these wharves require immediate attention. This is also an important port, and I believe petitions have been forwarded requesting that this accommodation be brought up to a certain standard.

The last matter about which I wish to speak concerns the dredging in the inner and outer harbour at Parrsboro, which is on the bay of Fundy. I believe the minister has received communications from the board of trade in this town and from other prominent citizens urging that immediate action be taken to dredge the harbour in order to enable the business of this port to be carried on freely and to the general advantage of all concerned. I wish to impress upon the minister the importance of this port, which also needs a government wharf in the town. There is a government wharf a short distance outside the town but it does not properly serve the shipping interests, since a great deal of lumber and other material is shipped from this centre. There are some privately owned wharves at this point but they are in a run-down condition and are not properly serving the shipping public. That is all I have to say; I appeal to the minister to give these matters his immediate attention and, if possible, to place amounts in the supplementary estimates this year to bring these works up to a proper standard and in order that the shipping interests to be served may be able to take full advantage of the accommodation offered.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest to the minister that the house adjourn now, because a number of the Nova Scotia members on this side thought we would not get through the Post Office estimates in time to deal with anything else to-night, and they particularly requested the hon. member for Argenteuil and myself to ask the minister not to take up anything else to-night. There is only ten minutes left, anyway.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no objection. I would say to my hon. friend, with regard to the matters of which he has spoken, that I know some of them have been receiving consideration, and the others will be given attention. If my hon. friends saw fit to pass this item, reserving the right to anyone to refer to it again, I should be very glad to get it through, but I am not going to insist upon it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We will be satisfied with that reservation.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, May 6, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 179 for the relief of Madelaine Virginia Lumsden.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 193, for the relief of Mary Bertha Dupuis Ranger.—Mr. Millar.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ROBERT J. ELLIOTT

Mr. HANSON:

1. On whose recommendation was Canadian National Railway baggage master, Robert J. Elliott, placed as conductor on Canadian National trains No. 23 and No. 24, between Sussex and St. John (Atlantic region)?
2. Was said appointment made with the approval of the order of railway conductors?
3. If not, has that organization protested Elliott's appointment?
4. What explanation has the Canadian National Railway Company to offer if Elliott has been advanced over those who are senior in the service to him.

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The relationship between the men and the management is entirely an internal affair of the railway, and any question arising therefrom is dealt with under well recognized rules. In case of grievances there has been set up machinery by which such grievances may be adjusted between the representatives of the management and representatives of the employees. That being the case, the management feel that it is not in the interest of the railway, nor in the public interest, to attempt to deal with such matters except in the prescribed manner.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—APPRENTICE INSTRUCTION

Mr. SENN:

1. What is the total cost to Canadian National Railways for apprentice instruction on the entire system?
2. What is the total annual cost for each of the regions of the system?
3. What is the total annual cost per apprentice for each region?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $77,551.48.

2.

Central	$ 48,977 74
Atlantic	10,428 00
Western	18,145 74

3.

Western	90 73

BEDFORD BASIN MAGAZINE

Mr. ERNST:

1. What was the total amount paid to A. S. McMillan and C. A. McNearney with respect to construction work at Bedford basin, in the county of Halifax, concerning which the payment of $100,000 appeared on page 270, volume 2, Auditor General's report, 1928?
2. Of such total amount, how much represents: (a) the contract price; (b) extras?

Mr. RALSTON:

1 and 2. The total amount paid to A. S. McMillan and C. A. McNearney in connection with their 1927-1928 contract for construction work at Bedford basin magazine is as follows:

Amount of work done under contract dated August 1, 1927	$ 107,900 00
Additional work ordered by engineer in charge	909 02
Total	$ 108,809 02

EXPERIMENTAL AND DEMONSTRATION FARMS

Mr. MANION:

1. How many Dominion experimental and demonstration farms are there in Canada?
2. Where are they situated, by places and provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. There are twenty-two Dominion experimental farms and stations, besides one substation, three tobacco stations and one fox station.

The Dominion government does not operate any demonstration farms, but it does supervise the operation and, in a small way assist the owners of a considerable number (186 in 1928), of what are called illustration stations. The illustration station area of a man's farm includes only that part of it fronting on a well travelled road and varies in area from eight or ten to forty acres. For the privilege of saying what crops shall be grown, what rotation shall be followed and how and when cultural operations shall be performed the department pays the owner or operator a small amount ($5 per acre) each year. The purpose of these stations is to demonstrate the varieties of the different crops, the cultural methods and the rotations that have been found to give the best results on an experimental farm or station where conditions are judged to be similar to those which maintain on the illustration station under consideration.

The crops harvested off these illustration stations are of course the property of the men operating them.

PELAGIC SEALING TREATY CLAIMS

Mr. NEILL:

Is it the intention of the government to take any steps this session of parliament, or in the near future, towards meeting the wishes of the sealers regarding the matter referred to in their petition to the right honourable the premier, during 1927, which asked for an investigation of their modus vivendi sealing claims of 1892?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

These claims were against the British government. They were submitted to that government through the government of Canada, but they were not favourably considered. The British government explained that the modus vivendi was adopted in the interests of the seal fishery, and due notice of it in the seasons of 1892 and 1893 was given. As the claims were fully considered by the British government, it is felt that no good purpose would be served by reopening the question at this time.

DR. W. A. GROVES

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. Was Dr. W. A. Groves, Fergus, Ontario, employed in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?
2. What length of time did he serve in this department?
3. In what year was his appointment made permanent?
4. Was any agreement for superannuation made?
5. When did Dr. Groves leave the service?
6. How much had Dr. Groves paid into the superannuation fund?
7. Has Dr. Groves been reimbursed for such payments or is he entitled to any?

Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes.
2. Including service with the Board of Pension Commissioners, from the 24th April, 1919, to the 30th June, 1926.
3. Dr. Groves was granted permanency under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act, with effect from the 1st October, 1925, but was not made permanent under the civil service or superannuation regulations.
4. No.
5. 30th June, 1926.
6. $150.03.
7. Dr. Groves was duly reimbursed. He is not entitled to any further payment.

SYDNEY-NEW WATERFORD-GLACE BAY MAIL SERVICE

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South):

1. By whom is mail conveyed from Sydney to New Waterford?
2. What amount is paid for the service?
3. Is there a contract for the work?
4. By whom is mail conveyed from Sydney to Glace Bay?
5. What is paid for the service?
6. Is there a contract for the work?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Sydney and Louisburg Railway.
2. $287.96 per annum, on mileage basis.
3. No.
4. Cape Breton Electric Railway.
5. $1,687.80 for year 1928-29 on a mileage basis.
6. No.

MONTREAL POSTAL STATION B

Mr. QUINN:

1. Is a portion of postal station "B", 676 St. Catherine street west, Montreal, occupied as a private residence?
2. If so, is this the residence of the Deputy Postmaster General as indicated in the Montreal directory and telephone book?
3. If so, how long has the said postal station been occupied as a residence, and what rental is paid for the same?
4. What floor space is so occupied for residential purposes?
5. Is the government renting any buildings for government offices in Montreal on or near St. Catherine street? If so, what rent per square foot per annum is paid?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. (a) The living quarters in this building have been occupied as a residence since its completion some twenty years ago; (b) $500 per annum.
4. 3,010 square feet.
5. Government rents ground floor space for postal station purposes at two points on St. Catherine St. Postal station "N", corner St. Catherine St. E. and City Hall ave., at $2.64 per square foot. Postal station "T", St. Catherine St. E. and Amherst St., at $3.85 per square foot.

MR. W. M. CORY

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond):

1. What is the position and salary of W. M. Cory in the Department of the Interior?
2. How long has he been in the department?
3. What was his salary when appointed?
4. Is this man a son of the Deputy Minister of the Interior?
5. What sum has he drawn in travelling expenses during the past twelve months?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Assistant departmental solicitor—$4,020, by Civil Service Commission.
2. From January 1, 1916.
3. $600.
4. Yes.
5. Nil.

MR. T. L. CORY

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond):

1. What is the position and salary of T. L. Cory in the Department of the Interior?
2. What was his salary when appointed to the said department.
3. Is this man a son of the Deputy Minister of the Interior?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Special legal officer, international water problems—$4,140, by Civil Service Commission.
2. $300 per month.
3. Yes.

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Will the act based on the Duncan report with reference to preferential freight rates of 20 per cent in favour of the maritime provinces be amended during the present session in order to locate the railway terminus in the city of Quebec instead of in the city of Levis?
2. If not, will this important question be soon settled, conforming to the request of public bodies in Quebec?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The legislative program does not contemplate any revision of the Maritime Freight Rates Act during the present session.
2. Answered by No. 1.

QUEBEC RAILWAY TERMINAL

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

Is it the intention of the government to consider the question of the railway terminus in the city of Quebec at the same time as they consider the terminus in the city of Montreal, which is asking $50,000,000 for said terminus according to the Palmer report?

Mr. DUNNING:

The management of Canadian National Railways is at present considering the terminal situation at Quebec.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—ENLISTMENTS

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

What was the total number of enlistments during the Great War of 1914-1918: (a) voluntary; (b) compulsory, in each of the provinces of Canada.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. BARBER:

1. How many cattle were slaughtered as reactors under the bovine tuberculosis test, during the twelve months ending January 31, 1929, in the provinces of: (a) Quebec; (b) British Columbia?
2. What is the total amount of compensation awarded the owners in each of these provinces for the same period?
3. What amount of the compensation was paid, and what amount is still due the owners as of April 30, 1929, in each of these provinces for the same period?

CONFEDERATION PARK

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Has the government paid the purchase price of property recently acquired in the city of Ottawa, bounded as follows: on the north by Wellington street, on the west by Elgin street, on the south by Queen street and on the east by the post office?

2. Do the various properties mentioned in question 1 now stand in the name of the crown free from all liens, charges and encumbrances?

3. Is the government aware that the municipal corporation of the city of Ottawa claims arrears of municipal taxes on the various properties mentioned in question 1?

4. If the government has been advised of arrears of taxes on the various properties mentioned in question 1, what does the same amount to on: (a) Russell hotel property; (b) Francis McDougall estate; (c) C. W. Mitchell estate?

5. Has the government paid any taxes to the city of Ottawa in respect of arrears on the various properties mentioned in question 1? If so, what amount of arrears of taxes has been paid?

6. What firm of solicitors acted for the government in the acquisition of the various properties mentioned in question 1, and did such solicitors give the government a certificate that said properties were free of all liens, charges and encumbrances when acquired?

7. What were the names of the tenants or owners of the various properties mentioned in question 1?

8. Was compensation paid to any of the said tenants or owners when the various properties were expropriated?

9. If compensation was paid, what sum was paid to each tenant or owner?

IMMIGRATION IN 1926-27-28

Mr. LUCHKOVICH:

How many immigrants entered Canada in 1926, 1927 and 1928 from: (a) British Isles; (b) United States; (c) other European countries, designating country of origin?

IONA, CAPE BRETON, PUBLIC WHARF

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. What was the expenditure on the government wharf at Iona, Cape Breton, 1928?

2. How was the work done?

3. What were the names of those engaged in this work and what was paid to each?

HENDRY'S LIMITED, HALIFAX—CHARTER OF STEAMBOATS

Mr. BARBER:

1. How many steamboats were chartered by various departments of the Dominion government from Hendry's Limited, of Halifax, for 1927, 1928 and 1929?

2. Under what terms were these steamboats chartered?

3. What are the names of the steamboats, the tonnage of each, when was each one built, and what is the charter price of each?

4. What is the fitness of each boat for the service called for?

5. Has any transfer of service of these boats been made from one department to another, and if so, what are the changes, and why?

[Mr. W. F. Garland.]

6. Have any changes been made as regards charter price, and if so, why? If no change has been made, why?

7. How many steamboats owned or chartered by Hendry's Limited, Halifax, are subsidized by the federal government for 1927 1928 and 1929, and what are the names, tonnage, route and subsidy of each, and when was each one built?

8. Has each one of those boats passed favourable examination by the federal steamboat inspector?

9. Will the government hand down report of such examination?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MR. A. M. GRAHAM

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of the report of the investigation of Judge Stubbs regarding the dismissal of Mr. A. M. Graham from the staff of the soldier settlement board.

HORNEPAYNE POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. COWAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, complaints, petitions, applications and reports from the Civil Service Commission in connection with the appointment of the present postmaster at Hornepayne, Ontario, and the dismissal of Mr. Leggatt from the postmastership at Hornepayne.

ONION LAKE INDIAN AGENCY

Mr. McQUARRIE:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to the appointment and dismissal of C. B. Rothery as clerk at the Onion Lake Indian agency, Saskatchewan, and the appointment of a successor to that office.

MANYBERRIES DOMINION RANGE EXPERIMENTAL STATION

Mr. GARDINER:

For a return showing: 1. The number and names of employees at the Dominion range experimental station at Manyberries, Alberta, from April 1 to November 30, 1928.

2. The actual wages paid monthly to each of the aforesaid employees from April 1 to November 30, 1928.

PARK SITES

Mr. BISSETT:

1. The report of R. W. Cautley or any other officer of the government relative to any investigation made, (a) in the proposed eastern Manitoba park site; (b) in the proposed Riding Mountain park site.

2. All letters, telegrams or other documents between the Department of the Interior or any other department of the government and the government of Manitoba or any member of the government of Manitoba or any member of the House of Commons, relative to the establishment of a national park in the province of Manitoba.

3. All letters, telegrams or other documents between the Department of the Interior or any other department of the government and the government of Saskatchewan or any member of the government of Saskatchewan or any member of the House of Commons, relative to the establishment of the Prince Albert National Park in the province of Saskatchewan.

4. All reports made in connection with any investigations relative to the establishment of Prince Albert national park in the province of Saskatchewan.

HARRY BRONFMAN

Mr. EVANS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government in connection with the alleged charge of attempted bribery of Customs Officer Knowles against Harry Bronfman.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This concerns more particularly the Minister of National Revenue, but I must say on behalf of the Department of Justice that this must not include documents and papers which, under the rules and practice, must remain confidential. I have no objection to the motion passing with that understanding.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE GEORGE GREGORY

Mr. GARDINER moved:

For a return showing: 1. The total amount of money paid to or on behalf of Private George Gregory, No. 160599, since his discharge from the overseas expeditionary forces at Calgary, Alberta, on June 4, 1928.

2. The amount of money paid directly to Gregory and for what purpose, namely, pension, etc.

3. The amount of money paid on behalf of Gregory and for what purpose, namely, hospitalization, etc.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would be glad if this question could stand until I have had an opportunity of inquiring of the pensions commissioners as to the information that should be brought down.

Motion stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 22 to incorporate Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company.

Mr. PETTIT: I notice that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is not in his seat, and I would therefore ask that this bill stand.

Order stands.

78594—142½

ANNIE FORBES SANGSTER

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of Bill No. 200, for the relief of Annie Forbes Sangster.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask, do these bills standing in the name of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) all relate to cases in his constituency?

Mr. JELLIFF: I wish to inform the hon. member that none of these bills standing in my name relate to cases in my constituency. I think most of them come from Toronto.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time, on division.

CHARLES STANLEY CUNEO

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of Bill No. 203, for the relief of Charles Stanley Cuneo.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some time ago those of us who come from the west were criticized in this house because we had anything to say with regard to divorce bills simply because they related mostly to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I think it is a very strange thing now that members from the province of Ontario cannot sponsor their own divorce bills. It seems to me that we ought to have an explanation of these bills since they have to be loaded on a man who comes from the province of Alberta. I would suggest that we have an explanation as to this particular bill.

Mr. JELLIFF: It is one of the ordinary cases that we have before us, of infidelity in the matrimonial relationship. I imagine that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is most concerned as to the future of the children who are involved in these cases. In the particular case before us I can assure him that there are no children involved. As to the bills standing in my name generally, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that I have examined the evidence in each case carefully, and I think it is amply sufficient to sustain the divorce applied for.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time, on division.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 178, for the relief of Adele Cawthra Rogers.—Mr. Matthews.

Bill No. 182, for the relief of Maud Parker.—Mr. McGibbon (for Mr. Church).

Bill No. 183, for the relief of Eleanor Vair.—Mr. McGibbon (for Mr. Church).

Bill No. 186, for the relief of Isabel Honor Gilderoy.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 192, for the relief of Catherine Goring.—Mr. McGibbon (for Mr. Church).

Bill No. 194, for the relief of Harvey Baden Powell Haney.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 196, for the relief of Ivy Georgina Lloyd.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 197, for the relief of Helen Steele.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 198, for the relief of John Campbell.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 202, for the relief of Joseph Nicholl.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 204, for the relief of William Allan Griffith.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 205, for the relief of Sydney Bishop.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 209, for the relief of Patrizio Nardini.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Motions for second readings agreed to on division.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

LOWER LAKES TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the terminal at the lower lakes, may I ask that there be placed on the file the original correspondence addressed to the United States, between certain dates, I do not know specifically when, in which a summary of the note from the United States, dated July 28, 1928, is contained?

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, sessional papers No. 266 have reference to the correspondence which has taken place between the government of the province of New Brunswick and the federal government in respect to the sale of the St. John and Quebec railway. My impression is that the file is not quite complete. I am given to understand that there has been correspondence between the premier of New Brunswick and the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) which is not on this file. If that is the case, may I ask that the file be completed?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I think the hon. gentleman is right and that there is some correspondence between the premier of New Brunswick and myself. I will see that it is produced. I was not aware that it was not on the file.

Mr. MacLAREN: This had probably not been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General?

Mr. VENIOT: No, it had not.

CANADA'S GOLD RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). There is an article in the current issue of the Monetary Times in which the statement is made that sixty million dollars would be required to bring Canadian exchange back to parity with that of the United States, and that there is not that amount of gold in Canada's reserve. May I ask if that is the real reason why gold is not being shipped at present to the United States?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet read the article. I will read it, and then I shall be in a better position to give my hon. friend an answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not the article, Mr. Speaker, that I am concerned about; I want to get at the facts.

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that the facts are as stated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Secondly, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance: Is it true that it will require sixty million dollars to bring our exchange back to par in New York? According to the Minister's own statement there is not sixty million dollars in our treasury reserve. I think in a matter of this importance we have a right to hear from the Minister of Finance. Do I understand that the minister refuses to answer the question?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I have been some twenty years in this house and I have observed that it is not etiquette for a minister to rise to answer a question until the hon. gentleman putting the question has sat down. Let me say to my hon. friend that the Dominion of Canada is in a position to meet all obligations, at any time, anywhere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that a general statement is not an answer to my specific question. I ask again: Is it true it will require sixty million dollars to bring Canadian exchange back to par in New York?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when we may expect his opinion regarding appointments by the Civil Service Commission pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have asked one of the officers of the department to communicate with both the Civil Service Commission and the officers of the Post Office Department and to make a full report to me. I shall be quite pleased to communicate it to my hon. friend.

NOVA SCOTIA FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I desire to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) when I may expect an answer to my question of April 29 with reference to the fisheries of Nova Scotia?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The officers of the department are working on the answer to the question of my hon. friend.

WESTERN POSTAL EMPLOYEES

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES OF THOSE DISMISSED AND RE-EMPLOYED

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently re-employed, to give them the benefit of salary they would have received had they re-entered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed, and of subsequent salary revisons, and to make provision whereby certain former employees not now in the said service shall be eligible for reappointment as vacancies occur.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain. The motion is very indefinite in its terms.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, in bringing this resolution before the house I might refer to what happened last session. When the supplementary estimates were submitted, three or four days before prorogation, several hon. members took part in the discussion and it will be remembered that later the item was withdrawn, and I stated that the matter would be taken up next session. The reason I gave for withdrawing the item was that judging from what appeared in the press and from the speeches in the house the matter had not been sufficiently studied, and I thought with a closer study of the question a better understanding could be reached. Now I am bringing the matter forward again in the shape of a bill which will be founded on this resolution. Its object is to provide for payment to the men taken back after the Winnipeg strike of 1919 of the salary they would have received had they re-entered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed.

It is not my intention to go into the merits or demerits of what happened at the time of the strike, but merely to relate what took place afterwards. On July 7, 1919, a special act was passed authorizing the Civil Service Commission to appoint to the permanent staff any person employed to replace anyone who went out on strike, and in January, 1920, the government agreed to an arrangement whereby employees who had gone out on strike would be re-employed, provided: First, that they had the approval of the governor in council; secondly, that they gave satisfactory assurance that a repetition of the offence would not occur; thirdly, that they passed the civil service examination; and in the fourth place, that they should begin anew in the service. The age limit was waived in their favour.

Now these ninety-six men who were taken on after the strike and reinstated as the agreement here states were demoted to lower positions; that is to say, they came in at the bottom of the ladder or as postal helpers to work their way up. That is what they were supposed to do. But when they did return to employment they were engaged in the same advanced class they had occupied in the service before the strike, although they were paid the wages of employees of a lower grade. By way of comparison, although these figures may not be quite exact, I may put it this way in order to show what I mean. A postal clerk drawing a salary of $125 or $135 a month came back into the service as a postal helper at $85; he did the work of a postal clerk who would receive $125 but he himself received a remuneration of $85 only, or $90 as the case might be. There was that spread between the two.

On my tour to the coast in 1927 I stopped off at Winnipeg for three days, and this matter was brought to my attention. I went into it fully, and met a committee composed of some twenty-five or thirty persons representing all classes of postal workers in the city of Winnipeg. That committee was composed of men who had gone out on strike and had been taken back; of men who had replaced the strikers—there were some six hundred in all—and were working in the service; as well as of those who had not gone out on strike but had continued to work in the service. I met this committee representing these different classes of those concerned in the question, and they were all unanimous that those who had been taken back, the ninety-six, should be paid the salaries which they earned. I would point out that if the intention was to punish those men by demoting them they should have been demoted not only as respects the amount of salary they received but, as well in the class or kind of work which they were to do. I have always believed in the principle that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and if these men were brought back and engaged in work of a higher class they should have been paid for that class of work; they should not have been demoted in the matter of salary alone.

After studying the situation very carefully and looking into all phases of it, without however inquiring into the pros and cons of the strike, or what may have brought about the strike, I submitted to the government that in my opinion these men for several reasons should receive the pay contemplated in section 1, the only section, of the bill to be brought down. As I stated before, I felt that they were worthy of their hire. I felt that other participants in the strike, those who had gone out from the service of the railways, industrial concerns and so forth having been taken back on the same conditions as previously, it would not be fair that the employees in the postal service should alone be signalled out for this demotion. That was one of the reasons on which I based my recommendation to the government, and it has been accepted. I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the house discussing the resolution; when the bill is before the committee we shall have an opportunity to go more fully into the merits of the question. Let me observe this, however. I read in one of the newspapers this statement: "These men are in receipt of larger salaries than they had at the time they went out." If that is so then there is nothing to pay them; it will not be necessary to put into operation this provision of the bill relating to those who went out, as regards any who may have reached after a few years the position wherein they would receive such salary as was paid them before the strike took place. Let me point out further that in this bill there is nothing which will give a preference in the way of seniority over the men who remained in the service or over those who were taken in to replace the strikers.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Did the ninety-six pass the civil service examination?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. As I say, there is nothing to give these men a preference, in the way of seniority or classification, over the men who were taken in to replace the four or five hundred who were not taken back. When the resolution is in committee I shall ask to have it amended by the omission of these words:

> And to make provision whereby certain former employees not now in the said service shall be eligible for reappointment as vacancies occur.

At the time this resolution was prepared I was not aware that there was an order in council which met that very condition. Having been made aware of it, and having obtained a copy of the order in council, I did not deem it necessary to go further than the first clause of the resolution in order to meet the conditions as I found them in Winnipeg. On January 7, 1920, an order in council was passed which reads:

> Many evidences have reached the Department of Labour from ex-postal employees that they now recognize they participated unwisely in the sympathetic strike in western Canada last May, and that they sincerely regret the action they then took. The gravity of their offence against the state being now realized, the government has given consideration to the possibility of removing the bar to their application through the Civil Service Commission for re-employment in the public service, and His Excellency the Governor in Council is disposed to exercise clemency so far as reasonably consistent with necessary discipline.
> Ex-postal employees may therefore be considered as eligible to be appointed to positions in the civil service for which they make application as vacancies occur, and to which, in the opinion of the commission, they are justly entitled under the regulations, subject to the following conditions:
> Ex-postal workers must not be re-employed in the civil service without the approval in each case of His Excellency the Governor in Council;
> Inasmuch as a number of those affected have been a long time in the public service, and are now past the age limit fixed for new employees entering the service, it will be permissible for the commission to appoint them notwithstanding the age requirements.

The words which I wish to omit from the present resolution refer to the age limit.

> In every case before being reappointed satisfactory assurance must be obtained that a repetition of the offence will not occur.

This is order in council P.C. No. 1152, containing the report of the committee of the Privy Council, and approved by the Governor General on June 4, 1920.

There is nothing much more for me to say except to endeavour to correct a wrong impression which seems to have spread in certain quarters. The Montreal Gazette of April 8, 1929, contained this statement:

> These men were dismissed from the service, and for some reason, which no one has ever been able successfully to explain or defend, were reinstated.

This order in council explains why these men were reinstated, and I merely draw attention to that statement in order to keep the record straight. A further reference was made to this matter, which I think should be corrected. The Gazette stated:

> The Postmaster General failed to secure the passage of his bill; the measure went through the House of Commons—to the discredit of that body, but it never left the Senate. That was Mr. Veniot's opportunity to do some learning.

Everyone knows no bill was introduced and no bill went to the senate last year; consequently this statement is without foundation. I do not refer to it in a critical way but simply wish to keep the record clear.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): How many men were dismissed?

Mr. VENIOT: I can give all that information in committee, but speaking from memory I think 623 men were affected. I will have all those details when we go into committee. I think 96 men applied for reinstatement.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before this house involves questions which have been fruitful sources of much unfortunate and painful discussion. I do not think it advisable to canvass the whole situation as we did last year; it is sufficient for my purposes to direct attention to the fact that a number of postal employees left the service of the crown under such circumstances as dislocated the public service and rendered it impossible for mail to be delivered in the city of Winnipeg. Later these men were offered the opportunity to go back to work but, not having availed themselves of that opportunity for reinstatement, they were later re-employed to the number of 96 on certain definite terms and conditions which constitute the contract between them and the state. Those conditions are contained in an order in council and are four in number. As the Postmaster General has stated, that order in council provided first that all who desired to re-enter the service should pass an examination before they were employed; secondly, that the age limit should be no bar to their re-employment as new employees; thirdly that they should be re-employed subject to approval by the governor in council in each case and lastly that they should commence as new employees in the service.

That there was an unfortunate condition in Winnipeg in 1919 goes without saying. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) last year thought the observations which were made by myself were rather stronger than the facts warranted, and not having been in Winnipeg at the time of the strike I shall content myself for the moment by reading an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 8 of this year. The Free Press was a daily newspaper at the time of this occurrence. The proprietors endeavoured to publish it as such during the strike and I take it that they had a clear appreciation and understanding of the situation which developed in that city during the progress of events. The following is the editorial, headed "The Vote for the Postal Workers" which appears in that newspaper:

> It is regrettable that the Dominion government did not profit by its experience last year to the extent of declining to resubmit to parliament the vote for the Winnipeg postal strikers, which they found it advisable last year to withdraw. This matter cannot be considered without reopening the whole question of the Winnipeg strike of 1919. This is something which considerations of prudence and public welfare should suggest leaving alone; for the passage of time has not in the least led to any adjustment in the points of view of those who have disagreed as to the original, motives and purposes of the strike. Last year, in a brief but bitter debate which followed the submission of the vote to the house, Mr. Bennett said the strike was, in the minds of its promoters, a consciously revolutionary movement intended to subvert the government of the country and he cited the findings of the court in Winnipeg to support this view: while Mr. Woodsworth took the line that it was a comparatively innocent development, the character of which had been grossly misrepresented. This involved, of course, the necessity of representing the court cases, which followed the strike, as part of a policy of injustice. Mr. Woodsworth did not boggle at this requirement. He talked about dastardly conspiracies, travesties of justice, farcicial trials.
> This interchange of views illustrates what is bound to happen whenever the Winnipeg strike of 1919 comes up for discussion. All the old bitternesses revive. By an agreement entered into by common consent the issue is left alone pretty much in Winnipeg on the principle of letting sleeping dogs lie; but the Dominion government is prepared, it seems, to have the question stirred up anew and made the subject of discussions, which are bound to be violent, in both the Commons and the Senate. Because it is not possible to deal with this business of paying back money to present members of the post office staff who went on strike in 1919 without bringing up the question of the merits of the great strike. The justice of making these payments can only be established if certain things are first established; that the Winnipeg strike was in itself right; that the postal workers did right in striking in sympathy with it; that the Dominion government of that day had no business to issue an ultimatum that the workers must return to work or lose their jobs; that the Dominion government did wrong in trying to man the post office and give the public a service; and that the men who took the strikers' positions had no claims to consideration and should have been turned into the street when, after the strike, the strikers returned and asked for their positions. Mr. Heenan, the Minister of Labour, took all these positions flatfootedly in 1926 when he made a recommendation to Mr. Veniot, the Postmaster General, which was the immediate cause of Mr. Veniot's efforts to induce the government and parliament to make these grants.

It is not surprising, however, that the Dominion government does not relish being put in the position of appearing to confirm these conclusions; and last session Mr. Veniot and Mr. Thorson made an attempt, which will doubtless be repeated this year, to make it appear that there is no connection between the granting of this money to the postal workers and the question of the merits of the action of the postal workers in leaving their employment and defying the state. They failed hopelessly because the connection is explicit and undeniable. Mr. Thorson argued that the Dominion government was under no obligation to take the strikers back, but that, having done so, it should have put them back in the positions they held when they went on strike and at the same salary; he intimated that the post office sought out these workers because it required their services and took advantage of their necessities to pay them the minimum wages. This is a very inaccurate account of what happened. Within three months of the close of the strike a concerted effort was begun by the strikers to get the government to lift the embargo and enable them to apply for employment on terms which governed entrants to the service. They appealed to every available agency to intercede with the government to induce it to recede from its position that they could never re-enter the service. Among others, the Free Press was asked to use its influence with the government to this end and gladly did so. But there was no suggestion of reinstatement to their old positions and salaries. Had this been their demand, they would not have got the support which enabled them to overcome the reluctance of the government, well known at the time, to recede from its position.

Having regard to the seriousness of their offence and to the distinct understanding upon which they re-entered the service, it cannot be said that these postal workers have been harshly used. With respect to employment, they were given a preference, subject only to prior claims of returned soldiers; the age limit, where necessary, was waived; and they were, for purposes of pensions and service, allowed to count the period of previous employment. They have been so advanced in the service that with the exception of one or two, who have been taken on within the last two or three years, they are all in receipt of larger salaries than they had at the time they went out. The average increase is about fifty per cent. There is good ground for doubting the spontaneousness of their demand for additional payment; but naturally, being human, they joined in the movement when they were advised that if they all pulled together and used their influence they might force the government to hand them over the money. The proposed vote last year was $115,000; this year it will be larger—the assumed figure is $150,000. The division of this sum among ninety persons, even allowing for handsome deductions for "legal expenses", would be a pretty fat thing for the recipients; and it is not surprising that there is a persistent push to secure it.

The sum, large though it is, does not, of course, mean much to the Dominion treasury; but the Dominion government ought not to delude itself with the idea that the simplest thing for it to do and the one having the least dangerous consequences, is to pay the money and stop the clamour. The Dominion government cannot accede to this demand and pay over the money without thereby agreeing to the propositions, with respect to the postal strike, set forth above; and it cannot agree to these propositions without taking a responsibility which we should think it would be to its great advantage to avoid.

That is the editorial in the Free Press. I will now quote from another newspaper, The Farmer's Advocate and Home Magazine of London, of April 18, 1929, which I think publishes a western edition. The paper is entirely out of politics and its criticism of what is being done is as follows:

Politics in the Postal Service

Canadians have had reason in the past to point to our postal service as an example of successful state ownership of a great public utility. Irrespective of partisanship and political affiliations the people of Canada have expressed their pride and confidence in this department of government; but if the Postmaster General succeeds in reinstating and reimbursing the post office employees of Winnipeg who sided with the red element during the desperate strike of 1919 the Post Office Department will soon be known as a mere political cesspool.

This action to restore the strikers to the same position and status they would now enjoy had they never defied the crown nor joined the revolutionary forces in those awful days of the Winnipeg strike is of more than local political significance. A great principle is involved; a principle that no minister of the crown, not even a government, should be allowed to profane.

Last year a considerable item was included on the estimates to adjust the salaries of and compensate a number of the strikers dismissed from the service during the Winnipeg strike. Opposition to the measure was so strong in the commons that the item was finally struck out of the estimates and the Postmaster General executed a temporary retreat. This year, however, a bill is under consideration, and parliament will be asked to vote approximately $125,000 to reinstate and reimburse the strikers.

Anyone acquainted with the efforts put forth to prevent utter demoralization of public services in the city of Winnipeg during the hectic days of the strike is aware of the masterly manner in which Thomas Bower, postmaster at the time, kept the mail moving and prevented a total tie-up of the service that affected not only the city, but the prairie provinces as well. Mr. Bower consistently refused to reinstate the striking post office employees and give them seniority over the staunch supporters who remained loyal to the crown and, even in the face of serious danger to themselves, remained long hours at their posts and made it possible for the office to function. Now as a reward for this service to the state, the Honourable Peter Veniot has forced a vacation and ultimate retirement on the postmaster at Winnipeg, for the purpose, obviously, of making it easier to reinstate the strikers and thus consummate some political bargain with the Labour party.

The postmaster at Winnipeg has been released from duty in a manner quite characteristic of Honourable Mr. Veniot's administration of the department. But the reinstatement of strikers and adjustment of salaries fortunately require a vote of money in the commons, and this provides the opportunity for the people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, to rebuke the Postmaster General and put a stop to his high-handed political manoeuvering.

This abject surrender to the Winnipeg Labour party would be an unpardonable affront to everyone who remained loyal to state laws and state institutions and struggled against fearful odds in 1919 to maintain them. More than that, any officer of the crown merits and must have, in the honest and conscientious pursuit of his duties, the unfaltering support of the department of government under which he labours. That is one of the tenets of successful business and sound government administration. These principles the Postmaster General would violate for a mess of political pottage.

Without partisanship or political affiliations "The Farmers's Advocate" is forced to condemn untoward action in any administration. Principle is above party. The people, in the last analysis, are supreme.

Under our system of government the people, fortunately, have a means of expression; and the opportunity here presents itself, before it is too late, to demand adherence to principle and honour in the conduct of public affairs.

As I have said, that article appears in an independent newspaper which in times past could not be charged with any particular lack of appreciation of the services rendered to the state by the government.

In common, I suppose, with most of the other members of the house, I have received a photographic copy of issues of the Western Labour News, taken from the provincial library of Manitoba. This was sent with the compliments of the Employers' Association of Manitoba, the prairie division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Winnipeg board of trade, the Winnipeg builders' exchange and the Winnipeg realty exchange. These articles are four in number, the first one being dated May 17, 1919. The opening sentence is:

How does the idea of using the new parliament buildings for a labour temple strike you?

Mr. THORSON: I might explain to the hon. leader of the opposition that the photographic copy is made up of a number of sentences which were cut out of various pages and pasted together before being photographed.

Mr. BENNETT: I am indebted to the hon. member for the explanation, because I was not aware of that fact until he stated it. This photographic copy which we have received—I suppose every member of the house has received it—is, as the hon. gentleman assures us, and he must know, being from Winnipeg, a photographic reproduction of a number of paragraphs cut out of different issues of the Labor News and then photographed in the form in which we now have it.

Mr. THORSON: I wanted to explain that the sentences had been cut out of their contexts and then pasted together and the whole photographed.

Mr. BENNETT: The sentences may have been quoted apart from their contexts, but it seems to me that the sentence "How does the idea of using the new parliament buildings for a labour temple strike you?" is certainly a sentence complete within itself. Another paragraph quoted is:

It is reported that certain rigs are delivering ice, bread, etc., without the printed card authorized by the strike committee. Some of these carry written notices. We warn all such drivers that this is contrary to the orders of the strike committee. Certified permits will be supplied on request by the food committee.

Another paragraph is:

Theatres and picture shows are running under strike permit so that the workers can keep off the streets.

Another one is:

All these concerns are organized fully and could be stopped on a minute's notice, but for the present the strike committee believes that it is better to let them run—hence its order for them to stay on the job under permit.

Edition No. 2 contains this paragraph:

All telegraphers are out on strike. But, in order to avert unnecessary hardship, such men as are absolutely necessary have been sent back under strike permit to send out such wires as are passed by strike committee.

Special strike edition No. 8 contains the following:

The postal federation and the telephone operators have received their ultimatums. We wonder why they delayed so long to do this. In a few hours more it may be expected that the city council will do the same thing re its employees. Then the individual employers will follow suit.

The reply of labour is explicit. No worker will return to work until the principle of collective bargaining and a living wage is recognized.

Then follows a paragraph from the last issue, as follows:

What will the governments, and the city councils, and the railroads, and the private bosses do? Not a single worker will go back till all are reinstated. The governments say that their employees are dismissed and that their dismissals are final. Then the issue is clear. Either the governments must eat humble pie or they must resign.

They have no other choice. Labour comprises the majority of the population. The 1,000 are so insignificant that it would need a magnifying glass to see them. It looks as if they will have to abandon the field and let their governments resign.

I think the sentences which I have just read are complete within themselves. I read them because they indicate the conditions which prevailed before and after the postal workers left their employment. The hon. minister quoted from an order in council which was passed in June, 1920, which contains very significant words: The order in council sets out the fact that it was a "sympathetic strike" under which the postal workers left their employment, that they were advised of "the gravity of their offence against the state," but that "clemency" would be extended consistent with "maintaining the necessary discipline." According to the admissions of the minister, it was a sympathetic strike which induced the postal men to quit their employment and tie up the postal service of Winnipeg. It is apparent that they left for no grievance of their own—they had none at the time—but rather because others had grievances and they were in sympathy with them. I think that is abundantly clear from what the minister has said.

Then it occurs to me that we have to ask a very simple question. Is the attitude of the government different from that taken by most employers under similar circumstances? I received, I dare say in company with other members of the house, a resolution passed by a body of locomotive engineers. It was signed by at least one engineer whom I know and I recall that within a very short space of time prior to that he with others had called upon me asking me if I could not use my influence, such as it was, for the purpose of helping them in seeking employment, not as engineers, but as men who had ceased to be in the service, because they had been dismissed for what their fellow employees said were just causes, as hostlers or in some other branch of the service of a great railway corporation, regardless of the fact that they were as well able to render service as engineers as they ever were. Having committed an offence against the rules of the corporation they had been dismissed from the service and now they sought re-employment not as engineers, with all the knowledge they had of that business, but in any capacity in which they could find employment as beginners in the service. They said very frankly that some of those who had been dismissed should not be entrusted again with a locomotive hauling a passenger train.

Need I remind the house that during the Great war, aye, prior to the Great war, we have the history of a great soldier who for an offence was cashiered from the British army. He volunteered as a private in a foreign army, rose to a position of great importance and became a commander. During the war I recall perhaps not many but some similar instances at least. I remember in particular one who was a friend of mine, who has since passed to his reward. He was employed as an officer. For good and sufficient causes he was dismissed from his position, and he enrolled as a private. He began again to work his way up the ladder to place and position in the force of which he was a member. So it is all through life. I venture to point it out in these words, words which I think we all have to keep in mind because we all at one time or another realize the soundness of them:

> Not heaven itself upon the past has power,
> But what has been, has been.

The fact is that these unfortunate men, for sympathetic reasons only, left the employ of the state, tied up and dislocated the postal service of Winnipeg and, when they were afforded an opportunity to go back and be reinstated, declined to do so. When the period was extended; when the government saw fit to say to them: You may have a longer time in which to make up your mind, a number of them still declined to make up their minds to go back into the service of the state. Under those circumstances the question is: Have they a claim for retroactive pay from this parliament? Under the conditions mentioned by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), have they a right now, seeing that they joined as new employees, to ask parliament to make them employees as from the date of their first employment, without taking into consideration any breach of employment or any time during which they were not employed? The principle is very far-reaching. Think what it means to this country to have the House of Commons declare to-day that men who were employed many years ago, who left their employment for sympathetic reasons, who declined to go back having two opportunities to do so, and who then went back under a distinct contract with the state that when they did so they joined as new employees, are now to be told that they are to be treated as though they had never left the service, as though there had never been a break in their employment, as though they had never gone on a sympathetic strike. I for one cannot bring myself to that state of mind. When I remember the statements that have been made to me by dismissed employees of corporations in this country who have sought my assistance that they might get back to any employment, and who have gladly gone back to subordinate positions, positions where men who were once their juniors became their seniors and their superintendents, I also remember that we do not take, with relation to ordinary transactions, the action that is now proposed. I remember further that, according to the very language of the Free Press newspaper, we put the imprimatur of the approval of this parliament upon the validity of that strike. As the House of Commons of Canada we will have said that that sympathetic strike was justified; that the leaving of their employment by the postal workers was justified, and that the consequences which follow every man for his act shall not follow in this particular case. As I have said, I cannot bring myself to agree to that reasoning. As a citizen, as a lawyer, as a member of parliament, I cannot give my assent to such propositions.

But let us for a moment ask us these further questions before we leave that phase of the matter. First, ninety-six men were employed by the state in the postal service.

Did they leave the service? Answer, yes.

Have they a grievance against the state that employed them? Answer, no.

Did they leave for sympathetic reasons because of grievances that others alleged they had? Answer, yes.

Were they afforded an opportunity for reinstatement? Answer, yes.

Did they avail themselves of it? Answer, no.

Were they afforded a further opportunity for reinstatement? Answer, yes.

Did they avail themselves of it? Answer, no.

Did they subsequently request the government to reemploy them? Answer, yes.

Was that request granted? Answer, yes.

By what method? Answer, by an order in council just read by the minister.

Did it impose conditions? Answer, it did.

Was one of those conditions that they should be treated as new employees? Answer, yes.

Under those circumstances we are asked to disregard period of the unemployment and reinstate them in salary. They have already had many of the other benefits, and reinstatement as regards salary means putting them in the position as though they had never left their employment and giving them back their money from the date of the strike until today—

Mr. THORSON: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: —on the basis of the salary they had before they left the service.

Mr. THORSON: There is no suggestion at all that they should be paid for the time they were out on strike.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean from the date of reemployment. I mean from the day they went to work after the strike, the day of reemployment after the strike. While, as I have said, I find it difficult to think that any government would submit such a measure to parliament, it has been done, and we have to meet the situation. We who sit to the left of the Speaker are not unmindful of the fact that at the time of these unfortunate occurrences, the Hon. Gideon Robertson, who has been a supporter of those who sit to the left of the Speaker, was Minister of Labour. He visited Winnipeg at that time, under circumstances to which I referred last year and with which I shall not trouble the house again. I thought it desirable, in view of my inability to arrive at any conclusion that would permit me to support this measure in justice to my fellow-citizens, in justice to my fellow-Canadians in every walk of life, to consult with him, and he made to me a suggestion which I shall give to this house for what it is worth. Senator Robertson, being very familiar with the matter, suggested that after all punishment should not be eternal—none of us believes in eternal punishment. One of my colleagues suggests that there are still some who do believe in eternal punishment, but certainly my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and I do not. It is now ten years since these men left the service and Senator Robertson suggested that as a period of ten years had since elapsed, justice would be done if those who had attained to the position which it was contended from their long service they were entitled, on recommendations made by their superior officers on the basis of their merit, regardless of the years of employment, received the increased salary up to the maximum of their class. I have thought over this suggestion very carefully.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would my hon. friend explain that a little more clearly? Does he mean from the date of their employment?

Mr. BENNETT: No. Let me make that clear; from a date to be fixed, from the 1st of June or the 1st of July or the 1st of May, if you like, and that they should receive upon the recommendation of their superior officers such increased compensation as their meritorious service would have entitled them to receive had that service been continuous. In other words, in the case of a postal worker who has worked in the service fifteen years, five years in the service before the strike and now for ten years more, if his superior officer recommends that by reason of that man having had five years' experience in the service previous to being re-employed he is better able to discharge the duties of his position he should receive the added salary or compensation to which he would have been entitled had he remained continuously in the service. It should not, however, be made retroactive, but should date only from the time this provision becomes effective, either the 1st of June or the 1st of July, or whatever date is thought desirable.

Mr. THORSON: On what principle would that be based?

Mr. BENNETT: On the principle that punishment should not be eternal, and that these men having served for fifteen years, in two instalments one of which was terminated by the employee himself, now as an act of "clemency"—to quote the wording of the order in council—we should consider the service as a whole for the purpose of future compensation, but not past compensation.

Mr. THORSON: Would it not also be partly on the principle that that man was a more valuable employee to the public by reason of the service which he had rendered prior to his removal from the service?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the ground which was urged by the Postmaster General and by the hon. gentleman last year, and which is urged again here to-day. Of course you cannot apply that principle in life. The demoted officer was a better private than any other private in the battalion because of his knowledge; the demoted officer who went into the Egyptian army was a better man than the other men in that army, and rose to be its commander; the demoted locomotive engineer became a better hostler than the men engaged in that work; the demoted conductor who became a brakeman was a better brakeman because of his past experience. But in the particular cases to which I referred, these employees of a private corporation lost their seniority, their pensions, and their claims to consideration on the part of their employers, and now I say that in order to end this matter, in order to have it no longer dragged into parliament as it has been under the circumstances alluded to by the Postmaster General, in order to prevent these acrimonious discussions to which the Free Press refers, in order that it may not be said that one party in the strike triumphed over the other—which is, after all, apparently what is to be done—in order to prevent all that, I thought the suggestion of Senator Robertson not an unreasonable one. If therefore the government were disposed to provide that from a future date, on the recommendation of their superior officers as to the character of the service rendered, those employees who had terminated their employment and afterwards been reemployed by a contract of re-employment which is fixed by order in council should receive this increased compensation, we on this side would not be unwilling that they should receive that consideration which their superior officers might recommend, in the light of the services they had rendered counted in years of service without regard to any interruption that had taken place in it. That is the best compromise suggestion, if you call it such—because after all, statecraft they say is always compromise—that we can make. Neither as a lawyer nor as a citizen nor as a member of this parliament could I legally become a party to it, but because of a very earnest desire to bring about happy and peaceful relations between the state as employer and the postal workers as employees and to prevent the harrowing discussions that take place in this parliament with respect to what happened ten years ago, the then Minister of Labour, who has as warm a heart for the men who toil as any man in this Dominion, has offered this suggestion, and after listening to his observations and his reasons I am convinced that it would be fair solution of what is a difficult problem. It is a compromise, it is true, but it violates no principle. It places no imprimatur of the approval of this parliament upon the validity or invalidity of what has been done in days gone by. It leaves out all the harrowing discussions with respect to the strike. It does not deal with the problems of re-instatement or re-employment, but leaves the question to be considered whether or not in the light of the greater experience of the worker he is entitled to receive greater compensation than the one who has less experience in that particular class of work, although it is perfectly clear that in the ten years that have elapsed the new men who have come in must have become as experienced as it is possible for a man to become by reason of length of service in work of that kind.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has cited as a parallel case the demoted commander who did the work of a private after his demotion, but I understand that these postal workers when they went back into the service did their old work, not new work at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend knows that any man who engages in a job as postal worker does the work of a postal worker whether he be a new employee or a man of ten years' experience. It may be that he could do more work because of his greater experience, but that is all that can be said with respect to it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There is a class of work that the newly engaged postal workers cannot do.

Mr. BENNETT: The demoted officer who became a private was better able to do his work by reason of his previous experience than the other privates, but they were all privates. These men were all postal workers. True, one may have had greater experience than the other and therefore if he so desired he could do more work, just as the demoted locomotive engineer was a better hostler than the one who had no experience.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But he was not an engineer again.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly was not. But there were grades in the postal service, and these men came in under their contract as new employees. That is the point of the whole thing.

Mr. ADSHEAD: They were put back in their old work.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me, they went back as new employees, and that is one of the conditions there stated.

Mr. VENIOT: Will my hon. friend allow me? If they went in as new employees they would have to begin as postal porters and postal helpers; but instead of that they were put to work as postal sorters and postal clerks —a higher grade of work. It is not the quantity, it is the class of work that counts.

Mr. BENNETT: And they received pay as new employees in that class?

Mr. VENIOT: No, they received pay as postal clerks and postal sorters.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they received pay as new employees, as postal helpers.

Mr. VENIOT: But the postal helpers and the postal clerks have different duties.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that, but they went to the work that was assigned to them in connection with the handling of the mail in the Winnipeg post office. And they agreed to it. They would never have been there but for that. These men would never again have been in the employ of the Dominion government, according to the order in council read by the minister, unless they had agreed to go back as new employees. Now they say: We want to break that contract. If so, why not put it on one side altogether? There was no coercion. They had failed to take advantage of the two offers made. Then, as the Free Press said, having sought new employment—mark you—they came back as new employees notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Having so come back, they now ask us to overlook all the circumstances under which they terminated their former employment and be treated as though there had never been any such termination. Can we do it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend one question? It is a little aside from what he is discussing. On what authority did the government give anyone the right to return to the postal service notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act? I cannot understand how these men got back at all by order in council. I should think their appointment ought to have come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, my understanding would be that as the War Measures Act was still in force, the wide provisions of that act enabled the order in council to be passed. I only say that to the right hon. gentleman because I asked the same question in relation to it, and that is the only answer I have at the moment. The War Measures Act conferred on the executive almost legislative—some have said wholly legislative—powers, in many regards. They thus had power, without coming to parliament, to override the provisions of the Civil Service Act to that extent. The men still had to pass examinations; the age limit was disregarded. Then they had to have the approval of the governor in council with respect to every specific case of employment. Lastly, they came in as new employees.

Now, I submit, the question is a very simple one. Why should parliament overlook the fact that the men themselves terminated their employment? Nobody asked them to leave the service. They did a grievous injury to the body politic by leaving their employment. What is more, it was stated in that order in council, and I once more direct attention to these words, that, first of all, it was a "sympathetic strike" that prevailed in Winnipeg; secondly, "they now realize the gravity of their offence against the state." Now we are going to reward them for realizing "the gravity of their offence against the state" by saying that they are to get full pay from the moment they went back to employment, regardless of the fact that they themselves acknowledge they were guilty of a grave offence against the state? That is what it gets down to.

It is my earnest desire, as I have said, to promote amity and good feeling between the great body of civil servants of this country and the state that employs them. Having had the benefit of a discussion with the gentleman whom I regard as being more fitted to speak in relation to the matter than anyone else that we have in parliament at the moment, I can only say that the compromise as such violates no principle. It merely says that if the postmaster, or whoever is the superior officer, reports with respect to fitness, he shall not be limited by reason of the fact that these men have been in the employment of the department during a limited number of years, that having been in the post office before 1919 they have more experience by reason of that fact, and that experience shall be taken into account to increase their compensation or salary—not retroactively, not as a reward for their grave offence against the state, but at a future date, to be fixed either by the governor in council or by this parliament, in satisfaction of these long outstanding claims, in the hope that this action may change to some degree of harmony what has been a very discordant note in the history of this young country.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset congratulate the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) on the comparatively moderate tone of his contribution to the debate as compared with the tone of his remarks on this subject last session. I am very strongly in favour of this resolution as it stands. I think that the criticism which has been directed against it has been based upon a misconception of its purposes and a misunderstanding of the situation in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary and Vancouver which it is designed to correct. When that situation is clearly understood and the purposes of this resolution are fully appreciated, I think the resolution will commend itself to the members of this house.

In order to make the situation a little more clear and to meet some of the objections that have been raised against this proposal, I think certain facts ought to be brought to the attention of the house. It will not be possible in the short space of time at my disposal to deal with all the aspects of the question which have been brought up, but I intend to deal with the more important ones at this stage and then when the house is in committee I shall be able to deal more fully with other aspects.

The postal employees of western Canada in 1919 belonged to an organization called the Amalgamated Postal Workers. The Winnipeg branch of that organization was and had been for some time affiliated with the Trades and Labour Council of Winnipeg. The fact of that affiliation was well known to the post office authorities at that time. When the general strike was called on May 15th, 1919, the Winnipeg branch of the Amalgamated Postal Workers went out, as did many other labour unions affiliated with the Trades and Labour Council of Winnipeg, and the strike spread to the post offices of Saskatoon and Calgary.

On May 24, when the strike had been in progress for some nine days, an ultimatum was issued by the postmaster at Winnipeg, on behalf of the government, to the postal workers who had gone on strike. The essential part of that ultimatum reads as follows:

> To-day voluntary workers are temporarily taking the posts these people have left. The government announces that those returning before 12 o'clock noon on Monday the 26th instant, will be accepted and that all failing to resume their duties by that hour will be definitely refused thereafter a place in the federal service. Commencing at the above stated hour new employees will be engaged on the usual permanent basis.

It will be noticed that this ultimatum was delivered on the 24th of May, a public holiday. It was also a Saturday and it called upon the employees to return to duty by noon of the following Monday. A number did return to duty but a great many did not. Those who did not return were removed from the postal service by two orders in council, the first being P.C. 89-1474, dated July 15, and the second, P.C. 2224, dated November 3. This latter dealt with those who had not been covered by the former. The ultimatum which I read a moment ago definitely notified the postal workers that if they did not return before a certain hour they would be definitely refused thereafter a place in the federal service; that is, the federal service was to be closed to them completely.

I am trying to give the facts to the house fully so that the record may be accurate and as complete as I can make it. Representations were made on behalf of these men to the authorities at Ottawa with regard to the terms of the ultimatum. Many of these men had been trusted employees; they had been efficient and conscientious servants of the public; many of them were returned soldiers who had recently been demobilized and had returned to the postal service shortly before the general strike. The government listened to these representations and appointed a subcommittee of council consisting of the Hon. P. E. Blondin, who was then Postmaster General, and the Hon. G. D. Robertson, who was then Minister of Labour, to look into the whole question and see whether some solution of the difficulty could not be found. These two ministers prepared a memorandum to the Civil Service Commission dated January 7, 1920, and presented it to the Hon. N. W. Rowell, who was then president of the privy council. That memorandum was accepted by council and became the basis for the reemployment of the men who had been dismissed. Perhaps I might read it and comment upon some of its terms. It is dated January 7, 1920, is entitled "Memorandum to the Civil Service Commissioners," and reads as follows:

Many evidences have reached the Department of Labour from ex-postal employees that they now recognize they participated unwisely in the sympathetic strike in western Canada last May, and that they sincerely regret the action they then took. The gravity of their offence against the state being now realized, the government has given consideration to the possibility of removing the bar to their application through the Civil Service Commission for reemployment in the public service, and His Excellency the Governor in Council is disposed to exercise clemency so far as reasonably consistent with necessary discipline.

Ex-postal employees may therefore be considered as eligible to be appointed to positions in the civil service for which they make application as vacancies occur, and to which, in the opinion of the commission, they are justly entitled under the regulations, subject to the following conditions:

Then three conditions are enumerated:

Ex-postal workers must not be reemployed in the civil service without the approval in each case of His Excellency the Governor in Council;

Inasmuch as a number of those affected have been a long time in the public service, and are now past the age limit fixed for new employees entering the service, it will be permissible for the commission to appoint them notwithstanding the age requirements.

In every case before being reappointed satisfactory assurance must be obtained that a repetition of the offence will not occur.

The only two conditions of reemployment referred to in this memorandum are that in each case approval by order in council must be obtained and satisfactory assurance must be given that a repetition of the offence will not occur. In other words, the government was prepared to recede from the position it had taken in the ultimatum, that these men would be forever barred from the federal service; it came to a different decision, namely, that they might be reemployed in the federal service subject to certain conditions. I think the government took a very fair-minded attitude to the general situation and I should like to commend it for so doing. However, in my opinion, as I shall point out later, it did not go far enough.

In consequence of this change in the attitude of the government a number of men have been reemployed in the federal service notwithstanding the terms of the ultimatum of May 24, 1919, and I wish to emphasize this—that all the men who have been so reemployed have been specially approved by order in council; all of them have given satisfactory assurance that the offence for which they were dismissed will not be repeated.

In respect of all the ninety-six men who were dismissed and are now back in the service there are orders in council; so far as I can ascertain the first of these orders is P.C. 1152, dated June 4, 1920, which reads as follows:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 31st May, 1920, from the Secretary of State, submitting that the Civil Service Commission has recently received applications for positions in the civil service from ex-postal employees who participated in the sympathetic strike in western Canada in the spring of 1919. In accordance with the understanding arrived at by the government, as embodied in a memorandum forwarded to the Civil Service Commission by Senator Robertson on the 7th January, 1920, ex-postal employees are to be considered eligible for appointment to positions in the civil service, subject to certain conditions therein mentioned. The ex-postal employees mentioned in the attached list have complied with the conditions of this memorandum. The minister, therefore, recommends that authority be granted for the appointment of these candidates to positions for which they are eligible. The committee advise that the requisite authority be granted accordingly.

Mr. MANION: What is the date?

Mr. THORSON: June 4, 1920. That was the first order in council. I am told that similar orders in council were passed with regard to the men who have been taken back into the service from time to time. It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that order in council P.C. 1152, to which I referred a moment ago, incorporated the memorandum to the Civil Service Commission of January 7, 1920, in which reference was made to only two conditions, first that re-employment should be subject to approval by order in council and secondly that the men should give satisfactory assurance that they would not again participate in a sympathetic strike. The other consequences of their re-employment followed by reason of defects in the Civil Service Act with regard to re-employment, which this bill is designed to correct.

Mr. POWER: May I ask a question?

Mr. THORSON: I have only forty minutes; I would like to finish this part of my argument and then I shall be glad to answer questions.

In all there are now 79 men in the Winnipeg post office who were dismissed by reason of their participation in the general strike. There are also a few such men at Saskatoon, Calgary and Vancouver. I should like the house to take note of the numbers in which these men came back into the service. Of the 79 men in Winnipeg 35 came back in 1920, a year after the strike; 11 came back in 1921, 10 in 1922, 14 in 1923, 6 in 1925 and one in each of the years 1926, 1927 and 1928.

I should like to point out also that the regulations regarding the re-employment of these men, which were framed in 1920, are still in force. The government in 1920 reserved to itself the right to determine whether or not a man should be re-employed in the federal service. That right is still reserved; this resolution does not affect it at all. The memorandum of January 7, 1920, proposed that appointments should be made only as vacancies occurred, and that these appointments should be made by the Civil Service Commission. This resolution is not intended to change that procedure in any way. There is not a single man in the employ of the Dominion government either in the Winnipeg post office or elsewhere who will be prejudiced in the slightest degree by effect being given to the resolution now before the house.

I have endeavoured to outline very briefly the steps which led to the dismissal of these postal employees and to the framing of the regulations for their re-employment. I commend the action of the government of that day, a Conservative government, in going as far as it did; I think it acted in a humanitarian way, but I have one criticism to offer. I think every member of this house will agree that the government of Canada should set an example for other employers of labour to follow, and I was very glad indeed to have for that proposition the approval of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) who stated the other evening that the Dominion government should be a model employer. The Dominion government should at least be as fair to its employees as other employers of labour were to theirs. What happened? These men who were taken back into the employ of the government were in most cases, particularly in 1920 and 1921, put back at the identical work they had been doing previously; full use was made by the Dominion government of their training, their experience and their efficiency. This is not a case of rewarding these men for something they did not do but rather a case of paying them what they have already earned but have not received.

I have here a statement showing in detail with respect to the 79 men who were dismissed from the service by reason of their participation in the strike of 1919 and are now back on the staff of the Winnipeg post office, their length of service, their classification or rank and the salary they were receiving prior to their dismissal. Of these 79 men 20 had been in the service of the Post Office Department ten years or more at the time of their dismissal, and their average length of service was over eight years. I think that is proof that it was the trained, experienced, capable men who wanted to get back into the postal service and who were accepted into that service. This was the result of the policy of requiring approval by order in council in each case where these men were re-employed. Their classifications ranged from the lowest to the highest, from that of transfer agent to that of a comparatively high class clerk, and their salaries ranged all the way from $1,180 per year including bonus to $1,830 per year, including bonus.

Mr. MANION: That was before the strike?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. Yet what happened? These men were all taken back as new employees. Notwithstanding their length of service, their training, their experience, the fact that they were put to the same work after the strike as they had been doing before it, notwithstanding their classifications and the salaries they had been receiving, they were all taken back as new employees at the lowest grade in the postal service and at the minimum salary of the lowest grade. They did the same work, particularly those taken back in 1920 and 1921, after they were taken back into the service as they had been doing prior to their dismissal. Let me take as an example the man whose name appears first on this list which I have before me. At the time of his dismissal he had served thirteen years in the Post Office Department; he occupied the rank of a high class clerk and received a salary of $1,830, including the bonus which was paid at that time. That man went on strike in May of 1919 and was taken back into the service on September 7, 1920. When he was taken back into the service he was placed at exactly the same work he had been doing previous to his dismissal; the value of his services to the state was just as great in 1920 as it had been in 1919! Why should he be paid differently? What happened to this man? He had been receiving $1,830 per year, which was the estimate which the state itself put upon his services, but when he came back he was taken on as a postal helper and paid $85 per month.

Mr. HEAPS: And doing the same work.

Mr. THORSON: And doing the same work which he had been doing. I appeal to the sense of justice and fair play which exists in the mind of every member of this house and ask them to say whether that was fair. Are we going to rest upon an imperfection in the law when that imperfection can be cured? I say that the government of the day should have gone further and done what other employers did, even if it meant an amendment of the existing law.

What does the resolution which is now before the house propose to do? Simply this: that the postal employees shall be paid by the Dominion of Canada for the services which they have rendered according to the value of such services. The principle of the resolution is this: that the Dominion government should do as other employers of labour did and recognize the fundamental principle, of which the Postmaster General spoke, that the labourer is worthy of his hire. The government should pay its postal employees in Winnipeg and elsewhere what they have actually already earned. That is all that was involved in the item in the supplementary estimates last year. That is the fundamental principle underlying this resolution and every member of the house can accept that principle as being sound and just.

Since the time at my disposal does not permit me to deal with it in detail, I shall deal very briefly with the argument of the hon. leader of the opposition. Why should not the Dominion government treat its former employees who went on strike as other employers of labour treated theirs? It was quite within the rights of the railway companies not to reemploy their striking conductors; likewise it was quite within the rights of the Dominion government not to reemploy its postal employees who had gone on strike. They both did so, however, and in so doing they acted in a humanitarian way. We commend the railway companies for acting as they did, and we commend the Dominion government for its action, but there is this great difference between the action of the Dominion government and the action of the private railway companies; when the railway companies took back their conductors and used them as conductors they paid them the wages of a conductor and not the wages of a wiper; they paid them the wages of a conductor because that was what they were worth to them. What did the Dominion government do? It took back its postal employees, used their training and experience, had the full benefit of their services to the state, and paid them as green hands. What did employers of labour generally do? The employers of carpenters, masons, mechanics and other skilled workmen reemployed their men who had gone on strike as they saw fit; it is quite true that not all of them were reemployed, but those who were reemployed were taken back at the current rate of wages—they were not paid as apprentices. Yet the Dominion government in all cases, regardless of the value of the services which these men were performing, paid them as green hands, as beginners in the service.

This resolution proposes to do two things; first of all, to pay these men as from the date of their re-employment the salary they would have received had they been taken back into the service at the salary they were receiving prior to their dismissal.

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to ask a question?

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to ask it after my time has expired? The resolution proposes also to put the government in the position which it would have occupied had it followed the example of other employers of labour.

I should like to deal with one more point, since it has been raised. It has been said that the approval of this resolution involves a justification of the strike. When, a year ago, I was discussing the item in the supplementary estimates relating to this question, I said that I did not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of the general strike of 1919 in which these men had participated. I do not intend to do so to-day; I do not think that the merits or demerits of the strike are in any way involved in the great principle that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and that the Dominion government should pay for services rendered according to the value of such services. Whether the strike was right or wrong, if a man was worth a certain sum of money in 1919 before the strike, then in 1920, after the strike, when he was doing the same kind of work as he had been doing before, he was worth just as much then as he was worth before. That is all that is involved. He is the same man, the value of his services to the state are the same; the value of his services to the state did not decrease merely because he participated in a general strike, perhaps after being unwisely advised. I take the view, notwithstanding the editorial in the Free Press—for the editor of which I have a very high regard—that the questions involved in the general strike are in no way involved in this resolution. There is only one principle involved in this resolution. I have enunciated that principle several times.

May I refer, Mr. Speaker, to a precedent for the application of this general principle? I see no reason why this principle should be applied in the case of the Toronto strikers, who took part in the strike of 1924, and not applied in the case of the Winnipeg strikers, who took part in the strike of 1919. I know it will be said that in the case of the Toronto strikers the men were striking in respect of a grievance of their own and that in the case of the Winnipeg strike it was a sympathetic strike and the men had no grievance of their own. I do not agree that that is altogether so, but I have not time to deal with that argument at this stage of the discussion. After all, the principle is the same; the men went on strike contrary to the terms of an ultimatum similar to that delivered at Winnipeg, and they were dismissed from the service, as the Winnipeg men had been dismissed; they were re-employed as postal helpers, as the Winipeg men had been re-employed. Yet, on March 20, 1926, the Hon. Charles Murphy, who was then postmaster general, listened to the representations which were made on behalf of the Toronto strikers and applied to them the same principle which we are asking this house to apply to the Winnipeg strikers. That principle was this: that these men were doing the same kind of work as before the strike and they should be paid accordingly. Hon. Mr. Murphy ordered that the Toronto strikers who had been taken back should be paid as from the date of their re-employment the salary which they had been receiving at the time of their dismissal from the service. In this connection I should like to commend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). I think he has taken a very sympathetic attitude towards this question, and the principle that is involved. During the course of the election campaign of 1926 he paid us in Winnipeg a memorable visit which was much appreciated by many members on this side of the house. In the course of his visit to Winnipeg he had occasion, I believe, to meet a committee of the postal workers in the Winnipeg post office who had been dismissed because of their participation in the strike and who were back in the service. He was then Postmaster General, and I assume that in the attitude which he took towards that committee he was acting for the government of which he was then a member. The committee laid before him the facts of the Toronto strike: they explained to him the action which had been taken by the Hon. Charles Murphy, in 1926. I am told that the hon. member for Fort William in his capacity as Postmaster General told these men that, in his opinion, from the facts laid before him, their application should be and would be favourably considered if the government of which he was a member should be sustained at the forthcoming election.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. THORSON: Might I complete my statement?—and then if I have been incorrectly advised, I shall be glad to correct it. I am told further that he informed these men that he saw no reason why there should be any difference of treatment between the Toronto men and the Winnipeg men, and that if his government should be sustained he would give to the Winnipeg strikers the same favourable treatment as the Toronto strikers had received. I hope I am reporting accurately what took place on that occasion because I consider that the attitude he then took was eminently just and fair.

Mr. MANION: Unless I put the hon. gentleman right, I might be quoted later as having taken an attitude which I do not remember ever having taken. My attitude was this: I was asked to meet these men. I met them and listened to them. I told them that if we were returned to power the matter would be thoroughly discussed and that so far as I was concerned I would give it the fairest consideration I possibly could. I could not have promised them that they would be treated as the Toronto strikers were treated; I could not have promised them anything because I was only one member of the government.

Mr. THORSON: I had hoped that the hon. member for Fort William would be willing to accept my version. I was informed as to what had taken place by persons whom I have reason to believe, and I thought the attitude he took on that occasion was eminently fair and just.

Mr. MANION: I think the attitude I took was eminently fair and just.

Mr. THORSON: Then I think I may agree with the hon. member in these remarks. After all, the principle is the same even though the causes of the strikes were different. The Dominion government is proposing to pay these men for services rendered; it does not intend to give them something for nothing. The position that we have taken all along in connection with this resolution is that these men have earned what we now propose to pay them.

This resolution may now affect directly only very few men, but it will be of interest to many because of the nature of the principle involved. We on this side of the house do not intend to limit our efforts to do full justice and to follow the example of other employers of labour by reason of imperfections in the law if we can correct those imperfections by an act such as we now propose to have passed with the consent of the house.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house another feature of the matter. Canada has taken a very prominent place in the International Labour Organization which has its office at Geneva. Anyone who has heard our Canadian representatives speak of Canada's attitude at Geneva in international labour matters must be proud of the part that she has played. If we are to continue our pride in Canada's achievements, in Canada's attitude in labour matters, how can we justify that pride if Canada is not willing to follow the example of other employers of labour in recognizing the fundamental principle that the labourer is worthy of his hire whether he went on strike or not; that services should be paid for according to their value?

When the Hon. Charles Murphy adjusted the salaries of the postal workers in Toronto in 1926, he had in mind the creation of greater harmony, greater cooperation between the government and its employees and increased efficiency in the public service. If this resolution is put into effect, I think it will pay handsome dividends to the public in the way of increased harmony, increased cooperation and greater efficiency of service. We should all like to hear the last of the Winnipeg strike in this house, but we shall not do so as long as there are grievances to be remedied and the men involved in that strike who are back in the service still have a grievance. The passing of this resolution will remove that grievance and we from Winnipeg ask the members of this house to assist us in writing the last chapter of that great strike. I hope, when that last chapter is written, it will be entitled "Justice to the postal employees of the Dominion government."

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member justify that strike? All his arguments would lead to that conclusion.

Mr. THORSON: Not at all. I say frankly to the house that I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of that strike. They are not involved in this matter in any way. I do not know what the final history of that strike will be.

Mr. McGIBBON: The merits and demerits are very much involved.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out all the words after the word "revisions" in the fifth line of the resolution.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Just before the motion is put, I should like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre a question; I did not desire to interrupt him as his time was nearly up. I wonder if he realizes the effect of what he said. It may be described in the words of the right hon. the Prime Minister as giving effect to "a vicious principle." This parliament is now going to make a new contract with these men; that is all, and it applies retroactively. That is what we are doing. Are we going to do that also for the unfortunate mail courier who tenders for $1,000 and holds his contract on that basis for four years; then on the expiry of the contract and the calling of new tenders, finding there is much competition he tenders for $800 and gets the contract only because of that fact, whereas the evidence is that the contract is worth $1,000? Are we going to make up the $200 to him? My hon. friend says that the labourer is worthy of his hire. What about the unfortunate mail couriers? Are we going to make new contracts or not? Are we going to make their contracts retroactive because the prices at which they tender are not adequate? Where is it all going to end? The labourer is worthy of his hire, the hon. gentleman says. Well, go and tell the men who receive from this government less than $100 a month that they are worthy of their hire. What about the 4,000 letter carriers, the mail carriers in the cities, carrying tons of mail each year? Are you going to make a new contract with them retroactively? They are worthy of their hire. Everybody agrees that their hire is not enough. Are we going to make it over again? That is what we are doing in this case. It is retroactive, and that is why I direct the attention of parliament to what is involved.

Mr. THORSON: That argument sounds very convincing at first blush, but not so convincing when it is more carefully analysed. No one on this side of the house has suggested that we are overpaying the lower paid servants.

Mr. BENNETT: We are suggesting that they are underpaid.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. leader of the opposition asks whether we are going to rewrite these contracts and make them retroactive. May I draw the attention of the committee to this distinction between these postal employees and the other classes of the service whom he mentions? The Dominion of Canada itself fixed the measure of the value of these men's services to the state by the salary they were receiving when they were dismissed; perhaps it was not correct, but the government did fix the value of their services, and we have that to proceed on. Is my hon. friend the leader of the opposition going to rely upon an imperfection in the law? He knows perfectly well that the only two conditions which were laid down for reemployment by Senator Robertson and the Hon. Mr. Blondin were these, that the men should renounce the principle of the sympathetic strike, and that they should be approved by order in council. The other two that followed, namely that they must be reexamined, and that they must enter the service as beginners, were legal consequences due to the fact that the Civil Service Act makes no provision for doing justice in cases of this sort. That is why those other two conditions became attached to the reemployment. I think that the Hon. Mr. Robertson and the Hon. Mr. Blondin would have received favourable comment from the public had they gone the whole way and said: We will do to you as other employers of labour are doing to their employees.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman mentioned that I met the strikers in Winnipeg during the last election campaign, and he is quite correct in that. I met them as one member of the cabinet and as Postmaster General of that day. I must confess frankly that I did not know the circumstances very fully, that I had but a very general knowledge of them. I met these men in the most friendly spirit, I listened to their story, but I heard only one side of the case. I repeat, I did not know the circumstances as well as I have since learned them. I have always felt very friendly toward labour, I have always desired and I desire now to take what is a fair-minded Christian attitude towards a group of men like this; I say that sincerely. My attitude towards them when I met them in Winnipeg was this, that I was only one member of the cabinet, that I could not definitely promise anything, because being only one I was subject to the opinion of the whole cabinet, but I promised that if we were returned to power I would give most fair consideration to their demands after looking thoroughly into the case. Naturally I had to hear the other side of the case before I could commit even myself to anything, let alone the rest of the government. I certainly intended if we were returned to power to give their case fair consideration, and certainly so far as I am concerned I am willing to go as far as most men in a case of this kind. We were not returned to power, and therefore it is up to this government to deal with the matter as they see best.

I submit that the proposition put forward by my leader is an eminently fair one. I do not wish to get into a discussion of the whole case, but while my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre says that he will not discuss the strike, he will neither justify it nor condemn it, at the same time he is absolutely justifying the strike by the attitude he takes, because his proposition is to put these men back exactly as they would have been if the strike had never occurred at all.

Mr. THORSON: Not at all. I think the hon. member forgets that these men have lost their seniority rights by reason of their participation in the strike, and this resolution does not give them back any seniority rights whatsoever.

Mr. BENNETT: They could not retain their seniority rights because there was an interval of time during which they were not in the service.

Mr. THORSON: I understand that they are keeping their superannuation benefits, but they have lost their seniority rights, so they are not being restored to exactly the same position they would have been in had they not gone on strike.

Mr. MANION: They lost their seniority rights by the very fact that they went on strike, and by putting them back with wages absolutely the same as if they had not gone on strike I submit that my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre is justifying the strike. That is my feeling at all events; I do not wish to misinterpret the hon. gentleman's attitude; I want to be fair with regard to the whole matter.

I submit that the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition is a very fair one. It treats these men in the future as if they had not gone on strike, but for ten years they have been losing a certain amount of their wages. His attitude, in other words, is this, that they have been sufficiently punished by the loss of those wages in the past, and that we will now clean up the account, call it a thing of the past, and put these men in the position of receiving pay for the work they are doing. His attitude is that the men have been punished for the ten years during which they have lost a certain amount of their wages. For those ten years they have been paying for having gone out on a sympathetic strike on a matter with which they were not directly concerned. That is my impression of it. I think it would be a very reasonable compromise for my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to accept on behalf of the government, and I am entirely in accord with it. Of course, I cannot go further than that, but I think it would be treating the men fairly, and I have been advised by some people from Winnipeg that the men themselves would be really well satisfied if that attitude were taken by the house.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the hon. member permit a question? He is fully conversant with railway affairs. If, for example, the engineers on the Canadian Pacific Railway were to go on strike, and afterwards were reinstated, would they be given engineers' wages or wipers' wages?

Mr. MANION: Much as I would like to answer my hon. friend's question I am sorry that I cannot; I am not familiar enough with railway conditions to do so. But I do know that many men engaged by private corporations are never taken back after going on strike.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre tell us how much on an average these men lost in wages before going back to work?

Mr. THORSON: I have not computed that. I have a statement of when they were taken back into the service, and I gave the figures of how many came back in the respective years. Thirty-five came back, for example, in 1920, eleven in 1921, ten in 1922, fourteen in 1923, six in 1925, and one in each of the years 1926, 1927 and 1928. I have not been able to compute the amount that they lost in those intervals. Some were out of the service for nine years, others for only a year or so.

Mr. MARCIL: During that time they received no wages at all?

Mr. THORSON: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh no, they were not entitled to any.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): Perhaps the member for Winnipeg South Centre would help me to clear up a difficulty. I am sympathetic to labour, but I am not quite clear as to what is intended. The member mentioned one case of a man who was receiving $1,830 a year. He was taken back in 1920, the year after, at only $1,020. That man lost $810 a year.

Mr. THORSON: Perhaps that is not quite correct. The $1,830 included bonus. I think the bonus in his case would be $430.

Mr. VENIOT: It was $420.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): We will say he was receiving $1,830, and was taken back at a salary of $1,020—a loss of $810 a year. He has been on duty ever since. I suppose he has received some raises during the ten years.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, that particular man has reached his maximum again.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): Is it proposed to pay that man at the rate of $1,830 during all those years?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, that is the proposition, less the bonus.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): That is the idea?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: That is the principle on which it is being worked out.

Mr. THORSON: This particular man has now reached his maximum of $1,740, which happens to be less than the maximum he was receiving originally.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): But it would be figured out on that line?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: This man was out of employment for a year?

Mr. THORSON: It is not proposed to pay for the period during which these men were out of employment.

Mr. MARCIL: He was penalized to that extent.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not penalized. We should like to have the number of men affected; the salaries each one was receiving, less bonus; and what is meant by the observation with respect to legal expenses mentioned in the Free Press editorial.

Mr. VENIOT: There will be absolutely no consideration of legal expenses so far as the department is concerned. When I went to Winnipeg in 1927 this committee of twenty-five did have a legal gentlemen with them. I would not listen to him at all. I told the men they would have to state their case without any legal gentleman interfering. I did not want any legal gentleman to put anything over on me or on any of the men.

Mr. CLARK: You did not want to have any real justice around you?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not admit that legal gentlemen are always—what shall I say?—the personification of real justice. The information the hon. leader of the opposition asks for can be procured. I am sorry that I cannot get it this evening.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly want to know what is involved financially in this proposal.

Mr. VENIOT: Roughly speaking, between $120,000 and $125,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to know how it is made up. That is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to take part in the discussion on the resolution, but I was getting some information at the time and the resolution was carried before I had an opportunity to intervene in the debate.

I wish to put myself on record with regard to this proposed settlement with the postal workers at Winnipeg. So far as I can understand the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, it is based purely on the question of what in law we call "quantum meruit," namely, that these postal strikers are entitled to wages for the period from their re-employment until to-day at the rate they were paid before the strike, and that they would be entitled to any raise that is usual in the service. He puts forward that as a very good argument in law. But, if I understand my law correctly, quantum meruit is usually invoked where there is no contract between the parties—

Mr. BENNETT: Not usually, but always.

Mr. GLEN: Yes; and therefore you must take into account the surrounding circumstances of the employment and then fix the amount of compensation accordingly. I think that is a correct statement of the law. But in this case there has been a contract between the postal employees and the department. That contract was based on an order in council, and whether or not the order injected two other provisions than those that were contained in the memorandum submitted by the Hon. Gideon Robertson, nevertheless the fact is that these postal employees entered into that contract knowing the effect of the conditions contained therein.

I saw a good deal of merit in the argument submitted by the leader of the opposition, and perhaps I would go a little further than he did, that in the recognition of these postal workers you are not merely compensating them for what they have done, but you are recognizing a principle which I do not think any government can afford to recognize, namely, that employees of the state should have the right to strike. If I say that the police, or the army or the navy, have not the right to strike, the same principle must apply also to these postal workers. I do submit that in the circumstances of the strike, more especially as has been admitted by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre the men had no grievance—those were his words—but because they happened to be affiliated with the Trades and Labour Council—

Mr. THORSON: I do not admit that they had no grievance.

Mr. GLEN: I took a note of my hon. friend's words, and Hansard will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. THORSON: I am correcting my hon. friend now.

Mr. GLEN: It is only a small point. You say they had some grievance. But at all events it was a sympathetic strike with others affiliated with the Trades and Labour Council. I cannot for many reasons support this resolution. I take the position that no government can afford to deal lightly or negligently with the tremendous principle involved, namely, the question of the public service. I realized when in Manitoba how throughout the country we were all affected by this strike. The whole of the postal service was disorganized, and, in the country of which I can speak, they were entirely hostile to all the principles involved in that strike. Having experienced the effects of the strike, and coming now to the question of settlement, there is not a man either in this house or elsewhere who would not wish that these postal strikers should be sympathetically dealt with. But unfortunately individuals must suffer in the general application of law; for no law ever was evolved whereby everyone benefits: in the application of the law some hardship is suffered by individuals. Now these individuals took upon themselves to enter a strike and they have been penalized. I am not going to deal at any length with all that has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) or by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson), but I take this postion: In view of the fact that these men had twice an opportunity to go back, which opportunity was not accepted; that they then had a meeting with the Hon. Gideon Robertson; that a memorandum was submitted to the government of the day admitting that they had seen the gravity of their offence, and that when the reinstatement took place they entered into a contract wherein they undertook to perform the services which they had formerly rendered on the condition laid down in the Civil Service Act, namely, that they were really new entrants into the postal service—a contract which they knew at the time carried only that minimum wage of the lower grade—and that they were satisfied to go back into the service on these terms, I must take the ground that, having done so, they must now suffer the consequences. Like the leader of the opposition however, and for the sake of compromise in the settlement of what is a very vexed question throughout the west and in Manitoba particularly, I think the bill might be amended so that these men who are receiving benefits to-day should also receive that seniority which would entitle them to further benefits. That would be a gracious act. I know it is in the very spirit of compromise. Of course, we cannot always be strictly logical in these matters, and I am glad to see the leader of the opposition taking that point of view, although the other night he was not so keen for it. I do think, however, that in this case a compromise might be accepted by the postal workers in Winnipeg, recognizing them in the position they now occupy. The heat and passionate feeling in relation to that strike have to a large extent evaporated. No one wishes to revive those feelings. On the other hand, certainly no one wishes to create a precedent which will enable persons in the service in the future to come to parliament and say, "You did this for the strikers of 1919; you reinstated them, recompensing them for the loss of wages. And now we wish also to have that precedent considered as a basis for a similar claim in our behalf". If a precedent were created, strikers in the future would feel entitled to come to parliament and seek to have that precedent invoked to their advantage. I think it might be well for the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to take into consideration the proposal that has been put forward. Certainly if the matter goes through in the form intended I shall vote against it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Like others who have spoken with reference to this bill, I am sympathetic so far as certain parts of it are concerned. I too think that the time is coming, in fact it is here, when, in the words of Lord Robert Cecil, we must get away from the war mind. No doubt until this time a great many members of this house would have opposed this bill in its entirety, and the fact that the leader of the opposition and many others on this side of the house have gone as far as they have is, I think, evidence on the part of the people of this country that, more or less, bygones should be bygones and that as far as possible peace and harmony should be restored.

At the same time I must agree with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) and the leader of the opposition. The leader of the opposition has gone a great way in compromising to the extent he has; because, try as we may, we cannot dissociate this question from the cause of the Winnipeg strike. It is all very well for any hon. member to say he will not discuss the merits of the strike, that he does not wish to discuss it, that he does not wish either to justify or to condemn it. So say we all; we do not even like to raise the question. But when you are wiping out the penalty entirely as we are here doing, and putting these men back in the status they would have had if they had never gone on strike, we are by that very act justifying their course in striking; we are saying that what they did in 1919 was right and that the conditions laid down by parliament and in the order in council which has been read here were wrong. We are saying that parliament made a mistake, that the people who condemned the strikers at that time were mistaken, and that the strikers were justified in all they did. That is an attitude which I do not think this country will take; I do not think we can afford to take it.

I agree with the hon. member for Marquette that there are certain services in this country the employees in which we cannot allow at any time to take the position that they can strike even if they have grievances. And the postal service is one of these. The business of the country must go on, and employees in this particular branch of the government service, if they have grievances, must seek a remedy by some other method than strikes. Consequently I, with others, should like to appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. MacKenzie King) to accept the suggestion which has come from the leader of the opposition. Many of us believe that we have gone a considerable distance in the direction of compromise, and I think the government might meet the wishes of those on this side of the house and at the same time remove the question for all time from the sphere of politics. If the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) is right in what he says—and I have no doubt he is—that he has been informed that the men will be quite satisfied with such a compromise, surely there can be no objection to parliament unanimously adopting it. As one who is always very sympathetic with labour but yet feels that he must uphold justice in this country and the actions of parliament, as well as respect for the laws of the land, I again appeal to the Prime Minister and his cabinet to accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition and to withdraw the matter from the political realm.

Mr. HOWDEN: There has been a rumour recently that some of the men in Winnipeg have a different attitude towards the situation of the postal employees of that city from that which they entertained a little while ago. I merely wish to say that when this matter was before the house last year I was entirely in support of it and I have not had occasion to change my attitude in the least. I am heartily in favour of this bill. I do not believe my support of this measure will bring any particular advantage to myself; I know it is criticized quite severely in Manitoba, nevertheless I think it eminently fair that these men should be paid for the work they did, and I am entirely in favour of seeing them so paid. I believe these men of whom we are speaking now are the only men connected with that strike or with any other strikes which have taken place since who have not been fully reinstated. I do not see why we should discriminate against these post office employees in Winnipeg and for that reason, without delaying the house further, I repeat that I am heartily in support of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to delay this measure, but on the other hand we are entitled to definite, positive information as to what is involved in dollars and cents. I want to know how many employees were affected and when they came back into the service. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre seems to know more about this question than the Postmaster General, and he says there are 79 men in Winnipeg. How many are there at other points?

Mr. VENIOT: There are 96 all told.

Mr. BENNETT: Where are they?

Mr. VENIOT: Calgary, and I think Saskatoon.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a case in Calgary to which I should like to direct the attention of the committee. There was a man who served in the South African war and who later became an employee in the Calgary post office; he was a letter sorter, I believe, and supported his wife and small family. He went out on the sympathetic strike and then had to leave the country, because there were no vacancies and he could not get a job. He went to California, but before leaving he saw me and explained the situation. He had purchased some property; they placed a mortgage on that property and as far as I know they have not returned to Canada, unless they have done so within the last few months. That man lost his job because he went out on the sympathetic strike, and there were no vacancies which he could fill. The result is that so far as the public service is concerned he is done for; he is getting old and his eyesight is failing.

On the other hand the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred to a man in Winnipeg who was re-employed by the Post Office department more than a year after the strike, I believe sometime in the fall of 1920. A vacancy occurred; he passed the examination, was selected for the position and entered the service at a certain rate of pay. There is a fact which it seems to me must not be overlooked; that man need not have re-entered the service at that rate of pay had he not desired to do so. Being twenty-one years of age and a man of experience, without the least coercion being applied he agreed to accept that position. We are told by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that before the strike this man was receiving $1,830 with the bonus, and I should like to know what salary he received at the time he left the service, exclusive of the bonus.

Mr. THORSON: I think the bonus amounted to $430.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he would be receiving $1,400, and he re-entered the service at $1,020.

Mr. THORSON: I believe the wages of a postal helper were about $85 per month.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the rate was $720, without the bonus.

Mr. BENNETT: Then when he went back in 1920, what did he get? I understand that there were 79 cases in Winnipeg, one or two cases in Calgary and some in Saskatoon, making a total of 96. Now I want to know when these men being over twenty-one years of age went to work under a definite contract with the state, a contract which they made freely and voluntarily, without threat, without duress, without misrepresentation and without coercion; a contract under which they agreed to work for so many dollars a month. I want to know the dates when they went back to work, how many increases they have received since that time, and how many of these men are now receiving the maximum salaries of their classes. That is, how many of these men have had their services recognized according to the provisions of the Civil Service Act so that they have reached the maximum of their class? That is important, because if they have been promoted that shows a recognition of their meritorious services, and there is nothing to indicate that those promotions were not based upon their efficiency in the light of their experience. In other words, we do not want to do this thing twice. These promotions have been obtained on the certificate of their superior officer, who certifies upon his honour, without regard to political or other considerations that such and such a man has rendered meritorious service and is entitled to his increase. I want to know how many of these men have reached their maximums and are receiving what they would have received had they never terminated their employment with the state. In my opinion it is important that we have this information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. gentleman if the prospect of starvation for a man and his wife and family is not a species of duress?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to that question is that in this country, where it is alleged that unemployment is unknown—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman believe that?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I do not, but I say that allegation is made. I see no reason for believing that any man, by reason of fear of starvation for himself and his family, would be driven to a particular kind of work unless he were willing to do that work; before going back to work he must have taken into consideration all these factors which have been mentioned. Then there is a further answer which suggests itself, and which is very simple: Why did he not think of that when he refused to go back to work? He had two chances to return but he refused them both; he had not one but two opportunities for repentance but he did not avail himself of either.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly he thought he was standing out for a fundamental principle.

Mr. BENNETT: Even assuming that to be so, he must suffer the consequences of so standing out, and one consequence was that he went back to work under this new contract.

There is just one observation which I cannot permit to pass unchallenged. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre keeps dwelling upon the fact that a man should receive compensation in proportion to the service rendered, but let me put another proposition to this house. Take the case of a new man standing by, doing his job without complaint; he had broken no contract and had dislocated no service. Perhaps he was a returned soldier, since many of the employees taken on at that time were returned men. Then another man reenters the service; he had broken his contract with the state; he had dislocated the service, and now he stands side by side with that other man, as a beginner under a contract into which he entered freely and voluntarily. So we have two beginners, A and B; one had broken no contract, had participated in no sympathetic strike and had done nothing to disturb the service of the country. They worked together, and it is said that one could and did do more work than the other, but they were both paid at the same rate. I know of no place in the world, in any kind of employment, where that condition is not found. There is always one man who does a little more, and he is the man who usually emerges as superintendent, as foreman or perhaps as president of the organization. But now we are told that we are to make a new contract for one man but not for the other, regardless of the services which have been rendered by this other new man, who is ambitious, who has been toiling hard and who wants to get on in the world; we are to make a new contract with the other man while we do nothing for the man to whom I have referred.

In the absence of any evidence to show how many there are, I would like to have some particulars, perhaps in the form of a schedule —I do not care about the names, they can be numbered 1, 2, and so on—which would show what number are involved. One man went to work last year and one the year before, and I should like to know what is going to be done about them. Three men came in during last three years; is one man to get an increase of pay for nine years, another man for one year, another for two years and another for three years; is that the idea?

Mr. VENIOT: He could not get any increase in pay if he had not worked.

Mr. BENNETT: We are going to make a new contract to increase the pay of a man who went to work in 1920 regardless of the fact that during that nine years his meritorious service has been certified to by his superior officer according to the provisions of the Civil Service Act. The Postmaster General knows the provision of the certificate, which is, "I certify on my honour, regardless of political considerations, that this man"—giving the name—"has rendered meritorious service which entitles him to receive this added pay." Those certificates exist with relation to a large number of the men, but I want to know how many. We cannot follow what is involved in this resolution unless we have some idea of what it means with respect to individuals and pay. The Postmaster General says that the sum involved is small and that the proper place to discuss this resolution is in committee, on the bill, but once we give a second reading to the bill we have committed ourselves to the principle of it, and that principle is the payment of a sum of money. I want to know how much money the treasury will have to pay to carry out a new contract which will be made by the Dominion of Canada with ninety-six of its employees.

Every service for the state is either by an implied or by an express contract. In an express contract the terms are mentioned; in an implied contract one is enabled to recover on a quantum meruit. We had an illustration of that in connection with a dredging contract with the Public Works department under which certain services were rendered. It was said that the classification was entirely different from that under which the tender had been made and therefore that the contractor was entitled to a further sum of money because of the services rendered. We are now making a new contract on a quantum where there is an express contract outstanding, and I should like to know under what principle we are justified in making that new contract. I should like to have these particulars from the Postmaster General before I give my further assent on division to this resolution going up.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I was asking the minister for information. He has just shown me a portion of a schedule which I have not had time to analyse, and he has not a copy of it.

Mr. VENIOT: This is the original. I can let the hon. gentleman have it.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is this and I cannot make it too clear: these men were employed at a given salary. The salary which they received prior to their dismissal by reason of their going on a sympathetic strike, was in some instances a smaller salary than that which they received when they went back. I noticed on the list which the minister showed me, the case of a man who had been receiving $704 and who was reappointed at a salary of $780.

Mr. THORSON: I think that list, of which I had a copy, does not show the salary of the postal employee at the time of his re-entry into the service.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it does.

Mr. THORSON: It shows his present salary.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it shows his salary on reappointment and not his present salary. The information I seek is this: what is his present salary? By what amount has it been increased since he joined the service. In making that increase did his superior officer not have regard to his meritorious service during the period of his employment, and by reason of his wider experience did not receive a higher recommendation for meritorious service than he otherwise would, so that he is now receiving a salary based upon meritorious service regard being had for the years he served and no attention being paid to the fact that he was reengaged in whatever year it was after he had gone out on strike and applied for reemployment? That is vital to the whole question. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will realize that. If the situation is as I suggest it is in that particular case, the man is not entitled to anything. The minister has under his hand a schedule which shows that one man is entitled to $1,937. That man is to get $1,937 and he has stood side by side with a man who came in with him who gets nothing at all except the statutory increase. That man gets $1,937 for going on strike. That is the principle to which this parliament is giving its approval.

Mr. VENIOT: That man was a postal clerk, class 2A, $1,400. When he came back after the strike his salary was reduced to $840. He came in about the first of the year, 1921. From that date to the end of March he received $11,666. He was doing the same work as prior to the strike, and had there been no change, he would have received $13,806. That makes a difference, allowing for arrears of bonus for the months of April and May, of $1,937.22 that he would get under this measure. I have under my hand as complete a list as I have been able to get—and I think it is complete, especially in regard to the Winnipeg employees—of every individual that went out on strike and came back, the date he came back, the salary he was receiving when he went out, the salary he received when he came back, and the amount that he will now receive according to this bill. The amount ranges from a maximum of $1,937.22 to a minimum of $250.

Mr. BENNETT: What would it be in the case of an employee who went back to work last year? The employee who went back last year is going to get $200 more than the man who came in last year.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but do not lose sight of this fact. That man is doing high grade work—

Mr. BENNETT: But he has not done it for seven or eight years.

Mr. VENIOT: But he passed the examination and qualified and is put at high class work, although he is only being paid for low grade work. He is qualified for the higher grade.

Mr. BENNETT: Could anything more clearly illustrate the iniquity—if I might use the term?—of this thing. Here are two men who joined the postal service in Winnipeg last year. One of them eight years ago went on strike and he has not been working for eight years in the postal service, but having passed an examination he goes back and is reengaged. So is the other man who had never been in the postal service at all. They go in together, and one gets $200 handed to him by this parliament; the other gets nothing, and the man who gets the $200 is the man who went on strike, the man who abandoned the postal service and left the people of Winnipeg without postal conveniences. He had a contract. Now the government is going to make a new one with him because nine years ago he worked for the government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will they both be doing the same work?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: They would not have the same experience.

Mr. BENNETT: No, and that is the only argument that can be used. One is a new man, and the other has had some experience —some experience in striking, my hon. friend from Fort William says. That is the reason I want this information.

Mr. BANCROFT: The other man may have struck for another purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: He struck the trail if that is what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. VENIOT: That first man is now drawing his maximum of $1,740.

Mr. BENNETT: Before we get away from that—I am coming back to the maximum—I trust that this house realizes how serious the situation is. Here are two men who go into the service last year, in 1927 or 1928—last year, the minister says—and now one is going to get handed to him $200, less legal expenses.

Mr. POWER: I would like to ask the hon. leader of the opposition a question for information, for I frankly admit that I have not understood this thing yet. Take the case cited by the hon. leader of the opposition, where two men come into the postal service say a year ago to-day. One had never been in the postal service in his life, and the other had been a striker. The striker gets the same salary as the other man, but if I understand the position taken by the Postmaster General, he is placed in a much higher position; he does work which under other circumstances would entitle him to receive, we will say, $1,800 instead of $720. If those are the facts I can form some judgment, but if I am wrong I do not understand any more about it than I did when we started.

Mr. VENIOT: May I be allowed to give an example? A new man comes in as a porter. His job is to carry bags, empty them out, prepare the mail for those who do the more advanced work. He gets a salary of $780. The striker who comes in at the same time, say a year or two ago, gets the same, $780 or $840, whatever the figure may be, but the striker does not empty the bags or carry them. He goes to a more advanced position, that of sorter, one of the most important positions, because when he was there before that is the work he did, and for that work he was getting a great deal more salary than the helper.

Mr. BENNETT: But is that this case?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I want the facts. The man who joined last year—

Mr. VENIOT: He went to a higher position—

Mr. BENNETT: What position did he go to?

Mr. VENIOT: He would likely go—

Mr. BENNETT: Not likely, what did he do? We are talking about actualities, not theory. What did he do, that one man?

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend will name one—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre said that one joined last year, one the year before, and one in 1926. Is that correct?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Those names are there on the record; I do not know them. One joined in 1926, one in 1927, one in 1928. Their pay was so-and-so. I want to know what work these men actually did and what they were classified as, not in theory, but in real practice—their names and what they did. Then I can form some judgment.

Mr. POWER: I think the house is entitled to that information.

Mr. BENNETT: And yet one of those men is going to get $200 presented to him. I want to know what it is for.

Mr. THORSON: I think I can perhaps give some information. I do not know these three particular individuals by name, but the three men in question would each go back and be graded as postal helpers. That was the only grade in which they could get back into the service.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: Then he got the pay of his grade.

Mr. THORSON: No, that is the point. He did not get the pay of his grade. The official grade that he occupied was that of postal helper, no matter what he was doing. I know of one case where a man who was an ex-striker had supervision over four or five other persons, all of whom were getting higher salaries than he was, but he was graded as a postal helper because that was the only grade into which he could be admitted.

Mr. POWER: That supervisory position must have been classified somewhere under the act.

Mr. THORSON: No. He was doing the work of a superviser, but his official grade under the civil service appointment was that of postal helper.

Mr. POWER: If he is classified, he should get the salary of his classification.

Mr. THORSON: He was graded as a postal helper, but he might be doing all sorts of work demanding higher qualifications.

Mr. VENIOT: Take a clerk who is classified as a mail clerk. He arrives at the point where he may be supervising five or six other clerks under him, and yet he does not get the salary of a supervising clerk. He is placing himself in a position where he may be promoted to the position of supervising clerk. While that is the name of the position he is occupying, he has not the salary of a supervising clerk.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend says that he may be classified as a supervising clerk. He does not say he was.

Mr. VENIOT: He has the opportunity of promotion to that position.

Mr. MANION: What I am trying to get at is this. The strike was in 1919. A man who has been out of the service for nine years goes back. In that time, might he not have so completely forgotten the work that he would have to start in the same position as a beginner?

Mr. VENIOT: I have a case in point, that of a man going into the service in 1926. There was a vacancy for the position of clerk. This man passed the examination and had the qualifications just the same as the position called for in 1919. He classified for the position by passing the examination. That was Samuel Woolson. He was receiving $1,630 before, and is now receiving $1,320.

Mr. MANION: Receiving a salary of $1,320 with what classification? Is that the salary of the position for which he passed the examination?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, it is in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: What is he going to get out of this fund?

Mr. VENIOT: $1,336. But he has been in now going on four years. The minimum since he went out has been increased in that lower class.

Mr. BENNETT: In 1926 there was a vacancy in the Winnipeg post office. It was advertised. Among the applicants for that position was one who seven years before had been employed in the post office, namely, in 1919. He was awarded the position, and now he is going to be given by this parliament $1,336. At the same time there was another vacancy, which was filled by another applicant who had not formerly been employed in the post office service. That applicant has received his statutory increases, but will get nothing more.

Mr. VENIOT: He is not in such a high grade.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what we ask the minister. He has given the name of the man. What work was he doing?

Mr. VENIOT: Mail clerk.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the other man? There were other vacancies for mail clerks in 1926.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not see any.

Mr. BENNETT: There were in other parts of the country—we will put it that way. Then we say, because a man seven years ago worked at a job in the post office, he is now to get $1,300 out of the people of Canada by reason of the fact that seven years ago when he was working he went on strike. That is what parliament is doing.

Mr. THORSON: If he is capable of doing the same work that he was doing in 1919, why should he not be so paid?

Mr. BENNETT: But he passed the examination. The Civil Service have given him his rating, in accordance with the examination on the application for the job.

Mr. THORSON: As postal helper. That was the only thing he could get.

Mr. BENNETT: As mail clerk in the post office.

Mr. THORSON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me. Will the minister say what salary he got?

Mr. THORSON: I have this man's name here.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the house will quite agree that I must look to the minister for this information, much as I should like to get assistance from my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre. Coming events may cast their shadows behind, not before.

Mr. VENIOT: I might say to my hon. friend that while this is quite complicated,—

Mr. BENNETT: It is not complicated.

Mr. VENIOT: —I cannot see that he is making any point, comparing this man coming in with his previous experience of eight or nine years in the service with the new man coming in under examination, because no new man comes in under a grade of that kind. He must come in as a postal helper, and consequently can only be graded as such. He begins at the bottom of the ladder and works up, whereas the other man has to pass an examination as to whether he is fit for the class he was in before. But he does not get the salary of that class. He gets four hundred dollars less.

Mr. BENNETT: We are not going to take generalities, but actualities. We are going to take this case of 1926. The man's name was?

Mr. VENIOT: Samuel Woolson.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a vacant position, I understand, and he applied for it. Did he write on the examination?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Having written on the examination, he was appointed to the position was he?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Wait a minute.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: He was appointed at the minimum salary of $1,080.

Mr. BENNETT: But what examination did he pass?

Mr. VENIOT: He passed the examination for postal clerk, because they put him at that work.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point. What examination did he pass?

Mr. VENIOT: The civil service examination.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. The same as any other applicant for a position in the service?

Mr. VENIOT: The only difference was the age limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. What position was advertised?

Mr. VENIOT: Postal clerk—no, postal helper.

Mr. BENNETT: Were there several applicants?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: We will have to know. We are going to get down to the reason. The Prime Minister was not in when I began to deal with this case.

Mr. VENIOT: There would be several applicants.

Mr. BENNETT: Seven years after the strike there was a vacancy. It was advertised. One of the applicants was Samuel Woolson, one of the striking employees of 1919. To him the position was awarded. He received $1,080 as a starter. That was the salary stated in the advertisement for the class of position vacant when the civil service asked for applicants. According to the minister, that man in this year of grace, 1928, will receive some $1,300; whereas any other person that passed the same examination, and might have been appointed to the same position, would get nothing but the statutory increase. In other words, seven years ago, Woolson had experience, now he has none.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, yes, he has.

Mr. BENNETT: He had seven years of no experience.

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: He had seven years without experience.

Mr. VENIOT: Without working. It does not follow that he would have forgotten all his past experience.

Mr. BENNETT: He had seven years in which he had not worked as a postal clerk.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member a question? If he drops out of legal practice for seven years is he going to forget all his law?

Mr. BENNETT: I know some gentlemen who are very emphatic in saying that in much less than seven years a man forgets a great deal of his legal education. I think most lawyers will say that if they retired from the practice of law for seven years they would not care to resume it without a good deal of study.

Mr. THORSON: Would not such a man be better than a law student?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but not as good as a new student at law.

Mr. BANCROFT: Would he charge less for his services?

Mr. BENNETT: He might and he might not. It has been published in the newspapers in Winnipeg that 20 per cent of this sum is going to the lawyers.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the trade union rate.

Mr. BENNETT: Among lawyers?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that has not been my experience. I would be much better off if it had been. Let me proceed. I trust the minister realizes where this leads to. A given number of men all pass the same examination. One, because seven years ago he was at that job, is a little more proficient in it than somebody else.

Mr. THORSON: Therefore worth more.

Mr. BENNETT: And, my hon. frend says, therefore worth more. The notice was posted up showing what the salary would be. His contract with the civil service was, just as the minister mentioned, $1,080. Now this parliament is going to make a new contract and give that man $1,300; but, the man who went into similar service in some other part of Canada, a man who was not a striker, a man of as good education as Woolson, is not going to get anything extra.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is losing sight of the fact that, although Woolson passed the examination and went in at the minimum salary of $1,080, he was not put to do the work of that class, but the work of a postal clerk. His experience before the strike qualified him for that higher grade and although, as the agreement said, he had to go in as a beginner, he took the examination and went in at $1,080 a year. But knowing that he was classified for this higher grade they put him to do that work although he did not receive the salary of the higher grade. And he has continued to do such work during the last four and a half years. That is how the difference is made up as between the work he did and the salary he got.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but when the minister says he did the work he must go further than that. Now, Sam Woolson reported for duty. What did he do?

Mr. VENIOT: They put him in as a clerk and—

Mr. BENNETT: What did he start at?

Mr. VENIOT: He started as a postal helper; he graded as a postal helper.

Mr. BENNETT: When he reported for duty what did he do?

Mr. VENIOT: He started on sortation work and that is one of the important duties But he did not get paid at all for sortation work.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister say that of his own knowledge—that that man started sorting the day he went to work?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not say it of my own knowledge but from information given me by the officials.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the record show that?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the minister must not say that, because he is assuming a case which the record does not show. That is why I have asked the minister with reference to this particular case, which is in point. Sam Woolson answered the advertisement. The salary was $1,080. Sam went to work at that salary of $1,080 and then he received the statutory increases. The minister says the postmaster put him at other work than that which ordinarily a clerk would do. Well, I want to know what he reported for; what he did; when he was changed; in other words, I want the history of that man's job up to this year; because it is proposed to give him $1,300, more than that given the man who stood at the desk beside him and who came in the same day.

Mr. VENIOT: That man did not stand at the desk beside him but in a lower class or grade.

Mr. BENNETT: What evidence have you of that?

Mr. VENIOT: He was not entitled to stand at that desk.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more the minister is building a case on what he says should be. I want to know what is.

Mr. VENIOT: I will tell you what is: A man going in entirely new could not stand beside this man who, although going in anew, carried with him his past experience. They were in different classes, working in different sections of the building.

Mr. BENNETT: But the minister has no evidence; he is speaking of what is going to be.

Mr. VENIOT: That is what took place, and I know it.

Mr. BENNETT: We can easily send a telegram and satisfy the minister. The minister's story is that Sam Woolson, in response to an advertisement by the Civil Service Commission, passed an examination successfully and was awarded a position in the Winnipeg post office. Is that right?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the position, may I ask, to which Sam Woolson was appointed?

Mr. VENIOT: To be positively sure we should have to look at the record.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, and that is what I want to know; because it makes all the difference in the world. What did Sam do when he went to work?

Mr. VENIOT: From what I see in the record he would start on sortation.

Mr. BENNETT: This is really so important that the facts should be before us. Before the house resumed the minister showed me the documents containing the list of these employees and I had just time enough to look down the page. However, I have taken one case, in 1926, and I am now asking to what work this man was put after he was appointed to the position. The minister says he reported for duty but he cannot be certain what the man went to work to do. I want to know: What did he do when he reported? How long did he remain in that position? What did he next do? When was he appointed to a different position? When did he attain to the position which the minister says, had he never left the service, would have enabled him to receive $1,300—more than someone else is getting. These are the questions I should like to have answered and I do not think they will be considered unfair.

Mr. POWER: I have no knowledge of what happened in Winnipeg, but to my misfortune I do know something of the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, and I know that no man may enter the employ of the Post Office Department now except as a postal helper. In the old days there were examinations for mail clerks and clerks grade 1, grade 2, grade 3 and so forth—examinations open to the public. At the present time these examinations are open only to those who wish to apply for the position of postal helper. Consequently every one of these men, as he returned to the employ of the Post Office Department, became a postal helper; he answered the advertisement for the position of postal helper, carrying a salary of $1,080. As these men entered the post office it was found by the postmaster or by their superior officers that they might, with advtantage and with a view to efficient service, be placed in one of the higher grades, say that of mail clerk, sortation clerk, clerk of grade 1, 2 or 3, and so forth, to none of which positions they could apply through the Civil Service Commission by examination; they had to go in by the lowest grade, so to speak. So that when their superior officers found that they could actually do that work—if the information I have gathered from this discussion is correct—they were placed in these positions—let us say in the position of sortation clerk which would carry with it a salary of say $1,500 or $1,600. So that for the past three or four years, as the case may be, these men although they entered the service at $1,080, with whatever statutory increases they received, presumably $60, have been doing work which under other circumstances would be carried on by men earning $1,600. And the purpose of this bill, if my information is correct, is to give to every such man the salary which he actually earned. My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) made that argument this afternoon, the argument based on the quantum meruit, and if I may say so quite frankly to him and to the Postmaster General, that is the only argument that is worth anything in this case; any appeals to sympathy for these men is to my mind hardly worth considering. But I wish to direct the attention of the committee to this point: that the resolution does not seem to say just what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the Postmaster General have in mind. The resolution states:

> That it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently re-employed, to give them the benefit of salary they would have received had they re-entered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed.

I do not favour that proposition at all. As I understand it, the proposition made by the Postmaster General and laid down by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was to pay the men for the work they have actually done during that time and not to pay them on the basis of the salary they might have received had they gone back and done that work. For instance, the case was put to us to-day of one man who had been earning $1,800 before the strike. He went on strike and came back, starting at say $1,080. If that man was doing $1,800 worth of work I am prepared to pay him accordingly, but I am not prepared to say that we should give him the equivalent of his salary when he went on strike. I am not prepared to give him that money unless it can be shown to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General and of the officers of the department that he actually was doing work which under other circumstances would have given him this money. I should not be prepared to go even so far.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the hon. gentleman think that a big favour is done these men to take them back at all?

Mr. POWER: That is the point I was coming to. In the first place, I am not sure that I should ever have taken them back. But now that we have taken them back we cannot forever keep hanging over their heads as a punishment this prospect: "You may work as hard as you please, and give the best service you can to the country, but because you made that one fatal mistake we shall never reward you for your efforts."

Mr. MANION: That is exactly the attitude we take.

Mr. POWER: I want to get this clear. If I understand my hon. friend's attitude now it is that for the rest of their lives these men must be punished for the action they took in 1919.

Mr. MANION: No, our attitude is exactly the same as that taken by my hon. friend, that from this day on we will make the past something to be forgotten and pay them for the work they are doing.

Mr. POWER: Then we are not so far apart after all in principle; there is very little difference between us. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that from to-day everything is to be forgotten and that these men will be paid the salary actually earned at the work they are actually doing now.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is it.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friends agree that from to-day we should pay these men the salaries which are carried by the positions they are actually occupying; that is to say, though they may have gone in as postal helpers last year and immediately become sortation clerks because they were able to do that work, from to-day we should start to pay those men $200 or $300 more.

Mr. MANION: That is my understanding.

Mr. POWER: Then the only difference between us is that hon. gentlemen opposite are starting a year later than we on this side. The same principle applies and it is only a question of quantum.

Mr. MANION: There is this difference in principle: We take the attitude that the man who started last year was, as my hon. friend admitted, lucky to be taken back at all in view of the fact that he went out on a sympathetic strike. From the time he began again until the present he has received perhaps a lower salary than he was really earning according to the work he was doing, but that was his punishment for going out on that strike. From to-day on we say "Let bygones be bygones, and we will pay you for the work you are doing, as certified by the postmaster."

Mr. POWER: So the principle is this, that in 1920 the government of the day, out of the goodness of its heart and not because there was an election coming on, which would not have been fair; out of the kindness of its heart in 1920, a year before the election of 1921, the government said to these men, "Come back; all is forgiven."

Mr. MANION: The strike occurred only two years before that; we could not do it very much sooner.

Mr. POWER: Probably that is quite right, but nine years later the members of that same party say, "If you come back you must put in one whole year without getting the salary which you earn." Supposing a man comes back to-morrow, after we pass this bill, where are we going to put him? Are we to put him to work as a sortation clerk and give him $200 a year extra because he happens to come back the day after this bill is passed?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has not stated the position quite correctly. The government of that day said, "We will take you back on certain conditions" and those conditions have been lived up to by the government. We think those conditions should continue to apply.

Mr. POWER: I am not familiar with the conditions except from what I heard this afternoon. I understand that these men were to be taken back subject to certain conditions, which simply amounted to the men saying they were very sorry and would not do it again. Another condition, which was in their favour, was to the effect that these men, going up for their examinations, need not be within the age limit. Those were the only two conditions I heard mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: And they retained their pension and superannuation rights.

Mr. POWER: That is correct, but there was no condition as to what their salaries should be and I submit that for us to come before this country to-day and say "We forgave you nine years ago but to-day we are not going to pay you the salary you earn" is a ridiculous position to take.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry my hon. friend from Quebec South has not followed the debate as carefully as he usually does. The four conditions mentioned by the Postmaster General this afternoon, which were referred to in the order in council which permitted the old employees to be re-employed —not reinstated—were first the approval of the governor in council; secondly, the passing of that examination, waiving the age limit, and thirdly, the fact that these men came to the department as new employees and, coming as such they received the pay payable to new employees. That was the contract, and now we are substituting a parliamentary contract for the one which was made between the state and the individual.

Mr. POWER: They were to receive the pay of new employees while they were doing the work of new employees.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. My hon. friend at once took the point which, as a lawyer, I expected he would take; he submitted that to put forth the principle mentioned in that resolution would be destructive of the civil service of Canada. There is no question about that; the hon. gentleman saw that point at once, but he said he was in favour of every man being paid what he was worth. Once more we are left in the cloudland of conjecture and doubt as to who is to determine what a man's worth may be.

Mr. POWER: That should be determined by the work he does.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, and it was because of that point that I endeavoured to extract from the Postmaster General the information I am now trying to secure. I took the Woolson case because I thought it might be typical. Let it be observed first that these men come in as though they were unknown to the state; they make application in response to an advertisement issued by the Civil Service Commission. We will say three men apply, and we might designate them as A, B and C, B having been employed in the Winnipeg post office seven years previously. They write their examinations and B gets the position; he is appointed to the position called for by the advertisement, as the hon. member for Quebec South admitted.

Mr. POWER: There is only one position, that of postal helper.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. B gets that position, and having been appointed to that position he cannot be promoted at once; that is a matter for the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department, through its officials. As I pointed out this afternoon, when a competent superior officer reports that this employee has performed meritorious service entitling him to a raise in pay, he receives the statutory increase and therefore obtains added compensation.

Now, every man in a post office who is a helper is looking forward to doing something better, and the postmaster tries him at another job just a little better than the one he previously held. According to the argument now being advanced and the principle favoured, we are to say hereafter that if during the year the postmaster of a post office puts a man at a little different job from that for which he was hired under the Civil Service Commission, that man is going to ask for more pay.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the position carries it.

Mr. BENNETT: Every job which is a little better than the job formerly held by a man carries with it a little higher pay; that is why men strive to obtain better jobs. That is the reason the ambitious man is always willing to try his hand at a little more difficult task, in order ultimately to obtain a little more pay.

Mr. POWER: But there is a vast difference between a man who has obtained a position as postal helper and a man who is a sortation clerk, we will say. There is a difference in salary of perhaps $600, and if it is true that some of these men were brought in as postal helpers and immediately made to do sortation work I think they should be paid accordingly.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is the information I have been trying to secure from the Postmaster General. I am advised that not a man was told to do anything which he formerly did after he went back to work as a postal helper; later, having worked as a postal helper, he got another job because he was better fitted for it or because he was more ambitious. I will say this; a young, ambitious man of twenty-five, making up his mind to get on—and remember, they waived the age limit—is going to get on to the next job as quickly as the man who has been out of the service for seven years, if not more quickly. I know the observation of my hon. friend will be that that is the reason there is an age limit.

Mr. POWER: What may have happened and what is likely to have happened is that the postmaster or the superior officer at Winnipeg took the older man who had been out seven years and gave him the higher position, or rather gave him the more important work to do.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us ask ourselves this question: What benefits have been conferred upon the striking employee, apart from the financial benefits sought to be given to him? First, the age limit was withdrawn, and that was a tremendous concession. What is the second concession? He still has his rights under the superannuation and pensions acts. He is deprived of his claim to seniority because you cannot overcome time and say that a man who went to work in 1925 is going to rank senior to a man who went to work in 1918; that is one of the things he is deprived of. What else is he deprived of? Nothing. He comes in as a new employee and he carries with his position the salary of a new employee, but if he does—and this is where it is so essential to get an answer from the Postmaster General—work of a higher class, which carried with it in the days gone by a higher pay, he shall be treated as though there had been continuity in his service, notwithstanding that he is seven years older and has been out during that time.

Mr. POWER: That is the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the resolution, yes. That is the resolution which I understand the hon. gentleman says he cannot give his support to. There is no play of words about this. May I say to the right hon. the Prime Minister that in one instance he is being compensated as though there were continuity of service and in the other instance there is the statement made, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has said, "I want this man paid for the class of work he does."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all the government want; that is our understanding of the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Assuming that that is what the government want to do then I submit that that is not what the resolution says. Leaving that for the moment, the difference between us seems to be very simple. We are willing to have the Post Office Department consider it in the light of service rendered but not make it retroactive; the government desire to make it retroactive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he has been employed right along.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member for Quebec South has pointed out, the question is: How are we going to determine with exactness that the man did the work of a higher class? I saw the Postmaster General's schedule and all he does to arrive at the sum is this:

Appointment: at such and such a time.
Salary: such and such an amount.
Salary when he left the service seven years ago: so much.
Amount received during the years he has been employed: so much.
Amount he would have received had he continued on at the pay he was getting when he left: so much.
Difference he is entitled to: so much, less adjustments.

As I understand the right hon. the Prime Minister and the member for Quebec South, that is exactly what we do not want to do.

Mr. POWER: We do not want that.

Mr. BENNETT: In fairness to the other employees there is only one way in which it can be dealt with, and that is not to make it retroactive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been a discussion as to the principles which should govern in this matter. The first principle mentioned was that underlying reinstatement, and the second was the principle underlying remuneration. We on this side of the house say that the application of the principle of reinstatement was settled by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office; that the principle of reinstatement as being applicable was settled at the time of the strike. The question of whether or not the men should be taken back after the strike was decided by the government of the day. The government of the day did not decide that question of reinstatement in the manner in which we are attempting to decide the present one of remuneration, namely by an act of parliament, but decided it by an order in council under the War Measures Act. I have nothing to say about their method of procedure beyond observing that I do not think it was right; the government apparently took advantage of the act to say that these men were to be reinstated. When the government took that position they made it perfectly plain that they were prepared to reinstate the men notwithstanding the part they had taken in the strike.

In order to obtain any position the men had to pass a civil service examination which admitted them only to the lowest position in the service. They were admitted to the service in that manner, but, having been admitted, they were, in view of acquired skill and previous training, given work which required a degree of experience and skill very much greater than that to which the examination related and which would have been required of men going into the service for the first time. We say that these men where they have been put into positions requiring a greater degree of skill and experience should be paid for the service which they are or have been rendering, notwithstanding the fact that they agreed to come back as though they were entering the service for the first time. In other words, the principle governing remuneration is that of paying what the service rendered is worth. I am prepared to leave to the government of the day the question as to whether the men should have been reinstated or not. That question was settled in 1920, but once men enter the government service then I say that there is only one principle which should govern in the matter of remuneration, and that is the value of the service which is being rendered. If these men are performing services which are worth more than they are being paid and which they would be receiving but for having participated in the strike, if they are filling positions which carry higher salaries than those which they are receiving, then I think they should be given the difference between what they are being paid and what they would have been paid for the particular class of work they are or have been performing. As I understand it, that is the purpose of the bill based on the present resolution. If the measure goes farther than that, if it attempts to pay to any man an additional sum of money, notwithstanding the fact that the work which he has been performing does not carry that salary, then I am with my hon. friends opposite in agreeing that such an amount should not be paid.

If hon. members will pardon me, as evidencing that what I am now saying is not a newly formed conviction, I should like to refer to a statement of principle in matters of remuneration, as I had stated it before this strike ever took place, and which appears in a volume entitled Industry and Humanity, published in 1918, which volume is a study in the principles underlying industrial reconstruction. It appears in a chapter entitled Principles Underlying Work, at page 272 of the volume, and is as follows:

> What labour is really concerned about as regards remuneration, is adequate reward of the effort put forth. What capital and management are really concerned about is adequate reward for their investments and services. What the community is really concerned about is adequate value in services and commodities for purchasing power. The method of remuneration of labour which helps most to secure adequacy of returns all round is the method which is likely to prove the most productive of efficiency, and, in the long run, the most advantageous to labour.
> What is earned, rather than what is received, or paid, is the fundamental consideration. Men should get what they earn, and should earn what they get.

As I understand it, that is the whole principle underlying the present resolution. What is earned, rather than what is received or paid, is the fundamental consideration on the part of labour, and that principle should govern, particularly in the matter of government employment. Once these men came back into the employ of the state they should have been paid what their services were worth, in other words, the amounts corresponding to the classification in which their services fall. If they are performing the services of sorters they should be paid the wages which are due to sorters, not the wages which would be paid to men in the lower grades. That is the whole purpose of this measure.

I think the purpose of both sides of the house is much the same. Our purpose certainly is the same as that which actuated hon. gentlemen opposite when they passed the order in council to permit these men to return to the service. It is that of bringing about industrial peace, and industrial peace cannot be brought about effectively so long as you leave a sense of injustice rankling in the mind of any man as to the terms of his employment and the service he is rendering to the community and his employer. Hon. gentlemen opposite thought that they were helping the cause of industrial peace, when, under the War Measures Act, they passed an order in council permitting men, who had participated in a very serious strike, to return to the service of the state on certain terms and conditions. We feel that in so doing they went a considerable length towards restoring and maintaining industral peace, not only as concerns the few individuals most affected, but as affecting labour generally throughout the country. But since that time, ten years have gone by; certain men in the post office at Winnipeg have been rendering specific services to the state, and during all that time those of their number who went out on strike in 1919 have been receiving less pay than they would otherwise have received for the services which they have been rendering. We say that so long as that is continued, a sense of injustice will remain. Hon. gentlemen opposite meet us in this way; they say: we will agree with you and we will discontinue that discrimination to-night because we believe that it is an injustice. If that is true to-night, it was equally true a year ago, two years ago. It was equally true as each man began to perform a service that is worth more than he was being paid for. We ask that that sense of injustice shall be removed so that not only this particular group of men but labour generally, may feel that the government of the country as an employer, is not seeking to profit by the necessity of any man, whether the necessity arises out of a particular part taken in an industrial dispute or otherwise.

Once the question of a dispute is settled and reinstatement is permitted, the state as a model employer, should be prepared to pay and allow payment of the remuneration which properly attaches to particular positions. That is as far as the government is prepared to go in sanctioning the resolution before the house. It is our understanding of the bill to be based on the resolution, and if in any particular the resolution goes further than that, it might as well be made apparent at the moment that the government will not sanction the introduction of any bill which goes beyond that point. That far we feel we should go. We believe hon. gentlemen in what they have said to-day are somewhat of that opinion in view of the change of feeling that has come with the passing of time. We, at all events, have come to the conclusion that if men have suffered a severe measure of punishment through eight or ten years of suspense as to what would be their future lot, in losing throughout that time the opportunity to invest the little moneys they might otherwise have received, and in the permanent loss of their seniority rights, we, as a government seeking to bring about, so far as possible, good will in all relations, international and industrial, can well afford to go the length this resolution goes to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has used a word— and I cannot but think he has done it unintentionally—which is exactly a negation of the fact. He used the word, "reinstated." The order in council does not reinstate anyone. That is the whole trouble. The order in council permits re-employment, but it reinstates no one and yet during his speech my right hon. friend used the word, "reinstatement" continuously. Reinstatement means just what its derivation is —put him back in the state in which he was. This order in council permitted no such thing. It said distinctly: first, your employment has been terminated; second, you went out on a sympathetic strike and that terminated your employment, and, third, you now admit that you are conscious of the gravity of the offence that you committed against the state. You are now allowed to be re-employed in the public service although the original order in council debarred you from re-employment in any capacity. There never was a question of reinstatement. It has never even been suggested that there should be reinstatement. The word is forgotten. The proper word is "re-employment", and re-employment was predicated upon conforming to certain conditions. Those conditions were enumerated this afternoon and I will not repeat them. But when the applicant for a position complied with those conditions he had a position. That position was under a contract between him and the state. It was no longer a matter of implication; it was a matter of exact and express contract. There is no clearer rule than this: that the terms of an express contract between parties govern and no extraneous matters can be introduced to vary, alter or change the terms of that contract unless under certain circumstances which do not exist in this case. Therefore we have an express contract of employment at a given salary. The resolution before the house supports a principle that the Prime Minister says he is not in favour of, but which in terms states that if the re-employed, discharged employees were employed in a given capacity before the strike they shall, when re-employed, receive the salary of that position regardless of the fact that they did the work of their former jobs continuously or only part time. In other words, the money that is to be paid is predicated upon what they received and what they would have received.

Mr. VENIOT: What they earned.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend says, "what they earned." But his sheet of paper shows what they would have received.

Mr. VENIOT: In the class equivalent.

Mr. BENNETT: In the class equivalent when they left the service.

Mr. VENIOT: Provided they were engaged in that class.

Mr. BENNETT: But for how long?

Mr. VENIOT: They would be paid only for the number of days, weeks, months or years that they worked.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the resolution says and not what those figures show. The hon. gentleman showed me a sheet of paper and it gives the date of appointment with the salary at that date. Then it gives the man's former salary, what he received during the time he was employed and what he would have received if there had been no break in his service. One is deducted from the other and that is what he is entitled, subject to some adjustments, to receive. That is not what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must thank my hon. friend for suggesting that perhaps I had not made myself clear, or rather had expressed what was not in my mind when I drew a distinction between reinstatement and re-employment. When I referred to reinstatement I was referring to a man going back to work in the place in which he had been previously engaged. I meant that he was going back to his former work—the word is derived from the Latin "status" meaning place —that is, he was going back into his place when he was going back into the position of a postal employee. That was settled by hon. gentlemen opposite when they passed their order in council. But I will drop the word "reinstatement" altogether. I will speak only of re-employment.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "that is the word." We will stick to that. Hon. gentlemen opposite and not this government decided that certain men were to be re-employed.

Mr. BENNETT: No, might be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, might be, and the largest number of them were re-employed by hon. gentlemen opposite by an order in council which they put through. At any rate they settled the principle that men who had been out on strike could be re-employed in the postal service of Canada. We are in agreement in regard to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite settled the principle of re-employment. Now comes the question as to the basis of re-employment, the principle that shall govern in matters of re-employment. This is where the difference comes in. We on this side of the house say that if these men are to be employed, the principle which shall govern in the matter of remuneration is that of services rendered, and that that principle alone should govern. We say that no government has any right to make contracts with men to perform services and to pay a less amount than is normally paid for those services in accordance with the general regulations of the department by which they are employed. Hon. gentlemen opposite want these men who are re-employed to be paid at a lower rate than their particular employment is recognized as commanding. We say that is contrary to the whole practice of maintaining a standard of wages as followed by employers throughout the country generally. We say that a certain quantity of labour and a certain quality of labour should carry a certain remuneration, and what we propose by this measure is to say that men who were re-employed under an order in council which hon. gentlemen opposite passed shall be paid now as though they had been re-employed on terms which would admit them to receive as remuneration the amounts of money which attach to the particular classes of work they were doing; not to go any further than that. May I make it clear to my hon. friends that if the resolution of the Postmaster General means anything more than that, the government will not sanction his bringing in, and will not ask this house to pass, any bill which goes further than that. If the bill which my hon. friend the Postmaster General introduces is not specific enough in its terms, we can amend it. The intention of the government is simply to fix the method of remuneration and the amount of remuneration in accordance with that attaching to the classes of work actually performed, letting bygones be bygones in the case of remuneration just as hon. gentlemen opposite did in the matter of re-employment.

Mr. VENIOT: That is my understanding of the effect of the resolution. If it meant anything else I never would have introduced it. Let me say here that the difference between these salaries is based on the nature of the work performed, and that would be determined by the reports throughout the number of years made by the office at Winnipeg. No fairer way could be adopted than taking the weekly and monthly and quarterly reports, the yearly reports, if you like, together with the case examinations of all these officials in the different classes or grades they occupy, and basing the remuneration upon those reports according to the class of work performed.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister has mentioned a number of times the order in council and the principle we established in passing it; I mean the government of 1920, of which I was not a member. I hold the order in council in my hand. It was loaned to me by the Postmaster General. I am going to read two or three clauses that are pertinent, and if hon. gentlemen desire it, I will read it all, although it is somewhat lengthy. I do not agree with the Prime Minister that we established the principle of taking these men back and giving them remuneration equal to that which they were previously receiving, for that is what the Prime Minister implied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I say you did not do that, but that you should have done so. That is where you made your mistake. You either should have said: these men will not be re-employed; we cannot sanction the principle of re-employing men who go out on strike in a great public service like the postal service; or you should have said: there are circumstances which permit their re-employment. Then if you re-employed them you should have said: we will re-employ them on the basis of paying them for the actual services performed.

Mr. MANION: We did not need to take a hard and fast position. We can occasionally take the middle road, just as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister does frequently, and I am not criticising him for that. In 1920 the government of that day took what I consider was the middle of the road. Let me quote from the order in council, dated June 4 1920. It says in respect to taking on these men:

> In accordance with the understanding arrived at by the government, as embodied in a memorandum forwarded to the Civil Service Commission by Senator Robertson on the 7th January, 1920, ex-postal employees are to be considered eligible for appointment to positions in the civil service, subject to certain conditions therein mentioned.

Then on the other side is the memorandum giving the canditions. Again I will quote the pertinent clauses:

> The gravity of their offence against the state being now realized, the government has given consideration to the possibility of removing the bar to their application through the Civil Service Commission for re-employment in the public service, and His Excellency the Governor in Council is disposed to exercise clemency so far as reasonably consistent with necessary discipline.

Ex-postal employees may therefore be considered as eligible to be appointed to positions in the civil service for which they make application as vacancies occur, and to which, in the opinion of the commission, they are justly entitled under the regulations.

All right; they were appointed to the positions for which they made application. That is all the government of 1920 agreed to, to re-appoint them to the positions for which they made application. These men, I understand after listening to the debate, applied to be appointed as postal helpers.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the regulation they could not apply for anything else.

Mr. MANION: The agreement distinctly states that they would be appointed to the positions for which they made application.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend misses the significance of the words he has just read —"under the regulations." The regulations would not permit them to apply for any other position.

Mr. MANION: I cannot help that. They applied for the position of postal helper. The order in council with the memorandum attached says that they may be appointed as vacancies occur to positions to which in the opinion of the Civil Service Commission they are justly entitled under the regulations. The Civil Service Commission considered that they were entitled to be appointed as postal helpers, and they were appointed as such, and they received the pay of postal helpers. It is true that some of them—I would not say all of them—did work of a higher grade, just as in ordinary business, as the leader of the opposition has pointed out, you will find one out of three or four men in the same concern who is much more able and does much more work and better work than the others, although all are getting exactly the same pay. Some of these men, having had previous experience, may have done a better class of work.

So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we are ready to let bygones be bygones. We say that probably these men have received sufficient punishment, and that in the future we are willing that they should receive the wages attached to the positions for which they are certified.

The Prime Minister made another point. Reading from his own book he enunciated the axiom that men should get paid for the work they do. We all agree with that, but he was not dealing in his book just at that point with men who had gone on strike from a great public service. He was merely speaking in general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was dealing with the principles underlying industrial peace.

Mr. MANION: He was not dealing with men who had gone on strike from the public service. I do not know the context of the passage quoted, but at any rate it seems to me that the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house lives up entirely to the order in council of 1920, which was passed, as was expressly stated, as an act of clemency. We take the position now, that for the sake of national unity and harmony in this country in the future these men should receive the wages of the positions for which they are fitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say just a word about the order in council which my hon. friend has just read? I asked the hon. leader of the opposition this afternoon just where the authority came from to pass that particular order in council. We have heard a good deal in parliament this session about the powers given by parliament to the Civil Service Commission. The law governing employment in the civil service states that civil servants of the class we are considering, must receive their employment through the Civil Service Commission under the terms which the commission lays down. These men were not re-employed under the terms of the Civil Service Act. That was the first breach. If hon. gentlemen had been concerned about the observance and enforcement of the Civil Service Act and what it demanded of an administration, not one of these men could have been taken back under the terms of the order in council.

May I say further that the Civil Service Commission to-day or any other day would not think of bargaining with men to go into the public service and to accept work there on lower terms than the standards which govern in the particular classes of employment for which they were to be engaged. We might well realize at this time that what parliament is now passing upon is the principle of what men shall be paid for services rendered. Parliament was not passing on that particular principle when this order in council was passed. The government of the day was then laying down certain conditions with regard to re-employing certain public servants. My own view is that these men should never have been re-employed except by act of parliament; that proceeding under the War Measures Act and in disregard of the Civil Service Act was not a correct method of procedure but, certain former employees having been re-employed, parliament is now asked to say on what basis of remuneration they shall be paid. Shall they be paid a rate of remuneration in accordance with the services they have actually rendered, or shall there be some compromise in that particular? In the matter of remuneration I submit that parliament cannot take any other ground than that of paying men for the actual services they have rendered.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more the right hon. Prime Minister, I think, has either not wholly grasped the situation as it has been presented by the documents, or else he attributes a meaning to the order in council that I cannot read into it. The War Measures Act, I assumed—I said I was not certain—was the only authority for the order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is right.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Are the words "War Measures Act" contained in the order in council?

Mr. BENNETT: In answer to my hon. friend from Rimouski, I have looked at the order in council for the first time—it is handed to me by the hon. Postmaster General—and it does not indicate on the face of it anything with regard to the War Measures Act.

Mr. DUNNING: Does it indicate any parliamentary authority at all?

Mr. BENNETT: No. It is merely a report. I think I had better read it. This is the order in council:

> The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 31st May, 1920, from the Secretary of State, submitting that the Civil Service Commission has recently received applications for positions in the civil service from ex-postal employees who participated in the sympathetic strike in western Canada in the spring of 1919.
> In accordance with the understanding arrived at by the government, as embodied in a memorandum forwarded to the Civil Service Commission by Senator Robertson on the 7th January, 1920, ex-postal employees are to be considered eligible for appointment to positions in the civil service, subject to certain conditions therein mentioned.
> The ex-postal employees mentioned in the attached list have complied with the conditions of this memorandum.
> The minister, therefore, recommends that authority be granted for the appointment of these candidates to positions for which they are eligible.
>
> The committee advise that the requisite authority be granted accordingly.
>
> (Signed) Rodolphe Boudreau,
> Clerk of the Privy Council.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The memorandum my hon. friend from Fort William has just read. The Postmaster General read it this afternoon. But may I point out, I cannot think the right hon. Prime Minister intends to go as far as his observation would lead one to conclude. The state has never been able, nor has any private employer, ever been able to calculate—shall I say?—the kilowatts of work that the human machine can render in any particular place. I recall the general manager of one of the great banks of this country endeavoured to determine the capacity of each of the employees by fixing a standard that would be the measure of his work. If he exceeded that standard, then he was ranked accordingly; and if he fell below that standard he usually sought other employment. Now, we cannot do that with respect to each individual in the post office. That is clear is it not?

Mr. POWER: No, we actually do it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is done by the classification in the civil service.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the mass. That is just the point I am making. Being unable to determine what each individual may render in the way of quantum of work, we have endeavoured to classify civil servants, and the classification is arbitrary. For instance, the great railway corporations have schedules classifying their employees according to the work they do. Those schedules cover section foremen, machinists, engineers, firemen, conductors, brakemen, wipers, hostlers, and so on. In this case we are endeavouring to correct what the Prime Minister thinks is unfairness to a group of people by arbitrarily saying: We will pay them what they would have got if they had never quit. That is wherein I say this measure—

Mr. POWER: That is what the resolution says.

Mr. BENNETT: No doubt.

Mr. POWER: But that is not what the Prime Minister has said, or what the member from Quebec has said. That is another point.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not what the Prime Minister says at all. This resolution is the exact negation of what he says. This resolution arbitrarily says that John Smith, who in 1919 was classified as A 1 and getting $1,500 a year, and in 1925 was appointed to a position which carried with it only $1,000, can now draw at the rate of $1,500 a year from the date of appointment to his present position because when he was formerly in the service of the crown he got $1,500 a year.

That is the resolution if English means anything. I do submit that under these circumstances perhaps the end that we all have in our minds will be served if this committee rise and report progress on the resolution. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the Postmaster General take this course, so that the law officers may have an opportunity to look at the resolution and the bill to be founded on it. And, further, that the Postmaster General furnish us with a list of the employees, and the way in which they are being dealt with under the measure, so that we may be able to establish that the principle on which the government is proceeding is the principle which I have just mentioned. The principle of the measure is not what the Postmaster General now says; his figures are quite the opposite. They take an arbitrary sum that somebody received when he was dismissed, and they apply that to somebody's salary from the time that he was re-employed. It is not intended to do this at all, unless, as the Prime Minister says, Smith, we will say did that work; and there is no evidence that he did the work. As my hon. friend from Lunenberg has remarked, there should be a fact-finding commission. And that is where the principle is all wrong, because if you are going to apply it to these men you should apply it to any man who in the course of his employment is desirous of doing more work than his position calls for. No man ever got anywhere by looking at the clock and seeing how little he could do and retain his position. Men now are going to be penalized who have not done that, but have endeavoured to do something more than their duty called for. Under these circumstances I think the only way in which the committee can ever make real headway is to rise and report progress on the resolution and ask leave to sit again. This will afford the government an opportunity to look into the measure, especially having regard to the terms of the resolution and the bill to be founded on it, so we may at least know, without endeavouring to amend the bill, what we are voting about and what principle we are giving effect to by enacting the legislation.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house, but there seems to be a possibility of agreement in principle between those who sit on the other side of the house and those who sit on this side. The leader of the opposition referred to a memorandum by Senator Robertson, accepted by the government of the day and made the basis of the order in council which provided for the re-employment of these men. Now, that order in council set forth two conditions only, the first being that the approval of council must be given in the case of every man who was taken back into the service; the second being that satisfactory assurances must be given that there would be no repetition of the offence. Those are the only two conditions. Then there is a third proviso which waives the age limit. There were two other conditions that became attached to the re-employment of these men by reason of the state of the law as it existed then and as it exists now. These further conditions, which are not referred to anywhere in the memorandum or the order in council, are these; first, the ex-striker must pass the ordinary civil service examination; secondly, he can come in only at the foot of the service. These two latter conditions are attached to the re-employment by reason of the fact that the Civil Service Act in itself does not provide for a situation such as this.

The leader of the opposition stated, I think quite pertinently, that it was impossible to assess the value of the persons who are in the government service. Under the conditions that were laid down in 1920 it was not possible to give recognition to the principle which the Prime Minister has enunciated and which the leader of the opposition appears to accept, namely, that employees of the government should be paid according to the value of the services they have rendered.

Mr. ERNST: Were not these conditions punitive in their nature?

Mr. THORSON: No; the two latter conditions of which I speak followed as a natural consequence from the fact that there is no provision in the Civil Service Act for reinstatement even when an injustice has been done, or for the reemployment of a man who has left the service. I know of one case. It is known in the service here. A civil servant in Ottawa left a position in which he had attained a certain salary. He resigned in order to take a position with a firm in one of the larger cities. That firm failed. The man was desirous of returning to the position in the civil service from which he had resigned, and the authorities in the department under which he had served were desirous of obtaining his services again. Under the Civil Service Act however it was not possible for him to resume that position with the salary which he had formerly received. There were no other applicants for the position, yet he had to come in at the bottom of that particular classification. The Civil Service Act is defective in that it does not permit the application of the principle which the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition are both agreed upon, and therefore it is necessary to have amended legislation to do full justice in this case.

I quite agree that it is impossible to assess in terms of money with any degree of nicety or accuracy the value of human qualities. But we have one criterion to which we might quite easily appeal in this case. Take for instance the men who were taken back in 1920 and 1921. It is not a very difficult matter to assess these men according to the value of their services to the public: in 1919 when they were in the service we recognized the value of their services by paying them a certain sum of money. That was the standard we applied to all the employees of the Dominion government. Is it not a reasonable standard to apply in this case? Is it not reasonable therefore to say that in the great majority of these cases justice will be done if we say to these men: "We will pay you as from the date of your reemployment in the service the salary which you would have received had you been taken back into the service at the same salary you were receiving when you were dismissed." That is the value which the government itself placed on services of these men prior to their dismissal, and that is the standard of value that can be applied to these men now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has made a suggestion which, in the light of the discussion up to the present moment, is one which the committee might well consider. Before, however, the Postmaster General moves that the committee rise and report progress, I want to make tolerably sure that we are in agreement on an essential point. I have said that so far as the government are concerned our view is that any payment to be made under the bill to be brought in must be payment for services actually rendered. That is the essence of the position we take, and it is, I understand, on that point that my hon. friend opposite has taken exception to the resolution as drafted. When the committee resumes, the resolution will have to be amended in accordance with the line I have indicated, and I should like to ask my hon. friend whether some such amendment as the one I shall now suggest would meet the situation so far as his point is concerned. Of course, I realize that hon. gentlemen opposite may be opposed to the resolution generally.

Mr. BENNETT: To the retroactive feature.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the other hand, there is less liability of a difference between us if we confine the resolution to payment for services actually rendered and in accordance with what would be the recognized rate of payment for those services were there no other consideration, apart from the services themselves, to be taken into account. The resolution, then, will be somewhat to this effect:

> That it is expedient to provide for the readjustment of the salaries of certain postal employees in western Canada who were dismissed in 1919 and subsequently reemployed, to give them—

And these or similar words will be inserted:

> —in so far as the services performed by them will justify—

And then the words which follow in the resolution:

> —the benefit of salary they would have received had they reentered the service in the class equivalent to the one they were in when dismissed, and of subsequent salary revisions.

Mr. BENNETT: Without discussing the question of difference between us with respect to retroactive legislation of this kind, I may observe that if the right hon. gentleman proposes to give effect to the contentions as he has submitted them to the committee, I think that language somewhat similar to that which he has read will entirely serve the purpose. But there is one difficulty which must be present in the right hon. gentleman's mind: How is that to be ascertained?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall have to satisfy the committee on that point.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman sees the difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to be tedious, but I should like to point this out. When the applicant for the position went to work he obviously must have worked in that position which was awarded to him. It becomes then a question of determining how long at what pay, and so forth. When you begin to discuss that phase of the question you are met with this further difficulty: that at the end of each year recommendations were made as to the meritorious services of each employee, and when that recommendation was made the officer making it obviously considered the character of the work done and took into consideration the fact that the employee had done work which was beyond the narrow confines of the precise position to which he had been appointed. Therefore to the extent to which his meritorious services warranted an increase he has already had it by recommendations made from year to year. That is a factor that must be kept in mind in dealing with this matter, and it is because of its complexity in that regard that I have asked the minister to furnish us with particulars. Perhaps the minister in the interim will give us the schedule, adding thereto something which does not now appear in it, namely, the salaries individuals are now receiving.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not on this list but we have the information.

Mr. McGIBBON: I presume it is a fact that these men after they re-entered the service got promotion.

Mr. VENIOT: Some did; we have a record of all.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many steps of promotion would there be?

Mr. VENIOT: Offhand I could not say, but the records of examinations, promotions and so forth are available. They are at Winnipeg and a good many of them are here in our office and we can get the information.

Mr. McGIBBON: It seems to me that an interminable task lies ahead of the minister. A man is re-employed and works probably at the lowest grade; then he is promoted after a certain length of service, probably receiving a second or a third promotion. When you compare that with what he would have done if he had not left the service, how are you to determine the steps of promotion he might have climebd had there not been a strike? It seems to me absolutely impossible.

Mr. VENIOT: It can be worked out. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How many returned soldiers were reinstated?

Mr. VENIOT: Twenty-one.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 131, page 36. When we were last considering this resolution we had passed an amount of $6,000 for South Bay, Ingonish.

Public Works—harbours and rivers, Nova Scotia—Sydney—wharf, $16,500.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Is this the final payment to complete this wharf?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): It is proposed to sheet pipe the south wall for a distance of ninety feet, place about 4,000 tons of filling and construct a warehouse 40 feet wide and 150 feet long. The work is to be done by day labour.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Is the other contract completed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is now being completed.

Item agreed to.

West Green Harbour—wharf, $1,100.

Mr. CANTLEY: What provision is being made for repairs to the wharf at Trenton?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is nothing in these estimates providing for Trenton.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the minister will remember that matter being brought to his attention both last year and the year before. The situation at this point is serious; no repairs at all have been made to the wharf for a number of years, and I submit that it is most unfair that no work has been done as far as the East river is concerned either at New Glasgow, Abercrombie or Trenton. The situation there is intolerable; public property is being destroyed simply because the government will not make the absolutely necessary repairs.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What my hon. friend has said with regard to this matter having been brought to the attention of the department is quite correct, and it is also correct that nothing appears in the estimates for this work, but the matter is receiving consideration. At the moment neither myself nor my deputy can recall the amount of money necessary to repair this wharf. If the amount required is not over $1,000, of course the work can be done under the general vote if it is one of the very urgent cases, but I am rather under the impression that more than that amount will be required.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am quite aware that there is nothing in the estimates for this work, and I am bringing up the matter now in order that the minister may make provision for these repairs in the supplementary estimates. I can tell him that $1,000 will not provide for this work, but I think $5,000 would cover it, and I do submit that at least that amount should be provided in the supplementary estimates and expended in order to save this property from ruin and in order to make it available to the large number of people living in that locality. There are from 4,000 to 5,000 people in that vicinity, all of whom find use for that wharf at different seasons of the year.

Item agreed to.

Yarmouth Harbour—dredging, $25,100.

Mr. SHORT: As this is the last item in this list I have a few words to say in connection with the unfair distribution of the $750,000 which is to be spent on harbours and rivers in Nova Scotia. I find of that amount about $150,000 is to be expended in the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, which adjoins my own constituency. I have no fault to find with that; I am glad he has obtained that amount of money, but I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that he has shown great partiality. My constituency contains more breakwaters than does the constituency of the minister, but the appropriation for the constituency of Digby-Annapolis is only $47,500 as compared with the $150,000 for the constituency of Yarmouth-Shelburne. I want to ask the minister if he thinks that is a fair distribution of the public moneys of this country. Are not the people in my constituency just as much entitled to receive appropriations in order to put their breakwaters and harbours into a condition which will permit them to earn their living as the people in the constituency of my hon. friend? He cannot go on doing business in this way and expect the people to be satisfied and not criticize the estimates.

I want to point out further that of this amount of $47,500, $33,000 is devoted to the Digby pier. This is not an appropriation for the benefit of the people in the community; it is for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they are paying the government 7 per cent.

Last year I brought to the attention of the minister a very much needed extension which was required to the breakwater at Westport, Nova Scotia, one of the largest fishing centres we have in the bay of Fundy. This place has more fishermen and produces more fish than does the village of Port Maitland, for which $50,000 was appropriated and another $50,000 is being asked for this year. I want to ask the minister if he thinks that is either fair or just to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, especially in view of what the government say they are trying to do for the fishing industry of the maritime provinces. They are spending a large portion of the public moneys in the constituencies represented by the hon. Minister of National Defence and the member for Antigonish-Guysborough. As I said before, the constituency of Digby-Annapolis is just as important a fishing constituency as is Shelburne-Yarmouth or Antigonish-Guysborough, but the government are neglecting the public works there to the great disadvantage of the district. I wanted to call this matter to the attention of the minister before the item passed, and I hope he will see his way clear to put a sufficient amount in the supplementary estimates to cover the extension of the breakwater at Westport and the necessary dredging and repairs required for the other breakwaters in my constituency.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will say to my hon. friend that I recall the plea he made a year ago on behalf of these various places, but I must say that I thought I was doing very well to obtain from the men from whom I have to get this money the amount of $47,000 for the hon. member's riding.

Mr. SHORT: You are getting a return on $33,000 of that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope these are all good investments.

Mr. SHORT: The government is getting that directly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the intention with which it is made. I am not quarrelling with my hon. friend when he says that there are a number of places in his riding which require further improvement, but if he makes as much progress within the next year as he has in the last I do not think he will have any complaints to offer next session.

Mr. SHORT: I will not be satisfied at all unless I can make a good deal more progress than I have made in the last year or two. There are only a very few of the numerous breakwaters in my constituency which you have looked after, and many of these are in urgent need of repair at the present moment. It would be a good investment on the part of the Minister of Public Works and would conduce to the welfare of the people of this country to keep these breakwaters in better repair, because if you do not do it this year it will have to be done at perhaps double the cost next year.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I would like to ask the hon. minister why he earmarks an item of $3,000 for breakwater repairs at Yarmouth bar and an item of $25,100 for dredging at Yarmouth harbour and does not include them in the vote which covers general dredging.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member will notice that they are quite considerable sums and I think we would have met with objections from my hon. friends if we took to ourselves the right to apportion such large amounts without having given the house an opportunity of considering them.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one observation I would like to make without further trespassing upon the time of the committee. During quite a storm last summer I drove up along the coast in the county which the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis represents. I saw a large number of these breakwaters to which he has referred, and the small fishing vessels were seeking shelter behind them. The very word "breakwater" implies the reason for their being constructed, and some of them were certainly in ill repair. It occurs to me that if we are going to protect the lives of the fishermen and expand the export business in fish—we are endeavouring to do that because if I recall correctly the exports last year were something like $34,000,000—we can only do it by keeping these breakwaters in repair. It would not take a very large sum of money to keep them in reasonable repair, and that should be done for the two reasons. The first reason is the preservation of the lives of the men who go down to the sea for the purpose of engaging in the fishing business, and the second is that they may be able to carry on their vocation under as favourable conditions as possible and thereby expand our business and carry the fish of Canada into the markets of the world. If the engineers of the department will look into this matter I am quite satisfied that they will report that many of these breakwaters should be repaired. This is a matter which should be beyond the reach of patronage; it is not a matter which the minister can deal with himself because he has to listen to what is presented to him by the ministers from the provinces and dispose of the money he is granted to the best advantage, but for the reasons I have given, I suggest that this should be beyond patronage. It is a question of life, and as far as possible the matter of safety and endeavour should be looked after by the government regardless of any other consideration. I thought I would mention this matter in view of what I saw with my own eyes last summer as I drove up along the Digby shore.

Mr. RALSTON: Following the argument of the hon. leader of the opposition, I know the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis will agree with me that the very purpose of the Port Maitland work was the purpose referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition. The hon. member knows that the Port Maitland breakwater constitutes practically the only safe shelter from Yarmouth up to St. Mary's bay on a very open coast where there is a great deal of fishing. When the men return to shore they meet with a difficult situation unless they have some sort of shelter, and that is why that work is being conducted. I know it has been a long time in process, as the first length of it was done two years ago and the contract for another length was let only last fall. It is just for the reason the leader of the opposition has mentioned that that has been done. I suppose everybody appreciates receiving credit for what he gets in his constituency; but if my hon. friend will look up the amount which goes to Shelburne-Yarmouth, he will find that there is a revote from last year of $67,000, money that was not spent, and the other votes are small. I only wish they were bigger. My hon. friend knows that the county of Shelburne-Yarmouth is a shore county going right around the whole nose of Nova Scotia from Port Maitland to Sable River. There are breakwaters and wharves and there is need for many more. These things can be done only gradually, and my hon. friend knows the pressure that is brought to bear in connection with them. I am endeavouring to serve my county as best I can, and I am only sorry I cannot get more.

Mr. SHORT: I have no fault to find with the hon. gentleman for getting this amount for his constituency; indeed I congratulate him on getting it. I have no fault to find with the government in that regard. I believe the breakwater at Port Maitland will be of great benefit to the whole St. Mary's bay. What I am pointing out is that the minister has given my constituency very little, although the need is very great.

Mr. RALSTON: I suppose some of it was taken to give to the constituency of my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg, who has an appropriation of $30,000 for dredging in Liverpool, and to the constituency of my hon. friend from Richmond-West Cape Breton, who has an appropriation of $75,000 at Fourchu.

Mr. SHORT: The Minister of National Defence says that $67,000 of his appropriation of $150,000 is a revote. I may say that $33,000 of my appropriation of $47,000 is a revote, so that I can go him one better and a good deal more.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): I wish to urge upon the minister the necessity of keeping these breakwaters in repair. There is in my constituency a breakwater at Port Morien that has been allowed to fall into disrepair. About two hundred feet on the inside of the breakwater has been allowed to collapse. I have called the attention of the minister to that, but nothing has been done. Will he make a note of it and have the engineers look it up for next year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have made a note of it and it will be looked up for next year, but I hope my hon. friends will bear in mind that the disrepair about which they complain—I think the leader of the opposition referred to the matter as allowing these wharves to get out of repair—is the result of several years. We are gradually getting back into repair those that got out of repair during the years of the war. We are, I think, making fair progress along that line with the amount of money that is being spent. I am sure nobody is complaining that any money is being spent that should not be spent. The only complaint is that there are many other places—and I quite agree with that—where there is need of further repairs. We are doing these repairs gradually and I hope my hon. friends will feel that a fair attempt is being made to meet the most urgent cases.

Mr. CANTLEY: What has been done in connection with the wharf at Pictou Landing? There is nothing for it in the estimates this year. I think there was something in the supplementary estimates of last year, and I believe some work was done. But I should like to know what it was and who did it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is nothing in these estimates specially for Pictou Landing. My hon. friend knows that we are repairing the railway wharf at Pictou. The matter to which he refers is one for future consideration.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not referring to the railway wharf at Pictou; I am talking about the wharf at Pictou Landing, for which a small amount was, I think, included in the supplementary estimates of last year, and some work was done. I should like to know how much work was done, by whom it was done and on whose recommendation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. CANTLEY: When.

[Mr. Short.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Right away.

Mr. CANTLEY: Does the minister mean to-night?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think my hon. friend will expect me to do that to-night.

Mr. CANTLEY: I will now refer the minister to another question which I asked the other evening in reference to Mr. McColl. I I think the minister will recall that he promised to give me some information on that subject. Mr. McColl appears to direct the work of the minister's department in Pictou county. He recommended a man who proved unsatisfactory and whom the resident engineer dismissed. He was then allowed to recommend a successor. Apparently the work carried on in the county of Pictou to-day by the Public Works department is done on the suggestion of Mr. McColl. Now Mr. McColl is not the defeated candidate; he never was a candidate for the federal house, and I should like to know what his influence with the minister is based on, and why orders from him are taken by the minister or his officials in the department or his officials in the county. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to give me that information now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I said to my hon. friend the other night when this matter was under discussion that I did not particularly remember Mr. McColl, whether I had ever seen him or not. The name is familiar. I was under the impression, I think I told my hon. friend, that Mr. McColl had been the defeated Liberal candidate. That is all I can say about him. The engineer apparently makes the recommendations as to the work he thinks should be done in the various sections that come under his jurisdiction. Mr. McColl has been consulted, I have no doubt, but I have no personal knowledge of him.

Mr. CANTLEY: When this matter was up before, I asked the information of the minister, and I understood him to say—and I do not think on reflection he will deny it—that he promised to look the matter up and give me the information. Apparently he has not done so, and is not in a position to give me the information now. It is of some importance to me and more so to the people of the county of Pictou. I have not said much by way of criticism of Mr. McColl personally, and I am not going to do so now. The defeated candidate has not interfered, but Mr. McColl has interfered and not to the advantage of the Public Works department or of the work being carried on by the department in the county of Pictou. I should like to know why it is that he directs and has directed the work there. There must be some reason and I submit the minister should be able to give it to me.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sorry that I cannot say anything more in regard to the reason why Mr. McColl was consulted. He is evidently a man whose judgment is regarded highly by the officials of the department and by the local engineer. I cannot say anything personally further than that. I hope my hon. friend does not think I am holding back any information which I promised to give. I had at least half a dozen requests for information with regard to Port Maitland and other places, and I thought I had given, just as promptly as it could be obtained, all the information that I promised the other night to give. I looked into the question of the contract referred to by my hon. friend where apparently the foreman had not turned out satisfactorily, and the very fact that he was discharged as soon as he was found not to be doing his job well is the best evidence that he did not have any particular pull with the department. Another man was put on the job, and I do not think my hon. friend will complain that the work was not well done eventually and that the new foreman did not efficiently perform his duties.

Mr. CANTLEY: Let us try to clear this matter up. The fact is that Mr. McColl recommended a Mr. McLean for the job at Bailey's Brook, and upon his recommendation Mr. McLean was appointed by the resident engineer at Halifax, Mr. Locke. The engineer who visited the work while it was in progress reported that it was the worst piece of work he had ever seen done. Mr. Locke also called attention to an inaccuracy in his accounts, that he had put in time for work that was not done, and the outcome was that he was dismissed. Now this man was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. McColl, and his successor was also appointed upon the recommendation of the same Mr. McColl, notwithstanding that the first man he had recommended had been dismissed for cause. I find that in regard to the work on the Pictou wharves, he recommended that it should be done by day labour and not by contract, and that was done, now I admitted the other day when this matter was up that I thought the minister was perhaps justified in that case. So far as the work at Pictou landing is concerned, Mr. McColl interfered there as well. I asked the minister some time ago to give me the information, but I have not got it yet. I absolve the minister for not supplying me with the information in regard to Mr. McColl, because I do not think that he failed intentionally; I think he simply forgot in the press of other matters. The matter, however, was discussed fairly fully the other evening, and I hope I am impressing on the minister sufficiently now the fact that I do want the information in regard to Mr. McColl, and I trust that he will not forget it, and that before the week is out he will be good enough to give me the information for which I am asking.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no knowledge of any information in the department regarding Mr. McColl further than I have given, but I shall make inquiries, and if there is anything available which will be of interest to my hon. friend I shall be glad to give it to him, but of course I cannot give him something that I have not got.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister said the other evening that he had not the information, and I accepted his word, but I think he undertook to get me the information.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think Hansard will bear me out when I say that I furnished all the information I undertook to furnish.

Mr. CANTLEY: We will waive that. I submit that the matter is of importance to the minister, or ought to be, because this man's recommendation had led the department into error, and has resulted in a disgraceful job and in the expenditure of money in a way in which it should not have been expended. These are or should be matters of concern to the minister, and I think it would be well worth his while making the fullest inquiry in regard to the matter to which I am now referring. I will expect him after inquiry to give me the information and let me know why this man has had, and has to-day, control of the expenditure of public works money in the county of Pictou.

Mr. SHORT: I would ask if the minister has yet made up his mind with reference to giving instructions for much needed dredging in Digby harbour. When I asked the minister the other evening whether he had received an application for dredging in Digby harbour, he was not sure whether he had or not. Since then I have been given to understand that application has been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which operates a line of steamers from St. John to Digby, and which is now building a very much larger steamer for that route. I understand from the files that the Canadian Pacific have already drawn the department's attention to the necessity of doing some dredging for the accommodation of the boat that is used on that route at present. I would impress on the minister that in order to prepare for the increased traffic that is coming across the bay of Fundy between St. John and Digby, especially with the building of this very much larger steamer, it is absolutely necessary that a large amount of dredging be done in Digby harbour. Will an amount be placed in the supplementary estimates for that purpose, or will the work be done out of the $600,000 vote in the main estimates for dredging generally? I would also ask if the work will be done this summer.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend all the information I have. There has been some correspondence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but my recollection is that there has been nothing definite since they have decided upon their new boat. So far as my information goes, they have not taken up with the department the amount of dredging that will be necessary to accommodate the new boat. I do not think they have themselves very definitely settled just what that boat is to be.

Mr. SHORT: They have definitely settled that it will be 340 feet long. The boat at present in the service is about 200 feet long, so the minister can readily understand that the channel at low water must be considerably enlarged to accommodate a boat that is 140 feet longer.

Mr ELLIOTT: That may be. I think, however, it is only fair to say to my hon. friend there is nothing in the general vote for harbours and rivers noted for that particular work. The request for the work not having reached the department, my hon. friend will quite understand that the examination necessary has not been made, and I can say nothing now as to what may be in the supplementary estimates. The matter, however, will receive every consideration.

Mr. SHORT: A request has been made by the Canadian Pacific for dredging to accommodate the boat that is now running on that service. Will that work be done this summer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand that the requirements of the present boat of which we have been notified, can be taken care of out of the general vote, but the dredging that will be necessary for a boat 340 feet long would require a further vote. That is my information.

[Mr. Short.]

Mr. SHORT: Will the minister provide that in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the first place, I cannot say how much the amount would be, and in the second place, I cannot say whether on our information I shall be able to recommend the expenditure. Even then it is impossible for me to say whether I could get what I recommend through the treasury board and council, but I will give the matter the best consideration I can.

Mr. SHORT: A large amount is being provided in the estimates for other places in Nova Scotia. I see there is $25,000 for Yarmouth, $30,000 for Liverpool, and the county of Antigonish-Guysborough gets quite a number of appropriations. We have at Digby, one of the most valuable harbours and piers in Nova Scotia, but no dredging has been done therefor the last eight or ten years. It is absolutely necessary that the harbour should be looked after. I have no doubt that $25,000 is urgently needed at Yarmouth, but we also urgently need dredging at Digby, and I think it is the minister's duty to see that these public works which are owned by the government and which bring in a good revenue to the country are looked after, so that the steamers on the service can dock at these wharves. If the minister will give me his assurance that the necessary dredging will be done there I shall be glad.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know that my hon. friend will not press me further for an assurance, because that is something that I cannot give him. But I do know that Digby is one of the places that is entitled to great consideration, and the best endeavours possible will be made to do whatever is necssary. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. SHORT: I am very glad to get that statement from the minister, and I have no doubt if he will use the same words in council he will have no trouble in getting a sufficient amount placed in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid my hon. friend has never had to appear before council for the purpose or he would appreciate the difficulty.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): In looking over the public works estimates for various constituencies in Nova Scotia I find that the constituency of Halifax, which has about 140 miles of Atlantic coast, with a large number of harbours, necessitating a great many breakwaters as a protection for fishermen's boats, has allotted to it the large sum of $13,600. Of that amount something over $5,000 is voted for private property, that is at Lawlor's Island —a quarantine station and a wharf. Those works are absolutely not in the public interest, but are part and parcel of the equipment of that institution. Deducting the $5,000 from the $13,600, we have a balance of less than $9,000 to take care of the breakwaters on 140 miles of Atlantic coast. I was pleased indeed to hear the minister say that he is rapidly overtaking the repairs necessary to the breakwaters along the Nova Scotia coast. I would suggest to him, and I hope the suggestion may be adopted, that in the supplementary estimates he endeavour to provide a few thousand dollars for the necessary repairs to the breakwaters in the constituency of Halifax; and if he cannot do so, that in the coming year he will allot a substantial amount for the purpose. The repairs are sadly needed and should be attended to. This I think is only fair when one considers that even my friend from Digby-Annapolis has $50,000 for his constituency as against less than $9,000 for the county of Halifax, to say nothing of the very large amounts that have been provided for the constituencies of my friend from Antigonish-Guysborough and the Minister of National Defence. It is not fair to set aside only $9,000 for public works in the county of Halifax.

Mr. CANTLEY: Could the minister let me know how much money was expended on Pictou Landing wharf last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not the information here. Unless there is an amount in the estimates we do not have any information ready to hand. It seems to be about all we can do to have a reasonable amount of information available on each of the many hundred items contained in the estimates. I shall be glad to look into the matter and let my hon. friend have the information.

Mr. CANTLEY: I assumed the minister had the information because I think some money was spent there. When may I expect to get that information?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I can give it to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Item agreed to.

Port Maitland—breakwater extension, $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN: This amount was allowed to stand.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I was to furnish some particulars to my hon. friend, which I did the day after the item was under consideration.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick—harbours and rivers—Anderson's Hollow (Waterside)—breakwater repairs, $5,000.

Mr. BELL (St. John): Will the minister let us have particulars of this amount?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is asked to be provided to repair the outer end of the breakwater and partly to reconstruct the approach to same. The ultimate scheme, which would consist of completely rebuilding and repairing the destroyed sections of the breakwater, is estimated to cost $15,000. The district engineer reports that with an expenditure of $5,000 the immediately necessary work can be performed.

Item agreed to.

Beaver Harbour—wharf reconstruction, $15,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: Would the minister kindly give information in regard to this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $15,000 is asked to be provided towards the reconstruction of the wharf, which is reported to be in an unsafe condition, owing to the action of the limnoria and general decayed condition of the structure. The proposed work is asked for by the district engineer who reports that during 1928 the business transacted over the wharf amounted to $130,000. The fishing trade was valued at $78,000, and imports received for the four stores amounted to $50,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: In looking over the estimates for the province of New Brunswick I am pleased to note that the county I have the honour to represent is not wholly overlooked. During the past seven sessions I have brought to the attention of the minister the necessity for making the extension to the breakwater at Seal Cove and Woodward's Cove, Grand Manan, and also an extension to the wharf at Beaver Harbour. I am very glad that the minister at last has recognized the great need for these works, and has placed an amount in the estmiates to carry to completion the extension to the breakwater that was started many years ago in the interests of the fishing industry. I am also very glad that there is an amount for the dredging and the breakwater at White Head. I wish to assure the minister that it will be appreciated by the people of that little island out in the bay of Fundy. But I desire to call the attention of the minister to one portion of the island of Grand Manan that has been overlooked and neglected for many years, more particularly since 1921. This is the most exposed place of the island of Grand Manan, which without doubt is in the most exposed position along the whole of the bay of Fundy. I refer to the village of Castalia. During the election campaign of 1921, and again in 1925 and 1926, it was definitely promised by the Liberal candidates and by those who were working in the interests of the Liberal party, that if this government were returned to power a breakwater would be constructed of the village of Castalia. It is needless for me to tell the minister that the people loyally carried out their program and have been waiting patiently for the government to implement that promise. I wish to say to the minister that no portion of Grand Manan should receive greater consideration at the hands of this administration than the village to which I have referred, in view of the support the people have given them. The village of Castalia was at one time a prosperous fishing community, but like many other places along the coast it has suffered from the tides and winds of the bay of Fundy and from the waves beating on the shore, so that the waterfront and buildings have been destroyed. There is no protection whatever. And in the event of storms the fishermen have to moor their boats two miles from home which entails another hardship. Under such conditions it is impossible to get young men to remain in the place and carry on their vocation. The older men are compelled to stay, but many of the young men have left and gone to the United States where they are following their occupation under more favourable conditions. It is generally believed by the people of Castalia that if some consideration were given them by the government many of these young men who have left would return and take up their occupation, while those who are there at the present time would have some inducement to remain. By the expenditure of a small amount of money we may retain the young men in the fishing industry in Castalia and bring back many of those that have left, and this is surely a proposition which the government ought to take seriously into consideration. In my opinion it is a good immigration policy which should be adopted by the government. A few moments ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that we were anxious to claim credit for anything that was obtained for the county. Let me assure the hon. gentleman that if the government will build this breakwater which was promised the people of Castalia I am prepared to give them all the credit, because it is a necessity and is in the interests of the fishing business.

I regret to see that there is nothing in the supplementary estimates for the island of Campobello or Deer island in Passamaquoddy bay. The population of each of these islands depends upon the fishing industry and I submit that they should receive as much consideration as other fishing centres. The government have at the present time a report from the engineers in their department who have recommended that a wharf be built below Welchpool on the island of Campobello. One of the government supporters from that district was here a short time ago and interviewed the minister and went home with a favourable impression, and I do hope that when the supplementary estimates come down he will not be disappointed. The wharf at Stewarttown is one that should be provided in the interests of the fishing industry of that place. In these two places, Welchpool and Stewarttown, the people are carrying on the fishing industry just as they did fifty years ago. There are no facilities for them to unload or load their boats and they are bound to follow the old fashioned method of anchoring their boats to keep them afloat and then wading ashore. Now you cannot expect young men to remain in the place if they are obliged to work under such conditions, and I strongly urge the minister, therefore, to bring down in his supplementary estimates provision for the breakwater at Castalia, for the wharf below Welchpool and for the wharf at Stewarttown, all of which are small undertakings. If he does so he will find a more contented people in that fishing centre. The fishermen as a class should receive every consideration at the hands of the government and we should do everything in our power to help the industry. I notice in the reports of the fisheries department that in our county alone last year there was a decrease in the fishing business of $430,000; and taking the whole province of New Brunswick the record is a million dollars less than it was in 1926. It is incumbent upon the government to give this matter the most serious consideration, because fishing is one of the largest industries in the county. I cannot over-emphasize the fact that if you want to keep young men at work in that industry, if you want to prevent the place from deteriorating at the rate it has done in the last year or two, it is absolutely necessary to carry out these undertakings. I have urged upon the minister building wharves and breakwaters and making extensions wherever necessary. If this is done we shall serve the interests not only of the people of the county but of the province of New Brunswick.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is the wharf at Digdeguash basin. That wharf will be greatly appreciated by the people of that district who have many dealings with the residents of the islands. I wish to impress upon the minister, before I conclude, the importance of keeping in mind the wharves I have mentioned. I trust that when he brings down his supplementary estimates they will contain an amount to cover these various items. He must not lose sight of the importance of the breakwater at Castalia, where nature has formed a splendid foundation of solid rock in the most suitable place along the shore. All that is necessary now is for the government to carry the work to completion. If they will do so they will implement the promises they made in 1921 and 1926 and it will mean a great deal to the fishing industry of that locality.

Item agreed to.

Blue Cove—breakwater, $1,100.

Mr. GRIMMER: Where is Blue Cove?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Blue Cove is in the county of Gloucester. This amount is required to complete payments for work performed under contract with Mr. Charles L. Comeau of Caraquet, New Brunswick.

Item agreed to.

Black's harbour—wharf extension, $5,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: That wharf is owned by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; I do not think there is any doubt about that. The original wharf, consisting of a pile work structure 106 feet long by 20 feet wide, was built by the provincial government and transferred to the federal government by order in council dated May 25, 1917.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is a public wharf.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Brantville—wharf, $11,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Where is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is situated on the gulf of St. Lawrence near the northeast extremity of Miramichi bay and about six miles northeast of Tabusintac. It is in the constituency of Northumberland. I am not as familiar with the geography of that province as I hope to be.

Item agreed to.

Burnt Church—wharf repairs, $5,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: In what part of the province is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In Northumberland.

Item agreed to.

Cape Bald—breakwater repairs, $5,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Where is Cape Bald?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in the county of Westmorland.

Item agreed to.

Cape Bald—breakwater extension and dredging, $10,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: One item provides for breakwater repairs and the other for a breakwater extension. Is that the same breakwater?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Dipper Harbour—breakwater repairs, $5,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Might we have the details of the repairs at Dipper Harbour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to provide for general repairs to the breakwater in order to maintain it in serviceable condition. The proposed work is asked for by the district engineer, who reports that the annual business transacted over the breakwater is estimated at $75,000, and the fishing trade is valued at $50,000 yearly. There are 26 motor boats and a number of smaller boats operating there.

Item agreed to.

Eel River Bridge—wharf, to complete, $1,500.

Mr. GRIMMER: In what county is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is in Northumberland county.

Item agreed to.

Escuminac—breakwater extension, $40,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will this amount complete the work at Escuminac?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that the votes in those portions of the province lying along the north shore, so-called, are in those constituencies represented in this house by hon. gentlemen opposite. Perhaps the minister would tell me whether that is an accident or a coincidence. At all events it is a fact that the votes for the northern section of this province are pretty well concentrated in those constituencies represented by members who support the government. If the minister looks over the list he will find that undoubtedly that is the case.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will just call my hon. friend's attention to two or three others which occur to me.

Mr. MacLAREN: Of course there are always exceptions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In his own riding there is Anderson's Hollow, Dipper Harbour—

Mr. MacLAREN: That is all, I think.

Mr. ELLIOTT: St. John river was marked here as being in that riding also.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is not in my riding.

Item agreed to.

Grande Anse—extension to breakwater and pier, $12,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: In what county is that?

Mr. VENIOT: It is in Gloucester county.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $60,000.

Mr. BELL (St. John): I would like the minister to give us the details in connection with this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to make provision for repairs and improvements to harbour and river works under the control of the department in New Brunswick which are reported by the district engineer to involve an estimated expenditure of less than $1,000, and for similar works which must be attended to immediately as necessity arises therefore. This also takes care of the expenses of the district engineer's office, and so on, for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. BELL (St. John): I would like to ask whether included in the estimates of the resident engineer there is any provision for repairs to the wharf at Chance Harbour. I had the opportunity of inspecting that wharf and I found it very badly in need of covering, and some of the side timbers also need replacement. That work would seem absolutely necessary in order to preserve the wharf in good condition, and I think it could be made good for a considerable time by a very small expenditure. Otherwise the heavy seas which come in there at various seasons of the year are likely to wreck great havoc with the structure as it now exists. I was wondering if this item of $60,000 included any provision for repairs to that wharf.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I can say to my hon. friend is that this item is to cover urgent requirements which, as a general rule, do not cost more than $1,000. It is possible that the work to which he refers may be included in this amount.

Item agreed to.

Lameque—wharf extension, $59,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: This is a large item, and perhaps we might have some explanation. In what county is it?

Mr. VENIOT: It is in Gloucester county, and corresponds roughly to the vote of $60,000 in my hon. friend's constituency. He did not raise any fuss about that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to provide for work now under contract. There is a revote of $20,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: We are back to the north shore again. Perhaps I might take this opportunity to direct the attention of the minister once more to Lorneville, which does not figure in the estimates this year. Lorneville is a very prosperous village of fishermen. It is an important fishing centre; it has valuable salmon and lobster fisheries. Last year the minister almost accomplished something, a thing which his predecessors had failed to do, although urged repeatedly to meet the necessities of the case. He put in sufficient vote to do the work, but it has been imperfectly and unsatisfactorily carried out. I believe there was something like $15,000 voted for dredging and if that amount had been expended I think it would have been sufficient to accomplish the desired results. But, as I have told the minister, and as my colleague has told him, the result has been that there are two faults: the boats cannot lie near enough to the pier because the dredging does not extend that far, and secondly, there are large hillocks and if the vessels should rest upon these when anchored at low tide it may be dangerous for them. Has the minister the engineer's report on these conditions?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not that report with me. I believe between $7,000 and $8,000 was spent last year, but I do not recall the engineer's report on this particular work.

Mr. MacLAREN: Could we have it tomorrow?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the minister would read the report of the engineer to-morrow I think it would bear out what I am stating. My argument is based on the statements of the fishermen who live there, whose lives are spent largely on the water. They are a fine lot of people and I accept what they say as being correct. It is a great pity to spoil this work when the expenditure of a few more dollars would complete it. The dredging could be evened on the bottom and also extended so as to permit the vessels to lie in close to the breakwater or the pier.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to look into the engineer's report.

Mr. MacLAREN: And we may have it to-morrow? If the minister would do this he would make the people very happy. They were quite excited when they heard that the minister was going to do this work but when they saw the result there was a great reaction. I would like to have that feeling removed, and it would be removed if the work were completed.

Item agreed to.

St. John river—improvements, $2,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: That seems to be a very small amount for improvements on the St. John river.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the Hudson of Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: There are many wharves upon this river and many boats passing up and down all the time; what is intended to be done with the $2,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To provide for the removal of boulders and ledges in the St. John river, chiefly in the eight mile section between Perth and Baker's Ferry, Victoria county.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is a long way up.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is where the repairs are needed.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot claim that to be near my constituency.

Item agreed to.

St. Stephen—wharf repairs, $4,500.

Mr. GRIMMER: Is this to be done by day labour or by contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is intended to be done by day labour.

Mr. GRIMMER: I think it would be wise for the department to look into the matter of day labour in repairing the wharf; I think money could be saved.

Item agreed to.

Seal Cove—breakwater extension, $18,000.

Mr. GRIMMER: Will that be by contract or by day labour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That will be by contract.

Item agreed to.

Stonehaven—breakwater repairs, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not a closed port now? Have they not stopped doing business at Stonehaven?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is for general repairs to the main breakwater which has been damaged by storms and ice. The proposed work is asked for by the district engineer who reports that the breakwater at Stonehaven provides the only protected harbour for schooners and fishing vessels between Caraquet and Bathurst, a distance of forty miles.

Item agreed to.

Tabucintac—wharf extension—$3,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think it might be well to leave a few items so that we can take up the matter of Lorneville to-morrow.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that Lorneville is not on the list.

Mr. MacLAREN: I want to get it on the list.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to supply my hon. friend with the information regarding that place.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is the general dredging vote for about $600,000, and if the minister would agree that, say, $5,000 or $6,000 would be set aside for Lorneville, that would be quite satisfactory.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will look into the matter and do the best I can.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 7, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Seventh report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) presented the third report of the select standing committee on public accounts, requesting that the committee be given leave to sit while the house is in session.

He said: With the unanimous consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I move that the report just presented be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 211, for the relief of Charles Storey.—Mr. Geary (for Mr. Lennox).

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if in the near future he can table the report of the engineers who made various surveys last year of the passes between the Peace River country and the Pacific coast; also the correspondence between the government and the Canadian National Railways in connection with the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway; also the correspondence in connection with the Pacific Great Eastern railway, for which an order passed the house some time ago.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, I will have these various returns checked up. In connection with one of them, about which my hon. friend spoke to me the other day, that is, the correspondence with respect to the acquisition of the Northern Alberta Railway by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, I am advised that the delay arises through certain correspondence between the presidents of the two railways having been marked "personal" and the necessary permission required to produce it. I do not think there will be any difficulty; it will be merely a matter of delay. In connection with the others, I will have the necessary inquiries made.

CANADA'S GOLD RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance in a position to throw any light upon the state of our gold reserve?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No, I have not had any report from the department yet. I can assure my hon. friend that we are quite safe.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I presume there will be enough to provide for the indemnity of the hon. gentleman who has inquired so often recently in regard to our gold reserve.

WAR MEMORIALS BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): May I ask the Prime Minister if anything has been done in the way of providing a building for the housing and caring of our war memorials? The matter was up last session. As I explained at the time, Canada has a wonderful collection of war memorials, in fact I think a collection larger and more important than that possessed by any other country. The Prime Minister then said:

> Up to the present time we have felt that there were other demands more imperative than the demand for a building for the purpose of housing these works of art. I think, however, we must not lose sight of the fact that the collection is a national possession, a very valuable possession, and one which as speedily as possible should be properly housed.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been much disappointed to find no provision in the estimates for a building for this purpose. The government seems to be able to spend a lot of money for other buildings in Ottawa. It strikes me that a building to house our war memorials is more necessary than some other buildings for which provision is being made. I wish the Prime Minister would be good enough to tell us when he will be able to do something towards providing a suitable building.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has just said, our collection of national war memorial paintings is without doubt one of the finest that any country possesses, and certainly, I assume, the best collection anywhere of paintings in relation to the recent war. After my hon. friend brought the matter up last session the government did carefully look into the question of the housing of the paintings. We found, as has been represented by my hon. friend, that they were stored, in considerable part, in what is now the basement of the National Museum and Art Gallery. We also discovered that it was not a suitable place for storage, and that it was necessary, if the paintings were to be properly preserved, that they should be stored in a dry atmosphere and in a better environment generally. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) and his officers went carefully into the available accommodation in the city and were fortunate in being able to obtain some space in a part of the large Auditorium building. This part the government has leased for storing the paintings. The building is suited admirably for the purpose. It is fireproof, it has a southern exposure, is quite dry, and an even temperature can be readily maintained. From what the director of the art gallery says, I believe it will serve to keep the pictures in perfect condition. So much for the storage.

As for the exhibition of the paintings, that is another matter. Up to the present time the government has not felt it would be justified in asking parliament to appropriate money for an art gallery. There are many public buildings urgently needed. One of them was referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) only a day or two ago—a building for the Supreme Court of Canada. There are other buildings necessary for departmental purposes, and we feel we should consider meeting these requirements before undertaking a building for the exhibition of paintings. However, personally, I am not without hope that some public-spirited citizen will be found who one of these days will present the country with a national art gallery.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

OPTIONAL CLAUSE—PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, in this morning's Citizen the Prime Minister is reported as saying that Canada will not sign the optional clause until the mother country and the other dominions are ready to do so. I should like to know if he is correctly reported?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I saw the report, Mr. Speaker, to which my hon. friend has just referred. I am afraid I have to say it is inaccurate. I remember being asked yesterday if I had anything further to add to the statement I made in the house a day or two ago as to Canada's position with respect to the optional cause, and I replied that the statement I had made in the house was all I had to say on the matter. The statement, I think, will bear out that all I said was that Canada was prepared to sign the optional clause, but did not intend doing so without conference with other parts of the British Empire, as had been promised at the time of the last Imperial conference; I made no statement to the effect that we would not sign the optional clause unless all parts of the empire agreed. Our view is that there should be a conference in the first place. After the conference it will be for us to say whether we shall sign alone, or whether it will be possible for all parts of the empire to sign at the same time.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I understood the right hon. Prime Minister to say that the statement in the House of Lords was correct, that Canada was willing to sign the optional clause immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I said so far as we are concerned we are quite prepared to sign the optional clause. However, we gave an undertaking at the last Imperial conference that we would not take that step until there had been an opportunity for all parts of the empire to confer together. That opportunity will come, I assume, at the next Imperial conference. It may come before, but until it does come I should not like to say that Canada will take any action on its own.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it not true that the Prime Minister definitely stated in the House of Commons that we would not wait until the next Imperial conference before action would be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is quite possible that the matter may be arranged by correspondence. I desire to be on the safe side and make a statement that I can be sure will be implemented.

BANK STATEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether there has been any alteration in the method of preparing bank statements in the last three years?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Not that I am aware of—no material alteration. I shall inquire from the inspector of banks, and if there has been any material alteration I shall let my hon. friend know.

MONTREAY RAILWAL TERMINAL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. G. BELL (St. Antoine): May I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) a question in regard to the proposed terminal facilities at Montreal? The Palmer report has been submitted to the various public bodies of Montreal. Has the minister any statement for the house as to their views in regard to the report?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): No, I have nothing to say along that line. I have no evidence as to their views. I have a number of individual representations of one kind or another, but I do not recollect any specific expressions of views by any public body. Shortly there will be before the house a proposal with respect to authorizing the Canadian National Railways to undertake certain expenditure in the city of Montreal, and at that time, I presume, the matter will be considered in all its bearings by the railway committee, on which occasion public bodies and individuals will have an opportunity to appear and make any representations they may desire.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—438b. Automobiles for conveying passengers only, n.o.p., valued at retail at place of production, when new, with standard equipment complete, at not more than twelve hundred dollars each; motor cars or motor trucks (not for railways or tramways) for carrying goods only; motorcycles or side cars therefor; chassis for motor vehicles specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The committee will observe that the only change in this item is the addition of the words "or side cars therefor." It is asked for by the Wheelmen's Association and the matter was considered before the tariff board, where there was no opposition.

Mr. COOTE: When this item was last before the committee on April 12, the question of the removal of the excise tax on automobiles was brought to the attention of the minister and he promised to investigate the whole matter. Has he any further information to offer now?

Mr. ROBB: I have a number of letters in reply from the automobile dealers and have instructed the tariff board to go into the whole matter carefully, with a view to determining not only the percentage manufactured in Canada but whether the requirements of the act are being complied with. Until the tariff board goes into the question thoroughly I do not care to make any further statement. I can assure the committee that the board have instructions to make a thorough inquiry and it is possible they will have an auditor go into the whole matter. Later on we may have public hearings if necessary.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister make it clear whether the board have been instructed to report to him as to whether the manufacturers of automobiles are or are not taking advantage of the situation—whether they are living up to their agreement made with the minister some years ago. Is it clear that the board are to report to the minister?

Mr. ROBB: That is the absolute understanding. I have not before me the letter to the board, but those are their instructions; they have been asked to go into the matter most carefully. I may say to my hon. friend that from the correspondence I am satisfied that most of the manufacturers are living up to the agreement, although there are some who have not been doing so.

Mr. COOTE: If the board should report to the minister that some of the manufacturers are not living up to the agreement will the minister promise us that he will take off the excise tax from all cars?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must not ask me to commit myself in relation to what we may do in that regard in the next budget. Such a statement can be made properly only after approval on the part of the Governor General. However, my hon. friend may safely leave the matter in our hands. We have a pretty clear mind as to what should be done and it is just possible that the question may be considered in relation to the tariff inquiry now going on in connection with steel and materials required in the manufacture of cars.

Mr. COOTE: I wish we could feel better satisfied to leave the matter in the minister's hands. We have done so for the last three years and some of us feel that for two years at any rate the manufacturers have been taking advantage of the elimination of the tax. The minister has been asleep at the switch and has allowed them to get away with it, to use a common expression. I do not think, therefore, that we should leave it to the minister until next session. Personally I should like to see the matter dealt with before this session is over. I wonder whether the minister would make the reference to the board wide enough so that they may report to him next year as to whether the customs tariff should not be further reduced on all motor trucks, which are coming into such general use to-day. As a matter of fact, to many farmers at any rate, the motor truck to-day takes the place which the wagon held some years ago. I would ask the minister to instruct the board to take up that question at the same time; the two matters could be considered together.

Mr. McGIBBON: When this resolution was last before the committee I asked the minister for a statement as to how the Canadian content was estimated. Supposing in the cheaper cars the Canadian content comprised 70 or 80 per cent: would that excess be applied to the higher priced cars with a Canadian content of say, 40 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: That is a matter that belongs to the Department of National Revenue, but I have given instructions to the tariff board to look carefully into it also.

Mr. McGIBBON: What has been the practice in the past?

Mr. ROBB: As I say, that matter is administered by the Department of National Revenue; they check up on the percentage of Canadian material going into the manufacture of cars.

Mr. McGIBBON: But that does not afford me any information.

Mr. ROBB: No. I have sent for my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler).

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not disposed to leave the minister in the position of evasion in which he has placed himself. Consciously or unconsciously he has been guilty of a breach of faith with the members in this corner of the house. When he appealed to us, in that memorable year, to permit him to relieve the automobile manufacturers in Canada to the extent of the removal of the excise duty he promised us absolutely, definitely and unquestionably that he would undertake to see that the manufacturers lived up to their agreement, which was to pass back to the consumers the saving which would result from the exclusion of the excise tax. The minister has now clearly shown in his answers to questions asked him that he has not checked up the manufacturers, but has relied on casual letters which he has received from them, and that even at this moment he is not in a position to state whether in his opinion they have or have not lived up to their promise. Let me repeat the promise made by the Minister of Finance in 1926. He said:

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.

The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) then asked:

> Will that be inserted in the bill?
> Mr. Robb: It is not necessary.

It was not necessary, according to the minister, to insert it in the bill. The minister left the impression that he was prepared to remove the excise duty on imported cars if the manufacturers in Canada did not live up to their promise, and in the three years that have elapsed he has made no investigation whatever; he has undertaken no check whatever of the situation. He has relied solely upon opinions expressed in letters, and now he attempts to evade his responsibility by stating to the hon. member for Macleod that he cannot give any promise as to what may be done, that the decision will have to be made in some future budget. The minister knows very well that this question of the excise duty can be dealt with by order in council, according to my information, if he desires to treat it in that way.

I do not think the Minister of Finance should leave himself or the house in that position. Certainly he never has given me the impression that he was a man who would deliberately break faith, but consciously or unconsciously he has broken faith in this case and I ask him now to reinstate himself in our confidence and in the confidence of the people who have trusted him up to this time.

Mr. ROBB: I do not recall the date when we had this matter under consideration previously, but I think it must have been about April 14.

Mr. COOTE: April 12.

Mr. ROBB: On April 15 I signed the following letter, addressed to Mr. Moore of the tariff board:

My Dear Mr. Moore:

It has been stated in parliament that certain Canadian manufacturers of automobiles have been and are now taking full price advantage of an exemption of excise taxes provided under the budget legislation of 1926. Attached is copy of correspondence with Canadian automobile manufacturers relative to this matter.

I desire also to direct your attention to the debate when in committee, June 7, 1926, Hansard pages 4124-4137; March 30, 1928, Hansard pages 1858-1859 and April 12, 1929, Hansard pages 1601-1613, and would request that you at once start an inquiry into the relative prices in Canada and the United States, as well as an inquiry into the percentage of content Canadian material and labour used in each of the several models upon which exemption from excise tax is now claimed. The Department of National Revenue may have available helpful information. I specially desire inquiry into charges that certain companies have not given their customers the reduction promised.

I would draw to your attention that various companies in their replies to me last year offered to open their books for the inspection of anyone whom I would care to name. This will be your authority to have an inspection made in accordance with their offer.

It is important that this inquiry be conducted without delay and be as comprehensive as possible.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) James A. Robb.

I cannot do more.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, but the minister could have done more if he had wished to keep faith; he could have started this inquiry at the outset, as he should have done and as it was his duty to do. During that session the situation as far as the administration was concerned was particularly strained, and to relieve the administration from a mighty ticklish position, to help the Minister of Finance, who is now pleased to smile about it, in one of the most critical moments in his career, and to meet his earnest request hon. members in this corner consented to modify their principles in this matter. Surely there devolved upon him then not only the duty but the positive obligation of undertaking and continuing an investigation in order to see that his promises were lived up to.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that there was a barter between hon. members in that corner and the Minister of Finance?

Mr. IRVINE: I hope the hon. member for Bow River and all hon. members in this corner of the house will learn a much needed lesson in political economy and in political matters generally from the question now before the house. It is generally understood that an Irishman is a pretty good man when dealing with pigs; he does not usually buy a pig in a poke, but this time he did so. The next time he makes a bargain I hope he will know exactly what he is getting, and see to it that he gets exactly what he should. Meanwhile we can only congratulate the Minister of Finance upon being a little more clever than some of the hon. members in this corner.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister realizes that a moment ago he said that this was a matter for the Minister of National Revenue, in spite of the fact that it was the Minister of Finance who sent a letter to the tariff board requesting them to deal with this matter, although it has to do with the collection of revenue. Why is it that our questions must go unanswered because the Minister of National Revenue is not here, while at the same time the Minister of Finance says, "Look what I have done; I have written to the chairman of the tariff board, who is a prospective Liberal candidate in a constituency which contains the largest automobile manufacturing industry in Canada, asking him to ascertain some of these things for us." That is what the minister wants this house to believe, and this gentleman to whom the letter was written is the gentleman who, in his annual report as chairman of that board, states that he has established intimate relations with the manufacturers of this country. I may tell the minister that I propose to ask, before he gets through his resolutions, the names of the establishments visited by that gentleman during the last twelve months, as mentioned in his report. We are going to ask for that information because we have a right to obtain it, and then we may find out exactly what are these intimate relations which have been established in this particular constituency between the largest manufacturers of automobiles in Canada and the chairman of the tariff board, a prospective Liberal candidate.

Does the minister think for a moment that the people of Canada will tolerate that sort of thing? Does he think that they will be deceived by it and that they will be made sport of in this way? A perfectly legitimate and proper question was asked in an endeavour to secure certain information, but the only reply we received was that the minister was referring the question to "dear Mr. Moore." The minister said to him, "You seek to represent a constituency in which is situated the largest automobile manufacturing business in Canada. Please go out and see how their prices compare with the prices paid in the United States, and if you cannot do that, take a look at their books. Here is your authority to do so," but a moment ago it was the Minister of National Revenue who had to deal with this matter, rather than the Minister of Finance. To use the classical language which was indulged in by one of the members of the government the other day, you cannot play both ends against the middle in that way very long, so let us get down to brass tacks in connection with this matter. Did the minister say to Mr. Moore that last year Canada imported about $102,000,000 worth of automobiles and automobile parts? Did he observe that of that amount $55,000,000 represented automobile parts and the balance automobiles imported largely from the United States? Did he observe that our exports were sent to countries enjoying a preference under different treaties? Surely the minister must have observed these things; the questions asked are quite reasonable and I desire to associate myself with those who desire to have these questions answered. I do not like this bunkum of saying, "I passed it on to Mr. Moore," who wants to represent the constituency containing the largest automobile industry in Canada. It may get him some votes if he makes the right kind of a report.

Mr. GOTT: Not many.

Mr. BENNETT: We will leave it at that.

Mr. IRVINE: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister and I were simply carrying on a little private conversation across the floor; he said I was getting information from another quarter, and I said I did not think so. At any rate, that is the question we would like answered; it is not unreasonable. On the question of content, surely the minister who came back from Keith's theatre with his courage still undaunted, but who yielded exactly one week later, the minister who put on this excise tax and then took it off, and who continues to play with it in the manner of the old shell game—now you see it and now you don't—surely he can do better than that. Now an hon. gentleman wants to know what is meant by it and I associate myself with his question.

Mr. ROBB: There seems to be a misapprehension as to the question asked by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon). He inquired as to the method of determining the content, whether an average was taken for the whole shop or whether each machine was dealt with separately. I am not in a position to give him that information; I do not administer that regulation, but I instructed the tariff board to inquire fully into that question and report, and I may say frankly that I have in mind that before this matter is concluded the automobile manufacturers will have to come into the open and have a public hearing in connection with this question.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Then I would like to ask if this hearing will have to take its turn and, if so, about what time we may expect it to be held.

Mr. ROBB: They are at work on it now.

Mr. BENNETT: Will that be a private or public hearing?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Three years after a definite pledge is given to the house by the minister he says, "I will take the matter up with the tariff board and have an investigation made." It was the duty of the minister to have one of his own investigators make an investigation and not wait for the tariff board to inquire into this matter. The minister has the power to put a qualified man on the job to-day if he wants to do it. It is his duty to do that and not wait for the tariff board. It was his duty to have done that two years ago; it was his duty to have seen that this saving was passed on to the consumers as he promised it would be passed on, and the only way he could be sure that that was done was by having a man from his department on the job from the day the promise was made. In failing to do that he has broken faith with us and with the country. He has failed in his duty when he is unable to answer the very simple question: Have they passed the saving back to the consumer? He was not able to answer that question and cannot answer it because he has no authoritative information. It was his duty as Minister of Finance, as an hon. member of the government and as one of the responsible ministers of the crown not only to keep the promise he made but to secure accurate information that the promise has been kept.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member forgets that it has not been established that they did not carry out their agreement. It is true that certain price lists were quoted from magazines showing a difference in price in Canada and in the United States. The hon. member will recall that when this was up last year I stated that I had written to all the automobile manufacturers reminding them of the promise. Replies came in from most of them claiming that they were passing along this excise tax to their customers. I think there were two companies from which I did not receive replies. It happened that an official of one of those companies was either the president or secretary of the Automotive Association, and when I directed his attention to this fact he brought down my original letter acknowledging his reply. He had replied but the letter had been mislaid in the department, and it has not been found yet. He brought down a copy of the letter which he had sent and in that letter made the statement that he was passing this saving on.

Mr. RYCKMAN: And he also stated that the books were open to inspection at any time.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The Ford Motor Company had not replied at that time but their business was very much disturbed, as everyone knows. They have since claimed that eighty per cent, or nearly eighty per cent of the contents of their car is Canadian and they also claimed that they are passing the saving on. There are the statements which they make to be put up against the statements which have been made that they are not passing it on. In justice to the public I have instructed the tariff board to go into this matter carefully, to put auditors into the companies where they consider it necessary, and I told the chairman only the other day that in the public interest it would be better to have a public hearing. I am not disposed to condemn these men before they have been properly heard.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. COOTE: I have no fault to find with the minister for asking the advisory tariff board to examine very thoroughly into this matter. My criticism is that when this matter was brought to his attention he satisfied himself by writing letters to these automobile manufacturers. On April 12, 1928, the minister was asked by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner):

> Is that all the minister has done?
> Mr. Robb: That is all.
> Mr. Gardiner: That is nothing.

It seems to me that nothing has been done in this case. I am very glad to hear the minister state that this matter will be made the subject of a public hearing and I presume the evidence will come before the members of the house. I am forced to express my regret that the minister has not seen fit to state to the house that if the case is proven that some of the automobile manufacturers have been taking advantage of this tax and have not passed the reduction on to the consumer, the government would remove the excise tax from all cars. I do not see in what other light the statements made to the house in 1926 can be viewed. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) the minister said:

> We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.
> Mr. Evans: Will that be inserted in the bill?
> Mr. Robb: It is not necessary.

I do not know what other interpretation can be put upon the words of the minister. If he can give the house any other explanation of the remarks he made at that time I am sure we will be pleased to hear it.

If the minister will not remove by order in council the tax upon these cars which are being imported, when the case should be proved, I can only suppose that next year he intends to introduce another of those popular Robb budgets and is saving this change to make his budget popular. The budget which was described in the election campaign of 1926 as the popular Robb budget contained a reduction in the tariff on automobiles, and I am quite satisfied that that was preeminently the one change which made that budget so popular. If that is the case, so far as the popularity of that budget is concerned, the success should not be ascribed to the Minister of Finance, it should be credited to the members in this corner of the house who persisted in keeping that matter before parliament and finally persuaded the minister, perhaps against his own inclinations, to reduce the tariff on cars.

I suggest to the minister that the inquiry by the tariff board should be a very thorough one and should go carefully into the whole question of the prices which are being charged the consumers of automobiles in Canada. I have before me a price list of the Ford Motor Company as issued to their agents from their St. John, N.B. agency. I will give the particulars of one model only because it is typical of all the rest. The price on one model is as follows:

Ford phaeton	$510 00
Spare tire	15 00
Bumper and bumperettes	20 00
Tax	12 27
Freight	84 00
Delivery charges	10 00
Price delivered at Glace Bay, N.S.	651 27

I draw the attention of the minister to this fact, the list factory price which is quoted by the Ford Motor Company does not include spare tires, bumper or bumperettes, and the price of $510 is the price which I used on April 12 last in making a comparison of the prices of the Ford car in Canada and the United States. Some hon. members of the house have said that there is more equipment on the Canadian car than on the American car, but I would like to know where it is because this price list shows very clearly that the spare tire, bumper and bumperettes are not included. I would like to draw the attention of the minister to this further fact; they are charging the consumers of automobiles in the maritime provinces—I am satisfied they are doing the same thing in other parts of Canada—with a freight rate which is more than twice what the Ford Company or their agents pay on these cars, and in addition they include a delivery charge of $10. I have in my hand a couple of invoices for Ford cars which were sent to an agent at Glace Bay. The agent informed me that in every case the freight was less than $40 per car and yet the consumers in the maritime provinces are being charged $84 for freight and in addition to that they are being charged $10 for delivery charges. It may be argued that they are not contravening any statute of Canada when they do that, but if they are penalizing the consumer in the distant portions of Canada, for instance in the maritimes and the western provinces, with a freight charge which is more than twice what they are actually paying, it is time we carefully considered the question whether we should further protect this company from competition from other countries or not. To say the least, the practice is a most questionable one. When this question was debated on the floor of the house on April 12, one hon. member at least, seemed quite concerned for fear the minister might remove this excise tax from imported cars, and subject Canadian manufacturers to a little more competition. He mentioned the fact that the Ford Company sustained a loss last year. In a letter which I have under my hand from an agent of the Ford Company, he says:

> The company, as would be expected, did not pay a dividend last year, but, a few years back they were generous in the extreme. In addition to a 100 per cent cash dividend in 1911, they also paid 500 per cent in stock and followed this with a 600 per cent stock dividend in 1916. In 1924, when net earnings amounted to $53.13 a share, they paid 10 per cent, 20 per cent in 1925, 10 per cent in 1926, 15 per cent in 1927 and nothing in 1928 as would be expected.

He makes that statement because he knew they were reorganizing their factory at that time. He goes on:

> However, if you will refer to ad., of the Canadian General Securities Corporation, appearing in all the daily papers in Canada on April 1 or 2, you will note that Mr. W. R. Campbell, president and treasurer, is quoted as stating that for January and February of this year, operations, "show net profits, after depreciation, in excess of $1,500,000—net profits for the month of March will be equally satisfactory—further it is estimated that the net profits after depreciation for the year 1929 will be in excess of any previous year."

That is the quotation which he gives. He suggests that it will be $10,000,000 at least. I do not think there is any occasion for the house or the minister to worry about the financial position of these companies. As a matter of fact, I think it is really important that the Minister of Finance should take some means of assuring the house that he will make good the promise which he made in 1926. I do not want to be unreasonable at all. If the minister thinks the case is not proven, I am quite willing that the matter should be investigated by the advisory tariff board. If we are to have an advisory tariff board in this country, perhaps it is the proper body to investigate this question. But I hope the minister will make a positive statement as to what he will do if the case is proven that these manufacturers have taken advantage of the remission of the excise tax and that he will assure the house that the tariff advisory board will be instructed to have brought out fully just what is the practice of these automobile corporations in setting the price which they charge to consumers in distant parts of Canada as related to their advertised list price at the factory, the price on which the excise tax and sales tax which they pay is based.

Mr. KAISER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let us have an answer from the minister.

Mr. ROBB: An answer to what?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To the question asked by the hon. member for Macleod whether the minister would keep his promise in the event of the companies not giving the saving to the consumer.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends are making a great deal of their statement that I broke faith with them in 1925 or 1926. That is sufficient reason for me to make no promises until I have all the facts before me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are we to understand then that these words are now dead and to be forgotten? The minister, when speaking in the house in 1926, used these words:

> I serve notice on them now, in the presence of my friends, that if they do not live up to that agreement we will find means of placing them in a position where they will have to do so, or meet competition of the world.

Has the minister forgotten that promise?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister going to live up to that promise?

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He has a very acute mind. Does he remember any promise which this government has ever kept?

Mr. KAISER: I am not going to endeavour to get the Minister of Finance out of any trouble—

Mr. ROBB: I am not in any trouble.

Mr. KAISER: —but I should like my hon. friends to my left to explain to me how they know whether the manufacturers passed the excise reduction on to the consumer or not. I am going to submit a few outstanding facts in regard to the automobile business. My claim is that the government made a blunder as regards Canada when they undertook to tamper with the tariff on automobiles in 1926. This was detrimental to the industry as a whole and to the consumers of Canada as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. KAISER: All right. Take the price of any automobile in 1926 when the government undertook to do something in regard to the tariff on automobiles; then go back three years and take the price of a similar automobile during that period and observe the drift of things. See what was going on in this country. Canadian manufacturers were grappling with a great industry and in those three years they reduced the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers by nearly 40 per cent. How? By virtue of their own genius, by virtue of mass production and by virtue of internal economic administration they were endeavouring to give Canada a cheap automobile and they reduced the price by from 33⅓ to 40 per cent in those three years. If the automobile business had been left alone, what would have happened? Economics were being studied; genius was being developed; mass production was increasing, and the manufacturers were endeavouring to run their factories as many months in the year as possible. Immediately after this change the number of months of operation in the automobile business yearly was reduced and in our city for three or four months at a time when men were absolutely out of employment; whereas, if they had been at work all the year round they could, by thus reducing the yearly overhead costs, have produced automobiles at a more rapid pace and at a more reasonable price. In 1926, the government of Canada disturbed this wonderful industry. It listened to the croakers who were saying: Give us automobiles as cheap as they have them in the United States; reduce the price to the consumer. And my hon. friends think they have accomplished something. What have they done? The same type of automobile, the price of which was reduced between 30 and 40 per cent in those three years previous to 1926 has been manufactured and sold by the same people in Canada and the reduction in price has been less than 9 per cent in the last three years. If the government had left this industry alone, I have not the slightest doubt that the reduction in price would have been 20 or 25 per cent instead of 9. Because of the number of months in the year these people would have been employed, and because of the increase in mass production, the manufacturers could have reduced the price of their automobiles more rapidly than they have been able to do under present circumstances. I see smiles on the faces of some hon. gentlemen. Evidently they think I am saying something that is absurd. I say to you gentlemen who are smiling that you desire to drive these industries out of Canada, but you will have another thought coming, and probably you will get it inside of a week's time. The consumers of farm products in this country mean more to the farmers of Canada than do the consumers of any other country in the world. What has happened, for instance, in the matter of automobile importations? Do hon. gentlemen smile at the fact that since the Minister of Finance made the change affecting automobiles in 1926 there has been an increase in the importation of the finished article amounting to over 260 per cent? Automobiles have been coming into this country in ever-increasing numbers, while the manufacturers in our own land could have manufactured right here at home every automobile that is used in Canada to-day, and in addition, they could have reduced the price by 20 per cent if they had been given a fair chance and were not continually assailed by people who think that our automobile manufacturers and manufacturers of every other article used in Canada should be exposed to the competition of the whole world. I believe that we can make in Canada, and that we should make in Canada, everything that the people of Canada need, and if our industrial centres were left alone we would produce most of these goods just as cheaply as they are produced in the United States or anywhere else, but we cannot do it if our manufacturers are to be eternally disturbed by these absurd theorists. Our manufacturers cannot go on and develop industries in Canada if they are always to be assailed by people who believe that these goods should not be made in this country, but in some foreign land. Why should there have been this increase of 260 per cent in the importation of automobiles when our own manufacturers could make every automobile that is used in Canada. If this 260 per cent increase in automobile importations were not coming into this country, our factories would be able to run for one month longer in the year than they do at present. The theory that these articles should be manufactured in foreign countries instead of at home will not hold up against the facts; it will not even hold up against the consumers' idea of cheapness, because if we had been manufacturing all these automobiles in Canada we could have produced them almost as cheaply as in the United States or anywhere else in the world. How can we ever develop into a great country when such absurd trade theories are put into effect as those expounded by certain hon. gentlemen in this house?

Mr. COOTE: I shall not attempt to deal with the rash statements which have just been made by the hon. member for Ontario, but he did ask for information. He asked what led us to believe that the manufacturers of automobiles were taking advantage of the excise tax.

Mr. KAISER: How do you know that the manufacturers are not passing this 5 per cent on to the consumer?

Mr. COOTE: If the hon. member would only keep his seat warm, I would try and tell him.

Mr. KAISER: How do you know they do not pass it on?

Mr. COOTE: I just got up to tell my hon. friend how I knew. If he would take the trouble to read the statement I placed on Hansard on April 12 last, he would see that the retail factory price of a Ford car in Canada is 29.1 per cent higher in the case of a coupe, 29.3 per cent higher in the case of a tudor sedan, and 29.8 per cent higher in the case of a fordor sedan.

Mr. GOTT: Higher than what?

Mr. COOTE: Higher than the price of the same car in the United States.

Mr. GOTT: There is no comparison between the two cars. The Canadian car is a much better car than the United States car.

Mr. COOTE: The customs tariff which these men enjoy is 20 per cent. Now if the tariff is 20 per cent and the price in Canada is 29.1 per cent higher than in the United States, it seems to me that we have furnished enough proof to the Minister of Finance for at least an investigation to be made to determine whether or not these manufacturers have taken advantage of the excise tax.

Mr. GOTT: There is no possible way of comparing the American Ford car with the Canadian, because the Canadian Ford car is so much better than the other.

An hon. MEMBER: In what way?

Mr. GOTT: It is better built and better in every way.

Mr. COOTE: The tariff board could make a very thorough inquiry into this question. They could get the advice of mechanical engineers and ascertain just how much more expensive the Canadian Ford is than the American. May I point out to the hon. member from Oshawa (Mr. Kaiser) that in my statement in regard to this matter a year ago I said that apparently General Motors had lived up to this agreement. I had no proof to the contrary, and so I exempted them. I would say to the Finance minister that I cannot see why he is so anxious to continue to protect the automobile manufacturers, particularly at what might seem to be his own expense, because in every case when election time comes around these manufacturers certainly do not vote for the party of which my hon. friend is so prominent a member. The hon. member for Ontario should thank the Minister of Finance for what he did for the automobile manufacturers, instead of belabouring him so hard, because as a matter of fact, after the Minister of Finance reduced the tariff in 1926, General Motors greatly increased their plant at Oshawa. I am perfectly unable to understand the attitude of the hon. member for Ontario. I think he should thank the Minister of Finance for his attitude if he is really sincere.

Mr. EVANS: I feel that this matter should not rest where it is. When this bargain was made, a definite and absolute promise was given to us here that the Minister of Finance at any time could exact the duty on these cars if he found that the reduction was not being passed on to the consumer. I feel that this action on the part of the automobile manufacturers is connived at by the government, and it is absolutely dishonest in the face of the whole country. The government is to-day conniving at the way in which these companies are putting it over the consumer. There is absolutely no necessity for any duty at all on cars entering Canada, because our Canadian manufacturers can compete with any part of the world. I listened a few days ago to a man from India who told us that the Canadian car was very much favoured there because of its cheapness, and it was generally underselling the American car. Why is this? Is the Canadian consumer paying the Canadian manufacturer a duty so that he can dump his cars in other parts of the world? Is all the export trade of Canada to be everlastingly carried on at the expense of the Canadian consumer? Manufacturing to-day is being done cheaper in Canada in many cases than in the United States. I know of agricultural implements that are made in the city of Hamilton and sold in North Dakota, and our farmers can go across the boundary from Saskatchewan and buy a Hamilton drill in North Dakota, bring it back across the line, pay the duty, and save $30 by so doing.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. EVANS: I know that my hon. friend disputed this statement last year, but he has only to write to the research department of the United Farmers of Canada to get the facts. Drills made in Hamilton, Canada, are sold cheaper in the United States than they are in this country, and our farmers in Saskatchewan can go across there, buy one of these drills, bring it back across the line, pay the duty, and save about $30 on the machine.

[Mr. Coote.]

I say again that it is the Canadian consumer who is paying; he has to stand the burden of the whole export business of Canada. Our Finance minister put this over us three years ago when we from this corner demanded that the benefit of that excise tax be passed on to the consumer.

Now, why is it that this has got to be left so indefinite again for another two or three years, when there is absolutely no excuse at all for imposing a duty on the Canadian consumer? Have the politics of our country come down to this state, that anything can be done that they can get away with? Is there no moral side to these questions at all? In my city, if there is one crime to-day more prevalent than another it is that young people are stealing cars for the sake of getting joy rides around the country. Afterwards they abandon the cars in a damaged condition. These young people show a spirit of utter irresponsibility. I want to ask the house to-day, where does that irresponsibility start? It starts right here on the treasury benches of this house; that is where it begins. It is not easy to say these things, but when a trick like that is put over us here, I cannot help saying that such a state of affairs should come to an end, and we should have something definite, particularly with regard to this matter. I do not intend to let these things go along as they have in the past.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to say anything in this debate, but I think statements such as the hon. member has just made should not be uttered in this house unless some proof is offered in support. Such statements do this country a lot of harm. Statements such as the hon. member made in a letter to the Montreal Gazette a week or two ago were a reflection on this whole house. Now I for one, want to protest against these allegations. Too often statements are made in this house that are absolutely ridiculous, and not a word of proof is given for them. The statements which the hon. member has just made are not new. I hold no brief for any manufacturer or any other person, but similar statements have been made from time to time for the last twenty years. What proofs have ever been submitted in support? The only proof that I know of was supplied to this house, and it is on Hansard to-day. It was supplied by a former Finance minister, Sir Thomas White, who in answer to charges of this kind sent an officer of his department twice across this continent, once through the United States and then back through Canada, to get the market prices of agricultural implements at different points in the two countries. He did so, and after making due allowance for difference in freight charges—I am speaking from memory, it was a good many years ago—it was found there was very little difference between the prices in the United States and in Canada. Those figures are a matter of record of this house. And they are authoritative, because they were made by a responsible officer of the government. That report is no doubt in the Finance department. In addition to that, we have statements by the manufacturers themselves, for instance, by the late general manager of the Massey-Harris company, absolutely contradicting the allegation and stating that never had they on any occasion sold their goods cheaper outside this country than inside. In face of that declaration we have men like the member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) getting up and making absurd, wild statements that, I submit, should not be made in any legislature in the world without proof. I say it is time that all this reckless talk upon any subject was stopped unless proof be submitted in support.

Mr. WARD: Hear, hear. I think the hon. member might take a little of that to himself.

Mr. McGIBBON: I suppose we have the last word now from the hon. member. But let me say that I can substantiate every statement I ever made in this house, which is more than members sitting opposite my hon. friend can do. I hold no brief for the manufacturers or for any other class in this country, but I do have some respect for the honesty of our manufacturers and of our people generally. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this wild talk should cease unless some proof is forthcoming.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—448. Spraying machines, fruit or vegetable grading machines, apparatus specially designed for sterilizing bulbs, pressure testing apparatus for determining maturity of fruit, incubators for hatching eggs, brooders for rearing young fowl, pruning hooks, pruning shears, hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, post hole diggers, snaths, milking machines, milking machine attachments; centrifugal machines for testing butter fat, milk or cream; pasteurizers for dairying purposes; equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz: engine, generator, storage battery and switchboard; stumping machines, and other agricultural implements, n.o.p.; and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The house understood the Minister of Finance was going to propose some alteration in the wording to make provision for certain agricultural machinery.

Mr. ROBB: That will be later on. I have a suggestion after these items are disposed of. That is for the "combination"?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. A special item?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I provide for that in a special item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—453c. Ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, rock drills, percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills, n.o.p., and complete parts of all articles mentioned in this item, when for use exclusively in mining or quarrying operations: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is that a reduction?

Mr. ROBB: The only change in the item is the addition of the letters "n.o.p." and of the words "or quarrying." It extends the item to quarrying operations.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—453e. Engines and complete parts thereof, to be used exclusively in the propulsion of boats or in hoisting nets and lines used in such boats bona fide owned by individual fishermen for their own use in the fisheries, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The only change in this is the addition of the words "or in hoisting nets and lines used in such boats." It appears the department ruled that if the engine was used for hoisting nets they had to come in under the higher rates. This is to clarify the matter.

Mr. KAISER: Are these industries in Canada now manufacturing these articles?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—453g. Machinery, n.o.p., for the concentration of ores, metals or minerals, viz.: flotation machines, flotation cells, pumps, vibrating and impact screens, jigs, magnetic separators and filters, when for use in the concentration or separation of ores, metals or minerals, and integral parts of all articles mentioned in this item: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The only change is the addition of the words "flotation cells" as requested by the Ontario Mining Association.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—453j. Ozone generators or airifiers of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in ventilating garages or automotive work shops: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: How much of that is new?

Mr. ROBB: This is a new item covering safety appliances for removing carbon monoxide gas. Application for it was made by the Calgary board of trade and the automobile dealers of Calgary. There is no separate classification of imports. The reduction of taxation will not be very large.

Mr. CANTLEY: What does the apparatus cost per unit?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know.

Mr. CANTLEY: No information?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Dixon, who appeared for the applicants, represented that under the laws of Alberta operators of garages were compelled to provide suitable equipment to remove or destroy carbon monoxide gas. He further stated that the most satisfactory machine for the purpose was obtained outside of Canada. So far as he could learn from inquiries made of the Canadian General Electric Company, the Ottawa Electric Company and officials of the Customs department, machines for the purpose were not manufactured in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: Under what item did these machines come in before?

Mr. ROBB: Under 453.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a reduction?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The previous rates were 15, 25 and 27½; the proposed rates are free, 5 per cent and 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—460. Sundry articles of metal as follows, when for use exclusively in mining or metallurgical operations, viz.: diamond drills, not including the motive power; electrically operated rotary coal drills of a class or kind not made in Canada; coal cutting machines, n.o.p.; coal heading machines; core drills; electric or magnetic machines for separating or concentrating iron ores; furnaces for smelting of copper, zinc and nickel ores; converting apparatus for metallurgical processes in metals; copper plates, plated or not; machinery for extraction of precious metals by the chlorination or cyanide processes; amalgam safes; automatic ore samplers; automatic feeders; retorts; mercury pumps; pyrometers; bullion furnaces; amalgam cleaners; blast furnace blowing engines; and integral parts of all machinery mentioned in this item: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: The only change is the addition of the words: "electrically operated rotary coal drills of a class or kind not made in Canada; coal cutting machines, n.o.p." These items were formerly free and they remain so.

Mr. KAISER: There are some articles excluded from this item. Do these remain in the free list or are they dutiable? If dutiable, under what heading do they come?

Mr. ROBB: Under 460e.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—460e. Miners' acetylene lamps and parts thereof; miners' safety lamps and parts thereof; accessories for cleaning, filling, charging, opening and testing miners' safety lamps, battery renewal preparations for miners' electric safety lamps; all to be used exclusively in mines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the change?

Mr. ROBB: The proposed new item covers all miners' lamps including miners' acetylene lamps, formerly dutiable under 435 at 20, 27½ and 30. There was no separate classification of imports, so that we cannot tell the difference.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—460f. Face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors, air engines, flame proof enclosed driving motors for air engines, and integral parts of all motive power or machinery mentioned in this item, to be used exclusively in mining operations: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I wish to amend this item to read:

Coal face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors.

And so forth. The word "coal" is added.

Mr. ADSHEAD: These were not machines of a class or kind made in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: The item did not apply to coal face loading machines.

Mr. McPHERSON: Would not the effect of the item as amended be to restrict it to coal mining machinery?

Mr. ROBB: No; the intention is to enlarge the item.

Mr. McPHERSON: But under the language now proposed it does not cover all machinery.

Mr. ROBB: It is intended to extend the item to include machinery used in coal mining.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This item 460f is new.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As it reads in the original resolution, it calls for a duty of 10 per cent under the intermediate and 12½ per cent under the general tariff, being free under the British preferential, and it applies to all face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors, air engines and so forth. As I read that item in the original it struck me as an excellent form of encouragement to the mining industry and I thought the minister was making a real attempt to promote the development of mining particularly in the areas that have been recently opened up.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The coal areas?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, all mining areas. Now I find, according to the amendment the minister is proposing that the provision will be restricted to face loading machines for coal. What was the duty on face loading machines generally prior to the submission of this new item?

Mr. ROBB: The rates were 15, 25 and 27½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And those rates will stand so far as machinery generally is concerned; they will apply to all the machinery mentioned in this item except when used in coal mining.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, the amendment is a serious restriction of the original resolution. Is that right?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sorry to see that. The minister has already seriously hampered mining development by the tax imposed upon companies issuing stocks of small value and now he proposes this further impediment, continuing a very high rate of duty on machinery used in the development of mines. I am not a miner, and I do not know to what extent face loading machines and such other implements as are mentioned here are used in the development of nickel, silver, gold, copper and other mines. If we could have some information as to the value to these mines of the reductions which were proposed in the original item we should be in a position further to criticise the minister or otherwise.

Mr. ROBB: We shall discuss the mining tax when we come to it. So far as this change is concerned, I am advised that it was arrived at after a conference with representatives of the mining association and of the coal industry. It was the coal industry who asked for this.

Mr. BENNETT: Asked for which—the original resolution or the amendment?

Mr. ROBB: The new item. I may say that it is satisfactory to the mining association; I fancy they would prefer to have the item a little wider. However, I propose to let the matter stand until after dinner.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before we pass from this item I want to congratulate the minister sincerely on his original resolution, which I regarded as a splendid attempt on his part. I like to congratulate him when I find a rare opportunity for doing so. The new resolution will be of immeasurable benefit to the coal industry but I should like to have an explanation as to why it is being restricted as now proposed.

Mr. ROBB: Let it stand.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is no doubt the resolution refers entirely to coal loading machinery to be used in connection with long wall mines; it describes practically the whole type of loading machinery used in those mines. The minister has made the item free under the British preferential, with 10 per cent and 12½ per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs respectively. I am led to wonder why he bothered with the matter at all. Why not bring it all under the free list? There is none of that material coming from the old country. This is made almost entirely in the United States or in our own country.

Mr. ROBB: I was just looking up the notes, and the representations I have before me as made by the Mining Association of Nova Scotia state that this machinery is not manufactured in Canada. That is why I am asking that the item stand; I want to look into it.

Mr. CANTLEY: Some of the component parts of this machinery have been made in Canada, but I do not know of any of this material coming in from the old country today. I do not think this change will have any effect at all; it seems more of a gesture than a reality.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the minister to amend this clause not only by adding the word "coal" before the word "conveyors," but also by adding the words "of a class or kind not made in Canada"?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That still further restricts the advantage of any reduction; formerly all kinds of this machinery came in free but now free entry is restricted to coal conveyors of a kind not made in Canada.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—468a. Machinery of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada for use in the manufacture of nets or netting for the fisheries, when imported by manufacturers for use in the making of such nets or netting in their own factories, but not for use in making nets or netting commonly used for sportsmen's purposes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. EVANS: I have a further word to say with regard to machinery. A few moments ago I made the statement that machinery could be made in Canada just as cheaply as in the United States, and for the benefit of any hon. gentleman who did not believe that statement I would like to read the following deposition:

This is to certify that I, Joseph Hill, of North Portal, farmer and reeve of municipality (rural) No. 4, did accompany George F. Edwards when securing information in connection with the price of farm machinery on the Canadian side of the international boundary at North Portal and on the American side at Portal, and that we visited farms on the Canadian side and also on the American side of the line where the owners of the farms had bought twenty-eight run double disc International Harvester Company seed drills, made in Hamilton, Ontario; the drills having "Made in Canada" stamped on at least thirty places, so that there was no doubt that the drills both on the Canadian and American side were made in Canada.

All of the drills, above mentioned, were purchased from the same implement dealer, whose place of business is in Portal, North Dakota. The price paid for the drills by the Canadian farmers, who bought in Portal, North Dakota, was $325, including the duty, while the price on the Canadian side of the line at Estevan, the nearest point at which these drills are sold in Canada is $355, the difference in favour of Portal and other adjacent points, with the duty paid of $30 for the same machines made in the same factory at Hamilton, Ontario.

The price quoted by dealers on other farm machinery showed the same discrepancy, and I, personally, bought a binder in Portal, North Dakota last fall, the price of the binder being $250, which with duty at 6 per cent cost me $265, while the same make of binder was selling on the Canadian side at $283 a difference of $18.

[Mr. Cantley.]

We were informed by the dealer who does business on both the American and Canadian sides of the line, that it is contrary to the law of the United States, for the implement companies to fix a price at which binders must be sold by their agents, but that the agents are allowed freedom of action in regard to the profit they take for themselves and the price at which they sell their binders, while the price of the machines manufactured in Canada, and sold through the agents is fixed by the head office of the various companies and there is no discretion allowed as to the price that will be charged.

This statement is signed by Joseph Hill, reeve of rural municipality No. 4 and witnessed by G. S. Richardson. Mr. Hill accompanied George Edwards of the research department of the United Farmers of Canada on his trip to North Dakota.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is just one question I would like to ask the minister in connection with this item. Why is he restricting the reduction, because I presume it is a reduction, to machinery of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: That is part of the policy. If an article is manufactured in Canada in commercial quantities I imagine another rate might prevail.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is very much of this machinery manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: No, I do not think so. There is no separate classification of imports, and the estimated reduction in taxation is not very large. This proposed new item is designed to assist in the development in Canada of the manufacture of fish-net making machinery. At present these machines are imported from Great Britain and France, particularly the latter, and are of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—478a. Iron or steel bands, strips or sheets, number fourteen gauge or thinner, coated, polished or not, and rolled iron or steel sections, not being ordinary square, flat or round bars, whether forged and punched or not, unfinished, when imported by the manufacturers of saddlery hardware and hames for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just what particular part of the hame or of the harness or the saddlery will this constitute?

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, a hame may be strapped with brass or something looking like brass, or with iron. The explanation is that the making of hames in Canada is now almost entirely in the hands of one company, which for many years has been able to import its hame straps from the United States free of duty. The chief source of supply was the United States Steel Company, but they have now discontinued the manufacture of hame straps. The only remaining possible source of supply on the continent is the United States Hame Company of Buffalo, which not only rolls the straps but does the punching and so on in one continuous operation. The only change is the addition of the words "whether forged and punched or not, unfinished."

Mr. GEARY: Who made the application for the change?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine it was the manufacturers of this article. I am not sure whether or not it was B. F. Ackerman and Son, of Peterborough.

Mr. GEARY: Did they first apply for an increase in duty on their finished product?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure of that.

Mr. CANTLEY: This is clearly a case of greed. Formerly this class of material, hames for all sorts of team and farm work, was made in several places in Canada; McFarlane's of Fredericton made a very large quantity but they were finally forced out of business by the concern to which the minister refers. Formerly iron and steel backings for reinforcing the wooden part of the hame were made in Canada; they were made in New Glasgow and elsewhere, but now there is practically only one firm in this business. In all fairness I do not see why these people, who now virtually have a monopoly of this business in Canada, should be allowed to bring in their materials free and at the same time have ample protection on their finished article. If we are to have protection, in which I believe, it should be fairly divided among all the people who make the component parts of an article of this kind. I protest against this item being put on the free list for the benefit of one particular concern.

Mr. ROBB: They have always been allowed to come in free, but we are now allowing them to come in free after they are punched.

Mr. CANTLEY: They have not always been free; I know that because I have rolled hundreds of tons of hame strap steel.

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum I have is that hame straps come in free under item 478a, but if punched they come under item 454 at 20, 27½ and 30.

Mr. CANTLEY: That may be so now but it was not always the case and it should not be the case to-day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is really a concession to the manufacturer of hames?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I should think so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The straps now come in free, ready for him to attach to the wood.

Mr. CANTLEY: All he does is to rivet the straps on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I doubt very much whether it will have any effect on the price to the consumer; the amount is small but at the same time it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. ROBB: Before the item passes I would like to say that I am following the excellent example of Sir Thomas White in 1914. He placed these hame straps on the free list but did not provide for their entry when they were punched.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Does this item take into consideration the all steel hames? A lot of manufacturers put out hames which are entirely steel, but this item apparently applies only to hames which are manufactured of steel and wood.

Mr. ROBB: The hame straps.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523g. Woven fabrics of cotton, or of cotton and wool, whether coated or not coated with rubber, when imported by manufacturers of card clothing for textile machinery, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such card clothing in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to ask the minister about a promise he made to the house last year but which he has not carried out. The minister proposed a regulation in his budget of last year and announced at the time that it would foster inter-imperial trade, but it was pointed out later that it would have the very opposite effect. The Minister of Railways, speaking with the authority of the Minister of Finance, made some very definite commitments at that time. I would like to ask the minister if he proposes to modify or amend that regulation in any way in order to make it more workable than it is at the present time.

Mr. ROBB: I will answer the last question first. It is the 50 per cent clause the hon. member is referring to?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The 50 per cent requirement of British labour and material. We have discussed this matter with the British board of trade and I think they are quite satisfied with the arrangement. There is a member of the Canadian customs staff in England at the present time and if they desire to have this 50 per cent clause checked up he is available to do that work and we would consider the matter on his report. So far nothing has been brought before us to indicate that any companies are having trouble coming within this regulation. The broad general statement has been made that some of them could not come under it, but as yet there has been nothing submitted to us. With reference to the item I would state that it is to correct one of my own mistakes of last year. These commodities were removed from the free list in the revision of 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: What is card clothing?

Mr. ROBB: It is used in woollen mills; this item will restore these articles to the free list.

Mr. GEARY: Are these fabrics for the textile machinery or clothing for the textile machinery?

Mr. ROBB: It is clothing for equipping the textile machinery.

Mr. GEARY: Has it not been put in the wrong place in drafting the item?

Mr. ROBB: The item was submitted by the customs department.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is this not just a further concession to the manufacturers of cotton clothing in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: These items had been removed from the free list and we are restoring them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is simply another concession in addition to the innumerable concessions already made.

Mr. ROBB: It is pretty hard to convince them of that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will be satisfied if the minister will do his best to see that cotton goods in Canada are made a little cheaper. They are certainly too expensive now compared with the prices either in England or in the United States. The unfortunate consumer is certainly being taxed more than he ought to be asked to bear in connection with the cotton industry of this country.

Mr. ROBB: This item applies more to woollen mills.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the British authorities were satisfied with the 50 per cent regulation?

Mr. ROBB: We have heard no complaints.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Probably they have not complained because they found it would be useless. They have been complaining for a long time, in fact ever since this regulation was incorporated in the budget of last year. I have in my hand sessional paper No. 172, and I would like to read some of the correspondence to show the attitude of the British High Commissioner and of the British federation of industry. The first letter I would like to read is dated at London, December 6, 1928, and addressed to the Minister of Customs, Ottawa, and reads as follows:

I write to confirm a cablegram which I sent to you on the 3rd inst. and in the following terms:—

"Reference recent alteration tariff basis to 50 per cent; very anxious know if list raw material exceptions is being issued; please cable reply."

I should like to thank you very much indeed for a cable you have been kind enough to send in reply, which reads as follows: "No list raw material exceptions from amended regulations."

Your reply informs me that there is no list of raw materials in existence at the moment. This federation would be grateful if in reply to this letter you would be good enough to advise it as to whether any list of this nature is in contemplation. This federation is very sensible of the value of the reason given by the government of the Dominion of Canada for the alteration in the basis of the tariff of from 25 to 50 per cent. At the same time it trusts that the Dominion authorities will appreciate that there are many raw materials used in manufacture totally unprocurable in the United Kingdom, and that if no exceptions be contemplated, many cases are bound to arise where the alteration of from 25 to 50 per cent, so far from benefiting the British manufacturer in question, may have exactly the reverse effect.

This federation has no doubt that this question is one which must have received or is now receiving your careful consideration, and as stated it will very much appreciate such information as you may be good enough to pass to it on this matter.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) J. Moir Mackenzie,
Head.
Overseas Organization.

I would like to read a cablegram dated London, January 18, 1929, and addressed to Hon. James Robb, Minister of Finance, Ottawa, as follows:

In view continued uncertainty here position on entry into Canada under British preferential rate or otherwise of certain British manufacturers inevitably composed of raw or semi-manufactured raw material not procurable commercially in British countries. Federation British Industries respectfully urges postponement of application of new customs tariff basis ruling from first February to first May to allow that full consideration of general principle and specific cases which federation has suggested by letter Stop if order comes into force February first serious dislocation trade many lines will result.

Mackenzie.

This is another letter from the same gentleman:

London, January 2, 1929.

The Hon. J. A. Robb,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Robb,—

I think I can do no better than attach to this letter as I do copy of one which I addressed on the 6th December to the Minister of Customs. I have just received a reply from the Commissioner of Customs, in which he states that he is not in a position to add anything to the reply sent to the cablegram referred to in the attached letter, except to suggest that it might be as well to communicate direct with yourself on the matter, as it is one which falls within your purview.

My letter to the Minister of Customs covers a question which, important as it was early in December, is becoming increasingly so now.

I shall be grateful of on behalf of this federation you would advise me whether you have any such list in contemplation as that referred to in my letter to the Minister of Customs. In addition to the manufacturers referred to in that letter as using raw material totally unprocurable in this country, there are also some manufacturers who use as material raw to themselves products upon which a certain amount of initial work has been expended at the source overseas from which such materials are procured. Users of certain materials of this nature are becoming nervous, because they fear that they may not be able to certify that of the completed article exported to Canada, more than 50 per cent can be attributed directly to British material and British labour.

Very similar questions have arisen in the past with the dominions of New Zealand and Australia, both of which, as you are aware, give, as does Canada, a preference to goods of British manufacture. Various discussions have taken place over a period of time. As the result of these in the cases of both of those dominions, lists such as I refer to have been issued by them. I mentioned this fact because if, as we trust, this question of the issue of a list by yourselves in receiving or will receive favourable consideration by you, the results of those discussions to which I refer are available either through the board of trade here in London or otherwise.

The question is regarded as one of very great importance amongst manufacturing interests in this country, which is my reason for troubling you at such length.

The federation will look forward with the greatest interest to the reply you may be good enough to send to this letter.

(Signed) J. Moir Mackenzie.

I will read a cablegram from the same gentleman, dated January 18, 1929, to the Hon. James Robb, Minister of Finance, Ottawa, as follows:

In view continued uncertainty here position of entry into Canada under British preferential rate or otherwise of certain British manufacturers inevitably composed of raw or semi-manufactured raw material not procurable commercially in British countries, Federation British Industries respectfully urges postponement of application of new customs tariff basis ruling from first February to first May to allow that full consideration of general principle and specific cases which federation has suggested by letter. If order comes into force February first serious dislocation trade many lines will result.

(Signed) Mackenzie.

An hon. MEMBER: Is there any reply to that?

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is the usual reply that one might expect. There is another letter from the same gentleman addressed from London under date of February 25, 1929, to the Hon. J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, Ottawa. In part, this letter reads:

In common with all other trade associations, members of this federation, the Association of British Chemical Manufacturers, 166 Piccadilly, London, W.1., was informed of the recent alteration in basis in the British preferential tariff.

Then the writer refers to an interview he had with a representative of chemical manufacturers, and he says:

I explained to my caller that as far as we were aware, the government of Canada was not prepared to issue a list of this description. He then raised specifically the question of mercury and its compounds. He pointed out that mercury is unprocurable from empire sources and that as a constituent it enters into innumerable compounds of a chemical nature, being either the predominant factor as regards value or at any rate being a very considerable factor.

I informed my caller that as far as information available in this country at the present time went, I thought that what was in the minds of the authorities in Ottawa was that each such compound would have to be considered on its own merits and a decision given covering such a compound.

A further conversation took place between Mr. Pratt and myself, when he pointed out that the number of such compounds containing mercury was a very large one indeed and was being continually added to as new specifics are produced.

I asked him if he would write to me on the matter, and this he has now done. On behalf, therefore, of the Association of British Chemical Manufacturers, I would ask you to be kind enough to give consideration to the case as put by him in his own words, as follows:—

"I should like to have a ruling on the following point of principle in connection with the submission of special cases on behalf of this association.

If we take the case of mercury compounds as an example, we find that the raw material, namely mercury, is not obtainable commercially within the empire. In most mercury compounds, the cost of the metal itself will constitute more than 50 per cent of the cost of the final product."

There is a long brief dealing with the matter. I will now read a memorandum handed to the minister by the British High Commissioner in this city. This is dated from the High Commissioner's office, Ottawa, January 28, 1929, and it reads:

After a careful examination of the new Canadian regulations governing the grant of imperial preference to goods entering Canada from Great Britain, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom are of the opinion that the application of these regulations on first February would result in an unfortunate dislocation of trade.

Conscious of the motives of the Canadian government in framing and announcing the new regulations for the benefit of inter-imperial trade His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom desire to suggest that the regulations in question should not be brought into operation until first April or first May, thereby enabling traders to adjust themselves to the new conditions and at the same time to fulfil forward contracts the raw material for which will have been ordered some time before the new regulations were announced.

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom have further ascertained that the following goods, amongst others, which are manufactured wholly in the United Kingdom, will be unable to qualify for imperial preference because the raw materials, which are unobtainable in the United Kingdom in commercial quantities, exceed 50 per cent of the total value of the manufactured article:—

Manufactures of copper and its alloys, cotton yarns up to 40 counts, grey cotton piece goods, certain types of silk goods, paper manufactures and electric cables. Detailed particulars to support the statement that the goods for which exemption is asked are wholly manufactured in the United Kingdom and that the raw materials are not obtainable in the United Kingdom in commercial quantities are being prepared in London for the information of His Majesty's government in Canada; but pending their receipt the High Commissioner in Canada for His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom has been instructed to put forward very earnest request for exemption of the goods mentioned above from the new Canadian regulations, or the modification of the latter in such a manner as will enable goods wholly manufactured in the United Kingdom from the above raw materials to continue to benefit by Canada's traditional policy of preference for British empire manufactures.

[Mr. Campbell.]

There are further complaints in the correspondence, and it is not surprising that no recent complaints have been made, because the minister has not dealt with those that have already been forwarded—

Mr. ROBB: What justification has my hon. friend for saying that the minister has not dealt with the complaints?

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is nothing on the file to show, and the minister has not said that he has dealt with them. Will he tell us now whether the matter has been dealt with and whether such a list has been published?

Mr. ROBB: I informed the house a few moments ago that the Department of National Revenue had a man in England who was looking into all these cases as they came before us, but since then we have had no complaints from the overseas boards. I understand that the officer is now on the way home. I imagine when he returns, we shall have the report, but I repeat that while my hon. friend has read from a long list of statements which have come from overseas, he has not made out any case that British importations have been stopped. My hon. friend has read some statements wherein it is claimed that certain goods were not obtainable in the United Kingdom. The British High Commissioner made the same statement to us, but we told him frankly that the United Kingdom did not comprise the whole British Empire, and that certain goods, if they were not obtainable in the United Kingdom, as we knew they were not, were obtainable in Canada and in South Africa. I will admit at once, as I admitted before, that there may be cases where we will have to make modifications, but we are not going any further than some of the other British dominions. Australia requires 75 per cent, New Zealand 50 per cent and the mother country herself requires 75 per cent on certain optical goods going in there from here. I am not sure just what South Africa requires. Surely it is not unreasonable on behalf of the British workingman to see to it that so far as possible British workingmen are employed within the United Kingdom if the reduced tariff is to be taken advantage of. When I brought this measure in before, I told my hon. friend that our attention had been directed to the fact that the British preference was getting into disrepute even among the British workingmen. Why? Because the goods were brought in from non-preference countries, indeed from countries with which Canada had not a favoured trade agreement. They would do a little work on them, repack the goods on the wharves, perhaps at Liverpool or some other shipping point, and then ship them to Canada as British goods. I am sure that my hon. friend desires, as we all do, that if we are to give a British preference it should be as far as possible a preference for British goods, and it is not unreasonable to ask that there be 50 per cent of British labour and material, the labour in the United Kingdom and the material from anywhere within the empire. There may be cases where it is not obtainable, but these cases will be adjusted when the report of the officials of the department investigating the matter comes before us. That report has not yet been presented.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have no complaint to make of the regulations in so far as they stimulate inter-imperial trade. Our complaint has been on the ground that this regulation impedes inter-imperial trade. The Minister of Finance refers to South Africa, New Zealand and some of the other dominions, but those dominions have exempted a list of goods which are not commercially procurable within the British Empire. That is the whole argument. Take velvet, for instance. In the raw it is procurable in Japan. It is brought to England and manufactured there, but the raw material is more than 50 per cent, and under this regulation it could not come in under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: The British government has not brought that to my attention so far as my recollection goes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: No doubt there are a great many other commodities that have not been brought to the minister's attention. It seems to me that at the very time when the United States are proposing to increase their tariff against our natural products, it would be good business for us to make it as easy as possible for the British people to buy our products, instead of putting into effect a regulation that certainly will have the effect of impeding inter-imperial trade. Until such a list is published and until certain of these goods are exempted from its application, this regulation must certainly interfere with trade from the mother country, and will prevent many British goods from coming in and getting the advantage of the British preference.

Item agreed to

Customs tariff—541c. Woven fabrics of vegetable fibres, coated or impregnated, imported for use exclusively as "brattice cloth" in underground mining operations: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. CANTLEY: May I ask the minister if there is any brattice cloth made in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: This item covers a woven jute fabric used for the diversion of air currents in mines. It is not of a class or kind made in Canada, and is essential to deep workings. At present it comes in under item 546 at 12½, 25 and 30 per cent. This has been requested by the Ontario Mining Association and the Mining Association of British Columbia. The imports are not ascertainable. The estimated reduction in taxation will be about $80,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister's information is quite correct so far as it goes. I have never known of any brattice cloth made in this country. It is just a jute fabric usually impregnated with pine tar.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—569e. Miners' safety helmets, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use exclusively in mining operations: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: The present rates are 22½, 30 and 35 per cent. There is no separate classification of imports. The change suggested in this item is to cover the hard hat or safety helmet used by miners as a protection against injury. This has been requested by the Ontario Mining Association.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In a case of this kind, where human life is concerned, I would think it would be better not to restrict the application of the item by using the words "of a class or kind not made in Canada." The very best helmets obtainable for this purpose should be allowed to come in free, because the safety and the very lives of the miners are at stake.

Mr. ROBB: The mining association represented that this would satisfy them.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did they ask for the inclusion of those words, "of a class or kind not made in Canada"?

Mr. ROBB: The officer of the department tells me that it was their suggestion.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Of the miners themselves?

Mr. ROBB: Of the Ontario Mining Association.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is not an association of the miners who dig the coal.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—618a. Gaskets of rubber for use in the permanent sealing of cans for food products: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to amend this item by inserting before the word "rubber" the word "unvulcanized", and before the word "cans" the word "metal."

Mr. BENNETT: Why is it only for metal cans?

Mr. ROBB: This was asked for by the customs, in administering the act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The item reads:

Gaskets of rubber for use in the permanent sealing of cans for food products.

The rates proposed are free, 7½ and 10 per cent. What were the old rates?

Mr. ROBB: Fifteen, 25 and 27½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would understand the item as meaning rubber gaskets for use in glass sealers, fruit jars, and so on, but the minister now proposes to restrict its application to metal cans. Would the resolution as it stood prior to the amendment apply to glass sealers used for preserved fruit?

Mr. ROBB: No. These particular sealers are rubber rings, not unlike elastic bands, which are used in the permanent sealing of cans in sardine canneries. Those used in Canada, according to the evidence presented to the tariff board, are obtained almost entirely from Norway. They come in at 20 per cent under the French treaty. Those my hon. friend refers to are made in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not understand this thing yet. Will the minister tell the committee why the amendment is necessary?

Mr. ROBB: The customs department asks that the change be made for administration purposes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I cannot understand how it affects administration.

Mr. ROBB: I may tell my hon. friend that I do not either. It is asked for by the customs.

[Mr. Adshead.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then as neither the committee nor the minister understands the reason for the change, why make it? As I read it at the moment it means this, that the manufacturer of canned goods will get his rubber bands at the reduced rate, but the unfortunate housewife who is canning her fruit in the fall will be paying for her rubber bands at the high rate. That is wholly unfair and absolutely out of keeping with the alleged policy of the Liberal party I protest against this. It is a small thing and I do not see why the minister should make the change; but if in principle it is sound to give the canneries this reduction, surely it is sound to give the housewife on the farm the same advantage.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment. I will take a chance on it as it is. If there is any trouble we will have to straighten it out later.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the minister have leave to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. McPHERSON: Might I suggest that the minister strike out the word "permanent" and so obviate any argument as to what this means?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. McPHERSON: The article, it is true, is small, but my experience is that the customs board in determining under what classification an article may enter can give a more weird exhibition as verbal acrobats than any other body I know of. I expect on the first attempt to pass this article through the customs the importer would be told: "That cannot possibly be for the permanent sealing of cans for food products. What can it be for? Only for temporary purposes. Therefore you are not entitled to any reduction of duty."

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot think anything could be permanent under this.

Mr. McPHERSON: No, I think they would immediately rule it was not permanent. I suggest that the word "permanent" be struck out.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I move that the word "permanent" in the second line be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—632b. Specially designed needles of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use only in repairing fish nets, when such nets are used exclusively for the fisheries, but not for use in repairing nets for sportsmen: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 632c as it is here in print has been changed to 632b.

Mr. BENNETT: What is involved in this?

Mr. ROBB: Would my hon. friend like to know?

Mr. BENNETT: I would not have asked if I did not wish to know.

Mr. ROBB: This application was received from Doctor O. B. Price—Doctor Price M.P. —on January 8, 1929. He desired that this be dropped from 15 and 17½ to the free list.

Mr. BENNETT: Have the government met his wish?

Mr. ROBB: I was delighted to.

Mr. SHORT: How many of these needles were imported last year ?

Mr. ROBB: Needles of vulcanite fibre, used for making fishing nets, not made in Canada, imports not traceable.

Mr. MANION: That is why they gave in.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, here is another amusing piece of phraseology that demands explanation. Will the minister tell the committee just how he is going to make this clause operative? The last part of it reads "but not for use in repairing nets for sportsmen." Why put in a clause of that kind? It is absolutely impossible for the department or for the minister or for anybody else to undertake that sportsmen will not buy these needles in some way or other for the repair of their nets. And what harm would it do if they did? I wonder if the minister ever saw a sportsman's fishing net? It constitutes a receptacle a foot or a foot and a half across and involves less than a yard of net.

Mr. SHORT: I do not suppose there was ever a needle imported for that purpose. I think the only reason it is inserted there is that the minister is trying to show to the country that he is doing something for the fishing industry. I do not know any other reason for the inclusion of that phrase. In the customs department they cannot find that any of these needles have ever been imported for this purpose.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Does the minister know that the few needles which do come in are donated by the manufacturers of nets? It is just on the same principle as applies to your cigar-lighter: the cigar store does not charge you for refilling it.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the minister thinks the sportsmen will be sports enough to pay the duty on the needles when they buy them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The sportsmen will say: we are sportsmen, and therefore anxious to pay a duty to the Liberal government.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—682c. Metal swivels, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when used exclusively for the fisheries, not to include swivels for sportsmen's use: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 682b has been changed to 682c, metal swivels, and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: How many of these were imported?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of imports. The imports are not ascertainable.

Mr. SHORT: What is the idea of putting this on the free list? Who made application for it?

Mr. ROBB: I understand that the representatives of the fishing industry asked for it.

Mr. SHORT: Perhaps Mr. Deachman made application.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no objection whatever to the item carrying, but I presume the minister has secured satisfactory evidence from the Tariff Advisory Board in connection with both these items. He insists that no reductions take place until he has had an investigation by the board.

Mr. ROBB: Do not press me too closely on that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Were the two items, the one for needles and the other for swivels, submitted to the tariff board before the reductions were allowed?

Mr. ROBB: Not for inquiry. It was submitted to them when we sat around the table.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I presume the Minister of Finance sat around the table with the tariff board and decided on the reduction in duty on other commodities as well?

Mr. ROBB: The government of the day are responsible for the tariff.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, a tariff inquiry before the tariff board is not absolutely necessary prior to the introduction of a reduction. Do I understand that to be the case, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. ROBB: Why should my hon. friend attempt to cross-examine me on that when he himself has advocated a tariff reduction this afternoon and I have consented to it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just so we may get this clearly, the minister states frankly that he has power—and very properly so—to make any necessary reduction in the tariff that in the public interest appears to him to be necessary without an advisory board examination.

Mr. ROBB: Contingent upon the approval of parliament.

Mr. FORKE: If nobody checks him up it is all right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, all this tariff talk we heard from the minister and others associated with him on the other side was so much "bunk."

Mr. BENNETT: Eyewash.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Absolute eyewash. They have sheltered themselves behind the board in order to escape the inevitable logic of their own pledges. They have refused to carry out their promises to the people of Canada and they come to this house and say, "This matter has not been fully investigated by the tariff board", or, "If you want a reduction apply to the tariff board", and so forth. The minister now frankly admits, what we have always held to be true, that if the Liberal government sincerely wished to carry out their pledges to the people they could have introduced the necesary reductions from year to year.

Mr. SHORT: Is there any record of imports under this item?

Mr. ROBB: Not ascertainable.

Mr. SHORT: It is such items as this that the expensive tariff board is investigating?—the tariff board which this country is paying so much to keep up. Is that board having round table talks over such items, which do not amount to anything so far as the fisheries of the country are concerned? Why, I do not think we import a single article under this item.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, there were three last year.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to this item?

Mr. SHORT: I am not objecting to it because there is nothing to object to. I am saying that it is a waste of time for the tariff board, which is costing the country tremendous sums of money, to investigate items like this.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): There is a distinction between these swivels when used by fishermen, in which case they are free, and when used by sportsmen, in which case they are dutiable. A swivel is a little thing about the size of the end of your finger. What provision is there for deciding when a swivel is to be used by a sportsman and when it is for the use of fishermen?

Mr. ROBB: The customs administer that.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have listened to a lengthy criticism from the hon. member for Bow River in regard to this item and he has referred to the tariff board in connection with the matter. Some hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia, basing their statements on answers to questions put to the minister, point out that there are no imports under this item, and the hon. member for Bow River states that many of us who are supporting the government have on various occasions contended in the country that it was impossible to propose reductions inasmuch as the matter had not been before the commission. It seems ridiculous on the face of it for an individual with the intelligence of the hon. member for Bow River to attempt to prove something against the government while hon. members from Nova Scotia condemn the government, using an argument that disproves what the hon. gentleman says. One says that we are attempting to hide behind something, and the others say that although we are doing something, in the final analysis we are doing nothing.

Mr. SHORT: Does not the final analysis show that this tariff board have done nothing?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—689b. Equipment, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and integral parts thereof, for distributing stone dust in mines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. CANTLEY: What information has the minister in regard to this?

Mr. ROBB: Stone dust is used in coal mines to limit the possibilities of coal dust explosions. It was represented to the tariff board by the Mining Society of Nova Scotia and the Mining Association of British Columbia that the equipment essential to the distribution of stone dust throughout the workings could not be procured in Canada, and it was being assessed for duty at 15 per cent, 25 per cent, and 27½ per cent, under item 453. It was stated by the Mining Society of Nova Scotia that the use of stone dust was being made compulsory in that province, and request was made for free entry of the distributing equipment. It has been thought wise, however, to retain a measure of protection, as this would seem to be an apparatus which might be made in this country; for which reason also the item is restricted to cover equipment of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The only objection I have to the item is that it is not free. Item 569e, already carried, provides for the free entry of miners' safety helmets, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use exclusively in mining operations. I cannot understand why this equipment is discriminated against.

Mr. ROBB: It is free under the British preference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, but 5 and 10 per cent respectively under the intermediate and the general. It would be just as well to make it free under all tariffs. This is something intended for the prevention of loss of life and the minister will only make it more difficult for mining operators to prevent explosions in mines, while at the same time he is rendering it safer for the miner to the extent of admitting helmets free. I do not know just how to describe an inconsistency of this sort. Miners' helmets are free but this equipment is taxed.

Mr. ROBB: There is the same spread as before.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister consider amending the item by striking out the 5 and 10 per cent and making it free?

Mr. ROBB: I prefer to maintain the British preference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, why did not the minister do so in connection with miners' helmets?

Mr. BENNETT: Especially in view of the fact that they make safety helmets in England.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is not consistent.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Wherever these words, "of a class or kind not made in Canada," occur in the tariff, what is the practice of the customs authorities? Do they throw upon the importer the burden of proving that the article in question is not made in Canada or do they assume that responsibility?

Mr. STEVENS: They ask Mr. Deachman.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) has no doubt observed the statement made by the minister that in this matter it has been thought wise to retain a measure of protection. From this statement the hon. member for Weyburn will realize the policy of the administration.

Mr. COOTE: Item 689a provides for the free entry of miners' rescue appliances, designed for emergency use in mines where artificial breathing is necessary in the presence of poisonous gases, and automatic resuscitation apparatus for artificial breathing, to aid in the saving of human life. If there is reason for making these appliances free under all tariffs, why should not this rescue apparatus be made free also? Stone dust is used to prevent explosions; the other apparatus is used to resuscitate persons after the explosion has occurred. Surely it would be better to prevent the explosion. There is an old saying that an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. It is difficult to understand why this item, 689b, should not be free under all headings.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure the minister would find no objection in the house to his placing on the free list this particular machinery designed to prevent loss of life. I have not heard a single voice raised in opposition to the proposal which has come from I think two corners of this house.

Mr. ROBB: Quite true, but the mining associations which asked for this change are quite satisfied with the item as it stands.

Mr. COOTE: Is that what they asked for?

Mr. CANTLEY: What authority has the minister for making that statement?

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend say they are not satisfied?

Mr. CANTLEY: I am asking the minister for his authority for that statement.

Mr. ROBB: I have had no complaint from them; I understand they are satisfied.

Mr. CANTLEY: I doubt it.

Mr. MacNUTT: Would the minister tell the committee the importations under this item last year?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification; we are unable to trace it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before we pass on, could the minister tell the committee the volume and the value of the importations of this machinery from Great Britain and from other countries under the intermediate and general tariff?

Mr. ROBB: I have just told my hon. friend there is no separate classification, so that I am unable to give the committee that information.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That being the case, does not the minister think it will be much safer to put the whole business on the free list? Then he can be satisfied that he has done his duty not only to the mine workers of Canada but also to his own principles.

Mr. ROBB: I think we had better let it go as it is.

Mr. CANTLEY: I would like the minister to say if it is not a fact that to-day there is no finality in machinery designed for coal dusting. Coal dusting is a comparatively new method of combating the explosive dust which lodges everywhere in a coal mine, and I believe that to-day no machinery has been really perfected as a distributing agency for coal dust. Various people are experimenting with machines designed for this purpose, and until some particular method of distribution is decided upon as being the best would it not be well to allow machinery of this type made anywhere in the world to enter Canada free?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is going on record as favouring certain principles, but I would say that this is a very substantial reduction, and as far as I know the mining associations are quite satisfied with this change. At any rate, parliament will meet again in another year, when this matter can be considered again, so I would suggest that it go through now as it is.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the original item?

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent, and now they are free, 5 per cent and 10 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the number of the old item?

Mr. ROBB: This machinery came in under item 453.

Mr. GARLAND: (Bow River): Item 453 provides for telephone and telegraph instruments, electric and galvanic batteries and so on.

Mr. ROBB: That must be a n.o.p. item.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister quite sure of the number?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has not read the whole item. Further down he will find the following:

. . . . and all machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, n.o.p.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—695b. Drawings or sketches of garments, but not including patterns, when imported in single copies by manufacturers of garments: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: This item has been amended to read as follows:

695b. Drawings or sketches of garments, or of boots and shoes, but not including patterns, when imported in single copies of each such drawing or sketch by manufacturers of garments or of boots and shoes or of boot and shoe patterns: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Here is another of these petty little discriminations against the consumers in Canada, perpetrated by an alleged Liberal administration. Drawings of sketches of garments, or patterns, as the housewives call them, for dresses or boots and shoes, when imported for the use of manufacturers enter free of duty, but if a housewife sees an excellent design she would like to have for her own use, she must pay duty on it. Really the minister cannot be consistent in his policy if he resists a protest against this discrimination. Will he tell the committee why the housewives in Canada should not be given the same advantages in securing these patterns as are enjoyed by the manufacturers?

Mr. ROBB: This does not cover patterns; it includes drawings or sketches from which the patterns are made. This is proposed to cover rough freehand sketches by designers, which are usually made in foreign style centres either direct from the model or from photographs, and in consideration of a fee paid by the Canadian designer who desires to copy the style sketches, either by himself or by his representative. They have no artistic, commercial or intrinsic value to anyone except the man who makes them, and they cannot be used as patterns. At present they enter under a duty of 22½ per cent.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the minister not think he should add the usual phrase "of a class or kind not made in Canada"?

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Who requested this reduction?

Mr. ROBB: The clothing and boot and shoe men of Canada.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Does the minister mean to say that the boot and shoe men and the clothing men, who enjoy a very high protection on their finished article, are asking that these sketches come in free?

Mr. ROBB: I just noticed that I have before me the record of a public hearing before the tariff board in connection with this matter, held on January 23. Those present were:

Mr. R. P. Sparks, Canadian Garment Manufacturers' Association.
Mr. L. Phillips, Canadian Garment Manufacturers' Association.
Mr. C. F. Sherwood, Canadian Garment Manufacturers' Association.
R. E. Oaks, Manufacturers' Credit Bureau.
H. W. Macdonnell, Canadian Manufacturers' Association.
A. E. Darby, Canadian Council of Agriculture.
R. J. Deachman, Consumers' League of Canada.

Mr. Sherwood, secretary of the association, read the brief, stating that the Canadian garment manufacturers made it a practice to go to New York and to pay for the privilege of looking over models produced by New York manufacturers. The Canadian manufacturer would make rough sketches of such models as appeared to him to be suitable for Canadian use. On bringing these into the country they were subject to a duty rate of 15 per cent under the preferential and 22½ per cent under the general. . . .

Considerable discussion took place over the wording of the proposed section, Mr. Sparks holding that the word "pattern" should not be used, as "patterns" were generally finished products which had a saleable commercial value, and its adoption might be objected to by patternmakers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I take it that this is the same Mr. Sparks who was so active in connection with the customs inquiry. This is a noble generosity on the part of the Liberal administration in extending to him a privilege which certainly his animosity would hardly deserve. Now may I ask why, in conceding to the manufacturers this undoubted privilege, the government have not included the patterns used by the housewives of Canada? What is the duty imposed on patterns used in making dresses and so on?

Mr. ROBB: Exactly the same duty as will be paid by these people if they bring in such patterns, but this item does not cover patterns; it is designed to include the sketches from which the patterns are made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But why not give the housewife a chance by letting the manufacturer still pay for the patterns and allowing the housewives to get them free? That would be a reversal of the policy of the government which would be exceedingly acceptable to the consumers.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—696. Philosophical and scientific apparatus, utensils, instruments, and preparations, including boxes and bottles containing the same; maps, photographic reproductions, casts as models, etchings, lithographic prints or charts; mechanical equipment of a class or kind not made in Canada. All articles in this item, when specially imported in good faith for the use and by order of any society or institution incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use and by order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in Canada, and not for sale, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: The only change in this item is the inclusion of the words, "mechanical equipment of a class or kind not made in Canada."

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What is philosophical apparatus?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think the tariff board would be one.

Mr. McGIBBON: As the Minister of National Revenue constantly keeps out of the house I wonder if the Minister of Finance would procure an answer to the question I asked earlier in the day?

Mr. ROBB: What was that?

Mr. McGIBBON: With reference to automobiles.

Mr. ROBB: I will ask my colleague about that. He will be in before we finish with the business of the committee.

Mr. TUMMON: Before we leave these items I wonder if the minister would refer to item 460f, face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors, air engines, and so on.

Mr. ROBB: That item is being held over; it will come up again.

Mr. TUMMON: Would the minister answer a question with reference to that part of the item which reads, "integral parts of all motive power or machinery mentioned in this item," and state whether that would apply to only machines now in use in Canada or would it apply to parts imported to go along with other parts made in Canada in order to complete the unit or machine?

Mr. ROBB: I will refer that question to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue who administers the department. I am bound to say that I am not in position to answer for the gentleman who administers the department.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister say just what items are being held over?

Mr. ROBB: There were some items in the early part of the list.

The CHAIRMAN: The first two.

Mr. TUMMON: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the point I have raised is a rather important point and one which should be decided. If it is necessary that the Minister of National Revenue should be in his place to answer these questions I think he should be present, because we are entitled to the information before the item is finally passed. Will the Minister of Finance give the house his assurance that the Minister of National Revenue will be here to give what information is required or to answer any questions we might ask?

Mr. ROBB: I would rather not undertake that.

Mr. BENNETT: We are entitled to have the answers.

Mr. ROBB: I will try to communicate with my colleague and ask him to be here.

Mr. BENNETT: He was here this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: Get the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring him in.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. McGIBBON: He has been conveniently gotten away.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has pointed out that this item might lead to a very great unfairness. Take, for instance, a hospital which is conducted as a public institution and a hospital conducted by a religious organization; in the one instance it could get this apparatus free and in the other it could not.

Mr. ROBB: I think the intention was to make it broad enough.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not the case.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member knows that there are cases where imports coming to hospitals or religious organizations are permitted by the treasury board to come in.

Mr. BENNETT: I recall an instance where a statue was brought in and passed and also another instance where a ring for ecclesisastical purposes which could not be made in Canada was allowed to come in.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the minister would include the words "scientific institutions" or something of that kind it might clarify things.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "scientific" has not been construed to mean a hospital, that is the trouble.

Mr. MacLAREN: I was suggesting that the words "scientific institutions" be added.

Mr. ROBB: Item 466a covers glassware and other scientific apparatus for laboratory work in public hospitals and also apparatus for sterilizing purposes, not including washing or laundry machines when imported for the use and by order of any public hospital; free.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is limited to three things as compared to this one; how about X-ray apparatus?

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that this change was asked for by the customs department for administrative purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister must see the difficulty. This item is limited in its operations to specifically named institutions. Why could not the word "hospitals" be added, or the words "any society, hospital or institution"? The minister might let this item stand and ask the officials of the department about it.

Mr. ROBB: I think perhaps we had better reconsider that item.

Mr. BENNETT: If the words "or hospitals" or "seminaries of learning" were added it would cover it.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—779a. Copper rods when imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories in the manufacture of electrical conductors, the individual units of such electrical conductors not to exceed the area of No. 7/0 gauge conductor, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, ¼ cent; general tariff, ½ cent.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I made reference to this item when I was speaking on the budget and I endeavoured to explain the situation in regard to copper rods. I will go over this again in order to refresh the minds of the hon. members. Copper bars are the finished product of the smelter and the raw material of the rolling mill which rolls them into copper rods. Copper rods in their turn are the raw material of the copper manufacturers. The situation is something like this: A small ring of men in the United States control 95 per cent of the copper output of the world. They do not mine it but they control the output and they export copper bars to other countries at a higher price than they sell to their own people in the United States. The purpose in doing that is this: they want to fix the price of copper the world over. If they fixed it in the United States, they would run foul of their anti-trust law. Therefore they fix the price for export, and then each one goes back to his own office and quotes for home consumption in the United States a price $8 a ton less than the price he quotes people in other countries.

Mr. BENNETT: Five dollars a ton.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Well, that makes my argument that much stronger. There is located in Brockville one concern which rolls copper bars into copper rods. It employs some thirty-one men in that work. It receives 60 per cent of its raw material from the smelter at Trail in British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not fair to say that they did, but they do not now? I think the record shows that.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Why not now?

Mr. BENNETT: Because they have discontinued manufacturing that raw material at Trail.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does my hon. friend mean to say that copper is no longer smelted at Trail?

Mr. BENNETT: It is smelted, but not refined to the extent that would make it available as raw material for that particular plant. I think that was the evidence of the Mr. Phillips people.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That was not the understanding I had of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just asking the hon. gentleman if that is not the fact.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My understanding was that they get 60 per cent from Trail and that they have to purchase the other 40 per cent in the United States; that the smelter at Trail is not under the control of this copper ring, and therefore does not charge this excess price. But this concern in Canada has to pay an excess price of $5 a ton on its copper bars and then when it comes to sell its rods it is met by the competition of concerns in the United States who get their raw material at a lower price but who do not pay any duty on the rods coming into Canada. The proposal now is to charge on copper rods a duty of half a cent a pound, or $10 a ton. This is the raw material of no less than five factories which are using copper rods in Canada. The concern at Brockville employing thirty-one men is handicapped to the extent of $5 a ton and the proposal is to offset this handicap by putting double that rate, or an additional $10 a ton, on the raw material of five different factories in Canada. The concern in Brockville is handicapped on only 40 per cent of its raw material. These other concerns, if this duty is added, will be handicapped on 100 per cent of their raw material. This would be equal to multiplying the handicap by five and placing it on another branch of the same industry. I do not think this is economically sound, and I would suggest that the minister let the item stand over.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend tell us who, of these five companies he has just mentioned, objects to this?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I am not saying that any of them objects, but looking at the matter with a purely philosophical mind—

Mr. BENNETT: Ah, but that apparatus is free.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): There is no head tax.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 124, for the relief of William Ernest Foulkes—Mr. Cahan.

ELIAS ABRAHAM

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 159, for the relief of Elias Abraham, otherwise known as Elie Abraham Allen.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask a question with regard to this long list of bills sponsored by the hon. member for Cartier. Are these Ontario or Quebec cases?

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend pretend that my jurisdiction extends only to the province of Quebec?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not at all. I am asking for information, as to whether these cases come from the province of Ontario or from the province of Quebec.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that merely to satisfy curiosity?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not altogether. We have been informed in this house that nearly all these divorce cases come from Ontario, that that province alone gives us nearly all this trouble. I should like to know as a matter of fact whether that is correct. We know that some cases come from the province of Quebec. What is the state of affairs with regard to this long list of bills sponsored by the hon. member for Cartier?

Mr. JACOBS: I think they are all from the province of Ontario, perhaps with one exception. Apparently my reputation as a divorce getter has extended to Ontario, for I get all this business from there.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time on division.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 119, for the relief of Bessie Ruth Glass.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 125, for the relief of Edith Marie McFarlane.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 128, for the relief of Cleoniki Paleologou Drakoulas.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 140, for the relief of Nanette Coffey.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 141, for the relief of James Graham McCreadie.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 142, for the relief of Stephen Dymon.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 179, for the relief of Madelaine Virginia Lumsden.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 180, for the relief of Edgar Charles Buchanan.—Mr. Stewart (Leeds).

Bill No. 184, for the relief of Edna Maud James.—Mr. Spence (Parkdale).

[Mr. Cahan.]

Bill No. 185, for the relief of Helen Jane Sim Pittendreich.—Mr. Spence (Parkdale).

Bill No. 187, for the relief of Alfred Roy Edwards.—Mr. Spence (Parkdale).

Bill No. 189, for the relief of Molly Vaughan.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 190, for the relief of Lillian Augusta Dunn.—Mr. Tummon.

Bill No. 191, for the relief of Myrtle Mary Jane McLean.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 193, for the relief of Mary Bertha Dupuis Ranger.—Mr. Millar.

Bill No. 206, for the relief of Walter Henry Lyne Dixson.—Mr. Tummon.

Bill No. 207, for the relief of Ida Rosenberg.—Mr. Spence (Parkdale).

Bill No. 208, for the relief of Marjory Lavinia Bradford.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

Motions for second readings agreed to on division.

DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

RIGHT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO ESTABLISH DOMICILE

The house resumed from May 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 75, respecting the domicile of married women in proceedings for divorce—Mr. Ward—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I presume on the—

Mr. WARD: Mr. Chairman, may I interpose? The bill has been amended slightly, and perhaps it would facilitate discussion if I gave to the house the amended form. When it was up for consideration on May 3 members of the committee offered certain objections and proposed certain amendments. I have endeavoured to embody those proposals in the bill in its amended form, because I consider them practical and they do not destroy the principle of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I object. If the hon. member has amendments to propose they should be put on the notice paper for examination.

Mr. WARD: I have a number of copies here for any hon. members who wish to see them.

Mr. CAHAN: I still object. The bill is so important that these amendments should be printed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was going to offer the same objection. In view of the very great importance of the bill and the importance of the change which the hon. member is suggesting, the amendments should be printed.

Mr. WARD: Certainly I should like to defer to the opinions of the Minister of Justice and of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but the principle of the bill has not been changed one iota. We have merely changed the wording; we have deleted subsection 3 and embodied 2 and 3 in one section. The principle is, however, exactly the same as when first the bill was introduced.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. member is moving an amendment to section 2 of the bill.

Mr. WARD: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is now considering section 1 and this section will have to be disposed of before an amendment can be considered to a subsequent section. So far as printing the amendments is concerned, under the rules notice is not necessary unless the committee so decides. As this is a public bill it will, however, first be necessary to adopt section 1 before any amendments may be considered in relation to section 2. Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. CAHAN: On the title we are at liberty to discuss, are we not, the general principle and purport of the bill?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 is the short title; shall section 1 carry?

Mr. CAHAN: This, as has already been stated, is a bill to provide for a divorce jurisdiction in the case of women who are judicially or otherwise separated from and living separate and apart from their husbands; and the general provision is that if a woman has been deserted by and has lived separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years, and is still living apart from him, she may secure domicile and be entitled to divorce in any court having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii. This bill will enable any woman to desert her husband and to obtain, so far as the jurisdiction of this parliament extends, the right to proceed to the United States, to Reno, and to acquire domicile there. And if in the state of Nevada divorce under the law is granted for minor disagreements between husband and wife—and divorce is granted there for incompatibility of temperament—

Mr. WARD: Will the hon. gentleman pardon an interruption? The amendment as proposed to the bill does not permit women to get divorce outside the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman will read the amendment he will see that the argument he is making is not applicable to the bill as amended.

Mr. CAHAN: I was discussing the bill for the purpose of directing the attention of the committee to its very expansive character. As it now stands it gives legislative confirmation to any divorce hereafter obtained in any part of the world, from here to Patagonia and on the coasts of the seven seas, if the woman—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the hon. member by what authority the federal government of Canada could give a married woman, or anyone else for that matter, the right to take legal action in another country?

Mr. CAHAN: At the present time, if either husband or wife deserts the other and proceeds to the United States to obtain a temporary domicile there, and secures a divorce in any state of the United States, that person is not as a general rule permitted to come back to Canada and marry again in this country. But this bill, if it is passed in its present terms, provides that either husband or wife may desert the other matrimonial partner and proceed to any country in the world and obtain a divorce for causes which we in Canada do not recognize but which are recognized in the foreign domicile so acquired, and should such person come back to Canada, this parliament is declaring that, so far as its legislative jurisdiction extends—and it extends to such individual upon return to Canada—that foreign divorce shall be valid within the various provinces of the Dominion. I consider the bill so extreme and broad in its terms that it certainly should not receive the approval of the house. However, I am prepared to listen with consideration to the amendments proposed; but I think they should be printed so that we may have an opportunity to study their precise terms and especially their legal purport.

Mr. LADNER: I suggest that the committee should have the amendments before it for consideration, because after all in discussing this bill we are considering something of an extraordinary nature. I have before me the amendment which the hon. member (Mr. Ward) proposes and it is so entirely different from the bill as originally submitted that it seems quite reasonable that we should have it before us for consideration. The principle is the same; but the amendment states:

A wife deserted by, and living separate and apart from her husband shall be deemed to retain the domicile of her husband at the time she was so deserted until she has acquired a domicile of her own choice in Canada and may acquire such domicile for herself in Canada as though she were a femme sole, when such desertion has continued for a period of two years, and on acquiring such domicile in Canada may commence an action for divorce where so domiciled praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that entitle her to such divorce in any court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii.

Mr. CAHAN: That is an entirely new bill.

Mr. LADNER: My suggestion is that we allow the hon. member to submit his amendments so that we may intelligently consider the bill as it will be actually before us.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Are we not now considering section 1?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 has not been adopted.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Section 1 is the short title, with which this discussion has nothing to do. What possible objection can there be to it? Let us first dispose of section 1.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If one is opposed to the bill, one is also opposed to that section. We are discussing a bill which is different from the bill as originally proposed, with this same section 1.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Nevertheless I contend that the only question before the committee at the present time is section 1.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 1 means nothing unless it is followed by something else; it has a meaning because there is a second section. And it is the second section to which we are objecting.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Married woman separate from husband.

Mr. WARD: I desire to move an amendment which will replace sections 2 and 3 and which will practically comprise the entire bill:

A wife deserted by, and living separate and apart from her husband shall be deemed to retain the domicile of her husband at the time she was so deserted until she has acquired a domicile of her own choice in Canada and may acquire such domicile for herself in Canada as though she were a femme sole, when such desertion has continued for a period of two years, and on acquiring such domicile in Canada may commence an action for divorce where so domiciled praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that entitle her to such divorce in any court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vincula matrimonii.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask my hon. friend if he is moving this as an amendment?

Mr. WARD: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not moved the amendment yet.

Mr. WARD: I move that the bill be amended by inserting this paragraph in lieu of sections 2 and 3 of the present bill.

Mr. LADNER: May I suggest to my hon. friend that in his amendment the words "and upwards" be inserted after the words "two years"; that is the usual phraseology in these proceedings.

Mr. WARD: I have no objection, so long as the principle of this bill is embodied in legislation. That is my only reason for introducing the bill.

Miss MACPHAIL: I cannot think any hon. member of this house will oppose the bill as amended, because it involves human rights. Although anxious that it should be in good legal form, I am not so much interested in the legal aspects of the matter as I am in the human rights of the case. A woman has just as much right as a man to be able to establish a legal domicile of her own where she can take action, and it is only because we still have a hang-over from the dark ages that this action must be taken to-day. While I am not really particularly interested in the involved legal argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George I want to see the bill passed in such form that it will enable a woman to establish a legal domicile of her own, and until she can do that she is indeed not a "person," as the supreme court decided some time ago. I feel that everyone will agree with the principle of the bill and will be anxious that women may be afforded the same privileges which men have enjoyed for a long time. There is no reason why men should have a corner on all the good things in life.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend claim that there should be two domiciles in a marriage union, one for the husband and one for the wife?

Miss MACPHAIL: Certainly; are there not two people?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That does not sound like the dark ages; it sounds like the period before the dark ages. It is against the natural law.

Miss MACPHAIL: That natural law stuff covers a lot of special privileges. Will the Minister of Justice, who gets so righteously indignant about two domiciles, say that if we should have only one it should be the domicile of the wife?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would have no objection. If the hon. member had been here the other day she would have heard me say that I care not whether it is the domicile of the husband or of the wife, but so long as there is a marital bond there must be only one domicile. That is the principle of British and international law.

Mr. BROWN: Following out that argument, then, I think it might be well contended that the woman should have equal rights with her husband in the one domicile.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend should abolish matrimony altogether; let us all be equal and free.

Miss MACPHAIL: Even that would not be as bad as some of the things we have now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Free love and free everything.

Mr. LADNER: On the argument presented by the Minister of Justice I would like to ask whether, in the case of a man who has been iniquitous in every sense of the word as far as his marital relations have been concerned and who moves off to unknown parts, he thinks the domicile should walk with the man and leave the poor woman stranded without any rights in regard to her future life or with regard to her children?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that in such cases the court always goes a long way to decide that the last domicile persists. If a man goes all around the world surely he would not benefit or profit by such vagrancy.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the domicile of origin commences.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and I am told that this is usually accepted by the courts.

Miss MACPHAIL: If that is true why is it that the legal profession has passed legal resolutions on this subject, asking that these changes be made?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The "legal profession" is a very wide expression; I do not think all the members of the legal profession have endorsed such resolutions.

Mr. LADNER: I may tell the Minister of Justice that in the courts of British Columbia, and I presume also in the other provinces where divorce courts exist, it is well-established law that you must establish domicile before you come under the jurisdiction of the court. If you do not know where the man is how can you establish domicile?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It will be the last domicile.

Mr. LADNER: No. I have had cases where the man has been gone for six or eight years, and the court will ask where that man is at the time of the trial, because he may have acquired domicile in Ontario or in Alberta, and in many of these cases the wife or the dependents do know where the husband is. He may have established a domicile in the United States, and once that fact comes to the attention of the court it is without jurisdiction to grant relief, so the argument of the Minister of Justice falls to the ground.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I was referring to the majority of cases. Such instances as my hon. friend has mentioned may arise, but I say that for the purpose of meeting difficulties which may exist in special cases we should not open wide the door to all sorts of applications such as I mentioned the other day. I do not want to repeat what I said then, but while I am on my feet I would like to direct the attention of the committee to the new bill—because by substituting a new section for sections 2 and 3 of the former bill my hon. friend has practically brought in a new bill. This bill would not limit the new domicile of the wife to the purpose of prosecuting an action for divorce; it establishes a domicile for all purposes.

Mr. CAHAN: It is beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament so to enact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Parliament has no right to deal with domicile. I know the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will not like it but we are still in the same position as we were when we allowed the provinces to settle their own provincial matters, and domicile generally comes under provincial jurisdiction. The bill states:

A wife deserted by and living separate and apart from her husband shall be deemed to retain the domicile of her husband at the time she was so deserted until she has acquired a domicile of her own choice in Canada and may acquire such domicile for herself in Canada as though she were a femme sole.

When such desertion has continued for a period of two years, after acquiring such new domicile she may institute proceedings for divorce. I believe the bill is beyond the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the Minister of Justice speaking as the head of the Justice department in interpreting the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am speaking for myself just now. I think the request of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was a very reasonable one, that we should have an opportunity of having this new bill printed and be given the time to consider it. It is a very important matter with which we are dealing and my first impression is that we are going beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The bill, as at present instituted, is an attempt to undo an unjustice which the law at it stands undoubtedly does to women, and I submit that the Minister of Justice, instead of criticizing the bill, should lend his powers and his legal ability to making it workable and giving the relief which the bill intends to give.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I regret that I cannot help my hon. friend, but I am opposed to spreading divorce in Canada. I am sorry the hon. member for Southeast Grey does not like that, but that is my principle.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I was asked by a very prominent lawyer in a city of Canada to give my support to this bill. He told me that he had had a case where a woman could not establish a domicile. Her husband had left her for many years and she did not know where he was. The learned judge on the bench told her that he was very sorry but under the existing laws of Canada he could not grant a divorce and give her the relief to which she was entitled.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest with conviction that this clause No. 2 is too wide in so far as it provides that for all purposes one may so acquire a domicile. It is possible that inasmuch as this parliament has jurisdiction to deal with divorce, it may incidentally have legislative jurisdiction to decide as to what shall constitute domicile for the purposes of divorce, but this bill is so wide that it comes in conflict with the provincial laws with regard to domicile as it affects property and civil rights. In so far as this bill affects property and civil rights, which are within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces, this section would be ultra vires of this parliament; and, therefore, it seems to me that if the mover of this amendment desires that this bill shall have the effect which he intends, and only that effect, the paragraph should be drafted differently so as to make it clear that, in dealing with the acquisition of domicile, it is the acquisition of a domicile for the purposes of divorce only and not for the purposes of civil status and civil rights.

Mr. McPHEE: Does not the first section of the bill show that?

Mr. GEARY: What does it show?

Mr. McPHEE: That "this act may be cited as the Divorce Jurisdiction Act."

Mr. GEARY: That is just a name.

Mr. BENNETT: I argued the case of Cook versus Cook before the Privy Council. The courts of Alberta had decided that a wife might, under the Matrimonial Clauses Act, obtain a divorce for herself. The Privy Council, following the decision, the House of Lords in the Jeffrey case, reaffirmed the old doctrine that the domicile of the wife was that of the husband and that there could be no domicile for her other than that of the husband, wherever that domicile might be. During the progress of the argument it was observed by one of the law lords that the only way in which the matter could be dealt with would be by the parliament of Canada. As the Minister of Justice has said, there is undoubtedly such a thing as two domiciles. There is the law of domicile with respect to the distribution of property, but we are not dealing with that here. I suppose there is no harm in saying that I discussed this matter with the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill, and also with the law officers. I think the most important words have been struck out, and they are, "for the purposes of this act a married woman. . ." This is an act which deals with the domicile in divorce matters, and this parliament would have jurisdiction. I quite agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the hon. Minister of Justice that we would be exercising powers entirely beyond our jurisdiction, so far as the British North America Act is concerned, unless we say that we are only legislating for the purposes of this act, that is, for divorce purposes.

The hon. Minister of Justice is opposed on principle to divorce, and the other evening he placed his position before the house with respect to the general principles regarding domicile in a manner to which no exception could be taken. He stated what the highest court of the realm has pronounced to be the law, having regard to the provisions of the statute under which we in Alberta exercise jurisdiction in divorce matters, namely, the English Divorce Act of 1857. Under the act of 1857 it was declared that a woman who was separated from her husband—I did not intend to participate in this debate and I have not the time to send out for the section—should have all the rights of a femme sole and she could contract or do as she pleased. Since that time the position of married women has greatly changed. Under the provisions of the law in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario, and the maritime provinces—I cannot speak with authority with respect to Quebec—a woman has a separate existence under the Married Women's Property Act with respect to property, with respect to contract and with respect to all rights which make her, in the eyes of the law, an individual apart from her husband. Up to the present time the law of the Dominion as to domicile has been that the domicile of the wife is that of the husband, and in the divorces granted by this parliament the question of domicile has been established on the basis of the domicile of the husband. This parliament has declined to grant divorces in more cases than one because the husband was domiciled in the United States of America, and that, under British law, being the domicile of the wife it followed that the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada had disappeared. This bill merely proposes to carry into divorce legislation the principle of which has been adopted in each province of confederation, namely, to confer upon the wife, when she has been abandoned and is living separate and apart from her husband as a femme sole, the right to acquire for herself a domicile.

Leaving that question for the moment, what is a domicile? I think many members of the house look upon residence and domicile as being one and the same thing. There are two factors which determine domicile; one is actual residence in a particular place and the other is the intention. Although there may be a residence for fifty years, if the second factor, namely, intention, is absent there is no domicile established. The leading case in that connection is that of an American who went from Philadelphia to the United Kingdom and lived there for thirty or forty years. When he died it was contended that he was domiciled in England. It was successfully set up that he had never lost his United States domicile, because during his lifetime he had declared that he intended to return to the United States, and always spoke of that and no other as his country. Although there had been a residence of, I think, something over thirty years in the United Kingdom, there was no presence of the second factor that makes domicile, namely, the intention to remain there as his home. That is, the intention is the all-important matter.

Here is a case of a wife who is abandoned; she is living separate and apart from her husband. She may be judicially separated or she may not. She is living alone. This bill declares—and the words "for the purposes of this act" are all-important; without them the bill is I think, ultra vires of this parliament—that for the purposes of this act, namely, for the purpose of divorce, first, the British principle remains; that is, if the point at which she was abandoned by her husband was his domicile, that is her domicile. If she was abandoned in Alberta, her domicile is Alberta; if she was abandoned in Saskatchewan, her domicile is Saskatchewan; if she was abandoned in Manitoba, her domicile is Manitoba. Then we say what the Supreme court of the United States said, I think in 1868; what state courts in the United States have held for many years; what the Dominion of New Zealand said some years ago, since overruled by the decision in Cook versus Cook, namely, that this woman may now exercise the rights of a femme sole. In other words, she may exercise the same rights as though she had never been married. She may acquire a domicile of her own. How? First, by remaining in a particular community as her home; and then, with the intention of remaining there indefinitely.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has he given any thought to this consequence that might follow if the wife acquired in Manitoba for example a domicile separate from that of her husband? This parliament would then be conferring upon the courts of Manitoba, the jurisdiction to grant a divorce in respect of a couple, one of whom was domiciled in Manitoba and the other domiciled outside of Manitoba. Under the present law the Manitoba courts have jurisdiction to pronounce divorce only when both parties are domiciled in Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has certainly indicated what the obvious result is; namely, that by this legislation the wife, being a femme sole, being abandoned by her husband, being no longer under his protection, her status being still that of a married woman, as the minister has well said, may change that to the extent of acquiring a domicile as though she were a single woman. That is all. Then we say that, she having acquired that domicile, the courts of that country have at once jurisdiction, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre says over her matrimonial state, that is, they have the right to divorce her from her husband. As I say, the supreme court of the United States, I said in 1868 but I think as a matter of fact it was 1870, declared that one of the incidents that resulted from the widening of the rights of married women was that, when abandoned, she could acquire a domicile of her own. Our courts have, as the minister has said, declared exactly the opposite, and this parliament has the power to deal with the matter. The question is, shall it exercise that jurisdiction? But it has not the right to exercise this power, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George says, unless such power is limited to divorce that is for the purposes of the act and the act only. To that extent it is an addition to the existing legislation which is British legislation of 1857. Therefore I am perfectly certain, unless we do this, the very injury which the Minister of Justice desires to avoid will continue, namely, we shall have people leaving Canada, going to the United States, setting up a fictitious domicile and securing a divorce with all the consequences incident thereto and all the uncertainties as to the legitimacy of the offspring. That is a very serious matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would rather have the United States assume the responsibility than ourselves.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice and I differ in that regard, I would rather be a party to this legislation to give legality to the situation than become a party to the scandals that, we know, exist with reference to it. That is my reasoning in arriving at a conclusion in the matter. I admit the force of the hon. gentleman's reasoning and of the objection of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. On the other hand, I can give half a dozen cases that come to my mind. One is that of a woman living in Alberta who has been abandoned by her husband. She has no idea where he is. The courts hold that if he is a roving person and has no known domicile, the domicile of his origin is the domicile that attaches to him, because the law is that every man is born with a domicile and is never without it. So it was held in the Cook case that this roving husband who was at one time domiciled in Alberta, although he changed his mind and roved about, had the domicile of his origin, namely, Ontario, and therefore the Alberta court could not deal with the matter.

What we are doing is to decide whether or not we desire to have a condition continued with all the scandal that attaches to it, with men and women going to a foreign jurisdiction, setting up fictitious domiciles, obtaining divorces in those courts which divorces are valid in every part of the United States, by reason of its constitution, sometimes marrying in the United States and coming back to Canada, confronted with the uncertainty of their own position and that of their children. We have to choose between that and the enactment of a statute whereby we declare that a woman who, in her own province, is a separate person with respect to contracts, obligations, debts, sitting in parliament, holding any office which may be in the gift of the people—and under our statutes she is eligible for any office except that she may not as yet sit in the senate—shall be given this additional right, namely, that of acquiring for herself for the purposes of this act a domicile. So far as I am concerned, I am in favour of giving her that right to acquire a domicile in order that her status, which is that of a single person with respect to contracts, obligations, property and everything that concerns her existence as a citizen, may be the same for the purpose of a domicile for the purpose of securing a divorce. In that way let us prevent the scandals to which I have referred and say that a woman who is abandoned by her husband may acquire a domicile for the purposes of this act, namely, a divorce act, and for any purpose concerning property in any way, shape or form. I think proper words could be found to express that meaning and we could pass this bill at this session.

Progress reported.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 779a, copper rods.

Customs tariff—779a. Copper rods when imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories in the manufacture of electrical conductors, the individual units of such electrical conductors not to exceed the area of No. 7/0 gauge conductor per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, ¼ cent; general tariff, ½ cent.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to ask the minister where and to what extent in Canada copper bars are manufactured.

Mr. ROBB: At Trail. That is the only place as yet, but they are preparing to manufacture them elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK: Do they not manufacture sufficient copper bars for all the concerns that use them in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: No, the supply is not sufficient.

Mr. CLARK: Since when?

Mr. ROBB: I remember the manager at Trail telling me that they supplied the Canadian trade with all that they had available, but that they did not have sufficient. They hoped, however, to have sufficient within a reasonable time.

Mr. CLARK: Have they not been granted a bounty?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: And that bounty has been paid to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company for some years?

Mr. ROBB: I have not a list of firms that have received the bounty. That is administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CLARK: But the bounty is still being paid?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, on a reducing scale; I think they are down to the minimum now. My recollection is that when the bounty provisions expired last year, they were renewed for another year, possibly two years.

Mr. BENNETT: They expired the year before last, I think.

Mr. CLARK: There is a situation in connection with this matter that I would like to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee. I understand quite well that the only smelter in Canada that does produce copper bars is the Trail smelter of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. Their supply of copper has come until recently almost exclusively from the Granby Copper Company at Allenby. Some two million dollars' worth of copper is produced there annually. I quite understand that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company could not supply the demand of Canadian manufacturers for copper bars at the present time for the very good reason that all the copper now produced by the Granby Copper Company is exported from Canada in its raw state to the Tacoma smelter. I desire to bring this matter as forcibly to the attention of the government as I can, for I believe that when we have in Canada smelters capable of refining our raw mineral wealth, those smelters should be utilized.

I quite realize, too, that there may be a dispute between these two companies as to the terms and conditions upon which this ore should be smelted, but I realize also that it is quite possible for this government to bring these two concerns together and to tell the Granby company that the exportation of copper in its raw state will not be tolerated, and to tell the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company that it must accept the ore of the Granby company and refine it on a fair basis. A fair basis could easily be arrived at by arbitration between the two companies. This is a situation which in my opinion merits the consideration of this government. If, for instance, we were smelting our raw copper at home, there would be no necessity for going down on our hands and knees to the United States for these copper bars. There would be no necessity for us to say to the United States: So long as you sell your copper bars to us at a price higher than you sell them in your home market we will put our tariff against your copper rods. This is what we are telling them. This is retaliation. We are going down on our hands and knees to the United States, whereas the root of the trouble lies in the fact that we do not insist on the refining of our raw copper at home.

I would draw further to the attention of this government that British Columbia at the present time is the greatest producer of copper in Canada. That may not long be the case, because Saskatchewan and Manitoba, through the medium of such properties as the Hudson Bay and Sherritt-Gordon will become great copper producers. Ontario, through the medium of International Nickel, will also become a great copper producer. Canada bids fair to become one of the greatest copper-producing countries in the world, and British Columbia should be an example to this government in that connection. We are producing there to-day twelve million dollars' worth of copper per annum. A large proportion of this copper is going out of British Columbia in its raw state, unsmelted. We have across the harbour from Vancouver the Britannia Mining Company, producing about five million dollars' worth of copper per annum, all of which is going out of this country in its natural state. That is quite a sufficient quantity of copper to justify the erection of a smelter, and I suggest to this government that it is its duty to advise the Howe Sound company that that condition will not be tolerated beyond a certain period. I do not think we need put any export duty on this raw material. All we have to do is to tell them that we will not have our raw mineral wealth going out of this country unrefined. Give them ample time in which to finance a smelter and the thing will be done, and Canada generally will benefit by such a policy. The reason it is necessary for us today to introduce a resolution such as that before the committee is because we have failed to take advantage of our natural wealth and failed to make provision for the refining of that wealth even to some extent here in our own country. The time has come when the Canadian people demand that such steps be taken. They want their raw materials fabricated at home. That is a natural desire, and one which the government should take notice of.

Mr. McGIBBON: As the Minister of National Revenue is in his place I would like to ask him for some information which I have tried unsuccessfully to get from the Minister of Finance a number of times, namely, as to the basis of arriving at the Canadian content of cars made in Canada.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I understand exactly what the hon. gentleman desires, but I take it that he refers to the excise tax of 5 per cent, which is remitted in certain cases on cars manufactured in Canada. Am I right in that?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: The excise tax of 5 per cent is remitted, or rather there is an exemption on cars of $1,200 and under only. I presume my hon. friend's question is as to how the 50 per cent Canadian content is made up to qualify for the exemption.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is there not a drawback on the raw material as well?

Mr. EULER: That is an entirely different matter from the excise tax exemption. They are two separate things. As to which does my hon. friend want information?

Mr. McGIBBON: On both.

Mr. EULER: I have given information as to the first; that is, that the 5 per cent exemption is granted on cars selling for $1,200 or less.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. BENNETT: If 50 per cent of the content is Canadian.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend's question is as to how that Canadian content is arrived at, whether on the average of all the cars or on each individual car.

Mr. EULER: A number of cars selling for less than $1,200 are manufactured in the same factory. We take the factory output of all cars of $1,200 and under, and they must qualify as to 50 per cent Canadian content before the exemption is granted. With regard to the fifty per cent content which is demanded before the drawback is payable on raw materials entering into those cars, it works out in practice the same way. The drawback is not granted until the fifty per cent is checked up.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister does not understand me. For instance, take General Motors. The Chevrolet is one of their low priced cars, and more than fifty per cent of it is made in Canada; some of their other cars contain less than fifty per cent. Do you take the average over the shop or the individual car?

Mr. EULER: We very seriously considered what the basis should be. Obviously it is impossible to take the individual car and follow it from the outset right through to completion. It is impossible to check all the materials that enter into each car. Then we were faced with the question whether we should take each particular line of car—my hon. friend mentioned General Motors—such as the Chevrolet, the Oldsmobile, the Oakland, the Pontiac, and others separately or whether it might be advisable for a number of reasons to interpret the law in such a way that we would take the total factory output, and then make all the output qualify on the fifty per cent basis before the company could get the drawback on their imported raw materials. After careful consideration—and I may say after consultation with some of my hon. friends opposite—as to the best thing to do, we adopted the factory output method. There has been a little criticism from one quarter alone. There has been no discrimination. At any rate, we have followed that plan.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the minister think that is legal?

Mr. EULER: I do not think there is any doubt about the legality of it at all. I do not see wherein the difference lies just because a certain make of car is called by a certain name. General Motors might call their cars all by the name McLaughlin-Buick Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, instead of, we will say, Chevrolet, Pontiac, Oldsmobile, Oakland, McLaughlin-Buick, and all the rest of them. However, there may be some difference of opinion, and as a matter of fact we are going to review the whole situation.

I might perhaps briefly state our reasons for taking the course I have mentioned. A good many of these cars, for example, the Chevrolet, and some other cars made by other concerns, contain away above fifty per cent Canadian content; some of them, on the other hand, would probably fall below the fifty per cent. We will take a car, for example, like the LaSalle.

Mr. McGIBBON: Or the Cadillac.

Mr. EULER: Yes, or the Cadillac. If you did not allow them to average the factory content over the whole seven lines made by General Motors, the result would be, as we considered it—I think quite correctly—that the higher priced cars would not be made in Canada at all; there would be no work done on them here; they would be imported in the finished condition, with the result that just that much labour would be lost to this country. There is the added result that to bring the total factory output up to fifty per cent, some of the lines being below that figure, on the other lines they would have to go still higher in order to obtain the average. That was one of our reasons for adopting the factory output method, to ensure that some work on the higher priced cars would be performed in Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much work is done on the higher priced cars?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give that information accurately. I know there is a good deal of it done.

Mr. MacLAREN: I hope the minister will reconsider the whole tariff situation regarding copper. No doubt in the not far distant future conditions in Canada will be very different from what they are to-day. There will be smelting, and we shall have copper produced in Canada in the form of ingots, bars, and so on. But that is not the condition at the present moment. Therefore one is forced to consider and in the meantime to guard the interests of our brass founders. They are dependent upon the United States for their copper. Why? Because Canada does not produce nearly sufficient raw material—copper ingots—for the brass founders. Previous to the war the raw material, in the form of ingots, was imported free of duty. During the war a duty was imposed which is now something like one and a half cents a pound. That duty has continued up to the present time. Consequently our brass founders to-day are paying one and a half cents per pound on their copper—one and a half cents per pound for their raw material. There has been no increase in duty on the finished product. Therefore the brass founders have had a difficult course to pursue. I wish the minister would specially think of this; is it well to have a duty of one and one half cents per pound on copper, which is the raw material for the brass founders, the workers in copper and brass? I think not. I think there is much in the argument that so long as Canada fails to produce a sufficient amount of raw material in the form of ingots, the government might well do without the duty on copper in that form. Then there is this other advantage. The item before us is copper rods. Were the duty taken off ingots, it would be a strong incentive to our people to do their own refining and to produce their own rods and bars. It is an additional reason, I think, why at the present time we should remove the duty on copper ingots. Certainly it would be for the advantage of the brass founders, but also it would stimulate the production of refined copper. At the present time our copper and brass workers are in great doubt whether it is of advantage to them to manufacture their own products or pay a duty and import them.

Mr. GEARY: The Minister of National Revenue has told us very clearly how he arrived at the Canadian content of cars. I judge that he has such a staff that he is able to go into the cost of all cars and to ascertain what relation the cost of production bears to the price charged. If that is the case, I submit that in these matters we shall get much more satisfaction through this department than through the tariff board, in regard to whether or not the excise tax has been passed on to the public. The tariff board, I presume, would only avail themselves of the officials of the revenue department. Therefore I suggest to the government if they want to get at the bottom of whether this excise tax is being passed on to the public or retained by the companies they would be much better served by the revenue department. I should like to hear what the Minister of National Revenue has to say about it, but perhaps he is too modest to speak.

Mr. DICKIE: Let us get back once more to copper rods and let us hear from the government what their policy is with respect to the processing of copper in our country At one time the Consolidated Smelters at Trail obtained copper from the Granby Company, the purchases running into millions each year, but owing to a slight dispute between these two concerns that copper ore is now going to the United States and Canada is suffering in consequence. Surely that dispute could be adjusted. I know of no argument in answer to the case put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Let these companies be told, "We will give you two years to erect your smelters and treat copper ores in Canada; if not we shall take some means to see that you are penalized for not doing so". There is no reason why this should not be done; it would mean employment for many more people in Canada and would be a businesslike proceeding. I would do the same thing with the asbestos deposits in Quebec.

Here we also have an unsatisfactory state of affairs. The United States government have announced their intention to levy a 25 per cent ad valorem duty on shingles entering the United States and this means that our cedar logs will go there and be manufactured into shingles. What will this government do about that? What will they do in regard to the pulpwood situation, which has been brought to their attention time and time again on the floor of this house by myself and others? Is it not time that we looked forward to doing something to retain our people in Canada instead of allowing them to go across the line? Let us build up industries in Canada so that the sons of our farmers will have something to turn to when they graduate from the farms instead of having to leave this country in order to make a livelihood south of the line. It is time we received an answer to this argument, and so far I have heard not one from hon. gentlemen on the government side. What is the opinion of the Minister of Finance with respect to these vital questions? I consider them among the vital questions that confront us to-day in this Dominion.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and with the hon. member who has just spoken as to what would be the real and permanent remedy in a case of this kind, namely, an export duty on copper. That would obviate the necessity of an application to the government, of any order in council, or of anything such as is proposed in this resolution.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): A duty on copper ore?

[Mr. Dickie.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, in its raw state. Have it refined and finished in Canada. Let us refine our raw material so as to give employment to our own people; let us reduce it as far as possible in this country.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): How far would you refine it before allowing it to be exported?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is a matter of detail.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): A matter of important detail.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The general principle should be to manufacture in Canada, as far as practicable, Canada's raw material so as to give employment to our own people.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Carrying it to the final and finished product?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If practicable, yes. In some cases it might not be practicable, but that is the general principle we should follow. Now I wish to refer to the brief presented by the Eugene F. Phillips Electrical Works Limited, of Montreal and Brockville, and reported in the records of the tariff board, reference No. 87, with regard to copper rods. This company has a rolling mill at Brockville, and its brief states:

In the applicant's brief dated January 9, 1928, (see pages 118 and 119 of stenographic report of first hearing) it was stated that:

From the opening of the Brockville rolling mill in November, 1922 to December 31, 1927, the Phillips company has purchased from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company the latter's total output of copper bars—16,669 tons of a value of $4,425,300.72.

To complete its requirements of copper bars the Phillips company from the time of the opening of its rolling mill to December 31, 1927, has been obliged to purchase in the United States 27,115 tons of copper bars of a value of $7,659,622.30.

During 1928 the Phillips company purchased from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company approximately 7,000 tons of copper wire bars having a value as of December 31, 1928, of $2,327,500, which represented the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company's total output of copper wire bars for the year.

During the same period—the year 1928—the Phillips company to complete its requirements, placed orders in the United States for copper wire bars to the extent of 6,250 tons, having a value as of December 31, 1928, of $2,078,125.

In September, 1928, the Granby Consolidated Mining, Smelting and Power Company discontinued the delivery of blister to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company's refinery at Trail and diverted the supply to Tacoma, Washington, to be refined there.

The last consignment of copper wire bars received by the Phillips company from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company was shipped from Trail on October 29, 1928. Since that date no copper wire bars have been produced at Trail nor have they been procurable elsewhere in Canada.

As a consequence, since October 29, 1928, the Phillips company has been obliged to purchase its entire requirements of copper wire bars in the United States.

To the applicant's brief, dated January 9, 1928, were attached two sheets, showing the variations to December 31, 1927, in the prices charged by the Copper Export Association to the Phillips company for copper wire bars delivered in Brockville, also the New York refinery prices plus the freight rate to Brockville and the discrimination per ton against Canada for the same dates. At the first hearing on June 20, 1928, the applicant filed an additional sheet carrying the figures down to May 25, 1928. A further sheet continuing the figures to January 23, 1929, is attached to the present supplementary brief.

It is evident that the Copper Export Association is hopeful of forcing the Phillips company to close its Brockville rolling mill and of compelling the Phillips company to import its full requirements of copper wire rods from the United States, because on November 30 last, the Canadian Freight Association considered an application from the American Smelting and Refining Company, one of the members of the Copper Export Association, for a commodity rate on copper rods from Baltimore to Brockville, although there has never been a movement of copper rods into Brockville.

This matter was before the tariff board and it was clearly shown that there was a discrimination against Canada, in the matter of the sale of these bars, of amounts varying from $2.50 to $4.25 and possibly higher per ton. The fact is that this association has so arranged matters that it sells copper bars in the United States at a lower price than it sells to Canada. It is the opposite of dumping. In one case when they wish to put the Canadian industry out of business they dump their products into Canada; in another case, when they cannot do it in this way, they raise the raw material to the consumer in Canada, thus forcing him if possible to close his mill in this country for the manufacture of raw material so that the finished product must be purchased in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does my hon. friend propose to forbid them to sell cheaply and also to sell dearly?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I propose to forbid them to trim us both ways, first by dumping and then by charging an exorbitant price for what we cannot buy in Canada. My hon. friend from Weyburn seems quite willing to stand it both ways; he is willing to let them dump fruits and vegetables into Canada and injure that industry.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When did they ever do it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They do it every year, because this government will not invoke the law in order to prevent that dumping. This is an effort to prevent them from charging more than they are receiving from their own people in the United States. I quite agree with other hon. members who have spoken that the more desirable way would be an export duty on our raw materials, but if the government cannot go that far I think they are quite justified in the action they are taking. For the benefit of the hon. member for Weyburn I want to say that Mr. Deachman appeared before this tariff board and argued the case; the tariff board, which is probably sympathetic to him, ruled against him and now my hon. friend wants to override the decision of the tariff board. I submit that he cannot have it both ways, and that this measure of relief is only fair and reasonable. It does not go as far as I would like it to go; it is not as permanent in its character as I would like it to be, but I submit that it will commend itself—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If you are in favour of it what is the idea of holding it up?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is my hon. friend in favour of it?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If my hon. friend favours this measure why does he hold it up?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not holding it up; I am endeavouring to support it, but this is a matter of great interest to my constituency, and I think my hon. friend will agree that I am entitled to speak on it.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My hon. friend says in this matter we are trying to overrule the finding of the tariff board, and I want to draw his attention to the fact that this is a case where the tariff board justifies its existence. That board found the facts, which are contained in the evidence; we have read the evidence and it is our duty now, as responsible members of parliament, to decide what we will do in the face of that evidence. Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of talking about building up Canadian industry, and this is how they propose to assist the Canadian mining industry: First they say to the prospector, "We will tax you on all the tools and equipment you require before you can go out and look for mines."

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Talk about the issue.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I am coming to it. Then, when the mine is found, they say to the company, "We will tax you an excessive rate on all the equipment and machinery you require for your mine." Then, after the mine has been developed through the expenditure of millions of dollars and after devoting years of work to it, they say to the company, "We will forbid you to sell your ores except to Canadian smelters." Then they say to those who would build a Canadian smelter, "We will tax you an additional sum on everything you require for the construction of the smelter." They say to the mining company, "You cannot sell your ore until the smelters are built," and they say to the smelting company, "You cannot build a smelter; we will tax you on everything you use." This is the way they propose to assist the Canadian mining industry.

Mr. MANION: The Canadian mining industry is going ahead by leaps and bounds in spite of what my hon. friend says. My hon. friend would help every industry except those in Canada, and every country except his own.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The Canadian mining industry is going ahead, but if my hon. friend and his friends got into power with their policy, the industry would come to a standstill.

Mr. MANION: Under the Conservative government of Ontario the mining industry in this province is going ahead faster than that of any other province in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: When we were discussing these items the other evening it was brought to the attention of the committee that there were two classifications for a new machine used for reaping and threshing, and it is proposed to clear up that situation by bringing in a new resolution which will be No. 445. I beg to move:

That resolution No. 1 of March 1, 1929, relating to amendments to schedule A of the Customs Tariff be amended by adding thereto the following provision:

That tariff item 445 the enumerations of goods and the several rates of duties of customs set opposite said item, be struck out of said schedule A and that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in said schedule A:

445. Mowing machines, harvesters either self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers, harvesters in combination with threshing machine separators including the motive power incorporated therein, and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item. . . British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 6 per cent; general tariff, 6 per cent.

This brings into that schedule the machine referred to, so there will be no further misunderstanding; and it will qualify them to get the same remission on their raw materials.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we finally leave this portion of the minister's task I should like to ask whether any report was received from the tariff board with regard to reference No. 47, which has to do with staves for the manufacture of wooden barrels. Canadian Western Cooperage, Limited, of Vancouver, who made the application, asked for some consideration in connection with that industry, and I have under my hand the reference. It deals with staves and headings made from Douglas fir for the production of containers for practically all kinds of liquids. Among the products for which these containers are used may be mentioned the following: Pickled fish of all kinds, mild cured salmon, pilchard oil, whale and sperm oil, fish oil, lubricating oil, acetic acid, and so on. Pressure tanks, beer fermenting vats, et cetera, are included among the containers affected. The hearing took place and I should like to ask the minister whether a report has been made, and if so, whether he has given consideration to it.

Mr. ROBB: I am speaking from memory only, but I recall that there was a hearing but it has not been completed.

Mr. STEVENS: I have the minutes of the hearing before me. It is true that it is called the first hearing, but it looks to me to be a very complete case. Different parties were heard and very careful questioning, cross-examination and argument took place. I notice the hearing winds up in the usual stereotyped form, as follows:

Whereupon the first hearing of reference No. 47 was adjourned.

That has something of the significance of the declaration from the pulpit: "Here endeth the first lesson." I have had considerable correspondence on this matter, and I believe the minister has too. I submit that the hearing is complete enough for some action. I suppose the minister cannot undertake at this stage of the case to declare any policy in the matter?

Mr. ROBB: No, I would rather not. Mr. Chairman, before six o'clock we were discussing item No. 696. The hon. leader of the opposition brought to the attention of the committee the fact that this was rather a wide item and he thought it should include public hospitals. I have been consulting with the officers of the department and although it is felt it would open up a rather wide field they feel that there is no reason why hospitals should be deprived of the advantages we are giving to the colleges and schools. Therefore, I beg to move:

That tariff item No. 696 be amended by inserting the words "public hospital" after the word "any" in the twelfth line.

That amendment will bring the hospitals under that classification.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would not like it to be confined to public hospitals unless that term includes private hospitals. What does the minister mean by the word "public"? Why not say "hospitals"?

Mr. ROBB: I think it is better to make it public hospitals. These are maintained by the public and in that way the department will be better able to control matters. The hon. member knows that publicly maintained hospitals should be considered in the same light as schools, colleges and seminaries. If it is opened up to include private hospitals we would be entering a very wide field and we think we are doing the right thing in using the language which prevails in tariff item No. 466a.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What does the hon. minister mean by public hospitals?

Mr. ROBB: What is meant by public schools?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): They are different things entirely. A private hospital may be one which receives all kinds of patients and still be a private hospital; I would like to be sure.

Mr. ROBB: We are following the same language which is in other items of the tariff affecting hospitals.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to support the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) for once, as it is not very often I can agree with him. In many large areas in this country there are no hospitals execept the private ones. The rates are no higher than in public hospitals and they are giving very good service to the public; in fact if it were not for the private hospitals there would be no service at all in many communities.

Mr. MANION: I am going to agree with the Minister of Finance in this case, although I do not agree with him very often. There are some private hospitals which probably should come under this item, but there are many which are simply money-making institutions and which do not get the support of the public. They do not admit anyone for charity but only admit those patients who are able to pay for private rooms and for private service.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What is meant by public hospitals?

Mr. MANION: Perhaps the Minister of Finance could answer that better than I can.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In my own city we have a hospital which is run by the sisters.

Mr. MANION: That would be a public hospital. In Ontario every hospital which admits charity patients receives from the province a donation of so much per head per day, and that would be a public hospital. Hospitals of that type come under this ruling, but hospitals which admit only those who can pay their way and can afford the expense of private rooms, hospitals which are operated merely as money-making institutions, would not, I assume, come under this.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If the hon. member is right in his interpretation I agree with him, but I wanted to be quite sure.

Mr. MANION: Let us find out what the Minister of Finance thinks about it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I tried to find out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps the minister would state whether a hospital maintained by religious denominations, such as the hospital maintained by the Salvation Army in Ottawa, would come under this heading.

Mr. ROBB: I think they are in as the item is now.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the hon. member for Saskatoon and the member for Fort William will both agree that hospitals, whether public or private, are a good deal like medical men in that they look after all charitable cases. I do not think a private hospital would take the responsibility of turning anyone away from their door because they would lose public sentiment by so doing. I know of a private hospital which has never received a grant in fifteen years and yet has never refused a patient, regardless of whether or not they could pay for their treatment.

Mr. MANION: They should have obtained a grant.

Mr. McGIBBON: They could not qualify. Will the Minister of Finance tell us what this item 696 is substituted for, and what is the estimated loss in revenue?

Mr. ROBB: The only change is the insertion of the words:

Mechanical equipment of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Before that it was in item 453, dutiable at 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent, or in item 657, dutiable at 17½ per cent, 20¼ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. There are no separate classifications for imports.

Mr. GEARY: In regard to the new item 445, a typewritten copy of which I have glanced at, and which, I understand, follows the suggestion that the hon. member for Last Mountain made in the house within the last month or so, I should like to be told the reason of that change, and the amount of reduction it is estimated will occur in duty per annum. I thought the hon. member for Last Mountain made out a good case when he stated it in the house the other day, but this comes before us for the first time and it has not come from or been considered by the tariff advisory board. I do not suppose the manufacturer of a motive power has any knowledge of the introduction of the item, and I should be glad to be informed what it means.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is now referring to the combined harvester and reaper. That item has been passed. It is simply clearing up the matter. As the situation was before, a thresher came in at 10 per cent and a reaper at 6 per cent. This new machine, introduced within recent years, was being charged a higher duty because there is in the Customs Act a section which states that when a commodity is affected by two different rates, the higher rate shall prevail. There seemed to be unanimity that this machine should come in at the lower rate. We are now clarifying the situation and the combined machine will have the same advantages as regards rebates as the other machine has under the 6 per cent duty It is in no worse and no better position.

Mr. GEARY: There is no reference to the motive power?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. LADNER: I do not think the minister answered the question put to him a little while ago in reference to item 696 in connection with hospitals, whether or not hospitals controlled by institutions such as the Salvation Army would have the benefits of that item.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. ROBB: We considered the item before six o'clock when it was suggested that we should also include public hospitals. The item then read:

All articles in this item, when specially imported in good faith for the use and by order of any society or institution incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use and by order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in Canada, and not for sale, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

These institutions qualified, but I think the objection raised before six o'clock was that public hospitals had not been provided for. That would be my understanding of the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister's understanding of it is the same as that of those who are administering the act, I shall be satisfied; but if it is not so interpreted by those who are administering the act, then we are still at loggerheads in regard to this item. I wish the minister would more clearly define what he means by a public hospital.

Mr. MANION: Would it not be a proper definition to say that a hospital would come under this item provided it were doing really charitable work? I admit there may be some private hospitals doing charitable work, and if those hospitals have the equipment they should be put under the classification of public hospitals. But any hospital that could show to the minister administering the act that it was doing really charitable work, accepting and looking after patients practically free of charge, should come under this item.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member say that if they were doing so only in part?

Mr. MANION: All public hospitals look after a few private patients. For instance, the one general hospital in my city, a very fine hospital, is largely a public hospital inasmuch as it looks after patients at a lower cost than that which the hospital incurs in caring for them, and it receives grants from the province; but it has private wards where the patients pay their way. It should come under this arrangement. If it does not, I do not know what hospital would.

Mr. ROBB: I am guided by consultation with the officers of the customs department who administer the act, and they were guided by an item which has been in the tariff for many years. It was amended in 1913 and it has been in the act ever since. This is the item:

Glassware and other scientific apparatus for laboratory work in public hospitals, also apparatus for sterilizing purposes, not including washing or laundry machines; all articles in this item when imported in good faith for the use and by order of any public hospital.

There has been no complaint. Why should there be any complaint about this?

Mr. MANION: I was not complaining. I was defending the minister, I am sorry to say. I regret ever having to defend the minister. I do not often have to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—460f. Face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors, air engines, flame proof enclosed driving motors for air engines, and integral parts of all motive power or machinery mentioned in this item, to be used exclusively in mining operations: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: We had under consideration also 460f and it was pointed out that the item, as originally presented, read: "face loading machines", and it was suggested it should be amended to read: "coal face loading machines". We propose to return to the item just as it is in the printed form presented in the budget; but there seems to be a duplication of language in the item, and in the third line we are striking out the words "for air engines", so that the item will read:

Face loading machines, shaker trough or belt trough conveyors, air engines, flame proof enclosed driving motors, and integral parts of all motive power or machinery mentioned in this item, to be used exclusively in mining operations.

Mr. BENNETT: Without regard to coal mines?

Mr. ROBB: This broadens it out. I am striking out the three words "for air engines".

Mr. TUMMON: What was the previous rate?

Mr. ROBB: The previous rates were 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent, and a part of it came under another item at 20 per cent in the general tariff instead of 25 per cent. The new rates will be free, 10 per cent and 12½ per cent.

Mr. CANTLEY: If the minister wants to clarify the item, I think he ought to preface it with the word "coal" and make it read, "Coal face loading machines."

Mr. ROBB: That is what we are correcting. We are broadening it out. Objection was made earlier in the afternoon that it was limited to coal only, and it should be made a little wider.

Mr. CANTLEY: The item does not refer to anything except machines for loading coal at the face under long wall operations.

Mr. ROBB: Then nobody else will use it.

Mr. TUMMON: I notice the Minister of National Revenue in his seat. Would he answer the question I asked this afternoon? It was in regard to the parts, whether this item would apply to parts for a machine that was already in the country and was perhaps now in use, or to new parts imported into the country to form with other parts a new machine?

Mr. EULER: I would not care to make a definite reply offhand, but my impression at the moment is that it would make no difference. Whatever the purpose for which the parts were imported, I think they would all be on the same basis. I am just giving that as an offhand opinion; I would not care to make any definite statement at the moment.

Mr. TUMMON: I am very glad to hear the minister make that statement. Let me explain why I asked the question. A branch factory of one of the largest mining machinery firms in the United States is located in Canada, and they have been adding to their output year after year many of the machines that the parent plant makes in the United States, building them here in their branch factory. Under this item as it is now amended they cannot build the complete machine in Canada as cheaply as they can import it from the parent plant in the United States, but they want to build all they can in the Canadian factory, and in order to compete they will have to import some of the parts of the machine, building the others in the branch factory here. I am very glad that the minister interprets this change so as to allow construction of some parts in Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—618a. Gaskets of rubber for use in the sealing of cans for food products: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "permanent" was struck out.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I now beg to move to strike out the word "cans" and insert instead the word "containers."

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—112. Cocoanut, desiccated, n.o.p. per pound: British preferential tariff, 5 cents; intermediate tariff, 6 cents; general tariff, 6 cents.

Customs tariff—113. Cocoanut, desiccated, unsweetened, per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 3 cents.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister now tell us where the request for these changes came from?

Mr. ROBB: I suppose we will consider the two items together. Under the present tariff, desiccated cocoanut, sweetened or not, enters under item 113 at 5, 6 and 6 cents, chiefly from the island of Ceylon. Application was made for reduction on the unsweetened, it being represented at the public sittings that, in the case of the unsweetened, the specific duty at present operative had an ad valorem effect of about 60 per cent. It is proposed by means of the two items, 112 and 113, to reduce the duty on unsweetened or less highly processed cocoanut, without changing in any way the sweetened. Imports of desiccated cocoanut, sweetened or unsweetened, in 1928, were valued at $193,000, of which $180,000 came from Ceylon. Application was made to the tariff board by Dodwell and Company of Vancouver, supported by the Consumers League. There was no opposition.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When these items first came up I made the statement to the Minister of Finance that these changes meant a clear gift to the Dodwell Company of $66,000 per annum. I asked the minister to let the item stand over for a while, and he kindly consented. I take issue with the minister on this item, on the ground that this is a type of case which occurs so often in connection with the tariff, whereby we are led to believe that the tariff is being reduced when it is actually being raised to the ordinary consumer. In support of my statement I have before me the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Let me say, first of all, that the agent for the Consumers' League was unaware that an application had been made for a reduction simply on the raw product. The rates under item 113 as it stood before on cocoanut, whether sweetened or unsweetened, were 5, 6 and 6 cents. That is reduced to 2, 3 and 3 cents. We had no idea that that did not apply to the whole of item 113. But when the question comes before us in committee of the whole house we find that the two items have been split, and that the sweetened as before retains the higher tariff, and the unsweetened retains the low tariff, giving to the only manufacturer of this commodity that I know of in Canada this super bonus of $66,000. At page 7 of the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ending December 31, 1928, I find there were 2,210,041 pounds of cocoanut, desiccated, sweetened or not, imported into Canada at a value of $159,228. That works out to a price of 7¼ cents per pound. Now when the tariff is reduced to 2, 3 and 3 cents, the manufacturer is given a distinct advantage of 3 cents a pound, and as he is the only importer and the only manufacturer of this commodity in Canada, it means that he can take out of the pockets of the Canadian consumers a clear profit of $66,000. That figure is obtained by multiplying 2,210,041 pounds by 3 cents. That represents a clear gift of $66,000 to the manufacturer for importing the cocoanut, sprinkling a little sugar on it, and then calling it a manufactured article. If you look a little further into the matter, and transform the specific duty into an ad valorem duty, you will find that it works out to an ad valorem duty of 82 per cent. There is no article that I know of in the tariff which merits a duty of 82 per cent. It is simply absurd in the extreme. It will be seen by this that the ultimate consumer is entirely left out of consideration. We hear a great deal about the low tariff policy of our friends of the Liberal party, but surely the consumer should be given some consideration in the matter. Both sweetened and unsweetened were equal before; they should be equal now. It is discrimination and it is ridiculous for a party that calls itself a low tariff party. This 82 per cent gives one company a monopoly of the business. I have brought this up because it clearly shows what is coming to one manufacturer and what is coming to the other. In respect to a great many of the articles where the tariff is reduced, it is reduced only on the article which the manufacturer himself uses, and the corresponding reduction of duty to the consumer is not granted; he does not reap that advantage because the manufactured article itself is not reduced by the same amount. Let me take an instance where one manufacturer gets a 10 per cent reduction on his raw material. In such a case surely that reduction should be passed on the ultimate consumer. For example, if the tariff on the manufactured article was 35 per cent before the reduction, then the price to the ultimate consumer should be correspondingly reduced. I have taken this case because in every instance that I know of the manufacturer gets the advantage and the ultimate consumer does not. In this case the sole manufacturer of the sweetened article, Dodwell and Company, is getting $66,000 out of the pockets of the ultimate consumers of Canada. I would ask the minister to cross out that item 112 and make the amount equal in both cases.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When this matter was up before I pointed out that the minister was interfering perhaps in a way of which he was not aware, and I should like to bring the matter to his attention again to-night. I would say now that he is not acquainted with what this resolution means. It appears to-night as if the member who has just spoken considers the manufacturing end is the desiccated cocoanut.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Sweetened.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): No, I am going to point out another side. The minister has said that the cocoanut in the raw state is admitted free. There are certain companies in this country who take the raw cocoanut and shred it here, and by the proposed change you are taking the labour from the people of Canada and giving it to the cheap coloured labour in the southern islands; in a word you are putting the Canadian companies out of business. One is the Baker Company of Montreal. They are importing the cocoanut free and shredding it here. It is not a matter of sweetening the cocoanut; that is not the manufacturing condition. The shredding that the member has spoken about is done in the southern islands. It is the labour there that he is trying to protect. I am trying to protect the white labour in Canada against this proposed change. I repeat, the change now proposed by the minister will throw the shredding of the cocoanut back to the cheap coloured labour of the southern islands to the disadvantage of the white labour of Canada. When the member for East Calgary sees that point I hope he will change his attitude. The minister does not know what he is doing. I have a letter from the Baker people saying that they are thinking about closing up business because the preference on the shredded cocoanut is given to the cheap labour of the southern islands. The manufacturer, as I say, is shredding the raw cocoanut here. If this change goes through there will be no work for that class of labour in Canada. It is a small amount of labour, it is true, but it should be protected.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I point out to my hon. friend that these two articles do not deal with raw cocoanut, but simply with desiccated and sweetened. The particular manufacturer I have mentioned has a considerable bonus of $66,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): And by the reduction you are simply throwing the labour back to the southern islands. It is not a case of sweetening, although it looks like it. Of course the cocoanut is sweetened afterwards, but that is not the crux of the case.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, it would appear now, after listening to my hon. friend from East Calgary and my hon. friend from Kingston, that the tariff board could not have been very far out in trying to strike the happy mean. There was a hearing, and the Consumers' League was represented.

Mr. BENNETT: That is part of the board.

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum that I have before me does not indicate that the Baker Company opposed the application.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Why not hear their side?

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum before me from the board does not say the Baker Company were opposed to the application. The Baker Company must know there is a Minister of Finance, but I have no recollection of their having written to me opposing the proposed change. After listening to both my friends I think I had better take the advice of the tariff board.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The Baker Company did not ask me to bring up the matter. It is merely by accident that I have come across this case. The minister must see now that there is a side to it in connection with the manufacture of the raw cocoanut which he did not see before, and I do not think the tariff board saw it either.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend from East Calgary also brings out a side that I had not noticed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give the revenue received from this source last year?

Mr. ROBB: My memorandum does not quite agree with the figures quoted. The total importations for 1928 were valued at $193,226. I imagine that is the value f.o.b. point of shipment. The loss in revenue will be about $39,657.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even if we accept the somewhat questionable figures of the minister as compared with those prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. ROBB: I beg your pardon?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I say if we accept the somewhat questionable figures of the minister.

Mr. ROBB: Why does my hon. friend say "the somewhat questionable figures"?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): For this reason. The Department of Trade and Commerce gave the importations last year as 2,210,000 pounds at 6 cents a pound.

Mr. ROBB: The importation was 2,643,865 pounds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the duty is 6 cents on that total importation the revenue produced must have been around $132,000.

Mr. ROBB: How does my hon. friend arrive at 6 cents? It came from Ceylon, which enjoys the British preference of 5 cents.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much came from Ceylon?

Mr. ROBB: Under the British preference there came in 2,589,065 pounds and under the general tariff 54,800 pounds. In other words, $188,613 came under the British preference—that is the value at point of shipment—and $4,613 under the general.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Under the British preference it carried a duty of 5 cents; that is to say, 2,500,000 pounds came in at 5 cents.

Mr. ROBB: The exact figures are 2,589,-065.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the balance came in at 6 cents.

Mr. ROBB: That is, 54,800 pounds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, over $100,000 of revenue is recorded for last year's importations—roughly, $110,-000, or perhaps a little more. Now, $110,000 of revenue is not to be sneezed at. The minister suggests that all of that will be retained except $36,000 or thereabouts. Suppose we accept the minister's figures.

Mr. ROBB: There will be 10 per cent off that if it comes in direct under the British preference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, suppose we accept that figure, of a loss of revenue amounting to some $36,000.

Mr. ROBB: $39,657.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Very well. The hon. member for Kingston raises the point that this may mean a loss of employment to some Canadian labour, whereas an hon. member in this corner points out that no benefit will accrue to the consumer; but the country has lost some $39,000. So that the only one who does get any advantage under the proposed change is this solitary manufacturer of sweetened desiccated cocoanut—Dodwell & Company. I suggest that in view of the representations made the minister might even the matter up, so as to give the people of Canada an opportunity to get some advantage from it, by levelling the duty down; instead of discriminating between the sweetened and the unsweetened article, let him include both items under the reduced rates. If he does this he will be doing something worth while; but to leave the matter as it stands is to benefit no one except this particular company. It is no use for the minister to shake his head or to say that because there was no opposition on the part of the Consumers' League the item should therefore be carried. As a matter of fact I am informed that the Consumers' League was not aware that the reduction was to be granted on just one part of the original item; the league assumed that it would be granted to the whole item. It is now protesting, and I have had representatives of the Consumers' League in my room pointing out the discrimination in this particular item.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I wish to read for the benefit of the committee and of some of the Montreal members the following:

> So just now we are thinking of the probable necessity of having to close down this industry in Montreal. We find it almost impossible to compete with coloured labour which is used in the making of cocoanut in the southern islands as against our using white labour in Montreal, and, too, paying freight on whole cocoanuts, which is the raw product, as against the rate of freight on the finished product.

There is the situation. They are bringing in raw cocoanut and manufacturing it here, shredding and sweetening it, and now it is proposed to bring in manufactured cocoanut from the southern islands to compete against white labour in Montreal.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does this cocoanut come in whole?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): For this purpose?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): To these people.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I did not understand so.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Well, I am telling you.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I understand it is already desiccated when it comes in.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is just where the labour comes in. The cocoanut comes in whole and is broken and shredded here.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member doesn't know his cocoanuts.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The first night this question was under discussion it looked as if the whole process of manufacture in this case consisted in the sweetening of the cocoanut, but that is not the case. The raw product is coming into Canada and is being shredded here.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): How many people do they employ in the shredding process?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not carry these figures around in my head; I am giving their statement. If the hon. member would like to go to Montreal with me we could find out. He is so much interested in the manufacturing end of the business in this country that I am willing to go with him. I have a little more interest in white labour in Montreal than in the cheaper labour down in some place I know nothing about.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): But you are not sufficiently interested to know how many men are engaged in the business.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I cannot give you the number of men engaged.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister deny that Dodwell & Company, by means of the preference, are going to get an advantage of $66,000 which they would not otherwise enjoy? That is one question I want to ask him, and a second is this: Will the minister put both the sweetened and the unsweetened product on the same basis?

Mr. ROBB: The records show that the loss of revenue will be $39,657, so that I cannot understand where the hon. gentleman gets that figure.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Out of 2,210,000 pounds imported.

Mr. ROBB: But they do not get the whole business.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Who?

Mr. ROBB: Dodwell & Company.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Who else does? They are the only persons that applied for this and I assume that they are doing the whole sweetening business. At any rate, if someone else does share in the business it makes no difference in the net result.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the hon. gentleman see that as soon as they are placed in the advantageous position which it appears they will be in when the schedule goes through other people will come into competition with them and they will not retain the $66,000? It will induce competition in the business. With regard to the Montreal concern about which my hon. friend from Kingston is so solicitous, I understand that this is an American company with its head office in Boston. This is the first time I have known the hon. gentleman to be so anxious about the welfare of people in Boston.

Mr. STEVENS: But the company is employing Canadian labour.

Mr. JACOBS: How many does it employ?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Suppose it employs ten or twenty persons, what difference does that make? I hope more American branches will come over.

Mr. JACOBS: As a matter of fact, how much white labour is employed in Montreal in this business?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As a member for Montreal you should know. You should be in your place fighting even for one little company.

Mr. JACOBS: I have to look after my own little cocoanut in Montreal.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am not surprised that there are so many protectionists on the Liberal side. The hon. member argues that if the tariff were kept on there would be more competition, and that is one of the worst protectionist arguments I have ever heard.

Mr. JACOBS: I am not ashamed of my protectionist views.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I know now why Sir Wilfrid Laurier was defeated in 1911: there were so many men pretending to be free traders while they were protectionists, and who absolutely crucified Sir Wilfrid Laurier for his free trade principles.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am glad that my hon. friend has at last found one outspoken protectionist on the Liberal side. For years he and his friends have been telling how the Liberal party is honeycombed with protectionists and now he has found one member of the Liberal party who will justify himself and his friends in making that statement for a long time to come.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The rest of us have known that to be the fact all along.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for Mackenzie has been saying a lot of things he has known, and now I am glad he has made this statement in the house because he has been making statements throughout the country which he has not made in the house.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. members from Saskatchewan had a good many things to say about the tariff which they have not said in this house.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have one more word to say. There are a number of items in this tariff which give to the manufacturers distinct advantages which virtually means raising the prices of these articles to the consumer. I hope that when this parliament meets next session there will be a different attitude shown towards the tariff policy, just as there has been a different attitude shown toward the income tax policy. If there is not a change, as far as I am concerned I will have to vote against the government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to know how my hon. friend from East Calgary expects the government to bring forward a low tariff policy while he supports them in their high tariff policy.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not suppose this is pertinent to the question, but I might say that I was all right when I voted against the government all the time last year, but because I see differently this year I am all wrong.

Item agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 212, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter fifty of the statutes of 1928, and to provide:—

1. That part III of the said act be amended by repealing the following sections and subsections: Paragraphs (b) and (c) of subsection one, and subsection two, of section thirteen; section fourteen; section fifteen; section seventeen; section eighteen; and section nineteen, thereby repealing the tax on the net premiums received by every company licensed or registered or otherwise authorized to transact in Canada or any province thereof, the business of insurance.

2. That part IV of the said act, which imposes a tax on cable and telegraphic messages, be repealed.

3. That part V of the said act, which imposes a tax on railway and other tickets, be repealed.

4. That part VII of the said act be amended by striking out section fifty-eight and substituting therefor the following:—

58. No person shall sell or transfer the stock or shares of any association, company or corporation, or any bond other than a bond of the Dominion of Canada or of any province of Canada by

(a) agreement for sale;

(b) entry on the books of the association, company or corporation;

(c) delivery of share certificates or share warrants or bond endorsed in blank or payable to bearer; or

(d) any other method whatsoever;

unless in respect of such sale or transfer there is affixed to or impressed upon the document evidencing the ownership of such stock or shares or bond, or a document showing the transfer or agreement for the transfer thereof, an adhesive stamp or a stamp impressed thereon by means of a die of the value of

(a) three cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the par value of the bond sold or transferred;

(b) four cents for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over one hundred dollars per share;

(c) three cents for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over twenty dollars per share, but not more than hundred dollars per share;

(d) two cents for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over three dollars per share, but not more than twenty dollars per share;

(e) one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price of three dollars or less per share.

5. That section eighty-six of the said act be amended by providing that the rate of the consumption or sales tax be reduced to two per cent.

6. That any enactment founded on paragraph one of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of March, 1929.

7. That any enactment founded on paragraphs two, three and four of this resolution shall come into force on the first day of May, 1929.

8. That any enactment founded on paragraph five of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of March, 1929, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Mr. ROBB: These reductions have been generally well received, with the exception of the proposed tax on the transfer of stock. It has been represented to us that the proposed tax on mining shares was somewhat drastic, so I desire to move an amendment, as follows:

That paragraph 4 be amended by striking out clause (e) and substituting therefor the following:

(e) one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over one dollar per share, but not more than three dollars per share:

(f) one-fourth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over fifty cents per share, but not more than one dollar per share;

(g) one-tenth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price of fifty cents or less per share.

I think that will be fair.

Mr. CLARK: I think the minister is still imposing too high a tax upon the cheaper shares. The effect of an unreasonable tax upon the lower priced shares will be to hinder the legitimate development of the mining industry and deprive the general public of an opportunity of sharing in the mining development which is now taking place in this country. The result will be that a monopoly will be placed in the hands of the larger interests. The fact that mining has developed to such an extent in British Columbia is due largely to the faith of the men with small savings, and if too high a tax is put upon these shares it will hinder legitimate mining development. The minister says that he is reducing the tax. He has reduced it very materially, but I should like to give a practical illustration of the effect of the tax as he had it compared with his present proposal. The Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company in British Columbia recently took over 74 per cent of the stock of the Caledonia mines on Vancouver island. They purchased outright 339,600 shares at 20 cents per share, a total value of $67,920. Under the minister's first proposal the tax would have been $3,396, or 5 per cent of the total price. On a purchase and sale the tax would have amounted to 10 per cent, or $6,792. A private investor could have purchased over $11,000,000 worth of securities of a par value of $100 and would have had to pay only the same amount of tax. The minister now proposes that the tax on shares worth 20 cents will be one-tenth of a cent. It is true that the tax is being reduced, but in my opinion it is still too high. Taking the illustration I have given, the tax would amount to $340 on a total purchase price of only $67,000, or over $700 on a purchase and sale of stock. I submit that that is too high; it is out of all proportion to the tax paid by the investor purchasing stocks on the market. The legitimate mining development in British Columbia has been brought about by the smaller investors, the men with small savings guided by good engineers. In the case I have cited by way of illustration these men went out and prospected and they showed sufficient ore to interest the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company. If the minister insists upon too high a tax upon the purchase and sale of these shares he will make them unmarketable and immediately kill the interest of the public in legitimate mining development. On shares sold or transferred at 50 cents the tax is to be one-quarter of one cent per share, or one-half cent per share on a purchase and sale. Let us consider the shares purchased by the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company as being worth $1.01 per share. That would mean a purchase amounting to $342,996 worth of stock, and the minister proposes to put a tax of $3,396 upon that purchase. The same tax would permit of a purchase of over $11,000,000 worth of stock of a par value of $100, and I submit again that the proposed tax is out of all proportion and will discourage legitimate mining development in this country.

Mr. LAWSON: I had intended offering some remarks in connection with this proposed amendment to part VII of the Special War Revenue Act, and the proposed reduction in the tax suggested by the hon. Minister of Finance this evening does not in any way change my view of the principle of the taxation; it merely offers, as a sop, a reduction in the burden cast upon the lower priced shares. To my mind this is most inequitable taxation. On the basis of the original proposal one buying or selling the lower priced issues would be paying a varying percentage in tax to the government. On one-cent shares the tax would be 100 per cent; on two-cent shares it would be 50 per cent; on three-cent shares the tax would amount to 33⅓ per cent; on four-cent shares it would be 25 per cent, and so on down the list. I endeavoured to make a rapid calculation upon the proposed amendment, and as I figure it the purchaser will be paying 10 per cent tax on a one-cent share; 5 per cent tax on a two-cent share; 3.33 per cent tax on a three-cent share; 2.5 per cent tax on a four-cent share, and so on. In the case of the higher priced issues valued at $100, the percentage the purchaser will have to pay in the way of tax will amount to only 3/100 of one per cent. Let us consider for a moment the results of a tax of this nature, first, from the public standpoint, second, from the standpoint of the development of the mines, and third from the point of view of other far-reaching effects. The average speculator in mining stocks must of necessity speculate in the lower priced issues; it is only those of means who can interest themselves in the high priced issues. As I pointed out a moment ago, if a man sells stock at $100 a share he would be paying to the government 3/100 of one per cent of the sale price by way of tax, but if he sells stock at $1 a share he would be paying 1 per cent. This, to my mind, is iniquitous. It will, in my opinion, have an adverse effect in connection with the financing of the mines. I am not unmindful of the fact that, under the act as it stands, the original issue of treasury shares is not taxable, nor will it be under the amendment; but we must bear in mind the basis on which new mining properties are developed and the development financed. In the first place, companies are incorporated in order to get money, and money can be raised only in one of two ways: either you must engage a corps of salesmen who call upon individuals to sell them shares of stock, a method which is exceedingly expensive and which lends itself to all the possibilities of misrepresentation and fraud, or you must offer that stock through some mining exchange where the divergence and width of the market make possible some fixed price. In order to offer that stock through an exchange, it is customary to have the issue underwritten by a broker or by some individual or corporation interested in the development of mining property. Obviously, for a new stock there is no demand which will produce funds to develop the property unless there is a market for the stock, and there will not be a demand unless the trading in that stock is active upon the market. Activity is obtained by brokers circularizing clients, by publishing the details of the property and its development to date in circulars, magazines, et cetera. The vast bulk of this class of stock consists of low priced issues; the moment you impose upon low priced issues a tax equal in percentage to the amounts indicated, you curtail trading in the market, and the moment you curtail trading in the market, you thereby prevent the company from obtaining the amount of funds which it would otherwise obtain for the development of those mines.

Let me cite a couple of concrete examples. Let us take Crown Reserve Consolidated, one of our mining issues, selling to-day at five cents. Under the original proposal there would be a tax of 20 per cent imposed on every sale. Under the new proposal there would be a tax imposed of two per cent. It is not possible for that company to re-finance its operations and continue development with a tax at that rate imposed upon all the sales of its stock.

Let me take a more striking illustration, a new property in the Red Lake district. Picard a year ago was selling at 70 cents a share. To-day it is selling at approximately 3 cents a share. This is caused by the company running out of funds, being unable to sell more stock and having a bailiff come in to execute a judgment. That company is supposed to have reasonable possibilities. It desires to re-finance. What opportunity has it of doing so when by this legislation you prevent an active market for those shares?

May I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that many of the higher priced dividend paying stocks to-day, were a short time ago selling for 10 or 15 cents a share? A most striking example is Teck Hughes, which as late as 1921 was selling at 16 cents a share and which, I see by to-night's quotation, is listed at $9.60 a share. I took the record of the Standard Stock and Mining Exchange, because it is, I think, the largest mining exchange in Canada. If hon. members will look at the record they will find that there is a trading on that exchange now in 156 issues, of which 112, in other words, approximately 74 per cent, are stocks selling at under $3 a share. I endeavoured to make a computation of the difference the proposed tax would make on the basis of one day's trading. I admit I shall now have to revise it to some extent by reason of the amendment proposed to-night by the Minister of Finance, but I selected the tax paid in one day by eleven out of fifty brokers trading on the Standard Stock and Mining Exchange. In one day broker No. 1 under the present basis of taxation would pay $190.29, and bear in mind that, in making that payment, he is merely the representative of the public who are investing in stocks. Under the new rate of taxation he would pay, on stocks under $3, $5,901.50, and on stocks over $3, $78.75, or a total of $5,980.25 as against the $190.29 being paid to-day. Let me give you the totals of the computation of the eleven. In one day, on one exchange, eleven out of fifty brokers, who in turn would be charging to the customer the tax payable, would pay $21,037.89 in tax instead of $809.57.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 8, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

IMPERIAL CABLE MERGER

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 213 to authorize consent to the sale of certain cable and wireless telegraph undertakings established under the Pacific Cable Acts, 1901 to 1924 (Imp.), and the West Indian Islands (Telegraph) Act, 1924 (Imp.).

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Perhaps the hon. minister will give us a short explanation?

Mr. VENIOT: This is a bill to enable us to accept the agreement that has been entered into between the different contracting parties and the merging company, if it is satisfactory to Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Such bills require the consent of the crown.

Mr. VENIOT: Consent has been obtained.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WIRELESS STATIONS

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. What wireless stations has the Dominion government in operation in Northern Alberta, Yukon, and the North West Territories?
2. What department or departments of the government have charge of these stations?
3. What was the total cost of construction of each station?
4. What is the annual cost of operation of each station?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Aklavik, N.W.T.; Herschell Island, Y.T. (summer operation only); Dawson, Y.T.; Edmonton, Alta.; Mayo, Y.T.; Fort Simpson, N.W.T.; Fort Smith, N.W.T.; Fort Resolution, N.W.T., (summer operation only).

2. These stations are operated by the Department of National Defence for the Department of Interior.

3. Aklavik, N.W.T., $28,613; Herschell Island, Y.T., included in Aklavik; Dawson, Y.T., $19,049; Edmonton, Alta., $22,950; Mayo, Y.T., $20,246; Fort Simpson, N.W.T., $44,536; Fort Smith, N.W.T., $20,936; Fort Resolution, N.W.T., included in Fort Smith.

4. The annual cost of operation of each station for 1928-29, was:—Aklavik, N.W.T., $16,105; Herschell Island, Y.T., $1,400; Dawson, Y.T., $12,648; Edmonton, Alta., $13,065; Mayo, Y.T., $16,495; Fort Simpson, N.W.T., $18,338; Fort Smith, N.W.T., $18,255; Fort Resolution, N.W.T., $1,952.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES COMMISSION—SCHOONER "DOROTHY"

Mr. BRADY:

1. Who comprise the members of the International Fisheries Commission on the Pacific coast?
2. Is the Seattle halibut schooner Dorothy under charter to the commission?
3. For what service is said steamer commissioned?
4. How long has said vessel been engaged in this work?
5. What is the total cost up to date connected with the services of said boat?
6. What part of the total cost is paid by: (a) Canadian government; (b) United States government?
7. What is the total number of persons on the personnel of said boat?
8. How many are scientific men and what qualifications are required before appointment?
9. How many men are employed in other capacities?
10. How many Canadians are employed on the Dorothy, and in what capacity?
11. How many Americans are employed, and in what capacity?
12. What salaries are paid and to whom?
13. To whom does the scientific staff make reports?
14. How many of such reports have been received so far?
15. Are such reports available on request?

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Cardin):

1. Canadian members: W. A. Found and J. P. Babcock. United States members: Henry O'Malley and Miller Freeman.

2. Yes, for a few trips. She is now on the last trip for this year.

3. In connection with a study of the life history of the Pacific halibut.

4. During the following cruises:—1st cruise, October 27-November 23, 1927; 2nd cruise, November 23-December 20, 1927; 3rd cruise, January 3-February 9, 1928; 4th cruise, October 26-December 10, 1928; 5th cruise, January 10-February 25, 1929; 6th cruise, March 4, 1929.

5. $37,974.45.

6. One-half by each.

7. From fifteen to seventeen on the different cruises.

8. From two to four on the different cruises. Graduates from a Canadian or United States university in fisheries or zoology.

9. The scientific staff consists of seven in all, from two to four of whom work on the boat as required.

10. There are four Canadians, and three United States citizens on the staff. As the Dorothy was chartered with her crew, the nationalities of members of the crew are not known.

11. Answered by No. 10.

12. The salaries of the staff are: W. F. Thompson, director, American, $500 per month; H. A. Dunlop, asst. director, Canadian, $310 per month; F. H. Bell, scientific asst., Canadian $245 per month; R. V. Butt, scientific asst., American, $195 per month; N. L. Freeman, scientific asst., Canadian, $175 per month; John Kask, scientific asst., Canadian, $150 per month; W. C. Herrington, scientific asst., American, $230 per month.

Clerical staff: Marion Egerton part time clerk, Canadian $25 per month; Dorothy Myers, stenographer, American, $135 per month; Grace Shirk, librarian. American, $135 per month; Harold Lokken, part time clerk, American, $15 per month.

13. The director reports to the commission. The remainder to the director.

14. The director reports to the commission as a whole twice each year and as frequently as necessary to the chairman.

15. The first report by the commission has been published. Several memoirs by the scientific staff are in course of preparation and will be published from time to time as they are completed.

ST. JOHN RIVER BUOYS

Mr. JONES:

1. Were tenders called for in the year 1927 by the Department of Marine and Fisheries or by any other governmental department for the work of placing buoys in the St. John river from Milledgeville to Fredericton, and from the mouth of the Jemseg river to the head of Grand lake and up to Bellisle?

2. If so, who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?

3. Was the lowest tender accepted? If not, why?

4. Who is at present performing this work and at what rate?

5. Have any complaints been received by the department in question against the services rendered by the present contractor in this connection?

6. If so, from whom, when, and what is the nature of the complaint?

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Cardin):

1. Tenders were invited for the maintenance of the buoy services at (a) Hatfield point, and (b) on St. John river, Jemseg, Grand lake and Bellisle river.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

2. (a) No tenders were received for the buoy service at Hatfield point.

(b) Two tenders were received for the buoy service on St. John River, Jemseg, Grand lake and Belleisle river, namely, from Chas. H. Gorham for the sum of $360 per annum and from William J. McNamara for the sum of $500 per annum.

3. The contract for the buoy service on St. John river, Jemseg, Grand lake and Belleisle river was awarded to William J. McNamara for the sum of $360 per annum.

4. (a) Benjamin F. McCutcheon is at present maintaining the buoy service at Hatfield point for the sum of $30 per annum.

(b) William J. McNamara is at present maintaining the buoy service on St. John river, Jemseg, Grand lake and Belleisle river for the sum of $360 per annum.

5. No.

6. See answer to number 5.

CADET TRAINING—ALBERTA

Mr. ADSHEAD:

1. Has the provincial government of Alberta asked for the appropriation for cadet training for the year 1929?

2. What date was such request made?

3. By whom was it signed?

4. What cities in Alberta had cadet training in 1928?

5. How many scholars in Alberta were under cadet training for 1928?

6. What amount of money was paid to the Alberta government for cadet training for the year 1928?

Mr. RALSTON:

1, 2, 3 and 6. No payments for cadet training are made to provincial governments as such. The department pays an allowance to the instructor and another allowance to cover cost of uniforms. These amounts are usually paid to the authorities in charge of each cadet unit.

4. Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge and Red Deer.

5. 5,974 cadets were enrolled and trained in Alberta during 1928.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is oleomargarine permitted to be sold as an article of food in Canada at present?

2. Has oleomargarine ever been permitted to be sold for food in Canada, and, if so, when and for how long?

3. If it has been on sale in Canada at any time: (a) how much was imported into this country each year it was on sale; (b) how much was manufactured in this country each year it was on sale?

4. How did prices for oleomargarine compare with prices for butter each year when it was on sale in Canada?

5. What products enter into the manufacture of oleomargarine?

6. Are these products commonly produced by our Canadian farmers, and, if not, from what countries do they commonly come?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. No.

2. Yes. The manufacture, importation and sale of olemargarine became legal December 1, 1917; the manufacture and importation was prohibited after August 31, 1923, and the sale was prohibited after February 29, 1924.

3. (a)

4. Records of prices on oleomargarine during the whole time it was sold in Canada are not available. Average prices in Ottawa stores, May 9, 1921, to May 19, 1921, were: butter, 40·14 cents; oleomargarine, 33·13. The average price of twenty brands of butter in retail stores, May 12, 1922, was 45·85 cents, and the average price of twelve brands of oleomargarine was 28·41 cents. On May 26, 1923, the average retail price of butter in Ottawa stores was 41·61, the average retail price of animal oleomargarine 28·75 and the average retail price of vegetable oleomargarine 31 cents.

5. Two kinds of oleomargarine were sold in Canada, namely, that containing animal fats, and that which was purely vegetable. The so-called animal oleomargarine was composed of oleo oil, neutral lard, might or might not contain vegetable fat and was churned in milk, salt was added. If vegetable fat in the so-called oleomargarine was used, such fat would likely be cotton seed oil. Vegetable oleomargarine consisted principally of cocoanut fat churned in milk with salt added.

6. Oleo oil and neutral lard are products of Canadian packing houses. The vegetable fat or oil is not produced in Canada. These come principally from the United States.

MARGARETSVILLE BREAKWATER

Mr. SHORT:

1. What amount was expended on repairs to the breakwater at Margaretsville, Nova Scotia, in 1928?

2. Who was the foreman in charge of the work and how much was paid to him for services?

3. What were the names of those engaged in the work, and what amount was paid to each workman?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. $799.94.

2. (a) Frank Atchison; (b) $77.

3. Gordon Aldred, $45.75; Charlie Roach, $52; Denley Porter, $49.50; William Nixon, $54.50; John Dwiney, $55; Winslow Patterson, $31.50; Whitfield Wilkins, $1; Thomas McLean, $55; Roland Atchison, $53.75; George Banks, $36.75.

GLACE BAY CUSTOMS STAFF

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South):

1. What is the present staff of Glace Bay customs house?

2. What is the salary paid to each?

3. What are the dates of their respective appointments?

4. Is there any vacancy in the said office now?

Mr. EULER:

1, 2 and 3. Sub-collector of customs and excise, grade 1 outport, salary $1,740, employed 15th January, 1923.

4. Yes, but Glace Bay was reduced from a port to an outport and a decision has not been reached whether the permanent appointment of a second officer is necessary.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PRIVATE GEORGE GREGORY

Mr. GARDINER:

For a return showing:

1. The total amount of money paid to or on behalf of Private George Gregory, No. 160599, since his discharge from the overseas expeditionary forces at Calgary, Alberta, on June 4, 1928.

2. The amount of money paid directly to Gregory and for what purpose, namely, pension, etc.

3. The amount of money paid on behalf of Gregory and for what purpose, namely, hospitalization, etc.

PORT GEORGE, N.S., POSTMISTRESS

Mr. SHORT:

For a copy of all correspondence in connection with the dismissal of Vera Slocumb from the position of postmistress at Port George, Annapolis county, Nova Scotia, and for a copy of similar correspondence in connection with the filling of the position of her successor.

WHEAT CONGESTION AT TERMINALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) if he can give the house some information regarding the congestion of wheat shipments at Port Colborne and Montreal. I realize that he may not have the information on hand, and if not, I would suggest that he have it ready on Friday next.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not know that there is any information I can give to the house with which hon. members are not conversant. There is a heavy movement of grain from the head of the lakes to the seaboard, and it is said that there is just the same quantity of grain in storage in the country as in former years. The crop is heavier by probably 75,000,000 bushels and undoubtedly there is at the moment an excess of grain at the seaboard. It is said further with respect to congestion at Port Colborne, —this matter was referred to recently by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning)—that it is due partly to the fact that the large carriers were filling elevators faster than the canal sized boats could get the grain to Montreal. There is a good deal of Argentine grain on the European market and orders are not plentiful. The marketing of Canada's crop is in the hands of those who own it. There is no further information I can give to explain the congestion apart from the fact that there is not at the moment a sufficient market for the grain we have at the seaboard.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED ERECTION OF GRAIN ELEVATOR AT PORT HURON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): I wish to direct to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) a question based on a despatch appearing in The London Free Press headed thus:

C.N.R. completes plans for building big grain elevator at Port Huron. Sir Henry Thornton makes announcement at dinner given in his honour in the Michigan city.

Is it correct that the Canadian National proposes to build elevator facilities in the city of Port Huron and, if so, why was that place chosen in preference to Sarnia on the Canadian side?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I am sorry I cannot answer the question offhand. I shall make inquiry regarding the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS

FREEDOM OF SPEECH, LIBERTY OF THE PRESS, RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring before the house a matter that affects a considerable section of the citizens of this country: that is, what seems to be a more or less concerted effort to abrogate certain British rights and to suppress, at least so far as certain sections of the community are concerned, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly. A little time ago we had the arrest of Arvo Vaara, the editor of a Finnish newspaper, Vapaus. Then came the cancellation of certain licenses to communist halls in Toronto at the instance, I believe, of the police of that city; then next the forbidding by the Toronto police of the use of any language other than English in certain halls, under penalty of such halls having their licenses cancelled. The next step was the breaking up of street meetings in Toronto, in connection with which six men were arrested on the charge of being disorderly as a result of having failed to move on at the request of the police officers. And now there is pending an application for the deportation of two of these men—a rather serious matter which will have to be dealt with by the Department of Immigration. The other day a petition was presented to the house by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre)—this was on April 25—for the suppression of the Finnish paper Vapaus, "for what appears to the petitioners good and sufficient grounds"—that was all. Then more recently according to the press, steps were taken in various cities to prevent Mayday celebrations.

I could not but contrast this series of repressive measures with the accounts we had the other day concerning the Mayday celebrations in London, England. The communists there went on parade and were offered facilities in that parade by the metropolitan police; when they held their meeting they were guarded by the police lest in any way the meeting should be interfered with. Lord Byng himself was observed in the crowd. Every effort was made to see that the fullest rights of freedom of speech were protected. There seems to be a danger in this country of our allowing other methods to prevail.

Now I am aware that it is not popular to plead the cause of the communists, and to allay any misapprehensions I may as well state at the beginning that I do not belong to the communist party. I wish to say, however, that there is an altogether unreasoning prejudice with regard to anything bearing the name of communism. For instance, in a recent issue of a paper published in my own city, the Evening Tribune, of May 4th, the following appears in one column:

It is expected that M. Lunacharsky whose photo appears above, will be appointed as the first minister from Soviet Russia to the Vatican at Rome, Italy. A mutual agreement has been reached between these states in a treaty by which the Vatican recognizes the Soviet government and the Soviet agrees to the free function of the Roman Catholic religion in Russia.

That is published on the front page, and in another column on the same page of the same issue I find another article headed:

Soviet to bar Russian Easter celebrations. Anti-God societies urged to prevent citizens from attending churches. Suppression as far as possible of the celebration of Russian Easter which falls to-morrow, has been determined on by the Soviets. Anti-God societies have been urged to intensify their efforts to prevent people attending churches and to induce them to give up their religious beliefs.

Then further:

Iszvetia, the official government organ, publishes a new law for the control of all religious organizations and this provides that religious bodies must register, but must confine activities to special buildings and cannot form cultural, educational or medical aid societies. The restrictions are so general as practically to place religious organizations at the mercy of local Soviets who are given unlimited opportunities of closing or confiscating church buildings.

Quite obviously those two articles are incompatible; yet that is the sort of thing we meet with constantly, when anything is mentioned concerning Russia or the communists in any part of the world.

It is quite true that Trotsky, one of the great Russian leaders, was exiled, and that probably logically debars the communists in this country from protesting against any curtailment of speech here. But it does not debar me from protesting against curtailment of speech, for I believe that freedom of speech has always been the proud boast of Great Britain. It is true that there are a number of foreign born among the communists, but I would urge that this is all the more reason why we should very jealously safeguard the rights of these foreign born. They are almost without political voice. This again emphasizes the need for showing them the utmost fairness in Canada.

It is quite possible it may not be very good politics for me to introduce this matter. In my own city of Winnipeg the communist party is one of the political rivals of the Independent Labour party, and the members of the communist party have constituted themselves our most bitter critics. But if I were not pleading for the communists I should be pleading for ourselves, that we maintain the British traditions, or what we have always been told were the British traditions, of freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly. Moreover, I ask the house to remember that when a lawyer undertakes to defend a man charged with murder he does not lay himself open to the charge of defending the crime of murder—much less to that of advocating murder; so, if I undertake to present certain phases of this question to-day, I hope hon. members will refrain from sugesting that I am advocating all the things which may have been advocated by some of the people for whom I speak. I know we have had some difficulty in that regard in the past.

I fancy that the attitude of a number of citizens of Toronto, although I hope this number is not very great, may be illustrated by a recent editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe of April 27 under the heading "Communism Must Go." The editorial stated:

The thin edge of the communist wedge has entered the life of the mining districts.

And again:

There is presented the odd anomaly of a strange people in a new land filled with opportunity preferring to cherish the bitternesses of the older country from which they come. These deluded immigrants, apparently chiefly Finnish, cannot see that, by feeding their minds on the disastrous teachings of embittered demagogues, they are standing in their own light and erecting a barrier between themselves and the rest of the community. Here they found a young country needing citizens ready to aid in its development. They also came among a people eager to give them welcome and anxious for their assistance in creating a new and virile community actuated by Christian ideals, honouring the king and obedient to the laws of this Dominion. But they will not assimilate. In all contacts with their fellows there arises the clash of the old, bitter spirit with the expansive optimism of a generous-minded and progressive people.

The Globe goes on to call attention to the fact that in the face of a common danger, all the residents of one of these northern towns, irrespective of denominational divisions, have united in protest against what it terms this great menace of communism.

I think the attitude of labour might be represented in a paragraph from an editorial appearing in the Canadian Railway Employees' Monthly for March:

Arvo Vaara, editor-in-chief of the Finnish newspaper, Vapaus, published in Sudbury, Ontario, has recently been found guilty of seditious libel, and sentenced to imprisonment for six months and a fine of $1,000. In default of payment, he will have to serve a further two years in jail.

And again:

He is a spokesman for the down-trodden and the exploited, particularly among the miners of northern Ontario. He is close to the workers, and knows how ruthlessly they are treated by the mining corporations, some of which have made more millionaires in Canada in the past year than during any previous ten years of our history. When he maintains that the death of King George would not affect the lot of the worker, he is expressing an obvious fact. When he says that capitalism is the real ruler, he is expressing an opinion which is very commonly held. Some people may think it is treason to express it, but the law does not yet make it a crime. Vaara's real offence was, apparently, that he allowed himself to be so stirred by the appalling conditions among the workers that he was guilty of a breach of etiquette with respect to royalty.

With regard to the Vapaus article itself, I have no desire to take the time of the house by reading it in full, but after speaking in a disrespectful way of the king, the article proceeds with the following paragraphs which seem to have been considered especially objectionable:

Will the king die, does not matter to us. The social order will be equally oppressive to the poor, whoever is king. Large capital is that which determines life's social conditions, and thus kingship has no other significance than to act as a certain kind of ornament while nabobs riot in splendour on wealth amassed from the blood and sweat of the workers. Of the king's condition the whole world is informed through telegrams. But is any thing wired of the condition of the millions who right now live in utter misery in the very heart of the British Empire, England? No, they are not telegraphed about. Efforts are made to conceal well such matters. They not being in accord with the fomenting of patriotic enthusiasm.

So, will the king die. If he does, we hope royalty dies at the same time, and its place be taken by a workers' republic. A change of kings will not better our conditions, no matter who holds the sceptre.

The rise in power of the workers themselves only will save us from the curse of the capitalistic system.

I notice that the evidence in the case showed that various organizations had to do with the publication of this paper, and it was not at all clear that the editor himself was definitely responsible for writing this article. However, this is what the judge said:

But is there any evidence here that any person other than the prisoner wrote, or published, this article?

So it was rather a negative sort of evidence in that respect. I think it is decidedly to the credit of the judge that he makes the statement:

It does not constitute a crime to speak in a slighting manner of the Prince of Wales, however reprehensible it may be.

In his charge the judge made two main points. The first was:

You are to say whether this article was intended to bring into hatred or contempt the person of His Majesty, or of the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like you to carry yourself, if you will, away to that northern country and remember the very hard conditions under which many of these miners live, with none of the comforts of civilization as we know them. They have come from a hard life in the old country to a hard life in this country, and I am not at all sure that they have been received with open arms as the Globe suggests or that they have been given the opportunities they should have been afforded. In order to let the house understand a little of the background which perhaps accounts for the bitterness of this article I would go back to the report of the royal commission on the Hollinger mine disaster, which occurred some time ago. In this connection I should like to read a few brief extracts from the report of the commissioner, who investigated the disaster which resulted in the death by suffocation of some thirty-nine miners:

The fire started in stope 55-A, east of crosscut 12, on the 550-foot level of the Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines, Limited.

Again:

The material in the stope was dry refuse from the thaw house.

Again:

There was an omission on the part of the general manager in not inquiring or knowing how and where such inflammable matter was being placed.

The assistant general manager was remiss in not personally satisfying himself that thaw house refuse was being disposed of through the central waste pass, or by other proper method diluted or mixed with waste rock and other material as he had been informed was the practice of the company with respect thereto.

And again:

The general manager and the assistant general manager cannot dissociate themselves from responsibility for their own organization; and, in my opinion, the responsibility of a general manager and assistant general manager is not limited in extent or time, where it concerns the safety or protection of the workmen or others under them.

Then we come to the commissioner's findings from which I desire to quote a few more paragraphs:

That the scales of justice should be evenly balanced, it was necessary that I should weigh the evidence unaffected by the glare of the fire. I have, therefore, dissociated my mind from the demonstrated fact that thaw house refuse was highly inflammable and required the utmost care in its disposal.

Later:

Those who guided the activities of the mine and those who gave their services, one and all testified to a belief in a state of physical security.

And again:

--and if the suppositions which I advance are tenable, the omission can be said to be a neglect of a condition that became obscured; lost track of in the concentrated effort for increased production which the directors, as a body of businessmen, properly sought if the mine lent itself to it, and which the shareholders would have a right to expect.

And again:

There was a dependence by the management upon officials under them, and these officials upon the workmen, but no one saw to it that the chain of continuity of action was complete...

The dependents of those who lost their lives may have the assured consolation that all that human ingenuity or resourcefulness could do was done, that no human agency could have saved a life that was lost and that those whose hour had come passed on their way to other and higher activities without a struggle, quietly, calmly and unconsciously stepping across the great divide.

And again:

"Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth," James 111:5. Out of a chaos of facts a simple lesson emerges: It need not have been; a sad refrain, but how true and beyond cavil or contradiction.

Let the curtain drop on what has been and rise on what is to be, thereby allowing confidence and morale to restore itself, is my parting word.

(Sgd) T. E. Godson,
Commissioner.

Toronto, May 17, 1928.

This is a most anomalous report. Some thirty-nine of these men were lost in the fire and someone must be to blame. A commissioner was appointed to fix the blame but he reports that it is hard to decide, that the management and the men had forgotten to take care, but that it should be a consolation to those who have lost their friends to know that they passed out in a hurry and dying did not hurt them very much. If some of us had been in the position of the miners and had lost some of our friends by a preventable accident and then had a commissioner come along and make such an amazing report I wonder how we would feel? Communism is fostered in this country by such intolerable conditions!

A second point made by the judge in his charge to the jury was as follows:

If you come to the conclusion after reading the article that it is calculated or intended to excite ill-will between the different classes of the king's subjects, that is, between the workers referred to in the article, and the capitalist class, or the other classes of the country, then that might be deemed to be seditious.

I submit that that simply means that if the workers were to go out to present their case and inferentially denounced the employers or those at the head of the capitalist system, they could be charged with and convicted of sedition.

I hold in my hand a publication entitled The Thunderer. This paper may have come to some of the other members of the house as it came to me, through His Majesty's mail delivered through the post office here in the parliament building. This issue is dated Toronto, April 6, and contains the following:

We say, we repeat it, that any Canadian who places his head beneath the foot of a wop, who calls himself Pope Pius XI, forfeits all claim to rationality; he is an apostate from the order of manhood, and contemptibly crawls through the world like a worm.

And then again:

Rome's petticoated boys and their dupes slandered the editor of The Thunderer—they stabbed "Pat" Sullivan in the back; they started the fight, and now they cringe like whipped curs before "Pat's" lash.

The Thunderer is here to stay, and Rome's Black-Militia and their followers can no more obstruct this snappy bi-monthly than Cardinal "Pea Soup" can dam the St. Lawrence with a bottle of "holy" water.

On page 2 of this issue the following appears:

A Fiend

He is a priest who ravished a defenceless fifteen-year-old orphan, who had just arrived from Ireland. He committed the crime in his parochial school hall, where he was in the habit of offering the holy sacrifice of the mass for the children of the parish. He kept her in his power through fear. Finally he forced her into public prostitution, and he often visits her for immoral purposes in her abode of shame.

He has an honourable place in the published list of the Catholic clergy of his archdiocese. She is numbered among the inmates of a brothel. He is beloved as a "Reverend Father in God." She is loathed as a common harlot—Father Crowley, Romanism A Menace to the Nation, p. 420.

And then on page 4:

Tyrant and Slave

The Roman Catholic Church is the hereditary enemy of democracy. For no one can be a loyal Roman Catholic without renouncing his mental and moral freedom, and placing his civil loyalty and duty at the mercy of a petticoated priest. The priests claim to be sacred persons, a caste apart from their fellows. Unless a man accepts them and their dogmas, they tell him he is damned. This is church teaching for Roman Catholics. If a Canadian places his head beneath a priest's foot, he is no more a free and enlightened citizen than a dark-skinned worshipper kneeling before a highly-decorated medicine man on the outskirts of an African jungle. The silk hat and dog-collar of the Roman priest makes no real difference between the mental attitudes of the priest and the worshipper. The one is a tyrant and the other a slave.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Who is the editor of that paper?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is The Thunderer, an independent bi-monthly, issued by the The Thunderer Publishing Company, 191 John street, P. Sullivan, editor.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What city?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is published in Toronto. The charge on which Vaara was convicted was that of inciting ill-will between different classes of the king's subjects, and he is in gaol to-day; yet papers like The Thunderer circulate freely throughout the country and come to us through the mails. I submit that that is not British fair play. Why should the poor, defenceless working man, who has not perhaps a full knowledge of the king's English and who in this case must use his own language in order to reach his own people have his paper censored and given publicity? We translate the offending article and scatter it all over the world. Then we send the editor to gaol. Is that the way to encourage the highest type of Canadian citizenship in this country? I think that matter can be allowed to stand without further discussion, as I cannot go into it in detail in the brief time at my disposal.

The Toronto police, under threat of the cancellation of the licenses of the halls, have forbidden the use of any language other than English in the halls where working class meetings are held. I can understand that the police may be granted certain authority to see that the halls are properly protected, that they are sanitary, that they have proper fire escapes and that kind of thing.

Mr. GEARY: Is it any language other than English?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps the hon. member can tell us what it is?

Mr. GEARY: French may be spoken. There is no question about that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GEARY: Under that order it may be used in meetings.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear that. But the languages of other races that have rights in this country are not allowed to be used in meetings. There have been published complaints with regard to the use of Yiddish. I have had complaints from Toronto friends with regard to the use of, I think, Bulgarian or Macedonian in national clubs, which have been organized under more or less religious auspices. These languages are being barred, so I am informed—and I think from credible sources—in the city of Toronto. I would say that the police of Toronto, if they are doing this, are exceeding their authority. Their action is impinging upon the fundamental rights of British citizens.

Mr. JACOBS: Why does the hon. member not make his complaint to the municipal authorities of Toronto instead of to the Dominion parliament?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The complaint has been made—

Mr. GEARY: Where?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —but I will show more fully, later on that I am making my complaint here because this is a place where I have a seat and the federal parliament has certain responsibilities in the matter.

Further than that, street meetings have been broken up. The judge in the trial of at least one of the men was Judge Coatsworth. He presided on April 25, 1929, at the trial of one Harvey Murphy. I was interested in noting that Judge Coatsworth's name occurs on some literature which has been sent to me. The leaflet before me is entitled " The Canadian Christian Crusade." Among the members of the advisory board is His Honour Judge Coatsworth of Toronto, and I presume it is the same gentleman. The reasons for the existence of this organization are given as follows:

The C.C.C. was organized as a result of the grave concern aroused in the minds of God's people over the ever-increasing menace of communism, bolshevism, and atheism.

Aim of the C.C.C.

(1) To secure provision to address companies of younger and older people on the subject of the 4-A propaganda, and thereby counteract its attack against the Word of God.

(2) To issue a "C.C.C. leaflet" periodically, giving startling facts relating to atheistic activities, and their menace to the life of the Christian community.

(3) To secure a representative in every Christian assembly who will receive such leaflets for distribution that prayer may go up in a mighty volume against this evil.

Inquiries are solicited, and should be addressed to:—

Secretary, Canadian Christian Crusade,
Room 301, 366 Bay street,
Toronto, 2.

On the third page of this leaflet appear the following statements:

The A.A.A.A.—

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no idea.

—have issued a leaflet with various quotations from the Bible, which they ridicule and attempt to utterly disprove.

I am indebted to Mrs. Bertha Carr-Harris for permission to quote from her book "The Five A's versus The Four A's in this connection, and propose to take some of their statements, and answer them from scripture verification.

Atheism: "Heaven is a solid roof supporting reservoirs of water."

Reply: "The Hebrew word for 'firmament' is 'raquea', and has no such meaning. It indicates an expanse"

Atheism: "Four-footed fowls!"

Reply "'All winged creeping things that go upon all fours are an abomination unto you.' Such things as flying frogs, flying lizards, still found in Asia, were prohibited as articles of diet."

Atheism: "Rainbow given as a pledge. . . ; The rainbow is as old as rain and sunshine."

Reply: "It is not said that it came into existence at this time, but it was then pointed out as a sign."

Atheism: "If Methusaleh lived 869 years, he survived the flood. He was not in the ark. Where was he?"

Reply: "He was dead. That's where he was. He was 187 years old when Lamech was born. Lamech was 182 when Noah was born. Noah was 500 years old when Shem was born (see Genesis 5: 25 to 32) and Noah was 600 years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth (7:6). Therefore—187 plus 182 plus 500 plus 100 equals 969. 'And all the days of Methuselah were 969, and he died' (5:27)."

(More of these answers will be given each time The Leaflet is issued until some of the absurdities of denial are cleared up.)

Pray Pray Pray and Give Thanks.

I said that on that document is to be found the name of Judge Coatsworth, and he is one of the men who decided whether or not these men were guilty of holding street meetings and of being disorderly. That shows very clearly a prejudiced mind.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. A judge may not be attacked in the House of Commons except by way of impeachment.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that Judge Coatsworth has resigned and so I suppose he may be attacked now.

Mr. GEARY: The proper course is indicated in Beauchesne at page 101:

The proper course for persons who feel called upon to attack the conduct of a judge is to proceed by way of a petition in which all the allegations are specifically stated so that the person accused may have full opportunity to answer the charges presented against him.

If my hon. friend wishes to attack a judge who, if I may say so, happens to be a very learned and exemplary person, let him do so in a proper manner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not intend further to attack the judge. I want simply to call attention to the general situation which exists. A little while ago I pointed out the hard conditions under which many of these Finnish people had to live and work. I think I was not going too far afield when I called the attention of the house to the religious and intellectual background of the judge who presided at the trial of this case. Someone asked me a little while ago why I brought this matter before the house. I said that it was because this was the place where I had a seat. I feel this is an important enough question to bring before parliament and the country at large. I would ask several things of the government; I am not insisting upon a decision to-day, but I would urge that the government consider these matters. First, I would ask that they carefully consider the question of leniency in the case of Vaara and the six men who have been imprisoned because of the attempt to hold a street meeting. I know it is not usual to grant leniency in the case of short sentences, but this is a very exceptional type of case. Second, I would urge that with respect to these men whose cases are now before the Immigration department, deportation should not be ordered on political grounds. These men were attempting to hold a street meeting. Possibly they broke the ordinances of the city. They were sent down for a month. Further than that they were charged with being disorderly because they in some way resisted the police. Possibly they are guilty on that charge. I submit that this is not a sufficient ground for deportation, that behind the charges against them lay the fact that they were members of the communist party and attempting to carry on communist propaganda. I would hope that in this country we would not follow the lead of the American republic, which has deported people for political reasons. It is a long time since Great Britain did any such thing.

I would even go so far as to suggest that certain representations might be made to the provincial authorities and to the police of the city of Toronto that they were coming at least rather near to exceeding their authority in prohibiting meetings at which languages other than English or French were being used. If I remember aright, there are clauses in the treaty of Peace which commit the signatories to respect the language rights of nationals, and I take it that we have certain responsibilities in Canada under that treaty of protecting the language rights of the various peoples who are living in this country. Whether or not, however, we undertake to keep our faith with the others who signed the treaty, I would say that from the standpoint of expediency it is highly desirable that when we invite people to come to us from other lands these immigrants shall be assured that they will have in Canada the full use of their own language.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): If they obey the laws of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend from South Waterloo suggests, if they obey the laws of the country. We have certain laws on the statute books under which these men may be charged and tried if they are not obeying the laws of the country, but it is absolutely absurd, that the police, simply for their own convenience, should say: You must not use a language that we cannot understand.

Further, I would suggest to the government that the government put on the statute books even at this session—and only the government can do it at this session—any legislation that is necessary in order to protect what most of us have been taught were the fundamental rights of British people.

May I in closing venture to quote a paragraph or two from an editorial on personal liberty in the Round Table of March, 1929:

> The second foundation of the British commonwealth is the liberty of the individual. This immortal idea, the most precious and important of all social rights, legally established in England by the long struggle which lasted from Magna Charta in 1215 to the Bill of Rights in 1688, and protected by countless enactments and judicial decisions, is the basis of law everywhere in the British commonwealth. This is not always perfectly realized. Liberty may be denied to individuals by fraud or corruption or ignorance here and there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that under standing order 37 I have the privilege of speaking even beyond forty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 37 reads:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

In the present instance there is no motion of "no confidence", but the hon. gentleman may continue while I consider the matter further.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not trespass upon the time of the house, except to finish this quotation:

> It may for short periods be temporarily suspended in cases of civil emergency or foreign war. But nowhere in the British Empire can it be constitutionally destroyed, nor has it ever, even in times of emergency, been long suspended.
> What this means may be realized by considering the consequence in other countries of extravagant idealisms, communistic, nationalist, racial or religious, which have recently triumphed at the expense of the older and far more important ideal of personal liberty. In Russia, in Italy, in many other countries of Europe, and in most parts of Asia outside the British commonwealth, the liberty of the individual is at the mercy of the caprice of government, whether constitutional or revolutionary. The right of assembly, the freedom of the press, the right of asylum, the integrity of the courts, the immunity of the individual from unlawful arrest, even the right of private judgment, are all habitually denied. The people may enjoy national independence; they may be able to try various experiments such as socialism, or some new but arbitrary form of law and order after a period of chaos; but they have not the most precious of all rights, security that the law and the courts will secure to them as individuals the advantages of liberty and justice, whatever government may be in power.

I plead, Mr. Speaker, that we in this country should follow the lead not of Europe or even of the great republic to the south, but rather that of the motherland, and in all these cases absolutely and rigidly insist upon the fullest measure of freedom.

Mr. SPEAKER: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I maintain my first ruling that the hon. gentleman should not have been allowed to speak for more than forty minutes, although by the courtesy of the house he was given that privilege. Standing order 37 says:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister—

The hon. gentleman was not properly speaking in reply to the motion made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. It was on that motion that the hon. gentleman rose for the privilege of expressing certain grievances before the house should go into committee of ways and means, but he is not entitled to speak for more than forty minutes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): May I suggest that Your Honour consider the matter a little further? I am not quite sure in my own mind what the committee originally intended by this rule, but the question now raised is a very serious one, and I think it ought to be carefully considered by Your Honour, if you will do so, and perhaps give a judgment later. This motion is certainly a government order; there is no question about that. The Minister of Finance moves a government order, and the first member who speaks in reply is entitled under this rule to speak for more than forty minutes. Again, if a member makes a motion of "no confidence" in amendment to the motion for supply, that case is also specially provided for in rule 37.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is a motion, but there is no motion of "no confidence."

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Apart from that, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is the member speaking in reply immediately after the Minister of Finance moved a government order, and therefore under rule 37 he should be entitled to speak for more than forty minutes. I admit that the words of the rule are not as plain as they might be, but the Minister of Finance certainly moved a government order, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the first member speaking in reply to it. I quite admit that it is arguable, but it is a matter that the Speaker might very well consider most carefully because it makes a lot of difference. It might very well be that at various times on the motion to go into ways and means or supply, a member would wish to speak on a subject which it would take him much longer than forty minutes to discuss, although he would not go so far as to move a non-confidence motion. Many questions are discussed to better advantage without a non-confidence motion, as the government are then able to view the question dispassionately. To say that on a motion to go into supply no member shall speak for more than forty minutes, unless he is going to move a non-confidence motion, is proceeding a little further, I think, than the committee intended. It might be well for the Speaker to consider the point carefully. I think the first member to speak might be allowed more than forty minutes on a motion to go into supply, even although he does not move a non-confidence motion, because he might desire to discuss a very important question.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, might we not ask that this point be debated? That is, that we might have an opportunity of presenting it before Your Honour makes a final ruling. Frankly, I think this is a most serious step. For instance, a government order might deal with any government bill, and under the suggested ruling we would be limited to forty minutes replying to a minister on a highly complicated bill that might take a long time properly to review. In regard to this particular motion to go into committee of ways and means or committee of supply, it is the inherent and most sacred right of a member to present to the house the grievances of any subject. In reply to the motion of the Minister of Finance that the house go into committee of ways and means, and before that is granted to the minister, a member has a right to present his grievance, which might take him a very considerable time. Personally, I would earnestly request Your Honour not to make that final ruling on this occasion, because to my mind it would very seriously abridge our rights.

It has been suggested that I elaborate for a moment the question of dealing with a government bill. We will take as an instance a bill that might be on the order paper now, we will say a railway bill involving a large expenditure of money and a very complicated issue. If the member who sets himself the task of preparing an answer to the government's proposal were limited to forty minutes, he could not possibly do so adequately.

Mr. DUNNING: There is not any suggestion of that in the ruling.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes, it would follow if that ruling were established. The minister presenting the bill has unlimited time to cover the ground fully, but the member replying would be limited to a period within which it would be impossible for him to present his case. Therefore I would respectfully urge Your Honour not to make that the final ruling until we have had further time to consider it. I would also ask that Your Honour grant us an opportunity to debate it fully, especially in the absence of my hon. leader.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the remarks made by the member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) and now by the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) are, I think, extremely opportune. The new rules of the house ought to be interpreted according to the spirit, and not according to the strict letter. Now, the standing proposition of the Minister of Finance every time we are going into supply is for the house to transform itself into committee of the whole to grant ways and means to His Majesty's government. This is a substantial function of parliament and, as Your Honour has well stated, it is a substantial right of every member to take advantage of that motion to present to the house any grievance from any community represented by him.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Why should that be limited to one hon. member?

Mr. BOURASSA: I will deal with my hon. friend's point in a minute. Therefore I say it is the outstanding duty of every member not to let that privilege be abridged. It may be abused at times, it may be used inopportunely by this or that member. But we should not consider the rules from that point of view. We should take the general rule as it is, and the principle underlying it. Now, every time the Minister of Finance moves that the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means, it is the right—and very often the duty—of each or any member to oppose that motion in order to bring before the house any grievance or something which he may think of immediate interest to the country.

The question then raised takes precedence over every other business, and has to be dealt with thoroughly by the house before it decides to vote for or against the motion of the Minister of Finance.

I have been asked a very pertinent question by the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young): Why should it be confined to one member? That is the chance of every member. The first member to stand up when the motion is made by the Minister of Finance takes that precedence for that day. He brings up the question which he thinks ought to be discussed and settled by the house before the motion of the Minister of Finance is adopted. I think it is a very important point, Mr. Speaker. It might give rise to consequences much more important and numerous and varied than we may imagine at first. We must look at the rule, and at the ruling passed upon it, not from the sole point of view of the member who has brought up the question to-day, but from the point of view of its general application. I claim that whether there is or is not a motion of want of confidence, every member who challenges the motion to go into committee of ways and means has the right to present fully to the house the question which he thinks important for the time being to be disposed of. It can be only one question. It has to be dealt with by the house before the motion of the Minister of Finance is adopted, and I think we should look twice before we abridge that individual right of all members of the house.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, the dilemma in which we find ourselves to-day is only another illustration of the undesirability of the rule we passed a couple of years ago. I am quite willing to accept your ruling, sir, and also the objections made against it, because they are both correct in that they illustrate our position.

You, sir, have ruled, taking the concrete instance, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not entitled to speak longer than his forty minutes, because the motion before the house is to go into committee of ways and means, and he was discussing a subject quite remote from the motion. Therefore it would seem reasonable that he should not be allowed to exercise a privilege denied, as my hon. friend says, to other members. Why should the privilege be granted to the man who first gets to his feet? I may have a burning grievance of as much importance to my constituents as the grievance of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is to his constituents. Because he first gets your eye, sir, he can speak for all eternity, and I am limited to forty minutes.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made a very clear point, but he omitted one illustration which I think is very strong. It is a well-known fact that the budget speech of the Minister of Finance is generally replied to by the financial critic of the opposition rather than by the leader of the opposition, and I believe this rule was worded for that purpose, so that it would allow the man speaking on behalf of His Majesty's opposition to criticize the whole budget; he would not be limited to forty minutes, which would be evidently grossly unfair. Therefore that privilege is to be conceded. If we allow that, we must also concede the privilege to any private, insignificant member to get up and delay the house while he discusses perhaps some private local grievance when that right is denied to other members following him. I suggest that the matter could be best solved by taking another vote, and I am sure that we should find the majority of the members willing to do away with this foolish forty minute rule.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): The intention of the committee at the time the rule was drawn up was to limit speeches to forty minutes, but we made certain exceptions thereto. The first exception was made in favour of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition and that was agreed to unanimously. But the question was raised that someone might speak on behalf of the Prime Minister—someone on the government side—or some member of the opposition might speak on behalf of the leader of the opposition, as for instance the critic of the opposition speaking in reply to the budget speech. We therefore extended the exceptions from two leaders to the minister who might move a government order or to the member of the opposition replying thereto on behalf of the leader of the opposition. That was our intention.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It does not specify a member of the opposition.

Mr. MARCIL: We thought that the leader of the opposition on occasion might not wish to speak himself but might request one of his colleagues to speak for him, and our intention was to limit the rule to the two leaders or to the two members speaking on their behalf—a member of the government speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister or a member of the opposition speaking for the leader of the opposition. I quite agree with the two hon. members who have spoken immediately before me that it is a time-honoured custom of parliament to allow grievances before supply, but the intention of the rule was to limit speeches to forty minutes, with the exceptions I have indicated.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I would point out what would seem to be an anomaly if such an interpretation were put upon the rule. The rule distinctly states that the member speaking in reply, immediately after the minister, shall be included in the exceptions. According to the hon. gentleman's interpretation, we find ourselves in this dilemma: Either the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was speaking in reply to a minister or else he was speaking absolutely out of order. If he was not speaking in reply to the minister he was not speaking to any motion. It seems to me that he could be speaking only to the motion made by the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: Which admits of any subject being presented.

Mr. BROWN: Certainly. So that if the rule should be that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre shall be limited to forty minutes then we find ourselves on the other horn of the dilemma, that he was not speaking to any motion at all and was therefore out of order. It may be that this rule goes further than those who devised it intended it to go; that may very well be. But the rule is as we have it, and it is not just now in point to debate whether the forty minute rule is desirable or not. I cannot see, under the rule as we have it, but that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking as he was, was entitled to take any time he saw fit in presenting his case.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): As a member of the committee that redrafted the rules, I cannot agree with the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). My recollection is that the committee intended to allow the first member of the house speaking in reply to a minister to exceed the forty minutes. I understand the tentative ruling to be that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is limited to forty minutes inasmuch as his speech is not a reply. The committee did not undertake—and I do not think this house would undertake—to dictate to any member what form his reply should take. If the hon. member chose to say what he did say in reply to the minister's motion that is for him to decide; no matter what he may say, he replies. It may be irrelevant or otherwise; we all have differences of opinion as to the effect and the advisability of statements made in the house. But no matter what his statement was it was a reply and therefore should not be limited to forty minutes.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): As a member of the committee which revised the rules I remember distinctly both the spirit and the intention behind that rule. There is no doubt in my mind that the exception was inserted to safeguard what we have considered to be a very valuable privilege in parliament, namely, that grievances might be discussed on the floor of the house. I was so certain of this that I prompted the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the effect that he had more than forty minutes in which to state his grievance. I agree with the hon. member for Bonaventure with respect to his main contention, but I do not agree with him that the committee intended the exception to be confined to the official opposition. That clause was inserted to apply to every member of the house replying to a minister in the technical sense. As a member of this house I have always understood that an hon. member rising to a motion to go into supply was replying to the minister who moved the motion. I have always understood that to be technically so, and I believe the rule was drawn up to give effect to that right. My memory is so distinct regarding the motives and the intention of the committee in this respect that, as I say, I took it upon myself to prompt the hon. member when he was speaking and when I saw that he was being hurried for time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Although I have already spoken I should like to make one further comment. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has raised a point which seems to me to be very relevant. There is no question that it was intended that if a member of the government moved the second reading of an important bill when he would have the right to take more than forty minutes, the member who spoke immediately after him would certainly be entitled to speak for more than forty minutes. But under what rule would he exercise that right? He would have the right under standing order 37, which relates to the member speaking immediately after the minister who moves a government order. It seems to me that inasmuch as a member has that right to speak for more than forty minutes after a minister moves a second reading, the same rule must apply in this instance.

Mr. NEILL: We have now heard from four members of the committee who framed the rule and no two of them are in agreement as to what it means.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): I cannot allow the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding the editor of the newspaper published in Sudbury—Vapaus—to pass without explaining to the members of the house the situation as it exists in that city and in the district of Nipissing. The editor of that newspaper was tried and after a fair trial convicted of seditious libel. The newspaper did not represent the opinion or the sentiments of the Finnish population of northern Ontario. We had in that district a very large number of Finnish families, many of whom are pioneers who have lived in that section of the country for more than a quarter of a century, and their descendants to-day have taken their place along with other Canadians and are engaged in trade, in the professions and in other occupations. They are considered among some of our most desirable citizens. I would point out to my hon. friend that notwithstanding the fact that we have this large foreign population in the district of Sudbury we have been free from strikes for the last twenty-five years. Living conditions among the mining population of northern Ontario are far better and far more comfortable than they were made to appear by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. No class of labourers in Canada receive better remuneration, live under better social conditions or are more prosperous than the mining people of the north, and no class of people have contributed more to the development of that great north country than those who are engaged in carrying on the work of our mines. Many years ago these people realized that it was to their own interest to create living conditions in the mining districts which would attract the very best labour, and the model towns of that district are taken as examples throughout Canada.

We have been free from strikes; we have been free from strife and we have been entirely free from racial or religious disturbances. The Finnish people in our district are not communists or socialists and the people in northern Ontario have failed to be influenced by propagandists who have been sent there to induce the labourers employed in the mines and in the lumber camps to join Communistic organizations. In that way we have kept free from labour disturbances and have succeeded in creating living conditions for that class of people under which they have no reason to complain. I would invite the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to visit some of the new plants which are being erected at present, before he makes such statements as to the living conditions of the mining men in the north.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I visited some of the old plants.

Mr. LAPIERRE: That may be so, but I am inviting my hon. friend to visit some of the new plants, and I would direct his attention to the fact that no labour disturbance ever has taken place in our mines.

I will leave it to those better informed to reply to the hon. gentleman with regard to the Hollinger mine, but when I visited that mine a few years ago it compared favourably with any of the hundred mines I have had the opportunity of seeing during the last eight or ten years. I may tell my hon. friend also that the working conditions in our copper and nickel mines to-day are equal to those existing in any other place in the world.

In conclusion I wish to say that the petition which was presented to this house requesting the suppression of that communistic paper published in Sudbury represented the very best elements of our society. It was signed by representatives of all the organizations interested in the welfare and the future development of northern Ontario, and I may say that that section of our Finnish population known as the White Finns—

Mr. HEAPS: What other colours are there in addition to white.

Mr. LAPIERRE: I will leave that for my hon. friend to deal with; he knows them better than I do. These people, however, have been absorbed into our population and to-day are just as good citizens as we have anywhere in that north country.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (Toronto South): There are one or two points arising out of the address of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to which, as representing at least a part of the city of Toronto, I should refer. Just how the hon. member considered the greater part of his speech to be relevant to the subject he was discussing I cannot make out. His speech was a criticism directed mainly, one gathers, against the courts which tried offenders for breaches of certain clauses of the Criminal Code.

As to the Hollinger mine fatality the hon. member who has just taken his seat, of course, is well versed. I know little of that case, but I do know that within a week of the disaster the Ontario government instituted an inqury under a gentleman who was not a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario, but who was a judge holding equal rank with judges of that court, Mr. Justice Godson, who at one time was mining recorder. It is not my intention either to commend or to criticize Mr. Justice Godson, but I have no reason to suppose that he, any more than any other judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario, should be subject to unfair criticisms in this house. I have not the slightest doubt but that he gave his decision in that case after careful inquiry, to the very best of his ability and with absolute conscientiousness. That being so, I think it is too bad now to criticize him. If there is any action which should have been taken following his report I think my hon. friend would be on more solid ground in suggesting it, but he has not ventured to make such a suggestion.

The other case taken up by the hon. gentleman was the one to which the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) has referred. That is the case of the judge who tried and sentenced an offender under the Criminal Code. With all respect to my hon. friend I do think that no good purpose is served by ex parte criticism in this house of a judge of our courts. It was the integrity of the court to which my hon. friend referred when he read from the Round Table magazine, and if we cannot trust our courts and if we are free to criticize our judges on such grounds I think matters have come to a very serious state. If this house considers it necessary to criticize the judgment of any judge here rather than in the proper courts of appeal, if such there be, the house should so declare, but at the moment the house should follow the rule which says there must be no criticism of a judge in this house. I regret very much that my hon. friend has sought to violate this rule, not only in regard to His Lordship Mr. Justice Godson but also in regard to His Honour Judge Coatsworth, who is a judge of the very highest standing.

The city of Toronto, through its police commission, has issued an order in regard to speeches at public meetings, with the terms of which I am not fully conversant. I do not think my hon. friend himself will defend in this house the doctrines of communism; I do not believe he can see eye to eye with those who profess to follow those doctrines of communism. I may say that no city in Canada is more ardent in defence of the principle of free speech than is the city of Toronto.

Mr. SANDERSON: No more so than many other cities.

Mr. GEARY: No, I do not say that; I did not intend to do more than point out the position taken by the city of Toronto, since it has been more or less attacked this afternoon by my hon. friend. He may say he was not attacking the manner in which the affairs of that city have been conducted, but from his reading of certain magazines or pamphlets, of which I have never heard but which happen to be published in Toronto, which fact he emphasizes, I can only understand that he wishes to take objection to the conduct of public affairs in that city. The police commissioners, who are an independent body, issued an order, to prevent communistic appeals being made—which appeals would have the result of creating disorder—in a language which was not one of the authorized languages of this country, and I think the hon. member will admit that the meeting he mentioned was being conducted in a language which does not come within that classification. I do not defend the action of the police commissioners because I do not know enough about it, nor do I criticize it, but I do say that the action of the chief of police, endorsed by the Board of Police Commissioners, has been apparently sanctioned by the approval of the people of Toronto, and also apparently by the people of the province.

Miss MACPHAIL: Has the hon. member not heard anything of the protests made by citizens of Toronto against the ruling of the chief of police?

Mr. GEARY: No, I have not heard of any, but if the hon. member says that such complaints have been made I am perfectly willing to accept her word.

Miss MACPHAIL: If the hon. member had been reading the press he would have seen them.

Mr. GEARY: I have not observed them, but at all events they have not induced a reversing of the order.

Miss MACPHAIL: It wouldn't in Toronto.

Mr. GEARY: I am one of those here to represent my city, and I think we can judge very well from what the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has just said, exactly what the sentiments are which inspire so many of these remarks. The city of Toronto has not lacked in any sense a proper appreciation of her responsibility as a city, to her province, to her dominion and to her empire. I say that on behalf of my city with regard to what I think are feelings which are not justified and to expressions which are made, quite often without cause, by hon. members of this house.

If it would be admitting anything to the hon. member, I will say that the city of Toronto is definitely and I hope unalterably opposed to the adoption of the principle of communism in this country. I do not know this for a fact—perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will correct me if I am wrong—but I am informed that the Labour party in Toronto, which owns a building called the Temple, does not permit communistic meetings to be held within that building. That is to say, organized labour, which is strong in Toronto and commands the respect of the people of every class, does not choose to allow its building to be used for this same sort of meeting, even when the addresses are made in English. The police commissioners have decided that it is in the interest of public order to forbid communistic meetings being held in a language which is not understood.

In a very ingenuous way the hon. member complains of a man who was arrested for resisting the police and charged with disorderly conduct. I leave it to the house to decide whether or not that was disorderly; it certainly was not orderly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My reason for referring to that was because the charge is now being made the basis for an appeal for deportation.

Mr. GEARY: I think the hon. member is in the proper forum as regards deportation, but in regard to the domestic affairs of the city of Toronto I personally would be very much obliged if hon. members would consider that after all Toronto has got to a point where she may be supposed to be able to take care of her own interests and we do not overwelcome interference and criticism which we think is not justified.

Mr. MALCOLM LANG (South Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the northern part of Ontario has entered into this discussion I feel that I should express my sentiments on this matter. I quite agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) when he says that we should all try to live up to the traditions handed down to us from the old land, the traditions of the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. I do not believe that we can follow that too closely, because just as soon as we depart from those principles we get into difficulties. I also agree with what the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) has said regarding the good citizenship of the Finnish people in northern Ontario.

I do not know anything about the paper which was suppressed as I did not follow the case at all, but I do feel that the people who seem to be taking this matter so seriously have been misled. I have been in touch with conditions there because the southwest corner of my riding comes within four miles of Sud-bury. I meet the people in that section at intervals throughout the year and I know that some people in Sudbury were greatly worked up about this affair, but to my mind it was only a tempest in a teapot. Only a few people were concerned in it, but probably they are the class who would try to get others interested in their agitation and perhaps they did express themselves in a way which was not fitting as citizens of our country. However that may be, the case has been in court and has been dealt with. My opinion is that the Finnish people around Sudbury are not going to be affected seriously by any action which has been taken by certain people or by the courts with regard to this matter. My experience, not only with the Finnish people but with the other European peoples who have come to our country, is that they always prove to be good citizens. It is true that when they first come here and do not know our language they have difficulty in understanding our ways; probably they do not understand our laws and it takes them some time to become accustomed to our methods of living. Whether their children come with them, or are born in Canada, I have always found that after they have attended our common schools they become a high type of citizen.

The tragedy which occurred at the Hollinger mine some two years ago has been mentioned in the house to-day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That was a disaster which was entirely unexpected and something which we all felt very keenly about, but it did occur. I knew Judge Godson for many years before he became a judge, when he was a mining commissioner, and I feel quite satisfied that he used his best judgment in trying to arrive at a finding in connection with the cause of that disaster. Nothing transpired because of his finding other than that the management have the experience which they had in that particular case and I believe that since this disaster has happened, the management of all the mines in northern Canada and indeed, throughout the whole country, will be much more careful. In the mining camps in the north country the mines, and particularly gold mines, are known mostly as wet mines, and mining men never believed that a fire such as happened at the Hollinger mines, could occur. But, however that may be, nothing that could be said by anyone or any findings by any commission that might sit on the case could make me change my opinion with regard to the matter, namely, that the responsibility for a tragedy such as happened in the Hollinger mine at that time, must rest upon the management of the mine. Had the management been what it should have been, greater care would have been taken to see that the regulations laid down in the Mining Act of Ontario were properly carried out, and such a tragedy could not have occurred.

There is another angle of the Hollinger disaster which, it occurs to me, has something to do with the comparatively small spread of communism throughout our country. Had there been throughout the mines in the Porcupine camp and other parts of northern Ontario a good miners' union well organized and kept alive; had the miners' union continued to exist as it did in the earlier days of the camps, then even had the management been neglectful in regard to the care of the mines, the matter would have been forcibly called to their attention by the men working in there, because they would have had behind them an organization strong enough to protect them in making necessary comments or complaints to the management so that the work could be carried on properly and carefully. I know the opinion I hold is not shared by everyone, perhaps not by the majority of the people in the north country, but I think nothing tends more towards a good, safe and successful operation of a mine or any other big industry than a good organization amongst the employees and one that in its operation merits the confidence of the management and the executive, so that the executive of the labour organization will be called in to meet and may meet with the management and discuss around a table the conditions which they have to face in order to make a success of the enterprise in which they are all engaged. For some years past the organization of the men employed in the mines of northern Ontario has not been kept intact. I hope that the time will come when the men will have a good organization. They need it. It will be a good thing for them and it will be a good thing for the mine owners and the mine managers, because only by their properly working together can the best success be made out of the development that is taking place in the north country.

Just a word with regard to communism. I think I am right in saying that they never had a good miners' union in the Sudbury district; but if we had a good miners' union throughout northern Ontario, that in itself would do a great deal towards preventing any spread of communism among peoples who come to our land from parts of Europe where they do not know our conditions and who, under the conditions that exist in the north country to-day, are left to fight their own battles, to look after themselves without any organization to help them and probably without the care, sympathy and assistance that they should have from their employers. It is not any wonder that some of them drift into the hands of these agitators who are endeavouring to spread communism throughout the land. I am thankful to say that communism is not spreading to any great extent throughout northern Ontario, but I am not inclined to place the blame for the little that exists, upon the poor individuals who are taking part in that agitation. We who have had more opportunities than they have, who have lived in that country for a long time, who are and always have been citizens of Canada, who know the conditions, and who have invited these people to come and live with us, and who want them to remain with us, should take a greater interest in them, and thereby keep them away from the communists who gather around them. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house, but when this opportunity arose to-day I felt that I should make my viewpoint clear upon just these few matters.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I think all have appreciated the speech of the hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang) who has just taken his seat. Let me state in the beginning of the few remarks which I intend to make, that I am not a communist. Neither, indeed, is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). It was just this winter that he was chased out of the Labour temple by the communists—or at least, caught his train a moment or two before he intended to. He had his meeting broken up by them and I understand he is not in very good odour with them. So it cannot be said that either of us is a communist, although I need not defend the hon. member because he is quite able to do so himself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I interrupt? I left the meeting before the row started. Even the communists did not frighten me.

Miss MACPHAIL: I can quite believe that. I am interested in this discussion only from the viewpoint of free speech, free assembly and a free press. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), an hon. gentleman who is held in very high regard by all the members of the house, say that he was not familiar with the protests that had been made by the liberal-minded people of the city of Toronto. I suppose they are so few in numbers that the sound they made did not reach the ears of my hon. friend. By "liberal" I do not mean Liberal in politics, but liberal in thought; they are not the same thing. But surely anyone who has been reading the press knows that W. A. Cameron, the minister of Lloydminster church, conducted a real campaign, and a very able one, in favour of free speech in the city of Toronto, that meetings were held in Hygeia hall and many letters written to the members of this house, all because of the ruling, I believe, of the chief of police of the city of Toronto. I should be glad to think that all over Canada we had freedom of speech and of assembly and of the press. I think it is true that we have freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, except in a few dark spots, but we have not quite got, I think, freedom of the press, and I think all hon. members of this house will secretly agree with that. We boast a great deal about following British traditions and honouring them by copying them, but this is one in respect to which I think we have fallen short. In Great Britain there is much greater freedom of speech than there is here. There one can say I fancy, almost anything and no one tries to stop him. But in this country, unless one is saying what is an accepted fact, one runs into difficulties. I think we might well become more British and less American in that regard. I do not think there is anything to be gained by trying to make all people think alike. I have every confidence in freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and freedom of the press because I believe that the truth will out, and if you let people talk who have nothing to talk about, they will naturally kill themselves; but if they have something that is a living and a vital thing, you cannot stop it from coming out, and the more you try to stop it, the more it grows until it becomes so strong that it overcomes all obstacles in its path and sometimes brings a great deal of destruction, like a dam when it bursts. That was borne out by the speech of the hon. gentleman who preceded me. I was happy to hear him say that he believed that if there was organized labour in the northern areas there would not be so much communism. That is my own idea, and one always thinks that the person who expresses one's own ideas is very clever indeed. I think that the more opposition there is to freedom of speech and assembly, the more opposition to decent standards of living and to acquiring decent standards of living by organization of the men themselves, the more communism there will be. Suppress that and you will bring about the thing you fear—communism. I want to support the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because I believe in free speech, free assembly and a free press. I believe that the more freedom there is in those respects, the greater will be our happiness and our self-respect.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): While I did not follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in regard to conditions in northern Ontario, I must support him and the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in their advocacy of the right of free speech, even if it comes to free speech in the House of Commons in connection with the forty-minute rule. I do not need perhaps to say that I am no communist and that I have no sympathy with such doctrines, and I hope there are no communists in the district I represent. I believe that the best method of dealing with extreme views is to afford them the greatest publicity. It is far better to have these doctrines shouted from the housetops or in the public squares than whispered in the cellar, because that is where they will be whispered if you do not allow them free outlet in God's air, so to speak. The surest way of propagating a doctrine is to make a martyr of somebody in connection with it. History all down the line tells us that. You can pour a pail of water on a cement floor, and you cannot eliminate it by beating it; you only spread it, and that is the effect of trying to stop people uttering seditious doctrines with which we are thoroughly out of touch.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey spoke of conditions in the old country. I was over there a couple of years ago, and I went to Hyde Park one Sunday evening. I was amazed at the freedom of speech that was allowed there. A man mounted a soap box and he talked sedition from the word go, and I was astonished to see that the people were listening to him and appeared to be taking it in.

Mr. HEAPS: How do you know it was seditious?

Mr. NEILL: It was in my opinion.

Mr. HEAPS: That is all.

Mr. NEILL: And in the opinion of most people. What was the ultimate result? There were a couple of men who looked like artisans standing in front of me, one of them with his wife. My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) will no doubt want to know how I knew it was his wife. I took that for granted, Mr. Speaker, in spite of my experience with divorce cases in Canada. These two men stood in front of me and I thought they were taking it all in, but at last one of them said, addressing the speaker,, "Oh, go and bile your bleeding head. Let's go home, Bill," and that broke up the meeting. I thought the speaker had been making an impression upon his audience, but the sound common sense of the British working people was too much for him. That remark was the end of him; his audience laughed and disappeared. But if he had been compelled to hold his meeting in a cellar, he might have made some impression.

Another instance which I did not see, a friend told me about. A man drove up in a car and stopped to listen to one of these soap box orators. He left the engine of his motor running, making a little noise. A policeman came over to him and said, "You will 'ave to stop that engine. You are hinterfering with the heloquence of the horator." That orator was talking sedition but the policeman saw that he got free vent anyhow, and no doubt with the publicity he got he ended as the man did in the other case I mentioned. Darkness, ignorance and suppression are the mothers of sovietism and communism. Give these doctrines the light of day and publicity, and we can trust to the sound common sense of the Anglo-Saxon race that there will be no danger of our being troubled with communistic principles. But make martyrs of these people and there is something in human nature that lends itself to follow them, and you will be doing more harm by trying to suppress their doctrines than if you gave them access to the free air, where they will naturally dissipate themselves.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): The few speeches that we have just heard have proven to the house, I think, that the initiative taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was quite timely. I did not have the advantage of hearing the hon. member, but I took my impression of what he said from the remarks of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), whose accuracy and probity of mind I trust entirely.

There were two or three points made by the hon. member for South Toronto in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which ought not to be passed over without some reference. With regard to freedom of speech and freedom of the press, that subject has been under discussion so often that I do not think it necessary to insist much upon it. I almost entirely agree with what my good neighbour (Mr. Neill) has just said about the advantage of letting people have vent for what they have to say, even if it is foolish. That is better than trying to suppress it.

I still more perhaps agree with the hon. member who spoke a moment ago, from South Timiskaming, I think. He hit the nail on the head, so far as agitation and propaganda among the labouring classes, and especially the foreign labouring classes, are concerned. There are two causes for this propaganda. He dwelt upon one—the lack of organization on the part of some sections of our labour world, and the lack of encouragement given to labour organizations either by employers or by the public at large. Quite a number of people in this country seem to imagine that syndicalism or labour organization is a mere matter of class concern for the labourers. That is an entirely wrong view. It is a matter of public interest, of social concern, of public safety for the whole nation. Under modern conditions of life and labour, the whole nation—I will go further—the so-called possessing classes, have a direct and immediate interest in seeing that labour is properly organized and in a position to deal with a sense of collective responsibility either with employers, or with the public at large, or with parliaments, governments, and so forth. I well remember in my young days when, in such organizations as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for example, the policy was to prevent or stifle any such things as labour unions. Well, there was among the vast number of employees of that company at that time a spirit far more inimical to the company and to society at large than there is now. Why? Because some few men saw the reasonableness of the employees' position. May I name one? The late Lord Shaughnessy. He, having had the advantage —I call it advantage—of beginning work at the foot of the ladder, had a heart and a mind big enough not to have forgotten the days of poverty, the days of humbleness, the days when he was under the load of authority and wealth which made itself so heavily felt by the labour classes. Instead of fighting that spirit of organization among the employees, he encouraged it. Of course, I admit that large employers of labour by adopting a friendly attitude towards organized labour often get their men to agree to certain conditions which they might not accept if their employers were hostile to them. But there is not the slightest doubt that since the spirit of syndicalism has spread out, since labour has organized itself in a sensible manner and a sense of responsibility has grown up among the labouring classes, it is easier to settle labour problems.

Now, in regard to the intrinsic and political right—I call it political in the very broad sense of the word—of people holding the doctrine of communism to express their views, well, that is a very broad question. There are many people nearer to the capitalists than to the communists, or people not belonging to any set class, who believe that the doctrine and practice of capitalism, as existing to-day in America especially—and I make no distinction between Canada and the United States in this regard—are just as baneful, just as opposed to the basic principles of natural law, just as contrary to the essential laws of prosperity, of the economic balance, of social and distributive justice, as may be the doctrine of communism. It was found long ago in such countries as England and Germany, for example, that communism is the direct and natural and logical result of the excesses of capitalism. Well, if it is wrong for people to hold the doctrine of communism, it ought to be just as wrong—at least many people would think it just as wrong—for others to hold the doctrine of capitalism. Where would that lead us to? Would the member for Winnipeg North Centre be entitled to raise a movement among the people he represents to get the public bodies of this country to suppress papers or organizations which hold the doctrine of capitalism? And yet he would be just as entitled under the constitution of our country, interpreted in a broad way, in asking for the suppression of capitalism, for the suppression of newspapers and of public meetings holding the views of capitalism, as the member for South Toronto and myself may be allowed to propound the view that communism should be suppressed and that the expression of view of those who hold that doctrine should not be made public.

Mr. GEARY: Will the hon. member excuse me? The only point I made was that the action of the police commissioners of Toronto was based upon disorder arising from the advocacy of communistic principles in a langugage they did not understand. I was neither condemning nor approving their action.

Mr. BOURASSA: I thank my hon. friend. That brings me to another point—language—which should not be lost sight of, but before I touch on it I want to deal with another point, that of due respect for courts of law. Here again it is very difficult to draw the line. It is often said that this parliament is the highest court of the land. There is not the slightest doubt that all jurisdictions in the land, whether civil or criminal, whether federal or provincial, hold their powers from this parliament or from the local legislatures. They are amenable to the supreme action of either this parliament or the provincial legislatures. That so long as parliament or the provincial legislatures do not think proper to change the law, individual judges should not be insulted or attacked or unduly criticized because they administer the law as it stands, I quite agree. But should we go the length of saying that no adjudication by any court should be open to criticism or attack on the floor of parliament or of any legislature? Then in what manner could we operate upon public opinion to have such laws changed? When you read history you find that no judicial powers—I mean on matters of importance—have ever been changed by the proper authority, let it be king or parliament, until abuses had repeated themselves from time to time, until excesses of authority had been committed by tribunals, and therefore until those abuses and excesses had been denounced by public opinion in one manner or another. Is it not a fact that criminal jurisprudence in England was largely amended in the last century, and for the better of society as well as for the safety of the subject, thanks to the unceasing campaign—many people called it slander—which "Labby" carried on through his paper Truth, when for weeks and weeks, and months and months, he published judgments rendered by courts of assize, police courts or magistrates in England sending men to gaol for eight days for real crimes, and others to the penitentiary for two or three years for offences which were considered trivial or unimportant by the people generally. The mere fact that the uncertainty of English justice, that the partiality of English judges, was put before the English public week after week by Truth had more to do with the amendment of English criminal jurisprudence than any other agitation to this end.

Mr. FORKE: Didn't they send Labby to gaol for his freedom of speech?

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course, he was sent to gaol, he was covered with fines, but nevertheless after a while his views prevailed. I do not think there is a single responsible public man in England to-day, whatever opinion he may have of the late Henry Labouchere personally, who will not admit that it was through that campaign—I repeat, as it was called—of slander—

Mr. FORKE: My only point was that speech was not always free in England.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. It is the same everywhere. And speech cannot altogether be free. I simply want to make it clear that if a member of parliament or a Canadian citizen believes there is a tendency in the application of the criminal or the civil law which will be detrimental to the country, or work against the individual or political liberties of the subject, I fail to see any other means of arousing public opinion and of bringing parliaments and legislatures to the point of amending their laws than by denouncing such judgments as they deem wrong.

Now I admit it is a question of degree; it is a question of tact; it is a question of opportunity. It is very difficult to draw the line. The only point I want to make is this: in spite of any written rule of this parliament, I lay down the broad principle that under the British system of government, and preserving what is best in that system, you cannot accomplish anything unless you take some risks, personal and political, and appeal to public opinion as against set rules, as against systems of policy, and even at times as against the authority of judges. But—and I repeat it for the second or third time—it must be done with tact and discretion; nevertheless it is very often a duty to be performed, and as regards the views held by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think that hon. gentleman did his duty when he pointed out the danger of certain jurisprudence which had its beginning in the days of the war and which threatens to perpetuate itself.

With regard to the use of foreign languages in publications or in public speech, I would point out that here again we have a very broad question of policy. I would be the last man to charge the good people of Toronto with more narrowness of mind than others. In this respect, not belonging to the province of Ontario, I am happy to repeat, and from a purely disinterested standpoint, what the hon. member for South Toronto has said. As an individual I can render testimony to the breadth of mind of a large proportion of the individuals of all classes inhabiting the city of Toronto. This may surprise my good neighbour (Mr. Neill), who seems horrified. I know some of my good Ontario Grit friends would not agree with that, but I claim to be a living witness to the fact. I believe I have denounced the views, political and social, held by the majority of the people of Toronto, in the city of Toronto, and before various bodies—universities and clubs—more often perhaps than any other member of this house.

Mr. MANION: And were applauded.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, and when I was not applauded I was listened to. In fact, all the broken sticks I have received in the varied course of my public life for saying just what I thought, I have received in my native province and not in the city of Toronto.

Mr. McGIBBON: They are generous minded down there.

Mr. BOURASSA: No, I will not say they are generous; I want to say exactly what I think. I think the majority of the individuals in Toronto are broadminded. But I am afraid that the concern which they have as a community, a collectivity, to be known as the standard city of loyalty has developed among them a public spirit which is not always in keeping with the breadth of mind, the intelligence and the culture of the individuals. I am afraid that their manifestations of political thought and of public life are very often the cause of the bad reputation which that city enjoys. I believe that is a fair view to take of the city; at all events I say what I feel. There is not the slightest doubt that, having an eye to "French dominated" Quebec, another eye to these new provinces of the west where armies of "foreigners" are invading these sacred precincts of the British Empire, the people of Toronto feel that they have a greater responsibility laid upon them collectively to preserve the rights of the king and the integrity of the empire than the king himself feels, and certainly than all the millions of the people of England and Scotland assume. I have felt that every time I have had occasion—and I may say I chose the occasions—to go to Toronto; I felt it more vividly after I came back from London. I have never experienced a change of atmosphere so sudden and so powerful. What the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said I have experienced time and again. I remember going with the late Joe Martin to a public meeting in his constituency of St. Martin's, one of the London ridings. There a public orator began by stating quite frankly that he was neither communist nor socialist, but he denounced the naval policy of the then Liberal government—a Liberal government, mind you. Someone interrupted him: Well, we have need of a strong navy; to which he asked: Why?—Well, to defend our country.—Defend our country against whom?—Against the Germans.—Why defend us against the Germans?—To keep our king and parliament.—Why, our king is a German anyhow; why have two German kings, one in Potsdam and one in Buckingham? Have only one in Potsdam and it would be less costly to us. And so far as we labourers are concerned, the German labourers are far better treated than we are.

Mark you, these words were uttered in London in the presence of several policemen and about six weeks before the outbreak of the Great war. But no one felt hurt; no one was scandalized. There were a few people who heckled him but not in any bad spirit. They seem there to think that their loyalty to the king and their attachment to their institutions are solid and genuine enough to resist the effect of any word spoken or written to the contrary. Some of our good friends in Ontario, on the other hand, appear to be so little sure of their loyalty as to be afraid to have anyone challenge it.

Of course, when you come to the foreigner it is another question. I think the hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Lang) has said the truth and the whole truth. I know a good deal about the various foreign elements which have come to our country in the last twenty-five years and are scattered throughout the western provinces and in northern Ontario, and comparing their state of mind with the state of mind of our own people in the province of Quebec, I think I can draw this conclusion: the more you attempt by force to make them British or even Canadian the less you will succeed. The French Canadians became thoroughly, and I might say radically, attached to British institutions the moment the British ceased to endeavour to make them British by force. So long as the representatives of the British crown and government endeavoured either by force or by diplomacy to impose the English language upon them and to deprive them of their rights, or their undue privileges as the British called them, in matters of school, church organizations and civil law, the French maintained a spirit, I will not say of disloyalty, exactly, but of resentment towards British rule. They looked upon that rule as something imposed upon them. They were sceptical of every attempt on the part of some few representatives of the crown to smile upon them; they always thought that there was behind the screen something which meant either their absorption or the denial of some of their privileges. But the moment the British, after nearly a century of political and at times physical struggle, renounced the idea of imposing their views upon the French Canadians, that moment did the French Canadians become the staunchest upholders of British rule. Not because it was British; you could not expect that from them; but because British rule as applied in Canada, after it had been made adaptable to the needs of this country, contains a germ of liberty and equality which they prized. In that sense they became more British than they had been French in the past. It will operate in the same way in connection with the newcomer, provided you do not turn the whole machinery of parliamentary law, of judicial authority and police repression upon them and say, "You must be British; you must speak English; you must talk this way and not the other way." You will never make them British or Canadians in that way.

It may be said that it is an inconvenience for police officials not to understand the languages used in public papers or at public meetings. Of course there are inconveniences in all systems; but I claim that this inconvenience is less vital than the blunder and the crime of leaving aside those broad principles of liberty, including liberty of speech in any language, in order to enable a policeman to understand what has been said or written. Let us do what they did in Austria and in Russia; let us have interpreters who will tell us what has been written or said, and if anything really criminal has been stated in any publication or in any speech let the principles of law and order which are applied to English or French speaking citizens apply to these other Canadians who speak in their own language. To say that you are going to force a community to print a paper in English or in French and so prevent a Canadian citizen from using in public or private speech the language he has learned, the language he is entitled to use by natural law and by a broad application of the highest principles of British liberty, it is a mistake. If you encourage that kind of jurisprudence, if you encourage that sort of legislation, you should begin by erasing some of the finest and noblest pages of Canadian history, which have become engraved in the hearts and minds of all true sons of Canada, whether their origin be French, English, Scotch or Irish.

A few years ago I happened to be travelling in the hills of Wales, and there I found some of the old-timers, old shepherds and old farmers who remembered their school days when they had received strokes of the rule on their hands because they dared speak their native language in school. My hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) will understand me. Their struggle for the right to speak their own language was maintained from the conquest of their country by the English in the twelfth century down to the last years of last century; and finally, after six hundred years of stubbornness, the English understood that they had gained nothing by enforcing that rule. Now the Welsh people can use their own language in pleading before their courts, in their political or literary societies, and also in their municipal councils and so on. Have they become less devoted to the British crown? I do not think so.

To-day in that country of which my friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) is a worthy son there is a revival of the Scotch language and the Scotch nationality under way. Does that constitute a threat to the unity of the British empire? I do not think so. I believe that anything which gives greater opportunity and wider scope for the mental, intellectual or moral growth of a people and all its component elements is for the good of the country and for its political safety. For heaven's sake let us endeavour to be reasonable in this regard and let us not follow the narrow-minded policy which is in force on the other side of the line. Have they succeeded in furthering the moral unity of their country by imposing upon their children the most backward and narrow system of education in existence to-day throughout the civilized world? They have not. There is less moral unity in the American nation to-day than existed previous to the war, and the reason is that they endeavoured to get their people to become what they called one hundred per cent Americans. The people revolted mentally against that attempt. To-day the German-Americans, the Italian-Americans, the Hungarian-Americans, the French-Americans and the Polish-Americans are less one hundred per cent Americans than they were before the war, because their understanding of the natural law and their sense of human dignity have revolted against this system.

This is a point which was brought out very well by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; and I think the hon. member for South Toronto, if he remembers his close personal contact with the French and other peoples during the war, must realize that if we want moral and political unity in this country it will not be achieved by making foreign-born Canadians English-speaking or French-speaking by force; it will not be achieved by days of imprisonment, by fines or by threats of what may happen if they dare use this or the other language, or if they dare oppose a certain social or political theory which may be held by other people. If we impress upon them that this country is more free than the country to the south, more free mentally, morally and intellectually; if we impress upon them that there is a place in Canada for every group of people to grow according to its racial or intellectual tendency provided the whole community is united in a few basic principles of national unity, we will get much further. Of course they must accept also the Canadian constitution, Canadian law and what I would call Canadian communal life; but if we take the broad attitude I have described, I think we will attain far better results than by letting it be known that such decisions as that rendered in the case brought up today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reflect the cool judgment and determination of either Canadian public bodies or the Canadian people at large.

Mr. GEARY: I rise to a question of privilege, not to object to what my hon. friend has said but rather to correct him, since I believe his impression is erroneous. In the action of the Board of Police Commissioners of Toronto I understand there is no condemnation of the use of any particular language. To my knowledge there are two excellent journals published in Toronto, one in the Yiddish language and the other in the Italian language, both weekly publications bearing very excellent reputations. With regard to the use of any particular language, a great body of respectable citizens in Toronto are of the Hebrew race; they use their language as they please without question, and so far as I know that point never has been raised. What my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre took issue with was an edict or order of the Board of Police Commissioners directed against communist meetings carried on in a foreign language, and made on the ground that they provoked disorder and the police could not understand what was going on. I neither condemn nor defend that action, because I do not know the circumstances. At this point I might say to my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that perhaps she was right in her expression of surprise during the course of my previous remarks. As a matter of fact I did not know of the agitation to which she referred, but since then I have been informed by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) that a great deal of discussion pro and con has been carried on in Toronto. Meetings were held and it was a matter of some public interest. I suppose through absence I was unaware of that and so made the statement I did. The hon. member was probably right in correcting me; I should have known.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. GEARY: I am speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a question of privilege also; my information is quite different from that of the last speaker.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as I represent the Porcupine district, I think it is my duty to say a few words. I intend to be very brief, but statements have been made this afternoon which I believe should be corrected. I have in mind more particularly some of the utterances made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in referring to the contents of The Thunderer. As a Catholic, I say that this paper should be permitted to carry on its propaganda because I believe it will make people of that faith better Catholics than they were before, after reading such trash. I am convinced also that 99 per cent of the protestant population of Canada who happen to read that paper will become more broadminded on religious matters than they were previously.

I do not desire to make any extended comment upon the communistic paper which was published in the Sudbury district, but I believe that judgment has defeated its own ends; it has become a boomerang to communism. I feel sure that only a very few members of this house have read that little paper or knew about it before it was mentioned in this discussion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned the lot of the miners in northern Ontario. As a citizen of the Porcupine district I know of the conditions there and I believe the lot of the miner will compare favourably with that of any other worker in the industrial life of this country. The minimum wage paid to the miner in that district ranges from $4.60 per eight hour shift upwards. Most of the Finnish people are working under contract and many of them make as much as $7 to $10 per day. Many of the miners in our section are directly or indirectly interested in the mine stocks, but that may not be a sign of prosperity; many of them own automobiles, which may not be a sign of prosperity; but in South Porcupine, Schumacher and Timmins a large proportion of the miners own their own homes, which is a sign of prosperity. The bank managers tell me that there are millions of dollars in savings deposits which belong to the miners, so I believe their lot is a pretty good one.

I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr.

Lang) that there would be no communism in our section of the country if labour were properly organized. The hon. member mentioned the word "capitalism". I hold no brief for the capitalist because I represent every section of the population of my constituency, but I must say in all sincerity that without capital our section of the country would not have the prosperity and advancement we are experiencing at the present time. Following the words of the hon. member I really believe that the miners themselves are to be blamed. We have found it almost impossible to organize them because the man working at the Hollinger mine does not want to be organized with the man working at the McIntyre mine, and so on. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was up in our section of the country a few years ago and he told the people at that time that organization was absolutely necessary. We have one organization in Iroquois Falls, and it is working quite well as the newsprint manufacturers in that section of the country are satisfied to work in cooperation with the labour element. The hon. member for South Timiskaming said that it was rather surprising we had not more communism in our section of the country, and I believe that the proper way to counteract any activities of that kind would be through proper organization.

Mention has been made of the disaster which occurred at the Hollinger mine in February of last year. Judgment has been rendered and I believe every member of this house will bear me out when I say that it is a positive fact that the company was not responsible for that disaster and that it certainly was not premeditated. I happened to be in Timmins during that time and I heard many fiery utterances which were made against the management and against the government, but I feel sure that 95 per cent of the population of that section of the country were satisfied with the verdict which was rendered after the inquiry had been held. New legislation has been passed and new means afforded for preventing a similar disaster.

That is all I have to say about this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I thought it was my duty to correct some of the statements which were made

Mr. SPENCER: In view of the importance of the forty minute rule, and the statement made to the house with regard to the length of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is the house to understand that Your Honour has given your decision or that you purpose making your ruling at a future time, as has been requested by several hon. members?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no doubt in my own mind as to the correctness of the ruling itself, but in view of the expressions of opinion of experienced members of the house, I am quite ready to consider the matter further.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was not here, but I fully agree with Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: I was here, and I wholly disagree with Your Honour's ruling.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last evening we were considering an amendment moved by the Minister of Finance to paragraph 4 of resolution, No. 3. The amendment reads:

That paragraph 4 be amended by striking out clause (e) and substituting therefor the following:

(e) one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over one dollar per share, but not more than three dollars per share;

(f) one-fourth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over fifty cents per share, but not more than one dollar per share;

(g) one-tenth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price of fifty cents or less per share.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, immediately prior to the rising of the committee last evening I was endeavouring to point out that 74 per cent of all stocks traded in on the Standard mining exchange were stocks selling at a price under $3; that the rate of taxation, even under the amended proposal made yesterday evening by the Minister of Finance, resulted in a rate of taxation varying from 10 per cent to 3/100 of one per cent; that the small investor was penalized by having to pay in tax to the government a much larger percentage on his investment than was the man of larger means, and that the new taxation as proposed, calculated on the basis of one day's trading on one exchange by eleven brokers, meant an increase in tax of $20,228.32.

I stated last night that I would endeavour to make a recapitulation in view of the suggested amendment of the Minister of Finance; but unfortunately the data from which such a recapitulation can be made is not available in this city, and hence I shall have to quote another figure which I do with the full realization that it will be to some extent reduced by the new proposal of the Minister of Finance. It has been conservatively estimated that the imposition of this new tax would produce, on shares of Ontario mining companies alone, an annual amount of $5,000,000. That amount of $5,000,000 would equal approximately 40 per cent of all the dividends paid by all the silver and gold mines operating in Ontario last year. The result of the imposition of that tax will be, I believe, to drive the financing of all new mining properties into the hands of the organized concerns and to prevent the ordinary prospector and the small investor from sharing the profits which may accrue from such investment. I endeavoured to point out that its effect, by reason of curtailment of market, would be to curtail the mining industry, and I would call attention to the fact that if the mining industry is curtailed, the effects are wider than the results merely on that industry. Last year, in seven out of the twelve months, the mines produced the greatest amount of tonnage carried on our railways, and during the high peak in the month of October, they produced 5,426,255 tons. In most, if not all of the provinces of this Dominion, we have a Transfer Tax Act, but every one of them has been based upon the principle that there shall be the same per cent of investment paid in tax by the small investor who invests in the small priced issue as shall be paid by the large operators who can afford to invest in the higher priced issues, and that the same per cent of tax shall be applicable to mining stocks which are the lower priced issues as is applicable to industrial stocks which are the higher priced issues.

The question whether there should be an increase in the amount of tax imposed by the Dominion upon the transfer of shares is one of individual opinion. At the moment I am not directing the attention of the committee so much to the quantum of the tax as to the inequality of the rate of tax in this proposal. To my mind it would be just as logical for the government to argue that the whole ascending scale of percentages imposed in connection with income tax should be reversed as it is to impose the scale of taxation now proposed, because in the result it would be exactly the same. In effect by this proposal the government says to the small investor who buys the cheap issues, the lower priced issues: You, by reason of purchasing that lower priced issue, should pay in tax to the government a larger proportion on your investment than should the large corporation. Last night we were treated to some vain boastings by hon. members opposite as to the advantages conferred on mining in this country by this beneficent government. It will be interesting to observe by what argument the government will attempt to persuade the mining industry that it receives any benefit from the imposition of this unequal tax, or by what reasoning it will endeavour to convince the small investor that he is not being discriminated against in favour of organized wealth. Surely this proposal has not had from the government the thoughtful consideration which it deserves. If it has had consideration, then one can only conclude that this is another evidence of an unfair burden of taxation being imposed upon the masses, and a remission of taxation upon the wealth of this country. If it has been considered at all, this is further evidence of allegiance by the government to that modern and expressive, though ungrammatical plagiarism "Them that has, gits."

Mr. MANION: I do not intend to delay the passing of the resolution. I intended to stop in time to let it pass if I was the only speaker.

Mr. ROBB: It is nearly six o'clock, and I think other hon. members desire to speak. I believe I shall be able to show that the tax as now presented is reasonable to the nation as well as to those who speculate in these stocks. We can, however, discuss that later. I want to take advantage of the few moments that we have before six o'clock to say to the committee that I shall move to amend the Excise Act, being chapter 60 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, by repealing subsection (a) of section 219 and substituting therefor the following:

On every pound of malt manufactured in Canada, subject to excise regulations with respect to coomings and absorption of moisture in warehouse as provided by the order in council of the seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, three cents: Provided that malt may be removed from a malt-house to a distillery in bond, and the duty on such malt may be remitted upon proof satisfactory to the department that such malt has been used solely for the production of spirits, in which production no other material than malt is used; and provided further that malt used, in any licensed bonded manufactory, in the manufacture of malt extract or other similar medicinal preparation approved by the department or in the preparation of any malt food product approved by the governor in council may have duty thereon remitted under such regulations as the department establishes;

In this way it will appear in Hansard and the votes and proceedings. The object of the motion is this: in the manufacture of malted milk there is an excise tax on malt and as there is a considerable industry desiring to establish itself in Canada to manufacture malted milk, they have represented to us that we should relieve them from this tax. We are therefore going to wipe out the tax for that purpose.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is not going to ask the house to pass the resolution in regard to the Special War Revenue Act to-night?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MANION: I wish to point out what I think is an inequality in this tax. I shall do so by quoting a few figures I have compiled myself. For example, 1,000 shares of Noranda at to-day's price of $54 amounts to $54,000 and the tax upon it is $30. On the other hand, 1,000 shares of Kirkland Lake at, say yesterday's price of $1.02, comes to $1,020 and the tax is $10. This bears out the criticism offered by the hon. member for West York. It does not seem a fair method of taxation whereby you tax a small dealer to a much greater extent in proportion to his deal than you tax the larger dealer.

Mr. ROBB: Not the small dealer, the small priced stock.

Mr. MANION: The small priced stock purchase. He is a small dealer in that he buys or sells small priced stock. On the other hand, I do congratulate the minister on this, that he has very much improved matters so far as the penny stocks are concerned, but even yet the penny stocks are being charged rather heavily. For example, take 1,000 shares of Columbus Kirkland, currently selling at 1½ cents a share. That deal would amount to $15, and the tax would be $1, whereas in the Noranda deal which I instanced, 1,000 shares selling at $54 a share, the tax would be $30. In addition, there is a commission on the Columbus Kirkland deal of $1.50 and an Ontario tax of 30 cents, making total charges of $2.80. It is true that only $1 of that is chargeable to the Minister of Finance, but it must be remembered that a lot of these penny stocks do become the parents, so to speak, of first-class mining stocks. My hon. friend who took his seat a few moments ago gave some examples. I will mention only one or two. Teck-Hughes, which is one of our outstanding gold mines, was selling a few years ago at 10 and 15 cents a share; it is now selling around $9 a share. McIntyre a few years ago was selling at 15 and 20 cents a share; to-day it is selling around $16 and $20 a share. Sheritt-Gordon within the last few years was selling at 60 cents a share; it is now selling around $8.50. So these small penny stocks that are largely traded in are sometimes the cause of the development of a large mining interest.

I want to put on record before six o'clock one other point in regard to industrial stocks, which I think is worthy of the consideration of the Minister of Finance between now and Monday, when he may possibly have to make some changes. Take an industrial stock, although really it is a mining concern, like Smelters. One hundred shares of Smelters at yesterday's price of $420 would amount to a $42,000 deal. The tax on that is $4, according to the minister's figures. One hundred shares of Cosgrave Brewery at $3.50 a share would be a $350 deal, and the tax on that is $2. There is a tax of $2 on a $350 deal, and a tax of $4 on a $42,000 deal, in the same number of shares.

Mr. ROBB: How would it be to put them all on the same basis as with the sales tax?

Mr. MANION: I do not think the sales tax would be fair at all. The minister has spoken of that in the past. I understand, but I do not think it would be fair because these shares change hands so frequently. We think that the sales tax should be wiped out altogether, but, at any rate, as it is presently applied it is fair to this extent, that when you buy a suit of clothes you make that purchase and you keep the suit, paying the sales tax only once, but these stocks change hands again and again and it would not be a fair method to apply the sales tax to them. One way in which it could be done—I am speaking for myself—would be a percentage tax on the value of the deal, although I have not worked out any percentages. I may say a few more words in regard to this matter when it comes up again, but I thought in the meantime the minister might give it his consideration.

Progress reported.

SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, before you finally arrive at a conclusion with respect to the point of order which was raised this afternoon, there may be an opportunity for some further discussion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. I will let the hon. gentleman know further with respect to the matter.

At six o'clock the house adjourned until Friday, May 10, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 10, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Eighth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Brown.

AIR MAIL SERVICE

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I desire to lay on the table of the house the remainder of the file with respect to air mail service, containing copies of air mail contracts asked for by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart).

DOMINION OF CANADA GUARANTEE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved:

That the petition of the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, presented on the 8th May, praying for the passing of an act to change the name of the said company and also to increase its capital stock, together with the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF MATURING OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations, and to issue substituted securities therefor guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest, but not exceeding $18,000,000, the aggregate face value of the original securities.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a Canadian Press despatch from Paris, among the statements contained in which is the following:

It was confirmed to-night that the plan for revision of reparations payments by Germany proposed by Owen D. Young of the United States at the reparations conference would leave Great Britain nothing for the dominions or for arrears of interest on debt. It would award that country just enough from Germany to pay the United States from now on.

There is also the following statement:

The absence of direct representation for the dominions at the conference is considered by the British delegation as all the greater reason for not yielding on the question of the dominions' share of German reparations. The delegation is practically certain to reject that phase of the Young proposals which would reduce the German payments to the dominions to zero.

In view of the effect which this would have on Canada's interests in this matter, will the Prime Minister lay on the table a statement showing the terms upon which the present payments are made, the arrears if any that exist, and the amount received to date, together with any information regarding the new suggested arrangements, so that we may have an opportunity of studying the proposals.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My impression is that the information which my hon. friend asks for has already been given to the house, but I will endeavour to see whether it is not available in a form in which it can be again tabled.

UNITED STATES TARIFF REGULATIONS

FILLET TRADE AND DRIED FISH INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I desire to direct the attention of the government to a Canadian Press despatch that appears in this morning's papers—I am reading from the Montreal Gazette of this morning's date. I do not purpose reading the whole despatch but merely two paragraphs:

Paragraph 717 of the existing or old law—

This has reference to the proposed United States tariff regulations or revisions.

Paragraph 717 of the existing or old law, imposes a duty of 2 cents a pound on "fish, fresh, frozen or packed in ice—such as halibut, salmon, mackerel and swordfish," with one cent a pound on other fish "not specially provided for".

The new bill keeps substantially the same rates but adds a provision for 2½ cents a pound on fish which is filleted, skinned, boned, sliced or divided into portions. It also provides for 2½ cents a pound on dried and unsalted fish, of cod, haddock, hake, pollock, and cusk and 1¼ cents on other dried and unsealed fish.

In view of the very serious effect such a provision must have on at least two branches of the fishing industry in Canada, namely, the fillet trade and the dried fish industry, I would like the government to lay on the table of the house all conventions between this country and the United States with respect to fisheries

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Of course my hon. friend understands that the officers of the department are not in a position to supply any definite information as to the effect of the changes mentioned by my hon. friend, but I am told that if these changes are as stated in the press they cannot seriously affect our trade at present. The officers of the department have looked into that report and they do not believe such changes can have a very great effect, but of course we cannot do anything in the matter. This is only a newspaper report; nothing definite has been done and as yet this has not become the law of the United States. With regard to my hon. friend's request, I am quite ready to comply with it.

TORONTO BUILDING TRADES STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour, or in his absence the Prime Minister, whether the strike at present in progress in Toronto in the building trades is in course of settlement.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot answer my hon. friend's question, but I assume that a strike in the building trades would be primarily a matter for the consideration of the provincial government.

Mr. HARRIS: Then I might ask the Prime Minister if the Minister of Labour is participating in the deliberations having to do with the settlement of the strike.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I cannot answer that question, but perhaps I might make a further reply to my hon. friend's previous question. A moment ago I said that a strike of this kind would come primarily within the jurisdiction of the provincial government; as a matter of fact I believe it would come entirely within the jurisdiction of that government. However, if both parties concerned requested the good offices of the Minister of Labour under the Conciliation Act he would be in a position to take action, and I am sure he would be ready to lend whatever good offices might be in his power.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED ERECTION OF GRAIN ELEVATOR AT PORT HURON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): On Wednesday last the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher) asked me a question based on a despatch appearing in the press with regard to the construction by the Canadian National Railways of a grain elevator at Port Huron, Michigan. I undertook to obtain the information requested and I am now in a position to say that the construction of a grain elevator at Port Huron is being undertaken by private interests on the Canadian National lines in the United States; it is being financed by United States capital to take care of United States grain. The Canadian National Railways are cooperating to the fullest possible extent in the matter, and those interested desired to erect these facilities in their own country.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Does the minister know the proposed location of the elevator well enough to tell me where it is to be eercted?

Mr. DUNNING: Port Huron, Michigan, is just across the river from Sarnia, Ontario

Mr. GEARY: Will the elevator be near the tunnel entrance or further up the river?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say exactly; I know it will be on the Canadian National lines and that is mainly what I am interested in, since we will get the traffic. I cannot give the details to my hon. friend.

NOVA SCOTIA FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): On April 29 the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) asked certain questions of importance. I was not in the house at the time, and his questions escaped my attention. The other day when the hon. member referred to the questions again I made a reply but had something else in mind; I thought he was referring to some other questions on the order paper. The hon. member asked as to the policy of the government in regard to steam trawlers and also as to what was the intention of the government with regard to the fishermen of the community of Ingonish, in his constituency.

Answering his first question I may say that the policy of the government with regard to steam trawlers is contained in the bill which was introduced by myself and read the first time on February 14, which bill is still before the committee on marine and fisheries. As to the intention of the government with regard to the fishermen of Ingonish, it has been represented to the department that the dealers in that community were offering a very low price for fish and that they were buying fish by count. After inquiry as to the dealers in that locality we made representations to them suggesting that they should buy the fish by the pound and pay the fishermen a reasonable price. Of course the house will understand that we have no power to dictate the price of fish; we have made representations to these dealers but up to the present no answer has been received.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee sat last we were considering vote 133, and were dealing with the following item:

Tabusintac—wharf extension, $3,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There were one or two questions asked by my hon. friends which I promised to answer. One question was asked by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) in connection with Lorneville. The hon. member asked why the total appropriation of $11,300 had not been fully expended. I have looked into this matter and I find that the estimate of the cost of removing 11,250 cubic yards, scow measurement, was $1 per yard, and it was estimated that that work would take up the whole of the appropriation. Whether the engineer's estimate was high or whether the contract price which we got for the work was low, we were able to have the work done at 65 cents per cubic yard, with the result that the total expenditure for removing very nearly that amount of material only came to about 65 per cent of what we had anticipated. I am told that it is probable that some work will be done the cost of which will come out of the general vote.

Mr. MacLAREN: I pointed out to the minister that the work had been found to be incomplete and not carried out to such an extent as to enable the work to serve the purpose for which it was intended, to make a safe refuge from heavy weather. The minister stated that he would read the report of the engineer, and I had hoped that the engineer would be recommending that some further work be done.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the latter part of December, before the work was completed, a report was made by the engineer, and if my memory serves me aright that was the last report we received. He said, he would probably ask for a further amount to complete this next year, but apparently there has been no further request from him. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the actual dredging done was within 115 cubic yards of the 11,250 cubic yards which had been estimated and for which the appropriation was made last year.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand the minister to say that he expects to make arrangements to continue the work and complete it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would not say to complete it, but further work is going to be done and I expect that it will be provided for out of the general vote. Since the hon. member asked the question the other evening I have inquired into this matter, and I have the engineer's report of September 22, reading as follows:

> Your letter of 30th July, authorizing dredging to be undertaken by Mr. James S. Gregory at Lorneville. I have to report this dreging was begun on 3rd August and completed on the 22nd August, 1928. The work has been thoroughly inspected and has been found to be left in satisfactory condition. Mr. James S. Gregory, the contractor, has executed the work to my satisfaction and in accordance with the terms and spirit of the contract. I find that he is entitled to receive payment for the removal of 11,134.9 cubic yards, scow measurement, class B, at 65 cents, a total of $7,237.69.
> Yours obediently,
>
> Geoffrey Stead,
> District Engineer.

The engineer has furnished a plan which I shall be glad to show to my hon. friend. This plan shows that the work was done around the inside and that there is a certain amount of work to be done additional to what was authorized and for which he suggests that he would ask for an estimate. However, no request for an estimate has been received, but I am sure that part of that work can be done out of the general vote.

Mr. MacLAREN: I hope that will be sufficient. I am sure that the desire of the minister is to have the work carried out so that the result will be satisfactory, and I would ask him to request the engineer to look over that area again and consult with the people in the neighbourhood. There was a certain amount of dredging done but the work is of little value. Perhaps the additional work may correct that, but I think it would be well if the minister would instruct the engineer to interview the people who are using this shelter and obtain their views on the situation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When we found that we did not have the additional request which the engineer had anticipated making, we issued instructions that a report be made as to what work will be required this year and as to whether or not it can be done out of the general vote. The hon. member is evidently under a misapprehension in thinking that because only $7,312.50 was spent last year out of an appropriation of $11,300, the work was not completed. The appropriation of $11,300 was based on a cost of $1 per yard for 11,250 yards, whereas the work was actually done at a cost of 65 cents per yard. The report from the engineer, which I take to be correct, shows that the work was well done.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is not the view of the people who are trying to make use of this shelter, and I think that practical experience in a case of this kind is a very valuable test. I am under no misapprehension, as the minister thinks, because I was not considering the amount of money which was spent; my point is that the dredging has not been done in such a manner as to make the shelter suitable and available for the purposes intended. I am basing my views on the knowledge and experience of the men of the locality, who can give a very valuable, practical expression of opinion. I do not, however, want to say too much now, because I really think the minister intends to have something done. I would ask that, apart from the engineer's opinion and some soundings that have been taken, he consult with the men of the locality. They inform me that the work has not been done in accordance with the conditions of the locality so as to make it a serviceable, safe refuge.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would my hon. friend mention anybody in the locality with whom he would suggest that I confer?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is about a year since the people interested spoke to me in regard to the matter. I cannot give the names offhand, but I will look into it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend and I are endeavouring to arrive at the same goal; we want this work properly done. My information is as I have given it. If there is a complaint, none has come to the department. The only statement the department has is the report showing that the work not only is satisfactory, but has been done at a very low price. If my hon. friend will give me the name of anybody he would like the engineer to confer with when he visits the locality, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. MacLAREN: The people complained to me, and I suppose when they did so they were depending upon me to bring the matter to the attention of the department, as I have done. It may take a few days but I shall be pleased to get some names and forward them to the minister.

Mr. GEARY: Has the department dredged out the harbour and left a shoal outside guarding it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: What my hon. friend suggests is that further work be done around the edges. It is the work around the edges that, it is stated, has not been completed.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is not quite that. They say, first that the dredging has not gone near enough to the pier so that at low tide vessels cannot remain near the pier; and, second, that the dredging is being done in an irregular way so that there are hillocks through this space. If a boat happens to be anchored on the top of a hillock, it may turn over when the tide goes down.

Mr. HANSON: Unfortunately I was not in the house when the item with respect to Escuminac was under consideration. I think it was some days ago that it was under discussion, and I have not been able to find it in Hansard. I should like to know what is the situation at Escuminac. It may be recalled that this work was started, I think as long ago as 1924-25, and that we have been since then making annual votes of about $50,000. This year I notice an amount of $40,000 is being required, and I should like to know whether this completes the work or just where we stand. My information is that what was predicted in the house some years ago has actually happened, namely, that no breakwater can be built at that point and remain there because of ice conditions. I have information now to the effect that the ice has actually lifted the works; that they are more or less of a wreck, and that the contractors are greatly exercised as to who is to bear the loss. Would the minister give a comprehensive statement as to the situation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to complete the work now under contract.

Mr. HANSON: That is only the part under contract. Of course this has been built, as the minister knows, in sections, one contract for each section. How much more is to be required in addition to this $40,000 to complete the whole work as projected? My recollection is that the minister's colleague, the Minister of Health, who was Minister of Public Works at the time the project was undertaken, stated that this work was to cost a quarter of a million dollars. Nearly all, if not all, of that amount must have been voted by the house. That is the first point I should like to have elucidated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is quite right in stating that the work was to be done in sections. The last section is the one for which this $40,000 is required; this will complete the contract for that section. Of this amount, $23,000 is a revote. There is no appropriation at the present time for any further section or for any further portion.

Mr. HANSON: How many more units are to be built in order to complete the whole project which, I understand, originally consisted of five different units?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The original project evidently contemplated doing eventually all that is shown in red and yellow on the map that I have under my hand. My hon. friend has no doubt seen it.

Mr. HANSON: I am familiar with it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The parts marked in red on the map have been contracted for, and this is to complete the last part of what is marked in red.

Mr. HANSON: Contracted for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; they were thought to be the most urgent. No contract has so far been entered into for the balance, and no estimate has been inserted for it. The work that has been done is the work that it was thought should be done first. As to how soon afterwards the balance will follow is a matter for future consideration.

Mr. HANSON: I quite agree. I should like to know how much, including this appropriation, will be expended, and also how much money will be required, according to the engineer's estimate, to build the portion which has not yet been contracted for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have no estimate for the cost of the balance. The cost of this last section is $69,000.

Mr. HANSON: Would that be the total expenditure to date, including the $40,000? There is something obviously wrong about that, because we have voted several sums of $50,000 for this project, with all due respect to the minister, I think his information is incomplete.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not under my hand the total expenditure in that vicinity. All I can say is that the present contract is $61,729 and the probable total cost of the work as shown by the details I have under my hand is as follows:

Amount of contract..	$61,729
Inspection, contingencies, etc.. ..	7,271
Total..	$69,000

Mr. HANSON: That is obviously for only one unit.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me just for one moment. In 1926-27, 310 feet of this breakwater was built under contract with the Burpee Construction Company, and the amount of the final expenditure was $44,672.56. With the $69,000 that will make about $113,000.

Mr. HANSON: Obviously that is not the whole story. There was $50,000 voted by this house prior to the general election of 1925 as a direct consequence of a bargain which took place before a by-election held in that county about the year 1923. I am giving this information to the minister because he was not in the department then, but the deputy minister knows the facts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will readily understand that I know nothing about any bargain that took place in any by-election or in any general election.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to know how much this project has cost the country so far, and how much it will cost when completed. I venture to suggest that the figures will be very startling. In addition, predictions were made which have already been fulfilled that no breakwater would ever stand the ice conditions at that point. I made a sporting offer to the Minister of Public Works of that day, the Hon. Doctor King, that if he would get a statement over the signature of Mr. Gray, who was then the district engineer in the city of St. John, that the structure proposed by the government would stand the ice conditions, there would be no opposition to the vote from this side of the house—from me at all events, because I realize that the fishermen require a shelter—but the minister was never able to get that undertaking. The prediction made by those who knew the conditions has been amply fulfilled. The ice has lifted up part of the work that has already been completed, and I want to know what the government are going to do about it. Are they going to make the contractor suffer the loss that has been sustained by reason of these ice conditions, or will the government sustain the loss? In my humble opinion it is not fair to put the loss on the contractor, because the government engineers and departmental officers had been fully warned about the ice conditions before the vote was ever passed and before the project was undertaken.

What is the whole project estimated to cost? I remember distinctly that prior to the federal election of 1925 the then Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Doctor King, estimated that it would cost $250,000. The work was started in units estimated to cost $50,000 each, and the separate units were proceeded with year after year. I do not recall just how much work was done, but it is apparent from the minister's figures that he has not the whole data before him. I am satisfied that more than two units have been completed.

I would like an expression from the minister with respect to the ice conditions to which I have referred. The only excuse that could be given for not making a complete statement would be that litigation was pending, in which event I certainly would not want to prejudice the government's case by pressing for a statement here. I do know this, however, that information has reached me that the predictions that were made with regard to this whole project have been already fulfilled, that the work could never stand the ice conditions in the Northumberland straits or in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, where this work happens to be. That is very unfortunate, but it is nevertheless true. I want it distinctly understood that I am not opposing this vote if it can be demonstrated that the work will stand against the ice conditions but if the ice conditions are as I believe them to be, and as I have been informed, then I tell the minister that this is just so much money wasted.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the first place, I am advised that the total estimated cost was not $250,000 as my hon. friend said, but $200,000. That was some years ago. As to the contract to which my hon. friend refers, where the ice conditions, storms or something of that kind rendered it more difficult for the contractor to perform his work, I think my hon. friend will be one of the first in the house to agree that that is something that cannot always be foreseen.

Mr. HANSON: Forewarned is forearmed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not necessarily. There are certain things that all the forewarning in the world cannot provide against. The precautions that were taken under these specifications were the precautions that the engineers considered reasonable under the circumstances, and they were carried out. A claim has been made, I understand, and is receiving consideration, but as to what will be done about it, no decision has been made, and I am unable to inform my hon. friend what the decision will be.

Mr. HANSON: I am not going to ask the minister to tell me what the judgment of the department is, but I would point out to him that all these ice conditions were brought to the attention of the department when the project was first announced. The department and its engineers were amply warned from this side of the house that the ice conditions were such that it would be practically impossible to maintain the structure as planned and laid down by the engineers. What was then said is in accordance with what has actually happened. I understand that there has been very considerable damage to the structure by the ice conditions, for which the contractor is in no way responsible and for which he should not suffer. In any decision which the minister may arrive at, I would like to assure him that if the facts are as I understand them, there will be no criticism from me at all events—I am speaking only for myself—provided the contractor is treated fairly and squarely and decently, and provided the minister does not load on the contractor the cost of the damage occasioned by the ice conditions, unless it can be shown that he was guilty of negligence or malfeasance in the execution of his contract. I would ask the minister to give this matter his attention, because this work will run into a quarter of a million dollars before it is done if the whole work is completed. That is a large sum of money to pay for a fishermen's shelter. If it were a matter of $15,000 or $25,000, it would not be so much, but this is a quarter of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. STEVENS: To win a by-election.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, the vote was certainly made for the purpose of influencing a by-election as far back as 1923 or 1924. There is no doubt about that; this certainly is the payment of an election debt. But I am not so much concerned about that, because all that is over and past long ago, and we are dealing now with things as they are. I repeat that this large expenditure should not be gone on with, much as this shelter may be needed by the limited number of fishermen to whom it will be available, unless the government is absolutely certain, on the best engineering advice it can obtain, that the conditions to which I have referred will not recur. They have occurred, and that is justification enough for the attitude that has been taken on this side of the house in regard to this vote in recent years. I ask the minister to look into the matter personally before he spends one dollar of this money. May I say I am not interested in the contractor at present, for he has passed his responsibility on to the subcontractor. Nor am I personally interested in the subcontractor—he is not a political supporter of mine, he is a supporter of the government. I know him; he is all right, he is a decent fellow. I want him to have fair play in the settlement of any claims of his which may now be pending before the department in relation to damage done by reason of ice conditions. That is as far as I wish to go.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not want to prolong the discussion,—

Mr. HANSON: I do not either.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —and I do not propose to get into an argument with my hon. friend. He is much more familiar with local conditions and with what took place there in connection with the elections than I am. But if his prophecy and the prophecy of his friends was a warning against something that was going to happen as a result of ice conditions—I take it he agrees to that; he nods his head—then his prophecy has not been fulfilled, because the claim made by the contractor, if my information is correct, is that the damage is not in any way due to ice conditions, but rather to storms.

Mr. HANSON: I may be all wrong, then.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This "I told you so" may be so easily stretched to cover something that never was intended originally that I do not want to leave my hon. friend under misapprehension any longer. With regard to the claim of the contractor, and that is always a difficult matter for the man in charge of the department, I make no promise—my hon. friend will readily understand that I cannot—as to what will happen to that contractor; but I hope when he gets through that he and the people whose money we are spending will both feel that the fair thing has been done in the matter.

Mr. HANSON: That is fair enough.

Item agreed to.

White Head—dredging, $20,500.

Mr. HANSON: Is this White Head island in the county of Charlotte? There are a good many White Heads, you know.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand it is in the county of Charlotte.

Mr. HANSON: Are there two items in respect of the same White Head?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. One is dredging and the other a breakwater.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON: How many yards of material are intended to be moved in this dredging? And is this re-dredging; has it ever been done before by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The first item, $20,500, is asked to be provided towards dredging a channel 100 feet wide extending shorewards from low water at ordinary spring tides, about 725 feet, and a basin in front of the public wharf about 200 to 250 feet wide and 200 to 300 feet long, to low water ordinary spring tides. It is contemplated that it will be necessary to remove 27,000 cubic yards of sand and gravel at $1.50 per cubic yard at an estimated cost of $40,500. The next is a breakwater at Gull Cove. The amount of $10,000 is required to construct a breakwater 153 feet long, and from 17 to 25 feet wide, for the protection of the 28 motor fishing boats employed in the cove.

Mr. HANSON: I have no doubt the work is required. Has the channel ever been dredged before? I think the minister will find that years ago it was. Perhaps he has not the information before him.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have not the information.

Mr. HANSON: I think the estimated cost of $1.50 is very high, unless there is rock there, which I do not think there is. For the information of the committee I would point out that this is an isolated island out in the bay of Fundy containing a fishing settlement. They have a great many weather conditions to contend with, and I would be the last one to deny them the facilities they ought to have if they are to carry on their work and be protected from storms. But $1.50 for that dredging is not what I should like to pay for it on a commercial basis. I hope the minister will keep that in mind when having the work done. Is it to be done by the government's own dredges or by Mr. Gregory's?

Mr. ELLIOTT: By contract.

Mr. HANSON: It will go to Mr. Gregory then.

Mr. ELLIOTT: To the lowest tenderer.

Mr. HANSON: He is the only man who is in the business in St. John.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is the St. John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. HANSON: I am not sure that they are in the dredging business now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, they are.

Mr. HANSON: Perhaps it is just recently.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend can rest assured that the same care will be taken to see that this is done at a reasonable cost as is exercised in all cases.

Mr. HANSON: That is the only warning I would give the minister. I may say that the great rise and fall of the tide there is an important factor in the cost of dredging, but even then I have no doubt the work can be done for less than $1.50.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If somebody tenders for less than that he will get the work.

Item agreed to.

Woodward's Cove—Breakwater extension, $20,000.

Mr. HANSON: Before the New Brunswick items are carried I wish to call the minister's attention to the necessity for some dredging in the river St. John at the Oromocto shoals, nine miles below the city of Fredericton in my Constituency. The soil is alluvial and rapidly fills in, and there has been no dredging done in the locality since previous to the war, I think 1912. These shoals form bars which at low water in the summer season render navigation very difficult. There is a daily steamboat running there, and at times she finds it pretty difficult to navigate. Has the minister before him in his records any recommendation with respect to dredging on the Oromocto shoals? I have not made any formal representations to the minister or to his department because I find usually they do not pay much attention to me in that respect.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You are entirely wrong.

Mr. HANSON: They are always very courteous, but I never get any action, so I have concluded it is not worth while. But I do now very seriously urge upon the minister the necessity and desirability of having such work done on the Oromocto shoals during this present season. I think it could be paid for out of the general vote. I do not ask for any large appropriation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is a general vote of $30,000 at page 43.

Mr. HANSON: There is a miscellaneous vote for the maritime provinces, I understand.

Mr. STEVENS: Dredging, maritime provinces, $650,000, page 44.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, harbours and rivers generally, $650,000. These of course are sufficient to take care only of the small repairs to wharves; I should not expect dredging to be done out of this money. But there is an item somewhere—

Mr. ELLIOTT: The item of $60,000 is not for dredging. The item that would cover the question raised by my hon. friend is for dredging in the maritime provinces, $650,000.

Mr. HANSON: Out of that item I hope the minister will use a sufficient sum on the Oromocto in the coming year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to look into it.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Harbours and rivers, Quebec, $1,826,970.

Amos—wharf repairs and improvements, $1,350.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Amos is away in the north country. Is the government undertaking to build wharves on these interior rivers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is not a new wharf, and the work is requested by the district engineer for the proper maintenance of the present structure.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: On what river is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work is for the proper maintenance of a public wharf to accommodate traffic to and from Amos, which is on the Harricanaw river.

Item agreed to.

Anse au Griffons—wharf, $20,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is this new?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a new wharf. The engineer's report states that 120 fishing boats operate from this place and the work is to provide proper facilities for the handling of trade, which would double in value with adequate accommodation. It is in the county of Gaspé.

Mr. GEARY: Are all these Anses in Gaspe?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think they are.

Mr. HANSON: How many items are there for Gaspe?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I could not tell you.

Mr. HANSON: We had a list of the post offices there; there were some eighteen, and I suppose there would be eighteen items for the county.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is one of the counties with extensive shore lines, and a great many places where the fishermen have been working under particularly hazardous and difficult conditions. We have had to refuse at least two-thirds of the requests made. They do not think they are too well treated. I believe we are doing pretty well.

Item agreed to.

Berthierville—reconstruction of icebreakers, $5,800.

Mr. GEARY: What is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This has been requested by the district engineer for the past three or four years, and is required for protection against the spring ice shoves which menace the road and buildings along the river front. It is to reconstruct in concrete two icebreakers already there, 27 feet by 21 feet at the base, and 14.4 feet by 9 feet at the top, with a height of 20 feet.

Mr. HANSON: Is that the gin mill?

Mr. POWER: It must be the match factory —something equally inflammable.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is it on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Bradore bay—wharf, $25,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this new?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: What constituency?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is it required for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Wharfage accommodation has been requested by the residents of the locality and by the Clarke Steamship Company for a number of years to provide for growing traffic which is at present greatly handicapped. Three steamers call regularly, and water is the only means of transportation for a population of about one thousand. The exports are estimated as follows: fish, fish oil and furs, $300,000; general merchandise and provisions, $250,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is that an outlet for the Saguenay river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is about 770 miles below Quebec on the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. GEARY: Is that the whole cost or just a start?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just a start.

Mr. GEARY: How much will it cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is towards the wharf, which is estimated to cost $55,560. In order to render it of value, however, there will have to be a freight shed as well, worth $5,000.

Mr. HANSON: And breakwater?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No breakwater is proposed.

Item agreed to.

Cabano—wharf repairs, $2,400.

Mr. HANSON: Is this on Temiscouata lake?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Do any steamboats operate on that lake?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not the Minister of Public Works but I might give a short explanation with regard to this item. Cabano is a big place on the shore of Temiscouata lake, which is 27 miles long and over a mile wide. On the other side of lake Temiscouata there is a farm settlement called Squatek, which consists of 700 or 800 people. A big mill has been erected at Cabano by the Fraser Company, which cuts the wood on the eastern shore of the lake.

Mr. POWER: For which company is this wood cut?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know, but I do know that my hon. friend from York-Sunbury is the attorney for the company.

Mr. HANSON: The company does not use this wharf at all; the company builds its own wharves and does not ask the government for help. This is a public wharf for the good of the community. I am not objecting to the item, but I want to know if any steamships operate on that lake. I have been there a good many times without seeing any steamships, although I understand a ferry operates across that lake, which is long and narrow as my hon. friend has said.

Mr. POULIOT: It is also very deep.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that the wharf is used for small vessels carrying supplies for the lumber camps in that district, and the engineer reports that repairs are necessary at Cabano because of the dangerous condition of the flooring on the wharf.

Mr. HANSON: I am not objecting to the item but I wish to know if there is any public traffic there. I want to correct the impression of the hon. member for Temiscouata that this wharf is used at all by the Fraser Company.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that the traffic at this point is comparatively heavy; the ferry boats make from six to ten trips daily with passengers and freight and the exports and imports amount to approximately $190,000 annually.

Item agreed to.

Cap Chat—harbour repairs and improvements, $8,500.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this on Anticosti island?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it is in Gaspe county.

Mr. HANSON: Is Cap Chat on the line of the Quebec Oriental railway which is about to be purchased by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. POWER: No, it is on the north shore.

Mr. HANSON: Is there any railway communication at this point now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Item agreed to.

Cap Chat —harbour improvements—The Canadian Paper Board Company to contribute one-third of cost, $25,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there anything for Anticosti this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nothing this year.

Mr. HANSON: Is this a revote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Nothing was spent last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. HANSON: Will the work be proceeded with this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That depends on whether the parties interested can satisfy us that the developments for which this sum is intended to provide facilities are sure to go on.

Items agreed to.

Charlemagne—dredging, $10,000.

Mr. HANSON: Where is that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is at L'Assomption, near Montreal.

Item agreed to.

Cross Point—wharf repairs, $1,900.

Mr. HANSON: Cross Point is immediately opposite Campbellton. I understand that a wharf has been maintained at Cross Point for a number of years.

Mr. MARCIL: Since 1904.

Mr. HANSON: And I presume this amount is intended to repair that wharf. In connection with the whole situation on the Baie des Chaleurs, would the minister tell us whether the dredging of the harbour at Campbellton and the other necessary dredging between Campbellton and Cross Point was completed last year? This is a large shipping point both for exports and imports.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course my hon. friend is aware of the item for Campbellton in the New Brunswick list.

Mr. HANSON: I was not here when that item was passed, and I would like to know if that is the estimate of what is required to complete the dredging at Campbellton or whether that is what is to be done this year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is all that will be done this year.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to point out that there is a very substantial development in that part of the province, with a large paper mill being erected at Dalhousie and a very large sulphite pulp mill being erected two miles above the town of Campbellton. A very large amount of supplies will be brought in through Campbellton and it will be the point of shipment by water for perhaps eight months of the year if these companies utilize water transportation, so I think the government should do that dredging at Campbellton this year. It has been requested for quite a long time, and now it is really required; this is practically the only point in the province where there is any large development going on. This is one case where an expenditure of this kind can be fully justified and I submit that the work should be done now and not carried out piecemeal. That is my judgment in the matter and I would like to see the department give attention to this request that the dredging at Campbellton be completed at once. The officers of the department will tell the minister that this is the point of shipment for millions of feet of lumber during the open season and difficulty has been experienced in getting the ships to the piers by reason of the fact that the river fills in the channel, which must naturally recur from time to time because of the very nature of the river and of the deposits which are brought down annually. I hope the minister will give attention to this request.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can only say that at present there is nothing in the estimates for Campbellton other than the item of $13,600.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that nothing was done last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, a good deal was done last year. This $13,600 is a revote because we spent only $16,628 last year out of an appropriation of $30,000.

Mr. HANSON: It is my recollection that only part of the work was done, and I would like to know why it was not completed. It might be more convenient to the minister if we could delay this matter until the vote comes up again, but possibly we could have the information now. The minister may have a very good reason why the contemplated derdging was not done.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Apparently they succeeded in doing $16,628 worth of work last year up to the 31st of March.

Mr. HANSON: Was that a contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That was under contract.

Mr. HANSON: Who was the contractor?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Felix Michaud of Buctouche. The contract was for 57½ cents per cubic yard, scow measurement, and that probably accounts for the difference. The contract was dated September 12, 1928, and completion was set for December 3, 1928, but apparently they were not able to complete the work. The time was not very long between September 12 and December 3.

Mr. HANSON: I do not understand why there was a delay in letting the contract, because the money was voted prior to June 1. I am interested in knowing whether Mr. Felix Michaud owns a dredge. This gentleman is the brother of the late member for Restigouche-Madawaska, a gentleman for whom we all entertained the very highest regard during the many years he was a member of this house, but who was peremptorily retired by the electors of that constituency in 1925. I would like to know who actually did the dredging work, as my recollection is that Mr. Felix Michaud is a very respectable farmer of Buctouche and has not hitherto been in the dredging business.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand that he has been in dredging business for many years.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON: I do not understand so, and I do not believe it either.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can only say that there seems to have been some delay.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to explain the situation at Cross Point. This is the most important wharf in my constituency due to the fact that all the traffic between Campbellton and Cross Point passes over this wharf. I think over five or six thousand automobiles passed over this wharf last year. The wharf was erected a long time ago—in 1904—and it was proposed to erect an interprovincial bridge at that point. The government of New Brunswick has undertaken to pay its share, the government of Canada is to pay one-third and we are waiting for the government of the Province of Quebec to agree to pay their third of the cost of the bridge. It is estimated that the bridge over the Restigouche river will cost about a million dollars; it will be very important work and is badly needed. Of course the wharf at Cross Point will be retained because there is very heavy traffic at that point. Champoux Brothers used to have a large mill at Restigouche but it was sold to the International Paper Company. The Madawaska corporation has purchased or leased this mill for four or five years and this year will conduct very extensive operations on the Matapedia and Restigouche rivers. I am in accord with the member for York-Sunbury when he says that Campbellton is the most important port in northern New Brunswick. An extensive development is going on at Dalhousie where the International Paper Company are erecting a huge pulp mill, and another mill is to be erected at Athol. In view of the operations being carried on at Campbellton, and in view of the intended operations at Dalhousie and Restigouche, I am sure the minister should give this matter more than passing attention and see that facilities are granted to this part of the country, which includes territory in both provinces, so that the trade may be carried on.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister say that the dredging will be done this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where?

Mr. HANSON: At Campbellton and Cross Point. It is all the same thing.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We will make every possible endeavour to do it, and I am rather hoping that it will be done this year.

Mr. HANSON: There is no reason why the minister could not give an undertaking that it will be done if parliament provides the money.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We cannot always get dredges to do the work, and we sometimes get tenders which look a little high. I do not think the hon. member realizes the difficulties in connection with these different contracts.

Mr. STEVENS: Do your best.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will do the very best I can; that is all I can say to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Donnacona — harbour improvements — The Donnacona Paper Co. to contribute one-third of cost, $50,000.

Mr. HANSON: This will be new work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: I think this vote requires considerable explanation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to go toward the construction of a long wharf out to deep water in the St. Lawrence river, mainly for the shipment of newsprint, pulp, roofing and agricultural products. The Donnacona Paper Company has been urging these harbour improvements for a number of years, and several schemes have been studied. This wharf will also be used as a coaling station and general operating base for the government ice-breakers and will be available as a shelter for river craft between Cap Rouge and Pointe Platon. It is claimed that this structure will hold the ice and prevent jamming at Cap Rouge, thus preventing the disastrous floods from Cap Rouge to Sorel. The whole work will be very expensive, and it looks as if the total would run into the vicinity of a million dollars, to be divided between the company and the government. The following letter has been received from the chief engineer of the province of Quebec:

A letter has been received from the Acting Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries enclosing copy of memorandum, dated 12th April, 1929, from Mr. N. B. McLean, of the river St. Lawrence ship channel engineering staff which deals with the points raised as to the influence of this proposed structure.

Mr. McLean is of the opinion that the wharf would not interfere with traffic or ice conditions;

(2) That the wharf would hold a large section of batture ice in place, preventing it floating off during the high water to jam later at Cap Rouge;

(3) That the wharf would make a place of shelter for ice-breakers and commercial vessels. At present when ice-breakers are working at Portneuf, it is necessary to shelter in the batture ice, which is not always safe.

In order that the wharf may be of the greatest advantage to ice-breakers and commercial vessels, Mr. McLean suggests that the outer end of the wharf be built out to the 30-foot contour line shown on the chart, copy of which he attaches. He further suggests a berth 500 feet in length, dredged to not less than 25 feet, should be provided on the upper and lower sides of the wharf inside the headblock, and that the depth at the outer face of the headblock be not less than 25 feet, all depths at low water.

The district engineer in his report calls attention to the fact that Donnacona is situated on the river Jacques Cartier on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, in the county of Quebec West. Previous to 1911, Donnacona consisted of timber and farm lands; now it is one of the most important pulp and paper centres of the province of Quebec. In 1912 a sixty-ton newsprint paper mill was erected by the Donnacona Pulp and Paper Company, with a 60-ton groundwood pulp mill and a 30-ton sulphite paper mill, giving employment to 800 men. Since then the company has increased its plant so as to have a daily production of 220 tons of newsprint, 200 tons of groundwood pulp, and 60 tons of sulphite pulp, giving employment to about 1,600 men. The company has not yet completed its program of extension and if necessary accommodation by navigation is provided at Donnacona, it is the intention of the company to double the capacity of its mill, to produce at least 500 tons of newsprint per day, meaning an additional population of about 5,000 inhabitants. The company owns and operates another groundwood pulp mill at Pont Rouge, producing about 5,000 tons per year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this a public wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: That is a very rosy picture to paint in the face of present conditions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the only condition on which we would be spending the money.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister, before he spends this money, say that he will bind the Donnacona Company to build a plant turning out 500 tons of newsprint per day? Because if he does so I am satisfied the money will never be spent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In matters of this kind appropriations have been held up because the development has not been started, and before we commence this work the government will be satisfied that its expectation in regard to the development that is to take place is assured.

Mr. HANSON: I am satisfied that the work will not go on this year under present conditions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then the money will not be spent.

Mr. HANSON: I wish to know whether the building of these piers and works and the expenditure of this public money will take away from the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific a freight tonnage which they now possess, and whether that is the policy of the company? That is what happened in relation to Matane and still worse, it was for a foreign company in Erie, Pennsylvania. This government spent a large sum of money to build a pier at Matane and, if my recollection is correct, the Hammermill people did not contribute anything, but the direct consequence was a reduction in tonnage from that point to the national railway. What effect will this have upon the Canadian railways?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my information is correct, this will take nothing away from the Canadian National railway. The object is to encourage the creation of new business.

Mr. HANSON: What about taking tonnage away from the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will not.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I should be the last to rise in the house to defend any project initiated by the Price Brothers company. The Donnacona Paper Company belongs to Price Brothers, and for many years members of the Price family have been in distinct and energetic antagonism to the principles which I represent in the constituency for which I sit in this house. But at the same time, common justice compels me to say that in this case at any rate there is a good deal to be said in favour of the passing of the item. I do not think it is intended to go on with any further newsprint production. The hon. member for York-Sunbury was, I think, quite right in saying that no newsprint company at the present time wishes or would be allowed to increase the production of newsprint, but I understand there is to be a mill utilized for the purpose of using the waste products, slabs, et cetera, of some of the other mills. I am not quite sure what the product is. It is a species of fibre board, but I do not think it is along the lines of insulex and other fibre boards that are being made. It is proposed to bring the waste material from other mills belonging to Price Brothers on the St. Lawrence river and rivers in the north country to Donnacona as much as possible by water and to export the finished product by water to the old country. That, I understand, is the project which the company has laid before the minister and which it intends to carry out. If such be the case, there will be no question of taking away tonnage from either the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this a settled policy adopted by the government that they will provide large amounts for wharves and repairs provided that some industry contributes one-third?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Every case has to stand or fall on its own merits. For years this practice has been followed with a view to encouraging industries which perhaps would not come here at all or would not go on with the development which they contemplate unless the government were sympathetic in regard to wharfage facilities and dredging.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Last year the estimates contained one or two items of the same nature and evidently they have been dropped.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They were not gone on with because the project had not reached the point where we were satisfied that it was going on this year. For that reason they were dropped.

Mr. GEARY: Does the department get any security for the performance by the company of its promise to pay?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We take a guarantee bond from them.

Mr. GEARY: A company bond?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Dundee—improvement to drains, $7,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What has the government to do with the improvement of drains? I thought that was a matter with which the municipality or the province had to deal.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In this case it was represented that the government had responsibility because the construction of the dam at its outlet had raised the level of lake St. Francis.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is Dundee?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Chateauguay-Huntingdon.

Item agreed to.

Grande Anse (Gaspe County) — wharf, $15,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this a new item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MacNUTT: What is it for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work is to provide facilities for the loading and unloading of fishing barges, one hundred in number, which at the present time have to be lightered under great difficulties.

Item agreed to.

Grondines—completion of wharf, $18,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There was no vote last year. Would the minister explain how he is going to complete a wharf on which no work seems to have been done last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is Sir Lomer Gouin's birthplace.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposed work is to complete the construction of the wharf commenced in 1923-24 by the addition of an extension 120 feet in length and 30 feet in depth, to be cribwork substructure with a concrete wall superstructure, the space between the walls to be filled with stone ballast and surfaced with crushed stone macadam, and the whole extension to be provided with a slip to enable boats to use this approach.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is really an enlargement of the wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has business there grown so much that this is required?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is what the engineer reports.

Item agreed to.

Lake St. Louis—dredging, $50,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose this is a work that has to be gone on with nearly every year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Work has been done nearly every year, but we are pretty nearly finished now.

Item agreed to.

Little Montreal river—dredging—the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $15,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is in Laprairie-Napierville.

Item agreed to.

Marsouins—wharf, $5,500.

Mr. GEARY: What is this for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is to construct a small wharf or landing pier 75 feet long and 27 feet wide, a short distance from the outer end of the jetty on the eastern shore of the mouth of the Marsouins river. In his annual estimates District Engineer Amiot reports as follows:

It is requested that the slab jetty located on the eastern shore of mouth of river be protected by an outside crib of 75 feet by 27 feet. This crib can also be utilized as a landing and will protect and facilitate the entrance to the harbour.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What county is this in?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Gaspe.

Mr. GEARY: Are there any boats there at all? How much will this wharf be used?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am unable to give my hon. friend the number of boats, but there are tugs used in connection with the lumber industry. The exports of lumber amount yearly to $80,000, and the imports of goods and general merchandise to approximately $30,000.

Mr. GEARY: Where is this place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a village twenty-five miles below Ste. Anne des Monts on the south shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence in the county of Gaspe.

Item agreed to.

Matane—harbour improvements, $33,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): This is a very large sum. What is it for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is required for the following improvements:

(1) An extension to breakwater 300 feet in length by 25 feet wide in stone filled open faced cribwork, $22,000;

(2) Repairs and improvements to town wharf consisting of driving protection piles along west and north faces of outer end, $5,000;

(3) Laying a double two-inch flooring over present flooring on outer end, $1,500; and renewing stringers and planking on older part of wharf, $2,500, or a total of $9,000;

(4) To complete renewal of superstructure of older portion of east breakwater on a length of 140 feet by width of 27 feet which is in a dilapidated condition, replacing stringers, planking and cap pieces and reinforcing outer end, $2,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I understand that Matane is only a small place. What would be the trade for the port, and what would it consist of? When we are spending $33,000 of public money there must be some justification for it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The main industry is lumbering. I will give my hon. friend an extract from the district engineer's report.

Matane is a large and ambitious village situated on the south shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence, 60 miles east from Rimouski. It is the shiretown of Matane county and the industrial and the business centre of the portion of the county located along the gulf shore. The Canada Gulf Terminal Railway, which joins the Canadian National railway at Mont Joli, has its terminus and main office in Matane. The population of the village itself is 3,500 inhabitants; with the parishes, it is approximately 7,000.

The main industry is lumbering. The Price Bros. Co. has a 15,000,000 feet board measure yearly capacity mill operating at that place; the Hammermill Paper Co. of Erie, Penn., which bought, a year ago, the timber holdings formerly operated by the Canada Gulf Terminals Railway, is also operating a saw-mill and more particularly a pulpwood plant of an approximate yearly capacity of 25,000 cords.

He goes on:

Matane harbour has become the shipping and distributing point for the many lumber, logging and cutting camps, and saw-mills are operated on the north shore from Bersimis down to Moisie.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I notice again that a large sum of money is being spent presumably for the benefit of Price Brothers. I understand they are the large operators there. We are developing a better harbour for them at an expense of $30,000.

Mr. HANSON: Not Price Brothers; the Hammermill people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I do not think this expenditure is justified.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As a matter of curiosity, in what estimate does this vote of $30,000 for 1928-29 appear? It says "1928-29, $30,000." Matane does not appear in the main estimates of last year. Is it in the supplementaries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should think my hon. friend is incorrect, because I have here a revote of $25,000 of $30,000 in the estimates of last year.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have been following the figures given here and in several cases they are wrong. In the main estimates for last year Matane does not appear at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It must be in the supplementaries then. Has my hon. friend the supplementaries before him?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend can take it as pretty certain that these contracts to which I have referred, and which cover the greater portion of this expenditure, would not have been entered into if we had not had a vote last year.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In several cases the figures are wrongly stated in the vote for last year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): In which constituency is this money to be spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Matane county. Do you want the name of the gentleman who represents it?

Mr. DIONNE: I know this place very well, for the one good reason that I was born there. The following figures will give some idea of the amount of business done at this point:

Price Brothers & Co. Ltd.
Lumber shipped.. 10,543,000 B.M.
Lath.. .. .. .. 4,047,800 B.M.
R.R. ties.. .. .. 7,387 pcs.
General freight received:
Price Brothers & Co. Ltd..	300 tons
Hammermill Paper Co. (pulp shipped).. 33,439 cords
Freight unloaded and loaded at Matane by coasting traders:
Rose-Helene (Capt. Z. Castonguay)..	3,027
A. Renaud (Capt. Ls. Castonguay).. ..	2,750
Legere (Capt. T. Piuze)..	3,340
Gilly (Capt. W. Guimond)..	3,000
Marco Pola (Capt. C. E. Heppell)..	2,025
Toussaint, Odilus, Pucelle d'Orléans Heppel Transportation Company	4,000

And there is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DIONNE: And there is a lot of other business transacted at Matane.

Item agreed to.

Mechins—wharf extension and repairs, $20,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is a new item, apparently.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In many instances the references are wrong.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hardly think my hon. friend is correct. This amount of $20,000 is required to complete payment to Messrs. Clouthier & Gaudreault in connection with their contract for the reconstruction and extension of this wharf, for repairs to the flooring and fenders on a length of 191 feet and towards a further extension of 200 feet.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Are Clouthier & Gaudreault the same contractors as are doing the work at Matane?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are the same.

Mr. DIONNE: Mechins is 45 miles from Matane. There is no railroad. The wharf is under construction. It is one of the finest places along the St. Lawrence for a harbour. After the construction of this wharf shelter will be provided against the heavy storms along this coast and it will enable the people to land there at any time, because there will be at least 25 feet of water at low tide.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How much of the vote last year was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $10,872.80.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Was this work done by tender and contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All but $1,600 was done by contract.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How many tenders were received by the government, and what was the amount of each?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Only two tenders were received: Cloutier & Gaudreault, $36,378, and Ludger Lemieux Limited, $38,434. The $1,600 worth of repairs to the flooring were done by day labour.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How is it that both contracts at Matane and Mechins were done by the same contractors? Is the government following the same policy that obtains in Nova Scotia, that of giving all contracts to one group of individuals?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend really mean that, in regard to contracts let by tender? Does he think that is a fair statement?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Is the same policy followed in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The same policy is followed in both places.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): In Nova Scotia we know exactly what has happened. We find that at two points the contracts were held by the same group of individuals.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think there is anything unusual about that, where the man is the lowest tenderer. The lowest tenderer may get two contracts, and in fact he is more likely to get both in the same vicinity than in places widely apart. But if my hon. friend means to suggest that any preference was given to contractors tendering for work done under this department he will find that the contractors of this country will not back him up in such a statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): In the past the contractors of Nova Scotia have not been backing me up, nor have they backed up anyone else but themselves and the government they support. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned I do not believe that, in the case of one or two contracts, the lowest tenderer got the award.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the hon. gentleman refer me to any place where the lowest tenderer did not get the contract?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): A contract was let at Port Maitland this year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The lowest tenderer got the contract; he was the lowest by many thousands.

Item agreed to.

Montmagny—improvement to protection walls, $30,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was there a supplementary vote last year in regard to this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): What is meant by "protection walls"?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a revote from 1928-29, and is required to improve the banks of the river at several points near Montmagny to prevent flooding and consequent damage.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Why was no work done last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was a good deal of delay getting releases from some of the persons whose lands were affected.

Item agreed to.

Natashquan—wharf repairs and extension, $19,300.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is on the gulf of St. Lawrence and it is a place in which I take a little interest in that some years ago I had to do with the service there. Last year there was a vote which does not seem to have been spent. Perhaps the minister will tell us what the condition is at Natashquan.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of this amount $18,000 is a revote. The money is required to complete the construction of an extension to the wharf under contract with Mr. Joseph Gagnon. The amount spent last year to March 31 was $10,581.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There is in the supplementary estimates a large amount which has not been expended.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the main estimates last year there was an amount for wharf repairs of $1,500, and in the supplementary estimates, for wharf extension, $38,000, making a total of $39,500. At the time these estimates were prepared the probable expenditure to March 31 was reported to us to be $21,500. Actually, only $10,581 was expended.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In the Auditor General's report there is no mention of Natashquan as having received any expenditure last year.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the year before.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When the estimates are being prepared, in the early part of February and sometimes in January, it is difficult to tell in a great many instances how much will be expended before March 31, so that we have to arrive at the best estimate we can.

Item agreed to.

Newport—wharf replacement, $10,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Gaspe.

Item agreed to.

Norton creek—dredging—the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $28,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Where is this and why are you spending all this money on a creek?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is in Chateauguay-Huntingdon, and is required to complete excavation work begun in 1912-13 and continued in 1913-14 and 1914-15. It was suspended during the war. The object is to enable this creek to take care of the spring floods.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister really think this is something which should be done by the Dominion government? I happen to know something about this work and I understand it is really for the purpose of assisting in the drainage of the country; it is not in any sense a harbour improvement, as I understand it, or anything in which the Dominion government should take an interest. This is work which, if they think it should be undertaken, should be done by the county or by the provincial government. I would like the minister to say whether this work is not really for the purpose of draining that part of the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is something to be said for my hon. friend's contention, and I went over this matter with a good deal of care when we were considering the estimate. Of course, in these years when flooding is much more troublesome than in previous years we are meeting with claims from all over the country, but it is pretty difficult to get over the contention that we should carry on the work we have already started and on which we expended $18,816, especially if the provincial government is ready to assist. The previous work at this point was done with no contribution from the provincial government, and in nearly all these cases there is something which has been done by the Dominion government which is urged as one of the reasons why the particular damage has occurred.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister should be able to give a better reason than that. We have the Rideau river right at our doors here, and every year there is trouble in connection with the flooding of that river. Would the minister consider an application for half the cost of necessary works to take care of that condition if the Ontario government paid the other half?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister must consider every application coming from any source, and if a precedent has been established by this government it is difficult to refuse such an application particularly if the provincial government says, as in this case, that part of the work was done by the Dominion government years ago with no contribution from the provincial government, and that all the work done previously will be wasted unless a further expenditure is made. In this case the provincial government is willing to bear half the expense, and in this way perhaps we can make useful the expenditure which was made in former years. With regard to the proposition of my hon. friend, I should be very glad to give consideration to it, and if we are bound by any precedent established in previous years, as is the case here, I should think we would have a good deal of difficulty in refusing such an application.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have no desire to hold up the committee on a matter of this kind, but I believe this to be a dangerous policy, and if the minister stays in office very long I believe he will have a great deal of difficulty with other cases as a result of adopting it.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one word to say with regard to this item. This is the second instance in which the provincial government has contributed an amount equal to that contributed by the federal government for dredging. I remember that some time this spring the Premier of the province of Quebec said that the sum of $5,000,000 should be spent for dredging the St. Charles river near Quebec, and I wonder if the government of Quebec has offered to pay half that amount.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not remember receiving any word to that effect.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The hon. member for Temiscouata has raised the question of the St. Charles river, and I am grateful to him for having done so. I have known of the conditions existing in the St. Charles river for a number of years; some work has been done there and I believe about $2,500,000 has been spent on that work by the federal government.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the balance should be provided by the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Just let me follow up my argument. Over $2,500,000 was spent on the St. Charles river, but when the Tory government came into power in 1911 they saw fit to suspend this work and since that time the greater part of the work done has been destroyed. The citizens of Quebec are very anxious that this work should be proceeded with, and I understand that at a banquet in Quebec not long ago Mr. Taschereau said that this work should be proceeded with and that his government would certainly contribute to the cost. More than that, the city council of Quebec would be quite willing to share the cost. I think this fact should be mentioned and the government asked to continue the work which they undertook to carry out under a written agreement between the city of Quebec and the federal government.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I would make another suggestion; the provincial government should not be the only body called upon to contribute. I suggest that the Royal Trust Company, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, the Sun Life Assurance Company, Barclay's Bank and La Caisse d'Economie, of which Mr. Taschereau is a director, should also be called upon to contribute to this work.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I am sorry my hon. friend does not take this question seriously, because the work on the river St. Charles should not be made a joke. The citizens of Quebec believe this work should be proceeded with, and as I said a moment ago I know that the provincial government would be willing to contribute to the cost.

Mr. POULIOT: I am quite serious in the matter, and in addition I would suggest that when the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency dies a monument should be erected to him on the banks of the river St. Charles.

Mr. McGIBBON: If I might interrupt this family quarrel I would like to ask if this is a principle which has been laid down by the government and if so whether they are following that principle in other provinces. I understand that in this case money is being spent to drain land. Is this private or public land?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We endeavour to carry out the same policy throughout the country wherever we have started work of this kind, and I think there are some places where we would not be carrying on this work had we not started it in previous years. I think we are doing similar work in one place in Manitoba and at another point in Ontario, where we were confronted with practically the same situation.

Mr. STEVENS: Then this would be a good time to stop.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps it would not be a bad time to stop this work in all these places. I am not going to enter into a discussion on this point, but in nearly each case there is the difficulty that some Dominion work, a railway or some other public work, is linked up with the matter. I do not recall that this is the case at this point, but I have no doubt that whoever started this work in the first place did so with the idea that it would assist navigation or do something which was part of the obligation of the Dominion government. At any rate the same practice is followed throughout.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister had better include those two items in what the Prime Minister calls "vicious" principles.

Item agreed to.

Peribonka—wharf repairs, $3,500.

Mr. GEARY: One has to study geography to know whether or not there are any other places in the province of Quebec where a wharf might be required.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can furnish the hon. member with a list of many scores of requests for wharves which have been absolutely refused. We have granted only those requests where the residents seem to be undergoing a certain amount of hardship on account of not having accommodation.

Mr. GEARY: Is it on account of that province being on the St. Lawrence river?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think Peribonka is on the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is on lake St. John.

Mr. GEARY: I am not complaining in regard to these votes, but one is struck with the number of places which seem to require this sort of work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the hon. member will compare the proportion of the total expenditure and the number of different works he will find that there is not a larger percentage attributable to this province than to any other, either in amount or in number. In the constituency of Gaspe, Charlevoix-Saguenay and Bonaventure there are many settlements which have no railway accommodation.

Mr. GEARY: It is largely a question of serving the communities along the St. Lawrence which are not served by railways?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quite so.

Mr. GEARY: I am not speaking in a critical tone at all, but I wanted to know how it happened that so many places seemed to have only water communication.

Mr. MARCIL: The province of Quebec has over 2,000 miles of coast line, and if you leave the railway and go down to the limits of Labrador you have practically one thousand miles of shore line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Quebec is one of the important maritime provinces of the Dominion. From Murray Bay to Labrador there is no railway and from Matane to Gaspe there is no railway; the only means of communication is by water, and the majority of the people make their living from the water and must have protection for their boats.

Mr. FRASER: Are these to be temporary or permanent structures?

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: There will be some timber used, but the structure will be as permanent as it is possible to make it.

Mr. MacNUTT: I have a pretty good knowledge of the life of underwater timber construction in Nova Scotia, and if the timber differs in other provinces as it does in Nova Scotia, I think the day has arrived when treated timber should be used for these smaller wharves. I realize that the larger structures are built with creosoted timber, but in view of the enormous cost of maintaining our wharves in the maritime provinces I believe some consideration should be given to the greater use of treated pilings. Has the minister given this feature of the matter any consideration?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Wherever limnoria are present we endeavour to have the timber treated, but as far as we know there are none in this particular district to which we are referring. Wherever the engineers consider that creosoted timber should be used we endeavour to employ that class of timbers. In some cases it is difficult to get it without going outside of the country, and we are making some progress in encouraging the treatment of timber in Canada.

Mr. GEARY: There are a great many wharves along the river-front at Sarnia, and I should like to know whether there is a government wharf among them. Is it the policy of the government to provide water transportation or communication by means of government wharves wherever the people require it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the hon. member is correct; I do not believe there is a government wharf at Sarnia at the present time. However, there has been considerable expenditure at Sarnia with very excellent results. We have provided for the elevator there, and there has been a great deal of dredging done.

Mr. GEARY: Will it be the policy of the government from this time on to provide water communication where required, irrespective of what the town may be or where it may be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: You cannot lay down one rule which will apply to every case. You must consider whether or not the town has railway facilities and whether the people are using the waters for pleasure only. I think the best answer to make would be to say that you must consider every case on its own merits and try to overcome those cases of hardship where the people are suffering through lack of accommodation.

Item agreed to.

Port Lewis—dredging, $15,600.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Where is Port Lewis?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Chateauguay-Huntingdon.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is it on the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is on lake St. Francis.

Item agreed to.

Richelieu river—improvements, $150,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister give us some explanation of this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $150,000, of which $83,000 is a revote from last year, is required to continue a scheme of improving navigation on the Richelieu river, the dredging part of which was commenced in 1928 under contract with Les Chantiers Manseau. The contract amounts to $96,904. Last year we were able to expend only $11,000 out of the amount that was voted.

Item agreed to.

Riviere au Tonnerre—wharf, $50,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister explain about this? It is a new work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This work was requested by District Engineer Sabourin in a report dated September 22, 1928, and by various petitions from the residents ever since 1915. The annual traffic at this point is reported to amount to about $90,000. This amount of $50,000 is required towards the construction of a wharf composed of an approach of the pier and bridge type 675 feet in length by 16 in width, and an open-faced cribwork headblock, 425 in length by 30 feet in width and having a height at the outer end of 35 feet with 20 feet of water at low tide.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How much will it cost altogether?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The estimate would be about $110,000 altogether.

Item agreed to.

Riviere des Prairies—improvements, $40,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This is a new vote. What is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required toward the restoration of navigation in Riviere des Prairies by providing a 12-foot channel from Bout de l'Ile to the village of Riviere des Prairies and the construction of a wharf at the village. This work has been requested since 1910 when the channel, formerly kept in good condition, was allowed to fill in.

Item agreed to.

St. Antoine de Tilly—dredging, $64,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister explain this item? It is a large amount of dredging.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $64,000 contains a revote from last year of $28,500. It is in the county of Lotbiniere. This work was requested by District Engineer Grandmont in his annual estimates. Owing to insufficient water in the channel leading to the wharf at this place, the boats can land only at high tide, which makes it very inconvenient as there is no railway connection at this locality, the only means of transportation being by water. There are two regular lines of steamers calling at this wharf four times a week when water conditions permit. There are now under contract with the National Dock and Dredging Corporation, dredging operations for deepening the channel, 150 feet wide leading to the government wharf, involving the removal of 35,402 cubic yards scow measure of clay, sand and gravel.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Could the minister give us offhand the quantity of dredging to be done in Quebec during the present year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I could not give that offhand, but the total appropriation for Quebec under harbours and rivers is $1,826,970 and, if my memory serves me aright, it is a lower percentage of the total amount than in a number of previous years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I notice there are some large sums for dredging, for instance $20,000, $30,000, $69,000. I also note under item 141 an amount of $600,000 for dredging for Ontario and Quebec. Could the minister give the committee offhand the amount that is to be expended for dredging alone in Quebec? This is a very large amount of money for that purpose, and I feel that we in Nova Scotia are not receiving a like amount, although we have a great deal of sea coast and our harbours and rivers are more important to us on account of our fishing industry.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When there are these large amounts for dredging, why not increase the large amounts instead of inserting the small items? What is the object in doing it in this way?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I quite agree with my hon. friend, but this practice has prevailed for years. We may be very frank in the committee with regard to the reason for it. It is that the Department of Public Works is the only one that does not receive large lump sums to expend as the other departments do. I am not sure that the house is not entitled to pass upon these various small items. Of course it takes up a great deal of time, and I am not objecting to that; but there is a feeling in the department that if we had the freedom to put in a larger amount for harbours and rivers generally, and not put in so many separate little items for $1,000 or $1,100, it would be in the interests of the country as a whole and would undoubtedly save the time of the committee. I am entirely in the hands of the committee. We are simply following what has been the rule in the past, and I felt that it was not fair to put these small items into the general vote.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is a pretty good rule, and you had better stick to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It makes the passing of your estimates much more difficult, but it has this advantage, that everybody knows before the money is voted where it is to be spent. I have no serious objection to that practice, but it would leave much greater discretion to the officials of the department and to the minister if these small items were bulked in the general vote. I submit very respectfully to the committee that with the business of the country increasing, with business being done to-day at places where it amounted to practically nothing a few years ago, the general vote must of necessity be increased much beyond what we have attempted to increase it this year.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am not objecting to these smaller items being put in separately. I am objecting to the large amount in the general vote, and then when an emergency arises and people want a little bit of dredging done at some important place the owners have to pay for the dredging themselves. I would rather see this large general vote broken up into smaller items so that we might know how the money is going to be spent. With such a large amount as this for dredging, one would think that private people would not have to pay for any emergency that has to be done. I have no objection to the practice of putting these small items in separately; I think it is right.

Item agreed to.

Shelter bay—dredging, $10,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Where is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In Charlevoix-Saguenay. This work is requested by the district engineer in his report dated June 19, 1928. It is to provide sufficient depth of water to permit steamers and barges to land at the north side of the wharf. The traffic amounts to some $2,550,000 annually, handled by three steamers and about seventy-five lake barges.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this wharf private or public?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Ontario Paper Company, Limited, own the wharf at this place.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is a private wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Templeton—dredging, $43,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this a private or a public wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a private wharf. This dredging is required to provide sufficient depth of water to enable boats to reach the wharf which is to be constructed by the International Fibre Board, Limited, and provide shipping facilities for the boats of the Canadian International Paper Company to reach the booming area with their logs.

Item agreed to.

Valleyfield—dredging, $50,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister give us an explanation of this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to continue the dredging of a channel three miles in length by a width of one hundred feet and to a depth of fourteen feet, from deep water in lake St. Francis to the government wharf, with a turning basin at the wharf 650 feet by 700 feet. This project was commenced in 1924 and continued in 1925, 1927, 1928 and 1929.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How much has been spent on it so far?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $177,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How much is it intended to spend?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The total will be $403,000.

Item agreed to.

Yamachiche river—dredging, $20,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What is the purpose of this dredging?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is required to pay the balance owing to the National Dock & Dredging Corporation in connection with their contract for dredging completed during 1928-29, to provide for the dredging of a turning basin having an area of some 56,000 feet to enable boats using the channel to turn.

Item agreed to.

Yamaska river—dredging, $12,200.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is this for the same purpose?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is dredging in the river. It is under contract now.

Item agreed to.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When dealing with the Ontario harbours and rivers vote to-night, we want a general item held over so that any Ontario members who are not here at the moment may have an opportunity later to discuss anything they like on the vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 90, for the relief of Harry Babington Millward—Mr. Ross (Kingston).

Bill No. 117, for the relief of Wallace Evered Gillespie.—Mr. Anderson (High Park).

Bill No. 132, for the relief of Myrtle Virginia Maulson—Mr. Spence.

Bill No. 133, for the relief of Claude Le Cheminant—Mr. Spence.

Motions for third readings agreed to on division.

ALLA CHRETTER

The house in committee on Bill No. 116, for the relief of Alla Chretter—Mr. Ross (Kingston)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I had all the facts the other night, but the hon. gentleman did not make any inquiries and I am sorry I have not that information at the moment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We shall have to ask that the bill stand. It was understood that while no details would be discussed on the second reading they would be, if necessary, in the committee stage.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There was a child in the case of the first bill, which the hon. member allowed to go through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In that case the petitioner was the father and perhaps it is easier for the father to look after the child. In this case the petitioner is a woman.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am almost certain there are no children.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

ALICE GLADYS BARKEY

The house in committee on Bill No. 135, for the relief of Alice Gladys Barkey—Mr. Spence—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the children, if there are any?

Mr. SPENCE: I have not the record here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is just as well to get information regarding any children that have to be provided for.

Mr. SPENCE: I will get it if you wish.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we should have information with respect to the children.

Mr. SPENCE: I will furnish the information later on.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that section 1 shall carry?

Mr. MARCIL: I think it desirable that the information requested should be furnished by the sponsor of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour of section 1 being carried will kindly say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A few of us who objected some time ago to the passage of these bills in this way were practically asked not to delay the business of the house. We protested quite sincerely that we were not attempting to block the business of the house but that we were desirous of seeing this work done in a little more decent manner than had been the case in the past, and we have adhered to that principle since. However, I think the least that can be done is to have the sponsors of the bills prepared to answer a few questions which may be asked, and one question I have wanted to emphasize is whether or not children are involved and, if so, whether those children are being cared for. True, the Minister of Justice informed us that it is not within the competence of parliament to grant the custody or demand the maintenance of the children, but even if that be so under the existing interpretation of the British North America Act I still say it is within the competence of parliament to refuse to grant a divorce until such time as the children are cared for, and I think I am quite within my rights in asking this question. I know we cannot do very much in these cases, but if an outstanding case is brought forward where children are being neglected, we might refer that case back to the committee for reconsideration.

In the meantime I want to emphasize the fact that in this house we are occupying a most anomalous position. As far as the state is concerned the chief reason why marriage is recognized is that there may be care for the family, yet here we are in a position where we cannot give effect to this principle which lies at the very root of marriage. That sort of thing should not and cannot continue very long. That we should recognize the union of two people and yet not be in a position to see that their offspring are cared for is hard to understand. Judging from the communications which have been coming to me from different quarters it is only beginning to dawn upon the people of Canada what an outrage has been perpetrated here throughout the years, and I do not think society as a whole will agree to permit a procedure to continue whereby we simply throw the children on the streets. In many instances these children are cared for by children's aid societies and other philanthropic institutions; we are not asking too much when we request this information.

Mr. SPENCE: If my hon. friend will permit me to do so I will give him the information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will get it in a moment. I think we are not going too far when we require that the sponsor of the bill be prepared to give us at least an outline of the case or to tell us something about the children.

Mr. SPENCE: I have no hesitation in giving the hon. gentleman the information, but I had simply forgotten to bring the evidence down with me to-night. There is one child in this case, living with the mother, and by order of Mrs. Patterson, a Toronto police magistrate, the father pays $5 a week for the maintenance of the child.

IRENE MABEL USHER

The house in committee on Bill No. 160, for the relief of Irene Mabel Usher—Mr. Ross (Kingston)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the children?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There are two children in this case, aged thirteen and fourteen.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is any provision made for them?

Mr. BOURASSA: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is of extreme importance. I was not here the other day when the Minister of Justice gave his opinion with regard to the jurisdiction of this house with respect to what I might call the civil consequences or results of a divorce granted by this house, but I think that opinion is incontrovertible, and it exemplifies the absurdity of the whole situation. Of course, the principle of divorce is just as bad in the case of married people without children. But as I have already stated my position in that regard, I need not go over it again.

But when it comes to the question of children I know of no civilized and so-called Christian country on earth where the dissolution of marriage or the separation of married people, what we call in French, séparation de corps, which is allowed in the province of Quebec,—you call it in English, separation a mensa et thoro—nowhere is it allowed without the court giving its decision with regard to the children, deciding which of the separated parties, the father or the mother, shall have the custody of the children and what means shall be taken to provide for their maintenance. That is done everywhere. I know of no country, whether it be the United States, England, France, Belgium, Germany or any other country the legislation of which I know anything about, which does not always look after the children. It is essential; it is the duty of the state, as represented by the jurisdiction created by the government, to adjudicate upon such matters, to consider what will become of the children. The responsibility of the state towards the child is greater than its responsibility towards the man and woman who cannot agree to live together and are asking for a separation. If it is the decided opinion of the government, or of the Minister of Justice, who is the legal adviser of the government, that this parliament is not empowered judicially or constitutionally to carry out its primary duty towards the child born of a marriage dissolved by this parliament, then this parliament has not the moral right to pronounce any divorce in cases where there are children, until and unless some means have been found to provide for the children, as they are provided for by regular courts of justice in any country where such separations or divorces are granted. This only shows that the problem cannot be solved until we have amended the constitution in such a manner that the power which has jurisdiction over the marriage will have the whole jurisdiction. So long as we exercise one jurisdiction here and the other jurisdiction is exercised by another power over which we have no control, we will never get satisfaction. Some harm may be done in cases where only two individuals, the parties to the marriage contract, are concerned, but it is much more strongly exemplified where there are children.

At times I hear some suppressed laughter in the house, but I would ask the members of this house to remember that this is one of the most serious questions before the country. It is concerning the thoughtful people of Canada much more than thoughtless people seem to imagine. Not very long ago the Anglican synod—quite a respectable body, I think—gathered and expressed its opinion with regard to this matter. Two of its most respected and high placed members, the Bishop of Ottawa and one of his colleagues, have issued a document which is one of the most comprehensive pronouncements on this question I have read for a long time. They called the attention not only of the members of their own church but of all thoughtful Canadians to the threat to the country arising from the disquieting increase in divorces from year to year. If that is a threat in itself, surely it is a much greater threat when we dissolve a family and, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre has just said, throw the children on the street and leave it to haphazard to decide how they will be taken care of, to which of the parents they will be given, whether to the worthy one or to the the unworthy one.

I am not a believer in the doctrine of the state taking the place of the parents in the matter of education, whether it is family education or school education; but when the state takes upon itself the responsibility of breaking the family tie, surely it should do something for the preservation of those members of the family who are incapable, either morally, physically or legally, of protecting themselves. We decide that the marriage is dissolved, the man goes where he likes and the woman does what she wishes, and no provision is made for the children; we wash our hands of all responsibility towards the children. This is an extremely serious aspect of the question, apart from all the circumstances surrounding it. When we consider the basic principle of the indissolubility of marriage, we must not forget that this other principle is just as important.

I assume that it will take some process of education to bring home to the people of the country a realization of the harm which was done at the time of confederation with regard to divorce. The power which performs the operation of breaking a family tie has now to admit that it is incapable, that it is impotent to perform what is considered in every civilized country as the primary duty of the authority which pronounces divorce—to take care of the children. It seems to me that the least we could do would be to say that before a divorce is granted, in cases where there are children concerned, such procedure should take place as was spoken of a moment ago by the member for Parkdale. The hon. member mentioned a case where a court of justice in Ontario had decided, before application for divorce was made, as to whom the child should be given and as to the allowance to be paid to the mother or the father, as the case may be, for the maintenance of that child. I say that it is essential that no petition for a divorce should be received by this parliament in cases where children are concerned until such procedure has taken place before a regular court of justice. That seems to me to be the least we could do. Finding out that we cannot ourselves exercise that duty, we should say to the parties who ask for divorce, "In case you have children you must go before a court of justice and have it decided as to what will become of the children, how they will be taken care of, and to whom they will be given." It seems to me that that is an extremely reasonable proposition, and if we still believe in the necessity of the maintenance of the principle of the family tie, it is about time that we retraced our steps as far as that aspect of the question is concerned. Therefore I think that in connection with this bill or any other bill involving children in regard to whom no judicial decision has been obtained in the province in which reside the parties in the case, no such petition should be received, and no such bill should be passed upon. It may be said that this suggestion is late; but it is never too late. Let what amount those parties have deposited be remitted to them; let them put themselves in a proper position in that regard before they ask for divorce from this parliament, and parliament should not grant a divorce until the whole case has been covered as it should be.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This is a case where the mother about nine or ten years ago contracted a filthy disease from her husband. She separated from him; for nine years she has been living apart and supporting her children and she wishes so to continue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There again is the question whether or not the parties should be given the right to marry again. If they are diseased the danger is obvious, and the sponsor of the bill should put a question mark as to whether we should turn them loose on the community.

Mr. MARCIL: I want to approve every word that has been uttered by the hon. member for Labelle. It is bad enough to divorce people, but if parliament is going to continue to act as it is doing now, separating these people and making no provision whatever for the children, it is a most heartless procedure to follow, and I am sure public opinion in general would back us up if we insisted that people coming to parliament asking for divorce should at least prove to the committee that provision has been made for the care of the children. That can easily be done by an application to the courts as is done in the case of judicial decisions in Quebec, where no such separation is granted unless a decree is issued by the court providing for the children. Surely parliament should look after these poor innocent children, minors, who are left practically on the street. The suggestion made by the member for Labelle is worthy of consideration. This bill should be allowed to stand.

ELIZABETH SPAIN

The house in committee on Bill No. 162 for the relief of Elizabeth Spain.—Mr. Ross (Kingston)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the children?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There is one child in this case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What provision is being mode for it?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I find this in the transcript of the evidence:

My husband was up for non-support, he had not supported our child since she was three years old, and Magistrate Brunton at Toronto —he is dead now—he told my husband he must pay me so much a week to help support our child. He didn't do it, and Major Brunton had him up in front of him. That is how I happened to know where he lived.

Mr. MANION: She is looking after the child?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there any children?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There is one child, born at Gallipoli.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How old is the child?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Eight years old.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In whose custody is the child at the present time?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): With the mother.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 177, for the relief of Claude Frederick Burgin.—Mr. Geary (for Mr. Lennox).

Bill No. 181, for the relief of Mary Addie Linton.—Mr. Geary (for Mr. Lennox).

Motions for second readings agreed to on division.

JEANIE MATHIESON HOWELL

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) (for Mr. Edwards, Ottawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, for the relief of Jeanie Mathieson Howell.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the sponsor of this bill state the ground on which divorce is sought?

Mr. HARRIS: This divorce case was unopposed. There were no interruptions by the members of the senate committee; the evidence was presented by counsel, and there was no collusion between the parties.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot hear at this end, Mr. Speaker. I asked what was the ground for divorce in this case. There was one bill for which the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Edwards) was sponsor that was of a very exceptional kind. I should like to know if this is the case.

Mr. HARRIS: I understand that the ground in this case is similar to that in many other of these divorce cases, misconduct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I object to that sort of answer. We are here dealing with legal matters if we are dealing with anything. I have heard hon. gentlemen stand in this house and talk about the "usual statutory grounds". I am not a lawyer, but if I understand the situation aright, there are no statutory grounds. Divorce is granted according to certain practices which prevail in the senate, and I say that there are several grounds upon which divorce has been granted. I asked a straight question, what is the ground upon which divorce is granted in this case? I think I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. HARRIS: The information I have is that there was evidence of misconduct.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time on division.

GORDON ASHUR TRUE

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) (for Mr. Edwards, Ottawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 199, for the relief of Gordon Ashur True.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle)): I have been absent for several sittings during which these manufactured divorces have been passed, but I understood when we agreed after the declaration made by the Prime Minister to let the ordinary procedure, hasty and indecent as it is, go on for this session in order to give the government time to think over the whole situation, that at least the ordinary rules would be observed. One of them was that each bill should be called; that is being done. And I also understood that when the sponsor of any of these bills was not here it would not be called. I thought that that had been agreed to. Now, two or three of these bills have been called, although the sponsor is not present.

Mr. STEVENS: He is ill and unable to be here.

Mr. BOURASSA: Suppose it was another matter—

Mr. STEVENS: It is a matter of courtesy.

Mr. BOURASSA: It is something more than a matter of courtesy. It is not a matter of courtesy to the member directly concerned, because I think that most hon. members take very little interest in the bills and know very little about them. One hon. member whose name has been connected this evening with several of these bills had to look after them when called. I do not blame him for that; I know it has been the custom. But that is precisely why we want to remedy this state of affairs, and it seems to me that when the sponsor is absent somebody else should be in a position to explain what the sponsor himself is supposed to explain. It seems to me to be more than a matter of form. Take another class of bill. I do not object to a member moving the second reading in the place of the sponsor, but at least the substitute sponsor should be able to state to the house what the original sponsor is supposed to know. Any member taking the responsibility of presenting a measure to the house is supposed to be able to give to the house an explanation of the bill. If he is absent, and somebody else moves the second reading, the latter is supposed to be able to supply whatever information may be required by the house. There again a practice that I think was clearly understood should cease is left to go on again in the same old way. I am not doing this to hurt anybody, but I simply desire to express my opinion.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Childish.

Mr. BOURASSA: No. It may look childish to the hon. gentleman, but everyone is entitled to have his point of view respected. I think the hon. member should pay a little respect to the opinions of others. It is the trouble of some people that they are impatient with those who differ from them. I respect the point of view of any member who differs from me, and I am entitled to the same respect from him. I submit to the house, first, the rules should be observed in this as in other cases; second, when practically an arrangement has been made with the government that certain things should be done, then that arrangement should be observed. Therefore while there is no desire on my part to retard the passing of these bills, I think the ordinary rules should be applied as it was stated they would be applied.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, as very much importance seems to be attached to the information which should be in the possession of those who sponsor these bills coming from the senate, I am sorry that in many cases they are not able to furnish the particulars which the house should have as a matter of simple justice. I raise the point now, sir, so you may give us a ruling on it at another sitting, as to whether when the sponsor of a measure is not present in the house that measure can be proceeded with except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: No exception can be made to the rule unless by unanimous consent. If the point is raised, I should say that the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of this bill is out of order. But certain amenities are observed in the parliament of Canada. We have the word of the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of the bill that the real sponsor, the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Edwards), is ill and cannot be present. On two or three different occasions of late we have taken the word—as we should take it—of those who ask to be substituted for the original sponsor. Of course, if the hon. gentleman insists on his point, it will be tantamount to refusing to accept the word of an hon. member. I leave it to the house. If the point of order is raised, certainly the original sponsor should move the second reading of the bill; but, as I have stated, there are certain amenities that should be observed, I would not say for the good government of Canada, but to facilitate our dealing with the ordinary matters that come before the house. Do I understand that the point is raised?

Mr. MARCIL: No, I was anxious to know what the rule of the house was.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was the procedure any different when the hon. member from Bonaventure was in the chair?

Mr. MARCIL: The rules have been very materially changed since then. I am quite willing to accept the declaration made by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then if the point is not pressed the bill may receive second reading.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of personal explanation I want to make it clear that my objection is not to any member moving the second reading in the place of the original sponsor of the bill who is ill and out of the house. My objection is to the fact that the gentleman who takes that responsibility is not in a position to explain the matter. I want that to be clearly understood.

Mr. HARRIS: If the hon. gentleman will give me a few minutes I can furnish the explanation, but as the hour of nine o'clock is approaching I must ask the house to accept a very brief explanation. In this particular case there was misconduct on the part of one of the parties. The one child of the marriage is being taken care of by the father and is in the custody of the mother-in-law, who is well able to provide for and take care of the offspring.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time on division.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of suply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 135, harbours and rivers, Ontario, $2,633,300. The details will be found on page 41.

Beaverton—reconstruction of harbour works, $2,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, some of the Ontario members who are not here to-night would like to be given an opportunity to comment on certain of these items. If the minister will agree to leave the item "harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $75,000", on the understanding that any of these items might be discussed by Ontario members, we are prepared to go on with the rest.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All these items are comprised in one vote; it would be impossible to proceed if that were done. And it may be some days before I shall have an opportunity again to be in committee. Would it suit the hon. member's purpose to have "harbours and rivers generally" in the Dominion left open?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is item 140?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, certainly, on that understanding.

Item agreed to.

Hamilton—harbour improvements, $212,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the reason for this increase?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Extensive work has to be done there if the harbour is to be utilized by ships coming into the canal, and even this amount will not suffice. The $212,000 includes a revote of $48,000; $29,000 is to provide for the contract of the Russell Construction Company for repairs to the revetment wall, and it is intended by contract to do the dredging of the channel and the slips in the proposed new terminal for the Canada Steamship Lines Limited. It is also to serve the Otis-Fensom Elevator Company when they construct wharfage. There will also be dredging of the channel and slip in connection with the proposed new 1,500-foot wharf to be built in 1929 by the Steel Company of Canada, one-third to be paid by the company. The estimated cost is $100,000, the department's share being $66,667. A very large traffic is to be provided for.

Item agreed to.

Kingston—dredging, $7,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What part of the work was left undone last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This revote is required to complete the contract with R. G. Weddell for dredging in front of the university and hospital dock on an area of 17,500 square feet with an average cut of three feet, involving the removal of 1,900 cubic yards place measure of class A material. The apropriation for last year was $14,200. The work done to March 31 last amounted to $5,258.61.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think a good deal more will be required there. For the last few years we have had from ninety to one hundred grain-carrying steamers harbouring there during the winter, and in addition to that the second extension to the dry dock will certainly bring large vessels. The minister should be prepared to carry out a good deal more dredging because the harbour is considered pretty safe for winter storage of these ships. They are tied up to the causeway and in various parts of the harbour eight and ten deep. I would point out however that following a storm a year ago the stays were removed, and although they were put back I do not think the engineers will say that they are now fixed with any degree of permanency, because they were stirred again this year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was put back?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The stays to which the steamers are moored in the winter. These stays were pulled up in the great storm a year ago, and as I say they were put back, but there is no great permanency about them; they came loose again this year. I think the engineer's department should consider some better means than this, because it certainly is not very pleasant having eight or ten large steamers which are held abreast loosened in the winter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member is aware that representations have been made with regard to this and other matters relating to Kingston, and I may say that arrangements have already been made with regard to tying posts and other facilities of a similar character.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When we come to the vote for dredging the minister might tell us how much was spent last year and where, and what proposals are under consideration this year regarding further expenditure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to give that information.

Item agreed to.

Sarnia—dredging, $70,000.

Mr. SPENCE: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The work is required to accommodate the heavy grain traffic and relieve the congested condition of this harbour. A new elevator with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels was constructed at this point in 1927 and is to be enlarged to a capacity of 3,000,000 bushels. Over 10,000,000 bushels of grain are handled at this point every season. These improvements were requested by the Sarnia Elevator Company, Limited, in December, 1928.

Mr. SPENCE: Did the government build the elevator?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. SPENCE: This is for dredging?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Toronto—dredging, $29,000.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Is that for the western channel?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 137, harbours and rivers, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Craven dam—in full and final settlement of claims, $25,000.

Mr. FRASER: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is asked to be provided in full and final settlement of claims on behalf of certain land owners for damage alleged to have been done their farms below the Craven dam in Saskatchewan. The claims arose through the breaking of the dam built by the Department of Public Works, resulting in a flood which caused this damage.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I suppose any claim against the government arising out of damage to property along the rivers, which damage might be caused by the washing away of government boulevard property, might be provided for out of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is correct in that assumption with this exception, that if it were a large claim it could be hardly cared for out of this item because the practice has been not to take large amounts out of these general votes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But I suppose if the minister granted a small claim which might be established to his satisfaction it could be cared for from this item.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 138, harbours and rivers, British Columbia.

Crooked, Pack and Parsnip rivers—improvements, $3,500.

Mr. FRASER: Would the minister tell us why the total vote last year was not spent, and how much of it was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of the $3,500 voted, $1,445 was spent.

Mr. FRASER: What work was done for that amount?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last year we carried on the removal of boulders and the building of wing dams to improve the river channels, chiefly at the Harriston riffle, some nine miles downstream from Summit lake. The expenditure was approximately $1,500.

Mr. FRASER: Is the work proposed for next year approximately of the same character?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The work now proposed consists in the main of improving existing channels by removing rock, boulders and gravel bars. The remainder of the work will be in clearing the banks of overhanging brush, sweepers and so on.

Item agreed to.

Digby island—repairs to float approach, $5,700.

Mr. BRADY: I should like to have a few particulars about this item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount of $5,700 is to provide for repairs to the float approach.

Mr. BRADY: Is that the breakwater?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To construct a triangular shaped pile work breakwater 20 feet by 20 feet, 30 feet wide at the base; the proposed work to be built alongside the approach to the float.

Mr. BRADY: What is the purpose of the breakwater?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The breakwater is required to give a much needed protection to the float which is exposed to southerly gales. The float is used for departmental purposes by the officials of the government wireless station as a landing when going to and from Prince Rupert, and by the children when going to school.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—improvements, $300,500.

Mr. BARBER: Is that to be spent at the mouth of the Fraser river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, it is practically all to be spent at the mouth of the river.

Item agreed to.

Glenannon—wharf, $6,400.

Mr. FRASER: Could we have some particulars with respect to this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to construct a wharf 248 feet in length at the east end of Francois lake at a point known as Glenannon, where there is no landing at present for the tugboat and five gas boats handling supplies, logs, and so forth, for 29 logging and tie camps operating on the lake. The proposed work is asked for by the loggers, ranchers and tie contractors operating on the lakes, who claim that they are handicapped by the lack of a wharf. The annual lumber cut is valued at $180,000 and the population to be benefited numbers about 250.

Mr. FRASER: Will that work be done by day labour or by contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will be done by contract if we can obtain a satisfactory price.

Mr. FRASER: Have you called for tenders as yet?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, we do not call for tenders until we get the vote.

Mr. BRADY: I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that last year the residents around Francois lake, through their board of trade, requested that something be done to give assistance in the matter of wharf accommodation. The lake is about 90 miles long and most of the traffic from that country passes up and down the lake. I spent about three weeks travelling up and down that country and found that requests had been made that a wharf be placed at MacDonald landing and also at one or two other points along the lake. The Burns Lake board of trade, representing that great district, presented their views on this matter. After obtaining full particulars of these requests I visited Victoria and presented them to Mr. J. P. Forde, the federal engineer, and he promised me that he would send in one of his men to investigate the conditions. I happened to be at Burns Lake when Mr. Forde's engineer came there and I assumed that he had come in at the request of the board of trade at Burns Lake, but I found that he had travelled these thousands of miles at the request of the secretary of the Liberal association at Endako. The question arises in my mind as to why a federal engineer should be sent in at considerable expense at the request of one man and the request of the main body of the people concerned should be ignored. I have been in this house three years and the more I examine into the Public Works department the more I realize that the sooner it is taken out of the realm of politics the better it will be for the development of Canada. I do not blame the Minister of Public Works as I think the fault lies with the men whose duty it is to present to the minister the needs of these outlying districts. Water transportation is the only means afforded to the people on this lake of transporting their produce to the Francois lake crossing where the ferry is. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that there is the greatest need on Francois lake for at least four wharves. On the opposite side of the lake is MacDonald landing where there is a large agricultural settlement, and they have no means of taking their products down to the lake and over to Burns lake where the railway is. From the Stellato river, where Glenannon is, down to Nadina, a distance of 90 miles, there is not a single wharf on that great inland lake. I have gone to the minister repeatedly and I have found that he has given me consideration, but the unfortunate thing is that the information he acts upon is from a quarter that I do not believe in nine cases out of ten expresses exactly the needs of that district. While I am on my feet I want to draw attention to the situation that exists at Stewart.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I ask my hon. friend a question? I have no doubt he has followed the interests of British Columbia very carefully. Is he not aware that this year they are getting a much higher percentage of the Public Works appropriation than they have for many years, and they are certainly not getting it in ridings that are not supporters of friends of my hon. friend. I just wanted to know whether my hon. friend knew that.

Mr. BRADY: I am thoroughly familiar with the conditions. I have been in this house for three years and I know that section of the country very well. In the past three years there has been the greatest neglect in the matter of public works for the Skeena constituency. We are living on the Pacific coast; we have an immense coastline and the main need of the people who are living along that coastline is wharves. I grant that the government has done something this year, but it is a belated gift. There are two great needs in the matter of wharf accommodation along the northern British Columbia coast. A couple of years ago there was in the estimates an item of $40,000 for a new wharf at Stewart. That, however, was taken out of the estimates. Why that was done I am not going to explain, although I could give a very good reason. What is the condition of the Stewart wharf to-day? I have before me the results of a four-days visit that I paid last September to Stewart. I took with me the leading citizens of that town in order that they might corroborate what I was writing down in regard to the congestion on the government wharf there. I know the minister has in his possession from the federal engineer, and Captain Saunders at Digby, reports regarding the Stewart wharf. Nevertheless the conditions at Stewart to-day are such that it is imperative that the Public Works department build a wharf there. The Premier mine have a practical monopoly upon the government wharf; their ore is passed over it. There is congestion from one end to the other. I found on that wharf tons of machinery that belonged to the Premier mine and that had been lying there for months. I found that when the Canadian National steamers and the Union steamers called there, the congestion was so great with all kinds of produce for the Marmot mine, the Premier mine and other places that is was impossible for the passengers to go down by the gangway and with impunity pass to their automobiles to take them to Stewart or to Hyder. The explanations given to me by the federal engineer as well as by Captain Saunders have been contradicted by every captain of the Canadian National and the Union steamships and also by the captains of the ore carriers, such as the Mogul and those boats that take the ore from that place. This is what the captain of one of those steamships said to me: after a wire had been sent to Ottawa "Your wire is only a joke compared to what you should sent in." In other words, that particular section is the most important mining area in the whole of northern British Columbia. There is the Premier mine, the Big Missouri, the Marmot mines, the Silverado, the Prosperity,—a whole great section which is comparable with anything either in Ontario of Quebec. What happened was this: a new wharf was built by Mr. Crawford for his own special purpose, for coal and other things, and it did not in any way relieve the congestion at the government wharf. When I went there I was told that Crawford's wharf and the wharf built by the Premier at the Marmot, were able to relieve the congestion on the main Stewart wharf. That is not the case. I do not want to compel the Minister of Public Works to do anything he should not do, but I contend that the most necessary thing in that section to-day is that a wharf should be built at Stewart to meet the requirements of that fast growing mineral area.

Mr. FRASER: When the minister made the observation that British Columbia was getting somewhat better consideration in this estimate this year than last year, he left the impression that British Columbia generally was getting the benefit of that increase.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not say "last year"; I said "other years". Take it for the last fifteen years.

Mr. FRASER: The impression I got was that we were getting a larger appropriation this year for works of this kind throughout British Columbia as compared with last year. Let me point out that the increase in the vote this year as compared with last year comes in three particular places: There is $100,000 for dredging the north arm of the Fraser river. Then there is $300,500 for improvements to the Fraser river, which is $100,500 in excess of last year. Then there is an item of $124,500 for dredging the First Narrows, so that apart from these votes there is for the rest of the province $712,300, as compared with $774,000 last year. The hon. member for Skeena is certainly correct when he says that a lot of these places in the northern country are not getting the consideration they deserve. I have in the central part of my constituency Quesnel lake, and on the whole of the ninety miles of its shore line there is not a single wharf. I would ask the minister to have his engineers investigate the conditions in these and other places in that new and growing district, for I feel sure that the information he will get from them will cause him to give greater consideration to these outlying places.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just to clear this matter up, let me say that I am not finding fault with the criticism; I think I would be very unfair did I not express my appreciation of the tone of the criticism that has characterized the passing of these estimates. But I do think it is unfair to the people of the other provinces and to this department for the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Cariboo, in view of these estimates for British Columbia, to get up here and suggest that these estimates for public works are gauged largely by considerations of political patronage. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the percentage of the total appropriation for harbours and rivers that the province of British Columbia has received in past years, and I find that from 1914-15 to 1921-22—those were war years—British Columbia's percentage of the total expenditure was 2.24; from 1922-23 to 1927-28, British Columbia's percentage was 2.41, and for this year her percentage is 3.60 of the total appropriation. I do not think that any hon. gentleman will object to any one item in these estimates if he is fair. I would rather have expected my hon. friend from Skeena, who in season and out of season, every time this committee has sat, has asked for floats at Prince Rupert and has spoken of the great amount of credit he would give to this government and to this department if they saw fit to provide those floats, to express his appreciation now that those floats are provided for in the estimates, but he has never referred to that fact at all. He does not know the percentage of the total appropriations which British Columbia is now getting as compared with what that province usually gets, that its percentage is now half as much again as it has been for many years. There is nothing my hon. friend can say to which I will not give consideration, but I do believe that he tries to seize every opportunity to make a little political capital for himself and his friends in that part of the country. I would ask him if he thinks it is fair, in view of what these estimates show, or if he thinks he is advancing the interests of Skeena, to make the criticism he made here to-night when not one of those ridings in which these appropriations are being expended is represented by a Liberal.

Mr. BRADY: I think I should reply to the remarks that the minister has just made. He says that I take every opportunity to make a little political capital. I want to tell him this, that I have never once in this House of Commons or outside of it uttered one word for the purpose of making political capital. I resent that statement coming from the hon. Minister of Public Works. I went through my constituency last recess, travelling by day and by night for four and a half months, to find out just what the conditions were so that I might present them, first, to the engineers of the Public Works department, and secondly, if it were necessary, to the minister himself.

The minister says that I have never said anything about the Prince Rupert floats, that I have never congratulated him upon providing them. Mr. Chairman, I have no reason to congratulate the minister on doing something which should have been done three years ago. There has not been one winter for three solid years during which thousands of dollars have not been lost to the fishing fleet in the port of Prince Rupert. Even this very year when I went back at Easter, there were a score of boats swept from their moorings and many thrown upon the opposite side of the harbour causing damage amounting to thousands of dollars, and yet the minister says, "Why didn't you thank me?"

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not say that.

Mr. BRADY: The minister said that I was not grateful for what he did.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is better.

Mr. BRADY: So far as the appropriations in these estimates are concerned, they were essential, not this year, but three years ago, and these necessary works have been kept back all that time. I think I know the reason why. I have stated in this house, and I intend to repeat it until I get what I want, that the public works of this country should be outside the influence of any member of parliament and of any defeated member of parliament. There are great needs in the northern part of British Columbia to be filled of which the Minister of Public Works is not yet aware. He states that British Columbia's percentage of the total appropriation for this year is 3.60. Does he forget that there has been a wonderful development in northern British Columbia in the last three years?

Mr. ELLIOTT: And in the other provinces too.

Mr. BRADY: I admit that, but I contend that there is an obligation upon the Department of Public Works to provide these wharves and other improvements for that section of the country where the great majority of the people live, not in the interior as in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, but right on the Pacific ocean. Wharves to them are as essential as roads in the province of Ontario. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Public Works misunderstood my remarks.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I did.

Mr. BRADY: I think you did, sir, because if I had chosen—I did not think it necessary, as it was your duty—I would have thanked you for four or five of those. But, sir, there are many necessary public works in my part of British Columbia not yet provided for. Remember, I am speaking now to the Minister of Public Works. If the minister could get one of his engineers to make a thorough investigation of the needs of that vast constituency, and give him an honest, exact report, he would find that what I have said to-night can be absolutely verified. I will give you an instance, sir. Take Port Clements on Queen Charlotte Island. Port Clements to-day is the centre of the traffic from the south and the east end of the island. The provincial government have built a road whereby the whole of the traffic from east and west moves to Port Clements. Now, I ask the minister to instruct his engineer to proceed there and investigate conditions, and I believe he will find at Port Clements a great need for a new wharf and also for additional protection of the local fleet.

This is the first time that I have been told that anything I say in this house is for the purpose of making political capital. I spent over twenty-eight years of my life in teaching the youth of the empire, and I do not want now to retrace my steps, I do not want now to be placed in the position of being told that I am coming to Ottawa for one purpose only—political capital. I entered into the political world not for that purpose, and I say to the Minister of Public Works that I have never yet spoken one word in this house nor outside of it, and I hope I never shall, that is not intended for the good of the people and for the good of the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If Mr. Chairman, I misunderstood my hon. friend. I am very sorry. The public works engineers who are charged with the responsibility of going all over the country to make reports upon the requests received—and they are numerous and sometimes very difficult to deal with—I believe are making a fair and honest endeavour to send in reports that will best serve the interests of the various parts of the country concerned, and I do not think my hon. friend should have referred to the fact that if our engineers would send in honest and exact reports the department would do something different from what they have done. Our engineers are in a difficult position, they are working very hard, and I believe they are doing their work well.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have one word more in regard to this matter. I am very glad indeed that the minister has brought it up. He says that British Columbia now has 3·60 per cent of this vote. I wonder how he justifies allotting that proportion of the vote to British Columbia. I wonder if he takes into consideration that we have thousands of miles of coastline and thousands of miles of shoreline in our inland waters, not only so far as rivers are concerned but also with respect to the immense lakes all over the interior of the province. If he would take the coastline and the shoreline of our inland rivers and lakes he would find that British Columbia is getting a pretty small percentage of the total vote devoted to the harbours and rivers of the Dominion.

I also want him to remember that the northern part of British Columbia is rapidly filling up with new people, and it would be in the interests of the colonization of that country if the Minister of Public Works would give a little more attention to the needs of the settlers who are going in there. I say this to the minister with the idea of assisting him in the work that he is performing for the Dominion. I would point out to him that the engineer in charge of that district lives in the town of Nelson, which is pretty near the southern boundary of the province. That engineer is expected to look after the work of his department in the northern part of British Columbia, four or five hundred miles away from his main office. What possibility is there of that man giving attention to the necessary work over all that great expanse of country when he is situated four or five hundred miles away? I submit it is about time the minister stationed a public works engineer in the northern part of British Columbia. For his benefit and information I would suggest that a first-class place for such an engineer would be in the city of Prince George, which is pretty well in the centre of all that territory. I make this suggestion knowing the country to be covered, knowing the necessities of these people are growing every day, and also knowing that the need for wharves all over that country cannot possibly be taken care of by engineers situated four or five hundred miles away. I suggest it is about time the minister stationed an engineer at Prince George to look after that work.

If the minister has increased the appropriation—and I admit that his figures are probably correct—I would suggest to him that if he would take a little time to travel through the province of British Columbia—and we should all be very glad to see him there—I guarantee that after he has reviewed the local conditions he will set aside for next year a much greater appropriation than appears in these estimates.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister has enunciated a new policy to-night, that is, he has suggested that any of us to whose constituency a grant is given should rise in our place and say: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not at all.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Well, we should be grateful anyway. But there is a little danger in doing that, Mr. Chairman. On one occasion my constituency received a little grant, but when tenders were called for the contract went to a Conservative and the money was never expended. So there is some danger, I say, in getting up and saying "thank you" for these little grants, because after all the money may never be spent.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Wait until the money is spent.

Item agreed to.

Halcyon—wharf construction, $7,600.

Mr. GERSHAW: Is this a public wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is proposed to replace the existing decrepit floating wharf with a new structure, 240 feet by 16 feet with a turning platform 32 feet by 32 feet, and an approach thereto. It is in West Kootenay. I have no doubt my hon. friend knows it is where the hot springs are located.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $65,000.

Mr. FRASER: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the condition of the wharf at Sicamous in my district, along the Shuswap lakes. The minister used the term "old and decrepit" in connection with a certain wharf under another item. I want to tell him that according to the reports I have heard regarding this particular wharf it is old and decrepit and very much in need of reconstruction. I would suggest that the minister take a part of the $65,000 and provide us with a new wharf there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the general vote there is $650 allotted for certain work at that point. It will not go very far.

Mr. FRASER: I cannot imagine that such a sum would reconstruct a wharf.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is for a new shed and wharf repairs.

Mr. FRASER: My information is that the old wharf is so old and so badly shaken that it is hardly worth repairing, and before the department gets into trouble as a result of the wharf falling down and killing someone a new wharf had better be built.

Mr. BRADY: In the matter of harbours and rivers, is there anything for the Stickine river, which is in a very bad way as regards dredging?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I repeat what I have said a number of times, that this general vote is not used for dredging.

Mr. BRADY: Very well.

Item agreed to.

Nicomen island—protection work and dyking, $35,000.

Mr. BARBER: What protection work was done prior to this last vote This amount is a revote. Prior to last year what was done in the way of protecting the bank at Nicomen?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Our expenditure to date on 1,650 feet of mattress work built in 1923-24 and 500 feet recently completed by day labour is $41,000. That is all the information I have.

Mr. BARBER: Is this work which is going on now supposed to be of a permanent nature?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is supposed to be as permanent as you can make work of that kind.

Mr. BARBER: I visited this particular place in Nicomen island during the Easter recess and saw the nature of the work that was being constructed. I think the department are also aware of it; they know the conditions there. The bank is soft, almost perpendicular, and the engineers went back about eight feet on top of the bank and sloped it, covering the surface with straw, upon which they are laying one layer of rock. A portion of the west end of the 1,000 feet is of quicksand bottom, and I think the minister will agree that during freshets the work will not stand very long. This is a very important question which has been before the department for some time, and those of us who are well acquainted with the particular trouble on the Fraser river at that point believe that the proper thing to do is to remove the cause. The cause of the erosion of the bank on the north side of the river at Nicomen island has been set forth by the engineer in a letter which I received from the deputy minister on February 1 of this year, in which he says:

> After the observations made during last year's freshet, I believe the main cause of the erosion of the south bank of Nicomen island is due to the movement of the deep water channel of the river towards the north. This is being caused by two factors. The first is the cutting of the river into the south bank above McDonald's bar, which has been very severe during the past years, and is still active, even at low water stages of the river. This cutting has formed a very sharp curve of this bank which guides the current during the lower stages of the river over towards Nicomen island more directly than ever before. The second is that the materials from this bank cutting—consisting of gravel and sand from above-mentioned high bank—have been deposited along the northerly side of McDonald's bar, thus extending the bar towards Nicomen island, and naturally pushing the deep water channel over towards the island.

The engineer reported in regard to the matter and action was taken in 1913 along that line. In that year this same engineer, under the same officers of the department, reported favourably on cutting a channel on the south side so that the main body of the river would be carried down and diverted from the Nicomen island side. In answer to a question of mine certain information was given on February 27, as reported at pages 534 and 535 of Hansard. This work was recommended by the present engineer, and the statement appears in Hansard that the object was to divert the current from Nicomen island, where the bank was eroded. This channel, known as the King Edward cut, was proceeded with; it was some 5,600 feet long and 150 feet wide and cost the country $87,225.40. This cut was never completed and therefore there was no relief given, although they came within about 1,600 feet of completing it. In answer to a question as to why this work was not completed the reason given was the high elevation of discharge and also the running ice which endangered the plant.

I waited upon the deputy minister last year in regard to this matter and he informed me that he did not think it good business to do any more dredging at this point, that it was simply throwing money into the river and that the channel had completely filled in. Last October I went to that district and, with some of the residents, proceeded up this channel in a gas boat; and with a 12-foot pole we could not find bottom. I agree that at the upper end there has been some slight filling in, but the channel appeared to be in almost the same condition as when the dredge left it. As I say, we consider it will be good business to complete this work because, as the minister stated, a large amount of money has been expended in order to protect that bank. We are spending this year another $40,000, which will give only temporary protection. In 1927 the engineer pointed out that it was very necessary that the banks of Nicomen island be protected; he said that the bank then was within 100 feet of the dyke built by the provincial government about four years previously. Last year a portion of the dyke was washed out, and in the opinion of some of the provincial engineers and those who reside in that district this work will not stand the heavy freshets. On November 9, 1928, the deputy minister wrote me as follows:

> Our efforts to induce the river to follow a cut at this point in the past were expensive and, as you are quite aware, produced no result. While those efforts were well intended the non-success only makes us more hesitant to undertake any further expenditure there.

I would ask the committee how any results could be expected with this channel completely isolated during low and medium water. During the construction of the channel the material was thrown into the centre of the river; a sort of dyke or bar was thus formed and at the east end of the work the gravel is some fifteen feet high.

As I said before, the engineer has been favourable to the completion of this work. He visited this district on March 16, 1927, and I have in my hand a letter which was written the next day by a member of the party who met and accompanied the engineer to that spot. He says.

> Mr. C. C. Worsfold, resident engineer, arrived at McDonald's Landing, Nicomen Island, yesterday at noon under instructions from Ottawa and received delegation of farmers on board Samson and proceeded across river to the head of old dredge cut which was never finished.
> The piece of dredging the farmers want done is 1,700 feet long, an average cut of 7 feet deep, 120 feet wide. This means nearly 50,000 yards of gravel to be removed. These are Mr. Worsfold's figures; cost $15,000. He said if we could get that through it would save the erosion at McDonald's Landing, which has been greater this winter than ever before. He gave us the impression when he left that he would report favourably on the scheme.

I took this up with the department here, and I have in my hand a letter from the deputy minister in which he quotes the resident engineer as saying:

If this cut were made this spring before the freshet in the river, Mr. Worsfold does not think it would relieve the bank this year as it would certainly take two or three freshets for the new cut to scour out sufficiently to carry sufficient volume of water to relieve the banks of Nicomen Island. . . . .

That letter was written in March, 1927. I desire to point out to the committee the importance of this matter, because on Nicomen island the provincial government has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars. They have constructed a new piece of dyke some 100 yards back of the present dyke, and are also constructing a new and permanent highway. Back of these dykes we have not only the highway but also the line of the Canadian Pacific railway.

I hold in my hand a letter sent to the Minister of Public Works by the provincial Minister of Works of British Columbia, in which he states:

I understand that a grant of some $40,000 has been passed for the work in question and that your engineer has been instructed to carry out a certain amount of protection work on the banks of Nicomen Island.

It has, however, been pointed out to me, not only by our engineers, but by residents on the island, that the channel on the Fraser which was dredged some years ago should be completed. I understand that there is a difference of opinion on this that your engineering department may not consider the work necessary as far as the channel is concerned. However, I will not dispute this but would point out that when the channel was excavated, known as the King Edward cut, a certain amount of material was left in the river which had the effect of diverting the water towards Nicomen Island, and gradually each year the banks have eroded to an alarming extent.

I would, therefore, ask you to seriously reconsider this matter and if, on your engineer's advice, you cannot do any work on the channel, that a larger appropriation be made to protect the banks of Nicomen Island, for our engineers feel that the appropriation which you have made will hardly do the necessary work.

If you will consult the correspondence on the subject you will notice that this department was assured by your government that if we would carry out certain dyking works your government would carry out the necessary river bank protection. Such an arrangement was carried out by your government but not to the fullest extent, for as results have proven our dyking works were taken out by the flood, and further protection in the same place has had to be extended.

I just wish to urge upon the minister and upon the department the importance of removing the cause of this trouble at Nicomen island. As the minister said, it is impossible to put up anything in the nature of a permanent protection of such a bank, so I would urge the government to consider removing the cause of this trouble at a very early date. In addition to the $40,000 which is provided for this work another $50,000 will be required, and it will be money well spent to open up and complete this cut, which I believe is from 1,200 to 1,500 feet in length.

Item agreed to.

Powell river—breakwater, to complete—The Powell River Co., Ltd., having already contributed their share of cost of work, as agreed upon, $3,400.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If my information is correct, this is what is known as a company town, and I would like to know the policy of the government as to making available for public use wharves on which public money is expended. There was a similar case last year in connection with Anticosti island; a large vote was put in to cover dredging at a point where the public were not even allowed to land. Will the public be permitted to use this wharf?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a public wharf.

Item agreed to.

Victoria—improvements to Ogden Point piers, $46,000.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Is this money to be spent on the approach or on the pier?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This vote is to be used for:

(1) Building of concrete parapet walls approximately six feet high across the ends of both piers to prevent seas washing over same into freight shed;

(2) Construction of four large creosoted pile dolphins near the corners of the two piers as protection to ships manoeuvering into berths;

(3) The provision of floating fender logs moored to existing bollards by heavy chain, along four faces of piers.

The estimated cost is:

(1) Parapet walls, $11,000.
(2) 4 creosoted pile dolphins, $26,000.
(3) floating fender logs, $9,000.

Item agreed to.

William Head—quarantine station—repairs to wharves, $6,100.

Mr. FRASER: Would the minister give us some information as to the meaning of the last item "appropriations not required for 1929-30, $326,739.74"? It appears in every vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the total of items which were either completed or the money not spent. I could give the hon. member some details if he desires.

Mr. FRASER: I am not interested in the details. Were the items completed or not spent?

Mr. STEVENS: It is just an accounting term.

Mr. FRASER: Did I understand the minister to say that they were items completed or not spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Works which were either completed or money not spent.

Mr. FRASER: I am more mystified than ever. How could the work be completed and the money which was voted for it not be spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In certain cases the money was not spent; it is purely a matter of accounting.

Mr. STEVENS: It is absolutely meaningless.

Mr. FRASER: Last year under harbours and rivers there was a total appropriation for British Columbia of $774,739.74, and out of that amount $326,739.74 was not spent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will give the hon. member some examples which will perhaps assist him. Arrowhead, improvements, $1,100 appropriation; amount expended $1,197.77. That is completed. Boswell, wharf repairs, $3,500. The expenditure was $2,096.28. This item was not completed and it is so marked. Brighton Beach, repairs to float, $1,100. This work was completed with an expenditure of $1,025.87, and there is no need of a revote. Brownsville, wharf reconstruction and extension. The appropriation was $4,000 and the amount expended was $3,547.41. Work completed.

Mr. MANION: The differences are all added together and make this figure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it is not the differences; these total amounts are added and they are called "appropriations not required" under our bookkeeping arrangement.

Mr. STEVENS: They are disposed of.

Mr. FRASER: Do I understand the minister to say that out of the vote of $774,739.74 the amount of $326,739.74 was not spent?

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh no, a great deal of it was spent. There are a number of cases where only a part of the vote was spent, but in many cases it was all spent.

Mr. FRASER: What about the $326,739,74; was any part of that spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The greater part of it was spent.

Mr. FRASER: I would like to know what part of it.

Mr. STEVENS: These words have been appearing in the estimates for years. I do not think anybody has yet properly explained them, and I do not think anybody ever will. It is simply a bookkeeping item inserted by the accountants of the department for their own guidance. On one occasion we spent a whole day trying to find out what it was and we knew no more about it when we had finished than we did before.

Mr. FRASER: If we cannot get any more information than we have now, I think we might as well let the matter drop.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am willing.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—dredging—maritime provinces, $650,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Will the minister give us some particulars of what dredging is to be done in the maritime provinces?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Part of this has not been allocated yet. A certain portion of it has. The engineers at the time these estimates were prepared gave us certain information. So far as our own dredges are concerned, the statement is as follows:

Plant to Operate	Total
Dredge No. 1 (Fielding) and plant, tug Helena	$95,300
Dredge No. 2 (St. Lawrence) and plant, tug Fredericton	60,900
Dredge No. 5 (Northumberland)	59,200
Dredge No. 9 and plant, tug Rona	55,200
Dredge No. 11	34,200
Dredge No. 12	42,000
Dredge No. 13, and plant, tug Canso	61,800
Dredge No. 15	6,700
Dredge No. 16	6,800
Dredge No. 115 and plant, tug Lisgar	83,900
Maintenance of plant not to operate	24,100
Dredge No. 4 and tug Sogenada—Operation and maintenance provided for in Ontario and Quebec vote.

Dredge No. 1, Fielding, and tug Helena are recommended to be used at Miramichi bay, Bathurst and Loggieville; dredge No. 2, St. Lawrence, and tug Fredericton at Eastern harbour (Cheticamp), Inverness county; dredge No. 4 and tug Sogenada is to operate in the maritime provinces provided she has completed work in the Magdalen islands.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): The minister has not the places where they are all to work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not settled yet.

Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, $600,000.

Mr. ROSS (KINGSTON): I suppose the same answer may be given in regard to this item. I should be glad if the minister would give us some details as to where these dredges worked last year and what part of the expenditure was in Ontario.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The details are as follows:

Estimated cost of operating and maintaining departmental dredging plant during 1929-30

Plant to Operate	Operation	Maintenance	Total
Dredge No. 4, tug Sogenada and plant	$43,200	$19,700	$62,900
Dredge No. 110, International, tug Witherbee and plant	45,100	15,700	60,800
Dredge No. 116, Progress, tug Storm King and plant	44,700	11,600	56,300
Dredge No. 117, Quebec, tug Hercules and plant	49,190	13,600	62,790
Dredge No. 121, St. Louis, tug Cliffside and plant	19,700	9,300	29,000
Dredge No. 123, tug Monitor and plant	33,200	14,800	48,000
Dredge No. 126	9,400	3,200	12,600
Dredge No. 127	6,500	2,050	8,550
Dredge Q and R No. 1, tug Peel and plant	40,600	9,550	50,150
Dredge Harricana and launch Gwen	16,760	2,510	19,270
Total			$410,360
Maintenance of plant not to operate			7,090
Total			$417,450

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is all right, but what work was done by these tugs last year in Ontario and at what places?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These are the details:

Place	Cost
Amherst, Quebec Magdalen Island	$37,633 78
Barachois, Quebec	5,889 53
Beauharnois, Quebec	14,072 10
Chatham, Ontario	40,278 07
Colonie des Greves, Quebec	3,124 67
Quebec, Magdalen Islands	4,073 07
House Harbour	1,702 64
Ile Sainte	787 70
Kingsville, Ontario	5,685 06
Lachine, Quebec	34,282 74
Lake Demon-Tigny, Quebec	12,251 96
Lobster Cove, Quebec	1,642 96
Matane, Quebec	41,257 81
Magdalen Islands	8,667 35
Pointe-au-Pic, Quebec	2,236 99
Port Burwell, Ontario	58,979 57
Red Cape, Quebec	434 42
Rimouski, Quebec	1,178 79
River du Loup, Quebec	215 10
Rondeau, Ontario	9,171 17
Saguenay river, Quebec	71,712 89
Siscoe island, Quebec	5,195 39
Sorel, Quebec	1,241 00
Ste. Catherine's Bay, Quebec	2,323 03
St. Jean, Isle of Orleans, Quebec	3,410 09
St. Laurent, Isle of Orleans (Slipway)	2,778 59
St. Laurent, Isle of Orleans (Government wharf)	4,883 58
St. Laurent, Isle of Orleans (Chantiers)	2,147 09
St. Sulpice, Quebec	20,086 36
Vercheres, Quebec	1,132 32
Dredge No. 109, Goderich, Ontario	2,068 32
Haileybury-Ship Yard Maintenance	196 35
Pattern warehouse, Ottawa, Ontario	1,909 30

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Are these works in the public harbours, and are they all purely government works?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, all purely government works.

Item agreed to.

Cape Breton telegraph and telephone lines—general repairs and improvements, $8,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Where is this telegraph line?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are letting vote No. 142 stand, and I can give my hon. friend the information he desires on that item.

Item agreed to.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 4, to amend and consolidate the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act—Hon. Mr. King—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This bill being of a technical character, it was decided when it was before the house on a previous occasion to refer it to a special committee. This committee held a number of sittings at which the bill was carefully considered section by section, and in addition, those who are engaged in the legitimate traffic in drugs appeared before the committee and made representations—I refer to representatives of the retail and wholesale druggists. These representatives were also permitted to be in contact and consultation with officers of the department and with the officers of the Justice department who drew the amendments as recommended by the committee. The bill as now presented I think meets the objects and desires of the departmental officers, and I think also clarifies any misunderstanding or doubts that might have existed in the minds of members of the committee or of those engaged in the legitimate traffic. I have an amendment to move to section 6 when we come to it, something that has come up since the committee adjourned. I will explain it when we reach the section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Importing or exporting drug without license.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are we not going to take up this section clause by clause?

The CHAIRMAN: If it is the desire of the committee, we can take up the subsections separately, but I called section 4.

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member for East Calgary was a member of the special committee, and I think we were agreed on every clause as it went through.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The first subsection deals with the penalties, and there are two features in connection with the penalties to which I objected in the committee and to which I still object. Section 1 provides that upon indictment an offender may be sentenced to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years, and in addition, at the discretion of the judge, he may be whipped. I object, first of all, to the practice of whipping. It is a relic of the dark ages when the rack and the thumbscrew were used to torture offenders. Secondly, this subsection does not fix any maximum penalty. In the case of penalties for any other offence, whether fine or imprisonment, there is a maximum penalty; it must not exceed such-and-such, but in this case there is no maximum penalty; it is left open to the judge to sentence a man to one or two or a hundred lashes as he sees fit. I think that is entirely wrong, even if you leave it to the discretion of the judge to order whipping, which, as I say, I look upon as a relic of the dark ages. Again, a man may be subjected to the penalty of whipping after a first offence. If you are going to whip at all, which I strongly object to, I do not think it should be inflicted as a penalty for the first offence. Give a man a second chance. I suggested in the special committee that that clause ought to be amended. I do not know how the committee of the whole house feels, but I would move, Mr. Chairman, to amend that subsection so that it will not be left to the discretion of the judge to order whipping.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman will have to submit his amendment in writing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I know that my hon. friend from East Calgary took exception in the committee to the penalty of whipping, but the matter was very thoroughly discussed and it was ascertained that whipping is not a new section in this bill, or a new principle applied to this offence. Whipping already was applied at the discretion of the judge where the trafficker gave or sold drugs to a minor. We have extended that principle in order to provide a greater deterrent to those who are engaged in trafficking. From the information I have received from all parts of the Dominion since the bill was in committee, I am satisfied that those who are interested in the curtailment and suppression of this traffic are entirely in sympathy with the provision that whipping be left to the discretion of the judge.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has the hon. gentleman any criticism of its being unlimited whipping?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is always limited by the judge.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was the old section in that form? It seems extraordinary. Under this section might not a convicted person be sentenced to be whipped once a week during his imprisonment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the criminal code it is the same—the judge exercises his discretion.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister except whipping for the first offence?

Mr. KING (Koootenay): No.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The reason given in the committee for imposing the penalty of whipping for the first offence was extraordinary.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the discretion can very well be left to the judge. I am satisfied that for the first offence the judge would not impose the penalty of whipping.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Did any other members of the committee object to the section?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I took exception; so did the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon).

Mr. LAPOINTE: And the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Guerin).

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Unlawful for physician, etc., to prescribe a drug except for medicinal purposes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have an amendment to move to section 6.

Mr. MANION: That is the section on which we had so much discussion when the bill was before the house on another occasion?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. I beg to propose the following amendment as subsection 2 to section 6:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the criminal code, or of any other statute or law, the court shall have no power to impose less than the minimum penalties herein prescribed.

Until recently we have had very little trouble under this section, as we were fortified by a judgment of the appeal court of Ontario that upon trial by indictment and conviction the minimum sentence was three months' imprisonment, and that the judge had no discretion but to impose this sentence. However, in the last week or two, since the bill was reported by the special committee, the appeal court of another province has decided differently, and ruled that under section 1,035 of the criminal code it is within the competence of the magistrate or judge to impose a fine and refrain from imposing imprisonment. Our officer makes this note:

> Proceedings by indictment are not taken against a professional man except under the most serious circumstances. As we are thus faced with two conflicting judgments, and as the intent of parliament is obviously that in such serious cases a minimum of three months' imprisonment should be awarded, the matter was discussed with the Department of Justice, who agreed that it would be advisable to place the matter beyond any doubt, and this can best be effected by adding a new subsection.

This is the subsection that I have just moved by way of amendment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think as the other members of the committee that considered this bill are not present, and this is a decided change in the section, it had better stand.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Then we will go on with the other sections.

Section stands.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister taken into consideration such a case as I brought to his attention on a former occasion? A practising physician administered a narcotic drug—I do not know under what circumstances—and a charge was made against him. If some person had not taken up his case that physician might have been whipped.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In such a case the judge would use his discretion. If the accused was found to be a regular trafficker, committing a crime worse than murder, and the judge decided that whipping was proper punishment, I do not think anyone would object. But ordinarily professional men are not proceeded against on indictment unless they are found to be really engaged in the drug traffic. The case referred to would not come under this section.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The evidence of the special officer engaged in the case would have been sufficient to render the accused liable to such a punishment, would it not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Why not? I ask for information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The judge, exercising his discretion, would see that this did not happen. Some of these matters must be left to the judge; we cannot possibly prescribe for every case.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think the officers employed in the enforcement of this law should be specially qualified. In the case I have referred to they should not have entered such a charge against the doctor. If they are to have full control of these cases as in the past we may have some very unfortunate results.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have special officers in the department known as enforcement officers under the narcotic acts. Their agents throughout the country are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the municipal and provincial police.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am quite sure that if they had consulted the municipal or provincial officers they would never have laid such a charge.

Mr. SPENCER: Are the provincial police throughout the Dominion cooperating fully with the mounted police in enforcing this act?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, we have had the hearty cooperation of the provincial and municipal police with the mounted police and our own officers in the enforcement of this act.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

PILKINGTON-NIAGARA JUNCTION

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 167, an Act to amend an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Pilkington and Niagara Junction, in the province of Ontario. (Withdrawal recommended by the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines).—The Minister of Railways and Canals.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, that Bill No. 167 be withdrawn and this order discharged.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent, of course.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDER 37

RULING OF MR. SPEAKER ON POINT OF ORDER

Mr. SPEAKER: I promised on Wednesday to give a ruling on the question then raised with respect to standing order 37. I may be allowed to read my ruling to-night:

On Wednesday, the 8th of May, Mr. Robb, on the orders of the day being called, moved:

That Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

Thereupon Mr. Woodsworth rose from his seat and said:

Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring before the house a matter that affects a considerable section of this country.

He then recited his grievances having reference to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly.

Having spoken forty minutes, I told him his time was up. The hon. member claimed that he was entitled under standing order 37 to speak beyond forty minutes. He was supported in this connection by other hon. members.

I have been requested to consider more deeply the objection raised. Accordingly, I have gone very carefully into the study of standing order 37, adopted by this house two years ago. If one reads carefully the new rule, it will be found that in order to limit the length of speeches which were unduly protracted, parliament came to the conclusion that a forty-minute rule should henceforward apply to the debates in the house.

Exceptions were, however, made to that rule and they are set forth in standing order 37, which reads as follows:

Standing order 37. Speeches limited to forty minutes, 22nd March, 1927.

No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

271a. The following resolution was adopted by the house on April 19, 1886:

"That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons, of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official report of the debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proveedings of parliament."

It is argued that the hon. member, by addressing the house as he did on Wednesday, came under the exception "or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister."

My ruling hinges on the interpretation to be given to the words, "speaking in reply." Was the hon. gentleman speaking "in reply" to the motion, "that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means"?

He was, as a matter of fact, airing grievances which had no relevancy whatsoever with the subject matter, namely: resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act by the Minister of Finance in the committee of ways and means.

It is a fundamental principle of parliamentary government that the redress of grievances is to be considered before the granting of supplies (vide Bourinot, p. 419). This principle applies with equal force when the motion is made for the Speaker to leave the chair to go into ways and means. Members may address the house on any subject of public importance or move amendments under the same rules as governed on going into committee of supply (vide Bourinot, p. 423).

Therefore the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had unquestionably the right to speak as he did, on the motion made by the Minister of Finance—but could he speak more than forty minutes? Did he come under the exception provided for under standing order 37? In other words, was he speaking in reply immediately after the minister?

I have since given the most serious consideration to the interpretation of this standing order and as I said the whole question hinges on the meaning of the words "in reply" as they appear therein. What is a reply? According to the King's English dictionary, it is:

> That which is said or written in answer to what is said or written by another; rejoinder; response.

Therefore, Mr. Woodsworth, in order to speak longer than forty minutes, was bound to argue against Mr. Robb's motion.

His speech, in this as in any other instance, had to be relevant to the issue. Was it relevant?

He actually objected to the Speaker leaving the chair until a certain grievance be aired before the house. He gave a reason for his objection, namely, that unless the house heard what he wished to ask the government on the question of freedom of speech, the ways and means for collecting revenue could not be considered.

As I have said, under an ancient constitutional doctrine, the redress of grievances is considered before the granting of supplies or the consideration of ways and means; and members may then discuss various questions without moving any amendment. As Bourinot says, 4th edition, page 421, a great latitude is allowed on such occasions.

I have come to the conclusion that the expression of any reasonable grievance on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair is a sufficient reply to bring a member's speech under the provision of standing order 37. I cannot conceive a case where he could then be irrelevant. It is not necessary that his observations should deal with the subject matter of the resolutions to be considered in committee. The member objects to anything being considered at all until he has had a hearing. Of course, if an amendment or a second reading of a bill, were moved, discussion should be properly confined to its subject matter. But there was no amendment in Mr. Woodsworth's case.

Standing Order 37 being a restrictive regulation, as such it must be given the broadest construction possible. In cases of uncertainty the benefit of the doubt must be given to freedom of speech in parliament.

I have considered the arguments from every angle and I have reached the conclusion that it is advisable to abide by the letter of this standing order. The ruling is that Mr. Woodsworth had the right to speak for more than forty minutes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 13, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved:

> That the recommendations contained in the eighth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, presented on May 10, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE RIVER DISTRICT

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING SURVEY OF RESOURCES AND PURCHASE OF RAILWAY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to table a return moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), for all correspondence with reference to the survey which will be undertaken jointly by the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the British Columbia government into the resources of that country. I desire also to table a further reference moved by the hon. member for Peace River, for all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Alberta government in reference to the joint purchase of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway.

In connection with both these returns I should say that delay was occasioned by reason of the need of securing the permission of the presidents of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways for the inclusion of certain personal correspondence. That permission has been granted, but I desire to say that this does not constitute in any way an acknowledgment of the principle that personal correspondence of that character can be brought down as a matter of right. In this case, however, both presidents were willing to have that correspondence included because of the nature of the correspondence and the information it conveys.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS—SALES AND TRANSFERS

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine):

1. At what price were the Canadian Gunner, Canadian Harvester, and Canadian Settler sold, in 1926?

2. To whom were they sold, and have they been paid for in full?

3. At what price were each of the seven steamers, Canadian Aviator, Canadian Gunner, Canadian Harvester, Canadian Otter, Canadian Runner, and Canadian Sapper transferred from the merchant marine fleet to the Canadian National steamships?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Canadian Gunner, $50,000; Canadian Harvester, $50,000; Canadian Settler, £17,750, less 2½ per cent commission.

2. Canadian Gunner, Canada Atlantic Transit Company, Toronto (a subsidiary of Canadian National Railways); Canadian Harvester, Canada Atlantic Transit Company, Toronto, (a subsidiary of Canadian National Railways); Canadian Settler, to the Arbour Shipping Company, London, England. The purchase price for the Canadian Settler has been paid in full; $30,000 has been paid to date on each of the other vessels—Canadian Gunner and Canadian Harvester.

3. Transfer price not yet established.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH—SOLDIERS' ADVISERS

Mr. ESLING:

1. What are the names of the soldiers' advisers under the Department of Pensions and National Health?

2. What is the salary of each adviser?

3. What advisers are on full time and part time respectively, and what was the profession or vocation of each adviser before his appointment?

4. What travelling expenses were allowed each adviser for the past fiscal year, and what office expenses were allowed each adviser for the same period?

REFUNDS TO COAL IMPORTERS

Mr. CANTLEY:

1. Of the total amount of $1,060,096.16 reported on page 2121 of Hansard of April 29, as refunded to importers of coal during the year 1928, what was the amount refunded on coal used in the production or manufacture of iron and/or steel in each of the several provinces of Canada?

2. What was the amount so refunded on account of coal imported and used in connection with metallurgical processes other than the production of iron or steel in each of the provinces of Canada?

3. What was the amount so refunded on account of coal imported and used in connection with the production or refining of salt in each of the several provinces of Canada?

Mr. EULER:

1. $662,986.28.

2. For metallurgical processes other than iron or steel, nil; for production of coke, $383,072.96.

3. $14,036.92.

Note: To give fuller details would disclose the business of individual concerns which is contrary to the practice of the Department of National Revenue.

PICTOU COUNTY PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. CANTLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and recommendations received at the office of the district engineer of the Department of Public Works, Halifax, relating to, or in any way connected with any work done in the county of Pictou by the Department of Public Works.

2. A return showing all appointments and/or dismissals made by or under authority of the said district engineer, with the causes assigned therefor, if any.

He said: This motion is incomplete; it should designate the years 1927, 1928 and 1929.

Motion stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 22, to incorporate Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company—Mr. Pettit—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 6—Directors.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is very much interested in this bill. He is away at present but I know he will return in ample time to enable this bill to be dealt with, and I suggest, in fairness to him, that some of these clauses be allowed to stand so that he may be enabled to express his views.

The CHAIRMAN: That is for the committee to decide.

Mr. PETTIT: I think I have acted perfectly fairly in this matter; this bill has been before the house and has been adjourned six times.

Mr. BENNETT: I received a telegram in connection with this matter from the Premier of Ontario, and I understand that a similar telegram was sent to the Prime Minister by the Premier of Ontario. As I understand the matter, the state of New York is opposed to this bridge, and the province of Ontario through its parks commission, is applying for the incorporation of a company of its own to deal with a bridge in that locality. This bill gives incorporation to the company and parliament has to deal with it because it happens to be an international waterway which is to be crossed. I understood that the hon. member for Lincoln, who is on the parks board, has certain observations to make to this house with respect to this bill, but due to a bereavement in his family he is absent at a time when he expected to be here. I have not discussed this matter with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Pettit) and I have had no communication with the hon. member for Lincoln, but in view of the fact that the state of New York and the province of Ontario, the two communities affected, are both opposed to this legislation, it would seem to me that an opportunity should be afforded to the representative who happens to be on the parks board, and who is looked to to present their views to this house, to put his case before the committee. It will be a matter of more than passing curiosity why this parliament gives incorporation to a company which is not desired by either the state of New York or the province of Ontario.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): As the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said, a telegram was sent to the Prime Minister of Canada by the Premier of Ontario. This telegram was placed in the hands of the chairman of the railway committee, and he handed it to me, as I was then acting as chairman. The telegram was read before the committee when the hon. member for Lincoln was present, and it was fully discussed. Several amendments were introduced which I understood very largely met the objections raised by the hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: Am I right in believing that an advertisement is pending for a bill on behalf of the parks commission itself to construct a bridge across this waterway?

I think hon. gentlemen will find that such is the case; that the province of Ontario is now advertising in the Gazette and in the newspapers asking for a bill such as this. I am only giving my recollection of what was said by one of the gentlemen from that department.

Mr. SPENCER: I have seen the advertisements.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is rather late for a private bill.

Mr. BENNETT: They were trying to get it through this session.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The CHAIRMAN: It is for the committee to decide whether or not we shall proceed with the bill. We are now on section 6. Shall section 6 carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 7, 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Tolls.

Mr. DUNNING: Was this section amended in committee?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, in line 17 the words "governor in council" have been struck out and the words "Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada" have been substituted therefor.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 12 and 13 have been stricken out.

Sections 14 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported on division.

FLORENCE MAY FORBES

The house in committee on Bill No. 122 for the relief of Florence May Forbes.—Mr. Bell (Hamilton)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the sponsor of the bill inform the committee whether there are any children in this case?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): If my hon. friend will refer to the former proceedings, he will see that it was explained that the respondent had become a fugitive from justice two or three years before this unfortunate woman petitioned; that one of the children remained with her, and that two others were being cared for by relatives in England.

Mr. BOURASSA: It has been frequently said that parliament does not encourage divorce by collusion. This is supposed to be the rule. In the senate committee there is put to every petitioner for divorce a formal, what I might call a stereotyped, question to which the invariable answer "no" is given. Of course, if one reads the evidence in most of the bills, it is quite apparent that although there is not actual and absolute collusion, the party against whom the divorce is asked has generally placed himself or herself in such a position that the evidence will enable the committee of the senate to declare that adultery has been proven. That is quite clear from the evidence in most of the bills, but in this case there is worse in the evidence itself. At page 10 of the minutes of evidence I find that this question was put to the petitioner regarding a conversation she had with her husband some time previously:

Q. Did he tell you anything else?
A. Yes, he said that I was far too good for him and I had better go home and take the children home to my mother. He said that he had done everything that he should not have done and he said there was no way out of it but for me to divorce him. But I could not, because I did not have the money, and our third baby was about to be born.

Here, therefore, we have clear evidence that prior to these divorce proceedings there was a meeting between the husband and the wife; that the husband advised the wife to ask for a divorce, making her a confession of the facts upon which the petition is brought to parliament. Then the wife adds that she did not take immediate proceedings because she did not have enough money.

The procedure adopted in this case is nothing out of the ordinary. Since we have been told that if these divorce bills pass it is because we, as members of parliament, neglect the duty of looking into them, I have made up my mind to look into some of them, so far as I can do so without disregarding my other duties as a member of this house, and conquering as best I can my instinctive feeling of revulsion and disgust at reading the evidence. What is testified to, quite honestly I believe, by the petitioner in this case takes place in many other cases that come before the senate committee. That is quite clear from the evidence itself. I think it is no exaggeration to say that nearly all these divorce cases are decided ex parte by the senate committee upon the evidence of the petitioner, whether husband or wife, and upon the evidence given by a police agent who is hired by the petitioner to make the case, such agent testifying to facts which are not corroborated by any other witness. It is also quite clear in many cases that the party against whom the petition is filed and against whom a divorce is pronounced, has lent himself or herself, whether husband or wife, quite openly to the research made by the police agent. I claim that this is divorce by collusion. Collusion may be proved at times, but not often, and that is true not only of divorce but of all other cases. It is very seldom that people who enter into collusion to evade a law will do it in such a manner that the evidence of collusion is easy to establish before a court of law. Collusion is generally the result of some action or inaction on the part of the individuals who enter into it.

This case I take as an example because it differs from many other cases in this, that the petitioner gives very candid and apparently honest testimony as to collusion. Evidently she had not been warned by her legal adviser that she ought not to bring before the senate committee any fact that would tend to prove collusion, which is so clearly shown in many other divorce cases. In this case you have the petitioner, under oath, and appearing on her own behalf, giving evidence of collusion before the senate committee. She swears that she was advised by her husband to ask for a divorce, and that her husband confessed to her the facts which enabled her to establish the grounds for divorce. I ask any fair-minded man if that is not prima facie evidence of collusion? I leave it to the house to decide whether or not we are justified in ratifying this decision of the senate committee after a fact like this is made clear in the evidence itself. This is not a case of presumption; it is not a case of the obiter dictum of anybody; it is not a construction being put on circumstantial evidence by anybody here or elsewhere; it is the very testimony of the petitioner herself, giving evidence under oath. I leave it to the house to decide whether or not this parliament, being the highest court of the land, as we are told time and again, should do what no other court and no other judge with a sense of judicial responsibility would do.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, I do not know how the hon. member for Labelle or any other member could have succeeded so admirably in proving to this house that I and other hon. members have been right in advocating repeatedly that there ought to be a divorce court to deal with the question of divorce in this country, because we know perfectly well that it is not competent to members of parliament as a whole, and certainly of all members it is not competent to my hon. friend from Labelle, to say what amounts in law to collusion. If there ever was necessity for a demonstration of that, the hon. member has just given it. Here we have the case of a woman who is ruthlessly deserted by a man who has become a defaulter and has left her flat to carry on with her three little children. That man without any sugguestion or assistance from her writes to her and rather brutally says, "I have broken my marriage vows. I have left you flat. You can go out and get a divorce if you feel like it," and my hon. friend from Labelle says that that amounts to collusion.

Mr. BOURASSA: It was not a letter; it was a conversation which took place between the two parties, and which is related by the wife.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Then so much the worse.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): So much the worse for the man. If my hon. friend had chosen to read but one detached portion of the evidence he would have seen how on page 11 this woman pledges herself to the fact that there was no collusion between her and her husband to make this application for divorce. She takes that oath after all the circumstances were laid before the divorce committee, and after the divorce committee had been apprised of the fact that without any suggestion from her this man had walked out and left her flat to care for herself and her three little children. I would be very glad, if it were possible to do so, to leave this case to the judgment of my hon. friend from Lisgar, who checks up on these applications, or to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, who has interested himself in many of these applications, to say whether this chamber should not unhesitatingly endorse this application, because I am sure that of all the applications that have come before the house this session there is none more meritorious than this.

MARY MELVINA GUERIN

The house in committee on Bill No. 95, for the relief of Mary Melvina Guerin—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Chairman, on this bill I wish to direct the attention of the committee to two facts. First, the parties are Roman Catholics. They were married according to the rites of the church and to the laws of the country before a Roman Catholic priest. Some years ago a similar case came before the house. Thereupon most of the representatives from the province of Quebec pointed out that such a marriage could not be dissolved under the laws of their church and of their province. They opposed that bill both on moral grounds and on legal grounds. The same arguments that were then advanced by several members, including, I believe, the present Speaker of the house—I am not sure as to that—apply in this case. There are four children born of this marriage. Those children are Roman Catholics. If we grant this divorce we place those children with regard to their church, their social ties, and so forth, in the most awkward and obnoxious position. We do them an injury of which they cannot at present—they are all under age—measure the consequences.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member pardon my interjecting? In the case of annulment, as granted occasionally in the province of Quebec, are not the children placed in a very awkward position, because they are then rendered illegitimate?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am glad my hon. friend has brought up the point, because it is one of the errors most generally propounded over the country. It has been repeated time and again in many, many newspaper articles and in speeches inside and outside this house. Both under the age-old law of the Roman Catholic church and under the written law of the province of Quebec, articles 163 and 164 of the civil code, every time a marriage is declared to be null—the Minister of Justice will correct me if I am wrong—if the so-called marriage was entered into in good faith by the two parties, even if one only was in good faith, the children are held to be legitimate. I am sure this will be confirmed by my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), who is neither Catholic nor Protestant, but who knows the law.

Mr. JACOBS: I agree with the hon. gentleman, and as he notes, I can properly act as arbitrator for both denominations.

Mr. BOURASSA: They are held to be legitimate, not only morally and socially, but legally as well. In other words, although the marriage is annulled, or rather—because in these matters one has to be precise—although the marriage is declared to be non-existent, the children are held, for all intents and purposes whatsoever, to be legitimate. They inherit from their father or their mother just as legitimate children do. I know of no single instance in Lower Canada previous to confederation or in the province of Quebec since confederation where the slightest stigma has ever been attached to children born of such marriages, or rather of such unions declared by the tribunals or the church to be non-existent. I hope that will satisfy my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre so far as the state of law, and the state of mind also, in the province of Quebec are concerned.

But on all those matters I must repeat and go on repeating what I have said on previous occasions—it is a difference of education, it is a difference of temperament, if you like. In those matters we Catholics look primarily to the social aspect. I am not saying that we are right or wrong. I am stating a fact. We look primarily to the social aspect. We claim, as they did, not only in old France, but in England as well, up to the middle of the last century, that matrimonial laws are primarily enacted for the sake of society, and that such individual cases, sad as they may be, which may come in conflict with the general law, should not predominate in the minds of the legislature or of the tribunals over the social principle.

Now, if you take that state of mind, if you take that principle of legislation into consideration, you will readily understand how on the one hand we endeavour to maintain the laws of matrimony intact from the social point of view, while at the same time we endeavour to make it as clear as we can in law, in practice, in effect, that no stigma, no degradation should attach to those individuals who happen to have broken the laws and therefore have put themselves into a position resulting in the situation which my friend has described, when in good faith they thought they had complied with the law.

So I repeat, without attempting to bring any religious issue into the debates of this house, that we should hesitate before we pass any legislation, private or public, which will put the subjects of such legislation in a position entirely antagonistic to the social surroundings and to the social laws under which they had been born and brought up. Of course, I realize that this parliament cannot legislate from the point of view of any individual church in this country. My friend from Cartier may regret that we have not Jewish legislation here. My friends of the Anglican church may feel similarly. I may feel the same as a Catholic. But we have to take the conditions in the country as we find them. As far back as 1851 it was declared in the legislature of United Canada, I will not say with unanimity, but under the influence of a French majority, that the conditions of Canada being as they are, all religions, all churches and creeds must stand on a footing of equality before the law. That may be objectionable from a purely philosophical or religious point of view, but it is true and unavoidable from the point of view of fact. But while I take it as an admitted principle of our polity that no legislation should be passed under the dictation of any church, as detrimental to any other church, I claim that we should avoid, either in private or in public legislation, hurting the feelings or impairing the social position of any church in this country, when the decision we make affects only the members of that church. That is a principle which was recognized by parliament in the past.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In this particular case one of the parties comes seeking a divorce. That action, I presume, would not be countenanced by the church.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But can we refuse to receive this petition even though the person seeking the divorce may be a member of the Roman Catholic church?

Mr. BOURASSA: Here again my hon. friend will realize the difficulty—but it is a difficulty which we must face—the difficulty of harmonizing the individualistic point of view, which I respect, of those people born and brought up in what I might call the tendencies of Protestantism, with the point of view of those born and brought up in the faith of Roman Catholicism. My hon. friend is impressed—and I appreciate his point of view—with the individual position of the woman asking for this bill. I have endeavoured however to direct the attention of the house to the social aspect of the case as it relates to the position of the four children concerned in this legislation, who have no word to say in law or otherwise, nor anyone to represent to this house what their situation will be after the marriage is dissolved. In the assumption that these four children will remain members of the Roman Catholic church when they come of age and when they enter into social relations with people of their creed, I submit that they will be placed in a most awkward position. Moreover, if either the woman or the man, heretofore the wife or the husband, should choose to marry again, against the rules of their church, taking advantage of this piece of legislation, once more you will place this Catholic family in a most awkward position. And you do it, I repeat, when there is no one entitled, legally or morally, to state the views of the four children. I have said on a previous occasion, and I repeat it now, that all through this broad question of marriage and divorce, I am more concerned with the fate of the children than with the fate of either the man or the woman. They are supposed to know what they have done and what they are doing; they are supposed to stand the consequences of their action. This woman is supposed to have known what she was doing when she asked for the divorce, and the husband is supposed to have known all the circumstances; he was free to come before parliament and oppose the petition of his wife. I am not in this instance discussing the principle of divorce itself; I am bringing forward once more the rights of the children. In this as in all other cases of this nature, who are the protectors of the children? By what right can this parliament or any body of men or any tribunal declare that four children, incapable of expressing their will, incapable of acting legally, shall be put in a position which will hamper them in the future if they desire to go on living socially with people of their creed? I am prepared to take the same position with regard to divorces granted to people of the Anglican faith, though of course I admit it may be perhaps a little indiscreet on my part to stand up in support of the position taken by the bishops of that church, when no representative of that church in this house does so. One does not like to be over zealous. But I am simply stating this fact to show that I am not taking this position merely from the Roman Catholic point of view; I am arguing from this standpoint: that when we deal with people belonging to one single individual church we have no right to pass legislation repugnant to the principles of that church. I take that stand, just as I would take the position that if any member of a particular church asked us to pass legislation or to refuse legislation in keeping with the principles of that church, but in a matter touching which the adherents of another faith were concerned, I should say that, given the principles and the practice of polity which must prevail in a mixed country like ours, we cannot afford either to grant or to refuse legislation from the sole point of view of one church when individuals belonging to another church are affected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A question was put to me only a few days ago by a correspondent in Montreal, a woman who thinks that she ought to obtain a divorce. She thinks the circumstances are such that were she a Roman Catholic living in the province of Quebec she could have her marriage declared null and void, but being a Protestant it is impossible for her to obtain relief along that line. Yet, living in Quebec, she finds it very, very difficult to obtain a divorce. Now, I put that problem to my hon. friend. Is there not a real difficulty for Protestant minorities living in Quebec?

Mr. BOURASSA: I cannot discuss the case because one would have to know the circumstances. The situation in the province of Quebec is this. Both under civil law—what it is good for at present, I do not know, nor does anyone know—both under civil law and under the canonical law of the Roman Catholic church, divorce is not admissible What is possible is a declaration of nullity, if according to the evidence, it is found that at the time of the marriage there was some impediment fatal in law, canonical or civil—because, I repeat, there is a discrepancy between the two—in that case the marriage is declared to be null. The marriage must have been celebrated by what is now called a substantial form of marriage, which is the law in every country with slight differences. It is the law of every province in Canada, of the United States, of every country, that there must be some essential form, rudimentary if you like, in the solemnization of marriage, and there must have been a form of consummation. If these conditions do not exist, then a declaration of nullity will be granted by a court of law in the province of Quebec.

The other procedure is separation. Both under canonical and civil law separation, or what is called in English, divorce a mensa et thoro, can be granted by the court, which has jurisdiction to declare under what conditions as to property the two parties will separate, to which of the two parties the children shall be confided, and what will be paid by one of the parties to the other for the maintenance of the children. That is all I can say to my hon. friend now on that point.

In the case now before us I want first to place before hon. members of this house, and especially those from the province of Quebec, the position with regard to the principle of this legislation. They may do as they like in the matter, but I desire to place the principle before them and to refer them to the debates which took place in this house in connection with a previous divorce case. I do not like to mention names, but my friend the Minister of Justice will remember the case. Two parties in the province of Quebec applied for a divorce some time shortly after the war, I was not then in the house; I am told it was about 1919.

However, apart from the question of principle there is a question of fact in this case. The husband and wife separated long before action was taken, which happens in nearly all these cases; the children lived with the father for some time and then returned to live with the mother. This divorce was recommended by the judicial committee of the senate on the sole evidence of one of the children, a girl of fifteen years of age, who at the request of her mother testified as to the adultery of her father. That was the sole testimony in this case, and I would ask the legal members of this house if any court of law would render judgment, even in a trivial case, upon the testimony of a child fifteen years of age, as against one of the parents?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; anyone looking at page 10 of the evidence will find that the statement just made by the hon. member is not quite correct. I refer to the following:

By Mr. Kelley:
Q. What did your husband tell you when you asked him about living with this woman?—A. He just told me that he was living with this woman for about two years.

There is not only the uncorroborated evidence of the child but also the admission of the husband.

Mr. BOURASSA: I said previously that the testimony of an interested party is not testimony at all, and I repeat that the only witness apart from the petitioner was the fifteen-year-old girl.

Mr. STINSON: There is the man's own admission.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, but the man did not appear and the woman simply said her husband admitted doing a certain thing.

Mr. STINSON: She is a competent witness.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not discussing this matter from the legal point of view; I am now addressing myself to the people who are not desiccated by law and have preserved some sense of humanity. Here is a poor woman who finds herself in the position of asking for a divorce; she thinks she is entitled to a divorce. That is her business, with which I am not concerned. She testifies against her husband, who does not appear. They never appear in these cases, apparently; most of them only appear when the police agent is sent to catch them under the proper or improper conditions which are required to make a case.

Mr. JACOBS: They also appear at the second wedding.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, both or either of them. The other witness is the girl, who says that she lived for months with her father. I shall not enter into a discussion of the details of this case; they are sufficiently repugnant, but the girl admitted that as long as she lived with her father she never spoke about the matter because he had forbidden her to do so. Then she went to live with her mother, and when the mother asks for a divorce the girl comes before the committee of the senate and gives her evidence. I remember having read in books of history that many times tribunals have refused to listen to such testimony; they have refused to put a child in the cruel position of having to testify against her father or her mother, but evidently this parliament is above such considerations. One of these days we may expect to have babies testify before the committee of the senate that they were born of adultery.

I am not a lawyer—like Sir Charles Tupper I was on the point of saying, "thank heaven!" —but I must say that the idea of deciding a case in law, whether civil or criminal, in such a manner revolts my feelings of humanity. Someone, I think, has interjected that this is a Roman way of thinking, but in my opinion it is a human way of thinking. Whether we are pagans or infidels or whether we belong to any sect imaginable, I cannot put it into my clumsy head to think that bringing a child born of lawful or unlawful union, to decide on the fate of either its father or mother, is the right kind of justice. I cannot put it in my clumsy head to think that a so-called representative body of a so-called civilized country should pass that sort of legislation.

To complete my idea, in a sense I regret that these two circumstances should be connected in this case; I would far rather have seen them separated. There is the principle to which I directed the attention of the committee in the beginning, the moral inability of this parliament to pass legislation contrary to the basic law of any religious community so long as only members of that community are concerned; secondly, the point of fact which I have just made. By mere accident they are connected together in this case and, therefore, I thought I would bring them to the attention of the committee. As regards the previous cases, and the cases which will follow, I leave it as it is for the time being. But on this bill, I hope we will get some pronouncement on the part of the representatives from the province of Quebec, because their silent attitude would stand in such contrast to the attitude taken upon the occasion to which I have referred, that it would give the people cause to doubt what has become of the sense of social duty of some of our representatives.

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat what I have already said. The people of Ontario and the people of Quebec have never accepted divorce. The question of divorce has never been submitted to the people, and I know if the province of Quebec were asked to express their view on any proposal accepting the principle of divorce it would be turned down by an overwhelming majority. And I know that in Ontario there is a very strong public opinion against divorce, which is evidenced, as mentioned by the hon. member for Labelle, by the pronouncement made by the Bishop of Ottawa and the Bishop of Kootenay at a meeting of the synod of the Anglican church of Canada. Divorce has been recognized as a misfortune; it has become a peril and a menace to our social existence. We must not follow in the footsteps of the United States where last year there was one divorce for every four marriages, or in the footsteps of the state of Nevada, where there there were two divorces for every marriage.

At the time of confederation divorce courts were in existence in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and had the fathers of confederation meant to impose divorce upon Quebec and Ontario they would have included a clause to that effect in the British North America Act; but that was not done. I have before me a volume which deals very succintly with the constitutional aspect of divorce. It is entitled, Parliamentary Divorce Practice in Canada, and the author is Frederick D. Hogg, of the Ottawa bar. I should like to read an extract or two from this volume, as follows:

Under the constitution of the Dominion of Canada the subject of divorce comes within the powers with respect to legislation, conceded to the parliament of Canada.

Section 91 of the British North America Act declares, that the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in this section and included among these specifically mentioned subjects is that of divorce.

This power to deal with divorce conferred upon the Dominion parliament by the constitution, is not exercised to its fullest extent and the Dominion has not enacted legislation with reference to divorce, applicable to Canada as a whole.

By section 129, of the B.N.A. Act,

"All laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at the union shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick respectively as if the union had not been made, subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or existing under the Act of Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland) to be repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the respective provinces according to the authority of parliament or of that legislature under this act."

Then the author continues with his comments:

Under this section the whole body of laws in force at confederation in the uniting provinces is continued, subject to the legislative authority granted by the act, to the Dominion and the provinces respectively. Any alteration therefore of the existing laws regarding divorce can be made only by the Dominion parliament.

Parliament has not yet repealed, abolished or altered the statutes in force in the several provinces at the time of their entry into confederation so far as any law in existence on the subject of divorce is concerned and does not exercise its right to exclusive authority over divorce.

The courts of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which there was legislation with respect to divorce at the time of confederation, have always entertained applications for divorce.

At the time the province of Prince Edward Island entered into the Dominion there was power in that province itself, to deal with the questions of marriage and divorce, this power having been given to the province by 5 William IV, Chapter 10, which conferred the right upon the governor and the executive council to grant divorce.

This jurisdiction was extended to the western provinces under the provisions of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act.

Divorce has never been accepted by the people of Quebec or by the people of Ontario, and in granting these bills of divorce we are making an exception for the relief of certain parties. To people who believe in divorce this is naturally very acceptable in some cases, but where people do not believe in divorce a very extraordinary position is created, as has been pointed out very eloquently by the hon. member for Labelle. If a man or a woman is a Roman Catholic and wishes to remain in the Roman Catholic church, he or she is debarred from divorce, and a divorced person cannot be remarried within the pale of the Catholic church. That is the law of the church, not only in this country but throughout the world, and it has been the law for centuries. It is true that a marriage may be declared null in the province of Quebec, but that is brought about by means of an ecclesiastical tribunal, such as existed in England for many centuries and such as exists at the present time in Rome and other parts of the world. This ecclesiastical tribunal hears evidence ab initio, as the expression is, to discover whether there was any impediment to the marriage either by reason of kindred or because of other obstacles which should be surmounted before a marriage could be performed. This religious tribunal presents a finding which is subject to appeal to another religious tribunal within the Dominion of Canada. If that is not satisfactory there is another appeal to the Rota at Rome, which is the outstanding tribunal of the Roman Catholic Church. These decisions do not declare in favour of divorce, but declare whether or not the marriage ever existed. In the province of Quebec legal and civil effect is given to the findings of the ecclesiastical court, and that is the end of the matter as far as Roman Catholics are concerned. The course generally followed in Quebec, and I presume in many other countries—it was followed in England for generations—was that parties who did not agree between themselves would apply to the court for separation as to bed and board. A finding is always made for alimony to the wife and for the maintenance and care of the children. Nothing of that kind is done by the federal parliament, and that is our strongest objection against divorce. It is unnatural and immoral and, with no disrespect to the opinions of those who believe otherwise, it is contrary to what I would call the well being of the state, because it saps the very foundation of home life. With that going on, what will become of the state in a very short time? The other day I cited some figures showing that in the United States in a period of fifty years prior to 1925, 6,500,000 people, including the children, had been affected by divorce. If we continue this state of affairs, where shall we find ourselves later on?

I shall not deal particularly with the case under discussion, but the hon. member for Labelle has disclosed a most extraordinary condition of affairs. He has pointed out that evidence was adduced by a minor, a young girl of fifteen years of age, who was the chief witness in the case and who was called upon to testify against her father. If that is the procedure which the people of this country wish to uphold in the parliament of Canada, I have never seen anything like it, although I have sat in this house for thirty-two sessions. Such a procedure is contrary to public polity and to the interest of the state.

As I said a moment ago, we do not want and we have never asked for divorce in Quebec. It is imposed upon us, and the unfortunate people in the present case, if they secure their divorce and wish to remarry, must leave the Catholic church; they cannot remain within its fold because they will be debarred from remarriage. For all these reasons I am glad that the opportunity has been offered me once more to direct the serious attention of the members of parliament to the remedy which must be applied to put an end to the most extraordinary state of affairs that exists at present with regard to divorce, and I hope the legal minds of the house will find a solution when next session comes round.

Mr. EVANS: Certain views which have been expressed this afternoon regarding the case before us make one wonder what a federation, or a confederation, as we call it, consists of; and a feature of the inconsistency of our position as a parliament has been well brought out by the hon. member for Labelle. We have before us a case of a woman belonging to the Catholic church and yet no Roman Catholic in the house will sponsor the bill. The inconsistency lies in this parliament insisting on granting divorces for certain provinces while some provinces deny the right of parliament to grant divorces to those who belong to particular churches, to interfere, as I believe the hon. member said, with the civil and religious rights and social status, chiefly of the children. It was not made very clear by the hon. member whether he intended that those civil and religious rights of Quebec should extend to the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. BOURASSA: No.

Mr. EVANS: His actions are not consistent with his words, then, because not long ago I remember quite well his declaring in the house in an impassioned speech that the western provinces had no right to their own natural resources without the rights of the minorities in those provinces being safeguarded in connection with the separate schools. I am wondering how, under such circumstances, parliament can be a parliament for the whole of Canada. There does not seem to be any consistency in such a situation. But it all amounts to this: Is it not time now for parliament to enact a law that will give the right to Ontario to deal with its divorce cases? As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out the other day, it is quite within the competence of the government at this session of parliament to introduce a bill to provide for that. Why not do so here and now before parliament prorogues and end all this inconsistency and confusion?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am sure my hon. friend from Rosetown does not want to be unfair, and I want to be absolutely fair to him. May I say this just as a matter of personal explanation, although I think it is quite out of order. I never suggested in any way, shape or form that any piece of legislation should be enacted by parliament on any question whatever—I am generalizing it—because of the rights of certain minorities. What I have stated and what I repeat is that parliament, having pledged itself in writing and in law to certain things, cannot undo those things without redeeming its pledges to whatever parties are concerned, whether they are majorities or minorities. That is all there is to the question of the return of the natural resources.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to say in answer to that, that in 1926 when the agreement between Alberta and the Dominion government had been entered into and approved by both parties, it was a speech by my hon. friend on the floor of the house that prevented its being carried out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us discuss divorce.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the seetion carry?

Mr. BOURASSA: Is it in order for an hon. member to take his seat and vote after the question has been put?

MINERVA ELLIOTT

The house in committee on Bill No. 88, for the relief of Minerva Elliott.—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. BOURASSA: Just to illustrate the system, let me say that there is not one single word of proof in this case. I have looked at the evidence, and it is all based on presumption. The woman lives in Toronto, she does not give evidence herself of the actual adultery of her husband. She speaks of a previous case where the woman had committed suicide, and then the parties adjusted their differences, and afterwards separated again. She was asked why she had not got a divorce before. She said she had no money; but for this case she had the money or somebody else found the money for her, and she hired three detectives in Montreal to make out the case. They shadowed the man from place to place, and to give those who are familiar with the city of Montreal an idea of the accuracy of their testimony I would point out that one of the detectives says in his evidence that he had followed at night a man who was supposed to be the husband, in the company of a woman. On page 11 of the evidence the detective says:

He had parked his car on Bleury street where the Viger station is.

Now I ask anybody who is familiar with the city of Montreal what geographical connection there may be between Bleury street and the Viger station. That station is distant from Bleury street about the distance of the Central station at Ottawa from, let us say, the end of Rideau street near the bridge; so that this man, followed by this detective, one of the witnesses in this case, upon whose testimony that high judicial body of the senate has pronounced judgment, parked his car in front of a hotel on a street half a mile distant from that hotel. Three detectives were employed in the case; one of the other two admits that he did not see anything, and the other one followed the man and the woman to a certain door, but actually there is not one single witness of the act supposed to have been committed.

An hon. MEMBER: The statutory ground.

Mr. BOURASSA: What is called the statutory ground, but of course, there is no ground and there is no statute. It simply forms part of the vocabulary of hypocrisy which has become established in order to explain to the good people of this country why we are acting as a tribunal on divorce, although there is no law to guide us, and although we break every law, natural or otherwise, in connection with the taking of evidence as it should be taken by any tribunal with a fair standing. Again, I leave this case to the committee. I suppose the bill will pass, as usual. It is the business of this representative body, which so often has denounced the abuses of the senate—it is the business of 245 elected members of this house to vote blindly for a decision taken by five judges—that was the number sitting in the senate divorce committee on this case—of the highest court of the land. I do not suppose any of them knew the city of Montreal. If we acted as decently as they do in the United States, in that low degraded country, even at Reno, if there was anybody acting in the public interest in these cases like the king's proctor acts in England, he would at least see that the law of evidence was respected and would follow the evidence in order to find out if the witnesses were sufficiently informed and were of sufficient good faith to be believed.

I know of a case where one of the witnesses who had come to testify against a woman—this was a case of the husband accusing the wife of adultery—met a member of this house after the session and told him, "Of course, all that was fabricated. If you give me so much I am prepared to go next year and testify the other way." That bill did not carry because of the political crisis of 1926, and it did not come up the year following because that member of the house, having received that information by the merest chance, went and informed the committee. The hired perjurer was afraid to come, but the year previous a decision was rendered by that high court of justice, the senate committee, upon the perjured testimony of that man who was paid to defame that woman. If that is justice, if that is accomplishing our duty by the people who come to this parliament seeking relief, very well; but every time I discover a case like that I will put it before the house, and when the house prorogues I intend to put it before the country. It is about time that we should realize at least what we are doing. I do not want to be too hard. I admit that most of us have done it without realizing what we were doing. I myself—I have confessed it before—for many years allowed divorce bills to go through without having the slightest idea of the circumstances involved. But now I have begun to scrutinize these bills a little more closely, though not half as much as I would if I could, and I am beginning to realize the absolute and unexaggerated truth of what I said the other day. I do not know of any so-called civilized country in which divorces are granted by courts under any law—lax as the American laws are with regard to the grounds for divorce—where at least some degree of concern is not given to the evidence and where somebody is not supposed to take up the case from the other point of view.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask if all this is not evidence in favour of the desirability of having these cases dealt with by the courts?

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course; but I go further. I think it is altogether in favour of the contention that this parliament should not deal with divorce, because in order to deal with every one of these cases with some kind of decency, with some kind of respect for the elementary principles of justice, equity and evidence, not one single item of public business could be attended to throughout the course of a six months' session; it would take the whole of our time to scrutinize these so-called private bills. Take the evidence involved in this bill. Three detectives were employed to gather evidence. I happen to know Montreal, and on the face of the evidence one of those witnesses either never was in Montreal or does not know anything about the city or thought he could impose anything on the committee. The idea of declaring he followed the husband and a woman to the point where they parked their car before a certain hotel on a street which is half a mile distant from that hotel! I do not believe one of those three detectives really followed the party. They saw what they thought was the man concerned in the case entering a certain room in the Place Viger hotel. That is all they saw. Is any man convicted before a court of justice because he has been seen entering a certain place and because he is suspected to have committed a crime with the person accompanying him? I put it to any lawyer in this chamber, would any tribunal pronounce judgment upon that kind of circumstantial evidence? In the previous case there was, for what it is worth, a declaration by the wife saying that her husband had admitted to her that he had misconducted himself; but in this case there is no such admission. What is declared to be an admission relates to acts committed long before and on which the decision is not pronounced. The acts upon which this decision is supposed to be pronounced are unknown to the petitioner, they are unknown to the three witnesses. The three paid agents of a detective agency simply testified that they followed up this man from place to place, and I have mentioned the discrepancy in the testimony of one of the detectives. Now, are you going to pronounce a divorce and, break the family tie upon such evidence?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): If the hon. member is going to review the evidence he must review it in full, and not take that part which suits his case. He neglected to inform the house that the man and the woman who was not his wife registered at the hotel as husband and wife.

Mr. BOURASSA: Is that a ground for divorce?

Mr. STEVENS: It is evidence.

Mr. BOURASSA: Is it evidence that something wrong has been committed?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): It is evidence of wrong intent.

Mr. STEVENS: Would you not think that is evidence?

Mr. BOURASSA: That is merely what we call in French "presumption of guilt."

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): They stayed there the night.

Mr. BOURASSA: The clerk said they registered. One of the detectives said he went up to the door of the room. That is all. I do not say nothing was wrong. I simply ask: would a court of law base its judgment upon such evidence? But my further point is this, that we go on voting these bills without knowing what there is in the evidence upon which they are founded. If we as a jury take the trouble of looking into each bill what is the result?

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BOURASSA: An hon. gentleman says "carried." I heard the interruption, but I do not know where it came from. Suppose you pleaded a case before a jury and one of the jurors said "verdict," what would be the attitude of the judge towards that juror? I admit that this, which is supposed to be the most important social tie in this country, has become an object of laughter. Then for heaven's sake let us cease talking about civilization, let us cease talking about the superiority of our morality as against that of the United States or Mexico or any other country, because upon this issue, which everywhere is considered as a basic principle of society, the principle upon which rests the family, whether the people in those countries are for divorce or against it, they treat it with some degree at least of apparent seriousness; but in this house it is treated with levity. I know the subject is playing upon the nerves of some hon. members. I regret it. I do not like to be disagreeable to anybody, but I think that some of us who have reflected a little on this question and have talked it over with thoughtful people outside this house cannot treat the subject lightly. We must not imagine that all the wisdom of this country is contained within the four walls of this chamber or of the chamber on the other side. There are a few thoughtful people outside parliament; in fact I think there are a good many, because perhaps they are less busy than we are and have a little more opportunity for reflection.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us hope so.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, let us hope so. Those people are simply beginning to take notice of this question; but we shall soon lose the respect and confidence of the thoughtful people of this country unless we at least scrutinize some of these bills, and show, by referring them back to the committee that is supposed to deal with them, that we are really concerned in this matter. Here is a case, I repeat, where there is no evidence, from the little I know of law, that would be accepted by judges as sufficient to justify judgment. It might justify suspicion; it might justify an assumption. But I have always understood that, under the British law, it is not possible to condemn a man or a woman upon a mere assumption of facts; there must be real evidence or such circumstantial evidence as to carry conviction to the minds of judge and jury. It is clear in this case that there is no such evidence; more than that, there is proof that at least one of the witnesses did not know anything about the city in which he was supposed to carry on his trade—that he was simply fabricating testimony to give to the senate committee.

AGNES VICTORIA LEADER

The house in committee on Bill No. 154, for the relief of Agnes Victoria Leader—Mr. Edwards (Waterloo)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This bill we had before us the other day, and it is rather different from most of the others. We have heard it stated again and again in this house that infidelity or adultery was the only ground on which divorce was granted by this parliament. In this case, as I understood from the sponsor the other day, the ground is non-consummation. I want to point out clearly to this house and to the country that there are no statutory grounds. I heard a member of the legal profession say the other day that a certain ground was statutory, but I think I am correct when I say that there are no statutory grounds; we are simply proceeding upon precedent. It is sometimes said that if we send these divorces to a court we shall be widening the grounds of divorce, but I suggest that the grounds are to-day as wide as they can be. We can grant divorce in this house on any ground whatever, and you cannot have it any wider than that. It is quite true that in practice the grounds have been limited to two, but that is only a matter of precedent. Even if we did transfer these cases to some other court that need not mean the widening of the grounds, but rather a delimitation of them, with this further advantage, that a court would be a great deal more careful with respect to the evidence—as my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has pointed out —than is the case in the senate. This is an important matter and we should have from the sponsor of the bill some intimation as to whether or not there have been precedents in regard to the particular ground on which this divorce is sought. I should like also to hear from the Minister of Justice. I asked him the other day whether he thought that in a matter of this kind this parliament was competent to deal with the facts.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): I have secured a partial list of the annulments granted by this parliament in former years. May I cite a few of the cases. In 1916, under chapter 81, an act was granted for the relief of Mabel Mills, on the same ground; in 1919, chapter 147, an act was granted for the relief of Claudius Henry Sherk; in 1919, chapter 136, Rose Kent Miller; in 1922, chapter 89, Nellie Berry; 1928, chapter 240, Elsie Irene O'Meara —all on the same ground. This is only a partial list of the annulments granted by the senate committee. I do not know much more about the case than the fact that these people came here in good faith and on the strength of these precedents; and their evidence was heard by the committee and annulment granted on the ground stated. The woman in this case works as a weaver in a knitting mill and she had to wait several years before she could obtain money to present her case. It would be a real hardship if the committee refused to pass the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As a matter of fact this ground has been accepted by the senate in previous instances. I have here Gemmill on Divorce, and discussing the White case, 1888, the ground being the same, he says:

In this case the application was dismissed, the evidence being insufficient to support the preamble of the bill, but it stands as an example of the principle put forward by the author that parliament is disposed to grant relief upon grounds which were recognized in the former ecclesiastical courts of England as sufficient to declare a marriage null and void.

Following this precedent, parliament, I know, has in many instances granted divorce on this ground.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): I have a partial list of the annulments that have been granted but this list could be greatly extended.

Mr. BOURASSA: This case involves an important point of law; it is not a question of evidence. It has been said time and again in Quebec by people who would like on the one hand to reconcile themselves to the laxity with which parliament grants divorces and at the same time to make the Roman Catholic clergy in that province believe that they are opposed to divorce, that parliament grants divorces because Protestants want them and because under the laws of Quebec divorce is not obtainable. That has been a ground of defence; without going into the matter at length one might put it that way. But here is a case which comes within the purview of the principles suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in a previous case, when he asked me in what position people would find themselves in Quebec with respect to divorce or separation. If the evidence in this case is correct, if the ground on which the divorce is being sought is true, then we are passing a bill of divorce in spite of the fact that either in Quebec or in Ontario, or for that matter in any other country, it is possible to ask for a declaration of nullity on the part of a regular court. Here is the very declaration in the bill.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Was there not a case identical to this last year, in which two Catholics in Quebec were granted a divorce?

Mr. BOURASSA: My hon. friend is making the same mistake. There never has been and cannot be a pronouncement of divorce in Quebec, either under civil or canonical law; but in a case like this if the evidence which was presented before the senate had been presented before the proper tribunal in Quebec, and I think I am right in saying in Ontario and all the other provinces as well, showing that the marriage had not been consummated because of impotency, the tribunal would declare the marriage null. There is, however, this difference between canonical and civil law: the canon law is at once broader, and I think more sensible than the civil law, which says that the impediment of impotency cannot be pleaded after three years of married life, while the canonical law, which was the old French civil law and which I believe to be the English law, provides that if the impotency is radical and organic and if it existed previous to the marriage, then there never has been a marriage and that impotency can be pleaded at any time as a ground for nullifying the marriage.

Those are the only cases so far as this impediment is concerned in which not a divorce but a judgment in nullity may be rendered by the civil courts of Quebec, and I am sure similar judgments have been rendered in Ontario and in every other country. So, in a case of this kind, there was no necessity whatever for the parties to come before parliament; they cannot claim what has been claimed by the upholders of divorce in this house, that they have no other remedy but to come before parliament asking for a divorce. They have their remedy before the courts of the province. The evidence proves that this case is one which should be adjudicated upon by the provincial courts, and the declaration of the senate itself, in the preamble of the bill—

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): If my hon. friend will refer to page 5 of the bill it will be seen that these parties were married in September of 1918 and that they separated in February of 1922, so they could not come before the civil courts.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course I do not know the Ontario law, and there may be a limitation, but the preamble to this bill states:

...and whereas by her petition she has prayed that, because of his physical incompetence to consummate the said marriage, their marriage be annulled . . .

My hon. friend says he does not know, and I do not know, the law of Ontario in this regard, but I do know that the ground upon which this divorce is recommended is one acknowledged under every civil law of which I have knowledge as being a ground for nullifying marriage. In other words, this is not a case for divorce but a case for a declaration by the courts, and if the laws of Ontario or Quebec are not broad enough to meet a case of that kind why should not the laws be amended in the proper way? Why should we, by private legislation, infringe upon a power which was supposed at the time of confederation to be vested in the provinces? That would raise a very interesting issue which I am sure will have to be taken up before long, as to whether or not this parliament or the provincial legislatures are competent to legislate on such questions as this. If we pass over this matter, let us see in the future that parliament grants divorces only on one ground, which has been stated time and again during the various sittings devoted to these bills. Here is a case where it is not even intimated that the so-called statutory ground, which never has been defined by statute and which is not even mentioned in the criminal code of Canada, exists; according to the evidence and according to the preamble of the bill itself this so-called statutory ground is not present in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the British statute of 1857.

Mr. BOURASSA: But that British statute is not in force here. If we want to put it in force let us say so; that would be far better and far less hypocritical than to go on granting divorces from year to year with no law to guide us as to the grounds for divorce or with regard to the taking of evidence. Then we have the organic impotency of this parliament to deal with the civil effects resulting from its decisions in these cases. Here we have a case where divorce is asked on a ground which is supposed to be covered by provincial laws, and we are unable to implement our decision, as is the case in respect to all these bills, looking to the effects which will result.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): On May 14, 1928, an order was passed for the return of certain papers in connection with the New Westminster penitentiary, but that return has not yet been brought down. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he does not think it is about time we were getting that return.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will look into the matter, and if the return is ready, I shall be pleased to lay it on the table. But may I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that I do not think he has the right to criticize me, because, under the rules, a motion for a return drops after the session is over. If the motion has not been renewed this session, my hon. friend cannot get the papers as of right, although I will give them to him.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is very kind, but I believe the minister is not quite correct in his statement of the rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, I am correct. I will show my hon. friend Bourinot, Beauchesne and all the other authorities. I was reading them yesterday.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister is good-natured to-day. In view of the delay there has been, will he bring the file up to date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is it about?

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is in connection with an investigation which was held some time ago by Inspector Jackson into the affairs of the New Westminster penitentiary. There was a transcript of the evidence. I might read the order:

> Order of the house for a copy of the transcript of evidence taken by Inspector Jackson on his recent investigation of certain charges against Lieutenant-Colonel H. W. Cooper, late warden of the British Columbia penitentiary at New Westminster, and into the administration of the said penitentiary; also a copy of all letters reports, or other documents or memoranda leading up to the said investigation, or during the course thereof; and also a copy of all letters, reports, documents or memoranda subsequent to the said investigation, including all correspondence passing between the Minister of Justice and the said Cooper.

Will the Minister of Justice be good enough to bring the report up to date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was under the impression that those papers had been brought down. Perhaps it was in the senate.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They were not brought down in the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, but I think they were in the senate.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I should be glad if he would bring them up to date, and in addition to that I should like to get, if possible the file of the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ah, that is different.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Similar files have been brought down several times during the source of the debate on the Post Office estimates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no power over the Civil Service Commission. I shall be glad to transmit the wish of my hon. friend.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I think the Secretary of State is the proper officer, if he will bring down the file in reference to the appointment of Inspector Jackson and all matters in connection with the same case.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can speak only for myself.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Minister of Justice is in error in saying that papers called for by an order of the house should not be brought down if parliament prorogues before they are tabled. I quite agree with him that if the motion has not been converted into an order before parliament prorogues, the motion lapses. But when an order of the house has been passed, the question is then only one of the officers of the department preparing the documents. Frequently we have had evidence of these having been brought down during the recess and the papers lodged in the proper place. An order of the house does not lapse merely because parliament prorogues. I think the hon. member is confusing for the moment the order with the notice which is placed upon the order paper and which is not converted into an order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am not confusing them. They are very wide apart.

Mr. BENNETT: I know we have acted upon the opposite principle.

REGULATION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

PAPERS RELATING TO CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the 23rd of April the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asked for some correspondence between His Majesty's government in Great Britain and His Majesty's government in Canada and also between His Majesty's government in Great Britain and the government of the United States respecting a convention signed in January, 1924, in relation to the liquor traffic. His Majesty's government in Great Britain has no objection to the tabling of the correspondence between the governments of Canada and Great Britain; but as regards the correspondence between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, the British government is of the view that much of it is highly confidential and should not be tabled. I am, therefore, not at present in a position to table the correspondence between Great Britain and the United States, but I am now tabling the correspondence between Great Britain and Canada in reference to the convention.

CANADA'S GOLD RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): A few days ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) inquired as to the exchange rates. In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to any authoritive powers vested in the Dominion government to ameliorate exchange rates by the exportation of gold, I desire to make our position clear:

First: Exchange rates are determined by commercial business, and so forth, transacted between countries.

Second: Banks are the media for conducting external as well as internal financial business, and not the government.

Third: The gold reserves held in our vaults belong to and are held for account of the several banks to the extent of the amount of available Dominion notes which they primarily obtained from the treasury on deposit of gold with the treasury.

Fourth: The banks are required by the Bank Act always to keep on hand 40 per cent of their cash reserves in Dominion notes, thus eliminating to that extent the amount of Dominion notes in their possession to call for gold from the treasury.

Fifth: The banks have gold supplies in their own vaults not under control of the treasury, except such gold as they may from time to time deposit in the central gold reserves towards protecting any surplus issue of their own bank notes over and above the amount allowed them under the provisions of the Bank Act.

Sixth: The banks are free to export their gold holdings without reference to the Dominion treasury, together with as much gold held in trust for them by the treasury as they are able to obtain by taking out of circulation and handing back to the treasury Dominion notes previously obtained by them on deposit of gold with the treasury.

Seventh: The Dominion has not parliamentary authority to deal in the buying and selling of gold for commercial purposes. If commercial business transacted by the people through the banks requires the shipment of gold, it becomes the duty of the banks to export or import gold to meet such requirements as their business transactions with the public demand.

Eighth: The Dominion treasury is obligated by the act governing government savings banks deposits to keep on hand gold to the extent of 10 per cent of such deposits made with the government. Such gold forms no part of the reserve held by the treasury in trust for the banks.

Ninth: The treasury has from time to time bought from Canadian mines gold consigned to the Royal Mint for refining purposes. All such gold has been paid for out of current revenues received from taxation and other government services. Such gold is held by the treasury in place and instead of the cash to our credit which was taken from our cash deposits with the various banks, and the gold so held is available for use on government business only and is utilized when required for such purposes. For example, such gold may be at any time deposited with the banks in Canada for the credit of the Receiver General, or may be shipped to our financial agents in any country, but only for the purpose of meeting government obligations. We have large commitments from time to time in New York and London, England. When exchange is against Canada to an extent over and above the cost of shipping gold, if our supply of this free gold permits, shipment will take place, but such shipments, being for government account in New York and not for sale in New York of Canadian funds, would have no effect on exchange rates other than perhaps what might be designated as a slight sentimental effect.

The above sets out the position of the federal treasury and the obligations of the banks in regard to exchange transactions. If the federal treasury needs funds at any time for government obligations in New York we are obliged to buy exchange through the banks precisely in the same way as is done in ordinary business practice, unless we can advantageously make use of any holdings we may have of free gold which has been bought from the mines, and so forth, with cash taken from our revenue accounts.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that that statement answers the question that was asked. Was not the question as to the extent to which gold is held against Dominion notes issued by the country?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, although that other question is involved. Just the same, I do not think the minister's statement is an answer to the question I asked the other day.

WAYS AND MEANS

BRITISH PREFERENCE—REQUIREMENT OF BRITISH OR EMPIRE LABOUR CONTENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the house some matters arising out of a discussion between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and myself on Tuesday last, a discussion which centered around the regulation that was imposed in connection with the British preference on the 1st of February last. Before dealing directly with the question at issue, I desire to summarize the events leading up to it.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech in 1928 announced that this regulation was being put into effect, and he stated that it was brought in with the object of fostering imperial trade. It was pointed out at that time that the regulation would have precisely the opposite effect, that instead of fostering inter-imperial trade it would be an impediment to that trade. The Minister of Finance did not take any serious objection to that. On February 29, 1928, some statements were made in the house by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) on the authority of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Railways and Canals on that occasion said:

> As to the criticism which has been uttered with respect to the intimation by the Minister of Finance that in future it was proposed to ask that all goods coming in, taking advantage of the British preference, should have a 50 per cent British or empire content, I desire to say just this: the Minister of Finance gave that intimation in no sense intending thereby to limit the British preference in the slightest degree.

Further on he said:

> Some hon. gentleman in the far corner—I forget who it was—insinuated the possibility that the raising of the limit to 50 per cent might have the effect of debarring British goods. I can assure my hon. friend on the authority of the Minister of Finance that there is no intention to permit it to be used for any such purpose, and if as a result of experience it is found necessary to provide a different percentage of content for different classes of goods, as other British dominions have done, it is quite within the competency of the government to work out the solution along those lines.

Later, on March 13, 1928, the Prime Minister in the same budget debate, referring to the regulation in question, said:

> May I say to this house; if we discover, in connection with the enforcement of a regulation of that kind, that the consumers of this country are in any particular losing the benefits which the British preference was intended to give, we shall not hesitate speedily to make such changes as the circumstances may demand.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Further on, the Prime Minister said:

> I wish to say that if that situation arises it is not the intention of the government to make the existing 25 per cent British content one per cent higher than it is at the present time.

The agitation from this corner of the house I believed had some effect; at any rate, the regulation was not put into effect at that time. Indeed, after the statements made by these ministers some of us were rather surprised that the regulation ever went into effect. However, it was made effective on the 1st of February last.

May I say that it appears that this regulation was actually asked for by the textile manufacturers? That would seem to prove to me, at any rate, that these gentlemen knew that it was in their own interests. I am not objecting to that, of course, but it would rather indicate that that regulation was never intended to foster inter-imperial trade. The Canadian Textile Journal in an editorial on November 29 last stated:

> Manufacturers and producers will welcome the announcement from Ottawa that after February 1 goods to enjoy the British preference entering Canada will be required to be 50 per cent of empire material and labour, instead of 25 per cent as at present.

Quoting further from the same editorial:

> This increase in empire content was foreshadowed by Hon. James A. Robb in his last budget and is due to the repeated demand of Canadian producers.

My complaint in this regard is that it never was intended to foster inter-imperial trade. That is my impression, at any rate, and certainly a wrong impression was created in this house and in the country, I believe, by the words of the Minister of Finance when he introduced his budget.

May I itemize some of the commodities that are affected by this regulation? First, fur. The raw fur used by British manufacturers comes largely from Russia, and as in nearly all cases this raw fur is more than 50 per cent of the value of the finished article, naturally these goods would be debarred from the benefit of the British preference. Then there is copper. I admit that the minister has perhaps more ground for the regulation in connection with copper than in connection with any of the other commodities. Copper is produced in Canada, in Australia and in other parts of the British Empire. But at the present time the Canadian copper producers have no worry with regard to marketing their product; as I understand it, they are much behind their orders. So even in respect to copper this regulation might well be delayed. The British manufacturers contend that while they do use Canadian copper, they find it almost impossible to make an affidavit as to the exact content in any particular line of copper goods. That is, to comply with the regulations they have to make an affidavit that all the copper in a particular manufactured article is empire copper. It is very difficult to segregate the lots of copper that come from different parts of the world. Then take velvet. Raw velvet, I understand, comes from Japan, and again as in most of the manufactured goods, the value of the raw material is more than 50 per cent of the value of the finished article. Of course, when that is so, the manufactured goods are debarred from the advantages of the British preference.

Then there is the question of mercury. Last Tuesday I read a letter from the British federation of industries which showed the effect that this regulation would have on mercury and its compounds. The letter pointed out that not only is mercury in its original form not commercially procurable in the British Empire, and therefore would be debarred under this regulation, but that there are many compounds of mercury. Mercury enters into many drug compounds, and these would all be affected to a very large extent. But the most important commodity, and the one that will be affected most seriously by this regulation, is cotton. As hon. members know, almost all of the cotton used in the British mills comes from the United States, and naturally, all other things being equal, it would be easier for the Americans to manufacture their cotton and ship it in here than it would be for the British manufacturers. The only thing that helps the British manufacturers to compete here is the British preference. If they are denied that advantage, it seems to me, while it might help our textile manufacturers to a limited degree, it would divert a good deal of the trade to the United States. I will deal with that later on.

On Tuesday I read considerable correspondence that has passed between the British High Commissioner and the Department of National Revenue, and also between the British federation of industries and the same department. The Minister of Finance, in answer to a question of mine to be found in Hansard on page 2314 said:

> Mr. Robb: It is the 50 per cent clause the hon. member is referring to?
>
> Mr. Campbell: Yes.
> Mr. Robb: The 50 per cent requirement of British labour and material. We have discussed this matter with the British board of trade and I think they are quite satisfied with the arrangement. There is a member of the Canadian customs staff in England at the present time and if they desire to have this 50 per cent clause checked up he is available to do that work and we would consider the matter on his report. So far nothing has been brought before us to indicate that any companies are having trouble coming within this regulation. The broad general statement has been made that some of them could not come under it, but as yet there has been nothing submitted to us.

Further on I made this statement:

> Mr. Campbell: If I understood the minister correctly he said that the British authorities were satisfied with the 50 per cent regulation?

To which the minister replied:

> Mr. Robb: We have heard no complaints.

Then on page 2316 the minister in answer to a statement of mine, said:

> Mr. Robb: What justification has my hon. friend for saying that the minister has not dealt with the complaints?

Further on he said:

> I understand that the officer is now on the way home. I imagine when he returns, we shall have the report, but I repeat that while my hon. friend has read from a long list of statements which have come from overseas, he has not made out any case that British importations have been stopped.

And again he said:

> There may be cases where it is not obtainable, but these cases will be adjusted when the report of the officials of the department investigating the matter comes before us. That report has not yet been presented.

On the following morning, May 8, I noticed an article in the Citizen which I will read for the information of the house:

> Considerable concern has been aroused in the office of Sir William H. Clark, British High Commissioner, by comments, made by Hon. J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, on the new 50 per cent empire labour and material preferential regulations in the House of Commons budget debate last night.
> Questioned on the minister's statements, R. H. Hadow, first secretary in charge in the absence of Sir William on his western Canada trip, said this morning that he found it difficult to reconcile Mr. Robb's statement that the report of the Canadian government investigator in England had not yet been received with the official information given the high commissioner's office that the report was made on April 26 to the minister of national revenue.
> Mr. Robb's statement that no further complaints had been received since the Canadian government investigator began his investigation among British manufacturers early last March is explained by the high commissioner's office in that all complaints were made direct to Major L. A. Wilmot, Canadian customs service agent in London, England, who made the investigation.

"When is Major Wilmot expected to make his report to the government?" Mr. Hadow was asked.

"Our information," the first secretary replied, "is that Major Wilmot was in Ottawa on April 26 and made his report then to the Minister of National Revenue."

"What about the minister's statement that no complaints have been received from British manufacturers for some months past?"

Withold Direct Complaints

"That is easily explained," Mr. Hadow rejoined promptly. "The British manufacturers were told by this office that the question was being investigated by an agent of the Canadian government and were directed to make all their representations to him. Thereafter, in order not to prejudice the situation nor to embarrass the Canadian government, all direct complaints to the Canadian government were withheld until Major Wilmot completed his enquiry. But, while no complaints may have reached the Canadian government during this period, as Mr. Robb informed the house, at the same time a continuous stream of complaints was reaching the government's investigator in the old land. Not until May 2, after this office was informed Major Wilmot's report had been made to the government, was any further complaint addressed direct to the Canadian government. On that date, however, this office, in a communication to the government, reaffirmed its previous objections to the new regulations and stated that already British export trade was suffering severely from the impossibility of complying with the regulations which were put into effect on February 1 last.

In view of this statement, I think it was a little unfair for the minister to speak as he did on May 7, unless this had not come to his notice. The article proceeds:

"Major Wilmot, in making his investigation, visited Manchester and other British industrial cities; he interviewed many manufacturers, and met many representatives of the British federation of industries; he was afforded every opportunity of visiting British factories to see for himself the difficulties under which the manufacturers are operating in attempting to comply with the new regulations."

"What about Mr. Robb's observation that Sir William Clark had to frankly confess that Great Britain does not comprise all of the British Empire?"

Sort of Suggestion

"That seems to be a suggestion that British manufacturers could use more Empire materials if they wished," Mr. Hadow concluded. "After careful investigation, British authorities were persuaded that certain types of short staple cotton used for certain manufacturers at present exported to Canada were not obtainable in commercial quantities in the British Empire, and that the new regulations, despite the utmost readiness of the British manufacturers to comply as far as possible in the interests of inter-imperial trade, will result in the exclusion of a large quantity of British goods from Canada."

May I read two letters I have received since the date of this debate? These letters are from representatives of British firms in Canada, one being from Messrs. Sproul, Smith & Co., manufacturers' agents, 33 Melinda street, Toronto, Canada, dated Thursday, May 9, 1929:

Milton N. Campbell, Esq.,
Member of Parliament,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir: I beg to refer to the statement attributed to Hon. Jas. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, in the House of Commons on the 7th instant regarding the 50 per cent British labour and/or material requirements for United Kingdom goods entering the Dominion.

If he has been correctly reported I understood him to have stated as follows:

"Not long ago an official of the Department of National Revenue was sent to England to investigate complaints by British manufacturers that the new regulation would work a hardship upon them. Since he left we have heard no more complaints, and we have had no evidence that the British manufacturers cannot comply with the 50 per cent requirement."

"I will repeat that an official of the Department of National Revenue went to England to investigate and that he is now on his way home. Sir William Clark told us that some raw materials were not obtainable in Britain, but had to confess frankly that Great Britain did not comprise all of the British Empire. Australia imposes a requirement of 75 per cent, New Zealand 50 per cent, and even Great Britain imposes a requirement of 75 per cent on certain goods. We do not think it unreasonable to ask that British-manufactured goods seeking the preference from Canada should have 50 per cent of British labour and material."

Permit me as the Canadian representative of one of the largest Lancashire manufacturers of grey cotton goods to profoundly disagree with the above. The assertion that since a representative of the Department of National Revenue was sent to England no complaints by British manufacturers that the new regulation would work a hardship upon them have been received is, in a sense, true, but to my knowledge many complaints have been made to the government by the Canadian representatives of British manufacturers and probably also by some of the British manufacturers themselves, but as these complaints are at present being investigated by the Customs department, it is possible that they were not within Mr. Robb's notice at the time his statement was made.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was reading a letter which I had received from Messrs. Sproul, Smith & Company, manufacturers' agents, Toronto, and I will start in again at the point where I left off when you interrupted me at six o'clock.

The fact that Australia imposes a requirement of 75 per cent, New Zealand 50 per cent, and Great Britain 75 per cent, is beside the point as all of these countries have lists of exempted goods and all that is being asked for now is that exemption lists should also be provided for in the case of British goods entering the Dominion. It is a well-known fact that there are certain raw materials which are not obtainable within the empire: for example, the cotton used in the manufacture of greys is only grown in the United States of America, the cotton grown in the empire only being suitable for fine qualities of cotton cloths.

Grey cottons are an essential requirement to all classes of the community and they must be obtained somewhere. Hitherto supplies have come mainly from the United Kingdom but if the 50 per cent requirement as regards this class of goods is insisted upon it means that in future requirements will be met from United States sources, or to put it more plainly, the government will simply be taking a certain volume of trade from the United Kingdom and handing it over to the United States of America. This, bearing in mind the present attitude of the United States government to Canadian products as expressed in their present tariff proposals, is unthinkable, and I earnestly hope, not only from a personal but also from an imperial standpoint, that it will be found possible to provide for an exemption list.

Then again I have a letter from the Toronto office of Messrs. Wm. Anderson & Company Limited, under date of May 9, as follows:

Milton N. Campbell, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I have noted, with interest, the statement made in the House of Commons on May 7th, 1929, by the Honourable J. A. Robb, in which he said: "That since the official of the Department of National Revenue was sent to England, no more complaints have been heard regarding the proposed new reguation and that no evidence has been forthcoming that British manufacturers cannot comply with the fifty per cent requirement." In the same newspaper I note, with satisfaction, that you challenged the minister regarding this statement and I am enclosing a copy of a letter addressed to the minister regarding this matter.

There is not the least doubt but that if the new regulations are applied without regard to exceptional cases such as the fabrics we have mentioned in our letter to the minister that they will affect very adversely the importations of these classes of British textiles to Canada and will greatly facilitate the importation of goods of similar construction from the American mills.

Attached is a copy of a letter which this firm sent to the Minister of Finance on May 9, as follows:

Hon. J. A. Robb, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In the Toronto Globe of May 8th, 1929, you are reported as having made the following statement: "Not long ago an official of the Department of National Revenue was sent to England to inspect complaints by British manufacturers that the new regulations would work a hardship upon them. Since he left we have heard no more complaints and we have had no evidence that the British manufacturers cannot comply with the fifty per cent requirement." Your statement, if correctly reported, is surprising, in view of the fact that so far as I know nothing has as yet been done to meet the position which arises in the case of certain goods in which my firm is interested, along with many other British manufacturers, and regarding which they made representation some time ago to the Department of Overseas Trade, London.

I refer to goods similar in construction to the sample attached hereto.

I may say that attached to the letter is a sample of this grey cotton, what the housewife would call unbleached cotton.

This material is entirely British made of American cotton. The yarns are spun and the goods are woven in England; the raw material only is not of empire origin and is not available within the empire. The fair market value of such a cloth, as attached, is approximately four hundred and seventy-five pence for one hundred yards and the value of the cotton used in this cloth approximates two hundred and sixty-two pence, and it will, therefore, be seen that although the entire process of manufacture is British we cannot certify that the goods have fifty per cent British labour and material. This cloth is typical of a considerable number of fabrics manufactured in quantity in Great Britain, which under the new regulation would apparently not enjoy the advantages of the British preference, thereby facilitating the importation of such fabrics from the mills of the United States.

It is respectfully suggested that such articles as this are worthy of special consideration and I find it difficult to believe that it is the intention of the new regulation to deny the British preference to goods in which the whole process of manufacture is British and the raw materials for which are not available within the empire.

I would point out that the various firms who have registered complaints with the minister and the British High Commissioner's office are not objecting to the regulation as such, but are asking that exemptions be allowed for certain classes of goods not commercially procurable in the empire, as has been allowed by New Zealand, Australia and also by Great Britain herself.

I direct the attention of the house to the probable effect this 50 per cent requirement will have on Canada's trade. I find that for the year ended December 31, 1928, we had what is commonly called an unfavourable trade balance with the United States of $333,000,000; that is, we bought from the United States of America goods to the value of $333,000,000 more than we sold to them. I find that for the same period we had what is commonly called a favourable trade balance with Great Britain of $257,000,000; that is, Great Britain bought from us goods to the value of $257,000,000 more than we bought from her. The question of the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar in New York has been raised recently in the house, and the minister read a statement this afternoon dealing with that question. I think it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who pointed to the fact that the Canadian dollar was below par in New York and that considerable shipments of gold had been made, apparently to balance the exchange. I do not think the assertion will be questioned that the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar is caused in this case by the unfavourable balance of trade. The present tariff bill before the House of Representatives at Washington will make it increasingly difficult to market our farm products in the United States and will increase and intensify that condition, and if nothing is done to correct it there is very little doubt that it will end by our selling less to the United States while the probable effect of this regulation will be that we will buy more from that country. Under those circumstances, we might look for a further drop in the value of the Canadian dollar, necessitating the shipment of further amounts of gold to the United States.

Some days ago I quoted from a speech delivered by Sir Herbert Holt to the shareholders of the Royal Bank. I do not think anyone will accuse Sir Herbert Holt of being a free trader or of being even a low tariff man. In pointing out the trend of events in the United States and the danger of a market being refused to our Canadian farmers, he mentioned that it might be necessary for Canada to increase the British preference and to make better treaties with the more favoured nation countries in order to market our farm products which he, at that time, anticipated the United States would refuse to accept. I have in my hand a Canadian Press despatch from Toronto, dated May 8. This is a press interview with the Hon. J. S. Martin, Minister of Agriculture of Ontario, and it says in part:

> The only recourse of the Ontario dairymen, Mr. Martin said, will be to make cheese and butter of the cream which is now being exported to the United States. It will be necessary, he continued, for them to concentrate on the British market with cheese and butter. The British market would be the only one open to them, he said.

I have another Canadian Press despatch from Montreal, dated May 8. This is an interview with the Hon. J. Edouard Caron, former Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec, and it states in part:

> He urged an increase in Canada's production the better to meet domestic needs and urged a trend toward developing the British market should any export trade be sought.

It seems to me that it is a most dangerous thing for the Canadian government to do anything at the present time which might prejudice or jeopardize that very important trade with the mother country which has proven so profitable to us. My complaint is based on two grounds: First, that the effect of this regulation will be to put additional impediments in the way of British trade—trade which we should encourage and foster in every way possible at the present time in view of the tariff attitude of the United States. My second objection is on a moral ground. I do not want to accuse the minister of deceiving the house, but I think he has either deceived the house or he has been deceived himself in introducing a regulation like this. I prefer to think that the minister did not understand it. In view of his statement, given through the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which I read this afternoon, I am inclined to think that the minister had not given very close study to this matter but had simply accepted the recommendations of the textile industry and had brought forward this proposal without considering its actual effect. My submission is that the effect of this regulation will be to raise the tariff on certain British goods. It is not being raised in the straightforward, honest, old fashioned way by means of a revision of the schedules upward, but it is being raised by indirect means and the effort has been made to create the impression in the house and throughout the country that the tariff on British goods is being lowered and that the government is doing something to foster and develop inter-imperial trade.

Hon. W. D. EULER: (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the subject under discussion affects the Department of National Revenue, I would like to make a very brief review of the situation as it stands to-day. I take it that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) criticizes not only the principle of the 50 per cent requirement of British content in order to obtain British preference, but also the manner in which it is working out. If he is criticizing the principle, I think he is just about one year too late as the matter was introduced during the last session of this house.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I criticized it much more forcibly during the debate on last year's budget.

Mr. EULER: If he is criticizing at this time its working out he is premature, because very little has been done so far with regard to the matter.

The theory of the 50 per cent requirement of British content, as announced by the Minister of Finance last session, is to help empire trade. This is questioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie, but if a further application of this 50 per cent requirement also helps Canada and Canadian production, because Canada is part of the empire, then, for myself, I would say that it should give no cause for regret. I take it that the British preference is intended for British goods, and I would make this statement: Goods are not British if they are not of British origin or British workmanship to a very substantial percentage. I do not think 50 per cent is at all too high a requirement, and if goods imported from Great Britain are not at least 50 per cent of British material or British workmanship then, I would say that they are not British and are not entitled to the British preference. I believe there are many instances where goods, largely manufactured in continental countries, have been imported into Great Britain and, after some further processing have been exported as British goods and have received the British preference, when as a matter of fact that preference went largely to manufacturers in other countries. I think the hon. member gave a very unfortunate example when he mentioned the matter of furs. He thought it a matter of regret that the manufacturers of furs in Great Britain could no longer go to Russia to buy their furs. When Russian furs are brought to Great Britain and manufactured there they do not contain 50 per cent British content and, therefore, could not take advantage of the British preference. Surely we are not required to go so far as to pay a bonus to the producer of furs in Russia in order to compete against Canadian furs. If the British manufacturer of furs wants to export them to Canada, surely as a part of the empire, we are entitled to some consideration as a fur producer, and he might very well buy his furs in that portion of the empire which produces them.

The hon. member also mentioned mercury. That criticism is entirely pointless, because mercury is actually on the free list and cannot be affected at all by this requirement. He claims that the proper working out of the application of this requirement would help United States industry. I do not know, but I might just as well assume that it might help Canadian industry and this is desirable. I believe this 50 per cent requirement will encourage empire trade. We have not completed our investigations and it is for that reason I say that the criticisms of the hon. member are premature. Our investigations have only just begun, but investigations so far show that the British manufacturer—and I do not blame him for this—is now purchasing in foreign countries a good many of his raw materials which he certainly can purchase in the British Empire because the 50 per cent British content applies to the whole British Empire. Surely it is not unfair, if he is to get a preference as a British manufacturer, that the thing should be reciprocal, and that the British manufacturer should purchase as much as possible from other parts of the empire. If we are going to continue as we have been doing and he is permitted to purchase where he pleases in foreign countries —and of course this is his privilege—then nothing is changed and we have the old condition that goods come in here as of British manufacture, get the British preference, and yet have perhaps not more than 25 or 30 per cent of actual British content.

When we put the requirement into force a few months ago, the Minister of Finance and I were interviewed with regard to the matter by the British High Commissioner, Sir William Clark. At first his protest was in the direction of a complaint that the application was a little too rapid and that more time should be given. We made some concessions in that regard. Later on a complaint was made regarding certain outstanding commodities which would be very seriously prejudiced in connection with their sale to Canada if we applied the 50 per cent provision. Those three commodities were cotton, copper and chemicals. It was stated that with regard to cotton, certain raw materials must of necessity be purchased from the United States; that the kind of cotton necessary for the particular commodities which they exported to Canada could in many instances be procured only in the United States, and that the cost of the raw material, the cotton, was in itself frequently greater than 50 per cent, so that it would not be possible to have in the finished article a 50 per cent British content by way of labour or raw material. It was suggested, as my hon. friend said, that an exempted list should be formed which should not come under the 50 per cent regulation. As regards cotton, our investigations have not been completed, but we have ascertained some facts. The cost of cotton, as everyone knows, fluctuates. If it is 10½ pence per pound, then the manufactured goods will be able, I think to come under the 50 per cent British content.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why was the investigation not made before the change was made in the preference?

Mr. EULER: I will come to that.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is the point.

Mr. EULER: I will try to present it to my hon. friend in a moment. As I was saying, if the price of raw cotton is 10½ pence per pound, all dried and finished piece goods can qualify. I think the price is lower than that at present. Grey cottons come very close to the 50 per cent requirement, and many already qualify. Cotton yarns, coarse, may not qualify, but we have not yet sufficient information to reach any decision.

With regard to copper, our investigation has not yet been completed, but in the course of a year or so the British manufacturer should make no complaint if he does not get the benefit of the British preference by reason of the fact that he does not buy his refined copper in the British Empire, because within a year or not more than two years there will be refined in Canada all the copper that will be necessary for manufacture in Great Britain.

With regard to chemicals the criticism does not seem to be very important for the reason that many chemicals are already on the free list and cannot be affected by the 50 per cent requirement, and in the case of commodities affected, the difference is very small, almost negligible. The difference between the British preference of 15 per cent and the general tariff of 17½ per cent is only 2½ per cent. Linseed oil is mentioned in the list about which some complaint has been made. It is quite possible to buy linseed or flaxseed in the Dominion of Canada. I want to point out that the whole arrangement ought to be reciprocal and I think it ought to appeal to the good sense of the house, that if this provision is intended for the benefit of the empire, Canada itself, being a part of the empire, certainly ought to expect to derive some benefit from it as regards purchases of raw materials from this country. Let me give some of the reports received from certain cities and districts. Belfast states that linen goods will not be affected. Dewsbury, in which many textiles are manufactured, states that they are not affected. The south of Scotland states that their products would not be affected even if the percentage were to be raised considerably. Leeds states that there are no instances in which local industries will be hampered.

When we have placed the legislation on the statute books and have applied the regulation, surely we are not going to call it a dead letter from the outset just because we have a few complaints from some interested parties. I am finding no fault with those business men in Great Britain who feel that they may not be quite free to purchase their raw materials outside the limits of the empire. When Sir William Clark made his representations, we said that we had an open mind on the question whether it was desirable in the interest of the Canadian consumer or in the national interest that we should make an exception with regard to, let us say, cotton, copper or any other material, but we were not ready at the very outset, before giving the new regulation a trial, practically to wipe it out. We said: We want to give it a trial and make investigations before we make any changes. As a result of that, the representative of the Department of National Revenue in Great Britain, Major Wilmot, was instructed to make investigations whenever a complaint was lodged. Unfortunately, Major Wilmot, very shortly after the instructions were issued to him, resigned his position and returned to Canada, but he had some opportunity to make investigations and he presented what we must term an interim report, which is certainly not complete.

Mr. CAHAN: In the investigation made, did the department ascertain what percentage of empire cotton is available for British manufacture as compared with the whole which, I understand, largely comes from the United States?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. gentleman definite information with regard to that, but the British representative was very clear on the point that, as regards many cotton manufactures, they must purchase the kind necessary from the United States. Just what percentage of their total output that would comprise, I am not in a position to say. We are, however, now sending another man and perhaps two men to England to make investigations as they are required. I might also say that the representative we had there, Major Wilmot, had considerable difficulty in making those investigations. For example, I understand he asked certain manufacturers who were complaining, to come to a gathering, to bring with them their costs, and I think in only one instance did the manufacturers do so. Surely it is not unfair for us to expect them to show what their costs are if they expect consideration of their claim with regard to the British preference.

With regard to the criticism made of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in connection with the report that was sent in on the 26th of last month by the representative of the Department of National Revenue, there can really be no criticism of the Minister of Finance in that regard. That report, quite naturally, was sent by an officer of the Department of National Revenue to the Department of National Revenue itself. It required considerable examination, and when the Minister of Finance made that statement he had not seen that report.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In connection with the cotton industry, will not the regulation with reference to the British preference have this effect. If a low class of cotton does not come up to the 50 per cent requirement, will not the effect be to increase the importations into this country of a higher class of cotton on which a great deal more labour has been done? In other words, instead of getting a low class cotton, shall we not get a higher class on which more labour has been expended ?

Mr. EULER: I cannot say definitely how it will work out, but I think in Canada we use high class goods in any event.

Mr. CAHAN: Can we make cottons in Canada as cheaply as they sell in Great Britain?

Mr. EULER: I would be very glad indeed if all these goods were made in this country. The point I want to make is this: There can be no real cooperation such as ought to exist between the various parts of the empire unless all parts of the empire cooperate. For my part I should think that wherever it is possible for the British manufacturer to buy his raw materials in Canada—we are interested in Canada primarily—we should see to it that he does so, or at least that he buys them in some portion of the empire before he can take advantage of the preference. But if he prefers to buy his goods in the way of raw materials in some other country, that does not prevent him exporting his goods to Canada, only he will be under the handicap of having to pass a little higher customs barrier. For my part—I am perhaps speaking only for myself—I would say that if a manufacturer in Great Britain, with whom we want to do as much business as possible, buys his goods in a foreign country when he could have purchased them in some part of the British Empire, he has no complaint whatever if he does not get the benefit of the British preference if his goods do not come up to the requirement of at least 50 per cent Canadian content. We should expect to get some business from those from whom we buy.

Finally I would say that the question is not settled. We are just beginning; we are making our investigations. We appreciate the desire of the British manufacturer to have just as soon as possible some sort of certainty with regard to the whole matter. There has been some delay, and I have given the reason for it, the fact that our officer on the other side has resigned. That will be corrected just as soon as possible, and in the meantime I think I am right when I say that the protests and complaints which have been made have been made only pending investigation. The matter is still open, and if we find upon investigation that adjustments should be made, they will be taken into consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would ask the minister if Major Wilmot's report will be made available to the members?

Mr. EULER: Reports of that nature are confidential.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): A short time ago we had a budget debate, and I am not going to refer to it beyond making that statement.

In all matters respecting changes in the tariff, whether in connection with the British preference, the general tariff or the intermediate tariff, I have been under the impression that it was understood that the matter would first be investigated by the tariff board, and that then the government would act. That procedure has not been followed in this case. The Minister of National Revenue tonight says: We are going to investigate, and it is unreasonable for members sitting in that corner of the house to ask the government to move in changing the present position of the British preference until the government has investigated the matter. So the position of the government really is this: We will not reduce the British preference without an investigation but we will increase it without an investigation. Now if it is necessary to investigate in one case, it ought to be necessary in the other. This is a case where the government has definitely moved in the opposite direction from its pledges to the country, without investigation, and it is rather striking that the minister who gets up to explain the position of the government tonight is the minister that did not make any statement at all about the matter last year when the government was appealing for support and particularly appealing to the house to vote against the amendment moved in this corner of the house in connection with the British preference. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) is a well-known protectionist. I am not blaming him for that, but what I do protest against is the government promising one thing and then acting in a contrary manner in the house.

Mr. CAHAN: Before the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) sat down I was going to ask him a question. He spoke of the lack of certainty now in the minds of the British manufacturers. There is no uncertainty now as to the British manufacturer's position. He knows his own costs of material and of manufacture.

Mr. EULER: He has no uncertainty as to where he stands. He knows he must come up to the 50 per cent British content, but he does not definitely know whether we will make any exemptions or not.

Mr. CAHAN: That is, he does not know whether the minister and the government will change their minds in the near future. I intended to follow that up with another question. The minister referred to possible changes. Would the minister state what are the general principles upon which future possible changes will be based? What are the principles which guide the government in making changes of the character under consideration?

Mr. EULER: In general terms I might say anything that we consider to be in the general public interest.

Mr. CAHAN: Of the empire or of Canada?

Mr. EULER: For my part, I would consider Canada first.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): May I just say a word regarding this apparently semi-controversial question of the British preference?

The idea of increasing the requirements as to labour and content is not a new one in British countries nor in the countries with which we have trade agreements. The mother country introduced that idea not so very long ago after they introduced their Safeguarding of Industries Act, and with that I shall deal in a moment. Australia, New Zealand and some of the other self-governing dominions also increased their requirements as to British labour and content. Some of the countries with which we have treaty agreements also increased their requirements, but I have yet to learn, indeed, I would be very sorry to learn, that any junior in any of the departments of Canada in any country of the world should attempt through the press or parliament to attack the policy of the government to which he was accredited. I think we shall get along better and further by reasonable co-operation and going carefully into the merits of each case as represented to us through the proper diplomatic channels. We have succeeded to some extent in improving the Canadian position through that method. I have nothing to add to-night to what was said when the budget was brought down and when we were in committee last session—to what was said by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Railways and Canals and by the Minister of National Revenue. We recognize that there are some items that may require to be revised, but I admit to this house and to the country that surely it is reasonable that those who are enjoying the British preference should submit evidence that they are entitled to a revision of the 50 per cent requirement.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the minister if Australia, Great Britain herself and New Zealand do not publish a list of exemptions?

Mr. ROBB: I am very glad my hon. friend has brought up that question. He has referred to furs and apparently it is a question of Russia against Canada. My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has dealt with that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is not a question of—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROBB: I did not interrupt my hon. friend. He has referred to copper. Now, the difference in our method as compared with that of some other countries is that we widen out the preference to the whole British Empire. We say that these products may come from any part of the empire. Surely my friend will not deny that copper is produced, and will be produced in increasing quantities, in Canada, not only in British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario, but also in the province of Saskatchewan whence my hon. friend comes. In that province there are very good prospects of copper development. Copper is produced in large quantities in Rhodesia.

Now, my friend has referred to drugs. That question has been dealt with by the Minister of National Revenue, who has shown that the particular drug which my hon. friend referred to is on the free list anyway and could not be affected by this requirement. Indeed if my hon. friend looks at the tariff he will discover that in regard to drugs not on the free list there is very little difference in the rating as between the British preference, the intermediate and the general tariff schedules because of the alcoholic content.

With respect to cotton, I say very frankly to the house that there are some classes of cotton goods in regard to which when the price of raw cotton is high the Lancashire workers might not be able to qualify; but as my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) very well pointed out—and I know from his accent that he understands the cotton business—they will qualify in their better goods. I submit that this is in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the minister allow a question? Is he not making his policy in regard to cotton depend upon the price of cotton in the United States and the fluctuating market there?

Mr. ROBB: Not necessarily. As I pointed out when raw cotton is very high there might be an insufficient percentage of labour content in the finished article, but when raw cotton is at a reasonable price the Lancashire manufacturers can qualify on most of their goods.

Now, the government have not been unreasonable in introducing this legislation. It was advertised to the world in the budget speech of last year that Canada proposed to increase the empire labour and material content to 50 per cent, and the house may be surprised to know that up until March 31 there had been no change in the percentage requirement; that is, up until a few weeks ago goods came in under the old 25 per cent regulation. Let us compare our procedure, more than one year's notice, with the procedure in the mother country. I am not sure that my hon. friend from Mackenzie is voicing the views of the government of the United Kingdom, because they recognized that when a change was to be made it was on the principle of "whatsoever thou doest, do quickly." When the British government changed their tariff on optical instruments, they gave Canada a preference of 33⅓ per cent, and we built up quite a good trade with the United Kingdom in cameras and goods of that description. The British government appointed a committee to look into the importations of these goods from Canada. In their report the committee point out that the quantity of these goods coming from Canada had increased from £2,103 in 1921 to £387,870 in 1925. Then the report proceeds:

> This might in the future be prevented, we think, both in the case of cameras and other optical instruments, by raising the proportion of the value of the goods within the schedule which is required to be the result of empire labour from 25 to 75 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: Did they make that change?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The report proceeds:

> We have carefully considered the question of the sufficiency of the present rate of duty, and having regard to the inadequate protection given by the present rate of duty in respect of many of the articles in question, we are of the opinion that there is much to be said for an increase from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent.

The recommendation that the duty should be increased from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent was embodied in the United Kingdom budget of 1926-27 and was effective from May 1, 1926.

The recommendation that the proportion of the value of goods of empire origin be raised from 25 per cent to 75 per cent was made effective on March 1, 1927, and notice to that effect was given by the Board of Trade on February 1, 1927. Britain gave only one month's notice. I am not finding any fault with Great Britain, they were looking after their trade, but hon. gentlemen will observe that in this case Canada was specially singled out because Canadian trade was coming in under those conditions.

My hon. friend has referred to Australia. In the first place let me observe that the Australian tariff is a very much higher tariff than the Canadian. I am not advocating adoption of the Australian tariff. I think the Canadian tariff is very much more suitable for this country than the Australian. The Australian tariff is very much higher than the Canadian. My hon. friend has said that Australia gives a list of exemptions. That is true. But the Australian requirement is 75 per cent. Let me quote to the house from an official document of the Commonwealth of Australia dated at Canberra, December 8, 1927:

> The minister shall determine what are to be regarded as raw materials and in such determination may include partially manufactured Australian materials.
> (b) To goods, not wholly produced or wholly manufactured in the United Kingdom in the terms of paragraph (a), provided they contain at least 75 per cent of United Kingdom labour and/or material in the factory or works cost.
> (c) Notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding paragraphs, to goods of a class or kind not commercially manufactured in Australia provided they contain at least 25 per cent of United Kingdom labour and/or material in their factory or works cost.

The limitations are there; there are exemptions but they must prove that these goods are not manufactured in Australia. My information is that the exporters are very much handicapped in that when the goods arrive there, there may be an industry employing say four or five men and the customs authorities say, "These goods are of a kind manufactured in Australia and therefore the higher duty must be paid." I submit to my hon. friends that the Canadian tariff is very much more favourable to the British Empire, as well as to to Canada herself, than the tariffs of some of these other countries which have been cited.

I was greatly interested in the argument of my hon. friend for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) as I listened to his discussion of cotton. The hon. member argued that the Lancashire mill was unable to obtain cotton of a suitable kind within the British Empire. I will admit that perhaps there is not sufficient cotton available in the Soudan and other British countries—and they produce cotton in Australia. But I could not understand his reasoning when he argued against the United States doing business direct with Canada. His whole argument was that our cotton should be shipped from the United States to England, there manufactured, and brought back to Canada. If I am doing him an injustice in thus interpreting his argument I shall have to apologize.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister is hardly putting it in a fair light. I said that the ultimate effect might be—I did not say it would be, but that it might be—to divert trade with Great Britain to the United States and thus increase the adverse balance against this country.

Mr. ROBB: But my hon. friend forgets that the Canadian mills bring in raw cotton for manufacture in Canada, and there are thousands of good Canadian citizens employed in manufacturing cotton. If my hon. friend were to argue that the Canadian was paying too high a duty on United States cotton yardage then I could understand how he might appeal to the people in his part of the country. But he forgets that the Canadian mills buy their raw cotton from exactly the same source as do the mills in the United Kingdom, and here in Canada it is entirely Canadian labour.

Mr. CAHAN: And the minister wishes to give it a chance to compete.

Mr. ROBB: Well, we have been giving it a chance; but we have been enlarging the British preference. Let me say this in conclusion. If it can be shown that in any case British industry cannot qualify properly, in respect to goods obtainable within the British Empire, we are prepared to consider the question; but we submit that it is fair to the Canadian people that evidence be adduced to our officials that they cannot qualify under the 50 per cent requirement.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

[Mr. Robb.]

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose, an amendment was under consideration.

Mr. MANION: When the committee rose at six o'clock the other evening I was discussing a certain matter which I shall now conclude in a few minutes. I was pointing out on that occasion that there was a somewhat inequitable tax on some of the shares in different classes of stocks, not only mining but industrial stocks as well, and I submitted the point for the consideration of the Minister of Finance. I pointed out, for example, that under the new method 1,000 shares of Noranda at $54 would be $54,000, upon which the tax would be $30, whereas 1,000 shares of Kirkland Lake at $1.02 would represent $1,020, on which the tax would be $10. I have said that the tax is inequitable. Take the case of Kirkland Lake. The tax on the sale of the same number of shares, according to these values, is eighteen times the tax on the Noranda deal. Take another, and you will find a still greater inequality. I have given as an example 1,000 shares of Noranda at $54, amounting to $54,000, with a tax of $30; on 1,000 shares of Columbus Kirkland at 1½ cents —this is one of the smaller penny stocks— we have $15 with a tax of $1. A tax of $1 on $15 applied to the valuation of Noranda would increase the tax on Noranda over one hundred times. Obviously, therefore, the whole tax is inequitable. The small man or small purchaser—the minister objects to my using the words "small dealer," although he is a dealer inasmuch as he is dealing in stocks; for I was not speaking of the broker but of the man who bought and sold the stock—is overtaxed, and that is where the minister is wrong; it is here that he should reconsider the matter. This is not a reduction but an increase, the minister having made a change after bringing in the original budget; and in practically every change in taxation the small man seems to suffer. In my opinion there should be worked out a tax proportionate to value, a tax which would be fair to all dealers, and which would be imposed upon people according to their ability to pay. I do not consider this a tax of that kind. The minister took something off the tax on mining machinery, but he puts it back on mining stocks; in other words, he removes with one hand the burden on mining machinery and with the other puts a heavier tax on the stocks. I think the facts I have submitted to the minister are correct, and they show that the tax is inequitable; the minister is taxing the smaller man more heavily, the man who purchases the cheaper stock. I submit that the whole scheme should be rearranged without injustice generally and making it more equitable to all classes.

That is the sum and substance of what I wish to say, and I shall not take up any more time at present. However, I think the minister should give this matter further consideration and bring in an amendment, if not to the present budget certainly to the budget next year.

Mr. LANG: Mr. Chairman, I wish to join with the hon. member for West York, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Fort William in protesting against the proposed tax on the sale and transfer of shares, which is now before the committee. I do so because I have looked into this proposal to quite an extent since it was brought down on March 1, and I find that the more it is looked into the worse it gets. Certainly it is not a fair or just tax; it works inequalities however you look at it; it places the burden upon the small investor and takes it off the large investor. Recently, in considering this question, it struck me that if the Minister of Finance believes the proposed tax to be an improvement over the tax which has been in effect for some years past surely the present tax would be worth looking into also, because if the present tax is worse than this proposal it certainly must be terrible. I wish to discuss this question first from the standpoint of the tax at present in effect in order to find out why the minister wants a change and, if a change is necessary, to see if we cannot find a more equitable tax than that proposed at present.

In order to appreciate the effect of this tax it will be necessary to consider the present structure of the companies listing shares on the stock exchanges throughout the country. In that connection I happened to notice an article on the mining page of the Toronto Star of last Friday, which gives the structure of 117 of the companies whose shares are most dealt in through the stock exchanges of Toronto. The article begins as follows:

> Following is a compilation of the market value as of May 4 of the outstanding share capital of the most active mining securities listed on the Standard stock and mning exchange of Toronto:

Then follows this statement showing the capitalization, the present sale value, the par value and so on of the shares of these 117 companies. With the consent of the committee I would like to place this list on Hansard without going through it, and then I desire to deal with some of the companies in order to show how the present tax works out:

Let us take Abana, the first stock on the list. The shares of Abana, a mining company in northern Quebec which has become well known during the last year or so, have a par value of $1. On May 4 the selling price per share was $2.10. Under the present system a tax of three cents is collected on shares to the par value of $100, so that on the sale of 100 shares of Abana the tax of three cents would be collected, although the actual selling price would be $210. I use this illustration in order to point out that the present tax is not an ad valorem tax—according to value; it is a tax on the par value of shares. At present Abana is selling for more than twice the par value, and the $1.10 additional is not taxed at all.

Then let us take Aconda, another mining company in northern Quebec. This is a cheap stock which has been on the market for some time. It has a par value, or a fictitious value, of $1 per share and on May 4 the selling price was 10 cents per share. On the sale of 100 shares of that stock the tax of three cents would be collected, yet the selling price of 100 shares would be only $10. My whole point is that the tax in force now is most unfair because it is not a tax according to value. That is the only fair way of imposing a tax of this kind, but this tax is imposed on a fictitious value placed upon the shares when these companies are formed. Under these conditions it is no wonder that we are trying to get something more equitable, and probably the Minister of Finance is trying to find some method which will bring in more revenue.

Now we will consider Argonaut, another cheap stock. This is a mining company in northern Ontario whose shares have been dealt in for a number of years, although it shows very little activity at present. The shares have a par value of $1, but on May 4 the selling price was only two cents per share. On 100 shares of Argonaut the tax of three cents would be collected, but the actual selling price of the 100 shares would be only $2. In other words, when you deal in Argonaut at 2 cents per share, on 100 shares you pay a tax on $98 which does not exist at all. This illustrates very clearly the inequality of the tax.

Now let us take some of the higher priced shares and see how this tax works out. Consolidated Smelters is one of the good, safe, big mining stocks of which every person knows. These shares have a par value of $25, but on May 4 last they were selling for $430. In order to collect a tax of three cents the sale of four shares of this stock would be necessary, making a total par value of $100, but the actual selling price of four shares on May 4 would be $1,720, so $1,620 would not be taxed at all. That shows the inequality of this tax in another way.

Falconbridge Nickel, another of the good mining stocks in Ontario, affords a further illustration of how the present tax works out. When this tax was framed seven years ago, in 1922, I suppose the government thought they were imposing a tax on value; they imposed a tax of 3 cents on every $100 of par value of shares of stock sold or transferred. Apparently some time after that the Department of National Revenue realized that there were some shares which had no par value and I have been told that for some time they did not know what to do because the act did not cover that class of share. I have no doubt that for a number of years no tax was collected on stocks of no par value, which is of considerable importance when we realize that out of a list of 117 companies the stocks of which are being traded in at present there are quite a number of stocks of no par value.

In going down this list the first stock of no par value that I come to is Falconbridge Nickel. On May 4 the selling price of that stock was $12 per share. No matter how many of these no par value shares were traded in, they were taxed on their selling value, a 3 cent tax on every $100 worth. I cannot understand why the government do not realize, when they present a proposal to change the method of taxation, that an ad valorem tax would be the absolutely fair way of taxing these shares. It is hardly fair to such stocks as Falconbridge Nickel when it is considered that there are other high priced stocks which are paying taxes on a certain par value when they are selling as high as twenty-five times the amount of their par value.

The next stock I should like to mention is Lake Shore. The Lake Shore mine is in northern Ontario, up in the Kirkland lake district, in the riding which I have the honour to represent. This stock has a par value of $1 per share. That means that when there is a transfer of 100 shares of Lake Shore stock the government receives a 3 cent tax. On May 4 that stock was selling at $27 per share, just twenty-seven times its par value. On a sale of one share at $27, $26 of that amount would be exempt from taxation. I know these Lake Shore people quite well and I am sure that they do not desire the government or anyone else to discriminate in their favour, as is the case with the present tax and as will, in another way, be the case with the proposed tax.

Another of our gold stocks which is selling above par is Teck-Hughes. This stock also has a par value of $1 per share and it is selling around $9 per share, nine times its par value. Under the present tax, on every sale there would be $8 per share which would not be taxed. It is no wonder that the Minister of Finance was not receiving the income he thought he would from this 3 cent tax. Had it been made an ad valorem tax and not a hotch-potch, graduated sort of thing such as he is proposing, it would work out quite fairly. Let the tax be a 3 cent tax on $100 of value, as it has been since 1922, but on the value of the shares sold. If that were done every person would be satisfied and happy because no one would be discriminated against and the government would be receiving a revenue at least four times as great as it is under the present tax; and the tax would remain at the same rate.

The next stock I should like to mention is that of Sherritt-Gordon, a recent development in northern Manitoba. I had given very little attention to this matter previously but when I picked up the Toronto Star on my way home on Saturday and read this article it started me thinking. This Sherritt-Gordon mine is not producing as yet, but it is expected that it will be within a year or two. The stock has a par value of $1 and is selling to-day at about nine times that value. On every share of Sherritt-Gordon stock which is traded in on the market about $8 is exempt from taxation. The Minister of Finance is losing for the people of Canada the tax which he would be receiving on that extra $8, if it were an ad valorem tax.

[Mr. Lang.]

Another stock is the Sudbury Contact. This is one of the new companies, formed within the last year or two in the Sudbury district near some of the big producers. It has not been successful so far; the initial money for development purposes has, I suppose, been pretty well spent and I understand it has not yet found any quantity of ore. Sudbury Contact has a par value of $1 a share, but on May 4 it was selling at 6 cents a share. Let the committee think how that affects the little fellow who is having a hard time to finance and get along. A sale of 100 shares of Sudbury Contact, which has a par value of $1 a share, pays a tax of 3 cents to the government, just the same as the high priced share that is selling at $27. On this stock, selling at 6 cents a share, the tax, which is 3/100 of one per cent of the par value, amounts to one-half of one per cent of the actual value. Wherever you have a low priced share selling under par, at half par, quarter par or 10 per cent of par, then it has to pay a tax which should never be imposed upon it. It is absolutely unfair and unjust and it places the burden on the one who finds it hardest to pay. On the other hand, as regards every share of stock that is selling at over par, where the mine is getting into good shape and producing and where the public wants the stock because it has merit, under the present tax the government does not receive any revenue at all on every dollar that the stock sells over its par value.

Another stock is the Treadwell Yukon, one of the great mines of Canada. It has a par value of $1, but it is selling on the market now at $13 a share. On every share of that stock that is traded in at $13 a share, $12 escapes taxation. Surely if the committee will just think seriously for a moment about the sort of taxation that we have had on the sale of shares of stock, and the sort of taxation that is proposed, it will realize that the one is just as crazy, foolish and unfair as the other. It is the simplest thing in the world to remedy this situation; it is staring us right in the face in the present tax that we have. All that is necessary is, instead of cutting out clause 58 as is proposed, simply to delete the word "par". It says that a tax of 3 cents is to be imposed on every $100 of par value. Just leave that word "par" out, and let it read that there is a 3 cent tax for every $100 of value of shares traded in. In that way we shall have a fair and equitable tax, a tax that will bring in, as I say, at least four times as much revenue to the public treasury as the tax in its present form will do.

I do not know that I should take up any more of the time of the committee. Surely it must be evident to any person who wants to give thought to the matter, that there is a fair and equitable way to raise revenue on a tax of this kind and that it can be done without the imposition of an onerous tax or one that will bear heavily on anyone. I am not a bit afraid that the Minister of Finance or the government will make it too heavy a tax as long as it is left where it bears equally upon all the people concerned. If it should ever happen that as great a percentage of taxation should be proposed on the higher priced as on the low priced shares, I know enough pressure would be brought to bear upon the Minister of Finance and the government from quarters that have had nothing to say about this tax, to ensure that such a step would not be taken. So far as I am concerned, the government can go just as far as they like in regard to this tax so long as they make it equitable, fair and just, bearing equally upon all; and that can be done only by its being made an ad valorem tax as I suggest, simply by deleting the word "par" from clause 58. Who in the world ever thought of imposing a tax on par value when the prices of the shares do not represent par value? Par value is simply a unit of division of the number of shares stipulated in the formation of a company. Naturally the big fellows do not worry about this tax; the little fellows apparently have not many people to look after their interests and they cannot raise much of a protest. But surely when the matter is brought so plainly to the attention of the committee, little more need be said.

I have under my hand a table something along the lines of those given by the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard with regard to the proposed tax. I do not know that it is necessary to give the figures, because I cannot conceive of any sane people going ahead with a tax such as is proposed when it is so evident that a fair, reasonable, just and equitable tax can be imposed and a greater revenue obtained for the people of Canada. I will, however, give a few of the figures, because I have spent a little time in working out the table. Suppose a mining company wishes to raise $50,000, which is the amount very often raised for the initial development stages; in order to do that, if the shares sell at 5 cents each, one million shares must be sold. In very many cases 5 cents is the initial price of the shares. Under the new proposal—which never will go into effect, but if it did—the tax on that $50,000 would be $1,000. Suppose that $50,000 is raised by the sale of 500,000 shares at 10 cents a share. The government would then receive in taxation $500. The government takes a tax of $1,000 when $50,000 is raised by selling a million shares at 5 cents a share, but only $500 when $50,000 is raised by selling 500,000 shares at 10 cents a share. Suppose the $50,000 is raised by the sale of 100,000 shares at 50 cents a share; the government tax would then be only $100. So that on $50,000 raised by selling stock at 5 cents a share the tax is $1,000; at 10 cents a share, it is $500; at 50 cents a share, it is $100. The government are taking less in taxation all the time, although the same amount, $50,000 is raised in all three cases.

Suppose 50,000 shares are sold at $1 a share. The government would then take $125. That seems wrong; there is another jump in the tax, which further demonstrates its lack of equity and fairness. Suppose 50,000 shares are sold at $1.10 a share. The amount raised would be $55,000, and the government tax amounts to $500. Truly a wonderful system, if it ever went into effect!

Suppose $50,000 is raised by the sale of 25,000 shares at $2 a share. The government tax on that would be $250. Not so bad, but still not so good; there are others better than that. Suppose $50,000 is raised by the sale of 12,500 shares at $4 a share. The government tax on that would be $250. Or take the sale of 5,000 shares at $10 a share. The government tax on that would be $100. That is pretty fair. At $20 a share, selling 2,500 shares, the tax would be just $50, although it is a $50,000 deal just the same. The government would take $50 on that $50,000 deal and $1,000 on a $50,000 deal when the shares sell at 5 cents a share. At $125 a share, selling 400 shares and raising $50,000, lo and behold! the government tax now is only $16, although it is a $50,000 transaction just the same as in the first case, where the government got a tax of $1,000 when the shares were selling at 5 cents each.

That is how it work out, Mr. Chairman. Surely this committee is never going to allow a tax of that kind to be placed upon the people of this country. If there were no other form of taxation that would be fair, equitable and just, one might say that we could not get away from this tax, that we have to raise the revenue; but when the tax can be imposed in such a way as to bring in a much greater revenue, a tax that will be fair to all, and that will not increase the burden on the buyer of the smallest shares, a tax that will take the burden off the little fellow and place a fair share of it upon those who are buying the higher valued shares, we should adopt that method. It is so simple that you would think anyone could see it. Simply place an ad valorem tax on the transfer of shares. Why in the world don't we do it that way? I feel sure that if the Minister of Finance considers this matter a little further, he will withdraw the proposal now before the committee; that he will impose an ad valorem tax, a tax that is fair to everybody, a tax on values, an equitable tax according to the size of the transaction. Let that be done, and I care not whether the minister raises the tax higher than 3 cents on every $100 of value in the transaction. I am satisfied that if he will leave the tax at 3 cents on every $100 of value in the transaction—not on the par value, because that would be foolish—it would work out well if the method I suggest were adopted. The only shares that have been paying an ad valorem tax have been the shares of no par value stocks, and the Department of National Revenue, in administering the tax on the no par value stock based it on the value of the transaction, as should be done in every case. As the act stood it provided simply for a tax on shares according to their par value, and there must have been some scratching of heads in the National Revenue department when they were figuring out how to tax shares of no par value, because there is nothing in the act to give them any authority to do so, so far as I can see. The act simply says, "three cents on every hundred dollars of the par value of the stock sold." This works out unfairly. It can be made fair, and I feel sure it will be.

I have a large amount of other material here which I would have gone into had I thought it necessery. I feel confident that there will be a great sigh of relief not only in stock brokers' offices but among all classes of Canadians if this particular tax is levied in a way fair and equitable to those concerned, and it seems to me that my suggestion is the only way in which it can be done. It is not simply few places that are interested in this tax; it is not merely our mining constituencies that are affected, but the people throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion realize what an important factor in our national life is the wonderful development that is now taking place in our mining and oil industries. Therefore we should not fool around any longer with a hotch-potch, graduted, unfair sort of tax such as that now under consideration. If the Minister of Finance is afraid there would not be a sufficient revenue from the tax I have suggested, let him instruct his accountants to figure out the returns from such a tax, and I venture to say he will find that, a three cent tax on every hundred dollar value of all share transactions will bring him a revenue four times as great as the revenue derived under the tax at present in effect or to be derived from his present proposal. This proposed tax would be obnoxious to the people and it would be unfair. I am sure the only reason that we have not realized the unfairness of the tax at present in effect, is that none of us were thinking about it or talking about it. As a matter of fact I never thought of looking into it until I read an article in the Star on my way home last Saturday. I was under the impression that the present tax was an ad valorem tax such as I have suggested. The only part of the tax on an ad valorem basis is the tax imposed on no par value stock, simply because there was no other way of taxing such stock.

Mr. ESLING: It is good to hear a voice from the other side of the house, Mr. Chairman, in agreement with us. The minister and practically every other member on the government side has received protests against this proposed resolution, from almost every part of the Dominion. The main argument against is its lack of balance and absolute disparity in application. It is unreasonable and inconsistent. While the people generally have accorded a generous acknowledgment of the Finance minister's good judgment and intention, in this case they are very much dissatisfied, and I suspect that he himself is not very enthusiastic about this resolution, nor can any of those associated with him be keen for its adoption.

To be as brief as possible I shall present my argument by way of illustration. I will take the difference in tax paid by an ordinary investor as compared with a trust company. We will take a trust company, for instance, which invests the sum of $250,000 in 500 shares of the value of $500 each. The tax is merely $20 at 4 cents per share under the new rate. Or that trust company may invest the same sum of money—and I think this is a point that should be considered—it may be the same sum of money, but if it is used to purchase a different kind of shares, it becomes subject to a different rate of tax. If that same trust company invested its $250,000 in 1,000 shares at $250 each, instead of paying $20 tax they will pay $40. Now we will take a man who has $1,000 to invest. I am sure this will appeal to the general public, and I imagine it must appeal to the Minister of Finance as unjust. This man buys two shares of Smelters, we will say, at $500 per share; his tax is 8 cents. If he buys 4 shares, we will say, of Canadian Pacific Railway stock at $250 a share, his tax is 16 cents. But this man may say, "I think I will not buy those high-priced shares, I will get some of the low-priced shares." So he invests $1,000 in 10 cent shares, and his tax will be ten dollars. If he puts his $1,000 into 8 cents shares, his tax will be $12.50. If he invests in 4 cent shares his tax will be $25. If he uses his $1,000 to buy 2 cent shares, his tax will be $50. It is inconceivable that such an unreasonable tax should be proposed, and I am confident that it would be difficult for any member on the other side of the house to justify to his constituents a vote in favour of this resolution. I am sure that most of the ministers have received protests against this tax. It is to be hoped that for the welfare of the mining industry the hon. Minister of Finance will withdraw this proposal and bring in something of a more reasonable nature.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the hon. member permit a question? I am not so conversant with mining stocks as he is, apparently. Under this arrangement is it not a double tax, a tax on the par value and on the actual amount involved in the transaction?

Mr. ESLING: Not under the new resolution.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister would be well advised if, in accordance with the argument put forward by my hon. friend (Mr. Lang), he placed the tax on the actual selling value of the stocks to be taxed. The minister has gone on the supposition that this is a tax against the stockbrokers; as a matter of fact it is not a tax against the stockbrokers or the Toronto stock exchange or any other such institution. This is a tax against the actual mining operations in the country. If, as pointed out by several members to-night, a company decides to put stock on the market at $1 a share at par, it has a great deal less to pay than the company which decides to put on the market stock valued at $1 per share which it sells at 5 or 10 cents. Every dollar collected by this government in the first instance is collected from the actual assets or receipts of the company itself. Ordinarily speaking, a company starting in business requires a capital of from $50,000 to $100,000, and in order to raise that money it must sell stock on terms that are agreeable to the brokers and to the public. Usually these stocks are sold at a very small figure per share—10 cents or less. In that case, according to the original tax proposed by the minister, one-tenth of all the funds goes to the treasury of the Dominion—one-tenth of all the funds secured; and probably one-fifth more goes to the broker. The result is that the money actually secured for the development of the mine is small indeed. The minister would be well advised to withdraw the item and in the meantime to reconsider the matter, which is of vital importance to the development of new mines not only in Ontario but in practically the entire Dominion. Could he not try to secure some equitable means of levying the tax on the market value of the stock at it is sold?

Mr. ROBB: The tax as originally introduced was complained of, particularly by the mining brokers. There was very little complaint except as regards those stocks included in paragraph (e):

> One cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price of three dollars or less per share.

Now there is before the committee an amendment which it occurs to me, after listening to the arguments of some hon. gentlemen, has probably been overlooked. That amendment now provides:

> (e) one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over one dollar per share, but not more than three dollars per share;
> (f) one-fourth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price over fifty cents per share, but not more than one dollar per share;
> (g) one-tenth of one cent for every share of stock sold or transferred at a price of fifty cents or less per share.

Mr. ARTHURS: According to the amended schedule the tax on stocks selling at 10 cents would be $1 per $100.

Mr. ROBB: There are three parties to this legislation before the committee. There is the prospector, there is the investing public and there are those concerned with revenues of the country, and I submit that the readjustment as presented is not unfair to the development of mines, while it is fair to the public and to the government revenues. Hon. gentlemen must observe that when stock is first allotted there is no tax whatever on the original transfer; it is only when they begin trading and selling the stocks to the public that the tax is imposed.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not according to the original act.

Mr. ROBB: Well, I will quote it to my hon. friend if he has any doubt in the matter. Section 61 of the Special War Revenue Act reads:

> The first delivery by a corporation or company of such shares, or debenture stock, in order to effect an issue, or the first issue of a bond, or a sale or transfer of any bond between any recognized dealers or brokers shall not be subject to the tax imposed by this part.

That is to say, the first delivery is exempt.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is the delivery to the brokers.

Mr. ROBB: The same thing applies to stock.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not according to the act.

Mr. DUNNING: It applies to stock as well.

Mr. FRASER: Does it apply to common stock?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: What the minister has quoted does not change our argument. We were not arguing—at least some of us were not—on that point but in regard to the sale of stocks on the market.

Mr. ROBB: I repeat, there is no tax on the first transfer, and I submit that this tax is a reasonable one.

Mr. ARTHURS: I have not before me the act to which the minister has referred nor have I the details of the proposed change. But my impression is that while the original transfer from the company to the brokers is not taxable, the transfer to the public is; and it must then be an additional charge to the company so far as the stock is concerned.

Mr. ROBB: As soon as they begin speculating then certainly the nation has a right to take some share of the profits. If I were representing a mining section of the country I might take a onesided view of the matter. But this is in the interests of the mining industry, and in support of that statement I shall quote the opinion of the Northern Miner.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the editor's opinion.

Mr. ROBB: Well, he should know what the opinion is in that part of the country. And as a matter of fact any opinion expressed in an editorial column is largely the editor's opinion. I quote:

[Mr. Arthurs.]

> While the business of company promotion by brokers has lagged lately, reducing the prospector's claim market, fortunately he has never been in such good position to sell first-class discoveries. Dozens of big mining organizations will listen eagerly to his story if he has a good one to tell, and will send engineers hopping by plane to examine. If his show stands up money is waiting, on the nail. Easy going, long distance deals are completely out of fashion. The prospector can get quick action if he is willing to deal with the big companies. Competition for good ground is so keen that he is sure of good terms. . . On the whole, it has probably been a good thing for everybody that the promotional game has been slack. Buyers have had a chance to catch their breath and promoters a chance to realize and act upon the new conditions. The public was overloaded with half-baked propositions. . .

The Monetary Times of January 11 quotes Mr. Norman Urquhart, president of the Standard Stock and Mining Exchange of Toronto, as follows:

> Another development which deserves mention and which has come with the increasing confidence in the mining industry is the improved cash position of new companies making application for stock listing privileges, compared with less than two years ago. To-day 60 per cent of the companies making an application have from $100,000 to $200,000. This ensures fewer mining failures than formerly because of lack of capital to carry on and indicates how much easier it is to raise money for preliminary development.

Then I have here another statement made by one of the most prominent bankers in the city of Toronto, where I suppose more mining shares are sold than in any other city of Canada. This statement was made by Mr. Bogart, general manager of the Dominion Bank, in his annual report:

> With respect to mining, entirely too many stock issues are made at a premature stage of development—some with no claim to recognition whatever are traded in daily—and it is a great pity that the mining industry, which in proper hands is making fine headway, should have to suffer through unworthy exploitation, and it does Canada no good abroad. The Ontario government and some sections of the press do what they can to protect the public, but there should be stricter regulation of the sale of stock and closer supervision of those who sell it.

Mr. FRASER: What was the date of that observation?

Mr. ROBB: It was made at the annual meeting of the bank on December 31, 1928.

Mr. MANION: That was before the imposition of this tax.

Mr. ROBB: But this is pretty good advice. I submit to the house that as compared with other countries our tax is not unreasonable. If you go over to London, England, to sell these mining shares, here is the tax you will pay:

Not exceeding £5, one shilling.
Exceeding £5 but not exceeding £10, two shillings.
Exceeding £10 but not exceeding £15, three shillings.
Exceeding £15 but not exceeding £20, four shillings.

And so on up to ten shillings.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that on the par value?

Mr. ROBB: That is per share.

Mr. FRASER: How can you compare the old country with Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I will be finished in a moment, and then my hon. friend can talk until eleven o'clock if he wishes. I submit that this is not an unreasonable tax but that it is fair as compared with the sales tax the miner must pay on his clothing and equipment when he goes out to prospect for these mines. I have had some experience in municipal life as well as in this federal parliament, and I have never yet known a tax which everyone considered fair.

Mr. McRAE: I am sure the opinion of the Minister of Finance is in keeping with the opinion expressed by the presidents of the prominent financial institutions, but I submit that the mining industry of this country never would have been developed under these opinions. As is well known, this great mining development has not been brought about on a strictly financial basis but by the optimism and the hope of the Canadians who have invested their money in these companies.

I listened with a good deal of interest to what the Minister of Finance said with regard to the transfer of these stocks, but it is not quite clear to me that he has covered the point which I know a number of hon. gentlemen have in mind. In the financing of mining corporations certain stocks have been underwritten, and it is not clear to me as yet whether or not the transfer from the underwriters is a transfer on which a tax may be collected. I submit to the committee that that is an original transfer, and, as such, should not be taxed.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish unduly to delay this item, but I have just one further observation to make. I have no quarrel with the minister's statement, but at the same time it does not alter the fact that on a sale of stock to the value of $54,000, for example, there is a tax of $30 and on a sale of $1,020 there is a tax of $10. In other words, the tax on the one is eighteen times greater than the tax on the other, taking these stocks according to their market value. In the other case which I mentioned, the sale of Columbus-Kirkland to the value of $15, there was a tax of $1, while in the other sale amounting to $54,000 the tax was only $30, or according to value more than one hundred times on the small transaction as compared with the large one. That is the attitude I have taken; that is the attitude taken by the hon. member for South Timiskaming and by other hon. members on this side of the house. We protest against the inequality of the tax on the small buyer and seller as compared with the tax on the man who can buy $50,000, $100,000 or $200,000 worth of stocks.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend referred to a purchase of shares, worth $500 each, to the amount of $500,000. The tax on such a transaction would be $40, whereas if shares worth $1.01 each were purchased to the amount of $500,000 the tax would be $5,000; in other words the tax on the lower priced share would be about 125 times greater than the tax on the higher priced share. That is not fair.

To a certain extent the minister has alleviated the situation; that we admit. As it stood previously it was impossible, but I should like to point out that in addition to the inequality of the tax there is another serious feature. In British Columbia at least the mining development since the war has been due largely to what my hon. friend from North Vancouver described as the optimism of the public. There the people have gone into the underwriting of legitimate propositions put forward under the best mining engineers in the country and they have purchased shares in these companies. As the matter now stands, however, if they find that owing to the tax, the brokerage and so on they must get about $1.05 for a share for which they paid $1.01 in order to get their money back it will deter people from purchasing these shares, and unless the shares are marketable people will not purchase them. If a man is considering going into a new proposition the first requisite is that the shares must be marketable, and I think these are the two main points we have in mind. First we believe that this tax does not work out equally—perhaps that is the most serious feature—and in the second place, these shares must be made marketable. If the tax is too high the shares will be marketable no longer, and if there is inequality in the tax people will hesitate before undertaking to purchase these stocks.

Mr. ROBB: According to a statement prepared by the department I find that in 1926-27 the Ontario government tax on shares amounted to $223,096.27. Quoting only the Standard exchange, which I imagine does practically all this business in Toronto, in the same year the federal revenue was $47,393.01. In 1927-28 the Ontario tax was $399,116.98; while the federal mining tax was $121,114.70. I have a statement showing the number of shares of stock sold on the Standard mining exchange on March 15, 1929, and the tax which would be applicable under the schedule which we are now divided on. There were 324,900 shares at 50 cents or less, which gives a revenue of $324.90. There were 186,500 shares over 50 cents but not over $1, which, at a quarter of a cent per share, would give $466.25. There were 114,900 shares over $1 per share, but not over $3, which, at one cent per share, would give a revenue of $1,149. There were 150,900 shares valued at over $3 but not over $20, which, at 2 cents per share, would give $3,018. There were 29,300 shares valued at over $20 per share but not over $100, which, at 3 cents per share, would give a revenue of $879. It will be observed that there is a turnover of 324,900 shares of what might be called speculative stocks. I submit to the house that this is a very fair tax and that it does not work out as the hon. member for Fort William has pointed out.

Mr. McRAE: I am afraid I have not made my point clear. In these mines the venture, if we can call it such, is underwritten and the underwriters take a certain percentage of the shares. I should like to know whether the shares in the name of the underwriters will be considered as original shares and not taxed in the event of a transfer.

Mr. ROBB: I am not able to answer the hon. member because the Department of Finance does not administer this act.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is an essential point.

Mr. ROBB: When the act was framed it appears that the minister was given power to deal fairly with all cases. I have already quoted section 61 of the act, but I will quote it again. It is as follows:

> The first delivery by a corporation or company of such shares, or debenture stock, in order to effect an issue, or the first issue of a bond, or a sale or transfer of any bond between any recognized dealers or brokers shall not be subject to the tax imposed by this part.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is only dealers or brokers; it does not cover the point raised.

Mr. ROBB: That is what they tell me in the department. Section 62 reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the purpose of determining what constitutes a sale or transfer under this part.

I am not just sure what the regulations are.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think this government should impose this tax. I do not think the federal government should impose any tax in connection with enterprises which are dependent entirely upon the provinces. The crown in the right of the Dominion does not own, nor has it any royalty in, the minerals in the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario, so why should we levy a tax of this kind? The provinces already tax these enterprises, and this means double taxation, which is wrong in principle. In my judgment the minister is making a great mistake in proposing to tax these mining ventures. Nearly all of them exist where the crown has no right to the mines or minerals. The federal government have no title and no royalty in Quebec, so why should they impose a tax? They have no title or royalty in Ontario, so why should they impose a tax? The same is true in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, and within a few months will be equally true in Manitoba. Why should the Dominion impose taxation on the transfer of mining shares when the provinces are already being overtaxed to provide the cost of the very trails which lead up to the mines, the schools in which the children of the miners receive their education, the other facilities which have to be maintained for the life of the community itself? I submit that this is an unfair tax against ventures which are already taxed by the provinces. It simply means that taxation by the Dominion will be superimposed upon the existing taxation; it means taxation by a power which has neither title nor right to the products of the mines in any way, shape or form.

There is something more to be said about it. This tax works out in a most inequitable fashion. I shall not repeat the figures already given, but I should like to emphasize the point made by the hon. members for Parry Sound and North Vancouver. Under the statute as it now stands the first issue is free from taxation. That is the issue which divests the enterprise of its securities and places them in the hands of the underwriters, whether the underwriters be dealers and divide it up with others, or whether they maintain it for themselves. The purchasers who buy either from the underwriters or from one of the recognized dealers have to pay a tax, and the brokers provide for that tax when they sell to the public. That is the point which the hon. member for Parry Sound has been making. It is too late to suggest that this tax should not be imposed in view of the fact that this government has not given assistance to any industry with a view to aiding its development. What has the government done to aid the pulp and paper industry, which belongs to the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Not a single thing which has contributed either to its success or to its failure.

Mr. POWER: The provincial governments contributed largely to its failure. The industry would have been better off had they left it alone.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Quebec South may be speaking with authority with respect to his province, but this is not a provincial legislature; it is the Dominion parliament. I do not propose to discuss whether they were right or wrong, but this government did not do anything to make the industry a success or a failure. They have not helped in the expansion of trade through the finding of markets—although the minister may say he did something in Australia and then by order in council shifted it on to New Zealand so that their butter could come here and kill our dairy industry. If he regards that as an achievement of which to be proud, he is entitled to the credit. Take our next largest industry, that of mining. Minerals to the value of $275,000,000 were mined in this country last year, and the Minister of Finance cannot point to a single thing which justifies his imposing a tax on this transfer of mining shares. The royalties of these mines belong to the crown in the right of the provinces, and the whole obligation of maintaining the enterprises engaged in developing them rests upon the provincial authorities. An important principle is involved here. Because it is said there is large speculation in mining stocks the government proposes to tax the transfer of such stocks, although the provinces alone have to do with them and the burdens connected therewith are theirs, not ours. The Minister of Finance has pointed out that the revenue received by the Dominion from the transactions on the Standard exchange amounted to only $47,000 or $48,000 in round figures, while the province obtained some $200,000. Why should not the province receive that? What interest has the Dominion of Canada in the mines of Ontario, Quebec or British Columbia?

It is the old story of overlapping taxation which came before the interprovincial conference two years ago. These mining ventures may be highly successful for some people and equally unsuccessful for others, but in the meantime, because they offer a target at which the government can direct a taxing power—the provinces have nursed this industry along until it has reached a point where it plays a very important part in the life of the country—they say: We are going to tax it. I do not think that is right.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Would that be any worse than imposing an export duty on their ores?

Mr. BENNETT: Who was talking about an export duty on ores?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My hon. friend's friends are talking about it.

Mr. BENNETT: What ores? Newfoundland?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member was out of the room. I am glad to see that he has wakened up. He has wakened up at the wrong time, like Rip Van Winkle. We were not talking about export duties on ores.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My hon. friend's friends have been talking about them for weeks.

Mr. BENNETT: Would my hon. friend just state who they were?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) who is sitting right beside my hon. friend now.

Mr. BENNETT: What did he say?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He said that he would put a duty on the export of our minerals and would not let them ship them out of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: And what else? Let my hon. friend give the rest of it.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He would make them refine and manufacture them here.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. I think one might almost say in the words of Shakespeare: "I thank thee Jew, for teaching me that word," because it makes it perfectly clear the hon. member for Vancouver Centre said what I would expect he would have said, namely, that he did not believe in Canadian mineral products being sent in the raw state to the United States of America and then bought back by our own people at one-quarter of a cent higher price than their competitors in the foreign country paid for their own product.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My hon. friend said just now that we had nothing to do with that.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that that was not what we were discussing to-night; that we were discussing the question of taxation on the transfer of shares. We discussed the other matter some days ago. I suggest to the minister that he abandon this taxation in its entirety, having regard to his buoyant revenues, and after the speech to which we listened to-night from the hon. member for South Timiskaming, who has given a great deal of consideration to the matter and whose province is developing a mining industry without any assistance from this government. Of course the Minister of Finance will say: "Have we not put mining machinery on the free list?" Well, the mines would be developed whether he did that or not, whether he obtained or lost the revenue. What has the government done to develop the mining industry? The tax should be imposed by the province which has to bear the burden, not by the Dominion government, which picks out this industry as a target at which to aim taxation.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition is arguing as if this were a new tax.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROBB: It is a revision of a tax already imposed.

Mr. BENNETT: The other was a mere stamp tax.

Mr. ROBB: Well, this is a stamp tax.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be classified as such.

Mr. MANION: It is a revision upwards, of course.

Mr. ROBB: I am in agreement with my hon. friend as to the desirability of getting away as soon as possible from this double taxation, but he will not deny that the federal authorities have the right to impose taxation anywhere in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not for a moment doubt that right.

Mr. ROBB: We require the revenue. We cannot build railways into the mining districts to take out the ore unless we get revenue somewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: But the freight rates surely furnish that revenue. According to the Minister of Railways that is so; otherwise we would not be building railways.

[Mr. E. J. Young.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has admitted that we have contributed towards helping the mines by reducing the duties on the implements of production required in the mines.

Mr. BENNETT: Implements of production not made in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: But apparently my hon. friend has forgetten that the government has built some railways into this section and proposes to build more. We must have revenue, and I submit that this is a fair tax. It is a revision of an old tax.

Mr. MANION: A revision upwards.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend from Fort William is right, another year is coming and the matter can be considered.

Mr. MANION: I do not know why the Minister of Finance should link me up with that "another year". He has done that two or three times. I said that if he could not do it this year, he should do it next year. Let him put the responsibility on his own shoulders. He takes the attitude that this is a revision of the tax and he is a great boaster of revising taxes downwards. This is a revision upwards. As regards the Dominion government helping mining by building railways, the government that built railways to help mining was the Conservative government of Ontario. The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario was the railway that did a great deal towards the development of mining in this country.

Mr. MALCOLM: Who started the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario?

Mr. MANION: I do not know, but I know who completed it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends may laugh, but they do not know any more about who started it than I do.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, they do.

Mr. MANION: The Conservative government was the one that built it, and the Conservative government of Ontario has done more for mining in this country than any other government. I think the minister would be well advised to change the tax this year. I repeat that if he does not do it this year, he should do it next year.

Mr. McRAE: I am rather astonished at the Minister of Finance mixing up his department with the Department of Railways. I think he might look after his own department and the Minister of Railways look after his.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance to-night says that he is going to revise the tax upwards, and I suppose the people of Canada will have the pleasure of hearing him say next year: Yes, see how I have reduced the taxes! It is the old way. How long does he think the people will be fooled by that sort of guff?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only word that describes it, and for the last five years that is what has been going on in Canada. The Minister of Finance introduces legislation year after year raising taxes and then reducing them, and he says to the people: Look how I have revised the taxes and lessened the burden of taxation! To-night he is going to revise this tax upwards. He says: Wait till next year. Next year he will say: Look what we did for the mining industry! We have reduced the tax 25 per cent. How long does he expect the people of Canada to be fooled by that sort of thing?

Mr. ROBB: Then my hon. friend will be able to say: I told you so.

Mr. BENNETT: We are taking proper steps this session to provide against a recurrence of such conditions. I suggest that the Minister of Finance explain to his colleague the Minister of Railways, who has been giving us all this talk about the self-supporting capacity of the railways, how they are going to take care of themselves, and how he has devised during long and tiresome nights a method of extending the railway system without loss of revenue; how he, the Minister of Finance, is helping to build railways with one-tenth of one per cent of a tax on mining stocks! That is the story my hon. friend is giving the country. The Dominion government got $47,000 out of this tax the year before last and the Minister of Railways is going to build a railway to Chibougamau. He was not able to pronounce the name the other night. That is good for the Minister of Finance, but I think he should have a quiet little talk with the Minister of Railways, because I am satisfied he will have to impose a good many taxes of that kind before he will be able to build his terminals at Montreal or extend his Gaspe and Oriental to Turkestan, because that is where it is bound for on its oriental mission.

Mr. LANG: Just another word. A number of hon. gentlemen have spoken since I first rose to discuss this question. The Minister of Finance has read some statements by bankers in Toronto, and something he saw in The Northern Miner. Those, speaking generally, were articles about mining and stock conditions in the country at the time they were written. None of them had any reference whatever to the present proposed mining tax They were written before the minister even thought about this tax, but even if they were written after the minister's proposal had been brought down, they had not in mind at all the mining tax that we have or any proposed tax; they had in mind only a condition that exists throughout Canada to-day.

The minister quoted some figures about the revenues of the provinces and of the Dominion under the present tax. I could not catch his figures, but I have some here that might interest the committee. Under the present tax which has been in effect since 1922, in 1927-28 the government collected on the transactions over the Toronto exchanges $615,000; in 1928-29, for the first nine months, the government collected $700,000, which amounts to approximately $950,000 for the year. The present tax, collected in the manner in which it must be collected, relieves from taxation entirely every cent of value over the par value of a stock, and if you go down that list of shares printed in the article in the Toronto Star, showing the 117 issues that are mostly traded in at the present time, you will find that the great volume of business, so far as money value is concerned, is in stocks that are selling away above their par value. In other words, the government is getting only 3 cents on every $100 of par value of the trading that goes on, when the great bulk of the trading, not in the number of shares, but in the dollar volume of business, is in shares that are selling from two to twenty times their par value. That means, so far as I have been able to judge in the short time I have been able to study this matter, at least two-fifths of the value of the business done over the Toronto exchanges is not taxed at all because it is made up of transactions in stocks selling over par. I have not a doubt in the world that half of the $900,000 that the federal treasury will receive in 1928-29 from this tax applied to the transactions on the Toronto stock exchanges comes from the smaller valued stocks that are taxed, not 3 cents on $100 of value, but sometimes 2 per cent of their value, so that it is a most unfair tax. Surely at this stage of the game, when with a stroke of the pen we can rectify this condition and get started off right, we are not in such a hurry to wind up the business of the session that just because this proposal has been put before us by the Finance minister and he says, "I am going to put it through whether it is a fair tax or not," we are not going to accept such an unfair proposal. There is not a member of this house who dare stand up before a body of men who know anything at all about political economy and say that this proposal could by any possibility be a fair tax. It is absolutely unfair, and it cannot be made anything else. On the other hand, an ad valorem tax would be absolutely fair, it could be easily imposed, and be much more easily collected. Any accountant who wants to figure it out will find that if that 3 cent tax was on every $100 of value, instead of on the par value, it would create a revenue four or five times as great as now when it is simply based on the par value.

Why should we hasten through the committee a proposal of this kind? I thoroughly understood from statements made to me by the Minister of Finance that the tax that is in effect now was an ad valorem tax, but when I looked into the matter for myself I found that it was not an ad valorem tax or anything that looked like an ad valorem tax. The only part of it that is an ad valorem tax is the tax on no par value shares, and those shares were not taxed at all, I believe, for a number of years because the department did not know how to tax them. The act did not provide for taxing no par value shares, and finally the shares were taxed under the present Minister of National Revenue on the basis of value, and that is an ad valorem tax on shares of no par value. But on every other share of stock it has been an absolutely unfair tax, and it has placed an unjust burden on the small investor and on the smaller priced stocks which are used for raising money for the development of new industries, and particularly the mining industry. Surely this committee is composed of men with business ability enough, with common sense enough—for that is all it needs—to see the unfairness of a tax of this kind. You do not need any business training to see the unfairness of the present tax; all you need is common sense. Any school boy or school girl in this country who knows anything at all about taxation knows that a tax on value or an ad valorem tax is the one general way of imposing taxation that can be fairly distributed according to the ability of the taxpayer to pay.

I should like to hear from some lawyer as to the interpretation of section 58. I know the section provides for a tax of 3 cents on every $100, not of value, but of par value, of shares of stock transferred or traded in. Surely any person can see how unfairly it has worked out. It has been absolutely unfair and oppressive upon those who should not be discriminated against. So much for the present tax in effect since 1922; and if this proposed tax is put into effect we shall have for another year a tax that is every whit as bad as the tax we have had since 1922, every bit as unfair, every bit as unjust, inequitable in every respect, and a tax that in my judgment, and I believe, in the judgment of any person who will give it careful study, will not bring in any more revenue to the treasury than the present tax does, because just as soon as such a tax is imposed those affected are going to seek ways and means of evading it. That is what they did under the old tax to a certain extent. That probably was the reason why quite a number of companies were incorporated with no par value stock; the incorporators saw a possible chance of getting by without any taxation. I think the National Revenue department owe it to this house, when bringing down a change of this kind, to state how the old tax worked out, and when they discovered a way of imposing the tax upon corporations with shares of no par value. Of course, had such companies reorganized and converted their no par value stock into par value stock of $1, a company such as Noranda, whose shares are selling to-day at $54, would not be taxed on the extra $53 at all. A tax such as this is manifestly unfair, no person can make it appear anything else, and when it is so easy to impose an ad valorem tax I cannot understand why it is not done. An ad valorem tax of 3 cents on $100 would work out all right and would be fair to everyone. I do not intend to let this proposed tax go into effect so long as I can do anything to hinder it, because it will not be fair to the people of Canada, and therefore should not be imposed.

Mr. LAWSON: I am indeed reluctant to have anything further to say on this subject by reason of the length of time I devoted to it last week, but to-night the Minister of Finance has made two statements which I cannot allow to pass. One is obviously an error, the other is misleading. If I remember correctly, in the case cited by him to-night, he quoted figures to show that the province of Ontario had derived something like four or five times more revenue from the transfer of shares than the amount received by the Dominion treasury.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend would like the figures on record?

Mr. LAWSON: $200,000 odd against $40,000. Is not that correct?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, in 1926.

Mr. LAWSON: On referring to the Dominion statute in force prior to this proposal I find it reads as follows—I am going to omit words which are unnecessary for my purpose—

> No person shall sell or transfer the stock or shares of any association. . . unless in respect of such sale or transfer there is affixed a stamp. . . of the value of 3 cents for every $100 or fraction thereof of the par value of the stocks or shares. . . sold or transferred.

An hon. MEMBER: Bonds.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not interested in bonds for the time being. The hon. Minister of Finance has given the returns, I understand, from the Standard stock and mining exchange. Now take the Ontario statute—

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend, if he is going to argue fairly, must continue and quote the exceptions provided in article 61.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not quarrelling with that. I am going to read the Ontario act to show that the statutory provision is exactly the same as in the Dominion statute.

Mr. BENNETT: The Dominion act is copied from the Ontario statute.

Mr. LAWSON: Under section 12 of the Corporation Tax Act of the province of Ontario it is provided:

> There shall be levied a tax of 3 cents, payable by the transferor, in money or stamps, for every $100 or fraction thereof of the par value upon every change of ownership consequent upon the sale, transfer. . .

Obviously if under the law of Ontario and the law of the Dominion the same amount of tax is imposed, then the Dominion treasury must have received the same amount of tax from that source as the provincial treasury, or else some department of the Dominion has been distinctly lax in its collection of revenue.

My other point is this. The hon. Minister of Finance stated that this was not the imposition of a new tax; it was a revision of the schedule. But may I point out to him that this introduces an entirely new principle in taxation, and I should like to hear some statement or argument from him justifying, not the quantum of taxation—that is the part to which all his statements have been directed —but the reason why a larger percentage of tax should be imposed upon the lower priced stocks than upon the higher. I should also like to ask the minister if he has any precedent for the imposition of a stock transfer tax on an ascending ratio as the value of the stock descends. I have had occasion from time to time to examine the transfer tax laws of the provinces and indeed of some of the states, and if there is any precedent for a tax based upon an increasing ratio on the lower priced stock, I should be interested to know.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, I should very much like to know if the Minister of Finance will attempt to justify the imposition of a higher percentage of taxation on the sale price of the lower priced issues than upon the higher. Why is it not equitable in an ascending ratio, if anything, on the same basis as the income tax?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The point raised by my hon. friend appears to be one that is worthy of attention. I should like the minister to give us an explanation. If he cannot explain it let him say so frankly, but if he can why not let us have the explanation?

Mr. ROBB: Explain what?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Give an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. ROBB: We might argue all night. We have submitted the matter to examination and we think the tax is fair, considering the business that is done and the nature of that business. Hon. gentlemen talk about the tax on certain high priced stocks; they forget that we derive an additional revenue from such stocks in the way of income tax. I submit that this tax will meet with the approval of the country.

Mr. LAWSON: Seventy-four per cent of the mining stocks traded in in Ontario on the Standard stock and mining exchange are selling at under $3.

Mr. JACOBS: Does that include wash sales too?

Mr. LAWSON: So far as I know, and I have some experience, they do not have wash sales in the province of Ontario. The statutes of the province of Quebec, in which my hon. and learned friend is interested, specifically provide that a tax shall be payable on wash sales. The Minister of Finance has pointed out that these higher priced issues bear a heavy tax inasmuch as they produce revenue from which the Dominion secures income tax. But as I pointed out the other night, 74 per cent of all stocks traded in on the Standard stock and mining exchange were stocks selling under $3; yet the gold and silver mines alone in the province of Ontario last year paid in dividends some $12,000,000. Surely that money coming into the hands of investors is taxable for income tax purposes just as much as the higher priced issues.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Amendment agreed to on division: yeas, 52; nays, 44.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment.

That the resolution amending the Special War Revenue Act be amended by striking out paragraph seven and substituting therefor the following:

7. That any enactment founded on paragraphs two and three of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of May, 1929, and that any enactment founded on paragraph four of this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, 1929.

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution as amended carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Resolution as amended agreed to on division: yeas, 47; nays, 40.

Resolution reported.

On the motion for first reading of the resolution:

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think a resolution can be read after eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe that is correct.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to ask, as a matter of information, whether this last vote is legal, since it was started after eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: As a matter of fact it was started just at three minutes to eleven o'clock.

Mr. McGIBBON: I must take exception to that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was watching the time closely and when I resumed the chair the hour was striking.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME II.
