I think the tariff has interfered with the prosperity of the West; and the price of agricultural implements has been a mighty serious thing. It takes too large a proportion of the crop to buy these implements. Then the cost of transporting that crop has also been a very serious factor; and the rate of interest we pay for money is more than the country can stand. I want to tell you another thing, although perhaps some of our members may not agree with me, and it is this: If the labourer is not willing to take what the farmer is able to stand he will have to go without a job and the farmer will have to do without help. That is what has been happening. Last fall I wanted help to do some brushing in order that I myself might do some breaking. I do not like to stand idle. I cannot do as much work on the farm as I used to do; but I want to tell you I have got the necessary courage, and if I can get labour at a price at which I can afford to use it, I will continue to break up the land; I want to keep on breaking the land in order to help to improve the country. Well, I felt that I could not afford to pay the price that the men who were out of work at Edmonton wanted. Now, I do not want anyone to form the impression that I want the labourer to have a poorer opportunity than he is entitled to, or that I want to treat him unfairly; but those men asked me $3.50 a day to cut brush, and I want to tell you gentlemen I did not think I could afford to pay that price. I hired one man at $30 a month and gave him his bed and board and I felt that was a pretty good average winter wage. That man is working for me yet as far as I know. Now, if the labour unions are going to control the labour bureaus—as they are evidently doing to my mind—the farmer is not going to get help out in the West at a price he can afford to pay. The labour man can do as he likes; he can go without a job or he can work, if he is willing to work, for the price the farmer is able to pay him. The farmer, however, cannot pay for labour beyond what his means will permit. I do not know whether the Dominion or provincial government is responsible for these labour bureaus because I have heard that the Dominion and the provincial bureaus overlap, but it is the opinion of the farmers in our part of the country that those fellows who are running the bureaus are more interested in getting higher wages for the men they want to put out than they are in getting labour for the farmer at a price possible for him to pay.

[Mr. Warner.]

Now I am not hostile to labour. I want labour to have a fair chance; but if the labourers are asking the impossible they are just following the example of other people. The banker is to-day asking the impossible thing; the transportation companies are asking the impossible thing from the farmer and the implement men are asking the impossible thing. To tell you the truth the farmer is in a corner and if you ever want to secure a return of prosperity in Canada you have to help him; you have to give him a chance to get out of the corner, pay his debts and possibly make a living. Whenever that time comes, whenever the man on the farm gets a square deal things will improve; because the country is good enough, the climate is good enough, and the soil is good enough; and granted what I have stated the courage of the farmer will be renewed so that he will help to put Canada in the position which she ought to occupy. But everybody else must assume his part of the burden. The farmer has already taken his share—not because he wanted to but because he had to. The farmer sells his produce on the world's market and he cannot raise the prices in that market whenever he wants to; the only thing he can do is to try and keep down the cost of getting it to that market to as low a point as possible.

Now, if our government will spend some money in seeing that the farmers get proper freight rates, a proper rate of interest on the money they need, reasonable charges for what they have to buy all along the line—including suitable tariff reductions,—then I think we will go ahead and prosper. I believe Canada will then come back to her old position; I do not think there is any doubt about it. But all of us must work toward that end. If we do that we shall come out on the right side of the balance sheet. I am ready to support a reasonably aggressive immigration policy. I do not know that I am prepared to back up this bargain with a Canada Colonization Association because I do not know enough about the company's affairs. I never offer criticism when I am not fully conversant with the facts. When I was approached in regard to the matter, however, I had a certain amount of suspicion. Any means that I have accumulated I have had to work for myself; nobody gave them to me. I was simply suspicious about the matter and did not go in. Still the association may be all right. I know of some good men that are in it. Still, that is not the reason I would oppose the government hitching up with this association.

When I came to this country twenty-five years ago the immigration policy in force under Sir Wilfrid Laurier was one that commanded my respect. I was looking for more land, so as to make it possible for my children to have a better opportunity than I had. When I heard the story of Mr. Bennett in Omaha, under the immigration policy as it was then, I rather doubted, but he persuaded me to come to Canada and investigate for myself. I came and looked over the opportunities, and I want to tell hon. gentlemen that I have always had confidence in that immigration policy since. They did not even tell me all the good things they might have. They told me I would have to work and would not find it a bed of roses, and I came prepared to work. I would rather see the government take full responsibility for an immigration policy. I should like to ask the minister right now if any part of this money that we are voting for outside salaries is to be paid to the Colonization Company's agents in the Old Country or the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. WARNER: Then I am ready to support the government in passing this item if they can prove to the House that they are going to pay competent agents with the money. I know we have to have these immigrants. I know the resources are here for them to develop. I know that we need them. Our debts are already made and we are a party to them. I know that we can compete with the rest of the world in the products we have if we are only given a chance to have the lowest possible rates to the markets of the world. I would rather compete with my neighbour and have him at the same time help me to pay the debts we have made in this country, than compete with him when he lives in some other country and competes in the same market that I do. If, on the other hand, part of the proceeds from the sale of his produce is turned in to help pay our debts, it seems to me that is an important matter to us. If he goes to the United States, perhaps in time they will get enough people over there to use all their own products of the kind we are raising, and we may have an opportunity to sell to them, but that time is not yet. As it is now we have to compete with them, and we are competing with them in the world's markets. I say that I would rather compete with them here at home than compete with them living in some other country.

I do not know that I have thrown very much light on this subject, but I have taken a different view from what some of our members have. I repeat, I want to hold the government responsible for ameliorating conditions as far as is humanly possible, so that we may be in the best possible position to help Canada get back on her feet again.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may say that I do not feel as keen to speak on this question now as I did about a week ago when the matter was first brought before the House. After listening to the many speeches which have been delivered I am very glad indeed, as I am sure are the majority of the members of this House, that the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) in spite of the difficulty under which he labours at the moment has endured until the end almost, and delivered the speech which he did here tonight. I think that it is much to his credit that he has spoken in the way he has. I have wondered often as I listened to the remarks which were delivered in this debate if the speakers appreciated the effect of the words which fell from their lips, and the thought flashed on my mind that we were inclined to forget in this parliament sometimes that we were the representatives, not of a particular constituency or of a particular class, but that every member of the House of Commons was here representing the Dominion of Canada.

As I listened to some of the objections which were raised against the bringing in of immigrants to this country, that it was going to encroach on someone's prerogatives, I thought as I viewed in my mind this vast expanse of territory which we have here with only a few millions of people endeavouring to occupy and develop it, what claim can we advance to justify our monopolizing all these broad acres and all the undoubted resources which this country possesses if there is a congestion in some other part of the world? Surely this is not in keeping with the policy that some of those who objected so strenuously to immigration have been advocating.

I shall not attempt to cover the whole range of subjects that have been touched on in this debate, but there are some features which did appeal to me as requiring some further explanation from the minister and the government. I was not at all surprised that considerable opposition to this policy came from the government benches, and some also from both groups on this side of the House. The question of immigration under present conditions is a very serious and a very vital one to the future welfare of this Dominion. It is, as I think has already been acknowledged by some members of the government, perhaps the most important and vital question that can engage the attention of the government and of parliament at the present time. I appreciate the difficulties which the minister and the government have to contend with in this matter, and the pressure that is being brought to bear from so many different sources. I believe that any hon. member of this House, if he was left free to act according to his best judgment, would adopt a very different policy from the one that has been placed before us for bringing immigration to this country. I think the policy is narrow and sectional, but it is possibly in keeping with the age in which we are living and the times through which we are passing. I sometimes wonder if the whole world has not gone mad, if something is not necessary to bring people to their senses. It is just possible that the best thing we could experience at this time would be a period of very severe depression in order to bring people back to their senses.

Surprise is expressed in some quarters that the youth of our country are not remaining where they were born and brought up. I do not think any surprise should be exhibited at this at all, because they are the sons of a colonizing race. This is evidently bred in the bone, and one can hardly expect that people of this disposition are going to remain in the place where they were born and brought up, notwithstanding how ideal conditions there may be. We have in Canada the descendants of two great races, and we all believe that we have in this Dominion a great country and that we are going to become a great people. I often wonder if the fact that people of French descent are more inclined to remain at home and not to wander so far abroad is not due to the circumstance that they are not the descendants of a race that has been so historically noted for its colonising proclivities. The Anglo-Saxon has wandered all over the world, and wherever there was a vacant place, you could rest assured he was there, establishing the Union Jack. This is going on to-day, and notwithstanding the fact that many of our young men are going to the United States at the present time, I am sure, as the hon. member for Strathcona has already said, that you will find them trooping back again in the course of a few years, if we only do our duty by ourselves under present circumstances. It is an easy matter at any time to find fault with a government which has to carry on, and it is very easy to find fault with the present government. I am inclined sometimes to wonder why many of the things which we heard about during the general election which took place a couple of years ago, have evidently been forgotten and why no effort has been made to put those policies into effect, if they were going to prove to be such a benefit for our country. I am not, however, going to blame the government for that, because I believe it is in the public interest that they should forget those old platforms of theirs, which they did not take very much stock in themselves, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has several times intimated to the House.

To my mind, the one outstanding matter which is affecting those particularly engaged in agriculture to-day is the enormous quantity of imported produce that is being disposed of in the Canadian market. I noticed the ex-president of the Ontario Agricultural College, Dr. George Creelman, in a speech which he delivered in Toronto a few months ago, stated that last year $168,000,000 worth of farm produce was imported into this country. I am referring to this matter for the benefit of some of my hon. friends to the left who think that some remedy different from the one I propose, should be applied to our difficulties.

But there are other matters that I should like to touch upon, and I am going to point out very briefly the greatest difficulty which we have to encounter at the present time and the one which possibly, above all others, is responsible for our present condition. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) referred to the need of competition in order to have proper development. I believe that is the case; when you eliminate competition, you are going to injure somebody in the process and you are going to remove the incentive which is necessary to bring out the best there is in anyone. That rule applies, it does not matter where you go, and one of the most serious things that we have had to face during the past few years is the fact that we have, not only in this Dominion, but in practically every other country, what is known now as organized labour. They have in several instances dictated to the rest of the people of this country who might be termed as labourers more than they in several respects. The effect during the present winter of the attitude of organized labour in connection with the mining of coal has been almost a calamity to this country. It has indeed, been so serious that it has overreached any temporary benefit which they have received, and those who have suffered most have been the wage-earners of Canada. The same thing, I believe, applies with regard to our transportation facilities. The unions took control of the railways of this country during the war period, and they absolutely made it impossible for the railways to be operated so that the best interests of the country could be served. I point to those as two illustrations to show what happens when competition is eliminated and matters are regulated in that way. This means simply that you have to organize every class upon a similar basis if you are going to put them on an equal footing, and if you do that you are right back again where you started.

As regards the idea that by having the people of this country divided into sections and classes, if you are going to reap a temporary advantage, that can be done only by injuring some other class which is not so well organized as the class which is receiving a temporary benefit. The effect of this is that eventually you get back exactly to where you started. I hope, before we have to go through that whole process, something will be done to stop that course and to make the people realize that the government are going to act on behalf of all the people of this country, regardless of whether they are an organized body or not and able to bring influence to bear upon the government.

A year ago, as I listened to the Minister of Finance during the budget debate, when he was pointing out how he had made certain reductions on some things, I wondered if that was because of the pressure which had been brought to bear, and if no reductions had been made on other items because no pressure had been brought to bear. I merely mention that to show the effect an organized body will have in bringing influence to bear upon the government. I am afraid this is the very thing the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) encountered in endeavouring to bring about an immigration policy to serve the interests of this country. As I listened to the statements he made on several occasions during the debate which is taking place, he virtually admitted that he was not attempting to do much; in fact, several of his supporters charged him with not having a policy at all. He scarcely claimed that this was a policy; but he was following the line of least resistance, and he hoped to get through in that way. I am afraid such a course will not suit present conditions in this country. I know, as regards the province from which I come, we do not want to steer a middle course by which we shall be subject to the least criticism. What should and what must be done is to meet the demands of this country, and anyone who says that there is no need of more labour in this country; that we have many people out of employment and that until they are absorbed, more people must not be brought into this country, is losing sight of the fact that there are thousands and tens of thousands of opportunities in Canada, works that ought to be carried on that are standing still to-day because there are not enough people here to carry them on. The farmers of Ontario are only half farming; they are not doing anything like what they could or would like to do, owing to the fact that there is no labour available.

Why is there not labour available? It is simply because the labour from the farm goes into the towns where there are abundant opportunities and where wages are much higher than they are in the rural districts. Someone may ask why that is the case. Well, let me tell you what happened a short time ago. Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress, went to Toronto and insisted that the provincial government adopt an eight-hour day for certain classes who were working on government contracts, and that they should pay a minimum wage. This was to apply to all classes of labour except farmers. When he was asked why he did not extend this provision to farm labour he said that this class of labour was in the nature of a family affair and should not come under these regulations. Now, we as a parliament are responsible for fixing the hours of labour for the servants of the people. We were the guilty parties in the first instance in fixing the hours of labour of those engaged in the Civil Service much below the standard of people engaged in any other walk of life. Is it any wonder that others look to us as setting an example of what might be accomplished by organization and pressure? It is generally recognized that the farmer cannot carry on under these conditions, and this has been demonstrated on many occasions. When we adopted daylight saving in this country there was a vigorous protest from the farmers, because undoubtedly it hampered them and made it much more difficult for them to get the necessary labour on the farm. The very fact that agriculture is languishing as it is to-day, particularly in western Canada, owing to the many difficulties with which it has to cope, shows that an abundance of labour is the only thing that can solve the problem. I called the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) during this session, to one article which I thought should be exempt from the sales tax for the reason that there is absolutely no labour to be had in the province of Ontario in connection with its production. And although we may not hear very much of an outcry, nevertheless there is an insistent demand on the part of the farmers for something to be done in this direction.

The minister (Mr. Stewart) said that so far as Ontario was concerned, the province preferred to keep its office in London and engage in practically the same work as is carried on by the federal government in bringing immigrants to the country. Do the government and the House consider that it is fair to the province of Ontario that it should have to do work of this kind in this way? A number of years ago the federal government undertook to make a disposition of all the immigrants coming into Canada, and the Ontario government gave up the work in which they had been engaged. Ontario was practically neglected because nearly all, in fact one might say all, the literature published and circulated by the Department of Immigration for years back has been devoted to western Canada, while little or none has been published to serve the purposes of that province. The publications issued by the Department of Agriculture itself, which are in the greatest demand by well-informed people in the Old Country when they are seeking information in regard to this country, contain so little with regard to the province of Ontario that intending immigrants receive no encouragement from that source to come to that province. This is a matter I have endeavoured to press not only upon this government but upon the previous government on numerous occasions. I may observe that I am referring to the reports in connection with the experimental farms of this country, from which you will find that there is practically no effort being made to do justice to the wonderful possibilities we have in that province.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me inform the hon. gentleman that in conference with the provincial governments I offered, as I am prepared, to distribute literature of any sort, which any province thinks will be of value to it, through all the agencies of the federal government. I did not suggest that the Ontario government should close their office in London, but I do think that it would be a saving of expenditure if all the outside work were carried on by the federal government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The history of immigration work in Ontario is just as I have endeavoured to point out. The work was handed over to the federal government in 1902 and for a number of years they controlled it until the provincial government were finally forced to adopt the method to which I have referred and establish their own agencies in the Old Land again. At that time there was a conflict, because while the federal government were paying a bonus of $5 to the booking agents for every immigrant booked to Canada, no commission was given for any immigrant sent to the Ontario government's agency. This was the case until 1908 or 1909, when the Ontario government again entered upon this work in the Old Land. And if they do not see fit now to give up their office and agencies the reason I think is obvious. Now the minister says he is prepared to print literature for the province.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. member has mistaken what I said. I said I would distribute literature for the provinces; and even if the government of Ontario cares to maintain its office, as I am quite willing that it should do, it may use every federal agent we have to advertise the province.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The fact that immigration comes within the scope of the federal government and not of the provincial government would justify the Dominion in giving impartial treatment to all the provinces. I doubt whether there is in the whole Dominion a place which is so well adapted as Ontario for the bringing in of immigrants, particularly if they lack the experience to start on their own resources. They come into Ontario, however, and after they have obtained some degree of experience the fall excursions for farm labourers are advertised all over the province and these people go to the West and engage in harvesting. Many of them see great opportunities of obtaining cheap lands and they remain out there. I venture to say that tens of thousands of those who have come to Ontario have gone out in that way.

Now, the minister has entered into an arrangement with an organization known as the Canada Colonization Association. I remember seeing this matter featured in the press for a considerable time past, and it struck me as propaganda that was being carried on with an object. When I saw that it was to be purely for philanthropic purposes I became somewhat interested and wondered how it was that such an earnest effort was being put forth. I followed the proceedings as carefully as I could and noticed that the minister had announcements to make from time to time with regard to government policy. A year ago very little criticism was offered because the government had not been in office very long. But owing to the fact while the war was on there was practically no immigration to Canada, and that during the past year immigration has fallen off by some 90,000 as compared with the previous year, it was undoubtedly a warning to the government that some effort should be made to meet the situation.

The minister has stated that the Canada Colonization Association has had a rather stormy career lately. In fact from his remarks I rather gathered that he himself was somewhat dubious as to the wisdom of continuing the arrangements entered into with the association. It was characterized by the Prime Minister as a welfare league composed largely of hon. members of a political persuasion opposed to his own, and I was wondering if that was one of the reasons which accounted for his apparent anxiety to favour the association. Certainly to do so would be something unusual. I may say that so far as I am concerned I do not know who are at the head of the Canada Colonization Association, nor am I aware what their political faith is, and I care much less; but I do say that when the government undertake to vote large sums of money to be handed over to land agents with a view to bringing immigrants to this country and placing them under the control of the Soldier Settlement Board, they are leading those people to believe that the government are to some degree at least officially responsible for the treatment which these immigrants are accorded. I shall not go into the history of this association at length because it was dealt with very fully before. When the minister (Mr. Stewart) first brought the matter up I put several questions to him, and it appears now that I was right in the conclusions I had arrived at on that occasion because what I said then has not been since contradicted.

When the Prime Minister pointed out that Sir John Willison had resigned from the presidency of the association owing to the criticisms which were being levelled at it, he asked to have some confirmation from the two groups on this side of the House as to their attitude towards the association. Letters were read by the Prime Minister, and he endeavoured to draw the conclusion that their writers were in favour of such a policy as had been advocated by the government. I do not think that conclusion could be reasonably drawn from those letters, for the very fact that the association had received them for that purpose would to my mind bring them under suspicion. If the association are in a position to do what they claim, if, as their papers indicate, they have been organized purely on a voluntary basis without any idea of making a profit then they ought not to resort to these methods.

Let me quote a few articles from the Toronto Globe of September last dealing with this matter. On September 2, 1922, the Globe contained this item copied from a Winnipeg paper:

> S. W. Jacobs, M.P., continued his criticisms of the King government's immigration policy and his advocacy of the private ownership of the government railways before the Winnipeg Liberal Association.

On the same date the Globe contained the following despatch from its Ottawa correspondent:

> Progress is also being made in formulating an aggressive and prudent immigration policy, and Honourable Charles Stewart, who has had this in charge, has his program about completed, and it was discussed to some extent at to-day's cabinet meeting. It will likely be dealt with again to-morrow by the cabinet, and it is understood that next week the plan for stimulating immigration of the better class of people to this country will be made public.

On the 11th September the Globe had this announcement on its front page, headed "Ministry discloses plan of importing needed citizens."

> Careful selection of agriculture workers. Canadian Colonization Association will work in conjunction with British overseas settlement officials, federal and provincial co-operation—

This was evidently the policy which the government decided to adopt on that date. On the following day the Globe contained an editorial headed, "The peopling of Canada", in the course of which the following appeared:

> The Canadian people will approve both the aim and method of the federal government's new immigration policy, etc. The services of the Canadian Colonization Association, an organization backed by private capital, which has been a long time mapping out the field for immigration to this country and will have the financial support of the Imperial government, will be employed in the location of settlers.

I should like the minister to inform the committee what financial support this association is receiving from the Imperial government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will give my hon. friend those particulars when the item comes up for discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The item, as I understand it, is for the outside immigration service?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And this is a matter under the control of the outside service?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it comes under the next item, No. 53.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The article in the Globe would make it clear that this association is receiving financial support from the British government. Now, it will be observed that not a word is said in these articles in regard to the bonus which was being paid to the association by the government. The people have been misled by the government not divulging the whole scheme. Let me ask why this information has been kept back until the item comes up in the estimates. The minister states that this is not the item. This item is for the outside service in connection with immigration, and therefore this business must of necessity come under those officials, or else it is being handed over holus bolus to this association without any control whatever by the department. I hope the minister does not imply that some control will not be exercised over this association?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I made a statement in the House this afternoon that I had not full information and that vote 53 would be delayed until that information was forthcoming. We are discussing vote 52 which deals entirely with the employees of the government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Outside?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Outside. It has nothing to do with the organization my hon. friend is discussing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The outside employees must of necessity be the field officers, and consequently must come in touch with this work.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, no. I have tried to make it clear to my hon. friend that those dealt with in the $700,000 vote are practically all civil servants. No activities of the association come under this particular vote; they are covered by the next vote, No. 53, which we propose to leave open.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Then there are evidently two systems: The machinery for carrying on under the old system is still being retained; and this is entirely aside from anything connected with the present system.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Chairman, it seems almost hopeless to get my hon. friend to understand. I made the statement the other day that we had been giving grants to the Salvation Army. But we do not interfere with the army in the handling of those grants, and that has been the practice of the department for years. They are working in the same fields in which our agents are working—employees of this government, and the same applies to the Canada Colonization Association. The money—I will deal with the matter when the item comes up—is given them by way of grant as well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The grant to the Salvation Army is in view of work which they are carrying on, well known services that they have been rendering. In the other case there are conditions attached that do not apply in the case of the Salvation Army. If, therefore, there is no check by the officials provided for under this item, I do not see how there can be otherwise.

On September 16 the Prime Minister is reported to have delivered a speech at Stouffville, in North York. The report says:

> Mr. King spoke at some length on the immigration policy. He said that Canada must get quality and not quantity in immigration, and the plan of co-operation between provincial and federal governments had been worked out. We are determined that we in Canada should say who would come and who should stay out. Conditions as they are discouraged many who would be good citizens in better times, he said, adding that there had been organized in Canada the Canada Western Colonization Association, which would sell lands on thirty-year terms and would look after settlers. The government would work in co-operation with the association, choosing and bringing out settlers, and having the association look after them.

This statement clearly indicates that the policy had already been shaped and that a contract had been entered into with this company. You will observe that these three statements were made in September. As late as November 17 the Globe reports:

> Hon. Charles Stewart will disclose immigration policy within ten days. A comprehensive plan of immigration will be recommended to the government of Canada within the next ten days by Hon. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior, according to an announcement he made at the Kiwanis Club luncheon to-day, following an address by Lord Shaughnessy.

The intimation is made that another policy is to be brought down. I direct attention to the fact that the Prime Minister, speaking months before, intimated that a policy had been formulated and was to be put into effect, and later the minister himself intimated at this luncheon, if he is correctly reported, that a new policy was to be brought down. On December 27 the Globe has another article, as follows:

> Light Immigration Canada's Prospect. No dearth of suitable persons agree to come, but they need assistance; expense too great. In the meantime the government is just doubling its activity in publicity in both the United States and the United Kingdom, including both advertising and lecture work.

Not a word about a subsidy or bonus being paid to anybody; but there is an intimation that the activities of the government are not to be nearly as extensive as the people were led to believe they would be from former articles appearing in this government journal. On January 7 there is a fresh report from Winnipeg as follows:

Sir John Willison, in a letter addressed to all directors and made public here to-day, announces that his resignation as president of the Canada Colonization Association was due to the fact that he had no voice in settling the details of policy.

I wonder if the reference to "details of policy" involved a conflict between Sir John Willison and the government, or was it in regard to the directors of the company? Perhaps the minister can give the committee some information on that subject.

11 p.m. We were assured that it was largely owing to the fact that Sir John Willison was at the head of this organization that the government entered into the arrangement with them; yet here he states that he had practically no voice in settling the details of policy. The report quotes his letter as follows:

"A short experience of three months has forced me to realize that I cannot give adequate attention to the affairs of the Association." Sir John's letter states "Since I have had no active relations to the association when its funds were subscribed, and have no voice in settling the details of its policy, I am sure that my withdrawal should not affect its interests or prospects unfavourably. I desire that my resignation should take effect January 2nd, 1923.

This comment is made:

The new Canada Colonization Association, with a commendable programme and a useful future, is apparently suffering from internal dissension.

It is difficult to understand why the government, in view of these unexplained circumstances, should allow this company to benefit from the bonuses they are being paid and the commissions they are receiving from the land owners whose lands are placed with them. These lands are listed with the company for a period of five years, on the understanding that when a sale is made it shall cover a period of thirty-two years. If any hon. member was offering his lands under these circumstances, would he not fix the value at least 25 per cent in excess of what he would otherwise accept? Yet the settler is being brought in in this way, and the Canada Colonization Asociation is to receive ten per cent commission.

This matter may be dealt with more specifically under a subsequent item, but as the first item is the one upon which the general policy of the government is discussed, it is only fair that these things should be cleared up. Before any item is passed we should have a clear statement from the minister with regard to this company, particularly with reference to the points I have mentioned. The arrangement is unfair to the prospective purchaser. It will bring discredit on the people of this country if sales are made under these conditions. Land agents as a rule have not a very high reputation. They produce letters asked for by leaders of groups in this House, with a view to bolstering up their case and establishing their claims upon the government. Moreover, the very name of the organization is misleading; when the people know that the Soldier Settlement Board are co-operating in the matter, they will believe the whole thing is part of the machinery of the government for placing the people on the land. Much of this land is held by speculators. It is the first duty of the government, not to look after those who are holding these lands, but to protect the interests of those who have invested their money in lands for agricultural purposes and are endeavouring to carry on under very difficult conditions. Probably the best thing that could happen to this country would be for those people to be forced to relinquish their control of these lands at a reasonable price, so that settlers could obtain them. If this policy proposed by the government is dropped I am satisfied that these lands will be purchased much more cheaply than they will be through the means provided for under the proposal which the minister has announced to the House. I would again remind the House that the arrangement with this association is of such a character that the outside employees of the department must of necessity be allied, in some sense, with the association if any control at all is to be exercised over it. The statement has been made in the press that $40,000 have already been paid to the association. If such is the case I think the minister should fully inform the committee with regard to it.

I do not intend to take up any more time at this stage but I would like to point out what is happening in the far western end of the province of Ontario at the present time. In the Ottawa Journal this morning I read the following:

Young Canadians rushing to Detroit

Eighty families a day reported crossing Border

Windsor, March 21.—Lured by high wages, hundreds of young Canadians are emigrating to the United States. According to the railway and ferry companys no fewer than eighty families a day are entering the States at Detroit. On one train arriving here this afternoon from the East there were forty-five young men who said they were on their way to Michigan industrial centres. A majority of the men are between 25 and 40 years of age. Most of them came from Toronto, Hamilton and other cities of eastern Ontario. Lack of work and prospect of high wages, they explained, induced them to leave the Dominion, More than half of the 45 are mechanics connected in some way with the building trades.

If it is a fact that there is a reluctance on the part of anyone to undertake any building or construction work in Canada under present conditions, that is a serious matter which should receive some attention. There is a need for inspiring capital with confidence, a confidence which is lacking to-day. To such an extent is that the case that I believe it is absolutely imperative on the part of the government to adopt much more stringent regulations respecting those who endeavour to hamper and restrict people in legitimately carrying on their business in Canada. An effort is being made along that line. We have heard statements made here during the present debate which I am sorry to think should ever be made by members of the Canadian parliament. One can see what the tendency and the drift is, and I believe the responsibility resting upon the government is such that they cannot afford to follow along the line of least resistance. They must face the conditions with courage, and deal with the situation in a statesmanlike manner. Then those people with capital will be inspired by that feeling of confidence which is necessary in order to enable them to go ahead and develop the natural resources of this country.

Mr. McBRIDE: Mr. Chairman I do not think I will take up the time of the House by emitting a wail of distress such as we have become accustomed to hearing from this end of the chamber. I do not think that the people of Cariboo sent me here to brand Canada as an undesirable country for citizens of other countries to come to. Those who entertain such an opinion of Canada would do well to leave it. I do not think there is another country on the face of the earth which holds the opportunities that Canada does for a young man to make a start in life. Some people advocate increasing the population as a remedy for the situation complained of. Others say: Do not increase production. Twenty-seven years ago I was farming down at the mouth of the Fraser river. At that time we were selling hay, baled and loaded on the barges for $5 a ton, and selling potatoes for 25 cents a sack, and we were not complaining about hard times either. There were a few agitators going around the country and calling out for lower production, and saying we must not raise so much hay, and oats. To-day there is six times the amount of feed raised at the mouth of the Fraser river and the Delta, and in British Columbia generally, and we are getting $30 a ton for our hay and $20 to $25 a ton for our potatoes. This country will never be what nature intended it to be until we have a population of from twenty-five to thirty millions. There is no reason why Canada should not support that number of people. One hon. member made a statement about the "better element" in this corner of the chamber. That hon member is not here now but I would like him to inform us who is the better element in this section of the House.

There is one thing to which I would like to draw the attention of the minister. It has been stated that in all likelihood army officers would come and locate in Canada. I may be wrong in that impression; if so I stand corrected. What I am going to say has no reference to any of our Canadian army officers that served overseas. No person in this House entertains a greater respect for those men than I do. The army officers to whom I refer have spent the greater part of their lives in the Old Country and I think they are a very good class of people to steer clear of. I have known of a number of these officers who came out to Canada and settled on the land; and really it was pitiable to see their efforts to try and make a living. Through no fault of their own they were greatly handicapped from want of experience in trying to carry on farming. Indeed they are a class of people that we can ill afford to bring to this country, but if the minister has some easy and well paid jobs around Ottawa that he wants to fill by all means let him bring these men over and install them in the positions.

I am opposed to assisted immigration. If any young man, healthy and strong, comes to Canada and cannot make a start for himself we do not want him; I do not think Canada is the proper place for him. One hon. member during the debate spoke of a man who came from the Old Country without any money whatever and who is now sitting in this House as a representative of the people. There is another man who came to Canada without a dollar in his pocket and he is also a member of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McBRIDE: If a young man cannot come to this country, make a good start for himself and go ahead I say we are better off without him. Consequently, I would give no assistance to any immigrant that comes to Canada; I am opposed to it in every way.

An hon. member made the statement that it was a love of society and a desire to have a good time in the city that caused people to flock to the large centres of population. Well, if I want a good time I start for the country; you can have a better time there than you can anywhere else.

An hon. MEMBER: Out at the country club.

Mr. McBRIDE: The country club is a mighty good place to go to. Some hon. members have spoken during this debate for an hour or more and have concluded by saying they had no suggestions to make to the government. Well, I think I will make a suggestion or two to the government before I conclude. The first suggestion I have to make is in connection with advertising. I hold in my hand a book bearing the names of the Minister and Deputy Minister of the Interior and dated 1918. This is some of the advertising that the former government sent out, in connection with the Peace river country:

The Peace River district contains an area of over 115,000 square miles. Its charming climate and scenery, so long famed by legend and mystery, has been proven a reality. Our keen searching trials and tests have proven it to be all and more than it was ever represented to be.

The climate is excellent. The air is pure and bracing—in the winter clear and crisp, and in summer dry and balmy. Extremes of temperature, sudden changes, and severe storms are very rare, with little snowfall and few winds. Blizzards are unknown, but the mild chinook winds occasionally sweep through the mountain passes from the warm Pacific.

Seeding usually begins in April, sometimes in March. Most of the rainfall occurs in June and July. The average precipitation for the full year is about twelve to thirteen inches.

The summers are remarkable for their long days and short nights. For three months there is almost continual light. The days are warm, but the heat is not sultry or murky.

Harvest commences about the middle of August. September is an especially pleasant month.

The climate need not be feared. Taken the year round, it is healthy and pleasant.

The soil is rich and easy to till. Flowers and vegetables grow with wonderful energy, and spread cheer and profit alike.

There are many large islands along the Peace river, and these are all thickly wooded with fine straight spruce.

I am only giving a synopsis of the advertisement sent out. I might also state that the gentleman who handed me this advertisement said he got it down in Tennessee, and he is now up in the Peace river country:

Seams of coal are exposed in the Rocky Mountain Canyon above Hudson Hope, of excellent quality and higher grade than most of the western Canadian coals.

Now I want to draw the attention of the committee specially to this:

Railway construction is in progress. Location has been carried west as far as Pouce Coupé, and it is only a matter of time until the steel will be laid across the prairie and thence through the mountain passes to give an outlet to the Pacific coast.

That is what I consider a contract between this government and the people who went into that country. I can take it in no other light:

Much of the country is still unexplored, but many millions of acres of fertile lands are known to lie in its valleys, and untold mineral wealth beneath its hills. It holds out very alluring promises for the future. Railway surveys have been projected from the south and east, and railway construction is in progress.

Another promise on the part of the government to the people of the Peace river country:

Much water power is available. Fish and game are abundant. The scenery is magnificent, and the summer seasons very delightful.

Homesteads have been located about Fort St. John. On the flats wild grasses and peavine grow in great profusion. The land is excellent, and very heavy yields of grain and vegetables are harvested every year on the homesteads already taken up.

Then comes another promise from the Dominion government to these people:

The government of Canada offer all resonable inducements and assistance to encourage the development of this great Peace River district. Progressive steps have been taken to open it up by establishing lines of communication and transportation.

I may say that it is essential to the life of these people that they get railway transportation. Something over two thousand people have gone in on the strength of this advertisement. Will this government carry out its solemn pledge to them? I am not finding fault so much with the old government, nor indeed with this government so far. The old government had the aftermath of the war to deal with, and this government has practically only got settled down and got the Railway Board appointed. But I think it is the duty of this government to give these people the railway facilities they are entitled to, and the railway facilities which this government pledged to them when they went into that country and settled there.

During last session I was asked a number of times to take this question up with the government but I refused to do so. I said that I would first go into the country and see it for myself, and at the close of last session I spent the great part of the fall in the Peace River district, and I have not one word of fault to find with that advertisement. I think there is a country there second to none in Canada, and although I travelled through it day after day I did not meet one person during that time who felt that he had any fault to find with the climate or with the soil. All they asked for was railway transportation. I went from granary to granary all through that vast country and saw hundreds of them, with two and three years' crops of grain and no way of getting it out. Some of them had their grain in stacks, and could not get money enough to thresh it.

On the train coming out with me were seven men and a bank manager. I wanted to get all the information I could, and of course

I was interested in talking to these men and learning what I could from them. I asked the bank manager why he was leaving. I asked him if he had got a promotion. He said, "No I am leaving that country because I think I had better leave it than go crazy in it. How can I stay in that country seeing what these people are up against, and that I am expected by the bank to make collections? I believe I would be locked up at New Westminster if I stayed there much longer. I am going out without instructions," he added "and I expect to get discharged." He was taking his wife and family out with him.

Each of the other seven men was the head of a family, and had left his wife and family in there to look after the cattle and winter as best they could. They were going out to try and earn a little money to buy clothing for their families. Four of these men went down to Seattle, two of them to work in the coal mines there, one of them to drive a team, and the other to work on the wharf. They said they had some friends over there and thought that they could get a job. Now what is this government doing? These men will work there four or five months and make a little money to buy clothing for their children. They will buy the clothing over there, and on their way back this government will collect a tariff on that clothing. These men go down there to earn a few hundred dollars to clothe their families and if they buy the clothes over on the American side where they can get them cheaper they will have to pay this government about thirty per cent in the way of tariff on those clothes. Is that the way to encourage settlers in this country? Is that the way we are going to treat them? They came here on the strength of this advertisement issued by this government. They are making good. They are the best class of people I have ever had the privilege of meeting. Some two or three hundred of them went over and fought our battle overseas. They went in and settled in the Peace river country on the strength of this pledge made by a minister of this government to give them railway facilities. What is this government going to do about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A minister of the previous government.

Mr. McBRIDE: He was a minister of the federal government, at the time he made this promise. I was talking to a minister of this government the other day and he said that the difference between this government and the government of the United States was that in the United States one government did not pretend to carry out the pledges of its predecessor, but he said in Canada they did. Under these conditions I say that this government is in honour bound to give these people railway facilities with the least possible delay. They went in there in good faith. They have carried out their share of the contract. What is this government going to do about it?

I do not want to take up too much time, but I have a petition here representing some two thousand settlers. They ask for a line to start from Prince George and to run into the Peace river country. This would be a matter of only about 200 miles, and it would open up that country. I venture to say from personal inspection of that country, if it had railway facilities, inside of ten years from 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels of wheat would be raised there. That is something the government wants to look into. The government is talking about bringing in immigration. There is a district in which not one person, all the time I was there, had one complaint to make about the climate, crop conditions or anything else. One man to whom I spoke said that a crop failure was unknown. He had been there for thirteen years, he said, and this year came the nearest to being a failure of any year since he had been there. He had as fine a crop of wheat, oats and barley as I want to see grown anywhere. The country is a splendid one, an empire within itself, and yet those people, after they have gone in there in good faith, are tied up and cannot get transportation. Now, it is up to this government to furnish them with transportation. If this government sends a commission there to investigate conditions, and if it is found that any word in that advertisement and the statement I have made to-night is not correct, I do not ask them to do anything; but I think they will find what I have said more than verified on investigation. Therefore, it is up to the government to build a line, in my judgment, from Prince George into that district. This would put those people within 667 miles of Prince Rupert, which is undoubtedly one of the coming cities on the Pacific coast, and it is up to the government to do everything it can to develop freight for its lines going there. It would also bring that country within 892 miles of Vancouver, and all the government has to do is to build about 200 or, at the outside, 250, miles of line. I have had a railway expert go and investigate the situation, and he says that such a line could be built for $35,000 a mile. I would ask the government to investigate the matter and try and make a start at the earliest possible date.

Mr. JELLIFF: It is not my purpose to take up very much of the time of the committee in entering into this debate. I have been sitting here for almost a week now in the gloom and shadows of this chamber and I felt that it was up to me to bring in a little gleam of sunshine from sunny, southern Alberta. We have heard a good many complaints from this side of the House in reference to conditions surrounding the farmers of this country, and I regret to say that most of those complaints are well founded. They are true; they are absolutely true from investigations which I have been able to make. But at the same time, we must ask ourselves the question, as fair-minded and reasonable men, members of this House of Commons, a great deliberative assembly: Where in the world can we go and not find similar or even worse conditions? We have come through a great war, and the situation in which we are placed, to my mind, is to a large extent the result of the losses of men and of treasure which we sustained during that great conflict and its inevitable reaction. I doubt whether any one of my farmer friends sitting to my left to-day, for whom I entertain the utmost respect and affection, could, at this time, plant themselves down in any other agricultural country in the world and find better conditions than exist right here in Canada, bad as these conditions are. We are here to try to help correct those conditions; and when I review the whole situation as best I can, looking the world over, I must conclude, when considering the matter of immigration to this country, that there is not another country on earth where incoming men who are honest, who are industrious, and who possess a fair share of intelligence, stand a better show of making a livelihood than in Canada.

I am going further than that, and I am going to say here to-night that, looking Canada over as a whole, I know of no province in this country which can offer better opportunities than the province of Alberta from which I come. I came into Alberta as an immigrant twenty years ago There was not a railroad in my neighbourhood; I journeyed part way to the land which I had selected, on what we called a narrow-track or turkey trail railway, and in those twenty years I have seen that country fenced up all around me. Those lands which formerly were the exclusive home of the ground squirrel, the coyote and a few straggling herds of cattle are now the homes of hundreds and thousands, I am going to say, of prosperous and successful farmers. I have seen school districts blocked out, schoolhouses built, churches built, towns and cities grow up, all the institutions of civilization placed in our midst, and the building in the three western provinces of one of the greatest empires on earth.

I am going to give the committee something from the records of our own provincial government—I am not going into it very far—just to indicate what Alberta is, what it has been doing during the last ten or fifteen years, to show it is a proper place for bringing in new settlers who have an honest intention to earn a fair living for themselves and their families. In the matter of grain, according to records which I have from the Alberta government, we produced in that province in 1909, 8,467,799 bushels of wheat, and in 1920, 83,526,901 bushels of wheat, or nearly ten times as much. As regards oats, we produced in 1909, over 24,000,000 bushels; in 1920, over 115,000,000 bushels, and in 1921, 92,000,000 bushels.

As regards barley, we produced in 1909, over 3,000,000 bushels, and in 1921, over 12,000,000 bushels. Passing from that to the cattle industry, let us see what took place. In 1910, the figures given as to cattle in Alberta are 672,709 head, and in 1921, 1,854,202, a tremendous growth and development. Our dairy products sprang from $7,855,751 in 1910 to $34,000,000 in 1920; our creamery butter rose from $2,315,000 in 1910 to $11,821,291 in 1920, and so on. The number of dairy cows in the province increased from 94,671 in 1910 to 423,838 in 1921; while the number of horses increased from 254,197 in 1910 to 916,510 in 1921, and swine from 237,510 to 574,318.

Now, these are some real facts in reference to what we have produced. True it is that in late years, with these great productions and with the market conditions such as they have been in the world at large, we have not been able to obtain a fair reward for the money invested and the labour put forth in agriculture in that province, and in the other western provinces. But I do not believe that that is a reason for us in Canada to stand by and let matters drift. I do not believe that the people in this country outside of this House of Commons would approve in any measure whatever of our taking an attitude of that kind. I believe that people are looking for an immigration policy; I think they are fully sensible of the great extent of our territory and the immeasurable richness of our resources, agricultural, mineral, fisheries and timber. They are looking to us to inaugurate policies in regard to immigration and otherwise which will result in such a development of these immense resources that Canada, within a reasonable period, will attain that position of influence and power and usefulness among the nations of the world which Nature and destiny intended she should fill. I thoroughly believe that and I feel that it is our business to promote that end. And it all has a relationship to this immigration policy.

I am heartily in favour of immigration. I do not believe there is a member in this House who is not in favour of it; I do not believe there is a member here who does not want to see this great heritage of ours, this magnificent land with its resources developed to the utmost. I believe we all are anxious to see steps taken that will bring about that result. Speaking for myself and for the district in which I live I must say that we are very anxious to have immigrants. Nothing would please me better than to see the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) set down 2,000 good reliable farmers in my district of Lethbridge to-morrow. We have passed through as difficult times as any district in Canada, and I believe worse. But outside certain localities in connection with which a mistake was made in earlier immigration policies, and where we had no business to place settlers without having made proper preparations, I believe that we can give every man who wants to come in and farm a good opportunity to make a fair, square living for himself and his family. Our people are persevering and gritty and they are determined to win. They have set aside and hypothecated great areas of land in my district to the extent of eight or nine million dollars, to be devoted to irrigation projects, and I am quite sure they will win. When they get these projects settled up and in operation there will be few failures in that part of the province, nor, I trust, any further misery or suffering. Now, it is sometimes well for us to see ourselves as other see us. I hold in my hand a letter I received two or three weeks ago from a young man who settled a few years ago in my immediate neighbourhood. Before coming out into our part of the country he was a book-keeper with T. Eaton and Company, his wife having been a stenographer with the same company. He had been brought up on a farm in Ireland. He came and settled down in that neighbourhood and made a success of farming in every way. This letter, which is written in beautiful handwriting, is dated February 23rd, and reads:

Dear Mr. JELLIFF,

In view of the discussion on immigration in the country, in the press and in parliament I am sending you a clipping from my home paper in Belfast, Ireland. It is the concluding article of a series in which this clergyman describes his trip from Belfast to Pennant, Saskatchewan and return. He is a man of considerable standing in his community,—the minister of probably the largest Presbyterian church in Ireland,— and if you will read his concluding remarks you will see he is very favourably impressed with this country. I understand it was the custom of the Immigration department some years ago when they were going after immigrants seriously to send over to the Old Country Canadian farmers during the winter season to tell them over there the actual conditions on the farm in Canada; and knowing your intimacy with the Hon. C. Stewart—this is complimentary to myself—I thought possibly you would use your influence on my behalf in that direction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JELLIFF: You can "oh, oh," at this all you please, gentlemen, but here is a man who is as honest, as honourable, as conscientious, and as successful a farmer as any that sits in this House to-night.

Of course, all the world knows the unsettled condition of Ireland, and lots of young farmers are at the present time anxiously considering the question of going overseas. As you know, I am familiar with conditions in each of the prairie provinces, both city and country, as I have been in Canada fifteen years, coming direct from the Old Country to Winnipeg in 1908. I can address public meetings if necessary and point out in a convincing manner the advantages the country offers to the settler, and have no doubt I could secure a considerable number of immigrants from the farms under present conditions in Ireland.

My people are farmers over there and have occupied the same farm for ninety-eight years, so that I am thoroughly familiar with farming conditions on both sides of the Atlantic.

This is a man from my own district who changed from a clerical occupation and is making a marked success of farming. He wants to go over to his native country to spend the winter time there and bring over men in the spring to settle on farms in Canada.

Now I am going to read the concluding paragraph of the clipping to which he refers, written by the pastor of one of the largest churches in Ireland. This is from the eleventh of a series of articles he has written with reference to Canada. He came over here to investigate conditions in order to satisfy himself. He had heard a lot about Canada, his people were looking this way, and he wanted them to know the truth about the situation. He says in conclusion:

At the moment there are a good many of our young people turning their thoughts anxiously and inquiringly to the Dominion of Canada. The present industrial depression and the uncertainty about the future of our country have made many wonder if emigration would solve for them the problem of the coming years. If my articles will have helped anyone to decide the question of whether or not they should seek a new home in Canada, then one of the purposes for which they have been written will be served. For my own part, I would say that if they decide to go they will find a land of hardly touched wealth and of many opportunities, a land that is producing men and women of industry, intelligence, and resource, a land in which they will be proud to dwell.

I know what hard knocks are on the farm. I came to Canada twenty years ago knowing little or nothing about farming. I presume I have had harder knocks on that account than the man who comes here even with a limited amount of experience in that occupation. I have seen hard times, and I doubt if there is a man in this chamber who has had more and harder financial burdens to bear during those twenty years than I have. But all through that period I never lost one iota of my faith in the future greatness and destiny of Canada. I am determined to make a win yet on my farming venture, and I believe other men are equally determined. I have seen the wonderful growth and development of agriculture in western Canada—a development such as has never been seen in any other country in the world within the same limited time. We should have hope and we should take courage from that fact.

Now as to this immigration policy. I do not like it. I want to see immigration, I want to see this country filled up. I want to see our great national debt paid, I want to see a stop put to these great railway deficits; but I am doubtful, sincerely doubtful, even if this Canada Colonization Association should be all right, whether it is going to obtain the results that we have in view. I do not think the immigration policy of the minister goes far enough. I do not think it is comprehensive enough. What does he propose? He is going to bring in, I take it from the plans that have been outlined, farmers, farm labourers, domestics and children—very commendable so far as it goes, but it is doubtful indeed if that is going to answer the purpose which I have no doubt the minister has sincerely in view.

The bringing in of children as a philanthropic enterprise is commendable, but it will be years and years before such immigrants will be able to give any appreciable help in the payment of our national debt or in decreasing our railway deficits. Then take the next class, the domestics. I cannot see with any stretch of my imagination that they are going to contribute materially towards paying off our national debt. If what I have seen of them in my life is still charactertistic of this class, most of their resources will be spent in mimicking their mistresses and possibly in a rivalry as to which can wear the shortest dresses both at the top and the bottom. But, I repeat, I do not believe they will contribute materially towards the payment of our national debt. And the same with the farm labourers. They will help somewhat on the farms to increase the amount of grain produced, but when it comes to the income tax and to furnishing freight for our railroads they are not going to be a very important factor. Then the last class, the farmers themselves. As I have stated, there are great burdens on our farmers and we want to give them the best possible outlook. This plan of bringing in farmers is a marked admission on the part of the minister as to the relationship of agriculture to the general welfare of the country and to the dependence that we must place on it. But he is proposing to increase the number of farmers. He admits that the farmer is the backbone of the country. But we are not going to carry our debt any easier by lengthening the backbone, for the longer you make it the weaker it will be unless adequate props are provided to sustain it, unless it is strengthened, unless it is energized, unless it is rendered more effective—and there is nothing proposed here to this end.

What I should like to have announced here in this connection is the general policy of the government, which should be dovetailed and fitted in with the immigration policy, whatever it may be, to ensure its success and to accomplish the purposes we have in view. As it is now, we are looking to immigration to lift this load by increasing the number of farmers. In other words, we are asking the tail to wag the dog, instead of relying on the more natural action of the dog wagging the tail.

Now, there are certain things that must go concurrently with this policy to render it effective and successful. The first is that we must lower the cost of living and the cost of production. Remove that burden from the farmer and you will remove much of the cause of his complaint. I know of nothing better this administration could do than to dovetail the policy outlined in the platform on which it was elected in with its immigration policy. Let them come out with the courage of their convictions upon which they secured their present place in this parliament, and they will do more to contribute to the success of immigration than anything else they could attempt. Take the burdens off the necessaries of life and the implements of farm production. Go further and take the tariff burden off the implements necessary for the development of our natural resources.

Another matter that should be taken up with a view to rendering the work of the farmers effective is the equalization of freight rates. In my own province we have a rate of 15 cents a bushel on wheat from Lethbridge to Fort William, a distance of 1,177 miles, while the rate to Vancouver, only 774 miles, is 15.8 cents a bushel. It is costing us $1.95 a ton more, on an equal ton mile basis of rates, to get to the coast than to Fort William. When I went into Alberta my friends said to me: "The trouble is that you are too far from your market." I said, "Well, I expect the day soon to come when I shall be able to ship my grain to the western coast," and I have been waiting for that all these years, hoping and praying that it would come, not only for my own benefit but for the benefit of the farmers generally in my province. In my district we raised 22,000,000 bushels of wheat last year—63,000,000 bushels in the whole province. If we had had an equitable rate to the West the farmers of Alberta would have saved $3,500,000 on their wheat alone. In my own district we would have saved a million and a quarter. That means something to the intending settler; to bring about an equitable condition in freight rates would give added strength and sinew to the men who are already toiling in the fields out in that country. The government has it within its power to remedy that defect.

Another difficulty we are labouring under is connected with our system of financing. We need a system of financing adapted to the requirements of agriculture, a system that will provide us with money on the terms necessary to enable us to mature our products and put them on the market in an orderly way. It has got to come. Some such system prevails in every agricultural country that we are competing with. It is but a few years ago that a farm loan mortgage system was introduced in the United States. During the war the United States had to back up its farmers by advancing them millions of dollars through their War Finance Corporation. Then came the slump of 1920 and 1921; the War Finance Corporation was reinstated and there was distributed within a few months through that corporation $470,000,000 for the relief of cotton growers, corn growers, live stock producers and the sugar beet industry of the United States—in fact, only that could have saved them from utter collapse, Europe not being able to take her supplies as she had taken them in former years. By holding back their surplus and letting it go on the market as its absorption became possible they raised the price of cotton from 8 to 20 cents a pound and the price of corn from 20 to 45 or 50 cents a bushel. That increase was not an undue burden upon anybody; it was the fair average value of the product. In this country it should be part of our policy to bring about some orderly method of marketing our farm products so that we may avoid slumps and frequent losses by putting the products on the market as they can be readily absorbed. Europe cannot take larger quantities than she requires for short periods; they are not in a position to buy in advance, because of the demoralized condition of their finance and exchanges. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, for whom I have so much respect, would, I am sure, pretty nearly agree with me in regard to some of these things, and I am confident that if the government took action along these lines they would have his hearty support and the support of hon. gentlemen to my right as well as of my hon. friends to my left. It is not simply a question of dollars and cents; we have to spend money here to make money. I doubt whether we can get our country back into shape without going further even into debt than we are today. We must put our producers in such a position that they shall be able to pull the load.

I believe from the bottom of my heart that the future of this government depends on the prosperity of the agricultural industry. If agriculture succeeds, prosperity will permeate to the very top of our industrial and commercial structure. As I sat here to-night thinking, my mind went back to that good old first Psalm that I learned at my father's knee. It presents to my mind a picture that I would like to look upon as a vision of our own country in the future. The words I have in mind are these:

> And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

I like to think of Canada as a great oak with its roots buried deep in the soil, developing into a magnificent tree under whose branches the war-weary of the world, the industrious, the ambitious, the worthy from all lands can find opportunity, peace, comfort and plenty.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, at this late hour I do not intend to take up the time of the House any longer than I possibly can. The reason I am speaking now is that my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) informed me that he would not occupy any more than ten minutes. I have enjoyed his speech very much, although I cannot agree with a great deal of it; and I must say that if the hon. member has no better idea of the conditions in Alberta than he has of the lapse of time I think he must be astray in some of the statements which he made. I, too, am an Alberta man and very proud indeed of the fact. I realize that Alberta is one of the coming provinces of this Dominion. I realize that probably in fifty years she will be the banner province of Canada; I have not the slightest doubt that in time that will be her happy position. I do not come from one of those districts we have heard so much about where only wheat growing is carried on. My constituency is located in what is almost entirely a mixed farming country so that I am in a position to speak from no extreme point of view.

We have heard a good deal this evening as to the number of hon. members on this side who came over as immigrants and are now occupying seats in this chamber. All I can say is, that a few years ago they must have been particularly careful as to the kind of immigrants they admitted into this country! A black picture has been painted from this side of the House in regard to agricultural conditions. In those instances where hon. members who have taken part in this debate have spoken enthusiastically of agriculture and have painted a rosy picture; I notice that in nearly every case the hon. member is not a farmer. As to the few hon. members on this side who have painted a more or less rosy picture, I know full well that if they dared they would use much blacker colors. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in painting too black a picture of anything, neither do I believe in painting a rosy picture when there is no cause for doing so; I believe in stating facts. I want to approach the consideration of this question entirely from a business point of view. I wish to lay a few facts before the House and see whether it is in the best interests of the country that we should spend large sums of money in trying to bring people to Canada. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Stansell) speaking a little while ago said that if he described conditions as some of the members to his left had described them, he would be afraid to go back to his constituents for re-election. I want to say that those hon. members who have given a true picture of the conditions have a far greater chance of returning to this House at the next election.

Let us see for a moment what the population of this country was in 1871. I am not going to bother the House with a lot of figures but those figures I am going to quote have been very carefully checked and I need them for the purpose of proving my argument. In 1871 we had a population of 3,689,257. The immigration to date has been 5,099,692, and the natural increase 3,931,125, making a grand total of 12,720,074. Now according to the census of 1921 we have a total population of 8,788,483 which shows a loss to Canada in the intervening time of 3,931,591. During that period we have spent no less a sum than $30,000,000 and yet have lost nearly 4,000,000 people from this country. Now, the question is one of horse sense: Is it worth while going on and spending money in trying to increase the population? Or, should we first of all try and find out why we are losing population so rapidly. This year the immigration estimates call for an expenditure of $3,386,190, or an increase over last year of $1,316,490. I do not want the House to think for a moment that I am opposed to immigration of a proper sort; I do not believe that a single member on this side has taken the stand that they do not want any kind of immigration. Personally, I am very much in favour of an immigration of the right sort, which should be entirely voluntary but selected. There is an old saying in the army that one volunteer is worth five pressed men. In my humble opinion one volunteer immigrant is worth five pressed immigrants who are attracted to this country by highly coloured literature and spoon fed for two or three years after they get here. What would we think of a farmer who is a horse dealer as well, who buys horses in great numbers and turns them into a large paddock and, as time goes on finds he is losing his horses, and instead of trying to discover the gate that happened to be left open, simply buys more and more horses to keep up the number? We would think he was a fit inmate for the asylum. And yet Canada has been losing her immigrants by the thousand, she is losing them to-day at the rate of ten thousand a month; and at the same time she is leaving the gate open and spending more and more money to buy fresh horses to put into the paddock.

I am not going to take up any time criticizing the business connection of the government with the Canada Colonization Association; I think that phase of the subject was very fully dealt with by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). However, I would like to consider a few reasons why people are leaving this country. You do not find people that are contented with their lot leaving a country; you do not find men leaving jobs if they are satisfied. We cannot get away from the fact that the people are going from Canada. You may talk all you like about looking on the hopeful side of things, and about Canada being a great country; but as long as people are leaving the country in a continuous stream it must be evident that something is wrong.

There are several reasons why that exodus is taking place, and I am going to give some reasons why people are leaving western Canada. Then you will know that something is wrong. The people are leaving this country for several reasons. I am not going to give the reasons why they are leaving the eastern part of Canada. I will leave that to the eastern members who are quite capable of looking after that part of the country, but I am going to give some of the reasons why they are leaving the West.

They are leaving western Canada, for one reason, because of the unjust indirect taxation they have to bear. Western Canada is paying the full price of an artificial tariff and is not getting any benefit from it. Furthermore, we are taxing through that indirect way the family man. We are making it more difficult for families to be brought up in this country because of the high cost of living. At the same time, on the other hand, we are doing all we can to spend money to bring children into the country!

Another source of criticism that we have in the new Canada is that for many years past, from fifteen to twenty years, railway construction has been promised in various parts of the West, and those railways have not been built, with the result that you have thousands of settlers who went into western Canada, just like the settlers we were told about this evening who went into the Peace river country, who to-day after years and years of waiting at a distance from the railway are getting disheartened, are getting tired of the governments not keeping their promises, and they are pulling out in great numbers.

Another reason why they are leaving is because of the great overhead, particularly in freight rates, and very much so in the province from which I come, because we have an unjust freight rate against us in getting to our nearest seaport. They are leaving also because of the unjust system we have had in regard to the financial monopoly they have had to do business with.

If the government will relieve us of a little of the indirect taxation, will carry out the railway construction they have promised us for so many years, if they will give us a reasonable freight to the coast, as is our due, if we can get financial institutions that will not hold up the western people for nearly double the rate of interest those institutions charge in other parts of Canada, I think there is some chance of keeping the people in western Canada.

We have heard a good deal of the need of bringing people into this country. I am going to read just one or two resolutions from the people of western Canada who are on the soil where you want to place these new settlers who are coming in. The following resolution passed through a large convention in Alberta:

> Resolved that the United Farmers of Alberta in convention assembled go on record as being opposed to any Canadian moneys being spent for the bringing into Canada more farmers (under present conditions).

Here is another resolution:

> That this convention very much disapproves of the whole Western Canada Colonization scheme, and calls on our government not to give it any financial support.

Here is a resolution I had from a municipality in the West:

> That the Minister of Immigration use his influence to obtain finance for operating a long term loan for farmers now in residence; making it possible for those now engaged in agriculture to remain on the land, in preference to bringing in new immigration.

Here is a letter I received the other day from a district that, as the writer says, is not the worst part of Alberta. He says:

> This is not the worst part of the country by any means, but there are a great many families through here that are nearly destitute of the bare necessities, and I saw children at the meeting in our school house the night of the 26th February who are really suffering from lack of food and clothing. Hope the government can be made to see the wisdom of looking after the people we have before aiding immigration.

Some hon. members may think this is rather a light subject, but I assure hon. members of this House that this is a very serious one, and if some relief is not given to that western country we are going to hear a great deal more from them.

Before I close I would just like to sum up the views of some members of the cabinet with regard to agriculture. We find the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart), for whom personally I have the greatest sympathy in his arduous task, turning to a real estate agency, more or less, for the policy he is trying to carry out.

We find the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) allowing the farmers of western Canada to be held up for millions through unjust freight rates on the Great Lakes, and then possibly on account of the indignation arising throughout that western country, deciding to get out of the way by taking a trip around the world.

We find the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has no more sympathy for Labour than my hon. friend the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has for the Knights of Columbus.

We find the Minister of Agriculture last year making the statement on the floor of this House that in his opinion farming could not be put on a commercial basis.

We find the Postmaster General refusing to give any help or support in providing rural mail delivery routes in western Canada. I do not know what action has been taken in the East, but an entirely deaf ear has been turned to the demands of the settlers in the West in that respect.

I sometimes wonder if the Premier himself has any idea of the feeling in western Canada. I thought that the very fact of western Canada sending down a group of members entirely separate from the old parties would at least show that there was something doing in the West. If that was not enough, I would have thought that when he tried to get a cabinet minister a position in western Canada, he would have wondered what was wrong when he was not successful. He probably did the wisest thing. He chose a man who was very popular indeed, who had held a very high position in the province, and yet in spite of those advantages we find that he ran up against a water-tight combination. He ran up against that because the people of western Canada have made up their minds that they must have some relief, and if the same thing had been asked of the other provinces I have not the slightest doubt he would have had the same answer. The opposition was not against a personality. It was because the people there have made up their minds they want justice. They have simply got to have relief. If that is not sufficient handwriting on the wall the near future will give us more.

I cannot, therefore, Mr. Chairman, support the estimates as they are presented. I cannot even support the item that we are now discussing. I cannot do so for this reason; I think it is far more important to Canada to alter the economic conditions of the West, and also of agriculture in the East to enable us to keep our own experienced men, who have been with us ten or fifteen or twenty years on the farm, than to let them go out and fill their places with green and untried settlers. I therefore beg to move the following amendment to the motion before the Chair:

That item 52 of the Immigration and Colonization estimates be reduced to the sum of $675,000.

The same as it was last year.

Amendment negatived.

Item agreed to.

Chinese immigration—salaries and contingencies, $60,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest to the minister that considering the success he has had in getting over a really serious hurdle, he do not ask the House to wait longer to-night. This is an important appropriation, and I know there are quite a number who would like to discuss it, some of whom are not present. No progress will be made by going on with that item. The minister has asked himself that the second item, No. 53, stand, and I do not see what he hopes to gain by going on.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. Friday.

Friday, March 23, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

LIVE STOCK ACTS AMENDMENT

Mr. KAY presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization, as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration Bill No. 10, to amend and consolidate the Acts Respecting Live Stock and have agreed to report the same with amendments.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): I beg to lay on the Table of the House the authentic texts of the Draft Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference (League of Nations) at its third session held in Geneva, Switzerland, October 25-November 19, 1921.

Under paragraph 5 of article 405 of the Treaties of Peace.

Each of the members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

When the authentic texts of the Draft Conventions and Recommendations of the 1921 conference were received from the Secretary-General of the League of Nations they were referred to the Department of Justice for consideration of the question whether the proposals involved were to be regarded as within Dominion or provincial legislative competence. The report of the Minister of Justice on this subject was approved by order in council on June 27, 1922, and a copy of the order in council is attached to the texts of the Draft Conventions and Recommendations for the information of the House. It will be observed that most of the proposals were found to be within provincial jurisdiction. Copies of the order in council of June 27, 1922, and of the authentic texts of the Draft Conventions and Recommendations were transmitted subsequently to the different lieutenant-governors for the consideration of their respective governments with a view to such legislative or other action in line with the proposals involved as each provincial government might be advised to take. The obligations of the government of Canada under the Peace Treaties have thus been fulfilled in respect of the individual measures of the 1921 conference which were found to be within the provincial sphere.

With respect to those Draft Conventions and Recommendations which were found to be within federal legislative competence, the authentic texts are being brought before parliament in conformity with the requirements of paragraph 5 of article 405 of the Treaties of Peace and are being laid on the Table of the House. The questions involved in these latter Draft Conventions and Recommendations are also receiving the attention of the government. The Dominion government has proposed to the several provincial governments that a Dominion-provincial conference should be held for the purpose of considering certain aspects of matters arising out of the relations between Canada and the International Labour Organization. Most of the provinces have already expressed their acquiescence in this suggestion and it is expected that the meeting will be held in the early part of next summer.

Referring to the inquiry which was made in the House yesterday by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), as to "when the House may expect the report of the last meeting of the International Labour Conference," I find that the government has not as yet received either the printed report of the discussions of the conference or the authentic texts of the recommendations which were adopted by the conference.

As I mentioned yesterday, a report of the 1922 session of the International Labour Conference appeared in the December issue of the Labour Gazette, the official monthly Journal of the Department of Labour of Canada. I have pleasure in laying a copy of a re-print of this article from the Labour Gazette on the Table of the House for the purposes of information.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): My information is that the report in the Gazette to which the hon. member referred yesterday and again to-day is not a complete report. It is only in part a report of the conference. Is that correct? I may not have caught what the hon. gentleman said, but I did not come to any clear understanding myself of his remarks as to why the report could be in the Gazette of December and the government not yet in receipt of the full report to lay on the Table of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will note that I have only laid on the Table of the House the authentic text of the draft conventions adopted at the 1921 conference. The authentic text of what was done at the 1922 conference has not yet been received by the Department of Labour. It has not yet come to Canada. We hope to have it within the next few months; but there is always, I understand, great delay in sending forward the authentic text. The report that appeared in the issue of December last of the Labour Gazette was, it is believed, as full and complete as was necessary. I am going to send across the floor to my right hon. friend a copy so that he can peruse it.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I observe in the press to-day an announcement that Mrs. James Carruthers of England, who formerly was Miss Violet Markham, has been selected to represent this government on the governing body of the International Labour Conference at its meeting in April. Is this correct, and if it is, what superior qualifications has she over Canadians to represent us on that body?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The report is correct, although I do not think it would be at all proper to intimate that Mrs. James Carruthers would have any superior qualifications over very many of our Canadian women. The circumstances are, however, that we received notice only very recently, as to the date of the next meeting of the governing body of the International Labour Office to be held on April 10 at Geneva, and with that notice a copy of the agenda of the matters to be dealt with. For the January meeting of the governing body, we received notice so late that it was regarded as inadvisable, under the circumstances, to endeavour to arrange for a substitute for the representative for Canada on the governing board for the January meeting. On this occasion, we undertook to secure representation hurriedly and by cable, endeavouring to secure a gentleman who, it was thought, would very ably represent Canada. That was found impossible; so Mrs. James Carruthers was asked to represent Canada and she very kindly consented to act. Mrs. Carruthers, although resident in England, has visited all parts of Canada, and is the author of a handbook on the Factory and Shop Acts of the British dominions, which was issued by the industrial sub-committee of the Victoria League. She is a member of the executive committee of the British National Relief Fund and of the Central Committee of Women's Employment, and was Deputy Director of the Women's section of the National Service Department in 1917, and was appointed a member of the British Industrial Court in 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just to save time, will the hon. gentleman lay on the Table of the House to-morrow, if possible, the notification, with notification of its receipt, and the other correspondence to which he has just referred? I may mention that there was one qualification which he forgot, namely that this lady was a Liberal candidate for Parliament at the last election; running against the Labour candidate.

Mr. MURDOCK: I was uninformed as to that fact, if it is a fact.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Immigration—Chinese immigration—salaries and contingencies, $60,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister certainly should explain this item, especially the increase of $25,000. He should also make clear to the committee just what this money is devoted to and how it fits in with the policy as to Chinese immigration, whatever policy it is that the government purposes adopting.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Minister of Imigration and Colonization): One reason for the increase in this item is that now there are 28 employees charged to this appropriation, whereas, only 19 were charged to the appropriation last year, the other nine being charged to the general appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the general appropriation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Their salaries were charged to the vote for the outside service. They are now taken into the Immigration staff, and their salaries charged to the Immigration appropriation. I will give the list of names, as that is possibly the quickest way.

S. N. Reid, maximum	$2,160
J. W. Speed, immigration inspector	1,560
A. H. Jones, immigration inspector	1,320
Miss H. G. Parkinson	1,116
A. F. Youngs, immigration inspector	1,335
Lee S. Yen, immigration interpreter	1,200
Peter Coney, caretaker	1,080
John Earnshaw	1,065
J. C. Kirk, clerk	2,280
G. A. Stevens, departmental accountant general	1,980
W. C. Taylor, engineer stationary heating	1,800
H. S. Ferguson, filing clerk	1,080
A. E. Allen, clerk stenographer	1,065
C. E. Wilson, immigration inspector	1,560
Harold Crump, immigration inspector	1,320
Paul Lung, immigration interpreter	1,260
Yip Sing	1,200
H. W. Wilson, inspector	1,260
Edmund Wilson, guard	960
A. J. Williams, guard	960
W. J. Lowe, caretaker	1,080
A. C. Green, elevator operator	885
H. Glover, immigration inspector Union Bay	900
R. H. Banham	900
R. H. Halhed	900
Lee Frank Hong, interpreter, Winnipeg, Man.	200
Wong Ham, Montreal, interpreter	200
A. Regimbal, immigration agent general, Montreal	1,920

This gives a total of $34,540, the number of employees being 28 as against 19 last year. Included in this are the ordinary statutory increases which with the salaries of these extra nine amount to $12,555 over last year's vote. There is also an additional expenditure that has come up since the inception of the Narcotic Drugs Act. The Immigration department are virtually acting as policemen after convictions, and their work in this regard has added to the expenses of the Immigration Act. I shall have more to say in regard to these points later. There is a provision in the Immigration Act for registration, but I would prefer to discuss that later. These are items that make up the $25,000 additional.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The salary list read by the minister totalled $34,000; then he says that there is $12,000 in the way of statutory increases this year to be added to that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; my hon. friend misunderstood me. The $12,555 is taken from the general immigration salaries—from the outside salaries—to pay these employees. In other words, this amount of $12,000 odd is included in the $34,000. The increase in the number of employees is nine and the $12,000 goes to pay their salaries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then $34,000 is the total, inclusive of statutory increases?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And that $34,000 includes the salaries of nine persons who were not taken into account before. They were previously in the general vote which we discussed for some five days. I would call the minister's attention to the fact that the general vote was itself $25,000 over that of the year before. So that if the increase in this vote is caused by taking something out of the general vote as it stood last year, the actual increase in the general vote must be regarded as $50,000. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it would be the $25,000 of an increase as voted last night, plus the salaries of these nine men, amounting to $12,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The increase of the two votes, the $25,000 increase voted last night, together with this $12,000 and the other items to which the minister has just referred, amounts to $50,000. It makes no difference how you distribute it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I had not followed him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The increase therefore is $50,000 all around. I do not understand what the money is to be applied to. These men are used in connection with Chinese immigration, chiefly I presume to prevent it, or at least to see that it complies with the minister's regulations. I should like him to tell us what those regulations are, and just what is the nature of this service as distinguished from the rest of his immigration service; and as well to explain why the Chinese need an elevator man when they get to Canada. Where are they elevated to?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I take it that he has always been in the building; there is an elevator in the building.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What building?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At Vancouver.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A special Chinese immigration building?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know that it is a special Chinese immigration building. I am not very familiar with it, but my recollection is that it was used largely in handling the Chinese at Vancouver. There are about ten persons engaged in the general immigration inspectional work in Vancouver and the ordinary port work, in addition to those whose names I have read as being engaged exclusively in Chinese work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who are these people?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are: Mr. Joliffe, Commissioner of Immigration; F. W. Taylor, immigration investigating officer; H. W. Pickles, Miss B. Jeffers, clerk-stenographer; J. W. Randall, clerk; Miss E. Cooper, clerk-stenographer; D. E. Hyndman, immigration inspector; Thomas Elliott, immigation inspector; Miss D. N. MacLean, and Luen Song.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the duties of these gentlemen?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are engaged on inspectional work, checking out any Chinese leaving the country, investigating each newcomer, taking care of deports, and a thousand and one other things in connection with the fairly numerous Chinese population of British Columbia. Frequent trips have to be taken inland in search of Chinese who have entered illegally, and this involves a considerable expenditure. My hon. friends from the coast are continually complaining of laxity on the part of our officials in prosecuting these cases, and I am free to say that I get a great many complaints. I do not think the staff is overmanned for the work that has to be done. True, if the bill which we will be discussing in a day or two is enacted into law practically only merchants and students will be allowed to enter. The work of our officials will then be confined to protecting the population against any Chinese who come in illegally. Of course, I do not want to imply that that will be the sole business of the staff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister can tell us how many men he has on this work altogether.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Twenty-five.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many Chinese came in last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the figures before me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So I see.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not expect to be asked that question.

Mr. MARTELL: What alteration has been made in the old regulations as a matter of fact?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At the moment we are admitting only merchants and students. Labourers will not be admitted. The bill proposes the abolition of the head tax. But that does not mean very much as no labourers will be coming in. Students come in simply for educational purposes.

Mr. MARTELL: What meaning does my hon. friend attach to the word "merchant"?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have found it very difficult to define who is a merchant, but I have a proposal to make when the bill comes down that I hope will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. LUCAS: How many Chinese came into Canada during the past year as compared with the year before?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For the fiscal year 1921-22 there were 1,459 admissions subject to and 287 admissions exempt from head tax. For the eleven months of this fiscal year there were 617 admissions.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Including children?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Children coming to join their parents here?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Those figures give the total admissions in both cases.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the minister know whether the figures are correct?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am giving the figures as they are given to me.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Of course, I do not doubt the minister's statement at all, but I understand that every boat reaching Vancouver from China carries quite a large number of Chinese children. This is another way in which the Chinese evade the regulations. We all know that the greater proportion of Chinese who seek admission claim to be merchants, and I think the minister will have a great deal of difficulty in defining a merchant in his bill, because the wily Chinese always finds a way to get around any restrictive regulations. The minister should be very careful in framing his definition. It will be a mistake if under his proposed bill merchants are allowed to enter to carry on business here permanently. Chinese merchants might be given permits to come in and carry on business temporarily, but we shall be faced with a very grave danger if we allow them to remain here permanently. I would suggest to the minister that Chinese merchants who desire to live here permanently should be excluded, for if you allow a Chinaman to enter as a merchant you at once lose control over him and he can engage in any occupation that appeals to him. I think also the minister should insert a provision in his bill to deport students who remain in the country after they have finished their university courses. As the law now stands it appears that once a Chinese is admitted as a student he can engage in any occupation he chooses to take up and it is impossible to deport him. A Chinaman is supposed to have several wives, and we can readily believe this when we see so many Chinese children sent to this country to join their supposed parents here. I should like to hear from the minister what investigation is made in reference to such children and whether the department is able to ascertain beyond question that the large number who are now entering Canada are really the children of Chinese already resident here.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think perhaps my hon. friend knows more about the difficulties of controlling Chinese immigration than I do. I had a very bright Chinese boy in my office the other night, in fact as bright a Chinese lad as I have ever seen. He is here on permit, and his case has been under investigation for four weeks. A Chinaman here swears that he is the boy's father; and the boy swears that he is the son of the Chinaman.

An hon. MEMBER: How can he swear that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, the boy is under twelve years of age, so perhaps it is not proper to say that he swears to the fact. But he alleges that he is the son of a Chinaman in Toronto. A number of Chinese people in Toronto say they were in China at the date of the birth of this boy, and that he is really the son of the Chinaman referred to. We do not think he is. There is certain contradictory evidence which would indicate that perhaps this is a case where the complaint of my hon. friend is justified. I merely mention this incident to show the difficulties we are confronted with. Taking it by and large my hon. friend is right as to the large number of Chinese children being sent to this country. Once it became known that the bill I have referred to would be introduced a lot of Chinese nationals resident in Canada attempted to bring in their children from China before the bill became law, and frankly we are suspicious that many of these children are not really the offspring of the men who are endeavouring to get them into this country.

Mr. STANSELL: Has the minister investigated the merits of the blood test in this connection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not resorted to any blood tests.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Do you take evidence on oath?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh, yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How are these Chinese sworn? The Chinese take two or three kinds of oaths in our courts. One is by breaking a saucer, another by burning a paper. The Chinaman writes his name on a piece of paper, sets fire to it, and then asks that his soul may burn up in hell as this paper is burning if he is not telling the truth. But neither of these oaths seems to tie the Chinaman down strictly to the truth. When you wish to be pretty certain that a Chinaman is coming very nearly to telling the truth, you insist that he be sworn by cutting off a chicken's head. What manner of oath is required by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We use them all.

Mr. MICHAUD: The chicken's head oath might be tried on members who ask too many questions!

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am not joking at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): When the proposed bill is under consideration all phases of examination and everything else connected with Chinese immigration will be discussed.

[Mr. Chas. Stewart.]

Mr. McBRIDE: If the Chinese were completely stopped from entering Canada, could not this item be struck out altogether?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): With the Chinese population we already have in British Columbia we shall always have investigations and other work to attend to, otherwise the allegations of many hon. members from British Columbia cannot be well-founded. These allegations are mainly to the effect that more Chinese enter British Columbia without permission than with permission.

Mr. McBRIDE: Is not the greater portion of this item to cover expenditure in connection with Chinese immigration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, but a very considerable portion of this expenditure has to do with looking after Chinese leaving Canada either temporarily or for good.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What precautions are taken by the department to see that Chinese do not enter illegally?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Whenever a complaint is made our officers are prepared to make an investigation to see whether the Chinaman complained of is here illegally or not.

Mr. McQUARRIE: But there is no one in the department charged with the duty of investigating before any complaint is made of illegal entries?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would not say that that is true in all cases, but I cannot tell what is the percentage. Our officials are maintained at the ports of entry, and naturally if a Chinaman gets in he will move back into the country without delay and we would not be likely to keep track of him. However, the bill provides for registration.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the department also take care of deportations of drug addicts?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How many drug addicts were deported last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The accountant tells me he thinks the figure is somewhere in the neighbourhood of twenty.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How many other deportations were there?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They do not come under this item. You mean deportations for being illegally in the country?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice that in 1921 this service cost $32,000; there was an increase last year, and a substantial increase this year. What is the reason?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I covered this item. I will give it to my hon. friend again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You gave us $12,550. Where is the balance?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have the balance for the purpose of looking after registration under the proposed legislation, supposing we cannot make a better arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is to look after registration under the new act.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the minister had the complaints of the Chinese Consul regarding the condition of the immigration sheds at Vancouver brought to his attention?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Nothing beyond what I have seen in the press reports of the speeches of Dr. Tsur. I visited the immigration shed at Vancouver, and although it is not by any means a palatial hotel, I think a man could be comfortable there provided he had his own bedding, which nearly all these immigrants carry.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are the Chinese and Japanese kept in this same shed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I suppose the minister has seen the accounts of the Japanese breaking out of the shed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My answer was not quite correct. They are not kept in the same quarters, but their quarters are in the same building.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Have any precautions been taken to prevent similar escapes in the future?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand there is some sort of international agreement between Great Britain and Japan. Would the minister consent to bringing that down so that we may have an opportunity of perusing it? I understand that the agreement allows certain concessions to Japan, and I should like to know what are the special considerations in regard to that country. I understand that it is not on account of any arrangement that we make, but on account of an arrangement made between the Mother Country and the Japanese Empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the arrangement with Japan, it was arrived at by a representative of this country in conference with Japanese representatives, but I think the formal signatures were by ministers of the Departments of Foreign Affairs. The negotiation of the agreement, however, was entirely in the hands of the Honourable the Speaker of this House in conference with the Foreign Office of Japan. The agreement has been considered a secret agreement, and I doubt very much if the government could undertake to bring down the agreement without altering the understanding between the two governments. The understanding was that it would be kept secret. I might further say that negotiations have been continued within the last year and this year between the Japanese government and our own with a view of modifying the terms of that agreement. These negotiations are not yet finally consummated, and until they are, it would be inadvisable to make any public statement regarding them.

Mr. MARTELL: I have every confidence in my right hon. leader, but I should like to know what can be brought down for public guidance in the matter. I am not asking for any confidential information at all, but can we have what has been reduced in writing and has been signed, and what is permitted to be made public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is all printed in the form of a state paper.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There is no particular secret about that. If my hon. friend wants the information I can give it to him.

Mr. MARTELL: I wish you would.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Japanese Consul General was kind enough to send me a memorandum of the Japanese views, and I suppose copies have been sent to other members of the House. In that memorandum the details of this alleged gentlemen's agreement are set out. It is stated in the memorandum that the arrangement was to the effect that no more than four hundred Japanese labourers should be admitted in any one year. That is the effect of the famous Lemieux agreement as set out in the memorandum.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Four hundred coming direct from Japan, was it not?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): It did not cover Japanese coming from other countries.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There is no secret about it. I do not see why we should have any secret arrangements of this kind. Surely if we are going to have an agreement with any foreign government as to the number of its citizens that should be admitted to Canada the public are entitled to know what the agreement is. I personally am very much opposed to that kind of secret agreement. I am opposed in the first place, to the agreement itself, and I am opposed also to any secrecy regarding it. There should not be any secrecy about it. We have received the memorandum from the Japanese Consul General as to what the arrangement is with Japan, and further, while the matter is still secret here so far as the minister is concerned, we have received a statement from the Chinese Consul General as to the treaty with China. They do not seem to treat these matters as secret, and I do not see why there should be so much secrecy on the part of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to what my hon. friend has said about secrecy, probably the best answer to that are the figures themselves. Our government has kept a record year by year of the number of Japanese that have come into the country for the last fifteen or twenty years. These figures are all published, and I think for the last ten years or more they will show that the number of Japanese labourers entering in one year was under four hundred, with the possible exception of one year.

In regard to what my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has said as to the agreement not applying to Japanese coming from other countries than Japan, my impression is, and I think I am right in it, that our government will not permit any Japanese to enter unless he comes with a passport from Japan, signed by the Japanese Foreign Office. These passports are not given to Japanese who come other than direct from Japan, so under the present arrangement the Japanese of the restricted class who does not come direct from Japan is excluded.

Mr. McQUARRIE: But the trouble is this. It may be quite true, as the Prime Minister says, that the Japanese government officially has kept the terms of this agreement, but the Japanese people themselves have not done so. I think the Minister of Immigration will agree with me when I make the statement that more Japanese have come into this country illegally than have come in legally. I asked the minister just a moment ago what precautions had been taken to prevent illegal entry of Chinese, and that would apply equally well to Japanese. I was thinking of the case that occurred the other day in Vancouver. A Japanese freighter came in with twenty-nine Japanese stowaways on board. The reason we heard anything about that was that the crew of the Japanese freighter had mutinied and taken possession of the ship, and the captain had wirelessed to the police at Vancouver to meet the boat. When she arrived at Vancouver the captain of the ship said that there were eighteen Japanese stowaways on board. The police endeavoured to locate them, and after a great deal of difficulty eventually found not eighteen, but twenty-nine Japanese in the coal bunkers. There you have the case of a Japanese freighter that is not supposed to carry passengers at all bringing in twenty-nine Japanese. If the crew had not mutinied, no doubt these men would have come into the country and later on have become citizens.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one point that I think in all fairness my hon. friend ought to state in regard to this situation. The Canadian authorities, if I am rightly informed, were told about these Japanese in virtue of a wireless that was sent by the captain of the ship, who was himself a Japanese. It was the Japanese that brought the matter to the attention of the authorities in this country.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That was after the mutiny. According to the press despatches, these Japanese stowaways stated that they had come on board ship under an arrangement with certain people in Japan, that they had paid for the privilege of coming to Canada, and they complained bitterly of their treatment in this country, and of the fact that they were not allowed to land. There is no doubt in the world that that has been going on for years, and that incident illustrates what has been happening, and explains why we have so many Japanese in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I wish to make is that what my hon. friend says in regard to Japanese coming in surreptitiously does not affect the agreement, or in any way what is accomplished or prevented under the agreement. That would take place, I assume, regardless of any arrangement. All I want to have clearly understood is that, as far as the agreement itself is concerned, the government has every reason to believe that the Japanese government has lived faithfully up to its letter. The agreement has been carried out in good faith by both parties.

Mr. McQUARRIE: But if this kind of thing is allowed to go on, should not the Japanese—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend suggest that no Japanese ship shall be allowed to land in Canada.

Mr. McQUARRIE: No that is not what I am arguing. The Prime Minister has said that the Japanese have carried out the gentlemen's agreement and lived up to it ever since it was entered into. The important point is that the Japanese government is not preventing Japanese leaving Japan to come to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member mean to say that the Japanese government is responsible for the Japanese who came in surreptitiously?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I say they are not taking any precautions to stop the emigration of Japanese citizens to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed exactly the opposite—that they are doing all in their power to see that the agreement is lived up to. Cases may arise which are beyond the control of the government. Japanese may come in surreptitiously. That is beyond the control of the Japanese government. I think it is due to the government of Japan to say that it has been made very clear, so far as this government is concerned, that the government of Japan is doing its utmost to keep faith in the matter of the agreement. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) who is present, and who had to do with immigration previously, will agree with what I say, that during his term of office he had every reason to believe that the Japanese government were living up to the agreement in good faith.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was never in charge of immigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the right hon. member was Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but never in charge of immigration. That was a separate matter and I was not in charge of that. Under the terms of that contract, each government undertook to limit immigration to Canada. Did the contract by the Japanese government say that not more than so many—referred to yesterday as 400—Japanese labourers should land in Canada? Was that a covenant on the part of the Japanese government? Or does the contract read in this way, that Canada is justified in preventing more than 400 Japanese landing in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might answer by saying that the first agreement that was made was in the nature of a treaty in regard to trade matters between Japan and Great Britain, to which this country became a party. One of the terms of that treaty, to which this parliament was a party or of which it approved, was that the subjects of Japan were to have free entrance into Canada. The treaty guaranteed—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the Anglo-Japanese treaty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Full right was given to the Japanese to come into this country under that treaty. It is open to parliament, if its members so desire, to denounce that treaty, to cease to be a party to it, and to lose the benefit to this country in trade matters which the treaty has helped us to secure. That conceivably might be the effect of eliminating the clause giving to the Japanese as citizens of Japan the right to come freely into this country. It was pointed out at the time that this right of entry would not be satisfactory to the people of Canada, that possibly the treaty might have to be denounced if that right was to be maintained. The Japanese government offered itself to restrict the number of persons coming into the country in accordance with arrangements which might be made between the government of Canada and the government of Japan. It was a matter, I think, mostly of national pride with the Japanese. They desired to preserve, in the face of the world at all events, the right of their citizens to go anywhere, and I say quite frankly to hon. gentlemen opposite that if this parliament, and particularly our friends from British Columbia, prefer to end any agreement, so far as trade is concerned, between Japan and Canada, which may affect immigration, they have only to say so, they have only to insist that such rights as are secured by treaty shall be ended, and we can very soon settle in that way, if that way will settle it, the whole question of Japanese immigration to Canada. If, on the other hand, this country wishes to preserve trade with the Orient, we shall have to have some regard for matters which with respect to their citizens the governments of the Orient regard as all important. If the government of Japan is agreeable to making an arrangement with this country which will preserve to the government of Japan such rights as it regards as essential to its citizens, and at the same time avoid as effectively as any other method possibly can, the immigration of labour from Japan to this country, I think it will be infinitely better for all to adopt the latter course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I now wish to say a word or two on the matter of the covenants of the government. I want to say that while in office it was never represented to me, nor have I any reason to say now, that the Japanese government have not complied with, or endeavoured faithfully to comply with, the covenant. I never saw the terms of it, and never had occasion to review the terms, but if the terms are such as the Prime Minister states, that the Japanese government undertook to prevent more than 400 coming to this country, and then if more than 400 come, it means the government has not complied with the treaty, although Japan may have endeavoured to comply with it. It may be that in regard to a binding contract with Japan, that country has found itself unable to comply with it. If that is the case, is not the government in a position to charge against the 400, or whatever the number is, any number that come in surreptitiously or in any way whatever? So that no more than 400 can come in, and no more will be allowed to enter, no matter how they come in.

The other matter is before the House to-day but I do not subscribe to the belief for a minute that we must abandon all trade with Japan, if we assert control over our own immigration and assert it to whatever extent we desire. The matter of trade is not a one-sided matter. It is a matter that is important to Canada and important to Japan. The Japanese are just as wise as we are. The Japanese control their immigration and we can control ours, and I am one of those who believe that we can control it just as absolutely as we desire, and whatever the consequences may be, they will not be any more disastrous to us than to the other country. In a word, they will not come in.

Mr. NEILL: I think if the Premier is alluding to the trade treaty of 1913, he will recall that in that treaty, which was ratified by Canada there was this stipulation:

> This treaty shall be subject to all the terms of the Immigration Act.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

A division of opinion has arisen since then, as to whether the words "Immigration Act" in that treaty refer to the immigration act of that day or also cover any immigration act that might be subsequently passed, but it is abundantly plain that it did cover the immigation act of that day.

Now that trade treaty between Japan and Canada was made or passed in 1913, and the revised or consolidated Immigration Act of 1912 contained provisions dating back some years, which gives the Minister of Immigration absolute power to exclude Asiatics under a general provision, something like that in the bill I endeavoured to bring down the other day. It says:

> The Minister of Immigration can reject the nationals of a people or a race whose national conditions—

Or some words to that effect.

> —and whose habits and whose climatic conditions, where they come from, render them unsuitable to assimilate with the people of Canada.

The provision is quite broad, and under it, in the year 1912, or prior to that, the Minister of Immigration had that power. Then, this trade treaty of 1913 undoubtedly reserved the provisions of that Immigration Act, so that, I submit, it will be possible to do away with the gentlemen's agreement to-day and totally to exclude Japanese or other Asiatics under the provisions of the Immigration Act as it was subsequently re-enacted more forcibly, without interfering with the right and privilege of trading with Japan. Trading with Japan is a matter in which we are vitally interested, and it is of as vital interest to Japan as it is to us. But under the terms of the provision which I have mentioned, it is not necessary to do away with the trade treaty if we wish to do away with the gentlemen's agreement.

Another matter in connection with the gentlemen's agreement has not been mentioned in this House. In addition to the 400 who are allowed into Canada every year, there is also what is called some land settlement scheme by which every Japanese owning a hundred acres of land can bring in ten Japs. Apparently, however, there is no restriction as to time; if he has 100 acres of land, he can bring in ten Japs to-day and ten next month. There is no provision as to how often he can bring in those ten Japs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under what?

Mr. NEILL: Under the gentlemen's agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. gentleman is misinformed as to that. Any restriction as to numbers of labourers coming in will apply to such labourers as may be brought in for the very purpose to which he refers.

Mr. NEILL: It may be that I am unable to read the gentlemen's agreement correctly, for I must say that the gentlemen's agreement, as I have seen it, is one of the most abstruse documents I have ever put my eyes on, and I may have interpreted it incorrectly. According to my understanding, the number was limited to 400 labourers per annum, plus the number allowed in as labourers on Jap farms. I will, however, accept the Prime Minister's interpretation.

Another thing that we might well notice under the gentlemen's agreement in connection with this matter is this, and it actually occurred three years ago. The Minister of Immigration in times of unusual unemployment has the power—and he exercised it three years ago—to prohibit any immigration into Canada of British subjects whatever, of unskilled or skilled labour, and he did so exercise that power. But he was unable under this gentlemen's agreement to prohibit the entry of those 400 Japanese. Thus, we had the wonderful situation of these orientals coming in at the rate of 400 a year, whereas, owing to unusual labour conditions in this country, our own British subjects were unable to enter Canada.

As regards the shipment of Japanese to which the hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. McQuarrie) referred, I think he stated the case correctly; but he omitted one feature of it as it was worked out in the press. It is much more difficult, I might say in passing, to prohibit the entry of Japanese than Chinamen. The Chinese come in our own Canadian Pacific boats, owned and manned by white men and these boats tie up at our wharf. The immigration officers visit and search the ship and keep a watchman on the wharf, whilst the ship is in port, so that it is practically very difficult for Chinamen to enter in that way illegally. But the Jap has his own line of steamships with not one white man on board. He pulls into the wharf and goes through the customs inspection. Then there is only a guard on the wharf at night, perhaps a sleepy old man, walking up and down. What is to prevent, with the full connivance of the officers, all of whom are Japanese, a boat or a launch coming on the other side of the ship, away from this sleepy watchman and taking off a small or moderate number, for a Jap never overplays his hand; he will only bring in twenty or thirty every ship-load.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How would an exclusion law prevent that sort of thing?

Mr. NEILL: I will come to that in a minute. I suggest that that is a way in which they are put ashore, and in some measure that accounts for the extraordinary difference between the number of those coming in legally and those who are now here. As regards this particular case, it would appear that these 29 stowaways had paid a sum of money to be taken over to Canada, and on the way over, through some misapprehension or misunderstanding, they found they were going, not as they thought, to San Francisco, for which they had apparently paid their good money, but to Vancouver. It was not altogether a mutiny of the crew that took place; it was a mutiny of those stowaways, backed by some of the crew. They swarmed up on board and practically took possession of the ship, saying: "We will not go to Vancouver; we will sail to where we paid our money to go," and it was that that led the captain of the boat to wireless in for assistance when he came into the harbour. The boat did not pull into the wharf; it anchored out in the harbour. The police came aboard and arrested, I think, one or two of the crew. There were no stowaways visible; but as soon as the police boat went away—there were just one or two immigration officers in it,—those stowaways came up again, and they compelled that boat to get up steam and come into the wharf. They appeared to be ignorant of the fact that there was a wireless apparatus aboard or how it was used, and the captain again sent a wireless message for assistance. When the boat docked, a swarm of policemen rushed aboard and arrested those who were making the trouble. Then they began to look for the Japanese stowaways, and they could not find any. The hon. member for New Westminister said that they were in the coal bunkers. That apparently would be a simple place to find them. The men found that apparently there was nothing but coal in the bunkers, and they could not get at the stowaways without removing three or four hundred tons of coal. They knew that the men were there, but they did not know how to get at them. Some man, with more than usual ingenuity—and the minister should promote him—conceived the idea of boring holes through the deck; they put down long rods until they came to a place where there was no coal, and presently they came to what apparently was Asiatic flesh. The Japs were lying in a heap in a concealed chamber in the coal, and they removed enough coal to get at them. This was a cunningly concealed place that the average man would not find at all. This was not done, and could not be done, without the full knowledge and consent of the Japanese line of boats. I have no doubt the Japanese government kept its agreement; but these are the nationals, and this is the way in which they act. As the hon. member for New Westminster says, had it not been for this untoward incident of their being scheduled to the wrong port, nothing would have been heard about the matter. That goes on, more or less, all the time.

To come to the Prime Minister's query as to how this can be prevented, I would say that a total exclusion act would not prevent that in any degree whatever; it would still go on. The remedy is to have a measure of exclusion, coupled with what, I think, the minister provides for as regards Chinamen to some extent, namely, a system of registration. When Mr. Jap or Mr. Chinaman—this is the case at present as regards Chinamen—comes in, he has a registration certificate given him, practically as we had in the war. In years to come, when any of those men get into trouble or travel, they can be asked by an official to produce their registration cards, and if they cannot produce them or give some explanation of their loss or so on, then they are liable to deportation. That is the case under the new act as regards Chinamen, and that is the remedy for evasions of the act.

I made it my business to have a talk with some of the prominent officials of the Department of Immigration as regards Chinamen. What they told me was this, that there was no definition, no rule, no formula, yet devised by their department—and they had been very strenuous in the matter—which had yet worked successfully, because the minute the Chinamen understood the rule, they sat down and evaded it. They told me how they evaded the rule in regard to Chinamen coming in as sons. Men who had not been out of Canada for thirty years would bring in boys of eighteen as their sons. The way the thing was worked was this. These would have to be the sons of a merchant. What was a merchant? A merchant was one actively engaged in some city of Canada with a certain sum invested. They got up bogus companies. Supposing I am a Chinese parent, and working at tailoring in Montreal, for some of this occurred in Montreal. I go down to a regular firm which makes a business of this. Supposing this is a firm of exporters or importers; I put $500 cash into the business; I get a job there as porter or some job I am fitted for, for a month or two. I then claim that the boy coming in is my son, and the immigration officials, who appear to have been very zealous on the job, make inquiries and even send a man down to ascertain whether I am really working there busy. They find that I am at work and they look up the books and discover that everything is straight, and that as a matter of fact I did put $500 into the business. After a great deal of consideration they may grant my claim or they may not; and when they go back to the same firm a month afterwards and inquire about another man they find that I have taken my $500 out of the business and gone back to my tailoring or laundering in the next street. Now, these are not hypothetical cases; they are actual occurrences as these officials told them to me.

As regards the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. McQuarrie) that we should be cautious in defining a merchant—I believe he said we should be very definite—I may inform the committee that the officials of the department are of the opinion that we should leave this matter to their discretion, and I am inclined to support them in this view. So that instead of having a clear-cut definition of what constitutes a merchant, it is my opinion that it should be left as flexible as possible and within the judgment of the officials; because the moment you make the definition rigid these people will find some way of getting round it. On the other hand, if you made the definition broad, and left some room for the exercise of judgment on the part of the officials, they would be in a better position to see that the provision was not evaded. Last year eight merchants came in under that category, and my informant told me of a case where a merchant wanted to bring a boy in who was really his son. He was a wealthy man in the ladies' tailoring business out West, but they refused to let this immigrant in because they claimed that the father was not a merchant according to their interpretation of the act. The Chinaman asked them what they considered a merchant to be, and they replied, "We regard as a merchant only anyone who is dealing in Chinese goods, importing or exporting direct, and carrying on a traffic with China." So that this man, although he has two or three stores and is wealthy, could not prove that he was a merchant and his son was rejected. For that reason therefore it is advisable not to define too strictly the term "merchant". The hon. member suggested that we should exclude merchants; not, I suggest, however, if the matter is left in that broad way; because I think we do want to do trade with China and Japan, and so long as they are genuine bona fide merchants trading with the East I do not think there can be any objection to them.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In the previous part of the discussion something was said about Chinese children coming into the country, and I might make a further statement in regard to Japanese. Not only do the Japanese bring their children in, but in some cases they furnish them with Canadian naturalization papers as soon as they land. That may appear to be a rash statement, but it is one that I can prove, because at one of the sittings of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission last year we had a witness who was the assistant secretary of the Japanese Fisheries Association of No. 2 District. I believe he gave evidence at Port Essington. That gentleman appeared before us and spoke English very well. He was well educated, and we found that he had attended the Columbian College in New Westminster. I asked him whether he was naturalized and he said he was. I inquired as to when he had got naturalized and ascertained that at the time of his naturalization he was eight years of age. I believe he was twenty-two when he gave evidence. I asked him how he had managed to get naturalization when only eight years of age and he replied, "My father arranged that for me." I asked him when that had been done and he said it had been arranged the year his father brought him from Japan. That evidence was given before the Fisheries Commission on oath, and of course it is available to any hon. gentleman who cares to see it.

I might refer to the last remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in reference to the trade treaty. The right hon. gentleman said that if the members from British Columbia so desired that treaty could be abrogated, and he seemed to hold this out as somewhat of a threat to us. Now, my stand in regard to that treaty was made plain when I submitted my resolution in regard to the exclusion of oriental immigrants, and one of the things I sugested was that this government should request the Imperial government to give notice of the abrogation of the treaty so far as Canada was concerned. I am not afraid of the loss of trade at all; I am not afraid that the Japanese will not do business with us if we keep them out of this country. The Japanese is a man who does business along business lines and buys his goods where it profits him most to buy them. He will buy our goods just so long as he thinks he is getting value for his money, and when he realizes that he is not he will deal with someone else. If he does not come to us for the goods which he at present gets from us, where is he going to get them? He is not going to go to the United States, because the same reasons would apply there as apply in this country to the Japanese. The United States certainly does not wish the Japanese to go there, so where will he go to get the goods he receives from us? This trade treaty is a trade bogey and I am not at all afraid of it. So far as this particular member from British Columbia is concerned you can abrogate the treaty right away.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me make it clear to my hon. friend that I was not attempting to utter any threats; nothing would be further from my mind than to do anything of that kind. I merely desired to inform the House of the possible consequences that might ensue from certain acts as represented to me.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There is something else of significance I would draw to the attention of the committee in connection with this treaty. It is provided that the citizens of Japan shall not be discriminated against in any way in this country. That has led to a restriction of the rights of the legislatures of the provinces. It is well known that in British Columbia we have from year to year, I do not know on how many different occasions, passed legislation which might be said to come within this class, and all that legislation has been disallowed as discriminating against the Japanese. We had an example of this last year when the British Columbia government passed an order in council providing that no orientals should be employed on timber lands leased from the Crown in the right of the province. Afterwards an act was passed validating that order in council, and the order in council and the act having been taken before the courts of our province, and the Supreme Court of Canada those courts held them to be invalid as conflicting with the Japanese treaty. What did this government do? I must take exception to the course that was followed on that occasion. This government disallowed the provincial enactment. It seems to me that that disallowance was unnecessary if the courts were right. But this government went out of its way to disallow that provincial enactment, as Liberal governments had been doing on a great many occasions. It seemed to be the policy of Conservative governments in British Columbia to pass legislation along these lines and of Liberal governments to disallow it. Anyway, this government went out of its way to disallow this provincial enactment. British Columbia took the case to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council, as I am advised by the press despatches, has held that the province was right in passing the act. So that this government disallowed an act which the government of British Columbia had a perfect right to pass.

I would like to ask the minister what investigation has been made in regard to the incident of the Japanese freighter? If the Japanese government are sincere they will investigate the matter over there, and if the statements made by the stowaways are correct they should be able to put their finger on the gang who are carrying on this illegitimate business. Here is something that should be investigated, and I would like to know what has been done in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that after that occurrence the Japanese consul called upon me of his own volition and referred to the matter. He intimated that the Japanese government were having it looked into.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Joliffe has gone to investigate, but we have not had a report from him up to the moment.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions—salaries and expenses, $140,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: What exhibitions is this money for, and is it the intention that Canada shall participate in the Empire exhibition to be held in 1924?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is our intention to participate in that event. Mr. Tolmie has just returned from the Old Country, but we have not yet had a report from him. For the collection of exhibits we have an appropriation of $35,000. For exhibitions in Great Britain and the United States the amount appropriated is $70,000 and for permanent exhibitions in those countries another $8,000 is provided. The appropriations for exhibitions are heavier this year on account of the advertising, which we are extending; we hope to increase our participation in exhibitions because of the resulting advantage to Canada in the way of advertising. We have been represented at Tampa last year and this year, at considerable expense, but we think it pays thus to display our products.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would like to point out the necessity of making a showing in those countries from which we hope to get immigrants. When I was in England I attended the big Royal Show, and I found that the Canadian exhibit there was not nearly equal to that of South Africa. South African products and the capabilities of that country were all well represented and their corner was crowded, while Canada's exhibit attracted very little attention. I have no doubt the minister was trying to economize, but it struck me as a very poor kind of economy. If any important effect is to be produced we must make a showing at least as good as that put up by other countries.

Mr. GARDINER: How much does it cost to collect exhibits for the purposes of these exhibitions? How many men are employed? What are their names, and are they employed the year round?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the names of the persons employed, or the number. The item of $35,000 is to cover the purchase price of samples of grains, grasses, fruits, vegetables and mineral specimens, together with the expenses of the field men.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I understand that these are special Canadian exhibits made at state fairs. What kind of exhibits are shown—natural products, manufactured articles, food stuffs, or what?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not seen any of these exhibitions, but I get very glowing reports concerning them. For example, I have a letter from the Exhibition Association at Tampa asking that our space there be doubled. I do not think, however, that it would be wise to do that, because the cost would be considerable; I would rather try to cover a larger area and enable more people to see the exhibits. We are trying to attract agricultural people to our country; therefore our exhibits are largely of agricultural products.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): They are under the supervision of some government official?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, of Mr. Tolmie.

Mr. GARDINER: I got a report from a person whom I can vouch for that there was an official in Winnipeg—I do not know whether he was employed temporarily or permanently—gathering samples of grain at the end of July. We all realize that in western Canada you cannot at that time of the year collect samples of grain that will be of any value for exhibition purposes. I see no reason why money should be wasted in that way.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did see one of our exhibits at Chicago, and one of the difficulties experienced there resulted from a lack of the exercise of due care in the selection of the samples of wheat in head, with the result that it was over ripe. I do know that a Mr. Smith was temporarily employed on this work last year. I will, however, get the names for my hon. friend of all who were employed and the period at which they did their work.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister will agree that the end of July is no time to collect samples of grain in the West. As I have said, I see no reason why money should be spent in a futile search of that kind. I have no objection to representatives of the department collecting the samples at the proper time, but it cannot be done at the end of July.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not seen the samples received this year and I cannot say where they came from, but I understand that Mr. Tolmie is highly pleased with them. The getting of good samples this year was not a difficult matter, owing to the extra good crop that was grown in western Canada, particularly in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Mr. BANCROFT: I happen to know something with regard to the gathering of these samples in Manitoba. The work is done by one of the permanent employees of the Immigration department there; as I understand it, it is part of his regular duties. As to going out in July, I may say that part of his work is to gather samples of native and cultivated grasses, and that of course, has to be done in July.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the total expenditure under this vote last year, and what was the proportion spent in each country where there was an exhibition?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For the eleven months of the last year the total expenditure was $121,998. That includes $12,000 in connection with the visit of Colonel Belcher to Canada on behalf of the British Empire Exhibition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not the answer yet. We spent last year $121,000. In what different countries was the money spent, and in what proportions?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the figures here, but I will get them for my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We started out with this item in 1921-22 in the amount of $90,000; last year it was $115,000, and the appropriation this year is $140,000. I understand from the general remarks of the minister that the activities of the department are to be increased. We require to know what has been spent in the past and where, because we have the idea that in some instances the efforts of the department went in the wrong direction. That information ought to be given to the committee before the item passes. Then, there is the question of salaries. We have in the main vote an appropriation of $700,000 for salaries, and under the head of Chinese Immigration the amount for salaries is $34,000. How much of this vote is for salaries, and what was paid out under that head last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The accountant informs me that there is no increase in the number of employees. The details are as follows: A. W. Tolmie, Exhibition Commissioner, $4,320; A. W. Despard, Chief of Agriculture and Exhibit Division, $3,240; W. D. Dalglish, Chief of Mineral and Decorative division, $3,240; J. O. Turcotte, Chief of Designing and Decorative division, $3,240. Miss E. M. Livingston, clerk-stenographer, $1,080; A. Pereira, clerk-stenographer, $1,600; R. G. Brown, exhibit decorator, $1,305; O. O Joubarne, caretaker, $1,080. There are eight permanent employees with salaries aggregating $19,105. The temporary staff is as follows: R. J. Beesley, carpenter and A. De Jausserand, $5.60 per day (or current rate); W. Bayard, painter, $5.20 per day; and four labourers at $3.60 per day. The total amount estimated for wages for temporary employees is $5,895, making the total amount for salaries $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not yet got the information, which I submit is both pertinent and necessary.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The amount spent last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An hon. gentleman to my left asked, what is the cost of getting together these exhibits? Secondly, who are the men that look after that activity and where are they employed? I have asked what amount was spent last year and where was it spent? I have learned that $121,998 was spent, but the minister is not in a position to tell us where it was spent so that we might know whether it was usefully spent. Reserving the right to have that information perhaps he can tell us where it is proposed to spend this $140,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not that information at the moment.

Item stands.

Relief of distressed Canadians abroad, $10,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister could tell us what was spent last year and what the condition is as to stranded and distressed Canadians overseas?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Last year, for the seven months ending October 31, 1922, we spent $5,922.92. It is, of course, very difficult to foresee just what your expenses will be under this vote. It is to cover the expenses incurred chiefly through the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London for relief and assistance to bona-fide Canadians who may be stranded abroad and temporarily distressed financially. In cases where 5 p.m. the department affords assistance to the extent of supplying transportation back to Canada, an undertaking is got from the individual to refund the sums advanced, and the department undertakes to collect from him personally in the first place, or secondly from his immediate relatives or friends. The amount this year, $10,000, is considered a reasonable estimate for the purpose.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The amount of the vote for 1921-1922 was $6,000. It grew last year, but it seems to me that now things are getting better we should not be saddled with such a large expense for the coming year.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Has the minister a list of the countries in which these distressed Canadians are located, and the number in each country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This amount is spent largely through the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, and by far the greater proportion of the cases would be in Great Britain.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I was thinking more of the United States. Has the minister a statement of the amount spent there for the relief of distressed Canadians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There have not been more than three or four cases all told, in the United States.

Mr. KNOX: What percentage of the money advanced in this way is paid back again?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): About ten per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister could not tell us just what class of people he finds requiring assistance. At one time we had a great many soldiers who had taken their discharge and were in very necessitous circumstances in England, and had to be helped home. Has that class been entirely looked after?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Answering my hon. friend from Lincoln, the reason for the increase last year was that votes for a similar purpose in the other departments were cut off, and it was all included in one vote in the Immigration department. The Immigration department was performing the service to a very large extent, but formerly the expense was distributed among other departments. This year we are providing the service and the money as well.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I noticed that the year before it was $6,000, and it seemed a big increase last year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That was the reason.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister is quite right. At one time there were several votes for looking after the soldier who had taken his discharge and really ought to have been looked after in England. Has that class been completely looked after by this time, or are there still Canadian soldiers in distressful circumstances in London?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have fewer applications for assistance, but cases of this kind are constantly arising, although I assume there will be fewer returned soldiers seeking assistance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the minister tell us what the policy is? Does the stranded soldier over there get this aid as his right, or is it given in one case and refused in the other?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not so far as I know. The High Commissioner makes a decision as to who should be sent back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does he report?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understand that the time has expired for bringing men back from the Old Country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is true, and yet it is not true. Canada could not afford to refuse to bring back a man who was stranded. While the vote applies to civilians, there is no particular vote for the soldier. Therefore he is brought back by the same vote as brings back the civilians. He is, therefore, a distressed Canadian. There is not any special vote to provide for the returned soldier.

Item agreed to.

St. John immigration buildings, $23,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us how that work stands. I am speaking from recollection, and I hope my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong. I think the improvements at St. John were to cost approximately $42,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It must be more than that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the committee should have full details as to what is going on there, and how it is being spent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The amount we are asking in the vote for 1923 is $23,000. The sum voted for 1922-23 was $25,000. Under an agreement entered into between the Department of Immigration and Colonization and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the department is bearing one half the cost of construction and maintenance of the following buildings necessary for the proper handling of immigrants arriving at the port of St. John:

Baggage shed, our share..	$88,048 28
Detention quarters, our share..	55,748 68
Waiting room, our share..	20,419 11
Total cost to department..	164,216 07
($5,748.68 extras total paid by department).

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That $5,748.68 is for extras?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. That leaves the sum of $158,467.39. This sum is payable in ten yearly instalments plus interest at the rate of 5½ per cent on outstanding balances at the end of each year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When do we start paying? How much has been paid?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We paid $25,000 last year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In the previous year there was an amount of $43,000 for the same thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was $1,000 out. I said $42,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: These buildings have been completed, have they not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as I know, they are now completed. This is the total cost of the building, $158,467.39. Was my hon. friend referring to two years ago when he spoke of $43,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The answer that the accountant gives me, although we have not the figures here, is that this will provide for the fourth payment. There was a payment of $43,000 which practically covered two payments, or a proportionate amount of them, I presume based on the date of construction. Last year we paid $25,000. This year we are paying $23,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the amounts will decrease?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what will be next year's payment?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The same, I suppose, less interest—based on ten annual payments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much is for interest and how much for principal of this $23,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This information can easily be secured. We have not it before us. If the item is allowed to pass, we will bring the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister explains that we have to pay $158,467.39 in ten annual instalments. That would make the capital of each annual instalment $15,826.73. Nevertheless last year we paid $25,000. Of course it is plus interest. What rate of interest was charged?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think that perhaps in addition there is caretaking, cleaning etc., and that would amount to a very considerable sum. My hon. friend is probably correct. Our principal payment is in the neighbourhood of $16,000, and the interest on the amount charged makes the balance up to $23,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What rate of interest is charged?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Five and one-half per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hardly think it will run up to that figure.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the general arrangement regarding the upkeep of this proposition and the cost of maintenance? I understand, as regards the building itself, we pay half the cost and the Canadian Pacific pay the other half. What about the care of it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. gentleman's question is as to maintenance, is it not?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not only maintenance, but the cost of running, heating, caretaking.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Operation of cleaning, 100 per cent; for construction of the building, 50 per cent, and subsequent maintenance of the structure and seats, 50 per cent. I do not know why seats are included, unless, perhaps, they are permanent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the cost of cleaning?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the figures before me, but I will give the proportion. Electric lighting, 100 per cent; water supply, 100 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister give us the figure for the electric lighting?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Steam heating, wages and fuel—the Canadian Pacific pay that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We need not bother about that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Nursery fittings and furniture.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who pays that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The government. Toilet necessaries and supplies, 100 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the nursery fittings and the chairs not included in the total given by the minister as the capital cost? I think the sum was to include the construction and also the fitting up.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Probably I had better read the agreement and we shall get a better idea of the matter:

Agreement made this 7th day of September 1922.

Between

His Majesty the King, represented by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, hereinafter referred to as "the minister".

of the First Part,

and

Canadian Pacific Railway Company, hereinafter referred to as "the company", of the second part:

Whereas the parties hereto have agreed to co-operate with a view of furnishing better facilities for the handling of steamship passengers and baggage and for the reception of immigrants at St. John, New Brunswick;

And whereas, pursuant to an understanding between the parties the company has constructed a baggage shed and other works, hereinafter referred to, upon land belonging to the city of St. John, with the consent of the said city;

And whereas, the parties have agreed to enter into these presents to evidence the arrangement under which the said works have been constructed, the minister being duly thereunto authorized by Order in Council P.C. No. 3143, dated 18th December, 1920;

Now therefore this indenture witnesseth that the parties do hereby covenant, promise and agree with each other as follows:

1. The company hereby assigns to the minister the right granted by the city of St. John to the company under an agreement dated the 24th day of December, 1919, to erect and maintain a baggage shed and other structures upon the site of the old cattle pens immediately to the southward of No. 4 shed at West St. John, and to occupy and use the same for the purpose mentioned in the said agreement, and the minister hereby accepts such assignment and agrees to be bound by all the covenants contained in the said agreement and on the part of the company to be performed.

2. The minister shall assume control of the said works and of the additions which have been made thereto by the consent of the city of St. John, and, subject to the terms of paragraph 5 hereof, shall at all times suitably maintain and light the same for the purpose of handling traffic to and from the trains and ships of the company, and also for the use of persons and their baggage brought to it by any passenger steamer other than those of the company.

3. The company will supply suitable heating for the baggage shed and additions thereto, viz: waiting room, detention quarters, etc., during the handling of passengers and baggage on the arrival of steamships;

4. The company will have the use of the platforms for the handling of passengers, baggage, mail and express traffic to and from its trains and steamships and shall be entitled to have reserved for it in the baggage shed suitable and sufficient accommodation railway and steamship baggage checking offices and for on-hand bonded baggage room.

5. The cost of construction, maintenance and operation of the said works shall be borne by the parties in the following proportions—

	Cost to be borne by Dom. govt. Immgn. dept.	C.P.R.
	Per cent	Per cent
Baggage shed—
Construction of building..	50	50
Subsequent maintenance of structure..	50	50

Steam heating..		100

6. The total cost of construction of the said works is $322,683.46, of which the proportion to be borne by the minister is $164,216.08, computed as follows:

	Total cost	Dom. govt. shares
Baggage shed..	$176,096 55	$88,048 28
Waiting room..	40,838 22	20,419 11
Immigration quarters	105,748 69	55,748 68
	$322,683 46	$164,216 08

Of the said sum of $164,216.08, the minister has already paid to the company the sum of $5,748.69, leaving a balance of $158,467.39, which is to be paid by the minister as follows. The sum of $88,048.28 in ten equal annual instalments, commencing the 1st January, 1920; and the sum of $70,419.11 in ten equal annual instalments commencing the 1st January, 1921. The minister will also pay to the company interest on the first day of January in each year at the rate of five and one-half per cent (5½%) per annum on the balance from time to time remaining unpaid.

7. In the event of the port of St. John being nationalized or brought under the jurisdiction of a harbour commission, or of the buildings being otherwise disposed of, the minister shall thereupon forthwith pay to the company the unpaid balance of the said one-half of the cost of construction and accrued interest thereon, and in that event the company shall also be entitled to one-half of any compensation that may be awarded in respect of the said works, exclusive of fixtures supplied at the sole expense of the minister.

8. The word structure, as mentioned in this agreement means the buildings as completed, equipped with plumbing, heating equipment, etc., on a co-operative basis by the Dominion government and the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with which the Dominion government has paid one-half and the Canadian Pacific Railway one-half.

9. The term maintenance, as mentioned in paragraph 5 above, includes repairs, improvements, alterations and renewals which may be mutually agreed upon of any part of the structure in which the company claims 50 per cent salvage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand, then, that we are to pay ten instalments, amounting to some $88,000, and another ten amounting to $70,000 odd. I understood the minister to say that the ten instalments covering the $70,000 were to commence in 1921. Is that not an error? Or do we pay both sets of instalments concurrently, in the same ten-year period? As I understood the reading of the agreement, the $80,000 payments came first.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of the $164,216.08 the minister has already paid the sum of $5,748.69 leaving a balance of $158,467.39, which is to be paid as follows: $88,048.28 in ten equal annual instalments commencing January 1, 1920, and $70,419.11 in ten equal annual instalments commencing January 1, 1921. Interest is to be paid on the first day of January in each year at the rate of 5½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, as I have said, we do start paying both sets of instalments now.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that we are paying approximately $15,000 a year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The only difference is that we commenced paying in 1920 in the one case and in 1921 in the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is doing the work of cleaning, maintenance, etc?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It will be carried on under the supervision of the commissioner in charge. I cannot give my hon. friend accurate information as to whether one staff will do the work and a division of costs be made afterwards, or whether it will be done by two staffs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In some instances the burden is thrown on the company and in others on the government. I want to know what the department is really doing there. Take this particular item, for instance. How much of this is salaries, and how much is required for cleaning, etc?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): None of the items I have mentioned are for the purposes of cleaning. This is merely to cover interest on principal and re-payment on the building fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If this is merely an item of interest, and re-payment on the building fund it cannot possibly amount to $23,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not? The agreement shows payments of $15,000 and $8,000 respectively, or $23,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman has not been following the committee. We have been told that $43,000 of the capital has been paid. If it is paid it is no longer subject to the 5½ per cent. We were told also that $25,000 was paid last year. These two sums amount to $68,000 and that reduces the capital to below $100,000. Now, $5,500 is 5½ per cent on $100,000. In other words we do not know where we are. I will ask the minister if that is true. I understood that in the first place, $43,000 has been paid on this account. It that true?

Mr. CAHILL: According to the agreement the minister read, $8,000 was to be paid in 1920 and $8,000 plus $7,000 in 1921. So that it is impossible to have paid $60,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not discussing the possibility of its having been paid; I am asking the minister whether it is true that these amounts have been paid. Maybe the information we got before was wrong; I do not know. It was said that a sum, which of course includes interest, of $43,000 was paid on account of this claim in 1922. Now, I am asking the minister whether that information is correct?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I scarcely think it can be correct in the light of the agreement. This is 1923; 1921 was the date from which the interest was to be charged in one case, and 1920 in the other. We have not the figures before us and we cannot give them accurately, and I think therefore that the best thing that we can do is to get the correct figures dealing with the whole situation from its inception.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that the item stands?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the city of St. John retain any interest or title in the land on which the building stands?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would appear from the agreement that they still retain the ownership in the land.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems a most extraordinary thing that the Canadian Pacific Railway should put up a building on a piece of land owned by another corporation. They are not in the habit of doing that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All I know about the matter is what is in the agreement. One of the provisions of the agreement is this:

> Whereas, pursuant to an understanding between the parties, the company has constructed a baggage shed and other works hereinafter referred to upon land belonging to the city of St. John, with the consent of the said city, etc.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is what I understood the minister to read. It seems a most extraordinary arrangement.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Another provision reads:

> The company hereby assigns to the minister the right granted by the city of St. John, etc.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me a most extraordinary thing that a building of this magnitude, half owned by the government and half by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, should be placed upon land owned by the city of St. John.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the city gave the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway the right to erect the building there.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It does not say so.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister himself does not know how this matter stands. I think his first figures were all wrong.

Mr. DUFF: Who signed the agreement?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I signed it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not blame the minister for signing the agreement, all I want is to get the facts. I think it will be found that the city has given an absolute right for the maintenance of this property and that we are to get the use of the land free of cost. I am not finding fault with that. All we want to know is what we are voting, and what it is for. The minister has himself given us certain figures which apparently are wrong.

Mr. CAHILL: The amount was not paid on principal alone, but on principal and interest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend, but we were told to the contrary.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): After a careful reading of the agreement I think that possibly the statement is not correct. Those sums of money were not paid.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think you are right. I think there is an error there.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We will get that information.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the idea of calling an item "carried" when the minister himself admits a mistake has been made in the figures. Either the committee has or has not a right to know what it is voting for. If it has that right the item must stand; if it has not that right we will discuss the point.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not engaging in any discussion as to whether the item shall stand or not. I have promised the hon. gentleman this information and I will get it for him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is no good to us after the item is passed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And no wrong either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be, I do not know. The hon. minister says he is not in a position to-day to give the committee this information. If the Chair desires a discussion upon the right of the committee to get the information, I am quite prepared to take it up.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend seems to have new scruples. I remember when he was sitting on this side, and I was sitting on the other side, whenever I wanted information, and the minister did not happen to have it at hand, he would say: "Let the item pass and I will get you the information afterwards." I am quite sure that the hon. minister will supply the information promised. My hon. friend and most of his colleagues did the same thing. I may recall to his memory the hon. gentleman who was Minister of Railways. He had quite a habit of inviting us to go to his office to get information. I do not think the hon. gentleman need have such keen scruples. This is nothing new.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it is nothing new. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is thought that I have a right to the information or not. I do not recollect any particular instance that the hon. gentleman is complaining about. I should like him to tell me when I refused to give him any information he was entitled to. I should also like to know, when I was on the other side of the House, whether I ever got an item through on the pretence of giving information afterwards and failing to do so.

Mr. CANNON: That is not what I meant, and I never so stated. I said it very often happened that when the hon. gentleman was minister he would say "Let the item pass and I will give the information to my hon. friend when I have it." Very often this was done by the hon. gentleman and by most of his colleagues.

Mr. CAHILL: It has always been done.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The accountant thinks he can get this information immediately after dinner, when we can close out the item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We can deal with it this evening.

Item stands.

To provide assistance by advances or grants to immigrants under agreement to be made with the Imperial government under the Empire Settlement Act, 1922, and to hereby authorize the Governor in Council to make such agreement as he may deem expedient thereunder, and to expend the moneys hereby voted in such manner and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, $600,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting to make a few remarks with regard to immigration. I restrained myself last night because I thought the minister was anxious to pass the item we were then discussing, and also because my remarks might have been out of order like those of a good many other members who spoke yesterday. I never like to speak very long, so I am glad to see the clock says twenty minutes to six. I intend to close within twenty minutes.

I think it is my duty at the outset to express my views on immigration in order to offset some of the views presented by members from western Canada, especially from the prairie provinces. My sympathies are with the acting-Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart). I think it is evident from the amount of information that he could not give us to-day that he is overworked and is not able to keep in touch with every branch of his department. Therefore I would very strongly recommend that the government appoint a minister to take sole charge of immigration, which is one of the most important questions we have to deal with. My sympathy for the minister is also aroused because of certain statements that have been made from his own side of the House as well as from this side.

I wish to express my appreciation of my honoured leader from Brandon (Mr. Forke) on his stand in regard to immigration. Wherever he has spoken in the Dominion he has said that what we wanted were more people of the right type, and I agree with him. I also wish to congratulate the member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) on his contribution to the debate, although he had the temerity to say that probably some of us farmers in Manitoba tried to scratch too much land. However, I quite agree that this is so in many cases. In fact I have myself tried to scratch too much land.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that no member from the province of Manitoba defamed his province. I think it is a credit to my colleagues from Manitoba. We know we have hard conditions in western Canada; indeed, there is not a member of this House outside the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) more hard up than myself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How do you know?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And if the resolution of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) had carried I would have been even more hard up. But here let me make a statement of a personal character. I left the province of Quebec forty-one years ago next month.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: How old were you?

Mr. ROBB: You were brought up in a good province.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I left as a baby and have lived in the province of Manitoba on the banks of the Red river since 1882. I have travelled throughout the whole of western Canada right to the coast and know it about as well as the average man in this country. And I might state right here that one of the biggest troubles in this House is that we do not know our own country sufficiently well. I want to extend an invitation to hon. members from eastern Canada to come out to the West and see our country.

Mr. POWER: The climate is too dry.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I may tell the hon. member for Quebec South that we are going to have a vote on that question in Manitoba next June. So you see that I have a fair knowledge of the province of Manitoba, and to that province I wish chiefly to refer. No one has more faith in western Canada than I have; no one has more faith in Manitoba than I have. We are hard up, but we are hopeful. In Manitoba we have more and better land prepared than has been the case at any other time in the history of the province. This question of immigration is a peculiar one in some respects. Mr. C. H. Burnell, president of the United Farmers of Manitoba, stated that the question of immigration came down to this: do we want neighbours? We want them in Manitoba. Do we want more children to fill our schools? We do want them. Do we want more people to patronize our railways? We do. If my hon. friends in Alberta do not want immigrants, I may tell the minister that he may send to Manitoba those he has allotted to Alberta, and we will give them a good welcome.

I would like to point out also that through a short-sighted policy—at least I think so; I may be wrong—on the part of our late provincial government, the Mennonites are leaving the province and going to Mexico. I have great respect for them; they are good farmers. They are leaving some of the best lands we have in Manitoba, and to-day those lands, with buildings in good condition, can be had at reasonable prices. So that there is quite an advantage available to people who come to our part of the country. I would advise the minister, however, to endeavour to get men who have a little capital, because to have money is a great advantage and to be without it is a serious handicap. The question arises, where are we going to get immigrants? I suggest that if the minister devoted all his energy to getting back the Canadians who have gone from our country to the United States, he would be doing something well worth while. There are millions of Canadians over there whose hearts are still with Canada. If the minister would endeavour to bring back a lot of the French Canadians, those families where the stork comes round about once a year, he would not have to give his attention to child immigration from older countries. And there are not only French Canadians; there are good Scotch Canadians in those eastern states—and I know how good the Scotch are, because I have a Scotch wife. Then there are the Irish Canadians—and I am standing beside an Irishman right here. These are the people we should try to bring into the country, people who have a certain amount of money. I am not in favour of going to Europe to get immigrants. I have nothing against the European people; I think a lot of them. But under present conditions in Europe you cannot get immigrants from there who have any money and it is going to be hard for anyone who comes here without it. I know from conversations I have had and from inquiries I have received that there are many people in the eastern states that are willing to come to Canada and assume their share in the task of building up our country. I would, therefore, strongly advise the minister to use his best efforts to get immigrants from there.

Under this item of $600,000 I do not know exactly what the proposal of the minister is, but it seems to me that it is going to be more or less in the nature of assistance to steamship companies. I may be wrong, and I hope I am. But I do think that if that $600,000 were used to carry on a propaganda in the United States with a view to bringing back our own good Canadians the result would be more beneficial than any payments out for steamship fares. In Manitoba, within a comparatively short distance of the city of Winnipeg, we have all kinds of wheat lands that are unoccupied and that can be bought at a small sum per acre. If you bring immigrants to Manitoba you do not immediately have to start to build branch line railways; they are there already and those who come to our province can all settle within a reasonable distance of railway facilities, which is no small advantage for any immigrant. Then Manitoba being the oldest province in the West, we have far more institutions than they have in the other provinces; in fact, as the member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) quite correctly said the other day, we are over-institutionalized. I think the minister should certainly do all he can to give Manitoba a large share of immigrants.

I stated, Sir, that I wished to conclude my remarks within twenty minutes, and I shall not detain the committee longer. But I did not want to let this debate go by without expressing my views on the questions before the committee and without expressing my faith in Canada. I am Canadian born and I am proud of it. I repeat that no one has more faith in this country than I have and, at the same time, less money in his pocket.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN PRESS LIMITED

House in committee on Bill No. 53, respecting Canadian Press Limited.

On section 1—Change of name and rights saved.

Mr. CAHILL: I would like some explanation of the meaning of this bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not charge of the bill but I am familiar with it. I think the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is very familiar with this subject. It is merely a company which looks after the collection and dissemination of newspaper news. They are changing their name, and turning the company from an ordinary share company to a company which will have no stock issue at all. The different newspapers will have a representative in that company. Those representatives are called shareholders, although as a matter of fact they will have no money in it. The management will look after the collection and distribution of news particularly for the newspapers interested in it. They change from a share company into one without money shares and one that is to be without profit.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it not pretty much a monopoly in regard to news items? Will the bringing of this company under Dominion legislation have any effect in regard to any person suing the company?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a provision in the bill reserving all rights in that regard. As to monopolies, I think my hon. friend is looking after all monopolies this year, even in the newspapers.

Mr. MARTELL: Is there anything in the bill to prevent any newspaper that may be subsequently established from going into the association?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so.

Mr. BOYS: I might say, in the absence of the hon. member in charge of the bill, that this measure has two purposes. One is that the word "limited" now existing shall be dropped. The company is now known as the Canadian Press Limited and the word "limited" will be dropped. The purpose of the bill is to convert the company from one with share capital to a corporation without share capital and with no participation in profits by anyone, and there is a clause in the bill which provides that if there is any money made it cannot be distributed as dividends.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

On section 5—Provisions of Companies Act not applicable to corporation.

Mr. COPP: This clause exempts the company from the operation of certain clauses of the Companies Act.

Mr. BOYS: These clauses are not applicable to a company with share capital.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House again in Committe of Supply.

To provide assistance under Empire Settlement Act, 1922, $600,000.

Mr. FORKE: On behalf of the members in this part of the House, I would ask that this item stand and that the minister be requested to bring it down in itemized form. The item reads:

To provide assistance by advances or grants to immigrants under agreement to be made with the Imperial government under the Empire Settlement Act, 1922, and to hereby authorize the Governor in Council to make such agreement as he may deem expedient thereunder, and to expend the moneys hereby voted in such manner and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, $600,000.

Item 53 I desire also to be brought down itemized. It is as follows:

Immigration contingencies and general expenses, including grants to immigration or colonization societies, or associations, as may be authorized by the Governor General in Council, $1,850,000.

Mr. FOURNIER: Why do you want them itemized?

Mr. FORKE: Because we want to know what they mean.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps, then, I might give the information in regard to item 58 for which hon. members have asked.

Item stands.

St. John immigration buildings, $23,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The amount paid for the fiscal year 1920-21 was $8,804.83; the amount paid for the fiscal year 1921-22 was $37,194.06; and for the fiscal year 1922-23 $22,610. These are interest and principal payments to date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That does not give us the information we want. It does not show how much we have paid for principal, how much for interest and how much towards upkeep. We have not got that yet.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We shall have to have more time to get that.

Item stands.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend has information in regard to item 55, which also was allowed to stand.

Exhibitions—salaries and expenses, $140,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner) asked who was in charge of the collection of exhibits in the West. The answer is: Mr. Oakley, assisted by Mr. John Hoey and Mr. W. C. Carson at Winnipeg. Mr. Despard and Mr. Dalgleish, respectively are in charge of the preparation of the fruit and mineral exhibits at Ottawa.

Mr. BOYS: I observe that for 1920-21 this vote was $80,000; for 1921-22, $90,000; for 1922-23, $15,000; and for 1923-24 we are now considering an expenditure of $140,000. As far as I know immigration and colonization has not been on the increase in recent years, on the contrary, it has declined, but for some reason the item itself is increasing very rapidly from year to year. What is the explanation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I gave the explanation before dinner. I promised to give my hon. friend a list of places where fairs are held; I have not been able to get the expenditure in each case. We are spending more money on exhibitions, believing that attractive exhibits of the products of Canada, particularly at fairs in the United States, is money well spent. We are concentrating our efforts there, although we spent $25,000 for the same purpose in Great Britain last year. This is the list of the places in the United States where we have exhibited our products:

Davenport, Iowa; Hartford, Conn.; Springfield, Mass.; Brockton, Mass.; Waterbury, Vermont; Poland, Maine; Manchester, N.H.; Syracuse, N.Y.; Atlanta, Georgia; Cincinnati, Ohio; Dayton, Ohio; Columbus, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Indianapolis, Indiana; Louisville, Ky.; Memphis, Tenn.; Sedalia, Mo.; Dallas, Texas; Waco, Texas; Sioux City, Iowa; Des Moines, Iowa; Waterloo, Iowa; Mason City, Iowa; Oskaloosa, Iowa; Minneapolis, Minn.; Milwaukee, Minn.; Fargo, N.D.; Haron, N.D.; Lincoln, Neb.; Spokane, Wash.; Salem, Oregon; Chicago, Ill. (International).

These are all fairly large fairs and it requires a considerable expenditure to set up our exhibits.

Mr. GOOD: Is the purpose of these exhibits to attract settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this item merely cover salaries in connection with these exhibits?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. The $140,000 I am asking for covers the total expense for the United States. In addition we have two cars on the road in Great Britain for exhibition purposes accompanied by lecturers. This expense is taken care of in the larger vote for immigration contingencies.

Mr. BOYS: Are we getting results from this expenditure?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am pleased to tell my hon. friend that the immigration returns for February are 50 per cent higher than for the same month of last year. So we are getting some results for our expenditure.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How long has the exhibition been running at Atlanta, for instance?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sorry I cannot answer my hon. friend's question. I got the list of fairs from Mr. Tolmie.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is Atlanta a good point at which to exhibit our products?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think there might be some doubt about Tampa, Florida, but a great many people go down from the central states to spend the winter in the South, and they have a very fine fair at Atlanta. Our people think they secure good results. They get a great number of inquiries about Canada from visitors to the fair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is Palm Beach overlooked?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a show there every minute.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understood the minister to say that the object of advertising at Atlanta or Tampa was because a lot of Canadians go down there every winter, and thus they get an opportunity to see our exhibits.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sorry my hon. friend misunderstood me. I said people from the central states go down South in the winter time.

Mr. BOYS: It is just at the fairs you do the exhibiting?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: I think the best city in the South for this purpose would be St. Petersburg. It has a much larger population than the other places mentioned and you will find a tremendous number of visitors there in January and February.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But they are all wealthy people and play golf.

Mr. GOOD: How many settlers have we secured as a result of this expenditure on fairs in the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I stood at the International in Chicago for a few hours and saw a great many people from various parts of the United States discussing our exhibits with our agents and taking our advertising pamphlets, but it would be very difficult to say how many settlers came here as a result.

Mr. GOOD: I presume we have some record of the number of immigrants from the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, we have; but what proportion would come as a result of having seen our exhibits it would be very difficult to say. I think my hon. friend will agree that if we will not spend any money to attract immigrants we cannot expect very many to come here.

Mr. GOOD: Are we getting results from this particular kind of advertising at the present time?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I believe it is the best form of advertising we can engage in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister give us his own views on this subject? Everyone appreciates that it is a first-rate idea to advertise our farms in places where there is a reasonable chance of getting immigrants. For example, the central West and further west, in climates which are at least not tropical. But does the minister really think it is wise to spend money upon exhibits at winter resorts attended by pleasure seekers—golfers, bathers, and so on from all over the continent, people who certainly are not thinking of migrating? Is the idea to give a first rate winter holiday to some of our officials? If so, and if the minister thinks we should spend money in that way, the idea is a good one. Does the minister honestly think he is going to get immigrants from Tampa, Florida, or from Georgia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know of at least six or seven who came from Ohio into western Canada and who had been at Tampa. Henry Ford has made it possible for farmers to travel great distances these days. I am told that as many as six or seven hundred farmers with motor cars visited that fair in the winter season. I may say I had the same view that my hon. friend holds in the matter and I made some investigation as to who attended these fairs. I was under the impression that they were patronized by rich men who were there spending the winter and seeking recreation. We set up exactly the same exhibit at Tampa that we show at Chicago and at Des Moines. These people seem to wander around a good deal; they travel immense distances in their own cars. My hon. friend will agree, from the list I have read of the fairs in which we are interested, that we are not spending a very large amount of money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be too small and too finely spread to do any good.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The bulk of our people come from central and western United States. The eastern circuit I have mentioned is given attention largely to induce people to come into eastern Canada. In my opinion this money is well spent; it is better than newspaper advertising. The people see the exhibits and learn exactly what can be done in Canada. In fact, I think the expenditure is one we might increase to our advantage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So long as it was made where it would be some good. How much money is spent on these exhibits in the southern states and in the semi-tropical zone?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The same as at Iowa, for example. It is the same exhibit.

Mr. HANSON: What is the average cost for each exhibit?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give that information, but it cannot run very high. The goods are in charge of experts; they are moved from place to place, and the cost is reduced to a minimum.

Mr. BOYS: What is the proportion for salaries?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The amount is $25,000.

Mr. BOYS: If you divide the balance by the number of fairs in which we participate, you would get the cost, I assume, of each exhibit?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Practically.

Mr. FORKE: How many years has the minister been spending money at Tampa for these purposes?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): 9 p.m. Three.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At how many places in Great Britain do we exhibit and how long have we been doing so?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give that information. That work is in charge of Mr. Obed Smith. Most of these exhibits are permanent in their character; an exception, of course, is the travelling car I have mentioned.

Mr. BOYS: These exhibits do not form part of this item?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, except as regards the collection of exhibits.

Mr. LADNER: Are any of these exhibits made on the occasion of international expositions at centres like Brussels and Paris?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as I know, those places are not visited by our exhibits. We are sending a commercial exhibit to France this year that will travel in a train of motor lorries.

Mr. LADNER: I understand that the government received an invitation to send an exhibit to the Brussels Fair of last year. Did the government participate in that fair for trade purposes?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not our department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are now spending, according to the minister, $90,000 in the States and $25,000 in Great Britain. There is an increase of $25,000. Where is that increase to go?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It will go to both Great Britain and the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will there be any extensions down in Georgia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There will be no extension in Florida or Georgia, so far as I know. My hon. friend does not think it is good business to send our exhibits down there?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly do not.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say that I am only going on the reports in the department. I promise my hon. friend that I will make careful inquiries and if it is not profitable to go down there I will cut the expenditure out. We are spending a largely increased amount on advertising this year and I am keying every advertisement in order to be able to give full information as to the value we are receiving for our money. It is my intention to do the same thing in connection with the fairs. Of course, my hon. friend will understand how difficult it is to know just what you are getting in the way of direct returns from a fair, but the farmers are interested in fairs; they go to them and enjoy them, and it is the farmers we are trying to attract.

Mr. LADNER: Are there any moneys spent along this line in Oregon and Washington, and if so, in what counties?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Spokane is the only point we visit with the fair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What amount was spent in Great Britain under this heading last year? The amount this year is $25,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I will give my hon. friend the amount we estimate for exhibitions in Great Britain this year, although it does not come under this item. We propose to spend in Great Britain $302,000, and in the United States $370,000. That is in advertising, and in just this kind of work. We exhibit the different products at these exhibitions.

Mr. LADNER: Are these products our natural resources or manufactured products?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The exhibits I am speaking of now are all agricultural products?

Mr. LADNER: Do they include timber from British Columbia, Douglas fir, for instance, fruit or anything of that kind?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. I saw that in London in the British Columbia office. As a matter of fact, the immigration offices of this government are in the same building at the moment.

Mr. McBRIDE: I would just like to say a word in connection with these fairs. I think it was in 1910 that the World's Fair was held at Seattle. Canada had an exhibit down there. I have always thought a good deal of Canada, but never felt as proud of Canada as I did when I looked at our exhibition in Seattle. I happened to go down there twice, and on the second occasion I had some friends with me who had come out from the Old Country, and they were amazed at the exhibition. All the people I talked to admitted that Canada's exhibit was the best there. I think a little money spent in this way is the best advertisement Canada can get, and I do not think the committee should hold up this estimate any longer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad that the Minister of Finance is in his seat at the present time. I just want to make a general observation as to the estimates, about something which I have always felt was wrong. My hon. friend knows how hard it is to get things changed. I want to draw not only the attention of this House but his attention in particular to this matter.

One of the great defects in our method of book-keeping and the presentation of our estimates at the present time is that no one can very well find out what the cost of anything is to the country. Just to illustrate. Civil government is supposed to carry the salary lists of the country. It is supposed to have segregated there the salaries having regard to the different activities of the country, but it does not by any manner of means include them all. We have a way of putting in salaries here, and there, and the other place. We have a switch of salaries this year from one vote to another vote. I am not saying it is wrong, except that the whole principle is absolutely wrong, because by doing that any method of comparison disappears. There ought to be one account for the salaries. Take, for example, the Department of Immigration and Colonization. We have in the first instance a civil government list amounting to $272,000. That is all salaries. Then in vote No. 52 we have for the outside service, salaries amounting to $700,000, which has to be added to the other salaries. Then in the few items we have been considering this afternoon we have salaries in the vote for Chinese immigration, over and above the other activities, amounting to $34,000. Then we have salaries of $25,000 covered up in the exhibition vote. I throw this out as a suggestion to my hon. friend. It really would be a good thing if everybody short of the expert could know just what the different activities of the country were costing to the country. Here we have in this one department civil government salaries amounting to $272,000, and salaries covered by these other items I have mentioned amounting in all to $829,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to the expenditure under this vote of $25,000 in Great Britain and $90,000 in the United States—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is wrong. Where does he get the $90,000? It is $50,000.

[Mr. McBride.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I took the figures down as they were given by the minister, and I certainly understood that $90,000 was being spent in the United States, $25,000 in Great Britain, and $25,000 for salaries, making a total of $140,000. If I am wrong I would like to be corrected.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend never heard me say that there was $90,000 appropriated for the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We were told that $25,000 was being spent in Great Britain, and $25,000 for salaries. Then where the balance is to be spent if not in the United States, I do not know.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will give the hon. gentleman the information, and will he take it down this time? If these questions are for the purpose of holding up this vote, there is no use in giving information. I have given it half a dozen times already.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us get it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Take it down this time, please. The amount of the vote is $140,000; collection of exhibits, $35,000; exhibits in the United States, $50,000; exhibits in Great Britain, $20,000, and window displays, $8,000; salaries as per detailed statement, $25,000, and unforeseen, $2,000. The figures I have given represent the cost of sending these exhibits to the Old Country and to the United States, and do not include the cost of the fair itself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to apologize to my hon. friend. I am sure no one wants to bother him, but on the other hand he will bear with me, I do not think he ever said a word about that $35,000 cost of collection.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I mentioned it innumerable times to-night. Was there not an inquiry from the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner) as to who gathered the exhibits in Quebec?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We got the name but not the amount.

The CHAIRMAN: The amount was given.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I want to apologize, as I got up to do. I am very sorry. Let us see if we have it right now. We have $35,000 for the collection of the exhibits. Are the salaries or any of the officials included in that $35,000?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. The $50,000 for the United States is the cost of exhibiting the samples which are collected here and sent there.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The same thing applies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What happens to the collection that costs you $35,000?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are collected for the same purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to help my hon. friend but he will not let me. The cost for collecting samples was $35,000, and those samples are sent to the States--

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will read exactly what is done. I read it twice before:

This is to include the purchase price of samples of grains, grasses, fruits, vegetables and mineral specimens, together with expenses of field men, and staff in grain warehouse in Winnipeg.

Exhibits at state and county fairs in the United States, $50,000. This to include charges for space, freight, express, duty on exhibits, travelling expenses of agents in charge, also salary and expenses of temporary assistants at different fairs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You send those exhibits down there; you do not get them in the States? I suppose these are part of the exhibits you paid $35,000 to collect?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would imagine so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I asked a moment ago when we had the difficulty. So that the $50,000 for the States would be over and above the samples covered by the $35,000 and I think that the same thing would apply to the $20,000 for Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. The memo I have reads:

Exhibits in Great Britain including freight of shipment for Canada, freight and express charges in Great Britain, rental of space and expense of assistants.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think you told us what window displays are?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These are window displays in the various agencies of the department.

Item agreed to.

To provide assistance to immigrants under the Empire Settlement Act, 1922, $600,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend (Mr. Forke) asked for a more detailed statement of this item. I can quite appreciate his request for information on the large amount that will come up for consideration next week, but I want to point out that this will be a very difficult matter to itemize. We are endeavouring at the moment to make an arrangement with the Overseas Settlement Board for co-operation. If we do not get co-operation we cannot spend the money. I explained the proposal the other day, and I will explain it again to-night briefly. The first idea we had was the bringing of children from the Old Country. I pointed out that there was a place for these children in Canada, but that they would not be brought here if there were no foster homes for them. I have a list of the homes or places from where these children will be secured in Great Britain, and I though it was good business to ask for an appropriation to encourage the immigration of these young people. The organizations that have been doing this work have found it exceedingly difficult in recent years to secure the funds for the maintenance of the homes and carrying on the work of the education of these children and the training and clothing of them. It has been carried on very largely by voluntary effort on the part of English people, and there is a number of very admirable homes from which these children can be selected. I sent Mr. Smart over there to make an examination of the children, first to see where we could secure the kind of children that would be desirable to bring to Canada, because I want to assure the committee that we do not desire to bring any children who would be undesirable. They will all be carefully selected and brought to Canada on application from Canadian people themselves. Unless there are homes for them they will not be brought. It has to be borne in mind that we expect the Empire Settlement Board to join us and put up the same amount of money we will put up, and in this particular case we do not expect any return. It will be a straight grant. I had estimated—I do not know whether the amount will cover the cost—$80 per head to pay the passage of these children; that would be $40 for the Canadian government and $40 for the Overseas Settlement Board. I will read you the names of the homes. There are many other homes in addition to these where fine children can be procured, but these are homes that have been in existence for a number of years, and eventually I hope that, perhaps, we can branch out, if this scheme proves successful, and there is a demand for children, or a place for them to go. These homes will be inspected as well as the children, so that the complaint that is so frequently made that children are being made slaves and are not receiving attention will be avoided as far as possible. It would also entail the cost of the inspection of these children once or twice a year, at least. Some one asked the other night if these children would be sent to school. They will come under the provisions of the laws of the province in which they are located, and as hon. members know in some of the provinces today the school age has been extended to sixteen years. These are some of the places we hope to place the children—

The minor agencies are not named; they are put in this largely for statistical purposes. Thus, this does not involve the expenditure of a huge sum of money for administration. it involves two of our officials in the Old Land making selections, and I notice that a little difficulty has arisen in connection with this very question in the joint action of the Australian government and the British government. I want to assure the committee that if they allow me to have this money, the most careful selection will be made of those children who will be brought to Canada, and also, of other people who are coming. I know I am being criticized very frequently because we are somewhat anxious to maintain the standards; that is, we want those who come to Canada to be mentally, morally and physically fit. I think that is desirable; I have always felt so. More than that, I think these children will assimilate into the life of Canada, will be assimilated into Canadian homes, will become Canadian citizens and will, perhaps, in a much better way adapt themselves to Canadian conditions than those who are of more mature years before coming to Canada. We have no definite arrangement at the moment with the Imperial authorities, because some considerable discussion is involved as to what methods are to be employed. A day or two ago, I received a wire intimating that the British authorities were viewing our proposal with favour.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the minister kindly answer my question as regards the minimum age of the child?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We propose to bring the bulk of the children between the ages of eight and fourteen. I know there is a great difference of opinion as to what age the child should be, but purely as an experiment, we propose to bring out at least a couple of hundred boys and girls between the ages of fourteen and seventeen, if we can secure places for them.

Mr. GOULD: Will the same interest be shown in finding homes for the children? I speak from a humanitarian point of view. The reason I ask the question is that I have. in many instances, seen children placed in homes where they did not receive quite as good treatment as, in my opinion, they might have. Will the department see that the homes are real homes for these children?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no complaint to offer as regards any province; but I think Ontario is, perhaps, the best field in which to test out a plan of this kind, and Quebec is similarly situated. Those provinces are more thickly populated, and they have classes of homes into which those children can, perhaps, be taken, and an environment that will give the children a better chance. I see the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) looking at me. I am now speaking of the older provinces.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is Quebec not more inclined to grow her own children?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was very much interested in looking over the figures to see that quite a number of those children go into Quebec, in spite of the fact that the people of that province, to their credit, raise a large number of very fine children. The older provinces are undoubtedly the best places in which to put those children. Their homes are established, and while the West will take some of those children, in the main, they will go into the older provinces. I am not so familiar with Quebec; but as regards Ontario, in discussing the matter with Mr. Manning Doherty, I found that they had not only agricultural agents but representatives travelling almost continually visiting those homes. In Ontario, they have and have had for years an officer in charge, whose business it is to be going about the country constantly visiting these homes. We propose on behalf of the federal government, if possible, to visit these children twice a year, and before a child is placed, to get a recommendation from the responsible people in the neighbourhood as to the character of the home into which the child is going. That is most essential. If you are careful about the selection of the child, it is just as well to be careful as regards the home into which you put the child.

Mr. GOULD: As regards the $40 which is the amount, I think, the minister mentioned as Canada's obligation, the homes where those children are placed would not be obliged to return the $40?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, that is a grant outright.

Mr. HOEY: Is it the minister's intention to spend this entire sum on child immigration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, that covers only $200,000.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has stressed the question of selection on the part of the department, and I am glad to know that he is not unmindful of the question of inspection. In days gone by, I have had a little to do with the Middlemore children who are the ones who have been brought to New Brunswick in recent years. I would advise the minister that, as far as possible, in each province where it is proposed to place these children, he should have a permanent standing committee in each local community. For instance, in New Brunswick he might arrange —and I think this could be arranged through the authorities of the Middlemore Home—to have a committee in the shire town of every county. I am not unmindful of the fact that a man's neighbours do not usually give him a bad standing, especially in matters of this kind, and I have known of citizens applying for those children being given characters not altogether warranted. If you had a standing committee in each central community, I am sure you would find they would take the pains to sift the character of applicants, so as to make sure that those children were not being put into improper homes. I have known of cases where the most outrageous cruelty has been committed against such children. That is a crime the country will not stand for; but it is better to prevent it than to cure it after. The minister read a list of the homes which have been sending children to Canada. I wonder if he has on his list a home known as the Cossar Home for boys. I would like to tell the minister about the activities of this home which is one of the smaller institutions of this kind. In the city of Glasgow there is a citizen known as Dr. George C. Cossar, who for a number of years past has been engaged in the work of rescuing the waifs of that city. At his own expense he takes them in and cares for them and sends them out to a large farm at Gagetown in the province of New Brunswick. The boys he sends out are for the most part around the ages mentioned by the minister. They are taught practical farming and are kept on the farm until they are ready to shift for themselves. This gentleman has brought out to this country at his own expense a very large number of boys, and in view of the fact that he is the only person engaged in work of this kind, what he has achieved is, I think, remarkable. The boys who have been settled in New Brunswick have with one single exception been a credit to him and to themselves, and when the war broke out, I am informed by the manager of the farm, every single one of them enlisted and fought for his country. The minister might tell us whether he intends to give any encouragement to agencies such as this one, which has done such a splendid work. If he would like to have more information privately I should be glad to give it to him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think that it is good business to begin this work only with such organizations as have made a success of it and can exercise some care in the mattter of selection and in inspection afterwards. Our Mr. Smart, who has had a long experience in the work, will visit the children and make inquiries about the home. I quite realize the responsibility that we are taking upon ourselves in a matter of this kind, and if we make mistakes the advertising would be very bad for us. I think it is well for us, therefore, to begin with the people who have experience and who have made a success of this sort of work, because after all there are only certain classes of people who are adapted for engaging in work of this character. I assure the committee that we shall try to exercise the greatest care in whatever is done in this matter.

Mr. LEWIS: The minister said something about selecting the children from good homes. Does he mean homes in the Old Land or in Canada as well, and are these children orphans?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Smart reports, and I gather the same thing from Commissioner Lamb of the Salvation Army, that there are in Great Britain innumerable families of children who have no very bright outlook for the future and whose parents find it difficult to maintain them. These children are a splendid class of young people, and the parents would be willing, if they were assured that the children were going into homes under proper supervision, to allow them to come out on some engagement or other. But we are not attempting that, because I think the committee will readily understand how difficult it would be to have an organization that could take care of immigration of that sort. At any rate we are not attempting it at the moment. Later on we may branch out in this direction, but personally I want to go carefully and slowly in beginning an undertaking of this kind. After all, bringing children to Canada is not a new thing for the organizations I have mentioned. So far as that goes it would be merely a matter of giving them a per capita allowance for the children they brought out and established. We have done a considerable amount of this work in the past, not by way of per capita grants, but by means of a general grant. But if we are to undertake the thing in a systematic way we must accept some responsibility for the selection both of the children and of the home.

Mr. SHAW: Is it the policy of the department in such cases to have the children legally adopted by the foster parents? If so, at the expiration of what time does the adoption take place? Further is any supervision maintained by the department in the case of adoption?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is a matter to which we have not given a great deal of consideration, deeming it wise to follow the procedure adopted by these well-organized institutions who, as a matter of fact, have the children taken right into the homes of the foster parents in a great many instances. I think my hon. friend will realize that, with the two hundred 'teen age boys and girls whom we might establish, some other plan would have to be adopted, such as an arrangement for two or three years, with provision for some return for the services rendered by the boy or girl of that age. But for the small children it would be preferable to have them adopted permanently into the home.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should not like this item to pass without expressing my appreciation of what the minister is doing in this regard. I do not know of anything that will redound more to the credit of the government than this work, if proper supervision is exercised, as the minister intimates he is prepared to see shall be the case. I also want to express my great admiration for the work, referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson), of that philanthropic gentleman in Glasgow in bringing these boys to the country. I remember in 1908 or 1909 I had charge as I had had for a few years, of the immigration work in the province of Ontario. This gentleman, a man of considerable means, has made this work his life vocation and to it he has devoted his time, his means and his ability. He is anxious to see that the under-privileged boys in the Old Land get a better chance, and I am glad to know that in the province of New Brunswick he has received such encouragement. When he came out to this country I met him, and I have often wondered how he succeeded in his work. I made close inquiries at the time and found that he had established in Glasgow a home at a large farm where he taught the boys agriculture. They were thoroughly instructed in the business and on being sent out here they were sent to the home that has been mentioned, afterwards being placed in the rural districts. I notice that a great number of the homes referred to by the minister are located in the province of Ontario, and I quite agree that that province is probably as well adapted as any other, if not more so, for taking care of these young people. It is an easy matter, to find out whether proper supervision is being exercised in the homes in which these children are placed, and if it is discovered that such is not the case you may rest assured that a condition of this kind will not continue very long. I am satisfied, however, that the work will be satisfactorily carried on while there is co-operation with the provincial governments, who have already the machinery to take care of the children. I want to express my approval of what is being done in this matter, and I trust that this devoted philanthropist of Glasgow, who has made this his lifework and who is putting his means into it, will receive the encouragement to which he is undoubtedly entitled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While I am glad to see the government are now taking some some little interest in immigration from the Mother Country—and I sincerely congratulate them upon arousing from the slumber they were enjoying—I would ask my hon. friend what arrangement was made between Great Britain and Australia and New Zealand under which, according to the Associated Press, those dominions secured 11,000 immigrants, and what was the arrangement under which Canada was able to get in the same length of time only 130 immigrants?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend expect an answer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly. I am now dealing with the scheme of immigration started by the Mother Country, and if I am wrong I want my hon. friend to interrupt me at once. Under this scheme I ask my hon. friend what the arrangement was with the Mother Country under which Australia and New Zealand got 11,000 immigrants in the period during which we were able to get only 130? Now I hope my hon. friend will understand what I am asking him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not think my hon. friend's arithmetic is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I stood up for correction.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the official figures before me, but is my hon. friend aware—and I think he is—that notwithstanding the fact that Australia has spent huge sums to establish British people there, last year about 86,000 people entered Australia and about 72,000 left? Of course my hon. friend wants to make a comparison between Canada, where we are just beginning a scheme of selected, assisted immigration, and Australia, where they have had the scheme in operation for some time. But if we had secured such a small net gain as has Australia I think my hon. friend might very well criticize us rather severely. He seems to be under the impression that Canada is the only country from which people happen to be migrating, but he is very much mistaken. The Australian immigration scheme has already involved a huge expenditure on assisted passages and the purchase of land for settlers. Speaking for myself personally, I want to approach this question with due caution. I have said upon innumerable occasions that I wish to see people from Great Britain settle in Canada. That is my desire. But when my hon. friend says that 132—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figure is 130.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Where did my hon. friend get the information?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend consider that he has answered my question?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite appreciate the fact that my hon. friend does not want to discuss this matter overmuch, that he wants to get off into something collateral, to talk about emigration from Australia. I was not talking about emigration from Canada, although the Lord knows we have enough of it. I was simply asking for information that the department ought to possess, and that is—what was the arrangement with the Mother Country and Australia under which Australia got 11,000 immigrants and we got during the same period 130. My hon. friend asks me where my particulars came from. Let me tell him that these are the particulars that resulted in his sending Mr. Black over to England, because when I drew his attention to the matter in this House he got up and told me that the government had sent that gentleman over to look after the matter. The figures were given by the Associated Press. I do not know if they are right. I am not the minister of the department. I do not know how many people the department brought in under this assisted scheme. The press may be absolutely wrong.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend is talking about the assisted scheme—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): —I may tell him that none came into Canada under this scheme.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Associated Press said 130 came.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I did not understand him correctly. I take it all back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all right. But is my hon. friend not sure that some of the agencies he has himself mentioned managed to bring over those 130 immigrants? Did his department bring over any under this scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So this British Empire scheme, so far as Canada was concerned, was a dead letter until the matter was brought to my hon. friend's attention in the House about three weeks ago, when he sent his deputy over.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have never been accused of evolving a scheme so quickly as that. Indeed, the whole current of criticism is that I have been acting too slowly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): But I have made a wonderful record upon this occasion if this is all the result of the suggestion of my hon. friend since parliament assembled. However, I am not going to take credit for it. I discussed this matter and sent Mr. Smart to England last fall, as I pointed out to my hon. friend, to look into the situation. I will admit that perhaps I have been cautious. I am not always cautious, and sometimes I have regretted my haste. But I should like to know how successful a scheme of assisted immigration is likely to be. It is all very well to say, "We will vote a big sum of money to bring out a large number of people." But we do not know what we are going to do with them when they come here unless we vote a further sum to establish them upon the land, because I think my hon. friend will agree with me that generally throughout Canada there was not at that time much opportunity for newcomers in the urban centres. There is to-day. To the extent there is such opportunity we will endeavour to place immigrants in our urban centres. But because Great Britain and Australia have joined hands in a scheme of this kind, I do not know that we would be warranted in embarking on such a heavy expenditure as has Australia in connection with it. South Africa seems to be dealing rather carefully with the matter, although they are spending money upon improving their land holdings for the purpose of placing settlers upon them. I want to start in a moderate way. My hon. friend says that 130 people were assisted to Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. I have quoted the figures given by the Associated Press.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know where they came from. A greater number of young domestic servants came into this country under the assisted passage scheme. My hon. friend knows that people in Montreal, in Saskatchewan, the Ontario government, have been acting in this matter for years, so I hardly know where the 130 would originate; there must have been a much larger number than that. It is important that this matter should receive careful consideration, and we have given it that consideration. I think we are warranted in asking for the co-operation of the Overseas Settlement Board for this purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not yet answered my question. If it is an improper question, that is a different matter. Surely the department knows what is being done under this large Empire scheme by the other dominions, and surely it is proper that we should have that information.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Australia, in addition to assisting the payment of passages —and that applies to adults as well as to children—has a land settlement scheme, a training scheme—they seem to have innumerable schemes involving the expenditure of money in a rather lavish way. But after all, they have not got very many more immigrants than Canada and not nearly as many as the United States. Clearly the Britisher wants to go to Canada because it is closer. My hon. friend knows that the Australian scheme involves a very large expenditure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not. That is why I am asking.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): After the adult has paid his share of the passage money, one-third being paid by the Australian government and the other third by the Overeas Settlement Board, an additional £5 would bring him to Canada, so that we have an advantageous position in that respect. Roughly speaking, the Australian scheme embraces training for those who desire it, the advantage of free land and certain assistance in getting settled upon that land.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister takes a great deal of credit for being cautious; it is quite evident that so far nothing has been done in this matter. I pointed out last night that on three different occasions it has been stated that the government had an immigration policy which was to be put into operation, but we are now informed that no arrangement has so far been made in connection with the overseas settlement scheme. It is a remarkable fact that we are spending much money in the United States to induce immigration from that country and a relatively small amount in the Old Land; and we refuse to co-operate with the British government in establishing their people here.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We did not last session—it may have been our duty to do it—make any proposal to join in a programme of this sort. The matter of providing homes for those who come here is being examined at the moment, and all that remains to be done is to make the arrangement with the overseas government, and that we are endeavouring to do. My hon. friend knows that we must have the money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It would not be unusual or surprising for the government to place their plans before parliament in order to justify any expenditure they might subsequently propose in that respect. I noticed a statement in the Globe some time ago that the Canada Colonization Association were receiving financial assistance from the British government in connection with the scheme discussed here a few days ago. Evidently this company has been making arrangements with the British government with a view to putting into effect the policy which is to be provided for under item 52. Last night I asked the minister what arrangements had been made and he said that that would be discussed under that item. The minister suggests that the money had not been voted and that nothing could be done. But the government need not wait until the money is actually voted before formulating their plans. We ought to know exactly what the British government propose and what the arrangements under consideration are. There appear to be three different plans, one in respect to domestic servants, one in respect to children, and another for ordinary settlers. I have no doubt that the 130 people who came out here were brought into Canada through the instrumentality of the government of Ontario, which for years has been advancing money to assist deserving settlers. In fact, Ontario was compelled to adopt that method because of the neglect of the federal government in the matter. Homes were obtained for these children in advance, and about four-fifths of them, I believe were located in Ontario. This is the season when immigrants should be arriving here, not months later when the demand will slacken off. We have a party expected to arrive in Toronto next week from the north of Scotland, and an agent of the Ontario Department of Immigration has gone to meet them at the seaboard. Places are already provided for them. There is any number of applications for help in the hands of the department, more than they can possibly supply. Yet the minister informs this House that the plans are not yet completed, and here we are almost into the month of April and the immigrants should be arriving within the next few weeks and be placed on the farms of this particular province at least. I think it shows that the minister, instead of being cautious, has been neglecting the duties that should be discharged by his department. It may be that through pressure of work connected with several other departments he has not been able to devote the time he should to this work, but it is altogether too important a matter to be treated lightly.

When I asked the minister a question a short time ago as to the amount of money that was being spent in the United States and Great Britain, he replied that he had given the figures on several occasions and he wanted me to take them down. Well, I took them down, and before he sat down he had given two different sets of figures, and I found that I was nearer right than he was when he stated that I had taken a wrong view of the situation.

I do not believe the minister is treating this matter seriously, and I am inclined to believe the House is not being treated in the manner it should be. I am sure the people of this country are looking for something different from the Department of Immigration at this time, owing to the fact that during all the years of the war immigration was practically shut out of this country. It was not natural to expect immigration then, but the result is that to-day the agricultural industry of this country is at a standstill because of the lack of labour on the farms, and there is an abundance of labour to be had for the British government is willing to assist in this matter. We do not know just how far. We cannot get that information from the minister. I think this matter is altogether too important to be rushed through in this way without the House being given the information to which it is entitled.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This $600,000 vote is divided into three—$200,000 for children, $200,000 for domestics, and $200,000 to be loaned to individuals for passages under a nomination scheme. We expect the British government will agree to all three, because this is practically what they are doing with the Australian government. Indeed, that is their offer, and we have simply devised our scheme so that we will have no difficulty in that respect. I mentioned a moment ago that there did appear to be difficulty developing over selection with the Australian govenment. I hope we shall not have that difficulty. That refers entirely to children.

So far as farm labour is concerned, it is coming to every province in Canada, and to every railroad station in Canada. Our department has been receiving for the last three months applications from one end of Canada to the other from farmers who are willing to hire, preferably by the year. Farm labour is coming forward daily from Great Britain, and some also from the Continent, from Holland and Scandinavia. Every agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and every agent of the Canadian National Railways has been an immigration agent for this purpose.

What my hon. friend says about the government of Ontario is very true. I have sought on several occasions to work in co-operation with the provincial governments. That is my desire, and we are working with them to a certain extent, but I do not think we have yet reached that stage of co-operation that will bring real success to an immigration scheme, though I am hoping to reach that stage. I am quite free to admit that I find an element of suspicion in connection with the federal Immigation department. I do not know why, but I understand that it originated some years ago. So far as I am concerned, my sole desire is for co-operation all round.

As to the children, everything is arranged, except that I am not able to say definitely to-night that we have an agreement with the British government. I hope I shall be able to say that in a day or two because I had a wire to-night which would indicate that matters are almost settled. That is being arranged through Mr. Larkin, the High Commisioner for Canada in London, in co-operation with the Overeas Settlement Board and Mr. Black, the Deputy Minister, who is over there at the present time.

I should like to deal for a moment with the other phase of the question. The domestic servant problem is one that I endeavoured to arrange in co-operation with the provincial governments. Ontario, as my hon. friend has said, has been spending money for years to bring out domestic servants to this province, and I believe with very fair success. The province of Saskatchewan is also engaged in this work, and has been for some years. The lady who makes the selections in England for Saskatchewan has been employed partly by the federal authorities and partly by the Saskatchewan government. Both these provinces prefer to work as they have been doing in the past. Nova Scotia prepared to utilize the Salvation Army, and New Brunswick—I am speaking from memory —is prepared to do the same thing. Ontario, in spite of the fact that they are bringing out domestics themselves, has also an arrangement with the Salvation Army to bring out domestics. Manitoba has expressed the desire that the Army might be used for this purpose so far as they are concerned, and so has British Columbia. So far as Alberta is concerned, they do not desire to go into a scheme of this kind at all. The reason I mention these matters is to show that we did endeavour to get the provincial governments to say how many of these young women might find employment in the respective provinces, and where they could be placed, and we sought to get them to assume the responsibility, because this is not a grant; it is a loan, with a ten per cent reduction for losses, for the full amount of the passage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I ask what it is proposed to loan in each individual case?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the domestic was coming to Nova Scotia, to Halifax, for instance, her loan would be the cost of her passage to Halifax, and similarly if she were going to Winnipeg. If she were going to British Columbia it would be just that much more. There is a minimum and a maximum that can be loaned, but the amount in each case depends altogether on the destination for which the domestic is bound.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What is estimated to be about the average cost for passage of each individual?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): About $125, taking Winnipeg as a central point.

Mr. CALDWELL: What arrangement has the government made for the collection of these loans?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am coming to that portion of it, because there is where our difficulties begin.

Mr. CALDWELL: I thought so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): With a federal organization scattered all over Canada for the collection of the money to be advanced, it would be too cumbersome and too expensive; therefore you can only utilize some responsible organization that is engaged in the work. The provincial governments of Ontario and Saskatchewan are putting up their money. They are taking their own chances of collection, and making their own selection. Although the province of Saskatchewan at one time showed a desire to join us in this scheme, so far none of the provinces is prepared to go into it, and I am not sure that, so far, we have any organization of a responsible character prepared to come forward and say they will re-pay 90 per cent of the advance, except the Salvation Army, and they are recognized by the Overseas Settlement Board. I hope that we shall later be able to get a responsible organization that will give a guarantee of that sort. The Salvation Army have carried on with the Ontario government, and have given satisfaction, so far as I can find out. I inquired of the Hon. Manning Doherty, as to the results they had had in the collection of the moneys advanced to the Army, and he told me they had had splendid results and that the system relieved the government of the responsibility of making the collections of the moneys advanced. There is no doubt that there will be other organizations which would undertake this work, but so far the Salvation Army is the only organization that is able to meet the requirements and satisfy the Overseas Settlement Board, because in this particular case, so far as they are concerned, I want the committee to realize that the Overseas Settlement Board, whether money is advanced by way of a loan, expect the federal government of the country to which a person is emigrating to repay that loan, or whatever portion of that loan is collected, on a fifty-fifty basis. So far as the Army is concerned, they are making a division, the Army paying one-third, the domestic herself, or the individual, where they are dealing with males, one-third and the government one-third. So far as we are concerned, we will have to put up 50 per cent. In this particular case the Overseas Settlement Board would put up the other 50 per cent, and they guarantee to return 90 per cent of the loan. That is the guarantee they offer as a responsible organization.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To make that clear, the guarantee is given by whom?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): By the Salvation Army.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not by the association that puts up the 50 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; the Overseas Settlement Board is quite prepared to have the Army responsible for their contribution, to repay it to them if we so desire. There is just that one difference. They have expressed the willingness if we so desire, if any advances are made to the Army, to accept the army as the responsible medium for repayment. That would, of course, reduce the risk very materially. That is the only organization that we have at the moment to deal with, in so far as domestic servants are concerned. I hope we will be able to get some other responsible organizations to engage in this work, because as near as we can estimate the amount, 5,000 domestic servants could be placed in Canada if they could be procured.

One difficulty is that there seems to be so many occupations in Canada into which these young women can enter, that they do not remain very long in the homes to which they come in Canada. The other scheme I have in mind is the nominated scheme of passage.

Mr. LEWIS: In regard to the domestics that are to be brought out. I understand the shipping authorities will look after the girls or domestics on board ship, but that when they get on the train in Canada, no such provision is made in regard to their food. Who looks after that end of it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A conductress accompanies every unaccompanied young woman; if arrangements are made that they travel in groups, we send a conductress right through to Vancouver. That has been done for two or three years.

Mr. LEWIS: When I travelled on one of the Transcontinental trains some time ago, I noticed about thirty young women, English, Scotch and Irish. The young woman who looked after them went into the Pullman and had her meal. I would expect that, but I passed time and again through the colonist car, where the girls were located, and I found they were eating in any style. There did not seem to be any practical provision made for their meals. These girls coming to this country would not know what provision to make for their meals, and I was wondering if the conductress was responsible for them, and whether, when you got thirty girls of that description, travelling in a colonist car, three nights on the train, any provision was made that they should be kept separate? Because there are no proper beds and they sleep on slats.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The purpose for which the conductress is appointed and paid is to see to the protection of these young women, and land them at the various hostels provided in every province in Canada now. That is the sole purpose of having a conductress accompany these young women. If they are neglectful of their duty we would be glad to hear it.

Mr. LEWIS: I did not mean to suggest that. Does the department look after the food situation, or do they have to provide it themselves?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The government has not been bringing these girls out. I understand the Saskatchewan government, for example, in nearly every case has someone to whom the girl is going. In many cases an advance is made by the individual himself the farmer or the businessman. He sends $160 or $170, brings out the young woman and she is placed in his home. If he has not the money the government in many cases finds it for him. The federal authorities have been given the services of these conductresses and they assemble the girls at the immigration halls in parties of not less than eight, usually up to thirty or forty, and travel right across Canada with them.

Dealing with the nominative scheme, it is the most difficult thing, I think hon. gentlemen will agree, to hold the young man. I have looked into this question and I may say, in answer to my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that I have thought very seriously of offering assistance to many of these young Scotch labourers who are quite prepared to come to Canada, but have not the means to pay their passage. But the great difficulty is that these young men will possibly move out. There is nothing that will hold them if they are not satisfied, and you lose touch with them and, perhaps, lose the money that you advance for their passage. Some scheme may be devised of bringing the unattached man out and keeping him in the country, because there are in the Old Land numbers of young men who could be brought out and successfully established in Canada. We have adopted a scheme of asking the farmer here, because this applies only to the farmer, to nominate someone that he knows in the Old Land. We ask that either he or the man who is coming, contribute 25 per cent of the cost of bringing the man out. In 99 cases out of a hundred, practically, these nominations will be of married men with families whose friends are desirous of bringing them out to Canada. In many cases the nomination will be of the wife and family of a man already here. We have decided on rather a simple scheme for the purpose of securing the return of the money. In the first place, the nominator puts up 25 per cent of it. He gives a bond, upon which we expect him to get the name of at least another responsible party, for the repayment of the loan in one year if it is for two persons, that is a man, his wife and a small child, or in two years, if the family is larger, the loan being without interest. That is the scheme we have in connection with nominated passages. We have made arrangements with the Bankers' Association that we shall send the forms upon which to make application to local banks in every community, and they will attend to the collection free of charge. Briefly, that is the scheme that we have to offer for the other $200,000, and it seems to me that it is safe. I feel that I am warranted in asking for a trial of it, and I think it will bring here people who will settle permanently, because they are being brought by their friends who are vitally interested in them, and in that case they are more liable to remain in that particular locality or to settle down permanently in our midst.

[Mr. Chas. Stewart.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think any risk is being taken. The chief objection I have is that nothing is being done. I refer to an article which appeared in the press in September last which I now have in my hand to this effect:

The Peopling of Canada

The Canadian people will approve both the aim and method of the federal government's new immigration policy, etc. The services of the Canadian Colonization Association, an organization backed by private capital, which has been a long time mapping out the field for immigration to this country and will have the financial support of the Imperial government, will be employed in the location of settlers.

Is this the government's policy or is it not? This has been published in the press of this country and it has not been denied. If this other organization is the medium through which immigration into this country is going to be solicited, and we are just being led to believe that something is going to be done by the government, we should have a little understanding with regard to item 53 before this one is passed. This seems a most remarkable state of affairs when we are passing votes for agencies, for salaries of immigration agents. I brought this to the minister's attention last night, and I was told that it had absolutely nothing to do with the other association; yet the very fact that this $200,000 is to be devoted to advancing loans to enable settlers to come to this country, leads me to believe that there is something we have not so far been made acquainted with. I should like the minister to inform the committee whether this article which I have read has any foundation or not, and whether any advances have already been made to the Canada Calonization Company to bring settlers to this country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What paper was that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This was published in the Toronto Globe of September 12, and it has not been contradicted so far as I know. I find that ever since that time the same paper has announced that another immigration policy was being advanced by the government. Surely we are not asked to wait at this time of the year, almost the beginning of April, for the government to formulate and to put into effect a policy to bring immigrants into this country for the present year. It is simply a matter of waiting to see what is going to happen. Under ordinary circumstances, it would be well to exercise some of the caution to which the minister has referred; but there is no risk to be run as regards the domestic servants who have been referred to. The provincial governments through the hostels which they have throughout the country, have all the machinery, and there is no risk to be run as regards advances made to domestic servants. Ontario has been doing this for years, and it will not entail a cent of expense on the government to do this work. My hon. friend referred to domestics who have been coming out here and asked whether anyone was in charge. Those who come into Ontario are met at the port of landing; they are taken care of until they enter their homes, and after that certain control is kept over them and a close touch is kept with what is going on. If the government are not prepared to act, then they should lend assistance to the provincial government to do something. They should not force the provincial governments to do all the work along this line, and then endeavour to claim some of the credit. The government, from the minister's own admission to-night, are doing absolutely nothing, and I believe from reports published broadcast throughout this country, that another company which is being subsidized by the government is engaged in this work and is now receiving similar grants from the Imperial government. Has any money been advanced to this Canadian Colonization Company up to the present time? That is a fair question; it is a question which is pertinent to the item before the committee. I am sorry that I have to leave in order to catch my train, but I think we deserve some information as regards the question which I have submitted. I want to know whether any arrangement has already been completed by the Canada Colonization Association with the British government to receive financial assistance in order to bring settlers to this country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will remember that the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Shaw) asked the question two weeks ago with respect to the matter that he has mentioned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I did not hear it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The question was answered: "Yes, the Canada Colonization Association got $40,000 from the government last October."

Mr. FORKE: That has nothing to do with the $600,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not a thing.

Mr. FORKE: Then why waste time discussing it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My hon. friend is very much concerned about wasting time, and I hope he will continue to exercise his caution in that regard. The question I asked was what arrangement had been made between the Canada Colonization Association, which is subsidized by this government and which the minister informed the committee he was keeping in close touch with to earmark every move they were making, so that no advantage could be taken of the government, and the Imperial government to receive financial assistance, as intimated by the newspaper article which I have read.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have already answered my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But he is referring to the Imperial government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know if they have made an arrangement with the Imperial government. I know that they are simply working in the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This is the newspaper which represents the government in this province. The editorial which I refer to has this heading:

> The Canadian people will approve both the aim and the method of the federal government's new policy.

This is the heading, and the report goes on to state:

> The services of the Canada Colonization Association—an association backed by private capital—which has been a long time mapping out the field for immigration to this country and which will have the financial support of the Imperial government, will be employed in the location of settlers.

This is the newspaper article that has led the people of the country to believe that this association was engaged in this work, and the minister tells us now that he has no definite information regarding the matter. The deputy minister is in the Old Country, but surely the minister can keep in touch with events over there. Are we simply putting these items in the estimates to make it appear to the people that the government propose some time to do something along this line, but that in the meantime they have no intention of doing anything? If that is the case I think it would be better to say so now and end the farce.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have been trying all evening to tell my hon. friend what we were doing. At one stage of the proceedings he seemed quite favourable, but now he appears to have a different attitude altogether. I am extremely anxious to carry out what I have suggested to-night, and I thought I was going to have the support of my hon. friend, but apparently he does not desire me to get on with the attempt I am making to have the arrangement completed in the Old Land. I am very anxious to bring people from the Old Country into Canada, and I have spent considerable time to-night explaining to the committee what we are doing. I hope I made myself clear, because I certainly did want to put the position fully before the committee. At one stage my hon. friend was quite enthusiastic; he said, "Here at last is something upon which I can agree with the minister." But unfortunately I have spoiled it all by explaining too much.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has certainly devoted a good deal of time to informing the House as to what he has not done, but as regards anything having been done, I fail to see what results have been obtained through the policy that has been featured in the press so often during the last few months.

Mr. CALDWELL: My criticism of the minister's policy will not be of the character offered by the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland). He has criticized the minister in one breath for not having done anything, and, in the next breath, for spending money on the Canada Colonization Association. If I have any criticism to offer it is because the minister has paid over money to this association before it has been voted by parliament. I fully approve of the policy of not making any agreement that calls for an expenditure of public moneys until it is voted by parliament, and I am glad that the minister has been exercising some caution in this respect. I do take strong exception to money being paid to this association. I do not approve of the scheme at all. However, I did not rise at this moment to make any speech on this point. I simply want to endorse what has been said by my leader (Mr. Forke) earlier in the evening, and to suggest that the minister give the items in connection with this vote of $600,000. I would ask him to put those items on Hansard so that we may be able to consider them beforehand. My leader asked that this item, together with item 53, be allowed to stand that the details be put on Hansard, and I should like to defer any further remarks in conection with these votes so that the minister might have an opportunity to comply with the hon. member's request.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The whole item covers some $1,700,000, and I think I may justly plead fatigue. I have had a fairly strenuous day and it would take a considerable time to give those items. If the leader of the House (Mr. Mackenzie King) will permit me, I shall be glad to do it on Tuesday.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We all want to save the minister as much as we can. Would it not be easier to have the details drawn up and a copy sent to the hon. member (Mr. Forke) and to anyone else who might want it? I have tried to follow the minister as closely as possible. As far as I can understand him, in connection with the first item of $200,000, in so far as our financial commitments are concerned, the British government puts up 50 per cent and we 50 per cent, and both say good-bye to it. In regard to the next item, the domestics, that also is something that is handled entirely in co-operation with the British government. They are to be responsible for 50 per cent, and we for 50 per cent. But there is in connection with that a further qualification. The British government's share is to be repaid before we get ours, unless we make an arrangement with the Salvation Army and substitute them for ourselves so that we shall have no further responsibility for the 50 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There remains, however, a third class which I understood my hon. friend to say the home government had nothing to do with.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I misunderstood my hon. friend, because it seemed to me that we were putting up money for the nominator, on the bond of the nominator, on the payment of 25 per cent in cash. I did not understand that the British government had anything to do with this.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the whole of the vote depends on the making of an agreement with the British government. I should like to know whether a draft agreement has yet been prepared, so that we may have some idea of its contents.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, we have not yet got a draft agreement with the British government; that will have to be entered into. I am waiting for particulars to know what form that draft will take.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice further that for the purposes of the agreement we are to have regulations. I wonder whether my hon. friend could not give the committee some idea as to what regulations he will adopt for the purposes of assisting and helping the immigrant, on the one hand, and protecting the country, on the other. The whole thing is to be done by way of regulations. Does he propose new regulations? Is so, in what connection does he need anything new?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is very little needed. I regret that I did not before inform the committee that we expect the Overseas Settlement Board to join in the third scheme. That is the hope but there will be this difference in connection with it, that we shall be responsible for the whole amount. Of course it will be divided between the Overseas government and the federal government of Canada, but we shall be responsible for the repaymnt of the whole amount. That is the difference between the domestic scheme and that of the nominated passage. But it is only on account of the Salvation Army that we escape the responsibility for the half furnished by the British government in the scheme for bringing out domestics. The regulations are much along the lines that I have explained. Arrangements have been made with the banks, and they understand what we propose doing. As these bonds come in properly filled out we send them forward.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just a word further in regard to putting a detailed statement befor us so we may have an opportunity to consider it during the week end. Practically every member is on two or three committees, some of which are sitting twice a day, and it is only on Saturdays and Mondays that we have a chance to attend to anything outside that work. For this reason I hope the minister will give us, even although it be only in brief outline, particulars of the items under which the $1,800,000 will be spent. Unfortunately most of the Progressive members are from the extreme ends of the Dominion and do not go home over the week end, so they will be here and in a position to study these particulars. If the minister adopts this suggestion I am sure it will expedite the passage of these items.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I had in mind that hon. members would be having a week's rest.

Mr. CALDWELL: We would like an opportunity to consider these particulars before Monday afternoon if possible. Could the minister not give us a brief outline of the expenditures?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are innumerable.

Mr. CALDWELL: All we want is a brief outline of the heads under which the $1,800,000 will be spent.

Mr. FORKE: Does the minister intend to go on with this next week?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should like to have the assisted passage scheme disposed of, because until it is settled I am unable to say definitely to the British government whether we can begin or not.

Mr. FORKE: If the minister does not intend to go on with it next week he could put the items on Hansard later.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can put them on to-night.

Mr. FORKE: As we have had a pretty full explanation regarding the $600,000 vote I would suggest that it be passed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would facilitate business very much if the committee would agree to let it pass.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think I could agree to that, Mr. Chairman. I should like to have a little more information as to the form of the agreement and the regulations. I would point out to my hon. friend that the way the vote is worded leaves a doubt as to whether he would make his arrangements for nominated passages through the British government. He hopes to, but he is not at all sure about it. At the same time he wants to do business. If he takes his vote this way he cannot do it apart from the agreement. I think he had better consider very carefully whether he wants the bargain in that form.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I had Mr. Edwards draw this agreement after careful consideration of the Overseas Settlement Act. He drew it as best he could in conformity with the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister does business under the overseas scheme entirely the agreement is perfectly well drawn. I understood that my hon. friend was going to do business under that act as far as children and domestics are concerned, but beyond those classes he was not quite determined how to proceed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes, I have no intention of using any part of this money except in conjunction with the Overseas Settlement Board.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think there is any particular hurry for putting the particulars on Hansard to-night.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot very well give a summary without using all these sheets, involving several hundred names and the amounts mentioned for printing and advertising, in Great Britain $202,000 and in the United States $370,000 if I remember correctly, and a great many other items. Would it be satisfactory to the committee if I prepared a statement of the amounts spent on salaries and advertising and lumped these together? Otherwise it will mean a great deal of detail.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister is preparing a statement why not set out the information in detail? It will be quite easy to do so.

Mr. FORKE: If we could get an intelligent grasp of how these moneys are being spent we would be satisfied. It would facilitate the business of the committee if we had this information beforehand.

Progress reported.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Before the adjournment may I call the attention of the House to the fact that we are on the edge of a new fiscal year, and though we have made considerable progress with the Estimates the supplies are not in a condition to warrant us making anything like an extensive appropriation. I am going to ask the House on Monday, if I can obtain unanimous consent, for a special supply bill covering two months of the coming year. I give notice in this informal way in the hope that the House will agree to it without division.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Monday, March 26, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): In accordance with an intimation given on Friday last, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to the several steps that would be necessary for the passing of an Interim Supply Bill. If there be no objection, I move that the House do now proceed to Government Orders for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider certain resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Agriculture—experimental farms, $1,525,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): The unanimous consent given, as I understood it, was a consent that my hon. friend should get his interim supply, but that he should confine it to interim supply, and not ask the House to go through the form of taking all the different estimates that have already been passed and of asking for concurrences.

Mr. FIELDING: The usual course is that we take all the estimates that have been dealt with and add one-sixth of the remainder. I think that is the invariable practice. If that is not so, I shall have to let the matter stand over until to-morrow and re-cast the resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What we used to do, and what my hon. friend always took objection to, was to vote one-sixth, full right being reserved to object, later on, to any estimates that had not already been passed. We have to-day some important matters that, I think, should not lose their right of way for the purpose of concurring in everything that has been voted. I am perfectly willing to consent to all that we thought would be done, namely, that the government should have the necessary interim supply, and we consent to a resolution now going through for one-sixth, the usual supply, as interim supply, without prejudice to the opposition or anybody else who may wish to object to any individual item.

Mr. FIELDING: The difficulty is that we have already voted the whole amount of the estimate in a number of instances, and it is rather inconvenient to vote one-sixth of what we have already voted six-sixths of. I do not think anybody's right is prejudiced by our concurring in any of these resolutions. I think, if my hon. friend will look into the matter, he will find that what I propose now is exactly what has been the custom.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We can take it as it was last year.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not the papers ready for the motion in that form.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content that the motion be put in that way now, or to-morrow, if my hon. friend so desires.

Mr. FIELDING: To-morrow will do.

Item stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The purpose of the bill is to prohibit the giving of information as to betting on horse races and fights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will this be the only amendment to the Criminal Code which the government will introduce this session?

Mr. BUREAU: That is for the government to decide.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How far does this proposal go?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This is the bill which I mentioned some weeks ago as embodying a suggestion which was submitted to us by the Attorney General of Ontario.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): As the question of the Easter adjournment has now been settled, I suppose my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) would like to announce to the House when he will bring down the budget. We should like to know whether it will be just after the recess, or when.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend is quite right; I should certainly like to make the announcement he requests. But there are many things which I should like to do that are not immediately in my power.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister might assist hon. members to the extent of informing the House that he is not going to bring down the budget the first week after we re-assemble.

Mr. FIELDING: I think I may oblige my hon. friend so far as to say that he is correct in that assumption.

Mr. WARD: The question is No. 2 on today's order paper, and relates to bonuses to retiring officials and directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: The answer will be brought down shortly.

[Mr. Ward.]

Hon. Mr. ROBB: This question has been on the order paper some time, and it may have to stand for a few days yet, as we have to send to the different outports where there are elevators to secure the returns. I am merely making this explanation for the information of the hon. member in whose name the question stands.

Question stands.

DRAWBACKS

Mr. FANSHER:

1. What was the value of the materials imported into Canada, during the last fiscal year, which entered into the manufacture of goods finally exported from Canada and on which a drawback was paid?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: I have already asked the hon. member to state his question more precisely, because the only way in which we can know when what materials are imported for manufacturing purposes is when the drawback is asked for. I cannot answer the question as it stands on the order paper, because no declaration is made at the customs that any particular materials are imported for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. BLACK (Huron): The hon. member is not in the House.

Mr. BUREAU: He can see me if he cares to.

Question stands.

EXCURSION RAILWAY RATES

Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation this session to amend the Railway Act so as to restore cheap, special rate excursion tickets (as was the custom before the war) on such special occasions as public holidays, week-ends, fall fairs, sporting contests, games and conferences?

2. If the government does not propose such legislation this Session, in view of the special and many urgent requests for these special rates last session from numerous fall fair organizations, the Canadian National Exhibition and many sportsmen's organizations and agricultural societies in Canada, will the government or Minister of Railways use their good offices with the railway companies to restore this old and long established custom and practice as to special rates?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. It is not the intention of the government to introduce such legislation. This must be left to the initiative of the railways, subject to the supervision of the Railway Board in regard to discrimination, etc., as provided by the Railway Act.

2. The government understands that the railways, in 1922, made the following arrangements for specially reduced fares, and is assured that the railways will carefully consider whether it is advisable to make any other special fares along the lines indicated in the question of the hon. member:

EQUALIZATION OF RAILWAY RATES

PRIORITY OF MR. CLARK'S MOTION

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last when I moved my resolution on the equalization of freight rates it stood over for the purpose of enabling you, Sir, to look into the question of whether it was in order. I then asked that the motion should be given right of way to-day, and I understood that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) acceded to my request. At least, he stated that subject to your decision my motion would be given priority. He also stated that he would consult with members of his own party who had resolutions on the order paper ahead of mine with a view of securing that right of way.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my recollection of what I said when my hon. friend asked that the priority of his motion might be preserved is that I intimated the government would do whatever lay within its power to meet his wishes, seeing that he was dropping his motion for the time being to suit your convenience, Sir, to enable you to look up certain references. Of course, the government's power in a matter of this kind is limited by the consent of the House. If the House is agreeable to giving the hon. gentleman precedence, the government is perfectly willing he should have it.

Mr. CLARK: I think my right hon. friend has apparently forgotten that after I had spoken to the motion, being in some doubt as to what interpretation might be placed upon the words I used, I immediately crossed the floor and explained to him that I intended to ask that my motion should be given right of way over all other motions, and should be taken up to-day. I also requested that the other motions, which stood in my way should be proceeded with last Wednesday. The first motion now on the order paper is one of those which I then referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend did come over and speak to me, and I said I would see what could be done. But he will be the first to admit that I could not make any promise which would bind the entire House. I have spoken to other hon. members who have resolutions ahead, but they maintain that it is their right to insist on their motions being called in their regular order. I am afraid, therefore, that unless they are willing to withdraw from that position at this moment, my power in the matter is limited.

BANKRUPTCY

PROPOSED ABROGATION OR AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1919

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the fact that the Bankruptcy Act, 1919, and amendments thereto, does not obtain the results expected, and is the source of complaints from various industries and trades, it is desirable that the said law should be amended or abrogated.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year I had on the order paper a resolution similar to this but I did not press it because I was given to understand that substantial amendments would be introduced to the Bankruptcy Act. The amendments, however, which were bought down in the last lap of the session, were of not much importance; they did not cover many of the points discussed and did not appear at any rate to be such as to afford relief.

All over the country to-day, especially in the province of Quebec, the present law and its application is criticized. Its enforcement during the last three years has been sufficient to prove to the general public that the law is not as good as it was thought it would be, not even as good as the old system which formerly prevailed under the abandonment of property provisions in our province and the Winding-up Act. Everybody will understand that the bankruptcy law is of the highest importance; it has a great influence on the economic and commercial life of the country, and even, I would add, on its morality. When our present law was passed one of its objects was to provide that when a person became insolvent his wealth and property should belong to his creditors and be distributed among them equitably; that a debtor was to be liberated if he were not proved guilty of any fraud, and that the costs were to be reduced to a minimum. That is what we were told when the provisions of the present law were introduced in the House in 1919 and that had been the object of previous laws respecting bankruptcy in this country. Since its enforcement, however, the present law seems to have opened the door to fraud and speculation. It has been injurious to the credit of individuals and commercial firms and in large measure has contributed to the financial depression that at present exists in this country. There is a good deal of feeling against the law, not only in the province of Quebec but also in other parts of the Dominion. And just here I cannot do better, Mr. Speaker, than to cite to the House some remarks made by Mr. Colby, then member for Stanstead, when the law of 1880 was repealed. He said:

> The idea of protecting the honest and unfortunate debtor was a humane and proper idea, but in England, in the United States and in Canada, where endeavours have been made to protect the honest and unfortunate trader, the door had been unfortunately opened to fraud, demoralization, recklessness, and evils so numerous that it became necessary in the public interest, that these facilities should be done away with.

This seems to have been the case in connection with the present law. I believe also that the promoters of the law, who were desirous of having uniform legislation on the subject—and I am told that the idea originated in the western provinces, the Canadian Credit Men's Association being its chief promoter—have had fault to find with it since it went into force. Mr. Detchon, the general manager of that association, is reported as having said recently that the law is favourable to the dishonest trader who makes use of the same to get rid of his indebtedness and in a certain way to keep the greatest part of his money to the detriment of his creditors. In the province of Quebec numerous trustees have been appointed under this law, and their aim and object has been to show people financially embarrassed the way to get out of their difficulties. We have seen circulars issued to people of the trades and industries and to others, asking them to call meetings of their officers or trustees for the purpose of discussing methods of overcoming their financial difficulties of the moment and of trying to get rid of their debt and turning over a new leaf. These people have sent notices out and have employed canvassers not only in the cities but in the country districts as well. We have seen many of them in the province of Quebec going to honest farmers in certain communities who are in some little financial difficulty and offering to fix things up for them. They tell these farmers that if they will let them look after their affairs they will put them under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act so that they may have freedom from all their creditors. I am told that a great many people in the rural districts have been lured by these canvassers who told them that their financial difficulties would be relieved, and the result has been that they have run into further difficulties. Sometimes they have succeeded in paying only 10, 15 or 20 per cent and have not been any better off after they failed; in fact, their position has been worse.

The present law provides facilities to enable the debtor to go to a trustee, open all his affairs to him, and ask him to make a settlement. In my opinion too much freedom is thus allowed to the debtor who is not so scrupulous, because he can go to a trustee and by preparing a statement of his affairs from two to six months ahead he can make a showing which, while substantially according to the facts, is not fully accurate and may thus make an attempt to get away with something. I may be told that there is a provision in the law under which such a trustee may be removed. It is true that a trustee may be removed for cause after a meeting of creditors called for the purpose. But it is usually the case that when a man goes to the trouble of getting a trustee to look after his affairs for him he has beforehand sought the opinion of some of the largest creditors and obtained their consent to the arrangement on the understanding that those creditors will get off not too badly and that they will be paid a certain amount of their claim. Then when an attempt is made to put out the trustees who have been so chosen, the creditors who have not been consulted find themselves in the dark; they are without support, and thus there cannot be secured the number of creditors necessary to bring about the removal of the trustees. This is one of the bad features of the law. In Montreal and in the rural districts as well people have failed who would have been able to meet their indebtedness with a little effort; they could have found a remedy for their financial difficulties without taking a course that would leave their creditors with nothing.

The cost of operations under the present law is too great. One of the objects of the law, as was stated on its introduction, was to reduce the costs of legal services and of trustees. I had a case in court where the creditors had taken proceedings against a debtor, obtained judgment and the property was in the hands of the sheriff to be sold. The cost amounted to about $300. Just a day or so before the date fixed for the sale, the trustee went to the debtor and explained the situation to him. The debtor immediately made an assignment, took the benefit of the law, and the costs were useless. Now the assets of the estate have been wound up, and the costs will have to be paid by the creditors for proceedings against the debtor, although the proceedings were of no avail. The creditors will lose the costs they have paid.

We had another case in which the assets of an insolvent debtor realized the sum of $680, and the fees for the proceedings and for the legal advice of the trustees amounted to $527; the balance went to the privileged creditors and the ordinary creditors went away with nothing. Another case was that of Le Union Co-operation des Fermiers de St. Leon-le-Grand. The proceeds in that case amounted to $3,943.40, and the cost and disbursements amounted to $2,056.44, leaving a dividend of 8½ per cent to the creditors. To-day in most of the small cases the costs absorb nearly the whole amount realized, and the ordinary creditors receive hardly anything. So that we are not much more advanced than we were under the old law. Then we have the bill of costs also of the lawyers, and in this case I am not speaking for myself, and I am not trying to unduly protect the lawyer, because some comments were made in this House a few weeks ago that lawyers were crowding the people hard. This law was made to try to prevent abuses. I had occasion to examine bills of cost myself and I find that the bills of cost are just as heavy as before.

Under the old law, in the superior court of the province of Quebec, it would cost us for a petition from $16 to $20—not more than $20—and now the costs under an order amount to $60, $85 or $90. Last year I had occasion to present a petition to a trustee to declare a dividend, and the costs amounted to $85. It is the same case everywhere, and the trustees themselves and the registrar are authorized by this law to charge for each and every single thing they do, and if any hon. member who has a moment to spare would kindly look at the tariff, which is to be found at the end of the sections, he would find that the bailiff, the trustees, the employees and all the assistants of the trustees, are well and favourably protected, much more than they were under the old law, The Winding-up Act and the Judicial Abandonment of Property Act as administered in Quebec before this law was in force.

There is another objection to this law. The law allowed the trader to fail, and by allowing the trader to fail, it has ruined in my opinion the credit of a great many other persons. We saw last year a great many people who would have been able, under other circumstances, to withstand the commercial and industrial depression and meet their liabilities and claims of their creditors, if it had not been for the bankruptcy law which is in force. We have seen many cases where the merchant would have been able to borrow from the bank or from individuals to carry on and obtain the necessary amount of money to settle his affairs, but he could not borrow this money on account of the bankruptcy law, because the people would say to him, "We have no guarantee, if we advance you a certain amount of money, that in a few days from now, with the help of some trustees or other creditors, you will not assign, and we will be left in the cold and will have no recourse under the law." Many of these merchants have gone to the banks and tried to borrow money and the banks have refused to lend them money because they were afraid they might assign and the bank would not be protected. Another objection is that a hypothec or mortgage created within three months preceding the insolvency is declared void, and that the creditor under the mortgage or hypothec has not the right to recover, according to the rank of the hypothec. The result is that in our province of Quebec, in farming districts, farmers who have become embarrassed under the old law would have been able to obtain money on their farming property, have found the door closed to them on account of this very same law, because the people did not trust them and they were afraid that the hypothec they would obtain on their property would be declared null and void. Since the law has been in force we have seen many merchants and others refusing to give credit to traders or other persons on account of this law. The industrial people, trades people, the business men and the manufacturers are all opposed to the law, and it is a strange thing that those who were pressing for this law in 1919 are all now in favour of the proposition that it should be either abrogated or amended in a way to protect the interest of the merchant, the manufacturer and the industrial people.

At a certain meeting of La Chambre de Commerce in Montreal, which is a French institution similar to the Board of Trade in Ontario, a resolution was passed declaring that La Chambre de Commerce was opposed to the law, and stating that even with the amendments passed at the last session of parliament the law was too wide and more advantageous to the bankrupt.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Do I understand the hon. member to say that a mortgage registered within three months prior to an assignment act is invalid, even if it were a bona fide mortgage, and no mala fides?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will come to that point. We have in our civil code article 2023 which says that a mortgage registered within thirty days of the insolvency of the debtor, if it is notoriously known that the man is insolvent, is no good. We have also article 2090 which prevents the registration of any mortgage or privilege on the movable property of the debtor within 30 days immediately preceding the insolvency.

Then I say if we have these provisions in our law to protect us and protect the creditors against the insolvent debtors, or the traders who might be in bad circumstances, I do not see why we should have gone to the trouble of enacting in this new law other articles which have made it worse for us, which are cumbersome, and are in a certain way overlapping the law of the province of Quebec.

Mr. LADNER: Does the bankruptcy law not distinguish between actual money advanced in exchange for a mortgage and the other class where the mortgage is given for a past due debt?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question now. I do not think the law makes any distinction as to that, at any rate not that I can remember. I know the law, and it is very complicated and pretty hard to understand. There are lawyers, and many trustees of long standing, in the province of Quebec who are not able to understand it. They find, too, that in many cases, there are contradictions in the law.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman will admit there are some lawyers who understand it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: My hon. friend no doubt understands the law as he has made a special study of it, just as he has in the case of the Immigration Act. I say that the law, as it is at present framed is not in the interest of the business community and should either be amended or repealed. I am not alone in that belief. I have cited the opinions of the Chambre de Commerce of Montreal and I hope I may be permitted to read a few extracts of what we see every day in the newspapers of our province. When I opened my newspaper some time ago I saw the heading "Bankruptcy Law Operation Flayed." That was the heading over the report of a certain organization, the Old Colony Club, which was meeting at the Windsor hotel in Montreal and trying to find some way out of the existing difficulties either by the improvement of the present law or by its abrogation. A headline in another newspaper was worded "Bankruptcy Act Not Understood." It may be that that is what my hon. friend was drawing my attention to a moment ago. This had reference to a meeting of the local Rotary Club of Montreal at which efforts were made to discover some amendments to the law which it was thought would remedy the existing conditions in the country. The heading over another newspaper article reads "Bankruptcy Law Needs Amendment." So you see that people, not only in the city of Montreal but in other districts of the province, are getting busy and endeavouring to devise some means of amending this law.

I have here also an article which was published in the Montreal Gazette about the time of the opening of the present session, and I quote from that article the folllowing:

> The results have been, apparently, advantageous, but not to the creditors. The present law does not differ in principle from its short-lived predecessor of 1875-80. The fault with the old law was attributed to administrative weaknesses, and the new statute was professedly designed to remedy these defects.

And then further on:

> The principal objection to the existing law in Canada, as expressed from time to time, is that it does not adequately safeguard the interests of the creditors and of legitimate business, in short, that it makes insolvency profitable to the debtor. It has been criticized further upon the score of expense and upon the ground that it is cumbersome, and the amendments made last year were intended to improve it in these respects.
> These amendments did not affect the principle of the law, and do not, apparently, meet the main objection, namely, that the statute encourages bankruptcy. Such an objection, if substantiated, is sufficient to condemn the act, as, obviously, the purpose of the law is frustrated in the result alleged. The case may not be as bad as it is represented to be, but the volume and character of the criticisms denote a fundamental flaw somewhere in the system, and the matter is of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the government and of parliament.

It is for this reason that I am now moving this resolution, in the hope that hon. members will co-operate with me and impress upon the Minister of Justice the importance of making certain desired amendments to the law.

Another effect which this law has had is that it has practically abolished articles 853 and 892 of our code of civil procedure, regarding the abandonment of property, which were in force for fifteen years before they were thus practically superseded and which gave entire satisfaction. Article 891 declares that a debtor is liberated from debt only up to the extent of the amount that his creditors receive from the proceeds of the sale of his assets. On the other hand section 58 of the new Bankruptcy law states that a bankrupt person may ask and obtain his release if he had not been proven guilty of any fraud, there being however, certain conditions which must be complied with. It is easy to imagine all the abuses that might possibly flow from such a law. Instead of forcing the bankrupt trader to fulfil his obligations and respect his dealings with his creditors, to my mind, this provision encourages the trader to incur further liabilities. There is also the opportunity of indulging in speculation by giving to the unscrupulous trader a chance, after having made some bad bargain, or of indulging in some imprudent dealings, to get free by making a settlement of some kind on easy terms with his creditors. Sometimes creditors, even though they may have sufficient time, are not interested enough in the settlement of their claims. Very often they do not look with sufficient care into these cases when they are brought to their attention, or when they receive a notice to approve or disapprove of an agreement or a settlement. It is too much the custom of such people to say, "I have made a certain amount of money out of this man, I have had certain transactions with him and in most cases he has paid me well; I shall lose a certain amount in the present case but I will let it go at that." In other cases the creditors are discouraged and do not want to spend more time and money in what they look upon as an uncertainty. The consequence is the bankrupt is liberated when he should not be freed at all. Under the old law in our province, which law is still in force, respecting the judicial abandonment of property, only a man who was in danger of arrest on a capias or a trader in a bad financial condition could assign. To-day, under this Dominion law, any person, whether he is a trader or not, can assign. Under article 853 of the provincial law only a debtor who was liable to be arrested, or a trader who had ceased his payments, could make an assignment. To-day, under this Dominion law, any man can do so whether he is a trader, a real estate operator, an engineer, or even a trustee; and I am told that in certain cities there are men acting as trustees who have made compromises with their creditors and who are operating under an extension of time. I am told that such men as these have, unfortunately, been given the administration of certain estates in the district in which they reside. The position of these men might have escaped the notice of the department because of their being highly recommended. I am, however, informed on good authority that there are such cases and it is hardly necessary to say that such men should not be occupying the position of trustees.

Another objection that I see to the present law is this: articles 1,999 and 2,005 of our civil code which were made for the protection of the landlord have been, to a certain extent, abrogated and the landlord has not the privilege which he enjoyed under the old law. Under section 52 of the present law the landlord is only granted three months' rental previous to the insolvency. A trustee can occupy the premises from month to month at the same rental, or at a certain rental fixed by the court. The trustee also has the privilege to cancel the lease at any time during the year, and the result is that in many cases the landlord suffers great loss and great inconvenience.

Sections 29 and 48 of the present law also seem to me to be objectionable because they do away with certain features of the clauses of the marriage contract which have been the basis and the mainstay of the family life and of the marital rights as between husband and wife.

Another objection to the law I find in article 85, which deals with the permission given to a company to assign. According to article 85, a company may assign if it is duly represented, and this other paragraph of the law states that a firm has a right to assign by one of its members. I am informed that in Montreal, in the case of Byers and Craig, one of the partners of the firm put the firm into liquidation and judgment was rendered on that point that, according to the article, as it was drafted, there was no other course than to maintain the action of the partner which was supposed to be binding on behalf of the firm. This article should be amended in such a way as to protect a member of a firm who might be put into trouble and lose a good deal of the money he had invested in the firm, if any other member could put the firm into insolvency. The trouble was that when this law was made, it was made to cover and protect creditors in other parts of the country than Quebec which do not seem to have the same provisions that we have in our civil code and code of procedure, and it is for this reason that we see many articles in the law and many things in the rules and regulations which seem to be overlapping and which cause so much trouble, as has been the experience since the law has been in force.

Many insolvencies have occurred recently in Quebec. If you open a newspaper or pass through any of the streets of our cities, what do you see? "Bankruptcy" or "sale judicially authorized." We see this in Montreal, especially. This is due, I believe to the fact that the law renders it too easy to the debtor to avail himself of its provisions. If we consider the many insolvencies that have taken place, we find that most of the insolvencies—at any rate I am so informed as regards the district of Montreal—have been voluntary and that the debtors themselves have gone to the trustees and arranged their affairs with them and a few of their creditors to try to get away with the matter. We are presented sometimes with a compromise or a certain agreement reached with a number of creditors who have the largest claims, and as I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is pretty hard to upset them. Formerly, it was only the trader who could assign, because he needed credit and he was in business; but to-day any person who is a debtor can make an assignment. We have also in the law a provision that a debtor can assign, not only in his district, but in other places, and I have seen many cases where debtors of rural districts have assigned in the district of Montreal. One of my hon. friends was pointing out to me that one debtor in the district of Joliette had assigned in another district entirely different from his own. This complicates matters and compels creditors to follow up their debtors to other districts than those in which they ought to assign, as was the case under the old law thereby increasing expenses.

To find out if the results of this law have been good, I think I can do no better than to give to the House the figures of the numerous cases which have originated since the law came into force. The figures are as follows for Canada:

Date	Number of insolvent cases	Assets	Liabilities
1916..	596	$ 5,000,000	$ 9,000,000
1917..	370	4,000,000	5,000,000
1918..	873	11,251,341	14,502,477
1919..	755	10,741,441	16,256,250
1920..	1,878	18,569,516	26,474,301
1921..	2,451	57,158,597	73,299,111
1922, for first six months..	1,899	24,372,548	32,423,961

For the first nine months of 1922, I am informed, there are 2,729 cases, and of those 1,083, or 40 per cent, are in Quebec. Of those 1,083 cases, I am informed that 300 were farmers in our good old province of Quebec, who had found a way to fail, a thing unknown formerly in the rural districts in our good province of Quebec which has had the reputation of being honest and paying its debts

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member mean to say that there were no bankruptcies amongst farmers until the Bankruptcy Act came into force?

Mr. CASGRAIN: There might have been some cases of bankruptcy, people who were assigning; but there were not so many. Under the old law the farmer, if he was carrying on a trade or business, could assign; but if a farmer simply was cultivating the land, he could not assign. Under the present law, he cannot be forced into bankruptcy; but he can himself make an assignment, and that is what is being done in many cases.

Mr. MORIN: Could his property be sold by the sheriff if he failed to meet his liabilities?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Like everyone else.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. SHAW: Would my hon. friend deny to farmers the right of seeking relief under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, the right he accords to others?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No. But before we had that law, farmers who were embarrassed were able to meet their liabilities and pull themselves through. Since the law has been in force, there seems to be a microbe or epidemic which has taken a few of those people, who have assigned at the instance of other people who are not so scrupulous as they ought to be. For instance some of the trustees go out into the rural districts and impress upon those people what the relief is under the law; that they ought to apply it to themselves, and that if they would put their affairs into the hands of the trustees, those trustees would settle all their difficulties for them. Under the old law, they had the relief of borrowing money on good terms in those rural districts where such facilities exist. On account of this new bankruptcy law, the people are afraid to do business with them, because they fear they may be left in the dark.

Mr. BOYS: What was the law in Quebec as regards bankruptcy? Is there no act by which a resident of Quebec can voluntarily assign?

Mr. CASGRAIN: We have, under the law of Quebec, as I quoted before, articles 853 to 892, whereby a firm or a person who is a trader under his own name or firm name, could make a judicial abandonment of his property or be forced to assign where he owed more than $200. Then we had for incorporated companies the provisions general to the Dominion of Canada of the Winding-up Act.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend has given figures of five or six years. I think he gave the figure of assignments in Quebec in 1921, as 2,451. Were those all assignments of merchants?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not in a position to answer that question, but I may say that in a great number of these cases the people voluntarily assigned, which goes to show that under the new law they are more eager to seek relief, for the reason that they can obtain their freedom more easily than was formerly possible. Under the old law they were liberated only to the extent that their estate could pay; now they are fully liberated, under the provisions of articles 58 to 60, if their estate can bring fifty cents in the dollar. Under these circumstances they are more eager to seek relief, and that is why since 1919 up to the present time we have seen a great many more insolvency cases and bankrupt estates in the province of Quebec than we have known before.

When one sees all these insolvency cases occurring and so many bankrupts seeking relief, one is reminded of the old custom that prevailed in France, where conditions are of course different to-day. In the old days in France the insolvent was forced to wear a green bonnet until such time as all his debts had been discharged to the satisfaction of his creditors. But when we see how easily debtors can now have their affairs settled, and with what little trouble they can get out of their difficulties, I think that in a few years we may have to establish a new order of decoration. These people are so successful in escaping from their responsibilities that, I am led to believe, we may deem it advisable to give them titles. The principal difficulty of the new law seems to lie in the facility—greater than under the law as it previously stood—with which a man can obtain relief from the consequences of failure, and the greater ability he has now to free himself. As I pointed out a moment ago, this condition induces a great many people to seek relief, and is also a strong incentive to dishonesty, because I am fairly certain that a great many of these people must arrange with the trustees and some of the largest creditors before being able to settle their affairs as satisfactorily as they seem to be able to do.

The present state of things also undermines credit, because people are afraid to advance money to any tradesman for the reason that they fear he may fail and then be able to avail himself of the provisions of the law at any time. Another objection to the law as it stands is the fact that the costs of liquidation are much too high. The law was intended to make all legislation uniform, but in my opinion, as things stand now, it only tends to make the evil uniform. I would also point out that this law encroaches on our provincial law, on our civil code and procedure. And one of the last, but by no means the least serious, of the objections I have to it is that it has been responsible for the appointment of too many trustees. When the law was first enacted we were given to understand that only about fifty trustees would be appointed for the district and city of Montreal, and that there would be some trustees located in other districts. I am told that in Montreal there are over 165, indeed, nearly 200 trustees to-day. Nearly everybody could be appointed a trustee under this system, but at present I understand that the gates have been closed and that it is not so easy to have trustees appointed. Very good reasons must be advanced and more security given. The trustees under this law are supposed to give a bond in regard to their administration, but I am informed that many of them give no bond except when they have in view the settlement of an estate. When that is the case they go and give the bond.

As I said before, it has been pointed out that in some of the big cities a few persons have been acting as trustees notwithstanding that they have availed themselves of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and are themselves under compromise. In this respect I would suggest that the government adopt the course that was followed last year by the provincial government of our province. It was discovered that, in the case of a number of persons who were acting as commissioners of the superior court, there were certain abuses in some districts. The government discharged them all by process of an act which was passed at the last session, and only those were reappointed who could show that they were sufficiently qualified for the position. I believe that it would be well to-day if all trustees were removed by this government and if only those were reappointed who could give the best guarantee and recommendation. At any rate, I would not appoint as many as have been appointed in the past. All these men have to earn their living, and this is one of the reasons why we have seen so many of them going into the rural districts and inducing people to avail themselves of the law.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, they are not under the Civil Service Commission, their appointment lies only with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State. Trustees are appointed by order in council. That is good.

It is my opinion that the bankruptcy law, with its many amendments and rules and regulations, is altogether too voluminous and complicated. We have a law that covers 72 pages and is embraced in 98 articles, and rules and regulations and every year since its enactment it has been amended. Indeed, it was amended even before it was put into force, because after the act had been passed in this Chamber it was discovered, upon consultation with some of the best lawyers, that it contained serious errors and omissions. The amendments that have been passed, together with the regulations and forms, are very cumbersome and complicated, and the law consequently does not afford that measure of relief which the people had expected. The forms which it is required to comply with are also for the most part useless and costly, and I venture the opinion that the rules of procedure contain too much red tape, so that creditors will never realize their wish of seeing estates wound up with any degree of expedition unless these rules and regulations are made somewhat more practicable.

I might refer to another feature of the law. I am told that last year certain amendments were enacted by which a trustee is bound to make a return of the affairs of the insolvent debtor for the last year and the year previous to the insolvency. In most cases this has worked very unsatisfactorily both from the point of view of the trustee and, as well, from that of the creditors, more especially of privileged creditors. In one case of which I have personal knowledge a trustee had prepared all his dividend sheets and he received a notification from the Income Tax department not to pay any privileged creditors or any others before the Income Tax office had adjudged what amount was to be paid by the trustee on account of the returns not made and the taxes not paid by the insolvent debtor, depriving thereby the privileged creditors, as well as the lawyers, the trustee and other persons similarly interested in the estate of the payment of their just claims and fees. And in most of these cases, from the books that are kept by the insolvent debtor, it is absolutely impossible for the trustees to prepare such returns.

When we consult the statutes we find that not only once has this parliament tried to legislate in the matter of bankruptcy. But each time it has been unlucky. We find that in 1839 a Bankruptcy Act was passed, only to be repealed in 1843, and six years later replaced by another statute. In 1863 Sir John Abbott introduced a bankruptcy bill which became law in 1864 and was amended from time to time. In 1874 under the Mackenzie administration a further bankruptcy bill was enacted, but six years later it was repealed. Judge Fortin, who later became a judge of the superior court of the district of Montreal, when a member of this House introduced a bill applicable to bankruptcy proceedings throughout the Dominion. With the assistance of some of the ablest lawyers of Montreal he drafted what it was hoped would bring relief to both debtors and creditors but the government of the day did not view the measure favourably, having in mind the unsatisfactory results obtained under the old law, and the bill failed to pass the House of Commons.

If we examine the defects of our old bankruptcy laws we shall find them practically the same as those which mar the Bankruptcy Act of 1919. On this point I wish to quote the views of Judge Desiré Girouard contained in a book which he published on the bankruptcy law of 1864. He then advanced the following objections to that statute:

> Firstly, it is prejudicial to commerce, because it opens new doors to fraud, affords to the bankrupt new means of deception. What is to be expected from a law which, from the first to the thirteenth clause, and from the first to the hundred and thirty-first paragraph, favours almost always the insolvent and not the creditor? Be it remarked, this assertion is not gratuitous; had we no other proof of it than the fact of all the advertisements and notices of failures, which have crowded, since the coming into force of the statute, the columns of our newspapers, our position would be fully established. But again, when we glance at the provisions of the act, the mode, voluntary as well as compulsory, of winding up the affairs of the insolvent; when it is observed that the bankrupt has himself the control of the important delays of the announcement of his failure and the divesting himself of his estate; that he can still with impunity defeat the law and defraud his creditors, obtain, in spite of the latter, a judicial discharge; when it is clear that the hope of such discharge will be for the debtor a powerful motive to induce him to diminish his assets, and afterwards to declare himself in a state of bankruptcy, in order to come out of it enriched with the spoils of the mass; when, we say, we consider all these complications and formalities, which here, as always, serve the debtor and not the creditor; when we remember, in fine, all these delays and costs of liquidation, without forgetting the expenses of the insolvent in obtaining his discharge and attending the meetings of creditors, for the arrangement of his own affairs, it is easy to see, we say again, that the fact, the evidence of which we invoked, it but the rigorous consequence of the law, the inevitable result of the provisions of the act.
> But it is not only because the act favours the interests of the insolvent to the detriment of his creditors that it is fatal to the commerce of the country, but because, like every other bankrupt law, it will injure our credit abroad.

And in support of his argument he quotes the following article from the Revue de Législation written expressly for the benefit of Canada in 1846 when the bankruptcy law of 1843 was in operation:

"The internal commerce of the country," says the anonymous writer, "ought to be sober, prudent and limited; the bankrupt laws in assuring beforehand the discharge from debts, will render it improvident, hazardous, and rash; first cause of mistrust. The facility of freeing himself from embarrassments and of avoiding his struggle always uncertain, will on the very first difficulty paralyze the energy and determination of the trader; for why struggle to pay debts, when it is so easy not to have any? This is a second cause of mistrust. When the labour and talents of the insolvent were the settled guarantee of his creditors, it was for their interest to make this labour and these talents available: and thence all these aids and encouragements which never failed to the unfortunate, and which assisted him to overcome difficulties and to regain lost ground. Bankrupt laws have put an end to this state of things, and hence a third source of mistrust.'

Finally, we think we do not stretch the truth in affirming that a large number of merchants, if not the greater number, would be satisfied with few amendments and simple additions to the existing laws, for the sole purpose of defining and punishing fraud and giving to the cession de biens its proper and necessary effects.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that either in the province of Quebec or in the Dominion generally do we need such a law as we find in the Bankruptcy Act of 1919. It is very hard to frame a law which shall be satisafctory of application in a new country, and we find that it was not until 1886 and 1898 that England and the United States respectively, both much older countries than ours, considered such a course necessary or desirable. We are a country in the making, and we have so many new elements mixing with our population, so many foreign immigrants who are not educated to our standard of ethics and morality, and our territory is so vast, that it is very difficult to draft a general law of bankrupcy to protect the opposing interests of creditors and debtors and ensure a just and economical distribution of insolvent estates. If in the province of Quebec the resentment against the Bankruptcy Act is stronger than in other provinces, it may be due to the fact that, especially in the district of Montreal, we have a very large proportion of foreigners who sometimes are inclined to seek freedom from their indebtedness in a way that our native population would not consider for a moment. I am told that in the province of Ontario this law has not been so adversely criticised. The reason for this may be that there is one-third less population of foreign origin in Ontario than there is in the province of Quebec, particularly in the city of Montreal.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Under this law a further objectionable feature is that large credit corporations are enabled to wield too much influence. For instance, we see big corporations such as the Credit Business Men's Association and other trustee companies engaging in the liquidation of insolvent estates more than was the case under the old law. I do not say that this state of affairs is altogether bad, but I do say that these companies having better means of administering the estates of insolvents it is very difficult for individual trustees who are not so well organized to secure a fair share of business, and this may be the reason why so many of these men go into outlying districts and try to induce people to assign.

Our present bankruptcy law has for the most part proven a boon and a benefit to the foreign element who have recently come to this country from Europe. They arrive here with neither a business nor any other reputation to lose and have no scruples about adopting questionable practices to rid themselves of their financial obligations.

The Bankruptcy Act of 1919 was introduced to secure a more equitable, speedy and economical distribution of a debtor's property and to prevent the excessive abuses and endless expenses which attend bankruptcy proceedings under the old system. But I believe the act was conceived in a hurry and was ill digested. In fact, it was one of those laws wished on us, like the Board of Commerce and other legislation passed by the Union government. which we later found encroached upon the rights of Quebec and the other provinces. It saw the light, I am informed, in an obscure law office in Winnipeg, was fostered here by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and finally adopted by the government of the day in despair. It has proved like our other bankruptcy acts, anti-social and anti-economic. It has done so much harm and so little good that I submit it ought to be consigned to the pigeon-hole to take its place with the Board of Commerce Act and other defunct laws passed by the Union government.

The old Winding-up Act and the provisions respecting the abandonment of property in our code of civil procedure in Quebec are, I submit, sufficient to meet all present purposes and to give general satisfaction to the public. A few amendments may be necessary, but that being done I think everybody would be satisfied. Above all, what we need in a law of this kind, if it has come to stay, is plain and simple language, not the equivocal language which predominates in the present act and which is the cause of much trouble and difficulty. It has been found under this law that in many cases the rights given to the province of Quebec under the civil code and the code of procedure had to be maintained before the courts through the submission of proof that notwithstanding this federal act we had the right to avail ourselves of certain provisions existing in our own laws. A gentleman who was in his lifetime a great lawyer in Montreal, Mr. C. H. Stephens, expressed the view that the code of procedure and the provisions respecting the judicial abandonment of property that we had in the province of Quebec were sufficient to meet all the needs of the people of that province. Speaking of the impossibility of removing from the minds of the people of certain provinces the idea that it is unjust and cruel to take the assets of a debtor and not liberate him from his liabilities, he said:

> To expose the groundlessness of this idea, it ought perhaps to be sufficient to point out that for 15 years, this province has, so far at least as its local interests are concerned, got on better with the half a dozen articles inserted in our Code of Procedure, than under the most elaborate of the insolvent acts which were previously in force.

He pointed out that under our provincial law, a system for distributing insolvent estates, there has been less litigation, less costs and a total absence of that demoralizing influence which constituted the great predominating evil of the acts passed before the present law came into force.

I believe the remarks I have made are sufficient to show that the laws of this parliament in the matter of bankruptcy have not met with favour of the public at large. These laws were introduced with the idea of remedying the existing evils, but in each case it has been found after a few years of operation of the law that the best results were not being obtained. In fact, these bankruptcy laws have been a nuisance; they have been the source of much trouble in our province, and we have been forced to spend large sums to ensure the maintenance of our rights under the civil code and the code of civil procedure. I would also point out that when we had no bankruptcy act we got along just as well as, if not better than, we do under the present system.

Let us see what some of the best legal minds in the province of Quebec have to say about this law. There was a debate in the legislative assembly last year and the previous year, when a resolution was adopted in this form:

> "The legislature of the province of Quebec regret that the Bankruptcy Act as amended invites dishonesty and fraud and causes serious trouble to both trade and industry, which is of a nature to ruin credit, and it requests the federal government to repeal the act."

Hon. Mr. Perrault, Minister of Lands and Colonization for the province of Quebec, speaking in a debate last year, stated that the law had only opened the door to fraud and speculation; that it should not be amended but should be repealed. Hon. Mr. Galipeault, provincial Minister of Public Works, speaking on the occasion of the opening of the courts in the city of Quebec in September last, stated:

> "The Canadian Bar, it is said, was responsible for the adoption of the new Bankruptcy Act by endorsing it after this project had been before the federal House for some time. If this is true, the association might have been more fortunate in its first move. The province of Quebec, which had the advantage of having its own bankruptcy law, which was less expensive and more easily operated will not be the only one to suffer from a law so rapidly studied, and which is so defective and means spoliation in many cases.
> "For all those who are attached to our civil laws, constant care and watch is necessary to prevent any encroachment on our privileges.
> "The tendency to centralize and unify legislation is becoming more and more visible since a few years, and there seems to be an admitted attempt to encroach on provincial rights and attack our civil laws.

The present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) expressed the same opinion a few years ago in addressing a convention of the Canadian Bar Association at the Ritz-Carlton in Montreal. He expressed the hope that when they recommended amendments to the different legislatures and to the federal parliament they should not ask for uniformity of laws which would be prejudicial to the laws of the province of Quebec. Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec, has also expressed his opinion with regard to the present law. I shall have to quote it in French, because I have the extract of his speech from reports published in the French newspapers. Mr. Taschereau said:

> The government has sanctioned the repeal of the act, Mr. Taschereau said, and now we shall have it examined by our most eminent legal authorities, and, should it be found to be ultra vires, we shall ask to have it referred to the Supreme Court so as to have it declared unconstitutional. The government think that the act has not proved satisfactory and it is willing to do its utmost so as to have it declared unconstitutional.
> If bankrupts occur in rural districts, further states the Prime Minister, it is neither due to taxes, nor to the erecting of schools and building of roads, but evidently to the Bankruptcy Act. The rural country was deluged with soliciting agents who induced the farmers to go into bankruptcy and many were taken in. The Act has been disastrous to the credit of farmers and as long as it exists we shall find the same results which, at present, we are encountering. The Premier reiterates that the government will take all the means possible to have this unjust law repealed.

With reference to the maintaining of our rights under the civil code and the code of procedure in our province, a case was decided last fall before the court of appeal, a case in which the Riordon Company was interested, the Danford case. A certain creditor claimed the right to exercise a certain privilege; the question was taken before the court of appeal, and in rendering their decision the judges said:

> The legislators during the short period of life of the act have so amended it that it is scarcely recognizable in its present form. It may be that before the Supreme Court could pass upon the question, further amendments would be made, either making clear what is evidently ambiguous or destroying entirely all rights of the privileged creditor.

That is the judgment of the court of King's Bench. I am told that the question is now before the Supreme Court of Canada, but judgment has not yet been rendered. We have also, Mr. Speaker, not an expression of opinion, but some remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) himself when he had occasion to speak last year at a meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. At that time one gentleman made a speech regarding the weak points of the law and the difficulties occasioned by it, and this is what the Minister of Justice is reported as saying on that occasion—I quote in French:

> I cannot but thank, said Sir Lomer Gouin, Mr. Deslongchamps for his interesting remarks on the Bankruptcy Act. I had already heard complaints in regard to this legislation, but this is the first time I have listened to such a clear statement of the grievances with which you have to put up. I am aware that bankruptcy laws have been adopted by the government, and some provinces, and, I also know that some have been repealed when they were found impracticable. I cannot express an opinion on what has been said by Mr. Deslongchamps, but what I may say without hesitation, is that manufacturers for whom this act was passed have made representation to the government that the act lends itself to abuse and that it is not in the interest of trade and the community at large, and, they may rest assured that the government will do its duty and give them justice.

On another occasion we have the report of Mr. Lambert, who was the president of La Chambre de Commerce of Montreal, who was reported as having had an interview also and discussing these matters with the Minister of Justice. I will read the following clipping with regard to the interview:

> He also reported on an interview accorded himself and other members of the chambre de commerce by Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, when the bankruptcy law had been discussed. Eleven amendments, recently approved by the Chambre had been submitted to the Minister of Justice and Sir Lomer Gouin had told them that he would do all in his power to see that a drastic change would be made as soon as possible. He had gone further, continued Mr. Lambert for he had declared that if the law was not repealed it would undoubtedly disappear anyhow, as it had been found most unsatisfactory for everybody concerned.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

I have here amendments submitted by La Chambre de Commerce of Montreal, which are eleven in all. I think the Minister of Justice must have had copies of these amendments because I believe they were submitted to the government. They point out certain modifications which would likely be made, in order to improve the present law, if it is not repealed, along the lines I have suggested this afternoon. I will not weary the House reading these amendments, or reading different letters which I have received from numerous manufacturers, industrial and other people in my district in the province of Quebec. I am glad to know we have at the head of the Department of Justice the minister who now occupies that position (Sir Lomer Gouin). He was leader in the province of Quebec for many years, has made good laws and brought prosperity to the province. I admit that this law might have some good effects, but it was not satisfactory on all points, and needs amendments, if amendments can possibly be made. If too many amendments would render the law ambiguous, as pointed out in the judgment of the court of appeal, I think it better to repeal the law entirely, and get the best legal minds in this country, those who have had the best experience, to frame up a new law which would give satisfaction to the province of Quebec and to the Dominion at large.

On the other hand, if the law is to remain as it stands, and if we have not time this session or other sessions to enact a new law, it might be provided that this law should not apply in the province of Quebec. A few years ago we had a law similar, which was of widespread application, the Lord's Day Act, but when that act was passed a provision was made that every province in the Dominion which would pass a similar law, or which had a law in existence before the passing of that act, would be exempted from the operation of that Dominion law. I want to see the rights of the province of Quebec protected, and I would like to see our civil code and civil procedure maintained in integrity.

I hope the Minister of Justice will do his best to remedy the present existing conditions as regards the province of Quebec.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): As one of those who had something to do with the Bankruptcy Act now under discussion, when that act was passed through this House two or three years ago, perhaps it would not be out of place for me to offer a few remarks in regard to the motion now before the House. It so happened that I had the honour of occupying the office of Solicitor General of Canada at the time when the Bankruptcy Act in its initial stages came before parliament. I believe in the first instance my hon. friend for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) introduced the bill into this House; that bill was subsequently taken over by the government as a government measure and entrusted to myself as its manager in its course through parliament, and in that way I became fairly familiar with the provisions of the act and with its general application. I do not know, from the wording of the present motion, whether it is the desire of my hon. friend who has brought this matter to the attention of the House whether in his opinion the act should be actually repealed, or merely amended. There is a great difference between the two proposals. I submit to my hon. friend that the principle of a uniform bankruptcy law for the Dominion of Canada is a proper principle. It is possible, and it is also probable, that many of the details of the present act might well be amended, but I submit that we in Canada should have one uniform bankruptcy law to be applicable throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. What was the position in Canada prior to the passage of this act. We had nine provinces in Canada, each having provincial legislation which was virtually bankruptcy legislation although the several provincial governments had no constitutional power to pass such laws, they came as close to the constitutional limit as it was possible for them to come in their respective provinces, and in the nine provinces of Canada these laws exhibited very great variety and entirely lacked uniformity. There was great difficulty in finding out just what the law of this, that or the other province was. The House will agree that trade and commerce is essentially a national question, just as much a national question as our railways, or our banking system. It is just as important to have a law pertaining to our trade and commerce uniform in regard to bankruptcy as it is to have uniformity in regard to railway law or in regard to the laws of banking and commerce. One difficulty arose almost from day to day by reason of the large amount of interprovincial trade that is done in this country. The difficulty was this. A man in Nova Scotia sold goods to a man in Manitoba, the man in Manitoba became unable to pay for his goods; and the question was, what was the man in Nova Scotia to do to collect his bill? He did not know the Manitoba law, it might differ very materially from the law of Nova Scotia. The same thing might happen in regard to British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta or Ontario, because the laws of all these provinces varied, and in some instances varied very materially. There was no uniformity, and there was a vast amount of uncertainty and of ignorance in regard to the exact situation even in our country. What about the foreign trade of the Dominion? We were doing an enormous trade with the United States and with Great Britain and with a great many other countries and it happened that of all the civilized trading countries in the world Canada and China were the only two that did not have a modern and uniform bankruptcy law. Complaints came to Canada from time to time from representative commercial bodies of other countries, from representatives of boards of trade and chambers of commerce in other countries, as well as from exporters of goods from other countries to Canada complaining of the unsatisfactory state of the bankruptcy law of this country. Foreign firms were in some instances averse to extending mercantile credit to Canadian merchants by reason of the uncertainty which prevailed in regard to bankruptcy legislation in Canada.

The only legislative authority in Canada having constitutional power to pass a bankruptcy law is the Dominion parliament. This is settled by the express terms of the British North America Act. And the question arose whether this parliament should attempt to remedy the difficulty and pass a uniform law in regard to bankruptcy and insolvency throughout the whole Dominion, or whether we should permit nine attempts to create bankruptcy legislation in the various provinces of the Dominion none of which had any strict constitutional right to pass such enactments. Parliament took the view that it was proper to have a uniform law upon the subject. The framers of the British North America Act in 1867 thought the Dominion parliament was the proper legislative body to deal with such a question, and power was given expressly to this parliament to do so. This parliament in 1875 passed such an act. That act was only in operation in Canada some five or six years at the most and then, in the judgment of parliament, it was repealed. It was held that the administration of that act had not proved satisfactory; and if one will read the debates in parliament at that time he will see that the chief complaint against the administration of the act of 1875 was the charge that the trustees or, as they called them in those days, the official assignees in insolvency, were incompetent men, also that they were irresponsible men, that time and time again the estates of a debtor had gone into the hands of an assignee and that was the last heard of it—the assignee through himself and his friends, managed to eat up the whole of the estate; there was nothing left for the creditors. That was the chief ground of complaint against the act of 1875. The act was repealed. We had no bankruptcy act in Canada from the year 1880 down to the year 1919 when the present act was passed.

The bill which became the act of 1919 was introduced into parliament in the year previous. A special committee of this House, upon which sat representatives from every province of the Dominion, worked, and worked diligently, upon this whole question. Twenty-four meetings of that committee were held; I had the honour of presiding over the committee and I know whereof I speak. We worked long and we worked late, and at the end of the session we were able to bring in a bill which was in the nature of a draft measure. In order that parliament and the country might have time to digest it, the bill was only allowed to go to its second reading. An enormous number of extra copies of the bill were ordered to be printed so that they might be circulated from one end of the Dominion to the other. Copies of the bill were sent to all the provincial legislatures, to the law officers of the Crown in all the provinces of Canada, to all the mercantile bodies of standing in the Dominion, to all the boards of trade, all the chambers of commerce, all the legal associations, to the banking associations, to labour organizations, to the wholesale and retail associations of traders; and I may tell the House likewise that representatives of nearly all of these bodies appeared before the committee and submitted their views, and I do not remember that any single individual, or any body of individuals, offered any objection to the principle of the bill—that is, that we should have a uniform Bankruptcy Act in Canada. Of course we differed—differed very radically from time to time—as to many of the clauses of the bill. In 1919 the bill again came before parliament. During that session the legislation was threshed out in this House clause by clause, item by item. Amendment after amendment was offered, and amendment after amendment was accepted. The desire of parliament was to secure the best bill and the most uniform bill that it was possible to secure in order to meet the varying conditions throughout the Dominion without infringing more than was absolutely necessary upon the local enactments of any one of the provinces. We considered that we had been able to report a fair and reasonable measure under all the circumstances—not by any means a perfect measure; no one dreamed that a perfect measure could be produced in either a year, or two years, or three, or four, or five years, and so experience has shown since the act was passed. Imperfections have developed from time to time. In Great Britain the bankruptcy act is frequently amended. So also in the United States, and I assume also in the countries of Europe where they have had bankruptcy legislation for generations back. I do not believe that any great measure of general application can be passed at a session of this House and remain as a perfect model of legislation for any number of years to come; it will have to be amended and altered from time to time. I find that during the last twenty odd years the Dominion Lands Act has been amended, I think every year; the Railway Act has been amended almost from year to year. Not so with the Banking Act, because we revise that every ten years; but I believe the present Bankruptcy Act will have to be altered from time to time for the next one hundred or the next one hundred and fifty years; it will have to be amended to meet changing requirements, the changes in our conditions, and the changes in our methods of trade.

Now, if my hon. friend who introduced this motion desires to get any concrete results from it, what I submit to him is this: He should bring in his proposals in the nature of a bill to amend the act. He has gone over the act from end to end; he has criticized it here, criticized it there, and criticized it in the other place; but he has left us no concrete proposal as to its amendment. If he would merely come before parliament—perhaps he could not this session but at any rate next session—with a bill to amend the act in the various sections concerning which he seeks amendment then the House, I think, will be in the position to discuss the question intelligently. But I am satisfied from what I know of the bill, from what I know of the temper of the House and the views of hon. members, that the House will agree, by a large majority, that the principle of the legislation is good and should be maintained. Although the details of the act may require a large amount of amendment to make it more workable there is this to be noted, that outside of the province of Quebec I do not think there has been any serious objection raised to the act itself. We had the advantage of advice from the province of Quebec with respect to this act, when it was before the committee in 1919. We had the assistance of the Bar Association; and many eminent and well known men from that province also advised the committee upon various questions. We had resolutions from chambers of commerce and boards of trade in the province of Quebec as well as from all the other provinces, and the committee endeavoured as best it could to put the ideas of those experienced bodies and able legal minds into legal form in the various sections of the act as they now appear upon the statute book. I have heard considerable criticism regarding the administration of this act in the province of Quebec, the criticism that my hon. friend has voiced to-day—that there are too many trustees in that province. I heard it stated within a few hours—not by my hon. friend but by another hon. member of this House—that there are ever 170 trustees in the Quebec district alone—

Mr. JACOBS: In the city of Montreal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the city of Montreal alone. Well, that is far beyond what anyone expected when the act was passed. We took particular pains in regard to the question of the appointment of trustees. We thought we safeguarded that branch of the act pretty well. We provided that no man should be appointed a trustee unless he possessed qualifications which would fit him for the office. In addition to that he was bound, in the first instance, to give a bond for $10,000 before he was appointed at all. In the next place there are provisions which safeguard the estate and creditors and compel the trustee to give bonds for every dollar that goes into his hands. These were clauses which were added in view of the experience which we had under the act of 1875; and the main idea was that only outstanding, capable, qualified men, who could give this security would be appointed to this office of trustee, as well as trust companies which had been incorporated in Canada for the purpose among other things of acting as trustees in the case of insolvent estates. I was amazed to-day to hear that there are some 170 or 165 trustees in the Montreal district alone. I was under the impression that if there were twenty-five or thirty that number would be quite sufficient to do the whole business of that district and do it well.

It has been intimated by the mover of this resolution that in the province of Quebec abuses have sprung up in the matter of fees on the part of trustees and also of the legal profession. If this is true it is in direct contravention of the provisions of the act—

Mr. JACOBS: Hear hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And some one should be brought to account. That act prescribes what trustees and lawyers may take lawfully. If they take more, they take it unlawfully and they should be prosecuted for so doing under the terms of the act itelf. The terms of the act in this respect are as plain and express as language could make them. The act fixes the percentage which may be taken for the cost of administering an insolvent estate, and if these particular sections of the act are transgressed in the province of Quebec as intimated by my hon. friend it is the only province with respect to which I have heard such a complaint made. My hon. friend in his address this afternoon had good ground, I fancy, for the statement he made, but I personally have not yet heard of any charge of this nature being made in any other of the provinces of Canada. I know there has been criticism in regard to the various details of the act from almost all the provinces of this Dominion. The Department of Justice may have received many complaints which have not come to my knowledge. If my hon. friend because he has evidently made a study of the act and knows whereof he speaks, would devote some of his time to preparing an amending bill with the assistance of the law officers of the Crown, and would introduce it into the House we would then have concrete proposals as to amendments, and the House could intelligently deal with the whole subject. I agree with him that the subject is big and important enough to take up some of the time of this House, and if the act can be made more workable, more satisfactory in Quebec, Ontario, and the rest of the provinces, by all means let us try to make it so. But I do not think my hon. friend has made out any case for the repeal of the enactment, greatly as he has impressed upon hon. members the necessity for some important amendments. I congratulate the mover of this resolution for the very able and painstaking manner in which he has presented this somewhat intricate and involved question to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, when the Bankruptcy Act was introduced in 1919, I believe I was the only member of this House to protest against the passing of such legislation. My protest at that time was based on five main reasons. The first was because I thought it would open the door to fraud and dishonesty. The second one because I was of opinion that it would disorganize trade and commerce. My third reason was because the law was made applicable to non-traders, and I thought at the time it was bad legislation to apply a law of bankruptcy to non-traders. My fourth reason was because it was an infringement on civil rights. And my last reason was that I was afraid that the government would practically destroy the benefits of the law by appointing political partisans as trustees.

The experience we have had with this law for two years and a half confirms the fears that I expressed at that time in the House. The law has been in force for a little over two years. Parliament has already made ninety-two alterations; complaints are coming from all parts of the country, and for the same reasons as I gave in 1919 against the adoption of the law, I support the resolution of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). I do not say that I would go as far as to repeal the law in its entirety. If the other provinces of confederation are willing to keep the law in the statutes, let them keep it. We have had on our statute books and we still have a law existing from 1880, or over forty years, a law on abandonment of property, a law which has been tested and which has been found to be a good law. It has been practically abolished by the federal Bankruptcy Act. We want to go back to that law. There is no necessity for uniformity in a bankruptcy law. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who spoke before me stated that he was in favour of the principle of a uniform bankruptcy law, but I did not hear him give any good reason for that. The reasons he gave were that we needed a law that would be applicable in all the provinces, so that merchants in any province would know what kind of law existed throughout Canada, and they could reach their creditors. If his reasoning was good, we should say that most civil laws should be the same in all the provinces. Why? The civil laws are very close to trade and commerce. Trade and commerce is within the purview of the federal government, I will admit; but most civil laws are applicable to trade and commerce in every province, and when for instance a trader or a merchant in Vancouver or in Winnipeg sells to or buys from a merchant in Montreal, he is under the civil laws of Quebec as regards his sale or his purchase. If uniformity of the law is a matter which is absolutely desirable, we should make it applicable, not only to the bankruptcy law, but to all the laws

[Mr. Archambault.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: The framers of our constitution boldly stated and enacted that bankruptcy should be applicable to the whole Dominion, and they gave this parliament the only power to deal with the subject.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That may be true; but my hon. friend will also admit that under section 92, subsection 13 of the British North America Act, civil rights are within the purview of the provinces. My hon. friend will also admit that in enacting a bankruptcy act, he can scarcely avoid touching on civil rights.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is right.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I believe I can show to the House that many of our civil laws have been touched and altered by the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. member not know that under the British North America Act the provincial authority has no right at all to legislate on bankruptcy?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That may be true in principle; but the act has been on our statutes for forty years, and if it had been such an infringement of the British North America Act, I am sure the matter would have been raised before. The law has been on our statute books since 1880, and the question has never been raised. The reason why it was never raised was because bankruptcy matters were too close to civil laws and civil rights.

The hon. member for South Wellington also stated that, with the exception of China and Canada, there was no country in the world which did not have a uniform bankruptcy act. My hon. friend will admit that in all those countries, if there is a uniform Bankruptcy Act, it does not apply to non-traders. Outside of Canada, there are in the world only two countries at the present time, where a bankruptcy act applies to non-traders, and those countries are Britain and the United States. In France, Belgium, and all the other countries of the world, there is a certain bankruptcy law which is not at all dissimilar to ours; but it does not apply to non-traders. It is illogical to apply a bankruptcy law to non-traders for whom credit is not essential. My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) also stated that the chief complaint against the law of 1875 was that the assignees, who are now called the trustees, were charging too much, and that therefore the law was abrogated. We have the same complaint to-day. I have in mind a case in which the total assets payable to the creditors amounted to $700 while the costs came to $1,600. My hon. friend went on to say that there was no complaint outside Quebec, which was the only province whence there came any word against the Bankruptcy Act. I might read to the hon. gentleman what Mr. Detchon, the manager of the Canadian Credit Men's Association, has to say on this subject. He is the gentleman whom I may call the power behind the throne, the one who inspired the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and my hon. friend for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). Speaking in Winnipeg on October 4, this gentleman stated, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of that date:

> The law as it exists at present is on the side of piracy, it is claimed, by the men who have been close to its operation, and the manoeuvres of a portion of the trading community who have been quick and sharp to take advantage of its weakness. Where one class of the retail trading community can buy in their own stocks at fifty cents on the dollar or less, it is extremely difficult for the efficient, honest trader to continue to compete with any fair degree of success.
> "Gentlemen, take 45 cents on long term payment or you get nothing," is the word passed by the wholesale traders in many instances. Along with the report on a long list of cases it is pointed out that 9 per cent of the men reported on have bought fine residences, run high-priced motor cars, and many keep their families at the beaches for the summer.

This complaint does not come from the province of Quebec; it comes from the manager of the Credit Men's Association, who lives, I believe, in Winnipeg, and who, practically speaking, is the father of this legislation. After having studied the act and the way in which it has operated, he finds just what I have quoted him as having said. The other comment offered by my hon. friend for South Wellington was that there were too many trustees. He told the House that he did not know that there were as many as 145 or 130 trustees in the city of Montreal, and added that during his administration good care had been taken to name as trustees only men who were reputable. Well, I have here a return to an order of the House dated April 26, 1921. I had asked this question:

> What are the names of the trustees under the Bankruptcy Act for the district of Montreal? When were they appointed, and what were their respective occupations before their appointment?

In reply to this question I find, to my amazement, especially after the statement of the hon. member for South Wellington, that from July 6, 1920, to December 26, 1921, the old administration had appointed in the district of Montreal alone 118 trustees. I do not believe, therefore, that my hon. friend's statement, that he thought there should be only 25 trustees and that we should take good care to name only men of good reputation, is worth very much.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does my hon. friend know of any case where an application was refused when the applicant was prepared to put up a bond of $10,000?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, I did not inquire into that; I did not investigate. But the fact remains that we have the statement of the hon. member for South Wellington that 25 trustees would be sufficient for the district of Montreal, and as opposed to this we have the proof that during the administration of the late government, of which he was a member, they named 118 trustees for that district.

Mr. SHAW: What is the objection to the appointment of any number of trustees so long as they qualify under the provisions of the act? Is there any more objection to that than there would be to the appointment of a large number of justices of the peace?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, there is an objection, because there should not be too many trustees appointed to take care of a limited amount of business. It is obvious that if there were sufficient business for five or ten trustees, say, and you appointed only that number, they would not try to obtain all sorts of business; by all means they would not go after people and try to make them assign. The state of affairs in the province of Quebec, whatever it may be in any other province—and I do not know that it is not the same—is simply amazing and outrageous. The other day a reputable lawyer of Montreal, Mr. Calder, in an address before a business men's association on the Bankruptcy Act, produced partnership agreement which he showed to his audience and the last paragraph of which read as follows:

> In case of bankruptcy profits will be divided equally.

I could bring before the House many typical cases, and especially one in the district of Montreal, where the trustee went after a certain person in a rural district against whom there was a judgment. The trustee wrote this man a letter and in reply the gentleman came to Montreal to his office. The trustee told him that he knew the person who had the judgment against him and that he could probably make a settlement or obtain a certain delay for the payment of the debt or the satisfaction of the judgment. Here the party who came to the trustee was not a very well educated person, he was ignorant of the law and was under the impression that this trustee was really trying his best to get a settlement for him with that creditor. The trustee inquired into the man's business, and after getting from him a list of his creditors he requested him to sign a paper authorizing him, the trustee, to interview the principal creditor who had taken judgment. A few weeks later the man found that he had signed a demand in bankruptcy and that a petition had been made on that demand.

Mr. BOYS: Was the assignor in that case actually insolvent? If so there was no great harm done.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No. But even if he was insolvent I submit that harm was done him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was the so-called trustee prosecuted under the criminal code?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The case is pending in court. I will read to my hon. friend the letter which the man received. This is a translation of it:

Dear Sir,—At the present moment we are going through a very difficult crisis and we find that a great many business men who have been in business a number of years are forced to make certain compromises with their creditors in order to maintain their business. Probably you, as do many of your confreres, need somebody to settle your affairs with your creditors. Do not be afraid to come and see us. If you want to maintain your trade at its maximum and to also maintain your previous standing, you have to avoid failure or bankruptcy. We are making a specialty of arrangements of all sorts between creditors and debtors. If the matter interests you, you can come and see me, or I will come and see you myself and give you a full explanation regarding this proposal.

Well, naturally this man, having done his best to obtain some delay from his principal creditor and having failed, was delighted to receive such a letter. He went over to that party, who was not a trustee, and was directed by him to the trustee, but he was always under the impression that the trustee who spoke to him was the party who had written the letter. He went over and, as I related before, he was made to sign a demand of abandonment. A petition was made by the court, and a few weeks later a meeting of his creditors was called. I may say that this man came to see me and told me his story, and I directed him to another lawyer. This lawyer made a contestation, which is now pending in court. No doubt criminal proceedings could be taken, but I do not think it would be wise to do so before judgment is delivered on the case in the civil court.

My hon. friend for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has covered the ground pretty well and there remains little further to be added so I will shorten the remarks I had intended to make. He stressed a point which in my opinion is very important. Under the Quebec law, as he stated, which we had for forty years, a debtor could never get his discharge. He was allowed to resume business after settling with his creditors for 50 or 75 per cent, but the creditors could take a judgment for the whole amount of their debts and collect if they desired to do so. The result was that after having made a compromise with his creditors, if on a second venture he made money these creditors could collect the balance owing them. But the present law is a direct encouragement to gambling. The merchant or manufacturer takes all kinds of chances, he may indulge in the wildest speculation, but he need not care if he does not make good, because under this bankruptcy law he can settle with his creditors for 40 or 50 per cent and start all over again, as many times as he likes.

My hon. friend for Charlevoix-Montmorency has also mentioned the various clauses in our Bankruptcy Act which infringe on the Quebec act. As I stated in my opening remarks, I do not contend that this parliament has no power to legislate on bankruptcy, but I do submit that when the law of bankruptcy is so closely related to civil rights, the Dominion parliament should be very chary about legislating in this matter. For instance, we had our old law governing the relations between lessor and lessee. Under the Bankruptcy Act the lessor has practically no protection when his lessee becomes bankrupt; all he is entitled to is three months' rent due. The trustee can take over the store, sublet it to a third party, even if there is a clause forbidding same in the lease, and the lessor has simply to acquiesce in the action of the trustee. Under the old act of Quebec, the fact of a lessee becoming bankrupt or abandoning his property automatically cancelled his lease, and the lessor was entitled to twelve months' rent due, if it was in arrears for that length of time; he was entitled further to damages for four months where the failure occurred four months before the expiration of the year, and to damages for twelve months if not.

As I said before, it may not be necessary to abrogate the law in its entirety. If the other provinces are satisfied with it, we have no objection to their taking that view. But as I have pointed out, for forty years we have had a very complete law, a law that has been tested and found good. The present federal law was passed upon the demand of the western provinces, and I believe it should be amended at least in such manner that it will not be applicable to the province of Quebec.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I think the importance of this resolution demands the attention of all hon.

members of the House. The proposal is double-barrelled in its character; it asks for an amendment and it alternatively asks for abrogation. It is apparent from the remarks of the proposer (Mr. Casgrain) that he desires that the law should be abrogated.

It is not my intention to repeat any of the arguments or observations that have been made by previous speakers, but I may say that from the point of view of the people of British Columbia—and I believe the same idea prevails very largely in the prairie provinces—we are much better off with the Bankruptcy Act than we would be without it. The purpose of the act, as I understand it, is not to enable debtors to go through crooked forms of liquidation, but to preserve the assets of crooked debtors for the benefit of honest creditors who have lent them money or given them credit on goods. In just cases the law is such that through the courts and the ordinary administration of justice it is possible to enable perfectly honest debtors who, through unforeseen circumstances or other causes entirely beyond their control, have got into difficulties, to obtain a discharge from the courts and to start afresh with a new hope and a new opportunity, whereas the old law made the debtor under such circumstances a slave to his creditors and his community and the victim of unforeseen or unwise acts. Not only does the bankruptcy law preserve the assets for the creditors and ensure a larger measure of justice to the debtor, but I believe it is the best method of liquidating the estate of a debtor at the least possible cost. Then again, the bankruptcy law maintains uniformity and makes for stability in trade and commerce.

That the present law needs amendment is apparent to any lawyer who has had practice under it. But what have we as an alternative? As hon. members seeking to discharge the responsibility of legislators and not catering to whims or to votes—and we do not do such things—I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if you abrogate the bankruptcy law you revert to the legislation which is still on the statute books in many provinces. I will take the case of British Columbia, because I am familiar with that province, and I would ask hon. members who are interested in this bankruptcy law to give attention to the remarks which I will make with respect to conditions prevailing before the Bankruptcy Act came into force. In British Columbia, if a man found himself in serious financial difficulties, three courses were open to him. He might sit down and allow his judgment creditors to rush in and sell him out, with others tumbling after as fast as they could. Or if it were a company, it would go into voluntary or involuntary liquidation under the Companies Act. Or if it were an individual, he might take advantage of the Creditors and Trustees Act whereby he would assign all his goods, all his property real and personal, to a trustee, who would handle them for the benefit of the creditors. The result was that men who took charge of estates were often in league with the debtor, were often not competent, not honest, not qualified to handle the assets. Then, the expense was great; the fees for liquidation and for legal services ran into enormous sums. I cite to the House the case of the Dominion Trust Company, with which many hon. members may be familiar, in which in one year, I believe, the law fees—not for litigation, but merely in connection with the liquidation of the estate—ran up to $28,000 or $30,000.

Under these old provincial acts we also have uncertainty so far as the position of the debtor is concerned. He could never be discharged from his liability; even if he were an extremely honest man he may have been confronted, as sometimes occurs in the lumber business, with an unforeseen and unpreventable disaster—for instance, a fire sweeping his timber areas and destroying everything he possesses from the business point of view. He puts himself in the hands of his creditors being obliged to do so from no fault of his own. What is his position? He is condemned for life so far as his activity in the business community is concerned; he can never get on his feet except behind the skirts of his wife or under the guise of an incorporated company. And even then he would not be safe; he has a hopeless future. Now, the purpose of the bankruptcy law was to give the honest man who is the victim of circumstances an opportunity to commence his business life over again.

The hon. member who proposes this resolution drew attention to certain abuses in connection with it whereby it was made easy for a man to avoid his obligations; whereby trustees facilitated liquidations under the Bankruptcy Act with the result that there were crooked and dishonest transactions. Well, my contention is that that would happen no matter what law you put into force in connection with bankruptcy. Where men are willing to be dishonest, where they have no respect for their character or their reputation and will employ crooked methods, then the law does not count for very much, unless it be the criminal law,—and it will be found that in the Criminal Code the attempt at fraud to the advantage of the perpetrator, either as affecting money or credit, is amply covered. So that really, so far as the principle of the law is concerned, the contention of the hon. member that the act enables people to do crooked things is hardly a good argument, because they will carry out dishonest actions in other ways.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe this resolution should be rejected by the House, first because the resolution is confusing. If you adopt it, you make it possible for the law to be broken. I think the suggestion of the former Solicitor General, the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is a good one, that a measure of this kind, to be dealt with intelligently by the House, should be handled by the hon. member bringing in his amendment in specific form, so that we may know exactly with what we are confronted. If we are to vote on the principle of doing away with the Bankruptcy Act or not doing away with it, I suggest to hon. members, apart from the reasons I have given, that they look in their own constituencies and see whether or not the business, the industrial and commercial interests of. those constituencies, or the responsible people of those constituencies who are interested in the business of the district, are asking for the repeal of this act. I do not think there are many portions of Canada where you will find that such a feeling exists, and where there are difficulties existing, I believe Mr. Speaker they can be overcome by an amendement and not by a complete abrogation of the law.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (Westmount-St-Henri): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to support the resolution of the hon member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). Indeed, as aforesaid, the bankruptcy act of 1919 and its amendments do not give to the people of our country the expected results, that they constitute a source of complaints on behalf of industry and trade, and that, at last, it is desirable to abrogate them or, at least, to greatly modify them. Before starting to study certain principles, the principal basis of this law, Mr. Speaker, let us glance over the judiciary administration, with regard to its laws and its connections with trade and industry, during the epoch that has preceded the year 1919. A bankruptcy law existed in each province of confederation. Creditors and debtors recovered in the proceedings as ordered by the provincial courts of justice. These local bankruptcy laws have been carefully studied, amended when required, by the provincial legislators and were giving, indeed, legal satisfaction. Moreover, this legislation had been enacted according to provincial necessities and customs, further resembling, as much as possible, the remaining laws in force in such and such a province. On the other hand, we had the Winding-up Act applying to the whole Dominion of Canada with regard to incorporate trading companies in liquidation. Everything appeared provided for and then we believed the legislators were very wise. The creditors, always dissatisfied when becoming connected with a bankruptcy, accepted their lot without bad grace in virtue of the dividend sheet prepared by the curator or the liquidator. We, for example, in the province of Quebec, were satisfied on our part. The confusion in which we are at present confirms the past and obliges us to prefer our former situation. Our law, called "Assignment", comprising articles 853 and following, of the Quebec Civil Code of Procedure, was excellent. Any unlucky trader found justice, and the community found efficient protection. We remember, Mr. Speaker, the day when a proclamation of the Governor General, dated December 31, 1919, announced to the Canadian citizens that the Bankruptcy Act, to-day in force, and of which as enacted, we complain bitterly, would come into force on and after the first of July, 1920.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we examine this act, it is interesting to remark that, from the first of July, 1920, to June 28th, 1922, it has suffered eighty-seven amendments. In fact, it was born before its time, and its numerous amendments have served it as an incubator. And, after all, how could it be otherwise? For, constructing a bankruptcy act for the whole Dominion, without consulting the provincial attorneys-general and the legislatures directly interested in the approval and the application of this law that superseded a bankruptcy system already established in every province, was an extremely difficult move. As an experimental act, it has embraced too much. Its construction has been badly calculated, and it has had need of many braces. It now approaches three years since that law was brought into force. During this period has it given the expected results? Together with the interests of trade, of industry, with the chambers of commerce and the public in general, we do not hesitate to answer in the negative. It has disturbed the commercial population of city and country. It encourages neglect and the breach of honest and frank commercial customs. It has diminished the urban and rural credit. It contributes, finally, as applied or tolerated, to the lowering of the honesty and morality of some individuals. The blindfold partisans of the Bankruptcy Act would answer: "But the principle of the law is good; it was asked for in 1919 by various commercial institutions of the different provinces. we will remedy the abuses shown to exist. We will amend the act so as to satisfy any just claims which may be advanced by the public."

Very well, Mr. Speaker, let the act remain in our statutes, if such is the desire of the majority of the members of this House and also of this government, in which I place my trust, but, let us receive, without further delay, the wishes of the commercial and industrial world who have for more than two years watched carefully the exploitation of this unfortunate act, and suffered its disastrous effects, and this, nowithstanding the after-war crisis through which we have just been passing. Therefore, I say, let us amend the act during the present session.

The abuses come from the disposition of the act itself giving an opening to all kinds of modern procedures. It has been abused enormously, Mr. Speaker. A change is needed to reinstate confidence and good faith, on the whole, in all bankruptcy matters. And we will reach that end by applying this act only to the tradesman who has ceased his payments. In the interest of the agricultural class, it is not convenient and it is unnatural that by the general law the farmer should fall under the operation of this act.

We understand that the tradesman has some risks to face. A reduction in price takes him by surprise and the effect on his business is such that he is sometimes thrown on the street. The war suddenly stopped—happily for the nation; the immediate result for the tradesman was, for example, the collapse of prices in silks, woollens, lumber and many other articles from sixty-five to seventy-five per cent. By its very nature, trade is very often risky in peace just as in war, in spite of the good name and the capital of a well-established firm. This is why a bankruptcy act is necessary to trade.

On the other hand, the farmer—and I am speaking now of the real cultivator of the field who has farmed from generation to generation, who likes his work and acquires experience with each succeeding harvest—is established permanently. Although he encounters some risk, although he has to face bad weather, he is almost never completely wiped out.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MERCIER: Mr. Speaker, continuing my remarks, I would add that this act, in offering to the agriculturist the opportunity of assigning, is a barrier to agriculture, hindering realization of the ideals of attachment to the land, annulling the effort of the farmer to balance his budget. The attraction of the city is then very bright. The farmer has no longer the same credit at the bank; discount is often refused to him. Even those who habitually lend money on farm property dare not lend to the farmers. Since these last have the right to assign, a privilege which they sometimes use, lenders prefer to buy debentures or shares in incorporated companies, more or less good, from salesmen who invade their neighbourhood. To-day, many people prefer a scrap of green paper, nicely engraved, to the value of a farm. This is how the act is at present affecting the solvency of the farmer.

Anyone who has studied our Bankruptcy Act will agree that it is a commercial tragedy. It brings on the scene five actors who play the principal parts. These are the assignee, the authorized trustee, the creditors, the registrar and the judge. As a finale, by way of apotheosis, when the curtain falls, there is the discharge, the rehabilitation in business. We have listened, Mr. Speaker, since July, 1920, to daily representations of this tragedy throughout Canada. We are now entirely justified in asking its withdrawal or, at least, in making necessary amendments, erasing certain sections which give rise to abuses respecting trade and the general public.

What are amongst thousands, the outstanding grievances against this act? First, the assignee ought to be a recognized tradesman; he should make his assignment in the district in which he is doing business, and in the hands of one of the trustees appointed for that district. Thus the creditors would have knowledge of the failure at its beginning, and trustee and assignee would be carefully watched during their work. Too much facility of procedure in bankruptcy is to be avoided. It is surprising to note that, according to the present law, the province of Quebec—and the same is true as regards the sister provinces—forms only one district in bankruptcy matters. Any person doing business and residing at Montreal can, as he sees fit, assign at Montreal, or at Quebec, or at any other centre in the province. Really, this fact is laughable. The petition should contain the honest assent of a serious creditor, and it should not be returned except after notice has been given to the assignee. To-day the trustee always finds reasons which he judges sufficient to return the petition without notice. This manner of procedure must stop for the advantage of everyone. Moreover, under the old law, the tradesman must have kept a cash book; or otherwise, no discharge was granted. We should oblige business people to keep books according to the usages and customs of commerce. The title and privileges of trustee should be conferred only on those who are really competent. A deposit of $2,000 to the federal treasury could be required from each trustee when nominated, as a guarantee of good faith, and this, in addition to the ordinary security exacted by the said act.

The business of bankruptcy, Mr. Speaker, is, in these times, very lucrative for the trustees. We are informed by creditable persons, sometimes the victims of these fakirs, that there exists a type of bankruptcy beggar who annoys honest people who have no intention of assigning, under the pretext of advantageously liquidating their stock. A federal inspector should be appointed to supervise the operations of trustees and to examine their books. The trustees, most of the time, do not have their bills of costs taxed. This inspector would see to this matter. Each province should be allowed to formulate a table of costs and supervise its just application. If the trustee so desires, according to the law, he may have a bankruptcy sale of immovables by the sheriff of the district in which the said immovables are situated. But he is not obliged to do so. He may also sell them himself after proper notice. It is needless to add that this is the usual manner of procedure. The sheriff's sale is a notable exception. In the future, an amendment made to the act would oblige all immovables to be sold by the sheriff. In any event, the sale of immovables by the trustee should be made only after the permission of the judge has been obtained. In addition, the trustee should tell the judge why the sale is necessary.

In the application of this act, two trustees often quarrel over the possession of a bankruptcy stock. It is delightful, Mr. Speaker. We should avoid these morbid discussions by leaving to the first trustee in possession the right to look after the bankruptcy stock until such time as it shall be otherwise ordered by the judge. Besides, the nomination of a crown prosecutor to supervise the bankruptcy cases and the filing of claims, sometimes false and simulated by shady creditors, would do good work towards the cleaning. The discharge would not be so easily obtained, for the increase of claims is beneficial to those who ask the discharge. To this effect, services are rendered to the assignee at the expense of oath. Fraud would then be punished by justice in the name of the state and at its expense, because fraud punished at the cost of the individual is never punished. It is the duty of the state to be directly interested, and France gives an example to many other nations on this point. The registrar, in my humble opinion, has too much power. He refers to the judge only contested cases. All procedures, after the assignment, should be presented to the judge to be ordered as law. What an enormous amount of dishonest proceedings would thus be avoided, discovered and rejected. This would be a protection for the actual creditors who are nearly always victimized by the tortuous procedures allowed under this act.

This act is based on English law; precedents form the law. In Canada, the act of 1919 gives an absolute discretion to the judge. The matter depends on him; it is the absolutism of the judge. For instance, who decides on the discharge offered by the assignee? The judge alone. It is not the act itself which decides or prescribes the procedure. No positive law text exists on this subject. This is a grave oversight which must necessarily be remedied. If an amendment is passed in regard to the manner of obtaining, and the requirements for discharge according to principles established and stated, judges themselves charged with the administration of the present law would be very well pleased, because the law as at present constituted gives them too great a responsibility. The immovable foundation of states, says the Greek poet Pindar, is justice. The grievances of the industrial and commercial world against the Bankruptcy Act are undoubtedly true and receivable in law as in fact. This cause is just; and when a cause is just, it must sooner or later triumph. I am assured, Mr. Speaker, that it shall triumph.

Mr. BOUCHER (Yamaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I unreservedly approve the resolution of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr Casgrain), and I deem it my duty to rise in this House so as to further give him my full support. The question brought up by the hon. member is one of the most important subjects that have been debated during the present session and I hope that the House will give it their most serious consideration, which it really deserves. It purports to a law which affects the financial interests of a large number of people in this country, and the application of which has up to now given the most fatal and disastrous results.

Mr. Speaker, the principle of the Act is defective and unjust, because it aims to limit, restrict, even to do away entirely with obligations legitimately contracted. To my mind, I have always considered and more than ever do I now believe that the legislator exceeds his powers, when he adopts legislation having for effect to liberate the debtor from his debt without having entirely discharged it. There is but one person who can remit a debt and that is the creditor. It is his privilege, his right, and any parliament which, through legislation, foils the creditors of that right, abuses its powers and is guilty of a denial of justice. I am therefore opposed, as a matter of principle, to all bankruptcy laws, and I think that the late government was ill advised in enacting the one of 1919. If I may judge from the protests which arise a little everywhere, and especially in my province, against the pernicious effects of this act to every point of view, I think it should be immediately struck off the statutes of Canada. I shall not, however, venture as far as to ask for its repeal, but I am strongly of the opinion, and, my own personal experience convinces me every day the more, that it should be radically amended.

The Bankruptcy Act as understood and applied fosters dishonesty. I will go further, I shall add that it is unjust inasmuch as it protects especially the debtor, to the detriment of the creditor which it leaves at the mercy of numerous annoying and costly procedures which, in practice, prove illusive. I contend that a bankruptcy act should have for its aim to protect first the creditors, and that the right to instigate bankruptcy should exclusively belong to them. I am therefore especially opposed to section 9 of the act which allows every person without any discrimination, whose debts are over $500, to make, of his own accord, an assignment of his property to the benefit of his creditors. This section makes no exception. Everybody is permitted to make an assignment of his property; the professional man, the artisan, the farmer, the ordinary beggar—as it has already happened—may avail themselves of the provisions of this section. It only requires to be indebted to the amount of $500 or more.

I represent a rural county, Mr. Speaker, and, I am proud to say, it is one of the finest counties in the province of Quebec. In my riding there are no large industries, nor any powerful business corporations, but fertile farms dotted here and there with beautiful villages where simple virtue survives, and I believe that the principal grievance we have to make against the Bankruptcy Act comes from the section just cited. I have not the slightest doubt that if members of this House were aware of the working of this Act in rural counties, they would without hesitation amend it in such a way as to comply with the aim the legislator had in mind when it was enacted. My knowledge is based on experience. I have seen this law in operation in my district and I am sure of not exaggerating when I say that it is most depressing and demoralizing. Not only is it harmful to those who wish to take advantage of it, but it is especially injurious to the farming class whose credit it ruins, and there is a general hue and cry against what is known almost everywhere, pardon the expression, Mr. Speaker, the "damn" Bankruptcy Act.

Who are the culprits? First, I have no hesitation in pointing out the trustees of bankrupts. I am aware that there are conscientious, competent and honest trustees, but they are in the minority. I sympathize with the latter and do not refer to them. I am alluding to the majority who, lacking the virtues or qualities that I have just mentioned, do not take into account that the trustees are appointed to apply the law but they imagine and end by really believing that the Bankruptcy Act is administered for their benefit. It then becomes a race, an organized campaign in search of victims to sacrifice on the altar of authorized assignment. The trustees are on the look out day and night; they have recruiting agents and the moment they have an inkling of a person seeming somewhat financially embarrassed, they find means of meeting their intended victim, having him interviewed, proposing all kinds of schemes, verbally assign him so to speak and finally convince their victim that he had better make a clean slate of it and begin life anew, and wipe out all obligations contracted up to date. The debtor first listens, then on the spur of the moment or feeling somewhat depressed gives in, allows himself to be convinced and signs an authorized assignment. His creditors did not demand an immediate payment, they were willing to give him time; but not being consulted in the matter, they learn of the accomplished fact through a notice of the trustees requesting their presence at a meeting. In most cases, the debtor regrets his haste; he would be differently disposed a few days or even a few hours after, but the thing is done, the winding-up follows its course, the debtor's property is sacrificed, the creditors receive a year or two later a dividend of 10 or 20 per cent, when there would have been enough to settle in full with them, and the trustees who, in most cases, hardly earned previously, $1,000 or $1,500 per year, now are in receipt of cabinet ministers' salaries.

Does this description, Mr. Speaker, seem too much exaggerated? It is not. It is the true narration of the application of the Bankruptcy Act in the rural country, at least in my district and the neighbouring ones.

In my own village I came across the following case: A certain person signed an authorized assignment under the same circumstances that I have just mentioned, the transaction had hardly taken place when the person discovers his mistake; two hours later he arrives at the trustee's home to inform him that he had changed his mind, and, would he be kind enough to return the assignment. After a long discussion over the matter, the trustee consents, demanding, however, an indemnity of $200. Was it to recoup himself for the work done? No, it was to indemnify himself for the fees he would lose if this assignment was not carried out. I can name the person in question. The trustee is still in office. I intend to ask for his dismissal and I hope that it will not be refused.

Is this, Sir, an isolated case? I contend that it is not. Cases of this kind are numerous; it is the general rule. On three different occasions, when the assets of the bankrupt comprised only a property mortgaged to its full value and that the inspectors had authorized an assignment in favour of the last creditor, subject to said mortgage, I was witness to trustees demanding in advance fees amounting to $400 and $500, simply for his signature in connection with the assignment. Still there are more glaring instances. In another village of my county, a merchant, immediately after the Bankruptcy Act came into force, took advantage of it to request a composition which was granted to him, and, naturally, it is almost the invariable rule in the composition that it is followed up by an authorized assignment. The latter was not yet settled when he again made—this happened only a few months ago—another assignment and this with the same trustee. Four long years under the rule of the Bankruptcy Act. Consequences: the merchant in question has just left the village without a cent to his name. The trustee is now the registered owner of both the property and trade of the bankrupt which he is disposing of, and, I am not aware that the creditors have received a cent.

It may be said that the act provides for such abuses as I have just mentioned. In theory perhaps, but in practice it is but a disillusion. How is it possible for a creditor interested in ten, fifteen or twenty bankruptcies, to be present at all the meetings, follow the procedure, protect himself before the courts and thereby incur considerable expenses. It is not done and not possible. The trustees and the debtor are practically the masters of the situation, and the creditor has to be contented with what is handed to him, and he may consider himself lucky if he receives anything.

By keeping track of the nature of transactions which, as a rule, take place in rural districts, I am convinced that the Bankruptcy Act will be found to be the cause of serious prejudices to creditors without being of any benefit to debtors, for the simple reason that in 80 per cent of the cases, without taking into consideration the considerable charges that the trustees demand, the debtor could pay 100 per cent in the dollar if a judicious winding-up was carried out.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the abuses that I have just mentioned would greatly be reduced if all of Part II of the Act were repealed.

The highest authorities in my province have denounced this legislation, men whose names I mention in this House with a certain pride and admiration, and moreover, I feel certain of meeting the unanimous approbation of the House in saying that they are amongst those who incarnate what is most noble and best in the French-Canadian race. The Hon. Alexander Taschereau, Premier of the province of Quebec, and the Hon. J. B. Perrault, Minister of Colonization, have in the course of the last session, at the Legislative Assembly, condemned this act in the clearest possible way, and in my estimation their word is authority on such matter.

Somebody suggested exempting the province of Quebec from the application of the Bankruptcy Act. This is the best solution and I would welcome with pleasure an amendment to that effect. Up to this day the people of Quebec have been noted for their loyalty, honesty and integrity. They wish to remain loyal to their traditions and in no way do they want to be legally exempted from paying their debts. Should it not be possible to adopt this amendment, I think it would be to the purpose and beneficial to amend the Bankruptcy Act as follows:

1. That Part II of the act be so amended that the authorized assignment and the composition will no further apply;

2. That the Bankruptcy Act be only applicable to trade as in the act of 1875;

3. That the scale of fees of trustees be more clearly defined;

4. That trustees' fees be only levied on the proceeds of the sale of movables and that the immovables contribute to the extent of the costs only of sale and awarding of moneys resulting from said sale;

5. That a penalty be imposed upon trustees who, directly or indirectly, induce a person to go into bankruptcy, divide their fees or split a commission.

I do not state, Mr. Speaker, that all is defective in the present act. I am willing to admit that in certain spheres and in special cases its existence is warranted and may be useful, but I think it is capable of being amended and that these amendments impose themselves to answer to the needs of those who I have the honour to represent in this House, these fellow citizens with whom I am proud to share both their ideals and aspirations.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the resolution contemplates two things: First the abrogation of the Bankruptcy Act; second, its amendment. From what I have heard so far I would not think there is any intention, even on the part of those favouring the resolution, that the act itself should be abrogated, but rather that certain amendments should be made thereto.

There seems to be a difference between the law in the province of Quebec and that in the province of Ontario prior to the passage of the Bankruptcy Act of 1919. If I understood aright what has been said, in the province of Quebec, farmers, for instance, were not entitled to the benefit of the Assignment Act —I am not giving it its proper name under the Quebec Code. I would point out to my hon. friends from that province that in Ontario farmers have always been entitled to the benefit of our Assignment Act. Its door was not closed to anyone in financial difficulties. At any time prior to the passing of the Bankruptcy Act anyone could make a voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and the same results were obtained as under the present act, with the one outstanding difference relating to discharge.

So far I find four main objections are made to the act. The first is that it is not confined to traders and merchants as in Quebec; second, that it was born too soon; third, that assignee's costs and fees are excessive; and, fourth, that there should not be a discharge.

Why anyone should want to withold the provisions of this act from a farmer I cannot see. Happily we do not as a rule, in the province of Ontario at all events, have assignments by many farmers. But if a farmer should get into financial difficulties why should not he be entitled to make an assignment under this act just as well as anyone else, be he merchant or otherwise. On behalf of the farmers—and I regret to say that during the hard times of the last two years there have been in my own county to my knowledge four or five assignments by farmers—I am glad to think they can avail themselves of the provisions of this act and giving a proper account of their dealings with their estate and satisfying the other provisions of the act get their discharge and start off again with a clean sheet and with a new lease of business life. Under our former act this was not the case. If a man failed, and his creditors wanted to pursue him, he was up against it. The only way he could start business again was by trading in the name of a fake company or in the name of his wife.

I think it was my hon. friend from Westmount (Mr. Mercier) who said that this practically was an eight months' child—that it was born too soon, because there were too many amendments. I happen to have in my hand the Statutes of 1921 and I observe that our criminal code contains for that year twenty-four amendments—about half as many as this act. The criminal code has been the law of our land for many, many years, and if at this stage it is necessary to put through twenty-four amendments to this long established law, surely it is not going too far to put through twice as many amendments to new legislation.

In regard to assignee's costs and fees, I was very much struck by the case cited by the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault). The assets were only $600 and I think he said the assignee's fees were about $1,500 or $1,600. I am not sure whether I have repeated the figures correctly or not.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The amount that remained to be distributed among the creditors was $700, and the fees were $1,600.

Mr. BOYS: What were the gross receipts?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I could not tell my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: Of course, it is that feature which governs. In the case referred to there is ample remedy provided by the act. Under the section dealing with trustees' fees a trustee is limited to five per cent. Solicitor and counsel fees are governed by stringent provisions contained in section 67. If the estate referred to by my hon. friend amounted to only $600, the assignee's fees would be limited to $30 and the solicitor and counsel fees, even if they secured the unanimous consent required by the act, would be limited to ten per cent, or $60—a total, all told, of $90. If any assignee in the province of Quebec or his solicitor retained $1,600, or indeed anything over $90, there is ample remedy under the act and it should have been invoked, and I cannot conceive of the creditors acquiescing in these excessive charges.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The amount included all expenses, advertising and so on.

Mr. BOYS: I am, of course, only dealing with the commission and fees. We must add to those the disbursements provided for by the act. I do not think any estate of $600 would involve disbursements of more than $75, or $100 at the outside. So this was a case of gross fraud, and I am at a loss to understand why the creditors interested did not take steps to protect themselves, for the act provides against any such extortion.

It was also argued that the act is prejudicial to the interest of creditors. I cannot see how it has that effect. Certainly it does not in Ontario, for beyond the question of discharge there is no difference between our previous law and this law. As I said before, anyone can assign and get the benefit of the act. The only difference is that under the former procedure he could not secure a discharge.

In regard to discharge let me deal with some of the provisions that have to be complied with. A bankrupt will not be entitled to his discharge unless his assets are sufficient to pay 50 cents on the dollar, except in the special circumstances referred to in the section; if he has failed to keep books of account he cannot get his discharge; if he has continued to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent, he cannot get his discharge; if he has failed to account satisfactorily for any loss or deficiency of his assets or to account for his liabilities, he cannot get his discharge; if he has contributed to his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculation he cannot get his discharge; if he has given any undue preference to his creditors, he cannot get a discharge; if he has made a previous assignment, he cannot get his discharge; and last, and perhaps most important of all, if he has been guilty of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust, he cannot get his discharge. There are other provisions that I have not even read. When one views those provisions it is hard to see how any man who has not dealt fairly with his creditors, who has not been honest, can secure a discharge. If he has been honest and dealt fairly with his creditors, and through misfortune has failed, is there any member of this House who wants to see such a man go through the balance of his life as a debtor pursued by his creditors? Is it not better that when he shows he has acted honestly he should get his discharge and get off to a fresh start in life? Those were, as far as I could see, the main objections to the act.

While I am on my feet I want to say a word or two regarding amendments. I have heard it suggested that the Minister of Justice is going to introduce a bill providing some further amendments to this act, and I certainly think there is room yet for amendments. I want to refer to one or two.

In the first place, the provisions regarding the preferential claim of a landlord for rent do not seem to me to be reasonable or fair. Under the Assignments and Preferences Act under which we formerly operated in Ontario, a landlord in case of failure, if he had been considerate of his tenant—who may have had a crop failure and the landlord may have given him an extension—if there was a year's rent in arrear and a failure took place, the landlord was given a preference for one year's rent immediately preceding the time of failure. Now it is limited to three months, so if a tenant wants an extension from his landlord and there is any danger, he cannot get it for the landlord would stand to lose at least nine months' rent, and the tenant suffers accordingly. That is not fair or proper. I cannot see why if a landlord is considerate enough to give his tenant time and the tenant has the misfortune to fail, the landlord's preference for at least one year, which was the law in Ontario before, should not still prevail.

Then, under the act he is only entitled to a preference for three months under the acceleration clause, and I would like to point out to the minister the effect that has. Suppose a farm lease is dated the 1st of March, rent not payable in advance, and a failure takes place say on the 1st of June. The landlord can secure three months' rent immediately preceding failure. If the assignee retains possession, the landlord, of course, can receive rent for whatever time possession is retained, but he can only secure three months' preference after the assignment. The crops are in the ground. He could not even get them. The most he could get would be six months' rent. The crops could be taken by the assignee and for the balance of the year, namely six months, the landlord would go without his rent, for a new lease would not be effective till the following spring. If there is any thought of introducing amendments, I would strongly urge on the minister a consideration of the section dealing with the preferential claim of the landlord, both for his protection, and that of the tenant.

There is another feature to which I would refer, and that is the powers of the registrar. In the province of Ontario we have one registrar. A failure might take place in Fort William, yet practically everything you want to do in connection with the assignment has to be done in the city of Toronto where the registrar is. I am offering no criticism of the registrar at all. We have one of the most capable officers of the courts in Ontario as registrar, but I would suggest to the minister that there should be some change there. Why we should not have our assignments registered and dealt with in the first instance in all ex parte applications—simple proceedings such as examinations and so on—in the office of the local registrar or local master in each county, just as is done in connection with supreme court proceedings, I cannot see. Where we have more difficult matters to deal with we have two judges to dispense the law. If you want even to examine the debtor, who might live in Windsor, or Kingston, or Fort William, the provision of the act requires the debtor to be examined in Toronto before the registrar. Surely that is not reasonable. I want to protest against the centralization of the operation of this act in one or two large cities in any province. Let us bring the provisions of this act as close to the door of the failure as possible, because the people interested in the failure are generally within that county. I am aware that in the case of merchants perhaps, most creditors would be in Toronto or possibly Montreal, but outside of that this change that I suggest would lead to the convenience of the people interested. If there is any thought of amending the act I would therefore suggest that that feature be taken into consideration also.

For my part I heartily approve of the Bankruptcy Act, and would be very sorry indeed to see it abrogated. I do not fear that for a moment, but by all means let us get all the suggestions we can for its improvement, and in the end I have no doubt an act will be worked out which will be complete, which will be convenient, and which will be less costly than the proceedings required by the act at the present time, and will be just as fair to all concerned.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I would not have entered this debate were it not for the fact that my name has been mentioned by several speakers who have preceded me, and I feel that in justice to myself I must say a word or two in support of this Bankruptcy Act for which I am given the credit.

I may say this to my friend the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), who I think referred to the fact that the act perhaps was bad because it was introduced originally by the Union government.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I never said such a thing.

Mr. JACOBS: It may have been the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). I do not think everything that the Union government did was bad. In fact, I think the best thing they did was when they retired from the government of this country.

Mr. BOYS: Or when they accepted your act.

Mr. JACOBS: The discussion this afternoon from this side of the House, and the essays which were so beautifully read by the members from the province of Quebec, would almost lead one to conclude that they were written in the office of the Nationalist sheet, Le Devoir. I have read these statements for the last two or three years. Le Devoir has always been opposed to this measure, and the reason they claim is, that it is an encroachment upon the civil rights of the people of the province of Quebec. It is claimed by Le Devoir and its supporters that the Bankruptcy Act is an attempt on the part of the English-speaking people of the other provinces to impose upon the province of Quebec, English law; that this is the thin end of the wedge, and that before very long we may have the whole English body of law imposed upon the province of Quebec. That is frankly what is at the back of this agitation to repeal the Bankruptcy Act. I know whereof I speak, because I am a very diligent reader of Le Devoir. I do not think I have missed a number since it came out originally in 1910.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You have never improved on account of that.

Mr. JACOBS: I have improved on account of it. I always like to know both sides of the question. I like to know what the other man is saying and what he is thinking. I have given the reason for the opposition to this law. If I thought that this Bankruptcy Act was the beginning of an attempt to impose English law on the province of Quebec, I would be the very first to oppose it, for the reason that if I know any law at all the only law I know is the French civil law of the province of Quebec, and if English law were imposed on that province I would be at a loss to know what to do, because I would have to go out of active practice. It is wrong for our people in the province of Quebec to say that the act which the parliament of Canada has a right to impose on the whole of the Dominion of Canada is an attempt to take from the people of the province of Quebec their civil rights and their civil law. The British North America Act gives to the federal power the right to legislate in certain matters for the whole of the Dominion of Canada. The Bank Act, for instance, is a federal act, and the Merchant Shipping Act, the Criminal Code are also federal acts. Not only the present Bankruptcy Act but those that preceded it are federal acts. If the residents of the province of Quebec, or if the legislature or the lawmakers, or if the Fathers of Confederation from the province of Quebec, felt that a law of this kind would eventually mean that their law would be superseded by the law of the other provinces, why did they not in explicit terms say that these federal laws should not apply to Quebec? Here is a statement made by serious minded members of parliament, and eminent lawyers like my hon. friend for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and my hon. friend for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), to the effect that this law should not be made to apply to the province of Quebec. For my part I have this to say: that I would rather see the act completely repealed and abrogated than to have it apply only to provinces other than Quebec. This is something which the federal parliament has the right to impose, and so long as we have that right I say that we ought to exercise it, inasmuch as it is a measure for the general advantage and benefit of Canada.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What about prohibition?

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) always thinks in terms of prohibition. One would imagine that, with his visits to Montreal once or twice a week, he would be able to forget his troubles between those visits. What is the trouble with the Bankruptcy Act as shown by the discussion to-day? One is that the costs of the attorneys and trustees are extortionate, and another is that there are too many trustees. That is a matter which can be very easily changed by an ordinary amendment. I myself believe we have too many trustees. We have in Montreal about 150 trustees. Now 150 men cannot live in the city of Montreal on the business provided in that city or in the district of Montreal.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: How many of those trustees were appointed at the request of my hon. friend?

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. JACOBS: I will take the responsibility of saying that I suggested five or six to the Union government. Their names were carefully examined by a committee of the government which, I think, consisted of Messrs. Ballantyne and Blondin, and the appointments went through. Since our government came into power not one man I suggested was appointed. They told me they already had a sufficient number and I think perhaps they were right. As I said before, we ought to curtail the trustees to a reasonable number I should think in Monteal fifteen or twenty would be quite enough. I understand in the city of Winnipeg where they have 250,000 population and a very large district surrounding it, there are four or five all told, to take care of the needs of that district.

Mr. LADNER: On what principle or reasoning would the hon. member limit the appointment of trustees, seeing that practically all the trustees engage in other business besides that of handling liquidation?

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think they should be engaged in other businesses, but that they should give their entire attention to this work of insolvency. It is impossible for 150 men to live on the business provided in Montreal, and it is just possible that when a man cannot live honestly he perhaps resorts to other means. The complaint has been made that many of these trustees go about from place to place, particularly in the farming districts, and they seduce the righteous farmer from the path of virtue. It is an easy matter for the farmer to fall, they claim, particularly in the province of Quebec. I do not know why that should be, but it seems to me that the method has been resorted to. I say that no respectable trustee, or no man who deserves the name respectable, should resort to that sort of work. If we had fifteen or twenty proper trustees in Montreal, they would see to it that the law was properly observed, and if it were not properly observed the trustees would find themselves removed from office.

Now with regard to the question of these extortionate charges, hon. members who just preceded me referred to the statute but they did not refer to those sections which say explicitly that no trustee and no attorney shall receive more than 5 per cent of the proceeds of the estate. For the benefit of my predecessors who spoke on this resolution, and some of whom I am afraid have not even read the act, I would refer to sections 40 and 67 of the act, which provides that no trustee or no attorney can charge more than 5 per cent. If they were restricted to that rate, I do not think there would be any cause for complaint, and if the number of trustees were further restricted both these causes would be removed.

On the question of the unconstitutionality of the act, it is all very well for hon. members to rise in their seats and tell us that this act is unconstitutional. I would refer them to a number of privy council cases, where it was held that the Bank Act, the Bankruptcy Act and other federal acts which were deemed at one time to,conflict with provincial jurisdiction were found to be quite constitutional. It is not for this House to sit in judgment and declare whether the act is unconstitutional or not. If it is unconstitutional, or the House thinks it is, let the courts be applied to, and if the courts say it is unconstitutional, that is an end of the act. I know that Mr. Taschereau, the Premier of the province of Quebec, has declared that he will stake his reputation upon the unconstitutionality of this act. Well, I was very much surprised indeed to hear that statement made by the Premier of Quebec. He is one of the ablest lawyers in our province and a great constitutional authority, but I think when he made that statement he was talking more as the Premier of the province of Quebec than as a lawyer of the standing everyone knows he has reached.

A further complaint has been made against that act—not this afternoon, but I have seen it mentioned in the press and elsewhere—in regard to the loose way in which it is drafted. They claim the English in the act is not what it should be, that no person is able to understand it, and that it is so confusing that no one can make out its intent. All I can say in answer to that is, that this act is a replica of the English Bankruptcy Act passed about 40 years ago, with its amendments. All of us who practice law know that there are no better draftsmen in the world than the English in matters of legislation, and if these men who complain cannot understand what the real meaning of the act is, it is not the fault of the English in the act, but perhaps it is due entirely to themselves. I know that often there is difficulty in clearly understanding the meaning of a new statute, but it is only a question of time when these sections of the law will be interpreted by competent authority, the judges on the bench, and in due course the law will be as clear to them as it is to those who practise in England. This Act, I submit Mr. Speaker, ought to be given a chance. It has only been on the statute books about two years and a half. We cannot see yet how it is going to work out. If we find that there are abuses, later we may take steps either to repeal or to amend the act. At the present time, I submit, it should be given a chance to function, and those who are trying to administer it should be afforded the opportunity of giving it a fair show.

Another complaint that was made, was that the act is being amended all the time It is being amended, that is true, quite often, but for the purpose of improvement. The law must keep abreast of the advancing tide of public opinion. What may have been good three or four years ago may not be good to-day. We did not claim that this bill when it was draughted and submitted to the judiciary, when it was submitted to the trustees, to the trade and to others, was perfect, or that there were not certain defects in it when the measure was brought before the House. From time to time the law was amended and, as I said before, it was amended in order to improve it and not otherwise. I do not believe that the fact that the law has been amended is in itself a proof that that law is bad; the amendments made to it are for the purpose of improvement.

Now, my hon. friends who have spoken here to-day on this side have no concrete suggestion to make with regard to this act. They say that it is a vicious act and that it produces fraud; they say it is productive of dishonesty and consequently it ought to be abrogated. In what sense does this act induce fraud and dishonesty? Do my hon. friends know that there are about seventeen or eighteen sections of this act which deal particularly with fraud and dishonesty on the part of debtors; sections which practically cover every case of fraud and dishonesty. It may be that these are not invoked as much as they should be. I know what the tendency is in insolvency matters. When a bankruptcy takes place the desire of all the creditors is to get as much as they possibly can out of the wreck, which is only human, and instead of prosecuting a fraudulent debtor and sending him to prison, as perhaps they should do ethically, they are anxious to get what they can out of the estate, and that is why these people are not prosecuted. We have heard statements made here to-day by gentlemen who would seem to be acting more as attorneys for creditors, but we have not heard a single word about the debtor's side of the case. Surely the debtor has some rights also. The debtor says, when he has handed everything he owns in the wide world over to his creditors, when the estate is wound up and he has nothing further—not even enough to start with again—because no privileges are given to the debtor—and no fraud of any kind can be charged against him, "I have a right to be given another show to start off again afresh." That is the theory of the act; but my hon. friends here say "No. Once a man has gone into insolvency he should be made to pay a hundred cents on the dollar, and until he does that he cannot go into business again." The rule of the old Roman law, was that the creditor should be able to sell his debtor into slavery. If a man is not able to start off afresh and earn a living for himself and his family, but is constantly in danger of being persecuted, by the creditors, then I say, we are lapsing back to the condition under the old Roman law, and our civilization of two thousand years amounts to nothing at all.

My hon. friends on this side also say that we ought to go back to the provincial code of civil procedure, which is a law that worked for many years and worked harmoniously and successfully. Do my hon. friends not understand that under the British North America Act the provincial legislatures have no power whatever to pass any bankruptcy act; and the so-called Insolvency Act to which they refer simply consists of a scheme whereby the debtor's assets are disposed of by auction or tender and the proceeds distributed to the creditors. It is not a bankruptcy act at all; it is merely a scheme of division. The only authority that can deal with the question of bankruptcy is the parliament of Canada; and if we repeal this act then we go back to the old system whereby a man, as I said before, will have to remain under cover practically all his life unless he has satisfied his creditors to the extent of every penny that is due to them.

Now, in connection with the discharge of the debtor. My hon. friends, I trust, know that no discharge—no matter whether it is for fifty cents on the dollar or over—can be granted unless the judge examines carefully into the entire state of the debtor's affairs. My hon. friends say that this act induces fraud; that a debtor throws his assets into the hands of a trustee; he obtains a settlement or a compromise and starts off afresh. That is not a fact. Every scheme of settlement, every scheme of arrangement or compromise must be submitted to the judge. Notice is given to every creditor who is interested to appear on a certain named day before the judge to show cause why this debtor should not be given his discharge. If any person appears before the judge and points out that some fraud mentioned in the act has been committed—and there are scores of these mentioned in the act—then the judge must deny to the debtor the right to obtain his discharge. So that we have here a distinct division made between an honest debtor who obtains his discharge and the dishonest debtor who does not obtain his discharge. If this act were repealed or abrogated they are all thrown into the same category; the honest and the dishonest debtor are refused their discharge and we are just as we were before. I say, Mr. Speaker, we have now arrived at that stage in our national development where we want a bankruptcy act similar to those laws which they have in every other country in the world.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend ready to state that only honest debtors get their discharge under this law?

Mr. JACOBS: If the debtor is able satisfactorily to answer the questions put to him by the court on the day fixed when all the creditors are there—and very often they are there with an array of counsel to back them up—if the debtor is able to run that gauntlet, and the judge declares he is honest, it is not for us to sit in judgment on the debtor or on the judge, but we will have to assume and presume that he is honest.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Did not my hon. friend say a minute ago that the creditors were more anxious to get money out of the debtor than to punish him if he is dishonest?

Mr. JACOBS: I say that in certain cases it is so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In most.

Mr. JACOBS: In certain cases; but why should we protect, or attempt to protect, a creditor who does not want to protect himself? If the creditor is willing to accept a certain sum on the dollar and does not wish to prosecute the debtor, who can prosecute him? If the creditors had in their possession information which would lead to the conviction of the debtor and they refuse to prosecute him they cannot call upon us for protection. They make their own bed and must lie upon it, and it is not for us to interfere.

9 p.m. At the same time there is plenty of machinery in this act which will enable a dishonest debtor to be sent to prison.

Now, with regard to the question of the rights of the lessor, and other rights referred to in the Bankruptcy Act, which seem to have been changed from the law as it existed before the act came into force, I may say that the entire question is now before the courts to determine as to whether the parliament of Canada has the right to interefere with the lessor's claim against the trustee and against the debtor. That is a matter which will eventually find its way to the judicial committee of the Privy Council. In fact all these questions—that is the rights of the parliament of Canada as against the provincial legislatures to legislate in matters of bankruptcy—will in due course come before the judicial committee of the Privy Council and will be dealt with there. If it is found they are unconstitutional it will be so declared and we will be where we were before; but it is not for us, sitting here as the parliament of Canada, to ask that the law be repealed while these questions are before the courts. The reason of much of this controversy is that in Quebec the law prior to this act differed so materially from the law of the other provinces that it is a bit of a shock to most of us in Quebec to find that our law in these particular matters should be overruled, as it were, by the federal authorities. But as I said before, the right was given to the parliament of Canada to do this, and until that right is taken away we are only exercising that right in a logical and constitutional way by enacting a law of this kind.

Many of my hon. friends were in this House in the parliament of 1917; they will remember that resolutions were passed by every board of trade in the country, with perhaps, one or two exceptions, by public bodies throughout the entire land, by the board of trade of the city of Montreal, the most important body of its kind in Canada, by boards of trade of Toronto and other cities, in fact, even by the board of trade of the city of Quebec, beseeching us to enact a law of this kind, and we were simply concurring in the views of the vast body of the people at the time when this law was passed. I care not for the odium which appears to have been cast upon me by certain people in Quebec for my part in putting upon the statute books this particular act. My friends will probably come to see a little later on that I was right when I advocated a law of this kind for the entire Dominion. The suggestion, as I said before, of contracting the province of Quebec out of this act will meet with my uncompromising opposition, and I would much rather see the act thrown into the waste paper basket holusbolus than agree to any scheme which would put Quebec into one class and the rest of Canada into another. Such action does not make for nationhood, concord or harmony. It is true that we have on the statute books certain acts which permit Quebec in specific matters to pass its own laws. The one I have in mind is the Lord's Day Act; but surely we cannot begin to make any comparison between the Lord's Day Act and the Bankruptcy Act. The Lord's Day Act is an act for the observance of Sunday, and of Saturday, if I may say so. The act of Quebec is the most fair-minded and broadest of its kind in the whole Dominion. It declares that any person who keeps Saturday as his day of rest may work on Sunday, and that the laws and customs of Quebec as regards the observance of Sunday shall remain in force notwithstanding the federal Lord's Day Act. I should be the last one to complain about the Lord's Day Act in Quebec, because I had something to do in seeing that the proviso as regards Saturday observance was inserted in that act. You cannot compare an act which deals with the trade and commerce of this country with the Lord's Day Act. Trade and commerce is the same in every part of Canada; the other act is a matter of religious principle and observance, and we cannot think for a moment of placing the Bankruptcy Act in the same category as the Lord's Day Act. For these reasons, I shall vote against the resolution which was introduced by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and again to-night, I was charmed to hear his eloquence as he spoke on —may I say?—so difficult a subject as the Bankuptcy Act. There is however, a point as regards which I cannot agree with my hon. friend, and there is at least one assertion which he has made that I must challenge. He seems to think that Le Devoir is the guiding influence of hon. members from Quebec. In that respect, my hon. friend is altogether wrong. We read Le Devoir at least, I do; I take what good there is in it and what I think is wrong, I leave out. In this particular case, it just happens that Le Devoir has been conducting a campaign against this law, and I think Le Devoir is perfectly right in doing so. That is the reason why to-day we stand with Le Devoir. I wish also to say to my hon. friend that in opposing this law, we rest our opinions on its merits only. We are not afraid by any means, nor are we prejudiced by the fact that the English law might be introduced into this country, and more particularly into Quebec. We want laws which are just and right to be introduced into this country; but we are opposed to laws that are unjust and vicious and, in our opinion, this law is both unjust and vicious. Rightly or wrongly, I am one of those who have always opposed this law. I have made strong representations, and I have brought protests to members of this government and the preceding government. Some amendments have been brought up; but I do not think this law is subject to amendment in order to make it right and just, because the fundamental principle of the law is, in my opinion, wrong and bad. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier thought, doubtless, that he had driven a very strong point when he said that this law was simply a replica of an old law that was passed in England about forty years ago. If there is a reason why I would not have this law in Canada, it is because it is a replica of an English law, passed some forty years ago. We have had too much copying of English laws in this country. We have this law which is a copy of the English law; we have another law, which in my opinion, is bad in many respects, which is also to a large extent a copy of the English law, and that is the electoral law. In many respects the electoral law has given us sad experiences. That law, in my judgment, was drafted by pseudo-experts or reformists, whose lack of experience and ignorance of conditions that prevail in this country are exceeded only by their arrogant self-appreciation. These men have shackled and fettered the electorate of this country with a cumbersome and, in many respects, unjust law imported from England where conditions are totally different from those which prevail in this country, and to bring a law of this kind into Canada, the best argument that they have given us so far, is that it is a copy of the English law. Conditions in this country are altogether different from conditions in Europe and it is not because this bankruptcy law and this electoral law are copies of English laws that I object to them; I object to them because they are not suited to the people of Canada. I would object to them just as strongly if they had been imported from France.

While I am on this subject, I might have a word to say to my friends of the party angularly opposite. I have just said that the electoral law is bad in many respects. I will ask them what they think of that law when they consider the results that have just taken place as regards the contestation of the constituency of Moose Jaw? Is it not a fact that the hon. gentleman who was recently disqualified had, during the conduct of the election, committed no crime? I am sure many hon. gentlemen thought what that hon. gentleman did was absolutely correct and lawful. But this law, borrowed from England, has been drafted in such a way that it requires highly trained legal minds to understand and apply it. And, so long as the law stands as we have it members of parliament will, quite unconsciously, do things that are not lawful; they will be liable to find themselves disqualified for having committed acts which are unlawful, although they may not have had the least idea that what they were doing was wrong. The electoral law must be modified in many respects if this condition of things is to be remedied. I mention this only by way of comparison in reference to the argument brought forward by my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), who declares that the law we are at present discussing is good because it is an English law.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me an explanation. I said that the language was English and therefore there should be no complaint as to the form in which the law was drafted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The grammar is good.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): The grammar may be good but the law itself is mighty hard to understand, even when a clever lawyer tries to construe it.

Mr. LADNER: I do not know whether my hon. friend is a lawyer or not.

Mr. JACOBS: He is.

Mr. LADNER: But does he say that because the Bankruptcy Act happens to have been drawn on the lines of the English act, it is therefore incorrectly drawn?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My answer is that the act as presented to us is so terribly involved that it was declared impracticable, not later than three or four months ago, by the Court of Appeal in Montreal in the case of Danforth and Riordon. Both the English and the French judges expressed the view that it was unwieldy and that, if it was not repealed, at least it should be amended in accordance with common sense. That declaration was made in Montreal by Mr. Justice Greenshields, an English judge, and it was sustained by the French judges present. I was there when the statement was made. As I have just said, this law is incomplete, imperfect, and involved. It is difficult, and in some sections impossible, to understand it. But that is not the greatest of its faults.

I said a moment ago that I was opposed to the importation of laws from England, and I will go further and add this, in regard to which I do not think I shall be contradicted· it is the cardinal function of any government to give good laws to its people. I submit that this law as presented to the people of Canada, and as it stands to-day, is not a good law. When it was submitted by my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier the late government were very busy doing other things. My hon. friend for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) rose this afternoon and spoke in defence of the law, and I can quite understand his doing so if he assumes a share of the responsibility for it. It was passed practically without any discussion, and although I want to believe my hon. friend for South Wellington when he tells us that it was studied by the government at the time, I greatly doubt it. The government at that time had something else to do. For instance, they were negotiating loans for the Balkan states; they were buying railways; they were building the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. In short, they had other things to do; and this principle of giving the people good legislation was their least consideration. The Bankruptcy Act therefore passed practically without consideration. The late government, having assumed the responsibility for it, must of course defend it. They have adopted the child and naturally it is their duty to defend it and—

Mr. BELAND: And nurse it.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Exactly. Now, back to the act itself, I shall be very brief. I believe that it should be limited to traders and that people who are not traders should not be allowed to fail. Reasons have been given on this point, and I will not repeat them. Then the proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act should be held at the place of the domicile of the insolvent. It is absolutely ridiculous, as at present, to allow a man living in Ottawa to go and fail in Toronto, or a man living in Fort William to fail in Ottawa. And this condition of things exists in Quebec; these anomalies have been observed.

A third point: I would object to property which has been given as security being sold to pay the costs of an insolvent estate. In other words, where property has been given as security it should stand as such, and the liquidator or the trustee should not have the right to take the proceeds of secured property to pay the fees of liquidation. Further, I submit that there should be inspectors for each province. There is no question that several trustees have violated the law. Well, hon. members say, go after them; why do you not take action against them? Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not every day that a man is willing to lose his money in an insolvent estate, and then spend more good money taking an action against trustees. In that way, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the trustee gets away with it. I would also have the number of trustees limited. However, this is a point on which we are not all at one. As to the tariff, I think it is not clear enough. The costs are far too high, too, and the tariff should be so drafted as to avoid such cases as have been cited this afternoon.

There is another point which has not been raised, and it is this. Under the act any trustee can go before a judge and ask for an ex parte ruling. I submit that that is not right or proper. It is absolutely contrary to the laws of procedure and justice that a person interested in a bankruptcy case should go before a judge and obtain such a ruling, because no matter how just and honest the judge may be he knows the facts from one side only when an ex parte case is submitted to him, and in many cases injustice has been done. Moreover, we have seen cases in which the judge having rendered an ex parte ruling, the party who was dissatisfied with it has appeared before another judge and obtained a second ex parte ruling, overruling the first one. I say that the law is fundamentally wrong when it permits a debtor to evade his creditors. Perhaps I might mention on this point something that was said to me not later than three or four weeks ago by a Montreal lawyer. I do not know whether my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier knows him, but I will not divulge his name. What he told me is worth listening to. Speaking in regard to this law he said: "A few days ago a client came into my office. On entering he requested me to close the door. I did not know what the crime meant. I closed the door. Thereupon my client said, 'Now we are both together I have something very important to say to you. I want to commit insolvency.'" In those few words you have the gist of the situation. Here is a man who wants to "commit" insolvency. Of course, there is something in the proceeding for a great many people. By "committing" insolvency some people think they will benefit themselves to the prejudice of others. No wonder this client wanted the door closed before he asked his lawyer's advice.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose my hon. friend does not know that that is an old threadbare joke?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Well, I met it for the first time three or four weeks ago.

Mr. JACOBS: It did not reach Joliette until then?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): It is such an apposite case that I thought it well worth mentioning here. Of course, my hon. friend may have heard of similar cases in his practice and that is why my story is so familiar to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, very strong objections have been raised to this law being made applicable only to such provinces as wish to avail themselves of it. I do not see the strength of these objections. Irrespective of whether or not the parliament of Canada has authority to pass a bankruptcy law—and my hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Boucher) quoted the opinion of the Premier of Quebec that this parliament has no such right—irrespective, I say, of this right, why not let every province profit by the adoption of this act if it chooses to do so? But do not force it on the province of Quebec, which does not desire to accept this legislation. If the province of Ontario is satisfied with the law, let the authorities there retain it; the same with the province of British Columbia and with any other province which is satisfied to have this law. But when opinion in the province of Quebec is practically unanimous against this law, which is not suited to the requirements of its people, for the life of me I cannot see why hon. members should insist on forcing it on my province in direct opposition to the strongly expressed wishes of the people there.

Mr. LADNER: Would the hon. gentleman apply the same principle to all the subsections of section 92 of the British North America Act placing certain matters under the jurisdiction of the Dominion government?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My hon. friend knows quite well that the question he is asking me is not a fair question. Section 92 of the British North America Act is far too wide for him to expect me to answer his question offhand. But in any event my answer is, no. I do not pretend that everything contained in that section should apply in this case, but for nearly forty years before the Bankruptcy Act of 1919 we got along very well in the province of Quebec without any special bankruptcy law. Indeed prior to that time we had a bankruptcy act but it proved so unsatisfactory in operation that it was eventually repealed. Now the present bankruptcy law does not satisfy a large section of the people of this country. Leaving all technicalities aside, why not let us try to give satisfaction to all the people? I submit that this end can be served by letting those provinces which are satisfied with this law retain it, giving the same liberty of action to other provinces which are dissatisfied to reject this legislation.

This is a very serious question. As the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated this afternoon, complaints against the unsatisfactory operation of the act have been received from all the provinces. The hon. member said that these complaints were not against the principle of the law but against the amendments. Therefore I say again that when these complaints are so general, that when the law is so doubtful in its constitutionality, and when in the opinion of the people of Quebec it is bad in principle, why should it be forced on any province?

I have said that in the province of Quebec nearly everybody is against this law. I have before me an article which was published in the Montreal Gazette on the 5th December last. I shall not take up the time of the House by quoting it at length, but, generally, it states that the legislature of the province of Quebec was seized of the question and that the premier and all his cabinet had declared themselves against the Bankruptcy Act.

In my opinion this act should be repealed. But I would not take from my hon. friends any benefit which in their opinion this law confers on them, and, on that account, failing to have it repealed I would have its operation confined to those provinces that desire to retain the benefits which they feel they derive from its provisions. But, conversely, I insist very strongly that this law should not be imposed on a province that does not want it.

Mr. LADNER: Why should the Bank Act be imposed, then?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): We are satisfied with the Bank Act. Moreover we have no law to replace the Bank Act in the province of Quebec, while for nearly forty years we had in the code of procedure of our province a law which served us very much better than the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. MORIN: Did the old law provide for voluntary assignment?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Under the code of civil procedure there is no voluntary assignment and there is no discharge. I am not going into that subject now. Finally, in the event of this law not being repealed, or not being made voluntary in its application to each province, I would urge very strongly on the government to have the act thoroughly revised—not by the same experts who drafted it originally, but by other authorities on the law and practice of bankruptcy and in collaboration and consultation with representatives from all the provinces. I hope some results will accrue from this discussion and that we shall see a stop put to the squandering of the many millions of dollars which has gone on since the enactment of this legislation by those who have taken undue advantage of its provisions.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it will soon be a century since the legislatures of this country started trying to give to the people a satisfactory bankruptcy law, and from what I have heard during the course of this debate, which I have followed with great interest, I am led to believe that we will have to spend the balance of the century in efforts to arrive at the desideratum.

Prior to confederation the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario had at different periods legislated in regard to insolvency. None of these provinces ever passed any bankruptcy act. The province of Prince Edward Island had various statutes about insolvency, and in 1868 it adopted a regular bankruptcy act providing for the discharge of the debtor. The colony of Vancouver Island and the mainland colony of British Columbia always referred to the English law on insolvency and bankruptcy matters until they came into this confederation. It was the old province of Quebec, then Lower Canada, which was the first colony to legislate on bankruptcy. In 1839 it passed an ordinance entitled "An Ordinance concerning Bankrupts and the Administration and Distribution of their Estates." It was administered by commissioners. It applied to traders only. It provided for the discharge of the debtor, and it was based on the English law.

In 1843, under the Union, another bankruptcy act was passed. It repealed the ordinance of 1839. It applied to traders only of the two Canadas, and provided for the discharge of the debtor. Twenty-one years later, in 1864 an insolvency act, which was a bankruptcy act was passed. It applied to the traders of Quebec and applied also to all persons in Ontario. It provided for the discharge of the debtor, and was administered by official trustees.

Under the confederation the first statute passed on that subject was adopted in 1869. That statute repealed the Insolvency Act of 1864. It was a consolidation, an assimilation, of all the insolvency and bankruptcy legislation of the four provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. It repealed all the acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the legislation of 1869. The statute of 1869, as well as the statute of 1864, provided for the discharge of the debtor. In 1875 another bankruptcy act was passed. By that statute the legislation of 1864 and of 1869 were repealed; also the statute of Prince Edward Island of 1896 was repealed. So with the legislation of Vancouver Island of 1862, and with the British Columbia legislation of 1865 which were repealed with all the amendments.

From the very start of the operation of that legislation of 1875, there was an agitation in the whole of this country, an irritation which became so acute that the law had to be repealed in 1880. As you have heard many times to-day, in 1918 the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) introduced into this House a bankruptcy bill, which was very carefully studied, and distributed to the public after it had been reported from the committee, and we may properly say that this bill of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier was the genesis of the statute of 1919.

This, Mr. Speaker, is to show and to establish that we have had many experiences in insolvency legislation and bankruptcy matters. This experience of ours, our neighbours have had. They have been working for nearly a century to arrive at the legislation which they have now, and which seems to be accepted by the people of the United States. Their first legislation was passed in 1800. It was repealed in 1803. A second bankruptcy act was adopted in 1841 and repealed two years after, in 1843. Only twenty-three years later, in 1867, a third statute was adopted, which endured until 1878. The law now in force in the United States was adopted in 1898.

This, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, establishes that we have had the same difficulties in Canada that they have had in the United States on this very important question of bankruptcy. But, after listening to the very able speeches which we have heard to-day, at what conclusion can we arrive if not this, that the best we can do would be to amend the statute on bankruptcy which is now on our books? The people of Canada, I repeat, for nearly one hundred years, not only in the western provinces and the eastern provinces but in Quebec as well, have been trying to get a satisfactory bankruptcy law, and as I have told you, it was the province of Quebec which was the first province to legislate on that matter. The social and economic needs of this country, I would say, demand that we should have a uniform law on bankruptcy, and if I am a good judge of public opinion I believe that a majority of the people of Canada, Quebec included, are in favour of a bankruptcy law provided it is a fair bankruptcy law. If we were to repeal the law that we have to-day, which has been in force since 1920, on account of the abuses which have been cited to this House, then immediately after this session, or within a year anyhow, an agitation would be started in all the provinces of this Dominion to have in Canada bankruptcy legislation, as all the civilized people of the world have it. This same irritation, this same dissatisfaction which we have witnessed, would certainly result in the passing of a new law. But the day must come when in this country we shall have only one law on bankruptcy matters.

The proposition was made to the effect that we might perhaps keep on our statute books the bankruptcy law that we have, but make an exception of the province of Quebec. Is that practical? Is that advisable? Would it be wise? Would it be advantageous to the people of the province of Quebec?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the British North America Act permit that very thing?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I would not like to give an answer on that. Perhaps it may be possible, and perhaps not. At any rate I wish to say that the province of Quebec has in its territory some of the best traders of Canada. We have many important manufactures. We deal not only in the province of Quebec, but we deal all over Canada, and even supposing that we would accept the proposition put before the House, that the province of Quebec should not be under the Bankruptcy law, that law would nevertheless affect the manufacturers, merchants and all the creditors in the province of Quebec in their dealings with merchants, manufacturers and others residing in the other provinces and who might take advantage of the bankruptcy law, and I do not see really, even if we consider only the interests of the population of Quebec, what advantage we could find in accepting such a proposition.

I have listened with great attention to all the arguments brought forward in the course of this debate. I have noticed all the objections offered against the law as we have it to-day, and I must say none of these arguments, none of these objections, appeals strongly enough to me to convince me that we should repeal that law.

Mention was made of the fact that in the province of Quebec there were bills of costs which were extraordinarily high. It is possible the same thing may have happened in some of the other provinces of the Dominions, but it seems to me this is not an objection sufficient to justify the repeal of such an important law. I think it would be easy to find a remedy for such a condition. As to the right or the privilege which has been granted to the farmers in this country to take advantage of the law, even supposing the majority of this House would be disposed to accept this proposition, and to say the farmers should not be allowed to assign, this is not an objection against the principle of the law itself. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the moment that we adopt in this country a law of bankruptcy—that is to say, the right of the debtor to assign and the right of the creditor to force the debtor to assign, a law which provides for the administration and the liquidation of the estate of the debtor and provides for the discharge of the debtor under certain conditions—I cannot see very well how we could say, "because you are a merchant, because you are a manufacturer, you will have the advantage of that law, but the farmer will not; the farmer will not have the right to obtain his discharge if he is unhappy, if he has bad debts or is passing through bad times." On that point we are disposed to treat all our citizens alike. It seems to me we should not give any preference or any privilege to any class of our countrymen. We are told that some of the trustees have acted in a fraudulent manner, and that for that reason we should repeal the law of 1920. You have already been told, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very easy to find a method by which a trustee could be punished and placed in a position where it would be impossible for him to repeat the fraud. I have heard with pleasure hon. members who addressed the House and complimented the province of Quebec on the legislation we had regarding assignments. They were right. By experience I know that our law of Quebec gave full satisfaction to our people, and it was approved by all the citizens of Canada who knew of it. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we could succeed in amending our law of 1920 in such a manner that we would give to it the good character which we find in our Quebec law, and the good provisions which made it so acceptable to our population. I feel confident that the hon. members who spoke against the law of 1920 would be disposed to accept it. For my part the great source of all these troubles in the administration of our bankruptcy law is to be found in the manner in which the trustees are appointed. There are two modes of the administration of the estates of bankrupts. One is by trustees who are officially appointed by the state, responsible to the state and the state responsible for them, and the other mode is trustees unofficially appointed by the creditors, for the benefit and the advantage of the creditors. Under the law of Quebec as we had it, we had no official trustees. There was no restriction as to the number of those who wished to become trustees. Any citizen in Quebec had the right to act as a trustee. The trustee was chosen and elected by the creditors. If we could arrive at the same system which prevailed in Quebec for so many years, and which proved absolutely acceptable to the people of Quebec and to all the creditors all over Canada, I think we would have found a solution of the troubles we meet to-day. Mr. Speaker, that is the system that they have in England. I read from Duncan, Law and Practice of Bankruptcy in Canada.

> The system under the English act is a compromise between official and unofficial administration. The act provides for official receivers who act under the board of trade. Pending the appointment of a trustee the official receiver is interim receiver of the debtor's estate. He summons and presides at the first meeting of creditors; reports to the creditors any proposal which the debtor may have made with respect to the mode of liquidating his affairs; investigates the conduct of the debtor and takes part in the public examination of the debtor. After thus as it were, getting the bankruptcy proceedings under way the official receiver hands over to a trustee appointed by the creditors.

That is what we have been doing in Quebec for over twenty years, and if we were to adopt that in our act I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would give satisfaction to all the provinces of Canada. It has been suggested that instead of centralizing the administration of the Bankruptcy Act we should decentralize it. If we were to adopt the system they have in England, and that we had in the province of Quebec, we would be carrying out decentralization. The debtors would assign to the prothonotary or at the court house, and this would harmonize with the proposition which is put before the House.

I do not know what the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) will say in reply. I hope, however, that he will not insist on pressing this proposition to a vote. Even after listening to his very able address, and to all the other speeches which were delivered to-day, it seems to me that very few members would be perpared to take the responsibility of asking for the repeal of the bankruptcy law that we now have. Most of us—I will say every one of us—in this House are agreed as to the necessity of the law being amended. If the hon. member struck out the last part of his resolution and simply asked that the law be amended I am sure the resolution would then pass unanimously. For my part I would be happy to vote in favour of such a resolution as amended. At any rate, after the remarks which have been made during this very interesting debate I may say that the government is disposed to submit to the consideration of the House during the present session some amendments to the act. We will try and make them as complete as possible so that all the provinces of the Dominion will be able to say, after those amendments have been made, that the law on bankruptcy matters is acceptable to them.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): We have all, no doubt, listened with much interest to the speech of the Minister of Justice, and particularly to his resumé of the evolution of the Bankruptcy Act. I must say, however, that I do not feel that I can accept the suggestion which he made to the mover of the resolution, or rather I do not feel that if that hon. gentleman accepted the suggestion of the Minister of Justice I would be prepared to vote for the resolution in its amended form. My reason for taking that stand is, that if the words "or abrogated" were eliminated from the resolution its wording would still be very indefinite. It would then read that the Bankruptcy Act should be amended. That does not mean anything at all. It might mean amended by striking out one word, or it might mean amended by striking out the whole of the act except one word. It seems to me that we should have something more definite from the minister, that we should have some concrete proposition before us for our consideration before we could vote intelligently on any resolution of this kind.

I think the mover of the resolution was quite justified in bringing the matter to the attention of the House. I realize the fact that conditions as to the administration of this act in the province of Quebec cannot be very satisfactory. As to that, of course, I do not know the details other than what have been given here to-day. That same conditions do not obtain in all the other provinces so far as my information goes or, I should say, at least, not in the province of British Columbia so far as I am aware. We have found there that the act is being administered in a fairly satisfactory manner. To the best of my information those who were appointed to act as trustees in British Columbia were men or companies who were responsible parties, and who attempted to carry out the provisions of the act in a fair and reasonable manner. It may be that in the province of Quebec too many trustees have been appointed.

I listened, too, with a good deal of astonishment to the remarks of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault). Sometimes the hon. gentleman tries to be serious but usually he is quite the reverse, and I was at a loss this afternoon to know whether to take him seriously or otherwise. He made the statement that the appointment of trustees in the province of Quebec had been made through the exercise of political patronage. I asked the hon. gentleman if he knew of one case where an application for appointment as trustee, properly supported by the necessary bond, had been refused and he said, "no", and that he had not made an investigation into that feature at all. But he had a lot of cases that he referred to in other connections, and it seems to me that if there had been such a case the hon. gentleman would have known about it. My information is that appointments were made in all cases where the trustee, or the proposed trustee, would provide a bond for $10,000 to properly administer his duties. I had occasion, I remember, at one time to make inquiries as to what the requirements were to obtain an appointment under the act, and I was told that there was no restriction whatever, absolutely none, but that anyone who applied and put up this bond could be appointed. Well, that principle may be objectionable, and apparently it has worked out in the province of Quebec in such a way, according to hon. members who have spoken, that too many trustees have been appointed. But it is not a case of political patronage at all, there is no political patronage about it, and I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member make the accusation on such a flimsy foundation.

I listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis). I always listen to the hon. gentleman with interest. I feel that invariably he is sincere and in most cases I have found him to be reasonable. The hon. member is always fair in his arguments, is usually rather convincing, and generally has grounds for every proposition that he submits. I was therefore surprised to-day to hear the argument that he advanced against this act. He stated that the act should be repealed because it was draughted along the lines of an English act. He seems to wish to have the House think it was a good and sufficient reason for asking for the repeal of any act, that it was made in England, as it were, or that it was modelled after an English act. That is a very surprising proposition to me. I thought in this country we got most of our good models of law from England; that they were always safe guides for us to use. Indeed, I think both my hon. friend and myself found in our practise of law that the English law is pretty good; that English cases are pretty sound; that English precedents are very reliable, and that when we follow them, we are usually on safe ground. The hon. member departed somewhat from his customary course, and he got lost in the fog, or something of that kind, when he touched upon that subject. I see that he is smiling now; I am sure that he has come to his senses again, and that if he had opportunity to do so, he would withdraw that as a ground of opposition to this particular law.

10 p.m.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Has the hon. member ever heard of the Code Napoleon?

Mr. McQUARRIE: The hon. gentleman sees fit to be facetious again.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, I am most serious.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is hard to tell. My hon. friend, rightly or wrongly has earned the title of comedian of the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: He has a few rivals.

Mr. McQUARRIE: One always expects something funny from him. He has some qualifications which are, perhaps, superior to those of other hon. gentlemen in this House. We have all heard of the great comedian who would stand up before an audience, and the audience would immediately, before he had said anything, burst into a roar of laughter. My hon. friend, possibly, has a qualification such as that, and we are glad to hear him. Everybody enjoys seeing him in the House, and everybody enjoys his little jokes.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Will the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. McQUARRIE: He is very funny I know.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My hon. friend does not know what the Code Napoleon is. I am glad to know that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Perhaps my hon. friend would like to hear some more recommendations of himself, but I am afraid I have complimented him enough for one evening. I entirely agree with those hon. gentlemen who have stated their adherence to the policy of uniformity of laws in this Dominion of ours. We must all appreciate the movement which is now on foot, in which you, Mr. Speaker, are playing some part, which is tending towards bringing together the people of Canada for the welfare of this great Dominion. It would be a mistake, particularly as regards such an important matter as this, to have one law in Quebec and another law for the other provinces. Some hon. gentlemen, and particularly the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis), put this query to the House: Why should we in Quebec be forced to take something that we do not want? Of course, that would be a hard question to answer if his facts were correct. After listening to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), I am forced to the conclusion that it would be going a little far to say that the people of Quebec, as a whole, are asking for the repeal of this particular enactment. I do not think that can be shown, because, if I remember correctly, the act was originally introduced by a Quebec member, and when it came up during the last parliament and prior to its being passed, there was plenty of time for objection to be made to it. If I remember correctly, the province of Quebec was not as a whole opposed to it in fact, I do not remember that there was any very strenuous opposition from Quebec. But in Quebec, as in other places, there were strong and urgent demands for the passage of such a law. That is as far as my memory goes. I know there were strong demands from other parts of Canada, and those demands were based on the fact that there was so much diversity in the matter of assignments and the winding-up of estates by reason of insolvency, that business concerns which did business in a big way, were unable to tell, with any degree of certainty, exactly what the real conditions were.

I am not going to go over the ground at any length; but I think I am safe in saying that there was on the part of the business people of Canada a very strong demand that there be a uniform bankruptcy law, and this law was passed as a result of that demand. Why should we repeal the law altogether? Why cannot we rather have put up to us in concrete form some amendment or amendments which will meet the difficulties which have been encountered, so that they may be considered, and then I am sure it will be possible, as the Minister of Justice says, to work out an act that will be satisfactory to the province of Quebec? Why should the act be repealed? Personally, I am opposed to its being repealed, and I am also opposed to voting for a resolution which calls for the amendment or the repeal of an act. We should either have certain amendments or the repeal of the act proposed; then either proposition would be open for anyone to vote on, and I would certainly vote against the repeal of the act.

Something has been said about the costs being excessive, and it may be that in some cases the costs have been excessive. But, as I say, that is also a matter that can be remedied. If the costs are too high surely we can put into the act a schedule of costs that would be satisfactory to those who are complaining. But it seems to me that the real objection to the act, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, is that too many trustees have been appointed, and that these trustees have been endeavouring to get business for themselves, and consequently have created difficulties which have given rise to this agitation. Well, that also is a matter that can be remedied. It would be possible, surely, to revise the list of trustees appointed for the province of Quebec, and more particularly for Montreal, if there are too many there, and reduce the number. To my mind that would meet the situation. I believe that after the courts have had time to interpret the act, after the law has become settled, and after the necessary amendments have been made, we shall find that the act will work smoothly enough and that it will be more satisfactory to have one uniform bankruptcy law for the whole of Canada than that there should exist such a condition as we had prior to the passing of the act.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to speak briefly on the resolution, and in doing so I shall approach the subject from my limited experience of the working of the act in the province of Ontario. I hope, however, that in dealing with it I shall not consider it from a provincial standpoint, but that whatever I may say will have reference to the matter upon the national scale and with a view to the benefit of Canada at large. Now, the resolution makes two attacks on this piece of legislation, and it appears to me that these attacks are somewhat inconsistent. First, it suggests the repeal of the act; and then, as if the mover were not confident as to the advisability of that, it proposes an amendment to it. There is considerable inconsistency in the proposition outlined in the resolution itself. We cannot overemphasize the importance of uniformity in our bankruptcy law in Canada. Our commerce has become very widely extended, and in my own limited experience I have found great difficulty in advising a creditor with respect to his rights when he was carrying on business in all the nine provinces of the Dominion under the old system. In the case of insolvency in one province, his rights would be governed by the laws of that province, and in another province his rights might be altogether different. The result was that we had nine different rights in the Dominion of Canada, all in connection with one situation, that of insolvency. We have been endeavouring through our Dominion Law Association to bring about uniformity in the laws relating to matters of this kind, and this surely is one in regard to which it is very important that there should be that uniformity which this statute provides. I cannot understand any reason why all classes of the community should not be free to take advantage of the act; I cannot see why the farmer should not be as free to assign and get a discharge as is a trader and do not think that anything has been said in support of that contention that requires any answer. I submit that after listening to the clear, complete and concise review of the situation by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) the answer to the resolution has been provided, and nothing can be added to what he has said. This legislation was not hurriedly introduced; it was preceded by a long campaign of education, and after representations had been made from different parts of the country in favour of a Dominion insolvency law. The act has many advantages. It has the advantage of uniformity, and a creditor knows his rights to be the same in all provinces. It has made a good beginning and has worked well in the province of Ontario. No person contends that it is perfect; it does need some amendment, and the weakness of it is particularly striking in its tendency to centralization. That was pointed out by one of the preceding speakers and a remedy was suggested. If there are any features in the law of the province of Quebec, as it existed prior to this act, that are better than the law we now have, or that are an improvement upon it, then by all means let us have them and embody them in the act. There will be no objection to them on the ground that they come from the province of Quebec, for we wish to make the law as perfect as we can. I am sure that it makes for a common citizenship to have a law of this kind. I am strongly opposed to the repeal of the act, but am in favour of its amendment in every respect that will make it more workable, that will improve it, and that will meet the defects which experience from time to time shows that it possesses. For that reason I am opposed to the resolution in so far as it asks for the repeal of the act, while I am in favour of the suggestion of the Minister of Justice that it be amended.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before the debate is concluded I might offer a few remarks. I should not like the resolution to be voted upon without putting before the House this fact, that the resolution is not submitted because the province of Quebec, from which I come, is afraid of any invasion of English law under the new system. But the debate that has occurred to-day must have shown conclusively to every hon. gentleman that there are undoubtedly real defects in the law; and as was pointed out by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier, the act is nothing but a replica of the English law. We are not afraid of having certain provisions of the laws of other countries embodied in our law, provided that under all circumstances the rights of each and every province of this Dominion be properly safeguarded and protected. And that is why in the remarks I made this afternoon before closing my address I requested the hon. the Minister of Justice to see to it that in all cases the laws of the province of Quebec should be respected, and the rights of the people adequately protected. In view of the clear address of the minister and the sound views he expressed regarding the question of the abrogation of the law, and his opinion as to what should be done under the circumstances, I have no objection to accepting his suggestion. I would therefore move to strike out the last two words of the resolution. So that the motion will not now be to the effect that in the opinion of this House the law as it stands at present should be amended provided, as the Minister of Justice pointed out in the course of his remarks, that it be in such terms as shall be in the best interests of the whole community.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that he has no right to amend his own motion without the unanimous consent of the House. As the debate is closed, and no one can move an amendment to the motion, it must be taken as it appears on the order paper. Of course, with the unanimous consent of the House the hon. member may move to amend by deleting the last two words of his motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw the said motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion withdrawn.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. C. G. Power (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Dominion of Canada should give notice of its intention to withdraw from the League of Nations and forthwith take steps to comply with article 1 of the covenant of the League of Nations by promptly freeing itself from all obligations which it may have contracted under said covenant.

Mr. POWER: Dropped.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN WAR

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to declare that save in the case of actual invasion the Dominion of Canada shall not be committed to participation in any war without the consent of the parliament of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, lest later on in the course of the debate some hon. gentleman may accuse me of political embezzlement and literary plagiarism, I wish at the outset to plead guilty to both charges. The resolution which I have placed on the order paper is taken mutatis mutandis from Article 48 of the constitution of the Irish Free State. This constitution was ratified by the parliament of Great Britain.

The theories advanced and the arguments adduced in support thereof have been placed before the people of this country on numerous occasions by Mr. John S. Ewart, K.C., of Ottawa. Mr. Ewart, in a manner as able as unselfish, has for a number of years devoted himself to the study of Canada's relations to the Empire and to the rest of the world. He has done this without any hope of financial reward or political preferment. His theory has developed into this: That we in Canada at this stage of our national development should be the moulders of our own destiny, undeterred by any consideration of interest or sentiment, except the interest which we have in matters pertaining to our own country and the natural affection which every Canadian should have for the land of his birth or of his adoption.

Some hon. gentlemen may be of opinion that this resolution is somewhat inopportune. Others may be of opinion that it is unnecessary because by the very fact that no moneys can be appropriated without the vote of this parliament, therefore no Canadian troops can be equipped or put in a state to go to war. It is urged that no government unless it had the support of the House of Commons or was assured of such support, could possibly involve Canada in war.

To the first of these objections, I answer that now is the time, if ever, for us to approve or disapprove of the conduct of the present administration during the Near Eastern crisis of last September, that now is the time, not too soon after the actual event for us to be still under the spell of the enthusiasm and of the glamour of the moment and not too far removed for us not to understand perfectly and to judge impartially as to what occurred on that occasion.

My answer to those who might say that this resolution is unnecessary is that as a matter of fact on the last two occasions on which Canadian troops have taken part in war they were mobilized and prepared for embarkation before even our parliament was summoned. I would say further that the resolution does not pretend so much to discuss the actual participation of this country in war as its commitment to participation. I think that perhaps as I proceed with my argument I can place this point more clearly before the House.

There are in this country two great schools of thought: Those who say—as some hon. gentlemen said last September—that at the moment when Great Britain extended to us an invitation to mobilize our troops for the Gallipoli campaign, we should instantly have answered, "Ready! aye ready!" Others who say "It was well that we had a government in power courageous enough to answer to the invitation of the British Prime Minister: 'Let us see what this quarrel is about—what are our interests—how is Canada's honour involved—is her territorial integrity menaced?'"

Now, Sir, I should like for a few moments to discuss the point of view of those who are willing to ask the Dominion to take part in any and every war wherein the British Empire may be engaged. From what I can gather their arguments—and they are not many—may be classified somewhat as follows: First, what I may call the sentimental argument; next, the moral argument; and last the legal or constitutional argument.

The sentimental argument may be summed up somewhat in these words: We must help the Mother Country—blood is thicker than water—we must answer the call of the blood. To this I would reply: In the first place, Britain is not our Mother Country; France is. It was the French explorers, the French missionaries, the French captains who first laid the foundations of civilization in this country, who first developed and christianized it. It was the French explorers who first opened up this country to civilization, and if we have a mother country at all in that sense, it must surely be France. Now I hardly think that any member of this House will venture to assert that we should go to war on any occasion when France is at war.

There is another argument, too, under the same heading, the argument of the call of the blood. Because the greater proportion of the inhabitants of Canada are of British birth or descent it is urged that we should promptly enter into bellicose and belligerent operations as soon as the Mother Country of these individuals becomes involved in war. We might just as well say that the United States should become involved in war when Britain is at war, because I imagine that the greater number of inhabitants of the United States have ties of kindred or business more or less closely connected with people living in the Old Country. But even admitting that this argument is not a good one, I would ask hon. members whether they think it is fundamentally and morally sound for the majority of the inhabitants of this country, simply because they are bound by ties of blood and sympathy to some nation, to insist that their fellow-citizens of some other nationality or of different racial descent should kill or be killed for the sake of whatever sympathy the first nationality may have. In this country there are people of every race and of every nationality. When they become citizens of Canada they are entitled to equal rights, and particularly to that right and privilege of carrying on their affairs in a manner to become as prosperous as possible, and unless we give them security to pursue their peaceful avocations free from the troubles and turmoil of war we have not carried out our contract with them.

Then we have what is called the moral argument, which might be summed up as follows. As Canadians we owe to the British Empire or to Great Britain that we have been protected by the British army and the British navy, and furthermore we owe to Great Britain our constitutional development and the freedom and privileges we enjoy under the British Constitution.

To that first argument I answer this: We have not, as a matter of fact, been protected to any great extent by the British army. On two occasions on which we became involved in war, when the British army fought on our side, the war was none of our choosing. The war of American Independence was certainly not brought on by Canada or by the citizens of Canada. With the war of 1812 we had little or nothing to do, and the least that those who undertook to carry on this war could do was to protect their own base. Canada on both these occasions was the base of supplies for the British army in their attacks against the United States and in their defence against attacks from that country. Furthermore, if British troops have for a long time garrisoned this country, I submit that it was because it suited the convenience of the Imperial authorities and not because it suited our convenience. In that connection may I quote the opinion expressed by the Duke of Newcastle before a select committee of the British House of Commons in 1861. He was asked the following question:

> Since 1854, the time when the arrangement of which you spoke was made, it appears that the force in the North American Colonies has not been in a state of progressive reduction, but rather fluctuating.

His reply was:

> I have already stated in answer to some questions in the early part of my examination that that was done without any communication with the colony, and for Imperial purposes. It was a convenience to us to send those troops there; they were not required by the Colony and beyond the towns and villages in which they were placed, which no doubt derived advantages from the commissariat, I do not think that the colony wished a single man.

Further on in the same inquiry, Earl Grey states that the troops were in Canada, but they were here because they cost very little more than they would at home. I have a number of other quotations on the same subject, but as the hour is growing very late I shall not weary the patience of the House by giving them.

With regard to naval protection, it has been said frequently in this House and outside of it, where would Canada be if it had not been for the protection of the British navy? The same argument applies also to the navy with regard to the war of 1812 and the war of American Independence. With regard to further protection, may I quote further from the evidence given before that same select committee of the British House of Commons? Rear Admiral Erskine states:

> We are at a certain expense in defending Canada; but supposing Canada were incorporated into the United States, would our expense be increased or diminished in time of war?

His reply to this was:

> Your expense must increase, because you must have your territory protected in the event of the Americans committing any aggression upon your trade, which now there is no apprehension of.

The Duke of Newcastle in the same inquiry states:

> Halifax is not kept up for the benefit of Nova Scotia; but rightly or wrongly according to the particular views which men may entertain, it is kept for military purposes; it is still more important as a naval station, inasmuch as by its natural capabilities it is certainly one of the finest, and in all probability the finest harbour in the world.

I go further, and I say that not only has the British navy not protected us, but it has on several occasions intervened to our disad-vantage. I quote now from Canada and British Wars by John S. Ewart, K.C., Ottawa, who, at page 10, says:

> Observe, next, that, so far from having enjoyed British protection, there have been but two occasions upon which the British navy has gone into action in connection with our (I include Newfoundland) quarrels, and in each case, although we were indubitably in the right, the British fleet acted against us. The first occasion was in connection with the seizure, by the United States cruisers, of our sealing ships on the open ocean. . . . The second occasion was when, in defence of an absurd claim of the French, a squad of British marines destroyed the lobster factories of Newfoundlanders on Newfoundland territory. In both of these cases, not only was it the opinion of the British government that our opponents were undoubtedly wrong, but, in the international arbitration in the one case, and in the British Privy Council in the other, our contention was authoritatively declared to be right.

So we may conclude from these quotations and from our own experience that so far from our being protected by the British army or the British navy, we have in a large measure protected ourselves, and in some instances if we could we would have protected ourselves more strenuously against them.

It is urged also that our constitutional development, the constitutional freedom and rights and privilege that we now enjoy are due in a large measure to what I may call the benevolence of Breat Britain. Let us see what these blessings are.

The first important document in our constitutional history was the Constitution of 1791. That was granted to us shortly after the American Revolution. The reason given for advancing us so far along the path of freedom is somewhat as follows. Lord Grenville in a letter to Lord Dorchester about 1790 asks for his opinion on this question.

> —by what means, the connection and dependence of Canada, on this country may be so preserved and cultivated, as to be rendered most beneficial to Great Britain during its continuance, and most permanent in its duration.

The Colonial Office accompanied these suggestions with the hope,— > —that they would afford a juster, and more effectual security against the growth of a republican or independent spirit, than any which could be derived from a government more arbitrary in its form or principles.

So that our constitution in 1791 was granted to us, not so much for our benefit as in order to keep us the longer under the more direct control and subjection of the Imperial authority. The next important step in our constitutional development was taken in 1841. I do not think it is necessary for me to dwell at any greater length on that portion of our history. We obtained a constitution in 1841 as a result of the rebellion in 1837. If we were granted certain freedom it was because it was found impossible to govern Canada, a country so far removed from Great Britain, unless certain concessions were made, and before the concesions were made the colonies had broken out into open revolt. The next step in our constitutional history was the proclamation of 1867. I do not think there is any question of doubt whatsoever in the mind of any hon. member but that the motive which swayed the British government in granting us the British North America Act was in order that we would build up, under the auspices of the British gevernment, on the North American continent a country strong enough and big enough and having sufficient strength to resist any encroachment which the republic to the south of us might be able or willing to make on the British naval or military power. May I say further still on this subject that it is true that we obtained freedom and our present free institutions while under the protection of Great Britain, but I submit, Sir, there is no copyright on freedom. We could just as well have obtained that freedom and developed our own free institutions under the protection of any other power, or we could have obtained it even had we been free and independent. We owe every gratitude to the Mother of Parliaments for having so far developed parliamentary institutions, but there was no copyright, as I said before, and no law which prevented us from copying these institutions and applying them to our own circumstances.

To conclude this portion of my remarks, let me make a passing reference to our experience with British diplomacy when we were represented in foreign affairs by the British authorities. Every one in this House is familiar with the fact that after the war of the American revolution we lost a large portion of the territory that rightfully belonged to us and which now makes up a portion of the United States of America. Every one knows of the Hay-Ashburton Treaty by which we lost Maine. Every one knows of our fishery dispute, and every one knows of Sir John Macdonald's report when he was acting with certain British diplomats at Washington. He found they were not so much interested in Canada as they were anxious to get home with a treaty of some kind in their pockets. During the whole course of our empire when we were in early youth and in young manhood, we were protected, firstly—if we were protected at all—in order to suit the interests of the Mother Country, and as soon as it no longer suited their interests we were made the butt of their diplomacy in order to placate and to please the Americans on every possible occasion. In making these remarks I wish not to be misinterpreted. I do not think there is any one on this side of the House, or on the other side of the House who shares this view with me wishes, for one instant, to decry the British Empire or its achievements. We are proud that we have taken part in some of these achievements. We are willing to admit that probably no empire in the world or no country in the world has done so much for the advancement of the human race, but at the same time we would like it to be clearly understood just what our obligations and what our views on this question are.

Before closing this part of my argument allow me to discuss what might be called the legal and constitutional viewpoint. It is I think fairly well understood that during the whole course of British constitutional history, so far from the colonies being obliged to defend or to help the Mother Country, it was the duty of the dominant partner to extend aid and assistance to the colonies. We have but to contrast the state of affairs which existed on the North American continent during the wars which took place here between England and France to see what the distinction was between the two colonial policies. The French in Canada marched to war at the command of the King. The British in America marched to war, sent their troops to the frontiers, and granted supplies only when the American colonial assemblies voted such supplies. And so a contrast can be made through the whole course of British and colonial history. So much did the colonies have control of their own funds, and of the question of defence, that when it was attempted to tax them, they for purposes purely of their own defence rebelled, and during the course of that rebellion the British House of Commons decreed—

> The King and parliament of Great Britain would not impose any duty, tax, or assessment whatever, payable in any of His Majesty's colonies, provinces and plantations in North America or the West Indies, except only such duties as it might be expedient to impose for the regulation of commerce; the net produce of such duties to be always paid and applied to and for the use of the colony, province or plantation in which the same shall be respectively levied, in such manner as other duties collected by the authority of the respective general courts or general assemblies of such colonies, provinces or plantations were ordinarily paid and applied.

Furthermore it has been stated by the foremost British authorities that the relation of the colonies to the Mother Country was not such that the Mother Country could not call on the colony for aid and assistance. On the contrary the Duke of Newcastle, in the same inquiry which I have already mentioned, states in answer to questions:

> Q. May your opinion be stated in these terms, that the mother country having assumed the government of a colony, takes upon itself all the responsibility of its defence?—A. Certainly.
> Q. No responsibility given to a Colony gives it the responsibility of declaring war?—A. Certainly not.
> Q. The power, therefore, of declaring war imposes upon the government the responsibility of protecting the Colony from the cost of war?—A. Certainly.

So that even during the time of our colonial status there was no question of doubt in the minds of British statesmen but that we were not under any obligation whatsoever to furnish it assistance.

Now, let us see what happened later on when we developed still more; when we lost the status of a colony and became a self-governing dominion and later on a nation. It was found and it was stated distinctly by our leaders, that the question of the defence of the Empire had now become a matter of treaty obligation and no longer a matter of any kind of obligation. Sir John Macdonald, at the time of the Soudan war, stated in a letter to Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner in London, dated 12th March, 1885, in refusing to furnish a contingent for that war:

> Our men and money would therefore be sacrificed to get Gladstone and Co. out of the hole they have plunged themselves into by their own imbecility. Again the reciprocal aid to be given by the colonies and England should be a matter of treaty, deliberately entered into and settled on a permanent basis.

And then he goes on to say further:

> The spasmodic offers of our Militia Colonels anxious for excitement or notoriety, have roused unreasonable expectations in England and are so far unfortunate. I dare say that a battalion or two of venturous spirits might be enlisted but 7 d. a day will cool most men's warlike ardour.

Again, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at the time of the despatch of the South African contingent said:

> I claim for Canada this, that in the future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act.

This, Sir, I think is the present state of the case. We are not bound to take part in Britain's wars unless we have some kind of a treaty which would bind us to do so. This was the position last September. We had no treaty at that time. We were under no written obligation or, as I have shown, moral or legal obligation to send an expedition to the Far East, so that the government of this country, in acting as they did, I think acted constitutionally, acted within their rights, acted with perfect justice, and for that reason deserves the thanks of the House and of the country.

That crisis having been safely passed let us see what shall be our policy for the future. I have said that in my opinion—and if the argument which I have pursued so far is right such is the case, any question of participation in Imperial wars should be a matter of treaty of arrangement. This resolution reads that no such treaty or arrangement be entered into without the consent of the parliament of Canada. In case it should be said that it would be impossible to enter into any such treaty or arrangement without the consent of parliament, allow me to give you an example of a case in which a country became involved in war without the consent of the people, or even the consent of parliament. In making these remarks I do not wish to ascribe any blame of those concerned in Great Britain. To my mind Great Britain entered the last war from the purest of motives, and after she had made every effort to avoid that calamity. She was, it is true, bound by no treaty obligation, but she was obliged to support France owing to a series of arrangements, conversations, and diplomatic interventions which allowed France to hope that in any case in which she should be assailed Britain would promptly come to her assistance. The obligation was, I say so strong that the parliament of great Britain—though it had no knowledge of these conversations or these arrangements—could not without besmirching the national honour, refuse to take part in the war. In 1904 Great Britain and France came to a sort of friendly arrangement whereby these two nations settled their difficulties throughout the world. One of the conditions was that France agreed to give Britain a free hand in Egypt and Britain agreed to give France a free hand in Morocco. In 1905 arose the first Moroccan incident. May I quote here the words of Sir Edward Grey from the Parliamentary Debates, British House of Commons, Volume 65, page 1,181:

> Now I must make this question of obligation clear to the House. I must go back to the first Moroccan crisis of 1906. . . . when a general election was in progress, and ministers were scattered over the country; and—spending three days a week in my constituency and three days at the Foreign Office—was asked the question whether if that crisis developed into war between France and Germany we would give armed support. I said then that I could promise nothing to any foreign power unless it was subsequently to receive the whole-hearted support of public opinion here if the occasion arose. I said, in my opinion, if war was forced upon France then on the question of Morocco—a question which had just been the subject of agreement between this country and France, an agreement exceedingly popular on both sides—that if out of that agreement war was forced on France at that time, in my view public opinion in this country would have rallied to the material support of France.

He says, further on, that the French officials approached him saying: "It is all very well to state that you will support us in the case of war with Germany, but had we not better have some arrangement, some conversations, between the military advisers of both countries in order, if you find yourself bound to take part in this war, that we will be in a position to make reciprocal arrangements?" He says that he agreed to this arrangement. Then he goes on to say:

> As I have told the House, upon that occasion a General Election was in prospect. I had to take the responsibility of doing that without the cabinet. It could not be summoned. An answer had to be given. I consulted Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Prime Minister; I consulted, I remember, Lord Haldane, who was then Secretary of State for war, and the present Prime Minister who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer. That was the most I could do, and they authorized that on the distinct understanding that it left the hands of the government free whenever the crisis arose.

Then he states that another Moroccan crisis arose, that of Agadir—

Mr. McMASTER: When was this speech delivered by Sir Edward Grey?

Mr. POWER: On the 3rd of August, 1914. Then, at the time of the Agadir crisis in 1912, he gave a somewhat similar assurance to the French Ambassador. It can clearly be shown by the diplomatic documents relating to the war that at that time, in 1912, conversations and reciprocal arrangements were 11 p.m. entered into between not only the French general staff and the British general staff, but also the Belgium general staff and the British general staff. It is true that at that time the French Ambassador, at the request of Sir Edward Grey, gave him a letter in which this was stated:

> We have agreed that consultation between experts is not and ought not to be regarded as an engagement that commits either government to action in a contingency that has not yet arisen and may never arise.

Other English statesmen, however, took a different view of those engagements from that which Sir Edward Grey took. It will be remembered that, at that time, owing to negotiations which had passed between the British and the French governments, the British fleet retired to the North sea and the French fleet retired to the Mediterranean, leaving the British fleet to undertake the defence of the North sea. Lord Crewe, on August 6, 1914, says:

> The direct effect of that understanding was the weakening of the French maritime defence in the channel and the corresponding weakening of our maritime defence in the Mediterranean. Your Lordships will see that the result was inevitable, without any formal arrangement between the two powers that one should fill the gap left by the other.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, speaking on the same day, August 6, 1914, states:

I do not think anyone can have failed to be deeply shocked by what I can now describe as the cynical attempt made to bribe this country, and not this country alone, into a disregard both of its treaty obligations and of those other obligations which are not less sacred because they are not embodied in a signed and sealed document. . . . To the other category belong our obligations to France —obligations of honour, which have grown up in consequence of the close intimacy by which the two nations have been united during the last few fateful years.

Bonar Law is of the same opinion in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Asquith, Prime Minister of England, on August 3, 1914. Lloyd George, in defending his policy in August, 1918, four years afterwards, stated that there could be no question of doubt but that an obligation of honour was imposed upon the British Empire to intervene in any war in which Germany should be the aggressor. I have said before that it is possible for obligations of this nature to be entered into without consultation with parliament and without the knowledge and consent of parliament. I have had in my hand a book entitled, How the War Came, by Earl Loreburn, who was from 1905 to 1912 Lord Chancellor, and consequently a member of the British cabinet. I may say that Sir Edward Grey, in the course of his speech, after stating that he had informed Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and others, states:

The fact that conversations between military and naval experts took place was later on—I think much later on because that crisis passed and the thing ceased to be of importance—but later on it was brought to the knowledge of the cabinet.

This is what Lord Loreburn says:

He does not say when. . . . but one of Sir Edward Grey's then colleagues may be permitted, in view of his statement about withholding the information from the cabinet, to offer certain criticisms. Sir Edward Grey's phraseology rather conveys that his selection of confidants was casual, but Mr. Asquith and Lord Haldane were with himself vice-presidents of the Liberal league, a continuation of the Liberal imperialistic movement which had supported the South African war and opposed Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman on that subject.

He says further:

There was no difficulty whatever in summoning the cabinet during the election to consider so grave a matter. A good many members of the cabinet were in London or within an hour of it, while those whom he consulted were at a distance. And there are railways and post offices in Great Britain. The cabinet met in January, 1906.

And then he goes on further to say that all during 1906 and later he, as a member of the cabinet, was not made acquainted with these conversations which had taken place with the French and Belgian officers. Further, he asked the question—When did the war come, and how did they bring us into it? Speaking with regard to the action of the ministers of the Crown, he says:

The answer to this question, in a single sentence, is that we were brought into the war because Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey and their confidants, by steps some of which are known while others may be unknown, had placed us in such a position toward France, and therefore also toward Russia, that they found they could not refuse to take up arms on her behalf when it came to the issue, though till the end they denied it to parliament, and probably even to themselves.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that England was in honour bound to go and support France when she went to war, and that Canada is not in honour bound to go and support England if she got into difficulties.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that owing to this series of conversations and arrangements that took place between England and France prior to the last war, without there being any written treaties or conventions with the consent of parliament thereto, and without the knowledge of the whole cabinet, Britain found herself so involved that, without loss of honour, she could not stay out of the war. As I proceed further with my argument, my hon. friend will see that it is to avoid any such contingency arising in Canadian politics, that this resolution is being brought down this evening.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question which is relevant to the present theme of his discussion? Was the government of Canada justified, in August, 1914, at the time Great Britain entered the war, in pledging Canada's active military support to Britain without securing the consent of the parliament of Canada?

Mr. POWER: I am under the impression that owing to some more of those conversations, for instance the interchange of officers between the British general staff and our exchange of officers, and also owing to a certain resolution passed unanimously in this House of Commons in 1909, we were practically pledged to go to war in case the British Empire was forced into war through aggression on the part of Germany. It is to prevent any such contingency in future without the knowledge and full consent of parliament, that this resolution is being introduced.

Before closing that portion of my remarks relating to how Britain entered the war, let me read Lord Loreburn's appreciation of Sir

Edward Grey's speech on the 3rd August, 1914:

> This remarkable speech began with an elaborate effort to prove that the House of Commons was perfectly free to determine either for peace or war. It ended with a passionate declaration that this country would be disgraced if we did not declare war, and the reasoning of the speech proved that Sir Edward Grey had committed himself irretrievably.

As I said before, this is a case where a great nation, the greatest nation on earth, a nation which has amongst its statesmen those who should be most familiar with everything that goes on in international politics, a nation the members of whose House of Commons probably study international politics more than those of any other similar bodies in the world, found that it had restrained its liberty of action in case of an aggressive war on the part of Germany to such an extent that it could not remain out of the war without, as I said before, besmirching the nation's honour. If such a thing can happen with regard to England, how much more so could it happen with regard to this country? Our leaders, much as I admire and respect them, will be, I think, the very first to admit that they have possibly not the training in diplomacy, nor in the knowledge of old-world events, which the members of the British cabinet and the members of the House of Commons of Britain, before 1914, possessed. As I said before, the general aim and object of this resolution is to prevent this country from being placed in a position similar to that which Great Britain was placed in before 1914. The resolution really only gives a more general application to, and elaborates an amendment moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was leader of the Opposition, on April 27, 1921, on the occasion of the departure of the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) then Prime Minister for Great Britain to attend the Prime Ministers' conference. The original motion stated that it was advisable to take part in the Imperial Conference, and so forth; and the present Prime Minister moved:

> That the House, while recognizing the propriety of Canada being represented at any Imperial conference or conference of the Prime Ministers of the Empire that may be called, desires to record its opinion that at the coming conference no step should be taken in any way involving any change in the relations of Canada to other parts of the Empire; and that, in view of the present financial position of Canada, no action should be taken implying any obligations on the part of Canada to undertake new expenditures for naval or military purposes.

This amendment was defeated by some thirty votes. But may I say now to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that, though he considered it his duty at the time to ask his supporters to vote down this amendment, he took to heart the injunctions which had been given him, and by his manly stand and his steadfast Canadianism was able to resist the blandishments of the Imperialists and prevent the renewal of the Japanese Treaty. The principles enunciated in that resolution remain, I think, the principles which guide the Liberal party in its foreign and imperial policy to-day. There can be no objection, then, on the part of the government to accepting the more general statement as outlined in the resolution which I have placed on the order paper. There will no doubt be other imperial conferences; there will be other discussions of the question of imperial defence; and our ministers, when discussions relating to these matters arise, might very well be pleased to be able to say to those who approach them that it is useless to converse, useless to negotiate, unnecessary to enter into undertakings because their hands are tied, they are bound by a resolution of the Canadian House of Commons not in any way to commit their country to any participation whatsoever without previously having consulted parliament. This, I submit, would be in the best interests of the ministers themselves; it would make the matter clear for everyone; and it would be following out the adage of which so much was said during the war,—open agreements, open covenants, openly arrived at. I can conceive of the case where it might be necessary for two nations which are combining against the aggression of a third party to keep secret the negotiations and even the result of their combination. It might be that this very combination might be sufficient to urge the third nation into making an attack before the plans of the other two parties were completed. But in this country we need no such precaution; we need have no enemies on this continent; and we have no right to make enemies for ourselves on any other continent. Any arrangements which the representatives of the people of Canada may arrive at should be arrived at in the broad light of day and be freely published, so that every citizen of the Dominion may know just to what he is obliged and under what circumstances he may act in such and such a matter. To sum up, I have tried—

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman think, in the event of enemy attacking Great Britain and being victorious, that Canada would be free from the penalties of the loser?

Mr. POWER: I am rather under the impression that we would. It has been said quite freely that in any case in which Great Britain is at war, whether we want to go to war or not, we would be attacked. I think the hon. gentleman knows, and every hon. gentleman in this House ought to know, that it would not be to the advantage of any single nation on earth to make an enemy of Canada if Canada were not inclined to go into war. Almost any nation on earth would carefully refrain from attacking a country which could put 500,000 of the best fighting troops in the world in the field at practically a moment's notice.

Now, I have tried to show that at the present moment our slate is clean in so far as international or imperial obligations are concerned. I have tried to show also that there is a way of keeping that slate clean. The passing of a resolution such as this is one way that would keep us from undertaking any entangling alliances or engagements. It remains only for me to close my observations by stating that my motives in bringing forward this resolution are not anti-British any more than they are anti-American. They are simply Canadian. I am Canadian, purely and simply, and I place the interests of this country before those of any other country no matter how closely we may be related thereto. A number of hon. gentlemen in this House may have arrived at the same conclusions as I have reached, but by following different paths. With these I have no quarrel, any more than I have any quarrel with those who think I am utterly and absolutely wrong. This is a matter of opinion. The question of our relations to the Empire is, I think, one of the greatest questions now before the people of Canada. It is certainly one question on which we can have a definite line of cleavage, at any rate. At the present time, for instance, with regard to the tariff, we have free traders and protectionists on this side of the House, and we have protectionists and so-called free traders on the other side. And we have private ownership and public ownership advocates sitting cheek by jowl on either side of the House. On almost every single question it is possible to cut clear across party lines. But on this question the time is fast approaching when every citizen of Canada will have to decide whether he is a Canadian first or a Britisher first. And when that question is placed before the people of Canada, without any extraneous circumstances to dim their vision or prejudice their judgment, then I think every member of this House will have to make his choice one way or the other. I think from what I have said to-night the House knows where my choice will lie. It will be said perhaps that the views which I have expressed this evening are selfish and narrow. To their selfishness I plead guilty; I think we should be selfish with regard to our country. We should so take the interest of our country to heart that we have little time or occasion to be worried over the fortunes of any other country.

It will be said too, that my views are narrow. But how can views be narrow which take into consideration the problems of the miner from Nova Scotia, of the farmer from Alberta and of the fisherman from British Columbia? We have national problems great enough to exercise the minds of our ablest statesmen. We have class problems—the problem of the employer, the problem of the worker, the problem of the farmer, the problem of the manufacturer; we have the problems of race antagonism and religious prejudice; we have economic problems—our railways are on our hands and we have to seek some means of developing our national resources. When we have settled, if ever we do settle, these problems, it will be time enough for us to turn our attention to the woes of the Hindu, to the troubles of the Australian sheep-rancher, to the hardships of the tax-burdened Lancashire miner, to the sorrows of the London coster. But until such time as we have either settled definitely or come to some conclusion regarding the settlement of these great national problems which cry aloud for solution, I say our people should devote their attention to their own national affairs, in an endeavour to make this country more prosperous and better to live in, and indeed a country better than any other in all the world.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as it is quite late and considering that my hon. friend the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has so ably set forth his resolution, I shall but add a few words in support of this very important motion; I shall, however, dwell long enough on the subject in order to express my views clearly on this question of participating in Imperial wars. It affords me much pleasure to second the resolution of the member for Quebec South, and, I sincerely congratulate him for having brought up this debate, thus affording to members the opportunity of stating their views on a question so vital to the interests of Canada. On that score he certainly deserves the thanks of every patriotic person in this country.

Members sitting in this House and having a leaning towards militarism or imperialism can no more parade as drawing room generals, or seriously cast a shadow of doubt on the motives which have prompted my hon. friend to take this step. This right is denied to them by the reason of his being one of the glorious wounded of the great war. It is because he was an eye-witness to so many horrors that he wants no more war, it is because he has a true knowledge of its frightfulness that he does not wish his country to be dragged into new conflicts without the people's consent, represented by their members in the nation's parliament.

In 1914, the Borden government decided to throw Canada into the most terrible war which history has ever recorded. They were willing to lay waste the country by sacrificing the last man and dollar to save the Empire, and this without having first consulted the Canadian parliament. Such an act was unworthy of responsible government nor was such a procedure truly democratic. It is this arbitrary and despotic way of settling the destinies of Canada by making light of the rights of the Canadian people that we wish to prevent by asking the House to adopt the resolution which my hon. friend has so courageously and eloquently put forth.

In the month of August, 1914, the people of this country awoke one morning to learn with stupefaction, that the Canadian government had cabled to the Imperial authorities that they were ready to lead the country into the most disastrous bankruptcy to save the Empire. What right had the government of that day to pledge Canada to an unlimited participation in the war? What authority did it possess to cause the blood of thousands of Canadians to flow on the Flanders fields and drain the treasury to save the Empire from floundering. It is under a false notion of liberty that the government directing the destines of Canada, in 1914, offered, without thought, to place all the nation's manhood on the battle-fields of old Europe, for England's benefit. It is only after everything had been settled that the government called parliament together to ask it not to decide if yes or no, we should participate in the war, but simply to approve of its line of conduct after having taken upon itself to decide what belonged to parliament alone to decide.

Since it is the people who shed their blood and give up their gold to the god of war, it is but just that it should be the same people that decide if they should or not take part in the wars of the Empire or in any other war outside Canadian territory, except as the present resolution under consideration demands it in case of an actual invasion of Canada.

The Canadian people were highly pleased to hear on different occasions the leader of the present government state that parliament alone would decide in the future if, yes or no, we should participate in foreign wars or the Empire's wars if you wish to put it that way. The whole of Canada sincerely applauded the noble and patriotic action of our prime minister when, during the Turkish entanglement, he answered, in a dignified manner, the British government who asked for contingents to be sent to Turkey: "The parliament of Canada is the sole judge in the matter and alone it will decide of our participation or non participation in foreign wars, either in Turkey or elsewhere." Europe is actually resting on a volcano. France which suffered the most in the last war, was obliged, so as to obtain the payment of reparations, to invade German territory. The society of nations is a huge joke and the sooner we get out of it, the better it will be for Canada. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that the Canadian people should control their own destinies and have the last word to say, through its representatives in parliament, when the question again presents itself of pledging Canada to participate in the Imperial wars. The people's duty is therefore to choose representatives whose views are well known in regard to the question of participation, and, who are in favour of previously consulting parliament before pledging Canada to new wars to the exclusive benefit of the British Crown.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know this motion is not debatable, but I do think it is lamentable that a motion of this kind supported by speeches of the character we have heard should now be adjourned and the whole discussion abandoned. I enter my protest.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the business tomorrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first item of business will be the Interim Supply, which was referred to at the beginning of the sitting to-day. Then the Minister of Railways and Canals will make a statement on the railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the statement be made in supply or before going into supply?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before supply. I would like to draw the attention of my right hon. friend to the estimates of the Post Office Department. I have received word from the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) that it is hardly probable he will be able to be back in the House till after the middle of May. I have sent to my hon. friend a letter from his physician which would indicate that he has had rather a serious illness, and under the circumstances perhaps my right hon. friend would consent to our going on with the Post Office estimates to-morrow if an opportunity presents itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister was kind enough to give me the letter, but I am very sorry to say that I have not read it. I intended to do so, but omitted it for the moment. I will read it and let the Prime Minister know to-morrow. After the railway statement to-morrow, which probably will not be followed by large comment at the time, may I ask what estimates will be gone on with in the absence of the Post Office estimates? Immigration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. There are some estimates outstanding of the Department of Defence, Public Works and Trade and Commerce, but I think it is possible that if the estimates of the Railway Department are not proceeded with to-morrow we may take up the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m

Tuesday, March 27, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

VIMY RIDGE MEMORIAL

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honor to inform the House that I have received the following letter from His Excellency, the President of the French Republic.

Le président de la République.

PARIS, le 14 mars 1923.

Monsieur le Président,—J'ai lu avec une vive émotion le compte rendu des débats de la Chambre des communes du Canada, relatifs au don d'un terrain sur le plateau de Vimy que la République française a fait au Dominion du Canada.

Les idées qui y ont été exprimées par tous les orateurs attestent les liens étroits qui unissent la France et le Canada et qui se resserreront chaque jour davantage.

Veuillez agréer, monsieur le Président, l'assurance de ma haute considération,

A. MILLERAND.

Monsieur le Président de la Chambre des communes du Canada.

[Mr. Meighen.]

[Translation]

The President of the Republic,

PARIS, FRANCE, 14th March, 1923

Mr. Speaker,—I have read with deep emotion the debates of the House of Commons of Canada regarding the gift of a tract of land on the plateau of Vimy tendered by the French Republic to the Dominion of Canada. The ideas expressed by all the speakers bear witness to the close ties of friendship uniting France and Canada which are daily growing stronger.

Kindly accept, Mr. Speaker, the assurance of my highest regard.

A. MILLERAND.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved the adoption of the fourth report.

Mr. SPEAKER: Although the motion is not in writing I will put it by unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, If I can have the unanimous consent of the House for the proceeding, I should like again to draw attention to the desirability of having an interim supply bill. On the assumption that there will be no objection to my doing so I may say that the procedure which I had asked the House to take yesterday was, I am assured, in accord with the established practice of the House. It had been contemplated that we should move concurrence in all the votes already passed in supply and then ask for a vote of one-sixth of the remainder. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggested that the motion for one-sixth should apply to the concurrence as well. As a matter of precedent, I think my own contention was the right one. But I am much more concerned to get the business done than to stand on any ceremony, and therefore I have asked the officials to prepare the resolutions so that they shall apply to one-sixth of the concurrence as well as to one-sixth of the votes. I have discussed this matter with the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who concurs in the motion I am now making. If the House is content that I shall take this course, I therefore move that the Speaker leave the chair and the House go into Committee of Supply in order that I may move the first resolution.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move the following resolution:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $36,339,861.93, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items not yet voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1924, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, excluding the amount of the second item of resolution 141, "Ottawa New Departmental Building, $500,000," be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31st., 1924.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Mr. FIELDING: I beg to move:

That one-sixth of each of the resolutions reported from committee of supply, from the 20th February last to the 23rd March instant, inclusive, forming a total of $8,385,196.32 be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The House in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31st 1924, the sum of $44,725,058.25 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. FIELDING thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 103 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the financial year ending March 31, 1924.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

REPORT

Annual report of the Dominion Statistician for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a return brought down yesterday by the Minister of Labour. In the first place, I draw his attention to the fact that the return does not comply with his undertaking of the 23rd and his statement of the return yesterday. Obviously it does not contain all the correspondence. It does not contain the first communication to Mr. Pacaud, now of the High Commissioner's office, asking him to represent Canada. That would be an important element of the return, as it contains the instructions. I would point out also that the request which finally resulted in the appointment of Mrs. Carruthers was received, not late, as stated by the minister, but on the 6th of March, the meeting not being held until the 10th of April, and that the communication asking for Mr. Pacaud was not by cable, as stated by the minister, but by letter. It would appear, therefore, that there was plenty of time for another appointment. But I wish to impress upon the minister the fact that the return is obviously incomplete, possibly the most important letter of all not being included.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The right hon. gentleman is entirely right. The letter to Mr. Pacaud dated March 6, which was the date on which the agenda of the next meeting of the governing body was received, is regarded as a communication that it would be inadvisable under the circumstances to lay on the Table. I shall be glad, however, to let my right hon friend read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why I should have special privileges. It is a letter giving the position of the government in relation to this convention, and, I presume, giving instructions. Surely that should not come under the category of secret diplomacy.

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at all. It was written by the Minister of Labour expressing the view of the Department of Labour as to what was desired in such representation as might be undertaken by a properly qualified person at the sessions of the governing body. There is nothing improper in that communication. My right hon. friend can read it, though, and judge for himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not suggest, I never thought of suggesting, that there was anything improper; but as it is the view of the Department of Labour, I do not know why it should be secret. However, that is the minister's position.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHING LICENSES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard) asked leave, under rule 39, to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the giving of a pledge in December last by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the salmon canners of British Columbia respecting the regulations and conditions under which that industry might be conducted during the season of 1923, and the announcement in March 1923 by the same department that such pledge is not to be honoured, with immediate resultant loss to those engaged in such industry, who relied on the sanctity of the pledge so given.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has followed the procedure and the practice with regard to motions of this kind. Under rule 39, subsection 4, the mover hands a written statement of the matter poposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the House to proceed. The motion is certainly drafted as it should be. I must confess that I have a doubt as to the question whether or not the matter is one of urgent public importance. It would certainly be one of importance in the county which I have the honour to represent, the county of Gaspé, and I know it is a matter of importance in British Columbia. Is it a matter of urgent public importance throughout the whole Dominion? Perhaps so. Indeed, I am inclined to believe it may be a matter of urgent public importance, affecting as it does a large industry, prices, and so on. Therefore I would give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): May I say a word? I know this motion is not debatable, but I wish to point out that my hon. friend advised me at a quarter past two to-day—I met him on the way to the dining-room—that he was going to bring up this matter this afternoon. I immediately asked for all the documents papers and records, but they have not yet arrived. I would ask my hon. friend to postpone this matter at least until to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK: It is true I met the minister around noon and spoke to him about the matter, but I had tried during the morning to notify him. I left word at his department and told him what I proposed to do. But the fact is this—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I should like to conclude the remarks I was making to the House in support of the stand I intend to take. The matter must be not only of public importance but also of urgency. On the question of urgency, the hon. gentleman states in his motion that the pledge alleged to have been given by the Department of Marine and Fisheries if not honoured would result in immediate loss to those engaged in this industry. Under the circumstances, therefore, I believe that I should favour the broad principle of freedom of speech and let the hon. gentleman air his grievance, if he has one, before the House.

Mr. CLARK: Last summer a Fisheries Commission was appointed to investigate the fisheries of British Columbia. During the time of its investigations the Department of Marine and Fisheries carried on negotiatons with the salmon canners of British Columbia, and in June last the department assured the canners that irrespective of the decision arrived at by the commission no change would be made in the number of licenses issued, other than white and Indian licenses, beyond the 10 per cent reduction laid down by the department. In December last the Fisheries Commission filed its preliminary report, which recommended a 40 per cent reduction of these licenses. The canners thereupon made an inquiry of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) who sent this telegram to the Salmon Canners' Association:

> No action will be taken on commission's report that will affect next season. Therefore existing regulations and policy including reduction in Oriental licenses decided upon last June will govern industry next year.

That reply was dated December, 22, 1922.

Mr. NEILL: Who signed it?

Mr. CLARK: The deputy minister. On February 28th the Fisheries Commission filed its report. Early in March the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intimated that he proposed to bring into effect immediately the 40 per cent reduction. Now the salmon canners, relying on the pledges which had been given in June and December last had gone ahead and made very extensive preparations for this year's operations. I think I could probably best indicate to the House the nature of the preparations made by reading the wires which have been sent to the Department of Marine and Fisheries and to myself. The first is a wire to myself dated 8th March:

As canners informed that recommendations of Fisheries Commission for forty per cent reduction Japanese licenses in district two will be made effective at once, I am instructed to earnestly bespeak your assistance to have former decision of department making a reduction of 10 per cent adhered to. Canners have signed contracts for labor and purchased supplies for entire operations during coming season in accordance with decision of department in respect to Oriental licenses previously positively notified them. It is now too late to enact further drastic reductions for this year as whole arrangements will be paralyzed. This matter is of vital importance.

B.C. Salmon Packers Assn.,
W. D. BURDIS, Secretary.

Following that, on 16th March, I received the following wire, which is really a copy of the wire sent to the minister:

Have wired Hon. Lapointe quote the canners fully appreciate the difficulty you experience in modifying the recommendations of the Fisheries Commission and were and are prepared to assist a policy of graduated reduction stated in your decision of last June. They implicity relied that you would not depart from the definite assurance given December 22nd, namely that no action will be taken on commission's report that will affect next season, and contracted for supplies and made customary advances to fishermen which will result in heavy loss if changes now proposed are enforced. The critical condition of the canning industry owing to Siberian competition demands sympathetic consideration on the part of the government instead of aggravating the situation by handicapping the producer with further drastic changes. Packs must necessarily be reduced as impossible to replace so large proportion fishermen in one year with experienced men who are necessary to successfully operate and take care of expensive boats and gear. The canners only ask fair equitable treatment along business lines and rely that sanctity of pledges given by the government shall be honoured and maintained.

The balance of the wire is immaterial on this particular point. Since that time the minister has indicated that he proposes to follow out the recommendations of the Fisheries Commission on this point, and I have received another wire dated March 22 from the Canners' Association reading as follows:

Many thanks for your favour and enclosure from Mr. Lapointe. The canners realize that some of the changes recommended in report of commission will result in wrecking their business, with consequent loss of invested capital. The minister responsible for the protection and furtherance of the industry admits he declared last June and later confirmed in November and December that this year's operations would not be affected by report of commission. Canners relying on that assurance from the responsible minister, contracted expenditures of hundreds of thousands of dollars now jeopardized by this failure to stand by his own positive declaration of a policy. No political exigencies can excuse such weakness on his part or would be tolerated by the local members interested in the welfare of their constituents. Canners only demand recognition of their rights as Canadian producers to the protection of the government and respect for the sanctity of pledges deliberately given by a Canadian minister, both which they are sure you as an officer and a man of honour would uphold and bespeak your courteous assistance to one of the basic sources of prosperity of this province.

B.C. Salmon Canners Association,
W. D. BURDIS, Secretary.

I am not referring at all to the report of the Fisheries Commission. I have not had an opportunity of studying that report. I may or may not agree with everything in that report, but I cannot understand why these solemn pledges have been given unless it was intended that they should be adhered to, and furthermore, I do not understand why the department carried on negotiations with the industry in British Columbia when a Fisheries Commission was sitting for the purpose of considering these matters.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I rise as the seconder of the motion. There is no doubt that this matter is one of great importance to British Columbia. I also have had some communications with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) regarding this matter. The salmon industry is one of the largest in Canada. It is one in which the co-operation of the proper department of the government is most necessary owing to the serious competition which the industry has to face from the United States, particularly the state of Washington across the line, and as the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) has mentioned, from Siberia also.

It seems to me, in a word, that the report of this commission, on the merits or demerits of which I do not propose to make any remarks at the present time, is not the question involved here, but the simple question of abiding by the undertaking of responsible members of the government so that business men, laying out their plans for the year—as cannery men must do—and making their expenditures and their arrangements, will be able to do so knowing that the governmental regulations under which they work will be of a kind consistent with the plans which they have formed. There may be some explanation which the minister has to offer; and I would urge upon the government, and upon hon. members, that this matter be dealt with dispassionately and fairly, and that the great industries of the country be not hampered or handicapped by action of this kind. There is no reason why they should be; there is nothing to be gained by changing an arrangement or undertaking such as that. Even the political aspect of the question is not one that would commend itself to a minister of the Crown under such circumstances. I trust that the government will see its way clear to make such adjustments, conforming to their own original declarations, as will give justice and fair treatment to those interested in the business.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I am very glad indeed that both the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) have made such short speeches on such an important question as the fisheries of British Columbia. I will, therefore, endeavour to make my own remarks brief although I have been so loaded up with material on this very important matter during the past six months that I am afraid I shall continue talking all the afternoon and all the evening unless somebody pulls my coat tails as a signal for me to sit down. Now, Sir, if I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Burrard he finds no fault with the decision arrived at by the British Columbia Fisheries Commission, which was composed of members representing all the groups in this House.

Mr. CLARK: I reserve my remarks on that point.

Mr. DUFF: We will be very glad if the hon. member at some time in the future, will discuss the report of that commission; speaking for my fellow commissioners and myself we would be very glad indeed to see that report discussed. However, if I followed my hon. friend's remarks correctly, and also those of the hon. member for Vancouver South, there seems to be some difference of opinion as to whether a reduction of 10 per cent, or a reduction of 40 per cent, should be put into force in the case of Japanese licenses—

Mr. CLARK: No, that is wrong.

Mr. DUFF: Just let me finish my sentence—and because the department finally decided to put the 40 per cent reduction into effect, my hon. friends argue that thereby the industry would suffer very seriously. Personally I do not think there is going to be any serious handicap placed on the canneries of British Columbia by reason of the fact that the government has put a 40 per cent reduction into effect.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. LADNER: If my hon. friend seriously intends to discuss the merits of the question he is not doing so. May I direct his attention to the fact that we make no argument with respect to the reduction of the licenses. The point we are emphasizing is the undertaking given by the government, which has nothing whatever to do with the report in question.

Mr. DUFF: What the hon. gentleman says may be quite correct, but if I correctly understood the argument of his colleague and himself they claimed that the government at a certain time decided to make a reduction of 10 per cent, and later reversed that decision and made a reduction of 40 per cent, and their complaint is that the government should have stuck to the 10 per cent reduction because their later action is seriously affecting the canneries of British Columbia.

Mr. LADNER: No, that was not the argument.

Mr. DUFF: That is just exactly what my hon. friends said and nothing else. The whole thing boils itself down to this, if I understood both hon. gentlemen correctly, that due to the fact that the government, or some official in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, sent word to the fishery interests in British Columbia that a reduction of 10 per cent was to be made, and that afterwards another decision was arrived at and a reduction of 40 per cent effected, those interests are going to be seriously handicapped and affected in 1923, with the result that the men who operate the canneries are going to lose a large amount of money during that year. I am not trying to say that these two hon. gentlemen are in favour of a lower reduction in Japanese licenses; I am not arguing that at all. If that is their fear I will put their minds at rest right now. All I want to argue is this: Whether the department did or did not change their policy with regard to the percentage of licenses that should go into effect in 1923, nevertheless the canneries of British Columbia are not going to be seriously handicapped or affected by that policy. Now, what are the circumstances? It is a fact that salmon fishing in British Columbia does not start until some time in June—the 15th, of June if I remember correctly. Consequently even at this late day, although the 40 per cent policy has been adopted now for over a month, the fact remains that the canners have about five months in which to make their arrangements. Now, what arrangements have they to make? One hon. gentleman said they are going to lose hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask the hon. gentleman what he means by saying that the canners have five months in which to make their arrangements?

Mr. DUFF: If the hon. gentleman will take into consideration the time from the date when it was decided by the department to put the 40 per cent reduction into effect it will not be very much less than five months.

Mr. CLARK: But the department decided to put the reduction into effect before they received the report. The report was filed on the 28th February.

Mr. DUFF: There was an interim report which asked the government to decrease the renewal licenses to Japanese by 40 per cent.

Mr. CLARK: That was on the 23rd December and the department gave its pledge that they were not going to consider it.

Mr. DUFF: Quite possibly. I am not arguing that the department did not change their policy, but evidently the members of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission were able to convince them that it was the right and proper thing to do, not only in the interests of the fisheries of British Columbia but in the interests of the people of the province as a whole; and as one of the commissioners I certainly think the department did the right and proper thing when they decided to accept the report of the commission in that regard and reducing Japanese licenses 40 per cent. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Burrard said that the British Columbia canners had signed contracts for labour and material. Well, even if they have done so—

Mr. CLARK: And made advances.

Mr. DUFF: And made advances. To whom? To Japanese. I hope my hon. friends will not press that part of the question. It is quite possible, as he said, that advances are made to fishermen; but the only advances which the canners make at this early date, or at the time my hon friend said they were made in December, is when they go to the Japanese bosses and engage a certain number of Japanese for the next season. Now there is nothing to prevent the canners from getting other fishermen; they have five months in which they can do it. There is absolutely no reason why, if the canners want to employ white fishermen they cannot go and get them. I say it is about time—in British Columbia or anywhere else—that white people should be employed in the fishing business, and the canners ought to go out and get help of that kind.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman seriously contend that it makes one bit of difference, so far as the honour of the government is concerned, whether the moneys were advanced to Japanese, Chinese, Hottentots or anybody else? If relying on the pledge of the government the canners set out on a certain business course and now the government takes the ground from under them and subjects them to a loss of several thousand dollars, what difference does it make to whom the advances are made?

Mr. DUFF: I am glad my hon. friend has set the loss at several thousand dollars. The hon. member for Burrard said the loss would amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. I am very doubtful whether the canners have advanced any money to the fishermen in British Columbia up to the present date—very doubtful indeed. It is true, of course, that the canners have to make certain arrangements such as buying cans, tin plate, boxes and other supplies for the fisheries; but what difference is it going to make to the canners of British Columbia whether the reduction in Japanese licenses is 10 per cent or 40 per cent as regards the quantity of supplies which they have to buy for the 1923 fisheries? If my hon. friend will read the statistics of the British Columbia fisheries he will see that in certain years when there has been a smaller number employed than in previous years, there has been a larger catch. Therefore, the man engaged in fishing in British Columbia cannot know the quantity of boxes or other supplies he will require from time to time. He has to prepare himself to handle a large quantity of fish, and, consequently, it is impossible for him to argue that because a certain per cent reduction in the number of licenses issued to orientals is taking place the canners are going to be seriously affected in that regard. I do not wish to argue that the department is infallible. It is as liable to make mistakes as other people, and I might say that perhaps the Department of Marine and Fisheries makes more mistakes than some other departments, but that is no reason why it should be condemned in this matter, and I do not think it is a matter of grave public importance to be discussed this afternoon or that the House should be prevented from going into Committee of Supply. This matter might have been discussed when the fishery estimates were before the House. There would have been ample time to discuss it then, and the only reason I can see why it is brought up now is to make political capital against the department and the government. I contend the British Columbia fisheries are not going to be affected in the least by the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) has said that one of the officials of the department sent a telegram in December last to British Columbia saying that the 10 per cent reduction was going into effect. I think I can say truthfully that, perhaps, I have received more correspondence regarding this matter and other matters connected with the British Columbia fisheries before and since our interim and final reports were filed, than any other man in this House. I have received telegrams and letters upholding the views of the commission, thanking the commission for recommending the 40 per cent reduction, not only from the fishermen of British Columbia, not only from citizens of British Columbia, not themselves interested in the fisheries, but also from gentlemen interested in the fisheries. I do not think there is any very great concern in British Columbia about the 40 per cent reduction, or the loss it will entail upon the canners when it goes into effect. In fact I have a telegram from a prominent canner; I just happened to find it a moment ago. The telegram is addressed to me and quotes a telegram sent to the minister part of which is as follows:

4 p.m.

> We urge your department to put in force the recommendation of the Duff report and immediate application of exclusion of Japanese from seine operations or working on same. Any variation from this, such as 40 per cent reduction, will cause endless worry to those who use whites and Indians and will only lead to endless trouble in the future; there is plenty of good white men and Indians for this work and our company have not for years used any Japs on either herring or salmon seines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is that from?

Mr. DUFF: I will give the name if the hon. member wants it, but perhaps the gentleman who wrote it would not want his name mentioned. I will show it to the hon. member, if he wishes to see it. It is from a prominent canner and is addressed to me. He quotes a telegram which he sent to the minister.

Mr. HANSON: I thought it was from the new Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. DUFF: I did not catch that remark. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to the fact that the Canadian canners on the Fraser river had to compete with the American fishermen and canners, and for that reason, I understood him to say, he did not think it was right for the department to change their decision. Everybody knows that the Americans do not employ Japanese in their operations on the Fraser river, and consequently his argument falls to the ground.

I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss this matter any further. All I wish to say is that I think the Department of Marine and Fisheries were fully justified in accepting the report of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission. Nobody is going to be hurt in any possible way, so far as we can see. We went into the matter just as fully as it was possible in the four weeks prior to the date upon which we signed our report. Every member of that commission, practically for every day, was discussing what was best to put in our report, and we gave a great deal of time and thought to this matter, and, with the exception of one of the members of the commission who did not quite concur with us in regard to the 40 per cent reduction, we were practically unanimous on all the other phases of the questions discussed. But I say, from my knowledge of the matter, that the canners of British Columbia are not going to be affected. I do not need to discuss the report, but I wish to say that in that report a great many concessions are made to the canners—more than any other commission ever gave them. I do not think the canners will say that I am not favourable to them and that I do not want to see them get a square deal. I think it is practically second nature to me to be interested in the fisheries of this country. From the time, almost, that I drew breath I have been interested, and my people before me, in the fishing business, and from the standpoint of the fish merchant; so that any particular sympathy which I would have would naturally be with the men who have to invest large sums of money in this industry and who sometimes do not get very large returns. Consequently, I say that the commission did not arrive at its decision with a view of doing anything which would be in any way detrimental to the interests of the canners. We had all these representations made to us by the canners. We were told that the department had first thought of making a 10 per cent reduction. They told us their business would be affected by it. We made every possible investigation we could into the matter before we arrived at our decision, and I think hon. members will agree with me that, with the composition of the commission, the decision we arrived at is in the interests of British Columbia, and in the interests not only of the fishermen but of the men who have their money invested in that industry.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): It is indeed of some interest that we should be attacked for having been too harsh towards a certain class of orientals in British Columbia. There is something queer about this question. There are members who want to exclude the orientals, except those whom they employ themselves, or who are employed by their friends. It reminds me of an incident in my early parliamentary career in this House. The House had been seized with the very question of oriental immigration to British Columbia, and gentlemen had been vehement in their denunciations of the government for allowing these people to come into Canada. After four or five speeches along that line I remember one of their cleverest members of the House at that time, the late Mr. Ralph Smith, in a speech he delivered said: "Now, I want to know who among the gentlemen who have just spoken does not employ orientals in his own personal business?" And he added, "Don't all talk at once." Nobody answered. Well, last year we had a very interesting discussion in this House when a similar motion was considered, and a dark picture indeed was painted of the dangers that were menacing British Columbia. My hon. friend who is moving the adjournment this afternoon made a speech himself, and I may be allowed to cite just a few words from it. He said:

> I submit we must take our stand on this question and take it at once. We must be firm; we must be clear and definite in our policy. If we do that we shall be respected; if we do not, we shall be treated contemptuously.

And the hon. member concluded by saying:

> It is a matter for the white race, particularly the Canadian white race, to consider and deal with now before the menace becomes such that our whole country is more seriously threatened than it is to-day. I am in entire agreement with my fellow members from British Columbia, and I sincerely hope that the House will take the matter firmly in hand without delay.

Well, I thought that perhaps I had taken the matter somewhat firmly in hand recently, and I am now faced with the criticism of my hon. friend who says I have violated solemn pledges and should issue more licenses to Japanese in British Columbia. Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts of the case? A committee was appointed to study the question of the fisheries in British Columbia. And with the consent of the House, indeed at the unanimous demand of the House, a commission was appointed composed of members of that committee to go and hear witnesses and investigate all matters concerning the British Columbia fisheries and make a report. Members were selected from every side of the House and I may give the list of them. This commission was composed of the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), who was chairman, the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), the member for Hants (Mr. Martell), the member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and the member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). Four of the members of that commission are representing British Columbia in this House. The commission investigated every matter concerning the fisheries of that province; they heard witnesses in various parts of British Columbia; and while their labours were still uncompleted they sent in an interim report to the department recommending that the number of licenses of all kinds issued to other than white British subjects and Indians in 1923 be 40 per cent less than the number issued in 1922. They stated that they were still considering the subject and that the final report would be filed later on. At that time, in December last, I was away, but I do not want to evade any responsibility; I accept the full responsibility for everything that was done in the department. The officers of the department, however, said that taking into account the fact that the report was only of an interim character and that there was no finality in the finding of the commission at that time, this provision should not apply to the next season. I admit that this was done.

Mr. LADNER: Was it not the deputy who said that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes; nobody said it was not the deputy. The commission continued its work until the 28th of February, and it filed another report in which I find the following on page 8:

> The commissioners were absolutely unanimous on all points dealt with in their interim recommendations, with the exception of the one dealing with the closing of Fraser river to sockeye fishing for five years. Two of the commissioners differed from the majority, as will appear later, on the question as to how overfishing was to be prevented after the closed period.
> The representations that have been made by the various interests concerned in the British Columbia fisheries, as well as the objections raised by certain officials of the department since the publication of the commission's interim report have been carefully considered by the commissioners before the writing of their final report. Our conclusions and recommendations hereinafter set forth have therefore been reached and agreed upon in the full light of the said further recommendations.

On page 13 the recommendation of the committee appears as follows:

> We therefore again recommend and most strongly urge—

And mark, they say previously that it is in the light of the knowledge they had of what had passed between the department and the interests concerned that they make their recommendation.

—that the number of licenses of all kinds, except trolling licenses, issued to other than white British Columbia subjects and Indians in 1923 be 40 per cent less than the number issued in 1922.

Now, one of the members of the commission, my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), did not agree with the recommendation in so far as it reduced by 40 per cent the number of licenses to be issued. He wanted the reduction to be only 25 per cent.

Mr. DICKIE: That referred only to the waters of the Skeena and the Naas, for reasons which I gave to the House; it had no reference to the waters below, where the majority of the fishermen are employed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Except in the area to which my hon. friend refers, I think he was in favour of a reduction by 40 per cent.

Mr. DICKIE: Yes, decidedly so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But even in the district of which my hon. friend made an exception, recommending a reduction of only 25 per cent, he agreed with all the other commissioners that the reduction should take effect this year for the season of 1923. So that a commission composed of members of this House representing all sides, four of whom represented British Columbia, considered the question, knowing everything that had passed, and recommended and insisted very urgently that this reduction should be made at once.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that they knew of the government's pledge of December?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They practically say so:

In the full light of the said further representations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that they were informed of the government's pledge, or that their report had any relation in the world to that pledge?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know whether they saw the telegram which my hon. friend construes as a pledge. I must draw his attention to the fact that their recommendation was based on an interim report, while the present decision of the department is based on the final report unanimously recommending and insisting that the department make its decision effective this year. And that is why I have issued instructions accordingly. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to think that anyone will suffer by reason of that decision. Is it to be said that the white fishermen of British Columbia cannot do their work?

Mr. LADNER: Has the minister any reason to doubt the positive assertion of the canners' association?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have had representations not only from the canners but from members of the House of Commons and, as well, from members of that commission. And my hon. friend himself speaks violently in this House against the danger of employing Japanese fishermen. My hon. friend and his associates last year said that British Columbia was confronted with the danger of all its fisheries going to the Japanese. Yet directly the very first step is taken by this department to avert the danger by reducing the licenses to Japanese fishermen, I am accused by those hon. gentlemen of having broken faith with the salmon canners of British Columbia.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member can only speak by leave of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. LADNER: I hesitate to rise a second time, but the hon. minister has touched upon an important point. May I ask him if anything which either the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Ciark) or I stated can give him the slightest excuse—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a matter of argument.

Mr. LADNER: —to say that we alluded to the reduction of Japanese licenses or the oriental question at all?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker I may say that the licenses will not be issued until next month. And here is a letter of which my hon. friend for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) received a copy. In answer to my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) I wrote him on March 14th, 1923, as follows:

My dear Mr. Stevens,—I have your note of the 12th inst., with which was enclosed a telegram addressed to you by the B. C. Salmon Packers Association protesting against the proposal of the department to reduce the number of licenses to Japanese fishermen and asking for sympathetic consideration of the same by me.

You will recall that the special fisheries commission appointed to inquire into fishery matters in British Columbia during the past season, submitted an interim report in the month of September last, recommending inter alia the reduction of licenses to fishermen other than whites and Indians by 40 per cent. In view of the intimation by the commission that a fuller and final report would follow at a later period, the officials of the department after having given the matter careful consideration concluded not to make effective the recommendations contained in the interim report for the season 1923. The commission has in the meantime completed its investigations and submitted its final report a few days ago. The commissioners, with Mr. Dickie dissenting, adhere to the recommendations submitted in the interim report to the effect that these licenses should be reduced by 40 per cent. Mr. Dickie, in a minority report recommends that the reduction should not be more than 25 per cent. The commissioners, however, are unanimous in strongly urging that these reductions should be made effective during the present season.

Having regard to the fact that four members representing constituencies in British Columbia sat on this commission, I have felt that I would not be warranted in ignoring their views and declining to make this recommendation effective. It was accordingly decided that the reductions recommended by the majority report should be put into effect this present season and the necessary instructions to that end have already issued. If, however, it appears to you that the general interests of the fisheries are in any way prejudiced by the decision of the department in this regard, the matter might well receive further consideration by the House of Commons Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

Why do not those gentlemen take advantage of the committee that has been reappointed for this session, and is actually sitting, to discuss this matter? Then should the committee find otherwise than the commission has found, the question will be still open for further consideration.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the issue raised by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) is not by this time thoroughly obscured, it will not be for lack of will or of skill on the part of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr Duff) and of the hon. minister (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. DUFF: Thank you very much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has the House discussed? One would think from the speeches heard from the other side that an appeal had been made by hon. gentlemen behind me against the treatment of Japanese in the province of British Columbia, and urging that more Japanese fishermen be employed, even against the report of the Fisheries Commission that has sat on the subject and made recommendations. No hon. gentleman is so dull as to honestly imagine that that is the issue or that it is relevant to the issue in the remotest way.

The report of the Fisheries Commission everyone understands. We have not all read it. There was an interim report last December; a final report on the 28th February. The final report, in so far as respects the question of license reduction, was the same as the interim report, which recommended that there be a reduction of Japanese licenses by 40 per cent, effective this year. As to that there is no dispute in the world, and no one in the House has raised the question that that report is good or is bad; no one on this side is objecting to its terms. Then why do hon. members rise and read extracts from speeches delivered last session urging that the Japanese be excluded? No one recedes from his position in that regard at all.

Now, what is the issue that we are discussing? It is that this government, in response to an inquiry from the British Columbia Salmon Fisheries' Association last December,—an inquiry made by them in order that they might know how to go about their business, making their purchases, making their advances and making their contracts; an inquiry that had to be answered that they might make these preliminary arrangements—gave a definite and unequivocal answer applicable to all this year's business. On the faith of that the British Columbia Salmon Fisheries' Association went to work and made their investments, they hired their men, they made advances to those men, and they made their purchases. After they have thus prepared themselves for their season's work the government comes along in March of this year and says: We will break every pledge we have made to you and will put you back in the position you would have occupied if we had made no pledge to you at all.

Mr. DUFF: If the right hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him? He says that the British Columbia Salmon Canners' Association have hired their men for this season. They could not hire their men until the licenses are issued for this season, and the minister has told us that these licenses will not be issued until next month.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The canners must make their contracts with the men they engage.

Mr. DUFF: They cannot do it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, in all these matters the member for Lunenburg says the canners have made no losses. Then I wonder what they are complaining about.

Mr. DUFF: I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows their business a lot better than they do themselves of course. He is the self-constituted president of the exchequer court of the world.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, of course the right hon. leader of the Opposition can talk either about sewer gas or angels' wings and impute to me knowledge concerning those things, but it is not fair on his part to say that I claim all knowledge concerning the business of the British Columbia salmon canners. I did not say any such thing, and I am not going to allow him to make any such implication. It is not worthy of him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will admit that the British Columbia salmon canners ought to know their own business better than he knows it—

Mr. DUFF: They ought to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then that ends the argument.

Mr. DUFF: And you might as well sit down, for you do not know anything about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I sit down now and the hon. gentleman sticks to his admission, the government will have to recede. Now, the minister tries to make the House believe that it was some conditional expression of view that his department made last December; that there was some expression of opinion by officers of his department that, as this report was merely temporary or interim, they would not feel themselves bound by it, and that in the face of such a conditional expression of view they were quite justified in March of this year in declaring that the final report would be put into effect. Have I misstated in the slightest degree, have I coloured in any way, what the minister said? The minister took good care not to read the undertaking given. This was an undertaking given by his department in response to an inquiry by business men in order that they might know how they should address themselves to the task of making their engagements for this year. If it was not of any importance, why would they have made the inquiry? Did they make it just for the fun of sending the telegram? It was because it was of business consequence to them; surely every hon. member will admit that—unless he wants to sit above and in judgment over them and declare that he knows their business better than they. The answer given to the inquiry by the Deputy Minister of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, sent from Ottawa on December 23, was as follows:

> No action will be taken on commission's report that will affect next season, therefore existing regulations and policy, including reduction in oriental licenses decided upon last June, will govern industry next year.
> A. JOHNSTON,
> Deputy Minister.

The minister would lead the House to believe that in the face of that pledge, as direct, as unequivocal, as inescapable a pledge as ever a department gave or ever a man gave, he is free now to tell these people that the regulations will be changed; that there will be not a 10 per cent reduction as fixed for this year, but a 40 per cent reduction, notwithstanding anything they may have done on the faith of that telegram.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my right hon. friend say that is too much?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is as far from the point as he was at the beginning, and it is hopeless for me to bring him to it.

Mr. MARTELL: That is no answer. Is my right hon. friend afraid of a 40 per cent reduction of Japanese licenses?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I stand in my place long enough to bring the commissioner himself to an understanding of the argument, I am afraid I shall impose upon the House. All my efforts so far have been in vain so far as he is concerned, but perhaps that is a credit to my efforts after all. Well, having received that pledge from the department, they ask for confirmation. Here is what they get in reply to their wire:

> Your understanding re reduction oriental licenses including trolling correct. Oriental licenses district 2 are to be attached. Reduction to each cannery to be made on number employed this year, preference being given returned soldiers and residents who are bona fide fishermen.
> W. A. FOUND.

Mr. Found, I understand, is Superintendent of Fisheries in the department. So that two leading officers in this department—for whose words and whose undertakings the minister takes responsibility now, and rightly so; he places himself in the position of having signed these telegrams himself—give that assurance to these people, on the faith of which they act. They now come to the government and say. You declare to us that you are not going to abide by that promise; you declare you are going to put into effect a forty per cent reduction. Does the question as to the rightness of the forty per cent reduction come in? Is that an issue now? No hon. gentleman, except possibly one, would ever suggest it was. The other parties to the contract come and say: As the result of the pledge you gave us we have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars; if you break that pledge, we are heavy losers. Now, is it the right of this House to judge whether they are losers or not? Is it the right of the government? I ask the hon. Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) or any member of the government this: Suppose he made a contract with a second party and after the second party had solemnly agreed to the undertaking the minister went ahead to carry it out. Suppose he got his operations well under way and the other party came and said: I cannot abide by the contract; I am going to break it here and now—would he think he had the right or the other party had the right to say whether he was damaged or not? Let us put the government to the test? Will this government undertake to stand liable for the damages to the British Columbia fisheries if they are established before the Exchequer Court? Will the government in this debate undertake to make themselves liable for any damage these men prove they have suffered as the result of the breach of contract by the administration?

Mr. MARTELL: Who said it was a breach of contract?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let them establish it, if they can, before the Exchequer Court of Canada; and if they do, will this government pay the damages? Unless they are ready to make that undertaking, then all the talk they have given us in this debate is just so much froth.

Mr. MARTELL: What about your own?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members must always ask leave of the hon. member who has the floor before interrupting him to put a question. The only interruption provided for in the mass of precedents is sometimes a mild "hear, hear."

Mr. MEIGHEN: In case, Mr. Speaker, there should be any doubt, let me emphasize that your ruling applies even to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell).

Mr. MARTELL: And it doubly applies to the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me emphasize before I sit down that this undertaking does not make any reference whatever to any condition; it is that the commission's report will not be followed for 1923, and it states that throughout that year the regulations that applied last year and the reduction that went into effect as of June of last year will apply for this year. Thus those men were authorized to go ahead on the faith of the pledge of the department. All I want to bring home to the House is this: Those are the terms of the undertaking given, an undertaking which is confirmed by the Superintendent of Fisheries of the department.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MEIGHEN: All these things were known to the minister when on the first of March last he told those engaged in the salmon fisheries in British Columbia—

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. gentleman—

Mr. MEIGHEN:—that the government did not propose to abide by that undertaking.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will appeal to the Speaker to bring the hon. member for Hants within the range of the courtesies of parliament.

Mr. MARTELL: I wish to ask my right hon. friend a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps there is some reason for special indulgence to the member for Hants at this particular time. Now, the commission, whether or not any member of it had knowledge of the pledge does not matter, was not asked to report as to what the action of the department should be in relation to any special undertaking of the department; it was asked to report what the policy of the department should be in relation to the conditions in the fisheries industry of British Columbia. That was what they had to base their finding on, and that alone. So far as I know, no hon. member on this side had knowledge that such a pledge would be or was given. I do know that no hon. member on this side, not even the member of the commission, had knowledge of that pledge. I know that he would have repudiated it, or rather would have stated that no such pledge should have been given; that the minister had no right to give it during the pendency of the work of the commission. The report of the commission had no relation to any undertaking of the department, and so far as I know, no hon. member on this side had any knowledge at all of that undertaking. Had he had such knowledge; had the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) or the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) had knowledge of the undertaking, they would not have been justified in having regard to it in making their report. I have not the slightest doubt that they would have paid no attention to the undertaking in determining their duty in relation to the finding of the commission. They had to make a finding on the facts connected with the fisheries industry, what they believed to be best for the industry in British Columbia, and were it not for this undertaking which the minister should not have given, but which he has given, every one of them would want the report in force, and in force at once. Now it is very easy for us to stand here and say, Oh, these men have not suffered any damage, they can get white men. Everybody knows another man's business usually except that other man himself. We say that aside from pledges no matter whether it is of damage to them or not, the public interest must be considered, and that in the adoption of a general policy as to fisheries there must be a reduction of Japanese licenses. If they are told that in advance and are told to make their arrangements in advance, then, whatever loss there may be, that loss is certainly not chargeable to us; we have done the best we could to make it the least possible. But when they are told the very opposite in advance, that no reduction will be made beyond what was made last year, and they make all their arrangements and all their engagements accordingly, surely it is hardly the part of dignity or of honesty for this government to say: You do not know what you are talking about; you think you have been damaged, but you have not been; we will be the judges whether you are damaged or not—we who at the very moment are admittedly breaking the pledge we gave.

That is the case, as I understand it, of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), and it seems to me that the matter of the honour and the good faith of parliament and of government is surely yet of some consequence in this country. I know it has been seriously tampered with of recent months. Hon. members on all sides of this House know that. Hon. members opposite have had their own newspapers calling it in their ears month after month since their conduct has been disclosed to the people of Canada. But still it is of some importance. How can we establish courts of justice through the country in order to compel individuals each with the other to keep his contract if we set the example of violating contracts ourselves, callously and with impunity? The first duty of government is to hold to every engagement it makes—to uphold the honour of the state. If we fail to do that, we will soon find the effects in disrespect for parliament, disrespect for government, and a general lowering of morale throughout the whole country.

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena): As a member of the fisheries commission I wish to say that I was thoroughly apprised of the notification issued on the 22nd day of December in regard to the proposal to reduce the number of fishing licenses other than to whites and Indians by ten per cent. I did all within my power to have that regulation become non-operative. I was thoroughly convinced that the industry would not suffer if the reduction were made forty per cent.

In connection with the submission of our report, the majority report and the minority report, one thing was sure, that the desire of the whole commission was that the recommendations should become operative for the year 1923. I presume that I have received copies of all telegrams that have been flooding the capital since this controversy commenced, and I notice that one of the forces used in connection with their argument is the condition in which the canning industry finds itself to-day. Each and every telegram claims that they are suffering loss and are liable to suffer tremendous losses by reason of Siberian competition. The canners, I think, find themselves in this position, that for years they have carried on their operations without hindrance from the people of Canada. They have hired whomsoever they would, with the result that the people whom they have employed for a great number of years in their canneries have learned the cannery business and have gone over to Siberia and established themselves in the canning business there, and they are now competitors in the world's markets. That is one complaint which the cannery people of British Columbia make to-day, of the competition of orientals and foreigners, who, I am free to say, learnt their trade in the shops of the canners of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length. If I got this question right, the issue before the House is this: The department made a pronouncement on the 22nd day of December to the effect that a ten per cent reduction would be made. Recently another pronouncement was made that the reduction would be forty per cent. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) claim that this is a breach of faith and that the further reduction should not come into operation. If I understood the member for Vancouver South correctly, he said that much loss would accrue to the cannery people by reason of the increased reduction. The minister has pointed out that even as yet there have been no licenses issued. We have made an alteration apparently between December and March. But the door is still open, as I understand it; modification can still be made, and I would ask the hon. member for Burrard and the hon. member for Vancouver South to put their sincerity to the test and to move here and now that the regulations be altered so as to revert to the ten per cent reduction or whatever other proportion they may deem proper and right.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I would like to begin by confirming the statement made by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that American canners do not use Japanese in their fishing industry. I believe they use some in their canneries, the same as is done in Canada, but not in the fishing industry.

One of the members from Vancouver made the remark that the cannery men were liable to suffer heavy loss owing to having made big advances to fishermen, and the hon. member for Lunenburg challenged him to say with whom these contracts were made, and he made the suggestion that these contracts were made with Japanese. The hon. member for Vancouver demanded proof of that fact. I think I am in a position to give him proof. One has only got to look at the patent facts. The restrictions proposed to be made on these licenses deal only with Japanese. There are no restrictions on Indians or whites. Consequently if the cannery man made a contract with an Indian or a white a month or a year in advance, nothing would happen to them. The cannery man could not lose on these fellows because there is no restriction with regard to them as to the number of licenses to be issued. The only restrictions are as to the number to be issued to the Japanese, and it must follow that it is on contracts with Japanese that they are standing to lose. The matter is a small one and I see no reason why the hon. member should have been ashamed to tell the facts that the cannery men fear they are going to lose something on their contracts made in advance with their Japanese friends.

I know the point made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and also by the hon. member for Vancouver South. The point is in part well taken. They claim that the grievance of the cannery men is not the reduction of the Japanese licenses but the failure to carry out a pledge made by someone in the Marine and Fisheries department. I thoroughly understand that is the point to which they wish to confine the debate, but you cannot confine it to that narrow issue because the cannery men's position is clearly set forth in their telegrams and according to what they say the issue cannot be so narrowed down. If the cannery men stood to make money out of this departure from the pledge given by somebody in the Fisheries department do we suppose they would be coming here complaining? This action is taken because of the cannery men's fear that they are going to lose money, and that is why their cause is being championed here. Therefore it is entirely legitimate for us to consider, in reviewing the whole question whether they are or are not going to lose money in consequence of this alleged change of policy on the part of the Fisheries department.

There is another thing that I would like to point out. While the changes have been rung on the terms "10 per cent" and "40 per cent" that is hardly a fair thing. That only applies to one river, and possibly two—the Skeena and the Naas—it does not apply to the other rivers. Now, the regulations suggested by the department were not that the 10 per cent should apply all over British Columbia, and it is quite unfair to use that as a comparison as against 40 per cent. It is done to create the idea that some sudden, violent, drastic change has been carried out by the department in consequence of the report of the Fisheries Commission. That is not so. The scale of reductions suggested by the departmental officials runs from 10 per cent in one case up to as high as 50 per cent in some places; and while I would not suggest that 40 per cent is the average, because it would not be so, still I wish to press the point that it is not a comparison between the 10 and 40 per cent but possibliy, on one or two cases at least, between 50 per cent and 40 per cent. The 40 per cent is probably more than the average but still there are a number of places where it was graded from 10, 15, 25, 40 and 50 per cent.

Now as to the report of the Fisheries Commission, in nearly every instance the cannery men themselves appreciated the fact that the economic situation in British Columbia was so desperate in regard to the white population that they admitted—reluctantly in most cases but they did admit—that a reduction was coming. They, of course, wanted to make the reduction as low as possible, because they think it is profitable to hire Japanese, but they did in nearly every instance, with the exception of one or two—and we heard some 197 witnesses in all—agree that a reduction was coming, so they lent themselves, at least, to some reduction. Now, the great point stressed in the letters and in the telegrams to the department, some of which were read this afternoon, was that the cannery men would be in a hole on account of this restriction; that they would not be able to get white or Indian fishermen to take the place of those restricted. That is the sum and substance of their argument. Well, I would like to ask those gentlemen who are championing their cause so ably this afternoon if they ever made any attempt to get white or Indian fishermen? It is on record—when speaking on the subject of immigration I quoted from a newspaper clipping stating the fact—that 30 or 40 Norwegian fishermen had passed through Winnipeg on their way to Prince Rupert, where the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) resides, to engage in the fisheries industry, induced, no doubt, by the expected reduction of Japanese licenses. Now, if there is likely to be any shortage of fishermen as a result of this reduction in Japanese licenses there is a source from which the canners can get men to take their places. Canners will not get very many fishermen by simply sitting in their offices and sending out telegrams.

There is another point to which I would like to draw attention. The importance of this fight, I may say, centres round the Skeena river because it is there where the department's reduction was 10 per cent and 40 per cent was recommended by the commission. We took ample evidence there. We spent a lot of time on the Skeena river which is a most important river—probably the most important river—in British Columbia now in salmon production and the evidence ran—I have not the figures at present, the debate has been brought on so suddenly—but speaking from recollection I think the united Japanese, white and Indian fishermen on that river last year would be in the neighbourhood of 1,100 or 1,080, of which 600 or 700 would be Japanese, or it may be 680. Man after man, of their own accord, swore in the witness box that the fishing would be much better on the Skeena river, if, and had been much better, when, there were only 800 boats on that river. Some of the cannery men themselves pleaded with us to go back to the old system of restricted licenses and only to put 800 boats on. They said it would be much better for the cannery men, and much better for the conservation of the fish. If a reduction of 40 per cent is made on the Skeena river it will only bring the number of fishermen down to something like the former number of 800, even if no extra whites are obtained. If the records are consulted of the number of salmon taken on the Skeena river during the last ten years it will be found that the greatest quantity was caught when the number of boats allowed was only 800. And possibly therefore the cannery men will not be ruined, possibly they will not be bankrupt, if the reduction to 40 per cent is made, because when there were 800 boats at work the fishery enured to the profit of the canneryman. I am not saying that we should not take the word of the cannery men, but if you were to ask me for my candid opinion of their telegrams, as to whether I thought they were entirely accurate, I would say, certainly not. We had evidence given last year before our Fisheries committee of the House where cannery men came and swore what the results would be if certain action were not taken. One gentleman said: My cannery will not run again if you do not do so and so. I made it my business during the tour of the commission last year to inquire whether the cannery of the gentleman who had made this statement was still running and, singular to relate, I found he was still running his canneries in spite of his statement on oath that if we did not do what he wanted us to do he would close up his establishment. I do not say that the cannery men are less credible than any other body of men engaged in promoting their own interest; it is only human nature for a man who is seeking some favour from the government to exaggerate his case to the very limit.

While our interim report was not given to the department, I find, until December, the recommendation was well known in British Columbia before that.

Mr. DUNCAN: How did it become known in British Columbia?

Mr. NEILL: The information leaked out through some official or officials. Before the commission adjourned we had agreed to keep the matter secret until the chairman had presented the report; but the recommendation became known in British Columbia before he got as far as Winnipeg on his way home. Now why did not the cannery men, if they were sensible business men, after hearing of our interim report, wait a little while until they found out what was going to be done? The minister has dealt with what we might refer to as the December pledge, but there is also what I may refer to as the June pledge. The hon. member for Burrard,—and to-day is the first time I heard of it, in almost the first sentence of his speech used these words: "The department in June assured the canners"—in British Columbia of course—"that irrespective of the report of the commission no change would be made." Now we did not meet until the middle or end of August and yet in June those cannery men were assured by somebody in the department that it did not matter what our report was they were perfectly safe, no change would be made. I think that is the most remarkable and the most important statement that has been made here to-day, and an investigation into that is of far greater importance, in the interests of the fishing industry of British Columbia, than the question that is more immediately before us to-day. Who sent that statement, who gave that assurance, and at whose solicitation was it done? This assurance did not come like a bolt from the blue. I submit it is reasonable to say that the cannery men in British Columbia asked for that assurance before they got it, and if that is so then I submit that there is—what shall I say—a fraternity that bodes no good to the public weal between the cannery men in British Columbia and some officials in this city or elsewhere. I do not know from whom or where the assurance came. It may have come from Ottawa or from elsewhere, but wherever it comes from, it shows there is too great an association between some of the cannery men and government officials. Long before this commission was in existence we had reason to entertain this idea, and we have had reason to entertain the opinion since. If the cannery men of British Columbia feel that they have any grievance, if they feel that they have not been dealt with fairly, they had better seek redress from those who gave them the assurance they had no business to give, which assurance no right thinking government or minister should support. In other words, let them seek redress from their friends who gave them the unjustified assurance.

There is just one other matter I wish to refer to. The Minister has commented on the difference between the attitude of some hon. members from British Columbia when we were discussing last year in a more or less academic way the subject of Asiatic exclusion, always a popular thing to spread oneself on, and to-day when it came to the practical application of those principles. But I can assure the hon. minister that there is a saving element in the members from British Columbia who are truly consistent in the matter, who neither employ nor affiliate themselves with employers of Japanese. We have nothing to do with them, and poor and weak prophets though we may be, we have not bowed the knee to Baal, nor worshipped at the shrine of the Golden Calf.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): As one of the members of the Fisheries Commission, I presume it would be in order for me to make a few remarks. I wish to be as brief as possible, but I would like to put my position fairly before this House.

In so far as the object of the mover of this resolution is concerned, in drawing attention of hon. members to the fact that pledges were given by the department to the canners of British Columbia, and to the fact that those pledges were not redeemed, I would say this. If it is admitted that the pledges were made, I would agree with the mover and seconder of the resolution that this House should express its disapproval of such undertaking being given under the circumtances. I think when a matter of this kind is before a commission, the commission's report should be received before the policy of the department is enunciated. That appears not to have been the case. I think there is something radically wrong somewhere, and I deplore, with the hon. mover and seconder of this resolution, the fact that these undertakings were given. I am not prepared to admit, however, that great hardship is going to be suffered if the recommendations of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission are carried out. I do not believe for one moment that the canners of British Columbia are not going to be able to secure the necessary men to fish during the coming season. I believe that the Japanese who have been displaced, or who will be displaced, will be replaced by white men and by Indians, and there are plenty of them to do the work. I think plenty of experienced men will be available. I do not think that the cannery men are going to be hurt in that respect, but even if it turns out to be the fact that fewer men will be employed during the coming season than might otherwise have been employed if there had been no reduction in Japanese licenses, then I say that it will be a good thing for the fisheries. There is great need for the conservation of our British Columbia fisheries. I have watched this thing going on for a long time, and I have seen a pack on the Fraser river of 990,000 cases of sockeye salmon in 1913. I saw, in a corresponding big year, namely 1921, about 39,000 cases of sockeye salmon packed. There has been a depletion also in other districts. So far as the Fraser river is concerned, we have various causes to refer to, which possibly were not within our control at all; for instance the slide at Hell's Gate, which filled up the Fraser river in such a way that the fish could not get up to spawn that year. Then there is the fishing done by the Americans on Puget Sound. That is in district No. 1. Those causes possibly were beyond our control. But up in district No. 2 we have ourselves to blame if there is any depletion in our salmon fisheries.

5 p.m.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I ask the hon member not to discuss any matter other than the motion which is before the House. The question of the salmon fisheries in British Columbia is not at issue on this motion. It would form by itself a subject of a special substantive motion. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member not to discuss that matter.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I will endeavour not to wander, in fact I do not think I was wandering, with all due respect. What I was arguing was this: That even if there were not as many fishermen employed this year in the British Columbia waters, it would be a good thing for the conservation of the fish, and consequently it would be a good thing for those interested in fisheries, the cannery men as well as the others.

Something has been said as to the information which the members of the Fishery Commission had in regard to the pledges made by the department, and I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I saw in the press of British Columbia some time last winter a statement that no changes would be made during the coming year. I will not contend for a moment that I was labouring under any false impression or any misapprehension as to true conditions. I heard that this statement had been made—at least, it was stated in the press that an arrangement of that kind had been arrived at. So that I came down to Ottawa with my eyes open. I am in the same position as the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), and when we discussed our official report we did so with the information that some such statement had been made. But as far as these definite and concrete pledges are concerned, they were not before us.

Now on the other phase of the question, whether there will be this 40 per cent reduction or not, I must say that I stand by the report of the Fisheries Commission. I think the cut is justified, and I think credit is due to the minister for carrying out the recommendations of the Fisheries Commission. As far as I am concerned, ever since I came to this House—and I was in the last parliament—I have hammered away on this question of the number of Japanese employed in the British Columbia fisheries, and I must say that I appreciated the action of the government and of the minister in referring the question of the British Columbia fisheries to the standing committee on Marine and Fisheries, because that committee up to that time, so far as British Columbia fisheries were concerned, had been dead. I say that the minister is entitled to credit for having given his permission to refer the matter of British Columbia fisheries to the standing committee. He is also entitled to credit for having agreed to the appointment of the sub-committee which went out to British Columbia, because if that sub-committee had not gone out there the fishing interests, and particularly the fishermen would not have been able to place their case before this parliament or before the committee. I feel that the minister is entitled to credit for having appointed that commission, and if he is now going to carry out its recommendations he should also be given credit for that. The British Columbia Fisheries Commission gave everyone an opportunity to be heard. We went into all the different districts and gave every interest a fair chance. Some of the interests that were concerned did not avail themselves of that opportunity; they were inclined to pooh-pooh the commission altogether. Well, that is their fault, not ours, because as I have said everyone was given the fullest opportunity to be heard. Nobody was prevented from giving his evidence; and I will say for the chairman of the commission and the other members of it who are not of the same party as myself, that they carried out their duties in a conscientious manner and treated everyone fairly. So far as I can see they used their best judgment in coming to their conclusions, and I agree with them in the report that they have submitted, except in one particular which has been referred to. I do not wish for a moment to be placed in the position of backing up any misstatement or misrepresentation which has been made, but I do say that I stand by the report of the Fisheries Commission and am of the opinion that it should be carried out. We should make the 40 per cent cut this year, and I do not believe that the canners or anyone else will be harmed thereby. I am firmly convinced that if we make this cut and stick to it, and make other reductions later on as conditions warrant, we shall get the fisheries back into the control of the white men and Indians as it should be. That would be better for British Columbia, I am sure, and better for the whole of Canada.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): As one of the members who happen to have been honoured by appointment to the Fisheries Commission, I agree with a great deal of what has been said this afternoon. I do not, however, agree with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who endeavoured to take an unfair advantage of the fact that he had the floor. I do not presume to be a modern Pythagoras, like the leader of the Opposition, who sets up a premise of his own devising, the fruit of his own imagination, and arrives at a conclusion altogether irrespective of whether that conclusion is justified by logic or not. So far as the forty per cent reduction in Japanese licenses is concerned, I may say that during the time the commission sat in British Columbia I was probably one of the most strenuous opponents to oriental fishermen being permitted to engage in Canadian fisheries. After hearing all the evidence, however, I concluded that I was possibly too harsh in the judgment which I had previously arrived at, and when we came to draw up our conclusions, with a view to unanimity the reduction was placed at forty per cent, although I may remark—and I do not think it is unprofessional to do so—that there were members of the commission who wished at one fell stroke to make the reduction 100 per cent. While I did not sign a minority report I was almost compelled to come to the decision that was reached by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) that in view of the lateness of the season we were probably taking the canners unaware. The canners, however, were and are well organized and they are in a fit position to look after themselves. In the light of all the evidence that subsequently came before the commission I concluded, therefore, that I could best serve the interests of the country and of the fisheries by agreeing with the majority, who decided that it was time to have a reduction of forty per cent.

I do not believe that I am giving away any secret of the commission when I say that the idea of the majority was not only a reduction of forty per cent but that there should be such a forty per cent reduction at the outset, and a sufficient reduction from year to year looking to the total exclusion of Asiatics from the British Columbia fisheries within a period of five years. So that I think the British Columbia canners have reason to congratulate themselves that they are not faced to-day with a recommendation calling for a one hundred per cent reduction instanter instead of a gradual reduction with a view to the total exclusion of Asiatics from these fisheries within five years. As the report now stands, all that the commission has recommended is a reduction of forty per cent for this year. We are now functus officio so to speak; and our duties have been discharged. Had we recommended to the minister what was in the mind of the majority of the commissioners at the time of the drafting of the interim report we should now be contemplating the total exclusion of Asiatics at once or within five years. I repeat, therefore, that those British Columbia canners who employ Asiatics should congratulate themselves on the fact that they have not to contend with the extreme of what was in the mind of the commission at the time of the making of the report.

Something has been said about what some of the departmental officials stated to the British Columbia trade during the time that the commission was functioning. I have no brief whatever for the departmental officials, but I believe that they were actuated by sincere motives. We may not all agree that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is perfectly administered; but the acme of efficiency is not to be found in any branch of the service, any more than it is to be found in any department of the business world. I believe, however, that the Department of Marine and Fisheries were actuated by the very best of motives. At the time when this letter, which has been read, was given to the people we had put in an interim report. The department had no knowledge of the time when the final report would be received. There was no definitely stated time as to when we would submit that report. True enough, if we had put the country to the expense of calling the members of the commission from British Columbia and from the Maritime provinces to meet in solemn conclave in the city of Ottawa to consider the matter and then make a report, the department would have been in a position to give definite information to the trade in British Columbia as to what they could expect for the present year. But it was not deemed advisable that the commissioners should all come together in Ottawa prior to a session of parliament. Therefore a letter was written to the British Columbia canners informing them that so far as could be foreseen nothing definite would be done for the year 1923. However, pursuant to the promise made by the right hon. the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), parliament met towards the close of January of this year and the commissioners had an opportunity of coming together. They considered the evidence they had received in British Columbia, together with various matters that had been presented by the canners and others from that province in the way of telegrams, letters and memoranda. However in the light of the evidence adduced and our visit to the locus in quo we came to the conclusion that it would be in the best interests of the country that a forty per cent reduction should be made this year, and we notified the minister accordingly. After a conference with his officials and taking all the circumstances into consideration, undoubtedly the minister concluded that this reduction should be carried out this season.

To my mind the canners of British Columbia have not been in any way handicapped by the action taken. A canner must estimate what his pack is going to be for the next year so that he may be in a position to buy his tin for his containers and all his other supplies. As a result of this forty per cent reduction of licenses to Japanese fishermen he is not restrained from getting the catch that he estimated, because he has the opportunity of employing whites and Indians to make up the deficiency. Therefore the putting into effect of this forty per cent reduction will not prevent the British Columbia canner from getting his estimated amount of fish. It is interesting to observe that on the basis of the amount of fish the Japanese caught last year the reduction of their licenses by forty per cent will not affect the estimated amount of any canner's business by more than ten per cent and, as I have already said, he can make up this difference by employing whites and Indians, and the consequence will be no loss to the canner and the encouragement of white fishermen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not leading the government. I have been termed a radical and everything else imaginable almost, but this I know and know full well that I am a Canadian animated with the desire to see justice done to my fellow Canadians. I do not admit that I entertain all the varied views imputed to me, but I do claim to know one or two things about the fisheries in which my forebears were engaged at the place of my birth, and from my experience as an official of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for years—I believe some weeks of which were under you, Mr. Speaker—I truly claim to know at least something about the fisheries and the administration thereof in this country. On the strength of that knowledge I say, in all fairness to my colleagues who were engaged with me in the department, in all fairness to the white fishermen of this country, and in all fairness to the excellent man who is now Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), that they have done what is right. I do not believe there is a Canadian citizen from Cape Breton to Vancouver Island who will condemn either the report of the fisheries commission or the action of the minister in putting its recommendations into effect. Therefore, before attempting to take any advantage, political or otherwise, from the report—which I believe is in the best interests of this country—any hon. member who stands up in this House and makes allegations should be seized of the facts before doing so, and not make vainglorious declamations against the action of the minister when these allegations are based upon a vivid imagination and ignorance of conditions.

My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who is not in his seat at the moment, took advantage of the fact that he had the floor and would not permit me to ask him a certain question, for undoubtedly he showed up his pretensions and instead of giving a pertinent answer, seized the opportunity to indulge in some characteristic insinuations. If he were in his place, I would tell him that though he possesses the title of "right honourable," and I am simply a humble hon. member, I would be glad to meet him on any platform or in any forum to discuss the rights of the fishermen of this country.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has done right in putting into effect what the people have demanded. My hon. friends from British Columbia on both sides of the House stood in their places last year and voted for Asiatic exclusion. My colleagues and I got along most amicably together on the fisheries commission. To this commission I submit must be accorded the credit of having recommended to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the hon. minister must be credited therewith, the first practical step that has ever been taken by the government of Canada to make British Columbia a white country—something which the people have been fighting for for many years. Consequently when the right hon. leader of the Opposition stands in his place and tries to appease the British Columbia canners by attacking the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries for endeavouring to make that province a white country by putting into effect practical fisheries' regulations—regulations that will not only make the province a better country for the white man but a better country for good fishermen to live in, I say he is doing something which is not consistent either with the best interests of British Columbia or of the Dominion generally.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay) (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that if my hon. friend for Burrard (Mr. Clark) and his seconder, the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Ladner) had realized where this discussion would lead them they would not have precipitated it this afternoon. Personally, and as a representative from the province of British Columbia, I rather regret the course that has been followed by them, for the simple reason that I believe it is the desire of the members from my province to show a united front in regard to orientals. However, I am not going to discuss that phase of the matter.

During the discussion some fairly thin ice has been crossed. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) stated that if the fisheries commission which was appointed to examine into the question under discussion, and who made a careful and exhaustive study of conditions last summer in the various ports of British Columbia, had known that these instructions had gone out in December from the Fisheries department they would not have brought in the recommendations which they later rendered. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), a member of that commission, stated that it was only known to him through the press or through channels of gossip or conversation that such instructions had gone out. Now, Sir, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the minds of hon. members in regard to the knowledge that the commissioners had, I would read a short letter dated December 23rd, 1922. It is as follows:

> Dear Mr. McQuarrie,—In view of the fact that the final report of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission, of which you are a member, will not be submitted until after the House meets, and as it is embarrassing to the whole industry to have frequent changes in the regulations and policy governing it, it has been deemed best to await the final report of the commission before reaching decisions on the recommendations contained in the interim report.
> Hence those engaging in the industry have been advised that no action will be taken on the report that will affect the season of 1923. This does not involve that there will be no reduction in the number of fishery licenses that will be available to naturalized orientals. The reduction of such licenses that was decided upon last June, before the appointment of the commission, will be effective so far as next year is concerned.

This letter signed by the Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Bureau) was sent to each and every member of the commission, so the commissioners in drawing their final report had knowledge of the action of the department at that date.

Now, what did the commissioners do in the face of that knowledge? In their final report to the minister they say:

> The representations that have been made by the various interests concerned in the British Columbia fisheries, as well as the objections raised by certain officials of the department since the publication of the commission's interim report have been carefully considered by the commissioners before the writing of their final report. Our conclusions and recommendations as hereinafter set forth have therefore been reached and agreed upon in the full light of the said further representations.

So we have this position—and it has not been fairly represented to-day—that the commission which spent last summer investigating this problem in order that we might reach proper conclusions upon it, the fishing interests, were advised that the regulations would continue with the reduction as proposed last June, over 1923, and the commission, in the face of that, recommended to the minister that their report, involving a forty per cent reduction, should be carried out. That change in policy took place in February of this year, some three or four months before the opening of the fishing season. I do not believe there is sound ground for the complaint that is made here to-day. I do not believe this is an urgent matter or one that requires such a debate as we have had here this afternoon.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think it must be apparent to the House that the minister has made no satisfactory explanation of his course in blowing hot and cold in this matter. No sufficient reason has been given for breaking what to all intents and purposes was understood by the canners of British Columbia as a pledge. The government's action was not businesslike; it was unfair to the canners. My conclusion is that the minister, or his department, for which he must take responsibility, was too hasty in sending out that first telegram, for which there was no necessity; too hasty in making that pledge by wire. A promise, or what can fairly be considered as a promise, was made; it could not be kept—at any rate, the government determined that it should not be kept, with the consequence that somebody has been injured. Well, that often happens, and the government must take the consequences and pay the damages if there are damages. For myself I have not much sympathy with people who make losses through the employment of orientals. I think it is better to let them take the consequences; they will probably be less likely to employ orientals in the future and will have less to do with them. I do think that the canners might very well have been put on their guard by the wording of that telegram, which was to the effect that irrespective of the findings of the commission there would be no changes in the regulations. That should have been a warning to them that the report of the commission might have the effect of bringing about a change in the regulations. It is true that the action of the minister brings about a result that is most desirable I say, to the great majority of the people of British Columbia, namely, a reduction of the employment of orientals in the industry in that province, and I am sure that no one would be more pleased with that result than the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). No one would be better pleased with that result than they, and I am sure they can congratulate themselves on the effort made by them at the last session, and particularly by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) in impressing upon this House and the government the need for action to curb oriental immigration into British Columbia. They can, I say, very well congratulate themselves upon the fact that their efforts have met with some success. But on the other hand I think that the minister should acknowledge the mistake—that is, the mistake of the department—and not attempt to take refuge behind the popularity of the anti-oriental movement with the idea of covering up his mistake, because that quite evidently is the object of the attempt put forth by him and his supporters here to-day. But, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Meighen) has said, no member is so dull as to be misled by this old device of drawing a herring across the trail; even though we are talking about fish, no one is to be diverted by that from the point raised by this resolution. The point is that what the canners understood as a pledge was given by the minister, and for reasons which are perhaps well grounded he has seen fit not to carry out that pledge but has rather made a much more material reduction in the number of Japanese licenses. That is the point under discussion in connection with this resolution, not the question whether Japanese licenses should be reduced or abolished. For my part I support any administration that takes action to meet the oriental menace, which is in fact a real one. But as I say, no one should be misled by the putting forward of the anti-oriental question with the view of covering up the mistake made by the government in this instance.

Motion withdrawn.

CODE NAPOLEON

STATEMENT BY MR. ARCHAMBAULT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, referring to Hansard of yesterday, during the discussion on the Bankruptcy Act, I find that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) said, as reported at page 1,587.

> I thought in this country we got most of our good models of law from England; that they were always safe guides for us to use. Indeed, I think both my hon. friend and myself found in our practise of law that the English law is pretty good; that English cases are pretty sound; that English precedents are very reliable, and that when we follow them, we are usually on safe ground. . . .
> Mr. Archambault: Has the hon. member ever heard of the Code Napoleon?
> Mr. McQuarrie: The hon. gentleman sees fit to be facetious again.
> Mr. Archambault: No, I am most serious. . . . Will the hon. member answer my question?
> Mr. McQuarrie: He is very funny I know.
> Mr. Archambault: My hon. friend does not know what the Code Napoleon is. I am glad to know that.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, I did a great injustice to the hon. member. I wish to apologize to him, because at the time I put my question I was under the impression that the hon. member was a lawyer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL STATEMENT BY THE ACTING MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I would like to ask the indulgence of the House while I present the statement annually made concerning the railway situation as it affects the government-owned lines. The subject will be very dry—nearly as dry as sock-eye salmon on land—but I wish to place this mass of figures on Hansard so that hon. members may have the opportunity of reading the statement and coming to their own conclusions.

As is generally known, the audit of the railway accounts is continuous and has been practically completed, with the exception of the signing of the balance sheet, which is expected to be reached in the course of a few days. The figures to which I am about to refer may therefore be regarded as final.

I shall have to ask the House to bear with me while I stick very closely to the documents before me. I would scarcely call this statement a speech, but rather a rehearsal of the figures showing the condition of the Canadian National Railways System.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): For what fiscal year?

Mr. GRAHAM: For the year ending December 31, 1922. In referring to the Canadian National Railways, members of the House will bear in mind that up till October last the entities that made up the system managed by the Canadian Northern board were designated the Canadian National Railways. I shall deal with this system first and then with the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister not wrong in the date? Was it not up to January of this year?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. I shall have to explain again as my hon. friend again was out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was up to January 31 of this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: The statement is up to December 31 of last year. I was referring to the birth of the Canadian National Railways by bringing into force the act of 1919 under which that company was created. First, I will give the operated mileage of the lines that now constitute the Canadian National railway system (all lines):

As I pointed out a moment ago, I propose first to deal with what was known as the Canadian National railway system prior to October last.

General Conditions throughout 1922

Before dealing with the income account, Canadian National Railways, a word or two concerning conditions and circumstances affecting 1922 operations might not be amiss. The gross earnings for 1922 decreased by $6,866,509.93. Freight, passenger and express earnings were all less than in 1921. The decrease in passenger traffic is a disappointment in view of the improved quality of service provided, and also in view of the fact that the rate for passenger travel in Canada is, generally speaking, slightly below the prevailing rates in the United States. A good year was expected, and provided for, but the traffic did not materialize.

While the tonnage of freight carried was slightly higher, and the average haul and train loading improved, the freight earnings fell off to the extent of $3,901,611.86, and the average rate per ton per mile—ton-mile rate—fell from 1.041 cents in 1921 to .889 cent in 1922, a decrease of 14.6 per cent.

It so happened that the improvement in traffic was largely confined to the final half of the year when reduced rates were in effect. I am offering no opinion as to whether the improvement in traffic was due to the reduction in rates or to a good crop and consequent general improvement in business, but this much can be said: that on account of its widespread mileage in the nine provinces, the traffic movement of the Canadian National Railways is a reliable indication of the state of trade in the country as a whole.

System car loading improved in the early months of the year, and appreciably so from towards the end of April, when, until the crop commenced to move, a daily loading of from two to three hundred cars more than the previous year was maintained. During the crop movement the improvement averaged a thousand cars a day. The all-rail movement of grain, which commenced in October, three months earlier than usual, contributed to the density of freight traffic on eastern lines. It is estimated that the restoration of the Crowsnest rates on grain reduced the earnings during the last half of the year by six and a half million dollars. Notwithstanding this reduction in rates, the earnings exceeded the operating expenses in September, October and November. In each of the other nine months there was an adverse balance, the smallest deficit occurring in May and the heaviest in January, February and December.

In making the statement that the restoration of the Crowsnest pass rates reduced the earnings during the last half of the year by six and a half million dollars, that estimate, of course, is based on the assumption that had the old rates remained the traffic would have been as heavy.

Income Account

The gross operating revenue for the year was $120,135,956.71, as against $127,002,466.64 in 1921; the operating expenses $129,872,274.75 as against $143,222,802.55; leaving a net deficit from railway operation of $9,736,318.04, as compared with $16,220,335.91 for the previous year.

The addition of tax accruals—which by way, are not classed by railway accountants as real operating expenses—brings the total operating deficit for 1922 up to $11,085,081.33 as against $17,805,365.16 for 1921. Non-operating income—car rentals, rental of joint facilities, express, mails, elevators, etc.— amounting this year to $5,644,217.22, is offset by the usual deductions from gross income—hire of equipment, joint facilities, etc.—amounting to $4,421,180.49, leaving the total deficit before fixed charges $9,862,044.60, as compared with $16,212,063.22 in 1921.

The fixed charges amounted, in 1922, to $41,-241,252.31, of which $32,711,546.22 pertain to the Canadian Northern, and $8,529,706.09 to the Grand Trunk Pacific. These fixed charges swell the total Canadian National deficit to $51,103,296.91 as compared with $56,989,978.82 in 1921.

In the statement which will be placed on Hansard, it will be seen that the 1921 figures do not entirely agree with the figures brought down a year ago. At that time, the operating results of the St. John and Quebec Railway were separately shown. As the St. John and Quebec results have been included in 1922 totals it was necessary to add in the 1921 results to make the figures comparable.

Analysis of Net Operating Deficit.

The net operating deficit was $9,736,318.04, compared with $16,220,335.91 in 1921. The net operating deficit of the Canadian Government Railways is $2,496,721.91 as against $5,714,-732.90 in 1921. Of this, the Intercolonial and branch lines were reponsible for $2,302,703.36, compared with $4,457,035.75 in 1921; the Prince Edward Island District, $634,588.66 as against $617,158.93 the previous year; the Transcontinental—lines east of Armstrong—$875,233.02 as against $1,964,730.23 in 1921; Transcontinental lines—west of Armstrong and east of Winnipeg, including the Grand Trunk Pacific Lake Superior Branch—an operating surplus of $1,488,833, as against an operating surplus of $1,523,547.90 in 1921; the St. John and Quebec Railway, a deficit of $148,078.67 compared with $127,434.15 the previous year; Hudson Bay railway, $24,-951.43 as against $71,921.08 in 1921. I must explain, in reference to the Hudson Bay railway, that the figures are not comparable, as the periods in the two years were not the same. A closer analysis of the figures, using the same periods, will show that the operating deficit of the Hudson Bay railway in 1921 was not $71,921 but rather about $50,000.

The Canadian Northern operating deficit was reduced from $6,475,911.14 in 1921 to $2,-946,729.72 in 1922, but the operating deficit of the Grand Trunk Pacific increased from $4,029,691.87 to $4,292,866.41 during the same period.

[Mr. Graham.]

Decreased Operating Expenses

I will now refer to the decreased operating expenses. I think I might interject that an analysis of the statement will show that the marked improvement for the year 1922 is the result of a large decrease in the cost of operating. If hon. gentlemen have followed me closely they will have seen that the first few statements made concerning the traffic were a little pessimistic on account of decrease in earnings; but the present statement is by no means pessimistic because the management was able to reduce the expenses of operation by a greater ratio than characterized the reduction of traffic. Operating expenses decreased $13,350,527.96, and the results for the year show that the expenditures were well controlled, there being reductions in the cost both of maintenance and of transportation. The management assure me that the condition of the physical properties was improved during the year notwithstanding that maintenance of way expenses were reduced by $2,656,340.92, and maintenance of equipment expenses by $1,225,612.86. As already pointed out, more business was moved, though $11,299,471.65 less in transportation expenses was spent to move same, in addition to the maintenance savings.

Slight reductions in pay for certain classes of employees, a decrease in the average number of employees—to be later referred to—and reduced cost of materials contributed to the improved showing, but the management feel that in the main credit should be given to greater efficiency of freight traffic, handling more miles per car per day and a small increase in load per car mile. The cost of yard operation was also considerably reduced, measured on the basis of the number of cars handled.

Operating Ratio

What is meant by the "operating ratio" is how much money it takes to earn a dollar. Shortly, I may say that when it takes $1.05 to earn $1 there is a deficit; when the earning expenditure is one dollar or less there is no deficit. The operating ratio for the year was 108.10, as compared with 112.77 in 1921 and 129.32 in 1920. The operating ratios of the component parts of the National System were as follows:

	1922	1921
Canadian Northern..	104.85	109.37
Canadian Government..	106.10	113.85
Grand Trunk Pacific..	123.18	124.21

The ratio of 108.10 for 1922 is divided as follows:—Labour 60.74, as against 65.02; fuel 14.01, as against 16.84, and other expenditures 33.35 as against 30.91.

Traffic Results—Steam Lines

The National lines carried 11,331,226 passengers during 1922, or 606,923 less than in 1921. the average haul per passenger was 60.84 miles, compared with 59.87 miles in the previous year, and the passenger earnings were $17,919,-602.17, a decrease of $2,289,218.02 compared with 1921.

The system handled 22,426,403 tons of revenue freight, an increase of 1,164,803 tons. The average haul also increased from 423.19 miles to 449.97 miles, but the freight revenue, which was $89,726,925.51, fell off $3,901,611.86 because of lower rates.

The average earnings per traffic train mile were $3.52 which was 8 cents less than in 1921, and the operating expenses $3.82, which was 25 cents less than the previous year. The average operating revenue per mile of road was $6,885.33, which was $438.16 less than in 1921, and the average operating expense per mile of road was $7,466.23, a decrease of $817.30. The average load per freight train increased from 482.66 tons to 548.34 tons.

Analysis of Operating Expenses

Out of each dollar spent by the National Railways on operating account during 1922, the following expenditures were made: 24.13 cents for maintenance of way and structures; 23.53 cents for maintenance of equipment; 2.23 cents for traffic expenses—soliciting, etc., —46.57 cents for rail line transportation—enginemen, trainmen, yardmen, station employees, etc.—1.42 cents for miscellaneous operations—dining and buffet, hotels restaurants, etc.—2.79 cents for general expenses—general offices, clerical and legal staff, etc.—and 0.67 for transportation for investment—i.e., the movement of materials entering into the property. This split of the expenditure dollar closely approximates the figures for 1921, except transportation costs, which are 3.61 cents less.

The distribution of operation expenses is shown also in another form: labour, 56.19; fuel—locomotive—12.96; other 30.85, total 100.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was analyzing the operating costs. Now I shall take up the item of labour.

Labour

Out of gross earnings of $120,135,956.71, the management paid out $82,390,245.42 in wages, including betterments, about six and a half million dollars less than the 1921 total pay-roll. Operating labour cost $72,969,378.-48, or almost 10 millions less than the previous year. The ratio of operating labour costs to gross earnings was 60.74 for the system, as against 65.02 in 1921, an improvement of 4.28 per cent. The average number of employees in 1922 was 58,398 compared with 60,315 in 1921, a decrease of almost two thousand.

During the first four months of the year, labour forces were lighter than in the corresponding period in the preceding year. In May, June and July maintenance forces were increased with the general object of having track and other conditions improved for the fall movement, which gave every indication of being heavy. From August to December, inclusive, substantially the same force was maintained as in 1921, although more tonnage was moved.

Locomotive Coal Purchases

Locomotive coal to the extent of 3,053,829 tons was purchased during 1922 at an average price of $5.47 and a total cost of $16,711,355.-22. Of this 2,198,039 tons was Canadian coal, at an average price of $4.83, or $10,621,037.57; 798,330 tons American coal, at an average price of $7.13, or $5,693,783.90 and 57,460 British coal at an average price of $6.90, or $396,533.75 In 1921 the average price of Canadian coal was $5.71 and of the American coal $6.47. During that year 2,505,389 tons of Canadian coal were purchased and 977,696 tons of American. Less coal to the extent of 429,256 tons was purchased during 1922.

Equipment

A statement showing details of equipment on hand, retirements and deliveries during the year, will be included with those to be handed in. Briefly it shows that the Canadian National system had 1951 locomotives and 87,482 cars on December 31, 1922, as against 1,973 locomotives and 88,478 cars on December 31, 1921. Also, for the information of the House, I shall put in a statement of new equipment ordered during the current year, totalling $20,250,600.85. The statement will show the number and type of equipment, the name of the builder, and the price. Unfortunately prices are still very high. For mountain type locomotives we are paying 74,500 and for the Mikado type $66,500. First-class coaches still cost $35,443, as against $16,586 in 1914., and standard sleepers $49,400, compared with $28,250 in 1915; mail cars, which could be built for $11,500 before the war, now cost $29,650; express refrigerator cars, which cost $4,642 in 1918, now cost $10,550; steel baggage cars, which cost $6,666 in 1915, cost $24,750 now; general service freight cars which cost $1,346 in 1914 and $3,250 in 1920, are now priced at $2,950; box cars which could be bought for $1,150 in 1914 and were $2,950 in 1920, are now $2,555. It is only fair to explain that car equipment purchased from 1914 to 1917, inclusive, was fitted with wooden and steel sills, and from 1918 to 1923 with steel sills and steel framing, and was also of greater capacity.

Betterments

The betterments effected during the year included the laying of 444 miles of new 85 lb. rail and 172 miles of second-hand relay rails, principally on western lines; the putting in of 5,910,014 ties and 1,030 miles of ballast; 50 new water supplies and 11 new water tanks; 432 miles of fencing and 315 sidings and siding extensions; 41 new stations and 16 station extensions; 9 new freight sheds and 9 freight shed extensions; 64 bunkhouses and section houses; 77 other buildings, 15 coaling plants, 406 culverts, 32 bridges and 163 bridges and trestles filled. A statement of the larger betterment items will, as usual, be handed in to Hansard.

New Construction During 1922

With the exception of the Long Lac cut off no new construction was undertaken during the year, and on the cut off only preparatory work was done up to December 31 last. The late minister pointed out a year ago that in the West alone construction had been projected which would entail an expenditure of $25,000,000 to bring to completion, but in view of financial conditions and the impending reorganization of the National Railway Board and management, the betterment programme for 1922 would consist of finishing work in hand as far as track had been laid, leaving the new board free to advise as to further extensions. In accordance with the policy indicated, no new grading or tracklaying was undertaken during the year under review, though considerable ballasting and surfacing was completed and necessary buildings and structures erected. Details of this will be supplied, also as to the 172.3 miles of new lines in the West turned over to the operating department for permanent operation. This mileage was under operation on behalf of the construction department, with restrictions as to speed, at the beginning of 1922 and was merely brought to completion during the year.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt only with the railway system known up to October last year as the Canadian National, not with that portion of it formerly known as the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am confused by my hon. friend's constant use of the month of October. The figures he is giving us, as I understood him all along, were for the entire year of 1922. Is not that correct?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought my hon. friend in the last sentence before I interrupted him said the figures were up to October.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian National railway and Grand Trunk railway were run as separate roads up to the end of the year. The order in council which made them one was issued January 30, 1923.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is right. But I was trying to explain at the beginning of my remarks the distinction between what was called the Canadian National Railway system then and now, and I pointed out that the Canadian National Board had been brought into existence in October last by order in council. In other words there was no Canadian National Railway until October last.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is merely a name.

Mr. GRAHAM: Certainly; but until October last there was not really any Canadian National Board; it was the Canadian Northern Board.

THE GRAND TRUNK

Now let me take up the Grand Trunk. To one who, like myself, has lived along the old Grand Trunk nearly all his lifetime the passing of this road from its original status even to become part of our national system is somewhat of a tragedy. We who have known the Grand Trunk so well since our boyhood almost reverence the old line. Of course, now that it has become part of our national system of railways I think I may be allowed to express the view that, given a fair opportunity, it will prove a splendid asset to the Dominion.

The Grand Trunk experienced in a general way the same difficulties as the Canadian National, though it did not come within the influence of the Crowsnest reduction. It carried fewer passengers, with consequent loss in revenue, and while freight tonnage and freight earnings increased somewhat, the average revenue per ton per mile was 4 per cent less than the previous year. This was stated to be owing to the reductions in Canadian freight rates effective December 1st, 1921, and August 1st, 1922; also to reductions in United States and International freight rates effective January 1st and July 1st, 1922. The system carried 940,000 fewer tons of coal and coke for reasons which are well known; but loss tonnage was more than offset by increases in general commodities, the most prominent of which were lumber and forest products, including wood pulp, building materials, motor cars, flour and iron and steel products. The decrease of $1,668,459.55 in passenger revenue, while contributed to by 1,124,181 fewer passengers, was in part due to a reduction in International fares at the beginning of the year. There was also a slight falling off in express earnings.

Income Account

In 1921 the Grand Trunk Canadian lines were the only part of the system to end the year with a net revenue from operation. In 1922 the New England lines were the only line to show an operating deficit, and that was only $57,090.48, compared with $681,490.29 the previous year. Last year the Canadian lines increased their operating net revenue from $5,678,739.47 to $7,382,205.78; the western lines turned a deficit of $447,925.11 into an operating net of $5,498,226.20, and the Central Vermont similarly converted a deficit of $176,806.42 into an operating net of $1,106,525.57.

The operating revenues, all lines, were $113,975,133.30 last year as against $109,097,557.58 in 1921; the operating expenses $100,045,266.23 as compared with $104,725,039.93 the previous year.

After deducting taxes, hire of equipment, joint facility rents, etc., expenditures which affect the western lines somewhat heavily, income other than from operation brought the net income before fixed charges up to $12,064,827.42..

At this stage the Central Vermont joined the New England lines in the deficit column. Fixed charges amount to $21,213,375.64. Of this sum $4,745,762.61 is due the government and $16,467,613.03 payable to others. Taking into consideration these fixed charges the Grand Trunk net deficit, all lines, was $9,148,548.22, as compared with $15,672,299.34 in 1921, a decrease of $6,523,751.12. The net deficit was apportioned as follows:

Canadian lines	$5,735,386 48	$7,386,170 97
Western lines	1,277,747 20	4,797,177 55
New England lines	1,398,600 35	1,881,093 84
Central Vermont	736,814 19	1,607,299 34
Total	$9,148,548 22	$15,672,299 34

Allocation of Net Deficit

The net deficit of $9,148,548.22 just referred to was distributed as follows:

Grand Trunk Canadian lines	$5,620,814 37
Ottawa Terminals Railway	113,769 09
Canada Atlantic Transit Company	82,454 25
St. Clair Tunnel Company	231,852 26
Toronto Terminals Railway	203,091 48
Terminal Warehouse Reg. (Cr.)	250,000 00
Canadian Express Company (Cr.)	266,594 97
Grand Trunk Western Lines	1,277,747 20
Grand Trunk New England Lines	1,398,600 35
Central Vermont Railway	736,814 19
Total deficit	$9,148,548 22

The comparison with 1921 figures is shown in the statement of detail.

Grand Trunk Traffic

The operating revenue of the Grand Trunk system was $106,348,507.11, an increase of $4,386,702.59. Of this amount $17,566,692.55 was on passenger account, a falling off of $1,668,459.55. Freight revenue was $79,716,164.68, an increase of $5,712,983.97; other revenue—mail, express, etc.—$9,065,649.88 showed a slight increase.

Operating expenses were $93,525,165.61, a decrease of $3,887,314.84. This decrease was common to maintenance of way and structures, transportation, miscellaneous, and general offices. Maintenance of equipment cost more than in 1921, as also did the traffic department.

Operating ratio was 87.94 per cent as compared with 95.53 in 1921.

Tons of freight carried were 29,942,949, an increase of 2,688,163, though the average ton mile revenue fell off 4 per cent. Passengers carried numbered 12,401,927, a decrease of 1,124,181. There was a decrease of 5 per cent also in the average revenue per passenger mile. An explanation of these decreases in revenue has already been given and the customary detailed and comparative figures will be brought down, also those in connection with the Central Vermont, which do not form part of the Grand Trunk system figures just referred to.

Separately Operated Companies

A number of separately operated subsidiary companies are controlled by the Grand Trunk, the net surplus of which is not taken into the Grand Trunk income statement. These include the Chicago, New York and Boston Refrigerator Company, International Bridge Company, Montreal Warehousing Company, Limited, Terminal Warehousing Company, Limited, Oshawa Railway, Rail and River Coal Company, Thousand Islands Railway, Montreal and Southern Counties Railway and the Central Vermont Transportation Company.

The net income of separately operated companies was $712,123.24, as against $381,439.05 in 1921. These separately operated companies paid to the Grand Trunk in dividends in 1922, $576,300 compared with $127,000 in 1921, and the undistributed surplus at December 31st last was $151,671.16 against $40,429.07 at the end of 1921. Detailed results of the operation of each of these companies will be included in statement form.

Employees and Compensation

The average number of employees Grand Trunk system was 38,359 in 1922, compared with 39,234 in 1921, and corresponding figures for Central Vermont were 2,763 and 2,859. The average wage, Grand Trunk, was $1,507.96 and Central Vermont $1,566.91, a decrease of 5.49 per cent and 1.93 per cent respectively. The pay-roll expense of the Grand Trunk was $54,016,242.75, or 57.76 per cent of the total operating expense. The pay-roll of the Central Vermont was $4,109,420.19, or 63.03 per cent of the total operating expense. The ratio of pay-roll to operating expense decreased 2.83 per cent in the case of the Grand Trunk, but increased 6.81 per cent in the case of the Central Vermont.

Of each dollar spent by the Grand Trunk 57¾ cents went in wages, 15½ cents in fuel for locomotives and 26¾ cents in other operating expenses. The Central Vermont figures were 63, 18½ and 18½ cents respectively.

Equipment, Grand Trunk—All Lines

A statement showing details of equipment of the Grand Trunk, including the Central Vermont, will be included with other tabulated information. It shows that at the end of the year these lines had 1,495 locomotives, 1,208 passenger service cars, 46,188 freight service cars, 2,537 company service cars and 3 car ferries. The corresponding figures at the end of 1921 were, 1,498, 1,210, 47,321, 2,555 and 3.

Coal

Locomotive coal purchased from all sources in 1922 amounted to 2,565,723 tons and cost on the average $6.50 a ton or a total of $16,685,813.03. Of this coal 2,157,134 tons was American at an average price of $6.56; 348,696 Canadian at $5.81 and 59,893 tons English and Scotch coal at $8.59.

Additions and Betterments

Additions and betterments, Grand Trunk, all lines, were made in 1922 at a total cost of $4,403,837.23. Of this amount, $1,598,651.30 was spent on equipment, and $1,277,822.43 on rails and various track material. The spread of this betterment expenditure will be brought down in detail.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—FINANCE

Consolidated Income Figures

The gross operating revenue of all roads now comprising the Canadian National lines was $234,111,090.01 compared with $236,100,024.22 in 1921. The operating expenses were $229,917,540.98, compared with $247,947,842.48, and the net revenue from railway operations $4,193,549.03 as against an operating deficit of $11,847,818.26 in 1921.

From the net revenue from operation, all lines, of $4,193,549.03, tax accruals amounting to $4,095,677.45 must be deducted, leaving the total operating income $97,871.58. The corresponding figure for 1921 was a deficit of $16,082,792.51.

To the total operating income of $97,871.58 must be added non-operating income such as rentals, express, mails, elevators, etc., which amounted to $15,752,496.48, but from which must be deducted our own hire of equipment and joint facilities charges, etc., which amounted to $13,647,585.24, making the total revenue, before fixed charges, $2,202,782.82, as against a deficit of $12,638,778.88 in 1921.

Next, the fixed charges must be considered. The fixed charges due the government increased from $19,569,989.79 to $24,649,513.45; those due the public decreased from $40,453,509.49 to $37,805,114.50, leaving the net increase in fixed charges $2,431,128.67.

Taking these fixed charges into account, the total deficit for 1922 amounted to $60,251,845.13 as compared with $72,662,278.16 last year, an improvement of $12,410,433.03.

Memorandum re Financing done during the Year 1922

During the year, an issue of $11,000,000. Canadian Northern Railway Company 5 per cent Three Year Notes, guaranteed by the Dominion government, was disposed of at 99·03 per cent. The proceeds, together with accrued interest and New York exchange amounting to $10,953,290.52, were used to retire maturing obligations, as follows: $5,651,000 Canadian Northern Railway 6 per cent 2½-Year Collateral Trust Notes which matured on February 1st, 1922; $4,601,789.76 to purchase sterling exchange to retire $5,109,026.67, Canadian Northern Railway 5 per cent Dominion Guranteed Series "C" Notes, which matured in London on April 5, 1922. The balance of $700,500.76 was applied in reduction of the loan made by the Dominion government under authority of War Measures Act and order in council dated July 5, 1918. The saving in exchange covering the retiring of the securities in London, amounted to $507,-236.91.

On June 1, 1911, $1,250,000 Canadian Northern Railway 5½ per cent Three Year Secured Notes, maturing at Toronto on that date, were retired from an advance from the Dominion government, provided for in the Appropriations.

$6,000,000 Canadian Northern Railway 5½ per cent Three Year Notes were paid off on December 1st, 1922, from an advance made by the Dominion government.

On December 1st, 1922, $7,099,493.34 Canadian Northern Railway 5 per cent Land Mortgage Debentures held by the public, were called for redemption in London, England. It was thought advisable to redeem these securities on that date rather than wait until the date of maturity, namely, June 1st, 1923, in view of the rising Sterling Exchange rates. This step has been justified, as the exchange rate on December 1st was $4.52, whereas to-day the rate is approximately $4.80. The funds necessary to retire these securities were advanced by the Dominion government. If the exchange rate reaches par by June 1st, 1923, which is quite probable, then the saving in exchange that will be effected by having retired the above securities on December 1st, 1922, would amount to $505,717.34.

Advances by the Government

Advances during 1922 to the Canadian Northern amounted to $49,826,881.29, making a grand total of $298,799,591.72 to December 31, 1922, on which, to the same date, interest amounting to $51,233,156.66 had accrued.

The advances during the year were utilized as follows: construction and betterments, $13,-251,014.30; equipment, $719,046.85; repayment of loans and equipment trust obligations $19,254,893.33, operating deficit, $4,344,418.27; fixed charges, $12,257,508.54.

Advances during 1922 to the Grand Trunk Pacific were $9,813,640.23, and the total advances to December 31, 1922, amounted to $90,538,034.75. Last year advances were distributed as follows: construction and betterments, $2,991,387.24; operating deficits, $4,552,-021.98; fixed charges, $2,270,231.01. Total accrued interest to December 31, 1922, amounted to $20,924,521.32.

On Grand Trunk account, there was advanced during 1922, $10,858,188,18, bringing the total up to $84,560,342.60 to December 31 last. The advances during the year were absorbed as follows: construction and betterments, $3,142,680.96; repayment of loans and equipment trust obligations, $2,487,778.44; operating deficit, $3,272,385.22; fixed charges, $1,955,343.56. The total of accrued interest to December 31, 1922, was $7,967,405.29.

In addition to the above, the government advanced to the Canadian Government Railways during 1922, $7,056,887.55, divided as follows: capital expenditure, $4,151,961.77; operating deficits, $2,904,925.78.

Fixed Charges

The total fixed charges, including Grand Trunk and Central Vermont, were $62,454,-627.95, compared with $60,023,499.28 in 1921.

The fixed charges of the Canadian Northern system show a net increase of $1,891,630.44, made up of a decrease of $680,533.25, in interest due the public and an increase of $2,572,-163.69 in interest due the government.

The decrease in interest due the public was occasioned by the fact that retirements during the year exceeded the increases, which latter were mostly due to interest charges running the full year in 1922, as compared with part only of the previous year. The increase in interest due the government reflects the advances made during 1922, and the full year interest on the advances made at various times during the previous year.

Grand Trunk Pacific interest charges are shown as $1,428,293.73 less than in 1921, largely because of the fact that interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific 4 per cent debentures, $1,395,-170.12, concerning which there has been more or less discussion, is no longer shown as a fixed charge, it not being considered a liability unless earned. G.T.P. interest due the government increased $869,018.02. There are also some inter-company adjustments, details of which will be shown in the comparative statement.

The Grand Trunk fixed charges increased $1,967,791.96, of which $6,506.52 was Central Vermont. A full year's interest on sinking fund 6 per cent Gold Debenture Bonds issued September 26, 1921, accounts for $1,108,333.33, and on government loans $1,638,341.95, the latter due chiefly to the 1921-22 advances running for the full year instead of only part of the year, as in 1921. On the other hand, there were decreases, the chief of which was an item of $657,000.00, due to the retirement in 1921 of 3-year 6 per cent secured notes. Details of all these interest charges are being brought down.

This is a fairly complete statement, I submit, of what has taken place during the year 1922, and I think that under the conditions existing in the Dominion of Canada, and which exist elsewhere, perhaps all over the world, in a more aggravated degree, the better showing of our Canadian National lines at the end of 1922 is very encouraging to the people of Canada who believe that eventually a public-owned railway can be made a success in this country. The problem is not easy to work out, but if we give it a fair show I think it will work itself out. Notwithstanding the reduction in rates from the West owing to the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement, which represents a reduction of over six million dollars, the improvement shown is very encouraging, and when amalgamation is fully completed and traffic is carried by the lines that can carry it most advantageously, when the operation of the two great systems becomes dovetailed and friction ceases, it is reasonable to suppose that there will be a betterment in conditions.

May I interject another word? Notwithstanding the fact that psychologically some of us seem to be hard up, the improved condition of this great highway that carries the people's products reflects, I think, the improved condition of the people generally throughout the Dominion of Canada, because it is a generally conceded fact that the condition in which the transportation companies of a country find themselves is a reflection of the condition in which the people of that country find themselves.

THE ESTIMATES

Now, as to next year you have all heard, no doubt, the story that our late lamented friend, Mahlon Cowan, once a brilliant member of this House, told us. In one of his election campaigns he went to see a coloured gentleman to whom he had been very kind and asked him for his support—as is usual, they tell me, when candidates are canvassing. His friend was a little reluctant to make him any pledge and he said to him "You remember, don't you Sam, that a week ago I got out of bed and went down and got you out of gaol?" "Oh, yes, I remember that." "Well, can't you give me your support after all that?" "Well, I will tell you. 'Liza and I have been talkin it over, and it's not what you have done but it is what you is goin' to do that is goin' to influence us." In making an estimate for next year, of course, we are going to base that estimate on the view that conditions in Canada are likely to continue to improve, and while that is not unduly optimistic I think it is on the safe side.

The amount to be voted on account of the railways for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, is $73,189,015, as compared with $97,220,000 last year.

[Mr. Graham.]

Four relatively small items, amounting to $189,015, relate to transactions under the direct control of the department, so that the amount required on railway account is represented by the loan of $73,000,000 asked for on Canadian National Railway Company account.

The following is a comparison of the several items which went to make up the estimate last year and this:

Description	Provided 1922-23	Provided 1923-24
Operating Deficits..	$21,123,827 62	$10,050,000 00

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What are the capital expenditures for which you are providing interest?

Mr. GRAHAM: For next year?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, the capital expenditures for which the interest which the minister has mentioned in the statement just given is required?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would have to figure that out; I have not got those figures at the moment. What I have just given is the interest due to the public. I have given the interest and it will be easy to figure out the principal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the figures my hon. friend has given apply to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. GRAHAM: They apply to the entire system.

As already alluded to in the reference to the year's financing, it was regarded as good business to retire certain securities on December 1 last, which was optional, instead of waiting until redemption was obligatory during the present year. The government advanced the money and a saving in exchange amounting to more than half a million dollars resulted. The supplementary estimates of the current fiscal year contain an item of $13,099,493.34 to cover these retirements.

SIR HENRY THORNTON ON REORGANIZATION

I asked the president of the Canadian National Railways to give me a synopsis of what had been accomplished in the matter of reorganization, and he has furnished me with the following statement:

The present management took charge of the property about December first, 1922, at a session of the year when inspections, examinations and progress were difficult on account of winter conditions.

Obviously, the first effort of the management was to make as complete an inspection of the property as weather conditions would permit, in as short a time as possible, and to become acquainted with the officers and employees on the various constituent parts of the National Railway system. In addition to this, traffic conditions and problems had to be examined, as all of these were essential factors in the determination of the organization which would be necessary to operate the consolidated system.

There were three primary problems which demanded immediate attention:

1. The determination of the kind of an organization which was to be employed in the administration of the property.

2. The determination of the regions into which the property was to be divided for operating purposes, and the location of regional and general headquarters.

3. The selection of officers for the various posts involved in the organization.

The study and successful solution of these three questions naturally involved examination of the property itself; the country, its productivity; the movement of traffic and the rates charged thereon; the principal lines of future commercial and agricultural development; coupled with a general study of the economic condition of the Dominion. Perhaps the most important and difficult problem was to assess the value of officers for prospective posts, with a view to getting the right man in the right place.

The organization which has been decided upon is what may be called a strengthened divisional organization as distinguished from a departmental organization. The executive officers consist of a chairman and president, assisted by five vice-presidents as under:

1. Vice-president in charge of operation, maintenance and construction.

2. Vice-president in charge of financial affairs.

3. Vice-president in charge of insurance, immigration, development, lands, express and telegraphs.

4. Vice-president in charge of legal affairs.

5. Vice-president in charge of traffic.

The above executive officers represent the minimum with which, in my judgment, it would be possible to operate such a property as the Canadian National Railways; indeed, as time goes on and traffic increases, it will probably be necessary to add another vice-president. The list above given, however, represents a considerable economy as compared with the executive officers of the old national system and the Grand Trunk Railway. Those properties had in the aggregate one chairman, two presidents, and eleven vice-presidents, with a complete staff of officers for each. There is now one chairman and president, and five vice-presidents. The actual saving in salaries of vice-presidents and their immediate office forces should be at least $150,000 a year.

It is not possible at the moment to say exactly what the total savings in the salary list will be, as the organization has been barely completed and the officers have hardly settled into their places, and consequently the exact number of clerks and subordinates in each department has not been finally fixed; but one would be quite safe in saying that a material saving will be accomplished, and a much more efficient administrative machine provided. Most of the announcements made with respect to officers represent either a rearrangement of duties and responsibilities or the confirmation of positions which already existed. In only one or two cases have entirely new positions been created; and the net result will undoubtedly be the employment of a smaller administrative class.

The railway has been divided into three regions for operating purposes, and this feature has been so exhaustively discussed before that comment is now unnecessary. Suffice it to say that the principle followed was to give to each operating region as much autonomy and local control in the actual operation of the property as was consistent with efficient principles of administration. Every effort will be made to confine the functions of the vice-presidents and the executive officers to policies, leaving to general managers, general superintendents and superintendents the responsibility of carrying out details. In the administration of such a large property as is represented by the Canadian National Railways no other theory of organization can be successful.

Various aspects of the operation of the national system are being studied with a view to reducing expenses as rapidly as possible. For example, it has been found that the railway could advantageously do its own insuring, and this has been decided upon. It is anticipated that from this item alone there will be a saving which will approximate half a million dollars a year.

It is the intention of the present administration to apply itself as diligently as possible to the creation of new traffics and the movement of those traffics and existing traffics with a constantly increasing economy. A system of statistics is under development which will, it is hoped, enable the maximum of use to be made of engine power. An examination of timekeeping methods is under way, in order to ensure that every employee is paid all that is coming to him, but no more. New methods of storekeeping, and the custody of materials, are being developed, in order that purchases may be reduced to a minimum; and in various ways the organization is preparing to bring each department and function of the railway to as high a degree of efficiency as modern scientific knowledge will permit.

In the organization of such a property, where we employ about one hundred thousand people, scattered over nearly 23,000 miles of line, the process of consolidating and harmonizing the various forces is one which will necessarily take some time. It is, therefore, earnestly hoped that those who administer the affairs of the nation will be sufficiently patient to give those who are sincerely, honestly and conscientiously working at this problem an opportunity to show what can be accomplished before criticisms are made.

That is a statement by the president, Sir, Henry Thornton.

INSURANCE

Then I take up the matter of insurance. The Canadian National Railways, with the full approval, I think, of the government, has decided to carry its own insurance. I might add that their Canadian Government Merchant Marine will be in the same class. The insurance on these two great properties will amount roughly speaking, to $400,000,000. That is a good insurance business in itself. I would be delighted to be president of an insurance company that would net me approximately $400,000,000 worth of business, with the gilt-edged premium handed me every year. I would not need to do anything else or to get any more business. My renewals would keep me the rest of my time quite comfortably, and I would be able to leave something for my family. If an insurance company can do that, we believe the Canadian National Railway, with the government behind it—because we, the people, are the shareholders—can carry its own insurance and make quite a saving. The insurance will not be let run wild or the risks go unprovided for. Each year when the premiums would naturally fall due, the amount of these premiums would be placed in a reserve fund for insurance purposes. Already I think the Grand Trunk has an insurance fund accumulation and I believe I am safe in saying that we have, in the several railway fire insurance funds, a rest fund of $2,000,000 with which we start. A good many policies come due on the 31st March, and in two or three weeks from now we will have substantially increased that reserve fund. Some figures have been given me which I will give to the House, to be sure that I am accurate in my reference to them. But let me say that at first blush it might seem to be quite a radical policy. Well, radical policies are all right, unless they are too radical, but if during the last ten years these roads—I am speaking only of the railroads—had insured themselves, they would have saved $7,000,000 and replaced all the destroyed property. When I had the honour of being Minister of Railways in Sir Wilfrid's government, the government of course carried its own insurance. At my suggestion we established an insurance fund, not large, of course, but each year we put aside a certain amount for insurance purposes, and that fund paid all the fire losses, and had quite a substantial surplus at the end of three or four years' time.

9 p.m.

I would like to amplify the president's reference to the change in insurance methods. The only railway property on which insurance has not been carried either by the underwriters or by means of railway insurance funds is that comprising the original group of Canadian Government Railways where the risk, about 50 millions, has been carried by the government. On the other railways, the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk groups, the insurance carried has totalled $279,425,999 and on the marine—railway as well as Canadian Government Merchant Marine—$47,620,562, a grand total of $327,046,561, on which the total annual premium or fund contribution has been $2,637,800. Had the government lines been insured—that is the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Prince Edward Island railway—the premiums or fund contributions would have totalled $2,837,800. The total losses during 1922 amounted to $1,144,279, or forty per cent of that amount. Thus, on the basis of complete insurance, the premiums would have exceeded last year's losses by $1,693,521.

[Mr. Graham.]

The insurance records have been examined for 10 years back, and they show that our average losses over that period have been a little under seventy per cent, so that over a ten year period the saving, under the method proposed, would have been thirty per cent. Should that record be maintained, the management have every reason to expect a saving of between $750,000 and $1,000,000 a year.

In this connection I might be permitted to say that hon. members will notice on the order paper a resolution indicative of legislation to be asked in order to cover certain points in reference to the insurance. As to mortgages, we all understand that if we have a mortgage on our house we have to keep the house insured, in order to protect the individual or the company which advances the money. This is particularly the case with the rolling stock, the buildings, etc., on the railway lines. Where these have been mortgaged, they have been mortgaged under the pledge that certain insurance would be carried on the property, in order to protect the lender. In this legislation which I referred to a moment ago, all we are asked to do is that, in lieu of this insurance in a company which is supposed to have a full guarantee of stability behind it, the government will step in and guarantee that the insurance will be paid in case of the destruction of the property. In other words, the government, in regard to these loans or these mortgages held on the property, takes the place of the company and that will be perfectly satisfactory to the lenders or to the holders of security.

Hon. members will want to know now, what about constructing branch railways. Well, the completion of branch lines already started, as well as the construction of others, has been held up by the war and by financial stringency since the war. Nothing will be found in the estimates for new construction during the coming year, but I might say, in palliation of that offence, that it is the intention of the government to submit to the House a little later on, in the way of legislation, a programme for construction extending over a term of years. That will be decided by parliament after discussion, and the public will know just what the government proposes to try to do, aided by parliament, during the next three years, in the way of construction. It will not mean that parliament will be tied down to that programme of construction, but it will be a guarantee to the public of what parliament intends to do along that line. That legislation will be brought down in due course after consideration. I know that it will have the sympathy and the full consideration of the House. I might say, in that connection, that there is on the statute books at the present time what is called the Branch Lines Act—I do not know whether that is the proper title—under which not a few branch lines have been taken over by the federal government. While I believe we must be economical and keep as close in our expenditure as possible; nevertheless, we cannot blind our eyes to the other side of the picture. If the members of this parliament on both sides of the House, including the government, do not take somewhat of an optimistic view of the future of Canada, then we cannot expect the people of Canada, or the people of any other country, to believe in Canada.

While, I say, we must be as economical as possible, still there is a point beyond which economy becomes extravagance; and I believe that the programme which we hope to bring down will appeal to the members of the House. I believe it will be seen that it is not for the purpose of making extravagant expenditures but of carrying out the ideas expressed so often in this House in regard to making the people of this country more contented; for I admit that a contented settler is the best advertisement that any country can have.

As I say, we have the Branch Lines Act. Now, it may be necessary, as it has been in years past, to build short lines that will not pay. I am not prophesying, but I say that we may have to build lines that will not be profitable. And that is where a government differs somewhat from the private company. The government finds its own people have moved into a new district; or perhaps in an older part of the country they may find a railway aided by both governments and by the municipality but not properly operated. The railway itself is properly constructed, but the company has perhaps been taking everything out and putting nothing in, so that the road might just as well not be operated at all in some instances. I leave it to the consideration of the House whether, under these circumstances, it is not the duty of the government to go to the aid of people in some cases even if we know that the undertaking will not pay in dollars and cents just at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that it has been a long and dreary task for hon. members to listen to the statement I have submitted. The figures I have given this afternoon and evening are merely a synopsis of tabulated information which should be immediately made available in complete form for the members of the House. I would therefore request the permission of the House to hand to Hansard a copy of certain statements which it is impossible to read in full and which cannot appear unless taken as read. So that the whole situation concerning the Canadian National Railways will be before hon. members in Hansard for their consideration, and they can compare the explanations I have given with the detailed statements which they will find therein.

The tabulated statements referred to by Mr. Graham are as follows:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The minister has placed on Hansard an imposing array of figures covering, I think, most of the features dealt with in previous years, and covering some that were not in such detail presented before. Obviously this statement is of such a nature that it cannot be digested for purposes of criticism merely by being heard. A railway statement must be read and studied and compared with previous statements of the same character in order that comment may be helpful or useful. I am not sure that I or anyone else could have succeeded better than the minister in bringing out the outstanding results of the operations of 1922. It may be permissible for me though to repeat for purposes of emphasis some things that I gleaned from the minister's statement, expressing the hope that if I did not catch the exact purport of his words he will correct me as I pass along.

The year 1922, of course, witnessed the operation of our National Railways still in two divisions, just the same precisely as the year 1921 and the year 1920. The parent Grand Trunk was operated under a separate board. It was divided for purposes of operation into separate departments, and, in all things pertaining to the accounting which the minister presents, was wholly distinct from the Canadian National Railways. It was under a board headed throughout that time, or until virtually the end of the year, by Sir Joseph Flavelle, but under, as managing director, Mr. Howard Kelley. The board that surrounded Mr. Kelley was selected by the late government. It was a board against which no word was ever uttered. In the management, through the late government keeping faith with the company in the contract it made, in the taking over of the stock, we preserved practically intact the constitution of the personnel up to the completion of the arbitration. This was agreed upon because the Grand Trunk directors felt that if we placed our men in direct charge before the time had come when all the evidence which they considered would be required for presentation to the board had been gleaned from their records, we would be taking an advantage in the arbitration that would be unjust to them. Once this evidence was gleaned, of course, the reason for the retention of the same personnel no longer obtained. That happened in the midst of the political contest of 1921. Such was the management of the road to the end or nearly the end of the year 1922.

I say, without the least hesitation, and indeed I am glad of the opportunity to say it, that for myself I never felt satisfied with all the personnel of the management of the Grand Trunk. I do not think that the Grand Trunk had been well managed for many years prior to the taking over of that system by the government. It may be that good management was possible by the method of absent treatment applied by their directorate; but whether good management was possible or not good management was not actually present I am quite sure that much better results can be obtained now with the old management out of the way. Rapid improvement should take place aside entirely from the additional fact that from the 30th of January last onward the Grand Trunk will be operated in harmony and in unison with the Canadian National Railways, the whole system operated as one. These two great factors, the removal of the management which the Grand Trunk kept, and secondly, the advantages of unification should contribute from this time on to a very rapid improvement in the showing of the Grand Trunk.

I refer, first, to the minister's statement as to the Canadian National Railways. This road was operated under a directorate named wholly by the late government, a directorate headed by Mr. D. B. Hanna, as president. He had been president of the Canadian Northern ever since it was taken over by the administration and had been managing director of the Canadian Northern for long years prior to the interest of the government in that system. This directorate had control of the road under Mr. Hanna throughout virtually the whole of last year. Mr. Hanna was displaced about the 4th of October, and on the 4th of October a new president was appointed. The directors under Mr. Hanna were displaced at the same time as himself, and on the 4th October their successors took charge. I make no comment on the new directors at this time—such discussion can wait the committee stage. Sir Henry Thornton, however, did not actually take over his duties until about two months later, i.e. on December 4th, 1922. So the results of 1922 are not 80 per cent, but 90 per cent—yes, 100 per cent the work of the old directorate and of the management of Mr. D. B. Hanna.

Now, what are these results? In 1920, by reason of conditions that the whole world knows, there was an operating deficit of some $36,000,000. By reason of the condition of the property; by reason of wage awards and wage agreements and conditions of work and operation put into effect in the United States, which had to be followed in this country, and by reason as well of a tremendous advance in the costs of materials; because of those three factors—there were others, but they were negligible in comparison—which could not be compensated for by an increase in rates—for whatever increase was granted was accompanied by at least a sufficient curtailment of traffic to prevent the effects of the increased rates counterbalancing an enormous penalty that had to be paid in augmented wages and costs of materials; because of this condition of affairs an operating deficit of some $36,000,000 resulted. It was an operating deficit though which, relative to parallel results in the United States, was very small indeed. In fact there is no study more illuminating of the history of the operation of our roads than the study of parallel operations of the roads and their results in the United States. Such was the outcome of 1920's operation.

In 1921, reported to us on the 11th of April of that year by the late Minister of Railways, Mr. Kennedy, the result was an operating deficit of slightly over $16,000,000—an improvement of nearly $21,000,000. At the same time, of course there was an increase of fixed charges, because with the deficit of any year the fixed charges for the succeeding year are increased by the interest on such deficit. The deficit takes the form of an advance to the system secured against the system, and the interest thereon is added to the fixed charges, though of course that interest possibly wholly comes to the government of Canada.

Last year's deficit on the Canadian National lines—leaving out of account the Grand Trunk—is reduced again this year, that is to say 1922, to some $9,000,000—an improvement from $16,000,000 to $9,000,000—and this notwithstanding a very considerable reduction of earnings, due in part to the imposition on the Railway Commission of restraints emanating from this parliament. But the whole $6,500,000 mentioned by the minister is not due to that cause at all, because if this parliament had left the commission free, unquestionably reductions would have been effected on the very same class of articles that would have totalled the greater part of the $6,500,000, if not 66⅔ per cent of it. This the minister understands just as well as I do. Anyway, the main factor in keeping earnings down this past year was the general reduction which was inevitable and which really was not great. Owing to certain reductions of wages and costs of materials which had taken place chiefly in 1921, the effect had to come in reduction of rates in 1922, the actual reduction being delayed by the timidity of the government—by the procrastination of this parliament in deciding what our course should be as respects an extension of the Crowsnest pass agreement suspension.

Those considerations have contributed to contracting the earnings for the year to the extent that the improvement for 1922 is not equal in operating results to the improvement of 1921 over the year before. However, it is gratifying under the circumstances—gratifying indeed I think to all hon. members, and I am certain to none more than to the group behind me, to whose perseverance, to whose fidelity to the policy which is now being vindicated we owe the comparatively happy situation we are in with respect to this long, trying, baffling problem at the present time. True, $9,000,000 is a considerable operating deficit on the Canadian National Railways. I will come though to some observations on that subject when I have finished a parallel account taken from the minister's address of the returns from the Grand Trunk for the same year.

For the year 1921 there was a profit on operation of the Grand Trunk of some $4,000,000. It was disappointing in comparison with the returns even of the year before. The reason of the disappointment was mainly that the American govenment had radically changed its methods of returns to American roads and as a consequence the operating results upon our American mileage of the Grand Trunk were vastly less than they were for 1920. Those returns should have been higher. This year I am glad to learn that they are very considerably improved, and if I caught correctly the statement by the minister applicable to this point, the operating profits of the Grand Trunk for 1922 were something over $12,000,000. This is particularly gratifying under the conditions of operation, because it must be remembered that the same managing director was in charge who had been in charge under the Grand Trunk directorate and to whose management I attribute in part the failure of that road to present the returns and give the service that might reasonably have been expected.

Taking into account the operating profits of over $12,000,000 on the Grand Trunk, and the operating deficit of about $9,000,000 on the Canadian National, a net operating surplus results of approximately $4,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: If you take in the Central Vermont, a little over $4,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, if the Central Vermont is taken in the net operating surplus is a little over $4,000,000 This is the first operating surplus that parliament has had reported to it since we came out of the valley of doubt and difficulty through which we had been struggling for many years in the solution of our railway problem.

Now, while we have an operating surplus on the two roads together of some $4,000,000, we must not forget that the fixed charges which we have to pay on the systems aggregate a vastly larger sum than this. The fixed charges on the Canadian National aggregate, if I have put the figures together correctly, approximately $42,000,000. What the fixed charges are on the Grand Trunk I was not able to glean, but from my recollection of the subject I think they were some $8,000,000—that is to say, the interest on the debenture stock and the interest on the guaranteed stock which we have assumed. As a consequence, on the Canadian National Railway, where there is a deficit in operation of $9,000,000 and where we have some $42,000,000 of fixed charges to pay, we find ourselves confronted with an aggregate deficit of some $51,000,000. That $51,000,000 compares with the parallel figure for 1921 of $56,000,000 odd and with the parallel figure for 1920 of $67,000,000 odd. So it will be seen that notwithstanding the annual mounting of the fixed charges due to the fact that each year the interest on the previous deficit must be added, the improvement in operation is such that the annual deficit is year by year reduced—reduced, in millions, from 67 to 56 and then from 56 to 51 for the year through which we have just passed. These figures apply, of course, to the Canadian National Railway alone. Coming to the Grand Trunk, the profit on operation is some $12,000,000. If my figures are right as to the fixed charges—the interest on the bonded indebtedness, if you so describe it, of the system—there would be a surplus there of some $4,000,000. I am not quite sure that my figures are precisely right—though I think they are—as regards the Grand Trunk; as regards the Canadian National they are undoubtedly right.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the significance of these figures and as well to impress upon the House really what is meant by these recurring deficits in order that all will understand—though I do not wish to intimate that all do not now—just what these deficits imply, and will not think that they imply more than they do. I am not unaware—indeed, if there is anyone in this country wholly and vitally and keenly aware, it is myself—that there are influences at work—and I do not refer to railway systems—to make the people or some sections of the people believe that these deficits mean something that they do not mean at all; that they have been brought upon us because of the folly of weak-kneed, blind and stupid politicians in bringing this country into the ownership of the national lines we have to-day. Of this $51,000,000—let us think of that for the time being; for by means of it the point I make can be well made clear—of this amount of deficit this year on the Canadian National, about $33,000,000 is money owed the government of Canada. That is to say, it is not money that must be found in order to let the railways stand up and proceed and give service. About $33,000,000, then, is money owed the government of Canada, and the proportion that is owed us of the total deficit is growing year by year. Because it is owed us, of course, it is a debt all the same, and I am not by any means suggesting that it should be left out of account But we must understand that it is money owed this country because of guarantees we gave and loans we made in years gone by, because of indebtedness we have assumed as respects the system, in regard to all of which we have our charge against the system.

What I impress at the moment is this: That assuming we go ahead, as certainly we should—and we should go ahead with accelerated speed from this on, now that we are loosened from the London management and have only one system instead of two—assuming we go ahead as we have been going for these three years, and reach the point where deficits cease, then we must remember that all these deficits of years gone by have been no loss to the people. Quite the contrary; when we get to the point where deficits cease and we commence an era of returns over fixed charges, at that point all the deficits of these previous years become interest bearing assets. Because they are in the form of loans they now add to the fixed charges year by year; when we overtake the fixed charges so increased from year to year and get to earning money over and above them, at that point we have gathered up all the deficits of the years that have gone and they have become assets, loans, securities, in the treasury of the Dominion, bearing interest to the people of this country. It is a common feeling—I have met many who hold this view, and I can scarcely find fault with anyone reading some of the newspapers of Canada for doing so—that after we get past the era of these terrible deficits and reach the point where operation produces a revenue over fixed charges, then we shall have to look back and think of the money we have thrown away because of the folly of politicians; we shall have to sit in sackcloth and ashes and repent for the $50,000,000 in 1922, the $56,000,000 in 1921, the $67,000,000 in 1920, all of which is gone forever. The very contrary, let me repeat, will be the fact. When that time comes—and it should not be long; the pace at which we reach it should henceforth be accelerated; we have been progressing towards it satisfactorily in these late years during which members of this House have listened to the returns—when that time comes all these deficits will take the form of mortgages in the treasury, bearing interest to the Canadian people.

There is another point I want to impress on the House as respects the deficits. Keeping in mind still the $51,000,000 which in 1922 is our deficit in connection with the Canadian National Railways, $33,000,000 of which is owed to the people of Canada, does anybody imagine that if any other policy had been followed, this country would have escaped those deficits? I was glad to hear from the minister an expression of confidence that, given a chance, as they have been given, and as the results show they have been given ever since they came under the operation of the Hanna directorate, ever since they became the National Railways—continuing to give them that chance, there is abundant hope; there is, indeed, serene and well founded confidence, that good results, all that has been hoped for, will come.

I was glad to hear him say that, although I could not help but note that it was not received with any sign of applause by hon. gentlemen around him—hon. gentlemen who felt that applause over a statement of that sort would scarcely be in accord with their assertions and predictions of just a few years ago. Nevertheless the statement will be received with approval by the people of this country and will be received, as well, as the expression of the honest belief of the minister, who, having reviewed the history of this question and having investigated the financial situation as regards these roads, comes to the House and says this is his profound conviction.

No, we would not have escaped these deficits if any other course had been taken. As a matter of fact, it is my belief we would have had to face one of two alternatives. We would have to have faced either an utterly demoralized service given to the people of Canada by the roads, or vastly greater sums to be provided by the parliament of Canada to hold the roads in private hands. Why is such the case? The Transcontinental Railway would have had to have been run by the Grand Trunk Pacific. It would have got from the west the traffic of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and no other traffic. The Grand Trunk Pacific would have had to have been held on its feet by the bounty of this parliament in loans of millions year after year, operated as an isolated and almost trafficless road. The Grand Trunk would have continued to have been operated from London, under Sir Alfred Smithers and his board of directors sitting in an attic in the middle of that city, operated by Mr. Kelley here in Canada, with Mr. Kelley's methods and Mr. Kelley's directorate, and the Grand Trunk, which was at the end of its tether by the admission of its directorate in 1918, would have been out of smelling distance of its tether long years before this, and the shoulders of the Canadian people would have been under the staggering Grand Trunk, holding it there by a bounty of millions voted by this parliament year after year.

As for the Canadian Northern, this is a road that with greater assistance would have pulled through and been able to stand on its own feet. It is the only constituent of the whole Canadian National system that could have done so. It would have required advances beyond the advances that were given. It would have required to have been carried past the period when properly equipped, all its maintenance provided, its branch lines constructed, it would have had the traffic that would have supported a system of its mileage. But it is the only one. Now they are all in the one system and the tremendous advantage of the policy that has been pursued is this, that instead of four or five, yes there would be five, unit roads each struggling and fighting with the other, each coming to this parliament year after year to be enabled to stand by itself and continue the hopeless battle, instead of such a condition as that we have all of them brought into one. We have the vast tremendous advantage of unification. We have the Grand Trunk system feeding traffic westward. We have the Canadian Northern system feeding traffic eastward. We have the Canadian Northern system turning such traffic as goes to eastern Canada through non-navigation times over to the Transcontinental railway, and we have the Transcontinental as a consequence showing this year only a trifling deficit whereas under other circumstances it would be showing a deficit to-day of millions of dollars which this parliament would have had to supply.

One word of repetition. The tremendous advantage of what has been done is not the improvement due to and flowing out of the fact that we have government operation; it is the improvement that arises from the fact that all these staggering unit systems are now one system, a system that is balanced in the east and west of Canada, a system that would be attractive to any band of capitalists in the world, a system that has every hope and prospect of growing into a great success.

I want to call attention to one other fact. This system that we have was not wholly built for commercial purposes. There are long mileages of the system as respects which it was never hoped that for years at least they would be able to stand alone. If for the purposes of this discussion I may abandon all party beliefs, if one may so describe them I will refer to certain features of the system as colonization features, and not political features. Many parts of the Transcontinental, for example, a whole lot of the Grand Trunk Pacific, all of the Grand Trunk Pacific that ever should have been built, for the great part of it never should have been built, those roads are not roads that are founded on any commercial basis at all. Those roads are roads that if put on a commercial footing to be run by a private company, by any company, by any government in the world, would have waited decades after decades before they could ever stand on their feet and give a service to the country at all. Consequently, it is no more than blindness and folly to compare the results of a system so collected, of factors of so various a character—colonization, political blundering, non-commercial, all the others—it is folly to compare the results of a system so constructed, so brought together with the results of a system that was projected by business men in order that they might get business returns. So when we say that the Canadian Pacific, on the one hand, has a surplus and pays ten per cent on its capital stock, and that the Canadian National road, on the other hand, has a deficit of $51,000,000 and pays nothing on its capital stock, when we say that and believe that by saying so we are making a comparison of private ownership as against public ownership we are only talking the language of children.

Now a new board is in charge, and in charge of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian National combined. This unification took effect, so we are informed, and so the order in council discloses, on the 31st of January of this year. For the year 1923 the results will be the results of a unified system under single control, each serving the other instead of each fighting the other. We have every reason to hope for a very considerable improvement in the year 1923, a great improvement arising from the feature I have just recited, and arising as well from the fact that the Grand Trunk management in all its aspects is gone. Already the road has taken over its own insurance business. I quite agree, and it seems to me it is so obvious as scarcely to need comment, that to take over its insurance business now that the two are unified is manifestly the proper course. There would be just as much reason for the government of this country insuring its own post offices all through the Dominion as for the Canadian National Railways with a business of $400,000,000 pretending to lean upon the financial strength of some insurance company. The insurance company in all probability would be weaker financially than the road itself, so the very first ingredient and primary principle of insurance would be absent.

There should, it seems to me, be very many more economies resulting from the amalgamation. I am not a railway man, nor have I had the advantage of consultation with men who are, but I venture to say this, with a lot of deference because of the considerations I have mentioned: I venture to say that if error is being made at this time in the reorganization because of the bringing together of the systems, it is the error of over organization rather than of simplicity. The results tabulated in the press so far would seem to indicate that an effort is being made to retain everybody possible, instead of an effort to get rid of all the overhead we can, and seek to make the system no longer top heavy. I hope I am incorrect in my diagnosis. The tremendous, almost endless, table of departments, and departmental heads, and sub-heads, and assistants to presidents, and assistants to vice-presidents, and all sorts of door keepers and paraphernalia that has been presented to the public so far, fill me with some fear. It seems to me that we have not yet had assurance that the hand of the railway master is at work rather than the hand of the politician.

Let us have real amalgamation, and let the product of such amalgamation so appear that he who runs may read, that the wayfaring man although a fool may not err, that all the public will know the exact results year by year of the operation of the system. Before I sit down I want to impress again this thought on the minister. I do not find fault with his presentation this year, but I ask him that now, commencing with 1923, when we shall have one report rather than two, the minister present his details in tabulated form, and bring the data down to this House subsequently in blue book form, and in such array that the next year we can follow precisely in the line of the year before, that we can have parallel columns year by year, so that the eye can follow the results of an operation in each department one year with the other, so that the eye can trace a financial product year by year comparable to the year before. We have these tabulations in our own fiscal returns. We have them so presented in the Auditor General's report. We ought to have the same presentation in the financial statement of our railways so that everyone who examines it can tell at a glance just how the success of any feature of any operation, and the success of any feature of financing, compares with similar success the year before, so that we can trace through the years the ascending or descending curve illustrating the results as time goes along.

I would like the minister to take that seriously into account. The tremendous moneys involved in the operation of these railways makes it incumbent that we have each year as full and complete discussion, and as full and complete disclosure, as we have of the financial affairs of the Dominion. There should be as illuminating a debate, there should be as comprehensive a debate, and as thorough and ruthless investigation, on the presentation of the minister's statement year by year as respects the railways as we have in the annual budget debate of this House. One is of as much consequence to the country as the other; and I earnestly hope that some method may be found whereby—by parallel reports—not only giving the same results the year before but giving them in the same form, giving them in columns so that the eye can see the effect without much effort of the mind —that such can be done. Then the people of Canada—interested as they are in their system as their first and greatest asset—will drive politics out and drive business in by insisting on results year by year; results that they know are improvements, and results that they can understand.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to get on my feet to make any remarks after the very eloquent and lucid statement we have had from the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). However, I felt that we should scarcely let this opportunity pass without complimenting the minister and the country upon the improved condition of our great National Railways. I notice that the leader of the Opposition, in commencing his remarks, could not let the opportunity pass without taking just a little hit at the Crowsnest pass agreement debate we had last year. We still feel that we were right in our attitude and that no mistake was made at that time; and any little deficit that has come to the railways through that arrangement has been fully and amply repaid by the benefit to the people who supplied the freight on those roads.

Although I have always believed that the only solution of our railway problem was in the national ownership of those roads, yet to-night, for the first time, I have felt almost a thrill of pride in the fact that the Canadian people really own these roads; and in the not very far distant future we are going, as the politicians say, "to point with pride" to the fact that we own that large system of railroads that we thought at one time were a millstone around the neck of the people of Canada. I am glad that we have a new board of management in whom, I think, the people of the country have faith; and I can only echo the words that have been repeated by the leader of the Opposition and hope that no political influences will enter into the management of this system, that these railways will have a fair chance to succeed, and that Sir Henry Thornton, and his board shall have a free field and no interference whatever in their management.

One of the things I have noticed in connection with the Canadian National Railways has been the improvement in the demeanour of the people engaged in the railway service. I think there has been a considerable improvement in the management and in the courtesy and treatment extended to passengers while travelling upon the system compared with what was experienced in these respects a few years ago. One of the things most conducive to the success of any system is when the interest and pride the people employed on it take in the service and its success. I am not going to attempt to make a speech to-night in connection with the railroads because I really do not know very much about the situation, other than that I do hope that we are on the road to prosperous times as far as our railroads are concerned. Of course, I happen to be of a rather optimistic temperament and I believe that we are going to see more prosperous times in this Dominion. With more people and more traffic, east and west, I have no fear for the future. I believe the time is not far distant when there will be no more deficits on the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: (South York): I would like to draw attention to the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, copies of which have been received by hon. members, and to point out that on page 3 there is a very succinct account of the earnings and the profits of that road for the year. In statements regarding our own railways, such as the minister has presented to-day, we ought to have similar information. Then on page 14 of the same report there is a business statement of the assets and liabilities of the road. I do not say that the minister could prepare an exact statement of that kind for the use of the House at the present time, but progress in that direction could be made. Furthermore, in this Canadian Pacific Railway report there is a very succinct statement in regard to the mileage. In our annual railway statement the number of miles of railways we own in Canada and the number of miles of railway we own in the United States, and similar information should be set forth. That has been more or less mentioned by the minister to-night, but there is no reason why we should not have the figures tabulated in our railway statement just as they are in the Canadian Pacific Railway report. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has supplied to the members of this House, and to the people of Canada, their annual statement on the lines that were referred to a few minutes ago by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). We should have information in that form; not only the figures which the minister has given to-night but an analysis of those figures somewhat in the form in which it has been prepared by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

I am one who has always believed in public ownership in this country. I see that policy coming now, and I hear almost everybody in this House saying there is no reason why it should not succeed. The greatest railway asset we have in the country to-day is the Grand Trunk. It possesses all the strategic positions in regard to traffic, or the great majority of them, in this country. It has the best grade and the best positions in the cities. It has the best position at Niagara, on the St. Lawrence, on the Detroit river, on the upper lakes, and it has good positions in cities in the West and in the West generally. There is no reason why that road, as has been said already this evening, should not be a great asset, and should not have a surplus, instead of a deficit, in a few years. The same may be said in regard to the Canadian National. While we are speaking of our own roads, and the misadventures which they suffered, let me read to the House an item that appeared in the press this morning, in regard to the railways of the United States and the railways of Great Britain. Do hon. members know that the railways of Great Britain to-day are practically on the scrap heap? The railways of the United States are in a similar position, and some kind of government relief must come to those roads. I am not speaking about the failures in connection with the railroad systems of Europe. They have all gone to pieces by reason of the war. Railways owned by the state in France, in Germany, Russia and Italy, as well as those owned by citizens, have been absolutely ruined by the war and some other things. Referring to the two cases of Great Britain and the United States, the following despatch appeared in the Ottawa press this morning:

> Washington, March 26.—Enforced consolidation of United States railroads into a small number of systems putting strong and weak together, is looming up more and more as the probable big feature of the transportation recommendations which President Harding will make in his forthcoming series of speeches. This step will be urged as the only salvation for weaker roads, short of government ownership. Not improbably the British experience with consolidations which is said to have been satisfactory, will be set forth.

They have a plan in Washington, and it will be submitted to the country, to unify the roads there, and that unification will be brought about by the use of the credit of the United States and the issue of bonds. They are going to issue bonds to recover possession of the railways there. They cannot go ahead.

10 p.m.

We have overbuilt and they have underbuilt; the roads are in trouble and the government has to come to their relief. They are in the same position in Great Britain. A consolidation is going on there for the improvement of the railways, and the government will have to take the responsibility. So that what is coming to Canada is coming to Great Britain and the United States, and the prospect is that national ownership of railways will be more or less adopted in those countries. If that is the case, we should not be discouraged in Canada, and we should have confidence in the road and in the government, inasmuch as they have said that they intend to give government ownership a fair trial. I have not heard to-night—and I am not going to make the statement myself—that they have not given it a fair trial, and I will go so far as to congratulate the minister on the statement he made and which indicated that the railways would get a fair trial. The results of unification will come and come rapidly. We will let the public see that we really have a first-class railway system and a real solution of the railway problem in Canada.

In connection with the suggestions that have been made and the grievances which have been voiced as to our railways, the new management cannot too soon take up the question of a reclassification of freight with special reference to the basic industries that provide the great bulk of the traffic. That does not quite involve a reduction in rate, so much as an improved classification. We will give advantages to the public. The public are interested in grain and the products of grain, coal and ore, and there is no reason why the new management of the National Railways should not take up reclassification and bring relief to the people of this country who are now complaining of freight rates.

I do not suggest that the new administration, or the new board of directors, should take up the question of waterways in connection with the railways, but that the parliament of Canada should immediately take up the question of the improvement of waterways and in that way help to reduce freight rates, because the nation has just as much interest in waterways as in railways. The one is complementary of the other, and there is no reason why a great reduction in freight rates cannot be effected by parliament taking up the improvement of the waterways and co-operating with the board of directors of the railways. Therefore Mr. Speaker it is a satisfaction to those who, under a great deal of discouragement, favour the nationalization of the railways, not only because of conditions that go with it, but because of the mess into which our railways have got, that we have public ownership to-day, and that it promises to be a success. The people of Canada will be more than satisfied if they find the government on its part giving public ownership a fair trial, and doing everything possible to carry out the trust confided to them.

I wish to point out that a great change has come to the railways of America by reason of the improvement of the highways and the development of the motor truck and motor car. Do hon. members know that the local passenger business of the United States, or the great bulk of it, has gone largely to the motor car? Certainly the great bulk of the local freight in the United States and in Canada now is going to the motor truck, and in that way a lot of local business has been taken from the railways, and has gone to the highways and the motor car. I know districts 200 miles in extent where there are good highways, where almost all the local business in passengers and freight has gone to the motor trucks and cars operated on the highways. The great advantage of this—and we must all recognize it—is that the motor truck comes to the shipper for the freight and delivers it to the receiver. There is no cartage to pay. It goes the same day it is taken from the shipper and there is a return trip the next day.

The railways have suffered discouragement by the disappearance of a lot of the local business which has been profitable to them in the past. But notwithstanding all that, there is a future for the railways. There is no future for the railways that have not the government behind them—and that is a fact that has come out to-day—both in Britain and the United States. That being the case, we ought to have a feeling of confidence in regard to the future and of appreciation for those who put forward the idea that the only way out of the transportation problem was by government ownership, and who had not misled the country or induced it to embark upon a doubtful venture. Therefore, if the minister can improve his statements somewhat on the line of the statements given us by the Canadian Pacific Railway, we will be able to get the number of cars, the mileage, and the net receipts for the year, and we will also get, a little later on, an actual statement of the assets and liabilities in connection with these roads we have now taken over and which constitute, I hope, the greatest asset Canada has.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

SUPPLY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Railways and Canals—amount not exceeding $73,000,000 to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred (where amounts available from net operating earnings may be insufficient) by or on behalf of the Canadian National Railway Company, hereinafter called "the Company", or any company specified in the first schedule to the act incorporating the Canadian National Railway Company, being chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, or by the company in respect of any railways, properties or works entrusted to the company from time to time under the provisions of section 11 of the said chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, or by or on behalf of any company specified or referred to in chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1920; or any one or more of them, on any of the following accounts: (a) Operating deficits whenever incurred or ascertained. (b) Acquisition of property, materials and supplies. (c) Interest and sinking funds on notes, securities or obligations. (d) Principal and interest of maturing or matured loans secured or unsecured. (e) Construction and betterments. (f) Co-ordination or consolidation of railway lines and facilities. (g) Guarantees of securities. The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time, in the discretion of the Governor in Council: (a) To meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred by the company in respect of railway, properties and works entrusted to the company as aforesaid. (b) By way of loans in cash, or by way of guarantee, or partly one way and partly the other, subject, however, as follows: If by way of loans, the amount or amounts advanced shall be repayable on demand, with interest at the rate fixed by the Governor in Council, from time to time, payable half-yearly, secured if and when directed by the Governor in Council by mortgage or mortgages upon such properties in such form and containing such terms and conditions, not inconsistent herewith, as the Governor in Council may approve. If by way of guarantee, any such guarantee may be of the principal and interest of the notes and obligations or securities of one or more of the said companies specified by the Governor in Council, and may be signed by the Minister of Finance, on behalf of His Majesty, in such form and on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine to be appropriate and applicable thereto, $73,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We might possibly have some useful discussion on this item to-night, but I doubt it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last night intimated that to-night we would consider the estimates of the Department of Labour. There was no positive statement to that effect but that was his belief. I think it would be better if we took up the estimates of that department. The railway statement has just been given and hon. members would wish to read it before discussing it, or at least before coming to any decision with reference to it. This is the chief item of the railway estimates, and while I have no objection to its being discussed to some extent to-night, I do not think that the minister should ask us to consider an item of this kind to-night immediately after he has presented his statement to the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am fully in accord with what the leader of the Opposition says. Probably the discussion to-night would not lessen the volume of debate on any subsequent occasion; we should no doubt have to start all over again. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is here and I suppose there could be no objection to the committee proceeding to consider his estimates.

Mr. BOYS: The minister might be good enough to give me some information regarding the Crowsnest agreement. In his statement he said that the loss in revenue due to the restoration of the Crowsnest rates was in round figures $6,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: $6,500,000.

Mr. BOYS: That would, of course, be from the first of July to the end of the year. I did not gather just how that figure was arrived at. The statement which was submitted to the committee on transportation rates was based on the rates prevailing in 1921. Comparing those rates with the rates established by the Crowsnest agreement, and assuming the volume of business in 1922 to be the same as that of 1921, I find the estimate given by Mr. Hanna before the committee was $8,600,000 for the whole year, while in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway it was some $7,000,000. Now we are told that for the six months mentioned it was $6,500,000. I did not gather from the minister, however, what figures he used in arriving at that sum.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will probably find the data in the tables I have placed on Hansard but which I did not read. If not, I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would necessarily be arrived at by a comparison of the rates obtaining last year with the rates obtaining in 1921, because the information furnished the minister evidently was a comparison of 1922 with 1921. To be a comparison it would have to take the rates of 1922 as opposed to the rates of 1921.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I pointed out, there is no doubt there would be that difference if we could assume that the 1921 rates under any conditions would have prevailed. Of course, the 1921 rates would never have prevailed, no matter what this parliament did as respects the Crowsnest agreement. But so far as the comparison goes, it would be the 1922 rates as against the 1921.

Mr. BOYS: I am of the same opinion, but I was paying fairly close attention to the matter and did not recall that the minister had mentioned that, That is why I wanted to be sure. It is an important matter, because we should like to compare the figures the minister gives with the statements given on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways before the committee on transportation rates.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think we can take any other basis than the rates of 1921 as compared with the rates of 1922; and I think I explained that it was also assumed that the same amount of traffic was carried in 1922. In other words, the comparison did not allow for the fact that greater tonnage might have been carried on account of the reduction in rates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister give the figures comparing the actual rate in effect in 1922 with the rate that the railways agreed to accept before the special committee? I do not suppose the difference would be more than a million and a half or a million and a quarter.

Mr. GRAHAM: That estimate could be given. The railways did make a proposition as to rates, but I have not any comparison.

Mr. BOYS: If I remember rightly the figure is something over $3,000,000, I forget whether in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian National Railways.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondents, $50,000.

Mr. BOYS: Was all of this appropriation expended last year?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The expenditure up to January 31st was $38,928.29, leaving $11,000 for the three months.

Mr. BOYS: What are the details of this expenditure?

Mr. MURDOCK: Correspondents' salaries, $7,984.78; travelling expenses, $186.53; sundries, $1.60; printing and stationery, $28,615; retail prices reports, $139.55; rental survey, $736.17; publication newspapers, etc., $1,264.66.

Mr. BOYS: Is there any substantial difference in the various figures now given as between this year and last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The expenditure is practically the same as last year.

Mr. BOYS: I know the total is of course; but are the figures the same in the separation of the various items?

Mr. MURDOCK: The actual amount expended is about the same from year to year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the printing and stationery item?

Mr. MURDOCK: The entire appropriation of $50,000 is intended mainly to meet the cost of printing, binding and distribution of the Labour Gazette, which runs to about $36,000 a year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the Printing bureau print the Labour Gazette?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is that?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think the Labour Gazette has been printed in the bureau for twenty years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is evidently one reform that was left open for the minister. How is it he does not grasp the opportunity?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have been giving the matter very serious consideration and hope to meet the right hon. gentleman's wishes in respect to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is the Labour Gazette printed?

Mr. MURDOCK: The placing of the union label on the Labour Gazette was regarded in years gone by as of sufficient importance to warrant having the Gazette printed outside the bureau. That has been the determining factor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the government in doing all the rest of its printing, which would be about 97 or 98 per cent, is non-union; but when it comes to the Labour Gazette it is union?

Mr. BOYS: Where is the Labour Gazette printed?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Federal Printing Company prints the Labour Gazette at the present time.

Mr. BOYS: Where does that company operate?

Mr. MURDOCK: It is an Ottawa concern.

Mr. BOYS: Has it been printing the Labour Gazette for some years?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, the contract was given to the Federal Printing Company early in 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are a very strong Liberal aggregation, I am informed.

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand that there are some reputable Liberals connected with the firm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any disreputable?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know.

Mr. CHARTERS: What is the circulation?

Mr. MURDOCK: About 13,000 a month.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was this contract made by tender, were other firms invited to tender, and how long is the contract likely to defer the minister's hopes of getting the work done in the bureau?

Mr. MURDOCK: The contract was not let by tender. It runs from month to month at the will of the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is it not let by tender?

Mr. MURDOCK: The minister being new at the business just followed the practice that had been in vogue in the past, but which may not have been right.

Mr. BOYS: What was the cost of printing the Labour Gazette last year and the year before as compared with the present year? Was the change made because the price was too high, or the work done unsatisfactorily, or was it desired to increase the price a little?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Auditor General's report for 1921-22 shows that 213,800 copies of the Labour Gazette were printed at a cost of $32,614.15. The annual cost has been between $32,000 and $36,000 for a number of years, with a tendency to slightly increase each year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the fiscal year and would be at the old rate. Will the minister give the exact figures to show how the rates compare? Who was the old contract with? I do not know myself.

Mr. MURDOCK: The rates are standard, subject to the King's Printer's audit and check—in other words the current rates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no contract at all?

Mr. MURDOCK: A contract to do the work, subject to audit and payment for the amount of printing done.

Mr. BOYS: Is it a written or verbal contract?

Mr. MURDOCK: Verbal. There is a brief statement of the understanding with regard to the matter exactly the same as when I took charge.

Mr. BOYS: If the company who had the contract before that were doing the work satisfactorily and at the same price, why the change?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would not say that the work was being done altogether satisfactorily before.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister say it was not?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I would not like to be that positive about it.

Mr. BOYS: The minister must have had some good reason for making the change. It may have been a political reason, but to him it would have been good, at all events. Now, can he not let us have the reason?

Mr. MURDOCK: It was regarded as advisable and consistent under the circumstances, to make the change and to have another concern for the time being print the Labour Gazette with the union label thereon.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. BOYS: I am delighted with the pleasant way in which the minister replies, but I would like to get the information. He says it was advisable—advisable for what reason?

Mr. MURDOCK: I cannot add anything to what I have said. There were various suggestions that indicated the advisability of making the change, for the time being at least.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What were those suggestions?

Mr. BOYS: Was it because there were some reputable Liberals in this new concern?

Mr. MURDOCK: That possibly was a factor.

Mr. BOYS: Has the minister not a better reason?

Mr. MURDOCK: There were various reasons, the chief of which was that the minister, being new on the job, was following what he understood to have been the invariable practice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who were the contractors before, and who were the contractors prior to 1911?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Ottawa Printing Company, of which the late Mr. Boudreault, I believe, was the head.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the matter with the firm that was doing the work?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not charging anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks as if this is a patronage government, does it not?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I would not think so—not so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only reason the minister has yet given is that there may have been some Liberals in the new firm. Can he think of any other reason?

Mr. LANCTOT: I would like to know something about the old firm. Were there any Tories in it, or any Liberals?

Mr. MURDOCK: Up to 1911 the Ottawa Free Press Company had the contract. In 1911 it was promptly transferred to the Ottawa Printing Company and the work was done by them until about a year ago.

Mr. SHAW: Is it not about time that the contract was let by tender?

Mr. MURDOCK: That would not involve a saving, because the payment in any case for the printing done would be on the basis of the cost assessed by the auditors of the Printing bureau and on standard rates fixed for all such work. Therefore it is merely a question of getting a concern which can satisfactorily and expeditiously turn out the work. It is known in advance what they are going to get for the work performed.

Mr. SHAW: Will the minister be frank and say that the reason for the change was entirely a political one?

Mr. MURDOCK: I could not truthfully say that. There were several reasons. The one that has been suggested by gentlemen opposite can be regarded by them as one of the side issues, but the real reason was that it was regarded under all the circumstances as being more satisfactory to make a change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry the minister's memory is so bad. He can only think of the political reason; there are other reasons that for the life of him he cannot think of to-night. The minister says all these prices are fixed and that there is no use in calling for tenders. When the Combines Act comes into operation is the minister going to turn his fury upon this combine?

Mr. JACOBS: Wait until it gets on the statute book, and then we will see.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, I am prepared to wait for that. But the minister says that everything is fixed; that there would be no use in getting tenders because they would all be of the same amount. That would look to me like something that would come under the definition of "combine" under the new act. Does the minister intend to turn his wrath upon this combine when the new act comes into effect?

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend misunderstands. The government railways, for example, have a good deal of printing done at different places throughout Canada. No matter what the firm doing the work undertakes to charge, the payments are based on a recognized schedule of printers' rates. That is what happens in this case. All these printing accounts are audited by the King's Printer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the use of auditing them if they are all the same?

Mr. MURDOCK: Measurements have to be made, then we find printing concerns attempting to overcharge. In such cases their rate is cut down to the current or standard rate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister think it is of any great value to have the union label on this one publication when it is not on the others?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under these circumstances is any effort being made to see that some kind of council is established or other arrangements made under which the employees of the Printing bureau may have some sort of self-government?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not heard of any complaint on the part of Printing bureau employees that they have not had all necessary opportunities to make their wants and complaints known to those in charge. I should be the first to resent it if I thought any condition of that kind existed.

Mr. BOYS: When was the Federal Printing Company incorporated?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am unable to answer that.

Mr. BOYS: Where they in business a year before they got this printing contract?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not sure as to that.

Mr. BOYS: I will put a more direct question. Was the company incorporated for the express purpose of receiving and filling this contract?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have no knowledge as to that. I do not even know if it is incorporated yet.

Mr. BOYS: Then formed as a co-partnership?

Mr. MURDOCK: It has been doing the work.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister have any difficulty in getting that information for the committee?

Mr. MURDOCK: I will try.

Mr. BOYS: I may say frankly that so far as I am concerned, if instead of mentioning one reason, namely, political, and then saying generally that there were other reasons, without giving them, the minister had given those various other reasons I would be quite satisfied. If he will not do so, I think we ought to have some information about this company, and if he cannot give it now perhaps the minister will get the information as to when they started doing business, and whether they formed a partnership or were incorporated as a company for the express purpose of filling this contract.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have no knowledge as to that. I am told they were in business for some time. They were certainly in business when they got the contract for printing the Labour Gazette.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would like to ask the minister how he came to pick upon this amount of $50,000—and I will give him my reason for asking the question. This sum of $50,000 appears in the Estimates of 1920-1921, 1922-1923, and 1923-1924. The minister just seems to have carried the item on. The figure seems to have been tatooed into the Estimates. The minister in the section of the country whence I came made very loud protestation of the reforms and economies that were going to be effected when his government was in office. Surely this item of $50,000 need not be carried on from year to year. If the minister really means economy, I think that ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars could be deducted from this amount. I would ask the minister, since this hereditary item of $50,000 appears in the Estimates again this year, whether it is going to be $50,000 next year.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend will look at the Auditor General's report he will find that for the last fiscal year there was spent $49,949.90. Up to the 31st of January last, as I have already stated to the committee, there was spent $38,928.29, leaving $11,071.71 to meet the expenses of printing the Labour Gazette, pay correspondents' salaries and other incidentals for the months of February and March of the closing fiscal year.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Can the minister effect any economies in this expenditure, or is economy just a conversational word with him?

Mr. MURDOCK: On this particular item I think not, because the circulation of the Labour Gazette is increasing, and an increase in circulation means an increased expenditure under this vote. This one item has therefore remained pretty stationary. As I have already intimated, there was only $50.10 too much voted for the last fiscal year, as is shown by the Auditor General's report. That, I think, is working pretty close to the estimate.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): To whom is the Labour Gazette distributed, organizations or individuals?

Mr. MURDOCK: There are from seven to eight thousand subscriptions to the Labour Gazette. It is also distributed free to the local secretaries of trades unions and very many others who are interested in its contents.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. MacLAREN: If the Gazette were printed in the Printing bureau, would that effect a saving over the present cost?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand that in the actual printing there would be no particular saving. It might be possible for the Printing bureau to print the Labour Gazette without additional help, but it is pretty hard to determine what the actual cost would be having regard to the overhead in connection with the operation of the Printing bureau.

Mr. MacLAREN: Has the minister under consideration transferring the printing of the Labour Gazette to the Printing bureau?

Mr. MURDOCK: One of the principal considerations that was in mind about a year ago when this contract was changed was the possibility of its being printed, either then or at some time in the near future, at the Printing bureau if that appeared to be the proper thing to do. That is the reason the agreement was made to run from month to month.

Mr. BOYS: Would that not be a very good reason for not making the change? If you were contemplating getting it done at the Printing bureau, why make a change from the previous company at all? I should think the very opposite is the reason. This contract involves $32,600, which is a pretty snug amount. Another company had this work, and I understand that their work was satisfactory. The price was identical with the price the minister is paying now, and the minister was confronted with one of two alternatives: Either the Gazette would continue to be printed by that company, or a change would take place. The minister no doubt talked the matter over, and perhaps took advice upon it for all I know, made inquiries, and because of information of some kind that he received he decided to make the change. I do think the House is entitled to more information than the minister has given. He said that one reason for making the change was political, and that is the only reason we can get, but he admits frankly that the change was made for various other reasons. Now the fact that the minister says "for various reasons" shows that he knows there were various other reasons, and if he knows there were, he must know what they were. Surely in a matter involving such a sum we have a right to know why that change was made.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the hon. member as the Whip of a once important party in this country consider the first reason sufficient?

Mr. BOYS: If the hon. member will have patience and give the minister a chance to answer my question—

Mr. JACOBS: I have asked a question and I would like an answer.

Mr. BOYS: I will await my answer. After that, I will be quite prepared to submit myself to examination by my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: I have my doubts about it.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend will indicate the question he wants answered—

Mr. BOYS: I do not wonder the minister has forgotten the various reasons. If I have to repeat this all again I am quite willing to do it but I do not want to unduly delay the committee. If the minister tells me that he does not know what I am asking I will be quite willing to repeat the question.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BOYS: Certainly not while I am on my feet and asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN: I thought the hon. member had put his question.

Mr. BOYS: I have asked the question and I am waiting for an answer.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend started out by making the assertion that a good reason for not transferring the contract would be if we were considering the possibility of having the printing done in the Printing bureau. He is entirely mistaken as to that. An important reason why we should not seriously consider it is the fact that for many years it has been regarded as the proper thing—such had been the opinion entertained under two previous governments—to have the Labour Gazette printed outside the Printing bureau for the purpose of getting the union label on it. The question to be determined was whether that should be continued. It was indicated that certain of the conditions under which the Labour Gazette was being printed were not altogether satisfactory, and that the concern handling it were, possibly, not performing the work with entire satisfaction. In other words it was indicated that it was advisable to make some change, and the point to determine was should we change from the concern that were printing the Gazette and had been doing so for a number of years, transfer it to the Printing bureau and take the chance of cutting the union label out; or should we let some other concern handle it for a time, under an agreement subject to thirty days' notice. That was the position that was taken and I think my hon. friend will, on reflection, agree—no matter how frank I may be expected to be—that he could scarcely require me to disclose all the particular reasons indicated to me as to why it is advisable to change this particular contract, or to change from one firm to the other. I was given to understand in the most emphatic manner that it was advisable to do so. One important reason why it was deemed advisable was, that the concern that had been printing it had so much work that they could not give as prompt consideration to the handling of the Labour Gazette as we believed the cause of Labour was entitled to have. In other words they could not get the Gazette out as promptly and satisfactorily as was considered necessary.

Mr. BOYS: I want to thank the minister for his explanation; that is one feature we have been waiting for. I would have thought that the main consideration in the matter would be the price and the way in which the work was done. If the work was properly done and at a right price one would not think a change would be desirable. However, if the publication of the Gazette was delayed and the minister gives that as a reason for making the change, I admit that is a fair reason. Now may I ask the minister, are there any other reasons as favourable that he can give? We have got two of them—value of the work and politics.

Mr. MURDOCK: May I correct my hon. friend on one point: There is no difference in the price. The price is fixed; it is a schedule rate.

Mr. BOYS: What I mean is that if you were getting the work done more cheaply that would be a good reason; but not if the price was the same, and the work was satisfactorily performed. The minister has given one reason for the change and if he has any more to assign we are entitled to have them.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have already informed the hon. gentleman that there were various reasons advanced. Among those reasons is a very important one that we wanted to get the Labour Gazette out promptly.

Mr. BOYS: The minister is still very strong in his use of the word "various", I see. Who is the editor of the Labour Gazette?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Hooper has been the editor, or was so classified, although the committee will understand that the Deputy Minister of Labour really occupies the position. In an effort to economize or, shall I say, co-ordinate the duties of the department, it has been decided that the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister ought to be able to do all the necessary work in editing the Labour Gazette. In consequence the services of Mr. Hooper, who has been editing the Gazette, have been, with great regret, dispensed with, dating from the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. CHARTERS: Does he belong to the union?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not informed as to that. Furthermore, I do not know that there is a union which embraces editors.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask the minister if Mr. Hooper did his work satisfactorily?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh, yes. There has not been the slightest complaint in regard to Mr. Hooper's work; in fact I understand that his work has been commendably well done always. He is a very capable man so far as I know.

Mr. CHARTERS: Is Mr. Hooper still in the employ of the department?

Mr. MURDOCK: He will until the end of the fiscal year be on salary. Then, under the retirement regulations, he will receive, I think, an amount totalling some five months' salary for the number of years he has put in.

Mr. CHARTERS: So there is no saving at all by the arrangement which has been made?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, there will be a saving to the extent of $2,880 a year, which I think is the salary of the editor. For five months, of course, there will be no saving. The government will pay just as much for the next five months as though Mr. Hooper were on continuous duty, but after that there will be a saving.

Mr. SPENCER: How long has Mr. Hooper been in the regular service?

Mr. MURDOCK: He has been in the government's service for about seventeen years, and in the Department of Labour for five or six years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister tell us the number of correspondents employed by the Labour Gazette and what allowance they receive at the present time?

Mr. MURDOCK: There are about sixty or sixty-five of these correspondents and the salary paid runs from $125 to $300 a year. I think one correspondent receives $300, but the majority are paid about $150, $175 or $200.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister think that those correspondents who receive $125 are being sufficiently remunerated for the work they do? I remember that when the Gazette was established, in the year 1900, the salary of a correspondent was $100, and he was expected to send in at least twelve reports per annum. I know at that time the amount paid was looked upon as very small. I am rather surprised to find that after twenty-three years there are men still working for the Labour Gazette at $125 per annum. Does not the minister think there ought to be an increase in the amount paid to those in the lower grade at the present time?

Mr. MURDOCK: The lower salaries are $125 or $150 paid to correspondents in the very small towns. For example, at Bathurst, New Brunswick, the salary is $125, and at Thetford Mines, Quebec, the salary is $150. My hon. friend, I am sure, will appreciate that some capable clerk, a young gentleman or older gentleman, who was thoroughly familiar with conditions at Bathurst, New Brunswick, or at Thetford, Quebec, could in his evenings or spare moments put together the detailed information that is required covering that particular locality, and send it in at the proper time to the Department of Labour.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What do they receive at points in Ontario such as Stratford, Kitchener and Guelph?

Mr. MURDOCK: At Kitchener $150, Stratford $150, and Guelph $150.

Mr. BOYS: What is the figure at Barrie? It might be under "Allandale." I think we would like an increase there.

Mr. MURDOCK: Not large enough to qualify.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amounts paid in the smaller places are rather too small. I do not know that I am authorized to make any complaint on behalf of these correspondents. If they are satisfied with the amount, I do not know that I should offer any complaint at all. I know that I have heard comment among labour men that the position of correspondent of the Labour Gazette was hardly worth while, and I think the minister would make no mistake if he were to look into the matter a little in the ordinary places of from ten to twenty-five thousand people in the province of Ontario, because I do think $150 is too little for the work these men do.

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand that some few years ago there were some increases made in regard to these correspondents, and I will be glad to take under advisement any complaints in that respect that I receive.

Mr. GOULD: I wish to ask the minister in regard to the correspondent in the lignite area in southern Saskatchewan, and the correspondent in Alberta. What is the name of the gentleman in southern Saskatchewan?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. W. Hawkins at Lethbridge, Alberta, and Mr. McCreath, in Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. GOULD: Who is the correspondent in southern Saskatchewan?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. W. B. McNeill at Regina and Rev. E. B. Smith at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. I said $125 was the minimum, but I notice there is a salary of $100 a year.

Mr. EULER: Is there any effort to make the Gazette self-sustaining?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, we can only charge 20 cents a copy for the Labour Gazette, and of course that does not begin to pay the cost of its publication. That is only a nominal fee, I am told, to prevent people 11 p.m. from writing in just for fun to get the Gazette, but with a desire to circulate it as much as possible.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $25,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was this vote expended last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, and we are $3,376 in debt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Could we have some particulars of the expenditure?

Mr. MURDOCK: For this year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For last year—how the money was spent?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member means for the present fiscal year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK: During the present fiscal year we have had a considerable number of boards under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The first one that is recorded here is the Association of Canadian Building and Construction Industries and employees, hod-carriers, $590; the Dominion Power and Transmission Company and employees, $125; various Nova Scotia coal companies and employees, $2,583.27; the Ottawa Electric Railway and employees, $1,560; The Algoma Eastern Railway and employees, $1,194.30; New York Central Railway and Federated Shopcrafts, $352.80, and so on. Does my hon. friend want me to complete the list? There were two large expenditures. The Southern Alberta Coal Company and employees, district 18, during last spring, cost $4,991.99. Another large matter was the Grand Trunk and employees, clerks' investigation, which cost $4,868.66. These are the two largest expenditures for the board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any expenditure under this item in regard to the strike that took place at Sydney, Nova Scotia, in which the militia of Canada was called out?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, considerably prior to the time that strike occurred there was a board; in fact it was the previous year. There were two boards, if my hon. friend will recall, down in Sydney, Nova Scotia, during the latter part of 1921 and the early part of 1922.

Mr. GUTHRIE: An item was given by the minister, Nova Scotia Coal Company, $2,583.27. Were the costs of these boards included in that item?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, that is the cost of the board of investigation that inquired into that situation.

Mr. BOYS: These costs all have to do with the board?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Nothing whatever to do with the troops that were sent down there?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh, no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the expenditure under this head appears to be quite moderate, particularly if the convening of these boards has resulted in stopping the strike or the apprehended strike, but we know that in one instance that was not the result, that notwithstanding the efforts and the good offices of the board, very serious difficulties did arise. The question is likely to come before the House, and I suppose the question could be discussed under this item as to who is going to pay the rather substantial amount that someone is liable for in connection with one of these strikes in Nova Scotia which failed of settlement under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Would the minister give us some of the particulars of the amount which that strike has cost the country?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very sorry, but I have absolutely no knowledge of any other cost to the country except this particular item, unless it be the approximate amount lost in wages.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister the approximate amounts in lost wages? I should be glad to know what the cost of such a strike is to the country.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not that information, and it would be to a very large extent guess work, as I think my hon. friend will appreciate. The alleged damage to property, if any, and the loss of wages and all of these things would be mere matters of conjecture. However, I have here a memorandum that indicates the time lost and the number of men who were out of work during the year on two big coal mining strikes in Nova Scotia. In the strike from August 14 to September 5th, eighteen days, 14,353 men were out and the time lost represented 258,354 days. In district No. 18 from April 1st to August 28th, 124 days, 7,538 men were out and the time lost represented 931,960 days. The total time lost therefore was considerably over a million days.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the loss in wages?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, that is the loss of days, and I presume that if you averaged that at $5 a day you could find the approximate total amount of money involved.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So that if I understand the matter, these strikes of which the minister has now given the particulars have cost in wages alone something between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. If the discussion of these strikes comes properly under this item, I would ask that the item be allowed to stand until some future time, as I am aware that some hon. members desire to discuss it. Of course, if the strikes are not pertinent I have no objection to the item carrying. But when one considers the tremendous importance of these strikes to this country in view of the loss in wages to the men, the loss to the owners and operators of the mines, and the loss to the transportation companies, one is appalled by the figures; and if the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act fails in cases of this kind, could not the minister offer some suggestion for the improvement of the act? Is there no means which this parliament could adopt which in the future would have a better effect as between the employer and the employee in the way of avoiding or settling these strikes? They run into untold millions, and I should think that the minister has probably given a very great deal of attention to this question. The committee would no doubt be very much pleased to know, therefore, if he can offer any practical suggestion for the improvement of the act which in future will, if possible, obviate these strikes, or some of the larger ones at all events.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member will no doubt have noted that in the proposed Bill No. 84 now before the House some suggestions are contained looking to the improvement of the act, and which it is hoped may assist in maintaining a better condition of industrial harmony. As to the question of securing a measure of any kind that will at all times, under all circumstances, guard against the possibility of a strike, or the conditions that are usually incident to a disagreement between employer and employee on vital wage questions, I regret to say that I do not believe we have come to the point where we can secure anything of that kind at present. But if my hon. friend will analyze the results that have accrued to Canada in connection with the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act he will agree that we have been remarkably fortunate, and that there has been very little loss sustained in Canada in comparison with various other countries that we might mention. I have not the slightest objection, if my hon. friend insists, to allowing this item to stand for discussion later. But I think he will concede that this particular strike in which he is interested that occurred in Sydney, Nova Scotia, in August last, was the culmination of a dispute long standing. One of the very first acts I was called upon, as Minister of Labour, to perform, was to appoint a chairman for a board that had been authorized by my predecessor in the previous government. The board was all ready to function and was just awaiting the final word to proceed. That board, as my hon. friend will recall, undertook to deal with this particular situation, with some unfortunate results for some reason or other. My hon. friend will remember also the discussion which later developed and the proposals that were made down in Sydney, with the final result that we again appointed another board in the month of April or May. That board filed its award, and that award was equally thrown to one side by the workmen as insufficient to satisfy their demands, with the result that all at once, with very little or no notice, and in repudiation of the suggestions made in the board's award, the employees went on strike. The results therefrom are, I think, familiar to my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was the final settlement after the strike made in terms of the award originally submitted by the Board of Conciliation?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think not. I do not think it had any regard for the terms of the award.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the final settlement came about through the efforts of the men and their employers directly, without the influence of the board at all. Is that correct?

Mr. MURDOCK: The final settlement was made as between the workmen and those representing the company. They, of course, had the advantage of the two inquiries that had been conducted during six or seven months. They had the advantage of all that information brought out in those two inquiries; but the settlement was made, as all settlements should be made, between those directly concerned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is just the point that was brought to my knowledge during the present session in the corridors of the House. The statement was made that the men and the employers would have come to a settlement if there had been no board at all in this matter, that the appointment of the board had the effect of irritating either one side or the other and of increasing rather than diminishing the difficulty. Does the minister think that in a case such as the Nova Scota coal strike a settlement would have been reached more expeditiously had no board of investigation been appointed? I know of course that when the parties concerned demand boards, under our present law it is the duty of the minister to appoint them. But if in that respect the act is wrong, we can easily change it. It has been drawn to my attention that the Nova Scotia coal strike went from bad to worse by reason of the appointment of a board, one party or the other resenting the appointment, and the difficulty of the situation increasing from week to week; whereas it is said, that if no board at all had been appointed the difficulty would have been settled without any very serious trouble. In the end it was settled, as the minister says, by the operators and the men, absolutely without regard to the fiinding of the board. I know that in very many instances the act has proved very beneficial in operation and that small strikes and difficulties have been avoided. But when the difficulty becomes serious does the minister think that the appointment of a board merely adds fuel to the fire, or has it the effect of bringing about a speedier settlement?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend might possibly like to have the results speak for themselves. From 1907 to 1921, 558 applications were made under the act for a board. The number of boards granted was 401. The number of disputes where a strike was not averted or ended was 34 only out of that total. So I think this shows a very satisfactory average of settlements. Then my hon. friend will recall that last summer when our neighbours to the south were in the midst of the most disastrous railroad strikes that possibly they had ever experienced, Canada was free from such troubles, and I think it is not improper to take some credit for this satisfactory condition to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I think the result secured through the negotiations entered into between employee and employers under the provisions of the act maintained a harmony that was evidenced in our railroad situation throughout the past year. As my hon. friend knows, the mining situation in this country has been somewhat in a class by itself so far as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is concerned. In other words, our miners unfortunately have not taken kindly to the provisions of the act and have not always co-operated to the extent we might hope in carrying out its provisions.

Mr. BOYS: I quite agree that the results given are most satisfactory. Will the minister state how many boards were constituted last year and in what cases they were successful?

Mr. MURDOCK: Thirty-two boards were established and strikes resulted in two mining cases, one east and the other west. My hon. friend may recall that in the West the strike began on April 1, 1922, with the general coal miners' strike all over the United States almost before we were able to get a board formed and functioning. The strike in District 18 lasted for several months concurrently with the strike in the United States coal industry.

Mr. SHAW: Does the minister suggest that the strike to which he has just referred, which involved something over 7,000 men, was settled only by reason of the settlement reached in the United States? Is it not a fact that that strike was settled independently of the difficulty in the United States, and that the work of the Labour Department in so far as the application of this particular act is concerned was ineffective?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would not say that the work of the department was altogether ineffective, nor would I agree that the settlement reached at Calgary was independent of the settlement reached in the United States, as documentary evidence on file will indicate. A tentative arrangement, as my hon. friend will recall, was entered into by the operators and the representatives of the United Mine Workers on the 18th of August to recommence operations under certain conditions dependent upon the scale of wages finally adopted in the central competitive field of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and a portion of Illinois. Within a few days after entering into that agreement they appointed the Minister of Labour as arbitrator to determine when that time arrived, and within a very few days it was necessary for us to wire to both the operators and the miners in the western territory that the rates which had been in effect during the preceding year must continue in force in accordance with what had been settled in the central competitive field. But so far as the actual board is concerned, I could not indicate that it did any particular good during the time that it was investigating the trouble. It was handicapped at the start from the fact that the men in District 18 intended to be governed by what was done in the central competitive field, as the final basis of settlement indicates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the minister let this item stand? I know there are some hon. members absent to-night who want to discuss it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the number of days stated by the minister include strikes in Nova Scotia only?

Mr. MURDOCK: The figure includes strikes in both Nova Scotia and Alberta. The days lost in Nova Scotia were 258,354; in Alberta, 931,960.

Item stands.

Administration, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, $30,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is some cutting down in this item.

Mr. SHAW: What is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. MURDOCK: The amount asked is $30,000, a reduction of $15,000 from the appropriation for 1922-23. The appropriation is intended to cover expenses incurred in the administration of the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act. Briefly, the statute empowers the minister to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices, to promote uniformity of methods among them, and to establish clearing houses for the interchange of information between employment offices concerning the transfer of labour and other matters. For the purposes of such organization and co-ordination, provision is made for the distribution among the various provinces annually of $150,000. The present vote, however, relates only to expenses incurred in administration and represents disbursements on account of printing, stationery and other supplies, travelling and temporary help There were in January of this year 70 provincial offices and clearing houses, all of which are outfitted from the department with respect to stationery and supplies. It is the intention of the department to close the clearing house at Halifax at the end of the present fiscal year, and that partly accounts for the reduction of $15,000. The duties of the Halifax office are being transferred to Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister be good enough to indicate his attitude with respect to private employment bureaus? I understand there is only one government employment office in New Brunswick, that which is in charge of Mr. Cochrane at Moncton. Some three or four years ago an employment bureau was established at Fredericton, the provincial government paying half the cost of equipment and a portion of the upkeep, the municipality of Fredericton providing offices and so on. The provincial government refused to continue this arrangement, with the result that there was no employment office in the city. Last autumn a returned soldier who had been in the employ of the office while it was functioning opened a private employment bureau in Fredericton, thus filling a long felt want. I understand that he was waited upon by an officer of the Department of Labour and told that it would be illegal for him to continue that office. He consulted me in the matter, and I have been unable to find any statute that would prevent him from maintaining that office, and I so advised him. However, an effort has been made by some officials of this department to have him close up, but the effort has been unsuccessful, and there has been no prosecution, so I assume the advice I gave him was correct. Will the minister tell us what his attitude is with regard to private individuals opening employment offices in localities where no such offices are maintained with the co-operation of his department?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is not quite correct in saying that there is only one government employment office in New Brunswick. There is one at Moncton, one at Chatham, and one at St. John.

Mr. HANSON: Does the province contribute to the maintenance of these offices?

Mr. MURDOCK: New Brunswick has all along hesitated to see the necessity of establishing provincial employment offices but has co-operated in the maintenance of municipal employment offices. I understand that at the St. John office they do provide the premises, the staff being chosen by the municipality, and the same arrangement prevails at Moncton and Chatham. The federal government pays no more than fifty per cent of the maintenance of these offices. I feel sure that no officer of the Department of Labour ever waited on a gentleman who was conducting an employment office at Fredericton and intimated to him that he should discontinue the office. It is true that the underlying intent of the act is to do away so far as possible with private employment agencies. All the western provinces have discontinued theirs; in Ontario I think about eleven still remain. Generally they have been pretty well abolished all over Canada.

Mr. HANSON: What I have stated to the minister is correct. An officer of his department did call upon the returned soldier to whom I have referred and tried to frighten him out of business.

Mr. MURDOCK: Could the hon. member give me his name?

Mr. HANSON: I think I could. I will do it privately; I do not want to injure the gentleman. But the minister's answer is hardly a reply to the query I made as to what is the attitude of the department in respect to the establishment of employment offices by private individuals in localities where no public offices are maintained.

Mr. MURDOCK: This is a matter over which the provincial government has control. Our suggestion to them would be, as it has been to all provinces, to discontinue the private employment agencies and co-operate with the federal government in the maintenance of proper employment offices under government regulation and control.

Mr. HANSON: I approve of that policy, but in the absence of any initiative on the part of the provincial government, what is a community to do? The only solution I can see is for the department to extend its operations into that community.

Mr. MURDOCK: The city of Fredericton has the same opportunity that any other community has of entering into an agreement with this government. We shall be glad at any time to take the matter up with them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister, under a previous item, mentioned amounts that were lost through strikes. Could he give us an estimate of the amounts lost through unemployment in this country?

Mr. MURDOCK: When the item which has been held over comes up for discussion, I imagine we may have a field day on that question. In the meantime I will try to secure the information for my hon. friend.

REPORT PRESENTED

Report of the first part of the investigation held by the Royal Commission on pensions and re-establishment.—Mr. Beland.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the House the authentic text of a recommendation concerning communication to the International Labour office of statistical and other information regarding emigration, immigration and the repatriation and transit of emigrants which was adopted by the International Labour Conference at its fourth session in Genoa, October 18, to November 3, 1922.

No draft conventions were adopted at this session of the conference and the only recommendation was the one to which I have just referred.

I may add, with reference to the recent inquiry of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) on this subject, that the authentic text of this recommendation reached the Labour department on March 26. The same is being brought before parliament in conformity with the requirements of paragraph 8 of article 405 of the Treaty of Versailles and the analogous provisions of the other treaties of peace.

Extract from minutes of a meeting of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, held at the office of the company, Dashwood House, 9 New Broad street, London, E.C., on Friday the 12th December, 1919. Sir Alfred W. Smithers, chairman, in the chair:

The chairman explained the position in which many of the chief officers, who had been in the service of the company for a very long period, might be placed when the change of administration of the Grand Trunk Railway took effect in consequence of the agreement made with the Canadian government for acquiring the Grand Trunk system, and then submitted letter from the vice-president and treasurer to the president, dated 8th November, with reference to the satisfactory working of the company's fire insurance fund, which at the 30th June, last, showed a surplus of $223,957 over the amount of $1,000,000 which is considered to be ample to cover all liabilities of fund. On the recommendation of the chairman it was decided, after consideration, to vote one year's alary as a gratuity to each of the following officers:

Salary per annum $50,000, Howard G. Kelley, president.

Salary per annum $16,500, J. E. Dalrymple, vice-president.

and $5,000 each to Mr. G. T. Bell, passenger traffic manager, and Mr. H. C. Martin, freight traffic manager.

It was also decided to grant Mr. Frank Scott, vice-president and treasurer, looking to his successful working of the fire insurance over a number of years, a sum of $25,000; and to Mr. H. H. Norman, secretary, and Mr. H. Deer, assistant secretary, $12,500, and $10,500 respectively; the whole of the above gratuities to be debited to the fire insurance fund.

Extract from minutes of a special general meeting of the company, held at the Cannon Street Hotel, London, E.C., on Thursday, 19th February, 1920. Sir Alfred W. Smithers, M.P., chairman, in the chair:

It was moved by Mr. A. B. Bosher, seconded by Mr. E. Roberts, and unanimously resolved

That the board of directors be granted, as compensation for loss of office, an amount equal to five years' remuneration, to be paid to them out of the contribution to be made by the holders of the debenture and guaranteed stocks, and to be divided as the board may determine.

Note: The total remuneration paid to all of the directors per annum was £6,900, or $33,580, and for five years was equal to £34,500, or $167,800. There were nine directors on the board at that date.

COLD STORAGE

Mr. THOMPSON:

1. Is the harbour cold storage a national institution?
2. To what extent is it financed by the government and at what rate of interest?
3. What are the net results profit or loss on the operating expenses of this storage for its first year's operations?
4. How will deficits be met, and in event of loss will harbour dues be increased to meet same?
5. Are the rates charged by the harbour commission lower than other public cold storages charged previous to opening the harbour commission's plant?
6. Is it the intention of the government to subsidize cold storages to be operated by co-operative associations in various parts of the country with the idea of having a chain of storages in the country to supply the harbour cold storage and thus have all under government control?
7. Would there be any discrimination against private individuals or corporations who might desire a subsidy for a cold storage plant, or is it intended to assist only rural communities that are organized?
8. Has any provision been made for the continuance of a subsidized cold storage in case of disorganization of the co-operative societies?
9. In the event of public cold storages being closed as a result of competition is there likely to be any increase in the rates charged by the harbour commission?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: As I have already stated Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer this question in its present form. I want to know to what cold storage plant the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PURCHASE OF UNCLEANED SCREENINGS

Mr. MANION:

1. Have there been any complaints since 1915 regarding the purchase of unscalped or uncleaned screenings from the government elevators to the Board of Grain Commissioners?
2. If so, was any action taken by the board?
3. Is the minister willing to lay on the Table of the House all correspondence and papers connected with such complaints if there were any?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, this question has been on the order paper for some days, and I may not have the required information until after the Easter holidays as we are waiting for a reply from Fort William.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Mr. EVANS:

1. When was the navy yard at Esquimalt closed?
2. What was the purchase price of the groceries on hand at that date?
3. How much of each of the following articles of food were on hand at the time this navy yard was closed: Pickles, oatmeal, raisins, ship biscuits, haricot beans, coffee, canned goods, hops, malt, mustard, pepper, preserved potatoes, rice, suet, vinegar, salt pork, arrowroot, pearl barley, celery seed, salmon.
4. When were these groceries disposed of?

7. What was the value of all other stores at the time the yard was closed, such as rubber sheets, rubber strips, utensils, dinghy, sailing skiff, diving dress, etc., etc?
8. How were these stores disposed of and what were the receipts realized?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

EASTERN LANDS DEVELOPMENT CO.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, letters and other correspondence, exchanged between the Minister of Railways, or any official of his department, and the Land Commissioner of the Canadian National Railways, relating to the transfer of the government lands to the Eastern Lands Development Company near Capreol and Poleyet.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED AGREEMENT RESPECTING DAMAGE TO MORTGAGED PREMISES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Governor in Council may from time to time cause an agreement or agreements to be executed by or on behalf of His Majesty the King, undertaking or guaranteeing that any company mentioned or referred to in chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1919 (first session), entitled: An act to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways, and in chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1920, entitled: An act to confirm the agreement dated the eighth day of March, 1920, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition of the capital stock of the said Grand Trunk Railway Company, except the four per cent guaranteed stock, will restore or make good all loss or damage to the mortgaged premises comprised in any mortgage or deed of trust (hereinafter called "such mortgage") at any time executed by any such company occasioned by fire or other casualty against which such company covenanted in such mortgage to insure, and indemnifying the trustee or trustees of any such mortgage against any consequences arising from any failure—(a) on the part of such company to comply with such covenant to insure, and (b) on the part of such trustee or trustees to take any action in respect thereof. The times and manner of the giving of any such agreement or agreements, and the form and terms thereof and the person who may sign the same on behalf of His Majesty shall be such as the Governor in Council may from time to time approve or direct.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been apprised of the subject matter of the resolution and has given his consent thereto.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I merely call the minister's attention to the impression the resolution makes on me at the moment. I think it is more comprehensive than is necessary. The resolution provides not that any damage suffered will be made good to the mortgage company, but that any loss by fire will be restored. The words used are:

Will restore or make good all loss or damage to the mortgaged premises comprised in any mortgage or deed of trust. . . . at any time executed by any such company.

It would seem to me that the government does not need to undertake to make good the loss to the mortgaged premises. That would require the government to restore the property, and it might not be wise to see that the property was restored. I would think that the only obligation the government would need to enter into would be this: that the mortgage company to whom there is a covenant to insure would not be allowed to suffer loss because of destruction of premises by fire.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my right hon. friend has the crux of the matter. But I suggest that the motion be allowed to pass—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not objecting.

Mr. GRAHAM: —and I will refer his remarks to the solicitor, Mr. Ruel, who drafted the bill. The desire is only to cover the necessary points. The purpose of the resolution, on which a bill will be based, is, of course, to protect the mortgage holder.

Motion agreed to.

BREWERIES AND LIQUOR HOUSES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BROWN: I wish to call the attention of the government to a question that has been on the order paper for a few days—it is No. 19 on the order paper for today—referring to the further licensing of breweries that have violated the law. If I am not misinformed, these licenses are issued on the first of April. This is the 28th of March, and it seems to me the government might well have its policy formulated in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) is not in the House at the moment. This matter comes under his department I think. As soon as I see him I will draw his attention to what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask if it is true that since this government came into power the number of export liquor houses in British Columbia authorized by the government has been increased from four to thirty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no information on the subject.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I would like to ask the government, particularly the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) if it would be possible by the time Easter recess comes to an end to have a return to an order made on the 12th of February concerning the proceedings of a sub-committee of the Privy Council appointed to regulate mining fees in the Yukon. A departmental clerk could prepare the information in a short time.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will see that the return is brought down. I had not noticed that it had not been laid on the table.

WHEAT BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I would like to ask the government what action, if any, is being taken to give effect to last year's wheat board legislation for handling this year's crop?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that the government is prepared to pass an order in council, which it has authority to do under the legislation of last year, to renew the wheat board in accordance with the existing legislation, provided that two or more of the provinces are desirous that such a step should be taken. One province has already communicated its desire to the government that this be done, and I believe that one other is about to indicate its view in the affirmative. When that is done the government will take action by order in council in accordance with the powers given by legislation.

Mr. FORKE: I was informed by the premier of Alberta that Saskatchewan and Alberta have both made application.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I understand. I know that one has been formally received, but I could not be sure about the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The purpose of the government, then, is to leave the legislation as it it is?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not very material, then, what the requests are.

SUPPLY—STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO MEDITERRANEAN

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr Speaker, I wish to say a word in connection with a question I put on the order paper the other day and the answer I have since received. The matter has reference to the establishing of a steamship service between Mediterranean and Canadian ports. I am afraid that questions of this kind do not receive the consideration that they deserve; the answer given in this case simply makes a perfect farce of the whole situation. I did not put this question on the order paper for the purpose of embarrassing the government. I was not criticizing the government nor do I propose to do so now. But knowing something of transportation by land and by water I feel that a service should be established between Mediterranean and Canadian ports. I believe that Mediterranean ports are anxious to ship to Canadian ports and importers are desirous of receiving goods from that part of the world through Canadian ports. It is said that we have a great merchant marine to-day that is doing no business. The answer to my question states that this is not the opportune time to establish such a service. I say that this is the time and this is the opportunity. The spring season is coming on. On account of frosts in California last year, 90 per cent of the lemons imported into Canada this year will come from Mediterranean ports, particularly from Italy. These lemons will have to be brought to Montreal and shipped inland as far as Calgary and Edmonton and probably to Vancouver. If a steamship service between Mediterranean and Canadian ports were established the result would be a benefit to our own Canadian transportation lines and the keeping of the transport business within our country. I would point out also that in the past we have lost a great deal, through breakages and otherwise, in the carriage through United States ports. The congestion at New York, for instance, is so bad that sometimes cargoes have to wait two weeks before getting a boat to take them to their destinations; or there may be a lapse of a week or two before cars can be got to transport the goods to inland points throughout this Dominion. I feel that some consideration should be given to this question, and I hope the Minister of Railways and Canals will consider it with the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and if possible establish a service between the ports of the Mediterranean and this country. It is very necessary that we should have such a service. The loss in breakages alone at New York is very considerable owing to the very heavy traffic and congestion. There is no reason why such a service cannot be established. It would not only help to make the government merchant marine a better paying proposition than it is to-day, but help build up our National railway lines by keeping the money in our own country.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I understand that the objection of my hon. friend is that Canada has done nothing to put on a service or subsidize a service between the Mediterranean ports and Canada, and his argument largely is that this service should be established because Canada imports from countries along the Mediterranean.

I submit to my hon. friend that Canada does all that it is possible to do to encourage and subsidize services from Canada to countries that buy Canadian products. If there are countries desiring to sell their products to Canada, I think it should be up to those countries to see that they establish a service to carry those products to this country. We have a subsidized service between the West India Islands and Canada carrying fruits such as come from the Mediterranean. We have also a subsidized service between Australia and Canada, and Australia also produces products similar in a very large degree to the products of the Mediterranean region. We have a service established between South Africa and Canada, and South Africa, one of the sister dominions, also produces commodities similar to those coming from the countries along the Mediterranean. I realize the importance of doing all that we can to establish connections that will give as cheaply as possible to our own people the products that we require and do not produce in this country, but may I repeat again to my hon. friend that we in Canada are more interested in encouraging services from Canada to countries that buy our products than encouraging services from countries exporting to Canada. It seems to me it would be good business upon the part of those countries themselves to establish better trade communications with Canada if they desire to put their products into this country.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Labour—Administration, Technical Education Act, $3,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister please inform the committee why there is a reduction of $4,000 from the vote of last year?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Heretofore in the civil government estimates we have provided for a director and an assistant director of technical education. Last year I intimated to the committee we would endeavour to get along with one officer. That has been done. This year we come to you with a request for provision for a director of technical education only. We have only had the one officer during the year, and he has been the assistant director of technical education. It is believed that the sum of $3,000 will be sufficient to cover the expenses that will be incurred by the director of technical education in visiting the different provinces in connection with his work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who is the director at the present time?

Mr. MURDOCK: There is no director at the present time. Mr. Crawford has been assistant director for some time. The Civil Service Commission have had an examination before them, the applications for which closed on the 8th day of March. Unfortunately Mr. Crawford has been confined to the hospital by a serious illness, and the appointment is being held up until such time as he can come before the commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that the appointment of this officer became necessary by reason of the statute 9-10 George V, chapter 73, whereby a grant is made from the Dominion government to each of the provinces. That grant is not in the nature, I believe, of a permanent grant. It was for a limited number of years, if I remember right. When does that provision run out, may I ask?

Mr. MURDOCK: In 1929. While on the subject of technical education, may I call attention to a typographical error further down on the same page where it appears that there is $1,000,000 authorized by statute for technical education. That should be $1,100,000 in accordance with the law. It was $1,000,000 last year, and the law provides that it be increased to $1,100,000 this year.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know whether this would be the proper time to mention it or not, but my friend the minister has just referred to an item lower down on page 49. Do I understand that Item No. 266 is passed?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: I am free to admit that I understood it was. I do not know whether the minister and the Chairman want Hansard to accord with the business done last night, but on glancing over yesterday's Hansard I see no reference whatever to that item. I remember quite well pointing out that the minister had made very considerable progress and that as it was getting late he might very well move that the committee rise and report progress, and I remember the Prime Minister answering by suggesting that the next item be taken up as it was in the same class. I understood that that item was then proceeded with, but I find that Hansard is silent as to what I said, silent as to what the Prime Minister said, and silent altogether as to this item No. 266. It seems to me something should be done to put that right.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon. member's attention to page 234 of the Votes and Proceedings, recording what was done on Tuesday, 27th March, from which it will be seen that Item No. 266 "To supplement amount provided by Statute 8-9 George V, Chapter 21, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, $50,000" was passed and reported. Hansard is in error that it does not include Item 266 as reported to the Speaker.

Mr. BOYS: I am not for one moment disputing the fact that the item was passed; I certainly think it was. But it is somewhat extraordinary that there is no reference to what was said by myself or the Prime Minister as regards this item; I cannot understand how all that could be omitted. I think something should be done to put the matter right, and to show that the item was considered.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We had absolutely no opportunity of discussing the item last night, and right along we notice these figures in connection with almost every department. It seems to me that we have a right to expect from the Minister of Labour some statement as to his reason for offering us these decreases in each item. If it means efficiency and economy I presume we are all in favour of it, but if it means—as would seem to be the case—that there is a lessening of the work of the department, I think that is a matter that requires careful consideration. If I understand aright, one of the leading officials of this department was allowed to go last year to a private enterprise; and to-day we do not have the same investigations, the same studies of these questions, being carried forward. That would seem to be a serious thing; a serious impairment of the usefulness of the department. I think we ought to have a statement not merely as to the particular items we are considering here one by one, but also as to the policy of the Labour department. There are big questions like unemployment insurance, like old age pensions, like the bringing in of the eight hour day across Canada. Surely we have a right to look to the Labour department for legislation that will protect the workers and advance their cause. I cannot see that the department is bringing down any legislation of this kind; I cannot see that they are tabulating the necessary reports and preparing the necessary data. It would seem to me that at some point in his presentation of the work of the department we ought to have a statement from the minister as to his policy and the policy of the government in this regard.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

Administration of the act respecting annuities for old age, $25,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: The expenditure under this heading covers disbursements for travelling expenses of officials, printing and stationery, advertising and sundries. It is expected that the entire appropriation for the present fiscal year will be used, and as more activity in this branch is contemplated for the coming year it is thought advisable to increase the appropriation by $10,000, as an expansion in this branch would entail heavy charges for advertising and travelling expenses. The expenses up to January 31st of this year have been as follows: Travelling expenses, $35; sundries, $47.67; printing and stationery, $2,237.15; advertising—that is advertising the government annuities—$7,295.96. It is hoped and believed that with additional opportunities for bringing the features of the Dominion government annuities to the attention of the public in Canada a material improvement can be made in the work of that branch.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the minister inform the committee as to the number of parties who have taken advantage of this proposition during the past year, and the total number of annuities in force?

Mr. MURDOCK: The total number of annuitants to-day is 5,642. According to provinces, if my hon. friend would like that information, the numbers are as follows: Ontario, 2,942; Quebec, 1,042; British Columbia, 468; New Brunswick, 313; Nova Scotia, 296; Alberta, 215; Manitoba, 183; Saskatchewan, 147; Yukon, 18; Prince Edward Island, 18. The total receipts to the 26th March, 1923, were $6,682,080.92. The receipts from the 1st April, 1922, to the 26th March, 1923, were $1,021,775.52.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to ask the minister further, what steps are being taken to bring this very desirable form of insurance before the public and to make known to them the advantages it possesses?

Mr. MURDOCK: As I said a moment ago, and as indicated by the figures quoted, we spent something over $7,000 on advertising last year in various papers throughout Canada. We also have in mind the running of advertisements on the slides of the moving picture houses of the Dominion—we can do that fairly cheaply—and in other ways we propose to enlarge the advertising that has been carried on in connection with this work. That is why we are asking for a sum of $10,000 additional to promote a proper campaign of advertising.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think it is very desirable that this work should be extended and the public made more familiar with its advantages. I do not think the minister answered the question I asked as to the number of applicants during the past year?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think we have data in a form which would disclose the actual number of applicants during a given year. The receipts, though, will indicate somewhat the volume of the business. As I have already stated, the sum of $1,021,000 odd was received during the fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the minister inform the committee how the receipts for the last year compare with the receipts for the year previous, so that we may learn whether the business is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand there has not been any great change from year to year during the past few years. The act, as my hon. friend doubtless knows, was passed in 1908. Its advantages, as I believe they can be regarded, have not been sufficiently impressed on the public of Canada—at least that is my personal belief—and it is with the hope of enlarging this field of effort, which we think would be to the advantage of many people in the Dominion, that we are asking for additional money to launch a campaign of extended advertising. We have been handicapped for the funds necessary to do what we think should be done.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister give the committee any information as to the total number of annuities taken out five years ago compared with the number taken out last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not that information before me, but I could get it, of course, for the hon. member from year to year.

Mr. WHITE: Will the hon. minister have that information for three years?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will realize that this particular branch has not been in the Department of Labour for one year yet. Prior to May last it was in the Post Office Department, I am told, relegated to a back room, out of the way, where it would not come too prominently to the attention of people. I do not know how much there is in that statement, but that is what I am told. When it was handed over to the Department of Labour, we found it in another building, away down the street, and it has now been brought over and housed right in the Department of Labour building, on a separate floor, and we hope to boost the Dominion government annuities if we can get a chance and find out if any enlargement of the functions of this branch can be made.

Mr. BOYS: When was the act passed?

Mr. MURDOCK: 1908.

Mr. BOYS: The law has been in force about fourteen years. Can the minister say whether the department has made or lost money during that period?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think I could properly pass on a question of that kind. The annuity system is conducted on an actuarial basis and on a safe basis so far as the government is concerned according to my best knowledge. I do not think it is reasonably possible that there should be a loss by the government. That phase of it, in my judgment, should be taken into consideration, and we should see if we could not improve the scheme and make it more attractive to the public generally.

Mr. BOYS: That is just exactly what I have in mind. It was only yesterday I was making certain inquiries regarding annuities and it seemed to me that the sum of money asked was excessive, and that if the department was making a considerable sum of money they might see their way clear to reduce the rates. It might not be amiss that I should state just what took place. I wanted to ascertain what an annuity of $1,000, payable quarterly to a man for his lifetime, and after his decease to his wife, or vice versa—for that matter for the lives of both of them—would cost, and I found the figure was something over $15,000. Now $15,000 at 6 per cent will produce $900, and you would be getting, without the annuity, within $100 of what the annuity produced, and at the end of the period you would have your $15,000. It seemed to me there should be more difference than that. I discussed the matter with Mr. Bastedo who is in charge. I heartily approve of these annuities, but if the department is making considerable money, it seems to me it might reduce the rates for, I think, on reflection the minister will admit that that difference is very slight.

Mr. MURDOCK: Would it not be a question of increasing the interest allowance rather than decreasing the rates, as you suggest? For example, Dominion government annuities only pay on the basis of 4 per cent interest. If you place the interest at 5 per cent, it would be substantially better than it is at the present time. I may say that considerable thought has been devoted to this question for some months now, to see if that could be reasonably done. I have personally been pressing to have it done.

Mr. BOYS: I am very glad to hear the minister say that. Of course that is only another way of stating it, because that would reduce the payments. Instead of paying $15,000 one would only have to pay, say, $13,000. So far as this particular application to which I refer is concerned, if the figures had been $13,000 the annuity would have been purchased, but it was not attractive at $15,000. It will be good news to those interested in the purchase of annuities that the minister has the matter in contemplation. I can only say that I hope he will be successful. I should think in reaching a conclusion the minister would be guided to some extent by the success of the operations up to the present time, and I am rather surprised the deputy cannot inform the minister whether, during the fourteen years' operation, money has been made or lost. As the average person purchasing an annuity would, I think, be over 50 years of age, and the expectation of life would not be over 14 or 15 years, according to this estimate, the department would have the matter down to a working basis.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think we are on a working basis and it is only a question whether the interest rates should be 4 per cent, as they have been for many years, or whether we should improve on that interest allowance. If the interest were 5 per cent unquestionably there would be a great increase in investments in Dominion government securities. I am very much obliged to the hon. member for his suggestion.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Could the minister inform the committee as to whether there is a classification of the parties taking advantage of this insurance, giving information as to the different occupations of the parties purchasing annuities?

Mr. MURDOCK: The card index files for each annuity would, I think, contain those particulars, but I have not the information here.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can the minister tell the committee what considerations led to this work being taken over by the Labour department?

Mr. MURDOCK: I could not give that information. It came to me entirely unrequested. Probably the Prime Minister could answer that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend that the Department of Labour seemed to be the appropriate department with which to associate this work. It was originally in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and then for a short time in the Post Office Department, but after the present government came into office we thought the Department of Labour would perhaps have opportunities of making the work of the annuities branch better known than any of the other departments, and that on the whole it would be in the public interest to have it transferred to that department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think one of the difficulties in the system so far has been the lack of publicity. I think the minister has the right idea when he says that he is going to give it more publicity by means of newspaper advertising and by means of moving pictures established throughout the country. It is rather astonishing to see how many people in Canada do not know that there is such a scheme in existence and that they can obtain government annuities. Most people know, I think, that they can purchase annuities from the ordinary old line insurance companies, but very few business people of this country know anything about the government annuity branch which has been in existence in this country for fourteen years. I think if the business has been carried on up to the present time on a basis of 4 per cent, it is highly probable that the government has made a fair amount of money out of the scheme. I remember when the bill was brought forward by Sir Richard Cartwright who was Minister of Trade and Commerce, and in the Senate at the time, he stated that it was not intended to conduct the department with the idea of making any profit; in fact it was stated that, being a government venture, and the ordinary expense being paid by the government, annuities could probably be granted to applications on better terms than could be obtained from old line companies, which, of course, would charge the annuitants with a proportion of the expense. It would be of great interest to know just how the matter has worked out as regards profit or loss after an experience of fourteen years. We are agreed that the matter is one worthy of consideration; we are agreed that the system is a good one, and the more extensively it will obtain throughout the Dominion, the better for the country and the people. I would heartily agree with the suggestion of the minister that he devote a considerable amount of the money at his disposal during the next twelve months to advertising the fact that the government of the Dominion of Canada issues annuities, guaranteed by the whole Dominion of Canada, and just as good as the Dominion bonds which are so greatly in demand by the people at the present time. But while we are on the question, perhaps the minister might go a step further and state whether he has developed any scheme in the way of old age pensions such as that referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). Many people feel very much interested in that question, and if the minister has anything in mind in regard to it, the committee would like to hear of it.

Mr. MURDOCK: That is a matter that has been given very careful attention from every possible angle during the past several months, in fact, since I have been Minister of Labour. The important question confronting this government at the present time and, indeed, that would confront any government that happened to be in power at this time, would be the matter of finding the wherewithal to do the things that it might be thought desirable or right to do as regards adopting an old age pension plan. The matter is being given the most careful attention with the end in view of seeing what it may be possible to do; but no definite plan is in contemplation at present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The first question would be: How much would it likely cost? Has the minister arrived at any conclusion as regards that question?

Mr. MURDOCK: That would depend entirely upon what basis the contract was undertaken.

Mr. BOYS: The government tables showing the cost of annuities at various ages should be distributed, and I should think as good a place as any for that would be the post offices. I have tried many times to get these tables, and you cannot get them locally. This leads to great delay when you have to wait and write to Ottawa for them. The minister, in his advertising scheme, should arrive at some plan whereby every post office in every town and village should carry these tables, and the advertising should show that the tables may be had at any post office. The minister will realize that once the people get the notion, they want to act very promptly; they do not want to wait for a week to find out what an annuity will cost. If these tables are made available in this way, any man taking them can find out from the age of the man or woman desiring the annuity what the cost is per $100.

Mr. MURDOCK: The postmasters have all been agents of the government annuities, at least until the time when this branch was transferred from the Post Office department in May last. As a matter of fact the act was passed in 1908 adopting the plan on a 3 per cent basis, which remained in force for a time. Then by order in council that was increased to a 4 per cent basis, and then apparently the matter was shelved, and as little as possible said about it. I hope that can be changed.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will the minister be good enough to inform the committee whether he proposes to continue to make use of the postmasters in connection with this work, or to improve the plan, or to abandon it or what other scheme he has of bringing this more prominently to the attention of the public?

Mr. MURDOCK: Of course, I would not be in a position to utilise the services of postmasters to the same extent as when this work was under the Post Office Department. Considering the results that were secured when all postmasters were agents of Do-
4 p.m. minion government annuities. I do not know whether that plan would be very practicable. I imagine we might have to offer larger inducements than we could afford with any appropriations that we have before us. But whatever steps can be taken to make the benefits of Dominion government annuities known to the public generally, will be taken, and any other plan that can be suggested will be accepted if it will bring about that desired end.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Do I understand the minister to say that he proposes to cease this agency of the postmasters, or is he going to continue them?

Mr. MURDOCK: We shall be glad, indeed, to have their help. What I said was that the annuities branch was under the Post Office Department until May last.

Mr. ARTHURS: Only for a time.

Mr. MURDOCK: For some few years. During that time the postmasters were agents for Dominion government annuities. Whether they are now or not is a question possibly for discussion. Probably most of them take the position that they are not.

Mr. BROWN: The suggestion made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) surely ought to be acceptable to the minister. There should be sufficient co-ordination between the departments that the postmasters could distribute the advertising and literature in connection with these annuities, as they do in connection with the income tax.

Mr. MURDOCK: We will endeavour to see whether that can be done.

Mr. BOYS: I can see the difference between postmasters acting as agents for such work and their merely distributing the literature. If they were agents, it would be their duty to sit down with intending purchasers and explain the plan to them. I do not believe that is necessary but there ought to be some place where we can go and get these tables if we want them. In every town and village insurance companies have agents with all the information at hand. If the government want to increase this annuity business, as is desirable from the standpoint both of the government and of the public, something must be done to have the literature, figures and tables available in every community. I do not see why the postmasters cannot be used in that way. If they can act as agents, so much the better; but at least the literature can be left with them and had when called for by anybody.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member is entirely right and we will see if that cannot be done.

Item agreed to.

International Labour Conference, $15,000.

Mr. BOYS: Was the appropriation of last year all expended? Could the minister give us the details of that?

Mr. MURDOCK: The expenditures until January 31 on this item were:

Services for allowances and travelling expenses of delegates, $12,616.58; sundries, $27.00.

Leaving a balance of $2,356.42 for the two months.

Mr. BOYS: Who were the delegates?

Mr. MURDOCK: At the International Labour Conference in Geneva, October 18 to November 3, last, the government representatives or delegates were the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Labour. The employers' delegate was Mr. Coulter of Toronto, and Mr. H. C. MacDonald was the adviser to the employers' delegate. The workers' delegate was Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and Mr. John Bruce was adviser to Mr. Moore. There were six present all told, two representing the government, two the employers and two the workers. In this are included certain expenses for attendance at meetings of the governing body of the International Labour Office which are held every three months, and at which Canada is usually represented, although she was not represented at the January meeting.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: From a practical standpoint it would seem to me as if there ought to be some more definite way of giving effect to the findings of this conference. Canada, as one of the signatories of the League of Nations, accepts these various conventions, for example, the eight-hour day. I understand the government of Canada thinks its duty is done when it reports the findings of the conference and suggests that the various provinces can carry out certain of those findings. The whole difficulty there would seem to arise because of a certain jurisdictional dispute as regards how far the Dominion can act and how far the provinces should act. In the meantime, great evils are going unremedied. I think I have already this year called the attention of the House to the fact that in the steel works in Nova Scotia, and I believe elsewhere, men are working eleven and thirteen-hour shifts, eleven by day and thirteen by night, every other week working twenty-four hours on end.

We have said that men ought to have an eight-hour working day and one day's rest in seven. We find every once in a while an industrial strike takes place. We had a strike in the steel works at Sydney not very long ago. Technically it was in regard to the reinstatement of certain workers, but I am told in reality it was a protest against the abominable working conditions which the men have to endure in that part of the country. A deputation of the clergy of the town a short time ago waited on the manager of the plant and asked him if there was any way by which an eight-hour day could be brought into effect. They were told that nothing could be done until Mr. Gary and the other steel magnates of the United States had decided on readjusting the working conditions and putting on three shifts in the twenty-four hours. Thus in this country our workers are exploited and practically forced to labour under the worst possible conditions for twenty-four hours on end. And yet it would seem that although we have signed a convention which concedes that the workers ought not to be subjected to these unjust conditions, we are powerless to effect a change. I suppose all we can say to these workers is that we will have to let things go from bad to worse until there is a riot in Sydney. Then this government, which now says it has no power in the matter, will find it has power to send down a military force to suppress the disturbance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that before we reach such a crisis we should calmy consider if we cannot work out some principle by which these evils—and I think everybody will acknowledge they are evils—can be removed in a regular manner. Therefore under this item I would suggest that the time is more than ripe for the government to definitely decide what action it will take to put these conventions into effect, some of which were drawn up at least two or three years ago.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Chairman, the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has already asked the minister (Mr. Murdock) to make some explanation regarding his general policy in view of the remarkable decrease in his appropriations this year. I note that there is a decrease in these estimates from a million and a half to about a quarter of a million. Of course, if this means efficiency and economy we are all delighted; but I want to know what it does mean. Does it mean a very large reduction in the work of the department? Does it mean that we have no need of an appropriation for relief? If that is so we are certainly very much pleased. But I do think it is in order for the minister to give us some explanation of this drop from a million and a half to a quarter of a million. I have not heard any explanation yet, and if it is coming I shall be glad to wait for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the point which my hon. friend has just raised comes under another item. This is the international office we are speaking of.

Mr. GOOD: I see no item, Mr. Chairman, under which my question could be answered, so I thought I would bring it up now.

Mr. MURDOCK: I shall be very glad indeed to give the reason for this reduction as I have tried to do in respect to each item which we have dealt with. For example, in vote 265 we made a reduction of $15,000, and I indicated the reason, that is, that we were not in any way hampering the work of the employment service, but that we thought there were certain unncessary expenditures and possibly certain unnecessary officials. My hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) a little while ago referred to a prominent official who had to seek another position last year. I presume he was referring to the former director of the employment service, who prior to July 7th last spent a good deal of time out of Ottawa looking for another position, and on that date he told me that he was leaving the department at the end of the month to accept a $10,000 job with a private concern in Chicago. I said to him, "All right, Sir, you can go at once if you like." I immediately wired for the western superintendent to come down and take charge. I only mention this incident because my hon. friend would almost appear to suggest that an injustice had been done to a capable employee. The gentleman in question was a capable employee no doubt, but, as indicated, he was out looking for and secured another position, which I am sure he will fill satisfactorily. The work of the employment service has continued uninterruptedly and to the general satisfaction so far as I know of the various provincial authorities and others concerned throughout Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no reference to any injustice having been done. What I want to know is whether the department is being weakened by efficient men being allowed to go over to private agencies.

Mr. MURDOCK: Of course, that is a question which neither my hon. friend nor I can determine. If he takes the position that some men in the service are not getting all they are worth, I will say he is right. At the same time I will say that possibly some men are getting more than they are worth. But that is a question under the jurisdiction of a properly constituted body known as the Civil Service Commission, which classifies the salaries of the service. Possibly it was unfortunate that the director of the employment service was only rated as a $4,200 man, but, as I say, that is something that we cannot in any way control.

The next item in which there is a reduction is No. 266, which is $50,000 less than the appropriation for 1922-23. This is to supplement the amount provided by Statute 8-9, George V, chapter 21, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act. In that act there is statutory provision for $150,000 to be used in organization and co-ordination of employment offices in co-operation with the various provinces, and this, it will be noticed is provided for further down on page 49. The position has been taken that it might reasonably be assumed that when $150,000 was provided by statute it should not be necessary to appropriate an additional $100,000. Last year the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) embarrassed me somewhat during the consideration of the estimates in presenting that view, but upon further thought I had to agree that there was some ground for the claim made. I decided, therefore, that we could get along with $200,000 for the coming fiscal year and at the same time meet our obligations with the provinces in which these employment offices were maintained. I believe that $50,000 added to the amount provided by statute will be amply sufficient. The amount provided last year in connection with the offices of director and assistant director of technical education, $7,000, has not all been spent. With only one officer in the future, the Director of Technical Education, $3,000 should be sufficient. As a matter of fact, up to January 31 last only $936.64 had been expended of the $7,000 during the fiscal year. So it seems reasonable to cut that appropriation down from $7,000 to $3,000.

Mr. GOOD: The minister seems to have misunderstood my question. I am not complaining about any particular reductions that have already been explained. I want some explanation about the reduction of $1,300,000 that has not been explained.

Mr. MURDOCK: I was coming to that later, but I will explain it now if my hon. friend wishes. We are not asking for any money this year to provide for unemployment relief. We believe conditions have changed for the better, and whereas last year $1,200,000 was asked for in the Supplementary Estimates to meet expenditure that had been incurred in connection with participation in unemployment relief schemes, it is believed we do not need any such appropriation at this time. Except under P.C. 220, we have paid out no money during this winter for unemployment relief; that is, we have discontinued entirely the plan in effect during the two previous winters. That represents the item of $1,300,000 that my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. GOOD: What was the total amount spent for relief during the present fiscal year?

Mr. MURDOCK: $902,576.79. We have on hand something like $380,000 of the amount voted in last year's Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would call the attention of the minister to the rather serious condition which has prevailed in Winnipeg during the last winter and to the earnest representations made to the government, not only by the city council of Winnipeg but also by the province of Manitoba, urging that conditions, at least in the city of Winnipeg, were similar to those which prevailed a year ago and pointing out that the joint conference called by the Dominion and the provinces had agreed that if conditions were similar, relief would be granted. Whatever may be true of other parts of Canada, if conditions are similar in Winnipeg to what they were a year ago—and I believe they are in some other parts as well—the government should explain why the arrangement of a year ago is discontinued.

Mr. MURDOCK: Shall we proceed, Mr. Chairman, with a discussion of unemployment relief, or shall we deal with this item, International Labour Conference?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 269, International Labour Conference, carry?

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has asked a very important question which has not yet been answered, namely, what steps are being taken by the department to carry into effect the various labour conventions. If it is because of lack of jurisdiction on the part of this parliament that nothing has been done to give effect, for instance, to the eight-hour law, why not let the provincial governments be represented at those conferences and the Dominion government discontinue their efforts in that direction?

Mr. MURDOCK: It has always been the desire of the federal government that the provincial governments should be represented at those conferences. At the Washington Conference in 1919, a representative from each province acted as adviser to the two federal government representatives. Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec were represented at the Geneva Conference of 1921. Last year, when the conference for 1922 was pending, the department urged that the provinces should be represented also on that occasion, but in each case the provinces considered such representation inadvisable. I assure the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) that I am just as much interested in the questions he has in mind as he can possibly be. It is my desire to see the things dealt with in a businesslike way that are securing results for those interested, namely, the classes referred to by conventions resulting from the International Labour conferences. Unfortunately, so far as my hon. friend's views and desires are concerned, the British North America Act has some material bearing on this question as it precludes the possibility of the federal government doing certain things that it might desire to do in regard to some of these questions. In short, there is a dual or intermingled authority and responsibility as between the provincial government and the federal government on a number of these questions. I laid on the Table of the House a few days ago the decision of the Department of Justice in regard to certain matters dealt with at the 1921 convention in Geneva, and prior to that time the decision of the Department of Justice had been laid on the Table in reference to the conventions emanating from the International Labour Conference at Washington in 1919. Some of the questions in which my hon. friend is deeply interested as emanating from this International Labour Conference cannot be dealt with by this government, I am told, under the provisions of the British North America Act, and therefore it is a question of getting the representatives of the provinces and those in authority in the Dominion together, if possible, to determine how far we can go in doing what is desired and should be done in connection with these conventions.

Last fall, on September 5, 6 and 7, it is true as my hon. friend says, that a conference was called here in Ottawa with the provincial authorities. The first question to be considered was deciding what we should do on the question of unemployment relief, if any, during the then coming winter. Among other important questions to be considered were the conventions and recommendations that had emanated from the International Labour Conferences to this federal government, and through the federal government to the several provinces. No definite action was taken upon the questions emanating from the International Labour Conference for the reason that the conference here in Ottawa after some discussion decided that it was not fully enough advised and in proper form to deal with these matters, but it was decided to arrange for getting together and dealing with these matters just as soon as possible. Some months ago we moved in the direction of bringing about a conference that would really deal with these matters, and suggested the latter part of February or early in March for the conference to meet and decide what should be done. The majority of the provinces indicated that the time proposed would be inopportune because their various legislatures would be in session, and the result is that the matter now stands until the various legislatures and this House have adjourned. The hope and expectation now is that within the next two or three months a meeting will be held as between those representing the provinces and empowered to discuss and deal with these questions and the federal government to see in what way we can ratify or deal with the conventions and recommendations that have emanated from the first, second and third International Labour Conventions. That is briefly the status of the matter at this particular time.

So far as the Labour department is concerned, as my hon. friend wanted to know its position, I may say the department and its minister are deeply interested in going as soon as possible just as far as it is possible for us to go in doing the things that should be done in regard to these matters. If there has been any delay, or if there appears to be any lukewarm or indifferent attitude in the matter, it is simply because of a lack of opportunity to go forward and do the things that it is hoped and believed should be done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has not the Dominion government taken authority, for instance, in the case of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and the Lord's Day Act? Do not these questions come in pretty much the same category as the eight-hour day or the one day's rest in seven?

Mr. MURDOCK: As my hon. friend knows, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applies only to public utilities, such as railroads and coal mines. Unquestionably, I am told, the federal government under the British North America Act has jurisdiction to determine certain questions, but it has not been considered that we have authority even under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act to go so far as to deal with some particular concern in a particular province, as witness the British Empire Steel Corporation to which my hon. friend referred a short time ago. Jurisdiction under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act does not, as we understand it, rest in the province to say that a board of investigation shall be appointed in a steel works controversy, for instance. So far as the Lord's Day Act is concerned, I think my hon. friend will agree that there are many and various Lord's Day Acts in the Dominion, or at any rate references to Lord's Day Act provisions. If my hon. friend will get whatever legal advice he desires to secure in this matter, I think he will find that on most of the questions that have emanated from the International Labour Conference the best legal opinion is that the provinces have jurisdiction, rather than the federal government.

Mr. SHAW: I quite readily appreciate the legal difficulties in which the minister finds himself. I am only anxious with the minister that effect be given at the earliest possible opportunity to such of these conventions as are found desirable. May I ask the minister, therefore, of the matters which have been found to be within the sole jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament, which ones have received consideration by this parliament?

Mr. MURDOCK: One of the most important questions emanating from the 1919 International Labour Conference at Washington was in reference to employment service. The federal government, as my hon. friend knows, promptly moved in the direction of making effective the general intent of that convention, which in substance provided that all possible assistance would be given to securing work for the unemployed without cost to the unemployed. In that direction the federal government has had the co-operation, generally speaking, of the provinces in so far as that was necessary, and it has been necessary because the western provinces all proceeded by regulation to discontinue private employment agencies. A commendable movement in that direction has been under way also in the eastern provinces, so that to-day in Nova Scotia there are no private employment agencies, but very few in New Brunswick, and in Ontario only some eleven or thirteen, I am not sure which. In that particular matter the federal government has, it is thought, gone a fair share of the way in doing the things it was contemplated would be done under that convention. On certain other matters the federal government has believed—or I should say the Labour department has believed and held all along—that we should have some reasonably distinct co-operative understanding with our partners in regard to the proposal and the necessary action to be taken in connection with these conventions. That, it seemed, could only be done by bringing about an understanding at meetings held for that purpose, and my personal hope is that within the next two or three months, or as soon as this provincial-federal conference can be arranged, we will be in a position to know how we are going to proceed in regard to certain of these matters that have not yet been dealt with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the matter of old age pensions come under the federal government?

Mr. MURDOCK: As to that there is a legal point involved and I would not care to give my hon. friend an opinion. It concerns a disputed point, and in any case it is a matter for parliament to decide rather than—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All I want to get at is where we decide these things. We are told it is a disputed point, but is there no clear line of demarcation or can we not, by means of the courts, or otherwise, decide what the powers of this parliament are and cannot we expect the government to take action within those powers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On this item of the International Labour Conference, I think it would be appropriate for me to say a word in reply to some exception which the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) appeared to take the other day when mention was made of the circumstance that Mrs. James Carruthers had been appointed to represent the Minister of Labour at the meeting of the governing body which is to be held within the next few days at Geneva. I was responsible for suggesting the name of Mrs. Carruthers to the Minister of Labour, and I think I ought to let the House know the reasons that actuated me. First of all, I might mention that the minister spoke to me a couple of weeks ago about the representation of Canada at this conference. He said that he would be unable to attend himself, and asked for a suggestion as to the person to represent Canada. I suggested that he follow the course that had been followed on previous occasions; that if the minister himself was unable to attend to have, if possible, one of our representatives in England appear on behalf of Canada; and I suggested that Mr. Pacaud, the Secretary of the High Commissioner's office in London, should represent the Dominion at that gathering.

May I say here, by way of parenthesis, that the governing body of this conference meets four times a year. Its sessions last for only three or four days. It is not a great international conference at which special delegates appear, but is a permanent body. Under existing arrangements the Minister of Labour himself is a member of the governing body. I understand this was also the case under the previous government, though the minister, I think, attended only once; on all other occasions Canada was represented by some person who was resident in England or in France.

As I have mentioned, when the minister took the matter up first, Mr. Pacaud was spoken of. He was communicated with by letter and, as the correspondence which has been brought down shows, at the end of several days a cable was received from him mentioning that he would not be able to find it possible to attend the gathering himself. The minister then spoke to me again, pointing out that the time was very short, and I suggested to him a name that would be suitable. I suggested the name of Colonel Cunningham who has represented the minister on three or four occasions. The minister said to me that he would prefer to have another nomination this time, and I then suggested to him the name of Mrs. Carruthers as one who, I thought, was very specially qualified to represent Canada at that gathering.

The main reason why I suggested Mrs. Carruthers' name was because she is the author of one of the best known books on labour legislation which has been published—one of the very few books that I know of that deal with labour legislation in Canada. I should be obliged if any member of the committee can tell me of any other author, or authoress, who has published a book, particularly on labour legislation, in the British dominions. I have in my hand a book entitled The Factory and Shop Acts of the British Dominions. It is by Mrs Carruthers, who at the time it was written was known as Miss Violet Markham. The contents are divided into three parts: Part 1, General View of the English Law; Part 2, New Zealand and Australia; Part 3, Canada—General Review of Federal Law; General Review of the law in Quebec, the law in Nova Scotia, the law in New Brunswick, the law in Manitoba, and the law in British Columbia. When Mr. Thomas, Director of the International Conference, was in Ottawa, he mentioned to me that one of the subjects which had occasioned most embarrassment and confusion to members of the conference was the very question we have been discussing this afternoon, that namely, of jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial governments; and having in mind the conversation I had with him at that time, it occurred to me that no person would be better qualified to make a satisfactory explanation and give a satisfactory exposition of that important matter than Mrs. Carruthers, who is thoroughly familiar with the labour questions of our country both in the federal and the provincial fields. That was the reason I suggested Mrs. Carruther's name—the fact that she has taken a very important part in labour questions generally.

It is perfectly true, as the leader of the Opposition mentioned that she was a candidate for parliament—not at the last election, as he said, but at the election before last. She was one of four candidates, I think, in a particular constituency, not supporting any party, but running as an independent Liberal. That, however, should not disqualify anyone from representing this country at such a conference. In addition to that, Mrs. Carruthers has been a member of the Central Committee on Womens' Employment in Great Britain; a director of the womens' section of the National Service Department during 1917; is at the present time a member of the Industrial Court—I think an appointment made under the present government in England—and has served on different commissions dealing with industrial and other problems. As there was very little time in which to give instructions to any person, it seemed to me that no one was better qualified—and I still hold that view, having regard to all the circumstances—to represent the minister in an effective way with regard to the questions that are likely to come up during these three or four days meetings of the governing board.

Perhaps I ought to mention another circumstance, I had in mind at the time I made the suggestion of Mrs. Carruthers' name. Only a short time ago, I had a conversation with the president of the Women's National Council of Canada, and she mentioned to me that at a recent meeting of the council the committee had desired the attention of the government to be drawn to the desirability of having a woman represent Canada, as occasion might afford opportunity, at one of these international conferences in Geneva. It seemed to me that Mrs. Carruthers, with her knowledge of labour legislation and industrial questions, would be particularly suitable as a woman to fill that place during this brief period. I might also mention that the questions coming up for consideration at the meetings have to do largely with problems relating to women's work in industry. Altogether, these circumstances seemed to render it advisable to suggest the name of this particular lady to represent Canada. Had we sent anyone from this side it would have been an entirely new departure.

I may say that Colonel Carnegie, who represented us on three previous occasions, is not a Canadian. He was employed here in Canada, during the period of the war, with the Imperial Munitions Board. After his return to England he published a book dealing with industrial questions, relating in part to matters in this country. I think his appointment to represent the Minister of Labour was regarded as a very good one, and that he did splendid service in that capacity. Mrs. Carruthers is in much the same position. She is not a Canadian but is familiar with Canadian law and Canadian conditions, and I think, will be distinctly helpful to our country in representing it at this particular meeting of the International Conference.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say that I am much impressed by the defence of the government in regard to the appointment of Mrs. Carruthers. I do not think, in the first place, that a knowledge of Canada, of Canadian labour conditions and employment conditions, can be gained by a study of provincial or Dominion statutes. It can be gained by residence in this country, by contact with actual affairs and by study resulting from that contact. Such advantages and such qualifications Mrs. Carruthers, no matter how brilliant she may be, cannot possibly possess. Such qualifications Colonel Carnegie did possess. Though not a Canadian, he lived here through very strenuous periods and was himself very closely associated with questions such as this. But Colonel Carnegie is not the only one. I think Mr. Obed Smith, a Canadian residing in London, represented us on previous similar occasions. I know of no reason why Obed Smith or Colonel Carnegie could not have accepted the position. Apparently no name was suggested and none of them was communicated with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned a moment ago—perhaps my right hon. friend was not in the House—that I did suggest Colonel Carnegie before I suggested Mrs. Carruthers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I though the hon. member said "Cunningham."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. Carnegie.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the Prime Minister made a mistake; I think he said "Cunningham." Then Colonel Carnegie was suggested by the Prime Minister and rejected by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) I did not know who Colonel Cunningham was, but I understand now. Apparently the Minister of Labour did not want Colonel Carnegie, I do not know why. However, Mr. Obed Smith was in England, and as far as I know his duties were there. Why he could not have represented the country I do not know. Certainly there could have been no political objection, which usually weighs heavily with the government, to the appointment of Obed Smith. The request came and was received on the 6th March. The government could have ascertained if Mr. Pacaud could have attended. No objection could have been taken to him. They could have ascertained in a day or two whether he could have attended. A long letter was written to Mr. Pacaud which he received on the 20th and answered on the 21st. There was no delay on his part. The delay was occasioned by the methods adopted by the government. But even after the delay there was plenty of time to have had a Canadian gentleman, and plenty of time to have had a Canadian woman appointed, if a woman were more desirable than a man. But no, an English woman politician, who forsooth had written a book, must represent this country. I have no knowledge of this woman. She has, I suppose, written this book—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a self evident limitation of the right hon. member's knowledge, unfortunately.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and I have many limitations of the same kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: She has written a book on Canadian law, provincial and federal. I doubt if very many in this country have had the advantage of a perusal of that book. I have not, but I repeat that that is a long way from qualifying to represent us on this important body. Besides, as everybody knows she is a member of a large coal-owning family in that country. That does not disqualify her, but it would at least tend to give her views, or perhaps a leaning, away from what would make her a fair judge of labour conditions, even in her own land, to say nothing of being a judge of conditions in this country. The appointment seems to me one of the most remarkable things the government has done, and when I say that I make a very strong statement indeed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must confess to a sense of gratification in not viewing these and kindred matters in as narrow and small-minded a way as my right hon. friend. I think when the leader of a great party has to take exception to a woman's appointment to deal with industrial matters on the ground that she belongs to a family which happens to be associated with a certain coal industry, he can be left to the measure of his own view of the situation. If my hon. friend, instead of having to confess his ignorance as to what Mrs. Carruthers has accomplished in the field of industrial relations, had a knowledge of her position in England and the esteem in which she is held among the working people there, he would be pleased to stand up in this House and say that Canada was fortunate in having one of Mrs. Carruthers' large sympathies and wide knowledge of industrial problems, to represent us at the conference in Geneva. More than that, I hope this country is large enough in its outlook to be prepared, when opportunity offers, to extend something in the nature of a recognition by courtesy to those who are helping to make the work and industrial position of this country known throughout different parts of the world. Mrs. Carruthers, as I have intimated, has helped to make Canada's labour laws known throughout the dominions of the British Empire and known to other countries, and when opportunity comes to recognize a service of that kind in so slight a way as this, I cannot but express my amazement that the leader of a great party should find it necessary to take exception in this House on grounds so small as those my right hon. friend has just mentioned.

Mr. SHAW: Can the minister tell me if, under one of the orders in council, the matter of old age pensions was not found to be peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament? I am referring to the order in council, I think, of November, 1920—I am not sure of the date.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think an order in council could deal with the question of old age pensions. My hon. friend possibly refers to the eight-hour day matter. That possibly could have been dealt with by order in council applying to the federal government works, such as railroads and so forth, but in any case the question of old age pensions is not one emanating from the International Labour Conference, and, therefore, it is not one of those matters that can be dealt with in order to determine what we are going to do in our relations between the provinces and the federal government, although it is still all important for somebody to determine what is to be done with it.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it a fact that during the session an hon. member brought up the matter of old age pensions in this House, and that the Prime Minister made the statement that the government was giving it favourable consideration? Would not that in itself prove that they considered it a federal matter?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not want my hon. friend to understand me as taking the position that old age pensions is not a matter the federal government should deal with. I do not take that position. I rather incline to the view, from all the information I have received, that it is a matter that this federal government could deal with, if and when it is prepared to do so, when it finds that the money is available for this purpose and a proper method of dealing with it can be devised.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Several times during the course of the debate this afternoon the minister has referred to the divided jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces with respect to labour matters. There has not been, as I understand it, any very clear or concise statement of the line of demarcation or division between those authorities. Could the minister give the committee a short, clear statement of the jurisdiction of this parliament and the jurisdiction of the provinces in this matter?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend of course appreciates that all of that information has been laid on the Table of the House by the previous government and this one, indicating the line of division between the provincial and the federal authority as alleged by the Department of Justice. I am quite sure that that hon. gentleman would be better informed if he would read the decisions of the Justice department as regards these matters, from documents already laid on the Table of the House, than he would in listening to me as an ordinary layman undertaking to give my views as to where federal authority ceased and provincial authority commenced. But I can, for the information of my hon. friend, deal with one particular question as it has been presented to us. Take the draft convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week. That is the one in which the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has, on several occasions, expressed great interest, which I know he feels.

The object of the draft convention is to secure the adoption of a maximum working day of eight hours and week of forty-eight hours for persons employed in any public or private industrial undertaking. Various exceptions to this proposed rule will be noted in the text of the draft convention. In an order in council of November 6, 1920,— —adopted on the report of the Minister of Justice, it was declared that the proposals of this draft convention involved legislation which is competent to parliament in so far as Dominion works and undertakings are affected, but which the provincial legislatures have otherwise the power to enact and apply generally and comprehensively. The proposals contained in this draft convention could probably be made effective by order in council in so far as regards hours of labour in Dominion works and undertakings are concerned.

Which my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Shaw) referred to a moment ago.

That is the ruling received on that particular question from the Justice department and some time ago placed on the Table of the House.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are there any other rulings which the minister could give to the committee?

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MURDOCK: They are all here. All of them have been dealt with excepting what took place at the last conference.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How many of them are there?

Mr. MURDOCK: There are many pages of these, if my hon. friend wants to go into them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I just wanted, if I could, to get some clear, concise statement in a general way outlining the division of authority. It is quite clear that as regards public works, this Dominion has jurisdiction.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would not care to be charged with undertaking to give a concise statement in a general way on an important legal question of this kind, defining the dual responsibilities as between federal and provincial authorities. I would rather read from the written legal definition given to us by the Justice department, and my hon. friend has, for these many months, had access to that on the Table of this House.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My reason for asking the minister that question was that I would gather from his statement that he had made a special study of the matter as Minister of Labour, and that he had referred on different occasions to this division of authority.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is correct in his supposition that, within the limits of time at my disposal, I have made a special study of all these questions that are of interest to the Department of Labour.

Mr. HALBERT: Supposing the Dominion government had full power, does the minister think it would be an excellent thing in the interest of Canada to introduce an eight-hour day for all the people of Canada under present conditions?

Mr. MURDOCK: That, my hon. friend will concede is under the circumstances, an hypothetical question and rather an unfair one to me, although my hon. friend does not intend it to be so. My hon. friend would naturally know where my sympathies might be on a matter of that kind. At the moment, though, I am only one member of a 5 p.m. government, undertaking to represent many and varied interests throughout Canada, all of which are entitled to equally fair consideration for their viewpoints and their interests involved. Therefore, it is not specially a question of my personal inclinations, judgment or desires on some particular matter that is going to govern.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the hon. gentleman any recollection at this late date of the engagements with respect to labour legislation made by the Liberal convention of 1919? Could he give the committee what those engagements were—I wonder if he has any idea of them at all—and then tell us whether they are now repudiated or just forgotten?

Mr. MURDOCK: I did not have the privilege or pleasure of attending the convention my right hon. friend speaks of. As a matter of fact, it was held in advance of the time that I was born into the political arena, and while I have read what my right hon. friend refers to, I would rather let someone more fully informed and equally interested in those matters answer the question of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would think the minister is the one who ought to be best informed and best able to answer. He is the Minister of Labour. Surely, he did not assume his duties without thoroughly acquainting himself with the obligations of the party with which he was connecting himself, as regards that special subject. I am asking him now only with respect to labour matters, for instance, old age pensions, women's pensions, the eight-hour day, all those cognate subjects. The minister is the one who should be best acquainted with those, because he must have studied them. He must have come to some conclusion as to his obligations in respect of those engagements. I ask him: What is his recollection of them? Has he any at all? Can he give the committee a rational statement of what he is committed to as labour leader in respect of those matters? If he can, what does he intend to do about the matter?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not, for one moment, expect that any statement that I might make would be regarded by my right hon. friend as a rational statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is rational, it would.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have already, on several occasions in the discussion of these estimates, indicated what was being done or what was hoped to be done in connection with old age pensions; I have indicated the position that we find ourselves in as regards the eight-hour day, forty-eight hour week convention, emananting from the 1919 International Labour Conference at Washington.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is our position now different from what it was in August, 1919?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would hold that our position and desires are not one whit different. The question is only one of time and reasonably consistent opportunity, having regard to the rights and interests of all concerned. As regards the matter of old age pensions, no one knows better than my right hon. friend that it would mean the assumption of an enormous burden of additional financial responsibilities to Canada, were we to undertake to adopt at the moment an old age pension scheme. No one in this House, not even the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) would be more delighted than I would be to know that it was possible to do that right now, but that is a question for parliament to determine. I have repeatedly stated that these matters have been and are being given all possible consideration with a view of seeing what can be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I am much enlightened. I have not had even a pretence of an answer to the question I asked. The minister did presume to say what the government's policy now is, and if I got his words correctly it is this: To do what is most consistent under all the circumstances with the general public interest. That is the government's policy.

Mr. MURDOCK: That is only your definition of it—and I never knew you to get anything right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I tried to repeat the minister's exact words. Perhaps he said satisfactory instead of consistent. Now will he give us again in his own words—and I will guarantee to get them exact—that fine specific definition of government policy which he gave us a moment ago.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend has asked for so much and changed his question so often that really I do not know, and I do not think anyone else in the House knows, what it is he wants. Personally, I think what he wants is to delay, to haggle and try to get something that he can make capital of, and possibly present a view that was never intended. Now, I wish him luck in his undertaking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can give my right hon. friend the information he asks for. It is well-known to him, but perhaps he will not mind my quoting the resolution of the Liberal convention in the exact language in which it was passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad the Prime Minister knows what I am asking for. The Minister of Labour has just got through saying that nobody does know what I want.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution is as follows:

Resolved that the committee recommends that the National Liberal Convention accept in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform, in the spirit they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporation in the conditions of Peace.

These methods and principles for regulating labour conditions so set forth in the treaty are as follows:

First.—The guiding principle that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second.—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third.—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth.—The adoption of an 8-hour day or a 48-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth.—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth.—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh.—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth.—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth.—Each state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

And further resolved

1. That the introduction into the government of industry or principles of representation whereby labour and the community, as well as capital, may be represented in industrial control, and their interests safeguarded and promoted in the shaping of industrial policies.

2. That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position,—

And here I might draw the attention of my right hon. friend to the words just used by the Minister of Labour. I think they are almost identical with those used in referring to this question.

—an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective co-operation between the several governments.

3. The representation of labour on federal commissions pertaining to labour matters.

4. Effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health.

5. The representation of labour on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

6. That the system of re-training soldiers, unfitted for their past work because of physical injuries, be extended to disabled workers in industry.

7. More effective restriction of Chinese immigration.

8. The federal incorporation of co-operative associations.

9. The acceptance of the principle of proportional representation.

10. Immediate and drastic action by the government with respect to the high cost of living and profiteering.

11. Restoration of the control of the executive by parliament, and of parliament, by the people through a discontinuance of government by order in council and a just franchise and its exercise under free conditions.

If my right hon. friend will be quite frank he will agree with me that some of the features of this resolution have already been carried out—some of the planks in this platform if he wishes to so term them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First I put administration by parliamentary government instead of by an autocratic executive. Then I think my right hon. friend will agree that we have representation of labour on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways. I could mention others. These "planks" have already or are being carried into effect. For example, more effective restriction of Chinese immigration is in course of being dealt with, there being legislation before the House at the present time with that end in view. And, "in so far as may be practicable having regard to Canada's financial position," the government will continue to put into effect one by one the several clauses of this resolution passed at the Liberal convention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The resolution, as will be seen, affirms, subject to some pretty vague conditions, adherence to the International Labour Congress charter. That, of course meant nothing because Canada's adherence had already been given long before. Then the resolution goes on and recites, I think, about eleven commitments of the Liberal party. The Prime Minister says they have carried into effect the last—parliamentary government is restored; order in council government is gone. The returns brought down in this House show that in the first three months of my right hon. friend's administration—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said parliamentary government had replaced an autocratic executive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —there were more orders in council passed than in any three months before in the history of the country, and I venture to say that the year 1922 will show more orders in council, and more extreme orders in council, passed by this government than ever were passed in any year in our history.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to interrupt my right hon. friend, but that question was asked and answered in the House yesterday. The returns were given and showed that the orders in council last year were fewer than those of the preceding year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By about what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not saying by about what. I am answering my right hon. friend's statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will look into it. I have not seen the return. But I will undertake to say that it will show one of the largest returns of orders in council passed in the history of this country. But if the number were twice, or half, as large it would not make one iota of difference; the number of orders in council only represents the number of decisions, small or great, which the government makes in accordance with the legislation of parliament. But this government time and again—and at this point I am not criticizing—has gone beyond legislation, and has presumed to act in the belief that the circumstances warranted such action and to wait for legislation in the future. It has done just the same as every other government, but in cases more extreme than even under the exigencies of war were ever acted on before. The fact is that all this talk about the restoration of responsible government was just so much froth and fury in the absence of any categorical indictment of the government against which it was raised.

Then the Prime Minister says, "Oh, but we have appointed a labour director on the National Railway Board." The previous government stated over and over again that on the reorganization of the Canadian National Railway Company and the bringing in of the Grand Trunk there would be a director appointed directly representing labour. Subsequent to the passing of this resolution the Liberal party in parliament set to work to state just specifically what that resolution meant. A motion was made by a member of the present government, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) that two representatives should be appointed to the National Railway Board representing labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is wrong again. The motion that he has reference to by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that labour should be represented on the board of directors was a resolution moved in this parliament before the Liberal convention was held at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was pretty certain it was later. Anyway it makes it worse if it was before, because if so this resolution was merely to implement that. That stands as a parliamentary pledge of the Liberal party and is entirely consistent with the resolution of the convention. It was moved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that there be two representatives, and that those representatives be recommended by the employees of the system. Does anyone dispute the correctness of that? Moved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, seconded by an hon. member whose name at the moment I forget, and supported by the entire Liberal party in the House—save, I think, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who at that time was seated about half way on his road across the House. That resolution pledged the party and called upon the government then and there to appoint two directors representing labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend quote that resolution?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I will give the resolution. There were to be two representatives, recommended by the employees of the system. What was done to carry that out? One man was appointed. He is a labour man; against him as a labour man I say not a word. But he certainly was not recommended by the employees of the system; he is not on the system at all, and never was, so far as I know. And he is one, not two; so there is a direct, a flagrant violation of the commitment of the party in this House. That is the extent to which that undertaking has been complied with; the others they simply forgot—said the time was not opportune. Well, the situation in the country is just the same as in 1919 they declared it was, because their resolutions and the other pages of their proceedings abound with statements that the country is overloaded with the burden of debt, and that—by intimation if not in so many words—it is on the road to collapse and bankruptcy. That was the condition declared by themselves to exist, when all these things were held out to the labour population of Canada. In a word, the so-called principles that were embalmed in these resolutions of the convention were not really principles, but only baits.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand that my right hon. friend is taking exception to the appointment of the president of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress to represent labour on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister understands exactly what I said; I could not have made myself clearer. I say his appointment is in no way a fulfilment of the pledge that the Liberal party made in this House, of the motion that they supported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend taking exception to the appointment, or does he endorse it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have nothing against Mr. Tom Moore at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend endorse it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was nothing in the world to prevent our appointing him; we had never committed ourselves to anything else. I am neither endorsing nor supporting it; I say it is a violation of the commitment made by the opposition of that time, now the government of the day. The Prime Minister's effort is only an imitation of the effort of his follower from Hants (Mr. Martell) to get away from the point we are discussing and to try to trail the discussion into something else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Minister of Labour tell us one concrete step that his government has taken, or, to put it more liberally, one concrete step they expect to take, even within the next two years, to fulfil in any substantial way the labour pledges of his government?

Item agreed to.

Joint Industrial Councils, $10,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How is this money being spent, and what is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. MURDOCK: The expenditure under this head for the ten months ended January 31, 1923 was $3,102.48. The appropriation is needed to meet changes arising out of work done for the promotion of a system of joint industrial councils as between employers and workmen. The system is largely identical with that known in Great Britain as the Whitley Councils and is thought likely to be helpful in meeting difficult situations arising out of the industrial unrest. The appropriation is intended to meet charges for printing, stationery, travelling expenses and temporary assistance. The appropriation had been $15,000. During the past year or two the department has found it inadvisable unduly to press, through the assistance of officers of the department at least, the creation of these industrial councils. We found a commendable desire on the part of employers and workmen in many of the industrial activities throughout Canada to get together. The department have always been ready to give assistance or advice in furthering the joint industrial council idea, but it is thought that $10,000 will be sufficient for the coming fiscal year, particularly in view of the fact that there has not been opportunity for the expansion of the proposed effort that might have been expected when the matter was originally before parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many industrial councils have actually been organized during the past twelve months?

Mr. MURDOCK: None. Only one or two could be called joint industrial councils under this proposed plan or the Whitley Council plan, and they have not been very active. There is no necessity of adopting the joint industrial plan where there is a disposition on the part of workers and employers to get together and straighten out their own differences. That is the condition we have sought to bring about and to maintain, rather than to press a plan which in many cases has appeared to be objectionable to employers and to employees.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has any effort been made to institute these councils in any of the government departments?

Mr. MURDOCK: Representations have been made in the form of memoranda submitted by local civil service organizations rather favouring the industrial council idea. I understand there is a joint industrial council in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. So far as many of the other departments are concerned—I know this applies to the Printing bureau, with some seven hundred employees, and the Labour department—there is no employee who has not ample opportunity to present any views or representations he may wish to make to the minister or to the deputy minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister would hardly claim that was an industrial council. As I understand it, the very basis of an industrial council is, as was very well expressed in the document the Prime Minister read, that labour in the community as well as capital should be represented in industrial control. I take it that merely the fact of making representations or having the right to make representations to the governing body does not constitute carrying out the principle of industrial councils.

Mr. MURDOCK: Parliament is maintaining industrial control here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) will be impressed with the progress made in carrying out that resolution. He must be impressed with the answer of the Minister of Labour. I rose to draw attention to the return to which the Prime Minister called my attention a moment ago, the orders in council passed in 1921 and 1922. The question was asked by the hon. member for Fort William:

(1) What were the number passed in the year ending December 31, 1921?
(2) What were the number passed in the year ending December 31, 1923?

The answer appearing in Hansard is as follows: (1) Year 1921, 5,861; (2) March, 1922, 5,621. I do not know what the significance is, and no one else can tell, of that word "March," but it would look to me as if the number given for 1922 was only from March onward.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think March appears at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word is here in Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no March in the reply. That is a misprint.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would look as if it was from March onward, or that the figures were given to the end of the fiscal year in each case, in which case there would be no comparison as between the two governments At all events, it will be seen by these figures the progress that has been made in the "restoration of responsible government."

Mr. GOOD: Did I understand the minister to say that out of the $15,000 voted last year only some $3,000 was expended?

Mr. MURDOCK: $3,102.14 up to January 31st.

Mr. GOOD: May I inquire then as to the significance of asking for $10,000 this year? There seems to be a considerable expansion of the work in contemplation.

Mr. MURDOCK: The vote was $15,000 last year, but as I have just intimated to my hon. friend for Centre Winnipeg there were not the opportunities last year that it was believed there might be to extend the efforts in connection with joint industrial councils. It is hoped and believed that there may be greater opportunities to do something in that desired direction this year, and that more sympathy will be shown by employers and workers in this connection. Therefore it is thought that about $5,000 off the estimate of last year, of which only $3,000 odd has been spent, would be about right. That would leave a margin of $10,000 with which to work during the next fiscal year, in the event of our having greater opportunities than we had last year of doing something in the desired direction.

Mr. GOOD: I suppose that the principle is that we should have plenty of money to draw on in case the opportunity should present itself.

Mr. MURDOCK: That we should have a sufficient amount so as not to handicap possible results that might otherwise not be secured. I discussed that particular phase when dealing with the Annuities branch question a little while ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the government contemplate introducing any legislation this session looking to the carrying out of this idea of the joint control of industry?

Mr. MURDOCK: That matter also is under consideration, but I think it is only fair to my hon. friend to say that my personal opinion is that there will not be any legislation of that kind initiated at this session of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $35,000.

Mr. BOYS: That was arranged to stand over, I think. There are some members who are not here, having gone away for the Easter recess, who want an opportunity of addressing themselves to this item.

Item stands.

Mr. BOYS: In connection with the appropriations not required for 1923-1924, I thought there was to be some discussion of that, but whether that be so or not, I understood the minister to say that there was nothing expended last year on unemployment relief. Were any applications received for unemployment relief?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend misunderstood me. There has been a great deal of money expended for unemployment relief during the past fiscal year, but it was decided that for this last winter it was unnecessary to adopt any plan of co-operation with the municipalities and provincial governments such as was in effect during the two previous winters, and that is the reason we are not asking for any appropriation this year on account of unemployment relief. There is already in the funds up to the 31st of March some $380,000 odd of the amount voted by parliament last year in the Supplementary Estimates. That vote has not been all used, and will not be used, I might say.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate that, but I do not understand the item as it appears here. It is for $1,300,000. In the Supplementary Estimates for unemployment relief it was $1,200,000. If you have spent all of that but $300,000 odd I do not see how you can have as large an item as you have now opposite the heading "Appropriations not required for 1923-1924."

Mr. MURDOCK: The sum of $100,000 was voted in the Main Estimates, and then I asked for $1,200,000 in the Supplementary Estimates to meet liabilities that it was said had accrued. That makes $1,300,000. As a matter of fact, the estimates that were given to us were rather over-estimates, and we found out that actually it cost us about $400,000 less than was estimated.

Mr. BOYS: That accounts for $400,000. Where did the other $900,000 go? The item as it stands now is $1,300,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: With $902,000 expended, and approximately $400,000 still remaining unexpended, you get $1,300,000.

Mr. BOYS: But if you have spent it, you require it.

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh, no. We are not engaging in any unemployment relief whatever this winter. We do not propose to. It is regarded as unnecessary to do so. We are not asking for any unemployment relief funds.

Mr. BOYS: I understand that all right. I may be very stupid, but I cannot appreciate the minister's explanation. You get $1,300,000, and spend $900,000. That leaves $400,000. I could understand this item for Appropriations not Required standing at $400,000 but if you have spent the money you certainly must require it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has not gathered the form in which the estimates are presented. Last year there was an item for unemployment relief. This year there is none. This is a comparison of the estimates of last year with the estimates of this year. Last year the total estimate came to $1,300,000. This year we are not asking for anything for unemployment relief, so compared with last years' estimate the amount not required is what was voted last year. That is the explanation.

Mr. MURDOCK: At page 49 my hon. friend will notice two columns, one for the present fiscal year and one for the coming year. In the column for the coming year, he will notice, a blank opposite the item "Appropriations not Required for 1923-1924" and $1,300,000 as the vote for 1922-1923. That amount is not required this year and is therefore carried over into the "Decrease" column.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I promised a moment ago to give the Prime Minister the resolution that was voted for by his party on the motion of the hon. member now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I find the date is April 23, 1919. That was three or four months prior to the celebrated convention. It reads as follows—and I ask hon. members to compare it with my words given from memory. It was an amendment to be added to a clause of the Canadian National Railways Act, in these words:

> At least two of the directors shall be appointed upon the recommendation of the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend will observe that the resolution adopted when the Liberal convention was held was the resolution on which the party appealed to the country. It called for representation of labour on the directorate of the Canadian National Railways and that has been carried out by the appointment of the president of the Trades and Labour Congress to that position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What a facile organization this party is? Here is a particular resolution of the party voted for and supported by the Prime Minister and every present member of the government. Three months afterwards their policy in this regard takes another form. It is only about two weeks possibly three weeks, since we were informed by the same government that where there was a difference between the resolution of the party in convention and the parliamentary commitments in the House, the latter governs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It depends upon when the matter is proposed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It depends entirely on what the subject is. They deal with it in another shape when they come to parliament, and the Minister of Finance tells us that is what is to govern, although they may have voted for another policy in convention. On the other hand the Prime Minister tells us it is the policy in convention that governs. Again I say what a facile organization! In other words what a sham?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I would like to remind the committee that there is nothing before it at present. What item shall be called?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Civil Government estimates to be found on page 84.

Salaries, $231,735; contingencies, $45,500.

The CHAIRMAN: The details are to be found on page 35 of the reprinted Estimates.

Mr. LADNER: I wanted to ask the minister if I understood him rightly in saying that no provision would be made by the government with respect to unemployment for the next year, or for the contingency of unemployment. I did not quite catch his answer on that point.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are not asking the government to vote any money at this time on account of possible unemployment for the future or for the present.

Mr. LADNER: Is there any provision for unemployment should the situation require assistance in any portion of Canada, or has the government decided to leave that question in the hands of the provincial governments?

Mr. MURDOCK: We do not anticipate any condition of unemployment that will warrant the participation of the federal government, either now or in the immediate future, and therefore parliament is not being asked to vote any more money on that account. We think that "Day by day, in every way Canada is getting better and better."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The United States is relieving the minister of very much trouble in that regard.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, and no other one gentleman in the Dominion of Canada is more responsible for that fact than is my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the policy?

Mr. MURDOCK: We find my right hon. friend, the leader of a once great party, who is accepting $14,000 of the people's money, standing on the floor of parliament the other night and making the statement, which Hansard will show, that children are dying, and that many suffered and died during the past winter. The statement is absolutely exaggerated and absolutely unfair to Canada, and it is just such statements as that on the part of my right hon. friend, and others like him, that are giving workmen the belief that this Dominion is not a proper country to live in and driving them out to seek employment elsewhere. My right hon. friend is the best advertising medium that Uncle Sam has today in taking from Canada the good citizens that know and love the country and would like to remain here if they were only given a square deal. No immigration agent that the United States ever sent to Regina—as we heard of the other night—or to any other part of the Dominion has been able to do as effective and splendid work in the nature of disgusting Canadians with their own country and turning them loose to seek their fortunes elsewhere as my right hon. friend has done. He can take the chief credit to himself of being the best immigration officer that Uncle Sam has on this continent at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I appear to have started something. I must say that these fine orations from the Minister of Labour are rather diverting. My latest crime is that I stated in the House, I think three weeks ago, that because of the position we found ourselves in last winter in respect of the coal needs of the poor there had been deaths of children. That is true.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will my right hon. friend please read the exact language he used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it? Does the minister think I carry the newspapers of the country around with me?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh no, read Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, Hansard? That is what I stated and that is what appears in Hansard, that children had died, and there have been a lot of deaths, because of inability to provide fuel under the conditions which have prevailed during this last hard winter. The minister says that is an awful thing to say, and that it is the cause of the denudation of the cities of this country by our artisan population who have gone to the United States. Well, I do not like to be disrespectful but I think if the consummation of nonsense was ever reached in the world's history it was reached in this last sentence. The men have gone there by the thousands because there is no work. It is unfortunate. I drew attention to it during the debate on the Address, and I stated that I did not attribute the condition wholly to this government, if at all. These things follow in cycles from world conditions and special conditions in the country, in respect to which the government has only partial control. But I do hold the government responsible for some of the unfortunate circumstances that exist to-day. A government policy can have a substantial effect in curing a situation. No word of pessimism as to this country has ever escaped my lips in this House or in the Dominion.

Mr. MURDOCK: Nonsense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1921 declared to the world that we were in the throes of bankruptcy, that even our own men were getting frightened, that we owed so much we could not maintain any longer our integrity as a country; and then they wonder that they did not have any immigration in 1922. No prophecies of that kind or of any kind have been made by me. I am not afraid to state conditions as they exist and as I know them.

Mr. MURDOCK: Did the right hon. member not, on various platforms in October and November of 1921, prophesy with loud acclaim that if certain things happened the factories of the various towns and cities of Ontario and Canada would be closed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely.

Mr. MURDOCK: And that the workmen would be out of work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK: Was it true?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, certainly it was true, but hon. gentlemen took care that these things did not happen, at the expense of their plighted word. Undoubtedly it was true. If we had seventeen classes of articles on the free list to-day there would be scores of factories in this Dominion closed beyond any question, and no one knows it better than the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). That is what I stated, and hon. gentlemen opposite now point to the factories which are open and say, "Look at them, the prophecies of Mr. Meighen have proved false by the events." No, what proved false was the government. These hon. gentlemen proved false to what they pledged themselves to do in this country, and then they boast of their own duplicity, and point to the condition of the country under the policy now in effect.

Mr. FORKE: This is very entertaining, but we are not getting very far with the estimates.

Mr. LADNER: The question I asked a moment ago was turned into an occasion for a declamation by the minister. Now I seek full information. I am trying to find out from the government if it is their policy to leave the solution of the question of unemployment with the provinces. The minister has told us that it is not anticipated that there will be unemployment. I ask the question purely with a desire to get information, in order that the people in that province who are interested will know, when the crisis arises, where they must go to find employment.

Mr. MURDOCK: On the 22nd day of December last, after very careful consideration by the government, a telegram was sent to the Prime Minister of British Columbia and a similar telegram to the Prime Minister of Manitoba, in answer to representations they had made to this federal government on the question of unemployment, indicating to these Prime Ministers the view that there was no general condition of unemployment in effect comparable in any way to that in effect during the two preceding winters, and no condition of unemployment which, in the judgment of the government, would warrant the participation of the federal government in a joint unemployment relief scheme such as had been in effect during the past two winters, the telegram indicating, as orders in council had previously indicated, that the question of unemployment relief was primarily one of municipal and provincial concern. The government has maintained that position on the general question of unemployment since that time, and, as a matter of fact, we have seen no great reason for changing that position. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I do not at this moment recall any word that we have received from authorities in British Columbia taking exception to that declaration of our position. It is true that in Manitoba we have received from the Mayor of Winnipeg, and various other representative gentlemen in that province, numerous requests indicating their desire that we should participate in assisting to relieve the conditions of unemployment which it was stated were in effect in Winnipeg. We did not however believe that it was advisable or necessary that the federal government should participate in any unemployment relief scheme, with, of course, one exception provided for in Order No. 220 which was laid on the Table of the House some time ago and which provides that where in certain municipalities relief organizations, composed in part of charitable and soldier organizations with representatives of the municipality, were participating in the relief of unemployed returned men, the federal government would, under the conditions recited in the order in council, pay one-third of the expenditure. Under that order in council we paid out some few thousand dollars, probably not more than ten thousand dollars, since the order in council was passed some weeks ago. Our view is that the conditions which I have just referred to are going to improve rather than get worse, and that there is no necessity at this time, for us to consider such a question as asking for money with which to deal with unemployment, which we do not believe will be general in effect.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to clear up a certain matter. Is the contention of the city of Winnipeg set forth in the following resolution correct?

And whereas at a conference called by the federal government in September, 1922, a resolution was unanimously passed to the effect that should abnormal unemployment exist during the winter the provincial and federal governments should jointly meet the situation in a manner similar to that followed during the winter of 1921-22.

Is that contention correct? Was that resolution unanimously passed?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, that contention is not altogether correct, but it would probably take some few minutes to explain the situation, and I am told the House desires a few minutes before rising. Therefore, I move the committee rise and report progress. I will have that information for my hon. friend next time we meet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The item under discussion was not carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was carried a few minutes ago.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. The minister suggested that the committee rise.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MEIGHEN: What business will be taken up on Monday the 9th April?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will continue in Committee of Supply, taking up the estimates of the departments that have already been considered; Trade and Commerce, Public Works, and Labour—one of the three.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED

General Rules and Orders of the Supreme Court.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

Eighteenth Annual Report, for the year ended December 31st, 1922, of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

WRECK OF ALASKAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) if he can give us any information as to when the report on the investigation into the wreck of the steamer Alaskan is likely to be brought down. The investigation took place more than two months ago, and the report is not likely to be voluminous. I may point out that apart from this investigation, sufficient has been brought out in connection with the wreck of the Alaskan and three other wrecks which have unfortunately occurred since then, two of them with loss of life, to show that the representations made by myself and by many public bodies in the West are well founded, namely, that the life-saving appliances or provisions out there are not adequate. I would like to ask the minister what steps he is taking or contemplates taking to deal with this matter. Time is slipping away; the session will soon be over, and this is a very important matter to the people on the coast of British Columbia.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The report of the Wreck Commissioner who investigated the wreck of the Alaskan has not yet been received. My information is that the stenographer who took the evidence had been ill and was unable to transcribe his notes; then, the commissioner himself has been ill. But we are informed that the report will be submitted in the course of a few days. Meanwhile, this matter has been brought to my attention on several occasions by my hon. friend himself and by various bodies in British Columbia, and I think that something should be done to improve the conditions there. I have decided, in fact, that something should be done this year, first, by establishing small wireless telephone stations in the various lighthouses so that communication may be had at any time with the life saving stations at Bamfield and Tofino. It has also been decided that the department shall have a station at Bamfield during the winter months and a ship suitable for the work which shall be equipped with all the necessary life-saving appliances and be in communication with all the lighthouses. As I have already said, we have in the Fisheries department two or three boats any one of which I think would serve the purpose.

I am glad to congratulate my hon. friend from Battleford (Mr. McConica) on his reappearance in this House.

It is also intended to place notice boards alongside the telegraph lines running along the shore to indicate the nearest place where survivors from a wreck can find food and shelter.

My hon. friend has suggested to me at various times that boats over one hundred tons register should be subject to the same inspection as boats of one hundred and fifty tons and over, and that the Shipping Act be amended accordingly. That matter is engaging the attention of the department.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SUTHERLAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As a member of the special committee to whom was referred Bill No. 15 to readjust the representation of the House of Commons, I take this the first opportunity afforded to refer to some newspaper articles which appeared on March 29 regarding this matter and referring particularly to myself. One of these articles purports to be based on a letter received from the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Hammell) wherein he states that I am the one man who is responsible for holding up the work of the Redistribution committee. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read one paragraph from an article in the Bracebridge Gazette of March 29, 1923, dealing with this matter, and which I want to characterize as absolutely false and without any foundation in every particular. This is what purports to have been received by the Bracebridge Gazette from the hon. member for Muskoka:

> As to Donald Sutherland, he is the one man who is now holding up the work of the Redistribution committee. At a former meeting of the sub-committee to work out the salvation of Ontario, Sutherland agreed to nine members for the city of Toronto, which would have meant very few changes in other parts of the province. But, at the meeting of the same sub-committee again to-day, after he had been censored by his Conservative friends, he backs up or swallows himself and now wants fifteen members for Toronto, which if they get them, will most certainly interfere with Muskoka.

As I said before, I wish to characterize that statement as absolutely false in every particular.

IMPRISONMENT OF J. H. ROBERTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask if the government has received a petition asking for the disallowance of special legislation which led to the imprisonment of Mr. J. H. Roberts, and what is proposed to be done with the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend that I understand communications have been received asking that the matter of disallowance to which he refers be looked into, and that at the present time it is receiving the attention of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister say that the statutes have been returned in the regular way to the government from the province of Quebec? I was not aware that they had been. Have the statutes of last session of the province of Quebec as yet been transmitted to the Department of Justice in accordance with the constitutional procedure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think they have. I was answering the question my hon. friend asked as to whether any communications had been received asking that this matter be looked into, and I mentioned that they had.

SINGLE TRANSFERABLE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation this session looking to the establishment of the single transferable vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That matter is under consideration at the present time. Any amendment of the character which my hon. friend has just mentioned would be an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act. There will be a number of amendments possibly to that act which the govenment will wish to present to the House for consideration, but whether it would be wise to bring them down at the present session will depend upon the progress we make now and in the next month or two.

TRUSTS AND COMBINES

Mr. CHURCH:

How many inquiries or prosecutions were there in Canada from 1905 to 1922 against trusts, and combines and combinations in restraint of trade by the government of Canada and with what results?

[Mr. Copp.]

Hon. Mr. COPP:

(a) Action has been taken in one case, namely, that relating to the United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada. In this case a board of investigation was, on the order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Cannon, a Judge of the Supreme Court of the Province of Quebec, established on February 25, 1911, under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. The inquiry took place in due course and the findings of the Board of Investigation were received on October 21, 1912, the findings declaring the United Shoe Machinery Company to be a combine within the meaning of the Combines Investigation Act.

(b) The United Shoe Machinery Company, in a communication addressed to the Honourable T. W. Crothers, then Minister of Labour, under date of August 21, 1913, reported that, to meet the situation created by the findings of the Combines Investigation Board, the company had changed its form of lease, and the evil alleged by the Combines Investigation Board.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WESTERN TERMINI

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. Was it decided at any meeting of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway that Brockville and Cochrane should be the western termini of the maritime region or division of the Canadian National Railway? If so, when was such meeting held?

2. Did said board at any other time change such western termini to Montreal? If so, when?

3. Did the said board at any other time change such terminus to Rivière du Loup?

4. When were each of said meetings held and who were present and acting at each of such meetings?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The reasons for the selection of Rivière du Loup as the western terminus of the maritime division of the Canadian National Railways have already been brought down. It is not considered to be in the interest of the successful management of the National Railways to make public the proceedings of the board.

1. What was the cost of maintaining Yukon telegraph system within Yukon territory, from and including Whitehorse north to and including Forty Mile, Yukon territory, during the year ending March 31, 1922, including salaries and all expenses but not including the superintendent's office at Vancouver, British Columbia, or any expense in connection therewith, or of any office or part of the line south of Whitehorse, Yukon territory?

2. What was the cost of maintaining Yukon telegraph system, main line only, from Ashcroft, British Columbia, to Whitehorse, Yukon territory, during the same period?

8. What is the length in miles of Yukon telegraph system, main line, from Whitehorse, Yukon territory, to Forty Mile, Yukon territory?

9. What is the length in miles of each branch line from said main line, naming them?

NEW ELEVATOR, MONTREAL

Mr. BOYS:

1. Are the harbour commissioners of Montreal calling for tenders for a new grain elevator to be erected in the vicinity of Tarte pier, Montreal?

2. If so, will tenders of all companies operating under Dominion or provincial charters receive consideration?

3. Is there any truth in the report that tenders which may be received from companies with headquarters outside of Montreal will not be considered?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TORONTO OFFICES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is there any truth in the announcement made by Director Gough of the Canadian National Railway and by J. E. Dalrymple, vice-president, in Toronto evening papers, Friday, March 23rd, that the Canadian National Railways is to erect the largest skyscraper in the British Empire on the corner of King and Yonge streets, Toronto, for regional headquarters, and have the National Railways under the existing legislation the power to erect such a building without the consent of parliament and by what statute?

2. What will be the cost of said building, how will the money be provided, and will parliament have to pass on the money for this item?

3. Is it intended that the building of this skyscraper shall have priority and take precedence over the contract the city has with the government for the building of the following long delayed essentials and the carrying out of the contracts herein, viz.:—

(a) A post office,
(b) A customs house,
(c) Completion of the new Union Railway Station,
(d) The viaduct,
(e) Harbour improvement?

4. Why are the Canadian National Railways expropriating this property when private ownership was ready to build a similar building on this site, and was not the new Union Station erected for this required accommodation if at present needed at all, and is not the new station the logical site for headquarters?

5. Is the erection of said building not a violation of the station and viaduct agreement, 1913, by which headquarters were to be in the new depot?

6. Who recommended this construction to the government, and why?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. If such a statement were made in Toronto, it was without authority. The property has been expropriated largely for ticket office purposes and to protect the interests of the Canadian National Railways in its uptown location. An amicable arrangement in the matter has been reached with the owners.

2. Plans for the utilization of the property have not yet been decided upon. When they are, whatever requisite authority is required will be obtained.

3. The necessity to protect the railways' interests uptown does not interfere with any other public improvement required at Toronto.

4. The lease of the Grand Trunk for the location in question was expiring, and no other suitable site was available.

5. No violation of said agreement is involved.

6. The Railway Management recommended the expropriation for the purpose already referred to.

DRY DOCK, PRINCE RUPERT

Mr. LADNER:

1. What is the tonnage capacity of the dry dock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, or the Canadian National Railway, at Prince Rupert, British Columbia, for vessels?

2. What is the total investment in the said dry dock?

3. How many main sections comprise the complete dry dock?

4. How many of such section, or sections, of dry dock are used at present, and what class of vessels, and how many of such vessels, have been repaired in the dry dock during the year 1922, and up to the end of March, 1923?

5. What is the tonnage of the largest vessel repaired in said dry dock between the 1st of June, 1922, and the 28th February, 1923?

6. Would the government, or the Canadian National Railway, be willing to move a portion of such dry dock to Vancouver under reasonable terms and conditions?

7. Is the government, or the Canadian National Railway, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, or whoever has the legal authority in that behalf, willing, under reasonable terms, to lease certain sections of said dry dock as are capable of being moved to Vancouver, in order to provide dry dock facilities for the vessels entering and leaving Vancouver?

[Mr. Church.]

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. 20,000 tons.

2. $2.940,000.

3. Three.

4. All sections have been used from time to time and all classes of vessels up to 17,600 tons displacement. During the year 1922, dockings totalled 182, and from beginning of January to end of March, 1923, total dockings 37, mostly small vessels.

5. 8,000 tons D.W.

6 and 7. So far as the government is aware the question of moving any part of the Prince Rupert drydock has not been considered.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LIFTING OF STEEL

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton):

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, orders in council, and all other documents, relating to the lifting of the steel on portions of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway between Edmonton and the western boundary of the province of Alberta.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

On the motion of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Mr. SHAW: Before this motion is put, I wish to say that I have just received a copy of the Supplementary Estimates, indicating that it is proposed to vote a sum of $5,500,000 to cover provisional bonus allowances for the inside and outside Civil Service. I take this opportunity of indicating the difficulties from which many civil servants suffered last year owing to the fact that this bonus was not voted until, I think, the month of June. The civil servants consequently found it necessary to get along without that bonus, which many of them needed, until the vote was passed by parliament. I simply rise to call the attention of the government to the necessity of having this matter disposed of as early as possible in order that there may be no interregnum whatsoever in the payment of the bonus allowance to civil servants this year.

SUPPLY—GRATUITIES TO GRAND TRUNK OFFICIALS

On the motion of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I may as well take this opportunity as any other to call attention to an official statement that I see in the press, authorized by the government, I believe by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the effect that a royal commission has been appointed, presumably under the Inquiries Act, to make inquiry into certain payments made by the former Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk in London, England, by way of gratuities, first of all to themselves, and secondly to others of their officers who still continue in their employment. I wish to ask: Is it the fact that a royal commission is to inquire into this matter? If so, what is there that is dark or misunderstood about it? In a word, what is there that is not known? What is the phase of it that still needs the light? Is it contemplated that this royal commission will proceed to England and have a trip over that portion of the world, and after they get there, how are they to be given such powers as will enable inquiry in England? In short, what is the general purview and what is the specific purpose of this inquiry? Anent this, it would be interesting to know who are in line for these positions, and how many? What is the proposed remuneration, besides the trip?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways): My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has soared into the realm of unknowable details. I am not giving any new information to the House when I say that when the fact became known that certain grants were made by the London Board of Directors to their own members as well as to officials of the Grand Trunk, it caused considerable uneasiness throughout the country as to just how far these grants went, whaat authority there was for making the grants, and if other grants were made the details of which have not yet become known. I want to make it clear that the suggestion of a royal commission, is no reflection on any person, but the conditions surrounding the making of these grants ought to be made quite clear to the public in Canada who now own the property out of which, at least, a proportion of these grants came, as the assets of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were less when they came into the possession of the Dominion of Canada than they would have been had these grants not been made. without casting a reflection on any person, but merely with a desire to get at the real situation, so that the Canadian National Railway may be started on its career from now on without any cloud or suspicion hanging over it in regard to any of these transactions, the government thought it advisable to ask some independent body or person to act as a royal commission, to get the facts as briefly and succinctly as could be done, so that they might be given to the public.

A letter was written if I remember correctly—and I am speaking from memory now—in October, 1919, by a legal representative of the government of that date in reference to a proposed agreement for taking over the Grand Trunk Railway. That agreement, although its provisions I believe were outlined in this letter, was not executed and did not become operative till the following March. There was one clause in that agreement, if I am correctly informed, which stated that after the execution of the agreement the Grand Trunk could not dispose of any of its assets without the consent of the government of Canada. In December, 1919, midway between the letter of October and the bringing into operation of the agreement, the board of directors met and passed a resolution giving gratuities to certain officers.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask, was the resolution made public at that time?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think so. It was made public a few days ago, as far as I know. In addition to that, that money was taken out of the fund set aside for fire insurance purposes. True, that fire insurance fund belonged to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but it never was set aside for the purpose of giving gratuities, and the public would like to have cleared up the details surrounding the decision in regard, not so much to the giving of the gratuities, as to taking them out of the fire insurance fund which had been set apart for other purposes; because to the extent that these gratuities were taken out of the fire insurance fund, that fund was reduced when the Grand Trunk system came to the Dominion of Canada.

Then a resolution was passed by the board of directors, giving themselves a gratuity of five years' salary on account of the disappearance of the Grand Trunk and, consequently, the disappearance of the board of directors. I might say, in justice to the board of directors, first, that I believe that, under the Railway Act of Great Britain, gratuities of that kind are given to directors under similar conditions, and that, while the company may not have been chartered under that act, yet they were living in the shadow of it, and this resolution would be passed under conditions similar to those existing in Great Britain.

But in addition to that, it is said in the resolution that these funds payable to the directors came out of another fund, contributed by the holders of the guaranteed securities, debentures and stock of the Grand Trunk. The holders of these securities are the men who have value, or to put the matter plainly, who do not lose by the transference of the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada or to the Canadian National Railways. Just why a resolution of the board of directors ought to be necessary to dispose of privately contributed funds is a question that ought to be cleared up. I want to be fair to every person, and this might be the situation As I understand the matter, the holders of these securities contributed certain funds for the purpose of protecting their interests or the interests of the shareholders before the board of arbitration, and this fund may have been so contributed that the board of directors had the power to use it even for the purpose of giving themselves the five-year gratuities. Everything that has taken place may be perfectly explainable; but there are surrounding the payments of these gratuities to officers in Canada, conditions which, to my mind, make it essential, in order that the people of this country who now own these properties may have the utmost confidence in them, that this should be cleared up.

One thing which has come to my attention is this. These funds were paid out of the fire insurance fund; but when the officials signed the receipts for their gratuities, they found that those receipts stated distinctly that the contributions were gifts from the shareholders to them for long and contiued service. There are as regards the vouchers which were originally presented, details which, I think, require a good deal of investigation, and it would be in the interest of the public that some independent body—the government suggests a royal commission—should be named to make this investigation and to give to the people of Canada who own this property, a clean slate as to what has occurred, so that we shall all know through what vicissitudes our property has come before it has reached us. I think this is fair to the officials, fair to the British board as well as fair to the various Canadian boards.

I need not go into details. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has asked me who was in line for the position of commissioner. If we take the men who are able, the line would be long; but up to the present time the personnel of the commission has been a secondary matter. Our sole purpose is to clear the air of whatever clouds may surround the transference of the Grand Trunk to the Dominion of Canada, and we believe it is in the public interest that this should be done. It may be necessary to have one commissioner; it may be necessary to have more. The government has not even discussed the question of the personnel of the commission. My right hon. friend has asked: Shall he or they have power to go to England? If it be found in the early stages of the investigation in Canada that it is in the interest of the public that the commissioner or commissioners should go to England, he or they should have the power to do so in order that the people of Canada may have the fullest information as regards this the greatest undertaking which the Canadian people have ever had on their hands.

The government had first thought of a Parliamentary committee; but they are unanimously of opinion that owing to the lateness of the session and the peculiar conditions surrounding this tranfer, the interests of the public would be better and more speedily served by having a royal commission.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Can the minister tell us why this matter has been covered up, so to speak, since 1919, over three years? Is it that it was left to a member of the Farmers' party to bring this thing to light? I am sure it would be appreciated by the members of this party and the people of the country if the minister could give us some light on that point.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I might be permitted, I am not sure that the Farmers' party has brought much light to the subject. The light was forced upon it. The question that was asked was whether the gratuities were given in perfect order to Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell; but having just received other information, I thought it was wise that parliament should have that also. I am glad my hon. friend brought this matter up. As regards Mr. Hanna, it is well known that it is the custom of large railway corporations to give gratuities or superannuations to old and tried employees. The House will pardon me if I point out that the situation in Mr. Hanna's case was delicate, and that Mr. Hanna coincided and fell in line with what was done as explained to him by the late Minister of Railways. Let me say this on behalf of Mr. Hanna. Mr. Hanna was not retired because he is not an able man. The government thought—and I am free to confess that as the days and weeks and months have gone on that the judgment was sound—that it would be next to impossible, for reasons that I need not explain, to amalgamate these two great systems with the head of either one at the head of the amalgamated system. I can assure the House that the difficulties that have arisen day by bay in welding together these two systems with the official staff of each, have convinced me that it would have been practically impossible to have done this with the head of either one of the separate systems at the head of the amalgamated system. Mr. Hanna, understanding the situation, sent in his resignation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the right to speak again, so I shall have to put this in the form of a question.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that I have the right either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister wish to intimate to the House that Mr. Hanna acquiesced in the resignation; that it was not a virtual dismissal of Mr. Hanna? If so, will the minister undertake to bring down the correspondence in connection with Mr. Hanna's resignation?

Mr. GRAHAM: Any correspondence that is public, parliament has a right to have at any time it wants it. I do not know whether there was any correspondence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, there was.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking only from what I know. If the leader of the Opposition has other information, he can give it to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have none that the minister has not.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking from the facts as I understand them. Mr. Hanna resigned, and Mr. Hanna, from that day to this, has acted in connection with the Canadian National Railways, as a man who is interested in the success of that system. There was no superannuation in the old Canadian Northern. Had Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell retired without some consideration, they would therefore have had no benefit of any superannuation. For the benefit, however, of the railway men, something of that kind will be established before very long. It will be remembered that the late Minister or Railways himself, in speaking in this House last year, informed the members of parliament and the country that when any of these old and tried officials were retired, they would have the benefit of superannuation. I imagine he had in mind at that time, not exactly superannuation, but that they would be treated generously. There is nothing secret about the gratuities handed to Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell. This was done publicly, wide open. The late board of directors did not act in any underhand way in connection with this matter. When they decided to do this, I knew they were going to do it, and I informed the government. So the circumstances are altogether different, and I am prepared to say that the gratuities given to Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell, under all the circumstances, were not more than those to which they were entitled. The country from a practical standpoint is the gainer instead of the loser by the generous treatment accorded these two officials, as any hon. gentleman would admit had he been in the Railway department or been associated with the railway amalgamation during the last six months.

As regards the question asked by my hon friend, as to why the matter of the other gratituties was kept hidden, I do not know that there has been any effort to conceal it. The facts are in the minutes of the old Grand Trunk Company, although as a matter of fact they did not come to the notice of the department until a few weeks ago. They are, however, recorded in the minutes of the old Grand Trunk Company in London, and it may be that the board of arbitration took recognizance of these gratuities and other expenditures when making the award. That being the case, it is all the more necessary that we should have an independent commissioner or body of commissioners to place all the facts before us so that the air may be cleared and we may start the new year knowing just where we are at.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the reference which will be made to the commission include the letter published a day or two ago by certain officials who did receive gratuities of this kind from the Grand Trunk and who are now in the service of the National Railways?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Certain gratuities were given by the Grand Trunk directors to employees who are still in the service of the Canadian National Railways. Are these men going to be allowed to keep these gratuities, or will there be a refund of the amounts paid to them? Will they be told whether it is right or wrong for them to keep the money seeing that they have not lost their positions? What is going to be done in the matter?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has not seen the morning papers.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We do not always believe what is in the morning papers.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may be wise.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We would sooner have a statement from the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those gentlemen who were given these gratuities under the impression that they were a gift from the shareholders for services they had rendered, when they discovered the peculiar conditions under which the money was given and the source from which the funds had come, informed the president of the Canadian National Railways that they would refund every cent they had received. That is a brief answer but I think it is a complete statement of the case.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I wanted to know whether the letter written a few days ago would be referred to the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Everything in connection with the gratuities will be placed before the commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed these various questions, on the assumption that there was no objection on the part of the House, because the matter is one of considerable importance. But I must remind hon. members that this free discussion is irregular as the House is not yet in committee. There is a motion before the Chair, and hon. members will have an opportunity to discuss the subject fully when the House is in Committee of Supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that everything has been regular until this moment, for I admit that my rising now is out of order. I would ask that no objection be raised to my speaking on the subject at this stage; otherwise I should not have the right to proceed. I have only one word to say. My own view of the action of the board I have already made public. I consider the action of the old Grand Trunk board as wholly indefensible from every standpoint. It was the taking advantage of an interregnum, which could not be avoided, between the date as of which the valuation was to be made and the date of the government's possession, and that advantage was taken for the benefit of themselves and of those of their staff to whom they wished to proffer favour, and at the ultimate expense of the people of this country, for whom they were not trustees. While it may be that some thought was given to the fact of the gratuity by the board of arbitration, I am of the opinion that, as the date as of which the value was to be fixed was prior to the grant, the board was not legally competent to take into account the facts of the grant. That makes all the more reprehensible the conduct of the board of directors. But that done, I do not see what there is to inquire into beyond possibly some legal phase which the Justice department is amply competent to deal with. I do not myself know whether the government can have any doubts as to the legality of the grants, but if it has such doubts the Justice department can deal with the matter. There is nothing in the world mysterious about it. The facts are all in the government's possession. The company is in the government's possession, and the records, the minutes and everything else are all there. There is nothing in the way of fact that remains disputed or that would remain disputed if looked into by an officer of the Justice department, without any powers under the Inquiries Act at all. So much for that. Now, if the government is doubtful as to whether or not someone else got money that is not yet revealed, that will all appear from the auditor's report which is in the government's possession. For the life of me, therefore, I see no reason for a royal commission, except the reason that is only too often in evidence, namely, for the benefit of the royal commission rather than of the country.

4 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Labour—salaries, contingencies, $277,235.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From what I can glean from the estimates, the Minister of Labour has been called upon to so contract, if not to demolish his department, as to make up for the extravagance of many of the others. In the process, though, it appears he is going to remove—according to report—his deputy minister, and put him in the position of King's Printer, a position for which I suppose he knows as little as any living man and in respect of which he has had no experience at all. He has had, I should say from memory, about fifteen years' experience as Deputy Minister of Labour. He is to go in, as I understand it—if I am wrong I hope the minister will correct me—over the present Director of Printing, who is by trade and by experience, a qualified printing man, making two directors of printing at salaries of about $6,000 and about $5,000 respectively. I presume the minister contemplates then bringing someone else in as Deputy Minister of Labour. Is that information correct, and if not, what is the minister's intention as to changing the personnel of his department and of the Printing bureau?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The Deputy Minister of Labour for some years past, having been appointed as such by the late government, has been King's Printer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Deputy Minister of Labour was appointed by the Laurier government not by the late government. Recently the duties of King's Printer were added to his duties.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend misunderstood me. I will repeat: The Deputy Minister of Labour has been for some time the King's Printer. He was appointed by the late government as King's Printer, and he has since been nominally filling the position, so far as the statute requires.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows that the position is only nominal; in fact he himself used the word "nominal." The real head of the Printing bureau has been Mr. Draper.

Mr. MURDOCK: The word "nominal" applies more specifically to the question of salary. Mr. Acland has received no salary as King's Printer. There is now a proposal before the committee in the civil government estimates of the Printing bureau to have the King's Printer paid a salary. As to who is to be deputy minister and who is to be King's Printer, that matter has not been decided. What my right hon. friend has seen in the press is largely, if not entirely, supposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But something must be intended, because heretofore the organization has been this: The late government abolished the separate position of King's Printer and the separate salary for it, but as the statute provided for a King's Printer, the Deputy Minister of Labour was nominated as such. He had, of course, only the one salary, $6,000. Mr. Acland has been Deputy Minister of Labour since some time in the regime of the Laurier administration. Mr. Draper was the active head of the Printing bureau, with the title of Director of Printing. Now the minister proposes to give a salary to the King's Printer. He certainly does not intend that the present Deputy Minister of Labour shall draw two salaries. Is he going to make somebody else King's Printer, and if so how does he justify providing an additional salary of $6,000 when the work is being satisfactorily done under the present arrangement? If he intends to have that as the salary of Mr. Acland, then he should tell us, so that we may know what he purposes doing. Does he intend to bring in some new man to take the post of Deputy Minister of Labour?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend why, if Mr. Draper was the head of the department, his government did not make him King's Printer? Why did they make Mr. Acland King's Printer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we saved some money by it, and I think that should be quite sufficient. We would have had to give him $6,000 if we made him King's Printer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was that the reason?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not aware that there was any other. Senator Roberston was Minister of Labour; he would know. Anyway, the work has been done all right under that arrangement. It is now proposed to add another $6,000 to the expenditure. What is the reason and what is the intention to justify that?

Mr. MURDOCK: As to the saving suggested by my right hon. friend, he will admit that there was an additional expenditure of something like $8,400 or $9,000 a year for an editorial committee, the functions of which should normally and consistently be carried out by the King's Printer. I was sorry indeed to hear my right hon. friend suggest a lack of experience on the part of the Deputy Minister of Labour. Does my right hon. friend not know that the Deputy Minister of Labour has had an experience of thirty years as a printer, as well as in editorial and publishing work? Does he not know that the deputy minister came to the department a number of years ago with a splendid experience in these capacities?

Mr MEIGHEN: As a printer?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. I am quite sure of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has been an editor; I never knew he was a printer.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am quite sure of it. As a matter of fact, the law provides that he could not be considered as King's Printer unless he were. But the question as to what arrangement is to be made, I can truthfully tell my right hon. friend, has not been decided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is intended to put Mr. Acland in as King's Printer?.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Acland, as I have said, was appointed by my right hon. friend's government as King's Printer. Whether that arrangement will be changed I cannot say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the minister is asking for $6,000 more.

Mr. MURDOCK: For a King's Printer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then if he puts Mr. Acland there he intends to pay him $6,000 extra; that is, he intends to pay him $12,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MURDOCK: Would my right hon. friend object if Mr. Acland continued as Deputy Minister of Labour, a position he has so ably filled for a number of years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. MURDOCK: Well, is there anything in these civil government estimates to indicate that that is not going to be the case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly there is. An extra $6,000 is asked for.

Mr. MURDOCK: For a King's Printer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister cannot get away from it; he must tell us what his intention is. He may not have decided upon the names, but he must tell us whether he intends to have a King's Printer and a separate Deputy Minister of Labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: I thought I had stated that on several occasions. Most certainly that is the proposal that is before the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he does not know whether or not he will put Mr. Acland in as King's Printer?

Mr. MURDOCK: That will be a matter for consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us how the department has suffered by the saving of this $6,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would not be before the committee for a moment with a proposal for increased expenditure. On the contrary, I think it can be shown that a decreased expenditure is proposed. Hon. members will note that there is no provision in the estimates this year to continue the Editorial Committee. It is believed that the business-like arrangement of maintaining timely supervision over government publications could be very well co-ordinated and regarded as part of the duties of the King's Printer, and that the King's Printer, if properly qualified to perform the functions of King's Printer as defined in the law, could do the work in a supervisory way, or a large portion of it, that is now performed by the Editorial Committee. So in the final analysis, and having regard to the Editorial Committee, which I hope my hon. friends will bear in mind, there is no increase contemplated whatever in this particular item. There appears to be a slight increase when you come to create an entirely new position, but my right hon. friend I am sure will take into consideration the various rearrangements that have been made, as a result of which a considerable number of positions have been eliminated entirely

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's long explanation amounts really to this: He purposes that the new King's Printer, whoever he may be, will do the work of the Editorial Committee.

Mr. MURDOCK: Partly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the only thing he said in the course of his long sentence round. Well now, that is to be examined into. Is the King's Printer really going to do the work of the Editorial Committee? The Editorial Committee was appointed about four years ago, I think. It was a committee representative of the different classes of departments and of men intimately associated with all the printing work of each. Because it was representative of the various departments and of officers of them, and particularly of the experienced men in that line, it carried an authority with it toward which all bowed, and as a consequence that Editorial Committee succeeded in reducing the printing liabilities of the country by very many hundreds of thousands of dollars. I think I would have been safe in saying millions of dollars, but undoubtedly I would be safe in saying over one million dollars.

The minister shakes his head. Has the minister the report of the committee there? I think he has likely heard of the work of the committee through some poisoned channel. Of the work of that committee I have some knowledge myself. I had to do with its appointment. If there has been one source of waste in the administration of this country more prolific and more persistent than another, it has been the constant printing at the behest of ambitious officers of various departments who want everything in which they are interested and everything they do scattered to the length and breadth of the world so long as it is at the country's expense.

Mr VIEN: Is the hon. member aware that most of the saving came from the elimination of the French publications?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not aware of that, and I am quite confident it is not the fact. I have no doubt there would be saving there, and I have no doubt there would be equal saving and far more, in the English publications. I never saw it divided, and I never took the slightest interest in the division. The question was whether the country was getting any return for the printing, and if the country was not, the instructions of the committee were to eliminate, to cut it down, not so that there would be any curtailment of printing in anything so long as there was appreciation of it, so long as there were those who were going to read it, but to prevent the piling and stacking in heaps in all corners of these buildings of blue books and government publications which no one looked at from one year's end to another or from one decade to another. The Editorial Committee set to work at that. At first it was under cabinet supervision, I think. I am not quite certain of that, but I know that it did report to the cabinet. Its work was thoroughly reviewed, any objections made were taken into account, and very great savings were made to the country as a result of that committee's work.

Now if that can be done by a deputy minister known as the King's Printer, all well and good; but in my judgment it cannot, and I will say why. We have had a King's Printer ever since we have had a country, or since very shortly afterward, and that was the duty of the King's Printer, but that duty he never performed. He never had sufficient authority to perform it. He had not that authority spreading over the other departments that a representative committee would have, and as a consequence we had the waste going on year after year. We never had the curtailment. The minister will find just the same result if he reverts to the old system. It depends, of course, in some degree who the King's Printer is; that is true, but get the best King's Printer he will, and that King's Printer will be stampeded and the old waste will be revived. I think he should have a representative committee, and he should have that committee in such association with the cabinet that its decisions will carry weight, or he is simply going to go back down the hill that we have been travelling up for these last few years.

Mr. GOOD: I understand the late editor of the Labour Gazette is going to be dismissed. May I ask who is going to take over his duties?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Deputy Minister of Labour is editor of the Labour Gazette. He has an assistant deputy minister, who is also associated with the deputy in the editorship of the Labour Gazette. While there was a gentleman classified as editor, it was thought that the duties could be properly performed by the Deputy Minister of Labour and his assistant deputy, and in that way save the salary of a special individual acting as editor.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask if the person mentioned here as deputy minister drawing this $6,000 is to be paid henceforth out of the money appropriated for the Printing bureau?

Mr. MURDOCK: No. There are civil government estimates for the Labour department, and separate estimates for the Printing bureau. If my hon. friend will look at page 84 of the estimates, he will find the Department of Labour civil government estimates above, and below that the estimates for the Printing and Stationery branch.

Mr. BOYS: I notice that in last year's list there was a total of 124 employees. That number has been reduced to 97, a reduction of 27. Would the minister tell us whether the services of these men have been dispensed with, or have they merely been transferred from this department to some other?

Mr. MURDOCK: Ten statistical clerks were transferred from this department to the Bureau of Statistics several months ago. They had been carried on the Labour department payroll and paid out of the Labour appropriation, but having regard to the discussion in the House last year, and particularly to the remarks of the then leader of the Progressive party, arrangements were made to transfer these ten clerks to the Bureau of Statistics. In many cases the positions were not required. There were seven rather important positions in that class. Then there have been other rearrangements, and as a result of all these changes it has been possible to reduce the permanent staff from 124 to 97, as my hon. friend says.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says that seven are not required. Not required by this department, for which reason they have been relieved entirely of their duties?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: And not transferred to any other department?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. BOYS: Then the actual change in employees so far as the government is concerned is seven?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh, no.

Mr. BOYS: So far as the government is concerned, I say, not the department.

Mr. MURDOCK: All of the 27 except the ten who were transferred would be out of the service of the government.

Mr. BOYS: I thought the minister said they were transferred.

Mr. MURDOCK: Ten were transferred, and the services of the others were dispensed with.

Mr. BOYS: Is it correct then to say that seventeen have been relieved of office and are not in the service of the government in any department?

Mr. MURDOCK: Some of those seventeen may have found positions elsewhere; if not it is a great misfortune. A number of them are very valuable employees; but it is unfortunate that in the government service it is not always open to us to transfer a known and capable employee from one department to another excepting under certain restrictions.

Mr. BOYS: I am not criticizing the minister at all; I merely want to get the facts. I cannot say that I am at all sure of them yet. The minister says that some of these employees may have secured other positions. All may have done so as far as that is concerned. I was trying to find out if the minister can tell me—if he cannot I will have to be satisfied—whether any of these seventeen employees have found positions elsewhere.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is no desire on my part to be in any way evasive. We are trying to do all we can to assist in having some of these employees transferred to other departments. A number of these cases are under consideration in the hope that that can properly be done, but so far as the Labour department are concerned these men are through there and are under retiring allowance, whatever it may amount to.

Mr. BOYS: Were any of these seventeen permanent employees?

Mr. MURDOCK: They were all permanent. In addition there were a great number of temporaries whose services have also been discontinued.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the minister will refer to page 35 of the reprinted civil government estimates he will find that the number of employees last year is represented as 124. Now, I have under my hand last year's estimates and the total number of employees given there is 117. Will the minister be kind enough to explain how the discrepancy occurs?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am glad my hon. friend asked that question. Last year when these estimates were before the House the Annuities branch was not in the Labour department. A little later that branch, having a total of thirteen employees—one of whom resigned—was transferred to the department under my control. The estimates presented this year make provision for the employees of the Labour department and the Annuities branch, and the reduced figure of 97 shows the number of employees in the two branches as consolidated.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The explanation of the minister means that last year, under the appropriation granted by the House, he was entitled to employ 117 persons but actually employed 124. I think it would only have been fair for him to have so stated in his estimates for this year. Instead of taking credit for a reduction from 124, the reduction should be from 117 to the lower figure. I might also point out to the minister that under last year's estimates he was granted $195,000 and he spent in the department something like $202,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not altogether clear as to what information my hon. friend wants; I do not know what particular thing I am being criticized for just now. I will be glad indeed to give my hon. friends any information possible if they will only let me know precisely what they want.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the minister explain how he has been able to reduce the staff by twenty-seven?

Mr. MURDOCK: First of all there were ten employees transferred to the Statistical department. It was contended, I think, last year by the leader of the Progressive party, and by a number of other hon. gentlemen that the Statistical department should, as far as possible, have charge of the compilation of all government statistics. That arrangement was carried out and ten employees were transferred from the Labour department to the Bureau of Statistics. Then during the year the director of the employment service of Canada resigned rather hurriedly and left for another and better paying position. At that time we had two superintendents of the federal employment service. We believed that one superintendent was amply sufficient and that for the future the director of employment service could discharge the duties of one of these superintendents. There were a number of other positions which we thought could very well be eliminated. For instance, we had five fair wage investigators and we found that with the adoption of a very definite fair wage policy—which was agreed to by all the departments of the government as the proper thing to carry out—it was unnecessary to have as many as five fair wage investigators looking into these matters, that three such officers would answer for the next fiscal year. Accordingly the services of two fair wage investigators were dispensed with. Then we had what is known as an employment specialist. A very capable individual filled this position, and he was also known as the juvenile employment specialist. Our opinion was that if the federal government's activities were properly regulated no need existed for an employment specialist, and so it was decided to discontinue the position. At a former sitting I explained to the committee what happened in the matter of the editor of the Labour Gazette; we concluded that the duties of this office could very well be handled by the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister. Furthermore, in the case of two clearance officers in connection with our employment service—one at Ottawa and one at Halifax—it was thought that these two positions could very well be discontinued and the work formerly attaching to them handled by the director of employment service, the superintendent and the remaining staff of the employment service. Again, we had a publicity agent. Some hon. gentlemen asked me last year what the publicity agent was for. I did not know then and I do not know yet. We decided that we could get along without a publicity agent. And so I might go on in the case of a number of other positions of minor importance. In all these changes in the staff an effort has been made to see that no part of the work, or the functions, of the Labour department, would suffer in any way. We have taken the stand that an employee not very busy in a particular position for the time being, might properly be called upon to help out in some other office, and in pursuance of that policy the reductions in the staff have been made as I have indicated.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I want to go back to the question I asked the minister a few minutes ago. He did not give a very clear answer to my question. There were last year, when the estimates were passed, 117 employees in this branch, with an expenditure of $195,000. I find, on referring to the second column of the present estimates, the figures now read 124, and the amount for the service is $203,000. I would like to know how the employees came to be added.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have before me a memo in which the matter is very clearly outlined, and which I shall read:

> Two points must be specially borne in mind in considering the civil government estimates for 1923-24 and comparing them with those for 1922-23: (1) the reduction by $15,000 made by parliament in the estimates as submitted, and (2) the addition to the department from the beginning of the fiscal year 1922-23 of the Annuities branch, though the figures for this branch were not included in the printed estimates for the Department of Labour for 1922-23. The civil government figures for 1922-23 as submitted by the minister provided for 117 positions at a cost of $195,040. In addition an estimate for the Annuities branch, at that time associated with the Post Office Department, provided for 13 positions at a cost of $22,320 a total of $217,360. The estimates of the department were reduced by $15,000 and the total voted for the department including the Annuities branch, thus became $202,360. Similarly as to numbers of positions, the positions in the Department of Labour estimate numbered 117, and those in the Annuities branch estimate numbered 13, a total of 130. Owing, however, to the $15,000 reduction in the estimates it became necessary to abandon 6 positions intended for purposes of adjustment, etc., and the salaries for which totalled somewhat less than the figure named, thus leaving at 124 the number of positions actually provided for in the estimates of 1922-23.

Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister explained by a process of elimination how he got rid of seven employees. If he would continue that process of elimination I wonder if he could successfully do away with the Labour department entirely, and have these matters dealt with by some other department of the government, and thereby save the country a considerable sum of money. For instance, one official who has been eliminated is the employment specialist who is, perhaps, one of the most important officials of the Labour department. It might be wise to re-establish that one particular individual and do away with all the other departments of the Labour administration.

Mr. MURDOCK: In answer to my hon. friend I would say no, I do not think we can do away with the Labour department entirely. I would oppose any movement of that kind just as strongly as my hon. friend would. Referring to the employment specialist, I would be very glad indeed to have my hon. friend from Calgary come to the Labour department some time and show me wherein we could properly, under any existing regulations, utilize the services of such a valued employee. The chief functions of this employment specialist, as I understood, were to secure the names of various individuals graduating from the different colleges of Canada, with a view to placing them in positions of responsibility and proper remuneration after they had graduated. I do not know whether it is intended that we should pay out the money voted by parliament for employment service purposes in that way, and there did not appear to be any opportunity for us to utilize, in accordance with what we understood to be the requirements of parliament, or of continuing to utilize, the services of this very valuable and capable employee. There was simply no work of importance, as my hon. friend can ascertain if he cares to do so, being accomplished by him so far as I know, in that particular branch.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister has just told us of 27 men that were let out from the Labour department. Would it not have been wise to have used this employment specialist first of all to find employment for those 27 men, and then engage him to find work for all the rest of the unemployed now in Canada?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Will the minister tell the committee just what services the employment officers have been rendering to the country, and how he is decreasing that service, and why?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will understand that employment service in the various provinces is under the direction and control of the provincial governments. They open the offices and appoint the employees. They are in charge, but they enter into an agreement with the federal government whereby we pay not more than 50 per cent of the cost of handling those employment offices in the various provinces, and in that work it is necessary for the Labour department to maintain a supervisory federal body, composed of a director of the employment service, in touch with all the provincial superintendents and officers to some extent, some 70 or more in Canada, and a superintendent of employment service, who is located at Winnipeg, and certain other officers and staff in different parts of Canada. But the employment service generally, as I think my hon. friend understands, is under the direction of the provincial government and we simply co-operate or maintain, shall I say, supervision over what is being done under certain regulations clearly set out and defined by order in council.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Any decrease, therefore, in that service is wholly done by the provincial administration?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have not a thing to do with the increases that the provincial governments might want to make in those offices. For example one hon. gentleman came to me the other day and wanted to know whether an office could not be opened in a certain specified town, and I said that was a matter we would have to take up with the provincial government. If they found an office was necessary, they would no doubt proceed to put one there, and if they did we would assume 50 per cent—not more than 50 per cent—of the cost of maintenance, they appointing those in charge of the particular office.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I notice the minister has here an item for purchasing agent. Are the purchases for the department being made through the Purchasing Commission?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is for the Printing bureau, and it comes a little further on. That is not in the Labour department.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Then are those purchases for the Printing bureau being made through the Purchasing Commission?

Mr. MURDOCK: That question was asked as to all departments of government, and I think an answer was laid on the Table today. I would prefer if my hon. friend would get the information from that answer, so that there would be no misunderstanding.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I notice there is in the estimates an account for a director of technical education. In view of the fact that the provincial governments are taking charge of technical education, why do we need this expenditure?

Mr. MURDOCK: For the reason, as my hon. friend, I am sure, will appreciate, that the federal government authorizes by statute the expenditure of $1,100,000 for the present fiscal year, and will do so for each fiscal year until 1929. The money is to be expended under certain regulations defined in the Technical Education Act, and we want to have somebody here who, on behalf of the federal government, will see that the various provinces are receiving their proportion of the money as a result of spending it in a proper way and in accordance with the act.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to say a word or two with regard to this estimate before it is passed. I do not think the Labour department is a labour department. The term is a misnomer; it should be called the Capitalistic department of the federal government. I gather that from the nature of the work it does and from the attitude of the minister himself. I would, of course, be the last to speak against a real labour department, if it undertook work in the interest of the labouring classes of this country, made an attempt to solve some of the economic problems and to meet some of the practical difficulties with which the labouring people are confronted. But as I understand the matter, I do not think there is any part of the work coming under this department that could not very well be put under some other department, and we could do away with this, at least under the name of a labour department. If we are going to continue it, it should be called the Capitalistic department of the government. If we are not going to continue it, it would be a good thing if we could expend the amount, nearly $1,500,000, in relief of unemployment or the colonization of some unemployed people on the land. That would be of far greater value to the labouring people of this country than the continuation of this department.

Mr. GOOD: I am not quite clear yet as to the duties of the deputy minister. I understand Mr. Acland is deputy minister at the present time, and it is proposed that he and the assistant deputy shall perform what duties they have performed in the past and also the editorial duties in connection with the Labour Gazette. I understand also that Mr. Acland is to assume some real responsibilities in the position of King's Printer which he has had nominally in the past. It would appear, therefore, that in respect to both the King's Printer's work and the Labour Gazette, these two gentlemen, the deputy minister and the assistant deputy, are to do very much more in the future than they have done in the past. Is that correct?

Mr. MURDOCK: There will, possibly, be slightly more to do, only to the extent, though, of the additional work, whatever that may amount to, that the editing of the Labour Gazette will place upon them. As a matter of fact, as the executive head and the assistant executive head of the department, they were required heretofore to be responsible for that work; they had to go over it; O.K, it, see that it was in proper form. It is thought that without any great additional hardship, that work can still be performed by the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister.

Mr. GOOD: The deputy minister is also to assume real duties in connection with the position of King's Printer. Is that right?

Mr. MURDOCK: No. We are asking parliament to provide for a King's Printer in fact, under salary, to devote his time to the work of King's Printer in a supervisory capacity as provided for in the law and as it may be necessary to provide for by order in council defining his duties, as I think was suggested by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) a little while ago. It is not intended that the one person shall handle the two positions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister mentioned, a moment ago, that he was saving money by abolishing the Editorial Committee. I do not know what money he refers to. The Editorial Committee was composed of officers of different departments. Mr. Lynch, of the Natural Resources branch, Interior department, Mr. Cook and Mr. Taché were the committee when I had to do with them directly. Mr. Taché having gone into the Library, somebody would take his place. They received no extra salary at all over what they were drawing in their respective positions. Any other expense—and I do not think there was a great deal—would be incidental to the work, no matter by whom it was done. Therefore, I do not see where the saving will come in, and this House will be confronted, year after year, with increased expenditures in this connection if the minister takes this view.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend will remember that the Editorial Committee had a separate office in a separate building, with a staff, and I think an expenditure of $8,400 was provided for last year. I do not want to be understood as saying that there is going to be an actual reduction. I do not know just how the proposed increased expenditure of $6,000 for a King's Printer will work out with the expenditure for rent, additional office space and staff that there has been in the past; but it is thought in the final analysis, there will be a real saving and a better business arrangement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be a saving only by neglecting the work. If the staff is necessary to the Editorial Committee, it will be necessary to the King's Printer for the same work. So, the only way in which money can be saved will be by neglecting the work—unless the staff is unnecessary. Thus, as far as any specific information goes, there is no saving at all; this is just an extra $6,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend agrees; in fact I have heard him say at different times, that it was not advisable to have members in one position in the Civil Service giving time to other work. This invariably results in these officers expecting extra remuneration for the services they give apart from their regular positions. As regards the Editorial Committee, the gentlemen who have been serving on it have made representations to the government that they should receive something in the way of additional remuneration for the services they have been rendering. It is unfair to expect any member of the Civil Service to devote all his regular time to the work of the department to which he has been appointed, and then to give extra time to the country without additional remuneration. It he has enough time to do other work than that for which he is regularly appointed, there is something wrong in the way in which government business is being carried on. We have been trying, in an effort to effect economies, to do away with this system of having officers of one department doing part of the work of another department. More than that, we have been trying to fix responsibility in a way that will, we trust, ensure more accurate and careful supervision. No better illustration could be taken than this very matter of the King's Printer. This is a most important branch of the public service. As my right hon. friend has said, ever since we have had a government service it has been thought necessary to have a King's Printer. Well, if that position has been required all along it stands to reason that the man who was to be held responsible as King's Printer should give his entire time to that work, it should not be left to the Deputy Minister of the Department of Labour or the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce or of any other department. A person who is filling any one of these positions is doing more than he can attend to properly if he gives his whole time to it. While my hon. friend was in office, for some reason best known to himself, it was decided to do away with a permanent deputy head as King's Printer who would be held responsible for the position, with all the duties that naturally go with the office of a deputy head, and with the salary attached to it. But the responsibility was left to an officer of another department who has ever since been responsible for the position of King's Printer. I think we ought to make it a separate position, where we can fix the responsibility and do away with this overlapping of different departments; and that is what the government has in view in the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot be expected to acquiesce when it is said that I have always been against an officer of one department having anything to do beyond the immediate duties assigned to him in that department. I am, however, opposed to officers getting extra remuneration under different designations for work done, whether within or outside of their particular departments. The salary an officer gets is paid to him for all his time to the country, and he ought to be prepared for that salary to do anything which the government feels he is fitted to do. There is some advantage to an officer in getting the opportunity of service such as comes to a man who goes on the Editorial Committee. It is first of all an indication that he is a man of special capacity. For example, Mr. Lynch was head of the Natural Resources branch of the Interior department. He was chosen by myself as the one officer of the whole Interior department most likely to render efficent service on the Editorial Committee. I knew something of his ability and the character of his work, and his designation gave him at least that additional status, so that in the event of promotion in the future his services there would be of great value to him. Mr. Lynch may have joined with the others in a request for more salary; most men are ready to do that. If he did so when I was there I opposed it, as I opposed the request, so far as all the rest were concerned. There are certain tasks that can be performed by representative committees better than by any single officer, no matter of what department, and these are tasks that appertain generally throughout the whole service and that affect the moneys spent in all. The fact is established, if by nothing else than the work of the Editorial Committee, that we have always had a King's Printer. But the work was never done. He never had the authority to carry it out, and only one minister was affected. When we appointed the Editorial Committee, gathered from the various departments, and brought that committee in direct contact with Council, we succeeded in getting the work done and saving the country hundreds of thousands of dollars. The minister thinks that the work is better done the other way, but I do not think he will save anything. He only takes a chance of its being done better, but I think the probabilities are that it will be done a lot worse. Rather, I should say, it will cease to be done at all.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend will understand that the government has given the matter a great deal of consideration and has decided that this will be the best plan. It is not just the personal position of the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That adds rather to my argument.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the duties of the director of employment service, and why is the salary for this office reduced?

Mr. MURDOCK: The following is the definition of this position as given by the Civil Service Commission's reclassification:

Under direction to have charge of employment service of the Department of Labour, to supervise operations of the provincial labour clearing houses and provincial employment offices, to co-operate with provincial employment services, to supervise expenditure of moneys voted by the Dominion government, and to perform other related work as required.

The salary is $320, $335, $355, per month graduated up. As I said some time ago, and as my hon. friend will recall, the director of employment service resigned on July 7th last, his resignation to be effective from the first day of August, and it was necessary to have another director appointed. The Civil Service Commission appointed one of the superintendents located at Winnipeg and brought him to Ottawa as director, and he receives the minimum salary for the first year. He will, of course, work up to the maximum.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do the duties of this position necessitate general travelling throughout the country?

Mr. MURDOCK: They do, considerably. Quite frequently this officer is required to take a trip to the West to inspect the office at Winnipeg and to get in touch with the superintendent of provincial employment service in each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia; and he also is required to visit the East. He makes these trips about once a year when he meets all the superintendents.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much was paid out last year in addition to salary in connection with this position?

Mr. MURDOCK: I cannot give that information at the moment but I can get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It would be just as well if we had that information, but we can pass this point for the moment. What are the duties of the superintendent of Dominion government annuities?

Mr. MURDOCK: I was going to quote the classification, but I find it is not here. The superintendent is in general charge of the handling of the Dominion Government Annuities branch. He maintains supervision over the office staff and determines under the regulations the functions of the branch. Briefly, without reference to the specific classification, those are his duties.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The increase is statutory?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. I may add that the salary was slightly increased within the last few months by the Civil Service Commission who considered the responsibilities of the office as entitling him to that increase.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Inasmuch as we have a Statistical branch, what is the need for a statistician in the minister's department? What is the need also for an annuities actuary and an actuarial assistant? It seems 5 p.m. as though the minister were running a big business, and I think he might take a leaf out of last year's book and reduce these estimates by another $15,000 or $20,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: The minister will give careful consideration to that suggestion, although I am sure that my hon. friend must have noted, from another quarter of the chamber, the view that I was cutting down to such an extent as to render the Labour department useless. I am not sure that my hon. friend is not right and that there can be further reductions without impeding the progress of the Labour department in any way whatever.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I certainly did not construe the remarks of the member for Calgary (Mr. Irvine) as the minister has construed them.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Was the work of the Dominion Government Annuities branch efficiently performed last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. I may say that several hon. members asked for information the other day respecting the Annuities branch which I could not answer at the time. I have the information now and I shall be glad to place it on record if the committee so desires.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The minister has stated that the staff of the Annuities branch has been reduced by practically fifty per cent, and that the work is nevertheless efficiently done. That would bear out the contention that has been made that the minister might well make staff reductions—or the committee might force him to make them, as it did last year—in certain other branches.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is only one less employee in the Annuities branch, due to one employee having left voluntarily.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Then I will have to ask the minister to explain all over again the answer that he gave to that question why the figure showing 124 for last year is not 130.

Mr. MURDOCK: The civil government estimates for 1922-23 provided for 117 positions in the Labour department at a cost of $195,040. In addition, the estimate for the Annuities branch, at that time associated with the Post Office Department, provided for 13 positions at a cost of $22,320, a total of $217,- 360. The estimates of the department were reduced by $15,000 in the committee, and the total voted, including the appropriation voted for the Annuities branch, thus became $202,-360. As to the number of positions, there were 117 in the Department of Labour and 13 in the Annuities branch, a total of 130. Owing, however, to the $15,000 reduction in the estimates it became necessary to abandon six positions in the Labour department—not in the Annuities branch—leaving the number at 124.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How many are employed in the Annuities branch now?

Mr. MURDOCK: Twelve.

Mr. CHAPLIN: On the fifth line of the details we have provision for "Superintendent, Dominion Government Annuities." A little further down we have "Annuities Actuary," and still further down we have an "Actuarial Assistant." It seems to me that there are three men doing practically the same work, and the minister, as he himself has suggested, might effect a saving there. Then we have a "Senior Wage Investigator;" two lines below there is provision for another wage investigator, and six lines down we have a "Junior Wage Investigator." It looks to me as if the minister might cut out one or two of these and save some money.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have already pointed out that last year we had five wage investigators; we have eliminated two, leaving three. My hon. friend may be right; we may be able next year to get along with two.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Are these men fully employed?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, the three are pretty well employed. The five were not altogether as fully employed as I thought they might be.

Mr. LADNER: This vote is quite a large one, and the point arises whether there is any correlation of activities between the Dominion Labour department and provincial departments of labour. I have specific reference to cases in British Columbia, particularly in South Vancouver, which would indicate that there was not always the degree of co-operation between the two that would seem to be possible.

Mr. MURDOCK: Our desire is to have as much co-operation as possible between provincial departments of labour and the federal government. The Progressive government in Alberta the other day decided upon the adoption of the fair wage provisions of the federal government as defined by our fair wage investigators; that is an indication of co-operation. Of course we cannot suggest to a provincial department that it do this or do that, but there is undoubtedly a certain amount of co-operation between federal and provincial labour departments.

Mr. LADNER: That is not exactly the information that I wanted. Is there any considered plan whereby the officials of the provincial labour departments meet in consultation with the officials of the federal Labour department so that they do not cover the same spheres of activity, and thereby the public, which after all bears the expense whether it is paid out of the federal or provincial treasuries, will get the maximum advantage with the minimum of expense?

Mr. MURDOCK: There have been various conferences held. For instance, we had a conference on the uniformity of labour legislation. Another conference was held here in Ottawa in September last. There is another conference proposed which I think will be held within the next couple of months. Then the director of the employment service of Canada meets with the superintendents of the provincial employment services and discusses ways and means for co-operating to the best advantage and for uniformity in carrying on the work of the employment service, So my hon. friend will see that there is consultation whenever there is any possibility for co-operation. Within the next day or two I might mention that two officers of the federal Labour department are going to a certain province for the purpose of discussing with the deputy minister and his assistant deputy and other officers certain matters of joint interest. That is the plan that is followed all the time so far as is possible.

Mr. IRVINE: Arising out of the explanation given by the minister I would like to ask if it has yet been decided whether the municipal, the provincial or Dominion authorities are responsible for the unemployment situation?

Mr. MURDOCK: There has been no change in that respect from the position taken by the federal government as outlined in the following telegram dated December 22, 1922, which was sent to the Premier of Manitoba. A similar telegram was sent on or about the same date to the Premier of British Columbia, and the same information was conveyed to the mayors of a number of western cities. The telegram reads in part:

With regard to the question of federal assistance to municipalities on the same basis as assistance was granted during the winter of last year or otherwise, it is necessary to state that neither the present federal administration nor, so far as can be gathered from the records on fyle, the late administration had at any time contemplated that the action taken during the last two years by way of relief to municipalities and in some cases to provincial governments on account of unorganized districts should be regarded as a precedent for federal participation in the responsibilities of municipal and provincial authorities, save under conditions comparable to those existing during the winters of nineteen twenty, twenty-one, and nineteen twenty-one, twenty-two, when, over the larger part of the Dominion, unemployment existed on a wholly unprecedented scale. Information reaching the federal government does not lead to the view that any situation exists at the present time which is at all comparable to that prevailing during the two last preceding winters, but is on the contrary to the effect that industrial conditions generally show great improvement and large sections of Canada are reaping the benefit of a harvest of unprecedented bounty. The situation, therefore, as it appears to the federal authorities, is not one which justifies action on their part in assuming at present any portion of the obligations falling customarily to the municipal and provincial authorities, and the conditions you indicate as existing in certain municipalities of your province cannot be regarded as ground for departing from this principle.

That was the position taken by this government on the 22nd of December last, and we have seen no reason whatever to change the view as then expressed.

Mr. IRVINE: If the government continues with its immigration policy as announced by the Minister of Immigration and the result next year is that we have increased unemployment because of it, will the present government now promise to assume responsibility for all such unemployed?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure that the present government will next winter take carefully into consideration the conditions which then exist, and certainly will not indicate by a promise now what it would do in advance.

Mr. IRVINE: I have another question. Is it the intention of the department to grant to the relief board at Calgary one-third of the amount, as the statute calls for, of the money expended on unemployed returned soldiers?

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that there is no body composed in Calgary properly qualified under the provisions of P.C. 220 to receive from the federal government any assistance in the relief which they may have expended during the present winter. That is my understanding of the situation in regard to Calgary.

Mr. LADNER: With reference to the telegram which the minister read, this is rather an important matter to the people of the various provinces, because they do not seem to be clear as to where the primary or constitutional responsibility rests with reference to the unemployment question. I would ask the minister if I state the policy of the government correctly when I say that they now take the position that primarily the handling of the unemployment question is a provincial matter and that until the situation gets of a nation-wide character the federal government, as a matter of policy, does not propose to deal with the problem. Is that a short statement of the position? The telegram is rather lengthy and not quite so specific.

Mr. MURDOCK: The position that was taken by the previous government and the position that has been taken by this government is that responsibility primarily rests with the municipalities and the provinces. There has been no variation from that position. In the telegram which I read a few moments ago it was indicated that during the two winters previous to this one there were abnormal conditions with unemployment general throughout the country, and under such conditions it was thought desirable and consistent that the federal government should come in a certain degree to the assistance of the municipalities and the provinces.

Mr. LADNER: That was a war problem, was it not? Detaching the question from the war, how would the minister regard it then?

Mr. MURDOCK: Detaching it from the conditions that existed during the two preceding winters, no matter what the condition was, no matter whether it was a post-war condition or brought about by some other cause, we can leave all that to one side. The position taken is that dealing with unemployment is primarily a matter of municipal and provincial concern, but during the last two winters unemployment reached such an acute stage, and was so generally prevalent all over the Dominion that it became absolutely necessary for the federal government, without committing itself to any such policy for the future, to come to the assistance of the municipalities and the provinces.

Mr. IRVINE: What court decided that the responsibility for dealing with unemployment fell upon the municipal and provincial authorities?

Mr. MURDOCK: The previous government so decided and enunciated the policy in order in council which it issued. This government did likewise on that particular point.

Mr. IRVINE: I am very sorry that the present government should have followed the previous administration in this or any other regard.

Mr. MURDOCK: We were more liberal. Owing to the abnormal conditions of unemployment which prevailed we were more generous in some of our allowances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to my hon. friend for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) I may say that the rights of the federal government and the provinces, as respects many important subjects, are determined by the British North America Act. The matter of property and civil rights, according to that act, is assigned to the provinces. The provinces have all along claimed, and I think rightly, that under that provision factory legislation, matters of employment, questions relating to master and servant and the like, come within their jurisdiction and not within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Such, in my opinion, is a sound and proper interpretation of that section of the act. If dealing with employment is part of the duty of the provinces, action regarding unemployment would also seem to fall within the same category. The view this government has taken has been that any such relief granted by it in the past has been by reason of a national emergency arising out of the war. Such aid was not given because of an obligation imposed upon the federal government by the British North America Act; it was to meet an emergency national in its character. Now the time has come when it is necessary to draw the line. I want to point out to my hon. friend—and I think it is well worth pointing out to hon. gentlemen as a whole—that during the period of the war the debt of the federal government was increased enormously; some two billions of dollars were added to the national debt, and this government has now to ask parliament for an appropriation of $140,000,000 to meet the interest on that debt alone. On the other hand the provinces, during the period of the war, added virtually nothing to their public debt as a consequence of that great struggle; the whole burden fell on the federal treasury which is now having difficulty in raising the money needed for the purposes of the nation. Moreover the provinces, or some of them at least, are beginning to have surpluses instead of deficits, and we feel, and I think the House will agree, that if this government is to be expected to carry out the obligations that clearly fall upon it we ought to tell the provinces that where they can reasonably find the means of dealing with those matters that come within their particular jurisdiction they should make an effort to do so.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. LADNER: The Prime Minister has furnished the information which I sought to get in my questions to the minister, namely, that the question of unemployment is primarily one that rests upon the provincial governments and that it is only under unusual conditions, such, for example, as those which arise out of war, that the federal government has any responsibility. So that we may assume from the statements of the Prime Minister and the minister that henceforth the attitude of the federal government on the question of unemployment will be a negative one excepting in cases of national emergency arising out of war—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: National emergency of any kind.

Mr. LADNER: I cannot conceive that there would be any other national emergency except such as stated, and therefore action on the part of the federal parliament would be confined to what I might call a war emergency. I get letters all the time from people saying, "Why don't you get after the government, they are not doing anything for unemployment?" I frankly confess that I agree with the attitude assumed by the government —that this is a provincial problem, not a federal problem; and the sooner the public learn where they stand the quicker they will be able to seek and enforce a remedy. I am therefore glad the Prime Minister has made this statement because it tends to make clear something which has been shrouded in mystery in the past. I presume that henceforth—excepting as regards situations growing out of war—we may conclude that the federal government has finished with the question of unemployment.

Mr. IRVINE: I appreciate the position of the federal government with regard to unemployment, and I am certainly glad that the Prime Minister has given us this explanation. We shall now, as provinces and municipalities, know that there is very little hope of expecting anything in the way of relief from the Dominion government except in extreme cases. However, I would like just to add this: While the Prime Minister has no doubt given us the proper interpretation of the act, nevertheless I would submit it is not a satisfactory one. If the act has been correctly interpreted by the Prime Minister I think it will have to be changed. For surely it is not fair that the Dominion government—possessing the power by its fiscal policy pretty well to regulate the industrial life of the country, and the power also by its immigration policies to flood this country with labour that cannot be employed —should pass on the unemployment burden to the provincial and municipal authorities. I would suggest that if this course is going to be continued the provinces be granted the right to map out their own tariff and immigration policies so as to be able to meet the emergency confronting them.

Mr. SHAW: I want to ask the minister a question in connection with a statement he made in answer to the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) about the refusal of his department, if such it be, to pay to the city of Calgary the sum of approximately $1,800 because, as he suggests, no proper body has been constituted in accordance with the provisions of Privy Council Order No. 220. I do not know what the terms of this order in council are, but I do know that the city of Calgary has a regularly constituted and responsible organization to deal with the matter of unemployment, and that there is a responsible official in charge of the office. Returned soldiers have received relief during the past winter to the amount of something over $5,000, and acting and relying on the previous attitude of the government, and the former governments, the city of Calgary had a right to expect that approximately $1,800 of that amount would be borne by the federal government. If a mere technicality stands in the way surely the minister is not going to take advantage of it in order to deprive the city of Calgary of this not inconsiderable amount which has been expended for the relief of returned soldiers. I would therefore like to know from the minister what limitations stand in the way of carrying out my suggestion and if the department proposes to rely upon those limitations or whether, regardless of non-compliance with the terms of the order in council referred to, an adequate amount will be placed in the Supplementary Estimates to cover this item.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will read Privy Council Order No. 220 to the committee, and then ask my hon. friend to suggest whether, in his judgment, the Minister of Labour—who is subject to criticism when he does not do things according to instructions—is permitted to recognize any bills of the kind presented by the city of Calgary.

Mr. SHAW: Is there any dispute as to whether or not the city of Calgary has properly expended this sum for unemployment?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, none whatever. The city of Calgary, in an orderly way and in due course, as it was necessary, and as the bills were presented, paid the amount without any federal grant, and thereby obviated the necessity of the Dominion government in any way, under order in council 220, coming to their assistance. This order No. 220 was not issued for the purpose of coming to the assistance of any municipality that accepted, dealt with and paid bills of the kind, but I still would like to read the order in council to my hon. friend as the point has been raised, and then ask him for his own version of it. The order in council reads:

> The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 30th January, 1923, from the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, submitting that, while employment conditions generally have improved since the winter of 1921-22, unemployment still exists, particularly in the larger centres of population, to an extent necessitating the provision of relief by municipalities and charitable organizations.
> The minister states that representations have been received indicating that certain of those reduced to a condition of distress in consequence of unemployment are former members of the Forces, including some suffering from disabilities which, although not attributable to war service, and therefore not pensionable, place the men concerned in most cases under a handicap in competing in the general labour market; such men not being, however, eligible to receive assistance extended by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to men whose disabilities are attributable to their services with the Forces during the war.
> Previous federal regulations with respect to federal co-operation with local authorities in the relief of unployment have properly emphasized the principle that the matter of caring for unemployed persons is fundamentally a responsibility of the local authorities, and that the federal authorities are justified in undertaking any share of the obligation arising only under abnormal conditions. It is, however, submitted that the situation above indicated is one which justified and requires federal action by way of co-operation in the relief of unemployed ex-service men of the class described.
> Information received shows that in certain municipalities central bodies, composed of representatives of the municipality and of the various charitable and veteran organizations, have been formed for the administration of relief to ex-service men unable to procure work and in necessitous circumstances, and such organizations are regarded as serving excellent purpose.
> The minister accordingly recommends that where any organization composed as above, has, since January 1st, 1923, made disbursements in relief of the necessities of ex-service men of the class indicated in paragraph 2 as above, the federal authorities will reimburse such relief bodies to the extent of one-third of such disbursements incurred since that date; provided that no grant shall be payable by the federal authorities save when the accounts submitted for payment have been approved by the Minister of Labour and Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment; the grants in question to be paid, the Minister of Labour concurring, from the appropriation for the relief of unemployment for the present fiscal year and administered under the authority of the Minister of Labour.

And it is duly signed. Therefore I call the attention of my hon. friend from Calgary to the fact that the $1,800 that he is interested in securing for the city of Calgary was paid by the municipality through its relief department alone, and without any consideration or recognition of this order in council, and it is only proper to say that I do not think that, by any stretch of imagination, sympathetic or otherwise, I could indicate that under this order in council the city of Calgary qualifies to be reimbursed the $1,800.

Mr. SHAW: The minister must certainly realize that, while the letter of the law has not perhaps been complied with the spirit of the law has been. Is it not possible for him, under those circumstances, to put in the supplementary estimates an amount sufficient to cover this particular item?

Mr. MURDOCK: Would my hon. friend be surprised to know that if I said yes, which I have no right to do, it would mean the presentation of bills very much greater in amount from various places from which we have not heard one word so far. Where it means $1,800 in the case of Calgary, I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that, in different parts of Canada, several thousand dollars would be claimed in the same way, although the money had been paid out in the ordinary course of business, and had been regarded having been properly paid by the relief departments of the various municipalities.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to point out that there is a slight difference between the case of Calgary and that of any other supposed case to which the minister has alluded. For instance, I inquired from the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment for his interpretation of this particular order in council which the Minister of Labour has just read, and according to the interpretation given me by the minister of the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, the federal government was liable for one-third of the amount of money expended by the relief board of Calgary. I communicated this information to Mr. H. B. Adshead, who is the administrator of the department of municipal service in Calgary. That statement was published in the public press and the people of Calgary had been relying on the government to recoup them that amount of money. So that there is a slight difference between this case and any supposed case that might come before the minister. Therefore I would urge the Minister of Labour to consider the appeal of Calgary in this regard, set aside what, after all, is only a technicality and grant this request.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Some time ago I asked the minister a question relative to the statistics of the department. I find, besides the names that I have mentioned, that there are 20 clerks in this department interested in the compilation of statistics. It seems to me that the minister can use the pooling method to great advantage there.

Mr. MURDOCK: Although a number of statistical clerks were transferred to the regular statistical department, it is still necessary, and has been held so, even by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics to have in the Labour department a considerable number of employees especially qualified to look after the compilation of labour statistics. It is for that purpose that a Statistical branch is still being maintained in the Labour department, and in that branch there are sixteen employees altogether.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I can count twenty. If the minister will look down the list, he will find one chief statistician, one head statistical clerk, three principal statistical clerks, a little further down he will find six senior statistical clerks. A little further down, eight statistical clerks, and still further down, one junior statistical clerk, making in all twenty.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is quite right. There is the Statistical branch for the purpose of compiling labour organization figures and matters in connection with that. Then there is the Employment Service branch which has also certain statistical clerk employees, and which deals with the compilation of figures that we receive from the various provinces. Thus, there are two branches of the Labour department, a Statistical branch and an Employment Service branch, in which there are a number of statistical clerks, compiling and handling figures that we could not get, I understand, through the regular statistical department of the government under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What are the special matters referring to labour for which these statistics are being compiled?

Mr. MURDOCK: Hours of employment, wage rates, cost of living in its various classifications, rentals which have an important bearing on the cost of living and all such items as that. These are all matters that it has been regarded as necessary to maintain as reasonably as possible accurate figures on.

Mr. BOYS: Possibly this question would come more appropriately at this moment. What I was going to ask was about the Annuities branch information that the minister was kind enough to offer about half an hour ago and which was asked for before the Easter recess.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have just got the information that I think was asked for from several sections of the House the other night.

From the 1st September, 1908, the date of the inception of the Annuities branch, up to and inclusive of the 31st March, 1923, the total number of annuity contracts issued was 5,643. Of the purchasers of these contracts, 513 have been removed by death, leaving in force on the 31st March ultimo, 5,130 contracts. The total amount of purchase money received during the same period was $6,688,760.19. The following statement gives the details:

Sept. 1,—March 31,	Number of Annuitants	Purchase money
1908 to 1909..	66	$ 50,391 32
March 31,—March 31,
1909 to 1910..	566	434,490 89
1910 to 1911..	1,069	393,441 40
1911 to 1912..	1,032	441,600 60
1912 to 1913..	373	417,136 10
1913 to 1914..	318	390,886 71
1914 to 1915..	264	314,459 29
1915 to 1916..	325	441,696 09
1916 to 1917..	285	432,272 40
1917 to 1918..	187	332,792 01
1918 to 1919..	147	322,154 23
1919 to 1920..	204	408,718 78
1920 to 1921..	195	531,800 45
1921 to 1922..	277	748,159 73
1922 to 1923..	335	1,028,760 19
Total..	5,643	$6,688,760 19

For a portion of the years 1909, 1910, 1911 and prior to 31st March, 1912, twelve lecturers or outside representatives, six in Ontario, three in Quebec, two in New Brunswick and one in Nova Scotia, were employed.

Mr. BOYS: Could the minister say what proportion of that money was received upon a 3 per cent basis, what proportion upon a 4 per cent basis, and what the disbursements were for the same periods?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am afraid I could not give my hon. friend that information. I could get it, of course, but I do not have it here.

Mr. BOYS: Can the minister give the total receipts and total disbursements irrespective of the variation in the 3 and 4 per cent calculations?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have the occupations of the various annuitants, covering 176 occupations, and then certain other information in answer to questions asked the other night, but I have not the information for which my hon. friend now asks. My recollection is that the 4 per cent basis was adopted about 1911. Prior to that time the basis, I think from recollection, was 3 per cent. It started off at 3 per cent.

Mr. BOYS: The minister will appreciate why I want the information. As I understand the matter, when this venture was started, there was no thought of making money, and after the experiment for, perhaps, three years on a 3 per cent basis, the calculation was then made on a 4 per cent basis. I was rather anxious to find out what the experience of the department had been on the 4 per cent basis, whether or not considerable money had been made, and if so, whether or not we might in the near future, perhaps, get on a 5 per cent basis, which, I understood, when we were considering the matter before the Easter recess, the minister said was under consideration. I should think the manifest way of reaching a conclusion would be to see what the receipts and the disbursements were, now that the scheme has been in operation for a sufficient length of time, in order to get down to a working basis.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will get that information for my hon. friend. He will have noticed that in 1910 there were only 566 contracts, the number in 1911 being 1,069, in the following year 1,032 and in 1913, 373.

Mr. BOYS: The decline was due to lack of publicity.

Mr. MURDOCK: Lack of publicity and information.

Mr. BOYS: I do not desire to delay the item. I do not know whether the House generally wants the information but I should like to have it myself, and if the minister can promise to let me have it I do not care whether I get it privately or in the House.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will get that information. I appreciate the interest my hon. friend has shown in the matter, because I think it is worth boosting.

Mr. SHAW: I did not gather from the minister whether or not he has given a definite refusal to the claim of the city of Calgary, or whether he is prepared to reconsider the position already taken.

Mr. MURDOCK: My recollection is that a letter was forwarded to Calgary stating that they were not within the law. Of course, that being the case, I would not have the authority as Minister of Labour to reverse the decision, although I would not for a moment suggest that there could be no possibility of reversing it. The decision was based on the circumstances, and the money was expended by the city of Calgary without any drawback from the federal government under any regulations in effect. They were so informed, and that is the situation.

Mr. SHAW: I take it then that the minister definitely refuses, either under order in council or by way of supplementary estimates, to make provision for that amount.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure my hon. friend would not want to put me in the position of definitely refusing to determine what the government shall do. If he so desires, I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the government his specific claim on behalf of Calgary, which in effect is just the same as might be made by many other municipalities throughout Canada. If he wants me to do so I will promise to ask the government to say whether the claim on behalf of the city of Calgary for $1,800 shall be reconsidered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister says that one feature of the statistics that are being compiled relates to the cost of living. I would infer from the discussion that took place a few nights ago that a good deal of the information is sent in from those who are paid a very small sum in outlying districts. During the war, I believe, it was required of those handling meat and produce of all kinds to file a monthly statement with the department regarding the prices at which these commodities were being sold. Is this practice still in vogue, or has this matter been turned over to the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. MURDOCK: The duties of the statistical branch relate, first, to prices and the cost of living; secondly, to wages and hours of labour, including industrial agreements; and thirdly, to strikes and lockouts. With regard to the first, there is published, monthly, information concerning retail and wholesale prices in Canada and other countries; and so far as wages and hours of labour are concerned, there appears monthly in the Labour Gazette a summary analysis of recent industrial agreements, schedules of wages, and so forth; and information is also given as to strikes and lockouts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I want information with regard to the cost of food products. Does this matter still come within the scope of the Department of Labour? I have a list of articles which those who handle these commodities are asked to fill in monthly, along with a solemn declaration as to the correctness of the report. I am raising this matter because a lot of the questions which have to be answered are absurd. There are 24 articles mentioned in the list devoted to fish of various kinds, 5 to butter, 8 to pork, and so on. One of the questions refers to beef roast from the fore quarter. A statement is required in regard to this matter and I have often wondered why it was called for. The price must be stated of roast from the fore quarter of veal but from no other part of the animal; and the same thing applies to mutton leg roast from the hind quarter. There must be a report as to the prices of these parts of the animals. What is the object in singling out these two particular parts for the purposes of the report? With regard to beef also there are five different qualities dealt with, and you can understand how absolutely impossible it would be for a retail merchant, a butcher or any one else to make a statement that would be in any degree accurate. It might have been necessary at one stage of the war to require these things, but I do not believe that the people who drafted these questions had any fair idea of just what they were trying to get at. No matter how many clerks you may have in this branch, it is absolutely impossible to make a report that would be of any value considering the nature of the 61 questions which are contained in this list.

Mr. MURDOCK: Is that a Labour department form that my hon. friend is referring to?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. MURDOCK: That has nothing to do with my department, although I believe that some information of the kind goes to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I do not think that information is collected by the Department of Labour, but we probably get from the Bureau of Statistics an analysis of the results that may be secured through this questionnaire.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The information sent out through the Labour Gazette is compiled from the statistics arrived at in this way.

Mr. MURDOCK: The department maintains also some 60 or more correspondents to check up on the figures obtained in the various towns.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see by the statistics which the Professor of Economics of McMaster University has been compiling for some years, that the cost of living has been rising for several months now. Is that the same verdict as the officers of the department find?

Mr. MURDOCK: The figures of the Labour department are in evidence for my right hon. friend to see. I do not recall what they show.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not so interested on this subject as he was a year and a half ago.

Mr. MURDOCK: He is yet quite as interested.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not know what the results of his own department are as to the cost of living. I was asking whether the department's figures agreed in tendency with those of the Professor of Economics of McMaster University showing an increase in the cost of living.

Mr. MURDOCK: The figures did show a slight seasonal rise as we have found in all winters in Canada in the past.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister going to do to bring the cost down? He has been failing in all his pledges in that regard.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are working nicely in that direction if you will keep out of the road.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is working all right, but the results are exactly the opposite of what he is working for.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are doing nicely, thank you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that the minister is drawing his salary, but the cost of living keeps going up. The minister made terrible strictures on the late government, and promised to devote his tremendous abilities to the reduction of the cost of living. That was to be his ambition in public life. That was what he set his heart upon; he was going to relieve the poor.

Mr. MURDOCK: Some job.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some job! Yes, now that my hon. friend is in the department he finds that it is "some job." The cost of living, which went down 24 points in the official scale in 1921 from what it was 12 months before, is now higher than it was when the minister took office. It is going the wrong way. Does the minister not think it is time for him to give place to somebody else?

Mr. MURDOCK: I suggest that my right hon. friend read Babson instead of the pessimists that he has been reading.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not criticizing Babson at all—I have been reading the hon. minister. He should judge his conduct by his own standard. I am asking him in what state of mind is he now, having not only failed to carry on the good work instituted by the previous government that he criticized, but having reversed the process altogether.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are doing very nicely, thank you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Individually he is doing very nicely, I admit that, but those for whom he is trustee are doing very badly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the Easter recess the minister said he would be able to give us some statistics with regard to the value of the time lost on account of unemployment. There are statistics with regard to the amount lost through strikes and that kind of thing, and I think the minister said he could get us information from the point of view of unemployment.

Mr. MURDOCK: That was held in abeyance under vote No. 263. I am anxious to go on with the discussion on that vote when hon. gentlemen on the other side are ready to proceed with it. In the meantime, however, we are dealing with another matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before this item carries I would like to have some definite assurance from the minister that the list which I hold in my hand is not the list upon which the opinions of the department with regard to the cost of living are based.

Mr. MURDOCK: I assure my hon. friend that they are not entirely based on that list. The analysis is made on the basis of the figures thus secured as well as of other information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister says, "the figures thus secured."

Mr. MURDOCK: Consideration is given to those figures, I understand, in compiling the analysis.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—ADDRESS OF LORD ROBERT CECIL

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

He said: It had been the hope of the government and of hon. members generally that there might be an opportunity to hear Lord Robert Cecil during his stay in Ottawa, possibly in the Railway committee room of the House of Commons. We have learned, however, that that will not be possible, and tonight will be the only opportunity that members of the House will have to hear his address on the League of Nations. Under the circumstances the suggestion has come from a number of sources that it might be advisable to adjourn the House this evening so as to afford hon. members the privilege of hearing Lord Robert at the Collegiate Institute. I have spoken with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and I think he shares with me the view that the circumstances would warrant the adjournment of the House for that purpose.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

Tuesday, April 10, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Mr. DUFF presented the second report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries, as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration the new regulation regarding the time each year that trout fishing by anglers is permitted, and recommend that the regulation at present in force be repealed and that the time be as formerly, that is from the 1st of April of each year until the 1st of May each year.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is permitted for the same length of time as formerly, but the date is changed?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the morning press there is an announcement that this year there is to be an Imperial Conference of the nature of that in 1921 to be held simultaneously with an Imperial Economic Conference, and that to the former all prime ministers are invited and all are going save the Prime Minister of New Zealand, who presumably along with the others is to attend the latter. May I ask if this conference has been decided upon if it is to be attended by the Prime Minister or by others of the government, and if so, what is the agenda that has been agreed upon or submitted to the government as subjects for consideration at the economic conference and also at the conference of the character of that of 1921?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my right hon. friend that the report as it appears in the press this morning is correct. An Imperial Conference similar to the one held in 1921 is to be held in London in October simultaneously with an Imperial Economic Conference. It is hoped that when October comes the expressed wish of the British Prime Minister that the prime ministers of the different dominions should attend the conference may be complied with so far as Canada is concerned.

As to the agenda, I think I might promise my right hon. friend that I will be in a position to place on the Table such papers as we have already received in that connection. Broadly, as to the agenda of the conference of prime ministers, it is similar to the agenda of the conference which my right hon. friend himself attended. The agenda in complete form is not available as yet. It is open to the different governments concerned to make suggestions as to matters to be taken up between now and the time of the conference.

As to the Imperial Economic Conference, The agenda I think is set forth in completer form, and I shall have pleasure in placing on the table of the House the data the government has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can that data be placed on the Table to-morrow or this week?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING In this, as in all matters between the Home government and our own, I wish to follow the customary practice of communicating with the British government before I take any action. I shall ask for permission to bring the papers down at an early date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There can be no possible exception taken that would be acceptable to this House, no possible reason for secrecy in regard to the agenda of either conference.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I call attention to another despatch in the press this morning indicating that the government has altered its attitude with respect to the Hudson Bay railway. The despatch is dated April 5, and states that the Hon. W. R. Motherwell in the contest now being decided in Moose Jaw has undertaken on behalf of the government the completion and the establishment of service upon this railway before Christmas. This is one of several commitments made. May I ask if this is the policy of the government? If so, is it permanent or is it only made for Mr. Knowles to get in on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The policy of the government remains what it was, as announced by the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) when this matter was referred to in the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That policy would be consistent with completion before Christmas. Is the government purposing to do that? Does the government purpose to have it completed this year, or does the government not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give my right hon. friend an answer as to time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Prime Minister say that he cannot say whether it is the intention to complete the Hudson Bay railway before this Christmas or not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that must have been a misprint.

GRATUITIES TO GRAND TRUNK OFFICIALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WARD: I should like somewhat out of curiosity to draw attention to a statement made by the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) yesterday in reply to a question by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) regarding a question I had put on the order paper some time ago. The minister had this to say:

> If I might be permitted, I am not sure that the Farmers' party has brought much light to the subject. The light was forced upon it.

I would like to tell the hon. minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This refers to a debate which took place yesterday and cannot form the subject of a discussion at the present time.

Mr. WARD: What I would like to ask the minister is what ground he had for making that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAHAM: Pure fact.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF JOHN J. HAYES FROM POSTAL SERVICE

On the motion of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Before the motion is put, there is a matter of great urgency which I should like to bring to the attention of the House. It deals with one Mr. John J. Hayes of Calgary. I want first briefly to state this man's position.

Mr. Hayes has been a postal employee of the Dominion of Canada for thirty-three years. Not only has he served in that capacity for that length of time, but he also served overseas for some years. After returning he was moved from the Toronto post office to the post office of the city of Calgary. He was moved there immediately after the postal strike in Calgary. He was considered to be of such efficiency that he was placed in the position of supervisor of the letter carriers there at that time. Now for some reason unknown to me, the postmaster at Calgary seemed to take an aversion to Mr. Hayes, and recently they set a trap to catch him. There had been some petty thieving going on in the post office, and a trap was set by a policeman and an official of the post office expressly to catch Mr. Hayes. These gentlemen were in the office watching for Mr. Hayes to put his foot into the trap. They sprang the trap when they were ready but they did not catch Mr. Hayes in it; the money they had planted was found elsewhere. Nevertheless Mr. Hayes was arrested. He was not accorded trial by a jury but was brought before Hon. Mr. Justice McCarthy, and was found guilty. His case then came before the Appeal Court and was heard by Hon. Mr. Justice Beck, Hon. Mr. Justice Hyndman, and Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, the result being that the conviction was quashed. I would refer those who are interested in the case to the report of the proceedings to be found in Canadian Criminal Cases, volume 38, page 348. Mr. Hayes then found himself a free man. The case was thrown out by the Appeal Court because the evidence against him was insufficient. Subsequently Mr. Hayes applied for reinstatement in the post office but was told by the postmaster that he would have to wait for some time. After repeated attempts to be reinstated he was informed that an order in council had been passed by the present government discharging him from the service, the letter from the Deputy Postmaster General stating that they were taking this action in the light of the judgment as summed up by the dissenting judge of the Appeal Court. I would like to know by what authority the Deputy Postmaster General sets himself above the Appeal Court in this case or, for that matter, by what authority the cabinet even judges a man over the head of the courts.

I want next to show what these proceedings mean to Mr. Hayes himself. As already pointed out he has seen thirty-three years' service. I think his service overseas counted for something more than the regular time, which would give him about thirty-five years' service under the postal department. Now, by his discharge Mr. Hayes loses the pension which rightfully belongs to him as an employee of the department. In this regard I want to point out that on the morning of his arrest the postmaster at Calgary offered Mr. Hayes the privilege of resigning. Had he resigned at that time he would have obtained his pension, but he would not resign because to do so would have been an admission, inferentially at least, that he was guilty of the charge laid against him. Mr. Hayes would not take that opportunity of getting out, but went to the court with his case. However, although he won out in the courts he was summarily dismissed by an order in council. By that dismissal the fruit of his labours of thirty-three to thirty-five years was lost and he himself, as long as the attitude of the department is what it is, is even regarded by his friends with suspicion. I saw Mr. Hayes when I was at Calgary a few days ago and he is undoubtedly in dire financial straits, and his family, at the present time, are dependent upon the precarious charity of friends. Owing to this charge against him, and to the attitude of the department, Mr. Hayes is unable to get work and is on the very verge of starvation. Now, I submit that a grave injustice has been done to this man. I do not mean to say that the government would knowingly pass an order in council calculated to inflict injustice upon anybody. At the same time, I want to say, that in my opinion, the attitude of the Deputy Postmaster General is contemptible; I cannot find words with which to express my contempt for his attitude in the matter. I imagine that the government reached the decision which it did under the influence of communications received from the postmaster of Calgary, and has not been guided in its decision in this matter by the judgment of the courts. I therefore think this injustice should be remedied. The thirty-three years of creditable service by Mr. Hayes should not be forgotten. The government's attitude not only robs Mr. Hayes of the pension which he has earned, but it also robs him of his character, for it was on the charge of theft that he was discharged, the judgment of the courts notwithstanding. I would therefore urge remedial action on the part of the government immediately. I contend that Mr. Hayes should be paid his wages from the moment he was arrested until he is reinstated, or else, if the department does not want to reinstate him he should be granted his pension. The least the government can possibly do, in recognition of his service overseas, and of his long term in the service of the department, is to give him his pension.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask my hon. friend to what pension he refers—this man's pension as an employee of the government or his pension for service as a soldier overseas?

Mr. IRVINE: I refer to the pension which Mr. Hayes has earned under the regulations governing postal employees. The man is innocent in the opinion of the court; he has been discharged as innocent of the crime of which he was accused. Therefore, I submit, he ought to receive his pension. He is an honest man in the opinion of the courts, consequently I do not see why anyone should desire to treat him as a criminal. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw):

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words be inserted instead thereof:

That this House desires to record its opinion that the dismissal of John J. Hayes, formerly employed as a civil servant by the Post Office department, Calgary, Alberta, is wholly unjustifiable, and that immediate steps be taken to redress the injury done to the said John J. Hayes.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this amendment came into my hands just as I was entering the House, and you can readily understand that I have not had time to digest the details of this case. I might point out, however, that if the mail matter, either social or business, is not safe in the hands of public servants, then the business of Canada, as well as our social relations, goes to pieces. Any man who cannot be trusted to handle the mail matter in a post office, while he may have the sympathy, cannot have the confidence, of the people of this country. I do not want to say anything to hurt Mr. Hayes' feelings, and I think bringing up this resolution, while it is in order, is not doing Mr. Hayes a kindness. It would have been better, I think, for my hon. friend to have discussed it with me, to see if there was not some other way of reaching a conclusion. However, I am not responsible for that.

In reference to the charge against Mr. Hayes I may say that he was arrested on September 14th, 1922, charged, first, with stealing a post letter containing $2, a test letter prepared by the investigating officer, contrary to section 364 of the Criminal Code, and stealing a post letter addressed to Mrs. C. I. McFarlane, Calgary, contrary to section 364 of the Criminal Code. One can readily understand that the officials of the post office, particularly the postmaster who is responsible would be in a very embarrassing position, having discovered that at different times, on sundry occasions, letters mailed and containing money had gone astray, and he set out to find who was responsible for this loss of money, and who was guilty of malfeasance in office. He came to the conclusion, with the other officers of the department and officials who were there, that they should investigate the matter. Mr. Hayes was under suspicion at least. This case was tried before Mr. Justice McCarthy. Practically every man in this House knows Mr. Justice McCarthy, who was formerly a member of this House. He heard all the evidence, saw the demeanour of the witnesses, was in a position to take into account all the local conditions and he found Mr. Hayes guilty and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment on each of the two counts, sentences to run concurrently. An appeal was taken. That appeal was heard before three judges; two of them upheld the appeal, one dissenting, Mr. Justice Clarke.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Did Mr. Justice Clarke dissent?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I must not comment on the judgment—but perhaps I might as well. I will be very delicate about it. Mr. Justice Clarke was at one time a member of this House, and one of the ablest lawyers in the Dominion of Canada, and one of the ablest men that ever sat in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And appointed by the late government.

Mr. DUFF: An exception which proves the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may have been a lapse of memory. But we are all unanimous in the opinion that Mr. Justice Clarke is a very able man. An appeal was taken. There were two questions at issue; first, the right of trial by jury, which had been refused at the time of the trial by the presiding judge. My hon. friend for Calgary (Mr. Irvine) referred to that. As a matter of fact, the law provides for the trial, as it took place, without a jury. The second point was insufficient evidence. Two of the judges held that the evidence was not conclusive. Without criticizing the judgment at all, and I am not doing that, I would say that in order to come to a conclusion some other theory must be adopted, or some other explanation must be accepted as to the method by which Mr. Hayes got the letters and money into his possession. One of these was purely presumptive. The first suggestion was that the test letter had been stolen by a letter carrier who had later turned the money in to Hayes when buying stamps. Some letter carrier other than Hayes must have stolen this letter, brought it back and turned it in to Hayes for stamps—a roundabout proceeding. The second point was that Mr. Tingle substituted this money while he was taking the requisition handed in by Hayes to the clerk from whom he obtained the stamps.

Now certainly the evidence may not have been conclusive, but to my mind the reasoning of the other judges was far from conclusive. I want to point out what Mr. Justice Clarke said in his dissenting judgment. Referring to these two contentions, or suggestions as to the method by which Hayes might have got these letters and this money, Mr. Justice Clarke first deals with the opportunity a letter carrier would have to steal this letter and shows that while it would not have been impossible for a letter carrier to have done it, it was highly improbable. He pointed out that Mr. Hayes's desk was only a few feet from the case in which the letters, including the stolen letters, were placed for his attention. Hayes personally took the letters from the pigeon hole, containing the "removed" letters, and put them on his desk to check them over as usual and turn them over to Clerk Black, the supervisor of city sortation. When examined by Black one of the test letters was there, and the other one was missing. The accused left the room for about 15 or 20 minutes—this was about 8.50 a.m.—immediately after he had turned the letter over to Black. About 9.30 a.m. he sent his assistant, Tingle, with the requisition for postage due stamped to the amount of $3.75, to the stamp vendor on the mezzanine floor. The marked money contained in the missing test letter was found among the moneys sent by Mr. Hayes for stamps. Hayes alleged he got this money from the letter carriers. I am not going to refer further to this judgment, but Mr. Justice Clarke dissented very strongly, giving, to my mind, real reasons for every point of his dissent. We begin with this again: Letters and moneys were found in the possession of Hayes illegally. Mr. Justice McCarthy, who heard all the evidence, sentenced Hayes to three years' imprisonment on each count.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister said that the money and the letters which did not belong to Mr. Hayes, were found in his possession. I think the minister is in error as to that. I do not think any money was found in Mr. Hayes' possession.

Mr. GRAHAM: The memorandum which I have here says that Hayes was charged with:

1. Stealing a post letter containing two dollars (test letter prepared by investigating officer) contrary to section 364 (c) of the Criminal Code, and

2. Stealing a post letter addressed to Mrs. C. I. McFarlane, Calgary; contrary to section 364 (b) of the Criminal Code.

Hayes appeared before Judge McCarthy and was found guilty and sentenced to three years' imprisonment on each of the two counts.

Mr. IRVINE: That is the charge, but that does not prove that money that did not belong to Mr. Hayes was found in his pockets by the trap-springers.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me read again a synopsis of what Mr. Justice Clarke says:

The carrier would have had to pick out this particular letter from the thirty or more letters in the pigeon hole, which he would have no knowledge of, abstract the money—two dollars, and then turn in the money in two instalments to Hayes in purchasing a few cents worth of stamps, all before 8.50.

From that I take it for granted that the money was found in the possession of Mr. Hayes. But let me get back. I am not going to take the place of the court. Hayes was charged with stealing money and mail matter; Mr. Justice McCarthy, who heard all the evidence, found him guilty and sentenced him to two terms of three years' imprisonment, the terms to run concurrently. The case was taken in appeal on two points: First, refusal of trial by jury. That has been cleared up by Mr. Justice Clarke, who pointed out that the law provides for such trials without a jury. The second was that the evidence was not sufficient. The judges rather took the ground "not conclusive". What I have read from the synopsis of the judgment of Mr. Justice Clarke would lead me to believe there was a wide divergence of opinion in that regard. Leaving all that aside, however, this is a man who is under suspicion sufficiently strong to make him a man not worthy to handle the mail of the people of Canada. Would any man in this House trust a public servant who had been tried and found guilty by Mr. Justice McCarthy and who, although he won on appeal, had applied to the case the remarks of Mr. Justice Clarke which I have read? I cannot but oppose this motion. I am willing to discuss this matter in the Post Office Department with my hon. friend; but I can assure him and assure Mr. Hayes that the object of the Post Office Department of the Dominion of Canada is not to persecute anybody; its chief object is to have the people of this country served, not only efficiently, but honestly.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I am amazed by the attitude assumed by the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Graham) in connection with this matter. He spent a good deal of time reviewing the judgments of the court and explaining why the view expressed by Mr. Justice Clarke must be upheld. Then, in the next breath, he tells us that he does not want to go into the matter as regards the courts. There can be no question of this fact —John J. Hayes is innocent of the charge which was laid against him.

Mr. CARROLL: Who told the hon. member?

Mr. SHAW: There can be no question about that. The courts have decreed that the charges which were laid against Hayes were unfounded, and he stands to-day before the people of Canada and in the eyes of the law an innocent man.

May I say at the outset, that of the questions which were considered by the Court of Appeal in this matter, one was a legal question as to the right of an accused person charged under the section dealing with post office offences, of securing a jury. On that point, the court did not come to any conclusion, because in view of the facts they deemed it unnecessary to consider that question. There were I believe, at least, three questions reserved. The second was: Was the finding against the weight of evidence? That is the question submitted by Mr. Justice McCarthy to the Appellate Court. I think we should have in mind that well-established principle that no man shall be convicted if there is any reasonable doubt as to his guilt. The second question concerned itself with the question of whether or not Mr. Justice McCarthy, in trying the case, had, so to speak, misdirected himself. The third question is:

Did I err in finding the appellant guilty of the charge of stealing from the post office at Calgary a post letter addressed to Mrs. C. I. McFarlane, in that the appellant alleges no guilty intent was established.

Next,

Did I err in failing to direct that no evidence was produced to prove the value of the letter forming the substance of the first charge?

Next,

Did I err in failing to direct that no evidence was produced to prove the value of the letter forming the substance of the second charge?

These questions were placed for consideration before the appellate division, and I want to read some extracts from the judgments of Mr. Justice Beck and Mr. Justice Hyndman, dealing with this matter.

Mr. CARROLL: Would the hon. member tell us briefly the decision of the Appellate Court on the second question.

Mr. SHAW: I am going to read some extracts taken from the judgments of these Appeal Court judges. The judgments themselves are rather long. Mr. Justice Beck states, and his statement will be found at page 349, Canadian Criminal Cases, volume 38:

As I am of opinion that the conviction must be set aside and the accused discharged upon a proper view of the evidence and the judge's reasons for his decision, I refrain from a consideration of the question whether or not the accused was entitled to be tried by a jury.

Further on at page 354, he continues:

There is absolutely no direct evidence of the guilt of the accused. The evidence against him, such as it is, is wholly inferential. The evidence makes it quite clear to me that, without discrediting in the slightest degree the evidence of Black, Hale, or the constable—

And these, by the way, may I mention, are the gentlemen who framed up the scheme on this particular man:

—(I emphasize this for reasons which will appear later,) there is room for more than one reasonable hypothesis to account for the two marked one-dollar bills being found in the way described in the hands of Hazleton. I set forth these hypotheses, of course, without wishing to suggest guilt on any particular individual.

In other words, Mr. Justice Beck found, under the circumstances, that any one of a number of individuals might have committed the offence. At page 357 Mr. Justice Beck again says:

Applying these principles to the evidence I am convinced not only that had I been trying the case I should not have convicted the accused, but that, in view of the several hypotheses consistent with his innocence, there is no evidence on which he could be properly convicted. Apart from this it seems quite clear to me that the judge misdirected himself. He gave reasons for convicting the accused as follows in which I insert comments indicating which I think are objectionable features.

To my mind it is impossible, in view of the law as I have indicated it, to say that this statement by the trial judge does not indicate that he very seriously misdirected himself. This being so, in my opinion, the conviction cannot stand. If this were the only ground for quashing the conviction, of course the court would have to consider whether or not a new trial should be directed,—

And I direct the attention of the Acting Postmaster General to this:

—but in view of what I have said with reference to the evidence, I would, even if it is thought that the evidence would on a strict application of legal principles justify a conviction, I would refuse to direct a new trial.

In other words, the court is satisfied that if a new trial were directed in this particular case this man must necessarily be found innocent of the charge. Mr. Justice Hyndman also deals with the matter.

Mr. HANSON: The result of the appeal was, then, that the conviction was set aside and a new trial refused.

Mr. SHAW: Yes. I may remark, for the information of hon. members, that the court might have taken three different actions in connection with this conviction. It might have confirmed the conviction; it might have decided that there was some error in law and therefore ordered a new trial; or on the other hand it might have done, what in fact it did in this case, namely, hold that there was no evidence to justify a conviction and decide that the conviction must be quashed.

Now, that is the position in which this man finds himself, and the Postmaster General's department in regarding him as guilty of the charge is simply arrogating to itself the functions of a court of appeal from the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Alberta. The lawyer representing this accused man has been in communication with the Postmaster General's department; I do not think he has been able to get any direct word from the Postmaster General. A letter appears to have been sent under the signature of "T. P. Murphy, private secretary," and I want to direct the attention of the House to portions of it. This letter is dated the 2nd day of February and is addressed to Mr. Hayes' lawyer. It says:

I note you state that the case was appealed and the matter came before the Appeal Court. Mr. Hayes was completely exonerated by two of the judges, the third dissenting. I am given to understand that the quashing of the verdict of the lower court, on appeal being taken, was by reason of the fact that there was considerable doubt of the guilt of Mr. Hayes in connection with the theft of the letter containing the marked money, but that the judgment did not "completely exonerate" him, as you state. In other words, the appeal was quashed because there was insufficient evidence, and not because it was clearly shown that Mr. Hayes did not commit the theft.

I would ask Mr. Murphy how a court could more fully exonerate an individual than this court did. I must confess that I have never known a case in which a court has held that a person is, to use the language of this letter, completely exonerated. Any exoneration is a complete exoneration, and that is the fact in this case. This private secretary indicates that he is placing his reliance on the judgment of Mr. Justice Clarke, which in substance is the same as the argument used by the Acting Postmaster General, and then he goes on to state:

The circumstances brought out in the evidence show that Mr. Hayes was the only person who would have opportunity, without being observed by others, to steal the test letter containing the marked money, which was subsequently sent by him to the stamp clerk.

Mr. Murphy evidently sets himself up as a judge of the facts and declares that this man is the only one who could have stolen the money, notwithstanding that the Court of Appeal has held that there were numerous individuals who might have been guilty of the offence. I quote further:

Leaving aside technicalities which necessarily enter into a legal trial, the fact remains that Mr. Hayes violated a positive rule of the service in having this letter secreted on his person, and there is strong presumptive evidence that he tampered with it.

Mr. Murphy talks about "technicalities" after the court has found that there was not sufficient evidence to justify the charge against this man. In my opinion Mr. Murphy is guilty of an unwarranted assumption of appellate court functions. He concludes:

In view of the facts above stated, this department cannot, in the public interest, accede to any request that Mr. Hayes be reinstated in the service. The necessity for preserving the safety of the mails entrusted to the care of Post Office employees, makes it impossible, after a careful consideration of all the circumstances in this case, to retain Mr. Hayes in the postal service where he would have access to the mails.

It appears therefore that Mr. Murphy accuses this man of the very crime of which he has been acquitted by the court; and I think that this is a most outrageous letter for an official to send to the lawyer representing an accused person. The government should be the last body to adopt an attitude of this kind towards a humble citizen of this country; and I urge, Mr. Speaker, that ample reparation be made this man. He has been declared innocent; in the eyes of the law he is innocent. If our law is worth anything at all he must therefore be given the benefit of that finding, and in my humble judgment he should be reinstated in his position if he desires to resume it, and should have restored to him the pension privileges of which he has been deprived. I do not think he should be eternally damned in this way and made to suffer for a crime which he never committed and of which the courts in this country have freed him.

Mr. CARROLL: Was there any finding as to the question of the denial of jury?

Mr. SHAW: I might elucidate that point which is merely a legal one. Under our Northwest Territories Act a person who is accused of the crime of theft where the value of the property is under the sum of $200 is not entitled to a jury. That is a provision of the Northwest Territories Act which has not been repealed, and consequently when Mr. Hayes found himself charged with the crime of stealing two dollars he was not entitled to a jury. In addition to that he was liable to a minimum penalty of three years in gaol. The Postmaster General mentioned the fact of his having been sentenced to three years as indicative of the enormity of the offence. Now, no one deprecates these offences more than I do, for we do require honesty in the public service; it is absolutely essential. But I want to direct the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that the minimum sentence which the court could impose for the offence was three years in gaol; and the man was under our law denied the right of a jury. He was convicted, but that conviction was set aside, and the moment that the conviction was quashed he was innocent in the eyes of the law. With the setting aside of the conviction the law regarded him as having been innocent at the time the charge was laid. I think it is only fair, Mr. Speaker, that the government, above all organizations, should assume a proper attitude in matters of this kind and not set itself in judgment above the courts of the country; and above all, this man having been found innocent, the government should make ample amends for the injustice which has been done him.

Mr. CARROLL: Did the majority of the court find that there was not sufficient evidence to convict the accused?

Mr. SHAW: They must have so found; the majority of the court must have found that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction. As a matter of fact I am sure that was the finding. Mr. Justice Hyndman in his judgment declares, that all the facts having been apparently before the trial court, that it would be useless to have a new trial since acquittal would necessarily result; and I have already read extracts also from the decision of Mr. Justice Beck indicating his view of that matter. If there had been only a legal technicality, or if there had been some doubt as to the value or the significance of the evidence, I doubt not that the Court of Appeal instead of ordering an acquittal would have ordered a new trial. That was not done, and that is the best proof that such evidence as there was was not sufficient to justify the conviction of this man.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the first information I have received of this case is that presented by the hon. members for Calgary (Mr. Irvine and Mr. Shaw). I must say that I find some difficulty in coming to a conclusion on the very brief statement of facts that has been made by the minister as well as by the hon. members to my left. So far as I have been able to gather, one Hayes, an employee of the post office at Calgary, was accused of stealing mail, was brought to trial before Mr. Justice McCarthy, and was by him convicted without a jury, the trial being in every way legal and proper. An appeal was taken to the Appellate Court of Alberta and was heard before Mr. Justice Beck, Mr.

Justice Hyndman and Mr. Justice Clarke. The appeal was on several grounds, but summing up briefly, it resulted in the quashing of the conviction on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, two of the judges being in favour of the quashing and Mr. Justice Clarke dissenting and supporting the conviction by the trial judge. It appears as well that in the judgment of the majority, given by Mr. Justice Beck and supported by Mr. Justice Hyndman, it was found that there were several explanations consistent with the innocence of the accused for the disappearance of the money in queston. The dissenting judge appears to have taken the view that the possibility of the money having been stolen by any other person was so remote that it could not be taken into account as overpowering the judgment of facts found by the trial judge.

The Post Office Department, as its conduct is defended by the minister, (Mr. Graham) takes the view that whatever the final judgment, the circumstances affecting the entire case are such that suspicion attaches to the accused, so much so that in the opinion of the department the confidence of the public could not be longer retained in him. The hon. member who has spoken last (Mr. Shaw) urges that the finding of the appellate court must be taken as establishing beyond suspicion the innocence of the accused. While as far as I can gather the facts from the debate, there does seem to be room enough for doubt to justify an acquittal, I would not like to subscribe to the proposition that the government of the country must in its decision of the fitness of an employee for office who has been charged with crime be absolutely bound by the judgment of a court. I feel that a department must be left in a position corresponding with that of the private employer. The private employer would have the right, and in justice to the shareholders of the buisness—if there were such—would be bound to exercise the right, of reviewing all the facts himself and deciding as to the qualifications and fitness of the man for a continuance of trust based upon those facts as they appeared to him.

Now, I have not been convinced that the case is so overwhelmingly in favour of the innocence of Hayes that the department is not justified in exercising its prerogative and saying that "The circumstances are at least so suspicious that we do not think he should be continued in office." It may be that on further argument the case in his favour could be made stronger, but it seems to me that a vote for the amendment is merely a vote that in all cases the judgment of a court must be final as to the retention of the

4. p.m. employee. It certainly is final in so far as it establishes that no proof has been made out of the guilt of the accused. and it is to that extent incumbent on the department, if it feels that his dismissal must take place, to effect it in such a way as to entail as little hardship on him as possible.

It does seem to me strange that Hayes must necessarily be deprived of his pension. I do not know that I got the facts in this special connection right. I understand that he was asked to resign, and declined. I do not think Hayes could have been expected to resign. He appears to have felt himself innocent, he was found innocent by the court, and resignation on his own part upon request by the department would imply something of an admission of guilt. Therefore his refusal to resign should not of itself deprive him of his pension. Though the department may be justified in regarding his case as so surrounded with suspicion that he must not be continued in a post of public trust, the department is bound to put him in a position consistent with his public service. Although for the reasons I have given I purpose voting against the amendment, I would hope that some way could be found of bringing to this man the pension of which I think he should not be deprived because of the final decision of the Court of Appeal.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we are being placed in a very awkward position. I agree very largely with the statements made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen): I think the government were justified under the circumstances in dispensing with Mr. Hayes' services in the Post Office Department. On the other hand, there is a doubt as to whether he was guilty or not, and I really hope that some way can be found to take care of him so that he may not suffer the loss of his pension. We cannot afford to have in the public service, more especially in the Post Office Department, a man upon whom there is the least shadow of doubt as to his character. It is all very well to say that he has been found innocent by the Court of Appeal. We know the facts of the case. There is some room for doubt, and under the circumstances I would not care to vote for the amendment. On the other hand, I would feel very guilty if by reason of the course we take now this man suffers for the remainder of his days and should after all prove to be an innocent person. I really hope the government will find some way of taking care of him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there was in the mind of any member of the government the least desire to have other than the fullest justice done by Mr. Hayes. I should like to draw the attention of the House to the manner in which this particular amendment has been introduced. Had my hon. friend who has moved the amendment seen well to go to the office of the Postmaster General and have a word with the Acting Postmaster General, I am sure he would have found no one more anxious and willing to take up this case and look carefully into it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. IRVINE: I would just like to point out that I did what I was advised to do by those in charge of this case .I understood from them that they had done the very best they possibly could to secure remedy for this man's case and had failed. I apologise if I have not done what is the ordinary thing in cases of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has been badly advised. If he had followed his own judgment it would I think have been better than acting upon the advice he has apparently followed. The amendment he has introduced really asks the House to record its opinion on two matters: The first is to the effect that the Post Office Department was wholly unjustified in dismissing Mr. Hayes. I would rather submit to my hon. friend that if all the circumstances which have been narrated by himself and by the seconder of his motion had come to the attention of the Post Office Department, they would not have been justified in retaining Mr. Hayes.

Mr. IRVINE: I would point out that I did not suggest that the government had overstepped its right in discharging Mr. Hayes, but I suggested that they had gone much too far when they had deprived him of his pension upon discharge after thirty-three years' service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that, because under those circumstances he will probably withdraw his amendment. The amendment reads:

> That the dismissal of John J. Hayes. . . . is wholly unjustifiable.

Now, my contention is that the Post Office Department, being the guardian of the public interest, and above all having to establish confidence in the handling of the mail, would have really been remiss in its duty if its officers had not under these circumstances intimated to Mr. Hayes that they could not retain him longer in the service of the department. Now as to that part of my hon. friend's resolution, I think hon. members of the House will agree practically without exception, even my hon. friend himself, that the Post Office Department were right in that particular.

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry to have to interrupt again, but I would point out that the dismissal of this employee is inseparable from his pension rights. If he is dismissed his pension is gone. If you will fix that up, I will fix the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to the second part of the amendment, "and that immediate steps be taken to redress the injury done to the said John J. Hayes," if my hon. friend heard the Acting Postmaster General when he was replying to him, he will have observed that he said that if my hon. friend would come to his office and discuss this matter with him he would be very pleased to look into this case himself with a view to seeing that no injustice was inflicted on Mr. Hayes. I think that with that assurance from the Acting Postmaster General and having regard to the manner in which the amendment is drawn, my hon. friend will perhaps see his way to withdrawing the amendment and not pressing it to a division.

Mr. IRVINE: After the explanation of the Prime Minister, with the consent of the seconder and of the House I withdraw my motion.

Amendment withdrawn.

Main motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply.—Mr. Gordon in the chair.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Labour—salaries, $231,735; contingencies, $45,500.

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps the minister could now supply the information regarding annuities that he promised just before we rose last night.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The question was asked yesterday, what proportion of the amount given in the statement that had been made was received for annuities on a three per cent basis, and what proportion on a four per cent basis, and what would be the disbursements for the same periods. The answer should have been that a four per cent interest rate has obtained since 1908, when the act came into force. Where an annuitant dies before the annuity becomes payable and the contract provides for the return of the payments made, interest thereon at the rate of four per cent is also allowed, this rate having been raised under an amendment to the act in 1920, from three to four per cent.

The question was also asked, what were the total receipts and disbursements on annuities account since the organization of the branch. These are as follows to the 31st of March, 1922. The interest on account for the year 1922-1923 and payments to annuitants for the same period are not yet completed. I have here a statement under the caption "Dominion government annuities, progress of fund from year to year."

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps other members want that information, but as far as my question was concerned I was not anxious for that. I wanted to know the total receipts and total disbursements. I am aware that there would still be outstanding liabilities in connection with some annuities.

Mr. MURDOCK: The total receipts since the act came into force are $5,660,000. The interest amounts to $1,529,951.14, or a total of receipts and interest of $7,189,951.14. The payments to annuitants for the entire period amount to $2,184,526.72, leaving a balance as of date of $5,005,424.42.

Mr. BOYS: There are certain obligations which belong to the department, I presume, in connection with annuities which were placed, the annuitants having died but the annuities being payable to others, for a period of five, six or seven years, the balance of a ten or twenty year period as the case may be.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not sure—

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps I can make myself plainer. As I understand it, there is a system by which an annuity may be purchased and if the annuitant dies within ten years the annuity is still payable to persons named for the balance of the period whatever it may be —generally ten years, I imagine. To that extent there would be outstanding obligations against this surplus of nearly $5,000,000. To ascertain whether or not the branch is paying one would have to know something of these outstanding obligations. If they are not very extensive one would be forced to the conclusion that the time, perhaps, is ripe now when these annuities should be placed on a five per cent basis—which the minister has in contemplation—rather than on a four per cent. That is, if it is not the intention of the department to try and make money out of this particular branch of the service—and I understand such is not the intention of the department.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think I have here the information that is desired by the hon. gentleman: An annuitant might have in hand a few hundred dollars which he would like to apply on account of the purchase so as to reduce the annual payments thereafter to be made; or he might wish to pay a specific sum, say $100 or $200 a year, to secure at a stated age the annuity which such payments would give him; or, if he is a young married man, the class of annuity which should interest him most would be a deferred last survivor annuity on the lives of himself and wife jointly, to be purchased by monthly payments, with a return to their heirs of the purchase money and interest if both should die before the annuity became payable; or the annuity desired might be an immediate annuity purchasable for cash on the lives of two persons payable so long as both lived, with a certain amount to the survivor; or it might be the kind of annuity in regard to which the hon. member for Simcoe said he had interviewed the superintendent, namely, an immediate annuity on the lives of two persons, the annuity to be paid to the purchaser so long as he lived, with the full amount to the survivor so long as he or she lived; the rates for all of which are not printed for distribution, and have to be calculated by the actuarial staff as required. It would be the work of years to prepare the tables which would be required to meet all such cases.

Annuities are not being sold for gain, and it was never intended that they should be. Whether the government might or might not lose a few thousand dollars by such a proposition would seem to me to be a matter of secondary importance to that of encouraging our people to be thrifty and saving, and of furnishing them with the facilities for investing their money with absolute security. The rate of interest on which annuity values are calculated is, as I have previously stated, 4 per cent. That was the rate fixed in the regulations of 1908, and the rate has obtained ever since. Where an annuitant dies before the annuity becomes payable, and the contract provides for the return of the payments made, interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent is also allowed, the rate having been raised under an amendment to the act in 1920 from 3 to 4 per cent; but in order to secure this additional interest the premium rate had also to be increased. Does this give the information desired by my hon. friend?

Mr. BOYS: The minister has given me most of the information but I think one point still remains to be cleared up. There appears to be to the credit of this branch a surplus, which has accrued during the fourteen-year period, of $5,005,425. Now, that would be profit with the one exception that you must deduct from it the obligations connected with the two plans that the minister has just referred to. Is it not possible to find out to what extent money should be retained to take care of those obligations—the difference between the five millions and that being really what this department has profited during the fourteen years—and if it is anything like the sum of $5,000,000, I think it would be an easy matter to come to the conclusion that the department has now reached the point when the rate of interest should be five per cent. I believe myself there is a great field for this security and the government requires money. It might as well get the money this way and if the people of Canada can be given a reasonable return for their money I should think they would take advantage of it. Four per cent is certainly not a satisfactory or productive return. But the government can make it productive. Let us have a little publicity, let all the postmasters throughout the country have this information for the benefit of those who seek it, and I believe that instead of reaching one million dollars—and I am glad to know that last year the receipts of this branch amounted to that sum—if the return to the people be raised the government will get a very considerable sum of money and this will prove an excellent and safe investment as against old age.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I believe that the real difficulty we are all in is that we do not know what we can do. I do not know that the minister can tell us where we are and therefore what we could do in moving towards a more liberal policy having regard to annuities. Before we get to that it is, of course, necessary to know what we have been doing. As I understand it—I was not here when the figures were last discussed—we now have a credit of some $5,000,000. Of course, that credit of five millions may mean a lot of money or may mean nothing at all; it may mean a very large profit or it may mean an absolute loss. But the minister has his tables worked out on the regular actuarial expectation of life, on a four and on a five per cent basis, and those tables will tell him just what reductions have to be made in connection with that sum of money. The House ought to know whether we are making or whether we are losing; and if we are making money, why we might not in future make a little less in order to earn a great deal more in ease of the Department of Finance. It is not a matter of guesswork, it is a matter of actuarial computation. The minister must have computations in the department. Perhaps he can tell us now just what actuarial reserve out of that five millions is necessary to meet the claims, based on the usual expectation of life, from the two classes.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very sorry but I do not think that the information requested by the hon. gentlemen has ever been compiled in connection with the Annuities branch of the service. My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) refers to what the Department of Finance might do in regard to this matter. I may say that the matter of increasing the allowance from a four to a five per cent basis has been under discussion for some time. Those authorized to consider and deal with these matters in the Department of Finance have indicated the belief that it might not be altogether safe to adopt the 5 per cent basis because of the possible loss that might accrue. During the last year I understand that, on the 4 per cent basis, the Annuities branch broke a little better than even, with, I think, $2,800 to the good, but I do not think the matter has been gone into by anyone to determine just what the profit or loss has been. I think the statement that was made a little while ago that it should not be considered altogether on that basis is a sound one. Personally, I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) who suggested that if the rate of interest were made sufficiently attractive we would enlarge the scope of the department, would not lose any great amount of money, even on that basis, and would have the use of a great deal of money invested by the citizens of Canada.

Mr. BOYS: I have not yet got what I want. Perhaps the minister cannot give it to me. Has he under advisement the question of whether the rate should be raised to 5 per cent or not, and what information is it he is considering? He finds that at this period he actually has a surplus of $5,000,000 odd. That is profit, with the one exception that he must take a sufficient sum of money to take care of the outstanding obligations to which he has referred. If we could only find out from the actuary what sum of money would be required, we would go a long way towards finding out whether or not this annuity system could be placed on the 5 per cent basis.

I wish to refer to another matter. We have in Ontario a savings bank carried on by the government of Ontario.

Mr. FIELDING: Not a bank.

Mr. BOYS: I forgot really what name I have seen on the outside of the various offices. It is a provincial savings bank.

Mr. FIELDING: The name "bank" cannot be used for the Ontario business.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate that, and I am in error in using the word "bank," but as far as the public are concerned, they view it in that way. It is a provincial savings institution. There is one not very far from the Parliament Buildings. We have them in Toronto and elsewhere in the province. We can take our money and place it in one of these institutions. With regard to the annuity of $1,000 which has been mentioned, the cash payment asked by this branch for that annuity was $15,000, which was estimated on a 4 per cent basis. How can the branch expect to do much business, when the same individual who might want an annuity could deposit his $15,000 in this provincial institution, get 4 per cent as long as he wanted it, and at the end of the period get his $15,000 back whereas by the system now in vogue in the Annuities branch. he would get $1,000 a year for his expectation of life, as long as he lived, and if his wife survived she would get it afterwards, for a period at the outside of 15 years. At the end of that time the $15,000 would be gone. If a man has $15,000, is he going to hesitate as to whether he should place it on deposit at 4 per cent, having the province of Ontario behind him, knowing he can get that rate of interest upon his money, and have the $15,000 at the end of the period, or purchase an annuity? I submit he would not hesitate very long. If annuities were placed on a 5 per cent basis, they would be attractive, and he would accept it; the government would get the benefit of the money, and the annuitant would be protected in his old age.

I want to ascertain how much of that $5,000,000 cash on hand should be retained to take care of outstanding obligations. I understand there is a plan whereby an annuity may be purchased on a ten-year basis. It will be payable to the annuitant for his or her life, but if he or she dies before the expiration of the ten-year period it will still be paid to whomever may be designated for the balance of the term. It stands to reason that a sum of money must be held to guard against these payments. There is also the other feature that annuities are purchased by laying aside certain annual payments to take care of them, and that money is on hand and must be kept on hand to take care of that situation. So far as I know, outside of these two features, this entire $5,000,000 balance—a large sum, in view of the business that is done, is on hand. If the minister has not the information, I wish he would get it so that we may be able to form our own opinion as to whether the time is not ripe and overdue when annuities should be placed on a 5 per cent basis.

Mr. MURDOCK: In considering the $5,000,000 surplus, you must take into consideration that there are 5,643 annuitants who stand to benefit proportionately from that, and, therefore, it cannot be regarded as a $5,000,000 surplus.

Mr. BOYS: I quite appreciate that. A great many of these annuitants have reached the expectation of life or very nearly so. Some of these annuities, of course, have recently been purchased, and the payments will have to go on. I want to find out how much money would have to be held to take care of them; the balance would be profit.

Mr. MURDOCK: Of course, that information could be procured, but I might state that there has never been any opportunity given to the department to find out anything of this kind—

Mr. BOYS: Why?

Mr. MURDOCK: —to the general extent that I think it should have been.

Mr. BOYS: The department has an actuary?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: What is he there for?

Mr. MURDOCK: There has never been as much interest, I think, in Dominion government annuities as on this occasion, for which I am personally thankful, and I hope the hon. member from Simcoe will have his wishes realized and a 5 per cent interest payment guaranteed for Dominion government annuities. I think it will do just exactly what he believes it will do—largely increase the sale of Dominion government annuities.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the Superintendent of Insurance exercise any supervision over this fund?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not directly. But this department, of course, asks his advice as to the consistency and safety of changing a 4 per cent rate to a 5 per cent rate.

Mr. HOCKEN: This, of course, is an insurance fund handled by the government, and having the government behind it, but I think it ought to come under the same supervision as any other insurance fund, and it strikes me that if this Annuity branch went about its work with the energy that ought to be applied to it, it should be possible to get all the business of that kind that is done in the country. You ought to be able to get better results at lower rates than any other insurance company. The government has no dividends to pay. The cost of management ought to be cut down to a minimum, an annuity ought to be purchasable from this fund at a lower rate than from any company, and if the people of Canada were properly approached and made familiar with the scheme in any way the department might discover to be effective, I believe there would be a very large increase in the number of those who would purchase such annuities. It is an old age pension operating, in my judgment, under the very best conditions that could be adopted, because it is a man's own thrift that secures for him the necessities of his old age. There is no element of party in it or anything of that kind. This is one feature of government policy that might be developed more thoroughly and energetically than it has been, with good results to both the annuitant and the country.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not had this matter before me for some time, and I did not have the good fortune to hear what was said on the matter before. I am not clear as to the meaning of this $5,000,000 surplus, if it be a surplus. I know the whole purpose of the organization has been, not to make money, but to afford an excellent opportunity of exercising thrift with the security of the country behind it. The 4 per cent rate was established in the belief that that was a fair value for the money. Then, in addition to that, there was the cost of operation. I think it was well understood from the beginning that the government would have to bear the cost of management, and the people investing their money in annuities would get the full benefit of the 4 per cent. Some months ago, I think, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), raised the question whether we could not afford to raise the basis to 5 per cent. I had the matter referred to one of the officials of the department, and he advised that this would not be profitable; that it would not help the financial situation and would be a burden to the country. There is, however, no finality in that. Rates of interest vary, and I am not prepared to say that we could not under any circumstances allow 5 per cent. I think the information asked for by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) can be secured, and I am sure the Minister of Labour will be glad to procure it, if possible, and to bring it down at a later date.

If we can give the facilities of this institution to the people without incurring any very considerable increase of expense, that should be done. I quite agree with what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the character of the business. In the early days, when this organization was established, we appointed lecturers for the purpose of making the people understand the matter. It is unfortunate, perhaps, under circumstances into which I need not enter now, that the services of these lecturers were dispensed with. We were told that the business was to be handled by the post offices. Soon after that policy was adopted, down in a distant portion of my province, I thought I would go and see what the postmaster knew about it. When I asked him about the matter, he asked me three or four questions as to what I was driving at. When I explained matters to him, he said that he did not know anything about it. I said: "I am told that literature has been forwarded to you." He said: "Has it?" He said that he did not know; that he would look for it, and at last acounts he had not found it. I am not complaining of any particular postmaster in this regard. This matter is like insurance. How many of us would have taken out insurance policies if some energetic agents had not canvassed us and pointed out the virtues of the system? While this is an excellent system, it does not reach the people; by merely placing literature in the hands of postmasters, you cannot bring the matter before the public properly. I am glad to have this attention given to the subject, and I think we might look into it again and see, before the session is over, whether we cannot afford to adopt the 5 per cent basis. The government are not going to approach this matter in any niggardly spirit. We are not going to be on easy street as regards money; but we can always get money, and I am not disposed to resort to this merely as a means of getting money. If we can get money at fair rates and at the same time establish this as a means of encouraging thrift, by all means we ought to do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know the situation is much as has been stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). We might, perhaps, make a little headway if we were to apply the ordinary actuarial methods and find out where we are. My impression is that we can do much better than we have been doing. In this instance, we ought to be able to do business much more cheaply than insurance companies, although as a matter of fact, we are selling annuities generally more expensively than they are. I may be wrong, but I believe I am absolutely correct in that statement. What I mean is that you can get better rates from an insurance company paying a dividend than you can from the government which pays no dividend. We should be able to do better than they, because we are under no cost of investment for this scheme. The money all goes into the fund without paying any percentages or commissions or anything else to anybody. We have the money, and there is no expense whatever in connection with the administration of the fund as such. Therefore, again we should be able to do business a little more reasonably and profitably to the people of Canada than insurance companies could.

I appreciate what my hon. friend says as to the difficulty of raising rates. When the four per cent annuity was first started, we had the government borrowing at something like 3½ per cent, sometimes 3¼ per cent, and the idea of the annuity rate was a rate which would yield the annuitant a higher rate than government borrowing would. Ordinarily, that would be the case. Lately, however, we have been in the anomalous position—and I am to blame for it too; I am not criticizing my hon. friend for it at all; we should have taken up this matter before—that we have been actually paying more interest on a thirty-year debenture, at the end of which time the whole capital comes back, than we calculate our annuities at for a much less period. That, of course, is all out of joint; it is all wrong. You cannot expect to do very much with annuities on that basis. I think my hon. friend is right when he says that we are going to have cheaper money. If we get out a number of annuities at a higher rate, we are bound to lose money. While the government ought not to make money in this connection, it ought not to lose money, and therefore we should be careful. While that is quite true as regards long-term annuities, this annuity business can be looked upon as a liquid business, something similar to loans, and a higher rate can be properly applied to short-term annuities. One always pays more for a short-term annuity, and it is money which is just as useful as any other kind of annuity. We know, however, we are going to be paying a high rate of interest for some time ahead, and I would suggest to my hon. friend that he consider an extension of the rate, at least, as regards short-term annuities.

Mr. BOYS: I understood from the Minister of Labour that the raising of the rate was under consideration, whereas I understand from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that he had the matter looked into, but that the actuaries considered—

Mr. FIELDING: Not lately. Some time ago.

Mr. BOYS: Perhaps the Minister of Labour has taken the matter up again. When he reflects that on $15,000 at 6 per cent, which rate for ordinary investment purposes cannot be considered high, because hardly any investments pay less than 6 per cent except government securities—you get $900 return, and purchasing an annuity you get only $100 more on the basis now existing, surely he must realize that that is not attractive to any investor. One would sooner put his money out on a mortgage or some other absolutely safe security at 6 or 6½ per cent. There is no difficulty in getting 6½ per cent on absolutely safe investments to-day, and that would produce just about as much as the annuity does. In the one case, the money is gone and in the other, you have it. I hope the minister will take this matter up seriously and see if it cannot be placed on a 5 per cent basis. It is not surprising that the minister is not able at the moment to give these figures, because I understand this branch of the government service has recently come into his hands. It would, indeed, be somewhat remarkable if he could give these figures, although I thought he might, because we were discussing this matter some days ago and the officials knew what was wanted. These figures, however, are not available now, and I will content myself with the observation that I hope before many months we shall find this on a 5 per cent basis. I feel certain if we do that, a considerable amount of money will come into the treasury of Canada.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Coming back to the question of the number of employees in the minister's department, last evening the minister told us that it caused him a great deal of pain when he was forced to discharge an employee. We know that the minister has a very kindly disposition, and last year, possibly with that fact in view, the House helped him a good deal by asking him to reduce his estimates, thus taking upon itself the burden of the responsibility for the reduction accomplished in the number of employees. I would suggest now that if the minister, in his goodness of heart, does not want to take the initiative the House might again come to his assistance by formally requesting him to reduce his estimates another $10,000. No doubt he would come through this year, as he did last year, with flying colours and again thank the House for being instrumental in making the reduction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would draw my hon. friend's attention to some figures in connection with the cost of living and ask him to inform the committee what particular items are chiefly responsible for the unfortunate condition they reveal. I am referring to Michell's figures. These figures are printed in the Labour Gazette, so that the minister will know all about them. Michell shows that the cost of living in January, 1922, was 165.2 and in February last 176.3. The minister might tell us the different items that are working in the wrong direction.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend looks a little further down he will see that Michell's figures reflect trade conditions and do not deal with the cost of living as it is dealt with in the Labour department. His figures have reference to general trade conditions rather than to the actual cost of living.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister might inform us how Michell's figures are arrived at.

Mr, MURDOCK: I do not think I could begin to determine just how Michell prepares his figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are published in the Labour Gazette and I suppose they are understood by the Labour department. If they were not worth something they would not be in the Gazette. However, they may be used as padding.

Mr. MURDOCK: They are there as indicating the Michell view of trade conditions, and not as determining the upward or downward changes in the cost of living.

Mr. BOYS: As a matter of fact, is not the cost of living rising? The figure quoted the other evening, which was not contradicted at all by the minister, was 22 points. I am not quite familiar with the figures, but I think the quotation was some twenty odd points.

Mr. MURDOCK: Twenty-two points from what period?

Mr. BOYS: From last year.

Mr. MURDOCK: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. BOYS: Then perhaps the minister will give us the figures.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have here a chart which was prepared by the Labour department at the request of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) during the Lanark election, and which has now been brought up to date as at the end of March. This chart indicates that for December, 1921, when the present government took office, all the cost of living figures, that is to say, of the chief items such as foods, fuel, rent, clothing and such sundries, were 62 points above the 1913 cost of living figures. In April, 1922, the figure was 52 points, or a drop of 10 points. In July, 1922, it was also 52 points or 10 points below the December, 1921, figure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite right there? I think it was 55. In April it was 52, but the budget came and it went up 3 points.

Mr. MURDOCK: In July, 1922, the figure shown is 52.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am taking the minister's chart, by which I see that the figure is still climbing up. It is up to 60 now.

Mr. MURDOCK: In September, 1922, it was still 52, while in December of that year it had risen one point, or 53. For January, 1923, we find that it has risen another point, being at that time 54, while in February it remains the same. In March it was 55, or an increase of one point.

Mr. HANSON: So that it is going up.

Mr. MURDOCK: It shows a slight advance, as hon. gentlmen know there has always been in Canada for many years in the winter. With the increased cost of fuel and other winter necessities there has always been a slight increase.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that if the minister looks at his own chart closely he will not tell us that there is always an increase. His own chart shows that in 1920 there was a toboggan slide until you get to 1922. From 1920 it is going down all the time, winter included. There is practically a toboggan slide until my hon. friend gets fairly into the saddle. When the government gets the new mechanism to work the figures begin to climb up, and we desire to know the reason for their going up instead of down.

Mr. MURDOCK: There has been no exceptional change during the winter season. My hon. friend refers—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To your own chart.

Mr. MURDOCK: —with heroic declamation to the year 1920 and to the upward trend since that time. He declares that the figures have gone away up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Off the paper.

Mr. MURDOCK: No one knows better than my hon. friend that the increase prior to the great decline was due to the abnormal post-war increases of wages all over the United States and Canada. He knows also that immediately after July, 1920, everything started on the toboggan slide towards normal. In 1920 we had the 200 mark increase recorded on the chart, and it went above that. Subsequently it came down until we find it in 1922 at 156, or 56 points above the 1913 normal figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask my hon. friend to check me while I go over his chart, which I cannot read as well as he can. Take the year 1921. The drop in the cost of living in that year was some 38 points. Am I right?

Mr. MURDOCK: Right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And that since the time my friend was referring to in December 1921, when he took office, the drop in the cost of living as recorded by his department on his own chart is just two points.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, my hon. friend is in error. There was a ten point drop.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not going through all the ups and downs of his curve. Is not the difference between now and then two points?

Mr. MURDOCK: Up to the 31st day of March last there is a seven-point drop as compared with the figures for December 1921.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then will my hon. friend please tell me how he gets seven on his chart for that year, because he will see that for the end of 1921 it shows 157 and for March 31st of this year, where his chart stops, it shows 155?

Mr. MURDOCK: Evidently the hon. gentleman is looking at something entirely different to what I am dealing with.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the chart of the department referred to by my friend.

Mr. MURDOCK: But it does not contain all the facts. Evidently the hon. gentleman has not got his chart brought up to date. The one I have before me is brought up to March 1923.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So is this. I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, if the department is giving us incorrect information It may be that the minister is all right, and his statisticians are all wrong. I am going to send this map over to the minister and ask him to correct it so we can get at the facts.

Mr. MURDOCK: There does not appear to be any difference between these two.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so. I again put the question to the minister: Am I not right when I say, looking at his map, that the index number at the end of 1921 was 157, and at the end of March this year was 155?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. I am told there are some typographical errors in the printing, December and September having been transposed, and that the index figure did show 156 at the conclusion of 1921.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 156; and to-day it is 155?

Mr. MURDOCK: 155 as of March 31.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So the net result for a little more than a year—fifteen months—is one degree.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend realizes that it fell from 156 to 152 and has gradually risen to 155 since December last.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so. I was sympathizing with the minister, Mr. Chairman. He used to make tremendous speeches against the sales tax and that sort of thing, pointing out what a burden it was. We got the cost of living travelling down nicely until April of that year, and then in came the new budget and the figure went up again. My friend is doing his best to straddle it, but it is lifting him.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not draw an answer from the minister in respect to the number of employees in his department. He very kindly listened to what I had to say and then smiled as if he probably would take advantage of the suggestion I made; but he did not tell us anything. Last night I pointed out that he had twenty statistical clerks in 5 p.m. his office. He has a department which is spending about a million and a half dollars. Let us suppose a business house doing a business of, say, a million and a half dollars, and then let us consider the overhead such a business would be carrying if it employed 97 clerks and 27 statistical clerks. Could such a business be considered at any time as properly managed if so over-staffed? I think the minister had better take advantage of the way the matter was handled last year. Why not adopt our suggestion of a reduction of $10,000 in these estimates and let some of these men go to work? We are getting back to better times this summer, probably, and these men had better be engaged in some productive work.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $35,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: This amount has been voted for a number of years.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why?

Mr. MURDOCK: To pay those who, in connection with boards of investigation, inquire into industrial disputes. The amount for this particular fiscal year is overdrawn $4,000, and there is before the committee in the Supplementary Estimates a request for $4,000. In other words, the expenditures for the past fiscal year have been $39,000. We believe though that we can get along with $35,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. MANION: How many industrial disputes were there in Canada this year as compared with last year and the year before?

Mr. MURDOCK: Disputes or strikes?

Mr. MANION: I really meant strikes.

Mr. MURDOCK: Of course, there are many disputes where no strikes result. There were eighty-five strikes in existence in Canada in the calendar year 1922, which was fifteen less than in 1921. In 1922, however, the total number of employees affected, and consequently the time loss, was greater than in the previous year. When we come to analyse the figures however we see that the increase in the number of employees affected and the time loss is attributable largely to fifteen strikes which commenced in the previous year, in the month of May, I think, and which had their genesis in the movement which started in the Untied States for the forty-four hour week. I am referring particularly to a number of strikes in the printing trades which started in May, 1921, and which, as a matter of fact are nominally, and so far as the records of our department are concerned, still in effect in various printing establishments throughout Canada, but what damage as a strike they are doing, I could not say without investigation of each individual case. There were also the two large coal strikes which it might be said were wings of the main army of coal strikes which commenced in the central competitive coal fields of the United States last year.

Mr. MANION: That is in Alberta and Cape Breton?

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. MURDOCK: Alberta and Nova Scotia. The number of employees affected and the time loss resulting from these disputes if deducted for the last year would give us a time loss of 169,185 working days lower than in any year except 1902 and 1915. In 1922 there were only seventeen strikes in the building trades, affecting 1,396 employees and involving a time loss of 28,247 days. Of these only three caused a time loss of more than 5,000 days. Six of the seventeen lasted less than seven days, and only five continued thirty days or more. In 1921 there were thirty-six strikes in the building trades, affecting 4,004 employees and involving a time loss of 153,-372 days.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister tell the committee how many threatened strikes were prevented from culminating in a strike by the conciliation method under the old Lemieux Act? I want just the figures for last year and the year before.

Mr. MURDOCK: In 1919-1920 there were 72 applications for boards of investigation and 46 boards were granted. In three cases in which the dispute was submitted to a board of investigation a strike was not averted; in other words, three strikes resulted. In 1920-1921 the number of applications for boards of investigation was 63, and the number of boards granted was 37 with six strikes resulting. In 1921-1922, the number of applications for boards of investigation was 49 and the number of boards granted was 31. In one case where the dispute was submitted to a board of investigation a strike resulted. For the past year there were 39 applications for boards of investigation, and 27 boards were granted. In two cases strikes were not averted.

Mr. ARTHURS: Are those two included in the applications granted?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. Those were two cases where a strike resulted after a board had been granted, and had sat and filed an award. It is only proper to say, however, in connection with the one big strike where the time loss was most in evidence, that is the strike in District No. 18, involving the coal mines of Alberta and British Columbia, the board was only granted and finally got to the point of functioning on the 31st day of March, and the strike had been ordered to commence on the 1st day of April, or the very next day; so there was no possibility under the circumstances of preventing that strike in what was just one little wing of the general coal miners' strike in the United States. It was finally settled on the same basis as the general coal miners' strike in the United States.

Mr. MANION: In what lines of industry are these requests granted, and secondly, outside of these regular lines in which requests for boards are granted, does the department ever take part in bringing about a conciliation board?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh, yes. Very frequently there are cases where municipal employees, for instance, ask for a board of investigation. We have two or three such pending now. In these cases the department is not free under the law to say arbitrarily that a board shall be appointed, but we at once accept an application for a board whether it comes from the employees or the employer, and it is the employees as a rule, and in such a case we ask the municipality if they are willing to become party to a board of investigation of the dispute which has been referred to us. If they indicate their desire to participate in such an investigation, we ask them to name a representative on the board, which presumably the employees have already done, and then ask the two to choose a chairman, and so on. In other words, we help in every way possible to bring about the formation of a board, to delay a strike and bring about an investigation of the differences involved to see if a satisfactory settlement cannot be arrived at. That must be our attitude on all disputes, excepting those which affect public utilities or coal mines. We have under the act, as hon. gentlemen know, no jurisdiction over very many of the disputes that occur from time to time. For instance, in the case of disputes in the building trades or in the steel works at Sydney, Nova Scotia, we have no authority, under the law, to arbitrarily say "You shall do this or you shall do the other thing." The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act does not apply in the case of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, but the department has always stood ready and anxious to use its friendly offices and to suggest any possible means of bringing the parties together and getting a thorough discussion of the questions in dispute.

Mr. MANION: Just to finish the subject, will the minister enumerate in a few words the different lines of industry which have the right, under the act, to get conciliation boards?

Mr. MURDOCK: The railroads and coal mines.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask if the government cannot find it possible to extend the application of the Industrial Disputes Act so as to cover cases that are not at present covered? For example, there is the case of public utilities. As the principle of public control extends, and municipal enterprises grow a larger and larger number of workmen come under public utilities but apparently these have not the same opportunities as if they were in the employ of private concerns. Only the other day my attention was drawn to a telegram that was sent to the Minister of Labour from the Canadian Electrical Workers Union to the following effect:

> I am instructed to ask if Toronto Transportation Commission comes within provision of Industrial Disputes Act. Reasons for question is possible dispute with Toronto Transportation Commission and if they come under act strike would in all probability be averted. Have not yet broken off negotiations with commission but fear that attitude of commission will not be satisfactory to electrical workers employed. Please reply by return.

I believe the reply received from the Deputy Minister of Labour was to the effect that the Industrial Disputes Act did not apply in this case. I now ask, would it not be possible to introduce legislation this session which would bring these industries, publicly owned, under this act and thus prevent strikes of this character?

Mr. MURDOCK: First of all, I should give my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) a little further explanation. I told him a little while ago that railroads and coal mines, under the act, have the right to be granted investigation boards. I should have included also certain public utilities, such as gas plants or waterworks supplying a city. It has been held—I do not know whether it is right or not; I do not know whether the contention would be upheld—that only those classes can insist, under the law, on a board of investigation.

In answer to my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) I can say that nothing I know of would please me better than to even suggest that it might be possible to do what I understand he contemplates. The Labour department is criticized for very many acts of omission or commission. I do hope, however, that no hon. gentleman, or any other citizen of Canada, is going to criticize the department because the British North America Act, many years ago, gave the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights within provincial limits. At this particular time I am told—not being a legal man I cannot say with any certainty—that law prevents the possibility of extending the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act so as to include the undertakings to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago. It might also be of interest to my hon.

friend and to the committee if I stated that in the case of the first three or four, possibly more, proposed investigations that came to the Labour department after I took office it was questioned whether any right whatsoever existed under the act, excepting in the case of a railroad, to compel the appointment and meeting of a board of investigation, under the provisions of the act. In other words, my hon. friend will be interested in knowing that it has been seriously questioned whether the act is not ultra vires—I think that is the legal term—of the Dominion authority entirely. My answer to that position in every case was: We at least know what the spirit and intent of the act is. The spirit and intent of the act is that opportunity shall be afforded of meeting and discussing matters of difference; presenting them before presumably an unbiassed tribunal, or a tribunal of which it is hoped at least one member is unbiassed; and after a full and frank discussion of all the points of difference, seeing if we cannot arrive at some common basis of settlement. That is the underlying spirit of the act, and I am glad indeed to say that the majority of the employers throughout the length and breadth of Canada accept the act in that spirit. I may say concretely and in answer to my hon. friend's question, I do not think it is possible to extend—but this is only my own personal opinion—the provisions of the act so as to compulsorily make it applicable to all disputes that may occur in the various municipalities throughout the Dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have one other question, and that is as to whether it is not possible to do something at the present time in connection with what threatens to be a serious condition down in Cape Breton. It has been my responsibility on several occasions in this House to call attention to the difficulties there, and it would seem as if very strained relations now exist between the employers—the British Empire Steel Corporation—and their employees—the steel workers and the coal miners. I am not particularly concerned as to who has jurisdiction in this dispute. It may be quite true that the British North America Act makes it difficult for this House, or the department, to act in certain provincial matters; but it does seem to me that the Department of Labour ought to be held responsible for initiating such legislation, or for bringing before the people such measures, as will prevent possible outbreaks in that Nova Scotia district. I think that a great many people have clearly recognized that the conditions there are now rather unique—a huge corporation controlling practically the whole of the industries of that part of the country, there being apparently a small population there and no large body of what has often been termed "neutral opinion". Under these circumstances, the employees are being forced to direct action. A letter was forwarded only a few days ago to the Prime Minister which I should like to read, for the information of this committee:

> We desire to call your attention to the following facts. Some three weeks ago, Mr. Roy Wolvin, president of the British Empire Steel Corporation, addressed a closed meeting of the Sydney board of trade. His address was of such a character in his own estimation, that although reporters of the local newspapers were present, it was suppressed as being unfit for publication at his request.
> However, we have been reliably informed that he stated to the members of the board of trade, that it was up to them to drive the radicals out of Cape Breton, or he would withdraw his capital from this island and allow the grass to grow on the streets of Sydney.
> As a direct result of this suppressed speech a second meeting of the board of trade was held in Sydney this present week, an account of which you may find in the Sydney Record of March 28th. The heading of the article reads: "Citizens call for drive to wipe out Bolshevism in Cape Breton". The particular brand of "Bolshevism" which the board of trade is going to stamp out is described as "Cape Breton Bolshevism". The whole resolution breathes the spirit of Mussolini without having the open courage of Mussolini behind it.
> "Cape Breton Bolshevism" consists in the working class of Cape Breton employed in the steel works and the coal mines exercising the right handed down to them by their British forefathers to walk off the steel plant to the last man employed and to walk out of the coal mines and leave the directors of the British Empire Steel Corporation to care for these plants as best they may. This right is being exercised in Cape Breton because of the fierce exploitation of labour carried on by the British Empire Steel Corporation.
> We are writing this to inform you and your government that ten thousand working men in Cape Breton are accepting the challenge of the Sydney board of trade and are inviting them to start in now and drive out the humblest "Bolshevic" in our ranks. We also demand that a thorough investigation by your government be made into the speech delivered by Wolvin before the Sydney board of trade, which was suppressed.
> Copies of this letter are being forwarded to the Hon. E. H. Armstrong, and C. C. Curtis, president of the Sydney Board of Trade.

Mr. SHAW: Could my hon. friend inform the House as to whether or not the Roy Wolvin referred to is the Roy Wolvin, an employee of the Standard Shipping Company, whose operations in fixing rates on the Great Lakes have been the subject of investigation by a special commission?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have understood so. I have nothing more to add, Mr. Chairman, except that it seems to me to be a serious situation, and that the government of Canada, whether it has the protection of the right of property in the provinces or not, has the protection of the citizens of this country in its charge, and that something ought to be done to prevent this matter developing further.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and I are surely going to agree on one thing, and that is that this is a serious situation which should be dealt with in some way, and it has been a serious situation for a number of years. But I hope the hon. member will admit the limitations of the federal Department of Labour to deal with the questions involved. The British Empire Steel Corporations is operating, as I understand, under a Nova Scotia charter; the mines, the steel works and the other properties of that company are in the province of Nova Scotia. The disputes that have occurred from time to time have occurred in Nova Scotia, and on every occasion, that the Labour department has had an opportunity to do so, it has indicated a readiness to do, within the law, everything possible to bring about, by investigation or otherwise, a settlement of the controversies. As I said a few days ago, one of the first official acts I was called upon to perform, about the 1st of January, 1922, was to appoint a chairman for a board of investigation in regard to the coal mine situation in Nova Scotia, which board had been authorized and established and was waiting the appointment of a chairman when this government took office. It is not necessary to go into a discussion of what developed out of that investigation. Some members might very truthfully say to me—and I would not dispute it if they did—that worse than nothing came out of the investigation held in the early part of 1922. But is that to be charged to the Labour department? Is that to be charged to this government? Is there any coercive right vested in the Labour department or in this government that gives us authority to say "Thou shalt" or "Thou shalt not" to either employer or employee? If there is I know nothing of it. But still it is very easy, in fact it is customary, when any dispute develops in any part of the country, in any walk of life, to turn to the federal Labour department, which may not have, under the law, anything to do with it, and to criticize that department for its omissions or its commissions in the matter. I am sure my hon. friends will recognize the fact that we have in Canada nine provinces, most of which have Labour departments with certain duties, functions and rights, that the Labour department of the federal government has only the rights conceded to it under the law and, that it is ready and willing to do anything it can to bring about thorough investigation with a view to the settlement of the disputes.

In regard to the particular situation that my hon. friend speaks of in Nova Scotia, what do we find at the present moment? What might be termed a club is held over the heads of the people of Nova Scotia, by labour, it is said. In other words, it has been indicated that a strike is going to occur on the 1st day of April unless 30 per cent increased compensation be granted, unless an eight-hour day be conceded and unless a check-off system be recognized by the employing company. As the Labour department of the federal government we might be interested in that, but I would like any hon. member to indicate to me how, in any particular, we can interfere and say "Thou shalt" or "Thou shalt not" to either employer or employee concerned. In other words, we have absolute limitations that I hope my hon. friends will appreciate before holding, as people are sometimes too ready to do, the Labour department responsible for all the disputes that are inevitable.

In the case of the Nova Scotia situation, as soon as the Labour department heard the proposal that a strike was likely to occur on the 1st day of April, one of the most capable and experienced officers of the department was sent down to Sydney, to suggest that the friendly offices of the department, through an investigation or in any other consistent way under the law, were available for the use of the workmen concerned, and we were given to understand that the men and committees were amply sufficient by themselves to deal with the matter. That is the situation that we find ourselves in as regards certain industrial disputes that we have no jurisdiction over.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the province of Nova Scotia a Labour department?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not a separate department or minister. In fact, a number of the provinces have not a separate Labour department. I think there are only two or three provinces that have what might be called a separate Labour department.

Mr. SPENCER: Where a province has not a separate Labour department, the minister's department would feel freer to act in the discussion.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, rather more hesitant to act, because if there were a separate Labour department, as there are in certain provinces, we would feel freer as individuals with a common aim and ambition in mind, to get into touch with that Labour department and to say: "Is there any way in which we can help and co-operate with you as regards this particular dispute"? Where there was not a separate Labour department, we might find ourselves approaching someone not so sympathetic to the question of a Labour department, and possibly more taken up with the operation of some other particular department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it within the power of the Dominion government, according to the Minister of Labour, to make a thorough investigation of conditions which prevail in Cape Breton, to go thoroughly into the question of the British Empire Steel Corporation, its finances, the hold it has on the country, its connections with steel companies south of the line, the control exerted over its policies by the United States companies? Is it possible that an investigation of this kind could be had? If so, would it not do a great deal to eliminate the causes of unrest?

Mr. MURDOCK: Someone has said:"All things are possible;" but in this particular case, as I said a little while ago, this concern is working under a provincial charter in a province that, according to my understanding. has exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights. I am not a lawyer, but I think I am stating the position correctly. That being the case, I do not know just how much latitude there is for one person or one government or one province to butt into the affairs of another. I realize that a good deal of this is indulged in; but I do not believe it would be regarded as altogether the proper thing when all of the provinces have jurisdiction and authority over such matters as those to which the hon. members refers. As to the necessity and propriety of the investigation that he speaks of, that is another matter, and one on which possibly I should not at the moment express my personal view.

Mr. BOYS: I understood the minister to say that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act had application to coal mines, railways and certain public utilities. I confess at once that I am not as familiar with the act as I would like to be. I come from a very peaceful part of Ontario, and we are not troubled very much with strikes. We have had only one in the history of my experience in Simcoe. I was wondering where the minister gets the authority for that statement.

Mr. MURDOCK: I might give a concrete example. Right at the present moment we have in course of formation a board of conciliation for a gas works in a certain city in the Dominion of Canada. The department has, I understand, for some time prior to the date I took office, regarded it as its absolute right to assume jurisdiction in a matter of this kind, as being a public utility that could reasonably be regarded as being within the law.

Mr. BOYS: It may be that there is some amendment that I am not familiar with, but section 5 of the act reads:

> Wherever any dispute exists between an employer and any of his employees, and the parties thereto are unable to adjust it, either of the parties to the dispute may make application to the minister for the appointment of a board of conciliation and investigation, to which board the dispute may be referred under the provisions of this act.

It is true there is in that section a proviso which specifically deals with railway companies, but I do not think that would warrant the statement of the minister. I am not saying he is wrong; I do not know. If he is right, it might be proper to consider an extension of the act. If again the reason that the act is not extended is because of property and civil rights, how then can there be any jurisdiction regarding a coal mine which is located in one province? I imagine in most cases the operations of a coal mine in a province are pursuant to a charter issued by that province. If the objection is that property and civil rights belong exclusively to the province, I do not see why a coal mine would come within the provisions of the act. At all events there are the two propositions. That is one, and the other is: What limitation is there to the wide-open provisions of section 5 of the act?

Mr. MURDOCK: To deal with the point that is now before us, we should turn to section 2 of the act and read the definition of employer:

> "Employer" means any person, company or corporation employing ten or more persons and owing or operating any mining property, agency of transportation or communication, or public service utility, including, except as hereinafter provided, railways, whether operated by steam, electricity or other motive power, steamships, telegraph and telephone lines, gas, electric light, water and power works, or any number of such persons, companies or corporations acting together, or who in the opinion of the minister have interest in common.

Mr. IRVINE: What can the Department of Labour do in case of an industrial dispute? What is its power?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is a very large order from my hon. friend. If both employer and employees adopt the same attitude in a controversy—that is certain individuals presuming to speak for employers at times and certain individuals presuming to speak for employees at times—the Labour department can do absolutely nothing; they are powerless under any legal rights that at present a Labour department would have. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, as I think has been very aptly suggested, is only for the purpose of bringing the parties together to reason, thresh out and determine as between each other their mutual differences with a view of arriving, if possible, at a mutually satisfactory understanding. It might be very aptly described as an intended league of industry and labour. But if either industry or labour or both bow their necks and go around with a chip on their shoulders and are ready to fight first, last and all the time, then this league of nations in a modified form would be absolutely useless. In a few cases in the past where this disposition has been shown by certain individuals this league has proved absolutely useless in preventing discord and strikes as a result of disputes.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand the reasoning of the minister in this regard to be that if employees are firm in their demand and if employees through their representatives are equally firm in theirs, so that there is a deadlock, then the department can do nothing? Is not that the only case in which the department would be required to do anything? If there is a disposition on the part of the contending parties to come to an agreement they do not need government assistance. But if the minister is correct in the statement that when there is a real fight the department is hopeless and helpless, why spend $35,000 in carrying it on?

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend only had a little experience in connection with the aims, ambitions and contentions of labour he would not make any such statement as we have just heard. Unfortunately he was not in the House a few moments ago when I gave some figures in regard to the accomplishments of this particular act which he now tries to hold up as useless except when both sides bow their necks. We find that since 1907 there have been 597 applications made for boards of investigation, not by individuals, either employers or employees, who were ready, as my hon. friend suggests, to bow their necks and not do anything, but by citizens of Canada who were presumably desirous of reaching common ground with those opposed to them in the particular disputes. As I say, 597 applications were made, and 428 boards have been granted under the law during the period I have mentioned. As a result of the appointment of these 428 boards during the time the law has been in force, a settlement was reached by negotiation, in accordance with the underlying intent of the act, in all but 36 cases. In 36 cases it was impossible, by negotiation, by compromise, or by discussion among the parties, to bring about a settlement of the questions in dispute, and strikes resulted.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister apparently takes the view that I suggested that the act was not of any value. I asked him a question as to what the department could do in cases of dispute and he told me that if there were a real dispute in which each side held to its position the department could do nothing. I accepted that as a correct statement of the situation. Now the minister moves his ground seemingly and says that the department can do something and has done so in 428 cases.

Mr. MURDOCK: I said no such thing.

Mr. IRVINE: What did the minister say?

Mr. MURDOCK: I said that where in 36 cases a settlement was not reached the department was powerless; and in any cases where both sides bow their necks and say they will have nothing in the form of a settlement the Department of Labour is powerless. But the intent of the act is to afford Canadian citizens, who have disputes, an opportunity to come to a mutual agreement; and in 95 per cent of the investigations held a settlement is effected where this spirit is manifested.

Mr. IRVINE: I would say that the minister was badly advised in basing the interpretation of the powers of the act on the 36 cases in which a settlement was not reached, and in omitting to mention the 400 odd cases in which it operated.

Item agreed to.

Canada Gazette, $45,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: This item is for the printing of the Canada Gazette. It may be noted that there is a reduction of $6,000, based on the belief that we can get along with that much less money for the current year. The expenditure for the period from April 1, 1922, to December 31 last, was $26,318.89 and the expenditure for the fiscal year 1921-22 was $43,345. We are asking for $45,000 in this item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Cannot the minister give the expenditure for the fiscal year ending March 31 last?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not the figures for 1922-23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount being asked now is more than was spent in 1921-22?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, a little less than $2,000 more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that the contract for the printing of the Gazette calls for just the same amount as it did for the year before? I think that is what the minister said the other day?

Mr. MURDOCK: Are we not getting the Labour Gazette and the Canada Gazette mixed? The Canada Gazette is the official record of orders in council and other things—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK: —and is printed in the Printing bureau. That is not the Labour Gazette.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no need of the Canada Gazette having this union label on it apparently?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, there has not been any general demand for it yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Referring to the Labour Gazette again, I understand I am right in assuming that it costs just the same now to print as it did a year ago.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think that the master printers generally throughout Canada have changed their tabulated rates for printing. There is a schedule of rates in effect which is 10 per cent higher west of the Great Lakes. If any printing is done in any office anywhere in Canada, no matter what the printer may claim for that printing, he is paid on the basis of this schedule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. But the company that the hon. minister deals with pays the printers; he does not pay them. He has a contract with the company. Now, does that contract call for the same amount of money as it did a year ago with the old company that did not suit him for some reason he could not explain other than that they were not Liberals?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have long since passed that item. I am not altogether clear as to whether slightly more is being paid per month for printing the Labour Gazette than was paid a year or two years ago, but I think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is no less?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MURDOCK: I would not say it is no less. I will get an itemized statement for my right hon. friend indicating what the cost of printing the Labour Gazette has been per month for the last five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that with that statement he also submit particulars of the size of the Gazette. I may tell my hon. friend that though this is a good Liberal firm that has the contract now, I understand it is getting the same amount as was paid its predecessors.

Mr. MURDOCK: I did not know that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all the minister did know the other day. I am sorry if he has lost that little bit of information.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend is mistaken. The other day I was asked if there were some good Liberals in the firm, and I think I intimated that possibly there might be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I think that is about the residuum of information he had on the question. I know there are myself, so if his information wants supplementing in any way I can help him. It is Simon pure information. There is no doubt as to the party fidelity and prejudice of the firm, not the least. My information is that the Gazette that is now being printed is smaller than the old Gazette, but the amount of money paid for its printing is just the same—the balance is so much extra party remuneration. I should like therefore the information the minister has promised to also indicate the value that is being obtained for this printing, giving the dimensions of the Gazette, the number of pages, and so forth.

Mr. MARLER: I suppose this item is made by contract?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know just what it is the right hon. gentleman desires, because I am quite sure that his information in regard to the printing of the Labour Gazette is entirely inaccurate, and we should, for the relief of the right hon. gentleman himself, clear up his doubts. I would ask him to tabulate just exactly what he requires, because I want that information as badly as he does and in as detailed form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last time I asked the question the minister said he could not understand me, nor could anybody else. His leader rose just afterwards and told him exactly what I wanted. As it is now six o'clock I will admit that his leader or any other hon. member could understand me.

The CHAIRMAN: It being six o'clock I do leave the Chair.

Mr. MURDOCK: We seem to have this six o'clock touch every night.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MURDOCK: Before we rose at six o'clock I was asked what the expenditure on this item was for the past fiscal year. Up until December 31st last the expenditure was $26,318.89, and for the preceding whole fiscal year $43,345.17. The committee possibly are unaware that this is a self-sustaining item so far as the Printing bureau is concerned. The committee is being asked to vote $45,000 for the printing of the Canada Gazette during the fiscal year, but the revenue derived from the printing of the Gazette is equal to, if not slightly greater than the amount which we are now asking the committee to vote.

Mr. BOYS: There is no contract, as I understand it. You simply pay according to the contents, so much per line, I suppose.

Mr. MURDOCK: This is to reimburse the Printing bureau for the cost of printing the Canada Gazette. The work is done at the Printing bureau, and this $45,000 is to pay the wages of the men who are employed, overhead and so forth.

Mr. BOYS: Pardon me. I thought the minister was answering the question of the leader of the Opposition regarding the Labour Gazette.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, this is the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BOYS: The Labour Gazette is not under contract either? It is so much per line, I suppose, and the cost depends upon the length?

Mr. MURDOCK: When the leader of the Opposition comes in, if he desires further information on the Labour Gazette I have additional information here indicating just how this matter was handled when the change was made, and on what basis the change was made. We have the order in council, which may be of interest to the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am wondering whether it is not possible in the interests of economy to change the form of printing the Canada Gazette, the form in which a great deal of information is given. I am speaking now on behalf of a good many of the ordinary people, who perhaps are not familiar with legal phraseology and with the very elaborate governmental forms which hitherto have been carried out. I have in my hand a number which I picked up almost at random, and here is a proclamation:

Byng of Vimy
(L.S.)

Canada

George the Fifth, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.

To Our Beloved and Faithful the Senators of the Dominion of Canada, and the members elected to serve in the House of Commons of Our said Dominion, and to each and every of you,—Greeting:—

A Proclamation

Whereas Our Parliament of Canada stands prorogued to Saturday, the twenty-fifth day of the month of February, 1922, at which time at Our City of Ottawa, you were held and constrained to appear, Nevertheless, for certain causes and considerations, We do will, by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada, That you and each of you, be as to Us, in this matter, entirely exonerated: commanding, and by the tenor of these presents enjoining you, and each of you, and all others in this behalf interested that on Wednesday, the eighth day of the month of March next, at Our City of Ottawa aforesaid, personally you be and appear, for the despatch of business to treat, do, act and conclude upon these things which Our said Parliament of Canada, by the Common Council of Our said Dominion, may, by the favour of God, be ordained.

In Testimony Whereof We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent and the Great Seal of Canada to be hereunto affixed. Witness: Our Right Trusty and Well-Beloved Julian Hedworth George, Baron Byng of Vimy, General on the Retired List and in the Reserve of Officers of Our Army, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distiguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Member of Our Royal Victorian Order, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Our Dominion of Canada.

At Our Government House, in Our City of Ottawa, in Our said Dominion, this third day of February, in the year of Our Lord one thousand and nine hundred and twenty-two. and in the twelfth year of Our Reign.

By Command,
THOMAS MULVEY,
Under-Secretary of State.

Which, if I can wade through and really interpret, means that the Senate is being adjourned from the 25th of February to the 8th of March. Then follow other proclamations and orders in council. I have seen a number of them, one after the other, in which the phraseology and these titles are repeated. Now I am not discussing orders and titles, but if it is necessary to give them somewhere in the Canada Gazette why not give them at the very beginning once and for all, and then state in the most concise manner possible the business of the country and the notices to be given? Perhaps if I were an older member of this House I would hesitate to speak frankly about this matter, but it does seem to me most absurd that in a democratic country we should not adopt some little more democratic and modern means of giving information as to the transactions of the country. Here is a large and bulky volume of the Canada Gazette. We talk about curtailing expenses along a lot of lines. I think we might well begin by curtailing expenses right here in this House by simplifying these forms, as other forms have been simplified in other times and places.

Item agreed to.

Printing Bureau—plant, repairs and renewals, $30,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What amount was spent last year on these repairs?

Mr. MURDOCK: This item is for general plant renewals and includes upkeep. This is the same amount that was voted for the fiscal year 1922-23. The expenditure for the past fiscal year was only $7,091.33. Expenditure for the fiscal year 1921-22 amounted to $17,488.10. This amount is asked for the following reasons. For the total plant valuation of $350,000 a vote of $30,000 for general plant repairs, renewals and upkeeps is believed to be reasonable, being less than the usual commercial provision of 10 per cent for such purposes. While it is true that the plant could be carried on for an uncertain period on a smaller vote, such a procedure woud be undesirable, and the inevitable result would be depreciated and obsolete machinery giving smaller production, growing labour expense and accumulative expenditure on repairs which, although to some extent hidden in the payrolls would nevertheless exist and a continuation of the former policy of granting a $30,000 vote for general plant repairs, renewals and upkeep, together with a minimum vote for new plant, would tend to bring back the former condition without consideration of the attendant evils of overstaffing. I have here an outline of what may be needed in the general plant renewals and it is believed that the amount needed is within the mark. I can give the details of expenditures for the last fiscal year:

Hand composing division	$ 352 97
Monotype division	5,868 50
Linotype division	4,505 36
Stereotype	81 78
Press	1,833 63
Bindery	2,138 17

And so on for various other items totalling, as I said, $17,488.10. During the last two fiscal years, as I have indicated, the full amount of appropriation voted by parliament has not been used, but it is believed that it may be necessary to use almost the entire amount of the present appropriation for the purpose of plant renewals.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HANSON: What new plant is contemplated for this year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The following plant is provided for:

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me it refers more to renewals than new machinery. A few moments ago, in connection with another item, the minister said that he was making renewals of machines. Now we are called upon to vote another amount for further renewals. The minister told us that the machinery should be renewed on the basis of ten per cent a year. I can tell him that the Finance department will not allow renewal on any such basis as that when you go to pay taxes. Yet in this case, instead of showing ten per cent, it shows nearly a twenty per cent renewal.

Mr. MURDOCK: What would the hon. gentleman suggest? He is probably more familiar with depreciation than I am. Is ten per cent too much for depreciation incident to the upkeep of a $350,000 Printing bureau?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I suggest to the minister that he should not have two accounts, mix up renewals with new machines and tell us that these are all renewals.

Mr. MURDOCK: If the hon. member will follow me in the particular items, he will see that item 299 was definitely specified as "Printing bureau, plant repairs and renewals", while item 300, which we are now dealing with, is specifically presented as "Printing bureau plant, new," and, therefore, these items aggregating $45,000 which I have read to the committee represent new plant, excepting that I think in three cases we are eliminating certain obsolete machinery that is out of date and should be renewed by new machines. For instance, if my hon. friend would come down to the Printing bureau, which I hope he will, and look at one of these big cutting machines there which we propose to discard, and observe how it vibrates almost the entire building every time it comes down, he would understand the position. We have moved it from the third floor to the lower floor, so as to eliminate, as far as possible, unnecessary vibration which is detrimental to the building, but even now, it would well pay this government to discard that machine on the basis proposed, considering the length of time it has been in service and the other conditions referred to. I hope my hon. friends will understand that I do not set myself up as being an expert on Printing bureau requisites. I am taking the advice and the experience of gentlemen dealing with these matters.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We are not saying that the minister knows his department thoroughly, and he need not excuse himself on that account particularly. In respect to this item, when a minister produces an item, part of which is marked renewal, and part of which is new, the new part means entirely new plant, and does not mean the replacement of old plant at all, and he has shown us that he is substituting new machinery and throwing out some of the old machinery. He tells us at the very commencement that he must put in renewals of this plant up to a certain percentage, and, instead of relying upon a ten per cent renewal, I claim that he is making a twenty per cent renewal. I say that if he were running a commercial business, his financial department would not allow him any such renewal at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did he not keep the old machines too long?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Now that we have all this new plant, would it be possible to print the Labour Gazette in the Printing bureau?

Mr. MURDOCK: That matter has been receiving attention since February, 1922, and considering the discussion that has occurred and the suggestions that have emanated from the so-called labour representatives on this committee, I think it will be possible to do as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many more months of consideration is likely to be given to the subject?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think we ought to be able to come to a determination very shortly. If it were only a question of making up my mind individually, I am sure that it could be done, but, of course, I have to confer with and carry out suggestions and instructions of council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no instructions. The minister is in charge of the department. This is a departmental matter. Surely he does not have to persuade his colleagues on a detail like this. He has now had, according to his own calculation, fourteen months to consider the question of having the Labour Gazette printed in the Printing bureau. How many more months he will require he does not know, and he attributes the delay to slow-thinking colleagues. Perhaps he can inform the House who are the worst of them in that respect.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure my hon. friend understands that it is necessary to pass an order in council to deal with this matter and determine how the Labour Gazette shall be printed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under what act?

Mr. MURDOCK: It took an order in council to determine the location of the work incident to the printing of the Labour Gazette, and perhaps my hon. friend would be interested in hearing read the order in council and the documents which I have here in connection with that. I brought them here because such a marked interest has been displayed in that matter, and I want the committee to have all the information I have.

Mr. CHAPLIN: A few minutes ago the minister told us about one of his machines racking the building. I was rather apprehensive that he might be coming shortly to the committee for a new building to put the machine in. I hope he will assure us that the change he is making will obviate the necessity of erecting a new building.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MURDOCK: There is an item, as I am sure the committee will observe, for a new building, to be dealt with later.

Mr. HANSON: Under what statute is it necessary to pass an order in council to provide that the Labour Gazette shall be printed in the Printing bureau?

Mr. MURDOCK: There is no specific statute that determines that particular question, but for some twenty years the Labour Gazette has been printed outside the Printing bureau for certain specific reasons that were held to be sufficient to warrant an order in council being passed to authorize the printing of the Labour Gazette outside of the Printing bureau. It is quite true, as my hon. friend suggests, that such condition could be changed and the Labour Gazette could be printed in the Printing bureau, but, as I frankly stated some days ago, for the reason that it has always been regarded as desirable to have the union label on the Labour Gazette, it has been by order in council printed for some twenty years outside the Printing bureau.

Mr. HANSON: Is it because you want the union label on the Gazette that it is printed outside the bureau? Is that the only reason? It does not seem to me to be a good business reason. It may be a good political reason.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend should not say "you". It has been considered necessary, in order to have the union label on the Labour Gazette, to issue an order in council to have it printed outside the Printing bureau.

Mr. HANSON: That is the only reason?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Distribution of parliamentary documents and other government publications, $40,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many people distribute these documents and from where?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have an establishment in the Printing bureau to distribute these documents and then there is in addition the House of Commons Distribution office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just wondering whether the minister had thought of looking after the whole of the distribution and of cutting down the double staffs. The war is over now, unemployment is gone and all troubles have ceased. Has the minister had time to look after domestic economies yet?

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend had been in the House during most of the time that my estimates have been on, he would have heard my being taken to task for economies by cutting down the establishment. It has been intimated to me that I have put the Labour department right out of business and various other things of that character have been said because I have undertaken to cut out unnecessary expenditure by getting rid of employees whom we thought we could do without and at the same time properly function and carry on all the necessary work of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether the minister has any designs, good, bad or indifferent as regards the department, whether he is scrapping it, whether he is looking after it, or anything else. He may be doing any of these things. I do not know. I do not know whether he thinks the department is a good thing or not; but has he considered the advisability of combining the distributing forces into one? How many have we on our distributing staff and what weight of periodicals is distributed?

Mr. MURDOCK: The staff of the Distributing branch in the Printing bureau was during the past fiscal year, a total of 29. It is proposed in this fiscal year to have a total of 25. The salaries run as follows:

Salaries, $2,000 to $3,000.
One at	$2,280
Salaries, $1,000 to $2,000.
One at	$1,500
Three at	1,260
One at	1,200
One at	1,125

One at	1,080
One at	1,040

Under prevailing rates.
One at	$1,692.60
Two at	1,300
Salaries under $1,000.

Two at	780
Under prevailing rates.
One at	$832
Four at	728

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sure the committee is greatly indebted to the minister for the very interesting information he has given us. Could he supplement that a little? We had twenty-nine employees last year; we have twenty-five this year. The cost is, I think, the same. I do not know, although I may be wrong, that there is any reduction in this item. I was not so much addressing myself to that point, and I think the minister knows perfectly well I was not. I was asking him whether we could not get a combination of these distributing forces. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to tell us what it costs to distribute these documents by the House of Commons staff, how many are employed there and how much duplication and overlapping there is.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very sorry I have not that information before me. I have been so busy looking after my own business that I have not yet been able to go into that.

Mr. MARLER: A vast quantity of material is distributed under this particular item. What happens to all this stuff? Is it thrown away? It is never read. There must be an enormous wastage in paper and that kind of thing.

Mr. MURDOCK: There are considerable quantities of waste paper and also of wasted publications.

Mr. MARLER: Are they sold?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, sold for waste paper.

Mr. MARLER: How are they sold? Are tenders asked for the sale of them?

Mr MURDOCK: Yes, sold by tender. Waste paper from all departments of the government service is sold by tender.

Mr. MARLER: What does the country get from all this waste paper now, and what has been got in the past?

Mr. MURDOCK: For the year immediately prior to February 1, last, waste paper was not sold by tender, but a contract was given in November, 1921, on the basis of the former yearly rate of $11,000 in a lump sum for the collection of all waste paper from the various government departments. The 1922 contract commenced on January 1, and this year it was necessary to run it over 31 days into 1923, so that the new contract is now in effect from February 1 of this year. For the five years prior to January 1, 1922, the rate for gathering all waste paper from government departments was $11,000 a year. When it became necessary recently to renew that contract or to determine how waste paper from the various government departments would be sold, tenders were called for, and the contract now in effect is that waste paper from the various departments of the government brings to the government $22,700 for this year.

Mr. MARLER: How does the minister explain this great divergency? Prior to January 1, 1922, this same paper brought $11,000, not by contract. How was this new contract at $22,700 let for this waste paper? There is something very extraordinary in the divergency in these figures.

Mr. McMASTER: Better management.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be that paper, like everything else, is more prodigally wasted by this government.

Mr. MURDOCK: On the other hand, the facts are entirely to the contrary that there was very much more waste paper under previous conditions than there is at the present time, and I think the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) conveyed that impression when, in such eulogistic terms, he referred to the great saving that had been brought about by the Editorial Committee in preventing unnecessary duplication and consequent waste in the Printing bureau.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That committee has been in force for some time.

Mr. MURDOCK: During the six years prior to the present year with that enormous waste, many publications went into the waste paper basket. As a matter of fact, I do not think it is any exaggeration to state that $150,000 or $200,000 were made out of the waste paper contracts for the six years prior to the present year.

Mr. MARLER: Which contracts were not let by tender?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is a little wrong in that. The Editorial Committee has been in charge for four or five years, and no doubt when that committee was in charge, the waste would be a minimum. The present government's policy is to abolish the Editorial Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is still there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And naturally there would be a larger tender for the waste paper. I cannot say, not having had the departmental charge, just how the contract was let. It was let, however, as I understand, some six years before and then was re-let. If I recollect rightly, it was let by tender, just as it is claimed it is let this time by tender. I should be very much surprised if I am wrong. The highest tender was accepted.

Mr. MURDOCK: You are mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I am.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure you are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps, while we are talking about waste, the minister will explain, seeing that he has not had time to get the information for the committee, how he came to waste time going to the Moose Jaw election and coming back without having been allowed to speak.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. MURDOCK: I took my holidays out there instead of going to Atlantic City. Now, I am very glad indeed that my right hon. friend has called my attention to something I was going to overlook, that is, certain enormous waste of government publications and printing that occurred during the course of the six years immediately preceding the present year. The gentlemen of the committee do not need to take my word for this at all. They can go to the report of Judge Snider, who was appointed royal commissioner to look into the enormous waste of hundreds of thousands—.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MURDOCK: —hundreds of thousands, I think, of government publications which were discarded and thrown away and which became part of the plunder of individuals who secured waste paper contracts at $11,000 a year. Judge Snider's report will indicate just exactly what happened and I hope that hon. members of this House will look into that record and not take my word for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume that the reason my hon. friend was not allowed to speak was because the friends of his party in that district felt that the peculiar style of oratory of which we get so much in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —was not—

Mr. McMASTER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN:—useful in that part of the country.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I understand that discussion in committee must be closely relevant to the item under consideration, and it seems to me that the leader of the Opposition is wandering somewhat far afield in discussing either the Moose Jaw election or the type of oratory displayed so ably by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: I should really apologize to my right hon. friend for having answered so shortly as I did when he asked his question. As a matter of fact I was due back here yesterday afternoon to go on with my estimates and I did not want to disappoint my right hon. friend or others. I wanted to get to business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not the coming back that I was marvelling at; I thought that was natural; it was the going out. Now, the minister tries to intimate to this House that there was some dark and serious scandal unearthed by Judge Snider's report, and hon. members have a right to some information in that regard. The minister's "hundreds of thousands" talk is oratory of a kind; that is all. There were some books, quite a number of them—I do not know whether they were blue books, but at all events they were publications—that were by error consigned to waste by an official. The facts were difficult to get at. The late government did not know why this waste had occurred, nor did it know who was responsible. No member of the government had authorized it or had had anything to do with it. The late government appointed Judge Snider to get at the facts because there were facts to be got at, and Judge Snider investigated the matter and submitted a report. He was not able to find that there had been any intentional error or wrongdoing on any one's part. Undoubtedly, there had been an error in consigning the documents to waste, but I do not think they were of such tremendous cash value. It was unfortunate, however, that they were destroyed, because they were of a character that could not be replaced, some of them being historical. But the numbers of them as stated by the minister are only representative of a very elastic imagination.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my right hon. friend will look into the matter again and consult Judge Snider's report he will find that there is no particular exaggeration in what I have stated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any increase or decrease in the quantity of parliamentary documents and government publications distributed under this item?

Mr. MURDOCK: The number of parliamentary documents printed is not determined by the Printing bureau. As my hon. friend knows, there is a committee of this House that determines what shall and what shall not be printed. But as to the various government documents and publications, the number is determined by the various departments under proper authorization, and this item takes care of their distribution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps the minister could give the information even though it does not come strictly under this item.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sure my hon. friend is not serious in asking me to give such an estimate as he desires, because no one in this House could do anything of the kind. This item is to take care of the distribution of parliamentary documents and other government publications.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister misunderstands me. I am asking whether there is any increase in the quantity distributed. I am anxious to find out if there is really any necessity for the continued voting of this $40,000 year after year for a service that may be on the decrease.

Mr. MURDOCK: I cannot even suggest whether there might be in this particular fiscal year either a slight increase or a decrease. I can only assure my hon. friend that if the money were not all expended it would still belong to the government, while if it were found necessary to use it it would be available.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many copies of Hansard are printed, and how many go to subscribers?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not the exact information, but the best estimate I can give would be about 150 copies sent to paid subscribers out of a total of 1,800 printed. These 150 are subscribed for on the basis of 5 cents per copy or $3 per session.

Mr. COOTE: What does it cost to print Hansard? I have been approached by a number of people who want to know whether the subscription rate for Hansard could not be reduced. They consider $3 an exorbitant sum to pay for it. I believe that if they knew the quality of some of the speeches recorded in the publication they would be willing to pay their $3. Speaking seriously, however, I think it would be good policy for this House to reduce the subscription rate, and perhaps the minister might give us some information on this point.

Mr. MURDOCK: I can assure the hon. member that the rate of 5 cents per copy or $3 per session is only a nominal figure; it is like sending out the Labour Gazette at 20 cents per annum. It does not begin to pay the actual cost of printing Hansard.

Mr. COOTE: I think the minister will admit that it would not cost as much proportionately if we printed twice the number that we are now printing, and I believe if the subscription rates were reduced by one half we could easily double the subscriptions.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will realize that it would cost twice as much for paper, which is an important item, and for ink, which is a less important item. It is quite true that mere printing, once the type has been set up, would not amount to a great deal extra. But I really do not think it would be advisable to cheapen the present nominal rates. However, I must say frankly that I had not heard it suggested before that the subscription rates should be reduced, and it may be a subject worthy of consideration from my hon. friend's point of view.

Mr. BOYS: Is this item sub-divided at all?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. Here is the estimate for the year:

Office printing, $2,000; office stationery, $2,500; postage, $2,500; express and freight, $200; char service, $2,000; sundries, $100; salaries, $27,613.60; motor car supplies and upkeep, $500; mechanical repairs and upkeep, $2,000; or a total of $39,413.60.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous Printing, $20,000.

Mr. GOOD: I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a little point in connection with this item. Since I have been in parliament I have been impressed with the amount of stationery which is embossed instead of printed. Most of our letterheads are printed, but a good many are embossed, particularly the departmental stationery, and practically all of the envelopes. I understand that it is very much more expensive to emboss than to print. I would suggest that we can all get along just as well with printed letterheads and envelopes and I would very much like to see a change in this direction, especially in view of the financial conditions now existing.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act—Further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: We ran slightly over the estimate last year to the extent of about $4,000, and consequently we are asking for this supplementary estimate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does this item include the cost of the telegrams that passed between the hon. minister and one Mr. McLachlan in connection with the strike of miners in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes—to some extent.

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS—OTTAWA PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Public Works—Public Buildings—Ottawa Parliament Buildings, $700,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is to be done for this?

[Mr. Murdock.]

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, this proposed expenditure is to complete the restoration of the parliament buildings. The itemized expenditure will be as follows:

Salaries of office staff, maintenance of plant and upkeep of staff	$ 10,000
Carpentry and doors	9,000
Asphalt surface and new roadways to rear of buildings	6,000
Grading and sodding around buildings	11,250
Post office fittings and alterations	15,000
Stone carving and modelling for interior	35,000
Pointing and stone work	6,000
Re-wiring library	10,000
Painting and decorating	10,000
Special lighting fixtures	100,000
Main tower, required for cutting stone	111,000

If we are able to proceed with the erection of the tower there will be an expenditure of $136,000, consisting of:

Amount for setting stone stairs	$ 5,000
Amount for steel work	2,000
Elevator, clock and stone work of memorial chamber	86,000
Balance to sub-contractors on contracts	8,341
Contingencies, miscellaneous and unforeseen	93,960

I may say that the items as read will probably not conform to the expenditure this year, for it is very doubtful if it will be possible to have the plans completed and the stone cutting done in time to carry on the erection of the tower to completion.

But from this item there will be an expenditure to cover the settlement with the architects. A settlement has been reached recently whereby payment will be made to them for the balance of their commission on the work that has been done to date. For the information of the committee I will give a short review of the conclusions that we have arrived at in making a settlement with the architects: The total expenditure on the buildings to November 28th was $9,910,972. Mr. Pearson's commission on that amount at $4\frac{5}{8}$ per cent would be $458,382.48.

We have not settled on that basis. We have followed to some extent the line suggested by the parliamentary committee, and we did make an adjustment with the architects in 1921 when they were allowed certain commissions on an expenditure over and above $5,000,000. There is no doubt that when the parliament buildings contract was entered into there was a desire and an effort made to limit the expenditure to some $5,000,000 but as the work proceeded alterations took place, the designs were changed, and in 1920 we find that the expenditure had exceeded the limitation of $5,000,000 by over $1,034,000; in January, 1921, the expenditure had amounted to $7,966,000, and on November 1, 1921, it had amounted to $9,157,229. The original plans as suggested by the architect, and desires probably of the committee were changed, with the result that this larger expenditure was made on the buildings that we are now occupying. Some of that increased cost, in fact, a considerable proportion of it can be accounted for by the increase in the cost of material and labour that took place during the years between 1918 and 1921, but in addition to that, the buildings as originally designed have been changed, accounting for an additional expenditure.

So far as the architects are concerned, they did originally indicate by letter that they would design and construct a building limited in cost to $5,000,000, and on receipt of their letter accepting the above offer and stating that the terms there set forth were satisfactory to them, a contract was prepared by the department with a limitation fee. When the contract was presented to the architects they took exception to the limitation in a letter dated July 6, 1916. Although that contract was presented it was never executed, the architects stating that they could not agree to the clause limiting the fee as no such limitation had ever been discussed with the committee. They acknowledged acceptance of the terms of the joint committee in which the limitation of fee was made, but stated that their acceptance was an inadvertence so far as the limitation of fee was concerned, it being intended to apply to the other conditions only.

Mr. CALDWELL: What date was that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In 1916. Although the architects did not sign this contract, the work continued, and as I have pointed out in the year 1920 the limitation of $5,000,000 was exceeded, further exceeded in 1921, and by November, 1921, the cost had amounted to $9,157,229. In the year 1920 the architects did complain and ask that they be given further consideration in regard to the over-expenditure. The department under instructions from the committee had Mr. Ewart, the Consulting Architect, make an examination of the building to try and indicate wherein the plans had been altered and new works undertaken, and to estimate the additional amount that might be paid to the architects. Mr. Ewart reported an amount of $1,396,999 as representing extra work and stated that further consideration of various items would be necessary before a final estimate could be arrived at of the value of the extra work done up to January 31, 1921. Unfortunately Mr. Ewart became ill and died, and Mr. Sutherland was then employed to report further on these additional items, and he found an amount of $337,401 that might be attributed to extra work. The committee at that time recommended and did pay an extra commission on $1,734,401.13. This estimate as compared with an estimate presented by the architects showed that the committee did not allow the full amount. In other words, the architects claim that they should have received in addition to the commission on $1,734,401.13, an additional commission on $946,277.

In December, 1921, Mr. Pearson was still urging further consideration of his claim. The then outgoing minister advised him that it would be necessary for this matter to be dealt with by the incoming administration. The architect at that time advised the minister that it would be necessary for him to close down the works. In a letter written on December 21, 1921, he advised the then minister that he had no alternative but to close down the work and that he would issue instructions to that effect to the general contractor, and on the same date he wrote to the general contractor giving him instructions to close down the works at the end of the week. I merely mention that as a matter of information for the committee. Mr. Pearson at that time felt it was necessary for him to retire from the work, and since that date he has not been associated directly with it. In fact, as is well known, there has not been any large undertaking since that date. The matter of adjusting the differences between the architects and the department was one presenting some difficulties. I think, generally speaking, that those who have followed the construction of the building and who have knowledge of the original intentions of the committee and of what has transpired since, will realize that there was a further obligation by parliament to the architects in the matter of payment for their work in connection with these buildings. That was recognized by the parliamentary committee and payments made as I have indicated.

We have taken up the situation where we found it in 1921 and with the aid of three hon. members of this House—the hon. member for London, the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for St. Lawrence and St. George—who have acted with myself and members of the department in bringing about what we considered a fair and reasonable adjustment of this claim we have arrived at the conclusion that the architects would be entitled to a payment of commission on $9,910,-972.59 less a deduction on account of increased cost not allowed on $1,683,463.46. In other words the commissions payable to Mr. Pearson would amount to a total sum of $458,382—less a credit of 4⅝ on $1,683,463.46 of $77,860, or a commission of $380,522.30 plus a fee for work of a special character of 2⅞ per cent on $932,960.74, or a commission of $31,822.62 plus a sum of $5,000 allowed for advertising and receiving tenders for special furniture and special work; making a total commision of $412,344 to Mr. Pearson, with a credit of payments received of $289,340, leaving a balance due Mr. Pearson of $123,004.20. Mr. Marchand's settlement is worked out on the same basis, he being allowed a commission of ⅞ of one per cent on the total, his total commission being $71,199, and he having received payment of $52,848, leaving a balance of $19,142. That is the settlement that has been entered into with the architects and an agreement has been made as the result of which there will be no overlapping of commissions. It will be a complete and distinct settlement. For the completion of this building it is hoped that we will be able to enter into a contract that will be distinct and separate from the old contract. This settlement of $142,000 will be paid out of the vote of $700,000 that is now before the committee. I think this statement pretty well explains the item of $700,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister spoke of the alteration of the plans having increased the price. Who was responsible for that alteration?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The architect in conjunction with the parliamentary committee.

Mr. CALDWELL: Who were the members of the parliamentary committee?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They varied from time to time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was a big change in the personnel the first year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The original committee consisted of Hon. Robert Rogers, Hon. William Pugsley, Hon. Charles Murphy, Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux and Hon. Robert Watson, the Minister of Public Works in each instance acting as chairman of the committee. Later, I think, Hon. Mr. Reid, Hon. Mr. Calder, and Hon. Sir James Lougheed became members of the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did these gentlemen all serve upon the committee at the same time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask what was the method of control by the government of expenditure on the Parliament buildings? Was it left to the architect, or did this committee really supervise the work or did they only act in an honorary capacity?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, the committee exercised an active supervision and control. Meetings were held from time to time and the architects reported from week to week, or month to month, as to the expenditures. The committee, I think, were in control and information as to the work as it proceeded was laid before them from time to time.

Mr. McMASTER: My recollection is—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the Hon. Mr. Murphy was a member of the committee for a very short time. I think the House would be interested to know when Mr. Murphy was appointed and when he retired.

Mr. CALDWELL: If I am not mistaken Hon. Mr. Murphy told us in this House, since I have been a member, that he only attended one meeting of that committee. However, that is not the material point under discussion. The government started out to spend $5,000,000 on the erection of a parliament building. To-day the expenditure has been in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000 and we are not nearly through yet. I would like to ask another question: How was the contract let for the construction of this building in the case of both the architect and the contractor, or was there any contract?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Going back to my hon. friend's first question I now have the information in regard to the composition of the committee. The original committee consisted of Hon. Robert Rogers, chairman, Hon. William Pugsley, Hon. J. D. Reid, Hon, J. D. Hazen, Hon. R. Lemieux, Hon. C. Murphy, Sir James Lougheed, Hon. P. E. Blondin and Hon. R. Watson. This committee was appointed in May, 1916. Mr. Murphy resigned on the 24th June, 1916. Hon. Mr. Lemieux resigned on September 1, 1916. Hon. Mr. Hazen having retired as Minister of Marine was replaced by Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, on October 24, 1917. Hon. Mr. Pugsley resigned on 23rd February, 1918. Hon. P. E. Blondin left for overseas military service on October 7, 1917. Hon. J. A. Calder and Hon. G. A. Robertson were nominated by Sir Robert Borden on March 25, 1919 to replace Hon. Messrs. Pugsley and Blondin respectively. Hon. J. A. Stewart and Hon. R. Monty were nominated by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on September 22, 1921 to replace Hon. Dr. Reid and Hon. Mr. Calder elevated to the Senate. On September 25, 1921, the joint committee consisted of Hon. F. B. McCurdy, chairman;

Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, Hon. Mr. Stewart, Hon. Mr. Monty, Sir James Lougheed, Hon. Mr. Robertson, and Hon. Mr. Watson.

Mr. CALDWELL: Who compose the committee at the present time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no committee at the present time.

Mr. BOYS: The minister referred to the original estimated cost as $5,000,000. It seems to me that the thought at first was that the walls of the building which stood after the fire were to remain, but that it was necessary to put on an extra storey and the foundations would not carry it. For that reason the walls were pulled down. Could the minister inform the House as to what the contract which called for $5,000,000 included?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the original investigation after the fire the architects who were called in reported that they thought there would be a salvage of $1,000,000 or more on certain walls—

Mr. CALDWELL: Was it not $2,000,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, $1,000,000 odd.

Mr. CALDWELL: It was stated at the time that it would be $2,000,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Nearer $2,000,000 than $1,000,000, I am advised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On later examination it was decided that the walls should come down and they were taken down.

Mr. CALDWELL: Who decided that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that was done on the advice of the architects.

Mr. CALDWELL: If my memory serves me correctly, Mr. Murphy told me that these walls were torn down while he was a member of the committee, without the knowledge of the committee. The committee had never been consulted and that was one of the reasons why he resigned.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not sure of that history. I know the report was as I have given it. First, they thought they had a salvage in the walls of some $2,000,000, and later on the walls were taken down, and the contract entered into for $5,000,000, was for a new building, not taking into account the old walls.

Mr. BOYS: Was there an extra storey decided on after that $5,000,000 estimate was made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think the original plan for $5,000,000 provided for the walls such as we have to-day. The memo I have in regard to it reads:

> The plans for the lay out of the building were submitted to the members of the Senate and House of Commons on two or three occasions, and it was explained to them that in order to carry out the scheme it was necessary to tear down the recently erected west wing and all the walls standing north and in the rear of the external south walls and the east and west pavilions. This was in order that the two chambers, the Senate and House of Commons, might be placed at the extreme east and west ends respectively of the new buildings so that they would have outside light. It was also decided, in order to reduce the danger from fire, to make the building as fire proof as possible and remove the boilers and heating plant to a central heating station outside of the building.

Mr. CALDWELL: He speaks of a contract. What kind of a contract was it that was let to the P. Lyall Company for the construction?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract with the architect was for a 5½ per cent commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cost plus.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That was for the full architectural service for the construction, the architect acting as agent for the committee. A contract was entered into with Messrs. P. Lyall & Company, general contractors, for the erection of the building, they being paid 8 per cent on the first $4,000,000 and 7 per cent on the balance, not to exceed $5,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that method of contract shows the reason we spent $10,000,000 to get a $5,000,000 building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is for the Chairman to answer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the minister can do much better than he has done. Personally, I think the architects earned every single cent they got. The minister has cut off the commission on $1,600,000, and I suppose, the way things are now, they can stand that all right. As I recollect it, the architects, besides doing the architectural work, had to look after drafting work, preparation of all estimates, tenders and the like, and had to maintain a large staff at the building. Could the minister tell me what is going to be done to the building now? Very little requires to be done. I do not suppose the minister is serious in wanting to spend a lot of money in carving stones, or a lot of decorations, that might just as well stand for a period. I should like to get some information in regard to the completion of the tower. Who is to do it? The minister spoke of the architect's strike last year and of his going off the work. Is he coming back again? Is the same architect to complete the tower, or is somebody else going to complete it? What is the present situation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not the desire of the government to continue large expenditures. We feel, however, that it is desirable that we should proceed with the completion of the tower and possibly we may do it. I had hoped that arrangements could be made whereby it might be carried through to completion this present year. I am advised that unless detailed plans are submitted within the next few days it will probably not be possible to carry it to final completion this year. In that case we will carry on with the details of the stone cutting, with a view to the erection of the tower early this coming year.

As regards inside stone carving, I think that work may well be deferred and carried out at some future date, as the parliament and the government of the day see fit. It is not essential work. A certain portion of it, especially in the main corridors and around the throne of the Senate chamber, in fairness, having regard to the expenditures already made and the desirability of having the effect of that carving, I think should be proceeded with in a reasonable time. Even in this chamber there are opportunities for the expenditure of money in carving. I think that can very well stand for the present. There are some expenditures on the outside of the building, on the driveway, the sodding, grading, and in the post office, which should be made this year. The lighting fixtures in the main corridors are temporary, and possibly the proper designs should be developed and carried out there, in order that the entrances might have a finished appearance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest to my hon. friend that there is only one possible excuse for spending any further money in the building at the present, and that is that you should get a building that is properly completed and finished, having regard to the spirit of its conception as a whole. I do not know whether it is true, but I was told when I was on the other side of the House that it was absolutely necessary, if we were going to get a properly completed building, to have the same architect who had erected the building complete the tower, in order to give the final effect to the whole of his work, and that nobody else except that gentleman could do it. It was only bearing in mind what I have been told by people who, I suppose, know something about it that I thought perhaps the tower ought to be completed, but if the tower is not to be completed by Mr. Pearson, it might just as well wait another ten or twenty years, if another architect is to be employed to do the work, and we might as well be ahead that much money. I wanted to know whether Mr. Pearson was going to build the tower or not. If not, I think it could well stand.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not agree with my hon. friend. I think it is desirable that those who designed and worked on the original construction, if proper arrangements could be made, should have an opportunity of completing the tower. I am hoping it will be possible to enter into proper arrangements for them to continue and carry on this construction.

Mr. BOYS: What is the estimated cost of completing the tower?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Between $400,000 and $500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister not think that he can do with less than $700,000? We have pretty heavy appropriations this year, and apparently the only thing that we know definitely is that we have to pay some back claims. Why not put in the amount for the back claims and let the other work stand altogether?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have given a recital of some of the expenditures proposed, and I think they are important. The grading and sodding around the building are certainly important, and we do not want to leave a matter of that kind unfinished. The matter of post office fittings and alterations is important and should be attended to. The rewiring of the Library, which is outside of this building, is also essential and should be done this year. As regards the lighting fixtures, some of those should be designed and placed. Then, as I have already stated, there will be commissions to pay, and I think the estimate of $700,000 is not excessive. It is not the desire of the department to expend lavishly; the desire is rather to curb expenditures. A similar amount was voted last year, and the expenditure was kept within reason and bounds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much was the expenditure last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The expenditure amounted to $459,241.17 made up as folows:

Paylists and services	$102,008 80
Materials	159,803 77
Furniture and fittings	144,763 60
Workmen's Compensation Board	1,917 81
Water for Sussex street shop	181 15
Coal	2,509 26
Contractors' commission	45,344 16
Sundries	2,712 62

Mr. BOYS: Do I understand the $700,000 item we are now considering will provide for the completion of the tower, electric light fixtures, which I think the minister said would cost about $100,000, payment of fees due to the architect, grading, sodding and so on, and cement work around the outside of the building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: I fully endorse what the minister has said. It would be a great pity if completion of the tower to this building was deferred much longer, because the building will never look as it should until the tower is completed. I also endorse what the minister has said regarding grading, sodding and cement work around the building. One cannot properly enjoy many of the rooms of the building with the outlook we have, particularly at the back. The item for electric light fixtures at first blush seems heavy; but at the same time I realize that the fixtures must be in keeping with this building, which is one of the finest in the world, and possibly they cannot be procured for less than $100,000. As to the cutting of the stone, as we look about here now, there are flat stones in this room which are supposed to be cut, and there are others throughout the building. That matter can stand; but I would like to see the tower and the other things to which I have referred proceeded with.

Mr. CALDWELL: Last year representations were made that some change should be made in the arrangement of this chamber in order to improve the acoustics. Some changes have been made that have effected a considerable improvement. Last year the minister said that he would look into the matter and see if the Speaker's Chair could be moved down on one side and the seating rearranged so that members could hear better than they can at the present time. While improvements have been made, the acoustics of this chamber are very poor. I would personally feel like fining the architect if he was responsible for designing this chamber because the designing was very poorly done for an assembly of this size. This assembly will increase in numbers as time goes on. In fact, after the next general election we shall have an increase, and it is quite possible that it will be in this section of the House. A number of the members of this party cannot hear very well, although after the next election, we may be on the other side. Is this ceiling the permanent ceiling that will be left, or is it to be built over?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We had certain investigations made after last session as regards the acoustics, and we were advised to carry on the scheme as hon. members see it before them, that is, of placing felt and carpet on the floor, and the hanging of draperies and curtains. I think it is evident to all members that a great and satisfactory improvement has been made by this simple expenditure. We also had models made, and I think I shall have them brought to the House and placed where members can see them, showing a rearrangement of seating and the placing of the Speaker in the centre of the chamber. Since the changes have been made during the interval and in view of the success of those changes, my view—and I think this is the view of many members with whom I have discussed the matter—is that we should not disturb the present arrangement, but possibly carry a little further next year the scheme as carried on last summer. It has been suggested that in and around the upper balconies further draperies or coverings might be placed which will tend to absorb the vibrations or voice sounds and probably add to the acoustic properties of the chamber. Personally, I am fairly well satisfied. I think in a chamber of this character, of this height and extent, the members are probably not suffering a great deal to-day, and that those who are accustomed to speaking and who speak clearly and distinctly do not have great difficulty in being heard. It would be a mistake to rearrange the seating; moreover, it has been estimated that to carry out a scheme of that kind would cost about $45,000, and at the present time, I would not feel disposed to ask that a change of that kind be made.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to make one suggestion as regards improving this House as a chamber for discussion and speaking. That would be to take the four front seats on the middle of each side and let those be made a bench where members could go to make set speeches whenever they wished to be heard in all parts of the House. A minister making a statement on behalf of the government involving the policy of the government or of his department could thus speak from the centre of the chamber, and if somebody on this side wished to criticise him, he could speak from the centre also, if he had an argument he wished, not only the House, but the country to hear. We have been spending a good deal of money to improve the acoustics of this chamber and such a change would cost very little. I have several times felt that I could, perhaps, put my case a little more clearly if I could sit nearer the centre. There are plenty of other seats left; the whole of the chamber is not occupied, and such a change as I have suggested would not inconvenience anyone but would be a great improvement and might lead also to improvement in the character of the debates. If we had such a speaking bench on either side of the chamber, this would not involve an expenditure of $1,000. It would not change the character of the chamber; but it would improve it as a chamber of discussion and speaking, so that everybody could hear, especially those who had something important to say and who were willing to go to the centre of the House to say it in order that they might be heard by the members and that their speeches might be in a better shape to go to the country.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like to hear from some of the members who sit at the far end of the chamber, how much they have heard of the minister's explanation of this item and of the discussion that has been going on at this end. I remember the time when I sat at the far end of the chamber. There were ten of us in that little group and there were days when we never heard one thing in regard to the estimates that were being considered. All we knew about them was what we read the next day in Hansard. I realize the very great disadvantage under which hon. members are placed in that end of the chamber. At the time I refer to we used to ask the minister to move further down as a concession when he was putting through his estimates, and I think it would be wise if the same thing were done now, because I am sure that hon. members at the lower end cannot hear well enough to be able to enter properly into the discussion of questions before the committee. I should like to know the views of those hon. members.

Mr. GOULD. Reverting to the tower, who possesses the original plans of that part of the building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the original drawings submitted of this building there is given an outline of the structure together with certain plans. But I am advised that the working plans have been developed from month to month as the work proceeded, and the working plans of the tower are not in the hands of the department. I am not sure whether they have been fully developed yet, but they will be as Mr. Pearson proceeds, if he does proceed.

Mr. GOULD: It is some years now since picture postcards were sold around this city purporting to illustrate this building as it will be when completed. I have looked at these post cards closely and they correspond with the building so far as it has been constructed. I presume that the photographs were taken from some plan, and I thought that possibly there might be two plans, one of the main building and another of the tower. There has been some discussion around the city during the past two months in regard to some rumoured change in the plan of the tower, and I should like to know whether it is contemplated to have chimes placed in the tower on its completion.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of course, we have the original draft of plan showing the elevation, and in addition to that models have been prepared which I have no doubt were photographed, as my hon. friend says. But these would not constitute the complete or detailed plan. The working plans that are required are not in the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is one thing the minister can do for hon. members and it will not cost anyone a cent, while it will make for much more livable conditions in this chamber. I wonder whether the minister has ever gone down to see the kind of ventilation we have in this building and the tremendous amount of pipes, fans, and other apparatus which, if kept in operation, would give us an atmosphere not quite so humid and stuffy as we usually have here. Instead of spending money I think the minister should see to it that, by the simple process of exercising some common sense in ventilation, conditions were improved in the building. Hon. members have been told that the ventilation was being looked after, and that there were fans all round the walls, in addition to an exhaust draft, and so forth. In fact, we were given to understand that the whole atmospheric contents of this chamber could be emptied in either two or five minutes. If that is the fact, why is not this humid atmosphere emptied sometimes?

Mr. CAHILL: It is cold air?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cold air, I hope.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am advised that the artificial ventilation of the building is up-to-date in every particular and that the air can be changed and renewed immediately. But I am also informed that the ordinary method of ventilation by the opening of windows and the artificial systew of ventilation cannot be carried out simultaneously. You have to depend on one or the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At present we are depending on nothing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If that is the case, the matter is one that should be inquired into. The apparatus that has been provided for the purpose of ventilating the chamber should be utilized, and if it is not we will make inquiries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt the minister has a pretty good idea when a room is stuffy. Does he think that the air in this chamber is as it should be?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Sometimes I hardly think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see there is $35,000 for cut stone ornamentation. Is there any other item for this kind of ornamentation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the only item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would seriously ask the minister if he thinks the country ought, even with this government, extravagant as it is, to spend $35,000 this year in ornamental stone carving.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Personally I am not disposed to spend a great deal of money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why ask for it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was very little carving done last year, and I do not think we shall do a great deal this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister does not want this money I would move that the item be reduced by $35,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I explained to the committee that there was some carving that ought to be done this year in connection with the entrance to the main corridor and in the vicinity of the throne in the Senate. In view of the expenditure that has already been made on the building this work should be carried on at an early date, and I do not see the necessity for reducing the vote. If the money is not necessary we will not spend it, but in justice to the building as it stands to-day there is certain work that should be done, and the amount suggested here by the estimate clerk is not large. I am not of the opinion, however, that it will all be expended.

Mr. BOYS: It seems to me that the original estimated cost of the building and the actual cost to date are so much at variance that we ought to have a fuller explanation from the minister as to how the difference came about. We are all aware that the committee of seven gentlemen in charge of the work was composed of some of the ablest men in the House on both sides of politics, as well as of gentlemen from the Senate; and as the matter stands to-day it seems to reflect more or less on the work of that committee. I have not the details, but I remember distinctly that when the restoration of the building was first under contemplation it was said that the old walls would be utilized, and later it was decided to put on an extra storey. I asked the minister definitely whether the $5,000,000 estimated cost included the tearing down of walls and the putting up of new walls, in addition to the extra storey, and he said he thought it did.

Mr. CAHILL: Who was the minister at that time?

Mr. BOYS: I am not criticizing any minister.

Mr. CAHILL: No, but I am asking for information.

Mr. BOYS: At this moment I cannot recall, but I suppose it was the Hon. Robert Rogers, although I am not positive. But it makes no difference who it was, he was one of the seven. There can be no doubt that any changes that were decided upon were first investigated by the architect and submitted to the committee, and in the end, I believe, received its endorsation. I am aware that the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) withdrew for some reason, but so far as I know the other members of the committee were unanimous in regard to the changes made from time to time. I think it is due the House that a full explanation should be given by the minister as to exactly what was under contemplation when the estimate of $5,000,000 was given, and how it was that the figure rose from that sum to $10,000,000. The minister has been quite fair. He has pointed out that a considerable proportion of the increase was due to increased cost of material and labour, but I hardly think that this would account for the whole increase, and I am sure the House will be interested to get a fuller explanation of the matter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A few moments ago I gave briefly some of the information my hon. friend is now requesting. But so that the committee may have fuller information I would read from this report:

Mr. John A. Pearson, architect, Toronto, Ontario, and Mr. J. O. Marchand, architect, Montreal, Que., were instructed by Hon. Mr. Rogers, then Minister of Public Works, to report on the condition of the ruins of the parliament buildings as they stood after the fire, and the report of these architects was presented to the Minister of Public Works on the 17th February, 1916.

The architects stated that the ruins of the building as it stood represented in labour and materials an asset of $2,000,000. This estimate with the architect's detail is as follows:

The new west wing..	$ 425,000
The library building valued at..	650,000
The boiler room, heating plant in basement and chimney stack, all of which would represent a value of about..	1,000,000

I find my impression was right when I said at first that I thought the value was between one and two million dollars.

Messrs. Pearson and Marchand were instructed to prepare sketch plans for the reconstruction of the parliament buildings. These were submitted to the committee, and after discussion it was considered advisable in rebuilding the structure to provide greater accommodation than existed in the old building. The architects were requested to prepare sketch plans showing an additional storey.

There was an additional storey.

Mr. Pearson submitted these plans at a subsequent meeting of the reconstruction committee and pointed out in discussing them that the addition of another storey would necessitate the taking down of the upper storey of the building, also the main tower. The committee carefully considered the matter and it was finally decided to add the extra storey to the building.

The plans for the layout of the building were submitted to the members of the Senate and House of Commons on two or three occasions, and it was explained to them that in order to carry out the scheme it was necessary to tear down the recently erected west wing and all the walls standing north and in the rear of the external south walls and the east and west pavilions; this was in order that the two chambers, the Senate and House of Commons, might be placed at the extreme east and west ends respectively of the new building so that they would have outside light. It was also decided, in order to reduce the danger from fire, to make the building as fireproof as possible and remove the boilers and heating plant to a central heating station outside of the building.

A report from the architects, dated July 29, 1916, was subsequently submitted to the committee dealing with the reasons for demolishing the walls of the old Parliament Buildings which were left standing after the fire; the architect explaining that several sketch plans were prepared in an endeavour to have the Commons chamber within the area of the block so as to retain the west wing, but it was impossible to get a properly balanced plan and the idea had ultimately to be discarded as the architects were convinced that no satisfactory scheme could be arrived at by endeavouring to tack the building on the west wing. They further stated that no portion of the walls above the foundation of the west wing could be used. The foundations of the remaining portion of the south or front wall were built of inferior masonry and the architects considered it better to tear out this masonry, and the wisdom of this decision was proved when they discovered stretches of the wall in the centre had been built of dry rubble.

I think that gives a fairly clear explanation of what led up to the destruction of the old walls.

Mr. BOYS: Is the minister reading from the minutes of the committee?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BOYS: Were minutes kept?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a summary from the minutes of the committee as prepared by the estimate clerk for the information of the committee. I think it covers everything pretty fully. This report was made in July, 1916, after the old walls had been taken down, and the estimate of the new building was fixed at $5,000,000.

Mr. BOYS: Do the minutes show what members of the committee were present when that was agreed upon, and whether or not there were any dissenting voices?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the minutes of the committee. Of course, they are very extensive, many meetings having been held. I am not sure whether the minutes would show that information, but I have no doubt they would confirm what I have stated to the committee.

Mr. BOYS: It would seem to me in view certainly of the implied, if not actual, criticism that it is important to know whether the committee was unanimous, or whether this work was forced on, so to speak, by a majority of the committee against the views of the other members. If so I have never heard of it, and I have been a member of the House for all these years.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did the members of the reconstruction committee receive any remuneration besides their indemnities?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Were they supposed to stay on the job all the year round and look after this work at their own expense?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then it looks to me as if the reconstruction committee were not expected to exercise very much supervision over the building of this structure the year round, and this impression is strengthened by the discussion we have had. In fact the architects and contractors were left largely to themselves. Due to the fact that the contract was on a cost plus basis and that no very close supervision was exercised by the reconstruction committee, the government or anyone else in authority except the architects, it is my candid opinion that herein lies the reason for the very high cost of construction. I am not blaming the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. King). I think he has had a very undesirable legacy bequeathed to him. I do not know just where to place the blame, but I think this committee should know where the fault lies, because already the country has spent more money than should have been spent for the value received.

Therefore I think we should have some record of how often the committee met and what took place at the various meetings.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): This House must take responsibility for what has been done. At various times information was presented to the House and the necessary money voted. Therefore the government of the day was more or less responsible, and as far as I can gather from the statement we have just listened to it is a substantially accurate summary of what took place. But we have the building on our hands and we must do something towards its completion. If the tower must be completed we will have to resume work on it If the several votes now before the committee would complete the tower and the Senate Chamber, I think that is nearly all we ought to do at this stage. I would suggest that we should not neglect the improve-10 p.m ment of the acoustic properties of this chamber,which improvement can be effected for a very small sum of money. If the building can be completed for the sum stated, and the House so decides, well and good, but I certainly would not be in favour of increasing the vote beyond $500,000 at this stage. I think this House ought to take the responsibility of placing a limitation on any further sum to be spent to have the building, say, three-quarters completed at least, but without including any unnecessary items in such expenditure.

Mr. GOULD: This discussion as to the difference between the initial estimates and the total amount which the building has cost up to the present time might well remind us of the old proverb of locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. It also seems to me that the committee that was appointed and acted under the supervision of the various ministers of Public Works should have remembered the old maxim that you may estimate the cost of a building in the most careful manner—and I think this applies not only to the large buildings in Ottawa, but to buildings in all other cities whether private or public buildings, large or small—but you will find that the contractor usually adds one-fourth to the initial estimate which has been arrived at after careful consideration. I think that the committee which acted from time to time should have remembered that maxim, and then there would not have been the need for this expenditure, because the added cost of materials, the added cost of labour and so forth, would quickly account for the extra moneys this building has cost. I think it is unnecessary to discuss any further the difference between the initial estimate and the cost of the building up to the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is important that the House get no wrong impression on the question of responsibility. It is true the joint committee which had charge did not exercise day to day supervision over the conduct of the work. It never was constituted for that purpose. It was constituted to determine the general plan of the work, the scheme of construction, the method of construction, whether by contract, cost-plus or by any other method, and in general to see that men suitable to the House as a whole, Senate and Commons, were in charge of the execution of the work. There never was any estimate of $5,000,000 in the world for the House as it has been built. That never was made. There was an estimate of $5,000,000 for what might be described as a portion of what we have to-day, but that would be based on the contemplation that it would be built on a contract basis. The committee decided against that, and my memory fails me very much if the committee did not decide unanimously that it would not be built by contract. There was some dispute, so far as my recollection goes, only on one point, as to whether or not the old walls and foundations should be used. There was not a party division even on that, but there was I think one member, possibly two, felt that we should not put on the extra storey and consequently might be able to use these walls. The better architectural opinion was that we could not, and the committee decided not.

As to building by contract or not by contract, I am quite satisfied from memory that there was no division whatever. It is true it costs more not to build by contract, but a building such as this, not upon any particular model, a building in respect of which new problems arise in the course of its construction over the years and must be dealt with at the time, new decisions be made as to what is to be done here and there, it was decided that the construction of a building such as that could be better done and be a greater credit to the country if it were done on the cost-plus basis, though it was known it would undoubtedly cost far more.

The government adopted the policy of having a committee of Senate and Commons, composed, I think, equally, with one majority only for the party in power at the time—otherwise equal of members of both sides. The decisions were made by that committee and the responsibility taken by them, and I do not know that there is anybody in the House to-day who is disposed to criticize those decisions. I know the building has cost a considerable sum, but when we compare it with the cost of other buildings of similar purpose and like character in the country, I am not sure it has gone beyond any of them when we have regard to the results that we have obtained. We have real results here for the expenditure made, results we never could have got had the committee come to another decision as to the method of construction and let the work by contract. So that we need not sit here with an air of superiority and feel that simple maxims were forgotten by the members of that committee. I venture to think that very full and ample consideration was given to all these things not only by members of the committee but by members of the House in that parliament, and taken all in all, when one considers the contingencies and exigencies that have to be met in the matter of a construction such as this, we have got through with it certainly without scandal of any kind great or small, and I think without any very great modicum of error.

Mr. BOYS: I just want to make one other point sure, I think it was the member for Carleton, New Brunswick, who suggested that the extra cost was due to the cost-plus system being adopted. I think I understood the minister correctly when he said the contractors were paid eight per cent on the first four million and seven per cent on the balance, but not exceeding $5,000,000. If that be so they got nothing whatever for work done over $5,000,000, so in that case there is nothing left of the suggestion of the hon. member referred to. I just wanted to make sure I caught the minister correctly on that point.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do I understand the minister to say that the contractor gets nothing for the work he did over a cost of $5,000,000, that he receives no remuneration for his work over that amount?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been no payments made to the general contractor beyond the commission as set forth, eight per cent on the first four million and seven per cent on the balance up to five million. It is true the contractor does maintain that he is entitled to further consideration but to date there has been no payment made.

Mr. CALDWELL: But he is claiming payment, and the government will eventually have to pay him on the whole cost at seven per cent will it not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In all probability there will have to be some payment. There has not been a settlement arrived at with the contractor, but he is claiming commissions and I would be inclined to think that a settlement probably will be arrived at. It has not been arrived at as yet.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. member (Mr. Boys) would have us believe that the contractor will not be paid on the extra cost above $5,000,000. Will the minister say that the government is not going to pay the contractor anything for his work above $5,000,000?

Mr. BOYS: I would like to interject one remark. What I said was that if I understood the minister correctly the contract did not entitle the contractor to anything beyond a $5,000,000 construction. I do not suppose the minister at this stage is going to judge the matter himself. That is for him and not for me, but I want to put myself right. All I said was that the remuneration of the contractor did not go beyond a cost of $5,000,000, if I understood the minister correctly.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contractor contracted to build a building which the architects estimated would cost $5,000,000. We do not have to go very far in this discussion because it has already been stated by a number of members of the committee who were in the old parliament that this is a different building. It is true it is a different building. There have been many changes which have added to the cost, I have no doubt. I know that the contractor is claiming an additional amount on the full work done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But does not the contract provide that these additional works shall be done by him and all be subject to the general limitation, that he gets so much up to I think it is two or three or four million, and then so much up to five million, but nothing beyond? In other words, is he not bound by the general limitation notwithstanding the fact that there were alterations in the building itself? The alterations were provided for in the contract.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not going to argue the contractor's case here. I have a settlement probably to make with the contractor. The argument presented by the right hon. leader of the Opposition is one that would be maintained to a certain extent, but we are dealing with a fact, and we must deal with the facts as they appear. It was only a moment ago that my right hon. friend said that this building was not the building as originally designed. The contractor will make the same representations, I have no doubt, to the department. It is a claim that will be under consideration shortly.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How much is it?

Mr. CALDWELL: The architect, I presume, was bound by a similar contract. He was to receive a certain percentage up to $5,000,000 and nothing above that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Supposedly.

Mr. CALDWELL: But he has been paid, or there is an agreement to pay him on the whole present cost of construction.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought I made that plain. He is paid on the cost less $1,600,000 odd not allowed.

Mr. CALDWELL: He is being paid a commission on about $8,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, and it is more than probable that you will have to settle with the contractor in much the same way. So that while I have great respect for my hon. friend's opinion on most matters I object to his trying to convey the impression that the contractor is not going to get paid anything on extra work in excess of the $5,000,000. That is not a reasonable thing and I do not think there is any thought in the minds of anyone that he shall not receive something for that extra work.

Mr. HANSON: Is not this matter subject to a written contract? Was there not a written contract entered into with the contractor at the start? If there was, unless that contract has been varied in some way, it seems to me it is a matter of the construction of the contract and the document should speak for itself?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no doubt it will be claimed that the contract has been varied and varied very materially; that is shown by the expenditure. The committee realized that when they had Mr. Ewart and Mr. Sutherland assess the new features of the original plan and allowed the amount of $1,733,000.

Mr. HANSON: There was no written contract with the architect but if the contractor agreed to the changes and did not stipulate anything for commission I do not see any legal liability whatever. A moral liability there may be, but that is another question.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The architects also were limited as to fees. It is true they did not sign a contract but in acknowledgement of a letter sent to them they wrote to the department accepting the conditions and the limitation of the fee.

Mr. CALDWELL: The architects?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not expect the minister to agree with what we say in this connection at all, but if he goes to his lawyer he will find that he ought to agree with it. There is a great deal of difference between the position of a man who writes a letter overlooking something which is contained in a formal communication and then repudiates it afterwards, and the position of a man who signs a sealed contract and whose action is bound within the four corners of that contract. The one would doubtless always maintain afterwards that he was not bound, while the other man continued to work under the contract. I think, however, we are, perhaps, getting a little bit away from this item. I wonder if my hon. friend does not want now to withdraw that $35,000. No? Then I am going to move in amendment that the item be reduced by $35,000, to the extent of that cut stone.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not know whether in the course of the discussion of this item the attention of the committee has been called to a very serious lack of proper accommodation for the housing and comfort of members of parliament which is evident in the construction of this building. Hon. gentlemen who have visited public buildings elsewhere, or who have been in other houses of parliament, have always found that a room was provided where members representing the different parties might meet together in conference and enjoy some of the good comradeship which every member realizes is one of the most interesting phases of parliamentary life no matter on what side he may sit. In the old parliament buildings the supporters of the government of the day had what was known as "Room 16," whilst the opposition had "Room 6." Opportunities were thus afforded of meeting the ministers, of meeting one another, of meeting gentlemen who came to Ottawa on public business, in addition to other advantages that accrue from gathering in such a common meeting place. I want to say that the gentlemen who composed the committee that had to do with the construction of this building apparently paid not the slightest attention to the provision of these rooms which I regard as absolutely essential to the carrying on of public business, as well as the ordinary business affairs of the members themselves. It would seem to me that the architect—and a very able and clever man he was, and he has given us an ornate building—ignored these considerations which gentlemen who have had an experience in parliamentary life regard as so essential. Not only that, but the members of the parliamentary committee in failing to make provision for such accommodation either neglected their duty absolutely or, if they gave any thought to the matter at all, failed to insist upon the architect providing for these wants. I do not know whether it is yet possible, by some rearrangement, to have provision made for accommodation corresponding to the old time "Room 16" and "Room 6," but to me it seems the greatest possible anomaly that whenever anyone comes to visit an hon. member on business he can only be taken to the member's private room—which involves quite a journey and absence from the House—or be allowed to stand in the corridor. The consequence of the existing lack of suitable accommodation is that members are greatly inconvenienced; there is no common meeting place where hon. gentlemen composing the respective parties in the House can meet together or to which they can take their business or political friends. We have spent a tremendous amount of money on this building, and we have a very ornate structure, but the building is entirely lacking in those facilities which are so essential to the proper discharge of the functions of the members of parliament. Everyone who has visited Westminster knows of the facilities of the character of which I have spoken to be found there, and I would like to draw the attention of the minister to those facts and to state that while it is a serious proposition to suggest the tearing down or renovating of such a fine building as this is, some attention ought to be paid to the provision of accommodation of the character I have described.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Start by cutting out this $35,000 in the matter of the cut stone.

Amendment (Sir Henry Drayton) negatived.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would ask the minister if it is not possible to have some more satisfactory system of lighting the offices on the sixth storey in the front part of the building. Hon. gentlemen who have offices there find it is necessary to have recourse to electric lights even in the day time. I do not know whether the committee or the architects are responsible for this defective system of lighting, but it is to be deplored that we should have to turn on the electric lights in order to carry on our work in the day time. Such a system is far from satisfactory; the conditions are very hard to work under. We have the worst lights in the rooms which need light most. These lights should be replaced, in order to make the rooms liveable at all, by the inverted lights which are used in the other rooms and which do not need them at all in the day time. I cannot understand why it was necessary to put the small windows along the front of the building, if the rooms were intended to be used for offices, because it is certainly a disgraceful thing to have such poor lighting, or rather the lack of lighting, in rooms of that kind. I recognize that it would be very difficult at this stage to enlarge these windows, but surely we can have electric light fixtures there which would give us lights which would not ruin our eyes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is the first occasion on which I have heard complaint of the lighting. I will be very glad to have an examination made of the rooms my hon. friend speaks of, and if artificial lighting can be secured we will have it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: These are not the only rooms; other rooms are in the same position. The matter has been under investigation for some time, because I have been complaining about it; the requisition was put in for proper light and was headed off. This investigation does not do us much good. If the minister will see that the matter is looked into, I think he will provide proper lights for these rooms.

Mr. BANCROFT: While the minister is looking after the matter of better lighting on the sixth floor, I hope he will not overlook the lighting of the chamber. It is impossible to read in the day time on the back benches, and better lights should be provided.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That matter has been brought to our attention and will receive consideration. Apparently the achitect thought he was making sufficient provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The curtains cause the trouble.

Mr. CALDWELL: In speaking of the members' rooms on the upper floors, I wish to remind the minister that there is no ventilation, except when the windows are thrown open, and that creates a draft through the room which is very injurious to health. If windows were made which could be let down from the top, we could have some ventilation and the drafts would not strike us so badly. The conditions spoken of by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) applies to the fifth as well as the sixth floor, especially the room next to the Library. I have a good-sized room with a deep recess in it, and there is just a little light in the centre of the room. The room is poorly lighted and the ventilation is worse than no good, because the whole window swings on a hinge, and you have to open it to let the air in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid there is a whole lot of trouble ahead of the minister. First he is told the building is too ornate, then he is told the building is not ornate enough, and then my hon. friend for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) says the light in his room is not good enough, and the government should provide a better system of ventilation. I think the trouble is not so much with the building as with the use to which the building is put. I think that is the real trouble. I do not know what has become of all the rooms. When we were in power—and we had a good many more members on that side of the House than they have now—we were able to accommodate the members of the opposition. We were able to see that ex-ministers and others who had business to look after were given rooms they could work in, so that they would not have to work with borrowed lights. That is all over now, and we are fitted up with artificial lights. But it is the same building, and there are far fewer gentlemen on the other side of the chamber than there were under the old administration, and they are not becoming any more numerous either. They will not have to provide a brand new first-class room for the member who is coming from Moose Jaw. We had good rooms before, and what the hon member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said is perfectly true. We had rooms for the members on the government side, and we gave the members of the opposition first-class rooms in the fourth storey. The opposition of to-day does not get that accommodation. Oh no, we are put in the cellar now—the cellar on the one hand and the garret on the other—and we are not grumbling an awful lot.

Mr. FIELDING: You are on the ground floor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, we are getting nearer.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It seems to me that the members who have to spend the greater part of their time in their rooms, the ones who come from a distance, are given the worst rooms in the building. I think those who require to remain in Ottawa over the week end, and who have to be in their rooms so much, should have the best rooms in the building, whereas, as a matter of fact, we get the worst rooms, and the members from Ontario and Quebec, some of whom are not in their rooms very much, have the good ones. I think there might reasonably be some different arrangement made.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the item carries, I should like to call the attention of the minister to the inadequate provision for the friends of private members on the government side in the gallery. We have very little provision made for the friends and relatives of the private members in the galleries, and a great deal more space than I think is necessary is devoted to those members of the other House who occasionally look in upon our labours. More space is also devoted to the Speaker's gallery than necessary. I think the private members' gallery should be extended 20 or 30 feet to the north, and the Speaker's gallery and the Senate gallery cut down somewhat. There is really not enough room for the private members' families in the members' gallery. I did not complain of our position when we were on the opposition side. At that time we bore with equanimity, courage and fortitude all these things and made no complaints. We had a large gallery, where those who admired us might sit and watch us in the successful effort we made to obtain power and assume the reins of government. But now that we have obtained the sunny side of power, we find that those who like to look at us and listen to our debates are cramped, confined and cabined in very small space. This is a matter of real importance to private members on this side of the House. I have dealt with it in a light way in order that I may receive the attention of the House, but it is a serious question and the present arrangement is unfair to the private members on this side of the House.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa, new departmental building, $500,000.

Mr. BELAND: I beg to move that the item No. 141, "Ottawa, new departmental building, $500,000" be struck out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister might explain how the government came to make that blunder.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No blunder was made. The matter of the new departmental building was carefully and seriously considered by the government. Anyone who is familiar with the manner in which the various departments of the government are scattered about the city of Ottawa, and anyone who has business with the various departments will realise that it is desirable that some of these departments, at least, should be housed in a better condition than they are to-day. It was, however, finally decided that it was not opportune this year to undertake a construction of that character, although, through inadvertence, the item appeared in the estimates. No mistake was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not quite get the reasoning. The government decided to build the building because it was far better to have the various departments housed in a government building, and the government decided that they would not do that this year. And no mistake was made. In which decision was no mistake made? In the decision to build, or in the decision not to build?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my explanation was quite satisfactory.

Mr. FIELDING: I think I shall have to take the responsibility of striking this out. The construction of this building was proposed at one stage by the Department of Public Works, and after further discussion it was decided that the item should be stricken out. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) knows the difficulties that arise in the clerical work of preparing the estimates, and in this work the clerks neglected to pay attention to this item. I am responsible for this. If there is a blunder, I am the guilty man.

Amendment agreed to.

Ottawa, addition to Dominion Archives building, $150,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is an entirely new item, and we should have an explanation of it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am very glad to give an explanation. The matter of further building for housing the archives is important and urgent, and if members will make themselves familiar with conditions that exist to-day, they will realise the necessity. In fact, in 1912, the government of that day considered that it was necessary to construct an addition to the Archives building in order that public records might be stored with safety. A commission was appointed which reported on the plan and the form of addition that should be made, and an estimate of $50,000 was then placed in the Estimates. I think this was repeated in 1915. Since the years 1914 and 1915, many valuable records have been and are in the possession of the government and of the people of Canada, and there should be no tendency on the part of the government to neglect the proper storage or housing of these valuable records. It is the intention of the government to make an addition to the present Archives building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there was a plan or a scheme for the extension of the Archives building, on a system of additional units to be constructed every few years. Is this appropriation to construct one of these units, or is it for a new building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was a scheme drawn up, but not a complete scheme. The architect is studying the present building now with a view of arriving at what he considers is best in the way of an addition to the present building, and plans are being developed along that line.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa Printing bureau—new building, $500,000.

Mr. BELAND: I beg to move that this item of $500,000 for Ottawa Printing bureau, new building, be reduced by the sum of $350,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When the matter was originally considered by the government, an amount of $500,000 was placed in the estimates as the sum that would be required and that could be expended during the coming year. At that time, it was thought that investigations and information necessary to be secured in order that proper plans and a proper building might be developed could be secured in time for plans and arrangements to be made for construction. There have, however, been unavoidable delays; we have not been able to proceed as rapidly as we would like, and I, in consultation with the architect, have been advised that a sum of $150,000 will be sufficient for this year's expenditure in the matter of constructing a new Printing bureau.

As regards the necessity for a new Printing bureau, the present building was constructed some thirty-six years ago. It does not lend itself to the proper installation and equipment of what would be considered as an up-to-date Printing bureau, such as the government would require. Apparently, there has been a necessity for enlargement for printing purposes, because we find that during the last four or five years a very large sum of money has been expended on that building constructed some thirty-six years ago. I believe some $111,000 have been expended since 1919 in additions and changes to the building, in an endeavour to make it adaptable for Printing bureau purposes. In addition to that, the department found it necessary to rent, outside of the present premises, very considerable space, and they find a very considerable expenditure is required in the matter of trucking back and forth from storehouses and rented space in other portions of the city. We are advised by the Printing bureau officials that a properly constructed bureau with proper equipment would make a very large saving to the people of the country, and after this matter was gone into thoroughly, it was considered good economy by the government to undertake the construction of a new Printing bureau, it also being intended to utilize the present building for departmental purposes. It will be possible, probably, to utilize this building, after it is vacated by the printing establishment, for the Statistical branch, a very large branch of the service that, I am informed, is to-day housed in some temporary buildings on Vittoria street. The matter has been carefully considered, and it is the intention of the government to proceed with the construction of a proper printing establishment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister give us some details? He gives us some general information. It is quite true that some money was spent on the building and many rearrangements were made as a result of the report of the Civil Service Commission, which rearrangement resulted in very large savings being made at that plant. At that time, as a result of the reorganization, the staff was largely reduced; it is to-day largely reduced, and large economies have already been effected. Will the government promise further similar resulting economies if this building is put up? What is the real reason for building it? The staff is now considerably smaller than it was before, for hon. gentlemen's predecessors cut down the cost of administration by over half a million.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend referred to the money that had been expended in making additions to that building during the past few years. I think the exact figure is about $195,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister gave $110,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: The additions, I am told, amount to $150,000. There have, as my hon. friend suggests, been great reductions in the staff in the past few years affecting some 400 or more employees. For example, there have been, I believe, about 61 retirements, most of which have been in the nature of a reduction of staff, the positions not having been filled. I believe it will be possible to continue to reduce the staff by future retirements and have a Printing bureau reasonably modern and up-to-date, obviating the duplication of effort back and forth, as is now necessary. It is believed that if this were done substantial reductions could be made. Then the floor space of the present Printing bureau is worth, on a rental basis, about $95,000 a year, possibly for some other branch of the public service, as has been suggested. In the matter of storage and the truckage of supplies back and forth between the two or three storage houses which the bureau now has to rent, this storage should all be within the Printing bureau itself, so as to avoid this unnecessary expense.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where are these storage houses that are referred to?

Mr. MURDOCK: They are scattered within three or four blocks of the Printing bureau. One of the storage houses is the old Hawkesbury building near the Archives. The building, of course, belongs to the government and it requires certain expenditures for fuel, light and janitor. It is an out-of-date building and the supplies cannot be kept in proper shape in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is kept there?

Mr. MURDOCK: Many publications that may or may not be required immediately or in the near future. We have, I think, two other storage buildings about three blocks from the Printing bureau, entailing an upkeep for watchmen and truckage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is stored in those other two?

Mr. MURDOCK: Paper supplies, and binding and other materials of various kinds used in the bureau, for which there is not room down there, and which are carried on hand for the use of the various departments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What area have we now for storage purposes in the existing bureau, and how many weeks' supplies can we carry there? It seems to me that this was all gone into two or three years ago, and my recollection is that there is enough room in the existing bureau to look after necessary supplies for a reasonable length of time. I think there is room for such supplies as any commercial man would have on hand.

Mr. MURDOCK: My information is that that is not the case and that there is not sufficient room for many of the supplies that are carried. As a matter of fact, not very long ago there was considerable pressure brought to bear for the renting of additional storage space and for some rearrangement at the Printing bureau. We are carrying on with just the rented outside space and the Printing bureau somewhat rearranged.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If new buildings are to be built simply because pressure is brought to bear on the minister, then there would be no vacant land left for buildings if the minister remained in the department long enough. I want to know what the real facts are. I do not want to be told that this or that interest, or this or that person wants the minister to rent a building or to have a new building put up. I want to know what area of storage is available and how much material can be carried in that storage space for maximum operations during any given period. I want the business end of the matter.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is rented an area of 40,000 square feet outside. The space in the Printing bureau is entirely insufficient, as my hon. friend would readily admit if he took a look at it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was not asking what space was rented outside. I want to know what space there is in the building and what supplies can be carried in that space.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think that information could be accurately given. When you come to determine what supplies are necessary in order to carry on, you have to assume that supplies when ordered will come forward promptly, and my hon. friend knows well enough, with his railway experience, that you cannot figure on any such thing, but that you have to store sufficiently in advance so as to be sure to have on hand the stocks of paper and binding material and everything else that may be necessary. As my hon. friend knows, the various departments of the government, when they have printing to do, place their orders with the bureau and the stocks have to be secured to fill those orders. Those stocks have to be kept in a proper place until they can be used, and my hon. friend can readily convince himself that there is no spare storage space in the existing bureau if he will take the trouble to-morrow morning to go there and look the place over. If he cares to go I shall be glad to accompany him.

Mr. CAHILL: What time?

Mr. MURDOCK: Any time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What quantities of material, such as paper, are ordered? What quantities do you take delivery of? What is your contract?

Mr. MURDOCK: That would depend entirely on what the order might be. Quite frequently you have to call for tenders for 10, 15 or 20 tons or more at a time, according to the orders that come from the various departments. The Printing bureau does not send out these orders for material until the various departments indicate their desire to have certain printing done. When they require such printing done they present their order to the bureau and the necessary material has to be purchased.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the committee might as well make up its mind to vote the whole half million with the information it has before it. We are simply invited to instruct the government to go ahead and spend the $150,000 on the building. Why, the minister himself will tell us that $150,000 is a mere flea bite. I do not think he will guarantee for one moment to get us a site and build a new Printing bureau for half a million dollars. This is one of the most vicious features we have in connection with government matters—the commencement of works without any proper information, without any reliable estimate of cost, without anyone being responsible if the estimate is exceeded. We are merely invited to give a blank cheque for a new Printing bureau. The committee sees how much information we have. The amendment helps just a little bit, but so far as the Treasury is concerned it does not save one single dollar, for just as much money will be spent as may be required, and every member of the government knows it. Surely we can get something definite before we are asked to vote this money? Surely the minister will tell us exactly how much he is going to spend before he asks us to pass this vote? And surely we are entitled to a little more definite information as to the real necessity of this work at the present time.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought I had made myself clear in my first statement, that we have an old building erected some thirty-six years ago and no longer suitable for present day equipment used in the printing trade, and that for some four or five years extensive additions have been made to this old building at an expenditure which I would be inclined to consider was wasted. We had the alternative this year of making another addition to this old building, which we did not think would be a wise expenditure, or consider the advisability of utilizing it for departmental purposes and providing a new building for the Printing bureau. The bureau is an important branch of the government service and requires a very large expenditure each year, and it is essential if its work is to be carried on economically and efficiently that proper equipment and adequate buildings should be provided. We are advised by the bureau people that they are to-day operating under serious difficulties. In fact, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) stated this afternoon, it was found last year unsafe to run one of the heavy machines on the third floor and it was brought down to the ground floor. Then again we find high pressure boilers for the operation of the machinery placed in the centre of one of these wings. The great heat from these boilers makes it uncomfortable for those working in this section of the building, and the fire hazard must also be taken into account. Under all the circumstances I think we are quite right in advising parliament at this time not to expend further money on the old building, but to construct a new building for the Printing bureau and utilize the present building for some other departmental purposes. That is the explanation I tried to make in the first place. I think it is sound.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see how far we have got. I am going to ask my friend the first thing that one would naturally want to know when requested to undertake a new work—how much will the completed work cost? We have not had the slightest suggestion yet as to that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I explained to my hon. friend that it was hoped when the original item of $500,000 was put in the estimates that we would have complete details and plans and be ready to go ahead. We have not been able to develop those details, and therefore I have asked the committee to reduce the estimate to $150,000. I am advised that the building will cost in the vicinity of $500,000 at least, but the whole matter is to be worked out in detail before any expenditure is made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The explanation is simply that the minister cannot tell us. He does not know, and he gives his excuse for not knowing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A very sound excuse, too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what the minister thinks. It seems to me that he might have had his work in hand and been ready with full particulars before asking parliament to vote this sum. What is the floor area of the present building, and of the projected building?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is proposed to make a careful survey of buildings of the character of an up-to-date Printing bureau. That survey is to be made jointly by a representative from the bureau and the architect of the department. We have not been able to make this survey to date, and that is why I am asking that the estimate be reduced. Nothing will be undertaken until full details are supplied.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is the case there is no reason why this item should not be struck out.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is the department now able to do all the government printing work, or is some of it being done outside?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not sure.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): We ought to have that information.

Mr. MURDOCK: Practically all of the government printing is done in the Printing bureau. There have been—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exceptions.

Mr. MURDOCK:—some slight exceptions—not so many as a short time ago.

Mr. BAXTER: I heard the minister say the old building would be used for other purposes. We ought to know definitely what department he intends to accommodate there so that we may judge as to the suitability of the building for the purpose.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In my original statement I said it was considered that the building would be very suitable for the Statistical branch. This branch has a large staff, ordinarily about three hundred, and during the census operations the number runs up to some six or seven hundred. I am advised by the Architect's branch that suitable accommodation could be provided for them in the old building.

Mr. BAXTER: Where are they housed now?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): On Bank and Victoria in some temporary buildings.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose there is no question that once we pass this item we are irretrievably committed to an ultimate expenditure of $500,000 or more?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two million dollars practically.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be anything.

Mr. BOYS: That being so, I am prompted to put another inquiry. When the item stood at $500,000 was that for the complete building or only for partial construction?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is estimated that $500,000 would probably complete the building. That is only an estimate. There is to be a thorough inquiry made by the architect of the department in conjunction with the Printing bureau people. There is nothing new in this procedure. Only in the last vote it was mentioned that in 1912 the government of the day placed $50,000 in the estimates for the enlargement of the archives building. I am informed that that was purely 11 p.m. an estimate. An estimate of this character is presented every year. I would very much prefer to have had the matter developed in order that I might have definite information for the committee, but that has not been possible under present conditions.

Mr. BOYS: That shows very clearly that if $150,000 is passed we are of course committed to an expenditure of at least $500,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. BOYS: As it is not really essential at the present time to undertake this work, could not the item stand until next year?

Mr. BAXTER: I presume the minister has informed himself, but I think this committee ought to have information as to the cost of rented buildings in the city of Ottawa upon a floor space basis as a comparison with similar figures for buildings constructed by the Dominion government, taking into account the interest on the cost, and the upkeep, including repairs and everything else, so that we may see whether it is more or less expensive to own buildings or to rent them. While personally I would rather favour the idea of the government owning and controlling the necessary buildings for the public service, still I have understood that the same thing obtains in Ottawa that obtains in other cities throughout Canada, and it is that the investments made by owners are not very profitable in the larger buildings, and that it will cost the government more annually to meet the interest charge and the upkeep of a building constructed for a specific purpose than to rent equal space in privately-owned buildings. I do not know which is correct, but I do think before we are asked to pass upon any such project we ought to have some information of that character. So far it seems to me to be just a little bit nebulous. The minister has told us that an architect is to consult with some one who will know the requirements of the Printing bureau. We do not seem to know the area to be covered nor the floor space that is requisite. It is very difficult to see how upon such a slender footing you can make an estimate of $500,000 or any other sum, and feel that it is even tolerably within the limits of accuracy. It may be, but I must say it is rather a nebulous proposition.

To avoid the necessity of speaking again, I would like to suggest this on the broader view of the question. If economy is worth anything it ought to begin here, and this government, this parliament, ought to try to set the example of getting along under existing conditions rather than incurring expenditure at a time when it seems to be simply impossible to make the annual revenue commensurate with the annual expenditure. Now if we start with that proposition I should think we would have very little of new building for some years. We have just heard a criticism in the House to-night as to the result with regard to this building in which we are. It may be that the criticism is not well directed, but there seems to be in the committee a feeling of dissatisfaction that the cost had so largely exceeded the amount that was predicted. Surely that must have come to some extent from the very practice that the minister, and I give him all credit for good intentions, is introducing to-night of embarking upon construction without first having a rigid analysis of the cost.

Might I suggest this, that the Dominion government at all times is doing too much printing, and that to contract the Printing bureau instead of expanding it would be decidedly in the interests of the country. There are tons of printed matter distributed to this House and distributed throughout the country that no one ever reads, and if we went so far in my judgment, which may not concur with that of other members of the House, as to bring about the suppression of Hansard itself, I think the country would not be much worse off. I must say I do not see any great benefit in recording what people have said when it seems to be one of the criteria of latter day politics that no one is bound to stick to anything he has said in the past. Against this expenditure which produces nothing for the country is the absolute need in every great harbour of Canada for the expenditure not merely of one hundred thousand or five hundred thousand dollars but millions of dollars, in order to promote the trade that is vital and necessary to this country if we are to keep the people within it and give them something to live for. I do not mind enlarging the capital debt for something that will promote the trade of the country even if it does seem to be running into extravagance. Why cannot we stop these things that are not vitally necessary, these things that do not produce any results until we have caught up with the things that are necessary from a business standpoint? I would ask the minister, because I believe he is a man of sound intentions and fair judgment and wants to do the best he can, under the circumstances to fairly consider the wisdom of dropping this item and all items of this class until we have met these other expenditures that the country needs to a vastly greater extent.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is true that our rentals of ordinary office space show a cheaper cost than in buildings owned and operated by the government but a building suitable for a printing bureau could not, I think, be rented in the city of Ottawa. I do not think you could find that type of building here. It is a building which is required for a specific purpose and my information, my advice, my inquiries lead me to believe we would be well advised in constructing a building for this purpose rather than trying to make additions to the old building which we are now occupying. We think it better business to provide this building, that it will be real economy in the end, and that is the reason why we are asking for this appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My suggestion to the minister is that we abandon the item; abandon any plans for additions to the present Printing bureau and the estimates for a new building. For the life of me I do not know why the government is starting to build another printing bureau now. I thought that pressure for everything that was needed, or for everything that was not needed, came on the late government, but I cannot recall any pressure for a printing bureau. I cannot recall any demand for that at all, and it seems a strange thing to me that it has been discussed now; that the one new thing we want in this country is a new printing bureau. Why are the additions required? Of course we could use them. There is some storage required at times for stationery, and if that stationery was at the bureau it would be a little handier. That is all correct, but it is no ground for embarking on an expenditure that is going to run to a million dollars.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Oh no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, pshaw. The minister has got to get ground, unless he is going to come down here on Wellington street, and I venture to say he is not. He is going to erect a building of the dimensions of the present bureau or larger. Will he tell me that the present building did not cost a million dollars, and erected at a time when building was far cheaper than it is now? I have never had the figures, but I venture to say that building has cost close to a million dollars. Once we pass this item the minister can enter into a contract for the erection of a building of the present dimensions or larger. When that is done he will have paid a million out. Then he has to take his old building and reconstruct it virtually from top to bottom, because as it stands to-day it is valueless as a departmental building; the walls are there, it is true, but the whole of the interior would have to be reconstructed. He is launching on a new building at the present time because he has been informed that the present structure is not suitable for a modern printing bureau. Does the minister mean to suggest that the need or call for a new bureau compares at all with the need of scores of farmers of this country who are drawing grain for sixty miles to get it to a railway station? The grading of the railway which is to provide them with means of transportation has been done but the government cannot provide the money to put down the rails. Let the minister get along with the building he has. We do not need a building to-day as much as we needed it years ago; we have fewer employees. I have a statement in front of me which shows that the annual pay of those employees, notwithstanding the increased wages we are paying out to-day, is something like $526,000 less than in previous years. We have some 460 less employees, if I understood the Minister of Labour aright, than we had before. Now if we have fewer employees and less expenditure to provide for, owing to the reorganization effected by the late government, why is it, with all that done, we have got to cast the whole thing away and erect a new building? The minister, I think, should abandon the item and abandon the project. Let us go on with the Printing bureau that we have, let us hold to the saving we have made, and let us possibly present some case to those in other parts of the Dominion who have to be denied improvements that are necessary for productive purposes on the score of economy.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is one very important reason for the proposal to build a new Printing bureau that has not yet been referred to. I was in hopes that it would not be necessary to allude to it but it seems that it is. I would like very much if my hon. friends opposite who have so eloquently talked against the building of a reasonably modern, safe and up-to-date Printing bureau would go down to that bureau and verify whether what I am going to state is warranted by the facts or not. I do not possess special knowledge with respect to printing bureaux but I regard the present building as being absolutely unsuitable for the employees under present conditions having regard to the location of the heating plant. When I was first placed in charge of the Printing bureau and went down to look at the situation and examined the location of the heating plant, what did I find? It is located in the centre of the bureau, the structure has been built around it, so that in the rooms above the heat in the summertime is unbearable while the risk from fire, and possible misadventure, at all times, seems to me to be beyond question. I frankly state that I have been anticipating, month after month, some unfortunate occurrence to happen down there, with possibly great loss of life. If there should be any such occurrence, under the conditions which now exist, would we save money in view of the fact that 675 or 725 employees would be thrown on our hands to be supported by the government while they were out of work. Then the fact of the heavy machinery in the bureau has been touched upon. I do not know that the building conforms to the requirements of the Ontario Factory Law; I am afraid that instead of being held to conform to the provincial statute it would be regarded as entirely unsafe. As to the aspect of this proposition from a financial standpoint, the committee have not yet been told that we pay out in rent of buildings in the city of Ottawa every year the sum of $626,000; that we pay for the upkeep of these buildings—for char service, heating and lighting and so on—$275,000, or a total of $901,000 a year for these purposes. Yet the proposition to build a $500,000 modern, up-to-date, printing plant, constructed so that the heaviest machinery could be utilized and operated without undue vibration, is subjected to criticism. This is a business proposition, if I know anything about it. I certainly would like hon. members who are opposed to the vote for this purpose to go down and inspect the situation for themselves and then come back and say whether this proposition is not a practical and businesslike one. I do not regard the conditions under which employees in the Printing bureau are working as being safe, and I think we are fortunate indeed that untoward occurrences have not happened before this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why there should have been any hesitation in stating that the building is dangerous from a fire standpoint if that is the real reason for the government's action. I really do not know what the government were afraid of in concealing that fact and only bringing it out at the last minute. But let us consider the argument presented from that standpoint. It has not been shown that any great change is needed now from what has existed for thirty-six years at all events for several years. I have not heard this fire peril advanced before.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will my right hon. friend pardon me? He probably is aware that in very recent years an additional wing has been built right over the boiler. That is a material change which affects the situation.

Mr. BAXTER: Where should the boiler be put? Not on top of the building.

Mr. MURDOCK: You usually have the boiler in a spot where you will not encounter improper hazards.

Mr. BAXTER: The boiler is in the cellar generally.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sometimes you do, but certainly it is not the rule by any means. Suppose the building is turned into a departmental building, what about the employees that are going to be put into it? The minister's intention is to take the government employees from some other sphere and hive them in this building, and the boiler will still be under the building. The boiler will not be moved out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a difference. These boilers are used for power purposes; they are under high pressure. The old heating boiler would be a low pressure boiler, which is quite different.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister mean there is danger of the boiler bursting because of the high pressure?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The boilers are under high pressure and high fires all the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume they are built for that. I understood the danger to be that there was something above, and in case of fire starting below it would quickly spread. That danger will exist just the same if the building is of the other kind. It may be there will be less fire on. It seems to me it is drawing the line pretty fine. If there is danger of the boilers bursting, then they were not built for the purpose for which they are being used. If there is danger from fire, there is just as much danger if it is heated as a departmental building as there would be in the other case. The minister says it is going to pay, because now we are paying out some $600,000 rentals and $200,000 odd for lighting and charring in the rented buildings. Well why not pay it out? After we have built this building, will we not have to light it the same as in the other case? Do we not get along more cheaply when we rent these buildings? Is not the reason he is erecting this building the fact that there is not a building he can rent which is suitable for the purpose? I have not the least doubt at all—and I have gone very carefully into some of the comparisons—that we cannot erect buildings and maintain them as cheaply as we can rent, save under very exceptional conditions of renting, and at the present time in this city there are liable to be more buildings in the market to rent, and there are to-day more buildings to rent, than there have been for some years. The government is in position to get cheaper rentals, if only it will exercise the opportunities at hand. The government can get cheaper rentals than we have had for some time, and while we are in that position, when we should be contracting rather than expanding departments, needing less year by year, we are launching upon a building programme, and we are asked to give a cheque for a building which is going to run to $1,000,000. It ought to be possible to obviate any special fire peril in this building. If there is any special fire peril I do not want the bureau employees or any other employees to be subject to it. It should be possible to obviate this peril, without abandoning the thing after 36 years, merely because we are told that by reason of the boiler being underneath there is some special danger to the occupants.

Mr. WHITE: In view of the statement made by the Mininster of Labour (Mr. Murdock) I would like to know if this bureau was not subject to the inspection of the factory inspector, and if the boilers are not regularly inspected by the inspectors of the insurance companies, and whether any complaint or any condemnation has been made in either case.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know whether any inspection has been made. I think not, and I do not want to convey the impression that the boilers are not safe. I do not know as to that. It is the location and the general way in which the wing has been built over, and the number of years that have elapsed since some of the work has been done and added to, that makes the structure, particularly in the centre, appear to me to be entirely unsafe and as though we might expect something serious to happen.

Mr. BAXTER: What is the matter with taking a recess, getting the architects and the chief of the Printing bureau and all the other necessary persons together, and coming back next session with a definite knowledge of what is the matter with the old building? The doubts of the Minister of Labour will be relieved by that time, and he can find out whether there is really a peril or not. We can have a plan made for a building, and know exactly what its floor space, height and cost will be, as accurately as any of these estimates can be made, and then parliament will be furnished with the information it should be asked to pass upon. I do not see there will be very much economy in time by putting the estimate through now, as all these things will have to be done, or I presume they will be done, before the government enters upon the construction of the building. It is only a question whether we will pass the estimate after the government has the information or before. I think perhaps the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) might enlighten me a little more as to what they are going to do with the old building? Are they going to put the old Bureau in the Senate?

Amendment (Mr. Beland) agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the item be further reduced by $150,000.

Mr. FIELDING: One suggestion on the part of hon. members opposite impressed me, and that is that this building will cost $1,000,000. The leader of the Opposition suggested the old building cost $2,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: I thought he said it probably cost $2,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, $1,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING: I think if this building is going to cost $1,000,000, before we go on with it the minister should come back to parliament and inform us. I think the request that we should know what a building is going to cost before we enter upon its construction is a reasonable one. I have been impressed with the representations as to the urgent need of the building, and if we are going to do anything this appropriation of $150,000 is not too much to make a beginning. If the minister finds on investigation that the building is going to cost about $1,000,000, I think he should not go on with it, but that he should stop operations, and come back and lay his plans before the House. Subject to that, I think the appropriation might properly pass.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a direct vote against the item, because it will reduce it to nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I intended.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know that the hon. member can move to reduce the whole item to nothing. He can move to reduce it by a certain sum.

Mr. GOULD: Listening to the remark of the Minister of Labour, I was impressed with the thought that, seeing that he had gone down and, in his judgment, proved the building to be unworthy and unsafe, he might have followed up that idea by getting an engineer to investigate and make a report, and submit that report to the House. It seems to me that it would be more authentic, and we would have more to go on, if an engineer would submit a report and state that the building was unsafe or that portions of it were unsafe, and it would not in any way depreciate the ideas or the sentiments of the Minister of Labour. It seems to me the committee here has a right, if buildings are alleged to be unsafe, to have reports from some competent authority in regard to them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think there should be any idea in the minds of members of the committee that these boilers which are high pressure boilers under steam are not being properly inspected and taken care of. I have no doubt examinations are being made from time to time to see that they are in proper condition. But as regards even boilers that are looked after, things happen at times, and nobody will undertake for a moment to say that a high-pressure boiler should be under a building in which six or seven hundred people are employed. There is not only the danger that might happen of explosions which are more or less remote, but which, through neglect or some other cause, occur at times, but a very considerable danger from fire. Boilers carrying steam are usually fired to produce the heat required for the generation of steam in quantities, a much greater heat than one finds required in low-pressure boilers for heating purposes, and there is a real risk there, a risk that I do not believe the employees in the Printing bureau should be subject to. They were not originally subject to this, but they have been more recently on account of additions that have been built around this boiler, which at one time was outside of the building. That is a phase of the question that has been brought to the attention of the committee, and I think in fairness to the employees of the Printing bureau, proper inspection should be made from time to time. There is an increased fire risk and some danger that explosions from that boiler might occur, although the latter danger is remote.

[Mr. Chairman.]

The suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is quite in accord with my view. I have assured the committee that it is the intention of the department that the Architect's branch and representatives from the bureau will devote considerable time to informing themselves as to what will constitute a proper building for printing purposes, one that will be of service to the government. They will then proceed to design plans and to submit plans to the government. If after careful inquiry, we find that this is going to commit us to a larger expenditure than the original expenditure suggested I have no objection, in fact, I will advise that the matter be stayed over until the House is consulted next session. But I think it is necessary for us to make some progress in the matter. Let us make the investigation; let us have the plans. If necessary, let us secure the site, although I do not think that will be necessary because the government owns a considerable amount of property, and I believe we can find a location for the plant. Let us go ahead, however, with the reduced appropriation of $150,000, and if it is found by the officials, after careful consideration, that this expenditure is to exceed the estimate as originally placed in the estimates, I will advise that the government hold the matter up and that parliament be consulted next year. In the meantime, I would like that this vote should receive the sanction of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the undertaking of the minister that if, after the plans are fully provided, they know what the cost is to be of the land and of the building, and if they find that that is likely to be over $500,000, then he will not proceed to make any expenditure, I am prepared to withdraw the amendment. The result will be just the same.

Amendment (Mr. Meighen) withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. MANION:

1. Have there been any complaints since 1915 regarding the purchase of unscalped or uncleaned screenings from the government elevators to the Board of Grain Commissioners?

SUPPLY

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Dominion Arsenal, Quebec, $390,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): Some hon. members wanted this item to stand when we were discussing the estimates on the last occasion.

Mr. BOYS: The minister will recall, no doubt, that when this item was under discussion some weeks ago certain information was asked for and promised, and I am pleased to say that privately I received most of the information asked for when the item was under discussion. I would ask that the minister give me that information now, so that it may be placed on Hansard. I wanted to know, (1) the quantity of ammunition received from England; (2) the value of the ammunition received from England; (3) the quantities of that ammunition still on hand, and (4) the portion of ammunition which would not be useful to the militia of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say, Mr. Chairman, as to the last question that, as far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no portion of it that would not be useful, if it is expended before the expiration of the life of the ammunition. The quantities of ammunition received from England, asked for by my hon. friend, are as fallows:

Q.F. 18-pounder shrapnel, rounds	98,980
Q.F. 18-pounder high explosives, rounds	4,000
Q.F. 13-pounder 9 cwt. shrapnel, rounds	2,500
Q.F. 12-pounder 9 cwt. high explosives, rounds	2,500
Q.F. 4.5 in. Howitzer, rounds, H.E.	33,000
B.L. 60-pounder shrapnel, rounds	5,400
B.L. 60-pounder high explosives, rounds	600
Q.F. 4.7 in. shrapnel, rounds	5,400
Q.F. 4.7 in. high explosives, rounds	600
B.L. 6 in. 26 cwt. Howitzer, high explosives, rounds	8,000
B.L. 8 in. Howitzer, high explosives, rounds	2,000
Bombs, high explosives, M.L. 6 in. trench mortar, complete	6,000

That makes a total of approximately 169,000 rounds.

An estimated value of $3,000,000 was placed on this ammunition. My hon. friend asks how much of that ammunition has been expended. I could give that to the House, but this situation arises; the chief of staff of the Department of National Defence takes strong objection to making public the quantity of ammunition in Canada. He said it was not done by the war office of any country and was contrary to the practice of military heads. Of course, the House is supreme and if the House thinks I should give that information I will do so. If I give the amount expended, of course hon. members will have the amount on hand, to which my chief of staff objects.

Mr. BOYS: That would be assuming we would be making no ammunition here in Canada. I do not ask as to the exact amount of ammunition on hand all told, but it would seem to me that we might, in view of what has transpired in the past, have some information as to what portion of the ammunition that came from England since the war is still on hand, and I certainly did want to know, with as much certainty as possible, what portion, if any, will not be useful. The minister said it would all be useful, except any portion that may not be used up to the time at which it is not supposed to be useful, which I think is 1925. Could the minister not tell us, assuming the consumption continues at the existing rate, whether or not all that munition will be used before it becomes useless in July 1925?

Mr. GRAHAM: At the present rate of consumption of ammunition, it will not all be used before 1925.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister go just a little further and give us some idea of the quantity? Is the quantity to be on hand trifling?

Mr. GRAHAM: It will be trifling.

Mr. BOYS: That is satisfactory.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister says that the heads of his department do not want him to tell how much ammunition there is in stock. I would remind the minister that last year he gave us that information. He evidently did not at that time follow the advice of his military advisers. This year, when we require similar information, we cannot get it because his military advisers tell him that he should not give it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know quite well I gave figures last year, and that is the reason why I was warned by my Chief of Staff that I did a wrong thing last year. I was asked on the floor of the House to give certain figures and I gave them as nearly as possible. When this year I asked my Chief of Staff what I should do, he said that I should, if possible, refrain in the meantime from giving the quantity of ammunition on hand.

Mr. CHAPLIN: As a consequence, the minister is not prepared to state how much small arms ammunition was used at the camps this year. The last time these estimates were up I asked whether it was necessary to continue manufacturing these goods. That can be determined only by knowing how much we have on hand. We are running an ammunition factory at considerable expense, and if we have on hand enough ammunition for a period of years with a reduced military camp, the best thing to do is to give the ammunition factory a rest for a while.

Mr. GRAHAM: The approximate quantity of small arms ammunition used last year was 4,000,000 rounds. As regards the other question, there is a limit of reserve under which Canada has gone. I will go that far. She will be manufacturing for some little time before she arrives at the place at which she ought to arrive and make provision for the annual expenditure.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad to know that we used about 4,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition. Last year, the minister told us that assuming that we were using about nine or ten million rounds a year we required of small arms ammunition enough for about a five years' supply. That would be about 45,000,000 rounds. Now, he tells us that the amount we used last year was 4,000,000 rounds. According to those statements, we have enough small arms ammunition to do us for ten years, assuming that we shall not use it at a higher rate than we did last year, and from the militia estimates that we are passing, we cannot use more because we are reducing the camps. This ammunition will spoil if we keep it without using it for ten years, and as far as I can see we have enough on hand now to last us for ten years. What is the use of making more?

Mr. GRAHAM: I tried to explain to my hon. friend a point that has some delicacy to it. We are supposed to have on hand in Canada at all times a certain number of rounds of ammunition for safety. We have not that nor anything approaching it, and if what my hon. friend said were true, that would not help the situation in the least degree, because if we are to approximate the number of rounds we ought to have in the Dominion of Canada, we must manufacture all we use and a great deal more.

Mr. KNOX: What is the life of small arms ammunition? How many years is it supposed to be good for?

Mr. GRAHAM: About ten years.

Mr. KNOX: After that, provided there is any of it on hand, what is done with it?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is tested at certain times. Of course, one can understand that ammunition that was dangerous could not be used for any remanufacturing purposes. It is generally destroyed.

Mr. KNOX: Would there be any reason why it should not be given out at a much reduced rate to some of the civilian rifle associations?

Mr. GRAHAM: If it were no good, it would be of no use to them except for junk.

Mr. KNOX: For practise purposes?

Mr. GRAHAM: As long as it was good for practise purposes, I imagine we would use it. The moment it became useless for practise purposes, because in the long run in peace times, it is used mostly for practise purposes, it would be of no use to civilian corps either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it a fact that of heavy arms ammunition, the officers have advised that we have only one day's supply, that is to say, one day's reserve, assuming that it would be expended at the rate at which it was expended in the late war in case of difficulty?

Mr. GRAHAM: No such suggestion as that has been made to me. I am inclined, however, to think if we were thrown immediately into the midst of war with a high or peak expenditure of explosives, we would not have enough to last very long.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did General MacBrien not advise that we had just one day's supply in such an emergency as that?

Mr. GRAHAM: He never advised me to that effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may inform the minister that that is in his evidence, and I thought likely he had so advised the minister. Has there during the minister's charge of this office been any of this ammunition brought over from the Old Country out of the reserve there from the war?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, I am sure there has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many shipments?

Mr. GRAHAM: In August, 1922, the Challenger brought out a certain shipment. What I have in my hand is just the amount of the freight.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister give the nature of the material?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not that here. I imagine it would be heavy ammunition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same material as had been brought out before?

Mr. GRAHAM: Of the same character, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many shipments altogether since the minister took charge?

Mr. GRAHAM: One, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like the minister to make more careful inquiry. My information is that there have been four.

Mr. GRAHAM: There may have been. I have only one in my figures. There has been at least one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to get this right, if I can. Surely the deputy knows.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will look it up. I find only one here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I appreciate to the full the minister's desire, to reserve as much information as possible as to the quantities of ammunition we have. This is all the more imperative, because undoubtedly our quantities are below the mark rather than above. Does not caution in that regard apply just as much to divulging information of ammunition received as of ammunition on hand?

Mr. GRAHAM: It might not be in the same category. Ammunition received might be in addition to a full reserve on hand. It is the quantity that we have on hand that makes for the safety of the country, and not the amount we receive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the heavy ammunition which we had on hand a full reserve in 1921?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not been given the figures in regard to the amount of heavy ammunition necessary as reserve, but speaking offhand I should say that Canada has had at no time anything over the amount necessary for reserve, of either heavy or light ammunition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister say that all the kinds of ammunition brought over, some of which has come under his own ministerial control, are being actually used in rifle practice in this country?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say in rifle practice—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I mean in training.

Mr. GRAHAM: —because there was no small ammunition brought over. As I informed my hon. friend (Mr. Boys), I have every reason to believe that all the ammunition brought over is useful for the purposes of the Canadian militia if it be used before the expiration of its life.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I want to know is whether, for the training that we give, all the ammunition of that kind is not necessary.

My point is this: If we do not get it from one source we must get it from another, because it is necessary for training purposes. Is this any class of ammunition,—and if there is I want to know what it is,—which is brought over that is not necessary for the kind of military training we give in this country?

Mr. GRAHAM: I know well what my hon. friend wants me to say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, I want just the facts. I know the facts myself, and I want them brought out in this House. I think I have a right to ask for them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not saying that my hon. friend has not that right, and I accept the compliment of being cross-questioned in order that he may elicit the evidence in the shape in which he wants it. As a matter of fact the Canadian militia had the right to choose its own ammunition and would not choose anything that was not useful.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And it did not?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, not as far as I know.

Mr. BOYS: If we did not have this ammunition from overseas and we wanted to give the training that was regarded as necessary, we should have to pay for that ammunition, whether it was made in Canada or elsewhere. Is not that so?

Mr. GRAHAM: This is not evidence in rebuttal now, is it? Certainly we could not have used ammunition if we did not have it, and if training with the same guns had taken place, ammunition of this kind would have to be used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, and the minister knows it. Is there any other kind of training given? Are we training our men properly or are we not? Is it not the regular training we are giving, and should we not have to have this ammunition for the purpose? If that is not the fact I should like the minister to say what is.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is getting unreasonable, but I do not mind that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, and I do not want to be unreasonable.

Mr. GRAHAM: Evidently he is not a soldier any more than I am.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is training and training. There can be training without this artillery at all; for instance, the infantry could be trained. I say again, however, that if there is to be artillery training of this kind we must have this ammunition or ammunition of a similar kind. I am not a judge as to whether the training is proper or not, as my hon. friend evidently wants me to appear to be, and I do not think he is.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Coming back to the item of small arms ammunition, last year the minister had an item in his estimates of nine million rounds for .22 rifles. I presume that this was for the purposes of boys' training. How much approximately of this was used last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: The .22 ammunition would be for the cadet service. The total estimate for the Dominion arsenal in 1923 was $425,000, but it was reduced by $50,000. My hon. friend will remember when the reduction was made. The re-adjustment then took place, and all the figures we had given before were consequently out of proportion to the reduced estimates. It became necessary to adjust expenditures and we were forced to reduce the production of .22 ammunition to 500,000 rounds, which is all we have manufactured this year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I want some information with regard to the subject of medals. It was at one time thought possible to produce in the arsenals of Canada, a service medal for Canadian troops. As the minister knows, the medals which have already been issued for service in the Great War are the Allied medal and the British war medal. There has been so far no distinctively Canadian medal issued and those troops who served in Canada but who did not go overseas or get to the actual theatre of war have not received, so far as I am aware, any medals for their services. A letter was handed me yesterday which I brought to the attention of the minister, to the effect that the British war medal, which was granted, in the first instance, only to those who had seen actual service in France, was being furnished to the troops in South Africa. I know that while I was Minister of Militia the British war medal was withheld from Canadian troops as well as from British troops who had not actually served in France, and I should like the minister to say whether there has been any change in regard to the conditions upon which the British war medal has heretofore been awarded. Further, I would ask, is it the intention of the government to issue a Canadian medal for those who served in Canada, and if so will it be made at the arsenals of Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: The question my hon. friend raised regarding the British war medal I submitted to my department this morning, but I have not been able to get the information so far. I will submit it to him privately; I could not obtain it before coming here. The question of medals for those who served in Canada is one that has been before the department, as my hon. friend knows, for years, and it has always struck me that it would be a good thing if the men who served only in Canada could be given some distinctive medal. But the cost is pretty heavy, and up to the present time no minister has seen fit to recommend that the expenditure be made just yet. If I remember rightly, the cost would be about $1,000,000 or a little more, and owing to the financial condition of the country we have thought it best to postpone the matter for a while. That is a plain statement of the situation.

Mr. MANION: Apart from the possibility of providing a Canadian medal, have all the medals that are to be distributed been disposed of to the soldiers?

Mr. GRAHAM: They have not all been distributed yet. They have been purchased but have not yet all arrived; but we are distributing them as fast as they come in.

Mr. MANION: What percentage of them has been distributed and what percentage remains?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not the figures, but I fancy that the distribution has largely taken place. We have been sending them out every day.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How much of the appropriation under the item we are discussing was actually spent last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is referring to the Quebec arsenal?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: The expenditure to date is $358,704; $375,000 was voted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understood the minister to say a moment ago that because of a general reduction in his militia estimates it was necessary for him to go over all these other estimates and rearrange them. I cannot comprehend that. Does he mean that he could go over these other estimates that we have passed and change them?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The estimates as they went through the committee were the estimates for the year, not as they were brought down before the reduction was made. When we had the item of $425,000 it was for the Quebec arsenal in the first place—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh no. I have before me the item for the Quebec arsenal. As brought down it was $425,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what I have just said.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I gave certain figures on the basis of $425,000, but afterwards that was cut down to $375,000, and thereupon we changed the detail, as we were compelled to, the amount having been reduced.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The vote for the Quebec arsenal last year was reduced $50,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And because of that the minister had to rearrange this particular estimate?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister not made a mistake in saying that we purchased the English war medals? My recollection is that these medals were given by the British government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sure we are paying a large amount for medals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For these British war medals?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes; for silver and bronze war medals and stars we have paid in Canadian currency altogether $893,945.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that Allied or British medals?

Mr. GRAHAM: All the war decorations I have any note of here are—British silver war medals, Victory bronze medals, stars, war service badges.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have been endeavouring to gather from the minister's statements what is the government's policy with regard to national defence. I understand from the minister that the supply of ammunition on hand is very much below the estimated reserve necessary to ensure the safety of the country. The arsenal at Lindsay has been closed, but there is an increase in the vote for the Quebec arsenal. The naval service has been sent on a fishing expedition. The colleges for training cadets for the naval service at Esquimalt and Halifax have been closed. Does the minister consider that any useful purpose is being served by the vote now under consideration for national defence or for the training of what is left of our militia? I must say that I am unable to understand from the explanations which have been given what the ultimate object of the government is. Some time ago the people were led to believe that certain hon. gentlemen opposite were horrified to think that large quantities of ammunition were being brought to Quebec from Great Britain. Now we are told by the minister that the supply is largely below the quantity required for the national safety in the event of any trouble arising. Is it prudent or advisable to get below the safety line in connection with national defence? Surely the dignity of the country and our national self-respect must be maintained, and these can only be maintained by keeping our reserve of ammunition at a point which will enable us to take care of ourselves in the event of any emergency.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is hard work to divide my affections in this matter. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) near my friend from Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) chastised me a moment ago for making more ammunition while we have some on hand; my friend from Oxford says that we are not going fast enough in building up a reserve. The purpose of this vote is the manufacture of ammunition. I agree with him that as rapidly as possible we ought to approximate at least to what our officers in charge of national defence think is the proper reserve.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is quite evident from the minister's reply that the officers of the department did not report that the ammunition which was unloaded at Quebec a couple of years ago was any menace to this country as then intimated by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to correct the minister. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) was only urging that on the scale of training now going on he felt there was abundance of small arms ammunition on hand. He did not for a moment say that he considered the scale of training to be sufficient or that the minister was carrying out his own self-expressed obligation of keeping the defences of the country at least at the minimum of safety.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims—National Defence—Militia Services, $4,000,000; Naval Services, $274,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Last year the vote was $7,380,000. The amount expended during the year was $4,086,000. Among some of the larger items was a payment to the British Shipping Board. My hon. friend will remember that a claim was made for a very large amount in connection with the sinking of the Llandovery Castle, a hospital ship under charter to the Canadian government. After much discussion between the British Ministry of Shipping, the steamship company and the arbitration board, and after obtaining the opinion of four private valuators, the British Ministry of Shipping paid the steamship company £553,540, or $2,693,894.59, and presented the account to Canada. Serious objection was made to the basis of valuation by the former minister, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and again this year by the representative we sent over, Mr. Garrison, with the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). The result was that the valuation was reduced to £503,540 a reduction of £50,000. Other items were: refunds for coal supplied, port charges, etc. $500,508.18; refund on victualling account, $420,639.73; claims withdrawn, $113,687.75; refund on gun contracts, two items, one of $930,167.74, and another of $14,600, making a total reduction, including that in respect of the Llandovery Castle, of $2,222,936.70. On that basis we settled with the British Shipping Board and we do not now owe them anything in respect to these accounts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Were they paid out of the vote of last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What does the minister propose to do with the $4,349,000 for which he now asks?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two large items outstanding which are provided for in this estimate. One is an interest account of £375,000 or $1,824,999, which is more than offset by the interest charges of the Dominion for advances made to Great Britain for war purposes, etc. The British government have recently made a payment of interest amounting to $1,631,602.48, and it has capitalized a further sum of $8,000,000. The other item is with respect to pensions to dependents of sailors who lost their lives. The British government has made a claim against Canada for whatever amounts should be paid to the families of the sailors who lost their lives on the Llandovery Castle. We have not admitted that responsibility, although there is an item here concerning it. My hon. friend will remember also that Vickers made a claim for cancellation of contracts, the amount being decided upon by a board as being about £62,000. If I remember correctly the Vickers Company offered to take £45,000 in settlement. When Mr. Garrison was in London this year the Vickers people reduced that offer to £33,000. The Finance Minister thoroughly investigated the matter and he is not prepared to admit that we owe Vickers anything. That is the way the matter stands at present, although I must say that within the last few days the company has written to the department going back to their old demand of £45,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is true that the company put in a very substantial claim, amounting in the first instance to something like £70,000. Then the matter was re-
4 p.m. ferred to an English board which had investigated a great many claims against the British government arising in the same manner. The claim is really one for damages for cancellation of contracts at the outbreak of the war. An award was made by the British investigators in the sum of about £62,000, but it was considered that that amount was excessive and that the company had not suffered damages to that extent. We offered, in my time, to give the company a fiat to prosecute its claim in the Exchequer Court of Canada, but they demurred. Finally they offered to accept £40,000 in full of their claim.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not in the correspondence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was a verbal offer made to me in London which I submitted to my right hon. friend who was then Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), and whose impression was that the amount was still too high. That is the furthest point which the negotiations had reached at the time of the election and the resignation of the government. I personally have no recollection of any £45,000 offer. Various conversations on the subject took place in the corridors of the House, in the Militia department, in England, and elsewhere. Several offers were made, but no official adjustment had been arrived at when the government resigned. I understand now that the company have reduced their offer to £33,000, but that that amount has not been paid. I think the government has done well in the settlement of the Llandovery Castle claim. I had the advantage of having with me in London in 1921 Mr. Garrison, an accountant of the Militia department, and certainly Mr. Garrison's work as an accountant was of the highest kind; he spent a great deal of time over the accounts. After a great many interviews and consultations and a good deal of bickering and quarrelling with some of the minor officials, we at that time succeeded in reducing the claim by about $700,000. But we refused to approve the offer of the British government in regard to the Llandovery Castle. The chief objection to settling at that time was that Canada had not been represented directly on the board of arbitrators which fixed that loss. The British Admiralty undertook to appoint a board, and that board assessed the damages on the basis of the replacement value of the ship. The ship was a British ship originally under charter to the British government, but Canada had become the charterer. When the vessel was sunk as a result of submarine operations in the English Channel, the question was who was to bear the loss. At that time it was next to impossible to procure insurance, and the decision was reached by the Admiralty, concurred in by the Canadian authorities, that on account of the enormous rates that had to be paid it would be better for each country to carry its own insurance. In this case no insurance had been taken out. My recollection of the figures was that the claim for replacement value of the ship ran to something like £600,000, while the original cost of the vessel was only about half that amount. Our objection, therefore, was on the ground that Canada was not a party to the award or to the arbitration that made the award, and that the replacement value of the ship was not a proper basis for a settlement—although the British Admiralty had settled a great number of cases on that basis. If a settlement has been effected, as I understand from the minister, at £503,000, a very substantial reduction has been made from the original claim and I think the department has been very wise in effecting such a settlement. At least a quarter of a million dollars have been saved on this one item, and I only hope that in respect to the other outstanding items the department may be as fortunate.

The question as to compensating the families of the sailors who lost their lives on the Llandovery Castle may give rise to some nice points of law. Having heard of the matter for the first time now, and speaking offhand, I would be inclined to think that as the ship at the time of the disaster was under Canadian charter there is rather a strong probability that we will be liable. However, I understand from the minister that that item is yet to be considered.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not hear the first part of my hon. friend's remarks about the Vickers case. Will he tell me what he refers to as the basis of the Vickers case? What is the ground of their claim?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The basis was damages for the cancellation of a contract.

Mr. FIELDING: That is the crux of the whole matter. The whole matter hinges on that word "cancellation". There was no cancellation; that is the vital point of the whole thing. In the discussion which took place a year ago my hon. friend made a similar remark; he understood there had been a cancellation of a contract, and therefore there would have to be compensation paid in some form under it. It may be that there are facts in this matter which did not come before me. The settlement of the claim was not part of my mission to England, but while there I had an opportunity of making some inquiries into the matter and had the privilege of hearing the views of Sir Trevor Dawson, managing director of the Vickers Company. As I found the case there was no cancellation at all. The Vickers Company made a contract with the government of Canada. The government of Canada were ready to honour the contract; they were ready to take the goods and pay for them. But the Vickers Company did not deliver the goods; they could not deliver them. The war came on, the British government took possession of the Vickers concern, and the Vickers people were busy from that time forward in fulfilling contracts with the British government. There was no cancellation on the part of the Dominion of Canada. That is the vital thing. If I am right in that then the Vickers Company have no claim. I have to emphasize that fact as matters all depend on that. It was said the claim was admitted later on. Even if that were so it would not be fatal at all; much would depend on the party who had admitted it and his authority to make the admission. But there was no such admission. An officer representing my hon. friend, who was then Minister of Militia, stated to the Vickers that if there were to be any further orders given, all things being equal, a preference would be given to the Vickers over other parties. But no further orders were given about that time, and there came no opportunity for the granting of the preference which was indicated. But if I am right in my statement the whole thing turns upon the question: Was there a cancellation of the contract? My information is that there was not. The government made a contract, the government were ready to receive the goods, the government were ready to pay for them, but the Vickers never could deliver the goods. The contract contained a clause respecting penalty and technically speaking there might be a claim for damages. But that would not be urged under the circumstances. The Vickers Company were not able to deliver the goods because the British government took possession of their works. I think there would be great difficulty in saying that the Vickers Company made any large expenditure bearing on the contract. If they made any expenditure it would be a very small one. If they did incur any expenditure designed to serve the contract, I suppose we might say technically there was a claim against the British government, because it was something the British government did, and not anything the Canadian government did, that prevented the carrying out of the contract. If the claim were made that the Vickers Company had expended some money in preparing for the contract, to that small extent there might be a fair claim; but any claim based on the contention that there was a cancellation of the contract is, if my own information is correct, entirely unfounded.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the item carries will the minister give us all the items making up the $7,833,800, the aggregate of the naval and military ingredients of this vote?

Mr. GRAHAM: The following is a statement of the expenditure for militia services from 1st April, 1922, to 8th March, 1923:

Pay and allowances	$ 111,411 93
Separation allowances	76,884 10
War service gratuities	227,982 14
Printing and stationery	2,835 21
Postage on medals, records, etc.	35,883 76
Ordnance services—repairs to rifles, machine guns, etc., from overseas	19,666 22
Engineer services and works	9,781 13
Civilian employees	309,115 81
Transport and travelling	2,299,276 50
Historical section	9,017 45
Pay and allowance board	1,670 00
Camp Borden site	Nil.
Medals	475,177 00
Difference in exchange	9,094 01
Miscellaneous and unforeseen expenditure	326,411 79
	$3,914,207 05
Battlefields memorials	172,361 69
	$4,086,568 74

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister tell us what really makes up the item "Transport and travelling"?

Mr. GRAHAM: The amount we are just speaking about, for the settlement made in connection with the Llandovery Castle was included in that item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then "Transport and travelling" includes the loss?

Mr. GRAHAM: The ship was transporting troops when this loss took place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The vote is really the same as the old demobilization vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the same heading.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Air Force—operation, maintenance, repairs, etc., $1,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to say that in this vote for the air force $250,000 is for the purchase of equipment, flying machines, etc. This service is going to be more useful year by year, as hon. gentlemen will see if they look into what has been done during the past year. I may as well tell the committee that this service is not going to be an inexpensive one. Machines last but a very short time and wear out quickly; the spare parts that have to be carried are expensive; the whole service is quite a costly one. But in one year it more than repays what it will cost in ten in the preservation of our forests and other preventive measures. This $250,000 will include the purchase of nine amphibious machines; in other words, flying boats. They will cost in the vicinity of $175,000. Tenders were accepted—they have not been delivered yet—from the Vickers people, seven of these to be manufactured in the Dominion of Canada and two to be manufactured in Great Britain and sent over. The wireless, for which an appropriation is asked in the $250,000, is one of the branches of aerial service. Without the ability to communicate with their headquarters on the ground, flying over the forest is somewhat precarious and not practicable. In addition to that, in the city of Winnipeg, for the purchase of some land, on which an amount has been spent this year in the erection of hangars, I think in the vicinity of about $1,000 will be expended, and the balance of this is for operation and maintenance, etc. I might say that last year some difficulty was found, I think particularly in the province of Quebec, with some of the large machines. When they got into difficulty and alighted on some of the small lakes, it was almost impossible to get them out. They were unsuitable for that work. These machines were practically all given to us by the Royal Air Force of the British government, and of necessity a good many of them have got to the point where they are unsafe for use and others are of a nature and construction not quite practicable in this country. In another year we will have to buy more machines for two reasons, first, because the machines are constantly wearing out, and, second, because men must not be sent in the air in machines that are considered unsafe. Furthermore, the demands being made on the air force are doubled every year. Last year the Attorney General of British Columbia came in to see me, and asked if we could not extend the service in British Columbia. He pointed out two or three instances in connection with the work out there that would impress one with the value of the service being rendered by the air force. He is Minister of Lands, and in one instance there was a point which he, with those in his department wished to reach. He told me it would have taken him several days, I forget how many, by pack train to get to this point. He went in with one of our machines and made the inspection, and only three hours were occupied in getting there. In expense, feed and practicability the air service has overcome time and distance.

Last year we received from the province of Quebec $20,000, and the same amount from the province of Ontario. Ontario has paid us $38,000 this year, having increased its service. British Columbia paid us a certain amount but the attorney general told me they were prepared to pay $20,000 this year and were prepared to extend and enlarge this service.

Mr. MILLAR: Has this service been extended to Saskatchewan? If so how much was spent there last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: The province of Saskatchewan is looked after largely from the Winnipeg depot. There has not been any work done, except some observation work, as far as I can recollect, in the province of Saskatchewan. We cannot very well locate these provincial activities, and distance does not mean much, if anything, to a flying machine, and for the present at least the officers of the department are confident that with the improvements they intend to make at Winnipeg, all the needs of Saskatchewan can be amply taken care of for some years to come.

Mr. MacLAREN: Has provision been made for the province of New Brunswick and the province of Quebec?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think we have not been successful in entering into any arrangement with the province of New Brunswick as yet, although we have a station in Nova Scotia from which they can do work in the province of New Brunswick and Quebec.

Mr. CLARK: Some weeks ago we had a debate in this House with regard to the building of the Hudson Bay railway. Has the minister given any consideration to the feasibility of using the air force for the purpose of investigating the Hudson bay route and of determining the exact time in each year that that route would be open to navigation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it has been decided already by the department that a portion of the air force shall visit Nelson and Churchill during the summer. An attempt is being made now to have an excursion trip by boat up to Nelson. A member of the air force proposes to accompany that party, if it materializes.

Mr. CLARK: That only applies to a certain season of the year. What I meant was a prolonged investigation over the whole period of one year, say, so that we could ascertain the nature of the channels and the route during the fall and winter months, and spring as well.

Mr. GRAHAM: Up to date we have not had sufficient money to enlarge to that extent. I might say that the Northwest branch has been urging us to establish a post much further north, but we have no money in this estimate for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister not consider that it would be advisable to postpone further expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway until such an investigation could be carried out, it being about the only means we have in our power of carrying out a thorough investigation as to the feasibility of that route?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from the other angle here would not agree to take that as a reason for postponing any work on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not after the promise of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. GRAHAM: Which seems to have been ineffective. Consequently I do not feel like making any more promises. A good many miles of the Hudson Bay railway, of course, have been constructed and investigations have been made. Everyone who has a library has volumes replete with investigations of the Hudson Bay railway, and I think we have got beyond the point when we can say that the Hudson Bay railway cannot be constructed unless we can further convince ourselves of its necessity.

Mr. BOYS: In connection with this item, is any provision made for the improvement of the approaches to this camp? The camp is in my riding, I am very familiar with it, and I certainly approve of this item. I think that in the interest of heavy trucks which operate there something should be done. The camp is reached from Angus on the Grand Trunk, and on the south from Alliston. There is about a mile of road within the camp from the Angus end which is simply a disgrace. It is not a road at all. It is a sand trail winding all over, the trucks get stuck, and I have no doubt considerable damage is done to the trucks from time to time. Within the camp itself, I do not know how many miles, but from 6 to 10 miles of cement pavement have been constructed during the activities of the camp in the years 1915 and 1916. It seems a pity that those stationed at the camp and many citizens of Canada who have occasion, from time to time, to visit the camp, should have to use the bit of road to which I refer. The work would not cost very much. I think the matter has been brought to the attention of the minister by some of the residents of Angus, and I feel satisfied that the municipalities interested would take care of the very small portion leading from Angus to the entrance to the camp, if the department would devote simply a reasonable amount of money to improve the road from the entrance to the camp to connect with the cement pavement now there. I am sure if the minister saw the place, nothing further would be necessary to convince him that the work should be undertaken mainly in connection with the heavy loads that go in and out of that camp. If there is nothing in the item now for this work, I would express the hope that the minister might economize on some of the other items making up the total and take this work in hand. If any other evidence is necessary respecting the need of this road improvement, I would be glad to busy myself and to supply the minister with it. I remember a gentleman coming down from Angus and interviewing the minister. He presented the matter very forcibly; but so far as I know, nothing has been done since. I hope the minister will give this matter his consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will certainly give it consideration. It has been brought to my attention by the hon. gentleman before and by a gentleman in that vicinity. I had hoped to be at Camp Borden last summer with my hon. friend, and if we could not travel over the road any other way, we would fly over it.

Mr. LUCAS: I understood the minister to say that several of the provinces had contributed $20,000 to the military air force, is that right?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the air force do any flying for private concerns?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have a receipt for $733 for urgent work done during a fire. I imagine that if there was any commercial work to be done, the air force would not be above handling it, if it did not interfere with their other work. At the present time we have not a sufficiently large vote to go into that; but I think it has been the general consensus of opinion that commercial flying for purposes of gain should be left largely to private enterprise rather than that it should be undertaken by the government.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to revert to a matter I brought to the attention of the minister a few moments ago. I have been advised by people who, I consider, are experts in this service, that it would be possible to carry on such an investigation as I suggested. In the debate on the Hudson Bay railway, considerable doubt seems to exist as to the exact period of time that the Hudson bay is open to navigation. I have also been informed by an authority that appears to be fairly good that there is a possibility that Hudson bay is open for navigation for a much longer period of time than was suggested by the mover of the resolution the other day; that furthermore, we could prove or disprove that by an investigation carried out by the air force, and that if such an investigation was properly planned over a full period of one year, we could determine almost to a final degree the exact period of time that that bay would be open to navigation during a year. I seriously commend this to the attention of the minister in the hope that in the very near future our air force can be used for the purpose of carrying out such an investigation. It seems to be perfectly futile to send an expedition up there in the summer time to gather such information.

Mr. KNOX: I might say, as the mover of the resolution, that I took the reports of a number of investigations which had been made covering a number of years, because conditions in Hudson bay and in the strait are not always the same, and it is necessary to take a number of years before one can reach a proper conclusion. I really believe an investigation such as has been suggested might do a great deal of good. It has been suggested that investigations should be made by the air force up in the Fox channel to discover the sources of the field ice which comes down in the spring and fall. It is possible we might learn a great deal regarding that by an expedition of that kind. I do not think, however, an expedition into Hudson bay or strait for one season would determine anything more than what we know at the present time. I took it as conclusive that the investigation which had been made by the Senate committee at that time and which was brought down in their report, covered the matter as far as we could get at it just now.

Mr. LUCAS: Is it the policy of the government at the present time in the air force to have the machines all shipped to one central point to be repaired? If so, does the minister think that is the best way of handling repairs to these machines?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have now three central shops in which they could be repaired, and it is questionable whether it would pay to establish shops with all their equipment at any more points for the limited number of machines we have. This is not like anything else. When a machine needs some repairs, but is not altogether out of repair, it can go in a very few minutes quite a long distance to a shop, and it can return at the same speed.

Mr. LUCAS: Where are those three central repair shops?

Mr. GRAHAM: High River, Ottawa and Camp Borden. There is a small shop at Vancouver. There are two or three other small shops besides the one I mentioned.

Mr. LUCAS: When I was coming down to this session of parliament, there were five airmen on the train who were being shipped from Vancouver to Camp Borden to engage in repair work. Very shortly after the session opened, I received a letter from those men. I think it is in the interest of this House that we should know these facts, and if there is any truth in them, I feel sure the minister would be glad to look into the matter. This letter is dated Camp Borden, February 5, and it goes on to say:

> I learn that militia estimates are now before the House, so am taking this privilege of offering more facts to bear out our claims as to the waste of public funds under military control.

The letter refers to the Air Board. That has now been changed to the air force. It continues:

> There are men here sent from every Air Board station, including High River, Winnipeg, Roberval and Quebec, to do work on engines and wings that are shipped from above stations and which will be reshipped on completion. Outside of this waste in men's time, travelling, fares and freight on engines and wings, we can truthfully say after being here ten days, that the amount of work done here is about 30 per cent of what we do at our own stations.

One instance of waste came before us to-day in so much that a man examined by a military doctor in Vancouver was shipped to this camp, examined by the military doctor here and proclaimed medically unfit.

At Vancouver air station men are being drilled three hours a day and three days a week. At the above station we have one serviceable machine, yet with seven men away doing duty here, the remainder are forced to waste their time forming fours and saluting, stuff that we all got during the war and quite unnecessary.

The men that have been relied upon this last three years are Air Board men, men that got their knowledge during the war and have trades behind them and which are an asset to Canada and aviation. These men are now wasting their time here, owing to a poor organization and military red tape.

I have gone amongst these men and in fact working with them right now and can safely say that not more than two per cent would join a permanent force. It's quite evident as to the class of men that would go to make up Canada's air force, should one be formed, just men that are out for an easy time and men unable to do so well outside.

Another instance of military inefficiency, a man here was made sergeant who has to get a second-class mechanic to do his work, being quite incapable to handle tools himself at all. I could go on relating instances of waste and inefficiency and am confident that any money voted to the military cause will be an absolute waste of public funds.

The men that know this business and are behind this letter, and have made a name in commercial aviation will have nothing to do with such a cause, so where the military party have an argument at all I fail to see.

I hope the minister will look into this matter and ascertain whether or not these charges of military inefficiency are substantiated by the facts.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know who signs that letter, but whoever he is, he is a first-class grouch. I will not ask for his name.

Mr. LUCAS: I do not care to give his name.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I do not want it, but I shall have the contents of the letter looked into. I feel confident that they are not borne out by the facts. At all events I shall have the matter investigated.

Mr. LUCAS: I thank the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister go on with some other items instead of this? We should like to have this stand over for a day, and we could proceed with others. We have no intention of holding up the estimates at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: This winds up my Defence estimates, except for the supplementaries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this the only item?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two items which we are discussing together.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So far as I am concerned I have no objection to one of the items going through, but I would ask that this one be allowed to stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: Very well.

Mr. KNOX: At what distance can these machines operate from the base of supply?

Mr. GRAHAM: It depends on the size of the machine I should say, 200 or 250 miles.

Mr. KNOX: In that case I would point out that an air force with a base at lake Winnipeg could not operate in northern Saskatchewan. We have immense areas of forest there that should be protected and an up-to-date system is absolutely necessary. Seeing that the forests in Saskatchewan are the property of the federal government, I think it is only fair that a station should be established in some part of northern Saskatchewan where the work could be looked after better.

Mr. GRAHAM: There has been an urgent appeal for the establishment of a station at Cowan lake, but we shall have to ask for a larger estimate if we are to set up more flying station establishments. At present there are orders from the various provinces for more work than the department can supply machines or men to cover, and it is a question whether we shall not have to enlarge the scope of the air force both as to men and machines.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 114 carry?

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 115 stands.

National Defence—amount required to pay cost of living bonus to employees of the Dominion arsenal and others at Quebec, discharged without receiving bonus for certain periods for which it was later granted to those similarly employed and not discharged, $26,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: In 1920 the Quebec arsenal was closed for a short period, and at that time it had not yet been decided whether these men were entitled to the bonus. In the interval, however, it was held by the Civil Service Commission that the bonus was due. Those men who were taken on again and who returned to work were given the bonus, but those who did not resume work did not get it, although the bonus was earned before the closing of the arsenal. It is maintained, I think in perfect honesty, that the men were all equally entitled to the bonus once the commission had held that it was properly payable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I remember the facts rightly, during the year 1921 both the arsenal at Lindsay and the arsenal at Quebec were closed for two or three months and the staffs were also considerably reduced. I was not aware that a bonus was at all payable to these men. Has it been subsequently decided that those who were retained were entitled to it? As I understand, they were men working for wages at so much per day; they were mechanics and the like who were laid off. Was there any bonus applicable to them?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not express an opinion on that. In 1920—it was not 1921—the bonus was paid to the men who were taken back after the arsenal was re-opened. It was paid on the decision of the department and the Civil Service Commission. The men who were not taken on did not get it although they had earned the bonus equally with the others. They now claim it and the commission decides that they are entitled to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand it yet. Were the men wage-earners or salaried, and if they were wage-earners, did they not follow the regular scale of advance given at that time in lieu of bonus? I do not claim to have a distinct recollection of the matter at all, but it would occur to me that this means two bonuses. Does it apply to both arsenals?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that although the men were working by the day it was decided they were entitled to the bonus and they got it in 1920. The Deparment of Labour, I believe, took a hand in the matter, and it was finally decided and approved by the Civil Service Commission that these men were entitled to the bonus. The men who were taken on again got the cash. The men who were not taken on again were entitled under the decision just the same as the men who did come on after the reopening of the arsenal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These men were not taken back?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes; but the bonus was earned before the arsenal was closed, and it was paid to the men for the period prior to the closing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not remember the matter ever coming up in the time of the late government.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was in 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may have been advanced, but I do not think it was. Were there not advances made in lieu of bonus to the same men? And would there not be quite a number of these men now dead? I do not know how you are going to pay the bonuses three years afterwards.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not familiar with the situation but I do know it was in 1920. After the arsenal reopened the men that were taken on were paid the bonus for a time prior to the closing of the arsenal. This vote is to pay the men who were not taken back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not have the least sympathy with any neglect to pay extra wages to wage-earners commensurate, or even more than commensurate, with the bonus as extra remuneration to salaried employees. The minister says that this is merely the pro rata allowance based on time of service of the men who had to be laid off commensurate with that secured by those who did not have to be laid off, or who being laid off were taken back. Does it apply to the men employed in both arsenals?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am told it did not apply to the Lindsay arsenal. For what reason I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is just possible, of course, that none were released until just lately. But I think we should have the reasor before we pass the vote..

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to letting the item stand. The situation I believe is quite clear. Certain men who claimed the bonus were working at the Quebec arsenal. Before the arsenal closed it had not been decided that they were entitled to the bonus. After the reopening it was decided and approved by the Civil Service Commission that these men who had claimed the bonus prior to the closing were entitled to it. Those who came back got it under the decision: those who did not come back, did not get it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the item comes up again perhaps the minister will bring down the report of the Civil Service Commission on the subject so we will see the argument by which they arrived at their decision.

Mr. THURSTON: For what period was this bonus paid?

Mr. GRAHAM: From the 1st April to the 1st August 1920.

Item stands.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to income—To increase the amount of loan authorized by Vote No. 136 Main Estimates, 1922-23—Additional amount required, $13,099,493.34.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The explanation of this item is that when the estimates were voted for the railway service it was contemplated that these sums, amounting to about $13,000,000, in the form of obligations coming due might be renewed, in which case it would not be necessary to provide for them in this way. When the obligations became due it was found convenient for the moment to pay them out of the general treasury, and it became necessary to vote this amount to cover the payment. It is still possible they may be consolidated, but in the meantime it is necessary to make the appropriation because the payment that was made was not contemplated when the estimate was voted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In connection with the general subject, it would seem to me that in case of a renewal of this sort the item shoul ! be in the estimates anyway so that each year we could easily see just how much of the money and of the credit of the country was advanced for deficits or for capital expenditure to the railways. Supposing it were a fact that this was a maturing obligation, and it was expected to renew the obligation, in that event, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has stated there would be no need of making the amount of the renewal appear in the estimates at all. On the other hand, suppose it had been intended that that obligation would be paid off by the issue of a new security guaranteed by the government. Then, as I understand the system that has always been followed, that new undertaking of the government would appear included in the estimates voted for the year. Well, had there been an intended renewal it would be a renewal with a government obligation. Consequently it seems to me it should have been included anyway.

I think I have a correct idea as to the facts and I hope I have made myself clear. I would like to have the minister's version of the situation. Is it not a fact that the estimates are supposed to include all the moneys advanced and as well all the obligations to be incurred direct or indirect by the country for the fiscal year in respect of the railways? If so, would it not have been right to have had this included anyway if it was the intention of the government to guarantee the obligation?

Mr. FIELDING: There is something to be said for my right hon. friend's contention that these maturing obligations might be shown in the estimates. I think, however, that that has not been the practice. Where an appropriation is made it is an appropriation in anticipation to meet a deficiency and not to include renewals. I think there is something to be said in favour of showing renewals but I am quite safe in saying that it has not been the practice in the past. New securities have been issued to make way for old ones, but I do not think they are shown in the estimates. I am not sure that there is not something in the contention of my right hon. friend, and that matter may be considered when preparing the estimates in the future.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been somewhat bothered by that complication of the entire railway financial situation. I do not know whether it has been conducted in exactly the right way in the past or not, but I do urge that we ought to have a system by which the estimates will include all obligations, whether by way of cash advances or guarantees for the ensuing year by the country with respect to the railways. I am sure I am right. If I had the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) I might get along by asking him instead of bringing it up in this way. Is it not a fact that the minister's estimates for the year include not only cash that is going to be required from the Treasury by way of loan—for everything is by way of loan as I understand it—whether for capital investment, extensions of lines or for deficit? All the money that is advanced is included in the estimate for the roads, and as well, all the obligations intended to be entered into by way of guarantee—for I know the estimate reads in such a way as to enable the minister to do it by way of guarantee. Is it not a fact that the minister's estimates for this year include all those obligations to be incurred in respect of the railways, whether by cash advance or by guarantee?

Mr. FIELDING: I think the estimates are for what I may call the current expenditures of the year. The wording of the estimate very properly allows the government to make payment either by way of cash or by bonds or by guarantees—in any form it pleases. But I do not think it covers renewals—that is my impression. I am inclined to the view, however, that we might well show the nature of these maturing obligations from time to time; and that thought may well engage our consideration hereafter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I have the point now: The intention of the estimates, as the minister understands it, has been to include all moneys to be advanced to the roads, and, as well, all obligations, whether by guarantee or otherwise—

Mr. FIELDING: No, not renewals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —whether by guarantee or otherwise that go to increase the debt of the railway.

Mr. FIELDING: To meet the obligations of the railway for the current year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes—that go to increase the debt of the railway. For example, if the railway required to raise some money, not for renewal but for new commitments or new purposes, for extending its lines, and so on, and the government decided that that should be done by the issue of a bond of the railway company which would have to be guaranteed by the government, then the estimates would include that; but if it were merely for renewal of a past obligation, in no way extending the debt of the system, the estimates would not include it.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite agree that it would be better for the estimates only to provide, as in the past, for all moneys to be advanced and all guarantees to be included that go to increase the railway's obligations. Those should be separate, but I think the others should appear, in a different place—all that increases the government's obligations, even for renewals. I am afraid I am not making myself very clear. I think it is right—and I am pretty sure this is what has been found in the past by both governments—that the estimates should show distinctly the entire commitments intended by the country for the railways in so far as those commitments increase the obligations of the system; all the others should be separate in the future as in the past. But I think the estimates should include as well any further obligations the country enters into on behalf of the railways for renewals, because those increase the country's obligations. It would never do, though, to have these included in the estimates in the same body as the rest; if we did that it would present the obligations of the country in too big a form, because while we are increasing the national obligations we are diminishing the obligations of the company that we own. It would never do to include the one with the other; I think they both should be there, but separate.

5 p.m.

Mr. FIELDING: My understanding is that the appropriation each year involves what I may again describe as the current expenditure of the year—not, however, on what might be called capital account. If, for example, a branch line is constructed, I think it would be necessary for the minister to bring in a special appropriation act for the purpose; I do not think we would have an appropriation to cover that. I may say, for example, certain appropriations will be needed in the way of equipment bonds. The railway legislation gives the railway company the power to issue these bonds; no appropriation here will be required. As a matter of convenience it might be well to show in the estimate of each year the maturing obligations. But it is necessary to draw a line between what I might call the current expenditure of the year and obligations which are represented by outstanding securities which can be renewed, as was the case in this matter. This may later be converted into securities, but in the meantime, as it was paid out of the current appropriation, we have to have this supplementary estimate to make it good. The suggestion that these maturing obligations, even in the way of renewals, should be shown in the estimate, is worthy of consideration, and without making any absolute engagement in the matter, I would like to see it considered hereafter.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BAXTER: May I ask the Minister of Railways whether there is to be any revision of the boundaries of the eastern region?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a matter that rests with the Canadian National Railways Board. It is not part of the government's duty to dictate to the board as to how they shall operate and what areas shall constitute the different regions. That is purely an operative question.

Mr. BAXTER: I appreciate the difficulty of the position in which the minister finds himself and in which any minister dealing with this department must find himself in regard to a question of this kind. It is put forward very definitely that this railroad is to be kept out of politics. One might hope that that may be so. I have heard gentlemen in the presence of Sir Henry Thornton declare, however, that it is impossible to keep the railroad out of politics. I do not know just what particular political interference they had in mind, though I have my suspicions. But there is a certain class of politics out of which no government can keep a state-owned railway. The government must lay down a policy for the railroad, which is a very different thing from allowing henchmen to dictate who shall be appointees to particular minor positions. As to the latter, I think we all concur that the railroad should be kept out of politics, but as to necessary action to ensure that all parts of the country through which the railroad runs shall have fair and just treatment and shall receive the co-operation of the national road in the matter of realizing their aspirations as well as meeting their needs —so far as that is concerned, the railroad neither should be nor will be kept out of politics.

We, in the Maritime provinces do not, I trust, complain unduly, but we do come here with a desire to let our needs be known, and if we feel that we are not getting in any respect the treatment that we ought to have, this parliament is the place in which we should express our views in that respect. It is quite proper that boards of trade in the Maritime provinces should confer with Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors. I trust that at the conference which is to be held, I believe, on the nineteenth of this month, there will be no directors absent, and I trust there will be no occasion for any director who may be absent to say that a policy has been determined upon at one meeting of the board and reversed at another. Such a thing was said and said openly by one of the directors, and when I ask a question in the House about it I am told that it is not wise in the public interest to give information as to the private transactions of the board. The government in that respect is adoring idols that it burned, because it is not so long since prominent members of the party were declaiming against the previous government because it refused to bring before the House matters of what might be called an internal nature. But I trust the government is going to stand by its policy in that regard. I do not ask them to reveal the details of every contract, but we do say that when an important resolution is taken which affects three provinces, the people of those provinces through their representatives in this House have a right to the information and have a right to get it here instead of going to some meeting place in Montreal or elsewhere, hat in hand, and asking Sir Henry Thornton to be good enough to lay aside his jests for a time and tell them of the inner working of the railway organization. Members should ask in the House and members should get the information here.

Speaking from a New Brunswick standpoint—and I think I can include the Maritime provinces—I may say that there is dissatisfaction to-day. The people who voted there in the last election voted against my right hon. friend and leader because his declaration as to region apparently did not go far enough to please them; and they voted on the basis of what was being said on public platforms by representatives of the party that is now dominant. They trusted to those promises—that if the Liberal party were to come into power there would be a very decisive revolution in railway circles in the Maritime provinces. Prosperity would go on, employment would be ample, freight rates would be reduced and, above all, the management of an important section of the road was to be centralized at Moncton. The people unfortunately believed this. To-day the people see whether those statements were quite worthy of belief or not. The absolutely sound, the absolutely sincere promises which were made by my right hon. leader were rejected by the people, and they took the illusory hallucinations projected from platform after platform by gentlemen who do not seem disposed to carry out one single particle of the obligations which they took during the campaign. What is the result to-day? That we have a railway and we have no national railway policy. Now, you cannot make a success out of an aggregation of rails, and fishplates and sleepers combined with rolling stock.

What I want to know—I am going to ask this House and I am not going to Sir Henry Thornton to ask it—is whether it is the policy of the government that this National road is to serve Canada or whether it is to serve a foreign country? I have asked in this House what the intention of this Railway Board is with regard to some proposed buildings in the vicinity of Providence, Rhode Island. I have not been able to get an answer, my question remains on the order paper. I had an intimation, through a fellow member, the other day that it was considered the answer might be embarrassing. That is not enough for me. I am entitled to know the whole of the details, and if there is a matter that is embarrassing I have a right to be told in confidence why it is embarrassing and to be allowed to use my judgment as to whether the explanation is sufficient or not.

In the Maritime provinces we are confronted, and have been confronted in the past, with a very distinct menace and that is the short route from Montreal to Portland, Maine, and the centralization of the activities of the Grand Trunk railway at that port. I want to know, the people of New Brunswick want to know, the people of the Maritime provinces want to know whether this road—the deficit on which is absolutely draining this country—is to be maintained by Canada, and by taxation upon the Dominion, in order to serve not only Portland, Maine, but Providence, Rhode Island, as well, and it is just about time that we had a clear and categorical answer to the question. We have not so far got it from the Board of Management, we have not got it in this House; all that we know is that there are newspaper items indicating a further expenditure of what is really the money of the people of Canada to carry this road a little farther into a foreign state. Is that a national policy? I cannot say the thing is going to be done because I cannot get an answer, the people of the Maritime provinces cannot get an answer, and the people of Canada are not getting an answer.

I ask hon. members if that is a reasonable attitude for the government to assume in the transaction of public business?

I said that we want a national railway policy. I desire to emphasize that or rather to illustrate it. I can go back to confederation. I can refer to the building of the Intercolonial as a part of the contract of confederation—a road that most unfortunately was weighted down by what I would almost characterize as the stupidity of Downing street where, in their great fear of American invasion, they placed the road in a most difficult position from the standpoint of earning capacity. But placed as it was we got it. It has been of service to the Maritime provinces. For what purpose was it built? Surely to promote traffic between the Upper provinces, as they were then called, and the Maritime provinces. Now, I am not one of those who seeks to read into the bargain of confederation something that is not even plainly expressed in the contract. I do not say that the bargain of confederation contained any special provision by which the Maritime provinces were to have some wonderful rebate in rates, or some wonderful privileges that you cannot find in the written document. No doubt things of that character were said upon the public platform. On the other hand, I find in the compact of confederation. I find in the spirit of confederation, the idea of national unity—the idea that each part of the country would help each other part to bear the mutual burdens and to develop the interests of all as sympathetically and as fully as possible. Can we expect that from the Canadian National under the present policy or want of policy? If that policy is national all right. If that policy is international, then, in my judgment, it is all wrong.

I spoke of the attitude of the Maritime provinces towards Portland, Maine, with the possible addition of Providence, Rhode Island. What is the purpose of this road, considering the Intercolonial as part of it? Why, it simply reaches two points, Halifax and St. John, for the water borne commerce of the country during the period of the year when all the other Atlantic ports of Canada are sealed. If this road is national all the endeavours of its management will be directed towards carrying Canadian trade over that railway and through those ports. And I do not ask for supremacy for either one or the other; let them take their fair chance for the trade they can handle. But we do not find that being done. We get a hint of development—further development—in a foreign country. We have the actual proof by an answer to a question that I put in this House. We have the actual proof that where not one bushel of grain was shipped from Halifax, last year there were, I think, 17,000,000 bushels shipped to Portland, Maine. The system had been united then. Was there no possibility of any divergence of traffic to the Maritime provinces? Are we going to be eternally told that the shippers routed that grain via that particular route? If I were told that I would not believe it. If I were told that I would say "Has the Canadian National no agencies, no canvassers, no ability to see that traffic is diverted to our own ports in our own provinces?" Why, the traffic in grain of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is not under national control, from St. John practically equalled what the nation was doing through Portland, Maine. It is a nice admission to have to make that the uncontrolled private corporation was doing more for Canada than the incubus which is draining us year by year in taxation and through, I think, misdirection. We got about 2,000,000 bushels of grain through the government road in St. John, none in Halifax, while the bulk was going through the United States. That does not suit me, it does not suit the people of the Maritime provinces, and if the people of the Maritime provinces could drop their politics for five minutes this House would be electrified on that subject.

Now, can we have a national policy which will regard this road as tributary to the ocean ports, which will equip the ports as they need to be equipped, which will, if necessary, put on a differential rate against Portland, Maine, and against Providence, Rhode Island, so that the dream which was so beautifully voiced by that great Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, may at last be realized, that every pound of Canadian freight shall be carried on Canadian railways and exported through Canadian channels? I am broad enough in my politics to realize a good policy when I hear it enunciated, and the doctrine of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is good enough for me and for every man, woman and child in the Maritime provinces. What we want is action to carry it out, but I am not cheered, and the people of the Maritime provinces are not heartened, when we see items in the press that some other port in the United States is to be developed, and when we are confronted with ministerial silence if we ask a question about it.

There has been some agitation in what I might call the local railway point in the Maritime provinces, the city of Moncton. This agitation has had regard to two things. One of them is what I referred to some time ago as the second deportation of the Acadians. It is not forgotten yet in that locality. I do not think—and I believe the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) will agree with me—that it will be forgotten for a considerable time: that is the moving some of the people from one part of the road to another in connection with the audit business. It may have been necessary. I am not familiar enough with the railway business to know whether it was necessary or not. Naturally Moncton, like any other centre striving for population as it is, ambitious and rightly proud of its growing position in the Maritime provinces. does not like to see any lessening of its prestige or of its population. There may be a reason for that movement, but I fail to see it. I would think that the work could be done at Moncton, but I am not going to condemn the action in this regard in unmeasured terms, because I think there might possibly be an explanation. I will say, however, that the people of that locality are yet waiting for an explanation which has never yet been given by anybody, and until they get it they have a right to be dissatisfied.

Then we come to the major question—the question of control. The people have been given nominally the local control at Moncton of the road as it is being run to Montreal. We are told that at another meeting of the board that arrangement was changed, and now it is to be Riviere du Loup, or it may be some other way station on the road, but it makes very little difference where it is. I am not concerned with the particular amount of mileage within that region. It is not the trackage, it is not the number of locomotives, it is not anything of that kind that counts. What we are concerned about in the Maritime provinces is where this board is placing the directing mind. Put a man at Moncton and tell him to take charge of that region, and while one railway man may not be quite as good as another, I have no doubt we can get a very capable man, whose orders will be obeyed by the subordinates, under whose direction trains will be moved regularly, freight will be moved promptly and public convenience will be met.

When we have got all that we have not touched the fringe of the real vital question of interest to the Maritime provinces. You have to put somebody in charge of that road, and you have to put him where he will be in direct contact with those in charge of the different regions, so that, instead of getting his information days too late to act upon it, he will be able to walk across the corridor and say to a man in charge af another region "What about such a class of freight? Why do you not arrange to send that freight through the ports of the Maritime provinces?" That is the vital thing. That is what we want, what we need and what we have a right to if the policy is national instead of international.

I suppose someone will say I have made a plea for moving the headquarters to Montreal. I have done nothing of the kind, but I want to see some one in high authority in charge of operations. The ordinary business of the division or region, or whatever you may call it, can be managed from Moncton, but I want to know that there is somebody high in authority over that region, who will be sitting right at the nerve centre of the railway system, right in the city of Montreal or wherever it is to be, because upon the ability of the manager of that region to impress upon the managers of other regions that they should use all their activities to direct the freight originating in other parts of Canada down to the Maritime provinces, depends the success or the failure of the old Intercolonial railway, and upon that depends whether confederation is a mere dream or whether it shall be a vivid reality to the people of the present day living in those provinces.

I am not a secessionist. I do not think anything could make me a secessionist, but I say there are people and they are largely in the province from which the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) comes, as there are some in my own province, who are beginning to talk of getting out of confederation. We are coming to rather an unfortunate pass when, during this session, I hear from one part of the House an argument put forward that to get grain or goods out of the country by the shortest and cheapest route is the desideratum of a particular district, and that the rest of the country must be ignored, but I find, on going home and looking over the situation, that there is a very real, though I hope not very extensive, movement as yet, for getting out of the union which some people in the Maritime provinces feel is only a delusion to them. I think we come here to make conditions better instead of worse. I think we can help materially to make them better, if we can get a railway policy which the people will realize is intended to help them, to serve them, to develop and stimulate Canadian trade through Canadian territories, and which will, as quickly as possible, get rid of every avenue through the United States which diverts from Canada traffic that ought to be handled in Canada and handled by Canadian roads.

I will go a step further. There is on the statute book to-day, and there has been for many years a provision by which the British preference can be limited to goods arriving directly at a Canadian port. My sympathy is entirely with the British preference. I think the sympathy of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has been with it for years; he has expressed and has carried out that view. But I maintain that it is no harm to anyone who wants to import goods from England to be told: "You shall be allowed to import those goods under the terms of the British preference if you will just put them in a British bottom and bring them into a Canadian port. But if you want to tranship them through a foreign country, then you will have to pay the same rate of duty as you do on goods that do not have British origin." An order in council is all that is required to bring this state of affairs about. What would the benefit be? Just this, that where in the winter time we can send out from St. John or Halifax steamships well filled with cargoes, there is always a rather slender cargo coming in, and while I do not say that this would be great enough to revolutionize traffic entirely. it would be a very big and welcome step in the right direction. There would come through Halifax or St. John in the winter time thousands of tons of merchandise that do not come in through them now. The coming in of those hundreds of thousands of tons through ports of a foreign country is enabling freight rates on those steamships on other merchandise to be kept down in that foreign country for the benefit of the foreign ports. Whatever differences we may have on any possible political subject, there is one thing that I believe we agree upon in this chamber. I believe we are national in our aspirations; I do not believe there is anyone who wants to do anything that is not distinctly along the national line. I say therefore, believing that as I do, that this is an opportunity for a national policy which will reconcile the Maritime provinces, which have undoubtedly lost much through confederation, to the difficulties under which they have laboured, to the difficulties of present-day conditions, by feeling that they have, at least, the sympathy of the rest of Canada and that that sympathy is being translated into real action for the purpose of conferring upon them a real benefit.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not rise for the purpose of answering my hon. friend, for I confess as a Maritime man I find myself so largely in sympathy with what he has been saying that I have no desire to break the force of it. But I think, in fairness, I ought to say that he has overlooked a very important point. We had for years two winter ports in Canada, Halifax and St. John. My hon. friend has very fairly said that they have rivalries, and that they must be left to work those out as best they can. I concur in that. But my hon. friend has forgotten that by the action of the government of Canada in acquiring the Grand Trunk railway, we have acquired another Maritime port at Portland, Maine. The question is an ugly one, and this complicates it. We own the Grand Trunk railway, and Portland is the Grand Trunk railway terminus. This is the problem we are giving to Sir Henry Thornton. We are asking him to make these roads reasonably profitable, remunerative, self-sustaining. We give him this road to Portland. Is he to let that road be idle, to let the rails get rusty, or to try to send some traffic over the Portland road in order that it may contribute something towards the cost of the system. I am not discussing the merits of the Grand Trunk system; but I am pointing to the fact that when we acquired the Grand Trunk railway system and opened a line to Portland, we were creating a rival to Halifax and St. John, and there is no use in ignoring the situation that confronts us to-day.

With nearly all that my hon. friend said historically and otherwise, I am entirely in sympathy. I know much of the feeling in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Many of the things I hear to-day are but an echo of the things I heard sixty years ago. The story is an old one to many of us whose hair is growing gray. I do not want to revive these matters to-day. I sympathize with the desire of my hon. friend that we should look at all these things from the purely national viewpoint. I know that is his desire; I appreciate that, and I would like to co-operate with him. But let us not wink at the fact that since we have acquired the Grand Trunk with the road to Portland, we want that road to make some money, and we must face the fact that we have deliberately set up a rival to St. John and Halifax.

Mr. BAXTER: If we have to let go practically the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Portland, if it does not pay, do we not get the same traffic over our own road to our own ports? May I point this out to my hon. friend? To-day, the Intercolonial, everything from Montreal east, is losing money for want of traffic, so that the Grand Trunk may show a profit from Montreal to Portland. Let the latter be the losing end and let ours be the profitable end. The result will be that—and I say this with all pleasantness—instead of Yankee workmen and trainmen handling our products in the United States, good Canadians shall be handling them at Canadian ports and through Canadian territory. If the loss must be on either one part of the system or the other, let the loss be to Portland.

Mr. FIELDING: Would it not have been wise if we had considered that before we acquired that Yankee connection down at Portland?

Mr. BAXTER: I did not acquire it, and if it had to be acquired through any effort of mine, it would never have been acquired.

Mr. FIELDING: All right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is really refreshing to see how many twists and turns such an adept politician as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is, can give to any and every question. One minute we are told that this is an old, old story, sixty years old; it is getting hoary; it is getting gray with everybody who is gray-headed in the Maritime provinces, and they are feeling very sad about it. It is the same thing, the same chicken, the same trouble. There is no difference. We get that one minute, and the next we are told that the whole reason of this is because the late government bought the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend would tell me what he said.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) was referring generally to the discontent in Nova Scotia as regards confederation, and I said that that was an old story we had heard all these sixty years ago. The reference to the railway is quite recent. His particular grievance is that we are sending business to Portland. My point was that the government of Canada made Portland one of our terminal points, and we have to face and recognize that fact.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, we stand just where we were. The talk was on this railway question; the talk was that this railway question to-day was inflaming the people who had troubles regarding confederation, and my hon. friend knows very well that for many years the Grand Trunk has been operating to Portland. Why, the trouble was just the same before. There is just this real difference that before the government owned the Grand Trunk, the government could not do anything; but through the Grand Trunk the government are now in a position to feed, if they want to feed. That is the only difference. My hon. friend says that the late government created Portland. We did not add one cent to Portland's facilities or anything else. I do not know whether my hon. friend is anticipating doing so. I see from the papers apparently his board is considering adding to the American facilities. It is quite true that if this question of ownership is to be made a reason by my hon. friend for multiplying American facilities and increasing American trade at the expense of Canadian trade, there is something in the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). These are aids they could not give if they did not own the line. But they are not compelled to do it; the action was their action. Certainly the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, instead of making it hard for the government to see that the Maritime provinces get their share of the business, makes it easy. Why, before they had no control whatever over that business; it was going Grand Trunk via Portland, to as great an extent as it is now going. They shipped everything down that way. This is no new story; it is something which did not commence with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, and my hon. friends know that. They know that the Portland cry as against Halifax and St. John is an old cry, and yet my hon. friend says that we created this situation when we bought the Grand Trunk. I think my hon. friend on further consideration will really do himself the justice in this House of acknowledging that the Grand Trunk sent all its business to Portland; he will acknowledge that all their grain was sent that way and that he himself in this very chamber in opposition, if my recollection is correct, pointed out the evils of that situation. If he did not, at any rate he vociferously applauded that position taken by gentlemen from his own province when in opposition at that time. I do not see why it should be necessary to try to drag a political issue into a matter of this kind, particularly when it is so perfectly obvious that the business was sent through Portland before and when the only change made is that the government, if they so desire, are put just in a little better position than they ever were before to see to it that the Maritime provinces get whatever measure of justice they are entitled to. Before, they had not the power to do it; they have now.

Mr. FIELDING: Let the rails rust.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says, let the rails rust. Well, perhaps he will distribute the rust a little bit. Let the rails rust! I am not asking to let any rails rust. But does my hon. friend object more to letting the rails rust on the Grand Trunk Portland line than he objects to their rusting on the line to St. John? Why, to-day the Minister of Railways is in a position in which he can control the traffic; he is in a position in which he can work up the traffic and see that it goes in this direction or that direction, through the large organization that is now right at his hand. Yet he says, let the rails rust. Well, I ask, is all the rust to be allowed to occur on the Canadian rails and none on the American? Or does not my hon. friend think that a little reciprocity there might be a good thing and that St. John might be allowed to have some of the business?

Mr. GRAHAM: If I did not know something about this matter I might be impressed. But this is like a comedy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it is.

Mr. GRAHAM: Really it is a comedy. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance was running the Grand Trunk for quite a long time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, it came under a board, with which he was connected, like the Canadian National Board. But that is not the question at all. The government bought a property, part of which is in the United States. Now, I was not a member of the House at the time but I did take occasion in two or three articles I had the privilege of writing to point out that difficulties might arise when the Canadian government became the owner of railway lines in the United States. Here is one of them presented to-day. It must not be forgotten that what is good at one end of the line is good at the other and the road to Portland is just as much the property of the people of Canada as is the road to Halifax. We have our money invested in it. But there is another feature of the matter, we must consider. Cut off the traffic going to the Grand Trunk from Chicago and vicinity, and there will be a lot that goes to Portland which will not go over the Grand Trunk at all. We cannot take the position of wanting to keep one end of the Grand Trunk in the United States and run it for our own benefit bringing traffic to Canadian ports, unless we are prepared to make a somewhat fair division and give some of the traffic that we get in Canada to the United States portion of the railway. The Grand Trunk owned by the people of Canada runs for a portion of its length under the control of the various states of the United States and of the federal authority as well.

Mr. BAXTER: In the statistics that I referred to, it is Canadian wheat that is handled down there now.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, my hon. friend must remember that in the statistics given this year at the port of Montreal the charge was made that we were handling United States wheat to the detriment of facilities for handling Canadian wheat. We are living beside a great nation, and when we have launched into the experiment of owning railways, a portion of which is in the country beside us, we must be a little bit reciprocal in our arrangements or we shall find that they can ruin us more quickly that we can ruin them. Now, my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) in so far as his Canadian citizenship is concerned, is the owner of every foot of the line in the United States just as much as he is the owner of the system in Canada; and while it is better in so far as we can to have Canadian traffic handled at Canadian ports, we must bear in mind that the Canadian ports if they are to be made successful, must reciprocate and handle traffic from the United States and in order to do that we must be somewhat careful. I agree with my hon. friend that in so far as it is possible at all we ought to develop our own Canadian ports, but we must go about it in a manner that will not absolutely ruin our investment or reduce the efficiency of the railways to any great extent as a result of retaliatory measures from the United States. It makes no difference, particularly now, who bought the Grand Trunk. The fact is that we have it. The situation to which my hon. friend referred as to further development at Portland is one which I thought he thoroughly understood. But if it had been fully explained to him I think perhaps he would not ask the question he has asked. On some other occasion I shall be at liberty to discuss the matter fully; but when I tell him, who has been a member of a government, that certain conditions sometimes arise in which it is not in the public interest to answer certain questions, I think he will fully understand that the government cannot at all times give a "yes" or a "no" in reply to some direct questions when they believe that the answer might be detrimental to the whole interests of the country.

Now, the Canadian National system is not the system it was a few years ago. It was a difficult task that Mr. Hanna had when he had control of the Canadian Northern and its ramifications and when he was managing for years the Intercolonial railway. It is no new story that the Intercolonial Railway is being managed by the Canadian National Railways. What was called the Canadian National Railway Board has managed the Intercolonial for years past, and it is nothing new. The hon. gentleman's friends were cognizant of that, and if we are to have the whole Canadian National system it cannot be otherwise.

But great as the problem was at that time it is much greater at present, and my hon. friend has clearly pointed out the reason. Heretofore the Canadian people owned the Canadian Northern and the ramifications of that company as well as the Intercolonial, Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. These railways were for the most part in the Dominion and the difficulty of handling them was not nearly so great as it is at the present time. We have added now all the lines of that great company, the Grand Trunk, which has its best feeder from the west and its chief port on the Atlantic in United States territory. This cannot be changed all in a moment, but I can assure my hon. friend that while the difficulty which confronts Sir Henry Thornton and his board is very great —greater than almost can be imagined from the outside—yet he has in mind to give the Canadian ports the advantage in every case wherever it is possible to do so. I cannot go any further than that. The time will come when I shall be able to make a few remarks to my hon. friend with reference to some of the things he has referred to which I know will be eminently satisfactory to him. But at the present time I must say again that it would not be in the interests of the Canadian people, it would not be in the interests of Canadian ports, if I were to undertake to answer in the manner that they are asked several questions concerning the extension of the line in the United States.

Mr. CHURCH: I think everybody will sympathize with the minister in his desire to put the National Railways on a business basis. Notwithstanding the pessimism which was voiced in the House during the immigration debates—I think the minister deserves some credit for the fine statement which he delivered to the House the other night as to the year's showing of the Canadian National Railways.

Now, the case of the Maritime provinces was considered last session by the special committee of which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was chairman. It was contended that by agreement at confederation the Maritime provinces were promised special treatment in railway rates and service. If such a policy of fixing rates by localities is to be followed we might as well wind up the National Railways, because the question of rates is a question of operating costs, it is not a question of east and west, or north and south. Rates and service are determined by operating costs, and that is the only economic factor which fixes railway rates. Last session we had the western representatives asking for preferential rates to the head of the lakes for their basic products, grain and so on. If the principle of preferential rates were once recognized, we might as well abolish the Railway Commission.

Mr. BAXTER: No one is discussing rates to-day.

Mr. CHURCH: Parliament has interfered every session with the question of rates until to-day the Railway Commission is not fulfilling its functions as a rate controlling board. The question of rates is an economic, a business, a commercial question that affects every business man in the country, and if the Railway Commission was left to fix railway rates it would be far better for all concerned.

In 1917 a royal commission was appointed to go into the question of railways and transportation in this country. That commission was composed of Mr. A. H. Smith, President of the New York Central Railway, Sir Henry Drayton, then Chairman of the Railway Commission, and Mr. W. M. Acworth, an eminent British railway engineer. What did Mr. Smith say about advancing loans and making extensions promiscuously without the consent of the Railway Commission? He said:

> Amend the regulating policy so that the Railway Commission may have jurisdiction over all railroads in the matter of maximum and minimum rates, the issuance of securities, the building of new railways, or the extension of lines, and other matters properly within the scope of governmental supervision.

Has that recommendation been carried out? No. Neither has any of the recommendations made by the other members of that commission. Parliament has gone over the head of the Railway Commission, and only recently this House decided to continue construction of the Hudson Bay railway, although that undertaking has been condemned by this royal commission on the ground that it is impracticable and will never pay interest on the capital outlay. All this will be found set out at page 62 of the report. Now other extensions are coming up. The whole question of rates has been interfered with by the duplication of our railways. We have three transcontinental systems where one would have been sufficient for many years to come. The proper regulation of railways by the Railway Commission is ignored to-day. For all the use the commission now is or for all it has to do its members might as well go over to Luxor and accidentally enter the tomb and become embalmed with King Tutankhamen.

Mr. GOULD: In reference to the Railway Commission having control of rates, would this affect the proposed importation of Alberta coal into Ontario?

Mr. CHURCH: If this parliament is going to interfere in the way it did last session with the rates on grain to the head of the lakes it might just as well go into the coal business too, because coal is a necessity as well as grain. What I contend is that parliament should not interfere with the functions of the Railway Commission in regulating freight rates, passing on loans, extensions and so on. The question of this loan should first be submitted to the Railway Commission to see if they recommend it. If you are going to give the National Railways a chance, do so, but to say that certain localities shall have preferential treatment is wrong in principle. You cannot have efficient administration of our national lines except under the Railway Act and by the Railway Commission.

Mr. MacLAREN: I had proposed, Mr. Chairman, to speak on this subject, but I did not anticipate that the particular phase of it to which I wish to address myself would be introduced this afternoon. I presume this vote will not be passed to-day, and that I shall have an opportunity of speaking when the subject is again taken up?

Mr. GRAHAM: This is merely an item for refunding. We have yet to take up the whole railway estimates. The discussion to-day is really a little premature.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is quite true, but now that the House has the matter before it I submit it is a more favourable time to continue this phase of it rather than bring it up in a detached form in a week's time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with the manner in which my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways—or the Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Railways—(Mr. Graham) approached the question. He is not throwing the blame for the Grand Trunk business on the late government. I appreciate that there are difficulties in connection with the matter. I appreciate also that he says he is going to do the best he can, and I hope he will, in connection with Canadian business. Of course, he is in a position now to do it, but he would not have been if the Grand Trunk had not been taken over. The proposed extensions at Providence, Rhode Island, have been under consideration for some time. I remember looking into the subject some years ago, and in what I am about to say my hon. friend will correct me if my recollection is wrong. My recollection is that the Grand Trunk spent some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in connection with that branch and the question was whether we could save that six or seven millions by making further commitments—some $5,000,000 more, I think. But the result of the information I then got was that having regard to traffic, having regard to business and general railway conditions, we would be simply losing another $5,000,000 if we spent it on that work. My hon. friend may have more up-to-date information on the subject. The state authorities were very anxious that the work should go on; they were going to extend the time for its completion in order that it might proceed. There was also some suggestion as to what they were prepared to do, if we went ahead with this thing, with a view to helping out what looked like an impossible situation from the investor's standpoint. I would like the minister to inform the committee as to how matters stand now with respect to the Providence situation. If the work is to go on, how much will it cost, and what changes have taken place in the matter of traffic?

Mr. GRAHAM: The situation is about as my hon. friend has described it. The Grand Trunk Railway, under the late Mr. Hays, expended some $7,000,000 over there, under a charter from two states. Hon. members will recall that there was some legal difficulty over the construction or the want of construction of that road. That expenditure has remained ever since without any effort to carry out the original idea of constructing a line to the port. Before this line can be constructed the two states in question have to renew the charters. One of these has already been renewed; in the case of the other the matter is now before the legislature and it is expected that the renewal will be granted in a few days, when the government will be able to announce its policy. My hon. friend will understand that I prefer not to discuss the matter at great length until we get the information on which we can base our opinion.

Mr. MacLAREN: I suggest that this item be allowed to stand.

Bill No. 105, An Act respecting the Canadian Order of the Woodmen of the World—Mr. Gordon.

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

Mr. DUFF moved, that the recommendation contained in the second report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WRECK OF STEAMSHIP TRADER

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government received a report with respect to the wreck of the SS. Trader in March, on the rocks dumped off the end of the jetty on the north arm of the Fraser river, British Columbia, built by the government?

2. If so, was the wreck due to the failure of the department to provide a proper light at the end of this jetty, and is the vessel a total loss?

3. Is it a fact that the said jetty has been without any light for three months or any other lesser period and that there is no mark or communication at the end of the said jetty to show the entrance to the channel of the north arm of the Fraser river.

4. Has the government a report on the wrecking or grounding on or about Thursday, March 15, of three tugs with booms of logs at a point on Sea Island about one mile east of the said jetty?

5. Has the government taken steps to provide a proper and sufficient light at the end of the said jetty and to otherwise properly protect the entrance to the said channel for navigation?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The Department of Marine and Fisheries has received a report of the wreck of the Trader.

2. The vessel was stranded 300 yards west of the jetty at noon on March 16th during what the captain in charge described as a furious W.S.W. gale. Consequently the wreck was not due to the absence of a light.

3. The edge of the channel is 400 feet from the jetty. The department has maintained since 1905 range lights to mark this channel. The outer light was carried away on January 21st last by the tug Gleeful, the report of which did not reach the department until January 31st. Instructions to rebuild were wired February 2nd.

4. No.

5. Yes.

WRECK OF STEAMSHIP ALASKAN

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government received a report regarding the wreck of the SS. Alaskan with the loss of all its crew, near Pachena Point on the Pacific coast, in January last?

2. Has the government, on acount of economy or otherwise, reduced by 50 per cent or any other amount, the strength of the unwatched lights on that coast or any part of it and thereby reduced the visibility of the said lights?

3. If such or any other reduction has been made, were the changes published to master mariners, so that they would not be fooled by the changed lights?

4. Does the government pay to the Pacific Salvage Company $30,000 per year or any other amount to keep up steam on board the SS. Algerine?

5. Is the SS. Algerine a seaworthy vessel, suitable for the purpose for which it is employed by the government?

6. Did the United States SS. Snohomish rescue the crew of the SS. Tuscan Prince which ran on to the coast of British Columbia?

7. Is it the intention of the government to provide proper and efficient coast protection for British Columbia by having an ocean-going tug similar to the said SS. Snohomish, or by having any other suitable class of tug, for assisting the mercantile marine in storms or times of peril on the sea?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. The government pays the Pacific Salvage Co. Ltd. the sum of $10,000 per annum to maintain a wrecking plant at Victoria, B.C., for service on the B.C. coast.

5. Yes.

6. No. The crew of the Tuscan Prince were rescued by the crew of the government life boat, stationed at Bamfield creek.

7. See statement by Minister of Marine and Fisheries on Pages 1725 and 1726 Unrevised Hansard.

GRAIN COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MILLAR: Can the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) inform us when we may expect the announcement of the appointment of the proposed grain commission and whether the trade will be represented on that commission.

Mr. ROBB: The matter is now under consideration, and all interested in the production and sale of grain will be represented.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD

MINISTER OF THE CROWN WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been waiting expecting an announcement by the Prime Minister, in view of the press statements this morning, of changes in the government—subtractions and possible additions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have much pleasure in informing the House that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was sworn in this afternoon as a member of the Privy Council of Canada, without portfolio.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the Prime Minister no announcement as to any one leaving the government, which he can make also with pleasure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would be with deep regret that I would make any such announcement.

SHORTAGE IN SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. COOTE: I would like to draw the attention of the government to a report which has appeared in the press recently to the effect that complaints have been made in England, by importers of grain shipped from the port of Montreal, that the shipments were short in weight, and that a commission is likely to be appointed by the government here to inquire into this matter, and to ask the government whether they have received this complaint, and if so, will a commissioner be appointed to conduct an inquiry?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The attention of the department was called in December last to a complaint which had been made by the directors of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association respecting a shortage of grain shipped from the port of Montreal. The matter was taken up with the Harbour Commission of Montreal, and an officer of the department was entrusted with the task of making an investigation. We are convinced that if there is any shortage, no blame can be laid on the port of Montreal. We sent the report of the investigation to the High Commissioner of Canada in London, who transmitted it to the Liverpool Corn Trade Association. The latter are not quite satisfied because that investigation was made by a department of the government. They want a more impartial investigation, so to speak, and that is what the High Commissioner has stated in a letter written to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. We have answered that we regret that this investigation has not satisfied them; but as the matter is very important, we are going to see that another investigation is made under the Inquiries Act. I am actually considering this question in conjunction with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let me add that the harbour commissioners of Montreal invite the investigation; they will be only too pleased that it should be made, and, indeed, they were prepared to carry it out themselves. They contend that if anything is wrong, it is not on their end of the transportation process. An announcement will be made shortly.

SUPPLY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to income—To increase the amount of loan authorized by Vote No. 136 Main Estimates, 1922-23—Additional amount required $13,099,493.34.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman,—

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): Might I be allowed just a word? I believe my hon. friend who has just risen to his feet, desires to discuss this item. I would suggest to the committee that after he makes his remarks, we allow the item to stand, as several other hon. gentlemen have told me that they wish to make some observations on it, but they are not prepared to do so to-day.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am fortunate in having this early opportunity, before speaking directly on the question before the committee, of congratulating the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I do so with great satisfaction, because I am aware of the capabilities of the new Minister of the Crown and especially his capacity for work. He has—and this has a direct bearing on the appropriation which we are now considering—an intimate knowledge of the railway question. He knows, in an unusually thorough manner, many of the difficulties which exist in connection with railways. His presence therefore, in the cabinet is additionally satisfactory, because I think he will bring to this question a well-founded knowledge and a sympathetic attitude, which I believe are not evident in the cabinet at the present time. During the debate on this appropriation, some discussion as regards the question of railway policy and transportation has been raised. The importance of the discussion was increased by the statements of two members of the government. Their statements were of importance, and at the same time their remarks were, I thought, of a dubious nature and of a disquieting character.

I wish to review, to some extent, the situation as regards the railway system and the railway policy. A few weeks ago the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), in the general summary which he presented to parliament, made some very important statements. He informed us that there were 22,646 miles of National railways. He also told us that the value of these 22,646 miles as appearing on the books of the various companies, amounted to $1,892,577,750, and further that the total earnings in the year 1921 amounted to $233,789,000. These are a few of the outstanding features of the very large organization which the country now possesses. This property was handed over to the Canadian National Railway Company by order in council of the 20th of January of this year, and that order in council entrusts the National Railways of Canada with the keeping of the Canadian National Railway Company for its management and operation. The only limitation in this connection is the proviso that it shall be during the pleasure of the Governor in Council. Up to yesterday no further copies of orders in council had been tabled showing that any subsequent instructions have been issued by the government to the Canadian National Railway Company. In other words, the government has passed over to the company the railways for operation and management without any instructions or any indication of what is to be done, or any general outline to be followed. Nothing of this kind has been done at all. There appears to me to be a striking lack of policy on the part of the government when it hands over this stupendous system of 22,000 miles to the company for operation and management without some guidance or anything to indicate in a broad way what the views of the government are. I ask, would anyone, in any other form of business outside of government control, contemplate handing over a property of this enormous importance and of such huge wealth to a company's management informing that company simply to go ahead and operate the business, without at the same time laying down some policy that shall be followed? Can anyone think of such a thing in connection with a matter that affects the financial condition of the country to such a large extent?

The property was entrusted to the company under a statute entitled "An act to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company, and respecting Canadian National Railways." The company took over the railway more especially under section 11, and I shall read this to the House:

> . . . . the management and operation of any lines or railways or parts thereof, and any property or works of whatsoever description, or interests therein, and any powers, rights or privileges over or with respect to any railways, properties or works, or interests therein, which may be from time to time vested in or owned, controlled or occupied by His Majesty, or such parts or part thereof, or rights or interests therein, as may be designated in any order in council, upon such terms and subject to such regulations and conditions as the Governor in Council may from time to time decide; such management and operation to continue during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and to be subject to termination or variation, from time to time in whole or in part by the Governor in Council.

The authority, then is given to the government to invoke such regulations and conditions as they think proper in entrusting the railways to the company. Where are these regulations and conditions? So far as can be ascertained from the orders in council no regulations or conditions have been laid down and passed on from the government to the company. The government have taken no such position in this matter. But while the government have not seen fit to give any general directions to the company in the way of guidance, certain commitments have been made on behalf of the country, and there are conditions which have existed for some time that bind the government to lay down certain broad and definite principles which the company shall follow. Among these commitments, I might refer first of all to the Intercolonial Railway, which is a matter that is often mentioned in the House. It is mentioned, frequently I think, without any very definite idea of what the British North America Act says on the point, and I therefore propose to read the section of that act, which is not long. Section 145 of the British North America Act says:

> Inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial railway is essential to the consolidation of the Union of British North America, and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the government of Canada: Therefore, in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the government and parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement, within six months after the union, of a railway connecting the river St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

We are quite aware that different views are held regarding the construction which this section entails, and without taking anything more than a moderate view of the section and what it calls for, I believe that it is fair to assume that it does show that this was to be a public undertaking essentially and that it was not necessarily a financial or commercial enterprise. I would suggest therefore that on the face of it this is a government railway and stands in a different relationship from other railways in the country; and I contend that it is not open to this government or parliament to dispose of it to any private corporation if that were proposed. The other fair deduction, I think, is that the conditions attaching to this railway are such that it is incumbent upon the government to see that trade between the Maritime provinces and the rest of Canada shall move freely and without any undue hindrance. But during the last few years this has not been the case, and this fact has been one of the grievances which have been complained of. So much then for the Intercolonial.

Now, how does the country stand in connection with the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific? This House and the country generally were given to understand when the measures were before Parliament that these two railroads would be used for the encouragement of Canadian trade from east to west and from west to east. As emphasizing this understanding I shall quote section 13 of the act of 1911 respecting aid towards the construction of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway. By this section it is declared:

> That the aid herein provided for is granted by the government for the express purpose of encouraging the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. Before such aid is granted the Governor in Council shall require the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company to enter into an agreement undertaking that all freight originating on the line of the Canadian Northern Railway Company or its branches, or on the line of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined to points in Canada be carried over the Canadian Northern Railway, or the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway, or the connections of either of them or over any railway within Canadian territory; and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports; and that the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company shall not in any matter within their powers directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use their utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

As further emphasizing this understanding I shall now read three paragraphs—42, 43 and 45—from the act of 1903 respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific. This act will be found as chapter 71 of the statutes of that year, and it is interesting to note that it was signed on behalf of the government by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Paragraph 42 is in these words:

> It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for poilnts in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

Now paragraph 43:

> The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

Then the last paragraph bearing on the point is additional to what I have read in reference to the Canadian Northern. I refer to paragraph 45:

> The company shall arrange for and provide, either by purchase, charter or otherwise, shipping connections upon both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans sufficient in tonnage and in number of sailings to take care of and transport all its traffic both inward and outward, at such ocean ports within Canada upon the said line of railway, or upon the line of the Intercolonial railway as may be agreed upon from time to time, and the company shall not divert, or so far as it can lawfully prevent permit to be diverted to ports outside of Canada any traffic which it can lawfully influence or control upon the ground that there is not a sufficient amount of shipping to transport such traffic from or to such Canadian ocean ports.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be said that while there is no evidence of the government having drawn these commitments to the attention of the railway board, still the latter are supposed to be aware of the legislation. Personally I do not think this suggestion is satisfactory. The property is too large and valuable and of too much importance to the country for us to depend on mere supposition. The existence of these commitments should be made clear to the country generally and to the railway board in particular, and that, I conceive, can only be done by order in council.

I need hardly say that these undertakings or agreements were known generally by the public at the time the legislation confirming them was enacted. Indeed, the country was not content to grant such generous aid to these railway companies unless, in return, the railway companies gave these undertakings so that the whole Dominion would be benefited, for the real object of building these railways was, through the encouragement of trade within the country, to ensure national prosperity. These are the commitments, and they must be lived up to. I am not saying that the government do not look upon them as commitments, but we would like to hear something more specific in the matter. In any case, those conditions are there, and as a matter of right, as a matter of good faith, they should be fulfilled.

I wish now to refer to the question of the transportation of Canadian products through United States ports and the transportation of American products through Canadian ports. It has frequently been stated that a large amount of Canadian grain is transported through United States ports, and when you look at the figures furnished by the Bureau of Statistics you cannot help being doubly impressed with the truth of that statement. In the year ending March 31, 1921, there were exported through the United States 58,839,270 bushels of Canadian wheat and principal grains, as compared with 48,401,141 bushels of Canadian grain exported through Canadian ports. In the year ending March 31, 1922, the amount exported through United States ports was 99,301,421 bushels, and through Canadian ports, 69,239,823 bushels. For the period ending January 31, 1923—the March figures are not yet available—the amount exported through United States ports was 160,250,892 bushels as compared with 88,232,899 bushels through Canadian ports.

Mr. CLARK: How much through the port of Montreal?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think I have the figures for Montreal and for Vancouver as well, but I would like to follow up this general line for the moment. While the respective amounts exported through American and Canadian ports vary somewhat, the figures show that 65 per cent, or even more, of our Canadian grain is exported to countries beyond the seas through the United States. That, I say, is a very impressive statement, and one that is not calculated, I think, to satisfy the ambitions of Canadians.

I would like to refer briefly to the matter of flour. The amount of Canadian flour exported through United States ports for the year ending March 31, 1921, was 1,546,714 barrels as against 3,282,568 barrels exported through Canadian ports. In 1922 there were exported through United States ports 2,864,699 barrels of Canadian flour, and through Canadian ports, 3,979,016 barrels. For the period ending January 31, 1923, the amount exported through American ports was 3,696,144 barrels, as against 5,496,963 barrels exported through Canadian ports. So that so far as flour goes, while a vast amount is exported from Canada through United States ports, the proportion is less unfavourable than it is in the matter of wheat and grains.

I have heard it stated in this House that while an undue amount of Canadian grain is being exported through American ports, that export is offset by the amount of grain that goes from the United States through Canadian ports. Well, these are the figures: For the year ending March 31, 1922, the amount of Canadian wheat and principal grains exported through United States ports amounted to 99,300,186 bushels as compared with 79,693,438 bushels going from the United States through Canadian ports. This shows a considerable preponderance in grain exported from Canada through United States ports over the amount that is exported from the United States through Canadian ports. It therefore cannot be said to be an offset. It is a partial offset, but it is far from being a complete offset.

I have other figures here. For the nine months ending December 31, 1922—the figures for the last three months are not available—Canadian grains passing through United States ports amounted to 146,210,694 bushels, as compared with 91,838,301 bushels of United States grains passing through Canadian ports, showing a very large preponderance for nine months in favour of the American ports.

For the year ending March 31, 1922, there were 2,864,699 barrels of Canadian wheat flour exported through American ports, as compared with 104,385 barrels of American flour exported through Canadian ports, or something like twenty times more Canadian flour was sent through American ports than American flour through Canadian ports. I have a similar statement for the nine months ending December 31, 1922. For that period there were 2,307,676 barrels of Canadian flour sent through American ports as compared with 12,046 barrels of American flour sent through Canadian ports. Those figures, I think, are very striking. It is hardly necessary to emphasize the point that one of the most important articles of production in this country is grain, and that this is very largely exported to a foreign country. These figures show that this country is not sharing in one of our important industries, namely, transportation, to the extent it should. This question of transportation is of the greatest possible importance, not only for the government to consider but the Railway Board as well. It concerns both the government and the railway company and must be considered not only from the general point of view of the transportation of Canadian business over Canadian railways and through Canadian ports, but regard must also be had to the formal agreements that have already been made governing a considerable portion of the railway.

In answer to my hon. friend from Burrard, the amount of Canadian wheat exported via Montreal for the year ending March 31, 1921, was 28,298,040 bushels.

Mr. CLARK: Was that all wheat?

Mr. MacLAREN: The figures I have given are headed "Quantity of Canadian Flaxseed, Barley, Oats, Rye, Wheat exported to Overseas countries via Canadian seaports direct." It states that the total of wheat and other grains exported for the year 1921 was 37,008,373 bushels: for the year 1922, 52,320,740 bushels, and for the year 1923, 60,098,995 bushels. Those are the figures given to me by the Statistics Bureau. I have given this information simply in answer to a question and it does not bear quite on the point I was bringing up.

Now we come to that part of the railway question of which we heard a good deal yesterday, and that is that portion of the Grand Trunk which runs from Montreal to Portland, Maine, and as regards the business that is now being done by the Dominion government through the port of Portland, Maine. At the present time the difference in distance between Port Arthur and Portland, and Port Arthur and St. John, New Brunswick, is 253 miles in favour of the Portland route, that is, if the route is taken from the short cut at Long lake and the freight carried from McGivney Junction through Fredericton to St. John. One offset to this 253 miles, and there are several offsets, is the difference in grade in favour of the Canadian route. The grade of the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Portland, Maine, is one and one-fourth per cent. The grade from Port Arthur to St. John over the largest portion of the road is four-tenths per cent; I am advised that that is the case for all except twenty-seven miles, and that is an important offset. It means that a full freight train can be carried from Port Arthur to St. John continuously, whereas if the freight was taken from Port Arthur to Portland, Maine, the freight would have to be divided in Montreal and sent on in two trains. That is an important offset. There is this other factor, and that is that when the wheat goes through St. John or Halifax the money is spent in this country, and surely that is an important offset. The business is there. The railways can do the business. They are not so congested that they cannot carry on until the traffic is forced out via the Grand Trunk to Portland, Maine. Therefore, it is a question with the railway companies and with the government whether they think it advisable to raise a certain amount of money by dividing their business between Portland, Maine and Canadian ports, or concentrate on having the main revenue derived from our own Canadian ports. Difficulties are arising, no doubt, in the situation, but are they sufficient to deter us from making the best arrangement we can, rather than accepting the easier course of least resistance? While one does not wish to appear in any sense as a railway expert, in all railway matters, as in everything else in life, there is a tendency to follow the path of least resistance, the rut so to speak, the custom of doing certain things, is apt to be followed, and it takes a vast amount of determination to follow a newer and a better method.

Some figures were given, in answer to a question not long ago, regarding the business done in Canadian grain through the port of Portland and through the port of St. John, and I wish to have these figures incorporated in Hansard. The amount of Canadian grain carried to Portland, Maine, since October 1, 1922, by the Canadian Government railways, was 14,756,808 bushels. The amount of grain that was carried through St. John by the Canadian Government railways during the same period was 1,706,376—fourteen millions and three quarters to Portland as against one million and three quarters to St. John. The amount of United States grain that was brought to St. John during the same period was 367,282 bushels—a comparatively small amount. The Canadian Pacific railway brought 11,047,981 bushels of Canadian grain and 2,202,121 of United States grain to St. John. The amount taken to Halifax was reported as nil. A certain amount of grain is brought from the United States to St. John but the amount is small in comparison with these amounts, particularly the amount sent to Portland, Maine, over the Canadian National. Here is a fact that I think the House might well consider: That at the present time the Canadian National Railways are taking to Portland, Maine, over 14,000,000 bushels as compared with one million and three quarter bushels to St. John.

I need hardly say that that matter is not entirely satisfactory to people who live in the Maritime provinces. They are showing very great concern and very much dissatisfaction with the conditions that now exist, and I would impress on the government that it is most desirable, not only in the interest of the prosperity of the country, but also in the interest of the contentment and happiness of the people, that this unsatisfactory condition should be changed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made a statement yesterday in reference to the situation. To my mind his remarks were very disturbing. He said in part—

> My hon. friend has forgotten that by the action of the government of Canada in acquiring the Grand Trunk railway, we have acquired another Maritime port at Portland, Maine.

Let me see if that be the case. The late government was more successful than were the commissioners in the drawing up of the Ashburton Treaty. They never succeeded in acquiring Portland, Maine—far from it—and yet the Minister of Finance says that the late government acquired another Maritime port in Portland, Maine. I think it is a most important thing. Mr. Chairman, not to confuse the issue. Having a railroad from Montreal to Portland, Maine, does not constitute having a port at Portland, Maine. It is confusing ideas. But the Minister of Finance is not given to confusion of ideas. He is remarkably clear, I do not think he has taken a dispassionate view of the situation or he would hardly advance that proposition.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is it not correct to say that the late government acquired a railroad to Portland, Maine?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is what I am saying. My hon. friend is quite right. I said acquiring a railroad was not acquiring a port at the same time—especially a foreign port.

Mr. PUTNAM: Acquiring a railroad in this case implied acquiring a terminus of a railroad, which was Portland.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think what I said was quite clear and what the Minister of Finance said is also clear. He said a port.

Mr. PUTNAM: I say that too.

Mr. MacLAREN: And I say that is a confusion of ideas and a confusion of the issue. It is not acquiring a port, and I am pleased to have the opportunity of refuting that statement.

Mr. PUTNAM: Instead of "acquiring," what is the proper word?

Mr. MacLAREN: I will answer the question of my hon. friend if he will remain quiescent for a little while. The minister stated as reported in Hansard:

> We have acquired another Maritime port at Portland, Maine.

Acquiring a railway from Montreal to Portland is, in my judgment, a long way off from acquiring a port; it is also a long way off from compelling the government to make use of that port whether they have a terminus there or whether they have not. There is in the act nothing laid down that I know of compelling the government to maintain that port, or to see that traffic goes through Portland, Maine. The minister went on to say:

> The question is an ugly one, and this complicates it. We own the Grank Trunk railway, and Portland is the Grand Trunk railway terminus. This is the problem we are giving to Sir Henry Thornton. We are asking him to make these roads reasonably profitable, remunerative, self-sustaining.

Where is the official record of this request that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) states has been made to the railway board? He stated:

> We are asking him to make these roads reasonably profitable, remunerative, self-sustaining.

I have pointed out already that there is no order in council giving any instructions whatever to the railway board, beyond entrusting them with the property and empowering them to operate and manage it. If Sir Henry Thornton has been asked to carry on this road, as the minister stated yesterday, so as to make it reasonably profitable, remunerative, self-sustaining, I should like to have the record. The minister went on to say:

> We give him this road to Portland. Is he to let that road be idle, to let the rails get rusty, or to try to send some traffic over the Portland road in order that it may contribute something towards the cost of the system?

That seems to me a method of conducting an argument that is not convincing, that is not satisfactory to this committee. What is the use of talking about rusty rails? I am afraid we have enough of them in this country already, and I do not know that the minister is exercised about that. But we know there is trade originating in Chicago, and it is carried to Portland, Maine, over the Grand Trunk. Nobody raises any dispute over that. Nobody says: "Do not do that." On the contrary, we agree that it is right and proper to carry that on. There is passenger traffic going on between Montreal and Portland, Maine. Does anyone wish to represent that nothing but wheat is going over that road? We know to the contrary. Wheat, of course, is not going there in the summer. That is not a method of conducting an argument that we might have expected; but in any case, if the railway is there and if the terminus is there, outside of all that I have mentioned, is that any reason why a government or a railway board should wish to keep up a foreign port at the expense of our own port? The business can be done as well, as cheaply, and I believe with more financial benefit to the country by sending the traffic through Canadian ports.

When this matter was discussed prior to the last election, a tremendous hubbub was raised about the taking over of the Grand Trunk. I do not know that anybody was particularly anxious to take over the Grand Trunk; but something had to be done; you could not give it away; it had to be disposed of in some way or another, and in my view, at any rate, the best thing to do in the interest of the country was to take it over. I saw no alternative. I am in favour of government ownership of railways, and when I say so, I do not want to say it in that drawback sort of tone or way, that I hear from many hon. members in this House and especially members on the other side. I believe in public ownership, and that it is not too much to expect of a railway board to feel hopeful that it can make a success of this project with the greatest benefit to our people. That being the case, why put this view forward that we must export through Portland, Maine? As I stated prior to the last election there was a tremendous disturbance over this question that another port had been originated in Portland, Maine, and that this was to be all corrected—mark you! On the other hand, another view was put forward that a favourable feature of the taking over of the Grand Trunk was that the administration and operation of the road then came within the power of the government, and they were at liberty to favour, or to limit, or to do away with all this business through Portland, Maine. The government are now in the position of saying whether they want this or do not want it. They are in the position of saying: "We will do this", or "we will not do it." It may be a part of the duties of the railway board, I grant you—they may do this and I hope they will—but I believe it is the duty of the government to come out in a general way and say: "We want this business for our country."

The Acting Minister of Railways also spoke on this subject yesterday, and there are two phases to his remarks. He gave some vague hopes at the end. I hope they will all be realized. I trust that what he hints at will please the House. In that case it must be something pretty substantial; but he does hint that something is coming of a favourable character. Before he made that statement, he referred in several instances to the railway situation in somewhat similar terms to the remarks made by the Minister of Finance. He said, for instance:

> It must not be forgotten that what is good at one end of the line is good at the other—

I do not know what that means.

> —and the road to Portland is just as much the property of the people of Canada as is the road to Halifax.

Very well. I would ask the people of Canada if they wish the port of Portland, Maine, to be developed and used as a Canadian port at the expense of our own ports? If the government wish to ask that question, I should be only too delighted; but I do not think that any question like that is going to be addressed by the government to the people. The minister went on to say:

> But there is another feature of the matter we must consider. Cut off the traffic going to the Grand Trunk from Chicago and vicinity, etc.

Nobody is objecting to the business that is developed from Chicago and its neighbourhood proceeding to Portland, Maine, over the Grand Trunk. Far from it.

I wish to refer for a moment to something in that connection so far as the Atlantic division is concerned. This is a matter that has been discussed to a considerable extent by the public in the last few months. I recognize that the apportionment of the country into divisions, western, eastern and Atlantic, in accordance with the act, comes within the purview of the railway board. I believe that everyone is content to leave this to the railway board, and if the board makes an error then I presume later on it will be subject to correction and advice. I am in accord with the view that the railway board and the management should be entirely free from politics; and, when I say that, I have reference to the personnel, the general management, general regulations and everything else connected with the board; I believe that in regard to all this the railway board should have a free hand and be quite untrammelled. But when it came to the assignment of these divisions, the general belief is that the limitation of the Atlantic division was fixed in a certain place west of Montreal but that political pressure moved it back to Montreal. What happened? That did not seem to be quite enough, and still further political pressure is reported to have forced it back again to Rivière du Loup. So that the western terminus of the Atlantic division is regarded by many people in the country to have been removed, by political pressure, and shifted twice, finally being fixed in the wilderness at Rivière du Loup.

Now, that sort of thing is not what we contemplate as administration without politics, and I trust we shall be able to carry on the railways without such interference. When, however, such a thing is done an hon. member can only rise in this House and bring up the point. As was stated yesterday, I believe that the only proper thing to do is to discuss these railway matters in the House. Hon. members are sent here to represent their constituencies and the country at large, and it is here that we must criticize in a fair way the acts of the railway board and any extra-railway board pressure that has been brought to bear. I can only state many men believe that these are the facts of the case as I have stated them. The ultimate settlement of the Atlantic division limitation at Rivière du Loup has given rise to dissatisfaction generally on the part of business men of the Maritime provinces. I have here a copy of a resolution that was passed at a joint meeting of a number of the boards of trade of the Maritime provinces held a few weeks ago at Amherst in which there was expressed strong disapproval of the western limitation being fixed at Rivière du Loup. They say that Montreal was the limit previously of the Intercolonial railway, and they contend that Montreal is the point where trade originates. They say that it is the point at which traffic coming in may be passed on to the Maritime rails rather than to Portland, Maine. These arguments do not apply to Rivière du Loup, which is a quite unimportant station near New Brunswick. That is the position of affairs, and I believe that it has been arranged for representatives of the boards of trade of the Maritime provinces to meet Sir Henry Thornton next week, so great has been the dissatisfaction that has been engendered in connection with this question. As the House is aware, there is one representative of the railway board on the Atlantic division. I asked a question some weeks ago as to whether an additional representative on the board was to be appointed for New Brunswick, and this is the answer I received:

> After consultation with the president of the Canadian National railways it was decided to begin operations with a comparatively small board representative of districts rather than of provinces. Should experience indicate the necessity for further additions within the limits of the act the government will not hesitate to make these additions.

The statement has appeared in the press on several occasions, and it has not been contradicted, that the representative of the Atlantic division has said that at one meeting of the board the western terminus of the Atlantic division was to be Montreal and that at a subsequent meeting at which he was not present the second push-back to Rivière du Loup took place. Now, the government have assured me that they would not hesitate to make additions if experience should indicate the necessity therefor. Well, I would ask the government whether there does not appear to be a necessity for further additions to the board in view of the fact that in the absence of the one representative for the Atlantic division the terminus of that division is interfered with. Is that not an experience which would indicate the necessity for a further addition? One can easily figure it out. If there were two members on the board representing that division then the chances of the division being entirely without representation at any meeting would be reduced one-half, or it would be quite possible for them to arrange matters so that if they were not always both present they could attend meetings alternately, so that there would be no fear of the Atlantic division being shoved further back. I suggest that to the government as being a reason that must appeal to them, in view of their assurance to me, why another man should be appointed on the board.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word in reference particularly to the future of the Maritime provinces. The satisfactory accomplishment of a suitable railway policy will ensure the future of the Maritime provinces. Some very prominent business men, men whose opinions are well worth careful consideration by this committee, have told me from time to time that in their view the future of the Maritime provinces lies in the development of industries within their borders and the building up of an export business beyond the seas. That is not an imaginary condition. These are practical business men, not men who talk about secession, and they tell me that the prosperity of the Maritime provinces lies in export business beyond the seas rather than domestic business over Canadian rails under present transportation conditions. Therefore I submit that the railway position is one of outstanding importance.

There is another factor that might help very materially, and it is directly bound up with the railway situation—that is preferential trade with Great Britain. It is very easy for that preference to be limited to goods coming through Canadian ports. It affects Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert, and it affects our Atlantic coast ports. There does not seem to be any difficulty about the adoption of such a limitation, and, with others, I again press on the government their careful consideration of this principle as one of the means of bringing back prosperity to the whole country. I must acknowledge with thankfulness that in the recent French treaty the principle has been recognized and acted upon, that treaty containing a provision that French goods entering Canada must come direct to Canadian ports to benefit from the preference. That is a beginning. It is a very small matter compared with the British preference, but it is a principle which the government has accepted. If the government will go a step further and apply this principle to the British and all other preferential tariffs, the country will be the better. Curiously enough, I do not see such a provision in the Italian treaty. Presumably this treaty in any case would be of much less importance. Be that as it may, I think that not only the French treaty, but also the Italian, the British and all other such treaties should contain this clause. It is a clause which is fair in every way, for no one is going to suffer but a great many will benefit from its inclusion in our trade treaties.

Item stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

National Defence—Militia Services—Amount required to pay Cost of Living Bonus to employees of the Dominion Arsenal and others at Quebec, discharged without receiving bonus for certain periods for which it was later granted to those similarly employed and not discharged, $26,000.

Hon GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): This is the item we discussed yesterday.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, when I left the House a few minutes ago the committee were dealing with the railway situation and I did not know that this vote would be taken up so soon. I wish to mention a matter relative to this item which we should all be interested in,—the employment of returned men in the various departments of the government, and particularly in the Militia department. When the boys went overseas we, as citizens, all promised to do everything we could for them when they returned, and I submit that in a general way, so far as the country is concerned, from the standpoint of pensions and ordinary re-establishment we have done very fairly by them. At the same time I do not think that our people generally have given to the boys all that they deserve, and I certainly do not think that some of the departments of the government have.

The reason I mention this is that to-day about noon I was waited upon by a young man whom I have known quite well since coming to Ottawa. He was in the Civil Service for a long time, first of all working in this building and lately in the Militia department. I have formed a very high opinion of him. He won a distinguished conduct medal at the front and is in every way worthy of one's esteem. With a number of others he had been in the Militia department for some time, I think about a year and a half, but recently when the department found it necessary to lessen its staff he, among others, was laid off. I am not criticizing the cutting down of the staff at all. But he claims—and I am basing my remarks on his claim because I only got his statement signed a few minutes ago and have not had time to investigate it; I have sent a messenger to my room for it and shall lay it before the minister for consideration—he claims that he and, so far as I recollect, something like forty other returned men have been discharged, although in the department there are a number of women retained who do not require to work for a living at all. For example, on the list he, as one of a committee appointed by the men handed me is the name of a lady—of course, I would not think of mentioning it here—who they state rides to her work daily in her automobile. This may or may not be true. But supposing it is true, then certainly, even if she is a permanent employee, to my mind, with all due respect to her, she should be laid off in favour of one of these returned men who risked their lives for their country overseas. I am sure the minister will agree with me in this. On the list are also included a number of young women, some married and some unmarried, and if the facts are as stated, I think they should be replaced by these returned men.

That in brief is the statement which I wish to make, because I believe it is only just to the returned men that so far as the government is able, and particularly the department over which my hon. friend, the Minister of Defence, presides, it is certainly their duty to look after these returned men and especially to see that the affairs of the Militia department be handled by those who have served overseas and are capable of handling this work.

I do not say that it would be advisable to put into a responsible position any young man who would not be capable of filling it; but mention is made, for example, of a number of girls doing such work as filing, which practically any intelligent returned man can do. I suggested to this young gentleman that perhaps these women were working at lower wages than any returned man would be willing to accept, and he said that was possible. But in any case I suggest that the government in all its departments should make a strong effort to give positions to these returned men. I well remember having pointed out to me, even when the late government was in power, cases where the daughters of well-to-do-men, men earning $5,000 or $6,000 a year, were working in certain government departments. It is possible that returned men could not be found to fill these positions, but I am sure I have the support of every member of the House when I say that positions in the government service filled by young women who do not require to work for a living, whose parents are willing and able to support them, should be given to the boys who served at the front. I am quite certain that that would be the view of the greater proportion of the people of this country. Where a young woman has been for many years in the government service and requires to work for her living, the returned soldier would be the last to suggest that she be replaced by any returned soldier; and the same would apply, perhaps, to a woman who is married and has a family to support. But if there are such cases as are mentioned in this statement, then I ask the minister, on behalf of the returned soldiers represented here, to make a personal investigation of the matter and to see that justice is done.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree wholly with what my hon. friend says; in fact, just what he suggests has been done. The history of every person whose name was submitted in connection with the reduction of staff was given. The instructions were that returned soldiers with families were to be first kept; second, returned soldiers without families; next, those with dependents to support. That principle has been carried out, and the returned soldier has had the benefit of the doubt in every case. I do not know who this young man is; he has not been in the service long, I imagine. But I ask my hon. friend this; if he had charge of a department in which an expert was employed, a woman with a family to support and whose husband had been killed overseas, would he give her position to a returned soldier?

Mr. MANION: I answered that question, I think, before the minister asked it.

Mr. GRAHAM: These things have all been taken into consideration—how to protect the returned soldier in the weeding out of the staff of the department. In fact, I have given more thought to the matter, perhaps, than I have any other phase of the work of the department. Where the services of women have been retained in the department, it has been due to their special qualifications; none have been kept who have not been in the service for many years. There are some branches in which the returned soldier does not fit; that work has to be done, and we must keep some persons on the staff to do it. It must be remembered that about a thousand have gone out of the department within the last year, and it was inevitable that some of these would be returned soldiers. They went out, however, in the order that I have mentioned. Of those who have been retained, an examination of the list will show that there are not five who have not given the assurance that they have a father, a mother, a sister or other dependent to support; and in many cases their sons or husbands were killed overseas. In the last few weeks, owing to the reclassification, some 193 were listed to go, and I spent days and nights in an effort to determine upon the ones that ought to be kept. After it was decided who should go, and they had practically received their notice, I recalled a large number of returned soldiers with families and told them to go on and work a while longer, because, the session being on, there was pressure for questions and that kind of thing involving extra work. Of course, anyone who is let out feels that he has a grievance, and I do not blame him. It is not a pleasure to me to reduce the staff; personally I would rather increase it. I have in mind the case of a very clever young man, a returned soldier, who is putting himself through college. He is in his last year, now, I believe; he is studying theology, if I remember correctly. He is very efficient; he starts to college next autumn, and he will have plenty of opportunity to work all the summer at more remunerative employment than he can get in the Militia department. Now, it was a case of choosing between him and the returned man with a family or with a disability, who could not earn anything anywhere else. So that if my hon. friend will look into the matter closely he will find that the utmost care has been taken in the matter. It is inevitable, of course, that in dealing with a large staff of that kind some errors should be made. I will look into this particular case.

Mr. MANION: I do not question for a moment the sincerity of the minister, but this statement does not agree with the result to which he refers. I have torn a page from the statement and I am going to take the liberty of sending it across to the minister so that he may examine it—I will not send over the part on which the signature of the young man appears as that would be hardly fair to him. But the page I have torn out gives a list of 12 girls and 6 men. The 6 men have not had military service, but that is beside the question for the moment. In the case of the 12 girls, he gives reasons why the committee considered they have not the right to the positions which they hold. Among these 12 is the young lady whom I have mentioned. If the facts are correctly stated—and I am only giving them as represented to me—I hope the minister will have the matter looked into again with a view to doing justice. I know the question involves difficulties; I have been up against the same thing to a certain extent in Fort William ever since I have been a member. We have a large grain staff there. When the boys went overseas a number went from that staff, and on coming back they asked to be reinstated in their positions. But the men who have occupied the positions in question have learned more about the work, and the question becomes a very difficult one. I admit that where a person is more or less of an expert and an expert is needed, it might not be wise to replace him by someone who is not an expert. I do find this, and in Fort William, that there is a tendency among many of those in charge—I am not speaking of the heads of the department but the sub-heads so to speak—not to give quite justice in some cases. I know that in a number of cases I have looked into I had alterations made by the late government. We even went so far on a number of occasions—perhaps it is questionable if we were right—as to keep on a number of men who were put on temporarily, and who otherwise would have been dropped out of their positions in the middle of winter without any work for them to get. We kept them on up to the last year or two, but of course they could not be kept on indefinitely and their services have been discontinued. I think the minister will find on looking into it, even though he may have a report that he feels is correct that in some cases favouritism may be shown and some returned men not be given notice. I am going to send this over to the minister with the request that he look into the list with reference to the facts as therein stated.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I will put it in my pocket in the meantime.

Item agreed to.

Air Services—Purchase of new flying equipment—$250,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: This item was allowed to stand yesterday. The hon. member for Victoria (Alta.) (Mr. Lucas) had made some comments on it, and it was thought wise that there should be some explanation before the item was passed. If hon. gentlemen will look at Hansard they will find that criticism was made by one of the staff of the air force of men being brought from Vancouver to Camp Borden, and it was suggested in his utterances that there was extravagance and that the men's time was being lost by bringing them over a long distance in order to have repairs made.

The situation is this. Until such time as repair shops can be provided in many more centres, this centralization for purposes of repair work will have to be continued. Camp Borden at the present time is the place best fitted for the performance of this work. The reorganization the flying force comes under military control rather than civil, although both kinds of flying are done. Those who were civil employees have not, of course, had the training that they are now required to have even in the matter of repairs and other work incidental to aviation. These men at the present time when extensive repairs are to be made have to go to Camp Borden, and that practice will have to be continued until such time as we are prepared to vote sufficient money to establish repair shops in other parts of Canada. An item has been placed in the estimates to establish such a shop, with hangars and so forth in Winnipeg. That will reduce the cause for criticism which my hon. friend made yesterday.

5 p.m.

Another point is this. These men who come in to the centre at Camp Borden are also given a training which they could not otherwise get. In addition to making the repairs to the machine, they are given a certain schooling in aviation which they are required to have in order to qualify under the militia regulations. The department believes that the results are going to be good. True, the military rules are a little more stringent than the civil, and it will take a little time for the men to adjust themselves and feel that they are being given a fair chance, but when the machinery gets working and these men feel they are a part of the militia unit as they are now, it will really be all the better for them. They will be better men for their training in aviation, better at making repairs and all that kind of thing. I repeat, that until such time as we are ready to establish repair centres in different parts of Canada at a cost of a great many hundreds of thousands of dollars, this practice will have to be continued, but the situation will be relieved to some extent next year, I hope, when the centre is established at Winnipeg. That was the explanation, I think, my hon. friend wanted.

Mr. MANION: Who is the officer in charge at Camp Borden?

Mr. GRAHAM: Colonel Barker.

Mr. MANION: How many men are there at Camp Borden at the present time?

Mr. GRAHAM: One wing commander, two squadron leaders, nine flight lieutenants, eight flying officers, seven pilot officers, one warrant officer, ten flight sergeants, twenty-one sergeants, nineteen corporals, and eighty-five air craft men.

Mr. MANION: About one hundred and fifty altogether?

Mr. GRAHAM: About that.

Mr. MANION: I presume there is only one medical officer in charge at Camp Borden?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister mind telling me if there has been any special amount of sickness there in the past six months?

Mr. GRAHAM: There has been none reported.

Mr. MANION: Has there been any severe epidemic of flu?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have not heard anything about it.

Mr. MANION: What hospital accommodation is there for the men of the camp?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed there is a small hospital for the men at Camp Borden with about eight or ten beds.

Mr. MANION: That was my information, but I understood that there was a rather severe epidemic of illness for some time during the flu outbreak in this country, and that the hospital accommodation was anything but adequate. That, of course, might easily occur. but I was going to suggest to the minister in view of that fact, if the statements made to me are correct, that perhaps it might be well to consider using another hospital building which I believe exists within about a mile of the camp. I was told at the time of the epidemic the hospital at Camp Borden was crowded, and there were mixed cases in the hospital. That, of course, might easily occur. I do not offer it as a criticism at all, but I suggest that it might be well to look into that condition and see if it could not be arranged to use the other hospital within a mile of the camp under circumstances of that kind in future. The other building is empty at the present time, I understand.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that is a very proper suggestion.

Mr. MANION: Has the hon. minister any information as to the number of machines at Camp Borden and their general condition of repair in regard to flying uses?

Mr. MacLEAN: (Prince, P.E.I.): I was wondering whether this air service warrants the expenditure being made on it. Have the aeroplanes been used successfully in carrying mails or in mail service? In Prince Edward Island we were more or less isolated for a time and a request was made for an aeroplane service. We were informed that the machines were mostly tied up or frozen in, that there were none available, that it would take some months before they could be released and put in shape to work and that the expense would be beyond all reason. Therefore, we could not reasonably ask for the expenditure. In view of these conditions, and if the aeroplane cannot be utilized for commercial purposes but can only be used for war, I was wondering whether we were justified in passing the items which are now under consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I pointed out yesterday, we have only performed commercial flying, outside of the forests, to the extent of some $770. With reference to the mail service, there is no doubt in the world that, as flying develops, Canada will do as other countries are doing, and adopt the aviation service for carrying mails, particularly the through mails. Up to date we have not done that. A request has been made from Prince Edward Island to have an aeroplane sent down there, but it means a lot more than simply sending the aeroplane. You must have your landing place and everything in connection with it. My department figured out the cost and, as my hon. friend stated, it was found that it would be out of all proportion to the necessities. Therefore we hustled up and got the other route opened.

My hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Manion) asks how many aeroplanes are at Camp Borden. The number is about seventy.

Mr. MANION: Are they in a good state of repair?

Mr. GRAHAM: Practically all will be ready for use in a few weeks.

Mr. MANION: I notice this item is for the purpose of supplying equipment. Is that $250,000 to be used at Camp Borden or in other sections of the country?

Mr. GRAHAM: To be used mostly for forestry and survey work. We have not machines suitable, in many instances, for this work. I pointed out one case yesterday. These are amphibian machines. Some of the machines have been used for forestry protection work, and if they drop into a lake or into a forest, they have trouble getting out. We had difficulty with one or two. In addition to that, the flying equipment will be provided for the remote sections. We wish to have the service equipped with wireless, in order that the occupant of the machine can be in constant communication with the ground, so that in case of trouble he can communicate at once. That service and the other equipment will cost about $50,000.

Mr. MANION: In regard to the forestry work being done by the air department, is there co-operation between the department of the hon. minister and, say, some of these private corporations, which are now doing a certain amount of patrol work as well? The Spanish River Pulp and Paper Company do a certain amount of patrol work in the province of Ontario. In Quebec they also perform patrol work. Is co-operation between the government and these corporations carried on?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say there was practical co-operation, but there is co-operation and the department is helping them with any information we can give them and everything of that kind. So far as I am concerned—but perhaps I would not have the sympathy of the House on this proposition—I am in favour of commercial aviation being in private hands, as a matter of business, rather than that we should do it, but we are glad to teach them and help them in any way we can.

Speaking of the different provinces, Ontario paid us this year $38,000 for the protection of her forests, and they think it is the best kind of protection they can have. British Columbia paid us a certain amount last year and the Minister of Lands from that province informed me yesterday they were prepared to pay us $20,000 this year. The provinces are working together. We look after forest protection for the Interior department and we do topographical work. We surveyed the St. Lawrence for the International Joint Commission. We made inspections of the forests with a view to their protection from insects and all that kind of thing. The work this year has been very heavy, and yet we were not able to meet the demands.

Mr. MANION: I presume my hon. friend is as familiar as I am with the work of Frank Barnjum, who, at his own expense, is undertaking to educate the people and make them understand that we have not the forest reserves we thought we had. He is trying to impress us with the fact that the illimitable forest reserves which we used to speak of do not now exist to the extent we formerly believed they did and that the forest wealth still remaining constitutes one of the greatest assets of the country. We exported last year forestry products, paper and pulp, to the value of about $200,000,000. I happened to be looking up the figures recently, and I found our exports of forest products, including paper and pulp, amounted to almost as much as all the wheat exported from the prairie provinces. That is rather a startling fact, but it is true that these forest products nearly equal the wheat products. So that, even if there is a certain amount of overlapping going on by the department of the minister taking in work which probably could be done by private corporations, I think it is a very good investment for the country at the present time to expend a reasonable amount of money to assist in that work until the private corporations are in a position to do it themselves, because if a fire took place on the limits of private corporations, if it were confined to the property of that corporation, it might not matter, but if it should overleap the bounds of those limits and burn up a few thousand square miles of pulpwood or timber belonging to Ontario, British Columbia, Quebec, or to the Dominion itself, that would be a loss to the country which the expenditure of a few thousand dollars might obviate.

I wish to take up another matter. What is the course of training given to the men at Camp Borden in regard to their work there? Is it a course of some months, or is it a course of a short period each year for a number of years? What are the terms upon which these young men are engaged?

Mr. GRAHAM: The old scheme of instruction was for rather a limited period, and I might point out to my hon. friend that we are introducing something new this year, of which I think he will approve. We are providing for the training of thirty young students from the different universities. We give them a training all through the summer at a nominal cost. I believe in that way we shall have added to the flying forces of the country, perhaps, the most intelligent men we can get. That is a new method; but the universities seem to be pleased with it; I have no doubt we shall have the full thirty, and we could have more than thirty if we so desired. They will be given the regular instruction on aviation, together with military training, the first year and then progress, because likely the same men will come back another year. We look to evolve a force of very intelligent flying men in that way.

Mr. BOYS: Owing to the fact that I reside near Camp Borden and have a personal knowledge of the matters under discussion, it would not be amiss if I were to take up just a few moments in referring to this subject. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) asked the minister regarding an outbreak of flu. I, of course, have not been at home since the House opened; but I think I can safely say that had there been anything of a serious nature there, I would have heard of it, and I can only say that I have not heard of it. There were formerly two medical men there; but the numbers at the camp were greatly reduced, and as far as I know there is only one medical man there at the present time. I have made it my business on many trips to Camp Borden to inquire into various things that I felt I should know and that naturally I was interested in, and I have never heard complaints that there has not been sufficient hospital accommodation. If, however, owing to an outbreak, the building now used for that purpose was found to be insufficient, I should like to say to the members of this committee that one of the features of Camp Borden is that at a very nominal cost the department secured these buildings which were originally constructed by the Imperial authorities when the Royal Air Force was in occupation. There are any number of suitable buildings which could be used in case of an outbreak of that kind, and these buildings would hardly require a dollar spent on them. They are well constructed, and are all together, and there could be no serious trouble resulting from insufficient hospital accommodation. I doubt very much whether there is anything in the suggestion that there was a serious outbreak at Camp Borden. If there was, the officers there could easily take the matter in hand, and within a stone's throw, I venture to say, they could find a suitable building of ample accommodation, to which building they could move.

Another feature in connection with the equipment that has been referred to is this. If the figures we were given in my home town, Barrie, were correct, between eight and ten million dollars worth of equipment was presented to this country by the Imperial authorities after the war. This equipment came to Camp Borden in carload lots, and it did not cost this country a cent of money, except possibly some transportation charges. Hence, the plant is undoubtedly extensive there and also up-to-date, I am led to believe. Apart from assembling, transportation charges and the percentage that was paid by Canada for these extensive buildings constructed by the Imperial authorities, we are getting all this for nothing. I would think, before the department seriously considers establishing new plants, they would make very sure that they are going to save money by so doing, because there is no question there is ample room for expansion at Camp Borden.

If possible, I would like the minister to verify the figures I have given regarding the equipment which came out from England and which was presented to Canada, and, if it is not amiss, I should be glad to know what was paid. I have heard different figures mentioned. I heard it suggested first that the buildings at Camp Borden were offered to the Canadian Department of Militia at fifty cents on the dollar. I heard later that the figure was reduced to 25 cents on the dollar and that is, as a matter of fact, what was paid. I do not know whether this information is private. If it is, I do not want to pry into it. But if it is not, it might interest the members of this committee to know that these buildings were secured at this small figure. In any event, I am quite certain they were secured at a substantial reduction. When the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) was minister, the matter was then under consideration, and I cannot say whether it was under his regime or that of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the actual deal was made. If it is proper to get the information, I should be glad to get it now.

I can only say, in conclusion, that if any members of this House have an opportunity of visiting Camp Borden, they should do so. They will find there one of the finest camps in existence. I have heard that from men who have seen the finest camps in the world. There is everything there. The property was acquired by this country at twelve dollars an acre, and I doubt very much if any deal was ever put through by the government of Canada where property was acquired at so low a rate as was Camp Borden. You have abundance of opportunity for artillery practice. You have the buildings for anything you want to go into. You have no end of cement pavements. You have a wonderful sewage system. You have the finest water you can get anywhere in this country. Two or three artesian wells, eight inches in diameter, supply this water. There is practically everything that could be wanted at that camp. The only thing I could criticize is the matter I mentioned to the minister yesterday. The approaches there are not what they should be; they are not fair either to the men or to the public who are interested in the camp and who have a right to visit it. The cost of this improvement would be only a nominal matter; these approaches should be made right, and if that is done, we have at Camp Borden as complete a camp as could be wanted by anybody.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking from memory now. Those buildings were acquired at a comparatively small cost to the country. It might be said that they are temporary and that to keep them in a state of repair would cost a good deal of money. The estimated value of the equipment sent across is, I am informed, considerably nearer $5,000,000 than $10,000,000. It must, however, be remembered that one of the difficulties in assembling the machines and engines is that one part may have to be taken from one machine and another from another, and we have reached almost the limit in connection with that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): How much of Canada's forest area is patrolled by the air force?

Mr. GRAHAM: About 300,000 square miles.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): How many different stations are there in Canada that are doing this kind of work, and where are they located?

Mr. GRAHAM: Vancouver, High River, Camp Borden. There are three in Manitoba: Victoria Beach, Norway House and The Pas. In Ontario there are stations at Parry Sound, Whitby and Camp Borden. There is a station at Roberval in Quebec, and one at Dartmouth in Nova Scotia.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is there any possibility of extending this work to northern Alberta? There is an immense quantity of forest area in northern Alberta as compared with southern Alberta. I do not know whether it is possible or not to patrol the northern area from High River; but in any case I would like to know if it is possible to extend this work.

Mr. GRAHAM: The department would be delighted to do this, and as I pointed out yesterday, more money will have to be expended in this branch as it develops. We have been thinking of two or three matters, one of them the very question submitted by my hon. friend. We are hoping that another year we shall be in a position to ask with confidence for a good deal more money so that we can extend the service. Our service has now reached the limit of its capacity.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What work does this air force do? Does it merely discover fires, or has it some means of fighting them after they are located?

Mr. GRAHAM: In Alberta the service is one of fire detection.

Item agreed to

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post Office—mail service, $14,740,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Postmaster-General): This is for the outside service. It will be seen that in this estimate all told there is an apparent increase of $778,641.50. But from that amount there must be deducted $399,932. I will explain this. Last year an item of $485,000 was not included in the Post Office estimates as the Postmaster General understood that the Department of Trade and Commerce carried this service. However, it has been discovered this year that this is not the case, and the Postal department carried the service last year, paying that amount out of the railway vote, the cost of the railway transportation of mails being reduced approximately by that amount. This year the amount is included, but the railway item is not in. So that the real increase is not $778,000 odd but $408,000 practically.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What service is the minister speaking about? There is shown here an increase of some $308,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are discussing the ocean mail service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not here.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is called "steamboat service".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot find it.

Mr. GRAHAM: It appears on page 65, "mail service".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister say that the amount he has referred to was not in last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: The sum of $485,000 was dropped last year and we are including it in the estimates this year. It was dropped because the Postmaster General was under the impression that the service for which the money is needed was carried on by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But where is it to be found now? Looking at the mail service at page 65 I do not find any item of $485,000. Probably I am not reading the item properly.

Mr. GRAHAM: That amount is included in the item, and I was explaining the difference between the item as it appears this year and as it was in the estimates last year. This amount I have mentioned is only a part of the item. There is an increase in the item "mail service by steamboat" of $508,-847.50 this year, and of that increase $485,-000, as I have explained, is an amount that was not included in the estimates last year and for which we are asking this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was it in the estimates of 1922?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was in the estimates of 1921-22 but was dropped in 1922-23 and therefore there was a proportionate decrease last year.

Mr. CHURCH: This is one of the departments of the public service upon which I think the country can congratulate itself. This is the only opportunity afforded hon. members to offer some constructive suggestions in regard to the present postal service, especially the outside service, and I shall take occasion now to refer briefly to some matters which I consider important. In England, in the United States, and in Australia the governments have restored the pre-war postage with the result that there has been a large increase in business. I do not think that there is anything that retards the growth of a country and hinders its trade and commerce more than the imposition of high postal rates. The report of the Postmaster General of Canada discloses the fact that the Canadian people are being taxed through the postal service and that the surplus revenue over expenditure for 1920 was over $3,000,000. The postal rate in Canada was three cents prior to 1897 when deficits were being rolled up every year in the Post Office Department. Sir William Mulock then introduced the two-cent rate, and although the deficit was not converted into a surplus at once, nevertheless in 1902 a surplus was secured which has increased year by year, unbroken even by the war. I may remark, also, that in the United States the war tax on postage has been dropped and a great increase in the postal service of that country has resulted. The boards of trade and chambers of commerce encouraged the government, and while it was thought that the reduced rate would not be satisfactory there was a huge surplus last year; and I observe from the bulletin of the National City Bank, an important corporation, that this reduction has done more than anything else in the United States to restore confidence in business not only of the retail men but of the wholesalers and of the farming community as well. The same thing has been the experience of the Mother Country. A tax on the postal service of a country is a great discouragement to trade and commerce and the British Postmaster General has brought down an elaborate statement this year in which he reckons upon a surplus of over $46,000,000 for the current year, of which $37,500,000 will be devoted to a reduction of post office charges including postal rates overseas as well as domestic postage particularly. With that surplus they are not only giving the staff higher salaries but they are reducing the postal rates to other parts of the Empire.

In regard to postal receipts, I need not refer to the city which I have the honour to represent, for its pre-eminence in volume of postal and customs business is well known. Yet although the postal receipts reach the huge total of over $5,000,000 we cannot get a new post office. I would commend to the government the example of Sir William Mulock, who with his courage and foresight reduced postal rates and made the Post Office Department a paying institution, converting its recurring deficits into surpluses year after year. It must be remembered that this is a department of government in which the people are very closely interested for they are directly benefited by low rates of postage. It may be said that to reduce our postage rates to the pre-war basis will mean a loss of revenue, but, Mr. Chairman, I predict that as in the United States and England such a great volume of increased business will follow lower rates of postage that still greater surpluses will result.

To-day the Post Office Department is doing splendid work and its officials throughout the country have the confidence of everyone and by their devotion to duty notwithstanding the comparatively small salaries they receive they have given us a demonstration of the success of public ownership. I would urge the government to go further and, like the British Postmaster General, extend the scope of the operations of the post office. For example, in England the Postmaster General is utilizing some of the surplus on the installation of radio equipment, better rural mail delivery and the reduction of the rates on all kinds of postal matter including drop letters. Undoubtedly the time has come when we too should reduce the rate on such letters.

I have before me a statement of the postal receipts by cities for the past twenty years, and in view of the large receipts from the city of Toronto I would ask the hon. minister if something cannot be done now towards providing a new post office building which is so badly needed. True, we have a post office in the new union station, but a new central postal building is immediately necessary.

By a courageous and foresighted policy on the part of the Post Office Department, such as the reduction of postal rates to the pre-war basis, business will be encouraged and stimulated, better wages will be possible for the post office employees, and the Dominion generally will be benefited. Such a policy I am confident will command itself to the wisdom and judgment not only of the three parties in this House but of the country at large.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, taxes are unwelcome anywhere. In the realm of finance I would not care to trespass without having consultation with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and I am not sure that he would, without a good deal of consideration, consent to our dropping this form of taxation—because that is what it is, taxation on behalf of war expenditures. It is quite true, as my hon. friend says, that what was done some years ago led to an increase rather than to a decrease in the revenue of the Post Office Department, but whether a similar course should be adopted now is a matter for consideration.

I can assure my hon. friend that the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) has been talking very frankly on many occasions to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) to the end of securing further postal buildings in the city of Toronto. Not being Postmaster General, perhaps I can talk more freely on this subject. It does seem to me that a big centre like the city of Toronto in which such a large volume of postal and customs business is conducted should have facilities of the very best for the carrying on of such business. However, that is a matter for discussion. I can assure my hon. friend that I will report what he has said to the Minister of Public Works and the government for consideration.

My hon. friend referred to the salaries of, I imagine, our letter-carriers and so forth. In this connection he will be interested to learn that the Post Office Department has inaugurated a new system which will be of some benefit to the department itself and will give permanent employment to men who heretofore have had but temporary employment. For instance, taking the city of Toronto, during what I might term rush seasons, or when the permanent employees were absent, quite a number of men were employed to fill their places temporarily, their services of course being dispensed with when the regular employees returned to duty. Under the new system instead of having the employees take their holidays within a limited period they will now be extended over ten months of the year, so that temporary employees who are looking after the duties of those absent will have constant employment. That is one reason for the increase in the estimates this year.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to take this opportunity of saying a word in behalf of, in my opinion, the most underpaid branch of any service of the government, namely, our rural mail carriers. For perhaps four or five years there has been an agitation conducted on behalf of these men. Something has been accomplished for them, but very little. I well remember in 1919 a change was made, and at that time I interested myself to the best of my ability in their behalf, believing that they were absolutely entitled to consideration. At that time it is true that prices were rising, and as many of these men had entered into their contracts when the prices of oats, horseshoeing and other things incidental to their work were not so high, they found themselves in a very awkward position, being bound by contracts on which they were losing money and from which there was no escape for four years. They pressed for improved conditions, and I should like now to put upon Hansard a letter which I then wrote on their behalf and which, while not altogether appropriate at the moment, is so in the main. I still express the hope that the amendment I then urged upon the Postmaster General may still be introduced, together with another change in the system to which I shall refer later. My letter to the Postmaster General bears date the 11th September 1919 and is as follows:

Dear Sir,—Pursuant to our conversation I am writing you on behalf of a number of rural mail carriers who made complaint to me that they cannot make a living on the remuneration they receive, and in my opinion their contention is unanswerable.

Many of them receive from $500 to $700 a year, and for this they have to keep up either one or two horses, buggy, cutter and harness, or motor, and while not working all day are nevertheless on the road every day but Sunday, rain or shine. I have asked the Superintendent to authorize a reasonable increase but he tells me he cannot; and I understand nothing can be done except cancel the contracts and call for new tenders.

I would like to suggest that the act be amended giving the Postmaster General power to grant a reasonable increase in proper cases. The amendment might provide that no contract should be reconsidered which has not been in force for at least one year. It might further provide that no increase exceeding say $100 or $150 a year, at the outside, should be made without new tenders. In my opinion such an amendment would save the department a large sum of money each year so long as prices continue upward.

It may be argued that the carrier is treated fairly if the contract, which he finds onerous, is cancelled, but that is not so in many cases, for he has his equipment which involves an outlay of from $250 to $500,—

These figures are very moderate; perhaps they should have been a great deal higher.

—and rather than sacrifice it he plugs on dissatisfied and disgruntled, and pours out his woes to all on his route, and they join the shout, knowing beyond question that he has in many cases, just cause to complain.

When one stops to reflect what a street car conductor or city postman receives,—

I would like the minister to understand that I am not offering any criticism of what they do receive; I merely refer to their case for the purposes of comparison.

—or when a comparison is made with the salary or wages paid in almost any line of business, the rural mail carrier is found to be in a class by himself.

I mentioned that the amendment asked for would save the department a large annual outlay. This will be explained by reference to many cases with which the superintendent is familiar, where a reasonable increase of say $75 to $150 has been asked and refused for want of authority, and in the end the new contract price has involved an increase far exceeding the amount which the carrier asked, and the expense of advertising has to be added as well.

I am not directing attention to recent contracts but to those made 18 months or more ago.

I sincerely trust something may be done at this session.

Sincerely yours,
(Sgd.) W. A. Boys.

What I suggest to the minister, and what I press upon him for consideration, is an amendment to give the Postmaster General the power to make increases in the remuneration of rural mail carriers of from $100 to $150, putting upon it whatever limit the minister thinks proper. Let us just consider the question for a moment. We find there is a contract in existence. The carrier has satisfied those on the route. He has his equipment; he has been doing the work for four years; nobody wants a change. So far as I know, the department is willing to renew the contract if the carrier will continue at the same rate, but if he is able to show that he should have some increase, even only to the extent of $25, the minister now has no power to award the contract on that basis to the man who has been doing the work satisfactorily and who has the equipment for properly carrying it out. It must be readvertised at considerable cost, and I venture to say that in most cases the lowest of the new tenders received far exceeds the old rate plus the small increase that the carrier asked for. It may be objected that to give the minister that power would place upon him or upon his superintendent a responsibility that he should not undertake. If the suggestion involved $500 or $600 per contract, I could give way to that thought, but when it is limited to $100 or $150 it seems to me that that objection is not sufficient to stand in the way.

At the time that letter was written, as I have said, a change was made; the contract was cancelled at the request of a man who claimed he was losing money, and he was let out. That was the extent of the relief he got.

Now, time has not improved matters. The work of the carrier has been increased. He now has to handle registered letters; he has to sell stamps; he has to take care of the parcel post. His responsibility is greater. The public enjoy this service; I believe it is the best thing that was ever done for the farming community and even if an improved system did cost a little more the farmers are entitled to it and should have it. They appreciate it, but as they use it more constantly they naturally become a little more exacting and look for greater efficiency. The demands made upon every carrier are therefore greater, but the remuneration remains practically the same. Let us make a comparison or two. What is the system in vogue in the United States? There they adopt the uniform system of $75 a mile, and the position is a permanent one so long as the work is properly performed. Why should not some such system be adopted here? The only objection I have heard to it is that there is a variation in the routes; one route is harder than another, and for that reason such a basis of remuneration might not work out fairly. Well, it must work out fairly in the United States or they would not have adopted it there. It is true that upon some routes the roads are better than upon others, but as a rule where you have these better roads you have a more congested population and more work for the carrier to do. From there you go to the routes where the roads are not as good and where the carrier has less work to do, so that one condition would counterbalance the other. I suggest, therefore, the consideration of a rate per mile for this service. I am not saying what it should be; that is a matter for the department itself.

Again, comparing what the rural mail carrier gets, with what the city carrier gets I understand that the salary of the city carrier runs from $1,335 and upwards per year. They receive clothes; they get three weeks' holidays; they get ten legal holidays, and they get bonuses. The rural mail carrier works six days in the week, every week in the year, rain or shine. He has to provide himself, I venture to say, with two horses on every route that runs over 15 or 16 miles, and the average length of route, I am told, is 20 miles. I do not think any carrier can cover a route of 20 miles every day in the week except Sunday unless he has two horses; in the summer time, as a rule, he has a motor. He does not get a single holiday. He does not get the three weeks that the city carrier does, or the legal holidays, or the clothes, and no bonus or help of any kind. The average pay of the rural carrier in Ontario is $816 a year, or $2.60 per day; the average in the Dominion is $750, or $2.39 per day. So far as I know, the lowest wage of a labouring man, who is even provided with a shovel, is from $3 to $4 per day. But the mail carriers have to provide their own equipment and perform the service from day to day without holidays; and they cannot get people to relieve them. Surely they are entitled to consideration.

It may be said in reply that if any mail carrier wants to quit or if his contract expires and the position is advertised, you can find somebody who is ready to take his place. I ask: Is there a single office in the gift of the government—and I make no exceptions—in respect to which, upon its being vacated and the position advertised, the place of the occupant of that office could not be filled for less money than he is getting? But after all, is that the proper test? I admit that when these contracts are re-advertised, in some cases—by no means in all—you can find men who are ready and willing to perform the service for the same money, in some cases even for less. When they undertake it, they do not know what they are up against; they take a chance on it and as a result the public suffers. I think that in this service as in all other branches of the government departments we want to secure efficiency, if possible, and the reasons given, I think, answer the tender and contract suggestion. I urge, therefore, in all sincerity, that some change should be made.

Mr. CHURCH: Make it the union rate of wages.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend makes a suggestion about the union rate of wages. Well, we find that method creeping in everywhere. I am not making an appeal on that ground at all. I am making it on the ground of merit, and the gross underpay which, if continued must lead to inefficiency. Why should the work of these men and their responsibilities be increased from year to year and no extra renumeration be given? How can you get men to do the work properly and satisfactorily if they feel they are underpaid, if they feel that another man performing the same service a few miles away from them is getting more? A man may take a contract at forty or fifty dollars for four years supplying bondsmen. He may have taken it too cheap. Perhaps a month or so afterwards he finds a carrier about ten miles distant is getting sixty or seventy dollars. These are not dreams. I know carriers in my own riding where there is a great difference in the renumeration of the men, but no difference in the work they perform, no difference in the routes they travel. Now to satisfy these men I would suggest that they be put upon a par. If the country cannot stand what is being paid in the United States, $75 a mile, perhaps it should be made less. I do not know for certain what the carriers themselves are urging upon the government, but I have heard it placed at $70. It seems to me that that can be gone into, and when it is gone into a reasonable allowance can be made.

I see it is nearly six o'clock and I do not feel that anything can be gained by asking that the House should now rise, because I think I have said concisely all, at all events that I can think of. It does seem to me that the reasons I have advanced are reasons which should commend themselves to the sympathetic consideration of the department. I am glad to know that the matter is in the hands of the Acting Postmaster General, the Minister of Militia. I believe him to be a reasonable man, a man always open to persuasion so long as your arguments are good. How can anyone suggest for a moment that these men should go on doing this work for $2.50 or $2.60 a day when carriers in the city whose hours are no longer, I think, get practically double the pay and do not have a horse or motor to keep up, and in addition are provided with clothes and get the holidays I have referred to? How can you expect efficiency from rural carriers under such circumstances? They have to go out in the morning and break their own roads in the winter quite frequently, and they are criticized if they do not manage to get through, because the people who are expecting their mail are dissatisfied if the carrier does not arrive on time with the mail. I have no doubt the minister's office is full of letters of criticism when as a matter of fact the carrier could not get through on account of bad roads. Nevertheless some of those living upon the route are dissatisfied and make their complaints.

In conclusion, I would most earnestly urge these matters upon the attention of the department. I know they have been pressed by the carriers themselves, but like everything else I suppose it requires a little extra pressure to make the change. I think the time is now ripe for the consideration of a change which will give these men a rate of pay commensurate with the importance of the work they are doing and with the responsibilities they have to assume.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): How much of the amount voted last year under the heading "Mail service by railway, $7,899" was earned and paid to the Canadian National system and the Canadian Pacific Railway respectively?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry I have not that information for my hon. friend. I will give the House the general policy of the Post Office Department. As Acting Minister of Railways, I would like to carry all the mails on the Canadian National; as Acting Postmaster General I may say the policy is to use as far as possible the Canadian National lines, but the general policy is to use the most expeditious means of transportation, the getting of the mails to their destination promptly being the chief characteristic of this service.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Does the minister know of territory in Canada which is served by both systems where the service is practically the same and where the privately owned railway gets the mail contract?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not go so far as to say that, but where the Canadian Pacific steamer brings the mail across the ocean, it expedites the service of the Canadian Pacific steamer to give its own mail train that is waiting there on its own track the carrying of the mail, and this mail would be carried to all parts of Canada on the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the Canadian Pacific Railway the contract, or is there any contract between the railways and the Post Office Department for the carrying of the mail?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no contract. The Post Office Department pays the railways for the space used.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And they can select the trains for them?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo): Just before the recess I was pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member on my right (Mr. Boys) with regard to the position of the rural mail service carriers in the Dominion of Canada. I think the remarks which he made fit the situation absolutely. In my constituency I have had numerous complaints from rural mail carriers as to the payments they receive and with regard to other matters, especially dealing with the contract system. That system, as it is carried on is, to my mind, a very vicious one. It gives us a class of public servants that are very poorly paid. In fact it works out very much like this; that the cheap men, or the men who will work for a low wage, irrespective of their ability to do the work, are the men who get the contracts. We find that the average mileage which the rural mail carriers cover in the Dominion is about 19½ miles, for which service they receive in the neighbourhood of $42 per mile. I think no one here will argue that that is adequate pay for the work they do. They have great expense to bear. For instance, they have to provide a suitable rig for the purpose, they have to maintain that rig, and we all know that it is a very difficult and costly matter to maintain a rig which is on the road during the summer months and travelling on all kinds of roads. That amounts to a very considerable portion of their work. Then they have a horse to maintain. They have to get blacksmithing done, furnish their harness, and pay for the feed of the horse and it amounts to a very large sum, so that these men do not get a living wage. Making a comparison of the wages of the two classes, the position of the rural mail carriers is very much worse than the position of the city letter carriers. The average wage for the city letter carrier is $1,335 per year. I do not wish to be understood as saying that these men are getting too much; in fact, I think they are not, but when you compare the compensation, the comparison is not favourable to the rural mail carrier. I think the government should take this question into consideration. I am satisfied that the poorest paid body of men in the whole government employ are the rural mail carriers. I think the time has arrived when we should improve the postal service of the Dominion. I understand the postal department had quite a surplus last year—the only department in the government that showed a surplus—and I think it is up to the postal department to improve the postal facilities as soon as possible. We find there has been practically no money spent for a good many years, owing to the war and other causes on the post offices throughout the Dominion. In view of the fact that we have a surplus on hand at the present time, the government owes it to the public to take steps immediately to introduce a better system of post offices that will meet the needs of the people of Canada in this regard.

Is it the intention of the government to continue the bonus to the letter carriers during the coming year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance has an estimate now before the House for the continuation of the bonus as it was last year or approximately so. All classes that were covered in the former year will be covered this year.

As regards the wages of the mail carriers in the country, of course they are not paid wages. These are not men working by the day or the month; they are contractors; they are given the rate which they tender for themselves. I am not a great lover of the tender system in many ways. Of course I would probably stand almost alone if I were to get up in this House and state that we should do away with the tender system. I would not go that far because this system is a protection; but in some of our services at least, I know money is not made by adhering rigidly to the tender system. It, however, seems to ensure more than any other system the protection of the public. These men are contractors, and while some of them are pretty poorly paid, that is to a large extent their own fault, because they tender for these services and they sign a contract. Moreover, a contractor has to give a bond to ensure that he will do his work, and if he does not do his work properly, the bond is forfeited. The question is worthy of discussion; but we do not want to get mixed up in our minds mail carriers in the cities and towns with mail carriers in the country. In the cities mail carriers devote all their time to this work, and they are paid so much as civil servants. In the country many of them are not occupying all their time in this work; they do other work as well, and they are doing this work at a price fixed by themselves and not by the department at all.

I have a great deal of sympathy in regard to the small rate at which many of these men perform their work; but supposing we took the view of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys). At the present time, as the law stands, any contract, the amount of which is over $200, can be renewed at that figure; but if it be increased, new tenders must be asked. Supposing it were left to the minister to increase a tender, would not hon. gentlemen detect quite a line of patronage in that? Would not the minister, whoever was in power, be accused of exercising patronage? Bill Smith says: "I will do this work for $700." The minister's friend is carrying the mail, and the minister would have power, if we were to change the act, to give the contract to Tom Jones for $100 more. Thus the question is surrounded with difficulties. This would afford the minister an opportunity to exercise patronage for his friends, and perhaps the House, when it came to consider the matter, would not think it wise to give him that power. How else would you fix this? The hon. member for Simcoe says: "Pay so much a mile." The system in the United States is different from ours, because to begin with they are far advanced over us on the question of good roads, and a mile is a mile in a large portion of the United States because their roads are practically all good. Supposing we took nineteen or twenty miles of road that is clay, and we have a mileage rate of so much for the mail carrier. The man on the clay road will get the worst of the deal, when he has to traverse the route in the fall or spring. Then there are sections of Canada where horses are not used in the winter. In sections that are comparatively small automobiles are used. In the riding that I represent, the mail carriers for the most part use automobiles; the roads are good, and mileage in the greater portion of my riding would be on an equal basis. But where our roads are as they are in the Dominion, some good, some bad, the latter predominating, it would be most difficult to fix a mileage rate that would be applicable to all parts of Canada.

Personally I would like to see the mail carriers better paid; but will somebody tell me just how that can be worked out without giving the government of the day patronage that perhaps hon. gentlemen would not think they ought to have? Of course at the present time this would be perfectly safe; but there might come a time when it would not be as safe, and I want to protect the country for the future, even if it does not need protection for the present. Is there a better way of working this out than the system of asking for tenders? We might make some variation in the act; but any such variation allowing the minister more latitude than he has at present would, as I said before, place in his hands a weapon of patronage. The matter is worth considering; but working it out in detail to the satisfaction of parliament, much less the people, would not, I am afraid, be an easy task.

Mr. EVANS: Is anything proposed to be done regarding facilities in the city that I represent, namely, Saskatoon? Some years ago work was begun upon the construction of a new building, but that was abandoned. The building they are using at the present time has never been finished. Three years ago an order was given out for that to be completed, two more storeys to be added, and this would have given adequate room for the time. Nothing, however, has yet been done, and it is time that some better facilities were provided for that city. They are trying to find room in other offices throughout the city, while they might get the accommodation in our building if it were completed.

Mr. GRAHAM: We must not forget that these public buildings are all in the hands of the Public Works department. While the fault is not that of the Post Office Department, and I will not say it is that of the Public Works department, the Post Office Department is anxious to have all these buildings completed and in the best shape possible. Owing to financial conditions the Public Works department is frozen up, and we have not been able to get everything done that we would like to have done. The Post Office department, of course, will keep urging all these improvements, and finally, I think, we shall get some of them made. In my riding I have a corner lot in one of the most beautiful towns of the country, and this corner lot, which is owned by the government, is simply asking for a new building. There seems, however, to be no response from the Public Works department. As Acting Postmaster General I have been urging that department to acquiesce in my request, both as the acting minister and as the member, to put a long-expected building on that corner. But, to be frank, I must say I have so far failed.

Mr. BOYS: I listened with considerable interest to the answer of the minister to the suggestions that have been made and I noted his reference to patronage. I hope he will not object to the proffered confidence which I was willing to repose in him and his department in this connection. I do not think it would be misplaced; at least, I trust not. Now, I do not think his argument will bear investigation, although to a very slight extent perhaps he is right. I would ask him to bear in mind that in the first instance the contract is let by tender, so that the situation we would have to deal with would arise when the contract expired at the end of the four-year period. The minister or his superintendent would then be confronted with a request on behalf of the particular carrier for an increase, and I have suggested that the increase should be limited. I would say that it should not exceed at the outset $150, or perhaps $100. But with that very slight increase a carrier could be satisfied. It would not be patronage, because he got his contract in the first instance by competition in which he was the successful tenderer. For my part I would be perfectly willing to trust either the acting minister or any minister or superintendent to do what is fair to the extent I mention, and that would obviate the necessity of advertising. The carrier would have to show reasons why there should be an increase and I am satisfied that the country would save money if that course were followed. The only argument advanced by the minister against an even rate per mile for the service as between the United States and Canada is that in the United States the roads are more uniform and are better than in Canada. I do not agree with him there. Perhaps he has seen more of the roads in the United States than I have, but I may observe that I have travelled over a number of them. I am ready to admit that the state roads in many of the states are superior to any rural roads we have, but these routes do not go over the state roads only, they form a very limited part of the mileage of the United States; and on the side roads I want to tell the minister that from the limited experience I have had in travelling in the United States, the side roads there are worse than they are in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: I keep off the side roads when I am across the line.

Mr. BOYS: That may be, but unfortunately we have a lot of farmers living on the side roads in Canada and it is on their behalf that I appeal, because they must be served. I had the pleasure of spending a little time in Florida last January and travelled over a good many roads there, and I can say that the roads in my hon. friend's county and in my own are vastly superior to the roads I travelled in that state. There are many roads in other states, too, in which I have been that certainly are not superior to the country roads in Canada, at least so far as I know. Of course, as I say, I am excluding the state roads, which are of cement and are therefore first class. Now, the answer the minister makes in this connection is the only one he offers, and I do not think it will hold water. The minister makes the old suggestion that this work should be done by tender, but that should not be the final test. Suppose a mail carrier in the city should be unable to continue. If you are to adopt that policy, why not advertise for someone to take his place? You would be flooded with applications from men who would do the work fairly well for a great deal less than the man is getting now. The figure quoted is $1,335 with clothes and the holidays referred to, and it would be the simplest matter to find a number of people to do this work, I venture to say for two-thirds of this amount. But that is not the only consideration. Efficiency must enter into the question; and if you want efficiency in the rural service you must offer the men more money. As I said before, the farming community are entitled to this service; and indeed they are delighted with it; it is the best thing that has been done. I want to urge the minister therefore to keep up the standard of the service. Do not let it be depreciated by some of the methods that have been followed. We know what those methods are. Now, I am not criticizing the minister at all in saying this, because the idea is to get things done as reasonably as possible. At the same time, I do not approve of the methods. Tenders are called for; they are received and are considered too high. An inspector then goes to the locality and he not only goes to those who have tendered and does his best to bring them down, but having the benefit of the information the tenders disclose, he scours the country to find someone who will do the work for less. Finally he gets some man who really does not realize what is before him, and perhaps in a moment when he is pressed for work he undertakes the service. The carrier who has been doing it before and doing it properly, being fully equipped, and whose son perhaps has been helping him, finds all his equipment left on his hands. If you get down to an even basis per mile you will overcome that trouble, because a man will get the work at a fair price and he understands that he can retain the job if he does his work properly, but not otherwise. Surely under these conditions you would get better results. If what I say about the American roads is right, that answers the argument advanced by the minister; and they must find that system satisfactory in the United States or they would not continue it there. If therefore it is satisfactory in the United States I do not see why it should not be satisfactory in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have a deficit of $60,000,000 there.

Mr. BOYS: Well, the United States is a large country. I was going to ask the minister another question but I will not do so now because I do not want to detain an hon. gentleman who I see desires to speak. I will put the question, and perhaps in the meantime the information could be looked up. I wanted to find out what proportion of the item under consideration is required for rural mail service. The item as it appears in the estimate is "for mail service by ordinary land conveyance, including rural mail delivery." I should like if possible to have these items separated and to ascertain, for the last three or four years at all events, what the rural mail service has cost the country, to what extent the cost is increasing, and whether it is increasing because of higher contract prices or because of the establishment of more routes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I asked the minister a little while ago about the contracts given to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National and he said he had not the information. Can he give that information now?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in a position to give that information at the moment. It would require research into all the mail carrying accounts of the department. The accounts for the last three months are not in yet.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): With regard to the other question, the minister said that the Canadian Pacific Railway had some of the mail contracts—I refer to the steamship lines—and that they gave the mail to their own railway in Canada. Why is that necessary? I do not think a private company owning the Canadian National railways and having mail to carry all over the country would hand the business over to a competing concern, and I do not see why the country should do it.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a very large question. I might say that the Canadian Pacific Railway is perhaps the biggest taxpayer in Canada, and it is possible to my mind that we could make it embarrassing for the Canadian Pacific if we started out on certain lines. These two great roads are necessary for the building up of the country. Speaking frankly, we want to treat our Canadian National Railways as a business concern which will get business on its merits from the public of Canada. My hon. friend asks me a question. The Canadian Pacific Railway has its own ships, docks and sidings to its own docks. Its trains back up to its own docks and take cargo from its own ships. That is natural. To transfer that cargo to the Canadian National Railways somewhere else would take time, and if that were done in the case of mails my hon. friend would not perhaps get his mail until forty-eight hours after the time he gets it now, or twenty-four hours to put it at the lowest. While, as Acting Minister of Railways, I should like to get everything for the Canadian National Railways, at the same time we have to deal with the question of mails from the point of view of the interest of all the people of Canada, and with a view to expediting business as well as of endeavouring to get freight for the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. STANSELL: I should like to add a word to what has been said on behalf of our rural mail carriers. It is not sufficient to say that this is an old question that crops up every year, or that we have a system of contract which must be the best simply because we have it. The fact that these complaints recur periodically show that the system is not what it should be. And undoubtedly these complaints will continue until the system is put on a better and fairer basis than obtains at the present time.

I represent a rural district and am familiar with the conditions under which these mail carriers work. I have taken considerable pains to go over their rounds with them and to estimate approximately what they are getting for the work performed. In two or three cases a few years ago, with the help of the department here, some of these men were released from their contracts under which they were unable to make a living, and allowed to tender again on a somewhat improved basis. But since the conclusion of the war this practice has not been continued.

I entirely agree with what has been said by the two hon. members who have so ably dealt with this subject, but I want to add my view of why the contract system does not work out satisfactorily as applied to the carrying of our rural mail. This is another case where theory is very beautiful but fails to work out in practice. The reason is that ordinarily any government work done under the contract system appeals to a class of business men who know exactly the conditions under which they are tendering. But our rural mail service is a comparatively new service and appeals only to a very limited class of people in the country districts owing to the low rate of wages allowed under the contract, and these men, because of lack of education and business training, have no adequate idea of what is involved when they sign the contract. In addition to that, just as has been already stated, departmental officials who are paid a living wage spend their time in many cases drumming up people in the country districts to tender at an extremely low rate in order to save the department the difference between this and a fair rate, although the wages of these officials is costing the country enough to pay the mail carriers a living wage. So it is really not economy to induce men to sign such contracts.

Another unsatisfactory feature is that under this system men are engaged to deliver our rural mails at the lowest possible remuneration without any regard whatever to their ability to discharge the duties required of them. I am not sure that I would entirely condemn the system of handling our rural mails providing the tenderers were required to pass an examination to prove that they possessed the necessary education to enable them distribute the mail. Under the present system we find rural mail carriers who are scarcely able to read, with the result that mistakes are constantly made by them, important mail is delivered to the wrong address, and in some cases serious financial loss occurs. Certainly we should have efficiency. To my mind it is folly to talk of investigating conditions of unemployment and underpaid workmen while the Dominion government in its system of rural mail contracts conducts one of the worst sweatshops in the country. If these carriers had to show certain qualifications, those qualifications in themselves would enable them to determine a fair rate of remuneration under their contract.

If the contract system is so good, why do we not apply it throughout every department of government. I think if we had our cabinet ministers and all others engaged in the government service paid under contract the evils of the system would be impressed on the people in a very decided manner.

Then again if a rural mail carrier has rendered good service under his contract it should be renewed as it expires and so encourage him to continue to render the most satisfactory service possible. I think it has been stated by at least two hon. members that under the present system a man can retain his contract at the same rate of pay. I do not know what the arrangement is, but I can point out what has actually happened, which is much more important. On one particular route of about twenty-two miles the contract recently expired. On the last occasion of its renewal, when prices of everything were rather high, the contractor secured the contract at $1,100, which is at the rate of $50 per mile, or $25 a mile less than the American government pay its rural mail carriers. This man is one of the most efficient carriers in the service. He has a wife and family to support and devoted his whole time to his route. His work was eminently satisfactory, being almost entirely free from mistakes. One would think that such an efficient public servant would be retained in the service. When the time came for renewal of his contract he was so fair-minded that he allowed for some reduction of living expenses and actually offered to continue the contract at a reduction of $100, although he had to keep two horses and the necessary equipment to carry out his work; but for some reason or other the contract was advertised and was awarded to another man who may not possess the excellent qualifications of his predecessor. The new man secured the job at $800. This instance I think clearly indicates that the practice referred to of allowing the tenderer to continue his contract does not always obtain; and I may say that I know of other cases of a similar nature. Why could not an arrangement be made to continue satisfactory men in the service instead of going to the expense of advertising for fresh tenders. I have no doubt that the man who has contracted to deliver the mail at $800 will be a dissatisfied servant and similar cases are what give rise to the continual complaints which we receive with respect to the rural mail service. Surely the government can devise a system under which efficient service can be secured by paying at least a living wage.

This is what it means, that on the average, each rural mail carrier has a twenty-mile route which he has to cover six days in the week, and to do this work it is absolutely necessary for him to keep two horses and the necessary equipment. On the most conservative estimate this cannot be done for less than $300 a year. Assuming the average carrier gets $750 under his contract, this leaves him only $450 to support his wife and family—$450 for working six days in the week throughout the entire year. Can anyone say that this is a credit to the country? And it is only possible to get men to enter into such contracts because they are not sufficiently conversant with business principles to know what rate they should tender at in order to ensure to themselves a fair wage. They only find out their mistake by bitter experience. I am convinced that if tenderers were required to pass an examination to test their efficiency the undesirable element would be eliminated and those who passed would be able to command a living wage. If you provide in some way that the man who proves his efficiency is not in danger of losing his job for the sake of a paltry $25 by being underbid by a man who may not be able to show that same efficiency, then you have done away with a good deal of the cause for complaint. As to the flat rate per mile, I am fairly well acquainted with most of our Ontario roads, and after careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that a flat rate would be very fair to all concerned. In almost all cases the better roads have the heavier class of service; there are as many complaints from the mail carriers with regard to obstruction of traffic on the really good roads as there are respecting the back concessions where the roads are not so good. So that the one balances the other, and the adoption of a flat rate for this service would not be a very serious injustice to anyone. It would, I believe, be entirely satisfactory to the men themselves.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would you give that flat rate without any tender?

Mr. STANSELL: Well, I am not suggesting that; I am pointing out what is wrong. I say we should either retain the contract system and provide for some examination, or adopt some plan whereby a man who proves himself efficient will not lose his job if he is getting a reasonable rate of pay, say, not less than $50 or $60 a mile. If his contract is not for more than that, surely he is entitled, in view of his good service, to keep his job. The people cannot be contented in the rural districts when they learn that other men working for the same government in the cities are treated differently, in that they receive a bonus—the continuance of which appears to be necessary—are given the benefit of pension provisions, are supplied with clothes, etc. On the other hand, the poor fellow in the country is working at starvation wages and has to provide everything, including the upkeep of two horses, and has left for himself not more than $450. That a man should have to work under those conditions and attempt to support a family should surely appeal to right thinking persons as an injustice that is no credit to this country or to the government, and that ought to be remedied without delay. The present government, I believe, is especially sympathetic to the workingman—or at least, they were prior to the last election. Possibly owing to the pressure of business their plans in this respect have been mislaid. But I do hope they can now be utilized on behalf of the rural mail-carriers of Canada.

Mr. McBRIDE: As one who represents the largest rural constituency in Canada, I would say that I have no sympathy with any person who will tender for a job and then, after he has got the work, start in to whine and ask for a raise in salary. I believe in the contract system. It is the only fair system, it is the only way the taxpayers of Canada will get a square deal. If you put it in the hands of the Postmaster General to the extent of $150, it will simply mean this: A person may tender for a small contract at $150 less than he really wants to get; then he can go to the member representing that section of the country and pester him until he gets the Postmaster General to make that increase of $150. A good deal has been said about starvation wages and cutting the rates to the rural mail carriers. I can call to mind one instance out in my district. During the war a man had a contract for carrying the mail at $1,850. He said he could not make it pay at that rate, and he tried to hold the government up for $2,500. The government called for tenders—that was in 1915—and one man tendered at $1,175. He got the job; he is still carrying on the work and is perfectly satisfied. If tenders had not been called on that occasion the taxpayers of Canada would have been held up for $2,500. It is urged that some of these contracts are very small. Well, I know of one instance where a man had a contract to carry the mail twice a week a distance of six miles, at the rate of $3 a week. That did not look very much, but what did it mean? A little girl of his got on a cayuse in the morning before going to school and went down and brought the mail up. It was simply pocket money for her. If anybody else had tried to get that contract from him, why, there would have been a regular row over it. On the other hand, if it were left to somebody to put a value on the delivery of that mail and somebody came in from outside to deliver it, the cost would probably be $25 a week, and even at that the amount would not be considered too much. As for keeping up a plant to carry this mail, in the rural districts they do not maintain very much of a plant. It is generally carried with a surrey in the summer and an old sleigh in the winter; it is the ordinary plant that they had before they took the contract. I believe in calling for tenders, and I believe that if those who tender have not brains enough to put in a proper price for a job then they should go under and let their bondsmen go good for the default. That is the only way the taxpayers of this country will ever get a square deal.

Mr. WOODS: I am of the opinion that no real injustice is done to the rural mail carriers through the contract system. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. McBride) that if a man wants to make a contract at a low price there should be nothing to prevent him from doing so. On the other hand, a great many of the rural mail carriers are none too well paid—many of them are underpaid—but they are rendering good service. I do not agree with the suggestion presented by one hon. gentleman in regard to holding an examination for the position of rural mail carrier. The position is not one that requires any very high standard of education. It does not require many of the qualifications that other occupations require; nor does it require the upkeep of pure-bred horses. But it does require men of sterling qualities who are not afraid to face storms and bad roads and all that kind of thing. I do not know that there is anything seriously wrong with the contract system, unless, as I have heard it stated, it is that when a man puts in a tender at a figure which is sufficiently low, some of the authorities persistently endeavour to get someone else to take the contract at an even lower price. I do not think that is proper. If a tender is honestly made and the price is not exhorbitant, the contract should be given to the lowest tenderer provided he is able to furnish the necessary securities. But there is another phase of the question that is of great importance; that is, the legal holidays. I think these men should get the legal holidays. As one who is served by the rural mail carriers I think I am safe in saying that the farmers and the rural population generally will not suffer if these men have a holiday now and then. To give them that concession would ease their minds and make them feel that they were getting what other men are getting elsewhere in similar positions. It is hardly fair to ask them to go over all kinds of roads in all kinds of weather every day in the year except Sunday. The government should take that matter into serious consideration. In fact, I have been taking the matter up with the department with a view to bringing about that change. I wrote to the previous Postmaster General on more than one occasion, but the Post Office Department take the ground that a contract is a contract. Truly a contract is a contract, yet I believe these men should be granted the legal holidays or the major portion of them at least, so that they could have a little rest from their daily routine of driving over these hard roads, as many are, in all kinds of weather. I think that would help the situation and make it easier to secure contractors for this work, for the lack of holidays has been a very serious complaint among all the rural mail carriers with whom I have come in contact.

Mr. GARDINER: Which of the railway companies has the contract for carrying the mail from Saskatoon to Edmonton?

Mr. GRAHAM: No railway company has a contract. They are paid according to the space the mail occupies, and whichever line is the most expeditious and most convenient gets the mail. I can imagine circumstances under which one line would have it at one time, and another line at another. They are paid for the work they do, and are not under contract.

Mr. MILLAR: Can the minister give the committee any information as to the prospects of extending rural mail delivery to the prairie provinces? During the last year I have had several petitions from those who would like to have a rural mail delivery, but up to the present this has been denied. I was thinking as I listened to the discussion and the great anxiety that some have about the small pay the mail carriers are getting, that those of us who come from the prairie provinces or a large part of it, at all events, have not yet reached the stage where we have any mail carriers to worry about. Our anxiety is to get some mail carriers, so that when another session comes round we may be in the position of those here to-day who have been worrying about finding some means to protect these mail carriers from themselves. I have found that some of the carriers that have been spoken of who cannot write their own names know how to charge just as well as those who can write. Their lack of penmanship does not seem an impediment in knowing how to charge. I know the minister is only acting minister of this department and may not have the information that the Postmaster General would have, but he might possibly be able to give us some idea as to when rural mail delivery will be extended to the prairie provinces.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a question that has been engaging the attention of the department. While I am not in a position to make any statement I can say that the department has been seriously considering what ways and means it could use to extend the service. The amount that is being asked for here is for services already under contract. The service in some cases may have been extended a mile or half a mile or something of that kind, but this vote is not for opening up any new territory. The condition in the prairie provinces cannot however, exist very long, and I can readily understand, although it would probably mean quite a deficit, that possibly a portion of the discontent of which we have heard might be allayed if the people of the West 9 p.m. had a rural mail delivery to bring them closer together, and give them closer connection with the outside and with the centres. I am not in a position to make any promises. The department has been giving this matter consideration, and I think the members from the prairie provinces can live not as those without hope. It would mean a very large expenditure of money, but I am inclined to think that before very long the situation will have to be faced, because there is always this to be remembered: railways, roads, and rural mail delivery not only accommodate the people of a community, but they make that community so pleasant to live in that other people outside are attracted to it.

Mr. FORKE: I think I might interject a few words right here. I have had several applications for the establishment of rural mail routes, and the reply I got from the department in some cases was that tenders would be asked for and if the amount was sufficiently low the route would be established. I do not know what we are going to do if we are now going to raise the price of carrying the mail along the different routes. I have listened with close attention to the remarks made by hon. members who have spoken in favour of larger pay being given to the mail carriers, and with all due respect to those speakers I must say that I have so far seen no solution of the problem. If you are not going to have the tender and contract system appointments will have to be made, and who is going to make those appointments? Will it be the minister or someone else? Then the charge of favoritism will creep in. Really, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see any solution except to tell these people to be careful and contract for a price at which they can afford to carry the mail

Mr. LUCAS: The minister told us a moment ago that there was no contract given to the railways for carrying the mail. And we to believe that the railways simply go out and grab the mail whenever they can and are paid according to space? Surely there must be some arrangement made with the railways for carrying the mail, and I should like to know what those arrangements are, and particularly the arrangement for carrying the mail from Saskatoon to Edmonton in which territory there are competing railways running.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend should not have got that wrong idea. The Post Office Department is responsible for the mails being transferred from the boat to the train, and the Post Office employees handle all the mails and put them on the train. The railways do not go out and grab the mail at all. They take what is given them, and carry it at so much per car, so much for a part car, so much per square foot, and so on.

Mr. GARDINER: Could the minister be more specific as to the cost of carrying the mail between Saskatoon and Edmonton? We in western Canada are very interested to know just what that space is costing the Post Office Department.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have a postal car and a baggage car service and the rates effective June 1, 1922, were as follows:

Postal car				Baggage car
Full	Apartment	Under 30 ft.	Side Passage	Full 60 ft.	Part 30 ft.	15 ft.	7 ft .	3 ft.
35s.	20c.	7/10c. per linear foot	20c. for 270 sq. feet	36c.	20c.	13c.	6.5c.	4c.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps the minister could tell us which railway company carried most of the mail from Saskatoon to Edmonton during the last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in a position to give that information because I have not got it. I would have to look over the various accounts of the railways during the different years in order to locate how much was given to each railway.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give us any information as to how much the Canadian National received from the Post Office last year, how much the Canadian Pacific received and the amount received by any other railroad that may have carried the mails in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not that information. The last three months of the year are not made up yet, and the accounts are not in. I could get the information by putting the accountants at work.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister give us the information he has?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have given my hon. friend all the information I have.

Mr. GARDINER: And that is not very much.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not along that line.

Mr. GARDINER: I think this a very important question, and I would like to have the information given to the House because I am well satisfied that the people of Canada want to know just exactly what is being done along these lines, and if the minister can obtain that information before this item is carried, I am satisfied the House will be very much obliged to him.

Mr. WARNER: Going back to the rural routes, I desire to say a few words. In quite a number of localities in my constituency the people want rural routes established. I have tried to obtain some information. I was very glad to hear the minister say to-night that it was likely that we would not have to wait very much longer for the establishment of these routes. It is very unsatisfactory to those people living in well settled communities to see the mail deliveries in the towns and other communities, when they cannot have the same privilege. When I go to the department I am always told that they are not establishing any new routes in any district. I have taken that as an answer, and have always advised the community interested that no more routes were being established at the present time. Previously we had the compensation voluntarily increased to people who had contracted to carry the mail for a certain price. I think it would look more reasonable if someone else were allowed to take this money, intead of raising the salaries of those who are already carrying the mail. It would look better if the department would allow more routes to be established at rates at which people are willing to carry the mail, rather than to raise the wages of those who have contracted to carry the mail at a certain price. I would not be in favour of raising the remuneration above the amount for which these people are willing to carry the mail, but I am anxious to see more routes established in localities where there is no service now. The cities have the delivery now, and it is not so much trouble for any one living in the city to go to the post office and get his mail, as the families living in the country have to do. I think it would be well for the department to consider the establishment of new mail routes in places where there are sufficient settlers to justify such an expenditure. However, I believe that we must all be tolerant. I believe that we are using too much money in the service not in the Post Office Department alone so much as on all lines of Government service in every way throughout the whole country, and that we are spending more than we are justified in spending or can afford. However, when others are receiving these services it seems hard on communities who are not able to get them, and, therefore, there is considerable dissatisfaction. As the minister has said, country life would be more tolerable, and I believe it is worth while in Canada to undertake to make the farmers feel that they are getting consideration and service for the part of the taxes they are paying. I think the government is justified in giving all the service to the people however, that we can pay for. It struck me that it would not look well in the eyes of the people in these communities I have been referring to if the wages of the mail carriers were raised above the figure for which the carriers were willing to carry the mail.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Speaking of the rural mail service, I am not particularly objecting to the contract system. I practically agree in the presentation that my hon. friend and neighbour from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) made to the House this afternoon and to-night. At the same time the chief objection I make to this contract system has reference to what is often done in connection with it by officials of the department. This feature was illustrated by my hon. friend and I know what he said to be the fact because the practice complained of has been resorted to more than once in my own immediate neighbourhood. I take strong exception to that kind of thing being done by government officials. I refer to the practice of a government official going out after the contract has been sent in, and beating down this one and that one, in order to get the wages to the level at which the contract is finally awarded.

I would like to see the rural mail carriers given the statutory holidays, at least. They should have those holidays, especially Christmas, to themselves. I am willing to do without my Christmas mail, in order that the men who have been carrying my mail to my door for 313 days each year may have a holiday, and I think the people in the rural districts generally would also be willing to dispense with the Christmas mail. I suggest that that matter be taken into account when tenders are being asked for by the department, either for the renewing of old contracts or for making new contracts.

I am not going to argue to-night in regard to the question of raising the price paid to the rural carrier, but I would like to see a little more equality than we have at the present time in the delivery of mail, whether letters or other articles, in rural and city districts. Some time ago an answer was given to a question asked by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott) in regard to the salaries paid to the rural carriers and those paid to the city letter carriers. There is a great difference between those salaries, and I took the trouble to figure it out on a per hour basis, because of the answer that was given. The answer was that in the one case it was for service which varies as to time occupied daily, semi-weekly, etc., and in the other case it was for full time service. I recognize that there is a consideration there. On the other hand, we ought to consider that, while the rural carrier perhaps does not give all day to the service, his day is broken into, and the balance of the day does not amount a great deal to him in the matter of earning. Take our own case; the train comes in some time about ten o'clock and the mail carrier starts out. His forenoon is broken up. He cannot go out and do a half day's work He gets back at five o'clock in the afternoon and his afternoon is gone. It is not fair to put it on that basis. If we figure this out on the per hour basis, we find that what they get per hour is about 35 cents. The city mail carrier gets about 60 cents per hour, and I understand he gets, at least, two uniforms a year. A man who is carrying mail in the rural districts, if you figure out the amount he gets on the same basis, receives a reward, or a salary, or a wage, if you like to call it that, of 38 cents per hour, while he is actually in the service of the government or in our employ. For that 38 cents per hour he also furnishes a horse and rig which are absolutely necessary. Some system should be evolved whereby that inequality could be overcome.

I do not know just why the one should be on the contract system and the other in the Civil Service with the contract system eliminated. The latter is a permanent official, and his salary is, I understand, based on the cost of living. In the other case, the salary is fixed on the basis of what some other fellow who, perhaps, does not know what he is undertaking, says that he is willing to perform the service for. I know very well that a bond has to be signed or bondsmen procured that the contract will be fulfilled. It is not fair to put the rural mail carriers on that basis. We talk about the merit system in our Civil Service, and this eliminates the merit system. Let me put the question in this way. A man who has filled a four-year contract satisfactorily has an opportunity of renewing that contract, if he so wishes, at the same price. I think that is generally the rule, although an hon. member to my right seems to find that this rule is not always carried out. At the same time, however, there is no recognition of the faithful service that the man has given. These are some of the disadvantages which we have at present under this system. I am not too sure whether I am prepared to subscribe to the mileage basis or not. There are some very good features in it; but there are other features which I do not think would be in the interest of economy in the service. There is one feature to which I strongly object, namely, that of government officials going out, after tenders are sent in, and beating down, as it were, persons who are offering to do the service. I hope that practice will be discontinued.

There is one little matter that I resent. In talking over this situation with some of those who are interested, I might go so far as to say, with some who are officials of the Post Office Department, I was told that the trouble is that in rural districts too much service is given. As one of those living in rural districts, I thoroughly resent that statement. We get a mail service once a day in our district, and that is quite sufficient for us. The mail service in Ottawa, is, I believe, twice a day, and I am not prepared to accept the statement that we are getting too much service at the present time, particularly when such a statement comes from the department itself.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I have for some years watched the rural mail carriers on the one hand and the city mail carriers on the other, and I have wondered if some fairer adjustment could not be made regarding the remuneration of these two classes of public servants. I happen to live in the country on a back road where we have had to shovel the mail carrier out time and again. People living along that route will expect that man to deliver the mail, and they will raise a row because he does not deliver it on days when it is impossible for the people themselves to get along the road. That condition is common in the winter season in that section of the country. When I come to Ottawa, what do I find? I find a man receiving $500 a year more for delivering mail on city streets where he does not do as much work in a day as the rural mail carrier does. The trouble seems to be that in the one case the government can fix the price, but in the other, it must be let by contract.

I happened to have some difficulty last session and I have also had it this session in connection with rural mail carriers in my constituency. The report which I get from these men does not correspond exactly with the statement of the minister to-night. They tell me—and I am almost forced to believe there is a great deal of truth in what they state—that even where a man who has been doing his work satisfactorily, puts in his tender, the department are not satisfied, but they send out men to beat the price down to a lower figure by almost any means possible. Why cannot the department cut somewhere else and give the rural mail carrier a fair show in the way of remuneration for his services in comparison with what men in the Post Office Department are getting? Why should he be discriminated against, when men in other branches of the Post Office Department are getting something more nearly approximating what they ought to receive? I do not say that any of these gentlemen are getting any more than they ought to get; but the mail carrier in the rural sections is certainly not getting what he ought to get. In these estimates I see a whole column of increases. I do not understand what these increases mean. Why should the salaries of these Post Office officials be increased? Why cannot some of the money be given to the men who carry the mail in rural Ontario, the western prairies, and, perhaps, in the eastern provinces, and let these Post Office officials do with a little less pay, because even if the salaries of the latter are cut down, men can be got who will do the work efficiently?

We were speaking about immigration in this House for several days. We expect a rural mail carrier to carry mail for one-half—or a little less, I think it is by the report this afternoon—of what men are getting across the line for carrying the mail there Does the government expect to keep men in the rural sections and prevent them from going to the cities and towns, when men in the urban centres are receiving $500 a year more than they do in the country? These are some of the things I cannot understand, and I feel sure, if the department get busy, they can give these rural mail carriers a little more money to which they are entitled and also the advantages that were asked for by other hon. gentlemen this afternoon. I meet these men every day; I have to go home and report to them, and I cannot sit quiet in this House while this debate is going an without expressing my opinion on the matter. These men ought to get fairer treatment from the department than they are getting.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Undoubtedly the rural mail carriers should receive more than they do. We all know the work these men are doing for a small salary. However, it does not seem to me that we should cut down the salaries of any of the mail carriers, whether of the city or the country; rather there should be a decided increase in the salaries of all this class of government employees. I wish we could have some assurance from the government tonight that some step could be taken to see that salaries generally would be revised. If I am rightly informed, the Prime Minister gave assurances to the postal employees last year that this would be done. Apparently no action has been taken and so far there has been no intimation that action will be taken. I should like to quote a paragraph from a memorandum sent to me recently by the Winnipeg Local Council of the Canadian Federation of Postal Employees, which comprises railway mail clerks, postal clerks, letter carriers, transfer agents and postal porters. After referring to what they claim was the promise of the Prime Minister, that there would be a general revision of salaries, they plead for the following standard:

Minimum and maximum salaries as requested from the government:

Railway Mail Clerks	$1,200 to $1,920
Letter Carriers	1,260 to 1,760
Postal Clerks	1,200 to 1,800
Transfer Agents	1,260 to 1,740

By comparison of the above with the figures as issued by the government in the Labour Gazette, it will be plainly seen that a revision of salaries is very necessary if this large body of public servants are to receive a living wage.

It has often been said that the government should be the model employer, but the remuneration granted to postal employees, has never been adequate to maintain the standard of living which is necessary to good citizenship.

A few months ago we had here in Ottawa a convention of all the postmasters, at which the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) paid a most eloquent tribute to the work of the postal carriers. I took from the paper at the time an extract of what he said, and it seems to me that he was only doing justice to the men whose services we all require and appreciate. May I read a paragraph:

Of all those engaged in bringing the postal service into the lives and homes of the Canadian people none fills so large a place as that familiar figure—the letter carrier.

There is something stirring and wonderful about the relation of that faithful figure to the daily lives of millions of our people. He is a part of a vast business which can be tabulated in terms of annual turnover, and number of employees, and curves of profit and loss, like any other business, but which is, nevertheless, the strangest, most human and most romantic business in which men were ever engaged.

Now, we all realize the great service performed by these men and yet I think we must confess that there is a very slight chance of definite promotion for a large number of them. Very early in life they reach the maximum of their earning capacity. In a great many other walks of life men can proceed to higher salaries and better positions in every way, but that is impossible for the great majority of the letter carriers. Now that there is a surplus reported in this department of the government service, I think it would be only reasonable for us to increase the salaries of the postal employees all along the line until they are comparable with the salaries paid in other lines of business. As I think I said a year ago, in my own city of Winnipeg last year there were people in the receipt of relief from the city of itself who were receiving more than the employees of the government who were carrying on a very important part of the public service. Again, may I ask that we have some sort of assurance that in the not distant future there shall be a general revision upward of the whole of the salaries of the postal employees?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend makes a statement but he qualifies it at the end. It was not the same at the end as it was at the the beginning.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly at the end I stated where I stood in the matter and what my hopes were.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had stated that in the near future there would be a revision of salaries, but in his remarks he slipped in the word "upward", which might materially alter the meaning of the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not suggest that the Prime Minister had promised a revision of salaries upwards. I was merely expressing the hope that in any revision that might take place these salaries would be increased.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it not altogether out of the realm of probability that there will come a time very shortly when the bonus system shall disappear. That being so, I suppose that the revision of salaries on a permanent basis will be made when that system is discontinued.

Mr. HANSON: This government has been in power now some fifteen or sixteen months. During that period we have had no direct declaration from the government with respect to the question of the repeal of the Civil Service Act, and I presume that they are waiting upon the report of the special committee which is now investigating the matter. But while they are waiting I make the statement deliberately that in so far as the Post Office Department is concerned they are violating the spirit of the Civil Service Act if not the letter on every occasion that presents itself. On more than one occasion during this session information has come to me of the creeping of the patronage system into the government service, especially in connection with the Post Office Department; and reports that reach me from different parts of the country are to the effect that the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) is the chief sinner among all the sinners in the government ranks in this direction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Too bad.

Mr. HANSON: When we were soliciting men to go to the front the people were told that there was nothing too good to do for these men. A few years ago parliament laid down the rule that, all other things being equal, returned men would have the preference in appointments to the public service, but this rule has not been lived up to, at least in connection with the Post Office Department. Only the other day I put a question to the Postmaster General with regard to a vacancy at St. Peters, Nova Scotia. I asked:

Has the Civil Service Commission been instructed to advertise for applicants for the position?

And the answer I received was:

The position has been advertised.

The next question I had in reference to this matter was:

If so, will preference be given to a returned soldier?

The answer was:

The vacancy will be filled in the best interests of the public service and consistent with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Which answer, of course, entirely ignored the question. Now, I have a case under my hand which I think is a very glaring one and which I desire to bring to the attention of the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Graham) because I believe that he personally is in sympathy with the policy that in filling any official positions in the public service preference shall be given to returned men. I would call his attention to the fact that about a year ago the office of postmaster at Clementsport in the province of Nova Scotia, which I understand is in the county of Annapolis, or at all events just on the border between Annapolis and Digby, became vacant. When the Civil Service Commission was requested to fill this position in accordance with the law, the acting Superintendent of Postal Service, Mr. W. E. McLellan, was communicated with and asked to report upon three applicants for the position, namely, Mr. Howard G. Potter, Mr. Rawding and Miss Anna E. Robertson. I have a statement from which I read:

In April 1922 the acting district superintendent reported that Mr. Rawding had been the former postmaster, and was dismissed on purely political grounds (which Mr. Rawding stated was without just cause and without any investigation). The superintendent strongly recommended that he be reinstated.

Presume that he was a friend of the present government. The district superintendent made no report on Mr. Potter at all, and I am instructed that he was communicated with by wire by the Civil Service Commission on the 27th April, 1922. On the 10th May following the superintendent reported to the commission that there seemed to be nothing against Mr. Potter's character or his fitness for the position, and being a returned soldier, under the circumstances the commission felt there was no alternative but to give him the appointment. The certificate for his appointment was issued on the 30th May, 1922, but it appears that the Post Office Department has failed to transfer the office to him—for what reason is unknown.

As I have stated, a certificate was issued by the Civil Service Commission appointing Mr. Potter postmaster at Clementsport, but the department has entirely failed to act on that certificate, although there is no good reason I venture to say why they should not have done so. There is, of course, a political reason, to which I have already adverted, that is, that the acting postmaster at that point was the former postmaster but was dismissed for political activity by, I presume, a former government.

Now, I addressed a question in regard to this to the Postmaster General on the 19th March, when I asked:

1. Did the postmaster at Clementsport, Nova Scotia, resign, as such, in or about the year 1922?

The answer is, yes.

2. If so, did the Civil Service Commission nominate Mr. Howard G. Potter as a fit and suitable person to fill the said position?

The answer is in the affirmative.

3. Was Mr. Potter notified of his appointment by the commission?

Here again the answer is, yes.

4. Is the government aware that Mr. Potter is a wounded returned soldier?

This question is also answered in the affirmative.

5. Why has Mr. Potter's nomination not been confirmed and why is he not postmaster of Clementsport, Nova Scotia, to-day?

The answer is:

(a) A temporary appointment was necessary on resignation of former postmaster, and an applicant with previous post office experience was placed in charge.

That is, a temporary appointment was made. Now I call the minister's attention to answer (b):

(b) Mr. Potter was not resident in Clementsport at the time the vacancy occurred.

That presumably is the meritorious reason given for the non-installation of Mr. Potter as postmaster at Clementsport. The answer to question 5 continues:

(c) Acting district superintendent, Halifax, reporting on various applicants, did not recommend Mr. Potter.

I call the minister's attention to the fact that when the acting district superintendent was asked by wire by the commission he said that there was nothing against Mr. Potter and there was no reason why he should not be appointed. Continuing the answer to question 5:

(d) Department's duty is to give public service, and while a difference of opinion exists service is being satisfactorily performed by the present temporary incumbent.

That is to say, a difference of opinion between the Civil Service Commission, acting on the second recommendation of the district superintendent, and some official, presumably in the department, who personally cannot know anything about the matter. The concluding paragraph of the answer is:

(e) When the position is definitely filled it will be filled strictly in accordance with the Civil Service Act.

Now, I call the attention of the minister to paragraph (b) of the answer to question 5, and make the statement on the authority of Mr. Potter that that is not a true answer. It says: "Mr. Potter was not resident in Clementsport at the time the vacancy occurred." Feeling that possibly the department was right and my previous information wrong, I wrote to Mr. Potter and on the 24th March he replied to me as follows:

Your letter of the 23rd to hand, and I thank you very kindly for taking this matter up.

I have always been a resident of this place except while overseas, and I have always voted and paid my taxes here and am a natural born British subject. I was living here at the time this post office was made vacant, also previous to that time and I can give you a certified certificate to that effect if you want one.

I should like to know who said I was not a resident here. It looks rather crooked to me.

Again thanking you very kindly, I remain.

Your humble servant,

HOWARD G. POTTER.

These are the salient features of this case. I say the Post Office Department is deliberately defying not only the letter but the spirit of the Civil Service Act in withholding the installation of Mr. Potter as the postmaster at Clementsport. I say further that it is violating both the spirit and the letter of the act in order to cater to a local partisan spirit and put into office the former postmaster who was dismissed for political activity by, I presume, a former government. That is to say, the law is being violated in order to perform an act of partisanship. I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that there is absolutely no reason in the world why this man Potter should not receive the position to which he has been appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Moreover, he is a wounded returned soldier. If he does not receive this appointment I intend to call the attention of the veterans to the case, and they will go right after the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON: I want to tell hon. members opposite that we cannot trifle with the returned soldiers. They are entitled to these positions if they are competent to fill them. ,

Mr. GRAHAM: In my riding our predecessors put in a very strong party man when a returned soldier was anxious for the position.

Mr. HANSON: Then I hope the veterans will go after it again. They did not do it very successfully at that time, but there will be opportunities later. I do not wish to approach this matter in too partisan a spirit, but I do suggest that the minister, as the acting head of the Post Office Department, is not doing justice in this case. But I know I have only to appeal to him and justice will be done. Therefore I confidently appeal to him to appoint this man to the position to which he is entitled in all honour and under the law of this country.

Mr. LOVETT: Perhaps I may be allowed to make a few corrections in the remarks of my hon. friend for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). It is true that the postmastership at Clementsport became vacant through the resignation of Mr. Ritchie. He resigned quite suddenly and notified the post office inspector by wire. Thereupon, in order that the service might not be interrupted, Mr. Rawding was appointed as acting postmaster. Mr. Howard Potter had been a resident of New Brunswick for some time, being employed I believe with Mr. Powers, a contractor. When my hon. friend says that Mr. Potter always voted in Clementsport he is not quite correct; in the last election he voted in New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON: He says he voted there; I did not.

Mr. LOVETT: He voted in New Brunswick.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps he voted twice.

Mr. LOVETT: The Post Office inspector, Mr. McLellan, recommended the appointment, and the Civil Service Commission approved the permanent appointment of Mr.

Rawding. This man, Mr. Potter, was brought home at the instigation of a few of his friends to oust Mr. Rawding from office. Mr. Potter had a satisfactory job at suitable pay, but he threw it to one side and came to Clementsport to dislodge Mr. Rawding. My information is that Mr. Potter was not a resident of the district at the time the vacancy occurred and consequently was not eligible for the position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From whom did the hon. gentleman get that information?

Mr. LOVETT: I do not know that it is necessary to say from whom I got the information. I said I had the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would not the man himself be the best judge of where he lived?

Mr. GRAHAM: He was an interested party.

Mr. HANSON: Does that disqualify him as a witness? Not in this country, I hope.

Mr. LOVETT: It would not necessarily disqualify him. But he was not a resident of the village.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where did he live?

Mr. LOVETT: He lived in New Brunswick and his family lived there. He voted there in the last election. As I say, the Post Office inspector voluntarily made the recommendation. The hon. member has alluded to the dismissal of Mr. Rawding in 1911. I may say that he was dismissed without just cause or reason, and without any investigation whatever, as many others were. My hon. friend is very much concerned now with the returned soldier; it was not so previous to the election of 1921. Under the former administration the returned soldier was promised many things that he did not get, and men who had never been overseas were placed in office. I could give instances in my own constituency.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend give one instance of the Civil Service Commission appointing a returned soldier and the late government not confirming the appointment?

Mr. LOVETT: I think I could give some instances, but I do not know that I could do it offhand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I defy the hon. gentleman to do it, and to bring a case this session.

Mr. LOVETT: I will endeavour to look one up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman just got through saying he knew of some.

Mr. LOVETT: I have some in mind. I do not wish to make any rash statements—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is the hon. gentleman's mind? If he has several "in mind", why does he not give them?

Mr. LOVETT: I do not like to make a statement unless I can back it up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has just made one.

Mr. LOVETT: I like to be sure of what I am doing. These things are known to almost everybody. I could point to specific cases—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the main thing.

Mr. LOVETT: That can be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now is the time to do it.

Mr. LOVETT: My right hon. friend need not worry about that. Mr. Rawling is now filling the office to the satisfaction of the people generally in that village.

Mr. HANSON: My hon. friend entirely ignores the gravamen of the charge, which is that the government are setting at defiance the laws of this country. The Civil Service Commission have given their certificate for the appointment of this man, and no good reason has been urged why the appointment should not be made. The hon. gentleman's information is based entirely upon hearsay. I produce the evidence of the man himself, who says his home has always been in Clementsport. I must take the first-hand evidence rather than the hearsay evidence of the member for Annapolis. If this sort of thing is to go on; if appointments made by the Civil Service Commission are to be ignored, where is the end to be? The government, and especially the Post Office Department, are in many instances setting at defiance the principle underlying the Civil Service Act, and the country might as well know now just where the administration stands in that respect. This is only one case in a great many. I submit that under the law there is nothing for the department to do but to transfer the office to Mr. Potter. I would point out also that the acting district superintendent in his first report made no suggestion pro or con with respect to Mr. Potter; he reported in favour of the previous official whom the government had put in charge, acting, no doubt, in accordance with the suggestions of my hon. friend—a political appointment pure and simple. The policy was laid down previous to the last election—and I say it on the authority of my right hon. leader—that every appointment of a returned soldier by the Civil Service Commission was confirmed. That is not being done to-day, and that is the serious part of this thing. It is a breach of faith with the returned men, especially with wounded men.

Mr. GRAHAM: This question seems to hang largely on whether or not Mr. Potter was resident in the locality concerned. The commission may not have had the knowledge that this man was not a resident. In any case, under the act, they are supposed not to appoint a non-resident.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the clause of the act?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is section 43, chapter 10 of the Acts of 1919, dealing with appointments to the civil service—subsection 3:

Except as to appointments to positions in the headquarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there is another clause which says that the priority of returned soldiers shall be absolute.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think it overrides that, but I am not going to argue the question. The information given to me by the department was that this man was not resident in the locality.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that the Department of Justice has ruled that the question of geographical residence must override even the returned soldier preference? I have been so advised by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know whether the Department of Justice has so ruled, but I am inclined to think that is the law.

Mr. JACOBS: In spite of what the Department of Justice says.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is quite plainly the law. If the information that comes to me is correct—that this gentleman was not resident and that some friends got him back to that place so that he could qualify after the vacancy occurred—then there is good ground for the acceptance by the department of the recommendation of its own officer that the other man should have the appointment.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON: But the district superintendent made a second recommendation when his attention was called to the omission to make any reference to Mr. Potter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, read it.

Mr. HANSON (reading):

As the Acting District Superintendent did not report upon the qualifications of Mr. Howard G. Potter, returned soldier—

Did not make any report upon him in the first place.

—he was communicated with by wire under date of 27th of April. On the 10th of May, 1922, the superintendent reported to the commission that there seemed to be nothing against Mr. Potter's character or his fitness for the position.

Mark those words "or his fitness for the position." Would that not include the personal residence?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON: Certainly it would. It continues:

Mr. Potter being a returned soldier, under the circumstances the commission felt that there was no alternative but to give him the appointment.

And the certificate was issued on the 30th of May. He is still waiting, while the department endeavours to find some method to evade the law.

Mr. GRAHAM: No. I would not go that far. I would say that if the information as communicated to the department be correct, the department is adhering to the spirit at least of the law. My hon. friend reading what the superintendent said, I think could clearly draw the inference that he was very careful only to say that if Mr. Potter got the job he could fill it. His fitness has not anything to do with his residence. A man in Timbuctoo might be fit to fill the position so far as his qualifications were concerned, if he happened also to reside in the constituency. But if it be true that Mr. Potter was not a resident of that constituency at the time the vacancy occurred, then according to the spirit of the law he was not eligible to make application for that position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems really hard to credit that the government could have this idea of its duty under the Civil Service Act. These directions in the act are directions for the Civil Service Commission. The government has absolutely no power to appoint. The Civil Service Commission alone has that. The Civil Service Commission in exercise of this power is directed by the act to give priority to returned soldiers; that is absolute. The Civil Service Commission is also directed in the case of a local appointment, that, "if it is practicable," in the words of the act, it shall go to a resident. Now does the government pretend to say that after the Civil Service Commission reviewing the question of whether he is a resident or not, reviewing the question of whether he is a returned soldier, decides that he is and appoints him, that the government can take the word of the member for the constituency that the commission was wrong and refuse to install the man in office? If the government has information that he is not a resident and believes the law therefore debars him, the government can bring that to the attention of the Civil Service Commission. Has it done it? No. The government pretends to sit in review and appeal over the Civil Service Commission, and the minister stands here and pretends to express the opinion to the House that that is the law of the land. The Civil Service Commission, let me repeat, has the sole power of appointment. Those are regulations to govern the Civil Service Commission. Does the government pretend to be in appeal over the Civil Service Commission? The government has a perfect right to lay any facts in its possession before that commission, but to sit there and say: No, the member tells us someone else is qualified, and he justifies keeping him there on the ground that he is told by someone whom he does not name that Mr. Potter was not a resident; therefore, we will not follow the act, and we will keep a man there in defiance of the act. That is what the government is doing, and it is doing it not only in the Clementsport case. The whole country is full of such cases. My mail is full every morning of letters from men who have been dismissed and who have been denied even a statement of why they were dismissed, not only denied an investigation, but denied the privilege of being told why they have been dismissed, and of cases, too, where the commission followed the act and named the appointee and the government refused to install him and placed their partisan appointee there instead. They have done it in Ontario. There will be in the mind of the minister now cases in western Ontario where this has been the regular practice of the administration. That is the method they are adopting day in and day out to evade the act until, forsooth, they succeed if they can by the circuitous method they have adopted this session in getting the act repealed or in some way impaired by legislation.

In the Clementsport case Potter is entitled to the position. If the government can convince the Civil Service Commission that he is not a resident and that that debars him notwithstanding the fact that he is a returned soldier, if they can convince the Civil Service Commission, all well and good, but that is the court to which they must go. They are not in appeal over the Civil Service Commission, they are not there to see that the commission is carrying out the law in each individual case. If they were, there might as well be no Civil Service Commission. If the government has the power to listen to one of its supporters who says that the Civil Service Commission did not do right because Potter was not a resident, and therefore can put another man in office, that is only another way of repealing the act, and let me repeat, they are repealing it in the Clementsport case, and they are doing it in numerous cases in Ontario. They are spreading patronage all over this country and doing it very frequently in defiance of the prior rights of the returned soldiers.

10 p.m.

Mr. MORRISON: My experience is very different from that of hon. gentlemen to my right. Since I have been elected a member of this House I have been asked several times by the government to nominate someone for a postmastership where the remuneration would be under $200, and in every notice I got to that effect I was asked to give returned soldiers the preference. I got notice of one postmastership being vacant the appointment for which really came under the commission, and I was a little perplexed to know why I had been notified. The vacancy was at a point fifty miles from where I reside and I only knew one man there. I forwarded the notice to him and told him that evidently the government wanted someone nominated, and for him to choose a fit and proper person. He wrote back and told me that on the very day he got my letter an agent of the Civil Service Commission came to that town and asked him to nominate someone, and a party was chosen who was afterwards appointed. I have had I think, seven vacancies for the position of postmaster in my riding, and as I said before, in every case the Civil Service Commission asked that a returned soldier be given the preference. So far as I could see, everything was done fair and above board.

But I know that when the late government was in office a Liberal who was keeping a post office where the income was over $1,000 took a very active part in an election campaign, and he expected to get his walking papers, and he did. In the West, so far as I know, things have been done pretty straight in connection with the post office service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just wish to say a word as to what my hon. friend says. He says he has been asked to nominate postmasters where the remuneration is under $200. I do not doubt that that is correct although I must say I have not received any favours of that kind myself. Evidently hon. friends to my left have a degree of affinity that I do not possess with the government of the day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I want to call attention to is this. That does not in the least affect the classes of cases we are speaking of here at all. The Civil Service Commission has nothing to do with that class of case.

Mr. MORRISON: I quoted one case where it had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was a returned soldier recommended?

Mr. MORRISON: The notice said that a returned soldier should get the preference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the act. The Civil Service Commission was doing its duty, and it did the same in the Clementsport case. But the government stands in the way and refuses to let the law take effect. Undoubtedly the commission always does that, and let me say further, in western Canada I do not think there is very serious complaint, and I think I know the reason. In western Canada there is not, and has not been for some time, the same patronage spirit as to office that there is in other parts of Canada. Western Canada has been in favour of the Civil Service Act and this system for years, and it is in favour of it to-day, and that applies, I think, to members of all parties in western Canada. It does not apply to individuals by any means, but western Canada almost unanimously is against patronage, and the government will get no support and no encouragement whatever in that country for anything in the way of an invasion of the Civil Service Act. But it is wholly different in Ontario. It is wholly different in the eastern provinces. In those provinces in the case of positions of some value to the returned man, the government has time and again consistently made it the practice and policy to evade and even defy the Civil Service Commission. I do not know what value a $50 position or even a $150 position is to a returned man.

Mr. JACOBS: The right hon. leader of the Opposition asked the hon. member for Digby and Annapolis (Mr. Lovett) to mention names.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the right hon. gentlemen give us some names.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I will give you the case of the Wingham post office.

Mr. JACOBS: Let us have the details of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The details have been published. I will give the hon. gentleman the references. If he will read the press of western Ontario in September last, or the Veteran of that month, he will get the Wingham and the Brussels cases and a great many more, that will harrow his soul, if he has any respect for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MARLER: I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) with reference to the government evading the Civil Service Act and sitting in judgment on the Civil Service Commission. He has referred to matters occurring in western Canada. I do not know so much about western Canada, but I come from eastern Canada, where the post office authorities employ very many men indeed, and I found, to my sorrow, on many occasions that it was utterly impossible to get the government to evade the Civil Service Commission in any way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is the hon. member so sorry?

Mr. MARLER: Well, I will leave it to my hon. friend himself to make up his mind. He will know why as well as I do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member wants a government that is a law breaker?

Mr. MARLER: Not entirely. I am only refuting what my right hon. friend said a few minutes ago, and I refute his statement absolutely as regards the city of Montreal. I will also say that the returned soldier, in my experience and to my knowledge, is invariably given the preference when he has an opportunity of filling the position. I have never come across a single case in which I have made application to the Postmaster General, or to any of the authorities in Ottawa, that I have not been referred to the Civil Service Commission, and I have always referred applicants to the Civil Service Commission. I have found it perfectly useless to do anything in any of the departments of the government, excepting through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. FORKE: I have been reading the Mirror, and I am pretty well posted now. However, I only want to say a word with regard to western Canada. I have seen no signs of any of those deeds in regard to which accusation has been made to-night, as far as patronage in western Canada is concerned. I have listened to the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I would be very sorry, indeed, if they were true, and I think the members on this side of the House anyway would like a little more definite and accurate information that the Civil Service Commission has been set aside by any action of the government. I hold no brief for any one, as far as that is concerned, but I would be very sorry indeed if the Civil Service Commission were being ignored by the government in making appointments. I have no knowledge whatever of anything of that sort having taken place, but at the same time I would not condone any offence along that line.

Mr. IRVINE: An hon. member of the Progressive group has just made a confession that he has been consulted with regard to the appointment of certain postmasters. That, to my mind, is being privileged to handle a certain portion of patronage. I hope that is not a general practice on the part of all the Progressives. If it is, the onus is on them to say so now, or forever be silent. Personally, I have not had any opportunity, nor am I desirous, of handling any such patronage, and I respectfully hope that all the Progressives are not handling patronage in that way.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Perhaps I may come in the class of those who are privileged, but I want to make it clear that I am not here in any way to screen our government. On the other hand a little reference was made to me in my own constituency, where I was asked to recommend a man to take charge of one of those post offices, to come in under the $200 class, and I recommended a man who was a returned soldier. If the committee want to get the actual facts, the man I recommended had originally been, and perhaps was then, as far as I know, a Conservative, but I recommended him to the Postmaster General at that time, and he was appointed postmaster, and is postmaster now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was his salary?

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): He was under $200. But I want to be fair to the government, and I say that in that case they did what was right by the returned man, although he was a Conservative.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the poor man do for a living, with a job in which the salary is under $200?

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): He is a blacksmith and has a good trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would need it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am going to enter a very emphatic protest. It seems to me, so far as the present government are concerned, they are discriminating against me, because I have never been asked to make any recommendation for postmaster or anything else.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No vacancies.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, lots of vacancies. I would like to get back to the question we have been dealing with, with regard to the transportation of the mails on the railroads. I have before me the report of 1922, and I notice the daily mileage of postal cars in March 1922 was something like 71,928. Now can the minister give us information as to the number of postal car miles for the different railways in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is asking me for some detailed information as to the postal car miles which I am unable to give him. They have never been asked for in the House on any occasion. I never dreamed that any such question as that would enter into the discussion. It is a detail that really has not very much bearing on the question that he is trying to get at. I can readily see that that would be followed by another question. I have not that information. It has never been given in the details in the postal estimates. I sent out for information after the hon. member had spoken. I do not want my statement to be taken as absolutely accurate, but, as far as the official could estimate, he believed the mail carrying was divided between the two great systems in the proportion of about 45 per cent to each, and the other systems about 10 per cent. That is what my hon. friend is trying to get at directly, I think.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is quite true. I suppose the minister will bring that information down in order that we may perhaps have some more accurate statement. Could the minister give us any information with regard to the number of rural free mail deliveries in the various provinces of Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: They are not divided by provinces, but the rural mail routes in number and operation are 3,742, and the number of boxes erected 200,027. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) was asking those questions. The approximate cost per year is $2,771,203.54. We do not have them divided by provinces. I think my hon. friend can take it for granted that the rural mail routes are largely in the East and not in the prairie provinces.

Mr. SPENCER: Do I understand the minister to say that the rural mail delivery routes are mostly in the East and not in the prairie provinces?

Mr. GRAHAM: I said I thought the larger number of them were in the East and not in the prairie provinces.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not know about other constituencies; but I take it that the situation in them is the same as it is in mine. During the last year we have had many requests for rural mail delivery routes, and in every single case, so far as I know, the request has been turned down by the government. Is it the intention of the government next year to let up as regards this matter, and to give the rural people some opportunity of getting their mail delivered?

Mr. GRAHAM: I dealt at quite some length with this matter earlier in the evening, when my hon. friend was probably not in his seat. To be frank, I may say that there is in this estimate nothing to provide for any new routes. Expressing my own opinion, I believe the time must arrive before very long when the rural mail system will have to be extended. I am speaking particularly of the West and expressing my view in the absence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy), who would be in a better position than I am to discuss this. As I said an hour or so ago, rural mail delivery, rural telephones and roads —all this kind of thing helps to make a contented people in a rural district by bringing them closer to each other as well as into closer touch with the great centres. That is a question of great import, and speaking for myself, I think the time will soon come when the rural mail route of Canada will have to be extended for these purposes, as well as for the accommodation of people living in rural districts. These things all tend to make not only people in sparsely settled districts more contented, but those districts more attractive to other people who might wish to come into them. The United States has extended a somewhat different system, and the deficit there this year is about $60,000,000. The question is altogether one of expense, how much the country can afford and how fast it can go.

Mr. HANSON: Last year when the Post Office estimates were under discussion, I asked the minister for a statement of policy as to what the department proposed to do in connection with extending the rural mail delivery. He was good enough to say that the time was rapidly approaching; I believe he said that before another year was over the department would take up once more the policy of extending the rural mail routes. I, like a good many other members, indeed, I presume like all members of the House, have received from time to time, under the frank of the Postmaster General, copies of the Ottawa Citizen in which reports of conferences and reports of the position of the Post Office department have appeared periodically. I notice in the ministerial press that the Postmaster General, at all events prior to the time of his departure for the south—I do not know what his attitude is just at present—has been pluming himself upon the great success that has attended his efforts in managing the department, especially with respect to its revenues. I understand that last year the Post Office Department showed a surplus. I, of course, have my opinion as to how that surplus was arrived at. When I am at home, I lick a good many stamps for cheques and other things, and I generally use postage stamps. At the same time all that sort of thing goes to swell the revenue of the Post Office Department. In view of what was said last year, I think the time has arrived when the finances of the country will permit of the extension of the rural mail service in Canada. I said last year, and I say now that that is practically the only direct benefit that many people living in rural communities in this country receive. If they can get a rural mail service, this is of great benefit, in fact, of almost inestimable benefit to them. I can contrast conditions that exist to-day in my province with what they were twenty-five years ago. When I was a boy, we lived in a country district and I had to walk three times a week six miles to get my father's mail. To-day there is a daily rural service established by the late government in that particular community, and I say that all communities in the country have a right to look forward to the immediate future when there will be a rural route on every great road, at all events. in this country. I hope, however, there will be no patronage in the extension of that service.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is by contract.

Mr. HANSON: It is let by contract, and I am not altogether in favour of that system, because my experience is that people in rural communities frequently vie with each other, and the government is getting the service, in many instances, at below cost. I can quote case after case of this character. I know of a case of a contractor taking a contract immediately before the war who, in the course of the four years his contract ran, went behind one thousand dollars. I know that is a fact, because I had to help him out and I was glad to do so. It was only after the most strenuous efforts that we were able to get that man any increase at all. A contract system in theory is probably quite all right; but in practice it works out that the government gets the service performed by rural mail carriers in this country in many cases at below cost. The time has arrived when the government ought to have a policy and to say that they are going to extend this service to people in rural communities.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am glad to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his seat and following the discussion with reference to the merits of competition in doing public business and the serious complaints which are being made on account of this service being rendered altogether too cheaply. I am sure if this system is applied to many more branches of the service, an enormous saving would result, and that the difficulties which the Minister of Finance is undoubtedly experiencing in meeting the requirements of the situation, will be much lightened. I notice that in the British parliament the announcement has been made by the Minister of Finance that there is a surplus this year of £101,000,000, and that the saving is largely as a result of a reduction in the amount paid out in the Civil Service. This was the chief item connected with the surplus which they had in the old land.

Just a word with regard to the competitive system in connection with rural mail deliveries. I often wondered why it was this system should apply to one branch of the service and practically to none other. You see what the result is, namely, that strong claims are being advanced that the service is being rendered altogether too cheaply. This is undoubtedly the fault of the people who have tendered to render the service. When one comes to make comparisons with what is going on in other branches, it certainly gives one serious thought whether our whole system is not wrong and the methods which we have adopted are not responsible for many of our troubles. I refer to the elimination of competition, because when you do away with competition there is bound to be a fixation of prices, and this is going on all over the country to-day. I suppose that if the rural mail carriers were placed on a salary basis, as men in other branches of the service, this would be regarded as something entirely different from the practice that prevails, in the rural districts at any rate. Competition is supposed to operate in connection with everything which is done by those people who live in the rural districts. They are in competition in the markets of the world as regards everything they produce, and possibly if the rural mail carriers were put on a salary basis there would be very serious complaints from the people in the rural districts, because this would be so contrary to the system in vogue in the country. This is a matter I have thought over seriously, and I am inclined to think that this system is largely responsible for many of the difficulties and troubles we have in this country to-day. If there were a little more competition and a little less fixing of prices I think we should have a better condition of affairs and the people would render a much better service than is the case where hours of labour are fixed and a scale of wages is laid down, even in the case of government contracts. I believe it is only fair to compare this condition with what is taking place in the country.

As regards the rural mail carriers it is a shame, I think, that His Majesty's mail should have to be carried in some of the outfits which some of these people are using throughout the country; and while it may be contended that it is the fault of the carriers themselves, I am inclined to think that many of them would not be able to continue in the service at all were it not for the assistance they receive from those to whom they deliver mail. In many instances they get in the form of assistance a fair percentage of what they receive for their services. I do not think this is as it should be; I believe that these people should receive a reasonable remuneration for the work they are doing. Unfortunately, however, there are many people whose earning abilities are not very great and they do not attach much value to this service because of their inability to do manual labour. So that if they can get into a rig and go around and render this service they think that they can get along. I have in mind a mail carrier whose route takes in the road on which I live. He is not very young now, and unfortunately a few years ago he lost one of his arms. He is a man with a large family, and for a service covering some twenty-two miles I think he receives between $800 and $900 a year. A horse soon breaks down in work of this kind, and so he has to get a new steed from time to time; and when you compare his remuneration with the salary paid to a letter carrier in the city, running up to as high as $1500 or $1600 a year, with $200 or $300 bonus, there is no wonder that it is difficult to get people in the country to do this work. I mention this as one of the many difficulties which we find prevailing in the rural districts to-day.

Many of the things which the farmers are producing they have to market in competition with the whole world, and the climatic conditions of this country are such as to render that competition all the more difficult. In tropical countries produce can be got out of the land with comparatively no difficulty. and when we in Canada have to compete against such conditions it will easily be seen what a handicap we are under. I might mention several articles produced under such favourable conditions that come into this country to the value of millions of dollars. For instance, we hear a great deal of talk about wool, the raw material of the manufactured product, upon which a high tariff is maintained, coming in free of competition. This is the system that prevails, and so long as it does prevail it seems that contracts must be let by tender for the rural mail service. But I cannot see any justification for paying the letter carrier in the city the salary he gets to-day, together with his uniform—I believe he gets two suits—and giving the rural man the remuneration which he now receives. I should like the minister to justify the difference in these two cases. He might also tell us what is the average amount paid to the rural letter carrier on a twenty or twenty-five mile route and also the average salary paid to the letter carrier in the city. At the same time I would ask whether there have been so far many losses in connection with the dividends paid on war loans which are distributed in the rural districts. The cheques are sent out in an ordinary brown envelope very similar to the envelopes that contain the applications in connection with the Civil Service Commission, and I have often thought that the envelopes containing these cheques should be registered instead of being sent out in the indiscriminate way in which they are delivered at present. Very often they are put into the wrong box. because unfortunately many of the carriers are not very careful; and in many cases there is no choice in the selection of these men on account of the competitive system. So far, have there been many losses in this respect? I know myself of some that have occurred in connection with cheques issued in payment of interest on war loan bonds.

Mr. FIELDING: I could not tell my hon. friend offhand, but I do not think there have been extensive losses. There may be an exceptional case here and there, but there have been no widespread losses.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would it involve any difficulty in having these cheques registered? I do not think it would entail any extra cost to the government, and it would make for safety. At all events it would be much more satisfactory than having the cheques distributed in the indiscriminate way in which they are sent out at present. Very often children are sent to the boxes to get mail during stormy weather and it is quite possible that an important bit of mail might be blown away. There is another matter which I would bring to the attention of the minister, and that is with regard to legal holidays on which the rural mail carriers have to deliver mail. Surely it is only fair that they should be given some remuneration for delivering mail on legal holidays. They have to carry the mails in all kinds of weather and they get nothing for their services on these holidays. I think it is only fair that they should be given something for this extra work.

Mr. GRAHAM: The last point raised by my hon. friend is worth consideration, and perhaps an amount might be added to provide remuneration for work done on holidays. Perhaps something might be provided to enable a man to engage someone else to drive his mail on that day if necessary. But it must be borne in mind that these men know all the terms and conditions when they take the contract. However, it is worth considering whether it would not be just to do something in this regard, as my hon. friend suggests. As to the delivery of war loan cheques, my experience is that one of the reasons why business men use cheques is because they do not have to register them. The cheque is usually payable to order and if it is lost payment can be stopped. We have not heard many complaints in the Post Office Department as to the loss of cheques. Personally I seldom get a cheque, although I send out cheques often enough. Whenever I do so, however, I always make the cheque payable to order and never register it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want to put a further question regarding some information that was attempted to be elicited by hon. members from Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner) and Victoria, (Alta.) (Mr. Lucas). Does the minister seriously mean that there is no contract of any kind with the railway companies that carry our mail? We have been informed that they do not go out and grab for the nearest mail sack, and we can readily accept this information. We have been further informed that the onus rests on the postal employees. Is there any arrangement made between the Post Office Department and the railway companies so that the latter know about what amount of mail, when, and between what points they are to carry it? On the other hand, does the Post Office Department know what trains are going to carry mail on certain dates? Surely there must be some arrangement under which the Post Office Department and the railway companies know how the mails are to be handled.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no agreement with the railway companies as to the mails they shall carry.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Not as to the amount?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, as to the mails they shall carry. There is an agreement as to what they shall get for their services, but they are not guaranteed any particular mail. The Post Office Department in its re-arrangement knows generally what railways are carrying certain mails, but the agreement with the railway companies, as I read it to-night, is that they shall get certain payment for the mails they carry. As for the Post Office Department, it can divert the mails in any way; there is no absolute contract with the railway companies that they shall have an absolute mail route.

Mr. RINFRET: Is it the intention of the government to appoint very soon a Deputy Minister for the Post Office Department?

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister himself would have to be consulted on that matter; as Acting Postmaster General I should not like to give an opinion as to what his views may be. There is an Acting Deputy Postmaster General, and there will probably not be any thought of appointing a deputy permanently until the Postmaster General's return.

Mr. RINFRET: My excuse for asking is that I have put the question many times to the Postmaster General himself. While I am on the subject I would suggest that when the government deals with the appointment of the Deputy Postmaster General it give some thought to the present condition in the various departments in Ottawa as to the respective representation of English-speaking and French-speaking deputy ministers. It is a fact that under the old government—I suppose we could not expect anything else from it—the ratio of French-speaking deputy ministers went down practically to nothing. The condition to-day is that there is a Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Boudreau, who has the rating of a deputy minister—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds further, will he tell me what reduction was made by the old government of French-speaking deputy ministers?

Mr. RINFRET: I have not got the facts before me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the facts before me. It was one in ten years. As I understand, this government has made a similar reduction in one year.

Mr. RINFRET: I know that the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue has disappeared.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the simple reason that the department was amalgamated with the Customs. That is the only reduction in ten years, but under this government one French-speaking deputy minister has been retired in one year. So why is the hon. gentleman making that statement as to the old government?

Mr. RINFRET: I have not the least hesitation to present my case in another way, because the sooner we forget the old government the better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is better to forget it than to say the wrong thing about it.

Mr RINFRET: I might put it this way, that during the ten years of the old regime our representation—because I speak for my compatriots—in the different departments as regards deputy ministers was below the standard I am now asking the new government—which is working very hard to right many of the wrongs of its predecessors—when it appoints a Deputy Postmaster General to give thought to the fact that at present the French-speaking people of this country are only represented in the departments by way of deputy ministers by the clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Boudreau—who has the rank of a deputy minister but without the responsibility of a large department—and by Mr. Desbarats in the Department of National Defence—who is not a deputy minister, I understand, but who since his transfer to that department still retains the salary of a deputy minister. I do not wish to argue the point at length for it speaks for itself. I do not wish even to cast any aspersion on the past; I say again that the sooner we forget the past the better. But when the government of to-day appoints a Deputy Postmaster General I wish it would remember that there are in this country over two and a half million French Canadians who pay their taxes and who should certainly be allowed their proportion of representation in the departments as anywhere else. That is my proposal.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member be satisfied to have appointed as deputy minister of the department a good Canadian?

Mr. RINFRET: I certainly would be satisfied in a general way; but I think there are good Canadians among the French Canadians; that is my point; and having a bilingual situation we must deal with it as it is. I believe you can find very good Canadians among the French Canadian employees of the Post Office Department. I will not mention any names, although I have brought some names to the attention of the government already. I am perfectly willing to admit the principle that we must have a good Canadian as Deputy Postmaster General, but I wish to protest against any condition where it seems that there are no good Canadians except among the other branch of our people. I strongly urge the government, I would not say exactly to appoint a French Canadian as Deputy Postmaster General, but in a more general and broad way to give the French-speaking people of this country their due representation in that grade of office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, before the minister speaks I would like to say a few words anent the remarks of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). Towards the close he became very anxious to forget the subject that he emphasized so pointedly in the first half of his remarks, and begged us all to disregard it. He started to attack the late government and claimed that we had done an injustice to French Canadians in that we had reduced, as he said, almost to the vanishing point the number of French Canadian deputy ministers. He added that the present government was struggling hard to repair the errors of the old government, and he begged them in this particular case to do something to that end. I sought to call his attention to the fact that there was no reduction of French-speaking deputy ministers at all by the late government save in the case of one, and there also we made a reduction of one of the English-speaking deputy ministers, if not two. But the only reason that Mr. Vincent, who was a very competent deputy minister of the Inland Revenue department, was not continued was that the government amalgamated the office with that of the Customs, and very rightly so. I know the hon. member would not say that that was not the proper thing to do. Not only was that the only case, but Mr. Vincent was treated with absolute fairness by the government, as he himself would admit; I do not think any retiring deputy was ever treated more liberally. Now, the hon. member says that this government is struggling to repair those errors. All this government has done to repair them is to reduce three deputy ministers to two. There were three of French origin when we left office; there are two to-day. Is that not right? There was Sir Eugene Fiset, Deputy Minister of Militia; there was Mr. Desbarats, Deputy Minister of Naval Service; and Mr. Boudreau; there are now only the latter two. So that in the great struggle to repair the errors of the old government, described in such heroic language by my hon. friend, the result has been to diminish—and, as he would view it, to aggravate—the offence of the old government. I know that Sir Eugene Fiset is out not by way of any injustice to him at all—I presume at his own desire; I do not know—but in the amalgamation of the Department of Militia and the Department of Naval Service. All I object to is the continual effort of the hon. member, which, I am sorry to say, he has been guilty of for years, through the paper he edits in Montreal as well as on the floor of this House, to impute to the late government an animosity that never inspired it and that never was in evidence. That was purely a matter of political incitation at the hands of hon. members who sought political advantage by it. I join with the hon. member in the hope that he expresses: I hope that it will be possible to find a French-speaking deputy-minister for the Post Office Department. I know the principal need is to have an efficient man; the hon. member will agree that that should be paramount. But while we are a bilingual country, talk as we will, we cannot get away from the necessity, if we are to have content and good feeling throughout the Dominion, of dividing these important appointments in approximate proportion to the respective populations. We tried to follow that out; we succeeded in almost every respect. I know the contingencies were such that when we went out of office the French Canadians were not getting their fair share in respect to the deputy ministerships. It has to be the practice; no one has more frankly said so year in and year out than myself. Therefore I hope it will be possible in the Post Office Department that a discrepancy that was occasioned in small degree through ten years and in equal degree under this government in one year will be in some respects remedied. The hon. member speaks the whole truth when he says that he has made a recommendation. It is pretty well known throughout this Dominion that he made a recommendation and that he got a rather curt refusal from the minister.

Mr. RINFRET: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not curt? It was a refusal, anyway, and it has not been accepted as entirely satisfactory by the friends of my hon. friend.

Mr. RINFRET: The matter is pending.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, it was pending in an unfortunate and rather harrowing way when that letter was written. Does the hon. member think there is still hope after that letter?

Mr. RINFRET: Well, I hope my hon. friend's remarks will not do away with that hope.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope not too. In fact, I will go further. I have an acquaintance with the gentleman the hon. member recommends. I not only have his personal acquaintance—not in any great degree, because he never was of my political faith; in fact, so far as I know he never was a political friend—but I have heard of him for many years and of his services in the department. For myself I know of no reason why he would not make an excellent deputy minister. I hope that will help my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it does, I shall be very much pleased. I earnestly hope that the trouble that has arisen over the matter will be patched up and that there will be no serious or permanent schism as a result. I rose only to state what I believed to be the principle that ought to be adopted and to express the earnest hope that something can be done to live up to it in the appointment of a deputy minister of this department.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are not on the civil government estimates, under which I suppose, the matter of the deputy minister might be dealt with. But as the item will probably go through without much discussion when we come to it, perhaps it is just as well that we should deal with it now. I may say that I know of no decision having been arrived at in the matter of the deputy ministership; none has been conveyed to me. My right hon. friend stated a truism in a three-cornered fashion when he intimated that this government had reduced the number of French-speaking deputies. But the fact is that this government did not do that. Sir Eugene Fiset, against my protest until his doctor's certificate was handed to me, insisted upon resigning. If at the end of his term of leave of absence his health should be sufficiently recovered to enable him to resume his work, nothing would delight me more, because he is one of the ablest deputies there ever was in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he had not resigned, Mr. Desbarats could not be deputy of the department; so there would have been a reduction anyway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could you have one department and two deputies?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was so in the Marine and Fisheries department; there was a Deputy Minister of Naval Defence and a Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the minister has made Naval Service and Militia one department. How can he have two deputies in one department?

Mr. GRAHAM: Under one ministerial head.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, there were two departments.

Mr. GRAHAM: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it, and the minister knows it too.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I say a word? The bill I introduced in this House forming the amalgamation provided for two deputies. The Upper Chamber amended the bill so that that was impossible, but it was provided that Mr. Desbarats should be retained in the new department as controller of the finances with the salary of a deputy minister. When Sir Eugene Fiset insisted on obtaining leave of absence, which I reluctantly gave him on account of his great ability and long experience, Mr. Desbarats remained Deputy Minister of Naval Service and assumed the office of Acting Deputy Minister of the Department of Defence. He is now controller and acting deputy. He cannot be appointed deputy, because two men cannot draw salaries for the same position. Sir Eugene Fiset is still drawing salary. When his leave of absence expires, if he is not able to return to his work, it will be in order to appoint a new deputy. I simply wanted to make it clear that the government was reluctant to part with Sir Eugene Fiset and that it was at his own request he was given leave of absence. Now, I will direct the attention of the Postmaster General to the discussion which has taken place here to-night. I have a great deal of sympathy with the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Rinfret). In this country, where we have a bilingual situation, we who are in the majority must see to it that those in the minority have fair play in respect to these larger positions, because only by showing that spirit can we hope to have unity and amity throughout the country.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I would like to say this. I did not withdraw at all, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition suggests, from the position I first took, but as that was not my point I simply did not wish to stress it. I could mention very easily many cases both in the service and elsewhere where we claim we did not get justice from the late government, and I would not like the leader of the Opposition to-day to state that after making a mild statement at first, I was quite willing to withdraw. My only idea in not stressing the point was that it had little to do with the case I was presenting to the committee to-night.

The leader of the Opposition claims that when Mr. Vincent was withdrawn, he was well treated. I do not discuss that phase of the question. I will say, though, that when we claim a certain proportion of responsibility for French-Canadians in the service we are not thinking at all of any huge salary that may happen to be paid to one of them, but we are thinking of the responsibility for those under him, and even if Mr. Vincent was well provided for and I suppose he was, at the same time it meant a loss of responsibility and power for the element he was supposed to represent.

As for the present government, my right hon. friend himself will admit that it has only been in power a year and a half, so we cannot very well consider that it has yet had the opportunity to do all that it wanted to do. The reason why I am asking this government to give proportional representation in that sense is that I feel perfectly satisfied that it will in due time, and I am taking the first occasion that offers itself to bring the attention of the government to that point.

There is just another remark I would like to make before I sit down. My right hon. friend has said that in my paper, referring to Le Canada of Montreal, and in my speeches I never lose an opportunity or I often take occasion to raise prejudice and create bad feeling. That was his statement, if I am not mistaken. I am not prepared at all to admit that. I am expressing the views of a certain proportion of the population who do not share the views of my right hon. friend, but I always try to do it in a very moderate way and in a spirit of good understanding. I am ready to admit, however, that neither my paper nor any of my speeches are intended to please the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have sent for the statutes because I am afraid the statutes will be necessary to convince the minister that there were two departments. There was a Naval Service department and a Marine and Fisheries department. They were created at different times. They were not one department.

Mr. GRAHAM: They were under one minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. Very frequently a minister has two departments. The Minister of the Interior has three to-day. The Minister of Interior is Minister of Mines; he is Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, that is another department; he is Minister of the Interior. He is head of three departments with three deputy ministers. But the Minister of Militia made the Department of Militia and Defence and the Department of Naval Service, not two departments under one minister, but one department.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was intended to make them one department with two deputy heads.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the anomaly of the whole thing. You cannot have two deputy heads. The minister tried to do that and he was very readily cured. It was only a method of keeping the salary that was all. That was what the minister was after. What the minister objected to in my remarks and in which I was absolutely right is this. I said there were two departments not one. The Marine and Fisheries department was one and the Naval Service department was wholly different. I have before me the statutes now which I can read to the minister. The Naval Service was created by Chapter 43 9-10 Edward VII, and the first thing the act says is that there shall be a Department of Naval Service. There had been a Department of Marine and Fisheries years before that. It was created by chapter 45 of the statutes of 1906. No, that is the chapter marked by the Library staff, but it is not the one I sent for. The Marine and Fisheries department was created very many years ago, shortly after confederation. There were two departments under one minister, and there were two deputy ministers. The Minister of the Interior has now three deputy ministers, and quite properly, in fact four, for Immigration has been put under him. There are four different departments. That is a wholly different thing. But when the Minister of Militia took the responsibility of combining the Naval Service with Militia and Defence by that act he necessarily got rid not of a deputy minister from the service but of the office and salary of a deputy minister, because you can have only one deputy to a department. He did precisely the same as we had done with the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue. That is all I rose to say. I do not say he should not have done it; I do not say that at all, but when one complains of the result of our action in ten years I would point out that the same thing has resulted under this government in one year.

11 p.m.

I have nothing further to say in answer to the hon. member (Mr. Rinfret). He was pretty fair in his reply. I certainly cannot dispute his initial statement that he could tell me of many cases where he claimed to be unjustly treated. I know he was continually claiming that almost every day for ten years.

Mr. SHAW: I do not know what particular item we are discussing, but I think this is perhaps an appropriate time to bring to the attention of the minister a suggestion which appears to me might have some merit in it. Under the law as it stands at present, public libraries I believe are entitled to a special postage rate on books sent out within a radius of fifty miles. That is a very desirable provision. The only point I wish to question is the limitation as to mileage. In eastern Canada I can quite understand that that limitation is very effective and perhaps meets the situation, but in western Canada with our great distances it is not, I think, working as satisfactorily. For instance, we have a public library at Edmonton and another at the city of Calgary, 190 miles away. The result is that with a fifty-mile zone, the libraries are not able to secure the advantage of the lessened postage rates, and consequently the reading public who might otherwise secure the advantage of books from public libraries are not able to secure them owing to the postage rates. My hon. friend from Edmonton reminds me that this is a very serious matter in the northern part of the province. The closest library is Edmonton, and the country to be served extends some three or four hundred miles north from that point. I rose simply for the purpose of suggesting to the minister that the zone be increased perhaps to one hundred miles. In that way no harm would be done in eastern Canada, but it would advantage the West very considerably.

Mr. GARDINER: I would like to refer back to a question that has been before the House already to-night. One or two members have made the statement that they have not been approached with regard to the appointments of postmasters where the salary has been under $200. I jokingly remarked that I had not been consulted in the matter, but perhaps I did not give the House a correct impression. I want to say that I have no desire to be consulted in the matter. I just wished to correct a mistaken impression some hon. members may have got from my remark. I would like to deal with that just for a moment. It would seem that the department is asking certain members of this House to make recommendations of the names of persons who, they think, would be capable of occupying these positions. Who is responsible for that? Who is going to be responsible for the appointment of that official in a position with a salary of $200? Does the department hold the member of parliament responsible for his recommendation? Or is the department going to hold itself responsible for that appointment? I maintain that, if they are asking the members of the House of Commons to recommend the names of people for those positions, the system is wrong, and we ought to get away from it as soon as we possibly can. I contend that where positions in small post offices become vacant the department should be responsible for seeing that a proper person is appointed to that particular vacancy, and it is not a question of a member of the House recommending any person for that particular vacancy. We must at all times hold the Post Office Department responsible for the appointments, and I hope and trust the department will get away from the species of petty patronage that has been introduced during the last twelve months.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, April 13, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter:

OTTAWA, April 13, 1923.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Louis Davies, K.C.M.G., acting as Deputy of the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at four o'clock for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

A. F. SLADEN,
Governor General's Secretary.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): I should like to ask the government if they would consider permitting me to move the second reading of my bill on capital punishment before the end of the present session. I urge this request on the ground that on a previous occasion when the bill was called, I held it at the request of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to have a word with the Minister of Justice before making a reply to my hon. friend. As soon as I have had that opportunity, I will give my hon. friend an answer.

HON. D. D. MACKENZIE

APPOINTMENT TO THE BENCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday the Prime Mininster declined to give the House any information as to retirements from the government. The statement persists in the press that the Solicitor General has retired and been appointed to the Bench. Why is not the House so informed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very sorry that my right hon. friend uses the word "declined". I had no intention of declining to give any information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked it twice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I misunderstood my right hon. friend. I beg his pardon. The former Solicitor General has retired. He has been appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That is the only retirement that there has been.

Mr. BUREAU: His resignation was read in the House yesterday. The right hon. member was not present.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I wish to bring the attention of the government to matters regarding the maple sugar industry which are d'actualité in our province.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BUREAU: Very well.

Mr. McMASTER: The first is that in view of the low price of the article and the high price of firewood, maple trees are being cut down when they really should remain to be tapped. The association does not ask for the expenditure of money, on which fact they are to be congratulated, but merely that an educational campaign should be inaugurated, no doubt by the Department of Agriculture, to show the unwisdom of such proceeding. The second matter in connection with the same industry is that the Association of Maple Sugar and Syrup Producers complain that there are many infractions of the law at this time, and they would like to see the government move in the direction of a more exacting administration of the act under which maple sugar and maple syrup are administered.

Mr. BUREAU: The Pure Foods Act.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Yes, and as we now have a new Solicitor General, I think it is unnecessary to add much more, for a new broom sweeps clean.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Translation): In answer to the first remarks made to the House by my hon. friend the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I wish to state that the present government has already taken the necessary measures to advertise the merit of products which are known as maple syrup and sugar. Last year an exhibition was held at Beauceville.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): In what county is Beauceville to be found?

Mr. BELAND (Translation): In Beauce. This exhibition of maple products was generously subsidized by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I have not heard it said that the producers of Brome county complained that prices of maple sugar were so depressed that this industry was no longer remunerative. I must however, add that the maple products of Beauce county are far superior to those of Brome county.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I think that the hon. minister should not boost the county of Beauce to the detriment of the county of Brome.

Mr. BELAND (Translation): At all events, Mr. Speaker, taking a serious view of the matter, my hon. friend may rest assured that the Health department is taking all the necessary means to ensure a strict application of the act, so as to guarantee the purity of these products. Moreover, this question has already been the subject of serious consideration by the House and all the hon. members are of the opinion that this industry should have the benefit of the government's entire co-operation.

SUPPLY

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Provisional bonus allowance for the inside and outside services of the Civil Service, to be paid to such persons and classes of persons, in such amounts and at such times as the Governor in Council may determine, $5,500,000.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I would ask the attention of the committee to item 435, being a supplementary estimate to provide for the bonus to civil servants. It is just one item, and as there is a great deal of anxiety on the part of civil servants as to when it will be carried, I am going to ask the committee to assent to it now before we take up the estimates of my hon. friend the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Graham).

Mr. HANSON: Has the government given any consideration to the question of making permanent the bonus that is at present paid to civil servants of the lower classes? I have had a great many requests from members of the outside service particularly asking me to support a resolution of that character. I have not so far arrived at any conclusion on the subject and I think there should be a declaration of policy from the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has not felt that the present is an opportune time to consider any final revision of salaries, largely for the reason that this year there have been exceptional conditions affecting the cost of living, such for example as the high price of coal which obtained last year. The government thought that under the circumstances it would be advisable to continue the bonus as paid last year, but during the recess which will follow after this session the whole question of the revision of salaries of civil servants will be taken into consideration.

Mr. HANSON: Then the government has no policy on the subject?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the same bonus as given last year and two years ago?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a cost of living bonus?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not quite the same as that which was given two years ago. The bonus paid last year was similiar to that of the previous year, with certain exceptions which were mentioned at the time; but this year it is the same as last year's.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is as much as it was two years ago?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the government think it would be a great deal better to reduce the cost of living and thereby get rid of the bonus?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the government is satisfied with its progress—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —in reducing the cost of living.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is coming down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government's own records show it is up going. The government in its struggle to go forward is apparently going back.

Mr. FIELDING: Every day in every way—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You are getting worse.

Mr. BUREAU: We are getting better.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it a fact that civil servants with dependents receive a larger salary than those without dependents?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "salary;" no doubt he means the bonus which we are now discussing. If he is referring to the bonus, it is true that civil servants having dependents are entitled to a larger bonus than those without dependents.

Mr. IRVINE: This applies, I take it, only to civil servants whose dependents are in Canada. I understand that those civil servants who have dependents overseas in Great Britain do not come within this class. I want to make this point, that while this is an excellent provision in behalf of civil servants, there are certain cases in which it is a distinct hardship to withhold the bonus from employees whose dependents happen to be overseas. I know some civil servants whose mothers are too ill to leave the Old Country and the bonus is on that account withheld.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The whole bonus scheme has been worked out by the Civil Service Commission, and no doubt if the point which my hon. friend has raised were brought to its attention it would receive consideration by the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government cost of living statistics show that since March, 1922, the cost of living has steadily risen. But not only do the government statistics and the curve of the Labour department, which I shall have in a moment, reveal this fact, but the statistics of Dun, of Professor Michell of McMaster University, and indeed all other Canadian statistics, show exactly the same thing. The curve of the cost of living is now about one point and three quarters higher than it was when the government brought down its budget a year ago. The descent of the cost of living which commenced in July, 1920, and which was precipitate all through 1921, was arrested the very day this government assumed power. However, it resumed very slowly for about two months; but when the budget was brought down and went into effect it commenced to rise. It has risen ever since and is rising now; and it has risen most substantially in the last year. May I ask the government what change of policy they purpose adopting to reverse the effect of the policy they now actually have in operation?

Mr. ROBB: I might ask my hon. friend a question, seeing that he has the information before him. Is it not true that different economists who have advanced the view that the cost of living is going up say that the largest percentage of the increase is attributable in the first place to rent, and in the second place to coal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I was not discussing the causes; and as a matter of fact these are not the causes, these are elements. Rents are going up, coal is going up and wholesale commodities are also going up. I know that coal and rent are going up and in this country are very likely to continue to do so. But the government abandoned the unemployed last winter with the result that they drifted across to the United States, and now there is no one to build. We cannot improve our housing facilities without mechanics, and we are without them; they are now citizens of the United States.

Mr. BUREAU: Those who want to build can build. They have the mechanics and the labourers down my way and they are building there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry to say my hon. friend is wrong. There are portions of Canada that are virtually without mechanics altogether.

Mr. BUREAU: Portions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. There are portions that are wholly stripped of mechanics.

Mr. BUREAU: Where the calamity howlers live.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So from what we have heard from the Minister of Trade and Commerce there does not appear to be very much hope for the immediate future. He will remember how his Minister of Labour complained in 1921 of the noble struggle that he had made to get the cost of living down and to take from profiteers that fraction that should be added to the earnings of the workingman. He was wholly unsuccessful, as he stated, notwithstanding that fact that all through that period, from the middle of 1920 right to the end of 1921, there was a very rapid descent of the cost of living curve. He was not satisfied and complained that he was only allowed a wooden gun with which to go out after profiteers and get the cost of living down. Perhaps his colleagues or the Prime Minister will explain what kind of a gun he has had since. He has been much less successful. In fact, the operation that was well under way was arrested immediately he got into office and the reverse process has been in operation ever since and looks as if it would continue for some time. The cost of living in Canada, even at its worst, was lower according to official figures than the cost of living even in the United States and much lower than in other countries. That was the case right up to the time of the coming into power of this government. I do not think that can be said to be the case to-day. I think it will be found that the cost of living in the United States, making allowance for the difference in the method of calculation, is to-day lower than here, and our prospects for the immediate future, considering the process that has gone on in the way of the depletion of our workingmen, are not good. I should like to have the government's view of this question, as to what kind of gun they purpose giving the Minister of Labour from this on that will be an improvement upon the weapon that he has had; and as to when they expect to succeed in the noble struggle they are making against the cost of living, so that we will not be faced with this vote continuously for years to come.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As respects the operation of economic laws, I think my right hon. friend will recognize that cause and effect do not operate simultaneously, but that usually the effect of the operation of certain causes is only experienced at some later period. He says that the moment this government took office the cost of living began to rise. If that was the case it must have been due to causes that were set in motion while my right hon. friend was in office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that. I said that the descent that took place while we were in office was arrested. It proceeded to go down a little for about three months until the government's budget went into operation, after which it immediately proceeded to rise. It is quite true it was a case of cause and effect: the government's budget was the immediate cause, and the high cost of living is the effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only defect in my right hon. friend's reasoning is that his operation of cause and effect is a little more instantaneous than that which is commonly observed in regard to economic forces. Any study of economic questions will reveal that these matters are not worked out in a week, a month or even a series of months; indeed sometimes they cover several years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the cause of the great descent through 1921?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Occasionally special causes operate and help to explain special conditions. The increased cost of living this past winter would almost seem to be elementary in its explanation to anyone who appreciates the important part that coal plays in the cost of production and the general cost of living. As my right hon. friend knows, Canada has need of coal earlier in the season than the United States, our need of coal extends over a longer period, and the increase in its cost increases the cost of transportation, the cost of manufacture, the cost of running retail establishments, the cost of management of households—it enters into every particular that one can have regard to dealing with the economic situation. Under those circumstances it was inevitable that the cost of living curve should be higher this year than possibly in previous years. There may be other explanations, but I think this is an all-sufficient one to account for any exceptional rise this year.

Mr. HANSON: How does the Prime Minister figure out that there has been an increased cost in the price of coal? Speaking for the Maritime provinces, where we use very largely soft coal, I can assure him that coal has been much cheaper during the entire year than it was a year ago. That coal goes as far west as Montreal and supplies the manufacturing establishments of the province of Quebec and of the Maritime provinces. I cannot speak for the province of Ontario, but I would advise the right hon. gentleman that there was no scarcity of coal for manufacturing purposes in the eastern provinces, and that there was not only no increase in the cost, but an actual decrease both in the cost of production and the freight rates, due to a special rate having been put into effect as far west as Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has referred to "cost" all the way through. I do not know whether he intends to refer to price, but if he means the price of coal I do not think he need go beyond this chamber to have every hon. member present witness to the circumstance that the increase in the price of coal has been very considerable all through this past winter.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I think we have a very good gun in this part of the House for reducing the cost of living, and I hope the right hon. gentleman, probably next week, will help us supply some of the ammunition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I help the hon. gentleman to supply it I am afraid the reverse effect would take place. I was warned only last night that my support always turned the government the other way. I shall watch with great interest the operation of the hon. gentleman's efforts on the budget this session, but I would remind him that the big factor in the increased cost of living is the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax. That is the main legislative cause of the higher cost of living. The Prime Minister is now very deferential to the effect of economic law and world forces and cause and effect. I cannot recall those words falling from his lips in the discussion of 1921. Then those things were wholly absent. It was altogether a case of enabling the present Minister of Labour to have a gun to go after profiteers. But what I want to emphasize is that not only in respect to rent and coal which he mentions now—the latter of which only in a certain portion of Canada and as to one class has risen in value at all—but as respects food stuffs, clothing and the essential factors and necessaries of life the cost of living has continuously risen since the hon. gentlemen took the treasury benches and put their taxation measures into effect. That has been the result ever since, and as a consequence we are called upon to vote five and a half million dollars to-day, and next year we will be called upon to vote the same amount according to present tendencies. Now, will the Prime Minister or any member of his government state when they hope by the success of their anti-cost of living operations to get rid of this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says that the vote is increased so much this year over the period during which he held office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not say that. I said that we are called upon to vote this much this year for the cost of living bonus. This is virtually the same as we had in 1921, and it is the same as we had last year. In 1921 the cost of living was rapidly going down; now it is rising. I know that prior to that time the cost of living was higher than it is now, but I also know that relatively to other countries of the world it was lower in Canada that it is to-day. That is how the government is to be tested—by its own policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before I answer my right hon .friend, will he admit that the sum we are asking to-day for bonus is virtually the same as it was in 1921?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will admit that the Prime Minister said so himself. I asked him at the opening of this discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I have the figures before me now, and I can give my right hon. friend the exact information. In 1920-21 my right hon. friend asked the House, for the purposes of the cost of living bonus, for an appropriation of $12,500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was three years ago

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am keeping to the 1921 period, which was the one my right hon. friend referred to, and is the period during which his government was in office. He asked parliament then for an appropriation of $12,500,000, of which his government spent in bonus $10,588,890.

Mr. BUREAU: With the cost of living going down.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1921-22—that includes the other part of 1921—he asked parliament for an appropriation of $9,375,000, of which his government spent in bonus $7,710,264. When this government came into office we asked for an appropriation for bonus of $5,500,000 as against the $9,375,000 that my right hon. friend had asked for one year and the $12,500,000 he had asked for the year before. This year we are asking for the same amount as last year, namely, $5,500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount spent two years ago was about the same. The amount asked for now is some five millions and a half. The Prime Minister stated at the opening of the discussion that this was the same cost of living bonus as that of a year ago and as that of two years ago, save in respect to certain adjustments that had been made of a detailed character. He will find, if he goes into it, that it is the same; naturally as we recede from the war it does not apply on as large a volume. It did not apply last year on as large as the year before because of the reduction in staff that we had made in 1921. But the cost of living bonus to-day to the individual is virtually the same as it was two years ago, and if this process continues the government is going to have to increase it.

Mr. SHAW: In view of the admitted increase in the cost of living over that of last year, has the government considered the advisability of increasing this vote for the present year? In any event, upon what reasoning has the decision been arrived at that the bonus should not be increased over that of last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bonus was never intended to correspond automatically with the increase or decrease in the cost of living. It is a general allowance intended to meet exceptional circumstances. The government thinks that having regard to the possible further reduction in the cost of living before the year is much further advanced, this amount will be quite sufficient for the purpose.

Item agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Civil government—Post Office—salaries and contingencies, $1,271,448.

Mr. BUREAU: I move that item 19 be amended by inserting after the word "salaries" the words, "including Superintendent of Mail Contracts at $5,400 per annum." These words appeared in the estimates as prepared but were inadvertently omitted from the printed estimates. The amount of the vote is not affected, as the increase made is already provided for in the item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask the minister how much he is being helped to-day in one of his three activities—his postal activities—by his genial friend the Minister of Customs and Excise.

Mr. BUREAU: To the extent of moving the resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now we have got step number one. I want to know how much money is being credited to the Post Office Department which is taken in by way of taxation not connected with the postal service?

Mr. BUREAU: We have carried on the same system that was put in force by my hon. friend when he was administering the War Measures Act. I have no hesitation in saying that it would be a good thing to provide that excise stamps should be used to pay excise taxes and postage stamps to pay postal charges. My hon. friend knows that it is very difficult to estimate how much money is—I will not say wrongly, but not exactly rightly collected—by my hon. friend the Postmaster General that ought to be credited to Customs and Excise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What my hon. friend says is quite true as to the commencement of things. But where we then used one stamp for purposes not connected with the Post Office, to-day anywhere from five to twenty are used. Besides that, there are the stamps used on receipts, which have nothing to do with the postal service; so that the use of stamps for these purposes has been enormously multiplied. Surely the department has some idea how much of the revenues are properly attributable to their own activities and how much to the postal service.

Mr. BUREAU: It is impossible to make any definite accounting in this respect. Either postal or excise stamps may be used for all these purposes which are not connected with postal charges, and unless you make an audit of everybody's books, the accounts of the banks, and so on, you cannot tell how many postage stamps have been used on cheques, receipts, etc. Under the present system that cannot be done. You might arrive at a kind of average. I take it that there is no increase in the volume of business done by the Post Office Department to account for any substantial increase in revenue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been really none, as I understand it. The volume of mail carried is practically the same as a year or two years ago; indeed, less than three years ago undoubtedly.

Mr. BUREAU: To do that we would have to ascertain the revenue of the Post Office three years ago and say that the balance comes from excise, but that would not be an accurate estimate. We cannot do that as the law stands to-day. I would ask nothing better than to change the law so that every excise duty would be payable with an excise stamp. Then we could know the revenue we were getting out of stamps, but as it is now, we cannot. Would the people stand for such a change in the law? Would they say it was too much inconvenience to carry excise stamps in their pockets as well as postage stamps? I do not know. I would be willing to take a chance on that, in order that the revenue could be credited where it belongs, and that could be done if we had postage stamps for postal business and excise stamps for excise duties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My latter question, in fact, all the questions were addressed to the Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. BUREAU: You wanted to know how far the excise tax was responsible, and I wanted to help by stating the case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite willing to admit that my hon. friend is of great assistance in any cause in which he is engaged.

Mr. BUREAU: Do not get sarcastic. It is your law that is there when it comes to customs; the mistake is yours.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I still say that I was talking to the Acting Postmaster General. Now we can arrive approximately at what we are after. For example, what was the amount of mail matter carried during each of the three last years? Knowing that, and knowing that there is no change whatever in the rates for carrying it, we can get a pretty good approximate idea of how much excise has helped out the Post Office Department.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Postmaster General): It is very difficult to get at an accurate statement for the reasons mentioned by the Minister of Customs. I have some sympathy, as a private individual, with the suggestion of the Minister of Customs that these two things should be kept separate and that the Customs and Excise department should get credit for receipts from the stamp tax for which it is responsible; but as Acting Postmaster General I take umbrage against it. As a matter of fact, I think the amount received from the war tax last year appears in the Postmaster General's report, it is about $7,400,000, if I remember correctly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows that is not covering the question at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I thought that was exactly what my hon. friend asked me—how much was received by the Post Office Department on account of sale of stamps used under the war tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not quite got the point. He has a war tax of his own, and he shows the war tax of his department in his report. Am I wrong in that? What I was asking was the amount of stamp revenue which you got under these other war measures of taxation. I think the minister will find I am right.

Mr. GRAHAM: I took the figures in the Postmaster General's report, where the revenue from the war tax is given as about $7,400,000. It does not say that it represents the one cent extra of postage. I think it is an estimate of the amount from the entire sale of stamps on account of war tax. Whether that includes the stamp tax as we have it in the other form, I do not know. If it does not, I can see no way of getting the information, unless we give an approximate estimate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Might I suggest that the acting minister ask his representative here, who I suppose knows something about the department, as to how that amount is made up?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that this item in the Postmaster General's report refers to the proportional increase in the postal revenue from the increased letter postage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I understand that we are at one on that. The minister now knows that this extra amount raised and shown in the report has nothing whatever to do with stamps on cheques and stamps on receipts, but is merely the extra cent put on postage. We are on common ground there.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is approximately it, I suppose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether it is approximately it or not. Surely you know. I ask who this gentleman is that is advising the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: He is one of the officials of the Post Office Department, and a very efficient man.

[Mr. Graham.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which official? I want to know if he is the gentleman who is running the department now.

Mr. GRAHAM: He is chief clerk in the Secretary's branch in charge of estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Might I ask whether the gentleman is running the department now?

Mr. GRAHAM: He is in charge of the estimates, and very properly so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not saying anything against the gentleman. I am sure he is absolutely all right. I just want to know for information. If he is not running the department, who is?

Mr. GRAHAM: So far as responsibility to the country is concerned, the Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear. Good doctrine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now so far as the work goes, who is running the department?

Mr. GRAHAM: Each branch is carrying on its work as usual, reporting to the acting minister instead of to the minister, who is absent through illness.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought they usually report to the deputy, and the deputy to the minister. Who are the sub-heads reporting to now?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Murphy, no relation of the minister, is acting deputy minister, and Mr. Coolican is general superintendent of the postal service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now will the minister kindly tell me what the amount of mail carried was, the weight of the mail last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not the particulars of that here. The mails are not weighed altogether. Under the new arrangement a great deal of mail is carried by the square foot; it is carried on the space basis, and not weighed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am perfectly willing to help the minister in every possible way. If he wants to give the information by the square foot let us have it by the square foot. If he cannot give it by pounds, let us have it by the square foot, or any way he likes to give it.

Mr. HANSON: By the gallon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By the gallon perhaps.

Mr. BUREAU: That is my measure.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be the most popular measure, I presume. As a matter of fact, I have not that information here. I could put the accountants to work and get it in a few days, but that information has never been asked for in the House before in connection with the estimates. It is the expenditure, rather than the square foot or the number of pounds, that the country is interested in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have always thought that there was a record kept of the volume of business done, and I think my hon. friend will find that such a record is kept in the department. I have even seen the totals of the letters handled in different offices given at different times.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the amount, not the tons.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we will take the amount. If my hon. friend does not want to give me the information by weight, or by the square foot, will he give me the number of letters handled last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have not the information, though as I said before, we might get it by putting accountants to work and going through various returns, but that kind of information was never before contemplated as likely to be asked for in this House; it never was dreamed of. I know what my hon. friend is trying to get at. He is trying to find out, if I understand him, what the return would be from stamps used otherwise than on letters.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly. In other words we want to know your postal business and we cannot get the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been asking that question for some days in connection with the Customs department, because my hon. friend and myself have several times discussed the point as to what the proportion of money received from the stamp tax was. Now the Post Office Department sells these postage stamps but there is no way of discovering where or how the revenue should go. A stamp vendor anywhere in the country sells his stamps to John Smith, and John Smith may put those stamps on cheques or he may put them on letters. Of course an estimate might be made. If we had the receipts from the stamps which are placed on cheques we could find out then how much money is received from that source. There is this other fact: the stamp vendors get a percentage of their sales.

Mr. HANSON: The matter then amounts to this—that the minister is not in a position to say to-day whether there is a deficit or whether there is a surplus in the operation of the Post Office Department. I mention this because the Postmaster General himself, has, on various occasions, inspired the publication of items in newspapers supporting the administration to the effect that owing to the great economies which he has effected in the department he has realized a fine surplus. Now we know that the claim is false, the assumption is untrue, it cannot possibly be justified for the reasons which the Acting Postmaster General has given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a fact that the business done in 1922, by all the tests that could be applied would certainly be not more and would probably be somewhat less than in 1921. All the other tax returns of the government would go to establish it. Now, assuming that, we must at least infer that the increased revenue this year over last year is due to the increased stamp tax for the nine months. That increased revenue, as I recall, is between three and four million dollars—about $3,000,000. That would be equivalent to something over $4,000,000 for the entire year. So that the government, by these extra taxes, is taking that amount 4 p.m. of money yearly from the pockets of the people. This has caused the Postmaster General periodically to make newspaper exclamations regarding the magnificent management of the Post Office Department, and afforded stump speakers, including hon. members opposite, in by-elections the only thing that had even the outward appearance of an argument in favour of the contention that they were able to present. I heard many and many a time about the magnificent management of the Post Office Department, in that we had a surplus this year. I really felt some compassion for the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) when his colleague was taking the credit for taxes that he had assumed the onus of putting on. It did not seem quite fair to me that the Postmaster General should be boasting before the whole Dominion that he had been able to produce a surplus in that department because of the mere fact that the Excise department was taxing the people at the rate of $4,000,000 a year extra for stamps. It costs nothing to sell these stamps, or virtually nothing. Notwithstanding that though, the cost of management of the Post Office Department is annually increasing. The estimates this year show an amount very substantially more than last year. I would not think it should be more at all, because these stamps cost nothing to sell; what costs in the Post Office Department is the handling of mail and mail matter. The fact, then, appears to be that instead of having more economical management we have had less; and instead of having a modest, truthful presentation of the facts we have had periodical boasting which really is nothing more than claiming credit for taxing the people.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a mistake to think that it does not cost anything to sell stamps, but that is immaterial. It sometimes costs 50 per cent, and in other instances 20 per cent.

Mr. HANSON: That commission goes against the salaries.

Mr. GRAHAM: The fact is it costs money to sell these stamps.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Take it all through, it does not require 10 per cent to sell the stamps or near that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not figured out the average. In a good many cases it costs 20 per cent, in others 40 per cent, and in others again 50 per cent; I do not think there is any question about it. I am not trying to pretend that the Post Office revenue has not been swollen by the stamp tax, I admit it has, but to what extent I have been unable to find out. I have tried in various ways to ascertain, but there does not seem to be any system of accounting to cover that point—that is any system which makes a distinction between the two classes of stamps. The revenue of the Post Office Department must, of necessity, be swollen considerably by the sale of stamps that are not used for postage.

Mr. MacLAREN: Where is the printing done?

Mr. GRAHAM: The stamps are printed by the American Bank Note Company under contract with the Finance department.

Mr. MacLAREN: But the other printing business, where is that done?

Mr. GRAHAM: At the Printing bureau.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is it all done there?

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine it is practically all done there.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am given to understand that there is some printing done outside the Printing bureau. Can the minister inform me as to that?

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Civil government—Post Office—salaries and contingencies, $1,271,448.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I am in a position now to give fairly accurately the information sought for in reference to the probable amount of revenue derived from the stamp tax this year in excess of that of last year. Last year the whole issue of stamps was approximately $28,000,000. This year it is estimated that at the end of the year it will be about $29,750,000. That is the issue. The officials have estimated that the sale this year will exceed the sale of last year by about $1,250,000.

Mr. NEILL: I would ask the minister, if I might, why he does not compel the public to put revenue stamps on their cheques? Last year the government imposed a very heavy tax in the way of stamps to be placed on cheques, and this was done by means of putting on ordinary postage stamps. Had the government compelled the public at very small inconvenience—or, as I hold, at practically no inconvenience—to buy revenue stamps, the confusion which we have been talking about all afternoon would have been avoided, because each branch would then have its revenue properly credited to it, and the work would be done a great deal cheaper. When you buy stamps to put on your cheque in a country town the post office official gets from 30 to 40 per cent of their face value. This is his commission; in other words, we are imposing a tax upon the public and are paying 30 to 40 per cent for the cost of collecting this particular tax. Take any other tax, such as the income tax, and you will find that the government will claim that the collection can be made for from 3 to 4 per cent. Why is not this system adopted in connection with this particular tax for the collection of which we are paying between 30 and 40 per cent? The public could easily use revenue stamps and this would entail no inconvenience and no confusion. It may be claimed that it would be inconvenient and confusing, but this is not so, because when a man buys one class of stamps at the post office he can equally as well buy the other class. Moreover we have precedent to back us up. When the late government first introduced the tax, which was then a small one, it was provided that revenue or postage stamps might be affixed to cheques. But unfortunately the matter was left optional, and when anyone went to the post office he had the privilege of using either an excise stamp or the ordinary stamp. The postmaster of course, got 40 per cent on the postage stamps while he got only one per cent on the sale of the revenue or excise stamps, and like most people he pushed the sale of the article on which he was getting the bigger profit. You might say you wanted revenue stamps and he would reply that postage stamps would do just as well and would add that he was short of revenue stamps. In the course of a few months therefore there was practically no sale for the revenue stamps. The mistake the government made at that time was in not making it compulsory for the public to use revenue stamps. The postmaster gets only one per cent on the sale of the revenue stamps, which can also be purchased from the banks, who get the same commission. If the government adopted exclusively the system of compelling the public to buy revenue stamps to put on cheques the inconvenience would be very slight and the profit to the country would be considerable. Besides this, all the confusion and dispute as to where the money should be allocated would be obviated. I would ask the minister if there is any reason that he knows of in connection with the carrying out of this business why that system should not be adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM: The only reason I have heard advanced against the system is the one of inconvenience to the public. There is a great difference of opinion upon that point. The average person buys postage stamps, and when people wish to issue cheques, in many cases the only place where they can get stamps keeps only the one kind. When the postage stamp is used for both purposes there is no confusion. It has been suggested to me that, under the conditions detailed by my hon. friend, the ordinary individual who used very few revenue stamps and a great many postage stamps might find himself putting revenue stamps on letters in spite of all his care, and putting postage stamps on cheques. Whether that reason is real or imaginary I am not prepared to say, but it is advanced at any rate. I might add that the public do not like taxes anyway, and if you impose them in the most inconvenient form they are annoying to say the least. There is a great deal to be said, however, in favour of having separate stamps for the two purposes. It would enable the Finance department or the Excise department to know exactly how effective any particular tax was. Take, for instance, the receipt tax. Under present conditions it is impossible accurately to state the revenue from the tax receipts. It can, of course, be estimated, but at best it is only an estimate, because the postage stamps that pass through the Postal department are used on these receipts. If there were a revenue stamp in use there would be no question at all, and the accounts between the Postal department and the Inland Revenue department would be cleancut, and we should have no discussion such as has taken place this afternoon in regard to the proper allocation of revenue. There is a good deal to be said on both sides. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) has had the matter under advisement for a considerable time, and had the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) been in good health and in the city they would probably have had some conferences concerning it. In the meantime I think I might say that on his return the matter will be discussed with the Minister of Customs because, as I have observed, there is much to be said on either side of the question. Certainly, from the standpoint of the accountants of the Finance department, it would be a great advantage to know what taxes were equitable and were really producing income, and this result would no doubt be effected by the use of separate stamps.

Mr. NEILL: I would point out that it is no more embarrassing for a man to buy at the post office one dollar's worth of postage stamps and one dollar's worth of revenue stamps than it is for him to ask for a dollar's worth of 3-cent stamps and a dollar's worth of 2-cent stamps. He can do the one as easily as the other. I would point out also that although the method I have suggested might be slightly inconvenient, which I do not think it would be, the general public are getting educated, and if they knew, as they do know and as they realize, that the present method of collecting the tax is costing them 40 per cent whereas it would cost them only one per cent under the other system, they would undoubtedly put up with the trivial inconvenience that might be involved.

Mr. FORKE: Why does it cost only 1 per cent to sell revenue stamps and as high as 40 per cent to sell postage stamps? I would hesitate a good while before I would change the present system, because I think there is a good deal in what the Acting Postmaster General says about the inconveniences such a change would be to the public. The amount of money that is gathered for revenue through the use of postage stamps on cheques is, I believe, somewhat exaggerated, for all the large business organizations use revenue stamps, and it is only in the smaller businesses and among private individuals that postage stamps are used for revenue purposes. I can quite understand the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) objecting to the present method—I do not know whether he does or not, as a matter of fact—but it would be quite natural for him to do so, because apparently the Postmaster General now gets credit for revenue that is not rightfully his. I do not believe the amount involved is very large after all. Perhaps the minister can tell us why it should cost from 10 to 40 per cent to sell postage stamps? It seems to me an exorbitant amount for the business done.

Mr. GRAHAM: The major part of the salaries of country postmasters is paid by commission on the sale of stamps.

Mr. FORKE: Then we will remember that in the estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: If a country postmaster were selling revenue stamps for the Customs department he would only get paid really a commission on such sales, while in the other case he is paid in a measure for handling the mail as well by a percentage commission on the sale of postage stamps. In the city offices where stated salaries of a reasonable amount are paid the vendor of stamps gets I think from one to two per cent.

Mr. MacLAREN: Has the minister yet the detailed information on the question I asked in reference to the post office printing?

Mr. GRAHAM: We give our orders to the Printing bureau. The bureau supplies the printing to the postal department. For the most part, if not all, the bureau does the printing itself.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does the postal department arrange for its own printing outside of the Printing bureau?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. The practice is for the postal printing to be handed to the Printing bureau. The only order given outside direct by the postal department was for a convention programme.

Mr. MacLAREN: My information is that some of the post office printing is done outside of the Printing bureau. With the exception of these convention programmes does the minister state that all the printing for the postal department is done either through the Printing bureau or by the latter arranging it to be done outside?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is my information.

Mr. MacLAREN: Would the minister make some further investigation on that point? Of course, my information may be incorrect, but I am informed that some printing is done on the order of the Post Office Department outside of the Printing bureau.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is it?

Mr. MacLAREN: Are all money orders printed through the Printing bureau?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what I thought my hon. friend had in mind. I am informed that the printing of money orders is done through the Printing bureau and not direct by the postal department.

Mr. BOYS: I should certainly like to support the suggestion that revenue stamps be put upon cheques and receipts, but I think it would be a great mistake to compel the public to put a two-cent postage stamp and a one-cent revenue stamp upon letters. Such a regulation would lead to no end of inconvenience, would arouse a lot of adverse criticism throughout the country, and would not secure the information that we have been seeking. If you had revenue stamps on cheques and receipts, and restricted postage stamps to letters, the department could take one-third of the revenue from postage stamps and treat it as belonging to the Department of Customs, which would give us the information we are after now. But I am sure the public would view with disfavour any suggestion of having to put a two-cent stamp of one variety and a one-cent stamp of another variety upon every letter for delivery outside of their own town.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with my hon. friend that such a regulation would be objectionable. The revenue stamp tax as we may call it could be kept separate, but I do not think it would be advisable to divide the postage of letters.

Mr. BOYS: The reason I interjected my observation was because I rather thought the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was that a man might go to the wicket of a post office and buy one hundred two-cent stamps of one variety and one-hundred one-cent stamps of another variety, and I presumed his idea was that the purchaser would put a two-cent stamp and a one-cent stamp of each variety on his letters. That is what I want to protest against. It would lead to no end of inconvenience, and I am satisfied it would not prove popular.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman does small credit to the common sense of the member for Comox-Alberni if he thinks that that is what I suggested.

Mr. MacLAREN: What objection is there to following the British method in regard to stamps, a method which has been in use for such a long period?

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the English practice?

Mr. MacLAREN: They have a revenue stamp for revenue purposes, and a postage stamp for postal purposes.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is really what I think the Minister of Customs is endeavouring to get, so that he will have his revenue absolutely separated from the revenue of the Post Office Department. When the Postmaster General returns I imagine that the customs collector will call upon him the same afternoon concerning this matter, as he has been pressing quite hard to have some new arrangement adopted to accomplish this purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand from my hon. friend that the Postmaster General is returning home. When is he expected?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Prime Minister intimated the other night that the Postmaster General would not be back until after the middle of May. In his present state of health his doctor is very doubtful if he will be able to return even then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole result is that nothing will be done, because you cannot pass any legislation after the House prorogues.

Mr. BUREAU: I will try to get something done before that time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As this matter has nothing whatever to do with postal administration, it is hardly a good excuse to shelve it until the Postmaster General comes back. This has nothing to do with the postal service; it relates to special taxation, and I do not see why the matter should stand until the return of the Postmaster General—which means simply shelving it. I hope that, as the Minister of Customs suggests, an effort will be made to put our accounts in more business-like shape. Not only is it the fact that when but one stamp was necessary for cheques the volume of income attributable to the sale of stamps for other than postal services was negligible compared to what it is now, but in the case of banks and other corporations the stamps were for the most part embossed on the cheques, so that the accounts could be properly kept.

Mr. BUREAU: That was not done in the majority of cases, though.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, in the case of the majority of banks.

Mr. BUREAU: But the public did not buy them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very largely, yes. I noticed also that through the amendment of the Minister of Customs provision is made for Mr. Anderson. That of course, means that Mr. Anderson's employment is not subject to the Civil Service Act. Has my hon. friend not overlooked many other names that ought to be added if he desires to have the department run in conformity with the law? Over a year ago a vacancy occurred in the postmastership at Woodbridge. About a month afterwards an appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission to fill the vacancy, but that appointment has never been confirmed by the government, and an outsider from Toronto has been brought in to do the work. My hon. friend knows that is illegal—or is the department to be administered without respect to law? I am not referring to the matter from the point of view of patronage; I am simply dealing with the question whether the Post Office Department is above the law. My hon. friend will find that in not less than twenty-three other cases appointments were properly made by the Civil Service Commission and just as regularly, for political reasons, disregarded. Now the thing is being legalized in the case of Mr. Anderson; why should the minister not also legalize it at Woodbridge and in connection with these other offices? I would like to know from what votes the payments to these persons are made and who in the department is responsible for them. Under the act it is an offence for any payment to be made in such cases after the expiration of six months. The Postmaster General has managed to get rid of officers who were doing very good work. He has managed to get rid of the former chief inspector, of a very efficient deputy, Mr. Coulter; and apparently, from what was said in the House last night, he is managing to get at outs with a very competent official of the department, Mr. Lemaire. My hon. friend may find it difficult, therefore, to pick up the scattered threads and determine just how these matters stand, but for a commencement I would ask him to give me the date of the appointment by the Civil Service Commission of the postmaster at Woodbridge.

Mr. BALDWIN: Last evening arguments were advanced in favour of increasing the remuneration of rural mail carriers and establishing new rural mail routes. As a last clincher to the argument one hon. member said: "We have a surplus and can afford to do it." Every well-posted citizen knows that that is beside the fact. I suggest, therefore, that the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) make a ruling that excise stamps shall be used on cheques, notes and other documents.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a question of legislation, not of ruling.

Mr. BALDWIN: If it can be done, whether by legislation or by ruling, let it be done. I have received letters from people who wanted to get the contract for rural mail delivery at less than was being paid for the existing contract. A great deal has been said here by way of comparing conditions in Canada with those in the United States. I would like to know how many holidays hon. members would want the rural mail carriers to have, whether five, seven or nine. We who live in rural sections know that there are more days than that on which the people in rural districts do not get their mail each year owing to the roads being made impassable by storms. The mail carrier, for instance, does not carry the mail on Christmas Day or New Year's Day, and if a great storm comes up between one of these holidays and the ensuing Sunday the people living in the rural sections would not get their mail for several days. These are actual facts. It is better for the mail carrier to work when the roads are good than when the roads are bad. I was very well acquainted with the man who had control of the rural mail delivery system in Minnesota, and he informed me that there were several days in each year when delivery of mail was impossible on account of severe storms, the breaking up of the roads, and so on. It is the same in northern New England but there are no holidays.

If the mail carriers were to be granted all the legal holldays, as some hon. members have advocated we would be in a fine predicament because there are people living in these back sections who occasionally have some business to do. They may occasionally receive a lawyer's letter giving them perhaps one or two days to pay, or maybe a notice from their bank. That is something that these kind-hearted members who spoke last night in favour of this profligate use of our public money might well consider. We know that all municipal taxes throughout this great country and the United States have doubled and trebled of recent years, and it is because of this wishy-washy way of doing business, of bonusing people, giving them holidays and letting them out of a contract and get more money. In the United States with its much denser population there are ten more patrons to the mile of rural mail routes than there are in this country. We have many rural mail routes that never should have been established. There are instances where a mail carrier is driving on a spur road two or three miles and back. There is nothing like that in the United States. In that country if people live on a spur line they must come down to the main line if they want to get their mail. I only mention these facts because there seems to be quite a mix-up in the ideas of some hon. gentlemen regarding the rural mail delivery system.

Mr. BOYS: May I ask if my hon. friend has any spur line in his riding?

Mr. BALDWIN: I have.

Mr. BOYS: Of two or three miles in length?

Mr. BALDWIN: I certainly have.

Mr. BOYS: I have been trying to get one or two and could not succeed.

Mr. BALDWIN: They were established in my county in 1915. There are a great many routes costing this country altogether too much. In my county there were mail routes running practically across the county that cost not more than six or seven hundred dollars and that are now costing more than six or seven thousand dollars and serving the same people. Many of these rural communities that are being served by the rural mail service would be glad to have it abolished and go back to the little post office. A great many queer things happen in some cases. Certain little kitchen post offices were left, and post offices that were well conducted, housed in a public building in a community where there were two or three churches, and where business was being done, were obliterated because some postmaster may have voted for reciprocity in 1911.

Mr. BOYS: I congratulate you on your influence.

Mr. BALDWIN: I was a postmaster and mail carrier for thirty-six years, so I have some knowledge of handling the mails.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister can now give me the information I asked him for.

Mr. GRAHAM: The officer is not here at the moment. I have not the data, but I think my hon. friend would know it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to get it on Hansard. There are twenty-three other cases I want to take up with my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are not twenty-three cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the appointments must have been straightened out recently.

Mr. GRAHAM: These cases are only temporary. They arise because of conflict between the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission as to their nominee. Out of the hundreds of appointments to post offices, large and small, and until recently they all came under the Civil Service Commission, speaking from memory there are only twelve or thirteen appointments outstanding now. That is not a very large proportion.

The date of the certificate issued by the commission was the 29th of June, 1922. Take the case of Woodbridge. I am not going into details. The commission have absolute power to make that appointment, and eventually their nominee if they do not change their mind will have to be the man appointed. In the meantime there is a temporary man placed in charge of the post office at Woodbridge. The contention of the department is that both being returned soldiers the man named by the department having had postal experience is the better qualified for this position. Personally, I do not know, but that is the contention of the department, and they hope to be able to convince the Civil Service Commission that they are right. As a matter of fact, the commission has the authority and their judgment must eventually prevail if they cannot be convinced that it would be wiser to name the other man.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask my hon. friend how long he thinks these vacancies should stand. I want to point out some things to him. The act provides that temporary appointments may be made for six months. That is the limitation imposed by the act. Now these vacancies have stood a good deal longer than six months. At Woodbridge the temporary man who was put in there was brought up from Toronto. I quite admit that they are both returned men, but I would ask my hon. friend whether he does not think in connection with these country post offices that the appointment should go, as it always did in the past, to a resident of the village? Or does he think a man should be brought in from outside? That is what is being done. There is no possible excuse why the law should not be complied with unless it is that the Postmaster General of this country says that he puts himself above the law. There is no good having any half measures here. What is the use of having criminal statutes if ministers of the Crown act with cynical indifference to the laws that are supposed to bind them? Is it simply because the hon. gentleman is in the position of trust that he now occupies that he is to be regarded as above the law? Should he not rather be the first to show others that the law ought to be respected? Does not my hon. friend think so? The people of that place had the right to have the law observed and that appointment made. I would ask my hon. friend how it is that the cheques for payment have been able to be smuggled past the Auditor General, because under the act payments are only allowed to be made for these temporary purposes for six months? What is my hon. friend paying these temporary men, and where is the money coming from? What officer of his is certifying to these payments?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Civil Service Commission, as I understand it, does not take the extreme view that my hon. friend has announced just now. I do not think there is any law being violated. I would not like to refer to the Auditor General as my hon. friend has done. I do not think anything can be smuggled by the Auditor General of this country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is the Auditor General of this country?

Mr. GRAHAM: Well then, the Auditor General's office. If my hon. friend thinks that is the case, he should go after the officials of that department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, the certificate would come from this department.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend did not say that. He said it was being smuggled past the Auditor General.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: All right, Hansard will show.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I said, and Hansard will show it, was that I would like to know who the official is who is supposed to see the law carried out but is certifying to these payments so that they can get past the Auditor General.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think there is any question of smuggling names or cooking accounts. It cannot be possible, I do not think there is anything of the kind. There has never been any question as to any of these payments in the case of this office or other offices similarly circumstanced. As I understand it, rural postmasters are not regarded with the same strictness, in the matter of the six months' limit, as perhaps other civil servants are, because the Civil Service Commission readily understands the difficulties surrounding the appointment of these officers as distinguished from those that are appointed to the inside service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that before the item passes my hon. friend should bring down the papers showing exactly how these payments are made. My hon. friend says that the general act does not apply to the postmaster.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I so understood my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: You understood wrongly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I am very happy to be corrected. If the general act does apply we have no right to make any of these payments after the expiration of the six months, and we are entitled to know therefore how they could be made. Consequently, as the minister does not say that the act does not apply, I will ask him to bring down the papers showing how these payments are made.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will bring down the papers. In the meantime we can continue with the item.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I will have to ask that it stand until the information for which I asked has been brought down.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are other hon. members who doubtless wish to discuss the item; my hon. friend is not the only one who has the right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Chairman asked whether the item should carry. I have no objection to anybody else discussing it, none whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM: Go on and discuss it then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister seemed to think that somebody else wanted the floor and, of course, I should be very pleased to yield the floor, or anything else, to my hon. friend at any time. I notice we are having an increase in the staff.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, a reduction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A reduction, is it? That is splendid. In the general total there is a reduction, but I notice that in some instances there are changes in the numbers. Has my hon. friend any particulars to give as to that? Is there anything he lays any claim to in connection with that as to economy or the like?

5 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In which case?

Mr. GRAHAM: In the whole. There is an abolition of sixteen positions and the creation of eight positions with smaller salaries, a reduction of eight officials. although there have been some increases in salary, statutory and otherwise, there is a decrease in the whole amount of $2,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just while we are on the question of totals, will my hon. friend give the receipts of the department up to the end of the year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Up to the end of the year, as I informed my hon. friend some time ago, the receipts would be about 29¼ millions.

The issue of stamps would amount to more than that, but the receipts would be about that total.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that should be gross receipts.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is gross receipts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If it is then was my hon. friend right when he said that more stamps would be sold. It was stamps issued, was it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, issued.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the item carries I want to know exactly how the regular practice which has been referred to is being carried on in this department. It may be that when the information comes down we will find there is nothing irregular, there may be some extraordinary explanation of it, but at present there is what, on the face of it, is a confession that the law is absolutely disregarded in connection with the Woodbridge post office. My hon. friend says the law is disregarded in connection with some eleven other post offices and he says it is a very small number. I think my hon. friend will find there are more cases than the eleven which he admits.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will tell my hon. friend the exact number.

Mr. HOCKEN: The details show a decrease of something over $2,000. Will the minister tell us the amount of the superannuation allowance in the case of the former deputy minister and the former superintendent of postal services because, I think, if these two items are added the decrease becomes an increase. I want to say that in superannuating these gentlemen the government has got rid of the two most experienced and best qualified postal officers in the Dominion, men who are just as capable of doing the work they formerly did as they ever were and perhaps a little more so. Instead of trying to promote economy it looks as though the Postmaster General were trying to put a friend into a lucrative position; under the guise of a superannuation the government have practically dismissed the former deputy minister and his chief assistant, the postal superintendent. If you add the superannuation in each case to the expenditure it will show an increase instead of a decrease. And this is done by a government that makes some sort of spurious claim to be economical.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend asked for the retiring allowance. Dr. Coulter receives $4,200 and Mr. Ross $3,900.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is over $8,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend must remember that both these gentlemen paid a certain amount into the superannuation fund. Their retirement would not involve any charge at all upon the post office; the fund from which that is taken is a different one altogether. If my hon. friend's argument were correct we might take the whole list of superannuations that have taken place in connection with the department and charge the expense against the Post Office Department. Both of these gentlemen asked for their retirement and it was granted.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is there correspondence to show that?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have a copy of Dr. Coulter's letter. I have already read it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Frozen out.

Mr. HOCKEN: Did Mr. Ross ask for his superannuation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed so. I have read Dr. Coulter's letter.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would like to see the letter brought down.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which letter?

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Ross.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will get copies of them both.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the acting minister seriously wants to let the House understand that either of these gentlemen got out voluntarily. I do not think the Postmaster General, if he were here, would say so. I think the minister would take the responsibility for bringing about their retirement, rightly or wrongly—he would claim, of course, rightly. But the fact undoubtedly is, unless I am very much misinformed, that the minister came to the conclusion that they should be out, and then he proceeded to get their resignations, their requests for retirement. They came. Of the fact I do not want to speak at first hand knowledge; but I feel so convinced that that is the case, that I do not think the minister should seek to give the House the other impression. There are circumstances when such a course is justified, That I am not discussing for the moment; but I object to the House being given the impression that these men wanted to get out of the service, and that they came forward themselves and forced themselves out. I am quite certain that is not the case. The minister is talking around the subject when he says that they paid into the retirement fund and became entitled to the $4,200 and the $3,900. That is correct, and the amount is not charged against the Post office Department, but it comes out of the country. If they were in the service, they would not be getting that. They would be getting the salaries that the new men are getting, and the country would be saved this $8,100 until the time came for them to retire. Therefore, what the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Hocken) says is absolutely right. Instead of being ahead, the country is behind just the difference between the $8,100 and the $2,000. Is it not a fact that Mr. Hector Verret has been retired?

Mr. GRAHAM: Some time ago, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But by the present minister within the last fiscal year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the position was abolished by the Griffenhagens.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be a very good thing. That would be a contraction. I see this does not appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. LAPOINTE: It certainly does.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Everything except an expansion is a joke to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some contractions are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nobody, I understand, in Mr. Verret's place?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was informed the position is abolished.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the government does not undo that piece of good work that was done by the late government, although I am really apprehensive that it will, and get somebody in there. As regards those two gentlemen, they have been relieved of their duties by the will of the minister, with the result that the country is out at least $6,100.

Mr. BOYS: Has there been any change in the policy of the department respecting what we have been calling spur lines? As I understand the matter, what is meant is this. A carrier has to go two or three miles up the line and has to double and come back. If there has been a change, I should like to secure one or two extra services in the county of Simcoe. I note that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) said that in his constituency he had a number of those. I congratulate him; he has done good work for his patrons in his constituency, and I would like to do the same for mine.

Another matter I should like to bring forward is this. I do not want the department to do for me anything that is not being done for others. I have five farmers on a route, and the furthest one happens to be within a mile from where the carrier passes on the highway. I understand there is a rule of the department that they will not serve any man who is not a mile away, even if he is on a spur. The result is that these five men have to walk, perhaps in very stormy weather, all the way from a quarter of a mile to seven-eighths of a mile to the corner, and there they may have to wait half an hour or an hour on a bad day for the carrier to come along. A change of that kind would not be very expensive. I suppose there are many such instances; but if that sort of thing is being done in other ridings, and there has been a change in policy, we should all know of it, because I have no doubt that every member has cases of this kind, and it is not right that some should be successful in their efforts to secure relief while that relief is denied to others.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine the same policy applies as far as practicable to all communities. There may be certain circumstances surrounding particular communities where the population is very dense, where there may be an exception; but I know of none, and I know of no change in policy. Surely in the older sections it is not cruel to ask a man to walk nearly a mile when there are in this country so many sections where people have to drive seven or eight miles to get their mail. I do not think any exceptional treatment is being given.

Mr. BALDWIN: The mail route of which I spoke before was established in the summer of 1915 against all overtures of mine and everything that I could do myself to prevent its being established, not by this government, but by the late government. That is in connection with what I said about a postmaster being dismissed for having voted for reciprocity in 1911.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is causing the delay in appointing a deputy minister for the department and in filling the other position of superintendent?

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, I am not in a position to say what is causing the delay. I would presume that it is the illness of the minister more than anything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the cause of that?

Mr. HOCKEN: Is it the delay that is causing the minister's illness, or the minister's illness that is causing the delay?

Mr. GRAHAM: I might as well make it clear that there is no question of the minister's illness and serious illness. I would not want any of the members to be led to believe that there was not a serious condition of health existing with the Postmaster General. I know that to be true.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is a very serious thing that a department of this kind should run along so far and through the session of this House without any responsible person in charge, without any person who knows the department to represent it in this House. There is no deputy minister to come and advise the acting minister about anything connected with the department. That is a serious thing and some effort should be made to fill these positions. Perhaps the acting minister can appoint a deputy.

Mr. GRAHAM: The acting minister will not do that. I will call my hon. friend's attention to this fact, that he was quite contented, in times gone by, to have a minister who never came into this House. The Postmaster General was then in the Senate. No person regrets more than I do the absence of the Postmaster General.

Mr. HOCKEN: He had a deputy minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: As good Samaritans do in a government or elsewhere, whoever is able does his best to carry the burden of the absent one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister have any hopes of being relieved of either the Militia department or the Railway department in the near future, and if so, which one? He ought to know about that.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend is really asking too much.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister will, perhaps, give us the list he has of post offices held up.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were twenty. My hon. friend was nearly right. Since the list was made, postmasters appointed by the commission have taken charge of five.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When were the appointments made?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will hand my hon. friend the list I have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I suppose this can be put on Hansard without wasting the time of the committee in reading it.

Mr. GRAHAM: It has already been brought down as a return.

Mr. HOCKEN: Get a ruling on it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The right hon. the leader of the Opposition moved for it one day in the absence of some other hon. member, I forget whom. At any rate it has been brought down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice from it that my hon. friend has apparently obeyed the law in connection with the five cases. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not put it that way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be too frank.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it not be true?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not go so far because I want to be accurate, and I do not want to admit even tacitly that I broke the law. I would say, that, as in all cases, investigations are proceeding and communications are being exchanged, and the department after conference and due consideration have given instructions for the postmasters, to whom certificates were issued by the Civil Service Commission, to take their places in these five instances. As a matter of fact it is only a question of time, unless the commission changes its mind, when the same thing must be done in connection with all cases, because the power eventually rests with the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I to understand that the cases against which the minister has a mark are the ones in which the law has been carried out?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not put it that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these the cases in which the appointments made by the commission have been made effective?

Mr. GRAHAM: I stated the matter clearly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, to the average person. I explained that in these five cases, after conference and investigation, the department had given instructions for the persons to whom the Civil Service Commission had issued certificates to be placed in charge of the offices.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend conceive it to be the duty of a minister to carry out the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission under the act?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be the duty of a minister to see that the laws governing his department were carried out; and unless the minister or the department can convince the commission that its appointee is not the best qualified person for the office in question, then eventually the minister must acquiesce in the appointment of the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Another question. In the minister's view, how long a time has a minister the right to hang up these appointments?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend, lawyer-like, is of course getting down to the cross-questioning.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all; I am merely trying to get the facts, that is all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say that my hon. friend was trying to get the facts; he is trying to elicit opinions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asking your opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, you know, opinions are not evidence. My hon. friend is not trying to get the facts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to the statutes, but you do not like statutes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course, my opinion I can give for what it is worth. Circumstances differ and each case has to be dealt with on its merits, and as the responsible head of the department views those merits. Conditions might arise in one case that would not at all obtain in the other, and the information necessary to be submitted to the commission might be more easily obtainable in one case than in another. My view, as I have already expressed it, is that eventually the Civil Service Commission, if it adheres to a nominee of its own, must make the appointment, as it has the right to do under the act. But in order that the public may be served as efficiently as possible, and that the machinery of government, not only of the departments but of the Civil Service Commission as well, might work smoothly, I think, the commission act fairly in allowing a reasonable time in which to see whether information cannot be placed before them which might lead them to view the situation as the Post Office Department views it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder whether my hon. friend can tell me what investigation is going on at Woodbridge? He says that when the investigation is over the appointment will be made unless the Civil Service Commission changes it mind. Well, what investigation is now going on?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not care to give the details.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend knows there are none. He must certainly know that nothing has been done, but that there has been a mere refusal by the minister to carry out the law. Nothing has been done in connection with the thing for months, and if the minister wants to say now, as a matter of fact, that an investigation is going on, then I would ask for the details.

Mr. GRAHAM: Further inquiries are being made. Now that my hon. friend has asked so many questions, showing that he has no confidence in the acting minister or in the department and being evidently under the impression that we are smuggling things by, I might inform him that I have given instructions to hasten to a conclusion as rapidly as possible some of these positions which he says are being hung up. I do not think that anything can be gained by hurrying too rapidly, and personally I should like to know all the circumstances. Now, I could relate some circumstances about Woodbridge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Go on.

Mr. GRAHAM: But that would not help the situation there; and I could do the same in regard to a good many others. That, however, is not my province. I want to get matters cleared up as rapidly as possible and that is what I purpose doing. I do not want to say anything further until I get all the information I want.

Mr. BRISTOL: Assuming that the Civil Service Commission has appointed a postmaster at Woodbridge, is it the function of the minister, not merely to examine into the qualifications of the appointee, but also to nominate someone else for the appointment, giving reasons therefor?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I would not go that length. In the case of Woodbridge the man is in charge now who was in charge when the certificate was issued to the other man.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The position is temporary.

Mr. GRAHAM: It can only be temporary. He has been there now since the certificate was issued to the other man.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He has been there a year.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not make any difference how long he has been there. The other man's certificate was issued in June, 1922, and that is quite a while ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can he be kept in the position for more than six months?

Mr. GRAHAM: He has been kept in it and paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Illegally.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think the commission complies strictly with the act in regard to this six months' provision, in the case of the outside service. I do not think that is their practice. However, these matters will be cleared up in due course, and I want to see it done in all these cases and see the occupants of the positions made permanent as nearly as possible.

Mr. BRISTOL: The point I am getting at is simple. Members of parliament to-day are not permitted—at least that is the understanding—to make recommendations to the Civil Service Commission as to who they think should be appointed as postmasters or in any other capacity. I take that to be the law; at least it is what is generally understood to be the practice, the object being to preclude patronage. Now, is it a fact, with reference to these twenty or any one of them, that the minister of the department recommends to the commission some person in lieu of an appointee whom the commission has already recommended? Is that the practice now, or has it been done in any case? If it has, it seems to me perfectly clear that the most powerful person is endeavouring to exercise patronage and induce the Civil Service Commission to make other appointments that do not seem to be in compliance with the law.

Mr. BUREAU: Read the evidence before the committee. It is to the contrary.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing to hinder my hon. friend making a recommendation to the Civil Service Commission, but that does not mean that his nominee would be appointed; he might be or he might not.

Mr. BRISTOL: I understood it was not proper for us to do so. I am glad to know that it is proper.

Mr. GRAHAM: You will find the Civil Service Commission receives recommendations from all sorts of persons; I know the department does. When a vacancy occurs an inspector of the department places a person in charge temporarily until such time as the Civil Service Commission makes its selection. In this case the department, rightly or wrongly has differed with some of the nominees of the Civil Service Commission on information that the department has. But the occupancy of the position by any person other than the commisioners' appointee is and can only be temporary, and eventually, if the Civil Service Commission does not change its viewpoint, its nominee is the proper person for the vacancy and must be appointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If what the minister says is carried to its logical conclusion it merely means that the intent of the act is defeated. The Civil Service Commission makes the appointment to the position. The government have the power to refuse that appointment. They would be justified in refusing to confirm it if, on the appointment being notified to them, they knew of circumstances that in their judgment disqualified the appointee, in which event it would be the duty of the government, I think, simply to transmit those circumstances to the commission. That would not involve any delay at all, would be carrying out the spirit of the act, and would be as far as the government in any case would be justified in going. If, on the other hand, after the Civil Service Commission makes an appointment, the government set to work to find whether the appointee is going to suit them from all standpoints, and they have an investigation themselves over the action of the commission, and they have a temporary man continued and continued temporarily in the position until they get through with their investigation, that is simply defeating the act. The word "eventually" means nothing; the word "temporary" means very little. Temporary employment may be for ten years. The act provides for six months, but six months should not be necessary. The duty of the government to install a man at once, unless they know of circumstances, not political, that they believe have not been brought to the mind of the commission, in which event they would be right in transmitting the information. Beyond that they have not any right to go ahead conducting prolonged investigations in review of the work of the Civil Service Commission. I think that is a fair statement of the position. If the government just go far enough in the exercise of the prerogative that the minister says they have, why, they might just as well recommend the repeal of the act. Putting a man in a vacancy in the first place, and keeping him there until the government is satisfied after their own investigation of the recommendation of the commission, is simply repealing the act.

Mr. BUREAU: It ought to be repealed anyway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood my hon. friend is going to bring down the pay sheets showing just how these temporary employees are paid. It may be that they can be paid legally under the act, but I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not made any promise to bring down the pay sheets. My hon. friend wanted to know how we "smuggled" in those pay sheets. That was the word he used. I insisted that they were not "smuggled." He asked by whose authority payments were made and I told him I would get the information. I do not propose to bring down all the pay sheets.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I only want a sample.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will bring down the information I promised to clear his mind. In the meantime we might as well go on discussing the item, because I suppose there will be a discussion on it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not believe any one wishes to discuss it further. I suppose this statement from the minister is to go in Hansard?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): It will have to be read if it is to go in Hansard, unless unanimous consent is given for it to be taken as read.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am willing to have it go in Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. gentleman wants it read I have pleasure in complying with his wishes. This, then, Mr. Chairman, is a list of post office appointments which have been hung up by the hon. Postmaster General. The first column contains the names of the post offices, the second column the names of the commission's nominees, the third column their military status, and the fourth column the names of the temporary incumbents. Bearing this description in mind, I now read the list. The first place is Alexandria, Ontario; the commission has appointed Mr. W. A. Morrison; his military status is O.A.S.; the Postmaster General maintains Mr. Peter Ferguson in Mr. Morrison's place.

Mr. BUREAU: What does O.A.S. mean?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will have to ask the minister; I am reading his own list.

Mr. ROBB: Overseas active service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The next place is St. Barnabe Nord, P.Q.; the commission's nominee is Mr. J. N. Gelinas—

Mr. DUFF: How do you spell that name?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Capital G-e-l-i-n-a-s.

Mr. BUREAU: Go on. I know about that case; it is all right too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Gelinas' position is held by a nominee of the Postmaster General, Mr. Charles Marcouiller. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like me to spell that name?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suggest that my hon. friend is not reading the document; he is editing it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend is objecting to my method of reading I am quite ready to change it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Put the document in Hansard.

Mr. BUREAU: Mr. Chairman, may we comment on this as the hon. gentleman proceeds?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: This man Gelinas bought out the place from his predecessor, Gelinas. I was informed of it. I said that even though under the old administration it was the custom to barter post office or other government jobs I would not stand for it. Thereupon Mr. Marcouiller was chosen and appointed by the Civil Service Commission. There are the facts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the return is all wrong; it does not show how the department acted.

Mr. DUFF: You are reading it upside down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am reading the statement as I received it from the Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. GRAHAM: Leave out the editing and get it right—read it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Here it is. The commission's nominee is stated to be J. N. Gelinas. My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) says they did not appoint him, they appointed Charles Marcouiller.

Mr. BUREAU: They appointed him and then dismissed him when they found he was bartering a public office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is there now?

Mr. BUREAU: Marcouiller.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is there—

Mr. BUREAU: And he is going to stay. He has the sanction of the Civil Service Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask my friend if he will not bring down a statement that gives us the facts—

An hon. MEMBER: Go on with your reading.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —because the facts are incorrectly stated here apparently.

Mr. BUREAU: No, the facts are correctly stated, Mr. Chairman. The Civil Service Commission, through their inspector, Mr. Green, recommended this man Gelinas. I went to the Postmaster General and told him that it would not do to barter these public offices. He agreed with me, and the Civil Service Commission confirmed the appointment of Mr. Marcouiller. He was recommended by the department at my instance, he is there and is going to stay there, and he is going to give good service too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is only another tribute to the tremendous power and influence of my hon. friend.

Mr. BUREAU: My power is due to honesty. The straight course is always the shortest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The next post office on the list is that of Field, B.C. The commission appointed Mr. J. Roberts, whose status is "O.A.S.". The nominee of the Postmaster General is Mrs. F. Howatson. The next is St. Moise Station, P.Q. The commission's nominee is Mrs. A. L. Michaud; the Postmaster General's nominee is Mrs. S. Vaillancourt. The next is St. Phillippe d'Argenteuil, P.Q.; the commission's nominee is Mr. T. LaMarche; the Postmaster General's man is Osias Laurin.

Mr. DUFF: Is he in or out?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is in; he is the Postmaster General's man. The next is Portneuf, P.Q. The commission appointed to that office Mr. Joseph Thibault, who has military status. The Postmaster General's man is Mr. Isidore Marcotte.

Mr. DUFF: What is the revenue from that office?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member will have to ask the minister. The next is the post office at Maddington Falls, P.Q. The commission have appointed to that office Mr. Emilien Rivard, who has military status. Evidently there is a family quarrel here, because the minister's nominee is the wife of the commission's nominee. The next is Clementsport, N.B. The commission's nominee is Mr. H. G. Potter, who has military status; the Postmaster General's nominee is Captain Elias Rawding.

Mr. DUFF: Did my hon. friend say that was in New Brunswick?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: That is another mistake.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You will have to take the matter up with the minister. I wish we could get down a proper return. The next post office is that of Almaville, P.Q. The commission's nominee is Mr. J. Beaumier and the Postmaster General has in the office Mr. Alexander Boisvert. Woodbridge, Ont., commission's nominee, James Morgan, who has military status. The temporary incumbent, the Postmaster General's man, is Mr. J. J. Deane, also with military status. The next one is Ste. Flore, P.Q.; the commission's nominee is Mrs. H. A. Houle, and the nominee of the Postmaster General is Mrs. P. Arvisais, Blackville, N.B., commission nominee, Mr. G. M. Barry, who has military status; his place is filled by Miss A. B. Astle. Then, the next one is Wardner, B.C.; commission's nominee, Mr. J. A. Harris, who has military status; his place is held by Mr. Ole Holm, Brussels, Ont, commission's nominee, Mr. C. R. Coultes, who has military status; his place is held by Mr. W. S. Scott, Tamworth, Ont., Mr. P. K. Stinson, who has military status; his place is held by Mr. L. P. Wells, Portsmouth, Ont.; commission's nominee, Mr. G. H. Wickman, who has military status; his place is held by Jethro Graham, Yamachiche, P.Q., commission's nominee Mr. Germain Beauchemin, who has military status; his position is held by Mr. Arthur Descoteaux, Mamora, Ont.; commissioner's nominee, Mr. James Hickey, who has military status; his position is held by Miss L. G. Shannon, Kenabeek, Ont.; commission's nominee, Mr. J. E. Irwin; his place is held by Mr. James Enright, St. John N.B.; commission's nominee, Mr. A. W. Lingley; his duties are performed by the postmaster and other employees in charge of staffs, as shown by the return. I point out, Mr. Chairman, a situation which I do not think so many of my hon. friends will laugh at; out of this long list, the gentlemen appointed by the Civil Service Commission all hold military status. whereas of the appointees of the Postmaster General but one holds military status.

Mr. COPP: Who appointed Mr. Lingley in St. John?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He has been appointed by the commission but he has not been given the position.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend did not read all this document.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You said I was a bad reader, and I stopped.

Mr. GRAHAM (reading):

Instructions have been issued for the transfer of Blackville, Portsmouth, Wardner, Tamworth and Marmora post offices to the commission's nominees, but the transfers have not yet been reported to the department.

Now, that is very important. Of these post offices my hon. friend has named, five have been handed over to the commission's nominees. That should have been read and put in the record.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend said that before.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend was reading this document and putting it on Hansard, and he left out a very important item, namely, that of the twenty offices mentioned, twenty-five per cent have already been placed in charge of the commission's nominees. So that this document, without further comment, must be discounted twenty-five per cent. Moreover, it bears out what I have already stated: you cannot make appointments to all these offices in rural districts on the basis of the rule of three. I said a few moments ago that information was being secured in respect to all these different cases, and that as rapidly as possible we were filling the positions, where the commission changed its mind, according to the commission's nominee. Twenty-five per cent of that has been done—yes, more, the commission changed its mind in connection with the post office to which my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) has referred. I contend that in connection with appointments to these offices the department has been doing very well; very few are at this moment not in the hands of the nominee of the Civil Service Commission and such as are not are being placed there. But in some instances the commission has changed its mind after getting all the facts. As I said before, if the commission does not change its mind after all the objections are presented, its nominee must stand. In the meantime I maintain that the position of the department is commendable, not attackable, on this point, because it is not an easy matter to handle throughout the whole Dominion of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Why was the Portsmouth appointment held up? There was no sale of that post office.

Mr. GRAHAM: That appointment is now in the hands of the nominee of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): But why was it held up so long? I can understand delay where there is a question of the post office being sold, but there was no such question in this case.

Mr. GRAHAM: There were strenuous representations made to the department that this post office should be put in a separate building, also that it should be kept in its present location. The suitability of the commission's nominee was also questioned and the department investigated the matter, just as it does in a great many other cases. That is the report I have. The department having investigated the matter asked that the commission's nominee be put in the position, and that was done.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): He is a good man. There is no dispute about that. I know him.

Item agreed to.

Post Office—outside service—to provide for the payment of salary at the rate of $1,000 a year to Lucien Pacaud as the representative of the Canadian government on the Pacific Cable board, as from January 16, 1923, $208.33

To pay J. W. Paddle, postmaster at Sunset lake, Saskatchewan, and mail contractor on the Spalding and Sunset lake route, for the loss of a horse while conveying the mail on October 6, 1922, $150.

To pay certain employees of the postal service in the Quebec district for extra services in connection with checking incoming and outgoing British mails during the summer of 1922, $288.14.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this Mr. Pacaud the assistant of the High Commissioner?

Mr. GRAHAM: Joint secretary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This amount is in addition to his salary, of course?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is his salary?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know. That would come under the estimates of the Prime Minister for the High Commissioner's office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It looks as if this was entirely a new matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh no. The Post Office Department makes this appointment every year, and this year it has appointed Mr. Pacaud.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who acted before?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Lang, I think.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is Mr. Lang?

Mr. GRAHAM: He was not in the High Commissioner's office, and it was thought better to have a man from the High Commissioner's office, so Mr. Pacaud was chosen.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): With reference to the second item, is it the usual practice to indemnify mail carriers for the loss of their horses on the routes?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am hardly in a mood to admit anything. We have to take each case on its merits. The inspector made a report on this case, recommending that we might well pay this man $150 for the loss of his horse under all the circumstances, and the department is carrying out his recommendation. I would not say that it would be constituting a precedent, for this reason: Every case will have to be considered on its merits, and if cause is not shown, the department would not be compelled to pay. There have been cases before, I think, where men have been indemnified under similar circumstances.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): What I want to get at is this: It is not that the amount is very much, although it is a pretty good price for the horse, but if this vote is passed will the minister give me the assurance that in a similar case the owner will get the same treatment? I lost one of my own, and I could give the details which I think would justify payment.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would say this, that every case will be dealt with by the department on its merits, and if my hon. friend makes out as good a case as this man, he will have to be paid for his horse.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): Might we know what the merits are, so that I might compare my case with this one?

Mr. CAHILL: And make the evidence to suit the case.

Mr. GRAHAM: This driver lost one of his horses while carrying the mail. We heard a lot last night about the mail carriers and how poorly they are paid. Well, this horse met with an accident and was killed. We had an inspector investigate the circumstances, and he recommended that we ought to pay for the horse. That is the whole case. If my hon. friend presents his case to the department and the inspector, after investigating it, feels that he ought to be compensated, there is no doubt in the world he would be paid.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): I suppose it would be all right to present the case here.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): I mean the general details. They are practically the same.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): What kind of an investigation did the inspector make into this matter.

Mr. DUFF: A post-mortem.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot say exactly what kind of an investigation he held. We have to trust our inspectors and officials. The inspector made his investigation and the department is acting on his recommendation.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Is it not a fact that this mail carrier simply wrote in to the inspector a statement of the case, and on the strength of that letter a report was made without taking any evidence whatever, the inspector simply forwarding the letter to the department with the recommendation that the claim be paid? I understand that those are the circumstances.

Mr. GRAHAM: I could not say what further investigation the inspector made, but on the evidence that he had he recommends the payment of this amount. What else can the department depend on?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What was the nature of the evidence?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will read the letter of this mail carrier. I wish some of those members who were so sympathetic towards the mail couriers yesterday were busy here now. Here is a poor mail courier who has lost his horse in this unremunerative work for a hard-hearted government, and some hon. gentlemen object to his being compensated for the loss of his horse. His letter reads:

Dear Sir,—I beg to report that the incoming mail of October 6th to Sunset lake arrived four hours late owing to a serious accident.

One of the mail courier's horses was killed while travelling through a bush trail about two miles from Sunset lake by a pole, which when stepped on one end by the horse flew up and the other end entering the horse's stomach caused death almost instantly.

The delay resulted through effort spent to save the horse and the difficulty of procuring another to complete the trip as the above occurred in a lonely spot.

This horse was a splendid percheron mare and as her value represents more than a full year of mail courier's salary, you will realize what it means to me as I had only three horses before.

Will you kindly forward a request to the General Superintendent of Postal Service, asking him if, under the unfortunate circumstances, some remuneration for this horse can be made as her loss without remuneration will seriously cripple my ability to continue the performance of my mail service as only one of my remaining horses is able to travel on the road and I am at present continuing with a borrowed horse.

Trusting you will give this matter your early consideration and thanking you for the above favor, I am

Yours faithfully,

Sgd. J. W. PADDLE,
P.M. & Mail Courier.

Now if that statement be true a splendid Percheron mare would be worth more money than an ordinary animal. It is not extravagant therefore to contribute $150 towards the loss which this man has suffered and I submit that it is not establishing a precedent.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I still doubt very much whether this animal was worth $150. I did not attend any horse sales in the West in October but I did in January and I saw good horses—young horses at that just ready to break in—sell for $20. Those were better horses than I have seen on most of the rural mail routes in western Canada, and I think the amount in this case is entirely excessive. I think it should be reduced to at least $75 and I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I am not opposed to this payment because of the amount or because the horse was not worth $150, although knowing the actual district where the accident occurred I should be inclined to doubt whether this very valuable Percheron mare was worth $150 last October. Apart, however, from that the objection in my opinion, is that it is creating a precedent. I think this man took the contract, as was said here last night, at a figure altogether too low; he probably underbid somebody else in order to get it. I do not know as to that but this I am aware of: This man is carrying the mail 52 times a year, on a round trip of 22 miles, for $125, being $25 less than the figure at which he values the horse. Now, I submit that he should not have used a $150 horse for carrying the mail. Bearing in mind the wear and tear involved, and the other conditions, he would have been better advised to have used a $50 pony to carry the mail at the price he was getting. I want to state that there are scores of mail carriers in that same district, or in similar districts within a couple of hundred miles of it, who are having losses owing to accidents to their horses and they never ask the department to recoup them. They are quite prepared to face the possible consequences when they take the mail contract. I say this would be a dangerous precedent to establish. For example, let me cite the following incident. I happen to know a mail carrier who lost a team of horses not so far away from this very post office a couple of years ago. It was about this time of year and a certain creek was in freshet. His team was drowned in trying to ford the creek; the owner thought he had not time to take the bridge which would involve a detour of some 15 or 20 miles. I never heard of any complaint by him. He was making a business of carrying the mail and he took his losses as a matter of course. I know of others who have lost horses under circumstances just as exceptional as these. They sound exceptional but actually they are not so. Just as in all bush countries it is not an uncommon thing for a horse to injure himself—very often fatally—by stepping on a stick. This man knew the conditions, just as other mail carriers know them, because he had often travelled the bush roads. Other men take these chances without any hope of compensation and this man should do the same. I am not going to oppose this item but I must say that it is creating a very dangerous precedent. There will be a great number of other claims made in future, quite as justifiable as the present one, and it would be well to draw the line before it is too late.

Item agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY

House in committee on Bill No. 37, to incorporate Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company (as amended, and recommending that the title thereof be changed to an Act to incorporate Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company).—Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

On section 18—new section:

When the corporate obligations of the company shall have been paid and its capital stock shall have been retired in the manner prescribed in its by-laws, its property, rights and franchises situate within the Dominion of Canada shall be conveyed to the said Dominion or to such province, municipality or agency thereof as the Governor-in-Council may designate; and its property, rights and franchises acquired from or situate within the state of New York shall be conveyed to the said state or to such municipality or agency of the state as the legislature thereof may designate.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to ask the Chairman of the committee if there is any further information regarding this clause. I have no desire in any way to try to impede the course of this bill; but in the committee, when the clause was suggested, I could not see how it could have any useful application. May I bring to the attention of the committee the point I there took. The clause reads:

When the corporate obligations of the company shall have been paid and its capital stock shall have been retired in the manner prescribed in its by-laws.

In the first place the company cannot possibly have any by-laws at the present time, because it is not incorporated. How the capital stock of a company can be fully retired, except with the consent of those who hold stock, I cannot imagine. I understood, perhaps, there would be some explanation, and if there is I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. McGIVERIN: This bill was passed last session in this House; it then went to the Senate and was held up there at the request of the National Railways, who have since withdrawn all opposition. In the meantime, an act on similar lines was passed by the legislature of the state of New York, and there was introduced by the New York legislature a section 16, which is exactly the same as clause 18 in this bill, the idea of the company being that it is a public enterprise, undertaken by public-spirited citizens in the state of New York and Ontario, to build this bridge and to carry out the undertaking as regards expenditure, with the idea that the state of New York and the Dominion of Canada, or the province of Ontario, as the case may be, will eventually take over the expenditure or the assets of the company. As regards what my hon. friend says, the bill is not very clear. I cannot, however, see any objection to its going through in this form, because in any case either country would have the power of expropriation as regards its half of the undertaking. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), as one of the promoters of the bill, stated that it was originally intended in 1913 or 1914 to be an undertaking as a memorial to the one hundred years of peace, and that in the meantime the war intervened. The strongest explanation that I can make is that it was at the request of the joint promoters in New York state and in Canada that this provision was incorporated in the bill, and it was apparently insisted upon by the legislature of the state of New York that it should be so incorporated.

Mr. BOYS: I do not for a moment suggest that the people behind this are not public spirited, that this is not a very desirable thing or that it would not be very useful in that part of the province. Therefore, I want to do all I can to assist the matter; but my hon. friend has not quite answered the inquiry I made. The clause I have quoted provides that when the corporate obligations of the company shall have been paid and its capital stock retired, its property rights and franchises in Canada shall be conveyed to the Dominion or to any province, municipality or agency thereof as the Governor in Council may designate. How can the time ever come when that will be done? It stands to reason that if they want to make a presentation of it to the government they can do so without this clause. I cannot see the purpose of the clause. It does not compel them to hand it over. There are no by-laws at present which say that the stock is to be issued and that stock shall be retired within a certain number of years or by an annual payment. I have done my best to figure out the purpose of the clause, but it seems to me that in its present form it is useless. I suppose it is the same clause as appears in the New York bill, but what good purpose it serves there either I cannot see. It did occur to me that the purpose of the clause was possibly to protect the state of New York on the one hand and Canada on the other, or in other words, that the company could not ask the Dominion of Canada to take over the bridge until its obligations were paid and its capital stock retired. If that is the purpose of it I certainly do not think that this clause accomplishes it. However, if the chairman himself thinks that the clause is a useful one and protects the country in any way I shall not further oppose it. The chairman heard the further explanation given at the last meeting at which I regret to say I was not present, and so I shall say no more. But I must admit that I do not see what good purpose the clause serves. There are certainly no by-laws now in existence, because there cannot be by-laws of a company that is not incorporated.

Section agreed to.

MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED HUSBAND'S BROTHER

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75 (from the Senate) to make lawful the marriage of a woman to her deceased husband's brother or such brother's son.

He said: This legislation, Mr. Speaker, originated in the Senate, where it was passed with practically no discussion. I do not intend to delay the House at any great length in exposition of the bill, which after all is of a very simple nature. For the last forty years our law has provided that a man may marry his deceased's wife's sister; in other words, that a widower may marry his sister-in-law. But strange to say the inverse is not the case, and the widow cannot marry her brother-in-law. Now it would appear to me that on the most reasonable grounds there is no real distinction or indeed any distinction to be drawn.

It may interest hon. members if I refer for a few moments to the history of the legislation in this parliament upon the subject. In 1880 Mr. Girouard, at that time member for Jacques Cartier county, who, if I mistake not, was afterwards one of the Justices of the Supreme Court, introduced a bill permitting not only the marriage of the man with his deceased wife's sister, but also the marriage of the woman with her deceased husband's brother. The bill was debated at very considerable length and passed by an overwhelming majority. However, the Senate of that day was not composed as the Senate of to-day is, and there the bill met with opposition and was rejected, but by a very small majority. If that measure had passed there would have been no necessity for the present bill. Two years afterwards Mr. Girouard introduced another bill, in which he asked merely for legislation permitting the marriage of the man with his deceased wife's sister. That bill was debated for some time, it received a large majority in this House, and was also passed by the Senate. Therefore, as I stated at the outset of my observations, for the last forty years a man in Canada has had the right—although he has been under no obligation—in the event of his wife's death to marry any one of her sisters. But the wife who lost her husband has not had the right to marry his brother.

Now, it would seem to me that if we believe in "equal rights for all and special privileges for none" that men and women in regard to this as in regard to many other matters should be put on the same basis. My first argument in support of the bill is that for the last forty years in which the present legislation has been on our statute books I know of no inconvenience caused by it. I believe if this bill were accepted and we could cast our minds forward for forty years, we would see that no inconvenience would result from the adoption of this legislation. I am told that the provision under which a woman is forbidden to marry her deceased husband's brother is often disregarded. the marriage taking place in this country, or is often avoided by parties going into the United States—because there is only one state in that country which forbids such a marriage—there contracting the marriage and returning to Canada if they see fit to do so. I think public opinion is in favour of this bill. When Mr. Girouard brought in his bill of 1882, which is the present legislation, he was able to invite the attention of his colleagues to the fact that three hundred women in Montreal had petitioned for the legislation. I can now tell the House that the Local Council of Women, representing a large body of thoughtful women throughout the country, some 300,000 in number, have asked for this legislation.

There cannot be any objection to this legislation on the part of those who are guided in life by the Scriptures. We will remember that little idyll found in the Book of Ruth which tells us that Naomi said to her daughters-in-law that they should go home because she was unable to provide them with husbands in the country to which she was returning. In the old days—if we are to have recourse to those early times for enlightenment and example—it was not only the right but the obligation of the male survivors of a deceased husband to marry the widow. You will remember that the founder of the House of David, before he married Ruth, received his right to do so from a nearer relation. So that I think we need not have any religious qualms in accepting this legislation. It seems to me so reasonable and so equitable as to really not require any argument, and I shall reserve anything further I may have to say in the case of any opposition being made to the bill. It seems to me that the bill speaks for itself.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

Trade and Commerce—Commercial Intelligence Service, including salaries, travelling expenses, contingencies and other expenditure of Trade Commissioners, Assistant Trade Commissioners, Junior Trade Commissioners and Commercial Agents; and miscellaneous expenses in connection with the development and extension of Canadian trade, $320,000.

Mr. MANION: How many trade commissioners have we, and what are the principal countries in which they are located?

Mr. ROBB: We have twenty-three trade commissioners and four commercial agents. The trade commissioners are located at Melbourne, Cape Town, London, Manchester, Glasgow, Shanghai, Liverpool, Hamburg, Rotterdam, Milan, Buenos Aires, Yokohama, Barbados, Auckland, Paris, Calcutta, Brussels, Rio de Janeiro, New York, Singapore, Jamaica and Havana, Bristol, Mexico City. The commercial agents are located at Sydney, Australia; Christiania, Norway; Nassau, Bahamas, and Port of Spain, Trinidad.

Mr. MANION: There has been a good deal of talk in the press at times about our commercial agents, or the lack of them. Would the minister state what are their general duties and what success they are having so far as this country is concerned?

Mr. ROBB: The duties of the trade commissioners are to look after trade generally, to keep in touch with the conditions in the countries in which they are located, to discover what products Canada may with profit ship to those countries, to keep in their offices a register of exporting firms who desire to do business, to advise the business people of the country where they are located as to what goods might be purchased in Canada, and generally speaking to survey trade conditions and advise the Canadian people where they can do business profitably in that country.

It frequently happens in the countries where the trade commissioners are located that there may be a difference of opinion at the custom house when Canadian goods arrive there, and the trade commissioners resident in those countries and on fair terms with the Customs Department of that foreign country are able in many instances to iron out the difficulties and make it easier for Canadians to trade there. Then from time to time the trade commissioners advise the government of proposed tariff changes that might be looming up in those countries, and represent as diplomatically as possible to the people of those countries the advantages it would be to them to give fair terms to Canadian products.

Another part of the duties of the trade commissioners is this, and it is done with considerable profit to Canadian industries. A firm in Canada desiring to export products to one of the countries where we have a trade commissioner located, may communicate with that commissioner and ask for the names of people there who would handle Canadian products. The trade commissioner gives the names only of those whom he considers reliable. From time to time he sends reports to the office of the Minister of Trade and Commerce here, where we have in the department junior trade commissioners in training, supervisors of commercial intelligence and an editor who classifies all this information and sends it out weekly to exporters, boards of trade, banks, colleges, and generally speaking to any person who might be interested in export trade.

Since my hon. friend has invited some observations on the trade situation I would like to point out that Canada is reaching out everywhere throughout the world for export trade, and we are doing fairly well, perhaps better than we ourselves realize. Canada geographically speaking is as well situated as any country to do trade with the different countries of the world. If you take a look at the map you will discover the advantages we have in location, the short haul for our products to the different markets of the world as compared with other countries. Canada, as I said a moment ago, trades with the whole world, but I think we might say without disparagement to any of our smaller customers that we have nineteen or twenty first-class customers who take from us various products in agriculture, mineral, and manufactured goods. The United Kingdom is our best customer, but the United States, notwithstanding what we hear of the Fordney tariff, is a very close second. It may interest the committee to know that of our nineteen or twenty first-class customers, for the year ending 31st December the United Kingdom took from Canada $379,540,481 worth of goods; the United States took from us $349,292,392 worth —a very close second. Our next best customer was the sister Dominion of Australia with a purchasing record of $17,411,298. Japan is our fourth best customer, buying from Canada last year $15,799,800 worth. France comes next with $12,869,332; Italy, $12,195,499; Belgium, $12,014,190; and we believe that when the treaties that will be submitted to the House in a few days are proclaimed and go into effect they will add very materially to our business with France, Italy and Belgium. Our exports to The Netherlands last year amounted to $10,891,889; British West Indies, $9,306,935, plus $3,218,332 to Bermuda and British Guiana;; Newfoundland, $8,800,174; New Zealand, $7,124,598, and let me say right here that per capita we have no better customer than the little sister Dominion of New Zealand, where there is an excellent feeling towards Canada. Germany, our enemy of yesterday, is to-day one of our good customers. We sold to Germany last year $7,651,117 worth of goods.

Mr. HANSON: How much are we buying from Germany now?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the figures just now. China including Hong Kong, which is listed separately, bought from us $5,293,808 worth; Greece, $5,964,156; Norway and Sweden, $4,597,000; Cuba, $4,905,468; Mexico, $3,231,580. I am sure my hon. friends will appreciate that there are possibilities of greater trade development in the future with Mexico as conditions in that country become settled.

For the twelve months ending February, 1923, the total exports of Canada amounted to $928,356,656, or an increase of $165,808,061 over our exports for the same period the previous year. Canada is not only a large exporting nation of agricultural products, but she is becoming an exporting nation of manufactured goods. It is true that agricultural products enter largely into our exports, but it is also true that our exports of manufactured products are increasing rapidly. Canada perhaps unconsciously is becoming an exporter of manufactured goods.

I am sure it will interest the committee to have a comparison as between the exports of Canada and exports of our great neighbour to the south, the United States. For the year ending March 31st, 1922, the records of the statistical departments of the United States and of Canada show that of the total exports of these two countries, the exports of raw material of the United States were 39 per cent, and of Canada 44 per cent. Of partly manufactured products the exports of the United States were 11 per cent, and the exports of Canada 14 per cent. Of manufactured products the exports of the United States were 49 per cent, while those of Canada were 41 per cent. When we analyze our business on a per capita basis Canada ranks very high as compared with other countries. On a per capita basis the little Dominion of New Zealand comes first with an export of $154.54. Canada comes second with an export per capita of $100.63, and keep in mind that 41 per cent of that export consisted of manufactured products. The United Kingdom has an export per capita of $63.36, and the United States has an export per capita of $33.95 as against a per capita export for Canada of $100.63.

Mr. MANION: I presume I would be quite right in supposing that in manufactured exports are included such commodities as flour? That is, any goods which are not produced from the soil and sent out in the shape of raw material would be included in manufactured articles?

Mr. ROBB: If we ship wheat that is a raw product. If we ship flour that is a manufactured product. If we ship milk that is a raw product. If we ship butter that is a manufactured product. If we ship pulpwood it is a raw product. If we ship paper it is a manufactured product. If we ship pulp it is partly manufactured.

Mr. MANION: The reason I asked the question is this; I take the facts to be just as the minister states them, but very often in explaining our exports I have noticed that statistics are given with the idea particularly of boosting one side or the other. So that the statistics are mixed up. For example in agricultural exports butter, condensed milk, flour, and things of that sort, are included which are really manufactured articles as my hon. friend says.

Mr. ROBB: This statement has been prepared for me by the statistical department. It is without any colouring whatever and is given exactly in the form in which they hand it out. Now, coming back again to the question of our exports. The total exports for the 12 months ending in February of this year were $928,356,656, of which 42 per cent were finished products. When it is recalled that in 1890 the total exports of Canada only amounted to $185,000,000, and that less than 6 per cent of those were manufactured products, it will be realized what great progress Canada has made in those 32 years. I would not like the House to believe that we should remain as we are with our arms folded, that we should be satisfied with our immense exports and the volume of manufactured products we are sending out. It seems to me that it should be the ambition of this country not only to increase our production but to increase the manufacture of our own products in our own country.

9 p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Converts every day.

Mr. ROBB: I have in mind the days of my boyhood when many of the farms in our part of the country had a mortgage on them, and the people were struggling to build homes and become properly established with comforts for themselves and their children. They were then breaking the land and growing a little grain, and they sometimes had to haul that grain 20, 25, 30, and even 50 and 60 miles to market. In that country to-day the conditions are changed. There are no mortgages on the farms or, if there are any, they are very few in number. The children of many of the people who then had mortgages on their farms to-day have investments in victory bonds and other securities. They possess comfortable homes, with large barns and great herds of cattle in the fields. It was the cow that paid off the mortgage on the farms in eastern Canada; and, looking at conditions throughout the country, it seems to me that we should not be discouraged for the future. The eastern provinces—the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec and the Maritime provinces—are well adapted for dairying; but there is another province in the Dominion which, perhaps, possesses as great, or even greater advantages for profitable dairying if the people there will work as the people of eastern Canada worked—I refer to the little province of Alberta. The conditions essential to successful dairying are cheap feed for the cattle, water and a good climate. I am sure no person will say that the province of Alberta has not a good climate, that it has not plenty of water, that it has not plenty of good feed for stock. I would like to remind my fellow members in the province of Quebec—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I interrupt the hon. minister?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to deny most emphatically that there is an abundance of feed or even of water in that province.

Mr. ROBB: Well, I visited Alberta for many years annually long before my hon. friend came to this country, and if he is discouraged with Alberta, I am not. I do not believe that my hon. friend with his pessimism represents the true feeling in that province. When I remember that in the autumn of last year, at the greatest exhibition held in Canada, the province of Alberta carried off most of the best prizes for butter; when I remember that the province of Alberta is as near the sea as many ports of the province of Ontario—

An hon. MEMBER: Except for freight rates.

Mr. ROBB:—I have no reason to feel discouraged over the future of that country. I know that dairying means hard work.

An hon. MEMBER: And no pay.

Mr. ROBB: I am not prepared to admit that, but it means comfort, it means happy homes, it means the family united where there is work for the boys and the girls.

An hon. MEMBER: And fourteen hours a day.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, fourteen hours a day and longer than that. But we are working fourteen hours a day in this chamber and we are doing fairly well at it. I am not making this statement with the idea of casting any reflection on my hon. friends from the western provinces, but rather to encourage them, and to say to them that what eastern Canada has accomplished, surely western Canada can do also. I am not one who believes that the son has less grip than his sire, and I believe the young men of to-day, if they are ready to get down and work as their forefathers worked, will find as good a future in Canada as in the country whence they came.

Mr. GOULD: In his early remarks the minister stated that trade commissioners were in foreign countries for the purpose of advising the government. Particularly he mentioned that they were there to anticipate if any false moves, we might say, were made in connection with the tariff. Are we to understand from that that our trade commissioners are in foreign countries for the sole purpose of anticipating these tariffs, to endeavour to get as low a tariff rate for the exports of this country as possible?

Mr. ROBB: I would not say that. They are there to watch conditions and to advise their government from time to time. Let me repeat again, they are there also to advise Canadian shippers of advantages in the countries in which they are located. In that connection, let me read for the information of the House a letter that I have from the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, Regina, dated the 29th September, 1922, to our trade commisisoner in Calcutta, India:

> Dear Sir,—We have to thank you for your very comprehensive letter of August 18 giving statistics on the 1921-22 wheat crop and outlining the conditions under which India's wheat cultivation is carried on.
> We note that your monthly reports are embodied in the Commercial Intelligence Journal, and as suggested by you, are taking steps to be put on the mailing list for this paper.

Then on the 11th April, they wrote for this information for a ten-year period, which Mr. Chisholm, the agent there, supplied them. Let me cite this record to show of what advantage these men are. Through the efforts of Mr. Emery, trade agent in China, of this crop there has been sold a total of 225,000 sacks of flour shipped from the Vancouver Milling Company, the Robin Hood Mills at Calgary, the Robin Hood Mills at Moose Jaw, and the Maple Leaf Milling Company at Medicine Hat. We have also a record of a large quantity of butter which was shipped from a creamery in Alberta to China.

Mr. HARRIS: We are, I am sure, all very much indebted to the worthy minister for giving a few of his observations on the trade situation. I rather think he trampled on the ground of the Minister of Agriculture, and that he would have been better advised to have interested us in his travels to foreign lands. I have in mind more particularly the question which he himself raised last year, namely that our trade commissioners in some of these foreign lands were found to be doing business, as he said, due, perhaps, to the niggardliness of this particular vote or votes of a like nature, on back streets of various towns and cities. It would be very interesting to the committee if the minister would, as the Minister of Agriculture did, give us a little summary of what he found to be the condition of affairs as regards these particular officers.

A further question which I have in mind is this. Is any effort being made on the part of the Department of Trade and Commerce to secure the same trade relations between Canada and Cuba as the United States enjoy with Cuba at the present time. I hope the minister will, at least, tell us some of the things that he observed in that trip of his around the world.

Mr. ROBB: I thought I had given my hon. friend a rather interesting review of trade conditions in that part of the world.

Mr. HARRIS: Did the minister find our trade commissioners working on back streets as he said, and does he anticipate that he will require a larger appropriation this year than in the past?

Mr. ROBB: We have made a considerably increased allowance to the trade commissioners and also increased their living allowance, so that they are getting much better located than they were. In Shanghai, China, we have recently organized an exhibition room, where samples of Canadian products for sale in that country are continually on exhibition. We have this on the rental basis, so that the firm shipping the goods pays a rental that almost covers the total expense. I think this is on a paying basis, or practically so.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the minister give me the information regarding Cuba?

Mr. ROBB: As my hon friend knows, negotiations regarding tariffs are under the Department of Finance. A representative is in Cuba now watching Canadian interests.

Mr. HARRIS: A representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: I was delighted to hear the minister speak so optimistically regarding the prairie provinces. I wonder whether his optimism is well founded.

Mr. ROBB: I hope so.

Mr. LEWIS: I happened to be in Moose Jaw last week—

Mr. STEVENS: Did the hon. member meet the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) there?

Mr. LEWIS: This time I did not go into the barn; but I noticed in the window of one of the grocery stores, fresh eggs marked 18 cents per dozen. These came from the country; and the farmer had to pay for the crate and breakages before the eggs reached the store, and I presume there was a little profit on the crate too. I asked some of the people in the country what they were receiving for eggs and they said 14 cents. I just wonder, considering what they have to pay for their food, whether it is a profitable situation for them to sell eggs at 14 cents per dozen. I also found that dairy butter, not creamery butter, was selling at 22 cents. It does not seem to me that these prices show that the West is going to be prosperous in a very short time. It is true that we need all the markets which the minister has spoken of, and I trust by the opening up of the larger markets of the world, the price will increase and the farmer will be given a fair deal for what he is raising.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has given the committee the amount of exports that Canada had during the last year. Can he give the committee the same figures as regards the imports?

Mr. ROBB: I have some imports from different countries. This is not so well classified as the other. I would be glad to hand the statement over to my hon. friend if he is interested.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the total.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister stated that there were practically no farm mortgages in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: In the section of country where I was born and brought up.

Mr. GARDINER: Just that one section.

Mr. ROBB: I was citing conditions in that part of the country when I was a boy when there were many mortgages. I said that to-day there were but few mortgages in that part of the country. What I said was that the people who at that time had mortgages to-day have victory bonds.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give us some idea as to what peculiar conditions in that part of the country would be responsible for this freedom of the farms from mortgages? His statement seems an extraordinary one.

Mr. HANSON: Perhaps it is the good old cow business.

Mr. ROBB: A little hard work—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister mean to say that we do not work hard out in the West?

Mr. ROBB: I am not saying anything about the West; I am talking about the East. The hon. gentleman asked me to what cause the condition I have described is attributable. A little hard work and patience and continuous saving from year to year will bring it about.

Mr. IRVINE: Are there for sale any of those cows that paid off the mortgages?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, not long ago, I know, one sold in British Columbia for $1,600.

Mr. SALES: A Quebec cow, sir? Is the minister aware that we have had evidence only this week from prominent men in the province of Quebec that the very conditions he speaks of actually obtain there, namely, hard work, long hours and small pay, and indeed less than small pay, rather no pay at all but a deficit instead, and that these same conditions are driving the young people off the land in that province at the present time? Is the minister aware of that?

Mr. ROBB: I am told that the young people are leaving the land not only in Quebec but in old free trade England.

Mr. SALES: Well, that only proves a fact that has been well known for many years, indeed throughout the ages, that the men on the soil are expected, as they have always done and as people think they will continue to do, to work longer hours than anyone else for less money. That is the fact of the matter and we can prove it, and that is the very reason the people are leaving. The young people are getting educated; the boys are getting more sense. I can give you my own personal experience. I sent my boy to the Saskatoon Agricultural College and when he came back he used language which I cannot repeat in the House of Commons. It was the first time I had heard him express himself vigorously. He said, "I am not going to be such a—well, such a fool as you are." I said, "What do you mean, Jack?" He answered, "I am not going to work fifteen hours a day to grow cheap food for the man who wants to work eight." And I cannot blame him.

Mr. FAFARD: Are you opposed to education?

Mr. SALES: No sir, I am not; but when you educate a young man you develop his powers of comparison and when he sees one man working eight hours while he has to work fifteen, he naturally resents the idea.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let them combine forces and work together.

Mr. HANSON: The fault does not lie with the man who has to work fifteen hours but with the man who does not want to work more than eight. Perhaps some of the evil lies in that direction.

Mr. COOTE: The hon. member tells us where the cause lies, but he does not tell us who is hit in the result.

Mr. HOCKEN: A barber works fifteen hours a day all the year round. Does the farmer in the West work fifteen hours a day throughout the whole year?

Mr. SALES: Do you think he ought to?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am asking a plain question. Do these men in the West work on the farms fifteen hours a day all the year round?

Mr. SALES: I can answer the question so far as my own farm is concerned. We have stock on it and while the men certainly do not work fifteen hours a day throughout the entire year, in winter they work ten at the very least; and always bear in mind that they work hard on Sundays as well.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I am surprised to hear the minister make the statement we have heard this evening. I cannot speak for Quebec, of course, but the hon. member who referred to conditions there was speaking from the evidence that has been brought out in regard to that province and no doubt that is the best evidence we can have. I can, however, speak of conditions as they exist in my own province. I happen to represent as good a farming section of the country as can be found in Ontario and perhaps as good as any in the whole Dominion, and a few weeks ago I got certain information from one of the men of the type the minister speaks of. This gentleman who is a successful farmer has been in his locality for thirty years and I want to make a reference or two to the statement he made to me. Now, the minister stated that in eastern Ontario or Quebec, which is much the same, there are no mortgages outstanding to-day. I wish I could bring myself to think the same. As a matter of fact, and quite naturally, we have mortgages in Ontario, and I do not see any way by which we could possibly avoid having them. Let me explain why. A farmer gets a section of land, it matters not whether it is large or small. If he raises a family and puts by a little for a rainy day he is under the necessity of mortgaging the farm, if he wants to have something to live on in his old age. Obviously therefore he cannot hand the farm over to his son without encumbrances. The son gets it with a mortgage on it and he too raises a family and naturally gets into the same position, so that again the mortgage is passed on to the next generation. If I might speak of the farm on which I live, I might remark that my son now represents the third generation holding the same homestead. For these reasons therefore it is inevitable that we shall have mortgages; and although I have not the statistics by me to give figures, I am satisfied that there are as many mortgages on our farms to-day as there were thirty years ago. I honestly believe also that the men holding these mortgages are not as well satisfied with the securities as those who held mortgages at that time.

Mr. HARRIS: Is there a mortgage on the holdings you have in the city of Toronto?

Mr. PRITCHARD: I do not happen to have a home in the city of Toronto.

Mr. HARRIS: Have you any holdings in the city of Toronto?

Mr. PRITCHARD: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: For the benefit of the committee, will the hon. member give his equity in these holdings in view of the opinions he has expressed?

Mr. PRITCHARD: Wait until the time comes; I will do that later. I want to deal with the question to which the minister referred. I met at the railway station a short time ago a gentleman from the constituency adjoining my own, and I might quote what he said in a conversation we had, in order to convince the committee that some of the statements that have been made in this House have not been made without some foundation of fact behind them. This man has been successful in his farming. You talk about dairy cows. For thirty years he has had as good a herd of Jersey cows as can be found anywhere in the country, and they have been as intelligently cared for. He works fourteen of fifteen hours a day, and while he was not complaining, because as I say he has been successful, he gave me some facts which I think it is well for the House to know. When I informed him of the nature of the debates that have taken place in this House he told me that he and his son had sat down and figured their profits for the year 1921, and they discovered that they had not quite a dollar a day after deducting all expenses. That is a well managed farm and I defy the minister, which is saying a good deal, to find a more successful man than this gentleman. Yet that is just what he told me a couple of weeks ago. These conditions exist whether we want to admit the fact or not; and while we are not grumbling in western Ontario, and no one can say he has heard us grumble much in this House, I do not want to sit here and have statements made which I know are not true concerning the district I represent as well as that part of the country generally. I have sat here and listened with a good deal of patience to men who have tried to be optimistic,and I can bear with them, because I would rather take an optimistic than a pessimistic view of things generally. I do not like the world to know our actual condition. It is bad enough to let the House know, but unfortunately Hansard publishes our statements whether they are pessimistic or optimistic, and they go forth to the country. I have refrained from saying anything pessimistic, but I do not want the impression to go out to the contrary because otherwise we who know the actual conditions in our constituencies may be laughed at when we get up in this House and refer to them even in the most guarded terms. We will not stand for that. If the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) or the member for East York (Mr. Harris) wants to know particulars of what I refer to I shall be pleased to enlighten them in my room, but I am not going to publish them on the floor of the House.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I am sincerely glad to know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) and so many other hon. members are keenly interested in dairy farming. It is news to me, because I have been interested in it in a direct way all my life, but since coming to this House I have not heard very much upon this phase of farming. I believe dairy farming in eastern Canada is perhaps the most prosperous line of agriculture which our farmers have been following, but I think the minister left an impression which is not altogether correct. I do not know what particular part of Canada he was referring to in the very rosy picture he unfolded to us of a farming community that was encumbered with mortgages thirty or forty years ago but now enjoys prosperity in the way of comfortable homes and victory bonds. I would like to know just exactly where that favoured spot is, because from my acquaintance with the dairy industry in Ontario I very much question whether the picture truly depicts actual conditions.

I have before me evidence, some of which I laid before this House two years ago in the course of the budget debate, and which has been further confirmed since that time by Professor Leitch of the Ontario Agricultural College. Professor Leitch was brought up on a farm and educated at the agricultural college. He has had practical experience in managing farms on a commercial scale, and for a number of years past he has been making a special study of mixed farming in Ontario, both dairying and stock-raising. In his sworn evidence before the Special Committee on Agricultural Conditions he gave a summary of conditions that obtained on a certain number of specially selected farms. These farms were selected as representative of average conditions in certain sections of the province, which were by no means the poorer sections. I do not wish to quote this evidence in detail, but here are some of the results which he gave to the committee and which are substantially in line with my own experience. I sincerely hope that this summary will elicit as much cheering from the members in my immediate vicinity as did the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

For the year ending May 1st, 1921, summarizing the financial operations of dairy farmers in the county of Oxford—the banner dairying county in Ontario, equal I think to the section to which the minister was referring—after allowing 5 per cent on investment and 26 cents an hour for eleven hours a day for 365 days in the year to the farmer, the cost of producing milk was found to be $2.70 per 100 pounds, while the price received was the same. The following year there was a considerable reduction in the cost of production, it dropped to $1.95 per 100 pounds, but the price received was also lower, being $1.8?

per 100 pounds. So that with this very moderate allowance for wages and profit the farmer was selling his milk at a loss of 12 cents per 100 pounds—that is, 12 cents per 100 pounds less than would allow him 26 cents an hour for wages and 5 per cent on his investment. Surely no commercial undertaking could ask for a less margin of profit or a lower wage than that. Following this same calculation down for the year ending May 1st, 1923—assuming, of course, that no change will take place in the figures for the next month—on the same basis the estimated cost of producing milk will be $1.70 per 100 pounds, while the price received will be $1.65 per 100 pounds, or 5 cents less per 100 pounds than the cost of production.

Those are average conditions in the very best dairying section of Ontario. I assume that conditions are no better in the particular section to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was referring. Although the dairy farmer is engaged in perhaps the most prosperous line of agriculture in this country, those are the results that he is obtaining at the present time, and surely the picture is not so rosy as the minister would have us believe. Those figures do not show anything unusual. There is no occasion for a dairy farmer to be alarmed at them, there is no particular reason for discouragement, because he has always had to put up with conditions such as these and very often very much worse. I do not know if they were any better at any time. Perhaps during 1918 conditions may have been just a little bit better than those figures would indicate. But those are the figures for the last three years, and they indicate in a fair way the condition of the dairy farmer to-day in this province.

Although the men of forty or fifty years ago no doubt should be accorded great credit for their energy and courage, I have it on the authority of men who are older than the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, men who have been engaged in this work all their lives, that dairy farming at the present time is very much harder than it was fifty years ago; that farming in this part of Ontario, in the province of Quebec, entails more work, more energy, more thought, more constant application, than it did forty or fifty years ago. I believe that to be the case.

Mr. ROBB: I think that is right.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): If that is the case, and if it is true, as the minister avers, that there are fewer mortgages now than there were then, I must conclude that the men engaged in this business are entitled at least to some credit for the way they are carrying on. I question that statement, however; I doubt very much whether mortgages, even in the dairy sections of this province and the neighbouring province of Quebec, are becoming fewer. I do not wish to draw any pessimistic picture of the prospects of the dairy farmer, but I would like to have these few figures placed on record in order that an accurate estimate may be formed by hon. members who, perhaps, do not know the actual conditions of dairy farming as they exist to-day.

Miss MACPHAIL: When the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy), who has just spoken, said that the farmer, his wife and family work and the farmer gets the money, he stated the truth. It is true that the farmers work hard; it is true their days are long and their pay is poor. But it is also infinitely true that the farm woman's day is longer and her pay poorer. With all due deference to the superior wisdom of men, one mistake that I think the men continually make in this House is that of treating the problem of rural depopulation as a man's problem and a man's problem only. Hon. members talk about the boy getting an education, as if when you have talked about the man and the boy you have finished the family—but you have not. You want to remember that the girl is also getting an education. The girl has seen her mother work as that mother does not want her daughter to work and as the daughter herself does not want to work. If you go over a rural community to-day—take your own constituency, for example,—and tabulate the results of your observation, you will find more young men on the land than young women: the girls leave first, and that is a pretty sure indication that the boys will leave later. I have noticed so often that the matter is looked at from the man's point of view. When a man is forced to quit farming, if you go into the case carefully you will find—and this applies to over half the cases—that he quits because of inability to carry on the work any longer. It is because the wife or the housekeeper in that house is broken down in health, or because of the woman's rebellion at the drudgery of her life. So I feel that the other view of it, the feminine view, the woman and girl part of the household, will have to be considered before the problem of rural depopulation is to be solved.

I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) is so optimistic; it is easy for people who are not farming to be optimistic. Our farm at home has no mortgage against it; there are no sons in the family or there would be a mortgage against it. There is some little money coming in besides that which is the direct result of farming, but we did not break even last year and will not this year. How long can anybody go on under those conditions? I sent out eight questions to 900 soldier settlers on the land in Ontario. I have received up to date possibly 400 answers. If the minister would like to have a pleasant Sunday afternoon, I will lend him these 400 answers, and if he still says there are no mortgages on the farms of Ontario I am sure that after reading the information contained in these replies he will not be so optimistic.

Mr. CALDWELL: Being a member of this special committee which is taking evidence with regard to agricultural conditions in Canada, and being a farmer myself, I have been very much disappointed at much of the evidence we have received. I know that in my own province of New Brunswick the agriculturists are in very bad financial condition. We were told by our provincial government within the last six months, when we went to them for some assistance to tide the farmers over and enable them to produce a crop this year, even to enable them to stay on the land—because large numbers of them are migrating to the United States, owing to the very serious conditions prevailing here—we were told that had we been raising cattle we would to-day find ourselves in good circumstances; that had we ceased two or three years ago to grow potatoes and gone into the stock industry, we would now be in a comfortable position. I had hoped that that was the case, because if only one province of Canada was in a bad financial condition with regard to its agricultural industry, it would not be very serious.

Our committee has endeavoured to get evidence from all the provinces, and I think we have obtained evidence from most of them with regard to the agricultural conditions. I wish to state briefly some of the figures that Professor Leitch put before us—and by the way, I think his was the most convincing evidence, due to the fact that he had actual statistics. A lot of people do not take very seriously the statistics compiled at the experimental farms; they are government institutions, and whether the work is correctly done or not it is apt to be looked upon as not carried out under normal conditions. Professor Leitch, as the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy) has said, has carried on experiments on farms under actual farming conditions. He took seventeen average farms in Ontario and instituted on each an accurate system of bookkeeping. He visited the farms frequently through the year to see that the books were accurately kept. An account was kept of all outlay for actual operation; the farm was credited with every item of production, and at the end of the year those seventen farms had a balance on the wrong side of the ledger of. on the average $460. These seventeen farms were representative, he told us, of the best counties in Ontario; they were in one of the finest stock raising sections in the province, and on those farms dairying and the growing of fat cattle were carried on.

I thoroughly agree with the member for Glengarry when he says he believes that cattle growing and dairying are the most profitable branches of agriculture in Canada. I have come to that conclusion after listening to the evidence of witnesses from the various provinces on the different phases of agriculture. We also had before us very recently a milk dealer from Montreal who was raised on a farm, whose brothers, he told us, are farmers. He himself is not farming, but we came to the conclusion after listening to his evidence, that few of the witnesses who appeared before us understood farming conditions better. He told us of the conditions in the province of Quebec—which, by the way I looked upon as one of the most prosperous provinces of the Dominion. We had been told repeatedly that the farmers of Quebec were both prosperous and contented. I had hoped it was so; indeed, I believe it is true in larger measure of that province than it is of any other. But this milk dealer told us that due to the cost of the production of milk exceeding the price received for it, the young people were leaving the farms; they were drifting to the Canadian cities in small degree and to the United States in a much larger degree, and the consequence was that the older men were not able to carry on the operations to the extent that they formerly did. They could not afford to hire help to carry on their industry, therefore they were selling off their cattle and decreasing production; and the situation was viewed with alarm. He said the time was coming in the not far distant future, when, if present conditions continued, dairying would reach the vanishing point in the province of Quebec—notwithstanding the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-night. I cannot help thinking that the minister is living in the past; that he has not been out in the country during the last two or three years. I admit that there was a brief period during the war when farming was profitable in all its branches. I want to admit this also. I think that during the prosperous period the farmers contracted habits that would be considered more or less extravagant by the farmers themselves, but not by city people by any means, because in the most prosperous days I do not think the farmers enjoyed anything like the luxuries and comforts that might be considered luxuries that are enjoyed by people in the cities in the very worst times. That is my candid opinion, and I have had a good opportunity for observing.

The hon. member for Calgary just now took the words out of my mouth when he asked if any of these cows were for sale that the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of. Our committee would be glad to dispose of them at fancy prices to help pay off the mortgage on the farm and keep the farmer in comfort. We have heard from many men who have been raising cows and have been given very full statistics on production, and know something about the conditions.

Mr. ROBB: I fear I have somewhat stirred up hon. gentlemen, and they are getting away from the real issue. I am bound to say I cannot quite follow all this debate. I present to my hon. friends proof taken from the statistics of the Dominion of Canada that our exports have increased from $185,000,000 thirty-two years ago to $928,000,000 to-day. I tell them of the conditions that existed when I was a boy, when there were mortgages on the farms, and of the conditions that exist there to-day. I never pretended for one moment that farming was a very profitable proposition to-day. I know it is like most other businesses in Canada to-day, the profits are smaller than during the war period, but I maintain that there is no reason in this country for the pessimism which we have heard expressed in the House. I do not believe that sort of argument is the best thing for Canada. I was simply trying to strike a note of encouragement for my friends of the western provinces when I expressed that opinion, and it is only an opinion for what it is worth, although I am bound to say I have heard it shared in by many people. I remember not so many years ago when every Alberta man you spoke to told you that Alberta was the best province in the Dominion. Go to Alberta, was what they all said. Those were the days when the easterner was buying town lots at fancy prices. I tried to point out to my hon. friends the natural advantages of that sunny province, and I have hope yet for the province of Alberta because, geographically situated as it is, being as near to the sea as many parts of Ontario, with a fertile soil and wonderful agricultural possibilities, a splendid supply of coal, good running water, and producing the best wheat in the world—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We can't get a price for it.

Mr. ROBB: —why with such resources, should it not have a great future before it? You can use your coal and your natural gas—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROBB: —I mean the variety up at Medicine Hat, to drive your flour mills and turn your wheat into the best flour in the world, and have the offal to feed to dairy stock in the province. Just have a little of the courage of the early men who cleared the land in eastern Canada and things will come all right. Nobody who travels along the countryside and sees the comfortable homes and large barns and great herds of cattle in the field can fail to be impressed with these the best evidences of prosperity. Of course, there are always people who are leaving the land. I left the land myself, out of compulsion. In those days it was not so easy to get a farm as it is now. I was the elder of two boys, and I left the farm much against my will to become a miller's apprentice. My brother is on that farm to-day. He has the adjoining farms and we hope that his boys will remain there and their boys after them, because we know it is a happy and a comfortable home, and that there is a prosperity and contentment on the land that you do not get in the cities where you have to get up at the shriek of a whistle in the morning, and are fined if you are late getting to work.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is not as bad as an alarm clock.

Mr. ROBB: I agree with the hon. member across the way who said it is the woman who works hard, and if there is any place where a woman has to work hard, it is on a dairy farm.

Mr. STANSELL: I have for some time been an admirer of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am sure that he has now justified that opinion by his ability to start something. I am glad that the discussion has turned on subjects that are prolific of debate and with which I am intimately acquainted—dairy cows, mortgages and natural gas. I do not propose to prolong this discussion, most of which, if I may be allowed to say so, is rather fruitless.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will allow me, I was just going to call the attention of the committee to the irrelevancy of a discussion of agriculture upon this item. Unless the committee is willing to allow it, it is altogether out of order.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is a profitable discussion.

Mr. STANSELL: I thought that possibly owing to the absence of the Minister of Agriculture his department was being administered by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon.

An hon. MEMBER: He is over there now.

Mr. HANSON: He is very subdued though.

Mr. STANSELL: I do not wish to lead the discussion into irrelevant channels, but I do desire to say something that has not been said on this subject and which I think ought to be said, and that is with respect to the question of farm mortgages. You cannot prove anything by the existence of farm mortgages as to the prosperity or lack of it in farming, and I think I can show why. From my knowledge of farming in Ontario there have always been farm mortgages, and I believe there always will be. Whether farming is made more profitable or not, that condition will continue for this reason: The man who is not a success on the farm, and whose farm is mortgaged, will naturally have to let it stay mortgaged because his lack of success does not enable him to pay it off. On the other hand the man who is successful, and let me say that profits on the farm are small, only succeeds in paying off his mortgage after a number of years of hard work, and by that time he is ready and properly entitled to retire. One of the boys or an immigrant buys the farm, makes a small payment and gives a mortgage to the former proprietor for the balance. So mortgages will continue. They may be changing all the time. Some men may make money, and others may lose, but owing to this continual transfer of property mortgages will continue to exist on the farms. The man who takes up farming as a means of living is a man of small means as a rule, and can only secure a farm by making a small payment and giving a mortgage for the balance. So it proves nothing as to the prosperity or lack of it in farming to point to farm mortgages, and anyone who argues from that basis is on aboslutely unsound premises. I think that is one point that has apparently been overlooked.

I would like to say further, I believe from personal experience and from some knowledge I have gained that there is a farm problem at the present time, and if we had a little less discussion and a little more practical work I think a great deal could be done towards bringing about a solution of that problem. I propose to offer a suggestion to the House which if acted upon would do a great deal towards solving the problem. If you will bear with me just a moment or two I will attempt to do what very few have so far tried to do this session. It is a common thing to find that the man who has had no experience in a particular subject is the one who professes to know most about it. I would recommend to the government that they appoint a small committee to investigate this problem and attempt to find a solution, and I will outline what I think the work of that committee should be. First, I would ask for half a dozen members of this House who know nothing about farming by actual production but who know all about it in theory. I would also have half a dozen members of the farming group in the House—

Mr. GOULD: Here is one.

Mr. STANSELL:—who know all about other lines of business by theory and nothing from actual practice. I would further recommend that half a dozen businesses may be acquired at the expense of the government and half a dozen farms in various parts of the country secured. Then I would reverse the existing operation and put the farmers into business and the business men on the farm where they would have the benefit of instruction from the colleges of agriculture. These men could be given a good deal of help and being intensely practical individuals —experts if I might call them such— could easily become familiar with the particular operations to which they were devoting their attention. Then, after two years had elapsed, I would let these men come together, give parliament the benefit of their experience, and recommend to this House something in the nature of a real solution for the existing difficulties. In the meantime, of course, the profits in both cases would go to the state. Now, I have something else. The undertaking in question would only employ twelve men. I would suggest that the rest of the country, while this experiment is in process, get down to hard work and stop grumbling until the committee is able to present a report.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister a question or two pertaining to this item. He will recall that last year when these estimates were under consideration I brought to his attention—indeed it was under his consideration as well—the question of the development of trade with certain islands in the southern Pacific, more particularly the Fiji Islands. This may, perhaps, seem to the committee comparatively insignificant, but as a matter of fact there is a prospect, I think, of developing some very excellent trade to the advantage of both parties. I received correspondence lately, and I have no doubt the minister also has, more particularly on the question of cocoanut oil, considerable quantities of which are brought into this country, and its importation. If the minister could give the committee some information in regard to that question I would like him to do so. I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into details as he knows, perhaps, the whole subject pretty fully. Before I complete this request, however, he will recall that one of the points at issue was the providing of suitable cold storage facilities on the steamers running between our Pacific coast and Australia, calling at Fiji to bring the products of Fiji to Canada. The minister will also recall this: That the market in times gone by, prior to about a year or two years ago, for Fiji fruit—pineapples, bananas and such like, was chiefly in Australia. But in that case they competed with the northern Australian product and therefore the new tariff of Australia largely shut that fruit out. On the other hand we have an excellent market for those fruits and Fiji offers a capital market for our manufactured goods. Would the minister give the committee the benefit of the latest information on these points?

Mr. ROBB: I have not before me the figures of the general trade with Fiji, but my recollection is that generally speaking the Fiji group purchases about $80,000,000 worth of goods a year, some of which products Canada might supply. Prior to the introduction of the latest Australian tariff the Fiji business was largely with the Dominion of Australia. They exported to that commonwealth considerable quantities of bananas, some oranges and pineapples; but Australia placed a very heavy duty on these imports particularly bananas. I am not just sure of the rate but it was prohibitive the hope being entertained of starting a banana industry in Australia. It was represented to the Dominion of Canada that Fiji would be a profitable source of trade for this country inasmuch as they could supply to us the bananas and other fruits which we now purchase from the Central American states, and that in return they would buy Canadian products.

Let me say in passing that there is some misapprehension as to the value of the Fiji market. I stopped there on the way down to Australia and met the governor and his council; in fact, travelled down with the colonial secretary, who has a summer home in British Columbia and who had gone there for a rest. They give to Canada a preference in that market. In some of the islands quite an area is devoted to raising cattle; but their principal source of revenue, as far as I could make out, would be from the production of pineapples. I am not sure that it would be possible to introduce their bananas on this market because our people have been accustomed to a banana different to the species which they produce. Also I am not very sure, from the information I gained, that the Fiji banana has the requisite keeping qualities for shipping. They had there an expert banana man who had been brought from the West India Islands, a Scotchman, and he had hopes that they would develop in the Fijis a considerable banana business. I had a meeting with the planters down there and arranged with the New Zealand-Canadian line, which is subsidized by us, to reserve certain cold storage space for shipments of Fiji products to Canada. They were to try the experiment for a period and I gave 10 p.m. them the assurance that if they would supply sufficient business to make it a paying proposition we would then consider their request to equip and put on that service some of the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I am satisfied we shall get business going down there, maybe not going to Fiji but to other countries, provided we can get return cargoes. I was not satisfied, however, that it would be a paying proposition to equip a vessel at this time. Nevertheless, the experiment is being made in the manner indicated, and after we have the experience of six or eight months we shall be better able to determine what can be done.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the minister give the committee a statement regarding the negotiations between his department or the government and the government of Australia in connection with preferential treatment, and more particularly having reference to the very large and important newsprint business going on between the two countries?

Mr. ROBB: Let me say right now that I appreciate, as does the government, the consideration hon. members opposite have shown in not pressing any questions upon the negotiations with Australia. As my hon. friend knows, in the negotiation of treaties between one country and another, it is generally arranged that the statements are made at the same time in both countries. We in Canada are in this condition that we must await the pleasure of our Australian friends before we can make an announcement. I would say this, however, that I was very kindly received in Australia; that I sat in with the Tariff Board of Australia for three weeks; that they have a statement prepared to submit to the new government, and that we have hopes that the new government will favourably consider the proposition, so that trade between Canada and Australia will continue to grow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot help but be amused at the minister's solicitude for fear there would be a premature announcement of that pregnant and fruitful mission of his to Australia, for fear something would be said that would compel him to make an announcement prior to the exercise of a similar privilege by the public men of Australia. When a treaty is arranged, it is usually announced simultaneously in both countries; but when no treaty is arranged and nothing on earth done, I cannot see any necessity for simultaneity in such a case as that. I would think promptness, frankness and repentance would more become the political commercial traveller in conditions of that kind. For the life of me I do not know what the minister's idea was in starting to Australia, in the midst of a political campaign, to negotiate a treaty. The Australian officers, whoever they might be, the Australian ministers could have no idea or no basis for an idea whether either the officers or the ministers would have any authority at all in the course of a few days, or in the course of the time that inevitably would elapse before a treaty could be made. The minister, of course, was kindly received. Why would he not be? He surely did not think there would be rudeness on the part of our Australian cousins. He was kindly received; no doubt he attended many dinners; no doubt he had a fine trip and no doubt he saw quite a lot of the world both going and coming. I understand he passed through the Suez canal. He visited Fiji. I do not know but what he also saw some parts of China.

Mr. ROBB: India.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He may have also polished off his almost perfect knowledge of India. That all took place. But what could have been done towards the negotiations of a treaty, I do not know, and I do not know what the minister could honestly have expected to do. He is back and he says: " Do not ask for results, because these things should be announced simultaneously in Australia and in Canada." He may have studied over a few schedules with tariff commissioners there. How much further does that get him? No further at all. I venture to say that he is not one day nearer a treaty with Australia than he was the day he came into power. Does he intend to go back next year, or is this a case for a return visit from somebody in Australia? What is the purpose of the government in this regard, or is there some other minister who is now in for a trip? I suggest that in view of the valiant, if not triumphant, services of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) of late, some of these favours be accorded to him, and that the globe-trotting be not in the future monopolized by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. ROBB: It is fair to the leader of the Opposition that I should say to him why I went to Australia. My right hon. friend and I entered this House the same day, and I have a great admiration for his agility and cleverness in trying to draw an opponent. Let me assure him right now that he is not going to draw me far enough to say anything about the treaty, when it will be announced or what it will consist of when announced. But it is fair to answer the question why we went to Australia. I was sent to Australia by the government on the invitation of the genial friend of my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister of Australia, who first sent his minister, Senator Pearce, as my right hon friend knows. We met Senator Pearce together.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About a year and a half ago.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A year and a quarter.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is a little off. In February of last year, Senator Pearce opened negotiations with this government. The Prime Minister of Australia cabled the Prime Minister of Canada urging him to send a minister down there to conclude negotiations opened by Senator Pearce. We considered the matter; it was decided that some person should go down, and the morning when I had instructions to cable the Prime Minister of Australia when we would arrive, the Canadian press intimated the possibility of an election in Australia. We again cabled the Prime Minister of Australia pointing out what the Canadian press carried, and a reply came back to come along at once, that there was nothing to interfere with the negotiations. I started and reached Vancouver. The morning I reached Vancouver the Canadian press announced the dissolution of the Australian parliament, and the Prime Minister of Canada cabled the Prime Minister of Australia pointing out the news carried in the Canadian press and suggesting that we defer the trip until after the elections. But the Prime Minister of the sister dominion of Australia urged that a minister from Canada should come along. Would my right hon. friend say that we should have been so discourteous as to refuse that invitation from a sister dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not a case of discourtesy; it was a case of this government exercising its judgment as to when an opportune time for the conference might be. The Prime Minister of Australia may have been very optimistic as to the result of the contest.

Mr. ROBB: Others have been.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not follow that his optimism should have been shared by the government of Canada so far as to transport a minister of Trade and Commerce diagonally around the world to negotiate a treaty with a government that undoubtedly had no security of tenure, and that now, I understand, is out of office. Were the ministers with whom the hon. member negotiated returned? Are they to-day in power? Not one of them. What was the value of his negotiations? He should have been the judge whether this expenditure and this absence from office and duty here were wise on behalf of the people of Canada. The Prime Minister of Australia should not have been the judge. The government of Canada should have exercised its judgment in the premises, and if it did, so much the worse for its judgment.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend is wrong. One of the ministers with whom I had friendly conferences regarding trade, is to-day Prime Minister of Australia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One of them and all the rest on the other side. The government is a different one altogether; the influences are not the same; it is not controlled by the same factors in any way. The minister has no treaty. If he went to Austrailia and negotiated with responsible parties, where is his treaty? He has not a treaty.

Mr. CAHILL: Does one always have to have a treaty when one looks for one?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but we like to have one when we pay for one. I honestly hope the results, when they come after the next or the succeeding visit, will be better than the results so far of the various treaty-making efforts of the government. I would much rather the infertility continued. I would much rather the death and decay that seem to surround this government would remain, and that nothing of new life would even ferment, than that we get much more of the character of treaties that have been presented up to date.

Mr. COOTE: I was endeavouring to get an opportunity to say a few words before the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) threw his cocoanut oil on the troubled waters; but I was unsuccessful. I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a little item which I read in the press a short time ago, possibly while he was on his tour of the world. In this article it is stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been addressing some members of the Country party in Australia. A deputation was urging upon the minister the extension of the British preferential tariff to Australian products. I quote the following:

> The deputation stated that the Country party was wholly in favour of the removal of high duties on agricultural implements and tools of trade, and in return it was hoped that the Canadian government would extend preference to Australian products. In the course of his reply Mr. Robb said, as reported in the Country News, of Adelaide, the official organ of the Country party:
> Our country is very different from yours and while our tariff has not pleased everybody, it is at least endorsed by those who are producers. I maintain that it is neither good policy nor good business to encourage immigration to a country and then, when they have settled down to work, penalize them by heaping burdens on their industry.

In the report I am quoting there appears in parenthesis at this point "hear, hear."

> Our policy is to make implements of production and tools of trade as cheap as possible. Then production itself is cheapened, foodstuffs are cheapened, cost of living is lowered and the nation is sounder and safer (Applause). You may rest assured that if there is no reciprocal arrangement at last made between Australia and Canada it will not be Canada's fault (Applause).

The article goes on to say:

> We can appreciate the applause of the deputation; Mr. Robb's remarks embody an eminently sound policy, but why doesn't he talk like that in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He used to.

Mr. COOTE (reading):

> Why has he to go over to the other side of the globe to tell farmers that it is bad business for a nation to tax their implements and tools of trade? If he would tell the farmers of Canada that it is not good policy or good business to encourage settlement on the land and then penalize the settlers "by heaping burdens on their industry," he would gain as attentive and as appreciative an audience as ever he could get in Australia or anywhere else. Doesn't good policy and good business, like charity, begin at home? Mr. Robb in Australia is anxious that the farmers should have cheap implements and tools of trade; it means cheaper production and cheaper living. Mr. Robb in Canada supports precisely the same policy as the Australian government of taxes on agricultural implements and tools of trade, and a consequent penalizing of the primary producers.

I hope that last sentence libels the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb). I trust it is not true and that he will support a policy that will mean cheaper tools and implements of production for the farmer. I hope we shall find him supporting a budget of that nature, although I am not very sure about it. But I did wonder to-night when the minister made his statement whether he had been hunting for a market for butter while on his tour of the world. If so, it seems to me that Australia was rather a peculiar place in which to start looking for it. I was very much pleased indeed to hear of the possibilities of dairying in the province of Quebec, and I am glad to hear that in that particular section of the country the farms are not mortgaged. But I want to warn those people beforehand that they must be on the look out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has urged the Alberta farmers to go more heavily into the production of butter, and I want to quote something for the benefit of the minister who can warn his people at home of what is ahead of them. This is taken from the evidence given by Mr. Leitch before the special committee which is inquiring into agricultural conditions. Professor Leitch was asked this question by the chairman:

Q. You know the Department of Agriculture is advocating mixed farming to a large extent to our western people. If that is carried out to any appreciable extent, it will mean the competition of the West in butter and cheese, butter especially. What effect will that have?—A. Under present conditions the quality of Canada's butter supply—of course, it can have but one effect, and that is to reduce the price.

By Mr. Hammell:

Q. What about our export surplus?—A. That cannot readily compete, on account of its quality, with the countries of Denmark and Australia.

By the Chairman:

Q. We do not make as good butter as Australia?—A. No.

By Mr. Caldwell:

Q. We do not have the grading?—A. The three western provinces make butter that is a credit to this country. Ontario and Quebec butter is a disgrace to the country.

Q. How about the Maritime provinces?—A. I could not say.

By the Chairman:

Q. Professor Leitch, give us the reasons for our falling down in butter production, and give us some remedy.—A. Up to two years ago, we did not make enough butter in Ontario to supply our own home demand, and since we were just making enough, or not quite enough for the home demand, the price was good.

Our people, the consumers of Ontario, are not quite educated to a high quality of butter, they are easily satisfied, but two years ago we had a little surplus to export from Ontario, and it went over to England, a large part of it, and made a very bad reputation for itself as compared with the butter from Denmark and Australia and western Canada, but the quality reflected on all Canadian butter.

Now, I think it is my duty to point out to the minister that if he gets all these farmers in Alberta producing butter, when it comes into competition with the poor butter of Ontario and Quebec the farmers there will have a hard job to market their product. Alberta can produce butter; the farmers there produce the best butter in Canada. I saw that statement in the Agricultural Gazette a few months ago; it was reported that Alberta in a Dominion-wide competition had the highest score of any province in Canada in their butter exhibit. If we are making the best butter, it is quite evident as the minister will see, that when we begin to compete with this poor butter of Ontario and Quebec they are going to experience a great deal of difficulty in marketing their butter at any price, because as Professor Leitch says, when the quantity is increased the price will be lowered. The people of Alberta can make good butter and they will make large quantities of it if you will show them the market for it. When I went home last summer after the session, the man who was running my farm told me that they had sold their butter at 18 cents a pound in June. Surely it is not necessary to argue, even with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that no matter how good a cow you have, butter at 18 cents a pound will not return such wages as will sustain life. I was visited by a woman from our home town a few weeks ago. She stated, that four weeks ago to-morrow, in that town of seven hundred people there were one thousand dozen eggs marketed and the price paid by the stores was 15 cents a dozen.

Mr. FOURNIER: That is bad treatment of the hens.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, it is hard on the hens. Ten years ago that might not have been so bad. But the woman who takes these eggs into town and gets 15 cents a dozen for them probably wants to buy some gingham or cotton to make clothing for the children at home. Ten years ago the price of checked gingham, 36 inches wide, in the T. Eaton Company's catalogue was 18 cents a yard. In their present catalogue the same quality of gingham, 27 inches wide—you will notice it has been narrowed down—is 23 cents a yard. Factory cotton in 1912 was 10 cents a yard, now it is 25 cents per yard. It will take quite a few dozen eggs to buy enough cotton or gingham to clothe two or three children now. Circular pillow cotton used to be 18 cents ten years ago, to-day it is 35 cents a yard. I could give quite a long list of articles showing that compared with ten years ago the purchasing power of the farmers' eggs will return him about 8 cents or 9 cents a dozen. Now, do hon. gentlemen think it is fair for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to urge us to pin our faith to the cow—and I suppose he would include a few chickens?

Mr. FAFARD: It has been stated to-night that during the late by-election in Moose Jaw eggs were on sale in a certain grocery there at 18 cents a dozen. I must correct that statement. Maybe it was made in good faith, but I do not think it is fair to the hens of Moose Jaw. I have before me the Moose Jaw Evening Times of April 9th in which the price for eggs is given at 40 cents a dozen.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, the statement of the last speaker has induced me to rise to my feet. I think it is agreed by all, nowithstanding the difference of opinion expressed, that agriculture is really in a bad way at the present time. I do not like this constant cheering when any remark is made about farmers not working all the year around. It is not true. I can assure you that the farmers of Manitoba do work all the year round.

An hon. MEMBER: And the farmers all over.

Mr. FORKE: I have remarked before that I am not as pessimistic perhaps as some of my friends, although I do not differ with them as to present agricultural conditions. But I think there are other factors that perhaps we do not pay enough attention to, and I am confident that if the hon. member who has just given us the price of eggs at Moose Jaw could have given us the price which the farmer received for those eggs there would be a considerable spread disclosed. Two or three weeks ago while in an Ontario farm home I asked the lady of the house what they were getting for eggs. She phoned to the local store and found the price was 35 cents a dozen. When I returned to Ottawa I asked my wife what she was paying for eggs and she told me 60 cents a dozen. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one of the greatest difficulties we have to overcome in our system of doing business—the cost of distribution. I do not care whether the producer is a manufacturer or a farmer, each is suffering alike because the spread is so wide between the price the producer receives and the consumer pays. It is no use our throwing recriminations backward and forward; this will not do us any good. The cost of distribution is one of the great problems that faces us, because this cost represents so much waste. I do not think anyone all along the line is making exorbitant profits to-day, but our system is too cumbrous and complicated to meet modern conditions.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What would my hon. friend suggest to decrease the cost of distribution?

Mr. FORKE: I have no remedy offhand, but I have no hesitation in stating that I think a good deal can be done by legislation. At the same time I believe the remedy to a certain extent is in the hands of the people themselves.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: How would my friend decrease the cost of distribution by legislation?

Mr. FORKE: That is a pretty difficult question to solve offhand.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It is difficult for everyone.

Mr. FORKE: I think co-operation would help a great deal. The cost of production can be brought down by various methods that I might enumerate and will perhaps have an opportunity to do so in this House at a future time. We have theories, they may not be correct, but at the proper time I am quite prepared to state my ideas of what can be done from the economic point of view. I do not suppose my hon. friend opposite will agree with me. However, I give him credit for believing he is right, and I hope he will extend to me the same courtesy.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Surely.

Mr. FORKE: I thoroughly agree with my friends who have painted a rather black picture of agriculture. Where I differ from them is in my outlook towards the future. I have even some faith that the cow of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce can assit us with her butter, and no doubt our hens too can be relied upon to do their duty. But the tremendous difference between the price received by the producer and the price paid by the consumer ought to be eliminated. Recently I received a letter from a merchant in a town in Manitoba in which he said he was only able to pay 19 cents a dozen for eggs. I do not know what is being paid in the cities at the present time, but I have an idea that a great many of those 19-cent eggs are going into cold storage and will be sold at a very much higher price later on when the supply is scarce. I think the farmers by having cold storage facilities and marketing their eggs at proper times may help themselves along this line.

Mr. ROBB: I promised the hon. gentleman opposite a few moments ago to give him figures respecting butter shipped to the Orient last year. We shipped 174,784 pounds of butter and about 6,000 pounds of cheese.

Mr. COOTE: Is any valuation given?

Mr. ROBB: The value is given at $54,366.19. I am not sure whether that is f.o.b. at point of shipment or at Vancouver.

Mr. FORKE: I would point out to the minister that the export value does not cut very much of a figure so far as agricultural products are concerned. The prairie provinces this year produced some 300,000,000 or 400,000,000 bushels of wheat—a tremendous amount. No such wealth was ever produced by the same percentage of population in the world before, and yet we find that those producers are not able to make a living. The export value shows that the wealth is in the country, but the people who produce that wealth are not reaping the benefit.

Mr. ROBB: I have not been offering these figures as indicating profitable business at all, but merely to show the extent of Canadian business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will ask the House to bear with me a moment while with much deference and humility I offer a few observations on the subject that is under discussion, although it is not the subject that is referred to by the motion. I was interested in the remark of the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke). He begged of the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) that as the two of them differ in their attitude towards this farmer's problem the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères would give him credit for sincerity, which he would reciprocate. I know that the request will not be denied, for the reason that it is only a few months since the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères adopted the same attitude as is now adopted by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). It is only a few months, indeed, since the difference between the sale price of the farmer and the purchase price of the consumer was laid at the door of a profiteering government by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, and was laid at the door of that awful monster, protection, by all hon. gentlemen across the way. Consequently they should not be slow in according courteous treatment to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) while he now presses home the arguments in which they were so prolific just eighteen months ago.

Let me refer to another feature. I do not think anyone has listened to these contentions longer than I have or has been the object of them, the one to be destroyed by them, more directly than I have been. The leader of the Progressive party himself, in the fall campaign of 1921, emphasized the serious position the country was in because of the policy pursued by the then administration; because of what he alleged was the big interest affiliation of the Prime Minister of that day. Why, he said, we have the spectacle of the farmer's products going down until he cannot make a profit, while the stock of Dominion Textiles, for example, is at a figure higher by far than just a few years ago; the one is up and the other away down. The hon. gentleman had on his paint and feathers and was on the warpath to bring about a change in those conditions by political effort. To-day the farmer's products are much further down, textile stock is much further up, and the leader of the Progressives has retired from politics. Why all this change? What is the cause of the intensifying, the aggravating of the condition against which there was so much thunder in the fall of 1921? There was nothing complained of in that day that to-day does not exist in intensified and aggravated form. I appeal to hon. gentlemen to my left if such is not the case. It is the case; the cost of living higher; the farmer's products selling lower all along the line; what the farmer has to buy standing up; prosperity harder to find in every part of this Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not be pessimistic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I will not, but before I am through the hon. gentleman will understand my views on these questions; at any rate it will not be owing to lack of effort if I do not make them understood. Much of what hon. gentlemen complain of respecting the condition of farming in Canada is true. In fact, I do not know of very much they have said that is not true. The condition of farming in this country to-day is a very difficult one. The farmer is undoubtedly getting pre-war price for what he sells and is paying almost double the pre-war price for what he buys. That is true of the whole Dominion.

Mr. McMASTER: Is Saul also among the prophets?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, Saul also may be among the prophets—I heard Saul prophesy a year and a half ago in the person of the hon. member for Brome, but I have not heard Saul anything like so loud in recent weeks, and I do not look for very much from him in this session. Now, in eastern Canada the pressure of these conditions does not come home in quite the same degree as it does in the West, for reasons that I will advert to later, but which for the moment I will only describe in these words: In western Canada the tendency to invest the profits of the inflation period was greater than in eastern Canada, because the land, which is the farmer's capital, was nearer at hand and more abundant. That is one reason; another is this: That the volume of purchases per man is greater in the West, and consequently when the cost of purchases rises, the western man feels it more than does the eastern farmer. Nevertheless conditions are difficult in every province. I may be asked whether I attribute this to the administration. If I followed the example of hon. gentlemen opposite I would do so. I do it in part; I believe there were variations in taxation a year ago that in at least substantial degree—material degree; put it that way—are responsible for the extra burdens the common people of this country carry now. But I do not attribute it wholly to hon. gentlemen opposite or to any policy being followed by the government of the day, it is only partly due to that, and that part, while it is material, is not the main factor by any means. Why do I say so? I ask hon. gentlemen to look the world over now, as I asked them to do two years ago and a year ago, look into other countries and ask themselves the question: Is the condition of agriculture better there than it is here? Are not the same wailings, the same cries and complaints, heard in every country of the world at this hour? Are they so loud and so fierce and so well foundationed in any country as they are in the Old Land, free trade England to-day? What is the main problem of the British government right now?

Mr. FORKE: Taxation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Taxation, yes; and they are heavily taxed. We do not know what taxes are compared to what they have over there. But agriculture over there is not specially taxed; the great burden of taxation does not fall on it at all.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What about the rents—the rent burdens of agriculture over there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course they have a rent burden, but you have an interest burden in its place. The hon. gentleman attributes it to rent over there? What about Ireland? In Ireland the rent burden has been pretty much done away with, but precisely the same conditions prevail.

Mr. BIRD: Does the hon. gentleman contend that the ratio of taxation to wealth is greater in Great Britain than it is in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I think it is.

Mr. BIRD: Is the right hon. gentleman certain about that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is. It is on the mass of the people. The tax in Canada on very great wealth is heavier than it is there, and the tax on the mass of the people is heavier there, although it has been made heavier in this country within the last year. Hon. gentlemen assert that there must be something wrong with government policy because agriculture is in this position and because there is a constant diminution of the proportion of agriculturists in our country to the total of population. I know it is in the minds of hon. members—I know it is not in the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and never was; he only pretended it was—that this condition is due to false fiscal policy. Well, if there is a country in the world that illustrates the diminution of agricultural population more clearly and more forcibly than any other, it is Great Britain. Great Britain to-day has not more than 17 per cent of its population on the land.

Mr. FORKE: Surely the right hon. leader of the opposition would never compare Great Britain with Canada on equal terms as regards agriculture?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course not.

Mr. FORKE: Great Britain is not an agricultural country at all; it is an industrial country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it was pretty much an agricultural country before free trade came in; I will give the hon. gentleman the figures in a moment. I say that to-day 17 per cent of the population of Great Britain are on the land. In the year 1850 there was over half, of the population, on the land, so that it was pretty much an agricultural country. I think that the process of diminution has been intensified there by the failure to provide a preference for the British producer in the British market. But I do not think that is the main cause in the diminution of the proportion of agriculture.

Mr. EVANS: What was the population at that time? Are there not as many on the land now as then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not by any means. If the hon. gentleman will read the reports of the expert committees appointed by the government of Mr. Asquith he will find that the number on the land to-day is not by thousands, nor tens or hundreds of thousands, nor by something over a million what it was then. It is, I think, between one and two million less than it was at that time. There are reasons for it, I know. I was just about to say that it is not due in the main to the fiscal policy of the British government, although I know it is the opinion of the great bulk of agriculturists of the Old Land, and I think they are right, that if the fiscal policy of Great Britain were different and they had a preference in the market they have helped so much to build up, there would be a larger proportion of farmers in that country to-day; but there would not be anything like the proportion there was fifty or sixty years ago. Is there a country in the world to-day where there is the same percentage of agriculturists as there was fifty years ago? There is not, and I will say this further: There is no country in the world where the diminution of agriculturists in proportion to the rest of the people has been less than it has been in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. COOTE: Would Canada have had a less proportion of her people on the land to-day if she had not for years carried on a persistent, paid, government propaganda to put people on our vacant lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think we would have had less people on the land if we had not had that propaganda, not only less on the land but less everywhere else. I do not think the propaganda has resulted in a larger or smaller proportion on the land. I think it has resulted in a somewhat larger population, more on the land and more elsewhere as well. I do not think it has affected the proportion by any perceptible amount whatever.

I was speaking of the Old Country. Now I come back to Canada. I ask hon. gentlemen to inquire and tell me of a country in the world where the proportion of agriculturists to-day as compared with fifty or eighty years ago is as great as it is in Canada. I do not think there is one. I know the United States is not one. I know Great Britain is not one. Great Britain has gone down from nearly sixty per cent to about seventeen per cent, where it is to-day.

Mr. COOTE: Was there any other country that had the same amount of free land to exploit?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The United States had. Australia had, the Argentine had—all these new countries of the world had. I do not know that they had as much fine new land for agricultural purposes as we had, and if we had the more that would be one reason why we have diminished less than they have, and what the hon. gentleman has in mind would be right. But what is the fundamental cause of the diminution of the proportion of agriculturists in the Dominion, in the United States, in Great Britain, in France, in Germany, in Australia, in every country in the world? Surely it is not because the people the world over have been following mirages in fiscal policies, have not had brains enough to see what is the right and proper course. We cannot come to that conclusion, because while one country has followed one course, another has followed another, and it so turns out that those who pursued the policy of free trade have found their proportion of agriculturists come down most rapidly of all.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. member mean to say that there are vacant farms in Great Britain?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have seen them, but I would not say there are vacant farms where the land is good and reasonably fit for agriculture. I do not know whether there are or not, I know that land has gone out of cultivation and into grazing to the extent of millions of acres. However, that is not the point. I am trying to deal with the matter in the large. There are influences of a minor character that are different in one country from another, but when you find every country has its urban population multiplied and its rural population diminished, you must look for something more basic than anything that is peculiar to the individual country.

What is it that is basic? Why surely it is this, and this is not anything new on my part. I was seeking to make this clear to the Prime Minister when he was leader of the Opposition, and I did not have much success. I will have far better success to-night. I know it was understood then thoroughly by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The fact is we do not require as large a proportion in the world to-day to produce what the farmer produces for the world as we did in those times. Why do we not? Some would say, because we have machinery which produces more rapidly, we do not need as many on the land. That is true, but that is not the main cause in my opinion, for the reason that we have also machinery in other occupations of life producing other goods much more rapidly than they were produced in olden times. It is one of the reasons, however, because the multiplication of production by machinery is more emphatic on the land than it is in many others of the occupations of mankind.

But the main reason to my mind is this, that with the advance and evolution of civilization the needs of the human race multiply, the demands of the human race multiply. They multiply in one field after another, in the field of what we wear, in the field of the amusements necessary to entertain us, in the field of travel. In all the different spheres of this life the demands of the world are getting greater, more complicated, more multiplied, and it takes a bigger proportion to cater to these demands to-day than it did in days gone by. Where an hon. gentleman to-day travels at the rate of a thousand miles a year his grandfather travelled at the rate of a hundred miles a year. It takes men to conduct that travel. It takes a part of the world's population to provide the facilities and see that these things can be done. Then there are a thousand engaged in amusing the world to-day where only fifty were engaged seventy-five years ago. That is all consuming a portion of the population, and consequently, because of that continuous process that has been going on for decades, the world does not need and therefore the world does not employ as many in producing the single article of food of which the human being consumes just as much to-day as it did half a century ago, just as much and no more. I have tried to make clear what I regard as the fundamental cause, and what I think economists—I do not pretend to be one myself—regard as the fundamental cause of a process that is world wide.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member, I think, has given us a complete outline, but he has missed the point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the point?

Mr. FORKE: The point is this. The wealth has to be produced from the land just as much as it ever had to be, and those on the land to-day have to cater to a much larger population than formerly. That is one of the reasons why agriculture to-day is in such poor shape. We have radio and other inventions that must be paid for. How are they paid for in Manitoba, let us say? Largely from the products of the soil. Consequently the soil is more and more taxed to pay for all these luxuries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the hon. member's mind is on the right line. If, of course, we assume that the farm pays for everything—

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. FORKE: I do not say that exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the line of his reasoning.

Mr. FORKE: There is no wealth in Canada but what is produced from the natural resources of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or in any other country.

Mr. FORKE: Well then, the more luxuries are multiplied, the heavier the burden becomes on those who produce the primary wealth of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see that at all. Any man who works, whether he works at the basis or at the top, whether he is working to bring the gold out of the mine or the coal, or working to turning those products into something else, every man is contributing to the world's wealth.

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me again. Does the hon. member think that the man who is working at the production of radio apparatus is as necessary to the human race as the man who is producing a bushel of wheat?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. FORKE: Then why put them on a level?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not putting them on a level. I say that every man who produces of the world's wealth, whether he is producing at the top, at the acme of the last effort of manufacture, or at the very bottom out of the soil is contributing to the world's wealth.

Mr. FORKE: I do not deny that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all I stated, but the idea, to my mind, is entirely erroneous that the more the world enjoys the more those on the soil have to pay for it, work and bear. It is not so at all. No man is compelled to stay on the soil in any free country. There are those who think a terrible calamity has occurred if their son leaves the farm and goes to the city. I have no sympathy with that view whatever. I think the future of our land depends upon the growth of boys on the farm and their maturing not only into farm life but into all walks of life. The greatness of our nation depends upon the young farmer who is getting into other walks of life as well as producing sufficient of the products of the farm to meet the economic needs of the country in which he is born. When a man finds he can do better elsewhere, his country has no call on him to stay on his father's farm. If he thinks he can do better any where else he has just as good a right as any other man to get into another field. It is a free country and he can go where he thinks he may do better. We are producing proportionately far more than we did years ago. We are producing far more grain. If we produced twice as much I do not think it would be any better for those who were producing it—it would be worse. Let those who wish go where they can be best employed to their own advantage and in my judgment in so going and so acting they are doing the best thing for the country in which they live. There will still be plenty of wheat produced, there will still be plenty of barley produced, and it may be that prices will be higher because there will not be so many working at it. Then we will get that readjustment for which we are waiting.

We are however suffering much to-day from a condition which I think is more or less artificial. Time will have to cure it, and such measures as will tend to cure it should be adopted. In the world to-day, by virtue of the power of organization, those engaged in other walks of life have an advantage over those employed upon the land. Because of the power of labour to organize owing to the uniformity of the work in which they are employed, they have been able to hold up the production costs of goods made elsewhere than upon the land. Had the farmer equal power of organization—he has an equal right—then he would be in a position to obtain results parallel with the results of those engaged in production in other fields.

Mr. FORKE: My right hon. friend has got my point of view exactly; he has stated everything I have been trying to get at.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad if that is so, but I was dealing with another phase of the subject. I am trying to show now the cause of the extreme feature of present conditions. It is not due to the fiscal policy of one country as opposed to the fiscal policy of another. It is due to something far more basic, namely, what I mentioned first. But this affects the situation too: There is an artificial element in production of another character. Much can be gained by the economic organization of the agriculturists of the country. The economic organization of agriculturists is an essential thing and must be perfected in this country far further than it is especially in organization for distribution. Organization will come that will control the total output of the farmer's products and thereby make his sale price bear some relation to his cost of production just as is enabled to be done in other fields of production. How long that will be in coming no one can foresee; but there will be far more effective organization, economic organization, of the agriculturists of this country; and I hope I will not be accused of political prejudice—much less any other kind of prejudice—if I suggest that if the efforts of the agriculturists of Canada had been directed on economic lines for concerted production—or indeed, restriction of production—in fields that were shown not to be successful; more economic distribution of the products of the farm, more direct distribution of those products to the consumer than we have through the cumbersome system of to-day—if that had been the main object of agricultural organization in Canada, instead of the attainment of political power, it would have been better for the farmers of this country. I hope I shall not be misunderstood as attempting to say that I have any objection, or that anybody has any objection, to the farmers obtaining political power. Not at all, they have the same rights as any other people in this Dominion; but there cannot be anything gained by a political farmers' party.

11 p.m.

There can be a lot gained by economic organization amongst farmers. Where it has been directed along that line great results have been achieved. They have been achieved more easily, I think, in smaller and more compact countries of less diversified conditions. There conditions more readily lend themselves to organization. Great things have been done in Belgium, in Holland, and in other countries of that character. They have also been done in larger countries. Even in the United States the farmers have achieved great results, when they have centred their energies upon economic organization and have not launched into other fields.

Now, having advanced these ideas I want to emphasize again that I do so certainly out of no prejudice to any part of our population. I do not pretend to have any special knowledge of farming; I have never sought to impose a knowledge of farming either on this House or any audience; but I think I know something of farm conditions. Before I take my seat, let me say that I do not pay very much attention to the evidence of any man no matter how expert as to whether farming pays or whether it does not pay. You can bring an expert to try and show what a thing costs and what it sells for by taking so much an hour for 11 hours a day in the case of a farm; and you can get a result that will show that no class of farming pays in any part of the country. But I have been on land when we had to sell farm products—dairy products—at less than the worst quotations—yes, less than one half the worst quotation—offered by any hon. member in this House, and I know that on that farm the mortgage was paid off, I know that a large family was given an education. I venture to say that if Expert Leitch had got into the recesses of the house on that farm and had got at the same material that he got at to come before this committee, he could have shown there was a loss on the operations of that farm every year. I do not know how we are going to get reliable or useful statistics as to what a bushel of wheat, or a quart of milk, or a pound of butter costs. With all deference I venture to say it cannot be done but I do know of farmers who through good and bad times, through difficult weather as well as through fair weather, have managed to make comfortable homes and comfortable fortunes, have managed to raise creditable and useful families, and such is the best proof that agriculture has paid in general. In the stage at which we are now I know there will be little money made, I know that many will go back, but these things adjust themselves as time moves on. What we are suffering every country in the world has gone through; and the way we can accelerate the return of better times is firstly by better organization; secondly, by intelligent direction; and, thirdly, lightening the taxation burden by economies in overhead expenditures which, in the case of a country, means economical administration.
